GATTERER, JOHN CHRISTOPHER, a learned German historian; author of a "History of the World to the time of Cyrus," "An Essay towards a General Universal History," &c. His treatises display a spirit of deep research and sound criticism. D. 1799.

GAUBIL, ANTHONY, a learned French missionary in China, was b. at Caillae, in 1708, and d. at Pekin in 1759, where he was interpreter to the court. He wrote the history of Genghis Khan, and an "Historical and Critical Treatise on Chinese Astronomy."

GAUBIUS, JEROME DAVID, a celebrated physician, was b. at Heidelberg, in 1705. His treatise on the "Method of Prescribing, or of Writing Receipts," contains the best rules on that important subject. But his greatest work is his "Principles of Nosology." D. 1780.

GAUDENTIO, an historical painter of Milan, was b. about 1460. He painted in fresco and oil a number of pictures for the churches in his native city.

GAULTIER, LOUIS, a French abbé, whose life was spent in rendering education a scientific amusement rather than a task, was b. about the year 1745. D. 1818.

GAUTHEY, EMILIAN MARIE, an eminent civil engineer, was b. at Chalons-sur-Saone, in France, in 1732. He filled several important posts; and under his direction many public works of magnitude were undertaken and completed. He conceived the idea of forming a canal from Chalons to Dijon, which is termed the "canal du centre," and is 23 leagues in extent. This was completed in 1791. He also executed the junction canals of the Saone, Yonne, and Doubs; and built several bridges and quays. He wrote several professional treatises, the principal one of which is entitled "Traité complet sur la Construction des Ponts et des Canaux navigables." D. 1806.

GAVARD, HYACINTHE, one of the most able anatomists of the 18th century, was b. at Montmelian, in 1753, and was a pupil of Desault. He published treatises on osteology, myology, and splanchnology, the latter of which especially has been highly praised. D. 1802.

GAY, JOHN, an eminent English poet, was b. at Barnstaple, Devon, in 1688, was apprenticed to a silk-mercant in London; but, showing a marked aversion to trade, his indentures were cancelled by mutual agreement, and he devoted himself to literature. In 1711 he published his "Rural Sports," which he dedicated to Pope, then a young poet like himself; a compliment that introduced them to each other, and proved the foundation of a friendship which lasted for life. The year following he was appointed secretary to the duchess of Monmouth. About this time came out his burlesque poem, entitled "Trivia, or the Art of Walking the Streets of London;" which was succeeded, in 1714, by the "Shepherd's Week, a series of Pastorals," in ridicule of Phillips. The same year he went to Hanover with the earl of Clarendon, as secretary to the embassy; but though he had great expectations from the court, they were never realized. In 1720 he published his poems, in 2 vols. 4to., by subscription; which produced him a considerable sum, but he lost it all in the South Sea scheme. After producing many ingenious and agreeable works, some instances of court favor encouraged him to employ himself in his well-known "Fables," written professedly for the instruction of the duke of Cumberland, and published with a dedication to that prince in 1726; but though they were popular, they failed to serve him at court. He thereupon wrote "The Beggar's Opera," which was first acted in 1727, and ran for 63 successive nights; but it so offended the persons in power, that the lord chamberlain refused to license for performance a second part of it, entitled "Polly." This resentment induced his friends to come forward on its publication with so handsome a subscription, that his profits amounted to £1200. The cause of Gay was taken up by the duke and duchess of Queensberry, who gave him a residence in their house, where he d. Dec. 11, 1732. He was buried in Westminster abbey, and a monument was erected to his memory.

GAY-LUSSAC, NICOLAS FRANCOIS, whose important discoveries in numerous branches of physics and chemistry have placed him in the foremost ranks of science, was b. at St. Leonard, in France, 1788. At an early age he distinguished himself by his aerial voyages for the observation of atmospheric phenomena at great heights; and the numerous experiments he made in conjunction with Humboldt, Renard, and Berthollet, on an infinite variety of subjects connected with the general laws that regulate the composition of bodies, have proved of eminent practical utility. He closed a long life of almost unparalleled scientific industry, May 9, 1850.

GAYOT DE PITAVAL, FRANCIS, a French writer, was b. at Lyons, in 1678. He was at first an ecclesiastic; next he entered into the army; and, at the age of 50, he became an advocate. He compiled the "Causes Célèbres." D. 1743.

GAZA, THEODORE, one of the chief revivers of Greek literature in the 15th century, was b. at Thessalonica, in 1398. D. 1478.

GBER, an Arabian philosopher of the 8th century, whose skill in astronomy and alchemical researches obtained for him in that dark age the character of a magician. He is said to have been a Greek by birth, and to have apostatized from Christianity to Mahometanism. His works, under the title of "Lapis Philosophorum," prove that his knowledge of chemistry was by no means so limited as that of many who wrote subsequently to his time.

GBERHARDI, LOUIS ALBERT, a voluminous historical writer; author of the histories of Denmark and Norway, the Wendes and Slavonians, Courland, Hungary, the sovereign houses of Germany, and various portions of the "Universal History," published at Halle. He was librarian at Hanover, where he d. in 1802.

GED, WILLIAM, the inventor of the art of stereotyping, which he practised in 1725, was a goldsmith of Edinburgh. In 1729 he entered into partnership with Fenner, a stationer of London, but no advantage to him resulted from the connection, and he returned to Scotland. D. 1749.

GEDDES, ALEXANDER, a Roman Catholic priest, b. in Ruthven, Banffshire, 1737. In 1779 the university of Aberdeen granted him the degree of LL.D., being the first Catholic since the reformation to whom it had been given. About this time he removed to London, and began to devote himself to a translation of the Bible into English. In 1786 he published his prospectus of that work. The first volume of it appeared in 1792, comprising the Pentateuch and the Book of Joshua; and in 1797 appeared the second volume; after which he published "Critical Remarks," in vindication of his work, and an "Apology for the Roman Catholics of Great Britain." D. 1802.—JAMES, an ingenious writer, was b. in Tweeddale, Scotland, in 1710; educated at Edinburgh; entered on the study of the law, and was admitted an advocate. He was the author of "An Essay on the Composition and Manner of Writing of the Ancients, particularly Plato." D. 1749.—MICHAEL, an eminent English divine of the 17th century. He was chaplain to the factory at Lisbon, where he was apprehended by the Inquisition in 1686, and interdicted from officiating in his ministerial capacity; on which he returned to England, and was made chancellor of Salisbury. He wrote the "History of the Church of Malabar," the "Church History of Ethiopia." D. 1741.

GEDOYN, NICHOLAS, the translator of Quintilian and Pausanias into French, was b. at Orleans in 1667, and d. in 1744.

GEER, CHARLES DE, a very celebrated Swedish naturalist, was b. in 1720. He possessed a share in the iron-works at Dannemora, which mines he improved by the application of new machinery. He also invented an apparatus for drying corn by the heat of the smelting houses. By these means he gained great wealth, which he applied to the noblest purposes, in feeding the poor, repairing churches, and establishing schools. He was appointed marshal of the court, knight of the polar star, and created a baron. He wrote "Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire des Insectes." D. 1778.

GELASIUS, bishop of Cæsarea in the 4th century, was the author of a "History of the Church," of which some portions are still extant. D. 394.—I., was elevated to the papal chair on the death of Felix III. in 492. He had a contest with the patriarch of Constantinople, and by his arrogance prevented a union between the two churches. D. 496.—II., a native of Campania, was elected pope in 1118. Cencio, marquis di Frangipan, who was in the interest of the Emperor Henry V., drove him from Rome, and he retired to the abbey of Clugny, where he d. 1119.

GELL, Sir WILLIAM, a celebrated antiquarian and classical scholar, was b. in 1777. He devoted his time to literary pursuits, and published "The Topography of Troy," "The Geography and Antiquities of Ithaca," "The Itinerary of Greece," "The Itinerary of the Morea," "The Topography of Rome," and, lastly, his interesting and beautiful work, entitled "Pompeiana, or Observations upon the Topography, Edifices, and Ornaments of Pompeii." For many years Sir William had resided in Italy; first at Rome, and afterwards at Naples. He was knighted on his return from a mission to the Ionian Islands in 1803; and in 1820 the late Queen Caroline appointed him one of her chamberlains. D. 1836.

GELLERT, CHRISTIAN FURCHTEGOTT, a German poet and writer on morals, was b. at Haynichen, in Saxony, in 1715. He received his education at Leipsic, and acquired great celebrity by his tales, fables, and essays. He was appointed extraordinary professor of philosophy at Leipsic, where he read lectures on poetry and eloquence, which were received with great applause. His complete works were published in 10 vols. D. 1769.—CHRISTLIEB EHREGOTT, brother of the preceding, was a celebrated metallurgist. He introduced very important improvements into the method of separating metallic substances by amalgamation, and wrote on the arts. B. 1713; d. 1795.

GELLI, GIAMBATISTA, an Italian poet and dramatic writer, b. at Florence, in 1498. He was bred to some low trade, but became a member of the academy of Florence, and had a high reputation in his day. Besides his original works, consisting of comedies, poems, and remarks on the Italian language, he translated the "History of Euripides," into Italian. D. 1563.

GELLIBRAND, HENRY, a mathematician, b. in London, in 1597, and educated at Trinity college, Oxford. In 1627 he was elected professor of astronomy at Gresham college. He wrote several useful works on the longitude, the variation of the magnetic needle, on trigonometry, and on navigation. D. 1636.

GELLIUS, AULUS, a Roman lawyer, b. in 130. He studied at Athens, and is the author of "Noctes Atticæ," a work full of interesting observations, critical and philological.

GEMINIANI, FRANCESCO, an eminent musical composer, was b. at Lucca, in 1666, and completed his studies under Corelli. His chief work is entitled, "Guida Harmonica, or a sure Guide to Harmony and Modulation." D. 1762.

GEMISTUS PLETHO, GEORGE, a philosopher, b. at Constantinople, in 1390, but who resided chiefly in the Peloponnesus, where he acquired great fame for his wisdom and virtue. He was a zealous defender of the Platonists against the Aristotelians, and of the Greek church against that of Rome. On going to the council of Florence, 1438, his zeal and eloquence gained him the admiration of all parties. He contributed to the revival of Platonism, in Italy, and was the means of laying the foundation of the academy in that city. He d. in his native country, at the age of 101.

GENDEBIEN, a distinguished Belgian, b. 1753, took part, in 1789, in shaking off the yoke of Austria; in 1790, sat as a deputy for the Belgian republic, when united with France in the council of five hundred. In 1815 he was nominated one of the commission for drawing up the constitutional act, uniting Belgium and Holland as the kingdom of the Netherlands. As a member of the second chamber, he steadily opposed the arbitrary acts of the royal authority, especially those which emanated from Van Maanen, the minister of justice, and took a decided part in the Belgic revolution of 1831, by which Belgium again separated itself from Holland, and declared its independence.

GENGHIS-KHAN, or JINGHIS-KHAN, the son of a petty Mongolian prince, was b. in Tartary, in 1163. After a species of intestine warfare with various Tartar tribes, this renowned conqueror invaded China, the capital of which was taken by storm, in 1205, and plundered. The murder of the ambassadors which Genghis-Khan had sent to Turkestan, occasioned the invasion of that empire, in 1218, with an army of 700,000 men; and the two great cities of Bokhara and Samarcand were stormed, pillaged, burnt, and more than 200,000 individuals destroyed with them. He continued his career of devastation for several years, and in 1225, though more than 60 years old, he marched in person, at the head of his whole army, against the king of Tangut, who had given shelter to two of his enemies, and refused to surrender them. A great battle was fought on plains of ice, formed by a frozen lake, in which the king of Tangut was totally defeated, with the loss of 300,000 men. This ambitious warrior, whose ravages had cost the human race upwards of 5,000,000 human beings, by dint of successive victories, became monarch of a territory exceeding 1500 leagues, including Northern China, Eastern Persia, and the whole of Tartary. He d. in 1227, in the 66th year of his age, and in the 52d of his reign: having, before his death, divided his immense territories between the four princes whom he had by the first of his four wives.

GENLIS, STEPHANIE FELICITE, countess de, celebrated for her literary talents, and by many for the independent principles which prevail through all her writings, was b. near Autun, in 1746. Her maiden name was Ducrest de St. Aubin, and the connection of her family with that of St. Aubin procured her admission, at four years of age, to enter as a canoness into the noble chapter at Aix, from which time she was called la comtesse de Lancy. At 17, a letter of her writing having fallen into the hands of the count de Genlis, he was so fascinated with its style as to make her the offer of his hand and fortune, which she accepted. By this marriage she became niece to madame de Montesson, who was privately married to the duke of Orleans; and his son, the duke of Chartres, chose her, in 1782, to superintend the education of his children. It was, soon after, rumored that an improper attachment existed between her and the duke; and Pamela, afterwards the wife of the unfortunate Lord Edward Fitzgerald, was supposed to be the issue of that connection. At this period, madame de Genlis wrote several excellent works, producing, in rapid succession, "Adela and Theodore," "The Evenings of the Castle," "The Theatre of Education," and "Annals of Virtue," all of which were highly popular. In 1791 she went to England with her pupil, mademoiselle d'Orleans, and on their return to France, the following year, both were ordered to quit the territories without delay. After some time, they went to Switzerland, but were not permitted to reside there; and General Montesquieu obtained them an asylum in the convent of St. Clair. In 1800 she returned to France; and in 1805, Napoleon gave her apartments in the arsenal at Paris, and allowed her a pension of 5000 francs. On the return of the Bourbons, she seemed to forget her old patron, and her love of republicanism gave way to admiration for the restored dynasty. When her old pupil, Louis Philippe, ascended the throne, both he and his family paid the kindest attention to the comforts of madame de Genlis; and her pen was actively employed to the last day of her existence. So numerous are her works, amounting altogether to about 90 volumes, that the mere enumeration of their titles would occupy too much of our space. They embrace nearly all subjects, and are characterized by fertility of imagination and a pleasing style. D. 1830.

GENNARI, CÆSAR and BENEDICT, two painters, who were the nephews and disciples of Guercino. After working together some years, Cæsar established himself at Bologna, and Benedict went to England, where he became painter to James II., on whose expulsion he returned to Italy. D. in 1715, aged 82.

GENNARO, JOSEPH AURELIUS, a civilian, was b. at Naples, in 1701. He became chief magistrate in his native city, and his works, which are all on legal subjects, are remarkable for purity of style and depth of erudition. D. 1762.

GENOVESI, ANTHONY, an Italian philosopher and metaphysician, was b. at Castiglione in 1712. He read lectures in philosophy at Naples with great reputation for some time, but at length he was attacked by numerous enemies for publishing his metaphysics, in which he recommended the works of Galileo, Grotius, and Newton. The king of Naples, however, protected him, and made him professor of political economy and moral philosophy in the Neapolitan university. He was the author of "Philosophical Meditations on Religion and Morality," a "System of Logic," "Humorous Letters," and "Italian Morality," which last is accounted his principal performance. D. 1769.

GENTILIS, or GENTILI, ALBERICO, an Italian civilian, b. at Ancona, in 1550. His father, who was a physician, embraced the reformed religion, and went to England, where Alberico became professor at law at Oxford; d. 1608. He wrote "De Jure Belli," and other works on jurisprudence.—SCRIO, his brother, who was professor of civil law at Altdorf, and d. in 1616, was the author of "De Jure Publico Populi Romani," &c.

GENTLEMAN, FRANCIS, a dramatic writer and actor; b. in Ireland, 1728. Besides some theatrical pieces, he was the author of "The Dramatic Censor," and a volume of "Royal Fables, in imitation of Gay." D. 1784.

GENTZ, FREDERIC VON, a distinguished publicist, and an uncompromising antagonist of France, was b. at Breslau, 1764; studied at Königsberg, and after a short sojourn in England, where he gained the good will of Pitt, he repaired to Vienna in 1803, where he entered into the Austrian civil service, under the most favorable auspices and hopes. He was appointed one of the secretaries at the congress of Vienna in 1814, and at Paris in 1815, and he took an active part in the various congresses that sprung out of the restoration. A selection from his various works, comprising political questions, a "Life of Mary Queen of Scots," and numerous articles written for the "Journal Historique," was published in 1838. D. 1832.

GEOFFREY of Monmouth, a British historian who flourished in the 12th century. He was a native of Monmouth became its archdeacon, and was raised to the see of St. Asaph; but, in consequence of the disturbed state of the north of Wales, he left his bishopric, retiring at first to the monastery of Abingdon, and then taking up his abode at the court of Henry II. His chief work is entitled "Chronicon sive Historia Britonum" and is full of legendary tales respecting the early British monarchs.

GEOFFRIN, MARIE THERESE RODET, a woman alike distinguished for the qualities of her mind and heart, who during half a century, was the ornament of the most polite and cultivated societies of Paris. She wrote a treatise "Sur la Conversation;" but passed most of her life in active benevolence. D. 1777.

GEOFFROI, STEPHEN FRANCIS, a French physician, and professor of chemistry at Paris, where he was b. 1672. He was the author of a Pharmacopœia, called "Le Code Médicamenteire de la Faculté de Paris," and was a member of the Royal Society of London. D. 1731.

GEOFFROY, JULIAN LOUIS, a French critic, remarkable for the severity of his dramatic censures. He conducted the "Literary Annals" after the death of Freron, and published a "Course of Dramatic Literature," a "Commentary on Racine," &c. B. 1743; d. 1814.—STEPHEN LOUIS, an eminent French physician and naturalist; author of a "Manual of Practical Medicine for Surgeons," a "Dissertation on the Organ of Hearing," a "History of Insects," &c. B. 1725; d. 1810.

GEOFFROY SAINT HILAIRE, ETIENNE, a distinguished zoologist and comparative anatomist, sprung from a family well known in science, was b. at Etampes, 1772. He was originally destined for the church, but he preferred dedicating himself to natural science, a taste for which he had imbibed from the instructions of Brisson, at the college of Navarre, and in the company of Haüy his colleague at the college of Cardinal Lemoine. In 1798 he formed one of the great scientific expedition to Egypt, explored all the conquered countries, and was one of the founders and most active members of the institute, of which he afterwards became professor. In 1808 he went on a great scientific mission to Portugal; in 1815 he was a member of the chamber during the hundred days; but, on the return of the Bourbons, he retired from political life. The great merit of Geoffroy Saint Hilaire as a naturalist consists in his discovery of the law of unity that pervades the organic composition of all animal bodies—a theory glanced at by Buffon and Goethe; and in his having founded the theory of "Analogues," or the method by which the identity of organic materials is determined in the midst of all their transformations. With him too originated the doctrine of "development," which has found so able a supporter among ourselves in the author of the "Vestiges of Creation." His chief works are "Histoire Naturelle des Mammifères," "Philosophie Anatomique," "Principes de la Philosophie Zoologique," "Études Progressives," &c. D. 1844.

GEORGE, LEWIS, I., king of Great Britain, was the son of Ernest Augustus, elector of Hanover, by Sophia, daughter of Frederic, elector-palatine, and granddaughter of James I. He was b. in 1660; was trained to arms under his father; married his cousin, Sophia Dorothea, daughter of the duke of Zell, 1682; served in three campaigns with the emperor's army, against the Turks in Hungary; and succeeded to the electorate in 1700. In 1706 he was created duke of Cambridge, and succeeded to the throne of England on the death of Queen Anne, in 1714. D. 1727.—Augustus, II., son of George I., was b. in 1683; married in 1705, the Princess Caroline, of Bradenburg-Anspach, who died in 1737; went to England with his father at the accession of the latter; was created prince of Wales; and in 1727 succeeded to the throne. D. 1760.—III., eldest son of Frederic, prince of Wales, and grandson of George II., was b. June 4, 1738, being the first sovereign of the Hanoverian line that could boast of England as the place of his nativity. On the death of his father, in 1751, his education was intrusted to the earl of Harecourt and the bishop of Norwich; though he was greatly indebted to the princess-dowager, his mother, for the formation of his mind and character. He ascended the throne on the death of his grandfather, in 1760, being then in his 23d year. D. 1820.—IV., son of the preceding, succeeded his father, and d. 1830.

GEORGES, Chevalier DE Str., a violinist and musical composer. He was a native of Guadaloupe, and usually resided in Paris, where, as well as in England, he was equally celebrated for his skill as a sword-player as for his performances on the violin. D. 1801.

GEORGIADES, ANASTASIUS, a modern Greek author, b. in 1770, at Philipopolis. He published at Leipsic a work in modern Greek, called "Anthropology," and another on the pronunciation of ancient Greek. He was a physician at Bucharest.

GERANDO, Baron de, a distinguished writer on philosophical subjects, was b. at Lyons, 1772; took part in 1793 in the defence of his native city against the troops of the convention, was forced to flee in consequence, returned in 1796, and was present at the battle of Zurich, 1799. But in the heat of the camp he had found time to cultivate literature; for his "Comparative History of the Systems of Philosophy" attracted the notice of Lucien Bonaparte, who made him secretary-general to the minister of the interior in 1804; and in 1805 he accompanied Napoleon to Italy, where he remained for some years endeavoring to introduce the French system of administration. In 1837 he was raised to the peerage. D. 1842.

GERARD, ALEXANDER, a Scotch divine and writer, was b. at Garioch, Aberdeenshire, in 1728. He was educated at Aberdeen and Edinburgh, and in 1752 he became professor of moral philosophy in Marischal college. In 1759 he was appointed professor of divinity, took his doctor's degree, and in 1771 he obtained the theological professorship in King's college, Aberdeen. He was the author of "An Essay on Taste," "Dissertations on the Genius and Evidences of Christianity," "An Essay on Genius," two volumes of sermons, and a "Discourse on the Pastoral Care."—FRANCOIS, a French historical painter, of the highest merit. He became, at the early age of 14, a pupil of the celebrated David, and is thought by many good judges to have equalled, if not in some cases to have surpassed his master. His battle-pieces are extremely grand; but probably his portraits of the Bonaparte family, and of the allied sovereigns are his finest achievements. B. 1770; d. 1837.—Louis, an eminent French physician and botanist, b. in 1733. He was distinguished for his researches in various branches of natural science; and he first noticed the natural affinities of plants, in his "Gerardi Flora Gallo-Provincialis." D. 1819.

GERARD DE RAYNEVAL, JOSEPH MATTHIAS, a French diplomatist, who for a long series of years was employed as secretary in political missions, and subsequently became chief of the division in the office of foreign affairs. He greatly distinguished himself both by his diplomatic talents and his published opinions. B. 1736; d. 1812.

GERARD THOM, or TENQUE, founder of the order of St. John of Jerusalem, was b. at Amalfi, about the year 1040. He first visited Jerusalem for commercial objects; but in 1100 he took the religious habit, and associated with others, who made the vows of chastity, poverty, and obedience: the object of their institution being to defend Christian pilgrims in their journey to and from the Holy Land. Thus arose the powerful order of knights hospitalers of St. John, who afterwards became the knights of Malta, and acquired such distinguished fame. D. 1120.

GERARDE, JOHN, an English botanist and surgeon, b. at Nantwich in Cheshire, in 1545, and d. in 1607. He was the author of "Catalogus Arborum, Fruticum, et Plantarum," and the "Herbal, or General History of Plants," a work which contributed to diffuse a taste for botany.

GERARDEN, SEBASTIAN, an eminent French naturalist; author of "Tableau Élémentaire de Botanique," &c. B. 1751; d. 1816.

GERARDS, MARK, a painter of Bruges, was b. in 1561. About 1580 he went to England, and was appointed painter to Queen Elizabeth. He was eminent in history, portraits, and landscapes. D. 1635.

GERBAIS, JEAN, a French civilian, doctor of the Sorbonne, professor of rhetoric at the royal college of Paris, and principal of the college of Rheims, d. in that city in 1669. He wrote "De Causis Majoribus," "A Letter on the Ornaments and Luxury of Female Dress," &c.

GERBELIUS, NICHOLAS, professor of jurisprudence at the university of Strasbourg; author of the "Life of Cuspinian," a treatise on the "Rise and Progress of the Anabaptists," &c. D. 1560.

GERBERT, MARTIN, a dignified ecclesiastic, born in the Austrian states in 1790. He was prince-abbot of the Benedictine monastery at St. Blair, in the Black Forest; and was eminent for his knowledge of, and taste for, the fine arts, particularly music. He travelled throughout the Continent for the materials of a work on the history of church music, and in 1774 it appeared under the title of "De Cantu et Musica Sacra a primâ Ecclesiæ Ætate usque ad presens Tempus." A still more valuable one, now very scarce, appeared in 1784, entitled "Scriptores Ecclesiastici de Musica Sacra potissimum." D. 1793.

GERBIER, SIR BALTHASAR, a painter, was b. at Antwerp, 1592. He went to England with Rubens, and was knighted by Charles I., who made him his agent at Brussels, and employed him in different negotiations. At the restoration he prepared the triumphal arches for the reception of the king. D. 1667.

GERBILLON, JOHN FRANCIS, a Jesuit missionary in China, b. in 1654. He wrote "Observations on Great Tartary," and an account of his travels is inserted in Du Halde's History of China. He was in great favor with the emperor, for whom he composed the "Elements of Geometry," and was his instructor in mathematics and philosophy. He was allowed to preach the Christian religion in China, and finally became superior-general of all the Jesuit missionaries sent from France. D. at Pekin in 1707.

GERMANICUS, CÆSAR, the son of Claudius Drusus Nero, and the younger Antonia, a niece of Augustus, was adopted by Tiberius, his paternal uncle. He was at the head of the Roman armies in Germany when Augustus died; and after gaining many great victories there, Tiberius, jealous of his nephew's glory, called him home under pretence of granting him a triumph. In order, however, to get rid of a man whose popularity appeared dangerous, he sent him, invested with almost absolute power, into the East, where he died, under strong suspicions of being poisoned, A. D. 19, aged 34. His death was regarded at Rome as a public loss, and all the houses were closed on the day of his funeral.

GERMANUS, patriarch of Constantinople in the 8th century, was a zealous defender of image-worship, for which he was degraded, in a council held at Constantinople, in 730. D. 740.

GERNSTNER, FRANCIS ANTHONY, chevalier de, a distinguished Austrian engineer. He constructed the railroad from Budweis to Lintz, and part of that from Moscow to St. Petersburg. He published an important and elaborate work on "Practical Mechanics." D. at Philadelphia, 1839.

GERRY, ELBRIDGE, one of the signers of the declaration of independence, and vice-president of the United States, was b. at Marblehead, Mass., in 1744, and received his education at Harvard college. He was graduated at this institution in 1762, and afterwards engaging in mercantile pursuits, amassed a considerable fortune. He took an early part in the controversies between the colonies and Great Britain, and in 1772 was elected a representative, from his native town, in the legislature of Massachusetts. In 1776 he was elected a delegate to the continental congress, where for several years he exhibited the utmost zeal and fidelity in the discharge of numerous and severe official labors. In 1784 Mr. Gerry was re-elected a member of congress, and in 1787 was chosen a delegate to the convention which assembled at Philadelphia, to revise the articles of confederation. In 1789 he was again elected to congress, and remained in that body for four years, when he retired into private life till the year 1797, when he was appointed to accompany General Pinckney and Mr. Marshall on a special mission to France. In October, 1798, Mr. Gerry returned home, having been elected governor of his native state, and in 1812 vice-president of the United States, he d. at Washington, 1814.

GERSON, JOHN CHARLIER DE, an eminent French divine, b. at Gerson, in Champagne, in 1363. He was chancellor of the university of Paris, and canon of Notre Dame; and he distinguished himself by his piety, his writings, and his defence of the council of Constance against the authority of the pope. D. 1421.—JOHN, abbot of Vercei, in the 12th century, by whom the book entitled "De Imitatione Christi," which bears the name of Thomas à-Kempis, was, as it now appears, really written.

GERSTEIN, CHRISTIAN LOUIS, a mathematician, was b. at Giessen, in 1701; appointed to the professorship of mathematics there in 1733; but afterwards deprived of it for not submitting to the decision of a court of justice in a lawsuit. D. in 1762. He wrote some Latin works on barometrical observations, a "New Method of calculating Eclipses," &c.

GERVAISE, ARMAND FRANÇOIS, a French ecclesiastic of the order of the Carmelites. He abridged the works of St. Cyprian, and wrote his life. He was also the author of the lives of Abelard and Héloïse, and other biographical and theological works. D. 1744.—NICHOLAS, brother of the preceding. He went to Siam, where he remained four years as a missionary; and on his return published the natural and civil history of that kingdom; also, a description of Macassar. After a time he was consecrated bishop of Horren, in Guiana, and went thither; but was murdered, with all his clergy, by the natives, in 1729.

GESENIUS, FREDERIC HENRY WILLIAM, one of the most distinguished orientalists of modern times, was b. at Nordhausen, 1786. He was professor of theology at Halle; and during the 30 years that he lectured in that university, he published numerous works, which have made a new era in oriental literature. His "Hebrew Grammar," and many analogous productions enjoy a universal reputation, and some of them are translated into most European languages. D. 1842.

GESNER, CONRAD, an eminent physician and naturalist, was b. at Zurich, in Switzerland, in 1516, and was professor of philosophy there for 24 years. His fame as a botanist was spread over Europe, and he maintained a correspondence with learned men of all countries. He wrote numerous able works on different branches of natural history, of which his "Historia Animalium" is reckoned his greatest performance, and procured him the appellation of the Pliny of Germany. His "Bibliotheca Universalis," a full catalogue of all writers extant, in three languages, Greek, Latin, and Hebrew, is a monument of immense learning and industry. He otherwise rendered much service to science, and for his various and great merits he was ennobled. D. 1561.—SOLOMON, a poet and painter, was b. at Zurich, in 1730. He was placed under a bookseller at Berlin, but soon eloped from his master, and employed his time in painting and poetry. On his return to Zurich he published "Daphnis," which was followed by "Inkle and Yarico;" but his fame was established by his "Idylls and Pastorals." He next added to his celebrity by the very popular piece of "The Death of Abel," which appeared in 1758, and made his name known throughout Europe. He then published his "First Navigator," "Moral Tales," "Dramas," &c.; and afterwards turned his attention more particularly to painting and engraving, and produced several landscapes; at the same time instructing with his pen, while he pleased the eye, and contributed to the progress of art. D. 1788.

GESSNER, JOHN MATTHIAS, a profound scholar and critic, was b. at Roth, in Anspach, in 1691. His most esteemed works are editions of some of the classics, and an excellent Latin Thesaurus.

GETA, SEPTIMIUS ANTONIUS, second son of the Emperor Severus, and brother of the infamous Caracalla, whom he joined in the government on the death of his father. He was b. 189, and had not reached his 23d year when the Romans had to lament his untimely death.

GEZELIUS, JOHN, bishop of Abo, the capital of Finland, was the author of a "Pentaglot Dictionary," an abridged "Encyclopædia of the Sciences," &c. B. 1651; d. 1690.—JOHN, his son, who succeeded him in the bishopric, was also a learned scholar, and translated the Bible into the Finlandish tongue. D. 1718.

GHERARDESCA, UGOLINA DELLA, immortalized in the "Inferno" of Dante, under the appellation of Count Ugolino, was a Neapolitan, who, in the 13th century endeavored to usurp the government of Pisa, and found a new principality, after the example of Della Scala at Verona. After a time he succeeded, but governed his countrymen with great despotism; and Roger d'Ubal dini, the archbishop of Pisa, who was as cruel and ambitious as himself, formed a conspiracy against him, the result of which was, that Count Ugolino was attacked in his palace, and, after a brave resistance, taken prisoner, with three of his sons and one of his grandsons, all of whom were imprisoned, and left to die of starvation.

GHEZZI, SEBASTIAN, JOSEPH, and PETER LEO, father, son, and grandson; three Italian artists of the 17th and 18th centuries, each of whom was more or less eminent in ornamenting churches and palaces.

GHIRBERTI, LORENZO, a celebrated sculptor, b. in 1378, at Florence, who early learned the arts of drawing, modelling, and casting metals. At Florence he executed two bronze doors, which still adorn the baptistery of St. John, and, according to the hyperbolical praise of Michael Angelo, were worthy of decorating the entrance to paradise. It contains 24 panels, representing various subjects from the New Testament. D. 1455.

GIHRLANDAIO, DOMENICO, one of the elder Florentine painters, was distinguished for fertility of invention, and has therefore been imitated by later artists. He was b. 1449, and had the honor of being teacher to Michael Angelo.—RIDOLPHO, his son, was also an excellent artist, and highly esteemed by Raphael. D. 1560.

GIAMBERTI, FRANCESCO, a Florentine architect of the 15th century, who made the designs for many buildings in Florence and Rome, composed a work containing the drawings of ancient monuments remaining in the Roman territory and Greece.—GIULIANO, his son, was architect, sculptor, and engineer to the house of Medici; built a magnificent palace for the Grand-duke Lorenzo, besides many other palaces, churches, and fortresses; in short, he was one of the first architects of the age. B. 1443; d. 1517.

GIANNONE, PETER, a fearless historian, was b. at Ischitella, in Apulia, in 1676, and became an advocate at Naples. He wrote a valuable "History of Naples," in which he gave great offence to the court of Rome, and exposed him to its fury. His book was prohibited, himself excommunicated, and, after having been driven into exile, he d. at Turin, in 1738.

GIBBON, EDWARD, the celebrated historian, was b. at Putney, in 1737; sent to Westminster school, but soon transferred to a private tutor; then to Magdalen college, Oxford, for a short time, and finally to Lausanne, where he renounced the Roman Catholic faith, without embracing any other, and became a confirmed skeptic. On returning to England he entered upon the duties of active life, but read much, and prepared himself for authorship. In 1763 he went on his travels; and while sitting amidst the ruins of the capitol at Rome, he formed the idea of writing the history of the decline and fall of that city. In the mean time he joined M. Deyvurdun in a journal called "Mémoires Littéraires de la Grand Bretagne," which met with no success. In 1770 he began his celebrated history of the "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire;" the 1st vol. of which, in 4to., appeared in 1776; the 2d and 3d in 1781; and the concluding three vols. in 1788. Previous to this undertaking, Mr. Gibbon was chosen into parliament for Liskeard; and when hostilities commenced between England and France, in 1778, he was employed to draw up the manifesto on that occasion; for which he was made commissioner of the board of trade, but lost the place on the change of administration in 1783. He then went to reside at Lausanne, where he continued till the French revolution obliged him to return to England. D. 1794.

GIBBONS, GRINLING, an eminent sculptor and statuary, was b. in London about the middle of the 17th century. His flowers and foliage carved in wood have almost the lightness of nature; and he executed several fine pieces also in marble and bronze. Amongst his works are St. Paul's and Windsor choirs, the wooden throne at Canterbury, the monument of Viscount Camden, at Exton, in Rutlandshire, the font in St. James's church, the statue of Charles II. at Charing-cross, and that of James II. in Privy gardens. D. 1721.

GIBBS, JAMES, an architect, was b. at Aberdeen, in 1683. He designed the churches of St. Martin's and St. Mary-le-Strand, London; the senate-house, and the new buildings of King's college, Cambridge; the Radcliffe library, Oxford, &c. D. 1754.—Sir VICARY, chief justice of the common pleas, was b. in 1752, at Exeter. On the death of Mr. Richard Burke, he was appointed recorder of Bristol, and was soon distinguished as an eloquent pleader and an able advocate. The trials of Horne Tooke, Hardy, and others, for high treason, brought the talents of Mr. Gibbs still more conspicuously before the public; and soon after he became king's counsel. He was also elected into parliament for the university of Cambridge; made chief justice of Chester; next solicitor, and afterwards attorney-general, with the honor of knighthood. In 1813 he was appointed a puisne judge of the common pleas; and, the year following, lord chief justice. After discharging the duties of this office about four years, he resigned it, at the end of 1818, on account of infirmities, and d. 1820.

GIBSON, EDMUND, a learned prelate and antiquary, who was b. at Knipe, Westmoreland, in 1669. In 1691 he published a new edition of Drummond's "Polemio Middiana," and James V. of Scotland's "Cantilena Rustica;" translated the "Saxon Chronicle" and Camden's "Britannia;" and produced several original works, the principal of which was his "Codex Juris Ecclesiastici Anglicani." In 1715 he was made bishop of Lincoln; was transferred to London in 1720, and d. 1748.—RICHARD, known by the name of the Dwarf, an English painter in the time of Sir Peter Lely, whose manner he studied. In his youth he was servant to a lady at Mortlake, who, perceiving his taste for painting, put him under De Cleyn, for instruction. He was page to Charles I., and when he married Mrs. Anne Shepherd, who was also a dwarf, the king gave away the bride. They were of equal stature, each measuring 3 ft. 10 in. They had nine children, five of whom arrived at years of maturity, and were of the usual stature. Gibson d. in his 75th year, and his wife in 1709, at the age of 89.—JOHN, General, a soldier of the French war, and also of the American revolutionary war, was b. in Lancaster, Pennsylvania, 1740. He early served under General Forbes in the expedition to Fort du Quesne, which was occupied Nov. 25, 1758, and called Pittsburg. Here he remained as an Indian trader. In 1763 he was captured by the Indians, and adopted by a squaw, whose son he had slain in battle. He had thus an opportunity to acquire a knowledge of several Indian languages. On being released he again settled at Pittsburg. In 1774 he was an important agent in making the Indian treaty entered into by Governor Dunmore. On this occasion Logan's celebrated speech was delivered, of which Colonel Gibson was the interpreter. On the commencement of the revolutionary war he was appointed the colonel of a Virginia regiment, of which he was in command at the close of the war. Residing at Pittsburg, he was in 1788 a member of the Pennsylvania convention; he was also associate judge, and major-general of militia. In 1800 he was appointed secretary of the territory of Indiana, and held the office till 1816, when the territory became a state. D. 1822.

GIFFORD, JOHN, a political and historical writer, whose real name was JOHN RICHARD GREEN, was b. 1758. He contributed to the establishment of the "British Critic," and afterwards of the "Anti-Jacobin Review," which last arose out of a newspaper of the same name. He also wrote "The History of France," the "History of the French Revolution," and "The Life of the Right Hon. William Pitt." D. 1818.—WILLIAM, a celebrated critic and satirist, was b. at Ashburton, Devon. His father, who was a plumber and glazier, at South

Molton, died when he was 12 years old. The widow soon followed her husband to the grave; and the orphan was at first sent to sea in a coasting vessel, but shortly after apprenticed to a shoemaker in his native town. There he remained till he was in his 20th year; but being disgusted with his employment, and evincing talents of a superior order. Mr. Cookesley, a surgeon of the town, proposed to some of the inhabitants to raise a subscription, with a view of purchasing his freedom, and giving him an education. This being effected, he was sent to Oxford, to pursue studies more congenial to his mind. In 1791 he published "The Baviad," a poetical satire, in which he severely lashed the poets and poetasters of the day; and, in 1794, appeared "The Mæviad," a satire on the degraded state of the drama. In 1797, Mr. Gifford became editor of the "Anti-Jacobin," a weekly paper, established by Mr. Canning. This publication, which continued only one year, involved him in a quarrel with Dr. Wolcot, against whom he published a poetical squib, entitled "An Epistle to Peter Pindar." In 1802 appeared his translation of Juvenal; in 1805 an edition of Massinger's plays; and, subsequently, the works of Ben Jonson, Ford, and Shirley; but it was in his capacity of editor of the "Quarterly Review," (which he conducted from its commencement in 1809 till 1824,) that he was most generally known. D. 1826.

GIGLI, JEROME, an Italian poet, b. at Sienna, 1660, whose attacks upon the Academy Della Crusca, and caustic wit, as well as his lyrical and dramatic productions, gave him great popularity. He was compelled however, at Rome, to retract all his offensive opinions, and he d. 1722, in such poverty that his funeral expenses were paid by some charitable monks.

GILBERT, DAVIES, an eminent man of science, vice-president of the Royal Society, and member of numerous other learned and scientific societies, was b. at St. Erth, in Cornwall, 1767. His family name was Giddy, but having, in 1808, married the daughter of a wealthy Sussex gentleman named Gilbert, he assumed his name and arms in 1817. He contributed several papers to the transactions of scientific societies, and published "A Plain Statement of the Bullion Question." He represented the borough of Bodmin in parliament from 1806 to 1832. D. 1840.—Sir HUMPHREY, an enterprising English navigator in the reign of Elizabeth, was b. at Dartmouth, in 1539. He published, in 1576, a discourse to prove the practicability of a northwest passage to China; and in 1578 he himself sailed on a voyage of discovery to the coast of America. In a second voyage, in 1583, he took possession of Newfoundland; but his ship foundered on her return to England, and all on board perished.—WILLIAM, a physician, and experimental philosopher, who discovered several of the properties of the loadstone, was b. at Colchester, in 1540; elected a fellow of the college of physicians, and became physician to Queen Elizabeth. He was a strenuous advocate for the inductive mode of philosophical matters, and was the first who asserted the theory of a great central magnet in the earth, afterwards applied by Dr. Halley to the explanation of the variation and dipping of the needle in the mariner's compass. D. 1603.

GILDAS, surnamed the Wise, a British ecclesiastic and historian of the 6th century, was the son of Caw, a British prince, who emigrated to North Wales, in order to avoid submission to the Anglo-Saxons. He appears to have been a monk; and, after residing in one of the small isles called the Holmes, in the Bristol Channel, retired to the abbey of Glastonbury, where he died. A book, ascribed to Gildas, has been repeatedly published, entitled "Epistola de Excidio Britannicæ, et Castigatio Ordinis Ecclesiastici;" but it exhibits so frightful a picture of the depravity of manners, which pervaded all classes of Britons, that its authenticity has been questioned by some critics, who presume it must have been the work of a foe rather than of a friend to their race. D. 570.

GILES, WILLIAM BRANCH, b. in Amelia county, Va., 1762, was governor of Virginia, and for many years a member of congress from that state, both in the senate, and house of representatives. He was governor of Virginia from 1826 to 1829. He published a speech on the embargo laws, 1808; political letters to the people of Virginia, 1813; a series of letters, signed a Constituent, in the "Richmond Enquirer" of Jan., 1818, against the plan for a general education; in April, 1824, and a singular letter of invective against President Monroe and Mr. Clay for their "hobbies," the South America cause, the Greek cause, internal improvements, and the tariff. In Nov., 1825, he addressed a letter to Judge Marshall, disclaiming the expressions, not the general sentiments, in regard to Washington, ascribed to him in the life of Washington. He has also appeared before the public as the correspondent of John Quincy Adams. D. 1830.

GILL, ALEXANDER, a famous school-master, was b. in Lincolnshire, in 1564. In 1608 he became master of St. Paul's school, where he brought up many eminent persons, and among the rest John Milton. Dr. Gill wrote a "Treatise concerning the Trinity in Unity," "Logonomia Anglica," "Sacred Philosophy of the Holy Scripture," &c. — ALEXANDER, his son, who succeeded him in the head-mastership of St. Paul's school, had also the honor of having Milton for his scholar while he was at Trinity college, Oxford, and it appears that the pupil had a great esteem for his preceptor in after life. D. 1642. — JOHN, a divine of the Baptist persuasion, was b. at Kettering, in Northamptonshire, 1697. His education was limited, owing to the contracted circumstances of his parents, but, by application, he became a good classical and oriental scholar. He commenced as a preacher at Higham Ferrers, from whence he removed to a congregation at Horsleydown, Southwark. He wrote an "Exposition of the Song of Solomon," and "The Cause of God and Truth." But his great work was an "Exposition of the Bible."

GILLIES, JOHN, was b. at Brechin, Forfarshire, 1747. He was appointed historiographer for Scotland on the death of Dr. Robison, and he continued his literary labors to a late period of his life. His chief works are, "A History of Ancient Greece," "The Reign of Frederic II.," "History of the World, from Alexander to Augustus," translations from Aristotle, Isocrates, &c. D. 1836, aged 90.

GILPIN, BERNARD, one of the English Protestant reformers, was b. at Kentmire, in Westmoreland, in 1517. By reading the works of Erasmus, he secretly embraced the principles of the reformation. In 1556 he was presented by his uncle to the archdeanery of Durham, and the rectory of Easington, where he labored with zeal; and, in his capacity of archdeacon, made strict visitations, being a great enemy to non-residence and pluralities. He was next presented to the rectory of Houghton-le-Spring, where his labors in promoting the Protestant faith were so remarkable, that Bishop Bonner threatened to bring him to the stake in a fortnight, and sent a messenger into the north for that purpose. In the reign of Elizabeth he was offered the bishopric of Carlisle, and the provostship of Queen's college; but refused both, contenting himself with Houghton, where he d., deeply lamented by his parishioners, in 1583. — WILLIAM, a divine of the church of England, and an elegant writer, was b. in 1724, at Carlisle. He published the "Life of Bernard Gilpin," his ancestor, above-mentioned; the "Lives of Latimer, Wickliff, Huss, and Archbishop Cranmer," an "Exposition of the New Testament," "Observations relative to Picturesque Beauty," a "Tour to the Lakes," "Remarks on Forest Scenery," "Sermons to a Country Congregation," "Moral Contrasts," &c. D. 1804. — SAWREY, brother of the preceding, was b. at Carlisle in 1738. He was placed with a ship-painter, and his first works which attracted notice were some market groups, which he sketched from his window. But it was principally as an animal painter that he acquired his reputation, though his historical subjects were above mediocrity. D. 1807.

GIL POLO, GASPAR, a Spanish poet and advocate, was b. at Valencia in 1516, and d. there in 1572. He is the author of "Diana Enamorada," so highly extolled by Cervantes, as combining elegance, sweetness, and purity.

GILRAY, JAMES, a celebrated caricaturist, unrivalled in his art for the rich broad humor and keen satire of his ready pencil. D. 1815.

GIL VICENTE, a Portuguese dramatist of the 16th century, who wrote nearly fifty plays, and excelled all the dramatic writers of that period in elegance of style and fertility of invention. He was b. at Barcellos, in 1485, and d. at Evora, in 1557.

GINGUENE, PETER LOUIS, a French writer, b. in 1748, at Rennes, in Britany, was descended from an ancient but impoverished family, and obtained a small government office. At the revolution, in which he took an active part, he associated himself with the more moderate writers upon the affairs of the times, and narrowly escaped the scaffold during the reign of the Jacobins. The directory appointed him ambassador at Turin, and Bonaparte gave him a seat in the senate. Upon being removed from this he applied himself wholly to literature. The work to which he is chiefly indebted for his fame is his "Histoire Littéraire d'Italie." D. 1816.

at Verona about the middle of the 15th century. He built the bridge of Notre Dame, at Paris, and various other edifices both there and in Italy; fortified the city of Treviso, and was summoned to Rome by Leo X. after the death of Bramante, to assist in the building of St. Peter's. He belonged to the Dominican order, and as an antiquary and a literary character he also greatly distinguished himself.

GIORDANO, LUCA, a Neapolitan painter, the pupil of Spagnoletto and Peter of Cortona, who imitated the style of Titian so closely that his pictures are not easily distinguished from the works of that great master. In fact, he imitated the best artists so successfully, that even connoisseurs were often deceived, while his celerity of execution was wonderful. B. 1632; d. 1704.

GIORGIONE, or GEORGE BARBARELLI, was an eminent painter of the Venetian school, b. in 1477, at Castelfranco. He received his first instructions from John Bellino; but studying afterwards the works of Leonardo da Vinci, he soon surpassed them both, and became the first colorist of his time. He d. of the plague, in 1511. Giorgione excelled in fresco painting, and was the first of the Lombard school who found out the effects of properly contrasting strong lights with strong shadows.

GIOTTO, or ANGILOTTIO, an ingenious painter, sculptor, and architect of Florence, was b. in 1276. He was the son of a peasant, and his real name was Ambrogiotto Burdone; but being observed by Cimabue drawing figures on the ground while feeding his sheep, he took him, and instructed him in the art of painting. He soon surpassed his master, and acquired such a reputation that Benedict IX. sent a person to Tuscany to make a report of his talents, and to bring a design from each of the Florentine artists. When the messenger came to Giotto, and informed him of his business, the painter took a sheet of paper, and, with one stroke of his pencil, drew a circle as perfect as if it had been performed by a pair of compasses. On presenting this, the man said, "I want a design;" to which Giotto replied, "Go about your business; his holiness asks nothing else of me." The pope on being made acquainted with this, sent for him to Rome, where, besides painting many pictures, he made a ship of mosaic, which is over the portico at the entrance of St. Peter's church, and is still known by the name of Gi-otto's vessel. In 1334 he undertook the famous tower of Santa Maria del Fiore, at Florence, for which he was made a citizen, and rewarded with a pension. D. 1336.

GIRALDI, LILIO GREGORIO, better known by his Latin name of GYRALDUS, a learned Italian writer and Latin poet, was b. at Ferrara, in 1479; and has been considered by Casaubon and other authorities as one of the most learned men whom modern Italy has produced. At the sacking of Rome by the troops of Charles V. he lost all his property, and was reduced to indigence; but he wrote numerous works, the principal of which is a "History of the Heathen Deities," and eventually triumphed over his adverse fortune, having accumulated 10,000 crowns before his death, which took place in 1552.—CINTIO, JOHN BAPTIST, a relative of the preceding, was an Italian poet and physician, b. at Ferrara, in 1504. He was secretary to the duke of Ferrara, and professor of philosophy and medicine in the university of his native city, and afterwards professor of rhetoric at Pavia. He wrote nine tragedies in Italian, but his principal work is entitled "Hecatommithi," which consists of 100 tales, in the manner of Boe-caccio. D. 1573.

GIRARD, STEPHEN, a celebrated banker, was b. about 1746, in France. He sailed to the West Indies, as a cabin-boy, when he was only 12 years of age, and after residing there some time removed to the United States. In 1775 he opened a small shop in New Jersey, and in 1780 went to Philadelphia, where by gradual accumulations he gathered an immense fortune. During the yellow fever of 1793 he was noted for his benevolent exertions. In 1811 he became a banker, and at the time of his death, in 1832, was estimated to be worth $12,000,000.

GIRARDON, FRANCIS, a sculptor and architect, was b. at Troyes, in 1628. His chief works are the mausoleum of Richelieu, in the church of the Sorbonne, the equestrian statue of Louis XIV., and the Rape of Proserpine, in the gardens of Versailles. D. 1715.

GIRODET, THÉOSON NICHOLAS, the most original, versatile, and scientific of the modern school of French painters, was b. at Montargis, in 1767; was first a pupil of Regnault, and afterwards studied under David. His subjects are distinguished for fulness and beauty, and his coloring is rich, transparent, and harmonious. Among his principal works are Endymion sleeping, Hippocrates refusing the Presents of Artaxerxes, the Deluge, the Burial of Attala, &c. He also painted Napoleon receiving the keys of Vienna; full-length portraits of the Vendean leaders, Bonchamp and Cathelineau; and St. Louis in Egypt, which was his last great work. D. 1824.

GIRTIN, THOMAS, an artist, was b. in London, in 1773. He was a pupil of Dayes; after which he studied the works of Canaletti, and the coloring of Rubens. He first introduced the custom of drawing upon cartridge paper, and he also painted excellently in oil colors. He took many beautiful views in Scotland, Wales, and various parts of England and France. He also painted a panorama of London, which was exhibited in Spring gardens. D. 1802.

GISBORNE, THOMAS, prebendary of Durham, an eminent philosophical, theological, and miscellaneous writer, was b. at Derby, 1758. He was educated at Harrow and Cambridge, where he greatly distinguished himself, and on soon after entering holy orders, in 1792, he obtained the living of Barton in Stafford, and the same year removed to Yoxall Lodge, near Barton, where he ever after resided. It would occupy too much of our space to enumerate the long series of works which Mr. Gisborne gave in succession to the world. Many of them have attained great and lasting popularity; among which may be mentioned the "Principles of Moral Philosophy investigated," &c., "An Inquiry into the Duties of the Female Sex," "A Familiar Survey of the Christian Religion and History," &c., besides sermons, and two volumes of poetry, which, under the title of "Walks in a Forest," and "Poems, Sacred and Moral," gave him no inconsiderable poetic fame. D. 1846.

GIULIO ROMANO, the most distinguished of Raphael's scholars and assistants, was b. at Rome, in 1499. He resided principally at Mantua, and there found a wide field for the exercise of his powerful genius, both in architecture and in painting. He was unequalled for the boldness of his style, the grandeur of his designs, and the loftiness of his poetical conceptions. D. 1546.

GIUSTINIANI, POMPEY, by birth a Corsican, was an eminent general in the Spanish service, and obtained the name of Iron-arm, by having one of iron made to replace the arm he lost at the siege of Ostend. He was governor of Candia, where he was killed, in 1616; and the Venetian senate erected an equestrian statue to his memory.

GLANVIL, Sir JOHN, an eminent lawyer and statesman in the reign of Charles I. He graduated at Oxford; entered at Lincoln's Inn; obtained a sergeant's coif in 1639; and, being a member of parliament, was chosen speaker of the house of commons in the year following. His attachment to the royal cause rendered him obnoxious to the republicans, who imprisoned him, and he was not restored to liberty till 1648. He recovered his rank on the return of Charles II., but died soon after, in 1661.

GLASS, JOHN, founder of the religious sect of Glassites in Scotland; b. in Fife-shire, 1695; d. 1773.

GLAUBER, JOHN RODOLPH, a chemist, alchemist, and physician of Amsterdam, who died in 1688. Chemistry is indebted to him for facilitating many useful processes, as well as for the discovery of the purgative salt which bears his name. Like others of his day, he was incessantly occupied in attempts to find out the philosopher's stone; and his experiments, however futile for his professed object, threw light on the composition and analysis of various metals, inflammable substances, &c.

GLEIM, FREDERIC WILLIAM LOUIS, a celebrated poet, sometimes called the German Anacreon, was b. in 1719, at Ermsleben; filled the office of secretary to the chapter of Halberstadt; and d. in 1803, aged 84. He owes his chief fame to his war songs, composed for the Prussian army; and they will long be remembered by his countrymen for their spirit-stirring power.

GLENDOWER, OWEN, a celebrated Welshman, lineally descended from Llewellyn, the last prince of Wales, and who opposed Henry IV. fourteen years, declaring him a usurper of the English throne. B. 1350; d. 1416.

GLENIE, JAMES, an eminent mathematician, was b. in Ireland, and educated at St. Andrew's. During the American war he distinguished himself as an officer of artillery; but having written a pamphlet, ridiculing the duke of Richmond's plan of fortification, he was compelled to leave the service, and he afterwards experienced much of the vicissitudes of life. He was a member of the Royal Society; and the author of a "History of Germany," and several mathematical works. D. 1817.

GLICAS, or GLYCAS, MICHAEL, a

Greek Historian of the 13th century. His "Annals from the Creation," and the "History of the Byzantine Emperors," are extant, and were published by Labbe at Paris, 1660.

GLOUCESTER, ROBERT OF, the oldest of English poets, lived in the time of Henry II. Camden quotes many of his old English rhymes, and speaks highly of him. He d. at an advanced age, about the beginning of the reign of King John.—WILLIAM FREDERIC, duke of, the son of Prince William Henry, duke of Gloucester (brother to George III.) by his wife the countess-dowager of Waldegrave, was b. at Rome, in January, 1776. D. 1834.

GLOVER, RICHARD, a poet and dramatist, was the son of a London merchant, and b. in 1712. He was educated at Cheam school, where, at 16, he wrote some verses to the memory of Sir Isaac Newton, which obtained considerable attention. On leaving school, he entered on the mercantile line under his father, who was engaged in the Hamburg trade. In 1737 he married a lady of fortune; soon after which he published his "Leonidas," an epic poem. His poem of "London, or the Progress of Commerce," appeared in 1739. The same year he published his popular ballad, entitled "Hosier's Ghost," intended to rouse the national spirit against the Spaniards. In 1753 his tragedy of "Boadicea" was brought out at Drury-lane, but, though supported by Garrick, Mossop, Mrs. Cibber, &c., it was performed only 9 nights; his "Medea," some years after, met with greater attention. At the accession of George III. he was chosen M.P. for Weymouth, and was esteemed by the mercantile interest as an active and able supporter. D. 1785.—JANE, a distinguished actress, was b. at Newry, in Ireland, in 1781. Under the auspices of her father, Mr. Betterton, she commenced her theatrical career at the age of six; and after a highly successful appearance in the provinces, she was engaged by Mr. Harris, of Covent-garden, where she made her debut, as Elvina, in Hannah More's "Percy," in 1797. D. 1850.

GLUCK, CHRISTOPHER, one of the most eminent musical composers of modern times, was b. in Bavaria, in 1714, devoted himself to the study of music, and became a skilful performer on several instruments. He went to London in 1745, and composed for the Italian opera. He then went to the Continent; and Vienna, Naples, Rome, Milan, and Venice were in turn the theatres of his glory. His "Alceste," and "Orpheus," produced at Vienna, between the years 1762 and 1769, had an overwhelming effect by their boldness and originality, and served, together with some later ones, to establish the fame of their author. In 1774, Gluck went to Paris; and the celebrated Piccini arriving there shortly after, the French capital was divided upon the merits of the two composers. Such a scene, indeed, of musical rivalry had never before been known. He now brought out his long-promised opera of "Iphigenia in Aulis." It was received with enthusiastic applause, and represented 170 times in the course of two seasons. In 1787 he returned to Germany, with a large fortune, and d. at Vienna in the same year.

GMELIN, JOHN GEORGE, a botanist and physician, was b. at Tübingen, in 1709. He went to Petersburg, where he became member of the academy, and professor of chemistry and natural history. In 1773 he was sent with a company employed to explore the boundaries of Siberia. He published "Flora Siberica" and "Travels through Siberia." D. 1755.—SAMUEL THEOPHILUS, nephew of the preceding, was b. at Tübingen, in 1743; went to Petersburg, and obtained a professorship. He spent some years in travelling through Tartary, where he d. in prison, into which he had been thrown by one of the chiefs, in 1774. He wrote his "Travels through Russia," and a "Journey from Astracan to Czarien."—JOHN FREDERIC, a physician and chemist, was b. at Tübingen, in 1748. He became professor of chemistry and natural history at Göttingen; and published several works on chemistry, mineralogy, and natural history. One of the most celebrated is his edition of the "Systema Naturæ" of Linnæus. He was also the author of "A History of Chemistry," and the world is indebted to him for the discovery of several excellent dyes, extracted from mineral and vegetable substances. D. 1805.

GOAD, JOHN, an eminent schoolmaster, was b. in London, 1615. His works are, "Genealogicon Latinum," "Astro-Meteorological Aphorisms and Discourses of the Bodies Celestial, their Natures, Influences," &c. The subject of this is a kind of astrology founded on reason and experiment, and gained him great reputation.

GOBBO, PETER PAUL CORTONESE, a celebrated painter of fruit and landscapes, b. at Cortona, in 1580. He copied nature with the greatest accuracy, and by his skill in the chiaro-oscuro he gave an exact and expressive roundness to his fruits, &c., but he chiefly excelled in coloring. D. 1640.

GOBELIN, GILES, a French dyer of the 17th century, who resided at Paris, and is said to have invented or greatly improved the process of dyeing scarlet. In 1686, a royal establishment for the manufactory of fine tapestry was founded on the spot where his premises stood, whence the work produced there was termed the Gobelin tapestry.

GODDARD, JONATHAN, an able chemist and physician, b. at Greenwich, about the year 1617. He was educated at Oxford, graduated at Cambridge, and on the breaking out of the civil war was attached to the parliament. He attended Cromwell in his expeditions to Scotland and Ireland, as physician to the forces; was appointed warden of Merton college, and in the parliament of 1653, sat as sole representative for Oxford. D. 1674.

GODFREY of Bouillon, chief of the first crusade, and king of Jerusalem, was the son of Eustace II., count of Boulogne and Lens. He served with great gallantry in the armies of the Emperor Henry IV., who conferred upon him the title of duke of Lorraine; and when the first crusade was set on foot, the fame of his exploits caused his election as one of the principal commanders. In 1096, accompanied by his brothers, Eustace and Baldwin, he commenced his march, and on arriving at Philopolis, in Thrace, he compelled the Emperor Alexis Comnenus to allow him a free passage to the East. Several difficulties occurred; but at length the Turks were vanquished, and the object of his ambition was effected. Jerusalem was carried by storm, after a siege of five weeks, (July 15, 1099;) and, in eight days after, Godfrey was proclaimed king, by the unanimous voice of the crusading army; but the piety and humility of the conqueror would not suffer him to wear a crown in the holy city, and he declined the regal title, contenting himself with that of Defender and Guardian of the Holy Sepulchre. The sultan of Egypt, at the head of 400,000 men, now attempted to dispossess him of his newly-acquired territory, but Godfrey gave him battle in the plain of Ascalon, and 100,000 men were left dead on the field. D. in 1100.—OF VITERBO, an historian who lived in the 12th century, was chaplain and secretary to Conrad III., and the emperors Frederic and Henry VI. He labored 40 years in compiling a chronicle from the creation of the world to the year 1186. It is written in a mixture of prose and verse; and was first printed at Basle in 1559.

GODMAN, JOHN D., an eminent anatomist and naturalist. After obtaining his medical degree, he entered with energy upon the active duties of his profession. He went to Baltimore, and afterwards removed to Philadelphia. Being invited to the professorship of anatomy in the college of Ohio, he spent a year at the West, and then returned to Philadelphia, where he willingly retired from the field of practice, and devoted himself to scientific pursuits. Determined to be a thorough teacher of anatomy, he opened a room for private demonstrations, and in the first winter had a class of seventy students. After prosecuting his anatomical labors four or five years, he was chosen professor of anatomy in Rutgers's medical college in New York. With a broken constitution he was compelled, before the completion of his second course of lectures to retire from the school, and to seek a milder climate. After passing the winter in Santa Cruz, he settled in Germantown, near Philadelphia. He wrote the articles on natural history for the "American Encyclopædia" to the end of the letter C., besides numerous papers in the periodical journals of the day. He published the "Western Quarterly Reporter of Medical Science," Cincinnati, 1822; "Account of Irregularities of Structure and Morbid Anatomy;" "Contributions to Physiological and Pathological Anatomy;" "Bell's Anatomy" with notes; "Anatomical Investigations, comprising descriptions of various Fasciæ of the Body," 1824; "American Natural History," with engravings; addresses on various public occasions, 1829; and "Rambles of a Naturalist." D. 1830.

GODOLPHIN, SIDNEY, a poet, was b. in Cornwall, in 1610; educated at Exeter college, Oxford; and having joined the king's army, he fell in an engagement at Chagford, Devon, in 1643. Besides several poems, he translated that part of Virgil which recites the loves of Dido and Æneas.

GODWIN, earl of Kent, a powerful Anglo-Saxon lord. In 1017 he accompanied Canute in an expedition against Sweden, where he behaved with such valor as to receive the daughter of that monarch in marriage, and large grants of land. On the death of Canute, the earl sided with Hardicanute against Harold, but afterwards he espoused the cause of the latter. He was charged with murdering Alfred, one of the sons of Ethelred II., from which he vindicated himself by oath. On the death of Hardicanute he joined Edward, who married his daughter, but afterwards he rebelled against Edward, and being unsuccessful, fled to Flanders. Having gathered fresh forces, he sailed up the Thames, and appeared before London, which threw the country into such confusion, that the king was obliged to negotiate peace with Godwin, who was restored to his estates. D. 1053.—FRANCIS, was b. at Havington, in Northamptonshire, in 1561. In 1601 he was promoted to the see of Llandaff, and was translated to that of Hereford in 1617. He d. in 1633. He was the author of "Rerum Anglicarum Hen. VIII." &c.; and a curious book entitled "The Man in the Moon, or a Discourse of a Voyage thither, by Domingo Gonzales." —THOMAS, a distinguished scholar, who in the 17th century was the master of the foundation school at Abingdon, Berks. He was the author of a useful work, entitled "Romane Historiæ Anthologia," a "Synopsis of Hebrew Antiquities," and a treatise on Jewish rites and ceremonies. D. 1643.—WILLIAM, the well-known author of "Political Justice," "Caleb Williams," &c., was the son of a dissenting minister, and b. at Wisbeach, in 1756. He was designed for the same calling as his father; but, while studying at the Dissenters' college, Hoxton, his religious opinions had undergone repeated changes, and though he commenced as a preacher, he ultimately abandoned the pulpit in 1783, and went to London as a literary adventurer. His first publication was a series of six sermons, called "Sketches of History;" and he soon after had the good fortune to obtain employment as a principal conductor of the "Annual Register," from which he derived a small but certain income. Associating with the democrats of the day, and expressing opinions in unison with theirs, he soon enlisted under their banners. But it was the stormy elements of the French revolution which called forth his extraordinary powers of mind, and gave birth to that bold and astounding masterpiece of republicanism, his "Political Justice." In 1794 he published his celebrated novel of "Caleb Williams," a work which produced nearly as great a sensation as the former, its object being to deery the existing constitution of society, while it portrayed, with appalling force, the effects of crime. After the trial of his friends, Hardy, Thelwall, and Horne Tooke, he published a pamphlet, containing strictures on Judge Eyre's charge to the jury, the circulation of which government tried in vain to prevent. Mr. Godwin did not appear again as an author till 1797, when he published a series of essays, under the title of "The Enquirer." In the following year he produced the "Memoirs of Mary Wolstoncroft," authoress of a "Vindication of the Rights of Woman," whose congenial mind in politics and morals, and whose noble spirit he ardently admired. He had lived with her some time before their marriage; and in her "Memoirs" he says, "the principal motive for complying with the ceremony, was the circumstance of Mary's being in a state of pregnancy." She, however, died a few months after, in giving birth to a daughter. In 1799 he produced another work, entitled "St. Leon," a romance. In 1801 he again married, and shortly after opened a bookseller's shop in Skinner-street, where ushered forth a variety of juvenile publications, many of which were his own composition. Though engaged in trade, he continued to wield the pen of an experienced author. He wrote the novels of "Fleetwood," and "Mandeville;" a "History of the Life and Age of Geoffrey Chaucer," a "History of the Commonwealth of England," two unsuccessful tragedies, an "Exposition of Mr. Malthus's Theory of Population," "Cloudesley," a novel; "Thoughts on Man; his Nature, Productions, and Discoveries;" "The Lives of the Necromancers," &c. As a novelist, Godwin is decidedly original, combining great depth of thought with singular independence and energy of style. During the administration of Earl Grey, he was appointed to the sinecure office of yeoman-usher of the exchequer, by which his latter days were rendered comfortable. D. April, 1836.—The wife of the preceding, though better known as MARY WOLSTONCROFT, was b. 1759. The poverty of her parents could only afford her the commonest mode of education. Reading and reflection, with extraordinary talents, her biographer tells us, supplied all deficiencies; so that, at the death of her mother, she opened a school with her sisters at Islington, from whence they removed to Newington Green. Shortly after, Mary quitted her sisters to attend upon a sick lady who had been her benefactress, and who died at Lisbon. Upon her return she engaged herself as governess to Lord Kingsborough's children. In 1789 she fixed her residence in London, and began her literary pursuits with "Thoughts on the Education of Daughters." In 1797 she was married to William Godwin, and died a few months afterwards.—WILLIAM, son of the author of "Caleb Williams," and the brother of Mrs. Shelley, was a contributor to some of the best periodicals of the day, and a parliamentary reporter. His essays showed that he was an attentive observer of men and manners, and were written with considerable tact and vivacity. D. 1832.

GOËTHE, JOHN WOLFGANG VON, the greatest modern poet of Germany, and the patriarch of German literature, was b. at Frankfurt-on-the-Maine, August 28, 1749. His father was doctor of law and imperial counsellor; and being in good circumstances, possessing a taste for the fine arts, and having made a tolerable collection of pictures and other objects of virtù, young Goethe had an early opportunity of indulging his fancy and improving his mind. Drawing, music, natural science, the elements of jurisprudence, and the languages occupied his early years; and when he was 15, he was sent to the university at Leipsic, but did not follow any regular course of studies. In 1768 he quitted Leipsic, and subsequently went to the university of Strasburg, to qualify himself for the law; but he paid more attention to chemistry and anatomy than to his nominal pursuit. In 1771 he took the degree of doctor of jurisprudence, and then went to Wetzlar, where he found, in his own love for a betrothed lady, and in the suicide of a young man named Jerusalem, the subjects for his "Werther," which appeared in 1774, and at once excited the attention of his countrymen, while it produced an instantaneous effect on his country's literature. Having, in 1782, entered the service of the duke of Saxe-Weimar, whom he had met in travelling, he was made president of the council chamber, ennobled, and loaded with honors. A splendid galaxy of talent assembled at Weimar, and united itself to Goethe. The direction of the theatre was confided to him, and he there brought out some of the noble dramatic chefs-d'œuvre of Schiller, with an effect worthy of them. There, too, his own dramatic works first appeared, viz., "Goetz von Berlichingen," "Faust," "Iphigenia in Tauris," "Tasso," "Clavigo," "Stella," and "Count Egmont." In 1786 he made a journey to Italy, where he remained two years, visited Sicily, and remained a long time in Rome. In 1792 he followed his prince during the campaign in Champagne. He was afterwards created minister; received, in 1807, the order of Alexander-Newsky from Alexander of Russia, and the grand cross of the legion of honor from Napoleon. D. at Weimar, March 22, 1832, aged 80. Goethe was an intellectual giant; and his profound knowledge of life and of individual character places his works among the first ever produced. His greatest production, "Faust," has been repeatedly translated into English. His beautiful songs and shorter poems, elegies, distichs, &c., possess a perennial beauty. Goethe's writings are by far too voluminous to be here enumerated; but we must mention "William Meister's Apprenticeship," an ethic fiction; "Herman and Dorothea," and the "Elective Affinities," &c.

GOETZE, JOHN AUGUSTUS EPHRAIM, a German naturalist, was b. at Aschefeilen in 1731; and d. in 1793. He made many microscopic discoveries, and wrote several books on natural history; among which are "Entomological Memoirs," "A History of Intestine Vermes," and a "European Fauna." He was pastor of the church at Quedlinburgh.

GOFFE, WILLIAM, one of the judges of King Charles I., and a major-general under Cromwell, left London before Charles II. was proclaimed, and arrived at Boston in July, 1660. Governor Endicott gave him a friendly reception. But when the act of indemnity arrived in November, and his name was not found among those to whom pardon was offered, the government of Massachusetts was alarmed. Perceiving his danger, he with Whalley left Cambridge, where they had resided, and went to New Haven. They were here concealed by Deputy-governor Leet and Mr. Davenport. From New Haven they went to West Rock, a mountain 300 feet in height, at the distance of two or three miles from the town, where they were hid in a cave. They afterwards lived in concealment at Milford, Derby, and Branford, and in October, 1664, removed to Hadley, in Massachusetts, and were concealed for 15 or 16 years in the house of Mr. Russell, the minister. On the first of September, 1675, the town of Hadley was alarmed by the Indians in the time of public worship, and the people were thrown into the utmost confusion. But suddenly an aged venerable man in an uncommon dress appeared in the midst of them, revived their courage, and putting himself at their head, led them to the attack, and repulsed the enemy. The deliverer of Hadley immediately disappeared, and the inhabitants, overwhelmed with astonishment, supposed that an angel had been sent for their protection. D. about 1679.

GOGUET, ANTHONY YVES, a Parisian advocate, and a writer on jurisprudence. His principal work, exhibiting much industry and learning, appeared in 1758, (the year in which he died,) and is entitled "Origine des Loix, des Sciences, et des Arts, et de leurs Progrès chez les Anciens Peuples."

GOICOECHEA, JOSEPH ANTHONY DE LIEUDOY, professor of philosophy and theology at Guatemala, in South America, and founder of the Economical Society there, was a Franciscan friar, but at the same time a public spirited member of the state. He published a number of memoirs on botany, agriculture, &c., and imported into his own country many invaluable inventions and discoveries. D. 1814.

GOLDING, ARTHUR, an English writer, of the Elizabethan era, patronized by Cecil, Sir Philip Sidney, and other cotemporary literati, was the translator of Ovid's "Metamorphoses" into English verse, and of Cæsar's "Commentaries" into prose. He was likewise the author of an account of the earthquake of 1580, and of several devotional and other treatises.

GOLDONI, CHARLES, a celebrated Italian dramatist, was b. at Venice, in 1707: and so early did his taste for the drama appear, that before he was 8 years old he had sketched the plan of a comedy. His father, who was a physician, having settled at Perugia, intended that his son should follow the medical profession; but Goldoni, dissatisfied with this pursuit, obtained permission to study law in Venice. After committing many youthful follies, he brought a few pieces upon the stage, which procured but little profit, and not much praise; and he continued to live in a continual scene of dissipation and intrigue until he married the daughter of a notary in Genoa, and removed to Venice. Here he first began to cultivate that department of dramatic poetry in which he was to excel, namely, description of character and manners, in which he took Molière, whom he began to study about this time, for his model. Having taken the direction of the theatre at Rimini, he set about the reformation of the Italian stage, and in 1761 to undertake a similar office at Paris. On the conclusion of his engagement, he was appointed Italian master to the princesses, with apartments in Versailles, and a pension. For 30 years he resided in the French capital; but the revolution having deprived him of his chief resources, he sank into a profound melancholy, and d. 1792, aged 85.

GOLDSMITH, OLIVER, a celebrated poet, historian, and essayist, was b. in 1731, at Pallas, in the county of Longford, Ireland. He was the son of a clergyman, and was educated at the universities of Dublin, Edinburgh, and Leyden, with a view to the medical profession. But his eccentricities and careless conduct were the prolific source of difficulty to himself and friends; and when he abruptly quitted Leyden he had but one shirt and no money, though he intended to make the tour of Europe on foot, and actually travelled through Flanders, part of France, Germany, Switzerland, and Italy, often subsisting on the bounty of the peasants, and returning the obligation of a night's lodging, or a meal, by his skill on the German flute, which he fortunately carried with him as his stock in trade. In 1758 he arrived in England; and, by the assistance and recommendation of Dr. Sleigh, his countryman and fellow-collegian, obtained a situation as usher in a school at Peckham; where, however, he did not remain long, but settled in London, and subsisted by writing for periodical publications. One of his first performances was an "Inquiry into the State of Polite Learning in Europe;" but he emerged from obscurity, in 1765, by the publication of his poem, entitled "The Traveller, or a Prospect of Society," of which Dr. Johnson said, "that there had not been so fine a poem since Pope's time." The year following appeared his well-known novel of the "Vicar of Wakefield." His circumstances were now respectable, and he took chambers in the Temple; but the liberality of his temper involved him in frequent difficulties. In 1768 he brought out his comedy of the "Good-Natured Man" at Covent-garden, but its reception was not equal to its merits.

In 1770 he published "The Deserted Village," a poem, which, in point of description and pathos, is above all praise; yet such was his modest opinion of its merits, that he could hardly be induced to take the proffered recompense of £100 from his bookseller. In 1772 he produced his comedy of "She Stoops to Conquer," which was highly successful and profitable. Besides these performances, he produced a number of others; as a "History of England, in a Series of Letters from a Nobleman to his Son," "A History of England," "A Roman and a Grecian History," "A History of the Earth and Animated Nature," "Chinese Letters," &c. Goldsmith was the friend of Johnson, Reynolds, and Burke, and a member of the Literary Club established by the former. D. April 4, 1774.

GOLIUS, JAMES, an eminent oriental scholar, was b. at the Hague, in 1596; educated at Leyden, and in 1622 went as interpreter to the Dutch embassy in Morocco. On his return he was appointed professor of Arabia at Leyden, and afterwards also nominated professor of mathematics, and interpreter of the oriental languages to the United States. His principal works are, an "Arabic Lexicon," a "Persian Dictionary," "The History of the Saracens, translated from Elmacin," and "The Life of Tamerlane." D. 1667.—PETER, his brother, who was also an excellent orientalist, became a Catholic, and founded a Carmelite convent on Mount Libanus. He d. in 1673, at Surat, in the East Indies, whither he had proceeded as a missionary.

GONGORA, LOUIS, a celebrated Spanish poet, was b. at Cordova, in 1562, and is called by his countrymen the prince of lyric poets. His style, however, is often difficult to comprehend, even to the Spaniards themselves, among whom he has had almost as many censurers as admirers. D. 1627.

GONSALVO OF CORDOVA, HERNANDEZ Y AGUILAR, a celebrated Spanish warrior, was b. at Montilla, near Cordova, in 1443. He entered the army when only 15; distinguished himself against the Moors, Turks, and Portuguese; was appointed viceroy of Naples, after having conquered that kingdom, and universally obtained the appellation of the Great Captain. D. 1515.

GOOD, JOHN MASON, a physician, poet, and philologist, was the son of a dissenting minister, and b. 1764, at Epping, in Essex. Having been apprenticed to a surgeon, he first practised at Coggeshall; but in 1793 he settled in London, as a surgeon and apothecary; and having obtained a diploma from the university of Aberdeen, he commenced practice as a physician in 1802. It is stated of him, that so incessant and multifarious were his labors in 1803, that he was finishing a translation of "Solomon's Song," carrying on his "Life of Dr. Geddes," walking from 12 to 14 miles a day to see his patients, editing the "Critical Review," and supplying a column of matter, weekly, for the "Sunday Review;" added to which he had, for a short period, the management of the "British Press" newspaper. In the winter of 1810, Mr. Good commenced his lectures at the Surrey Institution, which were published in 1826, entitled "The Book of Nature." He produced many other valuable works, among which are "The Study of Medicine." D. 1827.

GOODRICH, CHAUNCEY, lieutenant-governor of Connecticut, was b. at Durham, October 20th, 1759, and graduated at Yale college in 1779, with a high reputation for genius and acquirements. After having spent several years as a tutor in that seminary, he established himself as a lawyer at Hartford, and soon attained the first eminence in the profession. He was chosen representative in the legislature of the state in 1793, and the following year was elected to a seat in congress, and continued there till 1800. In 1802 he became a counsellor of the state, and retained the office till 1807, when he was appointed a senator of the United States. He received the office of mayor of Hartford in 1812, and lieutenant-governor of the state in 1813, when he resigned his seat in the United States senate. D. 1815.

GOOKIN, DANIEL, a major-general of Massachusetts, was b. in England, and in 1621 emigrated to Virginia. In 1644 he removed to New England, and was appointed superintendent of all the Indians who had submitted to the government of Massachusetts. In 1681 he received the appointment of major-general of the province. He d. in 1687, at the age of 75. He left in manuscript historical collections of New England Indians, which were published in the first volume of the "Massachusetts Historical Society." He also left in manuscript a history of New England.

GORDIAN, MARCUS ANTONIUS, the elder, a Roman emperor, surnamed Africanus, was descended from the Grac-ehi, and the family of Trajan. He was b. 157, and the early part of his life was spent in literary pursuits. After being edile, twice consul, and proconsul of Africa, &c. was, at the age of 80, raised to the throne, in conjunction with his son; who being slain in battle six weeks after their accession, the father, in an agony of grief, put a period to his own existence.—MARCUS ANTONIUS, grandson of the preceding, was called to the throne when he was only 13 years of age. He became a renowned warrior, and was styled the Guardian of the Commonwealth. He d. near Circesium, in 244.

GORDON, PATRICK, governor of Pennsylvania, under the proprietors, commenced his administration as the successor of Sir William Keith, in 1726. It was distinguished by prudence, moderation, and a regard to the interests of the province, and was highly popular. He was bred to arms, and served from his youth to near the close of Queen Anne's reign, with a high reputation. D. at Philadelphia, 1736.—WILLIAM, minister of Roxbury, Mass., was a native of England. He had been settled in the ministry in England, and came to America in 1770, and was ordained minister of the third church in Roxbury, 1772. He took an active part in public measures during the war with Great Britain, and was chosen chaplain to the provincial congress of Massachusetts. In 1776 he formed the design of writing a history of the great events in America. Besides other sources of information, he had recourse to the records of congress, and to those of New England, and was indulged with the perusal of the papers of Washington, Gates, Greene, Lincoln, and Otho Williams. After the conclusion of the war, he returned to his native country in 1786, and in 1788 published the work which had for a number of years occupied his attention. D. 1807.—ALEXANDER, a Scotch antiquary, who lived many years in Italy and other parts of the Continent; and, in 1736, was appointed secretary to the society for the encouragement of learning. In 1741 he went to Carolina, where he held several offices, and had some grants of land. D. 1750. Among his works are the "Lives of Pope Alexander VI. and his son Cæsar Borgia," "A Complete History of Ancient Amphitheatres," &c.—Lord GEORGE, son of Cosmo George, duke of Gordon, was b. in 1750. He entered when young into the navy, but left it during the American war, in consequence of a dispute with Lord Sandwich, relative to promotion. He sat in parliament for Luggershall, and became conspicuous by his opposition to ministers; but, though eccentric, he displayed no deficiency of wit or argument. He soon, however, became an object of great notoriety; for a bill having been introduced into the house, in 1780, for the relief of Roman Catholics from certain penalties and disabilities, he collected a mob, at the head of whom he marched to present a petition against the proposed measure. The dreadful riots which ensued, led to his lordship's arrest and trial for high treason; but no evidence being adduced of such a design, he was acquitted. In the beginning of 1778, having been twice convicted of libelling the French ambassador, the queen of France, and the criminal justice of his country, he retired to Holland; but he was arrested, sent home, and committed to Newgate, where he d. in 1793.—THOMAS, a political writer, was b. at Kirkendbright, in Scotland, and settled in London as a classical teacher, but soon turned his attention to politics, and was employed by Harley, earl of Oxford. Mr. Trenhard next took him to live with him, and they wrote in conjunction "Cato's Letters," and the "Independent Whig." He translated Tacitus and Sallust; and after his death, which happened in 1750, appeared "A Cordial for Low Spirits," and the "Pillars of Priestcraft and Orthodoxy Shaken."

GORE, CHRISTOPHER, a governor of the state of Massachusetts, was b. at Boston, in 1758, his father being an opulent mechanic there. In 1789 Washington appointed him first United States attorney for the district of Massachusetts; and in 1796 he was selected by the president as the colleague of the celebrated William Pinkney, to settle the American claims upon England for spoliations. In this situation he evinced his wonted energy and talent, and recovered property to a very great amount for his fellow-citizens. In 1803 he was left in London as chargé d'affaires, when Rufus King, the American minister, returned to America. In 1809 he was chosen governor of Massachusetts, but retained his dignity only for one year. In 1814 he was called to the senate of the Union, and served in this capacity for three years, when he retired from public affairs, and d. in 1827, aged 68. He was a good scholar, and had an excellent knowledge of the world, which qualities were set off to the best advantage by his fine person and graceful manners.

GORGIAS, LEONTINUS, a celebrated orator of the school of Empedocles, was a native of Leontium in Sicily, and flourished in the 5th century B. C. A statue of gold was erected to his honor at Delphi; and Plato has given his name to one of his dialogues. He lived to the age of 105.

GORHAM, NATHANIEL, president of congress, was b. in Charlestown, Massachusetts, in 1738, and d. June 11th, 1796, aged 58. He was often a member of the legislature, and in 1784 was elected to congress. As a member of the convention he assisted in forming the constitution of the United States.—JOHN, a physician of Boston, graduated at Harvard college, 1801, and finished his professional education at Edinburgh. In 1809 he was appointed adjunct professor of chemistry and materia medica at Cambridge; and in 1816 professor of chemistry and mineralogy. He d. 1829, aged 46. He published an "Inaugural Address," 1817; "Elements of Chemical Science," 1819.

GOSNOLD, BARTHOLOMEW, an intrepid mariner of the west of England, sailed from Falmouth for the coast of America, March 26, 1602. Instead of approaching this country by the way of the West Indies, he was the first Englishman who directly crossed the ocean. He discovered land May 4th, and a cape on the 15th, near which he caught a great number of cod, from which circumstance he named the land Cape Cod. The Indians which he met at different places wore ornaments of copper, and used the pipe and tobacco. He passed Sandy Point, and in a few days came to an island, which he named Martha's Vineyard, as there were many vines upon it. This is supposed to have been, not the island which now bears that name, but the small island which is called No Man's Land. He resided three weeks on the most western of the Elizabeth islands, on which he built a fort and storehouse. But finding that he had not a supply of provisions, he gave up the design of making a settlement. The cellar of his storehouse was discovered by Dr. Belknap in 1797. After his return to England he embarked in an expedition to Virginia, where he was a member of the council. But he d. soon after his arrival, 1607.

GOSSELIN, PASCAL FRANCIS JOSEPH, an eminent French geographer, b. at Lille, in the Netherlands, in 1751. He was engaged in a tour through Europe for several years, and made many valuable researches concerning ancient geography. In 1789 he was admitted a member of the national assembly, and, in 1791, nominated a member of the central administration of commerce. He was subsequently employed in the war department, became a member of the legion of honor; and was ultimately made keeper of the king's library and cabinet of medals, &c., at Paris. His works relate to ancient geography, and possess much merit. D. 1830.

GOTHOFRED, DENIS, an eminent French lawyer, b. of an illustrious family at Paris, in 1549. France being involved in confusion by the leaguers, he accepted of a professor's chair at Geneva, until he was employed by Henry IV.; but being afterwards deprived of his office, as a Huguenot, he retired to Heidelberg, and d. in 1622. He wrote many books, the chief of which is the "Corpus Juris Civilis."—THEODORE, son of the preceding, was b. at Geneva, in 1580. As soon as he had finished his studies he went to Paris, where he conformed to the Catholic religion, and applied with indefatigable industry to the study of history. In 1632 Louis XIII. made him one of his historiographers, with a stipend of 3000 livres; and, in 1636, he was sent to Cologne, and subsequently to Munster, to assist at the treaty of peace negotiating there. He d. in 1649. His principal work is an "Account of the Ceremonial of the Kings of France."—DENIS, son of Theodore, was b. at Paris, in 1615. He studied history, after his father's example; became as eminent in that department of knowledge, and obtained the reversion of his father's place of historiographer royal, from Louis XIII., when he was but 25 years of age. He finished the "Memoirs of Philip de Commines" began by his father; and was preparing a history of Charles VIII., when he d., in 1681.

GOTTSCHE, JOHN CHRISTOPHER, a German writer, was b. at Königsberg, in 1700; and is considered to have contributed much towards the reformation of German literature. He was successively professor of the belles lettres, philosophy, metaphysics, and poetry, in the university of Leipsic; and d. in 1766. He was assisted in his dramatic writings by his wife, who was a woman of splendid talents.

GOUJON, JEAN, a French sculptor and architect in the 16th century, who, being a Protestant, fell in the massacre of St. Bartholomew, 1572. He designed the fine façade of the old Louvre, and other works, which procured him the title of the French Phidias.

GOULD, JAMES, an eminent American jurist. He was a native of Branford, Conn.; and graduated at Yale college in 1791. In early life he became distinguished as a lawyer; and was raised to the office of judge of the supreme court of his native state. From this office, however, he was displaced in 1818, by the adoption of a new constitution. For many years he was associated with Judge Tappan Reeve, as professor of the law school at Litchfield, and after the death of Judge Reeve he continued to conduct the school till within a few years of his death, when the state of his health required him to relinquish it. In his manners he was an accomplished gentleman; in his family one of the most amiable and affectionate of men; and in the social circle one of the most refined and agreeable companions. His mind was richly stored with the treasures, not of his profession only, but of ancient and modern classics, and also of the elegant literature of the day. D. 1838.

GOUVION ST. CYR, General LAURENT, marquis de, an eminent French commander, commenced his military career during the revolution. In the campaign on the Rhine, in 1795, he repeatedly distinguished himself; and in the following year he attracted the particular attention of Moreau, who hesitated not to attribute to his skill and bravery much of the success which attended the French arms. He was afterwards intrusted with some diplomatic missions; and when these were performed, he returned to the camp, and in 1800 commanded the centre of the army of the Rhine. In 1804 he was made colonel-general of the cuirassiers, and grand officer of the legion of honor. He continued to pursue a successful career during the following campaigns in Italy and Germany; and when the French first invaded Spain he was employed in Catalonia, where he also displayed considerable ability. In the disastrous campaign of Bonaparte in Russia, he succeeded Marshal Oudinot in the command of the central army; and for his services on that occasion he was promoted to the rank of marshal. He behaved with great judgment and bravery at the battle of Dresden, and was left there with a garrison of 16,000 men; but succeeding events rendered it impossible for him to maintain the place. On the restoration of the Bourbons he was created a peer, and made a commander of the order of St. Louis. In 1817 he was appointed minister for naval affairs, and he subsequently filled the highest office in the war department. D. 1830.

GOWER, JOHN, an English poet of the 14th century, supposed to have been b. in Yorkshire, about 1320. He was a member of the society of the Inner Temple; and some writers assert that he became chief justice of the common pleas; though the more general opinion is, that the judge was another person of the same name. He d. in 1402, and was buried in the conventual church of St. Mary Overy, Southwark, to which he was a benefactor, and where his tomb is still to be seen. He was author of a tripartite work, entitled, "Speculum Meditantis," "Vox Clamantis," and "Confessio Amantis."

GOYEN, JOHN VAN, a painter of landscapes, cattle, and sea-pieces, was b. at Leyden, in 1596; and was the pupil of Vandervelde. He possessed great facility and freedom; his works are consequently more general throughout Europe than those of any other master, but such as are finished and remain undamaged are highly valued.

GOZON, DEODATI, grand-master of the order of St. John of Jerusalem, was celebrated for his courage and other virtues. A fabulous story is told of his killing a dragon of a monstrous kind, that infested the island of Rhodes. D. 1353.

GOZZI, GASPARE, Count, an Italian; author of "Dramatic Pieces," "Poems," "Familiar Letters," and a work on the plan of the Spectator, called the "Venetian Observer." B. at Venice, 1813; d. 1786.—CHARLES, Count, brother of the preceding, a dramatic writer, known as the persevering enemy and rival of Goldoni.

GRACCHUS, TIBERIUS SEMPRONIUS, was a celebrated Roman, of eminent talents and patriotism, who distinguished himself at the taking of Carthage, and was elected tribune of the people. Having, in their name, demanded of the senate the execution of the agrarian law, by which all persons possessing above 500 acres of land were to be deprived of the surplus, for the benefit of the poor citizens, among whom an equal distribution of it was to be made, it met with violent opposition, and Tiberius fell a victim to his zeal and the fury of the offended patricians, 133 B. C.—CAIUS, a younger brother of the preceding, who possessed similar talents and principles, and pursued similar measures. He was twice tribune, and obtained the passing of various laws obnoxious to the patriots; but, at length, he was slain in battle, when contending with the consul Oppianus, 121 B. C.

GRACIAN, BALTHASAR, a Spanish Jesuit, and one of the most popular preachers and writers of his time, was b. in 1584, and became rector of the college of Tarragona. He wrote several works; the chief of which are, "The Courtier," "The Hero," and "The Art of Prudence." D. 1658.

GRÄFFE, or GRÆVIUS, JOHN G., a learned classical scholar, b. at Naumburg, Saxony, in 1632. His avidity for study in his early years was astonishing. He succeeded Gronovius in the professorship of history at Deventer, and removed from thence to Utrecht, where he d. in 1703. He published editions of several of the classics; but his greatest works are his "Thesaurus Antiquitatum Romanorum," and "Thesaurus Antiquitatum et Historiarum Italiae."

GRÆME, JOHN, a Scotch poet, was b. at Carnwarth, in Lanarkshire, in 1749. He was the son of a poor farmer, but discovered a superior genius, obtained a liberal education, first at Edinburgh, and next at St. Andrews. He was preparing for the ministry, when he d. in 1772, leaving behind him a volume of elegiac and miscellaneous poetry, which was afterwards published.

GRAFFIGNY, FRANCES D'ISSEMBOURG D'HAPPOUCOURT DE, was b. at Nancy in 1694. She was the wife of Graffigny, chamberlain to the duke of Lorraine, from whom she was legally separated on account of his brutal conduct. Her best literary productions are a sentimental work, entitled "Lettres d'une Péruvienne," and the drama of "Cenie." D. at Paris, 1758.

GRAFTON, AUGUSTUS HENRY FITZROY, duke of, was b. in 1736; succeeded his grandfather in the family honors in 1757; and in 1765 was appointed secretary of state; but the year following he relinquished that station, and soon after became first lord of the treasury, which he held till 1770. During his administration, he was virulently attacked by Junius, who seems to have been actuated quite as much by personal enmity as by political hostility. In 1771 the duke was nominated lord privy seal, which office he resigned in 1775, and acted in opposition to the court till 1782, when he was again in place for a short time. After this, he was uniformly an opponent of ministers, till his death. He was the author of a volume of theological essays, &c. D. 1811.—RICHARD, an English historian, who carried on an extensive business in London, as a printer, in the 16th century. He greatly assisted in the compilation of "Hall's Chronicle," and also produced another, entitled "A Chronicle at large of the Affayres of England from the Creation of the Worlde unto Queene Elizabeth." Grafton's Chronicle was republished in 1809.

GRAGGINI, ANTHONY FRANCIS, an Italian poet of the 16th century. He was the originator of the Della Crusca academy; and the author of poems and tales, the latter rivalling, in purity of style, those of Boccaccio. B. at Florence, 1503; d. 1583.

GRAHAM, GEORGE, an ingenious watchmaker, and a most accurate mechanic, was b. at Kirklington, Cumberland, 1675. He invented various astronomical instruments, by which the progress of science was considerably furthered. The great mural arch in the observatory of Greenwich was made for Dr. Halley, under his inspection, and divided by his own hand. He invented the sector with which Dr. Bradley discovered two new motions in the fixed stars. He furnished the members of the French Academy, who were sent to the north to measure a degree of the meridian, with the instruments for that purpose; and he composed the whole planetary system, within the compass of a small cabinet, from which model all succeeding orreries have been formed. D. 1751.—Sir JOHN, the faithful companion and fellow-patriot of Sir William Wallace. He fell at the battle of Falkirk, July 22, 1298.—JOHN, of Claverhouse, Viscount Dundee, "a soldier of distinguished courage and professional skill, but rapacious and profane, of violent temper, and of obdurate heart," whose name, "wherever the Scottish race is settled on the face of the globe, is mentioned with a peculiar energy of hatred," was b. in 1650. His career in arms commenced as a soldier of fortune in France; he subsequently entered the Dutch service; and on his return to Scotland in 1677, he was nominated to the command of a regiment of horse that had been raised against the Covenanters. His subsequent career we will not dwell upon. Among many cruel instruments of a tyrannous sovereign, he made himself conspicuous by his barbarity, and has obtained an unenviable notoriety in history, romance, and local tradition. The services which he rendered to his sovereign were rewarded from time to time by various high offices; and he was finally raised to the peerage by the title of Viscount Dundee. Killed at Killierankie, in the hour of victory, in 1689.—Sir RICHARD, Lord Viscount Preston, was b. 1648. He was sent ambassador by Charles II. to Louis XIV., and was master of the wardrobe and secretary of state under James II. When the revolution took place, he was tried and condemned, on an accusation of attempting the restoration of that prince, but, through the queen's intercession, he was pardoned. He spent the remainder of his days in retirement, and published an elegant translation of Boethius on the "Consolations of Philosophy." D. 1695.

GRAHAME, JAMES, a Scottish poet, was b. 1765, at Glasgow, and educated at the university of that city. He was bred to the law, but relinquished forensic pursuits for clerical; and d. in 1811, curate of Sedgfield, near Durham. His poetry is mostly of a religious character, solemn, yet animated, flowing, and descriptive. His principal pieces are, "The Sabbath," "The Bards of Scotland," and "British Georgics."

GRAINGER, JAMES, a poet and physician, was b. at Dunse, in Scotland, in 1723. After serving his time to a surgeon at Edinburgh, he became a regimental surgeon in the English army in Germany; but on the restoration of peace in 1748, he took his doctor's degree, and settled as a physician in London; where, however, he principally supported himself by writing for the press. An "Ode to Solitude," published in Dodsley's collection, first procured him reputation; and, among others, the acquaintance of Shenstone and Dr. Percy. In 1759 he published his "Elegies of Tibullus," which, owing to some severity of criticism, involved him in a paper war with Smollett. He then went to the West Indies as tutor to a young gentleman, and, during the voyage, formed an attachment to a lady, whom he married on his arrival at the island of St. Christopher's, of which her father was governor. Here he successfully established himself as a medical practitioner, but did not lay aside his pen. He wrote a West Indian Georgic, or didactic poem, entitled "The Sugar Cane," and the ballad of "Brian and Pereene." He d. at Basseterre, St. Christopher's, 1767.

GRAMMONT, PHILIBERT, count of, a celebrated wit of Charles the Second's court, was the son of Anthony, duke of Grammont. After serving in the army under Condé and Turenne, he came to England in the early part of the reign of Charles II., with whom, as well as his mistresses, he became a great favorite. He married the daughter of Sir George Hamilton, fourth son of the earl of Abercorn, and d. 1707. He is described as possessing, with a great turn for gallantry, much wit, politeness, and good-nature; but he was a great gamester, and seems to have been indebted for his support chiefly to his superior skill and success at play. His memoirs were written by his brother-in-law, Anthony, usually called Count Hamilton, who followed the fortunes of James II., and ended his days in the service of France.—The duke of, father of the duke of Guiche, and the countesses of Tankerville and Sebastiani, d. at Paris, aged 81, August, 1836. Some years ago he instituted a suit in the French courts to establish his claim to the citadel of Blaye and its dependencies; and the cour royale of Bordeaux decreed that, at the expiration of three years, the state should pay the duke an annuity of 100,000 francs, or reinstate him in the possession of the citadel. The present duchess de Grammont is sister to Count Alfred d'Orsay.

GRANDIUS, or GRANDI, GUIDO, an Italian mathematician, was b. 1671, at Cremona. He became professor of philosophy at Florence, and zealously advocated the Cartesian doctrines; subsequently removed to Pisa; was appointed professor of mathematics in that university, and d. 1742. He corresponded with Newton, Leibnitz, and Bernoulli, and published several works, the chief of which is a Latin treatise, "De Infinitis Infinitorum."

GRANET, FRANCIS, deacon of the church of Aix, and an able critic, was b. 1692, at Brignolles, in Provence. He continued Desfontaines's "Nouvelliste du Parnasse," till the work was suppressed; after which he published "Réflexions sur les Ouvrages de Littérature." He also translated Newton's "Chronology," and edited Launoy's works. D. 1741.

GRANGE, JOSEPH DE CHANCEL DE LA, a poet, was b. in 1676, in Perigord. He wrote a comedy at 9 years old, and a tragedy at 16; but the work which made him known was a satire, entitled "Philippics," containing many infamous accusations against Philip, duke of Orleans.

For this he was seized, and ordered to be imprisoned in the Isle of St. Margaret; but he contrived to effect his escape, and on the regent's death returned to France, where he was allowed to live unmolested. His works, consisting of operas, tragedies, and miscellaneous poems, form five volumes. D. 1758.

GRANGER, JAMES, an English divine, who published a valuable and highly interesting work, entitled "The Biographical History of England." D. 1776.

GRANT, ANNE, usually designated Mrs. Grant of Laggan, a popular and instructive miscellaneous writer, whose maiden name was M'Vicar, was b. in Glasgow, 1735. Her early years were passed in America, whither her father, who held a commission in the British army, had removed with the intention of permanently settling there; but circumstances interfered with his design, and on his return to Scotland he was appointed barrack-master of Fort Augustus. Here his daughter became acquainted with the Rev. James Grant, chaplain to the fort; and a mutual attachment having sprung up between them, on his appointment to the living of Laggan, Invernesshire, they were married in 1779. In 1801, left a widow with a large family, and but scanty means, she was induced, by the persuasion of her friends, to publish a volume of her poems, which proved successful beyond her most ardent wishes; and the literary ice once broken, she now adopted literature as a profession, and at various periods produced her "Letters from the Mountains," (which have been often reprinted,) "Memoirs of an American Lady," "Essays on the Superstitions of the Highlanders of Scotland," "Popular Models of Impressive Warnings from the Sons and Daughters of Industry," &c. Nearly the last 30 years of her life were spent in Edinburgh, where she formed the centre of a highly accomplished circle, numbering among her friends Sir Walter Scott, Lord Jeffrey, Henry Mackenzie, and all the Scotch "notables" of the day; and where the Christian resignation which she displayed amid many calamitous events, and her amiable character, no less than her literary celebrity, procured her general esteem and regard. D. 1838. Her "Memoirs and Correspondence" have since been published.—FRANCIS, Lord Cullen, an eminent Scotch judge, was b. about 1660. He studied at Leyden under Voet, and on his return home was admitted an advocate. He distinguished himself by his publications in favor of the revolution, for which he was rewarded, first by a baronetcy, and soon after by being appointed one of the judges, or senators in the college of justice, when he took the title of Lord Cullen. He continued to discharge the duties of his office for 20 years, with the highest reputation; and d. in 1726.—JAMES, a Scotch barrister, and at the time of his death the father of the Scottish bar. He was early distinguished for his liberal political principles, and could number among his friends Henry Erskine, Sir James Mackintosh, and many others, eminent for their attainments and the lead they took in the politics of the day. He was the author of "Essays on the Origin of Society," "Thoughts on the Origin and Descent of the Gael," &c. D. 1835.—SIR WILLIAM, master of the rolls; an excellent equity judge, the promptitude and wisdom of whose decisions were appreciated no less by the public than by the profession, of which he was a distinguished member. B. at Elchies, in Scotland, 1754; d. 1832.

GRANVILLE, Sir RICHARD, was a native of Cornwall, b. in 1540, and entered early into the military service, as a volunteer against the Turks. He afterwards joined Sir Walter Raleigh in his expedition to America; and, in 1591, became vice-admiral under Sir Thomas Howard, who was sent out to the Azores to intercept the Plate fleet. The Spaniards, however, being apprised of the design, dispatched a powerful squadron, which succeeded in cutting off Granville's ship from the rest; and in a desperate contest with them he was mortally wounded.—SIR BEVIL, grandson of the preceding, was b. in 1596. At the commencement of the civil war, he raised a troop of horse at his own expense, and was killed at the battle of Lansdowne, in 1643.—GEORGE, Lord Lansdowne, a nobleman of very considerable talents, grandson to Sir Bevil. B. in 1667. He had a strong inclination for a military life; but this was checked by his friends, and he employed himself, during the various political changes that occurred, in cultivating his taste for literature. In 1696, his comedy, called "The Gallants," was performed at the theatre royal in Lincoln's Inn Fields, as was his tragedy of "Heroic Love," in 1698. On the accession of Queen Anne, he made his first appearance at court; took his seat in the house of commons as member for Fowey; became successively secretary of war, comptroller of the household, treasurer, and one of the privy council. On the queen's death he not only lost his post, but being suspected of disaffection to the Hanoverian succession, was arrested and sent to the Tower, where he remained upwards of a twelvemonth. He then retired to the Continent for ten years; and on his return passed his life as a country gentleman, amusing himself with the republication of his poems, and in writing a vindication of his uncle, Sir Richard, against the charges of Clarendon and Burnet. D. 1735.

GRATIAN, a Roman emperor, was the son of Valentinian I. by his wife Severa, and b. in 359. His father took him as his associate in the empire when he was only 8 years old. In his 17th year he succeeded to the throne, on the death of his father. Gratian defeated the Goths, and exerted himself with energy and success in defending the empire, but was put to death in a revolt, in Gaul, A. D. 383.—A Benedictine in the 12th century, was a native of Chiusi, in Tuscany. He employed twenty-four years in compiling an abridgment of the canon law, commonly called "Gratian's Decretal."

GRATIUS, FALISCUS, a Latin poet, supposed to be cotemporary with Ovid. He wrote a poem, entitled "Cynogeticon," or the "Art of Hunting with Dogs."

GRATTAN, HENRY, an eminent Irish orator and statesman, was b. about the year 1750, at Dublin, of which city his father was recorder. He finished his education at Trinity college, whence he removed to England, and became a student in the Middle Temple. He was called to the Irish bar in 1772, and brought into the parliament of Ireland in 1775, where he immediately became distinguished for his patriotic speeches, and that vigorous opposition to the statute 6th Geo. I., which roused the whole island, and produced its repeal, in 1782. For his share in this transaction, Mr. Grattan received addresses from all parts of the country, and was rewarded with the sum of £50,000, voted to him by the parliament of Ireland. In 1790 he was returned for the city of Dublin, principally for the purpose of opposing the union; but when that measure was carried, he did not refuse a seat in the united house of commons. The latter years of his parliamentary attendance were chiefly devoted to a warm and energetic support of Catholic emancipation; and it may be truly said, that he d. in the service of this cause. D. 1820.

GRAUNT, EDWARD, a scholar of the 16th century. He was appointed master of Westminster school in 1572; resigned the mastership in 1591; and d. rector of Toppersfield, in Essex, 1601. He was the author of "Græcæ Linguae Spicilegium," &c.

GRAVES, RICHARD, a clergyman of the church of England, but better known as a novelist and poet than as a divine, was b. at Mickleton, in Gloucestershire, in 1715. In 1750 he was presented to the rectory of Claverton, near Bath; and in that pleasant sequestered village he resided till the time of his death, in 1804. Among his various works are, "The Festoon, or a Collection of Epigrams," "Lueubrations in Prose and Rhyme," "The Spiritual Quixote," a novel ridiculing the extravagances of Methodism, as they appeared among the immediate followers of Whitefield and Wesley, and combining much shrewdness, wit, and humor.

GRAVESANDE, WILLIAM JAMES, an eminent Dutch geometrician and philosopher, was b. at Bois-le-Duc, in 1638. He was bred a civilian, and practised some time at the bar with reputation; but, about 1715, he became professor of mathematics and natural philosophy at Leyden, where he taught the Newtonian system. D. 1742.

GRAVINA, JOHN VINCENT, a celebrated jurist and literary character, was b. in Calabria, in 1664, became professor of civil and canon law at Rome, was one of the founders of the Arcadian academy, and the early protector of Metastasio, and d. in 1718. His works are numerous, and the principal one, "Origines Juris Civilis," is said to be replete with learning.

GRAY, STEPHEN, a gentleman belonging to the Charter House, who, early in the 18th century, distinguished himself as an experimental philosopher. He discovered the method of communicating electricity to bodies not naturally possessing it, by contact or contiguity with electric; and he projected a kind of luminous orrery, or electrical planetarium, thus leading the way to future discoveries and improvements.—THOMAS, a celebrated English poet, was b. in London, in 1716, and entered himself at the Inner Temple, with a view of studying for the bar. Becoming intimate, however, with Horace Walpole, he was easily induced to accompany him in his tour of Europe; but they parted at Reggio, and Gray returned to England in 1741. Here he occupied himself several years in laying literary schemes and plans of magnitude, which he admirably commenced, but wanted energy to mature. So slow was he to publish, that it was not until 1747 that his "Ode on a distant Prospect of Eton College" made its appearance; and it was only in consequence of the printing of a surreptitious copy, that, in 1751, he published his "Elegy written in a Country Churchyard." He declined the office of laureate on Cibber's death, in 1757, and the same year published his two principal odes, "On the Progress of Poesy" and "The Bard." In 1768 the duke of Grafton presented him with the professorship of modern history at Cambridge. But though Gray published little besides his poems, he was a man of extensive acquirements in natural history, the study of ancient architecture, &c.; his correspondence places him among the best epistolary writers, and some of his posthumous pieces afford proof of his profound and varied erudition. As a poet, he is energetic and harmonious, and his lyrics, though few, have been rarely, if ever, surpassed. D. 1771.

GREATOREX, THOMAS, an eminent musician, was b. at North Winfield, Derbyshire, in 1758. He was a pupil of Dr. Cook, and afterwards went to Italy, where he studied vocal music under Santarelli, at Rome; and having made himself acquainted with all the knowledge he could gather by a professional tour to the principal cities of Italy, Germany, Switzerland, and the Netherlands, he returned to England in 1788, and established himself in London as a teacher of music, in which he was eminently successful. He harmonized various airs, adapted many of Handel's productions, and arranged parts for the grand orchestra with great ability. But he did not devote his attention wholly to music; mathematics, astronomy, botany, and chemistry, each occupied his mind by turns. D. 1831.

GREAVES, RICHARD, an orientalist and mathematician, was b. at Colmore, Hants, in 1602, and chosen professor of geometry at Gresham college, in 1630. He next went to Leyden, where he studied the Arabic language under Golius. He also visited Egypt, and made a survey of the pyramids. While in Egypt, he made an accurate measurement, &c., of the principal pyramids, which he gave to the world under the title of "Pyramidographia;" he also published an ingenious work, entitled "Epochæ Celebriores," and a "Dissertation on the Roman Foot and Denarius." D. 1652.—THOMAS and EDWARD, his brothers, were also men of learning: the former, a good orientalist; the latter, eminent as a physician, and created a baronet by Charles II.

GRECOURT, JEAN BAPTISTE JOSEPH VILLART DE, a French ecclesiastic, famous as a wit and poet, was b. at Tours, in 1684. He excelled in epigrams, tales, sonnets, and fables, a collection of which was published. D. 1743.

GREENE, ROBERT, a humorous poet in the reign of Elizabeth, was b. at Norwich, about 1560. He was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, and after making "the grand tour," took orders. He wrote five plays, and various tracts in prose, among which is one, lately reprinted, with the quaint title of "A Groat's Worth of Wit bought with a Million of Repentance." D. 1592.—MATTHEW, author of "The Spleen," a clever poem, was a native of London. He held a situation in the custom-house, and is described as a man of great probity and suavity of manners. D. 1737.

—SAMUEL, was the first printer in North America. The first thing printed was the "Freeman's Oath," in 1639, the next an almanac, and the third the New England version of the Psalms in 1640. The time of his death is unknown.—NATHANIEL, major-general in the army of the United States, was b. in Warwick, R. I., 1742. Though enjoying very few advantages of education, he displayed an early fondness for knowledge, and devoted his leisure time assiduously to study. In 1770 he was elected a member of the state legislature, and in 1774 enrolled himself as a private in a company called the Kentish Guards. From this situation he was elevated to the head of three regiments, with the title of major-general. In 1776 he accepted from congress a commission of brigadier-general, and soon after, at the battles of Trenton and Princeton, distinguished himself by his skill and bravery. In 1778 he was appointed quartermaster-general, and in that office rendered efficient service to the country by his unwearied zeal and great talents for business. He presided at the court-martial which tried Major André in 1780, and was appointed to succeed Arnold in the command at West Point, but he held this post only a few days.

In December of the same year he assumed the command of the southern army, and in this situation displayed a prudence, intrepidity, and firmness which raise him to an elevated rank among our revolutionary generals. In September, 1781, he obtained the famous victory at Entaw Springs, for which he received from congress a British standard and a gold medal, as a testimony of their value of his conduct and services. On the termination of hostilities, he returned to Rhode Island, and in 1785 removed with his family to Georgia, where he d. suddenly in June of the following year.

GREENFIELD, WILLIAM, celebrated as an oriental scholar and linguist, was editor of the "Comprehensive Bible," and made many valuable translations of the Bible into Eastern dialects. His literary acquirements were made under great difficulties, and while pursuing his daily occupation of a bookbinder. D. 1832.

GREGORY I., surnamed the Great, was b. of a noble family at Rome, about the year 544. He discovered such abilities as a senator, that the Emperor Justin appointed him prefect of Rome; after which he embraced the monastic life, in a society founded by himself. Pope Pelagius II. sent him as nuncio to Constantinople, and on his return made him apostolical secretary. He was elected successor to that pontiff in 590. D. 604.—VII., pope, who is said to have been the son of a carpenter, and his real name HILDEBRAND, is chiefly memorable for his extension of the authority of the popes. This he carried so far as to depose Henry IV., emperor of Germany, and to send legates into all the kingdoms of Europe, to support his pretended rights. D. 1085.—XIII., was a native of Bologna, and succeeded Pope Pius V. in 1572. He was the most deeply versed in the canon and civil law of any in his time. He ornamented Rome with many fine buildings and fountains; but his pontificate is chiefly memorable for the reformation of the calendar, which took place under his auspices, and bore his name. D. 1585.—XV., was a native of Bologna, and descended of an ancient family, but his real name was ALEXANDER LUDOVISIO. He was elected to the papal dignity in 1621, and was the author of several works, one of which, entitled "Epistola ad Regem Persarum, Schah Abbas," particularly deserves mention.—XVI., MAURO CAPELLARI, was b. at Belluno in 1765, and succeeded Pius VIII. in the papal chair, 1831. His reign embraced a period of no ordinary interest and difficulty in the history of the church, and in the relations of the Vatican with the temporal powers of Christendom. D. 1846.—NAZIANZEN, ST., eminent for his piety and extensive learning, was b. in 324, at Nazianzum, in Cappadocia, of which place his father was bishop. He received an excellent education, which he improved at Athens, where he formed an acquaintance with St. Basil. On his return home he was ordained, and having displayed great theological and classical talents, he was chosen bishop of Constantinople, which appointment was confirmed by Theodosius in 380. After filling the archiepiscopal throne for several years, he resigned it, and returned to his native place, where he d. in 389.—King of Scotland, cotemporary with Alfred, succeeded to the throne in 883. He delivered his country from the Danes, acquired the counties of Cumberland and Westmoreland, performed many brilliant exploits in Ireland, and built the city of Aberdeen. D. 894.—Bishop of Neocæsarea, in the 3d century, was surnamed THAUMATURGUS, or the "Wonder-worker," on account of the miracles which he is said to have performed. The church flourished under his care until the Dacian persecution, in 250, when he thought it prudent to retire for a time. He was a pupil of the celebrated Origen, and appears to have been a man of learning. D. 265.—Or Nyssa, St., was ordained bishop of Nyssa, in 372. The zeal he displayed against the Arians excited the resentment of the Emperor Valens, who belonged to that sect, and he was banished, but, on the accession of Gratian, he was restored to his see. He drew up the Nicene creed at the council of Constantinople, and d. 396.—GEORGE, a divine and miscellaneous writer, was a native of Ireland, and b. in 1754. With an intention of following mercantile pursuits, he was placed in a counting-house at Liverpool, and it was not till 1778 that he took orders. In 1782 he settled in London, where he obtained the curacy of Cripplegate, and was chosen evening preacher at the Foundling. Among his works are, "Essays, Historical and Moral," a "Church History," "The Life of Chatterton," "The Economy of Nature," "Sermons," "Letters on Philosophy," and a translation of "Lowth's Lectures on Hebrew Poetry." D. 1808.—GEORGE FLORENCE, saint, commonly called Gregory of Tours, was b. 544, in Auvergne. He d. in 595. He was the author of a "History of the Franks," and other works.—JAMES, an eminent mathematician and philosopher, was b. at Aberdeen, in 1638. He published in 1663 his "Treatise on Optics," in which he imparted his invention of the reflecting telescope. About 1665 he went to Padua, where he printed a work on the "Quadrature of the Circle and Hyperbola." On his return from his travels, he was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society of London, and merit procured him the mathematical chair at St. Andrew's. In 1674 he removed to Edinburgh, on being appointed to the mathematical professorship; but he held the situation only for a short time, for while showing the satellites of Jupiter to some pupils, in October, 1675, he was suddenly struck blind, and d. a few days after.—DAVID, nephew of the preceding, and the inheritor of his abilities and his fame, was b. at Aberdeen, in 1661, and became professor of mathematics in Edinburgh. He was afterwards elected Savilian professor of astronomy at Oxford, carrying his election against Halley, who was also a candidate for that situation. In 1695 he published his "Catoptrica et Dioptrica Spherica Elementa." His demonstration of the curve, called the catenarian, appeared in 1697, in the "Philosophical Transactions;" but his greatest work was published in 1702, and entitled "Astronomia Physica et Geometrica Elementa." D. 1710.—JAMES, was b. at Aberdeen in 1753, and was long one of the brightest ornaments of the university of Edinburgh. He was the author of "Philosophical and Literary Essays," "Cullen's First Lines of the Practice of Physic, with Notes," and "Conspectus Medicinæ Theoreticæ." D. 1821.—JOHN, a physician and miscellaneous writer, was b. in 1724, at Aberdeen, became professor of philosophy at Aberdeen, and afterwards professor of physic at Edinburgh, and was appointed first physician to the king of Scotland. His works are, "A Comparative View of the State and Faculties of Man with those of the Animal World," "Observations on the Duties and Offices of a Physician," "Elements of the Practice of Physic," and "A Father's Legacy to his Daughters." D. 1773.—OLINTHUS, was b. at Yaxley, in Huntingdonshire, in 1774. He commenced his literary career at the age of 19, but the works which chiefly brought him into notice were his "Treatise on Astronomy" and the "Pantologia," a comprehensive dictionary of the arts and sciences, of which he undertook the general editorship. Through the interest of his friend, Dr. Hutton, he was appointed, in 1802, mathematical master at the royal military academy, Woolwich, where he obtained the professor's chair. He was the author of "Elements of Plane and Spherical Trigonometry," "Mathematics for Practical Men," "Letters to a Friend, on the Evidences, Doctrines, and Duties of the Christian Religion," and "Memoirs of the Life, Writings, &c., of the late John Mason Good, M.P." D. 1841.

GREGORIE, HENRY, Count, bishop of Blois, a French prelate, distinguished by his love of democracy, no less than by his inflexible integrity and active philanthropy, was b. in 1750, at Vatro, near Luneville. In 1789 he was nominated by the clergy of his province a member of the states-general; and in the constituent assembly he distinguished himself by the boldness of his opinions relative to civil and religious liberty. He was among the first of the clergy who swore fidelity to the constitution; but during the reign of terror, when the bishop of Paris abdicated his office, and several of the clergy abjured Christianity, the bishop of Blois stood forward as the supporter of the religion of his country. He also opposed the accession of the first consul to the throne of France. On the restoration of the Bourbons he was excluded from the Institute, and deprived of his bishopric. He spent the remainder of his life in retirement, and d. at Paris, in 1831. Among his writings are, "Essai sur l'Amélioration Politique, Physique, et Morale des Jnifs;" "Mémoires en faveur des Gens de Couleur, ou Sang-mêlés de St. Domingue;" "Essai Historique sur les Libertés de l'Eglise Gallicane;" "Les Ruines de Port Royal," &c.

GRENVILLE, GEORGE, an English statesman in the reigns of George II. and III., was younger brother of Richard Grenville, Earl Temple, and the father of Lord Grenville. He entered parliament as member for Buckinghamshire, and was distinguished for his eloquence. He successively filled the situations of treasurer of the navy, first lord of the admiralty, and first lord of the treasury. In 1763 he became chancellor of the exchequer; but, in 1765, he resigned his post to the marquis of Rockingham. His administration having been violently attacked by the press, he published "Considerations on the Commerce and Finance of England, and on the Measures taken by the Ministers," &c., in its defence. D. 1760.—WILLIAM WYNDHAM, Lord, third son of the preceding, was b. 1759. He began his parliamentary career as the representative for Buckinghamshire, filled the speaker's chair six months, and then succeeded Lord Sidney as secretary for the home department. In 1790 he was raised to the peerage, and in the following year made secretary of state for foreign affairs. On the dissolution of the ministry, his lordship principally confined his senatorial exertions to the cause of Catholic emancipation, for which he was always a steady and consistent advocate. He was distinguished for his general literary attainments, as well as for his political knowledge; and he held the office of chancellor of the university of Oxford; to which, on his death, in 1834, the duke of Wellington was elected.

GRESHAM, SIR THOMAS, a patriotic merchant and citizen of London, the son of Sir Richard Gresham, a merchant and lord mayor of London, was b. 1519. His father had been the king's agent at Antwerp, and the person who succeeded him having mismanaged the royal affairs there, Sir Thomas was sent over, in 1552, to retrieve them. This he did effectually. Elizabeth, on her accession, removed him from his office, but soon restored it, and knighted him. He planned and erected a bourse or exchange for the merchants of London, in imitation of that at Antwerp; and, in 1570 it was opened by the queen in person, who dined with the founder, and named it the Royal Exchange. Having built a mansion in Bishopsgate-street, for his town residence, he directed by his will that it should be converted into habitations and lecture-rooms for seven professors or lecturers on the seven liberal sciences, who were to receive a salary out of the revenues of the Royal Exchange; but Gresham college has since been converted into the general excise office, and the lectures are now given in a room over the exchange. D. 1579.

GRESSET, JEAN BAPTISTE LOUIS, a French poet and dramatist, b. in 1709; entered the society of Jesuits, but withdrew from them at the age of 26. For a long time he excited the admiration of Parisian circles, wrote some elegant poems, became a member of the Academy, and was the companion of the wits and literati of the French capital; but at length he renounced his favorite pursuits, and retired from the gay world to enjoy the tranquillity of retirement. D. 1777. His literary fame rests principally on his "Ver Vert," his "Chartreuse," and "Le Méchant."

GRETREY, ANDRE ERNESTE MODESTE, an eminent musical composer, was b. in 1744, at Liege. He first studied under Moreau, then went to Rome, and finally settled at Paris, in 1768. He produced upwards of 40 operas, of which about 20 retain possession of the stage, and two of them, "Zemire et Azor" and "Richard Cœur de Lion," have been translated, and played in London with success. D. 1813.

GREVILLE, FULKE, Lord Brooke, a patron of letters, and an ingenious writer, was b. 1554, and descended from the noble families of Neville, Beauchamp, and Willoughby de Brooke. He was in great favor with Elizabeth, and was created Lord Brooke by James I., who gave him Warwick castle. In 1614 he was made under-treasurer, chancellor of the exchequer, and one of the privy council. He founded a history lecture at Cambridge. He was stabbed by a servant named Haywood, whom he had reprimanded for an insolent expression, after which the assassin committed suicide with the same weapon. This was in 1628. After his death appeared several of his poetical works, and the life of his friend Sir Philip Sidney, written by him.

GREY, CHARLES, Earl, a British statesman, distinguished for his senatorial abilities generally, but more especially for his long and inflexible advocacy of parliamentary reform, was b. at Falldon, near Alnwick, 1764. He was almost constantly occupied in the discussion of the most important questions that engaged the attention of parliament. At the onset of his career, his oratorical powers were displayed as one of the managers of the impeachment of Warren Hastings; and from that time he always held a conspicuous station among the Whigs. When, in January, 1806, Mr. Pitt was removed from the helm of state by death, Mr. Grey took office, under Mr. Fox, as first lord of the admiralty; and in the following October was secretary of foreign affairs. The Whig ministry was soon after dismissed, parliament was dissolved, and, on the death of Lord Grey's father, in 1807, he removed to the upper house. D. 1845.—Lady JANE, an illustrious female, whose accomplishments and misfortunes have rendered her an especial object of interest, was the daughter of Henry Grey, marquis of Dorset, by the Lady Frances, daughter of Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk, and Mary, younger sister of Henry VIII. She was b. in 1537, at Bradgate, her father's seat in Leicestershire; and early in life gave proofs of talents of a superior order. She wrote an incomparable hand, played well on different instruments, and acquired a knowledge of the Greek, Hebrew, and Latin, as well as of the French and Italian languages. Roger Ascham has given a beautiful and affecting narrative of his interview with her at Bradgate, where he found her reading Plato's "Phædo," in Greek, while the family were amusing themselves in the park. In 1551 her father was created duke of Suffolk; and at this time Lady Jane Grey was much at court, where the ambitious duke of Northumberland projected a marriage between her and his son, Lord Guildford Dudley, which took place at the end of May, 1553. Soon after this Edward VI. died, having been prevailed upon, in his last illness, to settle the crown upon the Lady Jane, who reluctantly accepted the crown, and was proclaimed with great pomp. This gleam of royalty, however, was of short duration, for the pagan reign lasted but nine days. The kingdom was dissatisfied, and the nobility indignant at the presumption of Northumberland; so that Mary soon overcame her enemies, and was not backward in taking ample revenge. The duke of Northumberland was beheaded; and Lady Jane and her husband were arraigned, convicted of treason, and sent to the Tower. After being confined some time, the council resolved to put these innocent victims of a parent's unprincipled ambition to death. Lord Guildford suffered first; and as he passed her window, his lady gave him her last adieu. Immediately afterwards she was executed on the same scaffold; suffering with calm resignation, and a firm attachment to the Protestant religion, Feb. 12, 1554.

GRIDLEY, JEREMIAH, an eminent lawyer of Massachusetts, was b. about the year 1705, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1725. He was a warm advocate for the colonial rights, but, notwithstanding, was appointed attorney-general of the province, and in that capacity defended the obnoxious writs of assistance. He was a man of an ardent and generous character, and possessed extensive legal information. D. 1767.

GRIESBACH, JOHN JAMES, an eminent German theologian, b. 1745, at Butzbach, in the duchy of Hesse Darmstadt. He studied successively at Frankfurt, Tubingen, Halle, and Leipsic; became rector of the university of Jena, and ecclesiastical privy councillor to the duke of Saxe-Weimar; and d. in 1812. His works, which are too numerous to particularize here, possess great erudition; but the most valuable is an edition of the Greek Testament, with various readings.

GRIFFIER, JOHN, known by the appellation of Old Griffier, an eminent painter, was b. at Amsterdam in 1658, and d. at London, in 1718. He succeeded chiefly in landscapes, and painted several views on the Thames. He also etched prints of birds and beasts.—His son ROBERT, called the Younger Griffier, was b. in England, and was a good landscape painter, though not equal to his father.

GRIFFIN, EDWARD DORR, an eminent divine, b. at East Haddam, Ct., 1770. He was a pastor first at New Hartford, Ct., and then at Newark, N. J., and in 1809 was appointed professor of sacred rhetoric at Andover theological school. He was next a preacher at Boston, and in 1821 was chosen president of Williams college. He was one of the most eloquent preachers of his day. D. 1837.

GRIFFITH, ELIZABETH, a native of Wales, who jointly with her husband wrote two novels, entitled "Delicate Distress," "The Gordian Knot," and "The Letters of Henry and Frances." She also produced several works of her sole composition, among which are "Lady Juliana Harley," "The Morality of Shakspeare's Drama illustrated," and some plays. D. 1793.

GRIMALDI. The Grimaldi family have ever been of great importance in Genoa, and many of its members are conspicuous in the history of that republic.—RANIERI, was the first Genoese who conducted the naval forces of the republic beyond the Straits of Gibraltar. In the service of Philip the Fair of France, Grimaldi sailed to Zealand, in 1304, with 16 Genoese galleys and 20 French ships under his command; and defeated and made prisoner the Count Guy of Flanders, who commanded the enemy's fleet of 80 sail.—ANTONIO, was also a distinguished naval commander. His victories over the Catalonians and Aragonese, who had committed aggressions on the Genoese, for a long time gave the latter a decided maritime ascendancy; but at length, in 1353, the Catalonians, assisted by the Venetians, under the command of Nicholas Pisani, gave him battle, and nearly destroyed his whole fleet.—GIOVANNI, is celebrated for the victory he gained over the Venetian admiral Trevesani, on the Po, in 1431; when, in sight of Carmagnola's army, he succeeded in taking 28 galleys, and a great number of transports, with immense spoils.—DOMENICO, cardinal, archbishop, and vice-legate of Avignon, was eminent both as a naval commander and as a zealous extirpator of heresy from the Catholic church. At the battle of Lepanto, in 1571, though a bishop at the time, he is said to have distinguished himself by his skill and courage.—GERONIMO, b. 1597, was sent by Urban VIII. as nuncio to Germany and France; and the services he rendered the Roman court were rewarded, in 1643, by a cardinal's hat. He was bishop of Aix, and endeavored to reform the manners of the clergy in his diocese, by establishing an ecclesiastical seminary; he also founded an hospital for the poor, and annually distributed 100,000 livres of his vast property in alms. D. 1685.—FRANCESCO MARIA, a learned Jesuit and an eminent mathematician, was b. at Bologna, in 1618. He assisted Riccioli in his scientific labors; and was the author of "Physico-mathesis de Lumine Coloribus et Iride, aliisque annexis," &c. D. 1663.—GIOVANNI, an eminent painter, also called Bolognese, was b. at Bologna, in 1606. He studied under Annibale Caracci, to whom he was related; and became distinguished chiefly as a landscape painter, though he was also employed on historical subjects, particularly in the Vatican. Nor was he merely a painter; as an architect he was greatly distinguished, and as an engraver also his merit was conspicuous. Cardinal Mazarin invited him to Paris, where he enjoyed a pension, and was much noticed by Louis XIII. D. 1680.—JOSEPH, an unrivalled pantomimic clown, b. 1779, was the son of Signior Grimaldi, an artiste, noted for his humor and eccentricities, who by day followed the profession of a dentist, and by night that of ballet-master at Drury-lane. For a period of forty years "Grimaldi the clown" delighted the laughter-loving audiences of Drury-lane, Covent-garden, and Sadler's-wells, with a rich and (paradoxical as the term may seem) intellectual species of buffoonery, peculiarly his own—portraying to the life all that is grotesque in manners, or droll in human action. D. 1837.—WILLIAM, (marquis of Genoa,) was b. in 1785, in Westminster, and in early life entered into the service of the East India Company, but afterwards held a situation in the war-office at the Horse Guards. In 1823 he travelled in search of his hereditary rights, and discovered that he was sole heir of the late marquis of Grimaldi; but he never enjoyed any advantage from it, being attacked by a fit of apoplexy while at his prayers.

GRIMBALD, Str., a learned ecclesiastic of the 9th century, who was invited over from Flanders by Alfred the Great. He brought with him several learned associates, and settled at Oxford; but disputes arising between the strangers and the students before placed there, he retired to a monastery, founded by Alfred, at Winchester. It is supposed that he was skilful as an architect, and that the crypt of St. Peter's church, Oxford, is his work.

GRIMKE, THOMAS SMITH, a distinguished lawyer of South Carolina, b. at Charleston, 1778. He was a fine classical scholar, of devoted piety, and throughout his life took a warm interest in all the benevolent movements of the day, especially on the subject of peace. D. 1834.—JOHN F., judge of the supreme court of South Carolina, was a colonel in the war of the American revolution. He published "A Revised Edition of the Laws of South Carolina, to 1789;" "On the Duty of Justices of Peace," "A Probate Directory." D. 1819.

GRIMM, FREDERIC MELCHIOR, baron de, counsellor of state of the Russian empire, and a man of letters, was b. in 1723, at Ratisbon. Going to Paris, he became principal secretary to the duke of Orleans, and acquainted with Rousseau and other Parisian philosophers; an account of whose writings, friendships, disputes, &c., has been preserved in his "Correspondence." In 1776, being appointed envoy from the duke of Saxe-Gotha, to the French court, he was honored with the title of baron, and invested with several orders. On the revolution breaking out, he retired to the court of Gotha, where he found a safe asylum. In 1795 the empress of Russia made him her minister plenipotentiary to the states of Lower Saxony; and he was confirmed in that post by Paul I., and retained it till ill health obliged him to relinquish it. D. 1807.

GRIMOARD, Count PHILIP DE, a

French diplomatist, general, and author, descended from an ancient family, one of whose members was Pope Urban V. Louis XVI. intrusted him with a negotiation in Holland; and on his return he formed the plans, offensive and defensive, for the campaign of 1792. The fall of the king interrupted his career, and he retired to private life, devoting himself to literature. He wrote "Essai Théorique et Pratique sur les Batailles," "Recherches sur la Force de l'Armée Française," &c.; and "Tableau Historique de la Guerre de la Révolution de France," 1808, in conjunction with General Servan; of which work only 3 vols. were published, when it was suppressed by order of Bonaparte. D. 1815.

GRIMSTON, SIR HARBOTTLE, an eminent English lawyer in the time of Cromwell, was b. in Essex, about 1594. In 1660 he was chosen speaker of what was called "the healing parliament," and he was one of the commissioners who waited on Charles II. at Breda; on whose restoration he was made master of the rolls. He published the "Reports of Sir George Croke." D. 1683.

GRINDAL, EDMUND, archbishop of Canterbury, was b. at Hensingham, in Cumberland, in 1519. In 1559 he was chosen master of Pembroke hall, and the same year preferred to the see of London; in 1570 he was translated to York; and in 1575 to Canterbury. Two years afterwards he was suspended from his archiepiscopal functions, for refusing to obey Queen Elizabeth's order to suppress prophesyings, or associations of the clergy to expound the Scriptures. At length his sequestration was taken off, though he never completely recovered the royal favor. He contributed to "Fox's Acts and Monuments," and founded the celebrated school of St. Bee's, in Cumberland. D. 1583.

GRISWOLD, ROGER, governor of Connecticut, graduated at Yale college, 1780, and afterwards studied law. In 1794 he was elected a member of congress. In 1801 he declined the appointment of secretary of war, offered him by Mr. Adams. In 1807 he was appointed a judge of the supreme court of Connecticut. He was lieutenant-governor from 1809 to 1811, when he was elected governor. D. 1812, aged 50.

GROLLIER, JOHN, a patron of learned men, was b. at Lyons, in 1479. He was grand treasurer to Francis I., who sent him on an embassy to Rome, where he employed the Alduses to print some classics for him. He also made a large collection of valuable books, and settled pensions on many eminent scholars. D. 1565.

GRONOVIVS, JOHN FREDERIC, an erudite writer, b. at Hamburgh, in 1611. He studied at Leipsic and Jena; travelled through France, Holland, and England; and became professor of belles lettres at Leyden, where he d. in 1671. With extensive knowledge he combined indefatigable industry, a modest opinion of his own merit, and amiable manners. He published a number of classics with valuable notes and improved readings; of which "Commentarius de Sesterciiis," and his edition of Hugo Grotius's work, "De Jure Belli et Pacis," will serve as instances.—JAMES, son of the preceding, was b. at Deventer, in 1645. He was educated entirely under his father, whom he surpassed in learning, though he fell short of him in modesty and liberality. In 1672 he went to France, and from thence to Italy, where the grand-duke of Tuscany gave him a pension, and obtained for him a professorship at Pisa. This he held two years, and then returned to Leyden; and was appointed to the professorship of belles lettres and geography in that university. His acquirements in criticism and philology were very extensive; he compiled the valuable "Thesaurus Antiquitatum Græcarum, and edited a variety of classics. D. 1716.

GROS, ANTOINE JEAN, Baron, a distinguished French painter, professor of painting at the Ecole Royale des Beaux Arts, was b. at Paris, 1771. His pencil was chiefly devoted to the illustration of subjects from the history of France during the career of Napoleon; and his pictures, though coarse, are conspicuous for vigor and felicity of execution. D. 1835.

GROSE, FRANCIS, an eminent English antiquary, was b. in 1731, at Richmond, in Surrey. His father was a jeweller, and left him a good fortune, which he soon spent, and became adjutant and paymaster in the Surrey militia. He was remarkable for his wit and humor, and of a generous disposition, but his imprudences involved him in great difficulties; to clear himself from which, he published his "Views of Antiquities in England and Wales." Besides his "Antiquities," he published a "Treatise on Ancient Armor and Weapons," "Military Antiquities," and other works. D. 1791.

GROSSMANN, GUSTAVUS FREDERIC

WILLIAM, a celebrated actor and dramatist, b. at Berlin, in 1746. He was originally employed in some subordinate diplomatic situations at Warsaw and Berlin; but having become acquainted with Lessing at the latter place, an accidental hint from that celebrated writer induced him to try his fortune as a dramatist; and he wrote several successful plays. He afterwards became an actor and manager, manifesting considerable talents, and effecting many reformations in the German stage; but his bad success as a manager led to habits of intemperance, and involved him in great distress. D. 1796.

GROTIUS, or DE GROOT, HUGO, an eminent scholar and statesman, b. at Delft, in Holland, 1583. He was descended from a noble family, received an excellent education, and gave early manifestations of surprising talents. In 1599 he commenced his career as a legal advocate, and also as an author; and he was successively appointed historiographer, advocate-general of Holland and Zealand, a member of the states-general, and envoy to England. In 1613 he became syndic, or pensioner, of Rotterdam; and, declaring himself on the side of Barneveldt, he supported him, and the cause of the Arminians, by his pen and influence. But he narrowly escaped the fate of Barneveldt, who suffered on the scaffold, and received sentence of imprisonment for life in the fortress of Louvestein. From this, however, at the expiration of 18 months, which he had employed in writing his celebrated "Treatise on the Truth of the Christian Religion," he succeeded in escaping. This was effected by the management of his wife, who contrived to have him carried out of the castle in a chest that had been used for the conveyance of books and linen. Grotius at first sought an asylum in France; and it was during his residence there that he composed his great work, "De Jure Belli et Pacis." After an absence of 12 years, he returned to his native country, relying on the favor of Frederic Henry, prince of Orange, who had written him a sympathizing letter. But, by the influence of his enemies, he was condemned to perpetual banishment. He passed the remnant of his life in the diplomatic service of Sweden, and d. at Rostock, in 1645.

GROTO, LEWIS, an Italian poet, surnamed Il Ciero, was b. at Adria, in 1541. He was blind from his infancy; notwithstanding which he displayed an uncommon facility for learning, and at the age of 14 delivered public orations at Venice. He d. 1585, having a short time before performed the part of Edippus in a play at Vicenza, with great reputation.

GROUCHY, EMANUEL, marquis of, a distinguished marshal of France, and a scion of a noble Norman family, was b. at Paris, 1766. In 1789 he was a sub-lieutenant of the royal gardes du corps; but embracing the new ideas, he took part in the wars of the revolution, and gained great distinction, especially in the Alps and La Vendée, where he was named general of division in 1793. The decree which deprived all the nobles of France of military rank fell heavily upon him; but nothing daunted he joined the army as a private, and his distinguished gallantry soon led to his restoration. Dispatched in 1798 to the army of Italy, under the command of Jonbert, he planned the abdication of the king of Sardinia, and thus united Piedmont to France. He took part in the battle of Novi, where he received 14 wounds, and fell into the enemy's hands. His bravery was no less conspicuous on the fields of Hohenlinden, Eylau, Friedland, Wagram, Moscow, &c.; and he obtained the marshal's baton from the hands of the emperor shortly before his abdication. During the hundred days he was opposed to the duke d'Angoulême in the south, and made him prisoner. He was then summoned into Belgium, where he played an important part. He had already carried the villages of Fleurus, (June 16,) and Ligny, (June 17,) and was marching according to his instructions in pursuit of Blucher with a body of 30,000 men, when the battle of Waterloo was fought. Not getting instructions in time, he could not take part in the battle, and his absence may in some measure be said to have decided the fortune of the day. At the restoration, his title of marshal was not acknowledged, and remained so till 1830, a year which righted a good many wrongs. In 1832 he was created a peer. D. 1847.

GRUBENMANN, JOHN ULRIC and JOHN, two Swiss mechanics, who having been brought up as carpenters, devoted their entire attention to the construction of wooden bridges without the support of piers. The most extraordinary of these were at Reichenau, Wettingen, and Schaffhausen; the latter, over the Rhine, being nearly 400 feet long. During the campaign of 1799 they were all destroyed by the French. The ingenious builders died about the end of the 18th century.

GRUNDY, FELIX, a senator of the United States, b. in Virginia, 1777, who early removed to Kentucky, where he distinguished himself as a lawyer. He was a member of the Kentucky legislature from 1799 to 1806, when he was appointed one of the judges of the supreme court, and then chief justice. Shortly afterwards he removed to Tennessee, where he was elected to congress, in 1811, and served with activity for several sessions. In 1829 he was appointed senator, and took a leading part in the politics of the period. President Van Buren made him attorney-general. D. 1840.

GRYPHIUS, ANDREW, a celebrated German dramatist, was b. at Glogau, in 1616. He was called the Cornelle of Germany, and his tragedies acquired great popularity. He also wrote a keen satire on the old comedies of his countrymen, and produced some smart epigrams. D. 1664.—SEBASTIAN, a printer in the 16th century, who settled at Lyons, and was distinguished for the beauty of his Greek and Hebrew types. D. 1556.

GUA, JOHN PAUL DE, a French ecclesiastic, was b. in Languedoc, in 1712. He laid the plan of the "Encyclopédie," and wrote a number of mathematical papers in the "Memoirs of the Academy;" besides which he translated some English works into French. D. 1785.

GUALDO PRIORATO, GALEASSO, an Italian historian, b. at Vicenza, in 1606; author of a "History of the Troubles in France," an "Account of the Administration of Cardinal Mazarin," and his "Life," a "History of the Wars of the Emperors Ferdinand II. and III.," &c. D. 1678.

GUARINI, BATTISTA, a celebrated Italian poet, b. at Ferrara, in 1537. He was secretary to Alphonso, duke of Ferrara; next, to Ferdinand de Medici, grand-duke of Tuscany; and, subsequently, to the duke of Urbino. He was well acquainted with polite literature; wrote several admired poems; but his chief composition is his pastoral drama, entitled "Il Pastor Fido." D. 1612.

GUAY-TROUIN, RENE DU, a French naval officer, was b. at St. Maloes, in 1673. He commanded a ship at the age of 18, and had great success on the coast of Ireland, but at last fell in the hands of some English cruisers, and was carried into Plymouth; from whence he made his escape, and in a short time renewed his depredations in the British Channel, and also on the coast of Spain. In 1709 he was ennobled, and two years afterwards he made himself master of Rio Janeiro. D. 1736.

GUELF, or GUELPH, (from the Italian Guelfi and the German Welfen;) the name of a celebrated family, which, in the 11th century, was transplanted from Italy to Germany, where it became the ruling race of several countries. The family still continues in the two lines of Brunswick—the royal in England, and the ducal in Germany. The memory of this ancient name was revived by the foundation of the Hanoverian Guelphic order.

GUERCINO, (properly GIANFRANCESCO BARBIERI, but surnamed Guercino da Cento from his squinting,) was a celebrated painter, b. at Cento, near Bologna, in 1590. He studied under Cremonini and Gennari; but adopted two or three styles in succession, and afterwards perfected himself in the school of Ludovico Caracci. He executed 106 altar-pieces for churches, and 144 historical pieces, besides numerous performances in fresco; in short, such was the uncommon rapidity of his pencil, that, having been requested by some monks, on the eve of a festival, to paint Jehovah for the grand altar, he finished the picture in one night by torch light. The duke of Mantua conferred on him the honor of knighthood; and several sovereigns endeavored, in vain, to draw him into their service. He d. in 1666, very rich, notwithstanding he had expended large sums in building chapels, founding hospitals, and other acts of charity and devotion.

GUERICKE, OTTO VON, a distinguished experimental philosopher, was b. 1602; studied at Leipsic, Jena, and Leyden; travelled in France and England; and settled at Magdeburgh, where he eventually became burgomaster. He invented the air-pump, and in 1654 made the first public experiments with his machine at the diet at Ratisbon, before the Emperor Ferdinand III., several electors, and other estates of the empire. His electrical and astronomical knowledge also was considerable. D. 1686.

GUERRERO, VICENTE, elected president of the United Mexican States, in 1829, was by birth a Creole. At the very commencement of the revolution in Mexico he took arms against the royalists, and never ceased to occupy a prominent position in the affairs of that country. On repeated occasions, from 1819 to 1828, General Guerrero became the rallying point of the liberal or popular party, the Yorkinos, and was repeatedly called into active service in his military capacity. Having been successful in various contests with the aristocratical party, he at length, in 1829, was elected to the presidency. The expedition of Barradas soon gave employment to the new government; and the better to enable the president to meet the exigency, he was invested with extraordinary powers; but after the victory over the Spanish troops, and when the invading expedition was destroyed, Guerrero evinced an unwillingness to relinquish the dictatorship, which became the pretext of another revolution; and Bustamante, the vice-president, assumed the reins of government. Guerrero, however, was not long idle: in September, 1830, he collected a large force at Valladolid, and established a form of government in opposition to that of Bustamante, and the whole country was agitated by troops in arms. But his career was almost run. In February, 1831, he was taken, and shot.

GUEVARA, LOUIS VELEZ DE LAS DUENAS Y, a Spanish dramatist and romance writer, was b. in 1574, at Ecija, in Andalusia. He was an advocate, and by his flashes of wit often drew forth peals of laughter from the court. Several of his comedies are excellent; but the work of Guevara was his "Diablo Cojuelo," an admirable romance, which afforded the idea of Le Sage's famous "Diable Boiteux." Many of his witty sayings have become familiar to the people, and to this day are often heard as proverbs in Spain. D. 1646.

GUIBERT, JACQUES ANTOINE HYPOLITE, count de, a celebrated French tactician, was b. at Montauban, in 1743. He studied the military art under his father, with whom he served in the German war; and, in the expedition to Corsica, he was made a colonel, with the cross of St. Louis. On his return to France, he published his "Essai Général de Tactique," which work being diametrically opposed to Folard's, excited a vehement controversy. He was also the author of some tragedies; historical eulogies on Marshal Catinat, the chancellor de l'Hôpital, and Frederic the Great; "Travels in Germany," and "Travels in Switzerland." D. 1790.

GUICCIARDINI, FRANCIS, an Italian historian, was b. at Florence, in 1482. He was bred to the law, and appointed professor of jurisprudence in his native city. Politics, however, occupied the rest of his life. In 1512 he was sent ambassador, on the part of the republic, to the Spanish court at Bruges; for his services in which mission he was received with great honor by his countrymen, and Leo X. constituted him advocate of the consistory. In 1518 he was made governor of Modena and Reggio, and next of Parma, where he drove out the French, and confirmed the inhabitants in their obedience. He was afterwards reappointed to the government of Modena, and the presidency of the Romagna; and, in 1531, he was made governor of Bologna, where he assisted at the coronation of Charles V. After a life of great activity, he returned to his native city, and there began his great work on the "History of Italy during his own Time," which he had nearly completed at the time of his death, in 1540.

GUIDO RENI, one of the most eminent among the Italian painters, was b. at Bologna, in 1575. Combining the beauties of Albert Durer and Caravaggio with the school of Caracci, he soon gave his teachers occasion to admire his talents, and is even said to have excited the jealousy of Annibale Caracci. He was honored, caressed, and employed by the great, and might have accumulated great wealth; but, to satisfy an unfortunate passion for gambling, he often sold his paintings at any price, and became involved in pecuniary embarrassments, so that, in 1642, he d. in a state of poverty and dejection. Guido imitated the beautiful in nature, and was pre-eminently the painter of youth and female loveliness.—CAGNACCI, an historical painter, b. at Bologna in 1600, and a disciple of Guido Reni. D. 1680.

GUILLOTIN, JOSEPH IGNATIUS, a French physician, who, during the revolution, proposed the use of the guillotine, an instrument made after the fashion of "the maiden," which was used on the Scottish borders in the 16th century. He practised medicine in Paris many years, and was much respected for his general conduct. He was a member of the national assembly, where his political principles were marked by moderation, and his introduction of this instrument of death was from a humane motive—that of rendering capital punishment less painful, by decapitation. He was not, as has been reported, the victim of his own contrivance, though greatly annoyed by its being called by his name. D. in peaceful retirement, 1814.

GURAN, GALLIARD, counsellor of state to the prince of Orange in the 17th century; author of an "Historical and Chronological Register of the Seneschals of Nismes and Beauceaire." D. 1680.

GUISCHARD, CHARLES GOTLIEB, an able writer on military tactics, was a native of Magdeburg. His works are "Mémoires Militaires sur les Grecs et les Romains" and "Mémoires Critiques et Historiques sur plusieurs Points d'Antiquités Militaires." D. 1775.

GUISE, FRANCIS OF LORRAINE, duke of, an illustrious warrior of France, but as ambitious and bigoted as he was brave. He was b. 1519; distinguished himself by his bravery at the siege of Boulogne, the defence of Metz, the conquest of Calais, &c.; and lost his life by assassination, in 1653.—CHARLES OF, usually called the Cardinal of Lorraine, was the minister of Francis II. and Charles IX. He is notorious for his violent and intolerant spirit, and his memory will ever be held in execration for the furious persecution he promoted against the Protestants of France. B. 1525; d. 1574.—HENRY OF LORRAINE, eldest son of Francis, duke of Guise, was b. in 1550. He is memorable in the history of France for his bravery; but he was of a turbulent, ambitious, and cruel disposition. After having distinguished himself in Hungary by his valor against the Turks, he placed himself at the head of an armed band, which he called the League, under the pretext of defending the Roman Catholic religion, Henry III. the king, and the state, against the designs of the Huguenots, or French Protestants. This plan was formed by his brother the cardinal, and the Huguenots were massacred by thousands. But their violence did not stop here. Guise now became an open rebel; he entered Paris against the king's express order, and put to the sword all who opposed him; and the streets being barricaded to prevent his progress, this fatal day is called in French history, "the day of the barricades." The king escaped to Blois, and convened an assembly of the states; and the duke of Guise had the boldness to appear there to a summons sent him for that purpose. A forced reconciliation then took place between them; by the advice of this assembly; but it being afterwards discovered that Guise had formed a plan to dethrone the king, the latter, wanting the resolution to bring him to a trial, procured his assassination as he was entering the council chamber, Dec. 23, 1558.—HENRY II., duke of Lorraine, a grandson of the preceding, was b. 1614. He is described as prodigal and brave, addicted equally to love and war. After having joined in the rebellion of the count de Soissons, and received a pardon, he was induced to join the revolted Neapolitans; and, at their head, displayed great gallantry; but he at length fell into the hands of the Spaniards. D. 1664.

GITON, JOHN, a citizen of Rochelle, who was chosen mayor of the town when it was besieged by Cardinal Richelieu, in 1637. He refused the post, unless permitted to have a poniard to stab the first who should offer to surrender. Being told that famine had carried off many of the inhabitants, he answered, "It matters not, provided there is one left to shut the gates."

GUIZOT, ELIZABETH CHARLOTTE PAULINE, a French lady, whose works written for the instruction of youth have given her celebrity, was b. at Paris, in 1773. Her father died when she was a child, and her family having been brought to distress by the revolutionary changes, she was induced to attempt authorship, in order to provide for their exigencies. She accordingly produced the novels, entitled "Les Contradictions" and "La Chapelle d'Ayton;" she also wrote in the public journals; and her articles on manners, the drama, &c., attracted considerable attention. At length she became acquainted with M. Guizot, since distinguished also as a statesman; in 1812 they were married; and she subsequently acquired no small share of literary distinction for her "L'Ecolier ou Raoul et Victor," "Nouveaux Contes," and "Lettres de Famille sur l'Education Domestique." D. 1827.

GUNDULF, bishop of Rochester, was one of the Norman ecclesiasties brought over by William the Conqueror. He was a celebrated architect; and built that part of the Tower of London called the White Tower. He also erected Rochester castle, and rebuilt the cathedral. D. 1103.

GUNNER, JOHN ERNEST, bishop of Drontheim, was b. at Christiana, in Norway, 1718. He founded the Royal Norwegian Society, in the Transactions of which he published several valuable papers on natural history. On account of his zeal for botany, Linnæus gave his name to a plant in his system. He published "Flora Norvegica," and d. 1773.

GUNTER, EDMUND, a mathematician, was b. in Herefordshire, in 1581. He was professor of astronomy in Gresham college, where he d. 1626. He invented a portable quadrant for astronomical purposes, and the famous "rule of proportion," which, in its mechanical form, is styled "Gunter's scale." He also discovered the variation of the magnetic needle. His works were collected into one volume, and have been repeatedly published. D. 1626.

GUSTAVUS I., king of Sweden, known by the name of Gustavus Vasa, was b. in 1490. Having delivered Sweden from the Danish yoke, he was, in 1523, elected king of that country; reigned gloriously for 37 years, and d. 1560.—ADOLFUS, the grandson of Gustavus Vasa, was b. at Stockholm, in 1595, and ascended the throne in 1611. He brought the war in which his country was then involved with Denmark, Russia, and Poland, to a successful issue; and afterwards led an army of 60,000 men into Germany for the noble purpose of rescuing the Protestants from the tyranny of the house of Austria. He penetrated from the Vistula to the Danube, and twice defeated the celebrated Tilly. This great prince fell in the battle fought on the plains of Lutzen, in 1632.—III., was the son of Adolphus Frederic and Louisa Ulrica, sister of Frederic II., king of Prussia. He was b. 1746, and succeeded his father in 1771. He abolished the practice of torture, and introduced other good regulations in the administration of justice. He also formed a college of commerce, and reformed his army and navy. In 1788 he was involved in a war with Russia, which power was assisted by Denmark. Gustavus headed his army himself, and stormed the defences of Frederickshall, where he took and destroyed a great number of vessels. On the breaking out of the French revolution, a coalition was formed between the northern powers and Spain, by which it was agreed that Gustavus should march against France at the head of a considerable army; but while preparations were making, he was shot at a masquerade by Ankarstroem, a disbanded officer of the army, 1792.—IV., was b. 1778, and ascended the throne when his father fell. D. 1837.

GUTCH, JOHN, an antiquarian writer, who was registrar of the university of Oxford, rector of St. Clement's, and chaplain of All Soul's college. He published "Collectanea Curiosa," from the MSS. of Archbishop Sancroft; "The History and Antiquities of the Colleges, &c., from MSS. in the Bodleian library, written by Anthony Wood;" "The Antiquities and Annals of the University," &c. D. 1831.

GUTHRIE, WILLIAM, an indefatigable writer, was b. at Brechin, Scotland, in 1708; and after receiving his education at King's college, Aberdeen, settled in London as an author. Among the various works which bear this author's name are, a "History of England," a "History of Scotland," an "Universal History," the "Geographical Grammar;" "The Friends," a novel; "Remarks on English Tragedy," also a translation of Quintilian, and Cicero's "Offices." D. 1770.

GUTTEMBERG, JOHN, usually called the inventor of printing, was b. at Mentz, in 1400. In 1427 he resided at Strasburg, as a merchant; but returned to Mentz in 1430. About 1438, Guttemberg made use of movable types of wood; and in 1450 formed a co-partnership with John Faust, or Fust, a rich goldsmith, who furnished money to establish a press, on which the Latin Bible was first printed. Guttemberg, whose printing-office remained in Mentz till 1465, d. 1468.

GUY, THOMAS, the founder of Guy's hospital, was the son of a lighterman of Horsleydown, and b. in 1644. He was brought up to the business of a bookseller, and had a lucrative trade by dealing largely in the importation of bibles from Holland, and afterwards contracting with Oxford for those printed at that university; but his principal gains arose from the disreputable purchase of seamen's prize tickets, and jobbing in South Sea stock. By these means, joined to most penurious habits, he amassed a fortune of nearly half a million sterling, of which he spent about £200,000 in building and endowing the hospital in Southwark, which bears his name. He also erected almshouses at Tamworth, and made bequests to Christ's hospital and various other charities; besides leaving £80,000 to be divided among those who could prove any degree of relationship to him. D. 1724.

GUYON, JEAN MARIE BOUVIERE DE LA MOTHE, a French lady, celebrated as a religious enthusiast, was b. at Montargis, in 1648, and became a widow with three children, at the age of twenty-eight. Having a strong predilection for a kind of mystical devotion, she relinquished the care of her children to others, and gave up a part of her fortune for their maintenance, while she professed to be wholly guided by "divine impulses," thereby implying a complete renunciation of self, the silence of the soul, and the annihilation of all earthly cares and emotions, which has since obtained the name of quietism. For several years she wandered from place to place, preaching her doctrines, and making converts; till her fame reaching Paris, and calumny having been busy with her character, she was was by the king's order shut up in a convent. Through the intercession of madame de Maintenon, however, she soon obtained her liberty; and such were the attractions of her eloquence, and the tenderness and apparent fervor of her piety, that she not only made proselytes of many ladies of the court, but enlisted the illustrious Fenelon in her cause. Her doctrines and conduct at length excited the resentment of Bossuet and other rigid ecclesiasties, and she was compelled to sign a recantation. But again pursuing the same career in Paris, she was confined in the Bastille. On being liberated, in 1702, she retired to Blois, and there passed the remainder of her life in the private exercise of "quietism." Her works, which are very voluminous, are now scarcely remembered, except the one entitled "The Song of Songs interpreted according to its Mystical Sense."—MARIE CLAUDE, a priest of the Oratory at Paris, author of a "History of the Amazons," a "History of Empires and Republics," a "History of the Indies." B. 1701; d. 1771.

GUYS, PETER AUGUSTINE, a French merchant, b. at Marseilles, in 1720; whose love of letters induced him, when trading to the Levant, to make frequent excursions into Greece, with Homer in his hand, for the purpose of making his comments on the spot, and tracing the vestiges of its ancient glories. The fruit of his researches appeared in a work, entitled "Voyage Littéraire de la Grèce." He also wrote "Relation Abrégée de les Voyages en Italie et dans le Nord."

GUYTON DE MORVEAU, LOUIS BERNARD, an eminent French chemist,

was the son of a lawyer at Dijon, where he was b. in 1737. He figured among the earliest and most violent of the revolutionists; bore a decided enmity to the kingly authority and the priesthood; became successively a member of the legislative assembly, the convention, the committee of public safety, and the council of five hundred; was made a member of the legion of honor, and a baron of the empire by Bonaparte; and was director of the Polytechnic school, and administrator of the mint. Besides his share in the "Encyclopédie Méthodique," he was one of the principal editors of the "Annals of Chemistry," and wrote some other chemical works. D. 1816.

GWILYM, DAVID AP, a British bard, known by the name of David of Glamorgan, and styled the Welsh Ovid, was b. in 1340, in the county of Cardigan. He was one of the itinerant bards, and became steward and tutor in the family of Ivor Hael, where he d. 1400. His poems were published in 1792, and are said, by those who profess to be judges, to be unsurpassed by any of his bardic successors.

GWINNE, MATTHEW, was a physician of Welsh descent, but b. in London. After taking his degrees at Oxford, he commenced practice there: but, on the settlement of Gresham college, he was chosen professor of physie, and in 1605 appointed physician to the Tower. He wrote a comedy called "Vertunnus," "Orations," "Letters on Chemical and Magical Secrets," &c. D. 1627.

GWINNET, BURTON, was b. in England in 1732, and after engaging in commercial pursuits, emigrated to America in 1770, and resided for about two years at Charleston, S. C. He then removed to Georgia, and having purchased a plantation turned his attention to agriculture. On the commencement of the revolution, he took an active part in the affairs of this state; was elected a representative in the general congress of 1775, 1776, and 1777, and signed the declaration of independence. In May, 1777, he was a candidate for the chair of governor of the state, but failed; and on the 27th of the same month was shot in a duel with a political rival, General M'Intosh.

H.

HAAK, THEODORE, a German writer, b. at Newhausen, 1605. He studied at Oxford, translated the Dutch "Annotations of the Bible," and was one of the founders of the Royal Society. D. 1690.

HAAS, WILLIAM, a letter-founder at Basle, who improved the art of printing by the invention of a balance-press, &c. D. 1800.

HABERLIN, FRANCIS DOMINIC, a German historian and antiquary, author of the "History of the German Empire," but which, owing to his death, in 1787, was left incomplete. He was a native of Suabia, and professor of history at Helmstadt.—CHARLES FREDERIC, son of the preceding, was professor of jurisprudence in the university of Helmstadt, and the author of various legal works. D. 1808.

HABERT, GERMAIN, a French poet, was abbot of Notre Dame de Cerisi, and one of the first members of the academy. He d. in 1655. His principal poem is entitled "Métamorphose des Yeux d'Iris changés en Astres." He also wrote the "The Life of Cardinal de Berulle."—ISAAC, bishop of Vabres, in France; distinguished himself as a controversialist against Jansenius, and left a translation of the pontifical of the Greek church, some Latin poems, and other works. D. 1668.

HABINGTON, THOMAS, a gentleman of landed property, at Henlip, in Worcestershire, who was implicated in various treasonable practices, but who had the good fortune, though detected, to escape from the full penalty of them. He was found guilty of engaging in a conspiracy to release Mary queen of Scots, for which he was imprisoned six years; and he was afterwards convicted of concealing some of the agents in the gunpowder-plot, and received sentence of death; but obtained a pardon, owing as some assert, to his having been the godson of Queen Elizabeth; though, more probably, to the circumstance of his daughter being the wife of Lord Monteaigle, and the supposed writer of the mysterious letter that led to its discovery. He was, however, restrained from ever leaving Worcestershire; in consequence of this, he employed the rest of his life in collecting a mass of topographical materials, which subsequently formed the foundation of Dr. Nash's history of that county. B. 1560; d. 1647.—WILLIAM, son of the preceding, was b. at Henlip, Worcestershire, in 1605; and was both a poet and an historian. He was educated at St. Omer's and Paris; married the daughter of the first Lord Powis; and published a volume of poems, under the title of "Castara;" which, according to the judgment of modern critics, possess much fancy, elegance, and moral feeling. His other works are, "The Queen of Aragon," a tragi-comedy; "Observations upon History," and "A History of Edward IV." D. 1645.

HACKET, JOHN, bishop of Lichfield, was b. in 1592; received his education at Westminster, and Trinity college, Cambridge; and became chaplain to James I. This appointment soon led to other church preferment. He was the author of "A Century of Sermons," "Loyola," a Latin play, twice performed at the university before James I.; and the "Life of Bishop Williams." D. 1670.

HACQUET, BALTHASAR, an eminent naturalist, b. at Conquet, in Britany, in 1740. D. 1815.

HADLEY, JOHN, an English philosopher, who lived in the early part of the 18th century. He invented the quadrant which bears his name, and also a reflecting telescope; was vice-president of the Royal Society; and contributed several papers to the "Philosophical Transactions."

HAFIZ, or HAFEZ, MOHAMMED, SCHEMSEDDIN, the most popular of the Persian poets, was b. at Shiraz, and flourished in the 14th century. Like Anacreon, his muse is dedicated to love and wine, and, it is said, he practised what he preached. If we may judge of their general merit from the odes which have been translated by Sir W. Jones and others, we must admit that the fame of Hafiz has never been overrated. He d. in 1389, and his countrymen erected a monument to his memory, which was destroyed by an earthquake in 1825.

HAGEDÖRN, FREDERIC, a celebrated German poet, was b. at Hamburg, 1708. He was educated in the college of his native city; went to London in the suite of the Danish ambassador; and, in 1733, was appointed secretary to the English factory at Hamburg. He was the author of Fables, Songs, Tales, and Moral Poems; in all of which there is considerable originality, and many of them are extremely graceful. D. 1754.—CHRISTIAN LEWIS, brother of the preceding, held the rank of counsellor of legation, and was eminent as a connoisseur of the fine arts. He wrote "Remarks on Painting." B. 1717; d. 1780.

HAGER, JOSEPH VON, professor of the oriental languages in the university of Pavia, was b. at Milan, 1750; studied at Vienna, and devoted himself to the acquisition of a critical knowledge of the Chinese tongue. He resided some time in London, where he published several works explanatory of the Chinese language; but meeting with little success, he went to Paris, and there published many more. Among his works are, "The Chinese Pantheon," "An Explanation of the Elementary Characters of the Chinese Language," "A Dissertation on the newly discovered Babylonian Inscriptions," &c. D. at Milan, 1820.

HAHN, PHILIP MATTHEW, a celebrated mechanical genius, b. 1739, at Seharhausen. While at the university of Tübingen, he spent his leisure hours in making sun-dials and speaking-trumpets, grinding glasses, &c. He continued his labors with unremitting assiduity, and eventually produced works of great ingenuity: as, a clock showing the course of the earth and other planets, as well as that of the moon and other satellites, and their eccentricities; a calculating machine; and many other ingenious inventions. D. 1790.

HAHNEMANN, SAMUEL, founder of the system of medicine called Homeopathy, was b. at Meissen, in Saxony, 1755. Educated at the high school of his native town, he successively studied at Leipsic, Vienna, and Erlangen, where his zeal in the pursuit of knowledge procured him the regard of all his teachers; and having taken his degree of M.D., he was appointed, in 1781, district physician at Gomers, near Magdeburg, where he relieved his professional labors by an ardent study of chemistry and mineralogy. In 1784 he removed to Dresden, where he gained a high reputation as a practitioner; but struck with the absence of a guiding principle in therapeutics, and the great uncertainty of the healing art, he retired from practice, and devoted himself exclusively to chemistry and literary occupations. While thus employed, the great law of "similia similibus curantur" dawned upon him, and, in 1796, he announced his new discovery to the medical world, and his whole time was now spent in testing his principles by practice, and in making known the results in various publications. In 1813 he removed to Leipsic as Magister Legens; but the persecutions of the apothecaries drove him thence to Cothen, where the duke of Anhalt-Cothen offered him an asylum in 1820. Here he remained for 15 years, extending his fame and practice; but in 1835, having married a French lady when in his 80th year, he removed with her to Paris, where he remained in the active exercise of his profession, and surrounded by numerous disciples from all parts of the world, till his decease, which took place in 1843. His chief works are the "Organon of the Healing Art," published in 1810; and "Chronic Diseases, their peculiar Nature and Homœopathic Cure," published in 1828.

HAKLUYT, RICHARD, a naval historian, was b. at Eyton, in Herefordshire, 1553. He received his education at Westminster school, and at Christchurch, Oxford, where he made cosmography his favorite study, and read lectures on it. About 1584 he went to Paris as chaplain to the English ambassador, and, during his absence, was made prebendary of Bristol. On his return to England he published several works, particularly a translation from the Spanish of "Leo's Geographical History of Africa," and Peter Martyr's "History of the West Indies." In 1605 he was promoted to a prebend of Westminster, and the rectory of Whetheringset, in Suffolk. His principal work is a valuable collection of the "Voyages and Discoveries of the English nation."

HALE, SIR MATTHEW, an eminent English judge, was b. at Aldersley, in Gloucestershire, 1600; educated at Magdalen hall, Oxford, and removed to Lincoln's Inn, where he studied the law with great application. He acted as counsel for Strafford, Laud, Hamilton, and even for Charles himself; yet, by dint of importunity, Cromwell prevailed upon him to become one of the justices of the bench; but, refusing to warp the laws, he offended the protector, and refused to try any more criminal causes. In the parliament which recalled the king, he sat for his native county; and, soon after the restoration, was made chief baron of the exchequer; from which he was advanced to the chief-justiceship of the King's Bench. He resigned his office in 1675, and died the following year. He was a learned man, an upright judge, and an exemplary

Christian. His writings are numerous on theological, philosophical, and legal subjects. The principal are, "The Primitive Origination of Mankind considered and explained according to the Light of Nature," "The History of the Pleas of the Crown," and "Contemplations, Moral and Divine." He also wrote various mathematical and philosophical works, and left a very valuable collection of manuscripts relating to history and jurisprudence, which are preserved in the library of Lincoln's Inn.—

NATHAN, Captain, an officer in the American revolutionary war, graduated at Yale college, 1773. In the war he commanded a company in Col. Knowlton's regiment, and was with the army in the retreat from Long Island, 1776. Washington having applied to Knowlton for a discreet and enterprising officer to penetrate the enemy's camp and procure intelligence, Hale passed in disguise to the British camp, but on his return was apprehended and carried before Lord Wm. Howe, by whom he was ordered for execution the next morning. He was denied a bible and the aid of a clergyman. The letters, full of fortitude and resignation which he had written to his mother and sister, were destroyed. He was hung, regretting that he had but one life to lose for his country; though executed in a brutal manner as a spy, he was firm and composed.

HALES, JOHN, commonly called "the ever-memorable," was b. at Bath, 1584. He suffered great hardships in the rebellion, and d. 1656. He was a man of learning and skill in argument, as appears from his works, which were collected after his death, and published under the title of "Golden Remains of the ever-memorable Mr. John Hales, of Eton college."

HALFORD, Sir HENRY, bart., one of the most eminent and successful of modern English physicians, was the son of Dr. John Vaughan, of Leicester, and was educated at Rugby and Oxford. D. 1844.

HALHED, NATHANIEL BRASSEY, an eminent orientalist, was educated at Harrow school, and afterwards became a civil officer in the East India Company's service. He published "A Code of Gentoo Laws on Ordinations of the Pundits, from a Persian Translation;" "A Grammar of the Bengal Language;" and "A Narrative of the Events which have happened in Bombay and Bengal, relative to the Mahratta Empire since July, 1777." B. 1751; d. 1830.

HALIFAX, GEORGE SAVILLE, marquis of, an eminent statesman, was b. in 1630; contributed to the restoration of Charles II., who made him a privy councillor, and rewarded him with a coronet. On the accession of James, he was appointed president of the council, from which he was dismissed for refusing his consent to a repeal of the tests. In the convention parliament he was chosen speaker of the house of lords, and at the accession of William and Mary was made lord privy seal. D. 1695. He wrote an excellent piece, entitled "Advice to a Daughter," and various political tracts.

HALKET, Lady ANNE, the wife of Sir James Halket. She was the daughter of Mr. Robert Murray, of the Tullibardin family, and b. in 1622. Her father was preceptor to Charles I., and afterwards provost of Eton college; and her mother was sub-governess to the duke of Gloucester and the Princess Elizabeth. Anne received a liberal education; but theology and physic were her favorite studies. Her skill in the latter was so great, that persons came from Holland, and other countries, to benefit by her advice and treatment. D. 1699.

HALL, EDWARD, an old English chronicler, whose works rank with those of Holingshed and Stow. He was a native of London, and being a lawyer by profession, attained the rank of a judge in the sheriff's court. His death took place in 1547. As affording delinquencies of the manners, dress, and customs of the age, his "Chronicle," which Grafton completed, is very curious.—Sir JAMES, b. 1760, was the author of "An Essay on the Origin, Principles, and History of Gothic Architecture," and of many papers in the "Transactions of the Royal Society of Edinburgh." D. 1832.—BASIL, Captain, a distinguished writer of voyages and travels, &c.; was b. at Edinburgh in 1788. Entering the navy in 1802, he gradually rose through the minor ranks till he became post-captain in 1817. Besides contributing numerous papers on scientific subjects to various journals and encyclopædias, Capt. Hall wrote "A Voyage of Discovery to the Western Coast of Corea and the great Loo-Choo Island in the Japan Sea," a most interesting work, which went through many editions; "Extracts from a Journal written on the Coasts of Chili, Peru, and Mexico, in the Years 1820, 1821, 1822," "Travels in North America,"

"Fragments of Voyages and Travels," "Schloss Heinfeld, or a Winter in Lower Styria," &c. D. 1844.—ROBERT, a celebrated Baptist preacher, and a distinguished theological writer, was b. at Arnsby, in Leicestershire, in 1764. His father, who was also a Baptist minister, early remarked his precocity of talent, and in 1773 placed him under the instruction of the learned and pious John Ryland, of Northampton. At 15 he became a student in the Baptist college at Bristol; and at 18 he entered King's college, Aberdeen, where he took the degree of M.A. He then was chosen as colleague with Dr. Caleb Evans, in the ministry at Bristol, and adjunct professor in the institution. Here he attained great popularity; but he was obliged to retire from this situation, in consequence of approaching symptoms of mental derangement. By judicious treatment, during a long seclusion from the world, his powerful mind regained its former vigor; and, in 1791, he removed to Cambridge, being chosen successor to the celebrated Robert Robinson. He now appeared as the author of a pamphlet, entitled "Christianity not inconsistent with the Love of Freedom." This was shortly after followed by his "Vindication of the Freedom of the Press," which passed through several editions, and is still regarded as a standard work. But it was his "Sermon on Modern Infidelity" that established his fame as a divine. In 1802, Mr. Hall's mind again received a shock, which obliged him to suspend his pulpit labors; and on his recovery he removed to Leicester, where he remained as pastor of the Baptist congregation upwards of 20 years. On the death of Dr. Ryland, in 1826, he succeeded to the presidency of the Bristol academy, and the pastorate of Broadmead chapel; and there he continued till his death, which took place in 1831.—LYMAN, governor of Georgia, was a native of Connecticut, and graduated at Yale college in 1747. Having studied medicine, he established himself at Sunbury, Georgia. He early and zealously espoused the cause of his country. His efforts were particularly useful in inducing the Georgians to join the American confederacy. In May, 1775, he was a member of congress, and signed the declaration of independence, and continued in that body to the close of 1780. While the British had possession of Georgia they confiscated his property. In 1783 he was elected governor. D. 1791.—GORDON, first American missionary at Bombay, graduated at Williams college in 1808. Having studied theology, he refused an invitation to settle in Connecticut, saying, "Woe is me if I preach not the gospel to the heathen." Offering himself as a missionary to the American Board of Commissioners for foreign missions, he was ordained 1812, and sailed for Calcutta. He arrived at Bombay in Feb. 1813, and there spent thirteen years. D. 1836.

HALLER, ALBERT VON, an eminent Swiss physician, was b. at Berne, in 1708. The early display of his abilities was most extraordinary; and when in his 13th year, he was not only distinguished for his knowledge in Greek and Latin, but also for his poetical genius. In his 16th year he began to study medicine at Tübingen, but the fame of Boerhaave induced him to remove to Leyden, where, animated by the example of the great geniuses around him, he spent his days and nights with the least possible intermission, in the most intense study. In 1727 he visited England, and formed an acquaintance with Sir Hans Sloane, Cheselden, and other eminent men. He received the title of physician and counsellor to King George II., at whose request Francis I. gave him a patent of nobility, as a baron. After 17 years absence at Gottingen, the fame of whose medical school he had greatly extended, he returned, in 1753, to Berne, where his countrymen received him with the respect due to his great fame and talents. Having been elected a member of the sovereign council of the state, he soon obtained one of its magistracies; and his various duties as a statesman, a physician, and a medical teacher, occupied his attention till his death. His "Elementa Physiologiæ" and "Bibliotheca Medicinæ" afford ample proofs of his penetrating genius and solid judgment; and his philosophical and descriptive poems display great depth of thought and richness of imagination. He was, in short, a profound philosopher, an admirable poet, and a first-rate physician and botanist; yet not more eminent for his various scientific knowledge, than for his piety and active benevolence. D. 1777.

HALLEY, EDMUND, an eminent English astronomer and mathematician, was b. in 1656, at Haggerston, near London. He received his education at St. Paul's school, and Queen's college, Oxford, where he made so great a proficiency in his mathematical studies, that in 1676 he published observations on a spot in the sun, by which the motion of that body on its axis was determined. The same year he went to St. Helena, where he determined the position of 350 stars, which procured him the name of the Southern Tycho. On his return to England he was created master of arts, and chosen a fellow of the Royal Society; which learned body deputed him to go to Dantzic, to adjust a dispute between Hooke and Hevelius, respecting their proper glasses for astronomical purposes. In 1680 he made the tour of Europe with Mr. Nelson; and on the passage to Calais was the first to observe the great comet. After his return, he turned his attention to the theory of the planetary motions, which brought him acquainted with Isaac Newton, who intrusted to him the publication of his Principia. In 1703 he was appointed Savilian professor of geometry at Oxford; in 1705 he made public his valuable researches on the orbits of comets; in 1713 he became secretary to the Royal Society; and in 1719 he succeeded Flamsteed as astronomer royal. The remainder of his life was chiefly spent in the sedulous performance of his duties in that situation, especially in completing the theory of the motion of the moon. D. 1741-2.

HALS, FRANCIS, an eminent portrait painter, b. at Mechlin, in 1584, who was considered as ranking next to Vandyke. D. 1666.—DIRK, his brother, was famous for painting merry-makings and subjects of drollery. D. 1656.

HAMILTON, ALEXANDER, was b. in 1757. While a student of Columbia college, N. Y., at the age of 17, he published several essays concerning the rights of the colonies, which were marked by vigor and maturity of style, as well as by soundness of argument. Before he was 19 he entered the American army, with the rank of captain of artillery; and by the time he was 20, the commander-in-chief had made him his aid-de-camp, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel. From this time he continued the inseparable companion of Washington during the war, and was always consulted by him on the most important occasions. After the war, Colonel Hamilton, then about 24, commenced the study of the law, and was soon admitted at the bar. In 1782 he was chosen a member of congress from the state of New York, where he quickly acquired the greatest influence and distinction. He contributed greatly to the favorable reception of the constitution, by the essays he wrote, in conjunction with Madison and Jay, in the "Federalist." On the organization of the federal government in 1789, he was appointed secretary of the treasury; and during his continuance in that office, about five years, he raised the public credit from the lowest state of depression to a height altogether unprecedented in the history of the country. In 1798, when an invasion was apprehended from the French, and a provisional army had been called into the field, his public services were again required; and on the death of Washington, in 1799, he succeeded to the chief command. When the army was disbanded, Hamilton again returned to the bar, and continued to practise, with increased reputation and success, until 1804. A quarrel having taken place between him and Colonel Burr, the latter challenged him, and they met at Hoboken on the 11th of July. At the first fire Hamilton fell, mortally wounded, on the same spot where, a short time previously, his eldest son had been killed in a duel.—ANTHONY, Count, a poet, courtier, and man of letters in the 17th century. He was descended from an ancient Scotch family, but b. in 1646, in Ireland; from whence he was taken to France, when a child, by his parents, who were attached to Charles II. When James II. was obliged to contend for his crown in Ireland, he gave Count Hamilton a regiment of infantry, and made him governor of Limerick; but on the ruin of the royal cause, he accompanied James to France, where he passed the rest of his life. His wit and talents secured him admission into the first circles, and he d. at St. Germain, in 1720. Count Hamilton is chiefly known as an author by his "Memoirs of Count Grammont," a lively and spirited production, exhibiting a free and faithful delineation of the voluptuous court of Charles II. His other works are, "Poems and Fairy Tales," which, as well as the memoirs, are in French, and display elegance of style with fertility of invention.—ELIZABETH, a lady of great literary attainments, was b. at Belfast, in Ireland, in 1758. She wrote the "Letters of a Hindoo Rajah," "The Life of Agripina," "Memoirs of Modern Philosophers," "Popular Essays," "On the Elementary Principles of Education," "Letters on the Formation of the Religious and Moral Principle," and other works, replete with sound sense and information. D. 1816.—GAVIN, an historical painter, and connoisseur of ancient art, was b. at Lanark, in Scotland. Having discovered an early genius for painting, he was sent to Italy, and placed under Augustine Massuchi, by whose instructions he profited considerably; after which he applied with great diligence to the study of the antique, which has given his paintings of ancient subjects that propriety with regard to costume, which distinguished them at the time from the generality of modern compositions. One of his greatest works was his Homer, consisting of a series of pictures, representing scenes taken from the Iliad. The latter part of his life was employed in making excavations, at Tivoli, among the ruins of Adrian's villa, and in various other places in Italy, by which he was enabled to bring to light many of the long-buried treasures of antiquity; so that the success which crowned his researches made ample amends for the loss which painting may have suffered by the intermission of his practice. D. at Rome, 1796.—JAMES, inventor of the Hamiltonian system of teaching languages, d. at Dublin, where he had gone for the purpose of giving lectures, Sept. 16, 1829.—PATRICK, the first Scotch reformer, was nephew to James, earl of Arran, and b. in 1503. He was educated at St. Andrew's, after which he went abroad, where he imbibed the opinions of Luther. On his return home he was made abbot of Ferne, in the shire of Ross, where he promulgated the new doctrines with so much zeal as to excite the wrath of the clergy, who caused him to be apprehended and sent to Beaton, archbishop of St. Andrew's. After a long examination he was declared contumacious, and burnt at a stake, opposite St. Salvador's college, March 1, 1527.—THOMAS, is chiefly known as the author of "Cyril Thornton," a stirring novel of military adventure, combining the elegant style of an excellent classical scholar with the graphic description and vivid feeling of one who had participated in the scenes and circumstances that he described. After serving through the Peninsular and American campaigns, Capt. Hamilton devoted his time chiefly to literature, and he was a voluminous contributor to "Blackwood's Magazine," in which "Cyril Thornton" originally appeared. His chief separate works after Cyril Thornton are, "Annals of the Peninsular Campaign," and "Men and Manners in America." D. 1842.—

WILLIAM, an historical painter, was b. in 1750. He went to Italy when very young, and was there placed under the instruction of Zucchi, the painter of arabesque ornaments, at Rome. On his return to England he acquired considerable employment; and, in 1789, was admitted a royal academician. D. 1801.—WILLIAM, a Scotch poet, was b. at Bangour, in Ayrshire, in 1704. He joined the Pretender in 1745, and narrowly escaped being taken after the battle of Culloden. D. 1754. Among his songs and ballads is the well-known "Braes of Yarrow."—WILLIAM GERARD, a statesman who obtained the appellation of "Single Speech Hamilton," from the extraordinary impression produced by the first and almost only speech he ever made in the British parliament, was the son of a barrister of Lincoln's Inn, where he was b. in 1729. He was educated at Winchester school and Oriel college, Oxford. In 1754 he was elected into parliament for Petersfield, and the year following delivered the speech alluded to. In 1761 he went to Ireland as secretary to Lord Halifax, and in the parliament of that kingdom he confirmed the reputation which he had gained in England by his oratory. He was about twenty years chancellor of the exchequer in Ireland, but retired from public life in 1784. His works, consisting of "Parliamentary Logic," "Speeches," &c., &c., were printed in 1808, with the life of the author prefixed. Among the many to whom the Letters of Junius were once ascribed, Mr. Hamilton was one; but there was scarcely the shadow of an argument to support the conjecture. D. 1796.—Sir WILLIAM, was a native of Scotland; b. in 1730. His mother having been the nurse of George III., young Hamilton very naturally obtained that prince's patronage. Sir William was generally distinguished for his taste in the polite arts, employed a large portion of his life in the study of natural history, and supplied the Philosophical Transactions and the Archæologia with many learned articles. During his residence as ambassador from England to the court of Naples, he published his "Campi Phlegræi," from his observations of Mount Vesuvius, Mount Etna, and other volcanoes. He presented many books, manuscripts, and geological curiosities to the British Museum; and, after his death, his superb collection of antique vases was purchased by parliament for that institution. D. 1803.—EMMA, Lady, wife of the above, was the daughter of a female servant. At the age of 13 she obtained a situation under the name of Emma Harte, in the house of Mr. Thomas, of Howarden, Flintshire, to wait on his children. Emma, it seems, thought the situation dull, and left it. At 16, she went to London, got a place in the house of a shopkeeper in St. James's market, and soon after was hired to wait upon a lady of rank, where, having only the duty of dressing her mistress, she passed her leisure time in reading novels and plays. She soon acquired a taste for the drama; and employed herself in imitating the attitudes and manners of persons on the stage, from a desire to become an actress. She thus laid the foundation of her extraordinary skill in pantomimic representations. But she neglected her business, was dismissed, and went to serve in a low tavern, frequented by actors, painters, musicians, &c. In this service she formed an acquaintance with a Welsh youth, who was pressed upon the river, when she went to the captain and obtained the boy his liberty. The captain loaded her with presents, and with him she remained for some time. At length she quitted him for a gentleman of large fortune, who kept her in great affluence for a short period; but disgusted by her extravagance, and induced by domestic considerations, he dismissed her. Reduced to the greatest poverty, she became one of the most common of degraded females. From this state she was relieved by the infamous Dr. Graham, who, perceiving the beautiful symmetry of her person, took her to his house, and there exhibited her, covered only with a transparent veil, under the name of the goddess Hygeia. Painters, sculptors, and others, paid their tribute of admiration at the shrine of this new goddess. The artful quack had her bust modelled; numbers purchased it, and a greater number came to admire the original. She was an adept in deceit; with a violent and impassioned temper, she assumed the appearance of candor, innocence, and simplicity. Charles Greville (of the Warwick family) became enamored with, and would have married her, but for the interference of his uncle, Sir W. Hamilton, who, according to some accounts, made an agreement with Greville to pay his debts, on condition that he should give up his mistress; or, as others state the circumstance, in his endeavors to save his nephew, fell into the snare himself, and became the victim of her arts. He made her his wife in 1791; introduced her at the court of Naples, where the queen became so infatuated with the new ambassadress, as frequently to keep her a visitor at the palace. It was there that she imbibed a violent passion for England's naval hero, then commanding the "Agamemnon;" and, from that period, she became the companion of Nelson, to whom she was sometimes useful as a political agent. After the victory of Aboukir, when the conqueror was received in Naples with extravagant rejoicings, Lady Hamilton was the heroine of the crowd, and accompanied the slave of her charms wherever he went. To her advice is attributed the ignominious death of Prince Caracciolo, the oldest and the best officer in the Neapolitan navy. She d. in 1816, in the neighborhood of Calais.

HAMMOND, ANTHONY, an ingenious writer, was b. at the family seat of Somersham place, Huntingdonshire, in 1668. He was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, and became a member of parliament, where his eloquence procured him the name of "Silver Tongue." He was also a commissioner of the navy; but d. a prisoner in the fleet, in 1738. He was the author of a "Miscellany of Original Poems."—JAMES, an elegiac poet, was b. in 1710; received his education at Westminster school; was appointed equerry to Frederick, prince of Wales; and sat in parliament for Truro. D. 1741.

HAMPDEN, JOHN, a political character of great celebrity in the reign of Charles I., was descended of an ancient family in Buckinghamshire, and b. in London, in 1594. In 1636 he distinguished himself by his spirited opposition to the payment of ship-money, by which he acquired great popularity. He became a leading man in the house of commons; and at the commencement of the civil war he took up arms against the king, and accepted the command of a regiment in the parliamentary army, under the earl of Essex. Prince Rupert having beaten up the quarters of the parliamentary troops near Thame, in Oxfordshire, Hampden eagerly joined a few cavalry that were rallied in haste, and, in the skirmish which ensued, received a wound, which in a few days proved fatal. His character and conduct throughout his contest with the crown showed great firmness and moderation; and his name has become a sort of watchword to many who, loving his stern republican virtues, exult in displaying their patriotism: by resisting not merely taxation by prerogative, but all injustice. D. 1643.

HANCOCK, JOHN, an American patriot and statesman, was b. in Quincy, Massachusetts, in 1737, and under the patronage of a wealthy uncle received a liberal education, and was graduated at Harvard college, in 1754. On leaving college he entered the counting-house of his uncle, by whose sudden death in 1764 he succeeded to great riches, and the management of an extensive business. In 1766 he was chosen a member of the assembly, and soon distinguished himself by his zeal in the cause of the colonies. In 1774 he was elected president of the provincial congress of Massachusetts, and in the following year president of the continental congress, in which capacity he was the first to affix his signature to the declaration of independence. In this station he continued till October, 1777, when ill health induced him to resign. In 1780 he was elected governor of Massachusetts, and held that office for four successive years, and again from 1787 till his death in 1793. Governor Hancock was hospitable and munificent, a man of excellent talents for business, and a true lover of his country.

HANDÉL, GEORGE FREDERIC, an illustrious musician, was b. at Halle, in Saxony, in 1684. His father, who intended him for the law, perceiving his propensity to music, discouraged it as much as possible, and especially forbade him to touch an instrument. The boy, however, contrived to have a small clavi-chord concealed in the garret, where he used to amuse himself when the family were asleep. At the age of 9, HandéL composed the church service, for voices and instruments; and when he was 14 he far excelled his master, and was sent to Berlin, where the sovereign made him liberal presents. In 1704 he brought out his first opera, "Almira." Soon after this he visited Italy, and at Florence produced the opera of "Rodrigo." He subsequently went to Venice, Naples, and Rome; and having altogether remained in Italy about six years, he accepted the pressing invitations he had received from many of the British nobility to visit London, and set out for England, where he arrived in the latter end of 1710. The flattering reception he experienced induced him to prolong his stay, and he rose, during the 50 years which followed, to the height of professional honor. In 1741 he brought out his chef-d'œuvre, the oratorio of the "Messiah." D. 1759.

HANMER, Sir THOMAS, an English statesman and writer, was b. in 1676, and succeeded his uncle in his title and the family estate of Hanmer. He was, in 1713, chosen speaker of the house of commons. Towards the close of his life he withdrew altogether from public business, and occupied himself in elegant literature; the fruits of which appeared in a corrected edition of Shakespeare's dramatic works. D. 1746.

HANNIBAL, general of the Carthaginians, was the son of Amilcar, who caused him, at the age of eight years, to swear before the altar eternal enmity to the Romans. In the year of Rome 534, and 220 B. C., he took the command of the army, on the death of his brother Asdrubal. After achieving several conquests in Spain, he turned his arms against the Romans, and crossed the Alps by a new road. Having defeated Scipio and other commanders, in separate actions, he marched towards Rome, and gained the victory of Cannæ, 216 B. C. Instead of following up this advantage, Hannibal rested at Capua, which enabled the Romans to recover from their fright, so that when the Carthaginians encamped before the city, their appearance created no alarm. Hannibal, finding it hopeless to make any attempt upon the capital, retreated. Two years afterwards he defeated Marcellus; but notwithstanding this, finding his affairs growing desperate in Italy, where he had now been 16 years, he made overtures of peace, which terminated without effect. The battle of Zama, in which he lost 20,000 men, completely ruined Hannibal, and he retired to Asia, where he took refuge with Prusias, king of Bithynia; but being apprehensive that he should be delivered up to the Romans, he took poison, at the age of 64, 183 B. C.

HANNO. There were several Carthaginian generals of this name.—One of them made a voyage on the western coast of Africa, of which he has left a description, called the "Periplus of Hanno." The purpose of this voyage was to make discoveries for the benefit of commerce, and to settle colonies, of which he established several. Two Carthaginian generals, of the name of Hanno, commanded in Sicily, successively, during the first Punic war.—Another Hanno was one of the commanders under Hannibal in Italy, and was successful on several occasions.

HANS SACHS, a German poet of the 16th century. Prolific as German writers in general are, honest Hans must ever be regarded as an extraordinary instance of poetical fertility, if what his countrymen assert be true, namely, that he wrote no less than 10,840 compositions in verse, among which are 218 comedies and tragedies. To this we are bound to add, as an additional proof of his industry, that he was a shoemaker, and worked all his life at the trade.

HANSARD, LUKE, an industrious and successful printer, was b. at Norwich, in 1752. He served his apprenticeship in his native city; and, at its expiration, he started for London, with a good character, and one solitary guinea in his pocket. His first situation in London was that of a compositor in the printing-office of Mr. Hughs, printer to the house of commons; in which he acquired the full confidence of his employer, and, by his indefatigable attention, extended the business. In 1774 he became a partner in the concern, and when the whole of the business devolved upon him, by the death of Mr. Hughs, he spared no cost nor personal labor in performing the important duties intrusted to him. He amassed a very considerable property, and finished his useful and laborious life in 1828, aged 76.

HARDENBERG, CHARLES AUGUSTUS, baron, afterwards prince of, a famous Prussian statesman, b. in 1750; became cabinet minister in 1793; and his signature will be found to most of the treaties of coalition against Napoleon, with Russia and Austria, till the battle of Austerlitz, in 1805. In 1810 he was made chancellor of state. He was one of the Russian plenipotentiaries signing the treaty of Paris in 1814; was created prince; accompanied the allied sovereigns to London; was one of the most prominent actors at the congress of Vienna; and afterwards made president of the council of state. He was present, in 1818, at the congress of Aix-la-Chapelle; in 1819, at Carlsbad; in 1820, at Vienna, at Troppau, and Verona. D. 1822.—FREDERIC VON, (better known by his literary cognomen, NOVALIS,) was b. at Mansfield, near Eisleben, 1772; studied at Jena, Leipsic, and Wittenberg, and finally became superintendent of the mines in Saxony, having acquired a competent knowledge of the science of mineralogy under the celebrated Werner. His lyric poems have gained him great celebrity; and his romance, "Heinrich von Ofterdingen," though unfinished, has called for the admiration even of such fastidious critics as Tieck and Frederic Schlegel. D. 1801.

HARDICANUTE, king of England and Denmark, was the son of Canute, and succeeded his father on the Danish throne in 1038; and at the same time laid claim to that of England, which had devolved to his half-brother, Harold. A compromise was effected, by which he governed the southern part of the kingdom during Harold's life, and succeeded to the whole on his death. His conduct was violent and tyrannical—he revived the odious tax called danegelt, and his subjects rejoiced at his early death, which happened in 1041.

HARDOUIN, JOHN, a learned French Jesuit, the author of several works, but remarkable as the author of one in particular, (which excited equal interest and animadversion at the time,) the object of which was to show that almost all the writings under the names of the Greek and Roman poets and historians are the spurious productions of the 13th century. B. 1647; d. 1729.—JOHN STEPHEN, a French writer; the translator of Young's "Night Thoughts," and Fenelon's "Telemachus," into rhyme. B. 1735; d. 1817.

HARDWICKE, PHILIP YORKE, earl of, an eminent English lawyer, was b. at Dover, in Kent, in 1690. After serving the offices of solicitor and attorney general, he was, in 1733, appointed chief justice of the King's Bench, and created a peer. In 1736 he was made lord chancellor, which situation he held 20 years. In 1754 he was created earl of Hardwicke. D. 1764.—PHILIP YORKE, earl of, eldest son of the preceding, was b. in 1720. In 1738 he was appointed one of the tellers of the exchequer, and in 1764 succeeded his father in the earldom. He d. in 1790. Lord Hardwicke wrote a poem on the death of Queen Caroline; and with his brother, the Honorable Charles Yorke, projected the "Athenian Letters, or the Epistolary Correspondence of an Agent of the King of Persia, residing at Athens during the Peloponnesian War." A few copies only of this work were at first printed for private circulation; but in 1798 an elegant edition was published. Lord Hardwicke also printed "The Correspondence of Sir Dudley Carleton, in the reign of James I.," and "Miscellaneous State Papers from 1501 to 1726."

HARDY, SIR CHARLES, an English admira., and the grandson of an eminent naval commander of the same name, in the reign of Queen Anne. He had the command of the Channel fleet in 1779, but died the same year at Spithead.—Sir THOMAS, a gallant officer, the friend and brother in arms of the gallant Nelson, whose last breath he received on board the Victory. At the early age of 12 he entered the royal navy as a midshipman, on board the Helena, of 14 guns, and in November, 1793, was made lieutenant in the Meleager, of the squadron of Nelson, under whose notice he was thus brought. He was thenceforth constantly employed under the hero, who, in 1797, promoted him to the command of the brig La Mutine, of the capture of which he was the main cause. His constant gallantry, and especially his conduct at the battle of the Nile, in which his vessel, La Mutine, was the only single-decker that was present, caused Nelson to promote him to the command of the Vanguard. In July, 1803, he became flag-captain to Nelson, on board the Victory. For his services at Trafalgar he was created a baronet. B. 1769; d. 1839.

HARLEY, ROBERT, earl of Oxford and Mortimer, a distinguished English statesman, was b. 1661. At the revolution he was returned to the house of commons, and in 1702 he was chosen speaker. In 1710 he again came into office, as a commissioner of the treasury, and chancellor of the exchequer. Shortly after he was stabbed by the marquis of Guiscard, a Frenchman, when under examination at the council-board; but he recovered from his wound, and the assassin died in prison. He was then advanced to the peerage, and made lord high treasurer; which office he resigned a few days before the death of Queen Anne, in 1714. On the accession of George I. he was impeached by the house of commons, and committed to the Tower, where he was kept two years, and then, after a public trial, he was acquitted. After this, he retired wholly from public business, and d. 1724.

HARLOW, GEORGE HENRY, an English painter, was b. in 1787; studied under Drammond and Sir Thomas Lawrence; and d. 1819. He produced several good pictures; among which is the well-known scene from Shakspeare's Henry the Eighth, containing portraits of the Kemble family and other distinguished actors.

HAROLD I., surnamed Harefoot, king of England, succeeded his father, Canute, in 1035. He reigned four years, and d. in 1039.—II., king of England, was the second son of Godwin, earl of Kent. Upon the death of Edward the Confessor, in 1066, he took possession of the throne, without attending to the more legal claim of Edgar Atheling, or the asserted bequest of Edward in favor of William, duke of Normandy. The latter accordingly invaded England with a large army, and Harold fell at the memorable battle of Hastings, October 14, 1066; by which the conquest of the kingdom was effected, and the Norman rule began.

HAROUN, or AARON ALRASCHID, a celebrated caliph of the Saracens, ascended the throne in 786, and was the most potent prince of his race, ruling over territories extending from Egypt to Khorassan. He gained many splendid victories over the Greek emperors, and obtained immense renown for his bravery, magnificence, and love of letters; but he was cruel and tyrannical. D. 808.

HARPER, ROBERT GOODLOE, was a native of Virginia, but when very young removed with his parents to North Carolina. His parents were poor, and in early life he passed through a number of vicissitudes. At the age of twenty he found himself in Charleston, S. C., with but a dollar or two in his pocket, and with the intention of studying the profession of the law. Having obtained introduction to a lawyer, he prepared himself under his instruction for the bar, and, in about a twelvemonth, undertook the management of causes on his own account. He then removed from Charleston to an interior district, where he first distinguished himself, politically, by the publication of a series of newspaper essays on a proposed change in the constitution of the state. He was immediately elected to the state legislature, and soon afterwards to congress, where he was an efficient member of the federal party, a powerful advocate of the policy of Washington, and the personal friend of the most distinguished federal statesmen of the day. Many years afterwards he collected in an octavo volume, a number of his circulars and addresses to his constituents, and several of his speeches in congress. In 1797 he published a pamphlet, entitled "Observations on the Dispute between the United States and France," which passed through numerous editions, and acquired great celebrity both at home and in Europe. The speeches which he delivered in managing the impeachment of Blount, and the defence of Judge

Chase, are admirable specimens of argument and eloquence. On the downfall of the federal party Mr. Harper resumed the practice of the law in Baltimore, where he married the daughter of the distinguished Charles Carroll. He attended almost every session of the supreme court, from the time of its removal to Washington to that of his death, and was always heard with respect and attention by the court and juries. The federal party having regained the ascendant in Maryland, Mr. Harper was immediately elected a senator in congress, but the demands of his profession soon obliged him to resign his seat.

HARRINGTON, JAMES, a celebrated political writer, was b. in 1611, in Northamptonshire. His chief work is entitled "Oceana," a political romance, in which he defended republicanism. In 1661 he was, on a charge of treason, sent to the Tower, from whence he was removed to St. Nicholas's Island, near Plymouth, but was afterwards released on bail. D. 1677.

HARRIS, JAMES, a philological writer, was b. at Salisbury, in 1709. In 1774 he was made secretary and comptroller to the queen. He wrote "Three Treatises: the first concerning Art; the second concerning Music, Painting, and Poetry; and the third concerning Happiness;" "Hermes, or a Philosophical Inquiry concerning Universal Grammar;" "Philological Inquiries," &c. D. 1780.

HARRISON, JOHN, celebrated as the inventor of the time-keeper for ascertaining the longitude at sea, was b. at Foulby, Yorkshire, in 1693. His father, a carpenter or builder, brought him up to the same occupation; but by dint of ingenuity and perseverance he learned to make clocks and watches; and having turned his attention to the improvement of pocket-watches, he was induced to make a time-keeper, in that form, which he finished in 1759. This chronometer, in two voyages, having been found to correct the longitude within the limits required by the act of parliament, Harrison applied for the proposed reward of £20,000, which he received. D. 1776.

—JOHN, one of the regicide judges who sat upon the trial of Charles I., was the son of a butcher, and became a general in the parliamentary army. He was one of the ten who were executed for that act, after the restoration.—ROBERT HANSON, sustained the offices of chief justice of the general court of Maryland, and governor of the state. In 1789 he was appointed one of the judges of the supreme court of the United States, but declined accepting the office, which was afterwards conferred on Mr. Iredel. He exerted himself in the prosecution of the revolutionary war with great ardor, and in his station as judge and governor displayed very superior talents. He d. 1790.—BENJAMIN, governor of Virginia, was educated at the college of William and Mary. He went early into public life, commencing as a member of the legislature of his native province, Virginia. He was offered by the British government a seat in the executive council, which he declined, and remained true to his country. In 1774 he was a delegate in congress from Virginia, and continued to be a member till 1777. From 1782 to 1784 he was governor of Virginia. He was a member of the Virginia convention for adopting the constitution of the United States. D. 1791.—WILLIAM HENRY, president of the United States of America, was b. in Virginia, in 1773, his father being one of the most conspicuous among the patriots of the revolution. After receiving the customary education at Hampden Sydney college, he studied for the medical profession; but participating in the general excitement which prevailed throughout the country against the barbarous mode of warfare at that time practised by the Indians on the north-western frontiers, he suddenly abandoned the precepts of Galen, and joined his brethren in arms, as an ensign in the U. S. artillery, in 1791. During the years 1811, 1812, and 1813, General Harrison assembled a body of militia and volunteers, and marched against the Indians, who, under Tecumseh, had created serious disturbances on the frontier. The most signal success crowned his efforts, and he was appointed by Mr. Madison to negotiate with those enemies against whom his military skill had been so ably directed. In 1828 he was sent as United States minister to Columbia; and, in 1840, he was elected chief magistrate. But one month after his accession he was seized with an illness, and d. April 4, 1841.

HART, JOHN, a patriot of the American revolution, and one of the signers of the declaration of independence. He was a member of congress in 1774, from New Jersey. In the latter part of the year 1776 his farm was pillaged by the enemy, and his family dispersed. The alarm and distress of these occurrences caused the death of his wife. After the evacuation of New Jersey he again collected his family; but his health was now failing him, and he d. 1780.

HARTE, WALTER, an English poet and historian, was b. and educated at Marlborough, in Wiltshire. He published a poetical collection, called the "Amaranth," a "History of Gustavus Adolphus," and "Essays on Husbandry." D. 1773.

HARTLEY, DAVID, an English physician, was b. at Armley, in Yorkshire, in 1705, and d. at Bath in 1757. He wrote an excellent work, entitled "Observations on Man."—DAVID, son of the preceding, was b. in 1730; educated at Merton college, Oxford; became M. P. for Hull; was distinguished by his strenuous opposition to the American war; and was appointed one of the negotiators to treat with Dr. Franklin. He had the merit of several ingenious inventions, one of which is a mode of securing buildings from fire. D. 1813.

HARVARD, JOHN, a nonconformist divine, who d. in 1688, at Charlestown, Mass. He is deserving of commemoration by being the founder of the college bearing his name, at Cambridge.

HARVEY, WILLIAM, a celebrated physician, was b. at Folkstone, 1578. He discovered the circulation of the blood, of which he published an account in 1628, entitled "Exercitatio Anatomica de Motu Cordis et Sanguinis." In 1632 he was made physician to Charles I., and adhered faithfully to the king; for which, in 1645, he was chosen warden of Merton college, Oxford; but when the parliamentary visitors came there, he left it for London. In 1651 appeared his "Exercitationes de Generatione Animalium." D. 1658.

HASSELQUIST, FREDERIC, a Swedish naturalist, and one of the most celebrated of all the pupils of Linnæus, was b. in 1722. He embarked for Smyrna in August, 1749, went to Egypt, remained some time at Jerusalem, and afterwards visited other parts of the country. Returning to Smyrna, he brought with him an admirable collection of plants, minerals, fishes, reptiles, insects, and other natural curiosities. His "Iter Palæstinum, or a Journey to the Holy Land," was derived from his journal, and was drawn up by Linnæus.

HASTINGS, WARREN, was b. in 1733, at Chnrchill, Oxfordshire, where his father was the clergyman. He was educated at Westminster, and at the age of 17, went out to India, as a writer in the company's service. On his arrival he applied with diligence to the duties of his station, and at his leisure studied the oriental languages. After 14 years' residence in Bengal, he returned to England; but in 1769 he went out as second in council at Madras, where he remained about two years, and then removed to the presidency of Calcutta. In 1786 he returned to England, when he was accused of having governed arbitrarily and tyrannically; of having extorted immense sums of money; and of having exercised every species of oppression. An impeachment followed, which lasted 9 years. He was at length acquitted, and sentenced to pay only the costs of prosecution, (£71,080 sterling,) for which the East India Company indemnified him by a pension of £4,000 for life. He lived, however, to see his plans for the security of India publicly applauded, and d. 1818. Mr. Hastings was a man of mild and unassuming manners, and an elegant scholar. He wrote "A Narrative of the Insurrection at Benarés." "Memoirs relative to the State of India," some fugitive poetry, &c.—FRANCIS RAWDON, marquis of, son of the earl of Moira, was b. in 1754, and entered the army in 1771. He greatly distinguished himself in the American war; was appointed in 1778, adjutant-general of the British forces there, and rose to the rank of a major-general. In 1812 he obtained the appointment of governor-general of British India, which he held till 1822; and during the 10 years of his sway he overcame the Nepaulese, the Pindarees, and other native powers, and rendered the British authority supreme in India. While absent he was created marquis of Hastings. D. 1725.

HATTO, or HATTO VERCELLENSIS, was bishop of Vercelli, in Italy, in the 10th century. His work on the "Grievances of the Church," (which is curiously illustrative of the spirit and complexion of the times,) together with his canons and epistles, were published in 1768.

HATTÓN, Sir CHRISTOPHER, an eminent statesman, and lord chancellor of England, was b. at Holdenby, in Northamptonshire. In 1587 was made both chancellor and knight of the garter. His inexperience created much prejudice against him at first, but his natural capacity and sound judgment were seldom found defective. He wrote the fourth act in the tragedy of "Tancred and Sigismunda;" and to him is ascribed "A Treatise concerning Statutes or Acts of Parliament." D. 1591.

HAUBOLD, CHRISTIAN GOTTLIEB, a celebrated German jurist, was b. at Dresden, in 1766. He was made doctor of law in 1788; and eventually became ordinary professor of law in the university of Leipsic.

HAUFF, WILHELM, one of the most graceful prose writers of Germany, was b. at Stuttgart, 1802. He went to the university of Tubingen from 1820 to 1824, where he studied philosophy and theology, with a view to the church. While discharging the duties of tutor in a noble family at Stuttgart, he commenced his literary career with the "Märchen Almanach auf das Jahr," 1826. The chief of his works are, "Memoiren des Satans," "Mann im Monde," "Lichtenstein," "Die Bettlerin von Pont des Arts," "Phantasien im Bremen Rathskeller," &c. He had just undertaken the editorship of the celebrated journal, called the "Morgenblatt," when he d. November, 1827.

HAUGWITZ, CHRISTIAN HENRY CHAS., count of, an eminent Prussian statesman, was b. in Silesia, in 1758. D. 1832.

HAUKSBEE, FRANCIS, an English philosopher of the 18th century, who made many experimental discoveries in electricity, and published them.

HAUTEFEUILLE, JOHN, a mechanic, was b. at Orleans, in 1647. He made several discoveries and improvements in clock-making, and invented the spiral spring which moderates the vibration of balance-wheels in watches, which Huygeus afterwards perfected. He also wrote several short treatises on mechanical subjects; also, "The Art of Breathing under Water," "The Perpetual Pendulum," "A new System of the Flux and Reflux of the Sea," &c. D. 1724.

HAUY, RENE JUST, Abbé, a celebrated mineralogist, b. at St. Just, in Picardy, in 1742. He first studied theology, and was twenty-one years professor of languages. But mineralogy was his favorite pursuit; and to him science is indebted for an admirable theory of crystallization, founded on geometrical laws. He was appointed by Bonaparte professor of mineralogy at the botanic garden, and to the faculty of sciences at Paris. In 1803, at the command of Napoleon, he wrote his "Traité de Physique." His treatises on mineralogy, crystallog-raphy, and natural history, are all highly esteemed; and his beautiful collection of minerals, for which he had refused an offer of 600,000 francs, was bought by the duke of Buckingham. D. 1822.

HAWES, STEPHEN, a poet of the 15th century, was a native of Suffolk, and educated at Oxford.

HAWKESWORTH, JOHN, the son of a watchmaker at Bromley, Kent, was b. in 1715, and apprenticed to his father's trade; but he soon left it for literary pursuits, and eventually became an author of eminence. He is chiefly remembered by his "Adventurer," a series of periodical essays; a sentence, taken from the last number of which work, is inscribed on a marble monument erected to his memory in Bromley church. D. 1773.

HAWKINS, Sir JOHN, a brave English admiral under Queen Elizabeth, was a native of Devonshire. He was rear-admiral of the fleet, which she sent against the Spanish Armada, and had a great share in that victory. He was afterwards made treasurer of the navy. But his memory is disgraced by his being the first European who carried off slaves from the coast of Africa, and introduced that inhuman traffic into the West Indies. Queen Elizabeth herself, while she honored his bravery by knighthood, threatened him with the divine vengeance for this practice. D. 1595.—Sir JOHN, a lawyer and miscellaneous writer, was b. in London, in 1719. He practised as a solicitor, with reputation for some years; and having made general literature the study of his leisure hours, he also wrote for the periodical press. A taste for music led him to become a member of the academy of ancient music; and in 1742 he was chosen a member of the literary club, established by Dr. Johnson, with whom he formed an acquaintance which lasted during their joint lives. Having in 1753 married a lady of great fortune, and becoming possessed of a much greater one in 1759, on the death of her brother, he gave up his profession, and became a magistrate for Middlesex. His principal work is, "A General History of the Science and Practice of Music," and his edition, with notes, of "Isaac Walton's Complete Angler," acquired deserved popularity. D. 1789.

HAWLEY, JOSEPH, a distinguished American patriot, was b. in 1724, at Northampton, Mass., and being bred a lawyer, soon acquired great eminence in his profession. But he was mostly distinguished for his knowledge of political history and the principles of free government—a circumstance which rendered him one of the ablest advocates of American liberty in the legislature, previous to and during the contest between the colonies and the parent state. D. 1788.

HAY, GEORGE, judge of the United States court for the eastern district of Virginia, and for many years attorney of the United States, in which capacity he was the prosecutor of Aaron Burr. He d. 1830. His political writings, signed Hortensius, gave him some celebrity. He wrote also a "Treatise against the Usury Laws," "The Life of John Thompson," and a "Treatise on Emigration."

HAYDN, JOSEPH, an eminent German musician, was b. 1732, in the village of Rohron, on the borders of Hungary and Austria. He was the son of a poor wheelwright, who, having a taste for music, played the harp on Sundays, his mother accompanying with her voice; a circumstance which accounts for the strong predilection which their son showed for the science even in his infancy. When but eight years old he became a chorister in St. Stephen's, and at ten years of age composed pieces for several voices. With his fine soprano he lost his place, and his situation was very discouraging; but he had the good fortune to become acquainted with Prince Esterhazy, who placed him at the head of his private chapel. For this prince he composed some beautiful symphonies—a department in which he excelled all other composers—and the greatest part of his fine quartettes. When, after a period of about 20 years, the prince reduced his court, and Haydn was discharged, he went to London, to which capital he had often been invited. In 1794, having made a second journey thither, he found a most splendid reception, and the university of Oxford conferred upon him the degree of doctor of music. On his return from England, he purchased a small house and garden in one of the suburbs of Vienna, where he died. To the English public he is universally known by his noble oratorio of the "Creation," which is considered a chef-d'œuvre. D. 1809.

HAYDON, BENJAMIN ROBERT, an historical painter of distinguished merit, was b. at Plymouth, 1786. He commenced his studies at the royal academy in 1804. His first picture was exhibited in 1807; the subject of it, "Joseph and Mary resting with our Saviour after a day's journey on the road to Egypt." His second great work, "Dentatus," was exhibited in 1809, and in the following year it obtained the great prize at the Royal Institution. His "Judgment of Solomon" appeared next. He went, accompanied by Wilkie, to Paris, in 1814, to study at the Louvre, and on his return commenced his largest work, "Christ entering into Jerusalem." This picture was exhibited in 1820, both in London and Edinburgh, and was considered a triumph of modern art. But with his acknowledged powers, he disdained to follow the more certain path to fame and fortune. He became poor and discouraged, and died by his own hand in 1846.

HAYES, CHARLES, a mathematician, b. 1578. He published a "Treatise on Fluxions," and some other mathematical pieces, besides several works of a theological nature. D. 1760.

HAYLEY, WILLIAM, an English poet, was b. at Chichester, 1745. After quitting Trinity college, Cambridge, he settled at Earham, in Sussex, and devoted his time principally to literature. He was the author of an "Essay on History, in Three poetical Epistles to Edward Gibbon," "Triumphs of Temper," "Essays on Painting and Sculpture," a prose "Essay on Old Maids," and lastly, "The Life and Correspondence of the Poet Cowper." D. 1820.

HAYNE, ISAAC, a colonel in the American army, and a martyr to the cause of independence, was descended from a highly respectable family in South Carolina. After the capitulation of Charleston, he consented to subscribe a declaration of his allegiance to the king of Great Britain, provided he might not be compelled to bear arms against his countrymen. He was summoned, however, after the successes of Greene had changed the face of affairs, to repair immediately to the British standard. This he refused, as a violation of the compact he had entered into, and hastened to the American camp. Being shortly after taken prisoner by the English, he was tried, and condemned to be hanged. This cruel sentence, notwithstanding the mitigating circumstances of the case, was accordingly put into execution, Aug. 4, 1781.

HAYS, JACOB, a noted constable and thief-taker, of the city of New York, who was appointed by Edward Livingston in 1801, and discharged the duties of his office till the day of his death, in 1850. His natural qualifications for the place were remarkable; he never forgot a man that he had seen, and his courage as well as ingenuity in catching offenders made him a terror to evil-doers. B. 1772; d. 1850.

HAYWOOD, ELIZABETH, an ingenious writer, was b. in London, 1693, and d. 1756. She published the "Female Spectator," "Epistles for the Ladies," "Fortunate Foundling," "Adventures of Nature," &c.

HAZARD, EBENEZER, postmaster-general of the United States, was a native of Philadelphia, and graduated at Princeton college in 1762. In 1782 he succeeded Mr. Bache as postmaster, and continued in office until the adoption of the constitution in 1789. He published a valuable work in reference to American history, which is often quoted, namely, "Historical Collections," also "Remarks on a Report concerning the Western Indians." D. 1817.

HAZLITT, WILLIAM, a distinguished critic and essayist, was the son of a dissenting minister, and educated at the Unitarian college at Hackney. He began life as an artist; but though he always preserved an intense love for the arts, he soon relinquished the pencil for the pen; and when he was not borne away by violent prejudices, he appeared as one of the most able, powerful, and judicious critics of the day. Besides being a constant contributor for many years to the "Morning Chronicle" and "Examiner" newspapers, he occasionally wrote in others. Among the most popular of his writings are several volumes collected from periodical works, under the titles of "Table Talk," "The Spirit of the Age," and "The Plain Speaker." The largest and most elaborate, though not the most successful of his works, is the "Life of Napoleon." His "Characters of Shakspeare's Plays," attracted much notice; as did also his "View of the English Stage," "Political Essays and Sketches of Public Characters," "The Literature of the Elizabethan Age," "The Modern Pygmalion," &c. His last work was a very interesting volume, entitled "Conversations of James Northcote, esq., R. A." D. 1830.

HEATH, CHARLES, an eminent line engraver, was b. 1784. His taste for art was fostered and matured by his father, James Heath, a name well known to the print collector; and his serial artistic publications, the "Book of Beauty" and the "Keepsake," &c., for many years kept his name before the world as one of the first English engravers, besides exercising a marked influence over that department of the arts. D. 1848.—WILLIAM, major-general in the American revolutionary army, was a native of Roxbury, Mass. In 1775 he was appointed provincial brigadier, and also brigadier of the United States, June 22, and Aug. 9, 1776, major-general. When the army removed to New York, he commanded near King's-bridge. In 1777 he was intrusted with the command of the eastern department near Boston, and the prisoners of Saratoga fell under his care. In June, 1779, he returned to the main army, and commanded the troops on the Hudson, and in that station, for the most part, he remained until the close of the war. He was the last surviving American major-general of the war. He published a volume, which for a time, had great notoriety, entitled, "Heath's Memoirs." D. 1814.—JAMES, an historical writer during the reigns of Charles I. and II. He wrote "A Chronicle of the late War," "The Glories and Triumphs of the Restoration of Charles II.," "Flagellum, or the Life and Death of Oliver Cromwell." &c. D. 1664.

HEATHCOTE, RALPH, a clergyman of the church of England, to whom the merit is due of being the projector of the "General Biographical Dictionary." He was also the author of "The Irenarch, or Justice of the Peace's Manual," "Sylva, or the Wood," "A Sketch of Lord Bolingbroke's Philosophy," and other polemical works; which caused his introduction to Dr. Warburton, who nominated him his assistant preacher at Lincoln's Inn. He subsequently obtained higher church preferments. D. 1795.

HEBER, REGINALD, bishop of Calcutta, was b. at Malpas, Cheshire, 1783. He entered a student at Brazenose college, Oxford, in 1800, and, 3 years after, carried the English prize for his beautiful poem, "Palestine." From 1803 to 1822, he spent his time in discharging the duties of a parish priest; during which he published some elegant poems, and the life of Jeremy Taylor. He was then elected preacher at Lincoln's Inn. On the death of Dr. Middleton, the bishopric of Calcutta was offered to Mr. Heber, and on the 16th of June, with his wife and infant daughter, he embarked for India. On the 11th of October he reached his destination, and found constant occupation in the important exercise of his official duties. In 1826

he took a journey in the discharge of his episcopal duty, to Trichinopoly, where he arrived on the 1st of April, 1826. The next day he was seized with an apoplectic fit, whilst bathing, which terminated his valuable life. Since his death, a "Narrative of a Journey through the Upper Provinces of India," has appeared, and his widow has also published his biography.

HEBERT, JAMES RENE, commonly called Père Duchêne, (from the title of a Jacobin paper of which he was the editor,) was b. at Alençon, 1755. He was one of the most violent advocates for the French revolution. Having dared to oppose his colleagues and masters, they accomplished his destruction. At the place of his execution, contempt and insult were added to the severity of his sufferings, and he d. amid the hisses of the populace, on the 24th March, 1794.

HECKWELDER, JOHN, many years employed by the Moravian brethren as a missionary to the Delaware Indians, was a native of England. In 1819 he published, at Philadelphia, "A History of the Manners and Customs of the Indian Nations who once inhabited Pennsylvania;" and, in 1820, a "Narrative of the Moravian Mission among the Delaware Indians, &c., from 1740 to 1808." He d. at Bethlehem, 1823, aged 78.

HEDLINGER, JOHN CHARLES, the most celebrated die-cutter of his age, was b. at Schweitz, 1691. Many crowned heads, among whom were Charles XII. of Sweden, Peter the Great, and Pope Benedict XIII., honored him with their patronage. He frequently visited Sweden, and on his last voyage from that country, in 1745, he lost the greater part of his property by shipwreck. His works are distinguished by great simplicity, softness, and correctness of design. D. 1771.

HEEREN, ARNOLD HERMANN LUDWIG, a distinguished German historian, was b. near Bremen, 1760; studied at Gottingen; and after spending some years in foreign travel, returned to Gottingen in 1787, when he was appointed professor, and thenceforward devoted himself to the composition of those numerous works which have placed him among the first historians of his age. His chief works are, "Ideen über die Politik den Verkehr, &c., der vornehmsten Völker der alten Welt," "Handbuch der Geschichte der Staaten des Alterthums," "Handbuch der Europäischen Staaten-system," &c. D. 1842.

HEGEL, GEORGE WILLIAM FREDERICO,

the founder of a new school of philosophy, was b. at Stuttgart, 1770. He was professor successively at Jena, Heidelberg, and Berlin. He was at first the disciple of Schelling, with whom he was associated in the conduct of a philosophical journal in 1802-3. But his opinions gradually took a different turn. He rejected Schelling's intellectual intuition as an unwarrantable assumption, although he continued to maintain its leading idea. His system is at present the centre of nearly all philosophical interest in Germany, chiefly from the widely discrepant deductions, political and religious, which his friends and enemies draw from it; some maintaining it to be favorable to the present order of things in church and state, others founding upon it conclusions at variance with all ordinary notions of religion or morality. D. of cholera, 1831.

HEIDEGGER, JOHN JAMES, a very extraordinary character, by birth a Swiss, who took up his residence in London, in 1660, and, obtaining a commission in the guards, was known in fashionable society by the appellation of the Swiss count. He undertook the management of the opera house, and in his conduct of that establishment was very fortunate; added to which, by giving concerts, masquerades, &c., under the patronage of the court, he gained a handsome income, which he expended in keeping a hospitable table, and relieving the unfortunate. D. 1749, aged 90.

HEINE, HEINRICH, a German poet and miscellaneous writer, was b. at Dusseldorf, 1797, and studied at Bonn, Göttingen, and Berlin, with the view of embracing a legal career; but his temper and turn of mind rendered a residence in Germany distasteful, and he repaired to Paris about 1820, where he continued thenceforward principally to reside. His works comprise two plays, political pamphlets and satires, views of French society, &c.; but his fame chiefly depends on his poems and the "Reisebilder," which, though often deformed by a spirit of rallery and satire that knows no bounds, are full of grace, tenderness, and artless ease. D. 1856.

HEINECCIUS, JOHN GOTLIEB, a celebrated civilian, b. at Ersenburg, in Altenburg, in 1681. After having studied at Goslar and Leipsic, he became professor of philosophy at Halle, 1710; and in 1711 he was made professor of civil law, with the title of counsellor of the court. His great reputation induced the states of Friesland to invite him to Franecker, in 1724; but in 1727, the king of Prussia prevailed on him to accept of a professorship of law at Frankfort-on-the-Oder, where he distinguished himself till 1733. Becoming again professor at Halle, he remained there till his death in 1741, though invited to Marburg, Denmark, and Holland.

HEINECKEN, CHRISTIAN HENRY, an extraordinary child, b. at Lubeck, in 1721. So astounding is the account which is related of this mental phenomenon, that notwithstanding it is supported by the most powerful evidence, it still exceeds credibility. He spoke fluently at ten months old; at twelve he could recite the principal facts in the Pentateuch; in two months more he was master of the entire history of the Old and New Testaments; at two years and a half, he answered the principal questions in geography, and in ancient and modern history; and he spoke Latin and French with great facility before he had reached his fourth year. He died in his fifth year.

HEINSIUS, DANIEL, professor of politics and history at Leyden, and librarian to the university, was b. at Ghent, 1580. He became a pupil of Joseph Scaliger at Leyden, and was greatly indebted to him for the eminence to which he attained in literature. He distinguished himself as a critic by his labors on many classical authors, and was highly honored at home and abroad. Gustavus Adolphus gave him a place among his counsellors of state; the republic of Venice made him a knight of the order of St. Mark; and Pope Urban VIII. invited him to come, as he expressed it, to rescue Rome from barbarism. D. 1666.—NICHOLAS, the son of Daniel, was b. at Leyden, and became as great a Latin poet as his father, and a still greater critic. D. 1681.

HELMONT, JOHN BAPTIST VAN, a celebrated chemist, was b. at Brussels, in 1577. His first literary production was a treatise on the Spa waters, which is remarkable on account of the author having used the German word geist, answering to the English ghost, or spirit, to denote the air on which the properties of the Spa water depend, and from which is derived the modern word gas, now so extensively used. In 1609 he settled at Vilvorden, where he practised medicine gratuitously, and is said to have performed some very wonderful cures. He professed to disregard all book-learning on the healing art; and had he lived at the present day, would have been styled an impudent quack; but though his works abound with crude and visionary dogmas, they contain also many observations on the Galenical system, which are shrewd and pertinent. D. 1644.—FRANCIS MERCURY VAN, Baron, son of the preceding, was b. at Vilvorden, in 1618, and there practised as a physician and experimental chemist. If the father be charged with eccentricity or quackery, the son has a tenfold right to both qualities; yet that he was a man of talent none have denied. He travelled over a part of Europe with a caravan of Bohemians, (a gang of gipsies,) to learn their language and opinions; pretended to have discovered the original language of man; and had the impudence to affirm that a child born deaf and dumb would be able to articulate the characters at first sight. He professed to believe in the doctrine of transmigration, in the existence of the philosopher's stone, and other theories no less wild and visionary. D. 1699.

HELOISE, or ELOISE, celebrated for her beauty and wit, but still more on account of her love for Abelard, was b. at Paris in 1101, and d. in 1164.

HELST, BARTHOLOMEW VAN DER, an admirable Dutch painter, excelling in portraits, but also great in landscapes and historical subjects. B. at Haarlem, 1613; d. 1670.

HELVETIUS, ADRIAN, a Dutch physician, who being at Paris while the dysentery was raging in that city, successfully arrested its progress by administering a remedy. Being ordered by Louis XIV. to make it public, he declared it to be ipecaquanha, and was rewarded with 1000 louis d'ors, and made inspector of the military hospitals. B. 1656; d. 1721.—JOHN CLAUDE, son of the preceding, was also a physician, and a man of great skill in his profession. He cured Louis XV. of a dangerous disorder in his infancy, and became first physician to the queen, and counsellor of state. He was the author of several able works, and a member of the Academy of Sciences, &c. D. 1755.—CLAUDE ADRIEN, son of the last mentioned, was b. at Paris in 1715, and, at the age of 23, obtained the post of a farmer-general; but resigned it, and afterwards purchased the place of maitre-d'hôtel to the queen. In 1758 he published "De l'Esprit," the materialism of which drew upon him many attacks, and it was condemned by the parliament of Paris.

The book, however, obtained a rapid celebrity, though its author found it necessary to insure his personal safety by withdrawing for a time, first to England, and afterwards to Prussia. He at length returned to France, and led a retired and domestic life on his estate at Vore, till his death, which happened in 1771. A posthumous work, entitled "De l'Homme," is a continuation of the former treatise, and contains a fuller development of the doctrines laid down in it; but, at the same time, many new ones, particularly such as relate to the science of education.

HELWIG, AMELIA VON, a distinguished female poet of Germany, b. at Weimar, in 1776. Her father travelled in France, England, and Holland; and, at a very early age, she discovered a remarkable aptitude in learning, not only the modern languages, but Greek, while her poetical talents were at the same time successfully cultivated. Among a host of literary characters, whose friendship she obtained, and from whom she derived much valuable instruction, were Schiller and Goethe. D. 1832.

HEMANS, FELICIA DOROTHEA, an amiable and highly accomplished poetess, was b. at Liverpool, of respectable parents of the name of Browne, who subsequently took up their residence near St. Asaph, Wales. She married young; but her marriage was infelicitous, and, after the birth of five children, her husband estranged himself from her society, and a permanent separation ensued. From childhood she had an ardent thirst for knowledge, and her reading was extensive and varied. Her imagination was rich, chaste, and glowing; and though some of her earlier poems may be deemed rather monotonous, her "Records of Woman" and "Forest Sanctuary" are poems of a high order. After her establishment at St. Asaph was broken up, she retired to Vavertree, near Liverpool, but remained about three years only, when she settled in Dublin, where she d. on the 16th of May, 1835, in the 41st year of her age. Besides the two works before mentioned, Mrs. Hemans wrote "Wallace," "Dartmoor," "Dramatic Scenes," "Welsh Melodies," "The Siege of Valencia," "Songs of the Affections," "National Lyrics and Songs for Music," "Scenes and Hymns of Life," "The Vespers of Palermo," a tragedy, and a variety of scattered lyrics, in the "New Monthly" and "Blackwood's" magazines.

HEMSTERHUYS, TIBERIUS, a celebrated Dutch philologist, was the son of a physician, and b. at Groningen, in 1685. In 1705 he became professor of mathematics and philosophy at Amsterdam, where he applied himself so zealously to the Greek authors, that he may justly be said to have been the most profound Hellenist of the age. Hemsterhuys had no taint of pride or dogmatism, but was remarkable for his modesty and mildness of character. D. 1756.—FRANCIS, his son, inherited his classical acquirements, and was, moreover, an acute philosopher, and a critical judge of the fine arts. B. 1720; d. 1790.

HENAULT, CHARLES JOHN FRANCIS, an eminent French writer, was president of the parliament of Paris, where he was b. in 1685. He became president of the first chamber of inquests in 1710, which led him to make the Roman law his study, though he still amused himself with poetry, and, in 1713, produced his tragedy of "Cornelia." In 1723 he obtained a place in the French Academy, after which he set himself to digest into a chronological order the history of France. This work appeared in 1744, and has been translated into most European languages. He also wrote three comedies, and after his death appeared a work of his, entitled "Histoire Critique de l'Établissement des François dans les Gaules." He was intimately connected with madame du Deffand, and from his rank, as well as his talents, he held a distinguished station among the literati of Paris. D. 1770.—JOHN D^r, a French poet, was b. at Paris. After travelling into several countries, he returned to France, and was patronized by Fouquet. His works were printed at Paris, in a small volume, in 1670; besides which he translated part of Lucretius, but was persuaded by his confessor, when at the point of death, to throw it into the fire.

HENDERSON, JOHN, a first-rate actor, was b. in London, in 1747. He acquired great celebrity at Drury-lane theatre in Shakspeare's characters, where he performed Falstaff, Richard III., &c., with unbounded applause. D. 1785.

HENGIST, the first Saxon king of Kent, who, with his brother Horsa, landed an army at the mouth of the Thames, and eventually subjugated the Britons. The kingdom of Kent, founded by Hengist, embraced that tract which is now known as the counties of Kent, Middlesex, Essex, and part of Surrey. He established his residence at Canterbury, and d. about the year 488, leaving his kingdom to his posterity.

HENLEY, ANTHONY, an ingenious writer, cotemporary with Steele and Addison, and who contributed to the "Tattler," and other works. He was b. at the Grange, in Hampshire, the seat of his father, Sir Robert Henley, became M.P. for Andover, and d. in 1711.—ROBERT, lord chancellor Northington, third son of the preceding, was b. in 1708, educated at Westminster school, and Christ-church and St. John's college, Oxford; became lord keeper in 1757, and raised to the peerage in 1760, when he presided at the trials of Earl Ferrers and Lord Byron; resigned the great seal in 1766, and d. in 1772.—JOHN, familiarly known by the appellation of "Orator Henley," was b. at Melton Mowbray, 1692. He was educated at Cambridge, and entered into holy orders; but being dissatisfied with his prospects of church preferment, he commenced public orator. Having opened a chapel in London, he gave lectures on theological subjects on Sundays, and on other subjects every Wednesday. Novelty procured him a multitude of hearers; but he was too imprudent to gain any permanent advantage by it; he became the butt of wits and caricaturists, and he gradually sunk into obscurity. D. 1756.

HENRIETTA, ANNA, of England, duchess of Orleans, the daughter of King Charles I., was b. at Exeter, in 1644, amid the turbulent scenes of the civil war. Her unhappy mother fled with her to France when the infant was scarcely three weeks old; and after the death of the king she repaired to the convent of Chaillot, and there devoted herself to the education of her daughter. She united with great sweetness of character the charms of beauty, and was married to Philip, duke of Orleans. D. 1630.

HENRY I., of Germany, surnamed "the Fowler," was the son of Otho the Illustrious, duke of Saxony and Thuringia, and b. in 876. When he was elected sovereign of Germany, in 919, he had to contend with anarchy at home and enemies abroad, but his activity and prudence overcame them all. After a fortunate and glorious reign of sixteen years, he d. at Quedlinburgh, in 936.—III., of Germany, son of the Emperor Conrad II., succeeded his father in the imperial dignity, 1039. Nature had given him the talents, and education the character, suitable for an able ruler. In every thing he undertook, he displayed a steady and persevering spirit: the clergy were compelled to acknowledge their dependence on him, and the temporal lords he held in actual subjection. B. 1017; d. 1056.—IV., son of the preceding, was b. in 1050, and at the death of his father was only five years old. His disputes with Pope Gregory VII., who had been elevated to the papal chair without the consent of the imperial court, embroiled him in a series of wars, and caused him to be excommunicated. His eldest son, Conrad, rebelled against him, but was overcome, and died at Florence in 1101, deserted by his partisans. He then caused his second son, Henry, to be elected his successor, and crowned; but the latter also rebelled, and making himself master of his father's person in 1105, by stratagem, compelled him to abdicate the throne. Henry IV. ended his life and sorrows in neglect, at Liege, in 1106.—V., emperor of Germany, the son and successor of the preceding, and who had made himself notorious by his conspiracy against his father, was b. 1081. In 1111 he married Matilda, the daughter of Henry I., king of England, and the rich dowry he received with this princess, gave him the means of undertaking an expedition over the Alps, in order to demand the imperial crown from the pope in Rome. He caused the pope to be conveyed away from the altar, while at mass, and cut down, in the streets of Rome, all who opposed him. D. 1125.—VII., was the first German emperor who was chosen solely by the electors, without the interference of the other states of the empire. He undertook an expedition to Italy, and compelled the Milanese to crown him king of Lombardy. He then suppressed by force a revolt which had broken out in Upper Italy; took several cities by storm; and, having captured Rome, he was crowned Roman emperor by two cardinals, while in the streets the work of murder and pillage was still going on. D. 1313.—THE LION, the most remarkable prince of Germany in the 12th century, was b. in 1129, and assumed the government of Saxony in 1146.—DE BLOIS, bishop of Winchester, nephew of William Rufus, and brother of King Stephen, was an active prelate and a bold, ambitious, and enterprising statesman. When England was invaded by the partisans of the Empress Matilda, he at first joined her standard, but subsequently deserted it, and became her most determined enemy. The empress queen and her followers having taken refuge in the castle of Winchester, he laid siege to it, set the city on fire, and consumed twenty churches, a number of religious houses, and many other buildings. He is now remembered chiefly as the founder of the hospital of St. Cross, near Winchester, the church of which is regarded by many antiquaries as furnishing the model of the distinguishing features of the Gothic or pointed style of architecture. D. 1171.—THE NAVIGATOR, the fourth son of John I., king of Portugal, was b. 1394. He gave early proof of brilliant courage, but his love of arms was surpassed by his love of the sciences, particularly mathematics, astronomy, and navigation. He was the first who applied the compass to navigation; and to him also a principal part is ascribed in the invention of the astrolabe. Various expeditions were undertaken, and discoveries made, under his patronage and at his expense; but, at length, companies were formed of enterprising men, who were tempted with the prospect of obtaining gold dust, and the whole people became animated with the love of discovery. In 1446 Nunno Tristan doubled Cape Verde; and, two years later, Gonzalo Vallo discovered three of the Azores islands, about 1000 miles from the continent. Henry continued these efforts till his death, in 1463, and thus secured for himself an undying name as the patron and friend of navigation.—IV., called THE GREAT, king of France and Navarre, was b. in 1553, at Pau, in Béarn. His father, Anthony of Bourbon, was descended from a son of Louis IX.; his mother was Jeanne d'Albret, daughter of Henry, king of Navarre. He was brought up in the simple and hardy manner of the peasantry of Béarn, and this laid the foundation of a vigorous constitution and temperate habits. He was placed under the tuition of Florent Chretien, a learned man and zealous Protestant. In 1599 he accompanied his mother to Rochelle, and learned the art of war under Admiral Coligni. Having assumed the title of "King of Navarre," his marriage took place, Aug. 18, 1572. Then followed the horrible scenes of St. Bartholomew, Aug. 24th. The Catholics, in 1585, formed the celebrated league, which the king was obliged to confirm; and when called, by right of birth, to the French throne, he found innumerable difficulties in establishing his claims. His Protestant religion was brought forward to prejudice the Catholics against him. After a protracted and obstinate struggle, convinced that he should never enjoy quiet possession of the French throne without professing the Catholic faith, Henry at length yielded to the wishes of his friends, was instructed in the doctrines of the Catholic church, and professed the Catholic faith, July 25, 1593, in the church of St. Denys. He happily escaped an attempt to assassinate him; was solemnly anointed king at Chartres, in 1594; and entered the capital amid the acclamations of the people. He made use of the tranquillity which followed, to restore the internal prosperity of his kingdom, and particularly the wasted finances; and in this design he was highly successful, with the aid of his prime minister Sully. To his former brothers in faith and in arms, the Protestants, he granted entire religious freedom and political security, by the edict of Nantes, in 1598. In 1610, while riding through the streets of Paris, his coach was obstructed in the street de la Ferronnerie, by two wagons. A fanatic, named Ravallae, took advantage of this moment to perpetrate a long-meditated deed; and he received a fatal stab from the hand of this assassin, in the 52d year of his age, and 22d of his reign.—I., king of England, called, on account of his learning, "Beauderc," was the youngest son of William the Conqueror, b. in 1068, and succeeded his brother Rufus in 1100. He restored the university of Cambridge, forgave all debts owing to the crown prior to his accession, reformed the court, and conquered Wales. He abolished the curfew-bell, established a standard for weights and measures, and signed the charter, which proved the origin of the English liberties. D. 1135.—II., king of England, the son of Geoffrey Plantagenet and Mand, empress of Germany, was b. in Normandy, in 1132, and succeeded Stephen in 1154. He added the provinces of Anjou, Touraine, Maine, Poitou, Saintonge, Guienne, and Gascony, to the English crown. His reign was troubled by disputes between him and Becket, archbishop of Canterbury, who being murdered in 1170, the pope obliged the king to undergo penance for it at Becket's tomb at Canterbury. In 1170 he caused his eldest son, Henry, to be crowned king of England. In 1172 he conquered Ireland, and, the year fol-owing, his sons rebelled against him. Henry checked the prevailing licentiousness by severe laws, partitioned England into four judiciary districts, and appointed itinerant justices to make regular excursions through them. He revived trial by jury, discouraged that by combat, and demolished all the newly erected castles, as shelters of violence and anarchy. D. 1189.—III., king of England, surnamed of Winchester, on account of his having been b. in that city, succeeded his father, John, in 1215. He was obliged to relinquish Normandy, Anjou, Poitou, Touraine, and Maine to the king of France; after which a civil war broke out in England, and the king was taken prisoner by the barons, at the head of whom was Simon de Montfort, earl of Leicester. The tide of affairs turning in his favor, he deprived several of these lords of their estates, and gave them to his friends. B. 1207; d. 1272.—IV., king of England, surnamed Bolingbroke, was b. in 1367. He was the son of John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, the third son of Edward III. In the reign of Richard II. he was made earl of Derby and duke of Hereford. Having accused the duke of Norfolk of treason, the latter challenged him to single combat; but on the appearance of the two champions, at the appointed time and place, Richard would not suffer them to proceed. Both were banished the kingdom, Norfolk for life, and Hereford for a term of years. On the death of his father he succeeded to the dukedom of Lancaster; and, returning before the stated time, for the avowed object of claiming his duchy, and having been joined by the earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, soon found himself at the head of 60,000 men. Richard II. was defeated, taken prisoner, and deposed; and the duke was unanimously declared king, under the title of Henry IV. This usurpation gave rise to the civil war between the houses of York and Lancaster. D. 1413.—V., king of England, called, after his birthplace, of Monmouth, was b. in 1388. His dissipated habits while a prince gave his father great uneasiness; but he frequently displayed noble traits of character, and on ascending the throne he cast off his former companions, and justified the best expectations. France being at the time torn asunder by the opposing factions of the dukes of Orleans and Burgundy, Henry took the favorable opportunity of reviving the claims of his predecessors upon that country, and he landed an army at Harfleur, Aug. 14, 1415. With 15,000 men he gained the battle of Agincourt, though the French amounted to 52,000. He then returned to England; but three years afterwards he went again to France, espoused the Princess Catharine, on condition that the French crown should go to Henry and his heirs on the death of the king of France, and be inseparably united to the crown of England. D. 1422.—VI., king of England, son of the preceding, was b. at Windsor, in 1421, and was but ten months old at the death of his father. His grandfather, Charles, king of France, died soon after, and the duke of Orleans, encouraged by the minority of Henry, assumed the title of king by the name of Charles VII. When only nine years old, Henry was crowned at Paris, and the great duke of Bedford, his uncle and guardian, obtained several important victories. But the raising of the siege of Orleans by Joan of Arc gave a new turn to affairs, and the English interest declined. The death of the duke of Bedford was a fatal blow to the cause of Henry, and at length the English were deprived of their possessions in France, except the town of Calais. The insurrection of Cade followed. To add to his misfortunes, the York party in England prevailed, and Henry was sent to the Tower, where, according to the prevailing opinion, he was slain by Richard, duke of Gloucester, in 1471.—VII., king of England, first sovereign of the race of Tudor, was b. 1457. He was the son of Edmund, earl of Richmond, and of Margaret of the house of Lancaster. By the assistance of the duke of Brittany he landed in Wales, and laid claim to the crown in 1485. The people, disgusted at the cruelties of Richard III., joined him in such numbers that he was enabled to give the usurper battle at Bosworth field, where Richard was slain, and Henry crowned on the spot. He reigned 24 years, and d. 1509.—VIII., king of England, was b. in 1491, and succeeded his father at the age of 18. The Emperor Maximilian and the Pope Julius II., having leagued against France, persuaded Henry to join them, and he in consequence invaded that kingdom, where he made some conquests. About the same time James IV., king of Scotland, invaded England, but was defeated and slain at Flodden Field. When Luther commenced the reformation in Germany, Henry wrote a book against him, for which he was complimented by the pope with the title of Defender of the Faith. Having conceived an affection for Anne Boleyn, he determined to divorce his wife Catharine of Aragon, to whom he had been married 18 years. But on the divorce being refused by the pope, Henry assumed the title of supreme head of the English church, put down the monasteries, and alienated their possessions to secular purposes. His marriage with Anne Boleyn followed; but afterwards he brought her to the scaffold, and married Lady Jane Seymour, who died in childbed. He next married Anne of Cleves; but she not proving agreeable to his expectations, he put her away, and caused Cromwell, earl of Essex, the projector of the match, to be beheaded. His next wife was Catharine Howard, who was beheaded for adultery; after which he espoused Catharine Parr, who survived him. D. 1546.—CHARLES, a gentleman distinguished for his chemical knowledge and scientific pursuits, was the son of an eminent manufacturing chemist at Manchester, and b. in 1775. Though intended for the medical profession, he relinquished it for the sake of co-operating in his father's lucrative pursuits, which he afterwards carried on. D. 1836.—MATTHEW, a non-conformist divine, was b. in 1662. He was educated by his father, Philip Henry, an eminent Presbyterian divine; studied the law in Gray's Inn, but renounced it for the ministry, and settled at Hackney. His chief work is an "Exposition of the Bible;" besides which he wrote a "Method of Prayer," a "Discourse on the Lord's Supper," and other books of practical divinity. D. 1714.—ROBERT, minister of one of the churches in Edinburgh, and author of "The History of Great Britain," was b. at St. Ninian's, near Stirling, in 1718, and d. in 1790.—PATRICK, an American orator and statesman, was b. in Virginia in 1736, and after receiving a common school education, and spending some time in trade and agriculture, commenced the practice of the law, after only six weeks of preparatory study. After several years of poverty, with the incumbrance of a family, he first rose to distinction in managing the popular cause in the controversy between the legislature and the clergy, touching the stipend which was claimed by the latter. In 1765 he was elected a member of the house of burgesses, with express reference to an opposition to the British stamp act. In this assembly he obtained the honor of being the first to commence the opposition to the measures of the British government, which terminated in the revolution. He was one of the delegates sent by Virginia to the first general congress of the colonies, in 1774, and in that body distinguished himself by his boldness and eloquence. In 1776 he was appointed the first governor of the commonwealth, and to this office was repeatedly re-elected. In 1786 he was appointed by the legislature one of the deputies to the convention held at Philadelphia, for the purpose of revising the federal constitution. In 1788 he was a member of the convention, which met in Virginia to consider the constitution of the United States, and exerted himself strenuously against its adoption. In 1794 he retired from the bar, and d. in 1799. Without extensive information upon legal or political topics, he was a natural orator of the highest order, possessing great powers of imagination, sarcasm, and humor, united with great force and energy of manner, and a deep knowledge of human nature.

HENRYSON, ROBERT, a Scotch poet in the 16th century, was schoolmaster at Dumfermline, and a monk of the Benedictine order. His "Fables" were printed at Edinburgh in 1621; and his "Testament of Faire Creseide" in 1598. He wrote a number of other pieces, which are to be found in the collections of Hailes, Pinkerton, &c.

HEPBURN, ROBERT, a miscellaneous writer, was b. in Scotland, in 1690. At the age of 21 he published, in 30 numbers, a series of essays, entitled "The Tattler, by Hector Macstaff, of the North." He studied the civil law in Holland, and became a member of the faculty of advocates at Edinburgh, where he d. 1712.

HERACLITUS, the founder of a philosophical sect, was b. at Ephesus, and flourished in the 69th Olympiad, about 500 B. C. He incorporated the mysteries of the Pythagorean system into his own, which was exceedingly severe and obscure. Being of a misanthropic turn, whence he is said to have wept at the follies of mankind, he retired to a mountainous region, where he lived upon roots and herbs; but being attacked by a fatal disease, was obliged to return to the city, and soon afterwards d., in the 60th year of his age.

HERAULT DE SEHELLES, MARIE JEAN, advocate-general in the parliament of Paris under the old regime, and afterwards a member of the national convention, was b. at Paris, in 1760. He chiefly distinguished himself in the contest between the Mountain and Gironde parties, and he powerfully co-operated in the destruction of the latter; but all his services to the terrorists did not save him from the scaffold; he was executed with Danton, in 1795.

HERBELOT, BARTHOLOMEW D', a learned orientalist, was b. at Paris, in 1625. After travelling twice into Italy, in search of Eastern manuscripts, and to converse with oriental travellers, with a view to the elucidation of the Hebrew Scriptures, he was appointed regius professor of Syriac in the French capital, and granted a pension. He was the author of "The Oriental Library," and other able works. D. 1695.

HERBERT, EDWARD, lord of CHERBURY, was b. in 1581, at Montgomery castle; was sent, when only 12 years old, to University college, Oxford; was made a knight of the Bath, soon after the accession of James I.; and shortly after travelled on the Continent, where his elegant manners and chivalric accomplishments attracted the greatest notice. He served in the Netherlands in 1610 and 1614, distinguishing himself by his romantic bravery; was twice ambassador to France, and on his return, in 1625, was created an Irish peer, and afterwards an English baron. He espoused the parliamentary cause during the civil wars, but quitted it, and d. 1648. His principal work is entitled "De Veritate," the object of which was to assert the sufficiency and perfection of natural religion, with a view to prove the uselessness of revelation. He also wrote "De Religione Laici," his own "Memoirs," a "Life of Henry VIII.," &c.—GEORGE, a brother of the preceding, was distinguished as a poet and a divine. He was b. in 1593; educated at Westminster school, and at Trinity college, Cambridge; and became rector of Bemerton, Wilts; where he d. in 1632. He was a man of exemplary piety and benevolence, and a poet of no mean rank.—WILLIAM, earl of Pembroke, a poet and the patron of learned men, was b. in 1580, at Wilton house, the family seat. He was educated at New college, Oxford; and in 1626 was elected chancellor of that university, to which he was a liberal benefactor through life, and bequeathed to it at his death a valuable collection of manuscripts. D. 1630.—Sir THOMAS, a descendant of one of the branches of the Pembroke family, was the son of an alderman at York. After receiving his education at Oxford, he travelled for 4 years in Asia and Africa, of which he published an account. On the breaking out of the civil wars he sided with the parliament; but having been appointed to attend upon Charles in his captivity, he became warmly attached to him, and proved himself a zealous and incorruptible servant to him up to the hour of his execution. He assisted Dugdale in his "Monasticon Anglicanum," and published an account of the last two years of the life of King Charles, under the title of "Threnodia Carolina." D. 1682.

HERDER, JOHN GODFREY VON, a classical German writer, and philosopher, was b. in 1744, of poor parents, at Mohrungen, in Prussia; was educated for the church, and became court preacher, ecclesiastical counsellor, and vice-president of the consistory, to the duke of Saxe Weimar; and d. 1803. At the moment when he expired he was writing a hymn to the Deity, and the pen was found on the unfinished line. He was greatly esteemed by all who knew him, and looked upon as the Fenelon of Germany. His unrelaxing zeal and diligence penetrated the most various branches of science, theory, philosophy, philology, natural and civil history, and politics.

HERMAS, an ancient father of the Christian church, surnamed Pastor, or the Shepherd, who is said to be the same mentioned by St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Romans. He is supposed to have d. at Rome about the year 81. A piece of his, entitled "The Shepherd," is still extant, and was translated into English by Archbishop Wake.

HERMELIN, SAML. GUSTAVUS, Baron, a Swedish mineralogist, was b. in 1744, at Stockholm. After having travelled extensively, and paid particular attention to the statistics and geology of the countries which he visited, he settled in his native land, and for more than 50 years held the most eminent situations in the management of the Swedish mines. Hermelin wrote various works relative to the mineralogy, metallurgy, and resources of Sweden; and spent 15 years in perfecting the Swedish Atlas, a geographical undertaking of vast magnitude. D. 1820.

HERMES, TRISMEGISTUS, an Egyptian priest and philosopher, who, according to Diodorus, was the friend and counsellor of the great Osiris, and is said to have been the first lawgiver, and the founder of religious ceremonies among the Egyptians. He instructed his countrymen in the cultivation of the olive, the measurement of lands, and the knowledge of hieroglyphics, and to him are attributed all the mystic sciences of the Alexandrian school. But every thing relating to him is so uncertain and obscure, that even the time when, and the place where, he lived cannot be assigned with any certainty.

HERMILLY, VAQUETTE, D', a French historian, was b. at Amiens, in 1707, and d. at Paris, in 1778. He wrote the "History of Majorca and Minorca," and translated Ferrara's "History of Spain" and the "Critical Theatre" of Father Feijoo.

HERMOGENES, a rhetorician, b. at Tarsus, in Cilicia, lived about the middle of the 2d century, and is celebrated for the precocity and rapid extinction of his talents. At the age of 15, he was famous for his powers of oratory; at 17, he published his rhetoric; and, soon after, various treatises on oratory, which ranked him high among writers upon that subject; but, in his 25th year, he wholly lost his memory, and sank into a state of mental imbecility.

HERODOTUS, called by Cicero the "Father of History," was b. at Halicarnassus, in Caria, 484 B. C. and is the most ancient of the Greek historians whose works are extant.

HERRERA TORDESILLAS, ANTONIO DE, a Spanish historian, who wrote a "General History of India," which is a curious work. He also wrote a "General History of Spain." B. 1565; d. 1625.

HERRICK, ROBERT, an English poet of the 17th century. He received his education, first at St. John's college, and next at Trinity hall, Cambridge; after which he entered into orders, and obtained, in 1629, the vicarage of Dean Prior, in Devonshire. He was deprived of this living during Cromwell's usurpation, but recovered it at the restoration, and d. not long afterwards.

HERSCHEL, Sir WILLIAM, one of the most distinguished astronomers of modern times, was b. at Hanover, in 1738. His father, who was a musician, brought him up to his own profession, and, at the age of 14, he was placed in the band of the Hanoverian foot-guards. Towards the close of the seven years' war, when the French armies entered Hanover, young Herschel resolved to visit England, but not being able to obtain employment in London, he accepted a situation in the band of the Durham militia. When the regiment came to Doncaster, he formed an acquaintance with Dr. Miller, an eminent composer and organist of that town. It happened about this time that an organist was also wanted at Halifax, and, by the advice of the doctor, his young friend offered himself as a candidate for the place, and was successful. In 1766 he removed from Yorkshire to Bath, where he was chosen organist at the Octagon chapel, and leader of the orchestra at the public rooms. Although enthusiastically fond of music, he had for some time devoted his leisure hours to the study of mathematics and astronomy; and, in 1779, having constructed a telescope, and begun a regular survey of the heavens, star by star, he discovered, March 13th, 1781, a new primary planet, which he named the Georgium Sidus, in honor of George the Third. The same year he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, and had the gold medal awarded him for his discovery. After a long series of arduous and valuable labors, in 1802 he laid before the Royal Society a catalogue of 5000 new nebulae, nebulous stars, planetary nebulae, and clusters of stars, which he had discovered. He continued his astronomical observations till within a few years of his death, which took place in 1822.—CAROLINE LUCRETIA, sister of the above, and, like him, distinguished for her zeal in astronomical pursuits, was b. at Hanover, 1750. Having joined her brother at Bath, in 1771, she voluntarily undertook the arduous duties of his astronomical assistant, not only acting as his amanuensis, but executing the laborious numerical calculations necessary to render his discoveries available to science, and laboring in the cause of astronomy with an ardor and activity which neither the fatigue of the body, nor the inclemencies of the season, could exhaust. Her own observations were so numerous and important, that the Royal Society published them in one volume; and her "Zone Catalogue" was honored, in 1828, with the gold medal of the London Astronomical Society, of which she was also elected an honorary member. D. 1848.

HERVEY, JAMES, an English divine, was b. in 1714, at Hardingstone, near Northampton; and eventually succeeded his father, as rector of Weston Favell and Collingtree. His chief writings are, "Meditations and Contemplations," "Remarks on Lord Bolingbroke's Letters on the Study and Use of History," and "Theron and Aspasia; or, a Series of Dialogues and Letters on the most important Subjects." D. 1758.—

JOHN, Lord, second son of John, first earl of Bristol, was b. 1694. In 1720 he married Miss Lepell, so well known in Pope's letters and verses; in 1723 he succeeded to the title of Lord Hervey by the death of his elder brother; and in 1725 became member for Bury, when he attached himself to Sir Robert Walpole's party in opposition to Pulteney's, and was made vice-chamberlain in 1730, which he retained by court influence till 1740, when he became lord privy seal. From an early age, Lord Hervey took an active part in the literary and political contests of the day. His pamphlets in answer to the "Craftsman" involved him in a duel with Pulteney; his quarrel with Pope, which extended over many years, gave rise to some of the bitterest satirical sketches ever penned; and he carried on an active correspondence with Dr. Middleton regarding the mode of electing the Roman senate. His "Memoirs of the Reign of George II. from his Accession to the Death of Queen Caroline," after slumbering for a century in the chests of Ickworth, were published in 1848, with an interesting account of the author by John Wilson Croker. D. 1743.

HESIOD, a very ancient Greek poet, but whether a cotemporary with, or older or younger than, Homer is not agreed among the learned. The "Theogony" and "Works and Days" are the only undoubted pieces of this poet now extant.

HEWSON, WILLIAM, a celebrated anatomist and physiologist, was the son of a surgeon at Hexham, in Northumberland, where he was b. in 1739. In 1771 he obtained the Copleyan medal from the Royal Society, for his discoveries of the lymphatic system in birds and fishes, and was elected a fellow of that learned body. He also published "Experimental Inquiries into the Properties of the Blood." D. 1774.

HEYLIN, PETER, an English divine, was b. at Burford, in Oxfordshire, in 1600. In 1631 he published his "History of St. George," for which the king gave him the rectory of Hemmingford, in Huntingdonshire, and a prebend of Westminster, to which was added the living of Houghton, in the bishopric of Durham. Other church preferment followed. He published a weekly paper, called "Mercurius Aulicus." His other productions are, "Cosmography," "A Help to English History," the "Life of Charles I.," a "History of the Reformation," &c. D. 1662.

HEYNE, CHRISTIAN GOTTLÖB, a distinguished scholar, was a native of Chemnitz, in Saxony, whither his father, a poor linen weaver, had fled from Gravensclutz, in Silesia, on account of religious persecution. Though destitute and obscure, he acquired a remarkable acquaintance with the ancient languages, and succeeded Gesner as professor of eloquence at Gottingen, where he was soon after appointed first librarian and counsellor. By his editions and commentaries on classic authors, Heyne has deserved the reputation of being one of the most distinguished luminaries of the literary world. D. 1812, aged 82.

HEYWOOD, JOHN, one of the earliest of the English dramatic poets, was b. at North Mims, in Hertfordshire, and educated at Oxford; after which he became, through Sir Thomas More, a great favorite with Henry VIII. He also continued in the court of Edward VI., and was much in the confidence of Queen Mary; on whose death, being a Roman Catholic, he went abroad, and d. at Mechlin, in Brabant, 1565. He wrote "The Parable of the Spider and Fly," a voluminous poem. His other works are, a "Dialogue of Proverbs," and several plays.—THOMAS, a dramatic writer and actor in the reigns of Elizabeth, James I., and Charles I. He is said to have been a most voluminous author, having written no less than 220 plays, of which only 24 are extant. He also wrote "The Actor's Vindication," "The Hierarchy of the Angels," a "Life of Merlin," "Life of Queen Elizabeth," "Lives of the Nine Worthies," &c. Neither the date of his birth nor that of his death are on record.

HICKES, GEORGE, an eminent divine and learned antiquary of the 17th century, was b. at Newsham, in Yorkshire, in 1642. Dr. Hickes was a profound scholar, particularly in Saxon lore; but in theological matters the violence of his prejudices sometimes obscured his judgment. His greatest work is entitled "Thesaurus Grammatico-Criticus et Archæologicus Linguarum veterum Septentrionalium." D. 1715.

HIDALGO Y COSTILLA, DON MIGUEL, a Spanish priest, who distinguished himself in promoting the war of independence in Mexico, which commenced in 1809. He was at that time curate of Dolores, and possessed great influence over the Indians and Creoles. After raising the standard of independence, he was joined by Allende and a considerable body of insurgents; upon which he threw off his clerical robes, and assumed the uniform and rank of generalissimo. At first he obtained great success; but he ultimately fell into the hands of the royalists, and was executed in July, 1811.

HIGGONS, BEVIL, a dramatic poet and historian. His principal works are, a tragedy called "The Generous Conqueror," and a "Short View of the English History." He accompanied James II. to France, where he d. in 1735.

HIGHMORE, JOSEPH, a portrait and historical painter, b. in London, 1692. Among his best paintings is, "Hagar and Ishmael," in the Foundling Hospital. He distinguished himself also as an author. D. 1780.—NATHANIEL, an English anatomist, was b. at Fordingbridge, in Hampshire. He wrote "Corporis humani Disquisitio Anatomicæ," and other medical works. The cavity called the Antrum Highmorianum, in the superior maxilla, takes its name from him. B. 1613; d. 1684.

HILL, Sir JOHN, a voluminous writer, was b. in 1716, at Peterborough. He was brought up as an apothecary, and practised as a physician; wrote numerous books with great rapidity, and was the inventor of several lucrative quack medicines. Under the auspices of the earl of Bute he published a "System of Botany," and on presenting a copy of it to the king of Sweden, was invested with an order of knighthood. He also published a supplement to Chamber's "Cyclopædia," "Essays on Natural History and Philosophy," conducted a periodical called "The Inspector," and wrote several novels, farces, &c. He was a constant attendant on every place of public amusement; and, being a satirical "busybody," was often involved in quarrels with the wits of the day. On one of these occasions he was characteristically hit off by Garriek in the following epigrammatic couplet:—

"For physick and farces his rival there scarce is;
His farces are physick, his physick a farce is."

—ROLAND, the venerable minister of Surrey chapel, was b. at Hawkstone, near Shrewsbury, in 1744. At the time he quitted the university the celebrated George Whitefield was in the zenith of his popularity; and so congenial to his nature was that extraordinary preacher's manner and doctrine, that he quickly adopted both, and became his zealous disciple, prosecuting his favorite plan of itinerancy, preaching in the streets of Bristol, on the quays, or among the colliers at Kingswood; wherever, in fact, he could gain an audience; but resuming, at stated periods, the services of the London and Bristol tabernacles. In 1783 the building of Surrey chapel was completed; and from that time to the period of his death, an interval of 50 years, he continued to pass his winters in town for the purpose of officiating there, his place being supplied during the summer months by a succession of popular ministers from the country. His writings are very numerous, the principal of which is entitled "Village Dialogues." But he was not sparing of wit, humor, or sarcasm, whenever he could make either subservient to his purpose, as was strikingly seen in a satirical pamphlet against the ministers of the established church, which he published anonymously, under the title of "Spiritual Characteristics, by an Old Observer." D. 1833, aged 88.—ROBERT, a self-taught genius of extraordinary merit, was b. in Hertfordshire, in 1699, and bred a tailor and staymaker. By indefatigable application he acquired a sufficient knowledge of the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages, to be able to teach them. He d. at Buckingham, in 1777. He wrote "Remarks on the Essay on Spirit," "The Character of a Jew," and "Criticisms on Job."

HILLHOUSE, JAMES A., a distinguished poet, b. at New Haven, Conn., where he passed most of his life. His chief productions were "Hadad," a scriptural drama; "Percy's Mask;" "Sachem's Wood," and several spirited miscellaneous pieces. He also wrote considerably in prose, but no sustained or continuous work. D. 1846.

HILLIARD, NICHOLAS, a portrait painter, was b. in 1547, at Exeter. He imitated the style of Hans Holbein, and became goldsmith, carver, and painter to Queen Elizabeth. Among his best works are the portraits of Elizabeth and Mary, queen of Scots. D. 1619.

HILLTON, WALTER, a Carthusian monk of the monastery of Sheen, in the 15th century; author of "The Scale or Ladder of Perfection," and to whom also has been erroneously attributed the celebrated book "De Imitatione Christi," written by Thomas à Kempis, or by Gerson.

HILTON, WILLIAM, an eminent English artist. On the death of the great, though eccentric, Fuseli, Mr. Hilton succeeded him as keeper of the Royal Academy, and in that important office he ably and indefatigably directed and aided the students. B. 1787; d. 1840.

HIPPARCHUS, the most eminent among the ancient astronomers, was a native of Nicæa, in Bithynia, and flourished about a century and a half before the Christian era. He resided some time in the island of Rhodes, whence he has derived the appellation of Rhodius; but he afterwards went to Alexandria, at that time the great school of science. He has been styled the patriarch of astronomy, and was certainly the first who treated the sublime science in a philosophic manner. He discovered the precession of the equinoxes, calculated the eclipses, determined the revolutions and mean motions of the planets, invented the stereographical method of projection, numbered and catalogued the fixed stars, and, in short, by his labors, were laid the solid foundations of geographical and trigonometrical science.

HIPPIAS, prince of Athens, was the son of Pisistratus, at whose death he assumed the government, in conjunction with his brother Hipparchus; but the latter being assassinated by a band of conspirators, while conducting a solemn procession to the temple of Minerva, Hippias immediately seized the reins of government, and revenged the death of his brother by putting to death all of whom he entertained the least suspicion.

HIPPOCRATES, the most eminent of the Greek physicians, and deservedly styled the father of medical science, was b. in the isle of Cos, 460 B. C., and d. 361 B. C. His memory is still venerated in his native island, and the inhabitants show with pride a house in which they say he resided.—Of Chios, a celebrated geometrician, who lived about 500 B. C., and discovered the quadrature of the lunula, which bears his name.

HIPPOLYTUS, Sr., a Christian bishop, who suffered in the persecution of Alexander Severus, A. D. 230. His works in Greek and Latin were printed by Fabricius, 1716.

HIPPONAX, a satiric poet, of Ephesus, who lived about 450 B. C., and was contemporary with Anacreon.

HOADLY, BENJAMIN, a celebrated prelate, was b. at Westerham, in Kent, in 1676. He soon distinguished himself as a champion of freedom, in his controversy with Calamy and Atterbury; and was recommended by the house of commons to Queen Anne, who promised him preferment, but which he did not obtain from her. On the accession of George I., he was made bishop of Bangor; and soon afterwards translated to Hereford. In 1723 he obtained the bishopric of Salisbury, and in 1734 he became bishop of Winchester. D. 1761.—BENJAMIN, eldest son of the preceding, was physician to George II. and Frederic, prince of Wales. He published some medical and philosophical pieces; but he is best known as the author of "The Suspicious Husband," a comedy. B. 1706; d. 1757.

HOARE, Sir RICHARD COLT, an eminent local historian and topographer, was the eldest son of Sir Richard Hoare, the first baronet, and b. in 1758. In 1818 he printed for private circulation among his friends, his "Recollections of a Classical Tour." Various treatises on antiquarian and other kindred subjects occasionally came from his pen; but his great work, on which he bestowed the utmost care and attention, and which entitles him to a distinguished place in the first rank of topographical historians, is the "Ancient and Modern History of Wiltshire," which at the time of his death was not quite complete. D. 1838.

HOBART, JOHN HENRY, was b. in Philadelphia on the 14th of September, 1775. He was educated at the college in Princeton, New Jersey, and was noted in early life for his industry and proficiency in his studies. On leaving this institution he was engaged a short time in mercantile pursuits, was subsequently a tutor at Nassau hall, and after two years' service in this capacity he determined upon the study of theology. In 1798 he was admitted into orders, and was first settled in the two churches at Perkiomen, near Philadelphia, but soon after accepted a call to Christ church, New Brunswick. In about a year he removed from this place to become an assistant minister of the largest spiritual cure in the country, comprising three associated congregations in the city of New York. In 1811 he was elected assistant bishop, and in 1816 became diocesan of New York, and in performing the severe duties of the office, his labors were indefatigable. From 1818 to 1823 he was employed in editing the American edition of Mant and D'Oyley's bible, with notes. In September, 1823, the state of his health required a visit to Europe, where he remained about two years. He d. in 1830. He was incessantly active in performing his religious offices, and made several valuable compilations for the use of the church.

HOBBS, THOMAS, a celebrated philosopher and political writer, was b. in 1588, at Malmesbury, Wilts; was educated at Magdalen hall, Oxford; and in 1608 became tutor to a son of the earl of Devonshire. On the death of his patron and pupil, he became travelling tutor to a young gentleman; but the countess dowager of Devonshire recalled him into her family, to take upon him the education of the young earl. In 1628 he attended the earl on his travels, and at Pisa contracted an intimacy with Galileo. In 1642 he printed his book, "De Cive," which procured him many enemies by its dangerous principles. Soon after this he was appointed mathematical tutor to the prince of Wales. In 1650 appeared, in English, his work on "Human Nature;" and one, "De Corpore Politico, or the Elements of Law." The next year he published his still more famous and obnoxious book, entitled "Leviathan." At the restoration he received a pension; but in 1665 the parliament passed a censure on his writings, which greatly alarmed him. Besides the works which we have enumerated above, he published "De Mirabilibus Pecci, or the Wonders of the Peak," a poem; a translation of Homer; "Elements of Philosophy," a "Letter on Liberty and Necessity," "Six Lessons to the Professors of the Mathematics," &c. The latter years of his life were spent at Chatsworth, the seat of the earl of Devonshire, where he d. 1679.

HOBBIMA, MINDERHOUT, an eminent Dutch landscape painter, b. at Antwerp, in 1611. His pieces are remarkable for the grace and beauty of their execution, and being rare, are now very valuable.

HOICHE, LAZARUS, an eminent French general, was b. in 1768, at Montreuil, near Versailles, where his father was an hostler. In 1785 he entered the army; was made a corporal of grenadiers, and having passed with applause through the intermediate gradations of rank, frequently distinguishing himself by acts of bravery, he was raised in 1793, to the command of the army of the Moselle, where he had to contend with the duke of Brunswick, and was several times beaten. He, however, succeeded better when engaged with the Austrians, whom he drove out of Alsace. In 1795 he was placed at the head of the republican army in La Vendée. In this important and difficult station he acquitted himself well, and succeeded in defeating the emigrants at Quiberon, and in inducing the royalists to yield obedience to the government. After having been sent, in the winter of 1796, as commander of the troops in the expedition to Ireland, and from which he returned in disgrace, he was appointed to the command of the army of the Sambre and Meuse, and had already gained considerable advantages when his career was stopped by the armistice between Prince Charles and Bonaparte. D. 1797.

HOFER, ANDREW, a patriotic leader of the Tyrolese, was b. in 1765, at Passayer; and when he grew up, he kept an inn there, and dealt in corn, wine, and cattle. By the treaty of Presburg, the Tyrol was transferred to the king of Bavaria; but the war being rekindled in 1809, the inhabitants rose in a mass to drive out the Bavarians, and again place themselves under the dominion of Austria. The riches and influence of Hofer, his athletic form and decided character, all combined to induce the insurgents to elect him their chief. Every thing prospered under his direction. Almost the whole country was conquered, and 8000 of the best troops of Bavaria were made prisoners by the peasants. Hofer now appeared upon the Brenner, and became the idol of the Tyrolese. He was preparing to restore to the closely blockaded and suffering Tyrol a communication with the interior of the imperial states, when the battle of Wagram was succeeded by the armistice of Znaim, the terms of which required that the Austrians should abandon the Tyrol and Vorarlberg to the vengeance of the enemy. The gallant Hofer concealed himself in a cave, but soon issued from his retreat, and drove the French invaders out of the country. At length, however, the tide of victory turned; and although they maintained a glorious struggle, and gained many splendid victories, the Tyrolese were subjugated, and Hofer being discovered, he was tried by a court-martial at Mantua, and shot, Feb. 20, 1810. After his death he was revered by his countrymen as a martyr, his family were indemnified for the loss of their property by the emperor of Austria, and his son was ennobled by him.

HOFFMAN or HOFFMANN. There were several Germans of this name distinguished for their medical knowledge.—MAURICE, an anatomist, botanist, and physician; b. in 1621, at Furstenwalde, in Brandenburg; settled in Altorf, where he held the professorships of anatomy, botany, and physic; was the discoverer of the pancreatic duct; and d. in 1698. He, as well as his son, JOHN MAURICE, wrote several works on various medical subjects.—FREDERIC, the most celebrated of the name, was b. in 1663, at Halle, in Saxony, where his father was also an eminent physician. He studied and lectured at Jena, and afterwards practised at Minden. In 1684 he visited England, and formed an acquaintance with Boyle and other men of science. On the establishment of the university of Halle, he was appointed primary professor of medicine and natural philosophy; and thrice held the situation of rector. His reputation being now fully established, and his fame widely spread, he was elected a member of various scientific associations in London, Berlin, and Petersburg; and appointed physician to the king of Prussia, who gave him the title of archiater and aulic counsellor, with a liberal salary. His works are very numerous; the most important being his "Systema Medicinæ Rationalis" and "Medicina Consultatoria." It has been remarked of him, that as a theorist his suggestions were of great value, and contributed to introduce that revolution in the science of pathology, which subsequent observation has extended and confirmed. D. 1742.—CASPAR, another German physician, was a native of Gotha; wrote several medical works, became professor of the theory of medicine at Altorf, and d. there in 1648.—CHRISTOPHER LEWIS, also a physician, was b. in 1721, at Rheda, in Westphalia. He distinguished himself as a professional writer, and formed a new system of medicine, by combining the humoral and nervous pathology; assuming as the basis of his system, the sensibility and irritability of the solids, and the corruption of the humors as the principle of irritation. He was successively physician to the bishop of Munster and the electors of Cologne and Mentz. D. 1807.—ERNEST THEODORE WILLIAM, a German of varied talents, was b. at Königsberg, in 1776. He studied the law, and held various judicial appointments in Prussia; till his legal career was interrupted by the invasion of Warsaw by the French in 1806, in the government of which city he had been appointed counsellor. Having devoted his leisure hours to the study of music, and being at the same time a romance writer and an artist, he applied himself to these pursuits in order to obtain a livelihood. He possessed much imagination and talent; but he was an intemperate liver, and suffered much from hypochondriacism. Among his works are, "The Devil's Elixir," "The Entail," "The Adversary," &c.; all displaying a singularly wild and romantic imagination. In 1816 he was reinstated as counsellor in the court of judicature in Berlin, and d. in 1822.

HOFLAND, BARBARA, (widow of Mr. T. C. HOFLAND, landscape painter, who d. in 1843,) well known by her numerous works, written principally for the amusement and instruction of youth, was the daughter of a manufacturer at Sheffield, named Wreaks, where she was b. in the year 1770. She commenced her literary career in 1805, by the publication of a volume of poems, by subscription; from the proceeds of which she established herself in a school at Harrowgate, at the same time appearing occasionally as a writer of moral and amusing tales. Among the more important of her works are "Emily," a novel; "Beatrice," "The Unloved One," "The Son of a Genius," "Tales of the Priory," "Self-denial," "The Merchant's Widow," "Decision," &c. D. 1814.

HOGARTH, WILLIAM, a truly great and original painter of life and manners, was b. in London, in 1698, and bound apprentice to an engraver of arms on silver plate. About 1720 he set up for himself, and his first employment was to engrave coats of arms and shop bills. He next undertook to execute plates for booksellers, the chief of which are the prints to Hudibras. His first performance as a painter was a representation of Wanstead Assembly, the portraits being taken from life. In 1730 he married a daughter of Sir James Thornhill; shortly after which he embellished the gardens of Vauxhall with some excellent paintings, for which the proprietor complimented him with a perpetual ticket of admission. In 1733 appeared his "Harlot's Progress," prints which stamped his reputation, and were followed by other moral histories and satirical representations of vice and folly, such as "The Rake's Progress," "Marriage-à-la-Mode," "Industry and Idleness," &c., all admirably executed. Soon after the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle he went to France, and while at Calais began to sketch a drawing of the gate of the town, for which he was taken up, but was soon released. On his return he commemorated the affair in his excellent print, "O the Roast Beef of Old England." In 1753 he published his "Analysis of Beauty," in which he was assisted by Dr. Hoadly. In 1757 he became serjeant-painter to the king; but though he had arrived at wealth and eminence, yet, from being destitute of the advantages of a liberal education, he was inordinately vain of his talents, and affected to despise every kind of knowledge which he did not possess. He was also remarkably absent, of which the following is an instance: On setting up his carriage he paid a visit to the lord mayor, and having protracted his stay till a heavy shower came on, he was let out by a different door from that by which he entered, and unmindful of his carriage, he set off on foot, got home wet to the skin, and when asked where he had left the carriage, said that he had forgotten it. D. 1762.

HOGG, JAMES, (the Ettrick Shepherd,) a native of Scotland, was b. January 25, 1782, the anniversary of the natal day of Burns. His humble occupation, like that of his ancestors, "time out of mind," was that of a shepherd; nor had he, as he avers, even been more than half a year at school. At the age of 18, however, he began to amuse himself in stringing rustic rhymes together; and he continued to tend his sheep, and to write verses, until it was his good fortune to be noticed by Sir Walter Scott, (who had seen some of his poetical efforts,) which induced him to attempt something of a more decided character. He produced an "Essay on Sheep," which won for him the premium given by the Highland Society; and which, added to the success of a volume of ballads he had shortly before published, under the title of "The Mountain Bard," led him to hope for future fame and profit. He soon afterwards produced his "Forest Minstrel," which gained him but little in either sense; and it was owing to the kindness of Scott and Grieve, that his pecuniary difficulties were relieved. It was not until the publication of the "Queen's Wake" that his fame was established; but from that time he was considered as a somewhat popular author. His publications are numerous; and he contributed to some of the Edinburgh periodicals of the highest literary character. In fact, it was from the repeated mention of "the Shepherd" in the "Noctes" of Blackwood, that his name attained its chief celebrity. He continued the friend and companion of Sir Walter Scott until the decease of the latter. D. 1835.

HOHENLOHE, ALEXANDER LEOPOLD, prince of, bishop of Sardica, celebrated for the numerous miraculous cures which credulity has attributed to him, was b. at Kupferzell, 1794. Destined from his infancy for the church, he passed through his educational course at Vienna, Berne, and Ellwangen; in 1816 he entered into holy orders at Olmütz; and after a journey to Rome, where he lived chiefly with the Jesuits, he discharged ecclesiastical duties at Bamberg and Munich, to the satisfaction of all the members of his church. In 1820, having been struck with the cures which the prayers of a Badense peasant, Martin Michel by name, were said to have effected on many distinguished invalids, Prince Hohenlohe was induced to have recourse to similar means; and having healed some nervous patients, he was soon surrounded by a host of invalids, eager to test the spiritual powers of one whose fame had been noised abroad as having effected cures which had baffled all ordinary medical skill. As in most similar cases, rumor was far in advance of the truth; but the prince was the dupe of his own credulity; and it was not until a thorough exposure of the whole proceedings was given to the world by the burgomaster of Bamberg, that he abandoned his supernatural pretensions. He wrote several tracts and sermons, and d. at Grosswaradin, in Hungary, 1849.

HOLBACH, PAUL THIERRY, Baron von, a distinguished natural philosopher, was b. at Heildelsheim, in the Palatinate, 1723. His house was long the centre of attraction to all the savans of Paris; he contributed to the Encyclopédie numerous articles on natural history, politics, and philosophy; and few men have left behind them more enduring memorials of taste, skill, and ability. D. 1789.

HOLBEIN, HANS, or JOHN, an eminent painter, was b. at Basle, in 1498, and learned the elements of his art from his father, whom he soon excelled. His talents procured him the friendship of Erasmus, for whose "Praise of Folly," he drew several whimsical designs. At the recommendation of Erasmus he went to England, and was employed first by Sir Thomas More, who introduced him to Henry VIII. He now rose to the zenith of fortune in that monarch's court, and painted a vast number of portraits, which are still considered masterpieces of art. Some of his earlier productions, especially his "Dance of Death," are also very celebrated; and he was no mean proficient in the art of wood-engraving, many of his historical paintings having been executed by him in a highly graphic style. D. of the plague in 1554.

HOLBERG, LOUIS, baron of, a popular Danish writer, was b. at Bergen, in Norway, in 1684. His father had raised himself, by a bold achievement, from the ranks to the office of colonel, but took little care in forming the mind and character of his son, who struggled with great difficulties in acquiring learning. By reading the accounts of travellers, he became desirous of visiting other countries; and though straitened in circumstances, he travelled in England, Holland, France, and Italy; and, on his return to his native country, raised himself to fame, fortune, and rank, by his literary talents. He laid the foundation of his fame by a comic-heroic poem, or national satire, called "Peder Paars." He also wrote numerous dramas, romances, fables, and epigrams, all of which abound with wit, humor, and originality. His other works consist of "The Subterraneous Travels of Nicholas Klimm," an "Universal History," "Parallel Lives of Illustrious Men and Women," a "History of Denmark," &c. D. 1754.

HOLCROFT, THOMAS, a dramatist, novelist, and miscellaneous writer, was the son of a London tradesman, and b. in 1774. He at first followed his father's trade, (that of a shoemaker,) then became an actor, and finally directed his talents to literary pursuits. It was as a dramatist that he first essayed his powers; and, between 1778 and 1806, he produced more than thirty pieces, several of which were successful, and some still retain possession of the stage, among which is the "Road to Ruin." On the breaking out of the French revolution, Holcroft rendered himself obnoxious as a strenuous supporter of liberal principles, and was accused of high treason in 1794, on which he surrendered himself; but, owing to his companions, Hardy, Horne Tooke, and Thelwall, being acquitted, he was not brought to trial. Among his productions are, "A Tour in Germany and France," several novels, and numerous translations from the German and French. D. 1809.

HOLDSWORTH, EDWARD, an elegant writer, was b. 1688, at North Stoneham, in Hampshire, of which parish his father was rector. He was the author of "Muscipula," a Latin poem, written with classical purity; also of a dissertation, entitled "Pharsalia and Philippi, or the Two Philippi in Virgil's Georgics explained." D. 1746.

HOLINSHED, or HOLINGSHED, RAPHAEL, an English chronicler, of the Elizabethan age. He is said to have been descended from a respectable family in Cheshire; and from his own will it appears, that in the latter part of his life he was a steward to Thomas Burdet, esq., of Bromcote, Warwickshire. The "Chronicles of Holinshed" were first published in 1577; and prefixed to them is one of the most curious and interesting memorials existing of the manners and domestic history of the English in the 16th century. D. 1582.

HOLLAND, HENRY RICHARD VASSAL, Lord, was the only son of Stephen, second Lord Holland, elder brother of the Right Hon. Charles James Fox. During his parliamentary career he was the uncompromising advocate of the Catholic claims; a zealous promoter of every endeavor to soften the asperities of the law; and an assertor of popular rights in the most extensive sense of the term. When the Whig party came into power in 1830, he became a cabinet minister, and chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster. During his lifetime, Holland house, presided over by Lady Holland, who died, 1845, was the most renowned temple of wit and hospitality of which England could boast. Lord Holland left behind him some interesting "Foreign Reminiscences," which were published in 1850. D. 1840.

HOLLAR, WENCESLAUS, an eminent Bohemian engraver, was b. at Prague, 1617. He was brought to England in 1636, by the earl of Arundel, on his return from the embassy to Vienna; and, in 1640, he was appointed drawing-master to the prince of Wales and the duke of York. His "Ornatus Muliebris Anglicanus" is held in high estimation, as portraying, with great correctness, the fair sex, of all classes, in the 17th century.

HOLLES, DENZIL, Lord, one of the five members of the long parliament who were demanded by King Charles I. when he went to the house of commons. At the restoration he was advanced to the peerage; in 1663 he was sent ambassador to France, and in 1667 was one of the English plenipotentiaries at Breda. Notwithstanding these employments, he remained a zealous friend to liberty; and when the politics of the reign tended to make the king absolute, Lord Holles was a conspicuous leader of the opposition. D. 1680.

HOLLEY, HORACE, a celebrated pulpit orator, was b. in Connecticut, 1781, and graduated at Yale college in 1799. On leaving this institution he began the study of the law, which he soon relinquished for divinity, and in 1805 was ordained to the pastoral charge of Greenfield hill, Conn. In 1809 he was installed over the society in Hollis-street, Boston, where he remained for ten years, when he accepted an invitation to become president of Transylvania university, in Kentucky. In this situation he continued till 1827, when he died on his passage from New Orleans to New York. His sermons were generally extemporaneous, and were distinguished for power and eloquence.

HOLMAN, JOSEPH GEORGE, a dramatist and actor, was a native of London, and intended for the church; but in 1784 he made his debut at Covent-garden theatre. He afterwards came to America, and became manager of Charleston theatre. Among his dramatic productions, are the "Votary of Wealth," a comedy; "Red Cross Knights," "Abroad and at Home," &c. His death was remarkable and melancholy, taking place together with that of his second wife, two days after their marriage, by yellow fever, in 1817.

HOLMES, ABIEL, a divine and author, was b. in Woodstock, Conn., 1768; graduated at Yale college, 1783; from November, 1785, to June, 1791, was pastor of a Congregational church at Midway, Geo.; and in 1792 he became pastor of the First church in Cambridge, Mass., where he remained the rest of his life. His most considerable literary production, entitled "The Annals of America," is one of the most valuable historical publications that has been written in this country. D. 1837.

HOLT, FRANCIS LUDLOW, queen's counsel, and for 22 years vice-chancellor of the county palatine of Lancaster, was called to the bar in 1809, and in 1831 rose to the rank of a king's counsel. He was the author of several legal works on the law of libel, shipping and navigation laws, the bankrupt laws, reports of cases at nisi prius, &c. He also wrote one or two dramatic pieces; and was for many years the principal editor of "Bell's Weekly Messenger." D. 1844.—Sir JOHN, an eminent English judge, celebrated for firmness, integrity, and great legal knowledge, was b. at Thame, Oxfordshire, 1642. He filled the office of recorder of London for about a year and a half, when his uncompromising opposition to the abolition of the Test Act caused him to lose his situation. Becoming a member of the lower house, he distinguished himself so much by his exertions and talents in what is called the "convention parliament," that on King William's accession he was made lord chief justice of the King's Bench. On the removal of Lord Somers, in 1700, he was offered the chancellorship; but he refused it. D. 1709.

HOLTY, LOUIS HENRY CHRISTOPHER, a German poet, excelling particularly in lyrical and elegiac compositions, was b. at Mariensee, 1748. He was of a mild and pensive disposition, pursued his studies beyond his natural strength, and prematurely d. at Gottingen, 1775.

HOLYOAKE, FRANCIS, a learned lexicographer, was b. in Warwickshire, about 1567, and d. 1653. His "Etymological Dictionary of Latin Words" was first printed in 1606.—THOMAS, his son, was doctor in divinity, and d. in 1675. During the civil wars he commanded a troop of horse in the king's service, although in holy orders, and on the failure of the royal cause he practised medicine for a subsistence; but at the restoration he resumed his ecclesiastical functions, and obtained church preferment. He enlarged his father's dictionary, which was published in 1677.

HOLYOKE, EDWARD AUGUSTUS, an American physician, b. in Essex county, Mass., in 1728. He graduated at Harvard college, and in 1749 began to practise at Salem; was upwards of 100 years old when he died, yet it is said he was never in his life so far as 50 miles from the spot where he was born. Even after he had attained his 100th year he took interest in the investigation of medical subjects, and wrote letters which show that his understanding was still clear and strong. Dr. Holyoke was a good anatomist; was versed in natural philosophy and astronomy; and regularly recorded his meteorological observations daily for 80 years. D. 1829.

HOLYWOOD, JOHN, or, according to his Latinized appellation, DE SACROBOSCO, was an English mathematician and divine, b. at Halifax, in Yorkshire. After receiving his education at Oxford, he went to Paris, where he taught mathematics, and d. in 1256. He wrote "De Sphæra Mundi," "De Anni Ratione," and "De Algorismo."

HOME, DAVID, a Scotch divine, who was employed by James I. to bring the Protestants of Europe into one confession. He wrote "Apologia Basilica, seu Machiavelli Ingenium Examinatum," "L'Assassinat du Roi," &c.—Sir EVERARD, an eminent surgeon, was the son of Robert Home, esq., of Greenlaw castle, in the county of Berwick; and was brought up to the profession under his brother-in-law, the celebrated John Hunter. For a period of more than 40 years he practised with great success in London; and during that time he produced numerous medical works, which are held in high repute. He was sergent-surgeon to the king, surgeon to Chelsea hospital, vice-president of the Royal Society, president of the Royal College of Surgeons, and was created a baronet in 1813. Among his works are, "Lectures on Comparative Anatomy," and "Practical Observations" on a variety of diseases, consisting of several volumes; besides numerous valuable contributions to the "Philosophical Transactions," &c. B. 1756; d. 1832.—HENRY, Lord KAMES, a Scottish judge and eminent writer, b. in the year 1696. Mr. Home's success at the bar was not great, till his abilities were known by the publication of his "Remarkable Decisions of the Court of Session, from 1716 to 1718," which happened in 1728. From that period he practised, with much respectability and success, till the year 1752, when he was called to the bench. Eleven years afterwards he was appointed one of the lords of judiciary. Independent of various judicial works, he wrote "Essays concerning British Antiquities," "Essays on the Principles of Morality and Natural Religion," "An Introduction to the Art of Thinking," and "Elements of Criticism." Nothing further came from his pen till 1772, when "The Gentleman Farmer" made its appearance; and, the following year, "Sketches of the History of Man." The last work he published was "Loose Hints upon Education, chiefly concerning the Culture of the Heart." D. 1782.—JOHN, the author of the popular tragedy of "Douglas," was b. near Anstruther, Roxburghshire, in 1724, and educated for the church; but in the rebellion of 1745 he entered into the royal army, and was taken prisoner at the battle of Falkirk. He contrived, however to make his escape, and in 1750 was ordained as minister of Athelstaneford, in East Lothian. His tragedy of "Douglas" was performed at Edinburgh in 1756, and gave such offence to the presbytery that the author, to avoid ecclesiastical censure, resigned his living, and ever after appeared and acted as a layman. He obtained some trifling government appointments, and wrote four other plays, which, however, failed to attract. His "History of the Rebellion of 1745-6," also disappointed the public expectation. D. 1808.

HOMER, the father of poetry. Of the birth of this immortal bard, and of the circumstances of his death—of his parentage and descent, nay, even of his actual existence—all is involved in doubt and fable. Seven cities disputed for the honor of being his birthplace: Smyrna, Colophon, Chios, Argos, Athens, Rhodes, and Salamis: the probability is that he was an Asiatic Greek, and flourished in the 9th century B. C.

HONDEKOETER, GILES; GYSERECHE, his son; and MELCHIOR, his grandson; three Flemish artists of the 16th and 17th centuries. The first excelled in landscape painting; the second in delineating birds; and the last, who was by far the most celebrated of the three, combined the powers of the former two, and painted with great elegance and accuracy.

HONDIUS, ABRAHAM, a Dutch artist, of considerable ability, particularly in his hunting pieces; he also painted "The Destruction of Troy," in a manner which has obtained for him the highest praise. He went to England, and d. 1691.

HONE, NATHANIEL, a celebrated painter in enamel, was a native of Dublin, but came to London early in life, and was one of the first members of the Royal Academy. D. 1784.—WILLIAM, the son of a dissenter at Bath, became conspicuous as the publisher of a series of parodies, in which such irreverent use was made of the liturgy, that the government felt bound to prosecute him. He was tried on three charges, and defended himself for three days with considerable ability, and with equal courage and temper; and, as the government of that day was in ill odor with that large party in whom the reforming spirit at that time was rife, a verdict was returned in his favor. He subsequently had a large sum subscribed for him, by persons who, we presume, must have entertained sentiments similar to those of the "persecuted but triumphant champion of the press." His publications were the "Every-Day Book" and the "Year Book." This business, however, did not succeed, and Mr. Hone became much involved. Being led to attend the ministry of Mr. Binney at the Weigh-house, his character became changed; and the new religious connection resulted in his becoming subeditor of the "Patriot;" this he continued till his death, which took place in November, 1842.

HOOD, ROBIN, a celebrated English outlaw of the 12th century—whose personal courage, skill in archery, boldness of enterprise, and generous disposition, have rendered his name famous in the legendary history of that country—lived in Sherwood Forest, in Nottinghamshire. The heads of his story, as collected by Stowe, are briefly these:—"In this time (about the year 1190, in the reign of Richard I.) were many robbers and outlaws, among whom Robin Hood and Little John, renowned thieves, continued in the woods, despoiling and robbing the goods of the rich. They killed none but such as would invade them, or by resistance for their own defence. The said Robin entertained 100 tall men and good archers, with such spoils and thefts as he got, upon whom 400 (were they ever so strong,) durst not give the onset. He suffered no woman to be oppressed, violated, or otherwise molested; poor men's goods he spared, abundantly relieving them with that which by theft he got from abbays and the houses of rich old carles." D. 1247.—SAMUEL, Lord Viscount, the son of a clergyman at Thorncombe, in Devonshire, was b. there in 1724, and entered the royal navy at the age of 16. By his bravery in the capture of a fifty-gun ship, in 1759, he acquired the rank of post-captain; and he was present, as rear-admiral, at the famous defeat of De Grasse, by Rodney, April 12th, 1782, when his services on that occasion were rewarded with an Irish peerage. In 1784 he was elected into parliament for Westminster; but in 1788 he vacated his seat on being named one of the lords of the admiralty. In 1793 he signalized himself by the taking of Toulon, and afterwards Corsica; in reward of which achievements he was made a viscount, and governor of Greenwich hospital. D. 1816.—THOMAS, a poet, humorist, and miscellaneous writer, the son of Mr. Hood, bookseller, was at first a clerk, and then an engraver, and at length we find him contributing to, and in part editing, the "London Magazine." But his connection with the press became more pub-lily known by the occasional appearance of his name to various clever and whimsical trifles, which enlivened the pages of some of the most popular among the weekly and monthly periodicals. After this came his "Whims and Oddities," "National Tales," "Comic Annuals," "Whimsicalities," "The Plea of the Midsummer Fairies," "Tylney Hall," "Up the Rhine," &c. Much, however, as we have admired his abilities as a punster and a satirist, and heartily as we have laughed at his original sketches, droll allusions, and grotesque similes; much as we esteem the man of wit who can "shoot folly as it flies," without indulging in personalities, or inflicting pain on any but the worthless, we can still both admire and esteem him more, when, with true pathos, he fixes the attention of the reader, and commands the best sympathies of man's nature, by compositions so simple, eloquent, and forceful as "The Song of the Shirt." B. 1798; d. 1845.

HOOGSTRATEN, DAVID VAN, a Dutch poet and critic, b. at Rotterdam, in 1668; became professor of the belles lettres at Amsterdam, wrote several good poems, in the Latin language, and otherwise displayed considerable classical attainments. D. 1724.

HOOGVLIET, ARNOLD, a Dutch poet, b. in 1687. His chief fame rests on a poem entitled "Abraham the Patriarch," which is admired for the beauty of its style and imagery. D. 1763.

HOOK, JAMES, a musical composer, of great industry and talent, was b. at Norwich, in 1746. His operatic and melodramatic productions amount to more than 140 complete works, many of which were highly successful; he also set to music upwards of 2000 songs. D. 1827.—Dr. JAMES, dean of Worcester, son of the preceding, was an accomplished scholar, and an able dignity of the church. Besides some dramas, which he wrote early in life, he published, in 1820, "Anguis in Herba; a Sketch of the true Character of the Church of England and her Clergy," which he inscribed "To the sober sense of his country." Few writers, indeed, surpassed Dr. Hook as a polemical or a political pamphleteer. D. 1828.—THEODORE EDWARD, a celebrated novelist and dramatic writer, but more celebrated for his surpassing wit and extemporaneous powers, was the youngest son of James Hook. He was b. in London, in 1788. At 17 he produced his first drama, "The Soldier's Return," which was speedily followed by "Catch him who can," "Tekeli," "Killing no Murder," and nine other dramatic pieces, nearly all of which were decidedly successful. These, with a host of piquant articles in the "Satirist Magazine," and other periodicals, were hit off before he reached his 25th year. In Oct., 1813, he was appointed to the offices of accountant-general and treasurer of the Mauritius, which he held till Feb., 1818, when it was discovered that there was a deficiency in the military chest of £12,000, abstracted, as it afterwards appeared, by his deputy, who, on the accounts being about to be investigated, destroyed himself; but Mr. Hook, as a matter of course, was made answerable for the acts of his subordinate. He was accordingly sent home, his effects were seized and sold, and he became for a considerable time an inmate of the King's Bench. The first series of "Sayings and Doings" appeared in 1824. Other novels, as "Jack Brag," "Births, Deaths, and Marriages," "Gilbert Gurney," &c., followed at short intervals. He also wrote "Memoirs of Sir David Baird" and of "Michael Kelly," the composer. But not a little of his notoriety arose from his connection with the "John Bull," of which he was editor as well as a joint proprietor; and from his pen proceeded most of those bold political articles, racy sketches of men and manners, smart poems, and epigrammatic jeux d'esprit, which for so long a time distinguished that ultra-tory paper. For the last few years he was the editor of the "New Monthly Magazine." D. 1841.

HOOKER, JOHN, a learned antiquary, was b. at Exeter, 1524. He wrote a "Description of Exeter," and some part of "Holingshed's Chronicle," besides other pieces. D. 1601.—RICHARD, an eminent English divine, author of an excellent work, entitled "The Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity," was b. at Heavitree, near Exeter, in 1553, and d. at Bishop's Bourne, Kent, of which place he was rector, in 1600.

HOOLE, JOHN, a dramatic poet and translator, was b. in 1727. He was a clerk in the India House, but devoted his leisure hours to literary pursuits, particularly the study of the Italian language, of which he acquired a great knowledge, as appears by his excellent translations of Ariosto's "Orlando Furioso," and Tasso's "Jerusalem," into English. He also published two volumes of the dramas of Metastasio, and was the author of three tragedies, viz., "Cyrus," "Timanthes," and "Cleonice." D. 1803.

HOOVER, WILLIAM, a signer of the declaration of independence, was b. in Boston in 1742, and was graduated at Harvard college, in 1760. He engaged in the study of the law, and removing to North Carolina commenced the practice of his profession in that province. In 1774 he was elected a delegate to the general congress which met at Philadelphia. In 1776 he was a third time delegate to congress, but in the following year was obliged to resign his seat in consequence of the embarrassment of his private affairs. D. 1790.

HOPE, JOHN, a physician and naturalist, b. at Edinburgh, 1725, was professor of botany and the materia medica in his native city, and in 1761 was appointed botanist to the king, and superintendent of the botanic garden. D. 1786.—THOMAS, an English gentleman of large fortune, distinguished by his talents and patronage of the fine arts, was the nephew of a rich merchant of Amsterdam. In 1805 he first appeared as an author, by publishing a work, entitled "Household Furniture and Internal Decorations;" this was followed by two elegant publications, "The Costumes of the Ancients," and "Designs of Modern Costume;" but his great performance was "Anastasis, or Memoirs of a Modern Greek," which appeared anonymously in 1819, and was for some time very generally ascribed to Lord Byron. Another work of a metaphysical nature, has been published since his death, entitled "The Origin and Prospects of Man." D. 1831.

HOPITAL, MICHAEL DE L', was an eminent chancellor of France, to which high station he rose through the zeal, ability, and integrity he displayed in the various offices he before filled. He was b. in 1505; studied jurisprudence in the most celebrated universities of France and Italy; rose rapidly in his profession, and was sent by Henry II. as ambassador to the council of Trent. In 1554 he was made superintendent of the royal finances, when, by his good management, and his inflexible disregard of those rapacious favorites of the court who batted on the public purse, he restored the exhausted treasury. He was a sincere friend to religious toleration, and the principal author of the edict of 1562, which allowed freedom of worship to Protestants. When the atrocious massacre of the Protestants, on Bartholomew's Day, 1572, was at its height, and his friends thought he would be made one of its victims, he not only refused to take measures for his own safety, but, when a party of horsemen advanced towards his house, he refused to close his gates. They were, in fact, dispatched by the queen with express orders to save him. He survived this event a few months only, dying in 1573.—WILLIAM FRANCIS ANTHONY DE L', marquis de St. Mesme, a celebrated French mathematician, was the son of a general in the army, and b. 1661. Such was his reputation for mathematical science, that the profound Huygens did not disdain to apply to him for information. He wrote several works on conic sections, equations, &c. D. 1704.

HOPKINS, LEMUEL, an American physician and author, b. at Waterbury, Conn., 1750. He introduced the anti-phlogistic regimen and practice in febrile diseases, and was not less assiduous than he was skilful as a practitioner; while, as a literary man he successfully distinguished himself by various political tracts and satires, written with a view to give a tone to the public feeling in favor of the administration of Washington. D. 1801.—SAMUEL, founder of the sect called Hopkinsians, was b. at Waterbury, Conn., in 1721. He was a pious and zealous man, with considerable talents, and almost incredible powers of application; but his theological opinions have given rise to much controversy. He published numerous sermons, a "Treatise on the Millennium," &c.; and earnestly advocated the abolition of slavery. From the year 1769 he presided over a congregation at Newport, R. I., where he d. in 1803.—STEPHEN, one of the signers of the declaration of independence, was b. in 1707, in that part of Providence which now forms the town of Scituate. In 1732 he was elected a representative to the general assembly from Scituate, and was chosen speaker to that body in 1741. In 1751 he was appointed chief justice of the superior court of Rhode Island; and, in 1756, was elected its governor; was several times chosen a member of congress, and d. in 1785. He was a clear and convincing speaker, and a good mathematician; and though he had received but a very limited education, his knowledge of literature, science, and political economy was varied and extensive.—WILLIAM, an English divine, b. at Evesham, Worcestershire, in 1647, was a celebrated antiquary. He assisted Bishop Gibson in his edition of the "Saxon Chronicle," and was the translator of the article "Worcestershire," in Camden's "Britannia." In 1675 he was promoted to a prebend in Worcester cathedral; held the mastership of St. Oswald's hospital; and d. 1700.—WILLIAM, was the author of "An Appeal to Common Sense;" and, though openly professing Arian principles, held the rectory of Bolney, in Sussex, till his death, in 1786.

HOPKINSON, FRANCIS, an eminent author, and one of the signers of the declaration of independence, was b. at Philadelphia, in 1738. His father was the intimate friend and scientific coadjutor of Franklin. After graduating at the college of Philadelphia, and making the law his study, Francis visited England, the country of his parents' birth, and, in a few years after his return, entered congress as a delegate from New Jersey. He produced many satires and ironical pieces, such as the "Prophecy," the "Political Catechism," &c., tending to ridicule the old country; while, at the same time, he directed his efforts against the ribaldry of the newspapers, and the exaggerations and prejudices with which the federal constitution was at first assailed. After his retirement from congress, he was appointed judge of the admiralty for Pennsylvania, and d. in 1791. Among his works, the greater part of which are of a political character, there are many sound essays and scientific papers, acute and learned judicial decisions, and a variety of songs, possessing much sweetness and delicacy, which were rendered still more popular by the airs he composed for them.

HOPPNER, JOHN, an ingenious portrait and landscape painter, chiefly excelling in females and children, was b. 1759, and d. 1810. As the author of a metrical translation of "Oriental Tales," and in other literary performances, he also distinguished himself.

HORATIUS FLACCUS, QUINTUS, or HORACE, one of the most eminent, and certainly the most popular and elegant of the Roman poets, was b. at Venusium, a city lying on the borders of Lucania and Apulia, 65 B. C. His father, although following the calling of a tax-gatherer, was a man of elevated and liberal sentiments, and took the greatest pains in providing for his education. At the age of 20 years he went to Athens to complete his studies; and while there,

Marcus Brutus passing through the city on his way to Macedonia, Horace, accompanied by other Roman youths, joined the army; became a legionary tribune; fought in the last battle for the freedom of Rome at Philippi, and saved himself by flight. Though he saved his life, he forfeited his estate, and was reduced to great want, till Virgil introduced him to Mæcenas, by whose interest he recovered his patrimony. Augustus now became his friend, and offered to make him his secretary, which Horace declined. When Mæcenas was sent to Brundisium, to conclude a treaty between Augustus and Antony, he took with him Horace, Virgil, and other literary friends; and, not long after, his munificent patron presented him with the Sabine villa; to which, having witnessed such striking examples of the instability of fortune, he withdrew from the tumult at Rome, preferring retirement to a more brilliant life. His odes are models of that kind of composition, and his epistles and satires abound with acute and vivacious observations on life and manners; while his "Ars Poetica," so often quoted, evinces great taste, and is remarkable for a species of graceful negligence. D. 9 B. C.

HORN, CHARLES EDWARD, the best English melodist of modern times, the son of C. F. Horn, a German musician, was b. in London, 1786. At the precocious age of six, he showed evident signs of a taste for composition, his skill at improvisation arresting the attention of his father's visitors, among whom the great Haydn could be numbered. On the opening of the English opera house, he was engaged as second tenor, and he subsequently shared the public favors with the first singers of the day. He composed the whole or the greater portion of the music for innumerable operas; and he was the author of the three most popular ballads of his time, "Cherry Ripe," "I've been Roaming," "The deep, deep Sea," &c. D. at New York, 1849.

HORNE, GEORGE, a learned and pious English prelate, was b. 1730, at Otham, Kent. He took orders in 1753, and his graceful elocution and excellent style rendered him a popular preacher. He was successively chaplain to the king, vice-chancellor of the university, and dean of Canterbury; and, in 1790, he was raised to the see of Norwich. He was distinguished for his biblical knowledge, and in early life was a strenuous Hutchinsonian. In 1751 he opposed the Newtonian philosophy as inconsistent with the Bible; in 1754 he wrote against Dr. Shuckford's account of the creation and fall of man; and in 1756 he became involved in a controversy with Dr. Kennicott, the supposed author of "A Word to the Hutchinsonians." But among his numerous works, which are too numerous for specifying here, the principal is "A Commentary on the Book of Psalms," an elaborate performance, on the composition of which he bestowed nearly 20 years. D. 1792.

HORNECK, OTTOCAR OF, one of the oldest historians in the German language, was a native of Styria, and lived in the 13th and 14th centuries. About the year 1250 he composed a work on the great empires of the earth, which concluded with the death of the Emperor Frederic II., and is still extant in manuscript at Vienna. He also wrote a chronicle of the events of his own time, consisting of more than 83,000 verses, and which is said to be rich in portraying the characters of eminent men, and in the description of festivals, tournaments, and battles, at part of which he was himself present.

HORNEMANN, FREDERIC CONRAD, a celebrated German traveller, b. at Hildesheim, in 1772. At the instance of Blumenbach, the famous naturalist, he was, in 1797, employed by the African Association, in London, to explore the interior of Africa. After having visited Cyprus, Alexandria, and Cairo, he crossed the Libyan desert, reached Mourzouk, the capital of Fezzan, and soon afterwards proceeded on an excursion to Tripoli. From this place he set out with the intention of penetrating into Central Africa, and is believed to have d. on his return to Fezzan, of a fever caused by drinking cold water, after being exposed to great fatigue. His Journal, which was sent by him from Tripoli, was published in 1802 by the African Society.

HORNER, FRANCIS, barrister-at-law, was b. at Edinburgh, 1778. He entered parliament in 1806, and distinguished himself as chairman of the bullion committee; but his severe application to that intricate subject injured his health, which was naturally delicate; and he d. in 1817, at Pisa, whither he had gone for its restoration.

HORNTHORST, GERARD, a celebrated painter, called also GERARDO DALLE NOTTI, from his subjects, was b. at Utrecht in 1592, and was a pupil of Abraham Bloemart, but finished his studies at Rome. He painted night-scenes, and pieces illuminated by torch or candle light. On his return from Italy he visited England, and obtained the favor of Charles I.; and on his return to Holland, he was much employed by the prince of Orange. Among his numerous pictures, that of Jesus Christ before the tribunal of Pilate is the most celebrated. D. 1660.

HORROX, JEREMIAH, an English astronomer, was b. at Toxteth, in Lancashire, about 1619. He was the first who observed the transit of Venus over the sun's disk, his account of which was published by Hevelius, at Dantzic, in 1661, under the title of "Venus in Sole visu, anno 1639, Nov. 24;" and he formed a theory of lunar motion, which Newton did not disdain to adopt. D. 1640.

HORSLEY, JOHN, a learned antiquary, who d. 1731. His work, entitled "Britannia Romana," folio, gives a copious and exact account of the remains of the Romans in Britain.—SAMUEL, a celebrated English prelate and mathematician, was b. in London in 1738; and held several livings in succession, till he arrived at the episcopal dignity. But while he was rapidly rising in the church, and opposing Dr. Priestley, the great champion of Unitarianism, by his theological arguments, he was not neglectful of science. In 1775 he published an edition of Newton's works; and from 1773 till the election of Sir Joseph Banks, he was secretary of the Royal Society. His writings were numerous and important, in theology, in science, and in classical literature. D. 1806.

HOSACK, DAVID, an eminent physician of New York. He received his education at Edinburgh; was long at the head of the profession in New York; and was an eloquent and able teacher as a professor of the theory and practice of physic in the New York Medical College. He was held in high estimation as a man of talents, learning, and worth; was a liberal promoter of the arts and sciences; and was the author of the "History of the Erie Canal," and of the Life of his friend, De Witt Clinton, formerly governor of New York. D. suddenly of apoplexy, 1835, aged 66.

HOTTINGER, JOHN HENRY, a learned oriental scholar, b. at Zurich, in 1620. He displayed such a propensity for, and made such progress in, the ancient languages, that he was sent to foreign universities at the public expense. He went to Geneva, Gottingen, and Leyden; visited England; and returned to his native country, enriched with vast stores of knowledge. In 1642 he was appointed professor of ecclesiastical history in his native city; and by his teaching and writings contributed greatly to promote the study of oriental literature. In 1667, while preparing for a visit to the university of Leyden, in compliance with repeated invitations, he was accidentally drowned, with three of his children, by the upsetting of a boat, in the neighborhood of Zurich.—JOHN JAMES, son of the preceding, was b. at Zurich, in 1652; at which place he became professor of theology; and d. 1735. His principal work is an "Ecclesiastical History of Switzerland."—Another professor at Zurich, of the same name, known by his editions of the classics, was b. 1750, and d. 1819. He was an acute critic and elegant scholar; among his best works is an "Essay towards a Comparison of the German with the Greek and Roman Poets."

HOVEDEN, ROGER DE, an English historian, who flourished in the reign of Henry II. He wrote "Annals" in Latin, commencing at 731, the period at which Bede finished, and bringing down affairs to the third year of John, 1201. His style is defective, but he is highly esteemed for diligence and fidelity.

HOWARD, CHARLES, earl of Nottingham, an intrepid English admiral, commander-in-chief at the defeat of the Spanish armada. B. 1536; d. 1624.—EDWARD, the descendant of an ancient and opulent family, was one of the earliest and best of the naval school of novelists. "Ratlin the Reefer," "Outward Bound," "The Old Commodore," and "Jack Ashore," attest his powers, while his "Life of Sir Henry Morgan, the Buccaneer," gave promise of even higher excellence. D. 1842.—JOHN, the celebrated philanthropist, was b. at Hackney, in 1726. He was apprenticed to a grocer, but his constitution being delicate, and having an aversion to trade, he purchased his indentures and went abroad. On his return he lodged with a widow lady, whom he afterwards married. After the decease of Mrs. Howard, who lived only about three years, he, in 1756, embarked for Lisbon, in order to view the effects of the recent earthquake, but on the passage the ship was taken and carried to France. The hardships he suffered and witnessed during his imprisonment, first roused his attention to the subject of his future labors. On being released, Mr. Howard retired to a villa in the New Forest; and in 1758 he married a second wife, who d. in childbed in 1765, leaving him one son. He at this time resided at Cardington, near Bedford, where he indulged the benevolence of his disposition by continually assisting and ameliorating the condition of the poor. In 1778 he served the office of sheriff, which, as he declared, "brought the distress of the prisoners more immediately under his notice," and led him to form the design of visiting the jails through England, in order to devise means for alleviating the miseries of the prisoners. Having done so, he laid the result of his inquiries before the house of commons, for which he received a vote of thanks. He next made a tour through the principal parts of Europe, and published his "State of the Prisons," with a view to render them both more humane and more efficacious. A new subject now engaged his attention, namely, the management of lazarettos, and the means of preventing the communication of the plague and other contagious diseases. In this he encountered every danger that can be conceived, and having become personally acquainted with the subject, in 1789 he published "An account of the principal Lazarettos in Europe, with Papers relative to the Plague," &c. Actively pursuing this salutary and benevolent object, Mr. Howard took up his residence at the town of Cherson, a Russian settlement on the Black Sea. A malignant fever prevailed there, and he having been prompted by humanity to visit one of the sufferers, he caught the infection, and d. Jan. 20, 1790.—Sir ROBERT, an English poet and historian, was the son of Thomas, earl of Berkshire. He was a zealous friend of the revolution of 1688. He wrote several plays, the "History of the Reigns of Edward and Richard II.," the "History of Religion," &c. D. 1698.—THOMAS, earl of Surrey and duke of Norfolk, an eminent statesman and warrior in the reign of Henry VIII. He served with his brother, Sir Edward, against Sir Andrew Barton, a Scotch pirate, who infested the English coast in 1511, but who was killed and his ships taken. He next accompanied the marquis of Dorset in his expedition to Guienne, which ended in the conquest of Navarre by Ferdinand. The victory of Flodden Field, in which the king of Scotland was slain, was chiefly owing to his bravery. On the breaking out of the disturbances in Ireland, he was appointed lieutenant of that kingdom, where he suppressed the rebellion. Notwithstanding his great services, Henry, at the close of life, caused the duke to be sent to the Tower, on a charge of treason, and his son to be beheaded in his presence. The death of the tyrant only saved the duke's life. D. 1554.—EDWARD, younger brother of the above, entered early on the maritime service, and about 1494 was knighted. In 1512 he was sent as lord high admiral of England with a large fleet against France, the coasts of which he ravaged. He also defeated the enemy's fleet off Brest; but the year following he was slain in boarding the French admiral's ship, and his body thrown into the sea.—HENRY, earl of Surrey, an accomplished nobleman, a brave soldier, and the best English poet of his age, was b. in 1520. He served under his father, the duke of Norfolk, as lieutenant-general of the army sent against Scotland, and performed various other military exploits of eminence and value. He had quartered on his escutcheon the royal arms of Edward the Confessor, to which he had an hereditary right, and he is said to have aspired to the hand of the Princess Mary. On these and other less substantial charges he suffered decapitation on Tower-hill, 1546, by the jealous and arbitrary mandate of Henry VIII. His works consist of "Songs and Sonnets," &c., which deserve a high degree of commendation, for the period at which they were composed.—THOMAS, earl of Arundel, a nobleman distinguished by his patronage of the fine arts, was earl marshal in the early part of the reign of Charles I., and was employed in several foreign embassies by that prince and his father. He sent agents into Greece and Italy, to collect for him, at a vast expense, whatever was curious and valuable of the works of ancient artists, which had escaped destruction. His unrivalled museum of antiquities was divided at his death, and Henry, the sixth duke of Norfolk, about the year 1668, presented to the university of Oxford a considerable part of his moiety, including the celebrated Parian Chronicle, which with the other ancient inscribed stones accompanying it are now termed the "Arundelian marbles." D. 1646.—JOHN EAGER, an officer of the army of the American revolution, was b. in Baltimore in 1752. After serving in the rank of captain, in 1779, he was appointed lieutenant-colonel, and dis-tingnished himself by his valor and activity during the war. At the battle of Cowpens, Col. Howard, at one time, had in his hands the swords of seven officers who had surrendered to him personally. He was also present at the battles of Germantown, White Plains, Monmouth, Camden, and Hobbicks hill. On the disbanding of the army he retired to his patrimonial estates, near Baltimore, and was subsequently governor of Maryland, and member of the senate of the United States. D. 1827.

HOWE, JOHN, an eminent nonconformist clergyman of the 17th century, b. in 1630, at Loughborough, was ejected from his living at Torrington, Devon, and for many years officiated as the minister of a Presbyterian congregation in London; afterwards retired to the Netherlands, but returned to England upon James's proclamation of liberty of conscience. D. 1705.—JOHN, a statesman in the reigns of William III. and Anne. He was a member of the convention parliament, and exerted himself greatly in favor of the revolution, but afterwards joined the opposition, and gave great offence to the king by the boldness of his conduct. In the succeeding reign he was made a privy councillor and paymaster of the forces; but retired on the accession of George I., and was succeeded in his office by Walpole. D. 1720.—RICHARD, earl, a celebrated English admiral, was the third son of Emanuel, Viscount Howe, and was b. in 1725. He was placed, at the age of 14, as a midshipman on board the Severn, in which ship he sailed with Anson for the Pacific, and continued going through the usual gradations of the service under that admiral till 1745, when, though only 20 years of age, he obtained the command of the Baltimore sloop of war, and was made post-captain for gallantly defeating two French ships bearing succors to the Pretender. Having greatly distinguished himself on many occasions, he sailed, as commander-in-chief, to the Mediterranean in 1770, with the rank of rear-admiral, and in a few years rose to be vice-admiral of the blue. On the breaking out of the war with France, Lord Howe sailed for the coast of America, with a squadron destined to act against D'Estaing, and, on his return in 1782, he was created an English viscount. In the course of the same year he sailed to the relief of Gibraltar, which he effected in spite of the combined fleets of the enemy. In 1783 he accepted the post of first lord of the admiralty, and in 1788 he was created an earl of Great Britain. In 1793, on the breaking out of the war with France, he took the command of the British fleet, and bringing the enemy to an action on the 1st of June, 1794, obtained over them a decisive and most important victory. In 1797 Lord Howe exerted himself with great success to quell the mutiny among the seamen at Portsmouth, and d. in 1799.—SIR WILLIAM, brother of the preceding, succeeded General Gage in the chief command of the British forces in America, having landed at Boston with generals Clinton and Burgoyne, in May, 1775. General Howe commanded at the attack on Bunker Hill, was besieged in Boston during the next winter, evacuated that town in the ensuing spring, and retired to Halifax. In June, 1776, he arrived at Staten Island, where he was joined by his brother Lord Howe. Here the brothers informed congress that they had received full power to grant pardon to all the rebels who should return to their obedience; but the commissioners appointed by that body considered both the form and substance of the propositions too objectionable to deserve attention. In August he defeated the Americans on Long Island, and took possession of New York in September. After the campaign of the Jerseys, he set sail from New York and entered Chesapeake Bay. Having previously secured the command of the Schuylkill, he crossed it with his army, and repelled the attack of the Americans at Germantown. In May, 1778, he was succeeded in the command by General Clinton. D. 1814.

HOWELL, JAMES, a miscellaneous writer, was b. in 1595, at Abernant in Caermarthenshire, and after receiving his education at Oxford, travelled on the Continent as agent to procure workmen, &c., for a glass manufactory then for the first time established in England. He was subsequently a member of parliament, secretary to the British ambassador in Denmark, and clerk of the council. For some offence to the parliamentarians he was imprisoned in the Fleet, but obtained his liberty by applying to Cromwell, became historiographer to Charles II., and d. in 1666. He wrote many books, but the one by which he will be longest remembered is, "Epistolæ Howellianæ, or Familiar Letters, domestic and foreign."

opher and author in the 17th century, who gained celebrity by a work, entitled "Examen de Ingenios para las Ciencias," &c., or, an Examination of such Geniuses as are fit for acquiring the Sciences. This book, which is full of practical wisdom, has been translated into English, under the title of "The Trial of Wits," and into German by Lessing, as "Prüfung der Köpfe." Though he wrote in Spanish, and is supposed to have been born of Spanish parents, Huarte was a native of Navarre.

HUBER, JOHN JAMES, a celebrated anatomist, was b. at Basle, in 1707. He studied under Haller at Berne, and next at Strasburg; after which he took his doctor's degree at his native place. He assisted Haller on his great work on the Plants of Switzerland. He obtained the rank of court physician and counsellor of state; published a work on the spinal marrow and other parts of the nervous system, entitled "Commentatio de Medulla Spinali." D. 1778.—ULRIC, a native of Friesland, author of "De Jure Civitatis." D. 1694.—MARY, a deistical writer; author of "Lettres sur la Religion de l'Homme," and many other works. B. at Geneva, 1694; d. 1759.—

JOHN JAMES, a painter, called by Fuseli the Swiss Tintoretto. B. 1668; d. 1748.

—JOHN, a Genevese artist, b. in 1722. He was a good painter, but devoted much of his attention to the art of cutting profiles, in which he acquired an extraordinary degree of dexterity. He is described as being an eccentric character; and, among other fanciful schemes, formed a project for guiding the course of air balloons by the flight of large birds; on which he published a tract, illustrated with plates. D. 1790.—

MICHAEL, a native of Bavaria, professor of French in Leipsic, and the translator of several German works into French. B. 1727; d. 1804.—

LOUIS FERDINAND, son of the preceding; editor of several journals. B. at Paris, 1764; d. 1804.—

THERESA, daughter of the celebrated philologist Heyne, and wife of the preceding; a popular German novelist, many of whose works appeared under her husband's name.—FRANCIS, a naturalist, b. in 1750, at Geneva; author of "Nouvelles Observations sur les Abeilles," in which he explains the manner of the queen-bee's impregnation, &c. Having lost his way in a winter night, the effect of the cold produced total blindness; but the lady to whom he had been betrothed afterwards married him, and became his constant amanuensis.

HUDSON, HENRY, a distinguished navigator, whose early history is unknown. After making three voyages to find a northeast or northwest passage to China, in the second of which he discovered the river Hudson, he set sail a fourth time, April 17th, 1610, in a bark named the Discovery, and proceeding westward, reached, in latitude 60°, the strait bearing his name. Through this he advanced along the coast of Labrador, until it issued into the vast bay which is also called after him. Here, with his son, and seven infirm sailors, he was turned adrift by a mutinous crew, and is supposed to have perished.

HUERTA, VINCENT GARCIA DE LA, a Spanish poet and critic, b. 1729, at Zafra, in Estremadura. He acquired considerable fame among his countrymen, and zealously defended Spanish literature from the censures of Voltaire and other French writers. He published various poems and dramas, and edited "Teatro Español."

HUET, PETER DANIEL, a celebrated French critic and classical scholar, b. at Caen, in Normandy, 1630. He was educated in the Jesuits' college, accompanied Bochart to Sweden, and was in vain persuaded to settle there by Queen Christina. In 1670 he was appointed preceptor to the dauphin; and while he filled that situation he wrote an erudite work in defence of Christianity, entitled, "Demonstratio Evangelica;" he also published the Latin classics, in 62 vols., with those ample illustrations which have made what are called the Delphin editions so generally known and esteemed. In 1689 he was made bishop of Avrantes, but resigned that see in 1699, and spent the remainder of his days in literary retirement, producing many works of great merit. He d. at Paris, 1721.

HUFELAND, CHRISTIAN WILLIAM, a Prussian counsellor of state, who was also an eminent physician, was b. at Langensalza, 1762, and first practised physic at Weimar. In 1793 he was made professor at Jena, and in 1801 physician to the king of Prussia. He greatly improved his art, and wrote a "System of Medicine," which is among the best practical books extant. D. 1836.

HUFNAGEL, GEORGE, a Flemish painter, was b. at Antwerp in 1545, and d. 1600. He was also a tolerable poet in Latin and German.

HUGH CAPET, the first of the third race of French monarchs, was count of Paris and Orleans. He was proclaimed king of France at Noyon, in 987, and d. in 996, aged 57.

HUGHES, JOHN, an English poet, dramatic author, and essayist; b. 1677; d. 1727. His last work was, the "Siege of Damascus," a tragedy, which still continues on the stage. Several papers in the "Tattler," "Spectator," and "Guardian" were written by him.

HUGO, HERMAN, a learned Jesuit and Latin poet, was b. at Brussels in 1588, and d. of the plague at Rhinberg, in 1629.

HUGTENBURGH, JOHN VAN, a Dutch painter, who painted the victories of the duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene. D. 1733.

HULL, THOMAS, a dramatic writer and actor, b. in 1728. He was cotemporary with Garrick, and lived to be father of the British stage, but never rose to any great eminence in his profession. He was the author of a deservedly popular poem, entitled "Richard Plantagenet," besides some novels, tales, and dramas.

HUMBOLDT, WILLIAM VON, a distinguished statesman and philologist, the elder brother of the great philosopher and traveller, was b. at Potsdam, 1767. He received his early education at Berlin, and studied at Gottingen and Jena, where he formed a friendship with Schiller, which lasted through life. In 1800 he was appointed Prussian minister at the papal court, where his love of antiquarian and classical pursuits necessarily received a fresh impulse; and on his return in 1808 he was created a counsellor of state, and nominated minister of education. In 1810 he went as plenipotentiary to Vienna; and he shared in all the great diplomatic transactions of the next few years;—at Prague, at the conferences of Chatillon, where he signed the capitulation of Paris along with Hardenberg,—and at the congress of Vienna, &c. He next went as ambassador extraordinary to London; assisted at the congress of Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1818; and the following year he became a member of the Prussian cabinet, but he soon retired in consequence of the retrograde policy pursued by his colleagues, and thenceforward lived chiefly at his seat, Tegel, near Berlin, in the cultivation of literature and science. His works are of a most miscellaneous character, and show the extraordinary versatility of his powers; but his chief fame rests on his erudite researches into philology, and more especially the Basoue, Sanscrit, North American, and Malay languages: nor should we forget to mention, as most illustrative of his amiability and excellence of heart, his "Letters to a Female Friend." D. 1835.

HUME, DAVID, a celebrated historian, philosopher, and miscellaneous writer, was b. at Edinburgh in 1711. He was designed for the law, but having no inclination to that profession, he applied to mercantile pursuits, and became, in 1734, clerk in an eminent house at Bristol. He did not, however, continue long in that line; for, having a strong propensity to literature, he went to France, where he wrote his "Treatise of Human Nature," which he published at London in 1738. This metaphysical work, however, met with an indifferent reception; nor were his "Moral Essays," which appeared in 1742, more successful. In 1746 he became secretary to General St. Clair, whom he accompanied in his military embassy to the courts of Vienna and Turin. While at the latter city, he republished his first work, under a new title of "An Inquiry concerning Human Understanding;" and, in 1752, appeared at Edinburgh, his "Political Discourses," which were followed the same year by his "Inquiry concerning the Principles of Morals," which of all his writings he considered incomparably the best. In 1754 he published the first volume of his "History of England," which he did not complete till 1761. While this work was in progress he printed a piece, with the title of "The Natural History of Religion," which was attacked by Warburton in an anonymous tract, ascribed at the time to Dr. Hurd. His great work, the "History of England," had now acquired considerable celebrity, and the writer gained largely by its popularity, for besides the profits it brought him, he obtained a pension through Lord Bute. In 1763 he accompanied the earl of Hertford on his embassy to Paris, from whose fashionable and literary circles he received an enthusiastic welcome; and where, in 1765, he remained as chargé d'affaires. The year following he returned home, accompanied by Jean Jacques Rousseau, to whom he behaved with great delicacy and generosity. He then became under-secretary of state to General Conway. In 1769 he retired to his native country on an independent income of £1000 per annum. D. 1776.

HUMMEL, JOHN NEPOMUK, an eminent musician, was b. at Presburg, in 1778. His friends discovering in him an extraordinary capacity for music, he was placed with Mozart when only seven years of age; and after remaining under his roof about two years, he and his father travelled through various parts of Europe, visiting England in 1791, where his performances on the pianoforte were highly applauded. He soon acquired great celebrity as a composer as well as a performer. In 1820 he became chapel-master to the grand-duke of Weimar, where he continued afterwards to reside, making, from time to time, brilliant and profitable tours in Germany, Russia, and England. Hummel composed some operas, the most celebrated of which is "Mathilde von Guise;" his church music was also admirable; but his fame will chiefly rest upon his brilliant compositions for the pianoforte. D. 1837.

HUMPHREYS, DAVID, minister of the United States to the court of Spain, was b. in Connecticut in 1753, and received his education at Yale college. Soon after the commencement of the revolutionary war, he entered the army, and was successively an aid to Parsons, Putnam, Greene, and Washington. He left the army with the rank of colonel. In 1784 he was appointed secretary of legation to Paris, and was subsequently ambassador to the court of Lisbon, and in 1797 minister plenipotentiary to the court of Madrid. While in the military service, he published a poem addressed to the American armies, and after the war another "On the Happiness and Glory of America." In 1789 he published a "Life of General Putnam," and while in Europe a number of miscellaneous poems. D. 1818.—JAMES, an eminent lawyer and juridical writer; author of "Observations on the English Law of Real Property," &c. He was a native of Montgomeryshire, Wales; and d. in 1830.

HUMPHRY, OZIAS, an eminent miniature painter, b. at Honiton, Devon, in 1743. He first settled at Bath; then went to London, by the advice of his friend, Sir Joshua Reynolds, and was made a royal academician. In 1780 he went to India, where he was held in high esteem by Sir W. Jones and Warren Hastings, and was chosen one of the first members of the Asiatic Society. D. 1810.

HUNT, HENRY, was b. at Uphaven, Wilts; about the year 1773, where he was well known as an opulent farmer, and one who was a regular attendant at the Devizes market. When Mr. Hunt was a young man, he was a decided loyalist; but later in life he became a "radical reformer," associated with the most disaffected, and was looked up to by many of them as the fearless champion of their party. He long tried for a seat in parliament, but was unsuccessful at Bristol, Westminster, and for the county of Somerset. He was, however, twice elected for Preston, in 1830-1; but the year after his second return, his constituents declined his future services. As "lord of the manor of Glas-tonbury" he acted fairly at his court-leet; and, as a popular orator, he obtained notoriety; but a radical meeting at Manchester, where he presided and declaimed, having ended with loss of life and limb to many of the assembled multitude, he was indicted as the ringleader of an unlawful assembly of the people; tried, found guilty, and sentenced to three years' imprisonment in Hechester jail. But, though in confinement, he was not idle; he discovered and made known to the public some flagrant malpractices going on at the jail, which, through his means, were afterwards corrected. He was seized with paralysis while alighting from his phaeton at Alresford, Hants, where he d. 1835.

HUNTER, ROBERT, an English gentleman, who wrote the famous letter on Enthusiasm, which has been ascribed both to Swift and Shaftesbury. He was governor of New York and New Jersey several years, and afterwards of Jamaica, where he d. in 1734.—WILLIAM, a celebrated anatomist and physician, was b. at Kilbridge, Lanarkshire, 1718. His father was a farmer, and designed him for the church; but an acquaintance with Dr. Cullen inclining him to the study of physic, he resided with the doctor 3 years. In 1740 he removed to Edinburgh, where he followed his studies with intense application, and the year following visited London, soon after which he was taken by Dr. James Douglas into his house as a dissector, and also tutor to his son. In 1746 he succeeded Mr. Samuel Sharpe as lecturer to a society of surgeons in Covent-garden, and commenced a series of lectures on anatomy and surgery. He soon rose into extensive practice in surgery and midwifery, but confined himself to the latter, and in 1764 was appointed physician extraordinary to the queen. He was elected F. R. S.; became physician to the British Lying-in hospital; and on the foundation of the Royal Academy, the king appointed him professor of anatomy. In 1770, Dr. Hunter completed his house in Great Windmill-street, to which were attached a theatre, apartments for lectures and dissections, and a magnificent room as a museum. His valuable museum is now in the university of Glasgow. He wrote several able works on medical subjects, the most elaborate of which is "The Anatomy of the Gravid Uterus." D. 1783.—JOHN, younger brother of the preceding, was b. 1728, and apprenticed to a cabinet-maker; but, hearing of William's success in London, he offered his services to him as an anatomical assistant. In a few months he had attained such a knowledge of anatomy as to be capable of demonstrating to the pupils in the dissecting room. In 1753 he entered as a gentleman-commoner of St. Mary's hall, Oxford. In 1767 he was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society, and, the next year, he was elected one of the surgeons of St. George's hospital. In 1776 he was appointed surgeon extraordinary to the king; and, subsequently, inspector-general of hospitals and surgeon-general. He d. suddenly, having been seized with a spasmodic affection of the heart, in St. George's hospital, Oct. 16, 1793. He wrote several professional treatises, besides recording the results of many of his valuable discoveries in the "Philosophical Transactions."—ANNE, wife of the preceding, and sister of Sir Everard Home, was the author of many lyrical poems possessing much sweetness and beauty. Some of these were set to music by Haydn. B. 1742; d. 1821.—WILLIAM L. an eminent citizen of Rhode Island; from 1811 to 1821, senator in congress, and in 1844 minister to Brazil. B. 1774; d. 1849.

HUNTINGDON, HENRY OF, an ancient English historian, who flourished in the 11th and 12th centuries. He composed a general history of England from the earliest accounts to the death of King Stephen, in 1154, in 8 books; and, towards the conclusion, the author honestly acknowledges that it is only an abridgment, observing that to compose a complete history of England, many books were necessary which he could not procure.—SELINA, countess of, the second daughter of Washington, Earl Ferrers, was b. in 1707, and married in 1728 to Theophilus, earl of Huntingdon. After she became a widow, she espoused the principles of the Calvinistic Methodists, and patronized the famous George Whitefield, whom she constituted her chaplain; by the influence of her rank and fortune, appeared at the head of a sect; and, after the death of Whitefield, his followers were designated as the people of Lady Huntingdon. She founded schools and colleges for preachers, and expended annually large sums not only in their support, but in private charity. D. 1791.—WILLIAM, a religious enthusiast, was b. 1744. He was the son of a farmer's laborer in Kent, and the early part of his life was passed in menial service and other humble occupations. After indulging in vice and dissipation for several years, according to his own account, he was converted, and became a preacher among the Calvinistic Methodists. He soon engaged in religious controversies, published a vast number of tracts, and was regarded as the head of a peculiar set. His publications are very numerous, and some of them contain curious details relative to his personal history and religious experience. After the death of his first wife, he married the wealthy relict of Sir James Sanderson, a London alderman, and passed the latter part of his life in affluence. After his conversion, he generally appended to his name the mystical letters S. S., or Sinner Saved.

HUNTINGFORD, GEORGE ISAAC, a distinguished classical scholar, and an amiable dignitary of the church, was b. at Winchester, in 1748. Through the patronage of Lord Sidmouth, who had been his pupil at Winchester, he obtained the see of Gloucester in 1802, and that of Hereford in 1815. He was the author of "Greek Monostrophics," "A Call for Union with the Established Church," "Thoughts on the Trinity," &c. D. 1832.

HUNTINGTON, EBENEZER, a distinguished citizen of Connecticut, d. 1834, graduated at Yale college in 1775; joined the army near Boston the same year as a volunteer; in September was commissioned as a lieutenant; in 1776 was appointed a captain and also deputy adjutant-general; in 1777 a major; and in 1799 a lieutenant-colonel. He was present at the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown. In 1799 he was, at the recommendation of Washington, appointed a brigadier-general in the army raised by congress, when expectations were entertained of a war with France. D. 1834.—SAMUEL, a signer of the declaration of independence, was b. in 1732, in Connecticut, settled in early life at Norwich as a lawyer, and soon rose to popularity and eminence. In 1775 he was elected a delegate to congress, and in 1779 was chosen president of that venerable body. In 1784 he was appointed lieutenant-governor of his native state, and advanced to the seat of chief judge. He was chosen chief magistrate in 1786. D. 1796.

HUPAZOLI, FRANCIS, one of the few individuals who have lived in three centuries. He was b. in 1587, at Casal, in Sardinia, and d. in 1702. At first he was a clergyman, and afterwards became a merchant at Scio; and, in his 23d year, he was appointed Venetian consul at Smyrna. By his fifth wife, whom he married at the age of 98 years, he had four children. His drink was water; he never smoked, and ate little, (principally game and fruit.) He drank a good deal of the juice of the scorzonera root, ate but very little at night, went to bed and rose early, then heard mass, and walked and labored the whole day to the last. He wrote down every thing remarkable which he had witnessed, in 22 volumes. He never had a fever, was never bled, and never took any medicine. At the age of 100 his gray hair again became black. When 109 years old, he lost his teeth and lived on soup; and, four years later, he had two large new teeth, and began again to eat meat.

HURD, RICHARD, an eminent English prelate and philologist, was b. in 1720, at Congreve, in Staffordshire. In 1749 he published "Horatii Ars Poetica," with an English commentary. In 1750 he published a commentary on the "Epistle" of Horace to Augustus; and also a satirical attack on Doctor Jortin, in defence of Warburton, in an essay on the "Delicacy of Friendship," which he afterwards endeavored to suppress. His "Dialogues, Moral and Political," with "Letters on Chivalry and Romance," appeared, at different times, from 1758 to 1764, and were republished collectively, in 1765. None of his works attracted so much notice as the "Dialogues," which were translated into German. In 1767 he was made archdeacon of Gloucester; 1775 was raised to the bishopric of Lichfield and Coventry; and, not long after, was translated to the see of Worcester in 1781. D. 1805.

HURE, CHARLES, a French divine of the Jansenist persuasion, was b. 1639, and d. 1717. His works are a "Dictionary of the Bible," a "Translation of the New Testament into French," with notes, a "Sacred Grammar," &c.

HUSKISSON, WILLIAM, an English statesman, was b. in 1770. He was brought into parliament for Morpeth, by government interest, in 1797, from which time he connected himself on terms of friendship with Mr. Canning, and supported all the measures of the Pitt administration. During the Whig administration of 1806, he was an active member of the opposition; but on its dissolution he returned to office, and remained till the premiership of the duke of Wellington, with the short exception of an interval in 1809, when the quarrel took place between Mr. Canning and Lord Castlereagh, and he sided with the former in withdrawing from the government. When Mr. Canning was appointed to the government of India, Mr. Huskisson succeeded him as member of parliament for Liverpool; was successively treasurer of the navy, joint secretary of the treasury, vice-president and president of the board of trade, and was colonial secretary during the Liverpool and Canning administrations. It was during this latter period that he brought forward his celebrated free-trade measures. Mr. Huskisson d. at Manchester, September 15, 1830, in consequence of one of his legs being crushed, and other severe injuries sustained, by the wheels of a locomotive steam-engine coming in contact with him, while present at the celebration of the opening of the Liverpool and Manchester railway.

HUSS, JOHN, a celebrated Bohemian reformer and martyr, b. at Hussienitz, about 1376. He was the first opposer of the doctrine of transubstantiation, and the defender of Wickliff; for which he was burnt alive by order of the council of Constance, in 1415.

HUSSEY, GILES, an English painter, b. at Marnhull, in Dorsetshire, in 1710. He studied in France and Italy, possessed considerable talents, and painted some good pictures; but he was somewhat eccentric, and met with little encouragement in proportion to his merits. D. 1788.

HUTCHESON, FRANCIS, a metaphysical writer, was b. in 1694; studied at Glasgow; and, on his return to Ireland, officiated to a dissenting congregation, for some time, in the northern part of that kingdom; but, in 1729, he was elected professor of moral philosophy at Glasgow. He was the author of "An Inquiry into the Ideas of Beauty and Virtue," and a "Treatise on the Passions." In 1755, his son, DR. FRANCIS HUTCHESON, a physician of Glasgow, printed from his father's papers, "A System of Moral Philosophy," to which is prefixed an account of the author. D. 1747.

HUTCHINS, JOHN, an English divine and topographer, was b. in Dorsetshire, in 1696, and d. 1773. He was the author of the "History and Antiquities of the County of Dorset."—THOMAS, geographer-general to the United States of America, was b. in New Jersey, about 1730. He had served in the army against the Indians in Florida; was imprisoned in England, in 1779, on the charge of having corresponded with Dr. Franklin, then American agent in France; afterwards joined the army of General Greene, and d. at Pittsburg, in 1789. He published several topographical and historical works of considerable interest.

HUTCHINSON, ANN, a religious enthusiast in New England, who instituted meetings for women, in which she pretended to enjoy immediate revelations. By these means, great dissensions were caused in the churches, and in 1637 an ecclesiastical synod assembled and condemned her errors. Not long after, she was banished from the colony, where in 1643, she and her family, consisting of 15 persons, were captured by the Indians, and all except a daughter killed.—JOHN, an English philosophical and critical author, celebrated as the opponent of Dr. Woodward in natural history, and of Sir Isaac Newton in philosophy. B. 1674; d. 1737.—JOHN HELY, an Irish statesman and lawyer, was b. in 1715. He became secretary of state, and accumulated a number of lucrative employments. So great indeed was his avidity for office and emolument, that Lord North said, "If England and Ireland were given to this man, he would solicit the Isle of Man for a potato garden." He possessed great talents and eloquence, and d. 1794.—THOMAS, lord chief justice, and afterwards lieutenant-governor of the colony of Massachusetts, was b. at Boston, 1711. He had been greatly respected in his province for his able and irreprouchable conduct on the judicial bench; but having covertly taken part with Great Britain against the American colonies, and given the English ministers advice relative to the enforcement of the duty on tea, it was found necessary to remove him and place General Gage in his situation. He accordingly went to England, lived in a retired manner at Brompton, and d. there in 1780. Governor Hutchinson was the author of a "History of the Colony of Massachusetts Bay," &c.

HUTTEN, JACOB, a native of Silesia, who in the 16th century, founded a sect called the Bohemian or Moravian brethren. These were the descendants of the Hussites, and appear to have given rise to the Anabaptists. Hutten is supposed to have been burnt as a heretic at Inspruck.—ULRIC VON, a German soldier, poet, and miscellaneous writer, was b. at Steekelberg, in Franconia, in 1488. He was the most active of all the early reformers; and his writings against the church of Rome were so severe, that the pope sent orders to the inquisitor to seize him; but he fled into Switzerland, and d. near Zurich in 1523. His letters and poems are very classical. Hutten was one of the boldest and most free-spirited man of his time; injustice, falsehood, hypocrisy, and tyranny filled him with indignation, and he unmasked them with a spirit that knew no fear. Herder has collected his poems.

HÜTTER, ELIAS and LEONARD, two cotemporary Protestant divines, b. at Ulm, about the middle of the 16th century. The former is remarkable for having published a Hebrew Bible, containing no less than 30 versions of the 117th psalm in various languages. He also published a Polyglot Bible in four languages, Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and German; and he afterwards added to it the Italian, French, Slavonic, and Saxon. D. 1603.—LEONARD, who distinguished himself as a staunch supporter of the reformed church, published a variety of polemical treatises, obtained the divinity professor's chair at the university of Wittemberg, and d. in 1616.

HUTTON, CHARLES, an eminent mathematician, was b. at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, in 1737. Having made great progress in his mathematical studies, and distinguished himself by the production of a small work on the principles of bridges, he was appointed professor at the royal military college, Woolwich. He produced in 1796 his "Mathematical and Philosophical Dictionary," and in 1798 he gave to the world the first edition of his "Course of Mathematics." He was afterwards engaged with Dr. Pearson and Dr. Shaw in an abridgment of the Philosophical Transactions, for his labor in which work, it is said, he received £6000. He retired from his appointment at Woolwich in 1807, with a pension of £500. D. 1823.—JAMES, a celebrated geologist and natural philosopher, was b. in Edinburgh, in 1726. After finishing his education at the university, he was apprenticed to a writer to the signet, but quitted the legal profession for that of medicine, as being the nearest allied to chemistry, which was his favorite study. He in consequence went to the universities of Paris and Leyden, at the latter of which he took his degree in 1749; but on his return, being desirous of making himself conversant with agriculture, he settled upon a farm of his own in Berwickshire. In 1768 he went to Edinburgh, and from that time he devoted himself entirely to scientific pursuits, publishing numerous works, and investigating various subjects of natural philosophy. Dr. Hutton is chiefly distinguished as the author of a system or theory of geology, termed the Plutonian, by which the structure of the solid parts of the earth are accounted for by the action of subterraneous fire. This theory excited a warm controversy among men of science, and met with many fierce opponents; but the late Professor Playfair advocated it in his "Illustrations of the Huttonian Theory of the Earth," and it has since been gradually rising into repute. Among the chief works of Hutton are, "The Progress of Reason from Sense to Science and Philosophy," and a "Theory of the Earth, with Proofs and Illustrations." D. 1797, HUYGENS, CHRISTIAN, an eminent mathematician and astronomer, was b. at the Hague, in 1629. He was the son of Constantine Huygens, lord of Zuylichem, a nobleman of great scientific abilities, who initiated his son in the principles of general science and classical learning, and sent him to the university of Leyden. He soon distinguished himself by the publication of several learned works, both astronomical and mathematical; he also invented the pendulum, improved the air-pump, ascertained the laws of collision of elastic bodies, and discovered the ring and one of the satellites of Saturn, of which he gave an account in his "Systema Saturninum." He visited both France and England for scientific purposes; was made a fellow of the Royal Society in 1661, and shortly after, at the invitation of Colbert, he settled in France, where he received a handsome pension, and remained till 1681, when he returned to his native country, and d. 1695.

HUYSUM, JOHN VAN, a celebrated painter, was b. in 1682, at Amsterdam, where his father, Justus van Huysum, was a respectable artist. John was the most distinguished flower and fruit painter of modern times, and his pictures fetched enormous prices; his landscapes were also highly esteemed. He d. in 1749.—He had two brothers, JUSTUS and JACOB, the former painted battles, and d. in his 22d year; the latter copied the works of John with great exactness, and d. in London, in 1740.

HYDE, THOMAS, a learned divine and orientalist, was b. in 1636, at Billingsley, in Shropshire, and studied at King's college, Cambridge. While there, before he was 18, he assisted Walton in his great Polyglot bible. In 1658 he went to Oxford, and became successively Hebrew reader and keeper of the Bodleian Library. He was next promoted to a prebend in Salisbury cathedral, and afterwards appointed regius professor of Hebrew, and canon of Christ-church, Oxford. D. 1703. His "Veterum Persarum et Medorum Historia" is regarded as a highly valuable work.

HYDER ALI, or HYDER ALLY KHAN, a celebrated Indian prince, who, during the latter part of the 18th century, was a formidable enemy to the English in Hindostan, was the son of a petty chief in the Mysore. He introduced the European discipline among his troops, became general-in-chief of the forces of Cinoas, who then reigned at Seringapatam as a vassal of the great Mogul; and having quarrelled with the grand vizier, got him into his power, and eventually assumed the sovereignty himself. He made important conquests from the Mahrattas, twice invaded the East India Company's territories, and at one time caused the greatest apprehension for the safety of the British power in the East. A treaty was concluded in 1769, which was broken in 1780, and the war renewed with vigor; but the skill of Sir Eyre Coote proved superior to Hyder, who left the military operations to his son Tippoo Saib. D. 1782.

HYPATIA, a female philosopher, of the eclectic sect, was the daughter of Theon, a celebrated mathematician, who governed the Platonic school in Alexandria, in the 4th century. She early exhibited proofs of extraordinary genius and judgment; and being educated by her father in all he knew, she became a preceptress in the school in which Hierocles and other celebrated philosophers had presided. Her ready elocution, her beauty, and graceful address, united with deep erudition and sound judgment, procured her the admiration of all her hearers; and her house became the resort of all the learned and eminent persons in Alexandria, among whom was Orestes, the governor. This roused the jealousy of Cyril, a haughty and intolerant prelate, at that time the patriarch of Alexandria; and such was the blind bigotry and resentment of his monkish partisans, that they conspired against Hypatia's life, and a furious band of assassins seizing her as she was returning home from the schools, they dragged her through the streets, murdered her in the most barbarous manner, and threw her mangled limbs into the flames, A. D. 415.

IBRAHIM MANSOUR EFFENDI, an adventurer, whose real name was Cerfbere, was b. at Strasburg, of a Jewish family. After having served in the republican hussars, he became so violent a royalist that he was imprisoned. In 1802 he went to Constantinople, turned Mahometan, and was employed to discipline the Turkish troops. He subsequently wandered through Russia, Sweden, and Denmark; held, under the name of Medelsheim, a government office in Westphalia; fought against the Servians; was, for three years, engineer to Ali Paeha; recommenced his wanderings, and extended them to various parts of Asia, Africa, and America; and at last, being in a starving state, shot himself at Paris, in 1826. He wrote a "Memoir of Greece and Albania, during the Government of Ali Paeha."

IBYCUS, a Greek lyric poet, a native of Rhegium, was b. in the 6th century B. C. He wrote seven books of odes, of which only a few fragments are extant. He was killed in a solitary spot by robbers, whose crime is said to have been discovered in a singular manner. While dying, he saw a flight of cranes passing, and called upon them to avenge him. As the murderers were walking in Rhegium, one of them saw some cranes overhead, and said to his companions, "Here are the avengers of Ibycus." This speech excited suspicion, and the truth was wrung from the criminals by torture.

IFFLAND, AUGUSTUS WILLIAM, a popular actor and dramatist, was b. at Hanover, in 1759, and from his childhood had a propensity to the stage, which his father vainly endeavored to repress. In 1770 he absconded from his home, and made his appearance at the Gotha theatre. He soon rose to the first rank among German actors. As a writer he was almost equally successful. In 1798 he published an edition of his works, which contained 47 comedies and tragedies; and he subsequently wrote many others. D. 1814.

IGNARRA, NICHOLAS, a learned Neapolitan antiquary, b. in 1728. He was educated at the college of Urbano, at Naples, and at the age of 20 he taught Greek in that seminary. When Charles III. founded the Herulanean academy, in 1755, Ignarra was appointed one of the first members. In 1763 he succeeded Mazzochias, professor of sacred literature in the royal university, and in 1771 he became principal professor. In 1782 he was nominated director of the royal printing-office; and two years after, tutor to the hereditary Prince Francis of Bourbon. He was made a canon of the cathedral of Naples, 1794, and d. in 1808. His principal work is entitled, "De Palaestra Neapolitana Commentarium," 1770, a very learned production. He also published "The Life of Mazzochi," and other pieces.

IGNATIUS, ST., a father of the church, made bishop of Antioch by St. John the evangelist. After exhibiting many virtues in his province, he was seized by Adrian, and exposed to the fury of wild beasts in the Roman amphitheatre. Seven of his epistles are preserved.—A patriarch of Constantinople, was son of the Emperor Michael Curopalata, by Procopia, and presided at the eighth general council of that see. D. 878.

IGNATIUS DE LOYOLA, the founder of the order of the Jesuits, was b. in 1491, of a noble family, in the Spanish province of Guipuscoa. In 1521 he was severely wounded at the siege of Pampeluna. The result of his meditations on a bed of pain was, sorrow for his past debauched life, and a determination to devote himself to works of piety. He began by a pilgrimage to Jerusalem; after which he studied at Alcalá, Salamanca, and Paris; and began to preach and to make disciples. At first he was opposed, and even imprisoned; but at length the pope, in 1540, gave his sanction to the new order which Loyola had established, and appointed him its first general. He d. in 1556, and was canonized in 1622.

HIRE, JOHN, an erudite Swede, was b. at Upsal, in 1707; was educated at the university there; became professor of poetry, rhetoric, and politics; was ennobled and made a knight of the Polar Star; and d. 1780. He is the author of "Lexicon Dialectorum," "Glossarium Sueco-Gothicum," "A Dissertation on Runic Antiquities," and other works.

INCHBALD, ELIZABETH, a dramatist and novelist, whose maiden name was Simpson, was b. in 1756, at Stanningfield, near Bury, in Suffolk. At the age of 16 she secretly quitted her family, being prompted by an irrepressible desire of visiting the metropolis. After escaping many dangers in her rash adventure, she married Mr. Inchbald, of Drury-lane theatre, and was for several years upon the stage. In 1789, however, she quitted it, and thenceforth depended upon her literary labors. She d. in 1821. She wrote 19 dramas, some of which were deservedly successful; and two novels, "The Simple Story," and "Nature and Art," which rank among the standard works in that class of literature; and she edited "The British Theatre," "The Modern Theatre," and a "Collection of Farces."

INCHOFER, MELCHIOR, a German Jesuit, was b. in Vienna, in 1584. He wrote a book, entitled, "The Virgin Mary's Letter to the people of Messina proved to be genuine," which gave great offence to his brethren, whom he found great difficulty in appeasing. He also wrote a satire against them, which was printed after his death under the title of "Monarchia Solipsorum." He also wrote the "Ecclesiastical History of Hungary," &c. D. at Milan, 1648.

INCLEDON, BENJAMIN CHARLES, a celebrated English singer, was b. at St. Keveran, in Cornwall, in 1764, where his father practised as a surgeon. When only eight years old, the astonishing fine tones of his voice induced his parents to article him to Jackson, of Exeter, under whose tuition he remained, as a chorister in Exeter cathedral, until he was 15. Not liking the restraints to which he was necessarily subject, he abruptly quitted his place in 1779. In 1790 he made his debut at Covent-garden theatre, with great success, as Dermot, in "The Poor Soldier," and rose at once into a degree of popularity, which attended him till the infirmities consequent upon advancing years, and an irregular mode of life, compelled him to quit the stage. His voice combined uncommon power, sweetness, and flexibility, both in the natural tones and the falsetto, and his intonation was singularly correct. Indeed, those who have heard him in "The Storm," "Black-eyed Susan," or any of the better sort of the old English ballads and hunting-songs, will not easily forget a style of singing which, we believe, has seldom, if ever, had its equal. D. 1826.

INGENHOUSZ, JOHN, a physician and experimental philosopher, was b. in 1730, at Breda, in Holland; settled in London, where he was chosen a member of the Royal Society; was recommended by Sir John Pringle to inoculate the family of the Empress Maria Theresa; resided for many years at Vienna, in the enjoyment of honors and fortune; and at length returned to England, where he d. in 1799. He is the author of "Experiments on Vegetables," "Experiments in and Observations on Natural Philosophy," and other works of great merit.

INGERSOLL, JARED, a judge of the admiralty court of Connecticut, graduated at Yale college, in 1742. He settled at New Haven as a lawyer, and was agent of the colony in England, in 1757; but being appointed distributor of the stamps in Connecticut, under the stamp act, he lost his popularity. The people of New Haven compelled him to resign. Not deeming this resignation explicit, a large company from the eastern part of Connecticut set out on a journey to New Haven. They met Mr. Ingersoll at Wethersfield, when they compelled him to resign, and cry out three times, "Liberty and Property." The next day 500 men escorted him to Hartford. He was afterwards judge of the admiralty. D. 1781.

INMAN, HENRY, an eminent portrait painter of New York, was b. at Utica, 1801. In 1812 he removed to New York, and became a pupil of the famous Jarvis. He subsequently achieved a brilliant reputation as an artist.

INNOCENT I., a native of Albano, elected pope after Anastasius the first,

402. He defended Chrysostom, and condemned the Novatians and Pelagians. D. 417.—II., was elected pope after Honorius II., though part of the cardinals protested against his elevation to the papal chair, by appointing the son of a Jew, of the name of Peter de Leo, who assumed the appellation of Anacletus II. Innocent, though supported by the princes of Europe, except the kings of Scotland and Sicily, who acknowledged the authority of his rival, was at last driven from Rome by the tumults of Arnould de Bresse, and retired to France, where he held several councils at Clermont, Rheims, Puy, and other places. After the death of Anacletus, and the abdication of his successor, Victor IV., he returned to Rome, where he held the second Lateran council in 1139, attended by 1000 bishops, and crowned Lothaire as emperor. He afterwards made war against Roger, king of Sicily, and d. at Rome, 1143.—III., Lothaire Conti, a native of Anagni, raised to the popedom, 1198, after Celestinus III. though only 37 years old. To unite the Christian princes in the recovery of the Holy Land, he preached a crusade against the Albigenses of Languedoc, and afterwards put Philip Augustus of France under an interdict, and excommunicated John, king of England, and Raymond, count of Toulouse. He raised the papal authority to such a height that the Roman republic in its brightest days, was never more powerful, so that the pope was no longer the vassal of the neighboring princes, but the temporal master of all sovereigns, whom he could depose or restore agreeably to his absolute will. Under Innocent, the Dominicans, Franciscans, Trinitarians, and other orders arose, which were still to spread farther, and to confirm the power of Rome. This pope, thus distinguished by political sagacity and courtly intrigue, d. at Perouse, 1216.—IV., Sinibaldi de Fiesque, chancellor of the Roman church, and cardinal, was elected pope, 1243, after the death of Celestinus IV. He was early engaged in a quarrel with Frederic, emperor of Germany, who wished to invade the rights of the church, and he held a council at Lyons, in which he excommunicated and deposed the imperial delinquent. This severe measure was displeasing to several princes, but Louis, king of France, interfered in vain with the inexorable pontiff, and the dispute was terminated only by the death of the emperor. He wrote "Apparatus super Decretales," and was the first who invested the cardinals with a red hat, as a mark of their dignity. D. 1254.—V., Peter de Tarantaise, a Dominican, archbishop of Lyons, and a cardinal, made pope, 1276. He wrote "Notes on the Epistles of St. Paul," commentaries, and other works. D. 1276.—VI., Stephen Albert, a native of Pompador, in Limoges, was bishop of Ostia, and a cardinal, and in 1352, elected pope after Clement VI. He was of a peaceful disposition, and labored earnestly to reconcile the kings of England and France. He is blamed for bestowing too many honors on his family, though their good conduct deserved the highest dignities. D. 1362.—VII., Come de Meliorati, a native of Sulmone in Abruzzo, was elected pope, 1404, but opposed by the arms of Ladislaus, king of Naples, who drove him from Rome. D. 1406.—VIII., John Baptist Cibo, a noble Genoese, of Greek extraction, bishop of Melfi, elected pope, 1484. He labored much to re-establish union among Christian princes, and showed himself particularly attentive to the interests of his family, and of his children, whom he had had before he was admitted into the church. He was a benevolent pontiff, and d. of an apoplectic fit, 1492.—IX., John Anthony Faechinetti, a native of Bologna, made a cardinal by Gregory XIII. for his services at the council of Trent. He was elected pope, 29th October, 1591, and d. two months after.—X., John Baptist Pamphili, a native of Rome, who succeeded Urban VIII., 1644, at the age of 72. He persecuted the Barberinis, to whom he was indebted for his elevation, and he published his bull against the five propositions of the Jansenists. D. 1655.—XI., Benedict Odescalchi, a native of Como, in the Milanese, was made a bishop and a cardinal by Pope Innocent X., and elected pope 1676. He reformed several abuses in the ecclesiastical states, and opposed with great firmness Louis XIV. by refusing to admit to bishoprics those persons who were recommended to him by the monarch, so that at his death not less than thirty dioceses were vacant. He condemned the errors of the Molinists and the Quietists, and effected a strong coalition between Germany, Poland, and Venice, against the Turks. D. 1689.—XII., Anthony Pignatelli, a noble Neapolitan, raised to the papal chair, 1691, after Alexander VIII. He issued a bull against the system adopted by his predecessor, of paying particular honors to the relations of popes, and condemned the "Maxims of the Saints," written by Fenelon, archbishop of Cambray. D. 1700.

IRELAND, SAMUEL, was originally a silk manufacturer in Spitalfields; but having a taste for the arts, he became a speculator in scarce books, prints, &c., and published many embellished tours. In 1796 his character sustained a deep injury in consequence of the part he took in the publication of an impudent forgery, fabricated by his son, which made a great noise at the time, and was entitled "Miscellaneous Papers and Legal Instruments, under the hand and seal of William Shakspeare," &c. His son, however, acquitted him of wilful participation in this gross literary fraud, in what he termed an "Authentic Account of the Shakspeare Manuscripts." Besides a variety of "Picturesque Tours" above alluded to, Samuel Ireland published a work in one volume, entitled "Graphic Illustrations of Hogarth." D. 1800.

IRENÆUS, St., a Christian martyr in the 2d century, was bishop of Lyons. He was a man of considerable learning, and animated with an ardent zeal for Christianity; in which cause he suffered during the fifth persecution under Septimus Severus, in 202, and is honored as a saint.

IRENE, an empress of Constantinople, alike famous for her talents, her beauty, and her crimes, was by birth an Athenian, and married Leo IV., after whose death, in 769, she raised herself and her son Constantine VI., who was then but 9 years old, to the imperial throne. Charlemagne at that time menaced the Eastern empire. Irene at first delayed him by promises; and at length went so far as to oppose him, arms in hand; but he totally defeated her army in the year 788. When Constantine had arrived at manhood, he refused to permit her to participate longer in the government, and actually reigned alone seven years; but the inhuman and unnatural empress caused him to be deprived of his sight, and assumed the sovereignty. Her entrance into Constantinople on a triumphal car of gold and precious stones, her liberality to the people, the freedom which she bestowed on all prisoners, and other artifices employed by her, were not sufficient to secure her from the consequences of her criminal accession. Nicephorus, who was placed on the imperial throne, exiled her to the isle of Lesbos, where she d. in 803.

IRETON, HENRY, a soldier, statesman, and regieie, was b. at Attenton, in Nottinghamshire, in 1610; studied at Trinity college, Oxford, and the Middle Temple; and on the breaking out of the rebellion, joined the parliamentarians, the left wing of whose army he commanded at the battle of Naseby. Having married a daughter of Oliver Cromwell, he soon rose to preferments; sat in judgment upon the king, whom he had previously betrayed; and was appointed commander-in-chief in Ireland, where he d. in 1651. His body was brought to England, and buried in Westminster abbey till the restoration, when it was taken up, suspended at the gallows, and then thrown into a pit with those of Cromwell and Bradshaw.

IRVING, WILLIAM, a merchant of the city of New York. He was also distinguished as a gentleman of literary taste, and in 1812 became a member of congress. Mr. I. was a brother of Washington Irving; and it is said furnished several papers for the noted work under the name of "Salmagundi." D. 1821.—EDWARD, a native of Annan, Scotland, was b. in 1792. He received the first rudiments of classical education of the village schoolmaster, which he completed at the university of Edinburgh. When a mere child he is said to have been singular in his way of thinking, habits, and amusements; and, before he had reached the 17th year of his age, he was recommended as a teacher of the mathematics, by Professor Leslie, to an academy at Haddington. That situation he left, in order to fill a similar one at Kirkkaldy, where he remained seven years, and during which time he became enamored of Miss Isabella Martin, whom he afterwards married. In 1819 he went to Edinburgh, with a determination of becoming a preacher of the gospel; and on Dr. Chalmers hearing him in the pulpit, he appointed him his assistant at St. John's church, Glasgow. In 1823 he was appointed to preach at the Caledonian asylum, in Cross-street, Hatton-garden. The force, eloquence, and, it may be added, the novelty of style and manner of Mr. Irving, drew such large congregations to the Caledonian asylum, that those only were admitted who could procure tickets—even for "standing room;" while these were chiefly distributed among the noble, wealthy, and liberal of both sexes. He published many of his sermons and opinions; and on becoming acquainted with Mr. Drummond, joined "the prophets," as they were called, of Albany park, the seat of the latter. These "prophets" were twenty or thirty persons assembled together at the above-named seat, for the express object of studying, or elucidating, "the sublime science of sacred prophecy," accounts of which were published in 1827. In the course of this and the following year the change in Mr. Irving's doctrines became evident to his former admirers; and in 1830 he was charged with heresy by the Scotch church in London. Proceedings of the presbytery were carried on against him; and the judgment of that body being approved by the trustees of the National Scotch church, which had been erected for him in Regent square, he was dismissed therefrom, and afterwards deposed by the presbytery of Annan. He then removed to Newman-street to preach, and grew wilder than ever, till he d. 1834.

IRWIN, EYLES, was b. at Calcutta, of Irish parents, in 1748, and received his education in England. In 1767 he returned to the East in a civil capacity, but was suspended in 1777, for his attachment to Lord Pigot; on which he came to Europe over land to seek redress, obtained it, and was restored to his former station at Madras, whither he again repaired. In 1785 he returned again to England; but in 1792 he went to China to superintend the Company's affairs; after which he revisited England, where he d. in 1817. His works are "Adventures during a Voyage up the Red Sea, and a Journey across the Desert," "Eastern Eclogues," an "Epistle to Mr. Hayley," "Ode on the Death of Hyder Ali," "An Inquiry into the Feasibility of Bonaparte's Expedition into the East," "Napoleon, or the Vanity of Human Wishes," &c.

ISAAC, KARO, a rabbi, who was forced to quit Spain in consequence of the edict of Ferdinand and Isabella in 1499, which compelled the Jews to leave that country within 4 months, or become Christians. He first went to Portugal, and from thence to Jerusalem, but was so unfortunate as to lose all his children on their journey, as well as his library. He then passed the remainder of his life in solitude, occupying himself in writing a "Commentary on the Pentateuch."

ISAACSON, HENRY, the author of a valuable system of chronology, was the son of Richard Isaacson, sheriff of London. B. 1581; d. 1684.

ISABELLA OF CASTILE, the celebrated queen of Spain, daughter of John II., was b. 1451, and married, in 1469, Ferdinand V., king of Aragon. After the death of her brother, Henry IV., in 1474, she ascended the throne of Castile, to the exclusion of her eldest sister, Joanna, who had the rightful claim to the crown. After the kingdoms of Aragon and Castile were united, Ferdinand and Isabella together assumed the royal title of Spain. She was haughty and ambitious; but with the graces and charms of her sex, Isabella united the courage of a hero, and the sagacity of a statesman and legislator; she was always present at the transaction of state affairs, and her name was placed beside that of her husband in public ordinances. Private warfare, which had formerly prevailed to the destruction of public tranquillity, she checked, and introduced a vigorous administration of justice. D. 1504.

ISÆUS, an Athenian orator, the pupil of Lysias and Isocrates. He lived in the first half of the 4th century B. C., was wholly unconnected with public affairs, and devoted himself to the task of instructing others. Eleven of his orations are still extant.

ISCANUS, JOSEPHUS, or JOSEPH OF EXETER, was a distinguished writer of Latin poetry, who accompanied Richard Cœur de Lion to Palestine. He was the author of an epic poem, entitled "Antiocheis," or the deeds of Richard, which the poet had himself witnessed. This is unfortunately lost; but another, on the Trojan war is still extant. Warton styles Iscanus "the miracle of his age in classical composition." D. 1224.

ISELIN, ISAAC, a German philosopher, and an ingenious writer, b. at Basle, in 1728, of the grand council of which city he became secretary in 1756. His principal work is entitled "The History of Mankind," but many others came from his pen. D. 1782.

ISEMBERT OF XAINTES, a French architect of the 12th century, whose skill in building the bridges of Xaintes and Rochelle, induced John, king of England, to recommend him to the citizens of London, in 1201, as an engineer, or architect, who might be useful to them in completing the bridge over the Thames then building.

ISIDORE OF MILETUS, a Greek architect of the 6th century, who, together with Anthemius, was employed by the Emperor Justinian, to erect the church of St. Sophia, at Constantinople. It is now used as a mosque.—OF PELUSIUM, a saint in the Roman calendar, and so called from his retiring to a solitude near the town which bears that name, was a celebrated disciple of St. Chrysostom, and flourished in the 5th century. He wrote 3000 epistles on theological questions and ecclesiastical discipline.—OF SEVILLE, another Roman saint, was b. at Carthage, of which his father was governor. Isidore succeeded his brother in the bishopric of Seville in 601, and d. in 636. His works are numerous, and among them is a chronicle, ending at the year 626.

ISOCRATES, one of the greatest orators of Greece, was b. at Athens, 436 B. C., and was the son of a musical instrument-maker. His principal teachers were Gorgias, Prodicus, and Theramenes. On account of his weak voice and natural timidity, he took but little share himself in public speaking, but he applied himself with the greatest ardor to instruction in the art of eloquence, and preparing orations for others. He was particularly distinguished for a polished style and an harmonious construction of his sentences; his subjects were the most important points of morals and politics; and it is recorded to his honor that he never, by writing or accusation, injured a single individual. He was warmly attached to the liberties of his country; and such his grief on hearing of the fatal battle of Cheronæa, that he took no food for four days, and literally died of starvation, in the 98th year of his age.

ITURBIDE, AUGUSTIN, emperor of Mexico, was b. at Valladolid, in New Spain, 1784, and entered the military service at the age of 17. In 1819 he was invited to take the command of an army destined to the south, and he marched to Acapulco. There he matured a plan, the professed object of which was the emancipation of Mexico from the yoke of Spain, the independence of the country, the protection of religion, and the union of the Spaniards and Mexicans. On the strength of this plan Iturbide continued his march to Queretaro, and was soon joined by Victoria, the most devoted of the friends of liberty. He took possession of the capital in the name of the nation, and established a regency, consisting of members nominated by himself, and wholly under his control. Finding that the republicans saw through his intentions, and were opposed to his domination, he resolved to preserve his authority by boldly usurping the crown; and, accordingly, through the subserviency of his troops, and the concurrence of a portion of the deputies, he was proclaimed emperor, May 18, 1822. But defection now became general among the officers of the army, and in all the provinces, so that Iturbide saw plainly that his cause was hopeless, and hastily assembled at Mexico the dispersed members of congress, and tendered to them his abdication of the crown, March 20, 1823. Congress agreed to grant Iturbide a large yearly pension, on condition of his leaving the Mexican territory for ever, and residing somewhere in Italy. He proceeded to the coast, and embarked, 1823, for Leghorn. He might have continued to live happily in one of the charming villas of Tuscany, had he not been impelled by an ambition to attempt the recovery of his lost empire. With this object he left Italy for England, and embarked for Mexico, precisely a year after his departure from it, and arrived in sight of the port of Soto la Marina, July 14. During the year that had elapsed, the Mexicans had adopted a republican constitution. The government had been apprised of his leaving Italy, and suspected his design. A decree was passed, 1824, declaring him to be proscribed as a traitor, and requiring that, in case he landed in the country, the mere fact should render him a public enemy. Wholly deceived in the fate which awaited him, Iturbide landed at Soto la Marina, accompanied only by Beneski, his secretary, and was almost immediately arrested by order of La Garza, commander of the province of New Santander. La Garza lost no time in conducting his prisoner to Padilla, the capital of the province. His fate was for a short time delayed; sentence of immediate death was pronounced; and he was shot, July 19, 1824.

IVANOF, FEODOR FEODOROVITSCHEV, a Russian dramatist, was b. in 1777. He first served in the army, from which he was removed to the commissariat department, was the author of several comedies, and a tragedy called "Martha, or the Conquest of Novogorod." D. 1816.

IVES, JOHN, an English antiquary, was b. at Yarmouth, in 1751. He became Suffolk herald extraordinary, and published three numbers of select papers on subjects of English antiquities; also "Remarks on the Garianonum of the Romans," "Remarks on English Coins," &c. D. 1776.

IVETAUX, NICHOLAS VAUQUELIN, Seigneur d', a French poet and man of letters, b. 1559. He wrote a clever poem, entitled "Institution d'un Prince," and a variety of other pieces. D. 1649.

IZAACKE, RICHARD, author of "The Antiquities, or Memorials of the City of Exeter." was b. there, filled the offices of town-clerk and chamberlain, and d. in 1700.

J.

JABLONOWSKY, JOSEPH ALEXANDER VON, a Polish prince, b. in 1712. Preferring a life of literary ease, he resigned his dignity when the troubles broke out in his country, and went to live at Leipsic, where he distinguished himself as the patron of science, founded a society, called by his name, which still exists. He wrote "The Lives of Twelve Generals," a "Treatise on Slavonic Poetry," and other works. D. 1777.

JACKSON, ANDREW, president of the United States from 1829 to 1837, was b. in South Carolina, 1767. His father was an Irish emigrant. At the age of 16 he took part in the war of independence; at the close of which he became a law student, and was thus enabled to discharge efficiently some high legal offices in Tennessee, to which he was subsequently appointed. On the breaking out of the war with England in 1812, he took vigorous measures for the defence of the menaced territory; in 1814 he was appointed major-general; and, among other exploits, which raised him to the highest point of popularity, he gained the decisive victory over the English, Jan. 8, 1815, at New Orleans, which put an end to the war. The same success attended his arms against the Creek tribes, whom he repeatedly subdued. In 1821 he was appointed governor of Florida; and his gallant deeds being still fresh in his countrymen's recollection, he was brought forward by the democratic party as a candidate for the presidency, elected in 1829, and re-elected in 1833. His period of office is chiefly remarkable for the extension of democratic tendencies which took place during it. He obtained from France the payment of an indemnity of twenty-five millions of francs for injuries done to the commerce of the United States during the empire. His refusal to renew the bank charter, in 1833, led to one of the most violent financial struggles on record. General Jackson was endowed with inflexible will, an ardent patriotism, and was always the idol of the people. D. 1845.—JOHN, a learned Hebraist and controversial writer, was

b. at Lensy, in Yorkshire, in 1686. The corporation of Doncaster gave him the living of Rossington, but the pertinacity with which he supported his Arian principles prevented his further rise in the church. He was the author of "Chronological Antiquities;" and left behind him the character of a learned and sincere writer, though strongly tinctured with the faults of a violent polemic. D. 1763.—JOHN, an eminent English portrait painter, was b. at Lastingham, in Yorkshire, in 1778, and apprenticed to his father, who was a tailor; but discovering a decided talent for the art in which he afterwards excelled, his abilities procured him the protection of Sir George Beaumont, through whose means he removed to London, and studied at the Royal Academy. At the time he entered the great theatre of art, Lawrence, Opie, Beechey, and other eminent masters pre-occupied the particular branch he had chosen, and for a time he contented himself with painting portraits in water-colors, in which he was very successful. He was, however, determined to take a high stand, if possible, as a portrait painter in oil; and the tact with which he copied the works of the old masters surprised his contemporaries. He was elected royal academician in 1817; and when, in 1819, he travelled through Italy, and visited Rome with Mr. Chantrey, he was chosen a member of the academy of St. Luke. D. 1831.—WILLIAM, a musical composer and author, was b. in 1730, at Exeter, and received the rudiments of a classical education, with a view to his following one of the liberal professions. His taste for music displayed itself, however, so decidedly while he was yet a youth, that his friends were induced to place him under Travers, the organist of the cathedral belonging to his native city. Having passed two years in the metropolis, he returned to Exeter in 1750, and, succeeding eventually to the situation of organist, there passed the remainder of his life. He published several books of songs, canzonets, hymns, and sonatas of his composition, which are still held in esteem for their chasteness of conception and truth of expression; he was also the author of a treatise "On the Present State of Music," "The Four Ages," &c. D. 1804.

JACOBI, JOHN GEORGE, a German poet, was b. in 1740, at Dusseldorf; studied at Gottingen; was professor of philosophy and eloquence at Halle; and, subsequently, of the belles lettres at Friburg, which he retained during his life. The style of Jacobi was formed on that of the lighter French poets, and possesses much ease and gayety. D. 1814.

JACOBS, FREDERIC, a celebrated philological writer, was b. at Gothar, in Saxony, in 1764. In 1785 he became a teacher in the gymnasium of his native city, where he published a number of excellent works, of which, independent of those of a critical or philological character, may be noticed his "School for Women," and "Tales." D. 1847.—

JURIEN, was a native of Switzerland, b. in 1610. He studied under Snyder, and is celebrated for the fidelity and spirit with which he painted the animals in his hunting pieces.—LUCAS, commonly called LUCAS VAN LEYDEN, was b. at Leyden, in 1494. He studied under his father, Hugh Jacobs, and next under Cornelius Engelbrecht. Many of his pictures in oil and distemper are to be found on the Continent; but he is now best known by his engravings. D. 1533.

JACOPONE, DA TONI, so called on account of his birthplace, was an Italian poet, whose real name was JACOPO DE BENEDETTI. On being left a widower he distributed his property among the poor, and entered into the order of Minorites as a servitor. He composed Sacred Canticles, Latin poems, and the famous "Stabat Mater," since so celebrated by the compositions of Haydn, Pergolesi, &c. D. 1306.

JACOTOT, JEAN JOSEPH, originally a captain of artillery in Napoleon's army, and subsequently sub-director of the Polytechnic school, was deprived of his office at the restoration for having been a member of the chamber during the "hundred days." Retiring to Belgium, he there conceived and put into partial practice a new system of education, on the principle that all intelligences are equal, the only difference between man and man being the result of circumstances more than of nature. He has left several works upon the subject, interesting for ingenuity, if not for correctness. B. 1770; d. 1840.

JACQUARD, JOSEPH MARIE, the inventor of the beautiful apparatus for figured weaving, which bears his name, was b. at Lyons, 1752. At an early age he displayed a taste for mechanics, which distinguished him through life; and whether in book-binding, type-founding, or cutlery—all of which he tried in his youth—he showed a strong aptitude for improvement. On his father's death, he attempted to carry on the weaving business, which he inherited from him, but with little success; and soon afterwards, during the troubles of the French revolution, he lost his little all, having been compelled to flee from Lyons after its reduction by the army of the convention. He then joined the army of the Rhine; but having seen his son fall in battle by his side, he once more returned to Lyons, where he was obliged to earn a precarious sustenance in the humble occupation of plaiting straw. But a new era was now in store for him. In 1801 he submitted to the "National Exposition" his celebrated machine, which forms a memorable epoch in the textile art; and its merits being at once acknowledged and rewarded, he was soon afterwards employed by Napoleon in the "Conservatoire des Arts et des Métiers," at Paris, where he introduced some ingenious improvements in the models and machinery there in use. On his return to Lyons, he had to struggle against much opposition and prejudice on the part of the weavers; but he outlived it all, and long before his death he had the satisfaction of seeing his machinery introduced into every European and American manufactory; and so far from diminishing employment, as some feared on its first introduction, it has increased the number of workmen in the operations to which it is applied tenfold. D. 1834.

JAHN, JOHN, a learned orientalist, who after having been professor of biblical archæology and theology in the university of Vienna, obtained the chair of oriental literature, which, in 1806, he was obliged to relinquish on account of his heterodoxy. He published a "Hebrew Bible," "Biblical Archæology," "Enchiridion Hermeneuticæ generalis Tabularum veteris et novi Fœderis," &c.; and his works on the philology of the sacred writings are said to be the most valuable extant. D. 1817.

JAMBlichus, a philosopher who flourished at the beginning of the fourth century, and was a native of Chalcis in Cœlosyria. He was the disciple of Ana-tolius and Porphyry, from whom he learnt the mysteries of the Plotinian system of philosophy, which he taught with great reputation. Among the philosophical works of Jamblichus now extant are, "The Life of Pythagoras," "An Exhortation to the Study of Philosophy," and a "Treatise on the Mysteries of the Egyptians, Chaldeans, and Assyrians."

JAMES I., king of Scotland, of the house of Stuart, b. in 1394, was the son of Robert III. In 1405 he was taken by the English on his passage to France, and kept in confinement 18 years. In 1424 he obtained his liberty, and severely punished those who had governed his country in his absence; for which, and some strong measures which he took to curb a lawless nobility, he fell a victim to assassins, who gained admission to his apartment, and murdered him in his bed, in 1437.—V., of Scotland, succeeded, in 1513, at the death of his father, James IV., though only 18 months old. At the age of 17 he assumed the government, and assisted Francis I. of France against Charles V., for which that prince gave him his daughter Margaret in marriage. On her decease he married Mary of Lorraine, daughter of Claude, duke of Guise. D. 1545.—I. of England, and VI. of Scotland, was the son of Mary, queen of Scotland, by Henry Stuart, Lord Darnley, and was b. in 1566. In the following year, Queen Mary being forced to resign the crown, he was solemnly crowned at Stirling, and all public acts ran in his name. In 1603, on the death of Elizabeth, James succeeded to the crown of England, and proceeded to London. He received during his lifetime a deal of adulation for his literary abilities; but though he was the author of some few books, they display more pedantry than learning. D. 1625.—II., king of England, second son of Charles I. and of Henrietta of France, was b. in 1633, and immediately declared duke of York. After the capture of Oxford by the parliamentary army, he escaped, and was conducted to his sister, the princess of Orange. At that time he was 15 years of age. He soon after joined his mother at Paris, and, when he had reached his 20th year, served in the French army under Turenne, and subsequently entered the Spanish army in Flanders, under Don John of Austria and the Prince of Condé. At the restoration he returned to England, and married secretly Anne Hyde, daughter of the Earl of Clarendon, by whom he had two daughters, who afterwards became queens of England, viz., Mary and Anne. In the Dutch war, he signalized himself as commander of the English fleet, and showed great skill and bravery. On the death of Charles II., in 1685, the duke succeeded, under the title of James II., and, from the time of his ascending the throne, seems to have acted with a steady determination to render himself absolute. After disgusting the great majority of his subjects, he proceeded to levy the customs and excise without the authority of parliament. He proceeded by every direct and indirect attack to overthrow the established church; but these innovations, in regard both to the religion and government, gradually united opposing interests, and a large body of the nobility and gentry concurred in an application to the prince of Orange, who had been secretly preparing a fleet and an army for the invasion of the country. James, who was long kept in ignorance of these transactions, when informed of them by his minister at the Hague, was struck with terror equal to his former infatuation; and immediately repealing all his obnoxious acts, he practised every method to gain popularity. All confidence was, however, destroyed between the king and the people. William arrived with his fleet in Torbay, Nov. 4th, 1688; and being speedily joined by several men of rank, his ranks swelled, while the army of James began to desert by entire regiments. He fled to France. The throne of Great Britain was declared to be abdicated, and William and his consort Mary (the daughter of James) were unanimously called to fill it conjointly. Assisted by Louis XIV., James was enabled, in March, 1689, to make an attempt for the recovery of Ireland. The battle of Boyne, fought June, 1690, compelled him to return to France. D. 1701.—THOMAS, an English navigator, in the 17th century, who, in 1631 and 1632, attempted to discover a northwest passage. He wintered on Charleton Island, in Hudson's Bay; and next summer proceeded on his voyage, but was unable to penetrate farther than 65 degrees and a half north. He made some discoveries on the coast of Hudson's Bay; to the country on the western side of which he gave the name of New South Wales. On his return to England he published an account of his expedition, entitled "The strange and dangerous Voyage of Captain Thomas James, for the Discovery of a Northwest Passage to the South Sea."—WILLIAM, the author of a valuable national work, entitled "The Naval History of Great Britain, from the declaration of War by France, in 1793, to the Accession of George IV." &c. Every accessible source of authentic information was made use of by Mr. James in writing this history; and his industry and research deserve the highest praise. D. 1827.—WILLIAM, a land agent and surveyor, was a native of Henley-in-Arden, Warwickshire. He was the original projector of the Manchester and Liverpool railway; and may in some respects be regarded as the father of the railway system, having surveyed numerous lines at his own expense, and been an active promoter of these undertakings, at a time when they were considered to be mere speculative innovations. D. aged 66, at Bodmin, Cornwall, March 11, 1837.

JAMESON, GEORGE, an eminent painter, justly termed the Vandyke of Scotland, was b. at Aberdeen in 1586, and d. in 1644.

JANSEN, CORNELIUS, bishop of Ypres, and professor of divinity in the universities of Louvain and Douay, was one the most learned divines of the 17th century, and founder of the sect of Jansenists. He was b. in 1585, at Akay, near Leerdam, in Holland; and studied at Louvain. Being sent into Spain to transact some business of consequence relating to the university, the Catholic king, viewing with a jealous eye the intriguing policy of France, engaged with him to write a book against the French, for having formed an alliance with Protestant states; and rewarded him for it with the see of Ypres in 1635. He had among other writings before this, maintained a controversy against the Protestants upon the subject of grace and predestination; but his "Augustinus," respecting which a furious and almost interminable contest arose, was the principal labor of his life. D. 1638.

JANSENIUS, CORNELIUS, bishop of Ghent, was b. at Hulst, in Flanders, in 1510. He distinguished himself at the council of Trent by his learning and modesty. He wrote a "Harmony of the Gospels," and other works, and d. at Ghent in 1576.

JANSSENS, ABRAHAM, an historical painter, was b. at Antwerp, in 1569. He was cotemporary with Rubens, and in many of the finest parts of the art was accounted not inferior to him.—CORNELIUS, called also JOHNSON, an eminent portrait painter, was b. at Amsterdam. He resided in England several years, and was engaged in the service of King James I. His paintings are easily distinguished by their smooth, clear, and delicate tints, and by a strong character of truth and nature. D. 1685.—VICTOR HONORIUS, a celebrated historical painter, was b. at Brussels, in 1664. He associated with Tempesta, the celebrated landscape painter for several years, and painted the figures in the works of that great master as long as they resided together. For small historical pictures, he was preferable to all the painters of his time.

JARNOWICK, GIOVANNA MANE, a celebrated violinist, was b. at Palermo in 1745, and was the most accomplished pupil of Lulli. For several years he resided at Paris, and was considered at the head of his profession; he afterwards went to England, where he was very popular; but on being invited to settle at Petersburg, he went thither, where he d. in 1804. He was as eccentric and irritable as he was clever, and numerous singular anecdotes are recorded of him.

JARVIS, JOHN, an artist, distinguished by his paintings on glass, was b. in Dublin, in 1749; and after practising his art in that city, removed to London, where he obtained great reputation. His most celebrated performance is the west window of New college, Oxford, from the design of Sir Joshua Reynolds. D. 1804.—JOHN WESLEY a distinguished and eccentric portrait painter, one of the foremost of his day, was b. at South Shields, 1780, but came to America early in life. He was apprenticed to Edwin, the engraver, but his tastes were for painting, and he took to the brush. Settling in New York, he soon won a high reputation as well for his wit and convivial talents as for his skill as an artist. His portraits are among the most spirited that have been produced. D. 1834.

JAY, JOHN, an eminent jurist and statesman, was b. at New York in 1745. After studying at Columbia (then King's) college, he was admitted to the bar, and in 1774 was chosen a delegate to the first American congress, at Philadelphia. In 1776 he was chosen president of the congress, in 1777 he was a member of the convention which framed the constitution of New York, and in the following year he was appointed chief justice of that state. He was next sent as minister plenipotentiary to Spain, and in 1782 he was appointed one of the commissioners to negotiate a peace with Great Britain. The definitive treaty having been signed in September, 1783, he returned to the United States, and in 1784 he was sent as envoy extraordinary to Great Britain, and concluded the treaty which has been called after his name. In 1795 he was elected governor of his native state: this post he continued to occupy till 1801, when he declined a re-election, as well as a reappointment to the office of chief justice of the United States, and passed the remainder of his days in retirement. D. 1829.

JEBB, JOHN, a divine and physician, was the son of Dr. John Jebb, dean of Cashel, and b. in London in 1736. He studied at Trinity college, Dublin, and Peter house, Cambridge, and obtained church preferment, which, however, he resigned, and then commenced practice as a physician, in which he was very successful. He was a violent partisan in whatever he engaged, and, though conscientious in his religious opinions, their peculiar complexion, and the freedom with which he indulged in the political squabbles of the day, obstructed his professional progress. D. 1786.—SAMUEL, an eminent physician and classical scholar, was a native of Nottingham. While at the university he published the "Dialogue of Justin Martyr with Trypho the Jew," in Greek and Latin. He afterwards married the daughter of an apothecary, procured the degree of M.D., practised as a physician at Stratford, in Essex, and retired to Derbyshire, where he d. 1772. Dr. S. Jebb was the conductor of a classical journal, entitled "Bibliotheca Literaria," and the editor of Roger Bacon's "Opus Majus."

JEFFERSON, THOMAS, third president of the United States, was b. in 1743, at Shadwell, in Virginia, and was brought up to the bar. In 1769 he was elected a member of the provincial legislature, and in 1775 he entered congress, and took a conspicuous and very decided part in opposition to the measures which England had adopted towards her American colonies, and it was he who drew up the famous declaration of independence. In 1776 he retired from his seat in congress, and was next chosen governor of Virginia, which post he held two years. On the return of Dr. Franklin to America, in 1785, Mr. Jefferson was named his successor at Paris, from which he proceeded, as envoy, to London, in 1786. At the usual presentation, however, to the king and queen, both Mr. Adams and himself were received in the most ungracious manner, and, after a few vague and ineffectual conferences, he returned to Paris. Here he remained, with the exception of a visit to Holland, to Piedmont, and the south of France, until the autumn of 1789, zealously pursuing whatever was beneficial to his country. He subsequently filled the office of secretary of state under Washington, until 1793, when he resigned, and lived in retirement for four years. He was then elected vice-president, and in 1801 chosen president. At the expiration of eight years he again retired to private life, and on the 4th of July, 1826, (the fiftieth anniversary of American independence,) he d. He was the acknowledged head of the republican party, and an acute politician, eloquent and persuasive in conversation, and possessing the faculty of acquiring an ascendancy in his political connections.

JEFFREY, FRANCIS, Lord, equally eminent on the bench, at the bar, and in the world of letters, was b. at Edinburgh, in 1773. In 1794 he was called to the bar in Scotland, and when he had obtained a fair share of practice, he joined a few of his more intimate friends in establishing the "Edinburgh Review," of which he was sole editor for the long period of 27 years. The first number appeared Oct. 25, 1802. On the formation of the Whig ministry late in 1830, he was made lord advocate, and after sitting a short time for the Perth district of burghs and for Malton, he was chosen to represent Edinburgh in parliament, immediately after the passing of the Reform bill. His success in the house of commons disappointed his admirers, chiefly because he entered so late in life on a new field, and partly because he spoke generally above his audience. In 1834 he was promoted to the bench, and in this capacity he displayed such eminent qualities, that he is by common consent allowed to rank among the very ablest judges that ever sat on the Scottish bench. D. 1850.

JEFFREYS, GEORGE, Baron Wem, Lord, commonly known by the name of Judge Jeffreys, was b. at Acton, in Denbighshire, towards the beginning of the 17th century, and educated at Shrewsbury school. He studied at Westminster and the Inner Temple, and rose through the gradations of recorder of London, a Welsh judge, and chief justice of Chester, till at length, in 1683, he attained the dignity of chief justice of the King's Bench. On the accession of James II., he was one of the advisers and promoters of all the oppressive and arbitrary measures of his reign; and, for his sanguinary and inhuman proceedings against the adherents of Monmouth, was rewarded with the post of lord high chancellor in 1685. His conduct on the bench was, in the highest degree, discreditable at all times, and he indulged in scurrility and abuse of the most degrading description. On the arrival of the prince of Orange, he disguised himself as a seaman, in order to get on board a ship unknown, but was detected in a low public house at Wapping, by an attorney whom he had insulted in open court. The latter making him known, he was seized by the populace, carried before the council, and committed to the Tower, where he d. 1689.—GEORGE, an English poet, was b. at Weldon, Northamptonshire, in 1678. He was a nephew of the eighth Lord Chandos, and bred to the bar. He wrote "Miscellanies, in Prose and Verse," and two tragedies, "Edwin" and "Merope." D. 1755.

JEFFRIES, JOHN, was b. at Boston in 1774. Having studied medicine at the university of Cambridge, he went to London, and on his return to Boston practised with great success, until the evacuation of that city by the British garrison. He then accompanied General Howe to Halifax, and was made surgeon-general to the forces in 1776. He subsequently resigned his army appointments, declining even the offer of the lucrative post of surgeon-general to the forces in India, and in 1780 settled in London. He there occupied himself much in scientific research, and in order to ascertain the correctness of certain preconceived hypotheses relative to atmospheric temperature, he undertook two aerial voyages, the second of which was made Jan. 7, 1785, from the cliffs of Dover, across the British Channel, into the forest of Guinnes in France, and was the only successful attempt that had then been made to cross the sea in a balloon. In 1789 he again returned to Boston, and continued to practise there with success, till his death in 1819.

JEKYLL, Sir JOSEPH, a lawyer and statesman in the reigns of Anne and George I., was the son of a clergyman in Nottinghamshire. He was a member of parliament, and one of the managers of the trial of Sacheverel; was knighted by George I., who raised him to the office of master of the rolls. D. 1738.

JENNER, EDWARD, an English physician, celebrated for having nearly eradicated a pestilent disorder from the human race by introducing vaccine inoculation, was b. at Berkeley, Gloucestershire, in 1749, and subsequently settled there as a medical practitioner. About the year 1776, his attention was turned to the cow-pox, by the circumstance of his ascertaining that those persons who had been affected with this disease, were thereby rendered free from various infectious. From that time till 1796 he steadily pursued his investigation of this discovery; and having at length established its general efficacy, amidst all the opposition naturally to be expected in such a case, the practice of vaccination was introduced into the London hospitals, the army and navy, &c., and, finally, extended to every part of the globe. Honors and rewards were now conferred on Dr. Jenner as a public benefactor; a parliamentary grant of £20,000 was voted him; learned societies at home and abroad enrolled him as a member; and when the allied potentates visited England in 1814, the emperor of Russia sought an interview with him, and offered to bestow on him a Russian order of nobility. Dr. Jenner's writings consist merely of "Observations on the Variolæ Vaccinæ," and a paper in the Philosophical Transactions "On the Natural History of the Cuckoo." D. 1823.

JENNINGS, HENRY CONSTANTINE, an antiquary and virtuoso of most eccentric habits and checkered fortune, was b. in 1731, and was the only son of a gentleman of considerable property at Shiplake, in Oxfordshire. He was educated at Westminster school, and at seventeen became an ensign in the foot-guards; but resigned his commission, and travelled on the Continent, where he collected, while in Italy, a number of statues and other antiques, with which he decorated his seat at Shiplake. He now led the life of a man of fashion and fortune, indulging in the most expensive follies; the consequence of which was that he soon became an inmate of the King's Bench. He was at length freed from his pecuniary embarrassments, and settled on an estate he had in Essex, where he gave himself up with enthusiasm to the collection of scarce books, pictures, and curiosities.

But the current of good fortune did not long run smooth. Having borrowed a sum of money from a person who was indebted to the crown, his museum was hastily sold for a small sum, to satisfy the claim of government under an extant in aid. For many years he was a prisoner in Chelmsford jail; but on regaining his freedom, he resumed his former habits, and settled at Chelsea. D. 1819.

JENYNS, SOAME, a sprightly and entertaining writer, was the only son of Sir Robert Jenyns, b. in London, in 1704. Having entered into public life as representative of the county of Cambridge, he began his career by supporting Sir Robert Walpole, and ever after remained a faithful adherent to the minister for the time being. This attachment to ministers was rewarded by his being made a commissioner of the board of trade, an office he held for five-and-twenty years. As a country gentleman and magistrate, Mr. Jenyns appeared to much greater advantage than as a politician; but it is as an author, a wit, and a shrewd observer of manners, that he is principally to be regarded. His chief works are "Poems," "Free Inquiry into the Origin of Evil," "A View of the Internal Evidence of the Christian Religion," "Political Tracts," and some others. D. 1787.

JEPHSON, RICHARD, a dramatic writer, was a native of Ireland, and b. in 1736. He was a captain in the army, and master of the horse to the lord-lieutenant, during twelve administrations. As a dramatist his claims are chiefly founded on his tragedies of "Braganza" and the "Count of Narbonne." He also wrote the "Law of Lombardy," "Julia," and "The Conspiracy," tragedies; and the farce of "Two Strings to your Bow," "Love and War," &c. He was also author of "The Confessions of James Baptiste Couteau, Citizen of France," a severe satire on the French revolution, "Roman Portraits," a poem in heroic verse, with historical remarks and illustrations. D. 1803.

JERNINGHAM, EDWARD, a poet and miscellaneous writer, was descended from an ancient Roman Catholic family, and b. in Norfolk, in 1727. He was educated at Douay and Paris; but on his return to England, he joined in communion with the established church. He was the author of the tragedies of "Margaret of Anjou" and "The Siege of Berwick;" he also wrote "An Essay on the mild Tenor of Christianity,"

"The Dignity of Human Nature, an Essay," "The Alexandrian School," &c. D. 1812.

JEROME, or HIERONYMUS, Sr., one of the fathers of the church, was b. in 332, at Stridon, on the frontiers of Dacia, and studied at Rome, under Donatus the grammarian. He was ordained a presbyter at Antioch, in 378; and soon after went to Constantinople, where he lived with Gregory Nazianzen. In 382 he visited Rome, and was made secretary to Pope Damasus; but three years afterwards he returned into the East, accompanied by several monks and female devotees, who wished to lead an ascetic life in the Holy Land; and d. in 422, superintendent of a monastery at Bethlehem.—OF PRAGUE, so called from being a native of the capital of Bohemia, studied in the universities of Oxford, Paris, Prague, &c.; was a disciple of Wickliff, and boldly followed the great reformer, Huss, in propagating his doctrines. He attacked the worship of images and relies with ardor, trampled them under foot, and caused the monks who opposed him, to be arrested. He publicly burned, in 1411, the bull of the crusade against Ladislaus of Naples, and the papal indulgences. When Huss was imprisoned at Constance, he hastened to his defence; but on his attempting to return to Prague, the duke of Sulzbach caused him to be seized, and carried in chains to Constance. He heroically received, in prison, information of the terrible fate of his friend, and was terrified into a momentary recantation of his principles; but he resumed his courage, and, retracting his recantation, avowed that none of his sins tormented him more than his apostasy, while he vindicated the principles of Huss and Wickliff with a boldness, energy, and eloquence that extorted the admiration of his adversaries. He was, however, condemned to be burnt; which sentence he endured with heroic fortitude, May 30, 1416.

JEWELL, JOHN, a learned prelate of the church of England, who was bishop of Salisbury in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and a great polemical writer against popery. He was b. 1522, at the village of Baden, near Ilfracombe, Devonshire; studied at Oxford, and in 1546 openly professed the tenets of the reformers. Having obtained the living of Sunningwell, Berks, he distinguished himself by his zeal and assiduity as a parish priest; but at the accession of Queen Mary, finding they were about to prosecute him as a heretic, he made his escape to the Continent, and became vice-master of a college at Strasburg. On the death of Mary he returned to England, was received with great favor by her successor, and in 1560 he was raised to the bishopric of Salisbury. His principal work is entitled "An Apology for the Church of England," originally written in elegant Latin, but translated into every European language; and which, it is said, had more effect in promoting the reformation, than any other book ever published. D. 1571.

JOAN OF ARC, called also the Maid of Orleans, was one of the most celebrated heroines in history. She was born of poor parents, at Domremi, a village on the borders of Lorraine, 1402; and became a servant at an inn, where she attended the horses, drove the cattle to pasture, and was employed in other services similar to what a man-servant would perform in America. At this time the affairs of France were in a deplorable state, and the city of Orleans was so closely besieged by the duke of Bedford, that its fall appeared inevitable. In the exigency Joan pretended to have received a divine commission to expel the invaders. On being introduced to the king, Charles VII., she offered to raise the siege of Orleans, and conduct his majesty to Rheims to be crowned and anointed; at the same time demanding for herself a particular sword, which was in the church of St. Catharine. After a little hesitation her request was complied with; and while the French soldiers were elated by having an inspired leader, the English were as much dismayed. From this period, she appears the finest character in the history of the middle ages of France. In a male dress, armed cap à pie, she bore the sword and the sacred banner, as the signal of victory, at the head of the army. Still no unfeminine cruelty ever stained her conduct. She was wounded several times herself, but never killed any one, or shed any blood with her own hand. The general belief of her elevated mission, of which she herself was piously persuaded, produced the most extraordinary effects. Resolute, chivalrous, gentle, and brave, looking to one single aim, she was skillfully employed by the generals to animate the army, while they did not implicitly follow her counsels. The first enterprise was successful. With 10,000 men, under the command of St. Severre, Dunois, and La Hire, she marched from Blois, and, on April 29th, 1429, entered Orleans with supplies. By bold sallies to which she animated the besieged, the English were forced from their intrenchments, and Suffolk abandoned the siege. Joan entered Orleans in triumph, and the coronation at Rheims followed; after which Charles caused a medal to be struck in honor of the heroine, and ennobled her family. The town of Domremi also, where she was born, was exempted from all imposts for ever. After the coronation, Joan declared that her mission was at an end, and that she should now retire to private life; but the French commandant, Dunois, who thought she might still prove serviceable, induced her to throw herself into Compeigne, then besieged by the duke of Burgundy, and the earls of Arundel and Suffolk. Here, after performing prodigies of valor, she was taken prisoner in a sally; and after four months' imprisonment, was cruelly condemned by the English to be burnt alive, on the charge of sorcery. She resolutely defended herself from the absurd accusation, and was carried to the stake, where with dauntless courage she met her disastrous fate, in the 29th year of her age, May 20, 1431.

JODELLE, ETIENNE, an early French poet and dramatist, b. at Paris, 1532. He was the author of the first regular tragedy acted on the French stage; and he is described as having possessed an extraordinary facility and fluency of composition. Though enjoying the favor of Charles IX. and of Henry II., yet he died in great poverty and distress, in 1573.

JOFFRID, abbot of Croyland, in the 12th century. In the continuation of "Ingulph's Account of Croyland," by Peter de Blois, he says, "that Abbot Joffrid sent a deputation of three learned French or Norman monks, named Odo, Terriek, and William, to his manor of Cottenham, near Cambridge, to teach the people in that neighborhood, grammar, logic, and rhetoric; and that these three monks went every day from Cottenham to Cambridge, where they hired a barn, in which they taught those sciences to a great number of scholars, who resorted to them from all the country round." If De Blois can be relied on, Joffrid may therefore be considered as the original founder of the university of Cambridge.

JOHN, king of England, was the youngest son of Henry II. by Eleanor of Guienne, b. 1166, and succeeded his brother Richard. He rendered himself the object of such universal contempt and hatred, that his nobles determined, if possible, to control his power, and establish their privileges; and though the pope declared his disapprobation of their conduct, the barons assembled in arms at Oxford, where the court then was, and immediately proceeded to warlike operations. They were received without opposition in London, which so intimidated the king, that he consented to whatever terms they chose to dictate. Thus was obtained that basis of English constitutional freedom, known as Magna Charta, which not only protected the nobles against the crown, but secured important privileges to every class of freemen.—OF GAUNT, duke of Lancaster, a renowned general, was b. 1340. He served with great distinction in France with his brother the Black Prince, and on his death had the management of affairs during the life of his father. John of Gaunt was a man of great valor, prudence, and generosity. His son afterwards became king, by the title of Henry IV. D. 1399.—OF SALISBURY, bishop of Chartres, in France, was b. at Salisbury, in Wiltshire, in the beginning of the 12th century. He studied under the most eminent professors on the Continent, and acquired considerable fame for his proficiency in rhetoric and general literature. After his return to England, he became the intimate friend and companion of Thomas à Becket, whom he had attended in his exile, and he is said to have been present when he was murdered in Canterbury cathedral. He was one of the first restorers of the Greek and Latin languages in Europe, and an elegant Latin poet.

JOHNSON, SAMUEL, a divine, eminent for his zeal, and for his numerous writings, in the cause of civil liberty, was b. in 1649, in the county of Stafford; received his education at St. Paul's school and at Trinity college, Cambridge; and became minister of Corringham, in Essex. In the reign of Charles II., while Lord Russell and his coadjutors were promoting the bill for excluding the duke of York, he published a tract, entitled "Julian the Apostate," for which he was fined and imprisoned. In 1618, when the army was encamped on Hounslow Heath, he drew up a paper, entitled "An humble and hearty Address to all the English Protestants in the present Army," for which he was tried, and condemned to stand in the pillory in three places, to pay a fine of five hundred marks, to be degraded from the priesthood, and to be publicly whipped from Newgate to Tyburn. He bore all these disgraceful punishments with unshrinking fortitude, and continued to employ his pen in the same cause until the revolution, when the king offered him the rich deanery of Durham; but this he refused, as inadequate to his sufferings and services, which he thought merited a bishopric. He finally received a present of £1000, and a pension of £300 per annum for the life of himself and his son. D. 1703.—SAMUEL, the celebrated lexicographer, and one of the most distinguished writers of the 18th century, was b. in 1709, at Lichfield, where his father was a bookseller. He completed his education at Pembroke college, Oxford; and in 1732 he became undermaster of a free-school at Market Bosworth, in Leicestershire, which situation he was soon induced to quit, on account of the haughty treatment he received from the principal; and he next endeavored to earn a scanty maintenance by literary employment. In 1735 he married Mrs. Porter, the widow of a mercer at Birmingham, with a fortune of about £800, by which he was enabled to open a boarding-school; but the plan did not succeed, and, after a year's trial, he resolved to seek his fortune in London, in company with one of his few pupils, the celebrated David Garrick. In March, 1737, the two adventurers accordingly arrived in the metropolis, Johnson with his unfinished tragedy of "Irene" in his pocket, and with little to depend upon but his slender engagement with Cave, the proprietor of the Gentleman's Magazine. At this time he became acquainted with the reckless and unfortunate Savage, and in some respects his personal conduct was unfavorably affected by the intimacy; but from irregularity of his nature he was soon recovered by his deeply grounded religious and moral principles. His first literary production, which attracted notice in the metropolis, was his "London," a poem in imitation of the third satire of Juvenal. In 1747 he printed proposals for an edition of "Shakspeare," and the plan of his "English Dictionary," addressed to Lord Chesterfield. The price agreed upon between him and the booksellers for the last work was £1575. In 1749, Garrick brought his friend's tragedy on the stage of Drury-lane, but it was unsuccessful. In 1750 he commenced his "Rambler," which was continued till 1752. In this work only five papers were the productions of other writers. Soon after the close of this paper he lost his wife, a circumstance which greatly affected him, as appears from his "Meditations," and the sermon which he wrote on her death. In 1755 appeared his Dictionary, and the same year the university of Oxford conferred on him the degree of M.A. Lord Chesterfield endeavored also to assist it by writing two papers in its favor in "The World;" but as he had hitherto neglected the author, Johnson treated him with contempt. The publication of this great work did not relieve him from his embarrassments, for the price of his labor had been consumed in the progress of its compilation. In 1758 he began the "Idler," a periodical paper, which was published in a weekly newspaper. On the death of his mother in 1759, he wrote the romance of "Rasselas" to defray the expenses of her funeral. In 1762 the king granted him a pension of £300 per annum. In 1773 he went on a tour with Mr. Boswell to the western islands of Scotland, of which journey he shortly after published a highly interesting account; but which gave offence to many, by the violent attack therein made on the authenticity of the poems attributed to Ossian. In 1779 he began his "Lives of the English Poets," a work which, on the whole, may be regarded as a treasure of sound criticism, and a model of literary biography. D. 1784.—SAMUEL, a dramatic writer and performer of eccentric celebrity; author of "Hurlothrumbo, or the Supernatural," and various other laughable extravaganzas. D. 1773.—SAMUEL, first president of King's college, New York, was b. at Guildford, Connecticut; educated at the college of Saybrook; first preached at West Haven, then became an Episcopalian, and went to England to obtain ordination. On his return he settled at Stratford, where he preached to an Episcopalian congregation; received the degree of D.D. from Oxford, in 1743; and was chosen president of the college at New York on its establishment in 1754. He held this situation with much credit, until 1763, when he resigned and returned to his pastoral charge at Stratford, where he continued till his death, in 1772.—THOMAS, an English botanist, was b. at Selby, in Yorkshire. He was bred an apothecary in London, and became, says Wood, the best herbalist of his age. He wrote "Iter in Agrum Cantuarium" and "Ericetum Hamsted-ianum," which were the first local catalogues of plants published in England. But his great work was an improved edition of "Gerard's Herbal." In the civil wars he entered into the royal army; at the siege of Basing-house he received a wound, of which he d. in 1644.—RICHARD M., an eminent politician, and for some years vice-president of the United States. He was b. at _____ in _____, and at an early age was chosen a member of the legislature, then a member of congress, and finally vice-president of the United States. He took an active part in the Indian wars of the northwest, and is supposed to have been the man who killed the great chief, Tecumseh. While in congress he read a report on the subject of stopping the mails on Sunday, which was a masterly argument and gave him great éclat. D. 1850.

JOHNSTON, or JOHNSON, CHARLES, a native of Ireland, who was bred to the bar, and came over to England to practise; but being afflicted with deafness, he was compelled to quit that profession. His first literary attempt was the celebrated "Chrysal, or the Adventures of a Guinea," a political romance, which produced a great sensation. This work having so well succeeded, he produced others of a similar class, viz.: "The Reverie, or a Flight to the Paradise of Fools," "The History of Arbaces, Prince of Betlis," "The Pilgrim, or a Picture of Life," and the "History of John Juniper, esq., alias Juniper Jack." In 1782 he went to India, where he engaged in literary and other speculations, and obtained considerable wealth. D. 1800.

JOHNSTONE, JOHN HENRY, a celebrated comic actor and vocalist, was b. in 1750 at Tipperary, where his father was a small farmer. At the age of 18 he enlisted in a regiment of Irish dragoons, and soon attracted the notice of his comrades, by his fine voice and good-humored liveliness. The colonel of the regiment having had proofs of Johnstone's vocal powers, and hearing that he had an inclination for the stage, he generously granted his discharge, and gave him a recommendatory letter to Mr. Ryder, then manager of the Dublin theatre, who engaged him for three years, at two guineas per week, which was soon raised to four. His fame as a vocalist increased rapidly; and having married a Miss Poitier, who had acquired a profound knowledge of the science of music, he profited by her instructions, and soon became a finished singer. His first appearance at Covent-garden theatre was made in October, 1783. D. 1828.

JOINVILLE, JOHN, Sieur de, seneschal of Champagne, an eminent French statesman and historian of the 13th century. He accompanied Louis IX. in his first crusade or expedition to Egypt, in 1249, sharing his master's captivity, and rendering him many important services. In the king's second crusade, however, he declined taking a part, and subsequently employed himself in writing the "Life of St. Louis," one of the most interesting documents existing relative to the history of the middle ages. D. 1318.

JOLY, CLAUDE, a French ecclesiastic, who wrote "A Collection of Maxims for the Education of a Prince," which gave great offence, and was burnt by the hangman. The author, however, republished it with an addition, called "Codicil d'Or," or the Golden Codicil. B. at Paris, 1607, and d. there in 1700.

—GUY, the confidential secretary of Cardinal de Retz, who wrote "Memoirs of his Times," containing an interesting account of transactions from 1648 to 1665, in which is included the private history of his patron.—MARY ELIZABETH, a celebrated French actress, was b. at Versailles in 1761. She commenced her theatrical career in 1781, and soon rose to eminence in her profession, excelling principally as a representative of the soubrettes of the French drama. In 1798 she was imprisoned among other political victims, but recovered her liberty on condition of performing at the theatre of the republic. D. 1798.

JOMELLI, NICOLÒ, a musical composer, was b. in 1714, at Aversa, in the kingdom of Naples. He composed a number of operas in his own country, and became a popular favorite. He afterwards visited Bologna, Rome, Venice, and other principal cities of Italy, everywhere carrying away the palm from rival musicians. He was the author of many devotional pieces, among which are his celebrated "Requiem" and "Miserere." D. 1774.

JONES, INIGO, a celebrated architect, and the reviver of classical architecture in England, was b. in London, about 1572. He was at first an apprentice to a joiner; but his talents for drawing having attracted the notice of the earls of Arundel and Pembroke, the latter supplied him with the means of visiting Italy, for the purpose of studying landscape painting. He went to Venice, where the works of Palladio inspired him with a taste for architecture; and he afterwards devoted all his energies in pursuit of that noble branch of art. He soon acquired fame, and obtained the situation of first architect to Christian IV., king of Denmark, who visiting his brother-in-law, James I., in 1606, brought Jones with him to England. Being induced to remain, the queen chose him as her architect; and the place of surveyor-general of the board of works was granted to him in reversion. In 1620 he was appointed one of the commissioners for repairing St. Paul's cathedral; but this was not commenced till 1623. In the following reign, he was much employed in preparing masques for the entertainment of the court, and in building the Banqueting House at Whitehall; but while thus engaged he fell under the displeasure of Ben Jonson, who ridiculed him on the stage, and made him the subject of his epigrammatic muse. Jones realized a handsome fortune; but being a Roman Catholic, and a partisan of royalty, he suffered severely in the civil war. D. 1652.

—OWEN, a Welsh antiquary, and a member of the Gwyneddigion, or Cambrian society, for encouraging the bards, language, and music of Wales, was b. in 1740, and d. in 1814. He collected and published "The Archæology of Wales," the "Poems of Dafydd ap Gwilym," and other productions.—JOHN PAUL, a naval adventurer, was a native of Selkirk, Scotland, and b. in 1736. His first voyage was to this country, where he settled early in life; and at the commencement of the struggle between the colonies and the mother country, he offered his services to the former, and was appointed first of the first lieutenants. In 1775 he obtained the command of a ship under Commodore Hopkins, and distinguished himself in several engagements, for which he received his commission as captain of the marine. He then sailed to France, and being well acquainted with the Irish coast, and the northern part of England, he conceived the design of effecting a descent. For a long time he kept the northern coast in a constant state of alarm; at length he effected a landing at Whitehaven, and having dismantled a fort, set fire to some shipping in the harbor. From thence he sailed for Scotland, where he landed on the estate of the earl of Selkirk, and plundered his lordship's house of all the plate,

He next took the Drae sloop of war, with which he returned to Brest. He afterwards sailed round Ireland to the North Sea, with three ships, the Richard, Pallas, and Vengeance. Having committed great mischief on that coast, he fell in with the Baltic fleet, convoyed by the Serapis frigate, and the Countess of Scarborough armed ship, both which, after a severe action, he captured off Flamborough Head. For these services the king of France conferred on him the order of merit, and gave him a gold-hilted sword. He afterwards was invited into the Russian service, with the rank of rear-admiral, where he was disappointed in not receiving the command of the fleet acting against the Turks in the Black Sea. He found fault with the conduct of the prince of Nassau, the admiral; became restless and impatient, was intrigued against at court, and calumniated by his enemies; and had permission, from the empress Catharine, to retire from the service with a pension, which was never paid. He returned to Paris, sunk into poverty, and d. 1792.—Sir WILLIAM, an eminent lawyer, poet, and general scholar, was the son of an able mathematician; and was only three years of age when his father died, in 1746. In 1776 he was made a commissioner of bankrupts; about which time his correspondence with his pupil evinced the manly spirit of constitutional freedom by which he was actuated; and to his feelings on the American contest he gave vent in a spirited Latin ode to Liberty. In 1778 appeared his translation of the "Orations of Isæus," with a prefatory discourse, notes, and commentary, which, for elegance of style, and profound critical and historical research, excited much admiration. At length, on the accession of the Shelburne administration, he obtained what had long been the object of his ambition, the appointment of judge in the supreme court of judicature in Bengal. He went to India in April, 1783. One of his earliest acts in India was the establishment at Calcutta of an institution on the plan of the Royal Society, of which he was chosen the first president. Another was, to take vigorous measures for procuring a digest of the Hindoo and Mahometan laws. He then applied himself with ardor to the study of the Sanscrit, and his health soon suffering from the climate, he took a journey through the district of Benares, during which cessation of public duties he composed a "Treatise on the Gods of Greece, Italy, and India." His translation of the celebrated "Ordnances of Menu," the famous Indian legislator, published early in 1794, had scarcely appeared, when he was seized with an inflammation of the liver, which terminated his truly valuable life on the 27th of April, in the 48th year of his age.

JONSON, BENJAMIN, a celebrated dramatist, and the cotemporary and friend of Shakspeare, was the posthumous son of a clergyman. He was b. in Westminster, in 1574; at the grammar-school of which city he was placed, under Camden, at an early age; till his mother marrying again to a person who held the humble occupation of a bricklayer, young Ben, as he was familiarly called, was taken home abruptly by his father-in-law, and employed by him as an assistant in his trade. The ardent spirit of the future poet revolted against his condition; he fled from home and entered the army as a private soldier, in which capacity he served in the English army in Flanders. On his return he resumed his studies, and went to Cambridge; but from the poverty of his circumstances, he was obliged to leave the university and take to the stage. At first he was not very successful, either as an actor or an author; and having the misfortune to kill another actor in a duel, he was taken up and imprisoned, and narrowly escaped with life. On being released from confinement he married, and recommenced writing for the stage, to which he was encouraged by Shakspeare, who performed in one of his pieces. In 1598 he produced his comedy of "Every Man in his Humor;" which was followed by a new play every year, till the reign of James the First, when he was employed in the masques and entertainments at court. But regardless of prudence, Ben joined Chapman and Marston in writing the comedy of "Eastward Hoë," which so grossly libelled the Scotch nation, that the authors were committed to prison, and had they not made a timely and humble submission for the offence, they would have lost their noses and ears in the pillory, according to their sentence. By his address, however, he soon contrived to reinstate himself in the favor of a monarch to whose pleasures the effusions of his muse had become necessary; and for the remainder of that reign he continued in high favor as a kind of superintendent of the court revels. In 1617 he was appointed poet laureate, with a salary of £100, and a butt of wine yearly from the king's cellars. Want of economy, however, kept him constantly poor; although, in addition to the royal bounty, he had a pension from the city. D. 1637.

JORDAENS, JACOB, an eminent historical and portrait painter, was a native of Antwerp. He was the son-in-law of Van Oort, under whom he studied; he also received some instruction from Rubens; and his pictures are executed with correctness and brilliancy. B. 1594; d. 1678.

JORDAN, CHARLES STEPHEN, a Prussian writer, originally of a French family, was b. at Berlin in 1700, and d. in 1746. He wrote "Travels in France, England, and Holland, with Satirical Anecdotes," "A Miscellany of Literature, Philosophy, and History," and the "Life of de la Croze."—DOROTHEA, or DOROTHY BLAND, (Jordan being only an assumed name,) was b. at Waterford, about the year 1762. She made her theatrical debut on the Dublin stage, in 1777, in the part of Phœbe, in "As You Like It." In the following season she appeared at Cork, where she was much admired for her archness and sportive simplicity. In 1782 she came to England, was engaged by Tate Wilkinson, and first appeared at the Leeds theatre, as Calista, in "The Fair Penitent." From Leeds she proceeded to York, where she first played under the name of Mrs. Jordan, by which, though never married, she was subsequently known. In 1785 she made her first appearance before a London audience at Drury-lane, as Peggy, in "The Country Girl;" and immediately became such a decided favorite, that her salary was doubled, and she was allowed two benefits. At the close of the season, she made a provincial tour, and visited nearly all the large towns in England, everywhere receiving the most enthusiastic welcome from admiring audiences. When the duke of Clarence first made overtures to her, she was the mistress of a Mr. Ford, who refused to make her his wife, through fear of offending his father. Mrs. Jordan then entered into that connection with the duke, which continued in an almost uninterrupted state of domestic harmony, until it was suddenly broken off in 1811. D. 1816.—SIR JOSEPH, a gallant English admiral; who by his presence of mind and valor, gained the battle of Solebay, in 1672.—

THOMAS, a dramatic writer in the reign of Charles I. He wrote two comedies and a masque; and is mentioned by Langbaine with respect.

JORDANO, LUCA, a famous painter, was b. at Naples, in 1632; and d. there in 1705.

JORTIN, JOHN, an eminent scholar and divine, was b. in London, in 1698. Here he acquired so high a character for learning and acuteness, that he was employed by Pope to extract the notes from Eustathius, to print with his translation of the Iliad. His chief works are, "Discourses concerning the Truth of the Christian Religion," "Miscellaneous Observations upon Authors, ancient and modern," "Remarks upon Ecclesiastical History," "Life of Erasmus," and seven volumes of "Sermons and Charges," which were printed after his death. D. 1770.

JOSE, ANTONIO, a Portuguese dramatist, by birth a Jew, who was burnt alive at the last auto-da-fé in 1745, for having introduced in one of his farces a scene, in which a criminal is conversing at the gallows with his confessor, in a style, as may be supposed, not the most edifying.

JOSEPH I., emperor of Germany, the son of Leopold I., was b. at Vienna, in 1678; received the crown of Hungary in 1689; and was soon after elected king of the Romans. D. 1711.—II., emperor of Germany, was the son of the Emperor Leopold and Maria Theresa, queen of Hungary. He was crowned king of the Romans in 1764; the year following he succeeded his father; and in 1780, by the death of the empress-queen, he succeeded to the crown of Hungary and Bohemia. D. 1789.

JOSEPHINE, empress of France and queen of Italy, was b. at Martinique in 1763, and bore the name from her parents of ROSE TASCHER DE LA PAGERIE. While very young, she was taken by her father to France, to be the bride of the Viscount de Beauharnois—a marriage having been arranged by the two families when the Marquis Beauharnois was governor-general of the Antilles. They were accordingly married; and, in the enjoyment of each other's society, they lived beloved and respected, while Josephine became the mother of two children, Eugene and Hortense. Prompted by filial attachment, she went, in 1786, to Martinique, to attend upon her mother in sickness; and having taken her daughter with her, she remained in the island three years. The sudden rising of the colony, however, obliged her to quit it for France, with such haste, as not to allow of her taking leave of her parent. After effecting her escape, and surmounting numerous obstacles, Madame Beauharnois began to experience the horrors of the French revolution; and soon saw her husband, who had used every exertion at the head of the French army on the Rhine, dragged to a prison, and thence to the scaffold. She was also included in the list of proscription; but the death of her husband reduced her to such a state that she could not be removed, and to this circumstance she owed her deliverance. Robespierre at length perished, and the viscountess was delivered from prison by Tallien, who was never forgotten by her, nor by Eugene, from whom he received a considerable pension till his death. Josephine was indebted to Barras for the restoration of a part of the property of her husband; and at his house, after the 13th Vendemiaire, she met General Bonaparte, who was desirous of seeing her, in consequence of her son Eugene, then 15 years old, presenting himself before the general, to solicit that the sword which had belonged to his father might be given to him. Bonaparte from the first was favorably impressed towards the widow; and his attachment strengthening at every succeeding interview, he married her in 1796. From that day it became her practice to encourage him through dangers, and moderate his feelings in the hour of victory. After Napoleon became emperor, a divorce was a subject to which his friends advised him, but which he at first declined. Josephine had been crowned empress at Paris, and queen of Italy at Milan. When Napoleon became desirous of marrying a princess, and she was made acquainted with the wishes of the nation regarding a successor, she resolved to sacrifice her private feelings, and giving the archduchess, Maria Louisa, credit for all the estimable qualities which she knew were requisite to the happiness of Napoleon, she consented to the marriage. She, however, would not follow the wishes of her children, who were anxious that she should quit France; but retired to her beautiful seat of Malmaison, with the title of empress-queen-dowager. D. 1814.

JOSEPHUS, FLAVIUS, the celebrated historian of the Jews, was b. at Jerusalem, A. D. 37. His father, Mattathias, was descended from the ancient high-priests of the Jews, and his mother was of the Maccabean race. He was early instructed in Hebrew learning, and became an ornament of the sect of the Pharisees, to which he belonged. When 26 years old he visited Rome, for the purpose of obtaining the release of some prisoners whom Felix had sent to the capital, on which occasion he was introduced to Poppæa, afterwards the wife of Nero, and, on his return, was made governor of Galilee. He afterwards obtained the command of the Jewish army, and supported with courage, wisdom, and resolution a siege of seven weeks, in the fortified town of Jotapata, where he was attacked by Vespasian and Titus. The town was betrayed to the enemy. He accompanied Titus back to Rome, where he was rewarded with the freedom of the city, and received a pension and other favors from Vespasian and his son, and, as a mark of gratitude, he then assumed their family name of Flavius. His "History of the Jewish War, and the Destruction of Jerusalem," was composed at the command of Vespasian, and is singularly interesting and affecting, as the historian was an eye-witness of all he relates. St. Jerome calls him the Livy of the Greeks. His "Jewish Antiquities," written in Greek, is a very noble work, and his discourse "Upon the Martyrdom of the Maccabees" is a masterpiece of eloquence. He is supposed to have d. about the year 95.

JOUFFROY, marquis de, who disputes with Fulton and Fitch the honor of having been the first to apply steam to the purposes of navigation, was b. in Franche Comté, 1751. He made his first attempt on the Doubs in 1776, and renewed it with more success on the Saône in 1783, but he failed to carry it out through want of means and support. He was no less unsuccessful at Paris in 1816, but the Academy of Sciences acknowledged his claim to the discovery in 1840, a distinction with which, whether merited or otherwise, he could not fail to be gratified. D. 1832.—THEODORE, a distinguished writer on philosophical subjects, and professor of philosophy at Paris, was b. at Pontets, 1796. Besides numerous original works, which are in great repute for clearness and depth, he translated into French the writings of Reid and Dugald Stewart, and his "Cours du Droit Naturel" will be found worthy the most attentive perusal. D. 1842.

JOURDAIN, AMABLE LOUIS MICHEL

BRECHILLET, b. in 1788, was the son of a celebrated surgeon-dentist at Paris. He was designed for the law, but being struck at hearing the splendid eulogies bestowed on Anquetil du Perron, the orientalist, he determined on cultivating the same branches of learning for which that great scholar had been distinguished. This he pursued with such success, that the office of adjunct-secretary of the school of oriental languages was created in his favor, and he held it till his death. He was a contributor to the "Biographie Universelle," and other extensive publications, and author of "La Perse, ou Tableau de l'Histoire, du Gouvernement, de la Religion, de la Littérature, &c., de cet Empire," besides some others. D. 1818.

JOUVENET, JOHN, an historical painter, b. at Rouen, in Normandy, in 1644, and who studied under Poussin. He was employed to adorn the apartments of Versailles and the Trianon; he also painted colossal figures of the twelve apostles in the hospital of the Invalids at Paris. D. 1717.

JOUY, JOSEPH ETIENNE DE, a facile and graceful writer, was b. in 1764, served in America and India, and took part in the first campaign of the revolution. But he soon abandoned the sword for the pen, and rose to great popularity with his vaudevilles and the librettos which he wrote for Spontini, Cherubini, and Rossini. He was also distinguished as a political writer, but he is best known in England for his amusing and satirical work called the "Hermit of the Chaussée d'Antin," which was translated into English many years ago. In 1830, Louis Philippe appointed him librarian at the Louvre. D. 1846.

JOVELLANOS, DON GASPAREL MELCHIOR DE, one of the most distinguished Spaniards of modern times, was b. at Gijon, in Asturias, in 1744, of an ancient and noble family. He became a member of the criminal branch of the audiencia in Seville, and advancing rapidly in his professional career, he was finally appointed to the dignified station of member of the council of the military orders at Madrid. About the same time he was intrusted with some important affairs, and nominated counsellor of state, by Charles III. When, in 1794, Spain found herself loaded with debt, Jovellanos proposed, for the relief of the national difficulties, a tax on the property of the higher order of the clergy, for which he was exiled to the mountains of Asturias, though his project was afterwards carried into execution. In 1799 he was recalled, and made minister of justice for the interior, but before twelve months were past, he was dismissed, and banished to the island of Majorca, where he was confined in the convent of the Carthusians. After the fall of Godoy, the prince of peace, in 1808, he recovered his liberty, and subsequently became a member of the supreme junta. He was, however, suspected of favoring the French; and, at length, being denounced as a traitor for endeavoring to promote their plans for the subjugation of Spain, he was put to death, in 1812, during a popular insurrection. He wrote "Lyric Poems," "Pelayo," a tragedy, "The Honorable Delinquent," a comedy, several works on subjects connected with political economy, and translated Milton's "Paradise Lost."

JOYCE, JEREMIAH, an ingenious and industrious writer, whose profession was that of a dissenting minister, was b. in 1764, and first attracted public notice as one of the persons included in the state prosecution with Hardy, Horne Tooke, Thelwall, and others for treason. He was the coadjutor of Dr. Gregory in the compilation of his "Cyclopædia," and subsequently produced another on a similar plan, which goes by the name of Nicholson. He was also the author of "Scientific Dialogues," "Dialogues on Chemistry," "Letters on Natural Philosophy," &c. D. 1816.

JUAN, or DON JOHN OF AUSTRIA, a natural son of the Emperor Charles V., and the great military hero of his age, was b. at Ratisbon; in 1546. His mother is said to have been a lady named Barbara Blomberg, but this is doubtful, and a singular veil of mystery hangs over his maternal parentage. He was first employed, in 1570, against the Moors of Granada, and acquired great fame by their subjugation. He also signalized himself by a memorable victory over the Turks, in 1571, in the gulf of Lepanto, as well as by the conquest of Tunis and other places on the African coast. In 1576 he went to Flanders, took Namur by stratagem, and succeeded in reducing the insurgents to obedience. D. 1577.—Y SANTIÇLIA, DON GEORGE, a learned Spanish mathematician and naval officer, was b. at Orihuela, in 1712. His progress in mathematics was so great that, while a student in Carthagenia, he obtained the appellation of Euclid; and, entering the naval service early, his reputation as a scientific man occasioned his appointment, with Antonio de Ulloa, to accompany Bouguer and La Condamine to Peru, in 1735, to measure a degree of the meridian at the equator. He afterwards directed much of his attention to marine architecture, and his exertions to improve the Spanish navy were highly successful. He published his "Observations on Astronomy and Physics, made in Peru," and treatises on navigation and ship-building. D. 1774.

JUBA, a king of Numidia and Mauritania, who was an ally of Pompey against Julius Cæsar. After the battle of Pharsalia he joined his forces to those of Scipio, but being totally defeated at Thapsus, he put an end to his own life, and his kingdom became a Roman province.—II., king of Numidia, son of the preceding, was, when a boy, led a captive to Rome to adorn the triumph of Cæsar, but the Roman conqueror bestowed on him an excellent education, and he became one of the most learned men of his time. He gained the hearts of the Romans by the courteousness of his manners, and was in great favor with Augustus, who gave him the daughter of Antony in marriage, and made him king of Gætulia, of which dignity he proved himself worthy, by governing his dominions with justice and lenity. He was also an able and prolific author, as appears by Pliny, Strabo, Plutarch, and other writers, who allude to his histories of the Arabians, Assyrians, and Romans, his treatises on the fine arts, and his natural history, of all which a few fragments only have been preserved. D. 24.

JUGURTHA, king of Numidia, was the son of Manastabal. He was endowed by nature with superior talents, and was remarkable for manly strength and personal beauty. Formed for a soldier, his valor and conduct won the esteem of the Roman army, and the friendship of Scipio; but involving himself in intrigues and crimes to obtain the Numidian crown, the Roman senate sent Metellus against him, who conquered him in a great battle, and rejected all his bribes. When on the point of signing a shameful peace, and surrendering to the Romans, Jugurtha, through fear that they might inflict vengeance on him for his former crimes, suddenly changed his resolution, and determined once more to abide the worst. The king of Mauritania, his ally, having concluded a peace with the Romans, Sylla persuaded him to draw Jugurtha into his power, and deliver him up to the Romans. He was accordingly seized, and sent in chains to Marius, at Cirta. Thus the war was ended, and Numidia became a Roman province. Jugurtha, having suffered many insults from the people, was thrown into a dark prison, and starved to death after six days, 106 B. C.

JULIAN, FLAVIUS CLAUDIUS, surnamed the Apostate, a Roman emperor, was the youngest son of Constantius, brother of Constantine the Great. He was b. in 331, educated in the tenets of Christianity, and apostatized to paganism. In 335 he was declared Cæsar, and sent to Gaul, where he obtained several victories over the Germans, and, in 361, the troops in Gaul revolted from Constantius, and declared for Julian. During the lifetime of his cousin, Constantius, he made a profession of the orthodox faith, but, on succeeding to the throne, he threw off all disguise, reopened the heathen temples, and sought to restore the heathen worship in all its splendor, while he labored, both by his pen and authority, to destroy Christianity. D. 363.

JULIEN, PIERRE, an eminent French sculptor, many of whose productions adorn the metropolis of France, and whose chef-d'œuvre is "The Dying Gladiator." B. 1731; d. 1804.—SIMON, a Swiss painter, who by his brother artists was called the Apostate, in allusion to the Roman emperor of the same name, as well as to his abandonment of the French school of painting for the Italian. B. 1736; d. 1799.

JULIUS I., Pope, succeeded to the papal see on the death of Mark, in 337. Celebrated for the part he took in the Athanasian controversy. D. 352.—II., Pope, nephew of Sixtus IV., was b. in 1443. He is said to have, at one period of his life, followed the occupation of a waterman. He was remarkable for his wars, and his patronage of the arts. During his pontificate, the rebuilding of St. Peter's was commenced. D. 1513.—III., Pope, previously known as Cardinal Monte, was chamberlain to Julius II., whose name he subsequently assumed. He took little part in public business, but led a life of indolence at the villa still known by his name. D. 1555.

JUNGE, or JUNGIIUS, JOACHIM, an eminent philosopher of the 17th century, was b. at Lubeck, in 1587, and distinguished himself as an able antagonist of the Aristotelian philosophy.

Like his great cotemporary, Lord Bacon, he substituted experiment in the place of idle and antiquated theories, and is ranked by Leibnitz as equal to Copernicus and Galileo, and but little inferior to Descartes. Among his works are "Geometria Empirica," "Doxoscopie Physicæ Minores," and "Isagoge Phytoscope," from which latter work Ray and Linnæus appear to have taken some valuable hints. D. 1657.

JUNOT, ANDOCHÉ, duke of Abrantes, a distinguished French general, was b. in 1771, and entered the army, as a volunteer, in 1791. He first attracted the notice of Bonaparte by his coolness and courage when serving as a lieutenant at the siege of Toulon; and in 1806 he made him colonel-general of hussars, and appointed him to the command of Paris. In the following year he was placed at the head of the army in Portugal, where he remained two years, and was honored with his ducal title; but being defeated at the battle of Vimiera by Sir Arthur Wellesley, (the duke of Wellington,) he was compelled to capitulate. He subsequently served in Spain, and was made governor of the Illyrian provinces. D. 1813.—Madame, duchess of Abrantes, wife of the preceding, was from her infancy intimate with Napoleon. Her estates being confiscated in 1814, the Emperor Alexander offered their restoration, on condition of her becoming a naturalized Russian. She refused, and remained in Paris, living quite literally by the labors of her pen. The best known of her writings are the celebrated "Memoirs," which had a prodigious run. But she experienced the only too common fate of authors; harassed by creditors, she retired to a maison de santé; where she died, in 1838.

JURIEU, PETER, a French Protestant divine and theologian, was b. in 1687. He studied in England, under his maternal uncle, Peter du Moulin; and, while there, was episcopally ordained; but the French Protestants disapproving of episcopal ordination, he was re-ordained according to the form of Geneva. He filled the chair of divinity at Sedan with reputation; but, when that university was taken from the Protestants, he retired to Holland, and settled at Rotterdam, where he became a violent polemic, and engaged in some fierce contentions with Bayle and others. His principal works are a "Preservative against Popery," "La Politique du Clergé," "L'Accomplissement des Pro-phètes," "Histoire de Calvinisme et du Papisme," and "Histoire des Dogmes et des Cultes." D. 1713.

JUSSEU, DE; ANTHONY, BERNARD, and JOSEPH; three eminent French botanists and physicians. The first was b. at Lyons in 1686, and d. in 1758. He enriched the memoirs of the Academy of Sciences at Paris with several valuable papers, the result of observations made in his travels, on botany and mineralogy. He also wrote the appendix to Tournefort, and abridged Borellier's work upon the plants of France, Spain, and Italy; he was likewise the author of a "Discourse on the Progress of Botany."—BERNARD, brother of the preceding, was b. at Lyons in 1699, and d. in 1776. He published an edition of "Tournefort's History of Plants about Paris," and was the author of a book, entitled "The Friend of Humanity, or the advice of a good Citizen to the Nation." He was botanical demonstrator at the king's garden, and was much esteemed by Louis XV. Cuvier calls him "the most modest, and, perhaps, the most profound, botanist of the 18th century, who, although he scarcely published any thing, is nevertheless the inspiring genius of modern botanists."—JOSEPH, was also a member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, and accompanied Condaminé to Peru, in 1735. He was not only a good naturalist and physician, but an excellent engineer. He published a journal of his voyages, and d. in 1779.

JUSTEL, CHRISTOPHER, a French statesman and juridical writer of the 17th century, was b. in 1580, and d. in 1649. He was well acquainted with ecclesiastical antiquities and the canon law, respecting which he published several learned works, and left valuable MS. collections.—His son HENRY sent his father's MSS. to the university of Oxford, for which he was complimented with the degree of LL.D. On the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he came to London, and was appointed keeper to the king's library. He published, chiefly from his father's collection, "Bibliotheca Canonici veteris," and also some able works of his own. B. 1620; d. 1693.

JUSTI, JOHN HENRY GOTTLÖB DE, an eminent German mineralogist, who, after gaining some literary reputation at the university of Jena in 1720, enlisted as a common soldier in the Prussian service. He rose to the rank of lieutenant; was cashiered and imprisoned for insubordination, but made his escape to Leipsic, and maintained himself by writing for the press. In 1755 he became professor of political economy and natural history at Gottingen; but having written too freely on the Prussian government, was arrested, and ended his days a prisoner in the fortress of Custrin, in 1771. He was the author of a "Treatise on Money," a "Treatise on Mineralogy," "Miscellanies on Chemistry and Mineralogy," and "A Complete Treatise on Manufactures."

JUSTIN, a Latin historian, who probably lived at Rome in the 2d or 3d century. He made an epitome of the history of Trogus Pompeius, a native of Gaul, who lived in the time of Augustus, and whose works, in 44 books, contain a history of the world, from the earliest ages to his own time. Justin has been illustrated by the most able commentators, and particularly by Grævius.—Sr., a Christian philosopher and martyr in the 2d century, was a native of Sichem, in Samaria. A persecution breaking out against the Christians, under Antoninus, Justin presented to that emperor an admirable apology in their behalf, which had the desired effect. He afterwards addressed another apology to Marcus Aurelius, in which he defended those of his religion against the calumnies of Crescens, a Cynic philosopher. For this, and his neglect of pagan worship, he was condemned to be scourged and then beheaded, which sentence was put in execution, A. D. 164., in the 75th year of his age.

JUSTINIAN I., surnamed the Great, nephew of Justin I., emperor of the East, and celebrated as a lawgiver, was b. in 483, of an obscure family. He shared the fortunes of his uncle, who, from a common Thracian peasant, was raised to the imperial throne; and at whose death, in 527, he obtained the exclusive sovereignty. He was then in his 45th year, and distinguished for his devotional austerity; but immediately upon his elevation he solemnly espoused Theodora, an actress and courtesan, whose influence over him was unbounded. During the reign of Justinian many conquests were made by his brave general Belisarius. In 528 and 529 he obtained three glorious victories over the Persians; in 534 he destroyed the empire of the Vandals in Africa; Spain and Sicily were reconquered; and the Ostrogoths, who possessed Italy, were vanquished. The principal event, however, which has rendered the reign of Justinian interesting to posterity, was the celebrated reformation of the Roman jurisprudence. He commissioned Tribonian, aided by other learned civilians, to form a new code from his own laws and those of his predecessors. To this code Justinian added the "Pandeets," the "Institute," and the "Novellæ," since called, collectively, the body of civil law, (corpus juris civilis.) He likewise embellished the capital with numerous magnificent churches, among which is the celebrated Sancta Sophia, now subsisting as the principal mosque in Constantinople. Bridges, aqueducts, hospitals, fortresses, and other public works, were also undertaken throughout the various provinces of the empire. But towards the end of his life he became avaricious, oppressed the people with taxes, and lent a willing ear to every accusation; and at length, full of cares and disquietudes, he d. in 565, after a reign of 38 years, and in the 83d of his age.—II. was the elder son of Constantine Pogonatus, whom he succeeded in 685. He recovered several provinces from the Saracens, and made an advantageous peace with them; but his exactions, cruelties, and debaucheries tarnished the glory of his arms. He was slain, with his son Tiberius, in 711, by Philippius Bardanes, his successor.

JUSTINIANI, AUGUSTIN, bishop of Nebo, in Corsica, was a prelate of distinguished literary abilities. He was the author of "Annales de Republica Genoensi;" a "Psalter in Hebrew, Greek, Arabic, and Chaldee, with Latin notes," &c., being the first of the kind that ever appeared in print. He perished in a voyage from Corsica to Genoa, in 1536.—St. LAWRENCE, the first patriarch of Venice, was b. there in 1381; d. in 1485; and was canonized by Pope Alexander VIII. in 1690. He was the author of several devotional works.—BERNARD, nephew of the preceding, was b. at Venice, in 1408; was employed in several important missions by Calixtus III.; wrote a history of Venice, which has been considered the first regular attempt of the kind, and the life of his uncle, Lawrence the patriarch; and d. in 1489.

JUVENAL, DECIUS JUNIUS, a Latin poet, remarkable for the caustic severity of his satires, was b. at Aquinum, in Campania, about the beginning of the reign of Claudius. He studied rhetoric under the most celebrated masters, and became an eminent pleader at the bar; but satire was his forte. His first essay as a poetical satirist was directed against the player, Paris, who was the minion of Domitian; for which he was sent into an honorable kind of exile, by being made commander of a cohort at Pentapolis, on the borders of Egypt. On Domitian's death he returned to Rome, where he d. in his 80th year, A. D. 128. He may be said to have been the last of the Roman poets, and as the bold and unflinching castigator of vice he stands without a rival. Good as are his intentions, however, and forcible as are his denunciations, the moral indelicacy of the age in which he lived renders the satires of Juvenal too gross in their details for readers of the present day. Able translations have been made by Dryden, Gifford, &c.

K.

KAAB, a celebrated Arabian poet, cotemporary with Mahomet, whom he at first strenuously opposed, but afterwards eulogized. As a reward for writing a poem in his favor, the prophet gave him his green mantle, which one of the descendants of Kaab sold for 10,000 pieces of silver. D. 662.

KAAS, NICHOLAS, an eminent Danish statesman, was b. 1535, and studied in the universities of Germany. In 1573 he was made chancellor of Denmark; and, on the death of King Frederic II., in 1588, he was nominated to fill the situation of first regent during the minority of Christian I. D. 1594.

KABRIS, JOSEPH, a French sailor, who, being taken prisoner by the English, obtained permission to enter on board a South sea whaler, and being wrecked on the coast of the island of Noukahiwa, in the Pacific ocean, fell into the hands of the cannibal inhabitants. While preparations were making for his intended fate, and his doom appeared inevitable, he was saved by the intercession of the king's daughter, who shortly after became his wife. Being now allied to royalty, he was made chief judge of the island, which office he exercised with reputation and comparative ease, owing to the simplicity of their legal institutions. Nine years thus passed away, and Kabris lived in the enjoyment of domestic happiness, when he was carried off, as he stated, while asleep, by the Russian navigator, Captain Krusenstern. On returning to France, in 1817, he exhibited himself to the public at Paris and elsewhere, his face being tattooed in the New Zealand style. His object was to raise money, to enable him to return to his wife and family at Noukahiwa; but, while travelling for this purpose, he d. suddenly at Versailles, 1822.

KÄMPFER, ENGELBRECHT, a celebrated physician, naturalist, and traveler, was b. at Lemgo, in Westphalia, 1651; studied at Dantzic, Thorn, and Cracow; performed a journey, in 1683, as secretary to a Swedish embassy, by land through Russia and Persia; after which he visited Arabia, Hindostan, Java, Sumatra, Siam, and Japan, in which last country he resided two years. In 1692 he returned to his native country, took his degree of M.D. at Leyden, and entered upon medical practice. He was the author of a "History of Japan," "Amœnitates Exoticæ," &c. D. 1716.

KAESTNER, ABRAHAM GOTTHELF, a mathematician, astronomer, and poet, was b. 1719, at Leipsic; and filled the situation of professor of mathematics at Gottingen, with the highest reputation for more than 40 years. His scientific works are extremely numerous, of which the principal is a "History of Mathematics." D. 1799.

KALB, baron de, a major-general in the American army, was b. in Germany, about the year 1717. He entered into the French service when young, and continued in it 42 years. In 1757, during the war between Great Britain and France, he was sent by the French government to the American colonies, in order to see with what effect the seeds of discontent against the mother country might be sown among them. While in the performance of this commission he was seized as a suspected person, but escaped detection. He then went to Canada, where he remained until its conquest by the British, after which he returned to France. During the war of the revolution he offered his services to the congress, which were accepted. On the 15th of August, 1778, when Lord Rawdon defeated General Gates, near Camden, the baron commanded the right wing of the American army, and fell covered with wounds.

KALE, or KALF, WILLIAM, an eminent painter, was b. at Amsterdam, in 1630. He had the power of Rembrandt in distributing his light and shade, while in correctness and delicacy he equalled Teniers. D. 1693.

KALKBRENNER, CHRISTIAN, an eminent musical composer, was b. 1755, at Munden, in Prussia; was a pupil of Emanuel Bach; and having made considerable progress both in the theoretical and practical branches of the profession, entered the service of Prince Henry of Prussia, and finally settled in Paris, where his reputation obtained him the appointment of singing-master to the academy of music, which he held till his death, in 1806.—CHRISTIAN FREDERIC, a distinguished pianist, son of the above, was b. at Cassel, 1784. Having acquired, at an early age, a high reputation as a brilliant performer on the pianoforte, he removed in 1806 to Paris, whence he made frequent professional tours throughout Europe, his fame daily increasing, both from his own performances and the brilliant compositions which he gave to the world. In 1814 he removed to London, where he remained 9 years. He once returned to the French capital in 1823, when he joined M. Pleydel as a manufacturer of keyed instruments, and continued to occupy a prominent position in the musical world till his decease. D. 1849.

KALM, PETER, a Swedish traveller and natural philosopher, was b. 1715, in Ostro Bothnia; travelled in North America and Russia, for the purpose of exploring those countries; became professor of botany in the university of Abo, and d. 1779. His works consist of "Travels in America," which have been translated into English; besides numerous dissertations, illustrative of the state of commerce, agriculture, and manufactures in Sweden.

KANT, EMMANUEL, a celebrated German metaphysician, and the founder of a new philosophical sect, was b. at Königsberg, in Prussia Proper, 1724, and was the son of a saddler. Through the kindness of a rich uncle he was educated at the Frederician college, on leaving which he accepted the situation of tutor in a clergyman's family. He commenced his literary career in his 23d year; but it was not till he was appointed a professor in the university of Königsberg, in 1770, that any traces of his new metaphysical system, which afterwards attracted so much notice, appeared in his works. In 1781 he published his "Critical Inquiry into the Nature of Pure Reason," which contains the system commonly known under the title of the "Critical Philosophy." A second part of it, published in 1783, bore the title of "Prolegomena for future Metaphysics." The principles contained in them he had, however, long been promulgating from his professional chair. In 1786 he was chosen rector of the university; and, though far advanced in life, he continued to produce works in further development of his philosophical principles, until 1798, when he retired from his official situations, and d. in 1804. Kant was a man of high intellectual endowments; and his critical philosophy for a time superseded every other in the Protestant universities of Germany.

KARAMSIN, NICHOLAS MICHAELOVITSCH, imperial Russian historiographer, was b. 1765; educated at Moscow; served for a while in the imperial guards, and travelled for two years, through Middle Europe; after which he devoted himself to literature. His "History of the Russian Empire," the "Letters of a Russian Traveller," and "Aglia," a collection of tales, are all works of merit, and in much esteem. D. 1826.

KAUFMANN, MARIA ANNA ANGELICA, a distinguished artist, b. at Coire, in the Grisons, 1741. She acquired the first principles of drawing and painting from her father, whom she soon excelled. At Milan, Florence, Rome, and Naples she greatly increased her skill; and when, in 1766, she went to England, and was patronized by royalty, her reputation and success quickly improved her circumstances. She remained there seventeen years; married Zucchi, a Venetian painter; and d. at Rome, in 1807. She excelled most in the representation of female characters; and many of her most admired paintings were engraved by Bartolozzi, whose labors much contributed to the growth and perpetuity of her fame.

KAUNITZ, WENCESLAUS ANTHONY, Prince, a German statesman, was b. at Vienna, in 1711; and though at first destined for the church, he finally engaged in political life. His talents, aided by a favorable exterior, opened a brilliant career to him. In 1744 he was made minister of state for the kingdoms of Hungary and Bohemia; in 1748 he assisted at the congress of Aix-la-Chapelle, was honored with the order of the golden fleece by Maria Theresa, and employed as ambassador to Paris; returned to Vienna in 1753, and took the office of chancellor of state; concluded the treaty of alliance between Austria and France, in 1756; was made a prince of the German empire in 1764, and d. 1794.

KAYE, or CAIUS, Dr. JOHN, the founder of Caius college, Cambridge, was b. at Norwich, in 1510; was educated for the medical profession, first at Glonville hall, Cambridge, and subsequently at Bologna, where he graduated as M.D. On his return to England he became physician to the court, and held that office during three successive reigns. He was for several years president of the college of physicians; and, in 1557, he obtained a royal license to advance Glonville hall into a college, which he endowed with several considerable estates, and added to it the quadrangle. D. 1573.

KEAN, EDMUND, an eminent English tragedian, was the son of a scene-car-penter of the name of Kean, (whose brother, Moses Kean, obtained some notoriety as a mimic and a ventriloquist,) and the daughter of the well-known George Saville Carey, a dramatic writer and performer. He was b. in Castle-street, Leicester-square, London, in 1787. He trod the stage almost as soon as he could walk alone, being employed in processions, &c., thus imperceptibly acquiring the rudiments of his theatrical education under the eye of that great actor, John Kemble, whose rival he was afterwards destined to become. Miss Tidswell, an actress long known on the metropolitan stage, and said to have been a relation, assisted Kean in his juvenile efforts, and, at the age of 13, recommended him to a company of players in Yorkshire. He performed there under the name of Carey, and is said to have obtained much applause in the parts of Hamlet, Lord Hastings, and Cato. He also distinguished himself by his talents for recitation; and his delivery of Satan's Address to the Sun, from Milton's Paradise Lost, and the first soliloquy in Shakspeare's Richard III. having been highly applauded, he repeated his recitations at Windsor, before some of the royal family. He had also the good fortune to attract the notice of Dr. Drury, who sent him to Eton, where he remained three years, and is said to have made great progress in classical studies, devoting much of his attention to the precepts and examples of Cicero. On quitting Eton he procured an engagement at Birmingham, where he was seen by the manager of the Edinburgh theatre, who engaged him for twenty nights, on twelve of which he performed Hamlet to crowded houses. He was at this time only sixteen; and we find that his provincial engagements led him, in the course of a few years, to nearly all the principal towns in the south and west of England, playing in tragedy, comedy, opera, and pantomime. In the mean time, Dr. Drury, his old patron, had recommended him to the directing committee of Drury-lane, as fitted to revive that declining theatre. He was, in consequence, engaged there for three years, at a rising salary of eight, ten, and twelve guineas a week for each successive year. His first appearance was on the 26th of January, 1814, in the character of Shylock. In 1820 he visited the United States, and performed in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Boston, on the whole with great success. After his return to England, the extravagance and dissoluteness which had always disgraced his character, involved him in great embarrassments; and a second visit to America, in 1825, was attended with little credit or advantage. He returned again to England, and became manager of the theatre at Richmond, Surrey, where he d. May 15, 1833.

KEATS, JOHN, a young English poet, of humble origin, was b. in 1796, at a livery-stable, kept by his grandfather in Moorfields. He was apprenticed to a surgeon, but gave way to the ambition of becoming a poet. He published "Endymion," a poetical romance, in 1818; and, in 1820, his last and best work, "Lamia," and other poems. Being in feeble health, from a severe pulmonary disease, he was advised to try the fine climate of Italy, where he arrived in November, 1820, accompanied by his friend Mr. Severn the artist, and d. in Rome on the 27th of December following. He was interred in the English burying-ground, near the monument of Caius Cestius, and not far from the place where, soon after, were deposited the remains of the poet Shelley. Mr. Leigh Hunt, who was his earliest and warmest patron, describes him as having "a very manly as well as a delicate spirit," and being gifted with "the two highest qualities of a poet in the highest degree—sensibility and imagination."

KEBLE, JOSEPH, an English lawyer, whose industry was so remarkable during his whole life, that some account of it is absolutely due to his memory.

He was born about 1632, studied at Oxford, and was called to the bar in 1658. Three years afterwards he began to signalize himself by the constant regularity of his appearance in the court of King's Bench, where from that time to the day of his decease, a period of nearly half a century, he occupied himself incessantly as a reporter of the cases which came before the court. Nor was he less persevering while attending the chapel, copies of upwards of 4000 sermons, delivered by various preachers in that place of worship, being found among his papers when he d., in 1710. His publications are numerous, the principal being, "A Table to the Statutes," "Assistance to Justices of the Peace," "Reports," and "Essays on Human Nature and Human Actions."

KEILL, JOHN, a learned mathematician, was b. at Edinburgh, in 1671. In 1698 he published an examination of Burnet's "Theory of the Earth," to which he subjoined "Remarks on Whiston's Theory." The year following he was appointed deputy-professor of natural philosophy; and in 1701 he published his "Introductio ad Veram Physicam," as a preparation for the study of Newton's "Principia." In 1708 he defended Newton's claim to the invention of Fluxions, which brought him into a dispute with Leibnitz. In 1709 he was appointed treasurer to the German exiles from the Palatinate, and attended them in that capacity to New England. He next defended Newton's doctrine against the Cartesians, and received his degree of M.D. In 1714 he was chosen Savilian professor of astronomy at Oxford, and the year following appointed decipherer to the queen. Among his works are, "An Introduction to True Philosophy" and "An Introduction to True Astronomy." D. 1721.

KEISER, REINHARD, an eminent German musician and composer, was b. at Leipsic, in 1673. He was the author of 118 operas, of which his "Circe," brought out at Hamburg in 1734, was the last and most beautiful. He possessed a most fertile imagination, and is considered as the father of German melody. D. 1735.

KELLERMANN, FRANCIS CHRISTOPHER, duke of Valmy, peer and marshal of France, &c., was b. at Strasburg, in 1735; entered the Conflans legion as a hussar when 17 years of age, and rose to the rank of quartermaster-general in 1758. At the breaking out of the revolution he distinguished himself by his patriotism and judgment. At the commencement of the war he received the command of the army of the Moselle; formed a junction with the main army under Dumouriez; and sustained, Sept. 20th, 1792, the celebrated attack of the duke of Brunswick at Valmy, which contributed much to the success of the campaign. He was repeatedly denounced to the national convention by Custine and others; but his trial not taking place till after the reign of terror, he was acquitted. In 1795 he took the command of the army of the Alps and Italy, but he was soon superseded by Bonaparte. In 1798 he was nominated a member of the military board; in 1801 he was president of the conservative senate, and the following year a marshal of the empire. He served under Napoleon in Germany and Prussia; and having, in 1814, voted for the restoration of royalty, was employed under the Bourbons till his death in 1820.

KELLEY, or TALBOT, EDWARD, a celebrated necromancer and alchemist, was b. at Worcester in 1555, and educated at Gloucester hall, Oxford; but was obliged to leave the university for some crime, and after rambling about the kingdom, was sentenced to lose his ears at Lancaster. He next became an associate with the credulous Dr. Dee, and accompanied him to Prague, where Kelley contrived to live handsomely by his impostures, and was knighted by the Emperor Rodolphus; but his tricks being discovered, he was thrown into prison, and in attempting to escape, he fell, and bruised himself to such a degree, that he d. soon after, in 1595. He wrote a poem on chemistry, and another on the philosopher's stone; besides several Latin and English discourses printed in Dr. Meric Casaubon's "True and faithful Relation of what passed for many years between Dr. John Dee and some Spirits."

KELLY, HUGH, a dramatic and miscellaneous writer, was b. in 1739, near the lake of Killarney. He was apprenticed to a staymaker, which trade he quitted when in London, and became clerk to an attorney. Afterwards he turned his attention to authorship with considerable success, writing political pamphlets, plays, &c. His works are, "False Delicacy," "A Word to the Wise," "The School for Wives," the "Romance of an Hour," comedies; "Clementina," a tragedy; "Thespis," a poem in the manner of Churchill's "Rosciad;"

"Louisa Mildmay," a novel; and "The Babblers," a collection of essays. D. 1777.—JOHN, a learned English clergyman, was a native of Douglas, in the Isle of Man, and b. in 1750. Having paid a particular attention to the vernacular dialect of the Celtic tongue, which was spoken in that island, he was introduced to Bishop Hildesley, who employed him in translating the Bible into the Manks language, and ordained him a minister of the Episcopal congregation of Ayr, in Scotland. Through the patronage of the duke of Gordon, to whose son, the marquis of Huntly, he was tutor, he obtained the rectory of Copford, in Essex; and having entered at St. John's college, Cambridge, he was there honored with the degree of LL.D. In 1808 he published "A Practical Grammar of the Ancient Gaelic, or Language of the Isle of Man;" and in 1805 issued proposals for publishing "A Triglot Dictionary of the Celtic Tongue," which was nearly completed when the sheets were destroyed by a fire on the premises of Mr. Nichols, the printer. D. 1809.—MICHAEL, a composer and singer, was the son of a wine merchant in Dublin, who, for many years, acted as master of the ceremonies at the viceregal castle. He was b. in 1762, and at an early age gave proofs of genius for music, which induced his father to place him under Rauzzini, at that time in Dublin, who prevailed on his friends to send him to Naples, where he arrived when in his 16th year. He there found a patron in Sir William Hamilton, the British minister; studied under Fineroli and Appili; and subsequently performed at most of the Italian theatres, and in Germany. He contracted a close intimacy with Mozart during his stay at Vienna; was for some time in the service of the Emperor Joseph; and at length returned to London, where he made his first appearance, in 1787, at Drury-lane theatre, in "Lionel and Clarissa," and retained his situation as first singer at that theatre, the musical performances of which he directed till his retirement from the stage. He set to music upwards of 60 pieces, most of which were successful, and amongst these are the once highly popular compositions in Colman's musical romance of "Bluebeard." A few months previous to his death appeared his "Reminiscences," a very amusing work, replete with anecdotes of his contemporaries and familiar associates. D. 1826.

KEMBLE, JOHN PHILIP, the most dignified and accomplished actor on the British stage since the days of Garrick, was the eldest son of Roger Kemble, manager of a company of comedians at Prescott, in Lancashire, where he was b. in 1757. Being of Catholic parents, he was sent to the English college at Douay, where he early distinguished himself by his proficiency in elocution, and had Talma for a fellow-student. Finding that his father designed him for the priesthood, he quitted the college clandestinely, returned to England, and, engaging in an itinerant company, performed with great eclat at Liverpool, Edinburgh, York, &c. In 1798 he made his first appearance on the boards of Drury-lane, in the character of Hamlet. His success was complete; and from that time he maintained the character of being the first tragedian of the age. On the secession of Mr. King, he became manager of Drury-lane theatre. In 1802 he took advantage of the peace to visit the Continent, in order to study the French and Spanish histrionic establishments, with a view to the improvement of the English. On his return, he became manager of the Covent-garden theatre, where he continued till 1809, when that building was destroyed by fire. On the restoration of the edifice, Mr. Kemble was, during the O. P. riots, as they were called, the object of popular resentment, in consequence of having raised the prices, and made certain obnoxious arrangements in regard to the private boxes. In 1817 he retired from the stage, after a long and honorable career; and, in consequence of ill health, went first to Montpellier, and thence to Lausanne, where he d. Feb. 26, 1823.—GEORGE STEPHEN, brother of the foregoing, and also an able actor, was b. at Kingstown, in Herefordshire; his mother having performed the part of Anne Bullen, in the play of Henry VIII., on the evening of his birth. This gentleman was intended for the medical profession, and was apprenticed to a surgeon in Coventry; but soon quitted it for the stage. He first appeared at Covent-garden theatre in 1783. He was afterwards manager of the theatres of Edinburgh, Glasgow, Liverpool, and Newcastle; and he was remarkable for playing the part of Falstaff without stuffing. D. 1822.—PRISCILLA, widow of John Philip Kemble, the eminent tragedian, d. at Leamington, aged 90, on the 13th of May, 1845. This lady, like the widow of Mr. Garrick, long survived her celebrated husband, and, it is said, was (like her) the oldest member of the theatrical profession at the time of her decease. She entered on that public career in very early youth, and was first married to Mr. Brereton, an actor of considerable celebrity. Not many years after his death she was united to Mr. Kemble, and on his death in 1823, she took up her residence at Leamington, where she lived highly respected; her lively conversation and knowledge of the world rendering her society no less desirable, than her liberal and charitable disposition had made it useful.

KEMP, JOSEPH, an eminent musical composer, was b. at Exeter, in 1778, and was a chorister in the cathedral of his native city, where he studied under the celebrated William Jackson. In 1802, having been appointed organist of Bristol cathedral, he removed thither, and in the same year composed one of his best anthems, "I am Alpha and Omega." In 1807 he left Bristol for London, and the year following took the degree of M.B. at Cambridge. In 1809 he proceeded to that of doctor, when his exercise entitled "The Crucifixion" was performed. He now became a lecturer on music at several institutions, and invented a new mode of teaching the science. His principal works are, "A new System of Musical Education, being a Self-Instructor," "Twenty Psalm-odical Melodies," "The Siege of Ischa," an opera, with a variety of songs, glees, duets, &c.

KEMPELEN, WOLFGANG, Baron, a celebrated mathematician. was b. in 1734, at Presburg, in Hungary. Among his inventions was the famous automaton chess-player, which he first exhibited at Paris in 1783, and afterwards in London; but the secret of it was never discovered. He also invented a speaking figure, which he himself described in a work called "The Mechanism of Speech." He was also an author, and wrote "Perseus and Andromeda," a drama, "The Unknown Benefactor," a comedy, and some poems. D. 1804.

KEMPIS, THOMAS A, a famous writer of the 14th century, was b. at a village of that name, in the diocese of Cologne, in 1380, and d. in 1471. His treatise, "De Imitatione Christi," or, "Of the Imitation of Christ," some have attributed to Gerson.

KEN, THOMAS, a learned and pious dignity of the church of England, was b. at Berkhamstead, in Hertfordshire, in 1637. D. 1711.

KENNEY, JAMES, a distinguished dramatist, many of whose pieces still keep possession of the stage, was b. in Ireland, about 1670. His lively farce of "Raising the Wind," with its inimitable character of Jeremy Diddler, was his first dramatic production. This was soon followed by "Love, Law, and Physic," "Matrimony," "The World," "The Illustrious Stranger," &c. His health had been for a long time infirm, and he d. on the morning fixed for his benefit at Drury-lane theatre, Aug. 1, 1849.

KENNICOTT, BENJAMIN, an able divine and biblical critic, was a native of Totness, Devonshire, of which place his father was parish clerk. He was educated at Wadham college, Oxford, became vicar of Culham, preacher of Whitehall, librarian of the Radcliffe, a prebend of Westminster, and canon of Christ-church. Dr. Kennicott's literary fame mainly rests on his Hebrew Bible, in collating the numerous manuscripts for the text of which he was incessantly occupied during more than ten years. Though some object to this great work, that the author was insufficiently acquainted with the Eastern languages, yet every scholar admits that he rendered great service to the cause of science and religion by opening the way in this department of biblical criticism. D. 1783.

KENRICK, WILLIAM, a miscellaneous writer, was b. at Watford, in Hertfordshire. He was brought up as a rule-maker, but quitted his trade, obtained a doctor's degree at Leyden, and became an industrious author and critic. He established the "London Review," in which many critiques of merit appeared, too often, however, contaminated by vituperative language and unwarrantable personalities. He compiled a "Dictionary of the English Language," and wrote various works, among which are the comedies of "Falstaff's Wedding," "The Widowed Wife," and "The Duellist," "Epistles, Philosophical and Moral," and various poems. D. 1779.

KENT, JAMES, b. July 31, 1763, in Fredericksburg, then part of Duchess county, N. Y., received his preparatory education at Norwalk, Ct., and entered Yale college in 1777. In July, 1779, during the invasion of New Haven, the college exercises were suspended, and it was during this period that the future chancellor acquired a fondness for the profession of the law. He then first read Blackstone, and read it with care and enthusiasm. He was graduated with distinguished honor in 1781. Upon leaving college he studied the law with Egbert Benson, attorney-general of the state of New York, and in 1787 was admitted, at Albany, a counsellor of the supreme court of the state. In 1790, and again in 1792, while residing at Poughkeepsie, he was elected to the legislature from his native county, but in 1793, having lost his election by a few votes, he removed to the city of New York, and became professor of law in Columbia college. In 1796 he was appointed a master in chancery, and in the next year was made recorder of the city. In 1798 he was appointed associate justice of the supreme court. In July, 1804, he was appointed chief justice, and in February, 1814, he abandoned the latter office for that of chancellor, and on July 31, 1823, after hearing and deciding every case that had been brought before him, he retired from office, agreeably to the provisions of the constitution of 1821, which disqualified for judicial office all above sixty years of age. This event was universally regarded with regret. The bar of New York, the bar of Albany, and such gentlemen as were then attending the supreme court at Utica, vied with each other in expressions of respect. The letters which are preserved in the seventh volume of "Johnson's Chancery Reports," are signed by the most distinguished lawyers in the state, and prove that, great as had been his merits as a judge, the warmth and generosity of his feelings had left an impression not less decided. The next year he was reappointed law professor in Columbia college, and the lectures which he there delivered formed the basis of his celebrated "Commentaries." D. 1847.

KENYON, LLOYD, Lord, a celebrated judge, was b. at Gredington, Flintshire, 1733. He became a member of the society of Lincoln's Inn, and was called to the bar in 1761, but he does not appear to have made a conspicuous figure till 1780, when he led the defence, with Mr. Erskine, for Lord George Gordon. In 1782 he was made attorney-general and chief justice of Chester. He was also returned to parliament for Hindon, in Wiltshire. In 1784 he was appointed master of the rolls, and, on the resignation of the earl of Mansfield, in 1788, he was raised to the office of chief justice of the King's Bench, and created Baron Kenyon. D. 1802.

KEPLER, JOHN, a distinguished astronomer and mathematician, was b. in 1571, at Wief, in the duchy of Wirtemberg. He was educated at Tubingen, under Mæstlins, and, in 1591, was appointed professor of astronomy at Gratz, soon after which he published his "Mysterium Cosmographicum." In 1598 he was banished the university for professing the reformed religion, but was afterwards recalled, and restored to his office. In 1600 he was invited by Tycho Brahe to join him in Bohemia; and when Tycho died, he became mathematician to the Emperor Rodolph, who employed him in completing the Rodolphine tables. To Kepler we are indebted for the discovery of the laws which regulate the movements of the planetary bodies, their ellipticity, &c.; and he accordingly ranks among the first class of astronomers. Among his scientific productions are "The Rodolphine Tables," "Optical Astronomy," "Harmony of the World," "Copernican Astronomy," &c. D. 1630.

KEPPEL, AUGUSTUS, Viscount, accompanied Commodore Anson in his voyage round the world, and afterwards passed through all the gradations of the service, till he attained the rank of admiral. In 1778 he commanded the Channel fleet, which, on the 12th of July, in that year, fell in with the French, under count d'Orvilliers, off Ushant. A partial action ensued, which the English admiral thought to have renewed in the morning, but the enemy had retired. This affair gave great dissatisfaction to the nation, which was aggravated by Sir Hugh Palliser, second in command, preferring a charge against Admiral Keppel; but he was honorably acquitted by a court-martial at Portsmouth. Sir Hugh was then tried and censured. In 1782 he was raised to the peerage; he was also at two separate periods first lord of the admiralty. D. 1786.

KERGUELEN TREMAREC, Yves JOSEPH DE, a French navigator, was b. at Brest, in 1745. After having been employed on the coast of Iceland, to protect the whale fishery, he was sent, in 1771, on an exploratory voyage to the South Sea; and having returned with a flattering account of a supposed continent towards the south pole, was again sent on a similar expedition in 1773. On his return he was charged with having abandoned a boat's crew on a desert shore, for which he was cashiered and imprisoned, but he was at length liberated. He published accounts of his voyages to the North and South Seas, and d. in 1797.

KERR, ROBERT, a surgeon at Edinburgh, who devoted himself principally to the physical sciences, and distinguished himself as an industrious author and translator. Among his works are, "A History of Scotland during the reign of Robert Bruce," "Cuvier's Theory of the Earth," a "General Collection of Voyages and Travels," &c., &c. D. 1814.

KERRICK, THOMAS, principal librarian of the university of Cambridge, author of "Observations on the Gothic Buildings abroad, particularly those in Italy, and on Gothic Architecture in general." D. 1828.

KESSEL, JOHN VAN, an artist, was b. at Antwerp, in 1626, and d. about 1690. He painted portraits in the manner of Vandyke, but excelled in the representation of flowers, fruits, and insects.

KETEL, CORNELIUS, a Dutch artist. He went to England in the reign of Elizabeth, whose portrait he painted, as well as the portraits of many of the nobility. On his return to Holland he laid aside the use of pencils, and painted with the tops of his fingers, and even with his toes. D. 1602.

KETT, HENRY, a divine and an accomplished scholar, was b. in 1761, at Norwich, was educated at Trinity college, Oxford, was appointed Bampton lecturer in 1790, and rector of Charlton, &c. He was the author of "History, the Interpreter of Prophecy," "Elements of General Knowledge," "A Tour to the Lakes," "Emily," a moral tale, &c. Drowned while bathing, in 1825.—WILLIAM, a tanner of Norfolk, who in the reign of Edward VI. excited a revolt against the government. After defeating the marquis of Northampton, he was routed by the earl of Warwick, and Kett with several others was hanged, in 1549.

KEULEN, LUDOLPH VAN, a Dutch geometrician, who acquired great celebrity by his calculation of the approximate correspondence between the diameter of a circle and its circumference. He taught mathematics at Breda and Amsterdam. D. 1610.—JANSSEN VAN, a portrait painter, was b. in London, of Dutch parents, and before Vandyke came to England, was in great favor with Charles I. D. 1665.

KIDDER, RICHARD, a learned English prelate, was a native of Sussex, or, as some say, of Suffolk, and was educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, where he was elected to a fellowship. In 1681 he was made prebend of Norwich, and, in 1689, dean of Peterborough, on which occasion he took his doctor's degree. On the deprivation of Dr. Ken, he was consecrated bishop of Bath and Wells, and preached the Boyle's lecture in 1693. He and his wife were killed in their bed at Wells, during the night of the great storm, Nov. 26, 1703. Besides several sermons and religious tracts, he published a work, entitled "The Demonstration of the Messiah," a "Commentary on the Pentateuch," &c.

KILBYE, RICHARD, an English divine, who studied at Lincoln college, Oxford, of which he became rector in 1590. He was one of the translators of the present version of the Bible, and d. in 1620.

KILLIGREW, WILLIAM, THOMAS, and HENRY, three brothers, distinguished for their talents, wit, and loyalty, in the reigns of Charles I. and II., were the sons of Sir Robert Killigrew, of Hanworth, in Middlesex. Thomas, by his liveliness and wit, became a great favorite with Charles II., and obtained the name of king's jester.—ANNE, b. in 1660, had a decided genius for painting and poetry, and was distinguished for her exemplary piety and unblemished virtue, amidst the seductions of a licentious court. She was one of the maids of honor to the duchess of York, of whom, as well as her husband, she executed portraits. D. 1685.

KIMBER, ISAAC, a dissenting minister, b. at Wantage, Berks, in 1692, author of a "History of England," a "Life of Oliver Cromwell," some essays, discourses, &c. D. 1758.—EDWARD, his son, followed the same pursuits. His publications were the "Peerages of Scotland and Ireland," the "Baronetage of England," a "History of England," and "The Adventures of Joe Thompson," a novel.

KING, PETER, lord chancellor, an able and upright judge, nephew of John Locke, was b. 1669. While serving his apprenticeship to his father, a grocer at Exeter, he secretly acquired the learned languages by self-tuition, and so great was the proficiency he attained, that it induced his uncle to send him to Leyden university. After leaving Leyden he entered the Middle Temple, and attained high forensic eminence. In 1705 he became a member of parliament, was made lord chief justice of the common pleas in 1715, and raised to the chancellorship in 1725. Lord King offers a remarkable instance of the attainment of the highest judicial rank, simply by his own legal knowledge and high moral character, without any adventitious aid. But he was no less remarkable for his legal attainments than for his ecclesiastical learning; for, besides a variety of controversial works of great ability, he wrote a "History of the Apostles' Creed," and "An Inquiry into the Constitution, &c., of the Primitive Church," which excited great interest at the time of their publication. D. 1734.—RUFUS, a statesman and diplomatist, b. 1755, at Scarborough, Maine, entered Harvard college in 1773, studied the law, and was admitted to the bar in 1778, and was elected a member of congress in 1784. In 1796 he was appointed by President Washington, minister plenipotentiary to the court of St. James's, the functions of which office he continued to discharge till 1803, when he returned home. In 1812 he was a third time sent to the senate by the legislature of New York, and his speech on the burning of Washington by the English was a most eloquent display of oratory. In 1816 he lost his election, but in 1820 he was once more re-elected, and continued until the expiration of the term in 1825. He then accepted the appointment of minister plenipotentiary at the court of London, but was taken ill, returned home, and soon after d. 1827.—THOMAS, a celebrated actor and dramatic writer, was b. in London, in 1730. Having obtained great celebrity as a comic actor in provincial companies, he was engaged at Drury-lane theatre in 1759, where he soon became a favorite with the public, and in 1766 arrived at the height of his professional reputation by the performance of Lord Ogleby. His dramatic pieces are, "Love at First Sight," "Neck or Nothing, a farce," "A Peep behind the Curtain, or the New Rehearsal," a comedy, "Wit's Last Stake," a comedy, and "Lovers' Quarrels." D. 1805.—WILLIAM, a poet and miscellaneous writer, was b. in London, in 1663, was educated at Christ-church, Oxford, admitted an advocate in doctors' commons, and obtained various preferments in Ireland. His poetical and political works are numerous, and some of them are replete with pleasantry and wit: but his most useful book is, "An Historical Account of the Heathen Gods and Heroes." D. 1712.—WILLIAM, principal of St. Mary's hall, Oxford, and an ingenious theological and political writer. He was the author of various Latin tracts, but the work by which he will be remembered is "Political and Literary Anecdotes of his own Times." B. at Steyning, 1685; d. 1763.—WILLIAM, archbishop of Dublin, was b. in 1650, and educated at Trinity college. He was the author of a celebrated treatise, "De Origine Mali," or the Origin of Evil, wherein he undertook to show how all the several kinds of evil with which the world abound are consistent with the goodness of God, and may be accounted for without the supposition of an evil principle. D. 1729.

KINGSBOROUGH, EDWARD, Viscount, eldest son of the third earl of Kingston, was greatly distinguished for his literary acquirements and his attachment to literary pursuits. He was a fellow of the Antiquarian Society, and author of a splendid work on "The Antiquities of Mexico." B. 1795; d. 1837.

KINNAIRD, DOUGLAS, was b. in 1786, and received his early education at Eton. He afterwards passed some time at Gottingen, where he made himself master of the French and German languages. In 1813 he accompanied Mr. Hobhouse through Sweden, and to Vienna, and was present at the battle of Culm. He became an active partner in the banking-house of Ransom and Morland; and after the old partnership was dissolved, took the principal management of the business. He possessed great energy of mind, was a lover of literature, a liberal patron of the arts, and an intimate friend of Lord Byron. D. 1830.

KIPPIS, ANDREW, a dissenting divine, biographer, and miscellaneous writer, was b. at Nottingham, in 1725. He was pastor of congregations successively at Boston, Dorking, and Westminster, and latterly one of the tutors at the dissenters' college, Hackney. Dr. Kippis laid the foundation of "The New Annual Register," and devoted his principal attention, during the latter years of his life, to an improved edition of the "Biographia Britannica," of which five volumes were printed; but it was conducted on a plan so elaborate as to afford no prospect of its termination. He also published the lives of Captain Cook, Pringle, Doddridge, and Lardner, "A Vindication of the Dissenters," a volume of sermons, and "Observations on the late Contests in the Royal Society." D. 1795.

KIRBY, JOHN JOSHUA, an artist, was b. at Parham, in Suffolk, in 1716. Though originally a house-painter, he had a good knowledge of the art; and on settling in London, he was introduced by Lord Bute to George III., by which he became clerk of the works at Kew. He published the "Perspective of Architecture," and d. in 1774.—WILLIAM, honorary member of the Entomological society of London, and fellow of the Royal, Linnæan, Zoological, and Geological societies, &c., has left behind him an imperishable name as one of the first entomologists of any age. His "Monographia Apum Angliæ," published in 1801, excited the warmest admiration of British and foreign entomologists. His numerous and valuable papers in the "Transactions of the Linnæan Society;" the "Introduction to Entomology," written in conjunction with Mr. Spence; the entomological portion of his Bridgewater treatise, "On the History, Habits, and Instincts of Animals;" and his description of the insects of the "Fauna Boreali-Americana" of Sir John Richardson, are among his other works. D. 1850.

KIRCHER, ATHANASIUS, a Jesuit, was b. in 1601, at Geysen, near Fulda, in Germany, and studied at Wurtzburg and Avignon; after which he was a teacher of mathematics in the college belonging to his order at Rome. His works evince great depth of learning; the principal are, "Edipus Egyptiacus," "Ars Magnesia," "Lingua Egyptiaca Restituta," "Mundus Subterraneus," "Organon Mathematicum," "Musurgia Universalis," &c. D. 1680.

KIRK, Colonel, an English officer, who, in 1685, committed the most inhuman barbarities in the west of England, in the time of James II.

KIRKLAND, JOHN THORNTON, a distinguished president of Harvard college, was b. 1770, at Little Falls, on the Mohawk, and was educated at Harvard. He was a preacher at Boston for sixteen years; in 1800 was made president of Harvard, and in 1823 resigned. D. 1841.

KIRKPATRICK, JAMES, a skilful orientalist, was a major-general in the British service, and passed a great part of his life in India. He published a "Description of the Kingdom of Nepal," a "Biography of Persian Poets," and the "Letters of Tippoo Saib." D. 1812.

KIRWAN, WALTER BLAKE, an Irish divine, eminent for his popularity as a preacher. He was b. at Galway, in 1754; was educated at St. Omer's and Louvain; took orders as a Catholic priest; and, in 1778, was appointed chaplain to the Neapolitan embassy in London. In 1787 he conformed to the established church, and obtained successively the prebendary of Howth, the living of St. Nicholas, in Dublin, and the deanery of Killala. As a pulpit orator he excelled all his cotemporaries; so great, indeed, were his attractions, that we are told that it was often necessary to keep off the crowds, by guards and pallisades, from the churches in which he was preaching. D. 1805.—RICHARD, a distinguished writer on chemistry, geology, &c., was a native of Galway county, in Ireland. He was educated at the university of Dublin; devoted himself with great ardor to chemical and mineralogical researches; and became a member of the Royal Irish Academy, and also a fellow of the Royal Society. In 1784 appeared his "Elements of Mineralogy." He also published "Geological Essays," a treatise on the "Analysis of Mineral Waters," an "Essay on Phlogiston and the Constitution of Acids," &c. D. 1812.

KITCHENER, WILLIAM, a physician and miscellaneous writer, was b. about 1775, and was the son of a respectable coal merchant in London, who left him a large fortune. He was educated at Eton, and settled in London as a physician; but he distinguished himself far more by his precepts on the art of gastronomy than by the practice of medicine. He was a kind-hearted, social being, with more foibles than faults. He wrote a book under the title of "The Cook's Oracle," in which the laws of the culinary art, professedly founded on his own practice, were promulgated; and, by appointing a "committee of taste" among his friends, who had regular invitations to his dinner-table, the fame of this epicure spread far and wide, while his evening conversations were the resort of privileged wits, and literary bon vivants. Optics and music were also particular objects of his study. Besides "The Cook's Oracle," which was his most popular work, he published "The Art of Invigorating and Prolonging Life," "The Economy of the Eyes," "The Traveller's Oracle," "Observations on Vocal Music," and "The Loyal and National Songs of England." D. 1827.

KLAPROTH, MARTIN HENRY, an eminent chemist and mineralogist, was b. at Berlin, in 1743; became chemical professor there; and d. 1817. He was the discoverer of uranium, the zirconia, and mellitic acid; he also made interesting experiments on copal; and completed the discovery of tellurium and titanium. Among his works are, "A Mineralogical System," "Chemical Essays," and, in conjunction with Wolf, a "Dictionary of Chemistry."—HENRI JULES, son of the preceding, was intended by his father to pursue the study of the physical sciences, but abandoned them in favor of the oriental languages, in which he became one of the ablest modern scholars. In 1805 he was selected to accompany the Russian ambassador into China, and in 1807 the academy of St. Petersburg commissioned him to visit the Caucasian provinces. Subsequently he settled at Paris, where he founded and organized the Asiatic society. He has left several valuable works: "Asia Polyglotta," "Tableau du Caucase," &c. B. 1783; d. 1835.

KLEBER, JEAN BAPTISTE, a celebrated French general, was b. at Strasburg, in 1754. He was originally an architect, but preferred the military profession, and entered into the Austrian service, where he remained from 1776 to 1783. When the French revolutionary war broke out, he entered as a grenadier into a volunteer regiment of his native department, and rose rapidly into command. He displayed great skill and bravery at the battle of Mayence, after which he was employed in La Vendée, but the sanguinary scenes there so disgusted him that he obtained his recall, and was engaged in the north, where he defeated the Austrians, took Mous, and drove the enemy from Louvain. He also captured Maestricht, and contributed to the splendid successes which distinguished the campaigns of 1795 and 1796 on the Rhine. The directory gave him the command of the army of the Sambre and Meuse, which he resigned to Hoche, and for a time retired from the service. Bonaparte, however, who well knew the value of his talents, prevailed upon him to join the expedition to Egypt. He was wounded at the battle of Alexandria, but he marched into Syria, where he commanded the corps of observation during the siege of Acre, and defeated the Turks in several actions. When Bonaparte left Egypt, he appointed Kleber commander-in-chief of the army; and he was assassinated by an Arab, June 14, 1800.

KLEIST, CHRISTIAN EWALD VON, a German poet, was b. at Zeblin, in Pomerania, in 1715. After studying the mathematics, philosophy, and law, at Königsberg, he entered into the Danish service, and next into that of Prussia, where he rose to the rank of major; and was killed, after displaying almost romantic bravery, at the battle of Kunnersdorff, in 1759. His principal poem, entitled "Spring," is beautifully descriptive, and has been compared to the "Seasons" of Thomson. Kleist also wrote idylls, moral treatises, and a military romance, called "Cissides."

KLINGEMANN, AUGUSTUS, a dramatic writer, and director of the national theatre at Brunswick, was b. in that city, 1777. In 1813 he received the direction of the theatre of his native place, and under his superintendence it became one of the first in Germany. His dramatic works form 12 volumes, and among them are, "Heinrich der Lowe," "Luther," "Moses," "Faust," &c. D. 1812.

KLINGER, FREDERIC MAXIMILIAN VON, an officer in the Russian service, and a literary character, was b. at Frankfurt-on-the-Maine, in 1753. He commenced as a dramatic writer; but, in the war of the Bavarian succession, he entered the military service, and was made a lieutenant in the Austrian army. In 1780 he went to St. Petersburg, and was appointed an officer and reader to the Grand-prince Paul, with whom he afterwards travelled through Poland, Austria, Italy, France, &c., and, in the reign of Catharine, he rose to the rank of colonel. By the Emperor Paul he was made major-general, and director of the corps of cadets; and, when Alexander ascended the throne, he received other offices and further promotion. D. 1831.

KLOPSTOCK, FREDERIC THEOPHILUS, one of the most celebrated of the German poets, was b. at Quedlinburg, in 1724. After receiving a liberal education at his native place, he was sent to study theology at Jena, where he wrote a great part of his "Messiah," which he published in 1757, at Leipsic. Though this poem underwent the ordeal of severe criticism by some, it was admired by more; and Bodmer, with the Swiss in general, were loud in its praises. Klopstock was invited into that country, and while there the people regarded him with a kind of veneration. From thence he was called to Copenhagen, by the most flattering promises, which were amply fulfilled. In 1771 he went to reside at Hamburg, as Danish legate, and counsellor from the court of Baden. He was twice married. MARGARET, his first wife, whom he married in 1754, and who d. in 1758, was a woman of kindred genius and literary accomplishments. Among her productions are, "The Death of Abel," a tragedy; and "Letters from the Dead to the Living." D. 1803.

KLUIT, ADRIAN, a Dutch historian, was b. at Dort in 1735; studied at Utrecht, and became professor of archæology and diplomatics at Leyden. His political opinions occasioned his removal from the chair in 1795; but in 1806, under the regal government, he was professor of statistics. His chief work is a history of the political affairs of Holland to 1785. D. 1807.

KNAPP, SAMUEL LORENZO, an American author, who wrote extensively on various subjects, graduated at Dartmouth college, N. H., in the year 1804; and was by profession a lawyer. As such he acquired in the early part of his life a desirable eminence. At different periods, he was an inhabitant of Newburyport, Boston, and New York. His labors with his pen were frequently for means on which to subsist, and hence many of his productions carry with them marks of haste. As a man of kind and benevolent feelings he will long be remembered by his personal friends. D. at Hopkinton, Massachusetts, 1838.

KNELLER, SIR GODFREY, an eminent portrait painter, b. at Lubbeck about 1648, was designed for a military life, and sent to Leyden to study mathematics and fortification, but showing a decided bent for painting, was placed under Bol and Rembrandt at Amsterdam. Having visited Italy, where he studied with Carlo Maratti and Bernini, he went to England in 1674, and was much patronized by Charles II., James II., and William III., for the latter of whom he painted the beauties of Hampton Court, and several of the portraits in the gallery of admirals. His coloring is lively, true, and harmonious; his drawing correct, and his disposition judicious; he displays, however, a singular want of imagination in his pictures, the attitudes, the action, and drapery being tasteless, unvarying, and ungraceful. He was in habits of intimacy with Pope and most of his eminent cotemporaries; and, as he possessed a fund of humor, and was of a gay and convivial turn, his acquaintance was eagerly sought after. He continued to practise his art till after he was seventy years of age, amassed a large fortune, and d. in 1723.

KNIBB, WILLIAM, a celebrated Baptist missionary, was b. at Kettering, in Northamptonshire, at the beginning of the present century. Originally apprenticed to a printer at Bristol, he offered, on the death of his brother, to supply his place as a teacher of a Baptist school in Jamaica, and having repaired thither in 1824, he was in 1829 appointed pastor of the mission church at Falmouth, where his efforts to ameliorate the condition of the negroes were amply rewarded by their gratitude towards him. But these very efforts excited such hostility among the planters, overseers, and others in the slave-holding interest, that when in 1832 a formidable slave insurrection was threatened, Mr. Knibb was not only compelled, despite his sacred calling, to serve in the militia, but was treated with marked indignity, and shortly afterwards arrested for being implicated in the threatened rebellion. In the absence of all evidence to support a criminal prosecution he was released, but his chapel and mission premises having been burnt down during the disturbances, he resolved to proceed to England to explain all the circumstances connected with his mission. Feeling that the time for neutrality was passed, he now boldly advocated the entire and immediate abolition of slavery; and it is not going too far to say, that his stirring harangues throughout the country had no unimportant share in bringing about the emancipation act of 1833. D. in Jamaica, 1845.

KNIGHT, EDWARD, a celebrated comedian, b. at Birmingham, 1774. He performed at Drury-lane and at the Lyceum, till illness compelled him to quit the stage. D. 1826.—GOWIN, an English philosopher, was educated at Magdalen college, Oxford, where he took his degree of bachelor of physic in 1742. He practised in London, and was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society. He published "An Attempt to demonstrate that all the Phenomena in Nature may be explained by Attraction and Repulsion."—HENRY GALLY, a distinguished traveller and antiquary, was b. 1786. In 1814 he published a poem, entitled "Europa Rediviva," and this was followed at different intervals by "Phrosyne, a Grecian Tale," "Alash-tor, an Arabian Tale," and "Hannibal in Bithynia." But Mr. Knight's chief title to fame consists in the zeal with which he devoted himself to the investigation of architectural history both at home and abroad; and the fruits of which he gave to the world in an "Architectural Tour in Normandy," "The Normans in Sicily," and his last and greatest work, the "Ecclesiastical Architecture of Italy, &c." In 1824 he was for a short period M. P. for Aldborough; in 1830 he sat for Malton; and from 1835 down to his demise he was one of the members for North Notts. D. 1846.—RICHARD PAYNE, a man of fortune, and a patron of learning and the fine arts, was b. in 1748. He devoted a great portion of his time to the cultivation of classical literature, and the elucidation of the domestic manners of the ancients; while his splendid collection of ancient bronzes, medals, pictures, and drawings, in his museum at his house in Soho-square, gave sufficient proofs of his taste for every thing connected with virtu. The whole of this valuable collection, worth £50,000, he bequeathed to the British Museum. Among his works are, "An Account of the Remains of the Worship of Priapus," an "Analytical Inquiry into the Principles of Taste," "Prolegomena in Homerum," "The Landscape," a didactic poem, and "The Progress of Civil Society." D. 1824.—THOMAS, an actor and dramatic writer, was a native of Dorsetshire. He wrote "The Honest Thieves," "The Turnpike Gate," and several other dramatic pieces. D. 1820.

KNIGHTON, HENRY, an English historian, was a canon regular of Leicester abbey, in the reign of Richard II., of whose deposition he wrote an account; also a chronicle from the Conquest to 1595.

KNOX, HENRY, an American general, was b. in Boston, 1750, and, after receiving a common school education, commenced business as a bookseller in his native town. He early took a part in the affairs of the revolution, and was present as a volunteer at the battle of Bunker hill. For his services in procuring some pieces of ordnance from the Canadian frontiers, he was intrusted by congress with the command of the artillery department, with the rank of brigadier-general. He was present, and displayed great skill and courage at the battles of Trenton, Princeton, Germantown, and Monmouth, and contributed greatly to the capture of Cornwallis. Immediately after this event he received from congress the commission of major-general. In 1785 he succeeded General Lincoln in the office of secretary of war, and having filled this department for eleven years, he obtained a reluctant permission to retire into private life. In 1798, when our relations with France were assuming a cloudy aspect, he was called upon to take a command in the army, but the peaceful arrangement of affairs soon permitted him to return into his retirement. D. at Thomaston, Me., 1806.—JOHN, the great champion of the Scottish reformation, was b. 1505, at Gifford, in East Lothian, and was educated at Haddington and St. Andrew's. He was converted from the Catholic faith by Wishart, and became a zealous preacher of the new doctrines. Having been compelled to take shelter in the castle of St. Andrew's, he fell into the hands of the French, in July, 1547, and was carried with the garrison to France, where he remained a captive on board of the galleys till 1549. Subsequent to his liberation he was, for a short time, chaplain to Edward VI., after which he visited Geneva and Frankfort, and, in 1555, returned to his native country. After having for twelve months labored actively and successfully to strengthen the Protestant cause in Scotland he re-visited Geneva, where he remained till 1559. During his residence in Geneva, he published his "First Blast of the Trumpet against the monstrous Regiment of Women;" a treatise which was levelled against Mary of England, but which gave serious offence to Elizabeth. From April, 1559, when he once more and finally set foot on Scottish earth, till his decease, which took place November 24, 1572, the reformed church was triumphant, and he was one of its most prominent, admired, and honored leaders. Of his works the principal is "A History of the Reformation in Scotland: the fourth edition of it includes all his other writings.—VICESIMUS, a divine and miscellaneous writer, was b. 1752; was educated at Merchant Tailors' school, and at St. John's college, Oxford; succeeded his father as head master of Tunbridge school; held that situation for thirty-three years; obtained the livings of Runwell and Rausden Crays, in Essex, and the chapelry of Shipbourne, in Kent. Among his original works are, "Essays, Moral and Literary;" "Liberal Education;" "Winter Evenings;" "Personal Nobility;" "Christian Philosophy;" and "The Spirit of Despotism." He was the compiler of the "Elegant Extracts and Epistles." D. 1821.

KOCH, CHRISTOPHER WILLIAM, a publicist and historian, was b. at Bouxweiler, in Alsace, 1737; was educated at Strasburg, under Schoepflin; succeeded him as professor of public law; and d. 1813, rector of the university of Strasburg. Among his numerous and learned works are, "A View of the Revolutions of Europe;" "An Abridged History of Treaties of Peace;" and "Genealogical Tables of the Sovereign Families of Europe."

KOENIG, GEORGE MATTHIAS, b. at Altorf, 1616, was the author of a Latin "Biographical Dictionary," of considerable merit. D. 1699.—JOHANN GERARD, a physician of Courland, in Lithuania, b. 1728, was a celebrated botanist, and travelled to the East Indies and other countries, in pursuit of his favorite science, keeping up a correspondence at the time with Linnæus, his old preceptor. D. 1785.—DANIEL, a native of Switzerland, was killed, in his 22d year, at Franeker, by the mob, who in a popular commotion, fell upon him under the supposition that he was a French spy, as he had been heard to converse in that language. He translated into Latin "Arbutnot on Ancient Coins."—SAMUEL, his brother, was a good mathematical scholar, and filled the professor's chair at Franeker, in philosophy and ethics; but afterwards settled at the Hague, having been invited thither by the prince of Orange, who made him his librarian. D. 1757.

KOLLOCH, SHEPHERD, a lieutenant in the revolutionary war, who was at the battles of Trenton, Short Hills, Fort Lee, &c., established the "New Jersey Journal" in 1779, and the "New York Gazetteer" in 1783, and was judge of the common pleas in Philadelphia, for 35 years. D. 1839.

KORNER, THEODORE, an eminent poet, often called the German Tyrtaeus, was b. at Dresden, 1791; and, after studying at Leipsic, became a dramatist and secretary to the management of the court theatre of Vienna. Being an enthusiast for the liberty of Germany, he entered as a volunteer in the Prussian army, in 1812; signalized himself equally by his bravery and his martial songs; was promoted for his conduct at the battle of Lutzen; was afterwards twice wounded; made a lieutenant; and fell in a skirmish with the French, in Mecklenburg, August 26, 1813. His lyrical poems were published after his death, under the title of the "Lyre and Sword;" but innumerable editions of his works, consisting of his dramas, poems, and other literary remains, have since been published in Germany; and many of his writings have been repeatedly translated into English.

KONINGSMARK, MARIA AURORA, countess of, was b. about 1678. She was equally celebrated on account of her personal charms and extraordinary talents, and of the part which she performed in politics. While a girl, she wrote and spoke Swedish, German, French, Italian, and English; read the classics in the original; had an extensive knowledge of history and geography; and even composed poems in French and Italian. She played on several instruments, composed music, sang and painted with great skill; all which accomplishments were aided by a refined wit and superior conversational powers. Thus gifted and accomplished, she arrived, in 1694, in Dresden, with her two sisters. The elector fell in love with her at first sight; she yielded, appeared at court as his mistress, and bore him a son, the famous Marshal Saxe, to whose improvement she consecrated the remainder of her life. Though the passion of the fickle king cooled, and another favorite supplanted the countess, he always remained in terms of friendship with her; and by his influence she was appointed, by the court of Vienna, superintendent of Quedlinburg, where she chiefly resided until her death, in 1768.

KOSCIUSZKO, THADDEUS, a Polish general and patriot, was b. 1746, in Lithuania, and was partly educated at the Warsaw military school, where he excelled in mathematics and drawing. He completed his studies in France. When the American colonies threw off the yoke of the mother country, Kosciuszko entered into their service, and was made a colonel of engineers and aid-de-camp to Washington. Returning to his own country, he lived in retirement till 1789, when the diet appointed him a major-general. In the brief struggle of 1792 he behaved with distinguished valor; but as soon as the fate of Poland was sealed, he retired into voluntary exile. He kept up, however, a correspondence with the friends of liberty in his native land; and when, in 1794, the Poles resolved to make one more effort to break their chains, they placed Kosciuszko at their head. He began his career by defeating the Russian general, Denisoff, at Raslavice. But the enemy poured in on all sides, and at length, after having for six months delayed the fall of Poland, he was wounded and taken prisoner, on the 4th of October, at the battle of Maceiowice. He was sent to St. Petersburg, and incarcerated till the accession of the Emperor Paul, who liberated him. The remaining part of his existence was spent in America, France, and Switzerland, but chiefly in France. D. at Soleure, October 17, 1817.

KOTZEBUE, AUGUSTUS FREDERIC FERDINAND VON, a German writer, was b. 1761, at Weimar, and was educated at Jena and Duisbourg. In his twentieth year he was invited to St. Petersburg, by the Prussian ambassador, and was patronized by Catharine, who raised him from post to post, till he became president of the civil government at Revel; a station which he held for ten years. From 1794 till 1800 he resided, variously occupied, in Germany. In the latter year he returned to Russia, but had no sooner set foot on its territory, than he was seized and banished to Siberia. The capricious tyrant Paul, soon, however, recalled him, and took him into favor. In 1801 he again quitted the land of the knout and of autocracy. Some subsequent years were spent in travelling, and the remainder of his life in pouring forth his innumerable literary productions, and taking a part in politics. He is said to have written many of the Russian state papers and proclamations. The Emperor, Alexander, subsequently employed him in various posts, and in 1817 appointed him his literary correspondent in Germany. This invidious office Kotzebue is said to have filled in a manner hostile to the freedom of his native country; and for this supposed crime he was assassinated, on the 23d of March, 1819, by a youthful fanatic, named Sand. Kotzebue undoubtedly displayed genius in his writings; but they are vitiated by much frivolity, much bad taste, and, in many instances, a more than doubtful morality. His dramas number nearly three hundred. Among his other works, are "A History of the German Empire," "A History of Ancient Prussia," and various Narratives and Recollections of his travels.

KRANACH, LUCAS, (whose proper name was Sunder,) a distinguished painter, was b. at Kranach, in Bamberg, 1472. He was greatly patronized by Frederic, elector of Coburg, whom he accompanied on a journey through Palestine in 1493, and soon afterwards commenced his career as an historical painter, which, whether we consider the number or the excellence of his works, has not been surpassed by any of his countrymen. He was intimately associated with the great reformers, Luther and Melancthon, whose portraits, as taken by him, are amongst the most interesting memorials of their age. D. 1553.—LUCAS, his son, with whom he is sometimes confounded, gained great distinction in the same career, and d. in 1586.

KRANTZ, ALBERT, a German historian and philosopher of the 15th century; author of a Latin "Chronicle of the Kingdoms of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway," a "History of the Ancient Vandals," &c. His reputation as an able and upright diplomatist also was so well established, that in a dispute of a territorial nature, which occurred between the courts of Holstein and Denmark, the contending potentates agreed to abide by his arbitration.

KRASIICKI, IGNATIUS, count of Sietzen, prince-bishop of Warmia, &c., one of the most illustrious of the Polish literati, was b. at Dubiecko, in 1735. When the first partition of Poland, in 1772, deprived him of his senatorial dignities, he turned his attention to literature, and produced numerous poems, epic, mock-heroic, and satirical. He was much esteemed by Frederic the Great, who took great pleasure in his lively and most agreeable conversation. Among his writings are, "The War of Choczim," "La Monomachie, or the War of the Monks," "La Sourjade," fables, odes, &c. D. 1801.

KRAUSS, JOHN BAPTIST, a learned German ecclesiastic, and a most indefatigable writer. He was b. at Ratisbon, in 1700; took the monastic habit at an early age; became prince-abbot of the Benedictine monastery of St. Emmeran in 1742; and presided there till his death, in 1762. His works on theology, history, and criticism are very numerous.

KREUTZER, RODOLPH, a celebrated violinist and musical composer, was b. at Versailles, in 1767. He travelled in Germany, Holland, and Italy; and having established himself as one of the first performers in Europe, he was placed at the head of the orchestra at the grand opera of Paris. He composed the music for the operas of "Lodoiska," "Joan of Arc," "Paul and Virginia," "Charlotte and Werter," and some others. D. 1831.

KRUDENER, JULIANA, Baroness VALERIE DE, a religious enthusiast, was the daughter of the Russian baron Vietinghoff, governor of Riga, where she was b. in 1766. At the age of 14 she married Baron Krudener, appointed av-bassador by Catharine II. to Berlin, and subsequently to Venice. Here the secretary of legation fell in love with her, and committed suicide; on which event she wrote a romance, entitled "Valerie." For years she resided in France, and was the gayest of the gay in the Parisian circles. At length she became a fanatical devotee, and wandered from state to state, preaching and prophesying. In 1814 she became acquainted with Alexander, emperor of Russia, who had already for some time shown a disposition to religious contemplations, and on whom her conversations had a great influence. In Paris, she had prayer-meetings, attended by distinguished personages, where she was seen in the background of a suite of rooms, in the dress of a priestess, kneeling in prayer. Her predictions excited much attention; and when the allied sovereigns quitted Paris, she retreated into Switzerland, where she preached the approach of the millennium, and drew around her multitudes of the credulous mountaineers, who listened to, and believed in, her mission. At length the states interfered, and she removed to Germany; but wherever she arrived, she was under the surveillance of the police, who ultimately transported her to the Russian frontier. She was, however, ordered not to go to Petersburg or Moscow; she accordingly visited the Crimea, where she d. 1824.

KRUMMACHER, FREDERIC ADOLPHUS, a German religious writer, whose "Parables" and many other works are well known in England, was b. at Tecklenburg in 1768; and became successively minister of Orefeld, Kellwiek, and Bernberg, and ended a long and useful career as an efficient preacher and writer at Bremen, 1845, where he had labored for 21 years.

KRUNITZ, JOHN GEORGE, a German physician and natural philosopher, was b. at Berlin, in 1728; studied at Göttingen, Halle, and Frankfort-on-the-Oder; devoted his whole life to literary pursuits on his return to his native city, and d. in 1796. He produced an extraordinary number of works, the most considerable of which is an "Economicotechnological Encyclopædia," which he commenced in 1773. He had completed 73 volumes, and had just reached the article "Leiche," a corpse, when his progress was arrested by death.

KUHLMAN, QUIRINUS, a fanatic, and probably a madman, of the 17th century, b. at Breslau, in 1651. He pretended to have acquired the faculty of foreknowledge, and of holding communion with invisible spirits; but while travelling through Russia, where some of his prophecies were distasteful to the government, he was brought to the stake, and suffered with all the fortitude of a martyr, in 1689.

KUNCKELL, JOHN, an eminent chemist, b. at Hnysum, in Sleswick, in 1630, distinguished himself by several important discoveries, especially by the extraction of phosphorus from urine. He was ennobled by the king of Sweden, and made counsellor of mines. D. 1703.

KUSTER, LUDOLPH, a learned German writer, and one of the first Greek and Latin scholars of the age, b. at Blomberg, in 1670. He visited the principal libraries in Europe, chiefly in the view of collating the manuscripts of Suidas, and was successful in restoring many portions before unpublished. D. 1716.

KUTTNER, CHARLES GOTLOB, a German traveller, b. in Saxony, in 1775; studied at Leipsic and Basle; and travelled, as tutor to young Englishmen, through most of the countries of Europe. His works comprise "Letters on Ireland," "Letters of a Saxon in Switzerland," "Travels in Germany, Denmark," &c., and "Observations on England." D. 1805.

KUTUSOFF SMOLENSKOI, or KUTUSOW, MICHAEL, prince of, a celebrated Russian field-marshal, was b. in 1745, and educated at Strasburg. He entered the army in 1759; served in Poland from 1764 till 1769, and afterwards against the Turks under Romanzoff. He behaved with great gallantry at the siege of Oczacoff, where he was dangerously wounded, and on his recovery he joined Suwarrow at the storming and capture of Ismailoff, when he was advanced to the rank of lieutenant-general. In the subsequent Polish war, he was particularly conspicuous during the memorable day of Praga. In 1805 the emperor Alexander gave him the chief command of the first Russian corps against the French, and he headed the allied army at Austerlitz, where he was wounded. In 1810 and 1811 he obtained several advantages over the Turks; and, in 1812, when 70 years of age, the chief command of the Russian army, destined to oppose Napoleon, was bestowed upon him. To commemorate his victories, he received the surname of Smolenskoï. He d. in 1813.

KUYP, or CUYP, ALBERT, a celebrated painter, whose father was an able landscape painter, was b. at Dort in 1606. He particularly excelled in the purity and brilliancy of light; and was not surpassed, even by Claude, in an accurate representation of the atmosphere, and of the various effects of sunshine or shade upon the objects delineated. His paintings are all highly finished, and many of them grace the principal collections in Great Britain. D. 1667.

KYNASTON, Sir FRANCIS, an English poet, b. at Otley, in Shropshire, in 1587. He was knighted by Charles I., became regent of a literary institution, called the "Musæum Minervæ;" was the translator of Chancer's "Troilus and Cressida" into Latin, and author of "Leoline and Sydanis," &c. D. 1642.

KYRLE, JOHN, celebrated by Pope as the Man of Ross, was b. at Whitehouse, in Gloucestershire, and possessed an estate of £500. a year at Ross, in Herefordshire, where he d. in 1754, aged 90. The good deeds of this estimable man so highly eulogized by Pope in his "Moral Essays," do not appear to be overrated. Warton says, Kyrle was the Howard of his age, and that he deserved to be celebrated beyond any of the heroes of Pindar.

L.

LABADIE, JOHN, a French enthusiast, was b. in 1610, at Bourg, in Guienne. He was originally a Jesuit; but from his licentiousness and scandalous practices, he was compelled to quit that society, and seek an asylum among the Protestants. From thence he was also driven out, and forced to retire to Middleburg, where he propounded a new doctrine of belief, and by his imposing eloquence obtained many followers. The looseness of his private life, however, lost him many of his sect, and he was at length obliged to retire to Altona, in Holstein, where he d. 1674.

LABAT, JEAN BAPTISTE, a Dominican missionary, was b. in Paris, in 1663. He possessed great mathematical knowledge; and while in America, where he remained twelve years, he acted as an engineer in defence of Guadaloupe when attacked by the English in 1703. On his return to Europe in 1708, he accurately surveyed the environs and coast of Andalusia; soon after travelled into Italy and other parts, and finally returned to Paris, where he d. in 1738. He wrote many works, the chief of which are his "Voyage aux Iles de l'Amérique," "Travels in Spain and Italy," a "Description of the Countries of Western Africa," &c.

LABE, LOUISA, called "La belle Cordiere," was b. at Lyons about 1526. Her early education having been directed to riding and military exercises, as well as to languages and music, she acquired a taste for military glory, and entered the army in 1543. She soon displayed her strength and courage at the siege of Perpignan, but the French being obliged to abandon it, she renounced the military service, and devoted herself to literature and poetry. A rich ropemaker, named Ennemond Perrin, became enamored of her, and married her, and from that time her house was the resort of the literati, and men of rank and fashion. She was much admired for her talents, accomplishments, and beauty.

LA BEDOYERE, CHARLES ANGE-LIQUE FRANCOIS HUCHET, count de, a noted general, b. at Paris 1736. He served as an officer in the imperial guards at the battle of Eylau, and in 1808 and 1809, was aid-de-camp to Eugene Beauharnois. He was in the retreat from Moscow, and in 1813 distinguished himself at the battles of Lutzen and Bautzen. On the abdication of Napoleon, he was, in 1815, appointed to a regiment stationed at Grenoble; but immediately on the return of the French emperor from Elba, La Bedoyere, was the first to bring him a regiment. He was rapidly promoted, and eventually raised to the peerage; but being found in Paris after its occupation by the allied army, he was tried by a court-martial, and suffered death, August, 1815.

LABERIUS, DECIMUS JUNIUS, a Roman knight, who wrote "Mimes, or Short Pieces for the Stage;" one of which Julius Cæsar compelled him to perform, much against his inclination, and for which reason he delivered at the same time a prologue, full of satire, against that great man. This piece is extant in Aulus Gellius. D. 46 b. c.

LABROUSE. SUSANNE, b. in 1743.

one of the extraordinary characters produced by the French revolution. She proclaimed herself a prophetess at that period, fancied herself inspired, and persuaded many of the Jacobin party to credit her ravings, after the enthusiast, Don Serle, had declared her prophecies true in the constituent assembly. She published them in 1799.

LACARRY, GILES, a learned French Jesuit, was b. in 1605. He was well skilled in history, and taught philosophy and theology. Among his numerous works are, "Historia Galliarum sub Præfectis Prætorii Galliarum," "Historia Romana," "De Regibus Franciæ et Lege Salica," &c. D. 1684.

LACOMBE, JAMES, a French miscellaneous writer, was b. at Paris in 1724. He published several useful abridgments of histories. His best work, however, is "Histoire de Christine Reine de Suede."—DE PREZEL HONORE, brother of the above, was b. at Paris, in 1725. He published a "Dictionnaire de Citoyen," "Dictionnaire de Jurisprudence," and other works.

LACRETELLE, PIERRE LOUIS, a French writer, was b. at Metz, in 1751. He was a counsellor of parliament, one of the editors of the "Grand Repertory of Jurisprudence," and of the "Mercure de France;" and in 1787 he was appointed member of a committee charged with the reformation of the penal code. When the revolution took place, Lacreteille embraced its principles with moderation, and sat in the legislative assembly; but during the reign of Robespierre he found it necessary to retire from public duty. He afterwards appeared for a short time, but held no official situation, and during the imperial and regal governments he devoted himself wholly to literary pursuits. Among his writings are, "Eloquence Judiciaire et Philosophie Législative," "Roman Théâtral," "Portraits et Tableaux," &c. D. 1824.

LACRUX Y CANO, DON RAMONDE, a famous Spanish dramatic poet, b. in 1728, and d. in 1795. Among his best pieces are, "El Sueno," "El dia de Noche Buena," "El Temo," &c.

LACTANTIUS, LUCIUS CÆLIUS, or CÆCILIANUS FIRMIANUS, an eminent father of the church, was by some esteemed an African, and by others a native of Fermo, in Ancona. He studied rhetoric under Arnobius, and by his production, entitled "Symposium," or the "Bouquet," he obtained such renown, that Diocletian appointed him professor of rhetoric in Nicomedia. Subsequently he was appointed tutor to Crispus, the son of Constantine, who dying not long after, Lactantius was neglected. He wrote many works in vindication of Christianity, from the beautiful style of which he has been honored with the name of the Christian Cicero. His principal works are, "Institutiones Divinæ," and a treatise, "De Persecutione."

LACY, JOHN, a dramatic writer, was b. at Doncaster, and bred a dancing-master; this employment he quitted for the army, but subsequently he took to the stage; in which line he acquired such celebrity as a comedian, that Charles II. had his portrait painted in three different characters. He wrote the comedies of "The Dumb Lady," "Sir Hercules Buffoon," "Old Troop," and "Sawney the Scot." D. 1681.

LAER, PETER DE, a celebrated painter, usually called Bamboccio. He was b. in 1613, at Laeren, in Holland. After studying the art at Rome, and increasing his knowledge of it by an acquaintance with Poussin and Claude, he returned to Holland, in 1639, where he enjoyed unrivalled celebrity, till he was compelled to share it with Wouvermans. In energy of touch, in the management of the chiaro-oscuro, and in fertility of invention, he excelled his rival, but not in neatness and delicacy of pencil; yet the competition so much affected his prosperity, that in a fit of despondency he drowned himself in a well, in 1763, when 60 years of age.

LAFAYETTE, GILBERT MOTTIER, marquis de, was b. 1757, at Chavagnac, in Auvergne. At the age of 17 he married the grand-daughter of the duke of Noailles; and, although he inherited a large fortune, was of high rank, and had powerful connections at court, he came, in 1777, to join the war of independence in America. He raised and equipped a body of men at his own expense; fought as a volunteer at the battle of Brandywine, in 1778; at that of Monmouth in 1778; and received the thanks of congress. He then proceeded to France, in order to obtain reinforcements; returned with the armaments under General Rochambeau; and commanded Washington's vanguard at the time of the surrender of Lord Cornwallis, in 1782. The capitulation of Yorktown followed, and, on the peace with the mother country, the general returned to France. He was elected a member of the notables in 1787, and, on the breaking out of the revolution, he took part with the friends of liberty, though with wise moderation. In October, 1789, he was made commander-in-chief of the national guard, and ordered and assisted in the demolition of the Bastille. On the 6th he marched to Versailles, saved the royal family from the outrages of the mob, and placed them under the protection of the national assembly. In 1790 he proclaimed the "sacredness of the right of insurrection," and established, in conjunction with Bailly, the club of Fenillans. On the attempted escape of Louis XVI., Lafayette lost some of his popularity, through being accused of conniving at it; but, dissipating these calumnies, he fought against the emigrants and allies in Flanders; and mutual accusations of counter-revolution passed between him and Dumouriez and Collot d'Herbois. He returned to Paris to denounce them, and to protest against the violence offered to the king. But the Mountain was too strong for him; he was burnt in effigy on the 30th of June, 1792; and, being obliged to escape from France, fell into the hands of the Austrians, who imprisoned him at Olmutz. There he remained five years, till after Bonaparte's first triumphant campaign of Italy, when, on the special demand of the latter, he was set at liberty. Lafayette, however, was consistent: when Napoleon became an apostate from liberty, he voted against the consulate for life, and withdrew from public affairs. But, after the battle of Waterloo, he reappeared to protest against a dictatorship; and, having subsequently protested against the dissolution of the legislative body by Prussian bayonets, again withdrew to his estates, till he was returned, in 1818, deputy for the department De la Sarthe. In 1821 he made a visit to America, and was received with distinction and enthusiasm, as joint founder of American liberty with Washington and Franklin. The unconstitutional violence and ordinances of Charles X., in June, 1830, brought Lafayette on the stage again, in the character with which he commenced his career—that of commander-in-chief of the national guard and the advocate and supporter of a citizen king. He soon after resigned the command; and having seen Louis Philippe recognized as king of the French, he once more retired to domestic life. D. 1834.

was b. at Paris, in 1715. She distinguished herself by her opposition to the French philosophers of the last century, with whom her mother had been connected, and by her literary talents generally. In 1771 she was appointed grand-mistress of the burlesque order of the Lanturelus, while its founder, her friend, the marquis de Croismare, was grand-master. This whimsical institution obtained so much eclat, that it was esteemed an honor by several sovereign princes to become Lanturelus. She d. in 1791, and left many posthumous writings.

LAFITAU, JOSEPH FRANCIS, a French Jesuit, was b. at Bordeaux, and sent as a missionary among the North American Indians. On his return to Europe he wrote a work, entitled "Mœurs des Sauvages Américains comparées aux Mœurs des premiers Temps," and another on the possessions and discoveries of the Portuguese in the New World. D. 1740.—PETER FRANCIS, brother of the above, and a Jesuit, was also b. at Bordeaux. He was sent on a mission to Roune to arrange the disputes of France, respecting the bull Unigenitus, and while there he obtained favor with the pope, Clement IX., who made him bishop of Sisteron, in Provence. He left the society of Jesus to preside over his diocese, and d. in 1764. He wrote many religious works, among which were the "History of the Constitution Unigenitus," and the "Life of Pope Clement IX." In the latter he speaks much against Jansenism.

LAFITTE, JACQUES, a celebrated French banker and financier, was b. in 1798. Having obtained employment in a banking house, he rose from a clerk to be cashier, partner, and, at length, head of the most eminent bank in France. Possessed of this conspicuous position, and of great wealth, he speedily became a member of the chamber of deputies. His advocacy of extremely liberal principles rendered him so popular, that when Charles X. was driven from the throne, and the great majority of the public men of the day were for establishing a republic, M. Lafitte, by his word alone, made the citizen king. But the commercial calamities which followed the revolution fell so heavily upon great houses which were indebted to Lafitte, that his house, too, became insolvent. Nearly a million and a half of francs were raised for him by a public subscription; but when his affairs were finally settled, he was found to have nearly seven millions after paying all demands. D. 1844; aged 76.

LAFONTAINE, AUGUSTUS HENRY JULIUS, a celebrated German romance writer, was b. at Brunswick, in 1756. Among his numerous works of fiction are, "Blanche and Minna, or the Manners of the Burghers," "Moral Systems," "The Country Clergyman, or new Family Pictures," and "Clara du Plessis and Clairaut, or the History of two Lovers." D. 1831.

LAGERBRING, SVEN, a Swedish historian, was b. in 1707. He was professor of history in the university of Lund, in Scania. His chief works are a history of Sweden, in 1457, and an abridgment down to modern times. D. 1788.

LAGERLOEF, PETER, historiographer of Sweden, in the 17th century, and professor of rhetoric at Upsal, was an eminent classic scholar. He wrote an historical description to accompany a collection of national monuments, called "Suecia Antiqua et Hodierna," at the desire of Charles XI., and published numerous historical dissertations, among which was "Historia Linguae Græcæ," "De Magno Sinarum Imperio," &c. D. 1699.

LAGERSTROEM, MAGNUS VON, a philosopher of Sweden, and director of the Swedish East India Company, was b. at Stockholm, in 1696. His youth was spent in Germany and Denmark, and on his return home he applied himself to trade, which, however, he soon relinquished. He wrote a dissertation on political economy, and translated many French, German, and Danish works. Appointed director to the East India Company of Gottenburg, he considerably promoted scientific researches, especially in natural history, many novel specimens of which, at his instance, were procured from abroad. D. 1759.

LAGNY, THOMAS FAUTET DE, an eminent French mathematician, was b. at Lyons, in 1660. He wrote many works on mathematics, and made many important improvements and discoveries. Among his works may be mentioned, "New and Concise Methods for the Extraction and Approximation of Roots," "The Cubature of the Sphere," "A general Analysis, or Method of Resolving Problems," &c. D. 1734.

LAGOMARSINI, JEROME, a learned Jesuit and philologist, was b. at Genoa, in 1698. He was professor of rhetoric at Florence 20 years, and in 1750 he was appointed professor of Greek in the college at Rome, where he d. in 1773. He published many classical works, and left in MS. a collection in 30 vols., having for its object the justification of his order from all the odious imputations that had been cast upon it.

LAGRANGE, JOSEPH LOUIS, a celebrated mathematician, was b. at Turin, in 1736. At the age of 16 he became a professor in the royal school of artillery, where he formed an association, which afterwards rose to the rank of an academy of sciences. Here he made many important discoveries, particularly in calculating the motion of fluids and in vibrations, introducing also the theory of recurring consequences and the doctrine of chances to the differential calculus, &c. He communicated to the society a number of papers, and some to the Academy of Paris, of which he was chosen a foreign member. While on a visit at Paris he wrote his celebrated work, "Mécanique Analytique." In 1766 he removed to Berlin, where he was appointed director of the academy; and in 1787 he settled at Paris, and became successively professor of the Normal school and Polytechnic school. He there announced his "Fonctions Analytique," and pursued other literary labors till his health giving way under this fatigue, he d. 1813.

LAIARPE, JEAN FRANCOIS DE, a French dramatic poet, was b. in 1793. His father was an officer in the army, and dying in indigence, the son was taken into the college of Harcourt by the president, M. Asselin; but lost the favor of his patron by a satire, of which he was suspected to be the author. After a confinement for some time he was set at liberty; but it disgusted him with his situation, and he resolved to trust to his talents as an author for support. In 1763 he wrote his tragedy of "Warwick," which met with great success. This was followed by "Timoleon," "Pharamond," and some others not equally successful. But when his series of Elogies appeared, they gained him great credit, particularly one on Henri Quatre. During the fury of the revolution, though he embraced the principles of republicanism, the moderation of his views rendered him an object of suspicion, and he was thrown into prison in 1793. Though sentenced to deportation, he regained his liberty, and lived in retirement till the time of his death, in 1803. His principal work is "Lyceum, or a Complete Course of Literature."

LAINÉZ, ALEXANDER, a native of France, remarkable for his poetical jeux

d'esprit, was b. at Chimay, in 1650. After receiving his education at Rheims, he visited Paris, and then journeyed through Europe and Asia. On his return, he took up his abode in the French capital, till his death, in 1710.—JAMES, a Spanish ecclesiastic, and associate of the famous Ignatius Loyola, was b. 1512. At the death of Loyola he became general of the Jesuits, and induced the pope to grant him many privileges. He obtained the papal decree for rendering the generalship perpetual in the person chosen to fill it, and giving him the power of making any and every compact without consulting the brethren; also, for giving authenticity to all his comments and explanations of their constitutions; and, likewise, for having prisons independent of the secular authority, where he might punish the refractory brethren. D. 1565.

LAING, ALEXANDER, an antiquarian and miscellaneous writer, was b. in Aberdeen, in 1778. He latterly followed the calling of an itinerant vendor of old books; and being a man of much humor and eccentricity, he gained admission, in the course of his peregrinations, to the archives of several houses, which have since been found shut against more pretending investigators. The information thus acquired he turned to good account, in the "Donean Tourist," in verse, with copious notes, giving an account of the battles, castles, families, gentlemen's seats, &c., on the banks of the river Don; and "The Caledonian Itinerary, or a Tour on the Banks of the Dee," a poem, with historical notes. He was also the compiler of the "Eccentric Magazine," which contains many curious and whimsical epitaphs gleaned from various churchyards in Aberdeenshire, 1822, D. 1838.—ALEXANDER GORDON, a traveller, was b. in Edinburgh, in 1794. He served in the army many years, both in the West Indies and on the western coast of Africa; while at the latter place he made many fruitless journeys into the interior to establish a commercial intercourse with the natives, and to learn the geography of the country. He was compelled, however, to leave Timbuctoo, and the guard he hired to protect him on his route by Sego to the coast, treacherously murdered him, 1826.—MALCOLM, a Scottish historian, was b. at Stryorey, in Orkney, in 1762. He finished his education at the Edinburgh university, and was subsequently called to the bar. On the death of Dr. Henry he completed the unfinished volume of that author's History of England. His chief work, however, was a "History of Scotland." He also edited a new edition of the poems of Ossian, and d. in 1819.

LAIRESSE, GERARD, an eminent historical painter, was b. at Liege, in 1640. He surpassed his father under whom he studied, and obtained such renown, as to be considered the Raphael of the Dutch school. He also well understood music and engraving. He lost his sight some time before his death, and d. at Amsterdam, in 1711. His chef-d'œuvre is a large picture of the child Moses trampling on the Egyptian diadem.—ERNEST, JOHN, and JAMES, the three brothers of the above, also obtained some eminence in the art; the two former excelled in animal painting, and the latter in flowers.—Two sons of Gerard also practised the art, but with very inferior pretensions to eminence.

LAIS, a celebrated courtesan, was b. at Hyccara, in Sicily. She possessed great personal charms, and at Corinth sold her favors at a most extravagant price. She was assassinated 350 B. C.

LALANDE, JOSEPH JEROME LE FRANCAIS DE, a celebrated astronomer, was b. at Bourg, in France, in 1732. He showed an early preference for mathematical studies, but was educated for the law. His intimacy, however, with astronomers and other men of science led him to pursue the early bias of his disposition, and it was not long before the Academy of Sciences deputed him to go to Berlin, to make observations for determining the parallax of the moon, and its distance from the earth. On his return home, he was nominated astronomer, extended his researches in the science of the heavenly bodies, and turned his attention to gnomonics. In 1760, on the resignation of Maraldi, Lalande undertook the editorship and publication of the "Connaissance des Temps." Shortly after, he succeeded Delisle as professor of astronomy at the college de France; when successive treatises, talented and voluminous, proceeded from his pen, much to the advancement of astronomical science. Among these mention must be made of the very valuable "Traité de l'Astronomie." D. 1807.—MICHAEL RICHARD DE, a celebrated French musician, b. at Paris, in 1657. He attained to great perfection on various instruments, particularly on the violin, and was appointed master of music in the chapel royal, by Louis XIV. D. 1726.

LALLY, THOMAS ARTHUR, Count, an Irish officer, attached to the house of Stuart, and in the service of France. His bravery at the battle of Fontenoy was rewarded by the appointment of brigadier-general; and in 1756 he was made governor of Pondicherry. This town was soon after besieged by the British; and unable to withstand their assaults, he surrendered, and with the garrison was made prisoner. He was conveyed to England, but was soon liberated and permitted to return to France. On arriving in that country, public clamor ran so high against him, that he was beheaded, in 1766.—TOLLENDAL, marquis de, son of the preceding, was b. at Paris in 1751, and was educated at the college of Harcourt. The expenses of his education were defrayed by his cousin the Countess Dillon and by Louis XV., who thus endeavored to make some atonement for the misfortune which he incurred through the fate of his father. Prompted by filial feeling, he wrote, when only 15, a Latin poem on the story of John Calas, who had been sacrificed to the fury of a mob; and when he had attained a more mature age, he warmly exerted himself to retrieve from obloquy the memory of his father; and in 1783 he regained possession of his paternal estates. Previously to the revolution, he was captain in the regiment of cuirassiers; and in 1789 he was nominated deputy from the nobility of Paris to the states-general. He soon became one of the most popular members of the constituent assembly, gave his support to the declaration of the Rights of Man proposed by Lafayette, and subsequently suggested as an amendment, that all citizens should be eligible to public employments, which was adopted by acclamation. He published a work, entitled "Quintus Capitolinus," in which he retraced the operations of the national assembly, pointed out the faults of the constitution, and condemned the suppression of the higher orders of the state. Having returned to France in 1792 he was arrested, and sent to the Abbaye, but having fortunately escaped amidst the massacres which took place in the prisons in September, he effected his retreat to England, where he obtained a pension from the government. When Bonaparte became consul, he returned to France, where he resided till the restoration of the Bourbons, in 1814. He wrote a work, entitled "The Defence of the Emigrants," published in 1796; also an "Essay on the Life of the Earl of Strafford, the Minister of Charles I.;" and a tragedy on the fall of that noblemen. D. 1830.

LALUZERNE, CÆSAR WILLIAM DE, Cardinal, was b. at Paris, in 1738. Having obtained orders in 1762, he was soon after elected agent-general of the French clergy. In 1770, Louis XV. nominated him to the see of Langres; and, in 1773, he pronounced his majesty's funeral sermon. On the breaking out of the revolution he advocated many patriotic measures for the relief of his country, but was soon compelled to quit it. Under the government of Napoleon he returned home; and, in 1814, he was invited by the king to reassume his rank of duke and peer. Shortly after he was made a cardinal, and in 1822 he d. His works, theological and political, are numerous and able.

LAMB, Lady CAROLINE, daughter of the earl of Besborough, and wife of the Hon. William Lamb, afterwards Lord Melbourne, was distinguished for her literary talents and the decided part she took in political affairs, particularly at the time her brother-in-law, the Hon. Geo. Lamb, was a candidate for Westminster, when she personally canvassed the electors, and made herself the subject of great notoriety. She possessed a masculine mind, and was on terms of friendship with several literary characters, but more especially with Lord Byron, for whom she entertained an attachment fatal to her domestic felicity. Several of her poetical pieces appeared in the newspapers and periodical journals; and she wrote the novels of "Glenarvon," "Graham Hamilton," and "Ada Reis." D. 1828.—CHARLES, an essayist, poet, and miscellaneous writer, was b. in London, in 1775, and educated at Christ's hospital. In 1792 he obtained a situation in the accountant's office of the East India Company, where he remained 35 years, till his salary had gradually risen to £700; when he was allowed a retiring pension of £450, which he continued to enjoy till his death. He began his literary career in 1797 as a poet, in conjunction with his friends Coleridge and Lloyd, their three names appearing to one volume; and subsequently the attention of the public was for several years called to his occasional Essays, signed "Elia," which were published in various periodicals, and afterwards collected and printed. In 1808 he published "Specimens of English Dramatic Poets who lived about the time of Shakspeare; with Notes," &c. Besides these, he wrote "Rosamund Gray," a tale; "John Woodvill," a tragedy; "Album Verses," "Tales from Shakspeare," "The Adventures of Ulysses," &c., in some of which he was assisted by Mary Lamb, his sister, with whom he lived. His writings were select rather than numerous; and his manner of treating the subjects which his fancy suggested was at once piquant, terse, and playful. D. 1834.

LAMBALLE, MARIE THERÈSE LOUISE DE SAVOIE CARIGNAN, princess de, was b. at Turin, in 1749, and was married to the duke of Bourbon Penthièvre, whom she soon lost by death. She was superintendent of the household of Marie Antoinette, queen of France, to whom she was remarkably attached. After the flight of the royal family to Varennes she departed for England; but hearing of the imprisonment of her royal mistress, she hastily returned, and shared with the queen her confinement and misfortunes. She was, however, summoned before an iniquitous tribunal, and cruelly murdered in 1792.

LAMBERT, ANNE THERÈSE, marquise de, a literary lady of Paris, was b. in 1647. Upon the death of her husband, Henri Lambert, marquis de St. Bris, in 1686, she employed her large fortune in patronizing literature, and learned men. At her disease, in 1733, her own writings were collected, and published.—AYLMER BOURKE, a gentleman distinguished for his attainments in botanical science, was b. in 1761. On the foundation of the Linnæan society, in 1788, Mr. Lambert became one of the original members, and for many years filled the office of vice-president; while he contributed many excellent articles to the "Linnæan Transactions." His own Herbarium was considered one of the finest in Europe. D. 1842.—JOHN, a distinguished general in the time of Charles I., was a student-at-law on the breaking out of the civil wars. He, however, espoused the cause of the parliament, and distinguished himself as colonel at the battle of Marston-moor; and also acted a conspicuous part in many other engagements. He vigorously opposed the advancement of Cromwell to the title of king, upon which he lost his commission; yet a pension was granted him of £2000 a year. Upon the death of Oliver Cromwell, Lambert compelled his son Richard to relinquish his authority, and restored the members of the long parliament to their seats. Subsequently, however, acting in opposition to the parliament, General Monk marched from Scotland to meet him. His troops deserting, he was compelled to submit, and was confined a prisoner in the Tower. Escaping thence, he again quickly appeared in arms, but was defeated, and retaken. At the restoration, he was brought to trial; but his submissive demeanor gained him a reprieve, and he was banished for life to the isle of Guernsey. He here lived upwards of thirty years, amusing his leisure with horticulture and flower-painting, and is said to have d. a Catholic.—JOHN HENRY, an eminent mathematician and astronomer, was b. at Mulhausen, in 1728. Compelled to follow his father's employment as tailor, for his support, night was the only time his poverty afforded him for study, till 1748, when he became tutor to the children of Baron Salis, president of the Swiss convention. In 1756 he visited Gottingen, where he published his first work; and next went to Paris. Soon after he published his celebrated work "On Perspective," and in the following year appeared his "Photometry." Other important and valuable scientific works succeeded, and in 1764 he visited Berlin, where he was introduced to Frederic the Great, who admitted him a member of the academy of that capital. D. 1777.

LAMI, BERNARD, an ecclesiastic, was b. at Mans, in 1640. He d. in 1715, at Rouen, and left numerous writings, of which his "Apparatus Biblicus" is very valuable.—FRANCIS, a Benedictine, was b. in 1636, at Montereau, in the diocese of Chartres. After serving in the army he embraced the religious life, and became a Benedictine monk, and one of the ablest theologians of his time. He distinguished himself by his writings against Spinoza, and d. in 1711. His works are numerous, and written with much purity and elegance of style.—GIOVANNI BATTISTA, an ecclesiastic, was b. at Santa Croce, near Florence, in 1697. He studied at Pisa, of which university he became vice-rector. He afterwards went to Florence, where he was appointed chaplain to the grand-duke of Tuscany, professor of ecclesiastical history in the university, and public librarian. He published a valuable edition of the works of Meursius. His own writings are numerous. D. 1770.

LAMIA, a celebrated Athenian courtesan, noted for the charms of her person, the brilliancy of her wit, and her proficiency on the flute. She visited Egypt, where she became the mistress of Ptolemy Soter. On the defeat of that prince by Demetrius Poliorcetes, her charms gained a complete ascendancy over the conqueror, from whom she procured great concessions in favor of her countrymen, the Athenians. The time of her death is uncertain.

LAMOTTE, VALOIS, comtesse de, a French philosopher and ingenious writer, was b. at Paris, in 1588; relinquished the law for literary pursuits, and, in 1639, was admitted a member of the French Academy. In 1647 he was appointed preceptor to the duke of Anjou, and he also obtained the titles of historiographer of France and counsellor of state. D. 1672.

LAMOTTE, ANTHONY HOUDART DE, a French poet, was b. at Paris, in 1672. He was bred to the law, but deserted it for dramatic composition. In 1710 he obtained admission into the Academy, at which time he was nearly blind; and many years before his death he lost his sight entirely. He produced several tragedies and comedies, some of which were very successful, particularly that entitled "Inez de Castro." In 1714 he published a translation of the "Iliad," although entirely ignorant of the original language. He also published a volume of "Fables," besides some pastoral elogues, hymns, &c.; but his prose was much superior to his verse. D. 1731.

LAMOTTE FOUQUE, FREDERIC, baron de, celebrated as a poet, historian, and novelist, was b. at Brandenburg, 1777. Entering the army, he served in the campaign of the Rhine, and had a share in the numerous engagements that were fought for the liberty of Germany in the beginning of this century. His first works appeared under the name of "Pellegrin," and the numerous productions of his pen contributed, not a little, to fan the flame of patriotic ardor which led his countrymen to final victory. On quitting the army he retired to Nehnhäusen, the property of his second wife, Caroline, (see below;) and on her death, in 1831, he removed to Halle, where he delivered lectures upon poetry and history. His beautiful fairy tale, "Undine," has gained him a European reputation. D. at Berlin, 1842.—CAROLINE, baroness de, a popular German novelist, was the wife of the author of "Undine," &c. Among this lady's works are, "Lodoiska," "Frauenliebe," "Feodora," &c. D. 1831.

LAMOTTE, VALOIS, comtesse de, who became generally known in consequence of her intrigues at the French court, which led to a disgraceful trial, was the offspring of poor parents, and b. in 1757. Her occupation of carrying fagots (her father being a woodman) attracted the notice of the lady of the manor, who took the girl to live with her. Hearing her speak of valuable papers which were in her father's possession, the lady, on further inquiry, found they related to the royal family of Valois; and, on investigation, it was proved that she was a descendant of that noble family. The girl married a private in the guards; and, obtaining an introduction to the cardinal de Rohan, great almoner of France, he advised her to make herself known, by letter, to Marie Antoinette, the reigning queen, at the same time expressing his bitter regret that an offence he had been (though innocently) guilty of towards that illustrious lady, prevented him requesting an interview. The queen granted her prayer, and employed her about her person; but Lamotte rewarded her royal benefactress by the grossest treachery. By means of a person named Villette, the countess kept up a fraudulent correspondence between the queen and the cardinal. Villette forged the queen's handwriting, while the cardinal fancied himself restored to the royal favor, and even honored by the queen's confidence; for, through Villette's villany, he was led to suppose he had furnished the queen with 120,000 francs, but which were kept by the countess. Not being detected in this, she carried on the fraud to an excess that merited her subsequent disgrace. Bœhmer and Bassange, the queen's jewellers, had collected, at an enormous expense, diamonds, which, set as a necklace, they intended to sell for 1,800,000 francs. Lamotte persuaded the cardinal that the queen passionately desired to possess this necklace, and confided to him the commission to purchase it; and that she would give a note in her own writing for the sum, which she would repay from her private purse, by instalments, unknown to the king. The cardinal fell into the snare—he bought the desired necklace, which he committed to the care of the countess, who, the better to prevent suspicion, told the cardinal the queen would meet him in the garden, as she wished to thank him. A courtesan of the Palais Royal, Mademoiselle Olivia, personated the queen; in a short speech she thanked the cardinal, and promised him her future protection. Ambition silenced every other idea, and he left the garden elated to excess. Meantime the countess sent her husband to London with the necklace; but the period of the first payment being allowed to pass without any notice being taken of it, Bœhmer made his complaint to the queen, and the whole plot was discovered. The queen, incensed at the affair, required public satisfaction to be made. The minister, Breteuil, was a sworn enemy to the cardinal, and, by his advice, the king ordered the cardinal to be arrested. He was taken in his sacerdotal habit to the Bastille, and proceedings were entered into against Mademoiselle Olivia, who proved to be a degraded female; Cagliostro, a mountebank; the forger Villette; and the contriver of all, the countess. She alone was punished; the cardinal was acquitted, because he was a duped agent in the business; and the others effected their escape from prison; but madame la Comtesse was whipped, and burnt on each shoulder with the letter V, and then taken to the hospital, where it was intended she should remain for life; but she made her escape at the end of ten months, and proceeded to England, where she published her justification, which was read with curiosity, but excited little interest in her favor. D. in London, 1791.

LAMPRIIDIUS, BENEDICTUS, a Latin poet and scholar of the 16th century, was b. at Cremona. He taught the classical languages at Rome with great reputation, and in 1521 removed to Padua. At the invitation of Frederic Gonzaga, duke of Mantua, he settled in the latter city, and superintended the education of the duke's son. D. 1540.

LANA, FRANCIS DE, an Italian mathematician, was b. at Brescia, 1637. He was a Jesuit, and a celebrated teacher of philosophy and mathematics. He first gave the hint of the principles of ærostatic machines, to be conducted by gas, in his work entitled "Magisterium Naturæ et Artis," printed at Brescia, 1684. D. 1700.

LANCASTER, JAMES, an English navigator, sailed to the coast of America in 1591, and afterwards doubled the Cape of Good Hope on a voyage to the East Indies. He subsequently gave such information relative to a N.W. passage to the East Indies as led to the attempt of Baffin and others to discover it. D. 1620. —JOSEPH, a member of the Society of Friends; the author and successful promulgator of the system of mutual instruction, known under the title of "the Lancasterian." He was, for many years, actively engaged in delivering lectures and forming schools in various parts of England; and rank, wealth, and beauty flocked to hear the earnest though simple eloquence of the enthusiastic and benevolent Quaker. But enthusiastic as were the applauses bestowed upon him, patronage and support were not bestowed in like proportion; he became so much embarrassed in consequence of his benevolent exertions, that he was obliged to seek an asylum in America. Here also he suffered many embarrassments, and a subscription was just proposed for his relief, when he was run over in this city, and so severely injured, that he died on the day following the accident. B. 1771; d. 1839.

LANCISI, GIAMARIA, an eminent physician, was b. at Rome, 1654; d. 1720.

LANCRE, PETER DE, a native of Bordeaux, was a counsellor of parliament, and presided over the trials of sorcerers and witches in the provinces of Labourd and Gascony. His services in this capacity were rewarded by the appointment of counsellor of state. He wrote two curious works on demonography. D. 1630.

LANCRINCK, PROSPER HENRY, an able painter, was b. at Antwerp, in 1628. He imitated Titian and Salvator, and was much encouraged in England, where he met with employment under Sir Peter Lely. D. 1692.

LANDEN, JOHN, an eminent mathematician, was b. at Peakirk, Northamptonshire, 1719. In 1755 he published a volume of "Mathematical Lncubrations," in 1764 his "Residual Analysis," subsequently a "New Theory of the Rotatory Motion of Bodies affected by Forces disturbing each Motion," and his volume of "Memoirs." D. 1790.

LANDER, RICHARD and JOHN, two brothers, whose names are indissolubly associated with African discovery, were natives of Cornwall, and b., the former in 1804, the latter in 1806. They were both apprenticed to a printer; but the elder abandoned his occupation to accompany Clapperton in his expedition to the Niger in 1825; and after his death, in 1827, he returned to England, where he submitted to government a plan for exploring the termination of the Niger, which was adopted. Accompanied by his younger brother, he set out for Badaguy in 1830, where, after encountering many dangers, they reached Kirree, but were taken prisoners at Eboe, and only, after the promise of a high ransom, succeeded in getting arrangements made for conveying them to the sea. This they reached by the channel called by the Portuguese, Nun, and by the English, Brass river; and thus was solved by their agency, one of the grandest problems in African geography. This important discovery, opening a water communication into the very heart of the African continent, made a great impression on the mercantile world; and soon after the brothers' arrival in England, an association of which Mr. Macgregor Laird was the head, was entered into for forming a settlement on the Upper Niger; but the expedition that was fitted out for this purpose at Liverpool proved a failure; and the Landers, together with nearly all that joined it, fell victims either to the unhealthiness of the climate, or in contests with the natives, in 1833.

LANFRANC, a learned prelate, was b. at Paira, in 1005, but went over to England with William the Conqueror. Through the interest of that prince, he obtained the archbishopric of Canterbury, vacant by the deposition of Stigand. He was an able politician, as well as a munificent prelate, founding two hospitals near Canterbury, which he liberally endowed. D. 1089.—GIOVANNI, an artist, b. at Parma, in 1581. He was originally a domestic in the service of Count Horatio Schotte, who, finding him to have a taste for design, placed him under Caracci. Under this great master he improved so rapidly that his talent was soon in requisition, and the Farnese palace and churches of St. James and St. Peter at Rome, bear ample testimony of his capability. The great excellence of this artist consisted in his composition and foreshortening, and in fresco painting. D. 1647.—A physician of Milan, where he practised with much success, but attempting some innovations in his profession, he was compelled to take refuge in France. D. 1800, and left a valuable treatise on surgery, entitled "Chirurgia Magna et Parva."

LANGBAINÉ, GERARD, an English divine, b. at Bartonkirke, in Westmoreland, about 1608; was keeper of the archives, and provost of Queen's college; was well acquainted with the laws and antiquities of his country; corresponded with Selden, Usher, and other learned men; endowed a free school at his native place; published an edition of Longinus, and several works on history, theology, and criticisms. D. 1658.

LANGDON, JOHN, a distinguished American patriot, was b. at Portsmouth, N. H., 1739. He engaged in commerce, and took an early and efficient interest in the cause of the colonies. He was successively a delegate to the general congress, navy agent, speaker of the assembly of his native state, president of his native state, a delegate to the convention that framed the federal constitution, and a member of the senate of the United States. In 1805 he was chosen governor of his state, and again in 1810. D. 1819.

LANGHAM, SIMON DE, abbot of St. Peter's, Westminster, was b. at Langham, in Rutlandshire, in the early part of the 14th century. In 1360 he was made lord high treasurer; in the following year he accepted the bishopric of Ely; in 1364 he became chancellor, and was promoted to the see of Canterbury, in 1366. He there distinguished himself by the violence of his opposition to Wickliff, and was made a cardinal; but this so offended Edward III. that he seized the temporalities of his see. He accordingly repaired to the papal court, and was amply compensated for its loss. D. 1376.

LANGHORNE, JOHN, an English divine, poet, and historian, was b. at Kirkby Stephen, in Westmoreland, in 1735. He published several popular pieces, particularly a poem, entitled "Genius and Valor," and having therein defended Scotland from the scurrility thrown out by Churchill in his "Prophesy of Famine," he was complimented with the degree of D.D. by the university of Edinburgh. In 1770 in conjunction with his brother, he published a translation of Plutarch, which is still a very popular work; in 1777 he was presented to a prebendal stall in the cathedral of Wells, and d. in 1779.—WILLIAM, his brother, b. 1721, was presented to the rectory of Hakinge, and the perpetual curacy of Folkestone, where he d. 1772. He wrote one or two poems, and had a share in the translation of Plutarch.

LANGLANDE, ROBERT, a secular priest of the 14th century, and fellow of Oriel college, Oxford, known as the author of some satirical poems against the vices of the Catholic clergy.

LANGLES, LOUIS MATTHEW, a celebrated oriental scholar, b. at Peronne, in France, 1763, published a "Dictionnaire Mautchon-Français," and various works translated from the oriental tongues, particularly a work on Hindoo literature. D. 1824.

LANGLEY, BATTY, an English builder, known by his attempt to remodel the Gothic style of architecture, by inventing different orders of the Gothic, from an intermixture of the various Grecian orders. D. 1751.

LANGTOFT, PETER, an historian and Augustin friar, was b. in Yorkshire, in the 13th century, and is known as the translator of "Boscam's Life of St. Thomas of Canterbury."

LANGTON, STEPHEN, archbishop of Canterbury in the time of King John, was b. in Lincolnshire, but educated in France. He rose through the various honors of the university of Paris till he became its chancellor, and then to the see of Canterbury by the pope. John, the king of England, however, refused to confirm the nomination, and the kingdom was accordingly under excommunication. The monarch at length yielded, and Langton entered into quiet possession of his diocese in 1213. D. 1228.

LANIER, NICHOLAS, an Italian artist, b. about 1568, employed by Charles I. of England.

LANJUINAIS, JEAN DENIS, count de, was b. at Rennes, in 1753. He was a member of the third estate at the breaking out of the revolution, and, when the republic was proclaimed, he was as zealous in defence of the rights of his prince as of the rights of the nation. He opposed the usurpations of Bonaparte, and after the second restoration, he strenuously resisted the extravagant pretensions of the French clergy, defended the liberty of the press and individual freedom, the law of election, and the charter. D. 1827.—JOSEPH DE, an ecclesiastic, b. in Britany. After entering the order of St. Benedict, and becoming professor of theology, his connection with D'Alembert and Diderot compelled him to retire to Lausanne, where he embraced the reformed religion, and became principal of the college of Moudon. He published many works, which excited some attention, and d. in 1808.

LANNES, JOHN, duke of Montebello and a marshal of France, was b. in 1769, at Lestoure. He was apprenticed to a dyer, but entering the army, his zeal and energy gained him promotion, and in 1795 he was made a chief of brigade. After various successes in Italy, and under Bonaparte, in Egypt and other places, particularly at Marengo, he was made a marshal of the empire, and afterwards duke of Montebello. He contributed much to the victory of Austerlitz, and was very prominent in the battles of Jena, Eylau, Friedland, Tueda, and Saragossa. At the battle of Essling he received a mortal wound, of which he d. 1809.

LANZI, LOUIS, an Italian antiquary, b. at Monte del Celmo, in 1732, became a Jesuit, taught rhetoric with great success, and, on the suppression of his order, was sub-director of the Florence gallery. He wrote several works, particularly one on "The Tuscan Language," and "A History of Painting," &c. D. 1810.

LAO-TSEE, a celebrated Chinese philosopher, was b. about 600 B. C., in the service of Hou-Konang. He was cotemporary with Pythagoras, and taught the doctrine of metempsychosis. He followed the sect of Tao-Tsee, and must have lived to a great age, having been visited by Confucius in 517 B. C.

LAPLACE, PETER DE, a French magistrate and writer, b. at Angoulême, in 1526. He became a pleader in the parliament of Paris, till he was appointed, by the prince of Condé, superintendent of his household. Unfortunately he returned to Paris, and while discharging his duty as president at the court of aids, was murdered in the massacre of St. Bartholomew in 1572. His works are, "Commentaries on the State of Religion and the Commonwealth," "A Treatise on the Use of Moral Philosophy," and "A Treatise on the Excellence of the Christian Religion."—PIERRE SIMON, a celebrated mathematician and astronomer, was b. at Beaumont-en-Auge, in 1749, where he became professor of mathematics in the military school. From this place he soon removed to Paris, where he distinguished himself by his knowledge of analysis and the highest branches of geometry, and was chosen a member of the Academy of Sciences, one of the forty of the French Academy, and member of the bureau des longitudes. In 1796 appeared his famous work, "Exposition du Système du Monde." After the revolution, on the 18th of Brumaire, in 1799, he was made minister of the interior by the first consul. But from this he was removed, to make room for Lucien Bonaparte, and was then admitted into the senate, of which, in 1803, he became president. Having, in 1814, voted for the deposition of Napoleon, on the re-organization of the peers, he was made a marquis. D. 1827.

LAPO, JAMES, or JACOPO, an Italian architect living at Florence, who built the church of the Virgin Mary at Assisi, founded by Helias, which obtained him great reputation. D. 1262.—ARNOLPHO, his son, became a most celebrated architect and sculptor, displaying great genius and skill in his profession. D. 1300.

LARCHER, PETER HENRY, an eminent French scholar, was b. at Dijon, in 1726. His first translation was the "Electra" of Euripides, after which he translated "Martinus Scriblerus," from Pope's Miscellanies, and furnished notes to the French version of Hudibras. In 1767, a difference took place between him and Voltaire, on whose "Philosophy of History" he published remarks, under the title of a "Supplement," to which the latter replied in his well-known "Défense de mon Oncle." Larcher rejoined in a "Réponse," with which the controversy ceased on his part, but not so the merciless wit of his opponent. He afterwards published his "Mémoire sur Venus," and translated Herodotus and Xenophon. D. 1812.

LARDNER, NATHANIEL, a learned dissenting divine, was b. at Hawkhurst, Kent, in 1684, and received his education at Utrecht and Leyden. He was the author of several important theological works, viz., "The Credibility of the Gospel History," "The Testimonies of the Ancient Jews and Pagans in favor of Christianity," "The History of Heretics," sermons, &c. D. 1768.

LARIVE, M., a celebrated French tragedian, was b. at Rochelle, in 1749, appeared at the Théâtre Français, Paris, in 1771, where, by his fine person, and his powers of declamation, he rose to eminence. He quitted the stage rather earlier in life than most actors, and d. at Montignon, in 1827, aged 78. He wrote a drama, entitled "Pyramus and Thisbe," "Reflections on the Ilustrionic Art," and other works.

LARIVEY, PETER DE, an old French dramatic writer, and one of the first who considered comedy as the representation of real life, was a native of Troyes, and is supposed to have d. about 1612.

LA ROCHEFOUCAULD, or ROCHEFOUCAULT, FRANCIS, duke de, prince of Marsillac, a distinguished courtier and man of letters in the reign of Louis XIV., was b. 1613. He acted a conspicuous part in the civil war of the Fronde, but he is chiefly remembered as the writer of "Réflexions et Maximes," a work which has been extolled and criticised in no ordinary degree. He also wrote "Mémoires de la Règne d'Anne d'Autriche," and, during the latter part of his life, his house was the resort of the first-rate wits and literati of France. D. 1680.

LA ROCHEJAQUELEIN, HENRI DE, one of the most distinguished of the Vendean royalists, was b. at Chatillon, in Poitou, in 1772, and was a son of the marquis de la Rochejaquelein. The peasants of the neighborhood having risen in the royal cause in 1792, he placed himself at their head. After gaining sixteen victories in ten months, he fell, at the age of 22 years, March 4, 1794, in a single combat with one of the republican soldiers, while defending the village of Nouaille.

LARREY, ISAAC DE, an historian, was b. in 1638, at Montvilliers. He went to Holland, where he was made historiographer to the states-general. His works are, "The History of Augustus," "The History of Eleanor, Wife of Henry II.," "History of England," "History of the Seven Sages of Greece," and "The History of France under Louis XIV." D. 1719.

LA SALLE, count de, a brave soldier, was b. at Metz, in 1775, and entered the army, with the rank of an officer, at 11 years of age, under Prince Maximilian, afterwards king of Bavaria. The privilege of birth opened to him a line of promotion; but he resolved that merit alone should distinguish him. He accordingly resigned his commission, became a private soldier, and at length rose, through long and dangerous services, which occupied eight years, to the post which he had before resigned. By his decisive conduct at the battle of Rivoli he possessed himself of the colors, upon which the commander-in-chief addressed him in these words: "Rest yourself upon these flags, you have deserved them." He was equally victorious in Egypt; conquered the Prussians on the walls of Königsberg, and finished his career on the field of Wagram.

LASCARIS, CONSTANTINE and JOHN, two noble Greeks of the 15th century, who, on the taking of Constantinople by the Turks in 1453, took refuge in Italy. Constantine went to Milan, where he instructed the daughter of the grand-duke in the Greek language. From thence he removed to Rome, and next to Naples, in which city he opened a school for Greek and rhetoric. Lastly, he settled at Messina, where he d. about 1500. His Greek grammar was printed at Milan in 1476, and again by Aldus in 1495.—JOHN, surnamed RHYNDACENUS, took up his residence at Padua, and was patronized by Lorenzo de Medici, who sent him to Greece to purchase certain valuable manuscripts, a mission which he accomplished much to the satisfaction of his employer. In 1494 he entered the service of Louis XII. of France, who made him an envoy to the Venetian senate; in 1513 he went to Rome, and persuaded Leo X. to found the Greek college, of which Lascaris became the principal, and also the superintendent of the Greek press; and in 1518 he returned to France, and was employed by Francis I. in forming the royal library. D. 1535.

LAS CASAS, count de, celebrated for his fidelity to Bonaparte, was b. in the chateau of Las Casas, in the department of the Haute-Garonne, 1766. At the outbreak of the French revolution, 1789, he was a lieutenant in the navy. He then emigrated, joined the army of Condé, and took part in the Quiberon expedition, but returned to France after the 18th Brumaire. Having been long devoted to literary pursuits, he now published, under the name of Le Sage, an "Atlas Historique, Chronologique, et Géographique," which went through several editions. In 1809 he enrolled himself as a volunteer to ward off the English attack upon Flushing, and from this time attracted the attention of Bonaparte, who soon afterwards made him his chamberlain, admitted him to the council of state, and intrusted him with various confidential missions. In 1814 he refused to vote with the council of state for the dethronement of the emperor, took up arms for him after his return from Elba in 1815, and was one of the four attendants that accompanied him to St. Helena. There he remained eighteen months with the illustrious prisoner, enjoying his intimacy, and noting down all that he said in a journal, which he subsequently published, under the title of "Mémorial de Sainte Hélène." But having become an object of suspicion to Sir Hudson Lowe, the governor, he was seized, and conveyed first to the Cape, and thence to England as a prisoner, and was not allowed to return to France till after the emperor's decease. In 1830 he was elected to the chamber of deputies, and took his seat with the opposition. D. 1842.

LASSALA, MANUEL, a Spanish Jesuit, author of an "Account of the Poets of Castile," an "Essay on General History," &c. B. 1729; d. 1798.

LASSO, ORLANDO DI, an eminent musician, was b. at Mons, in Hainault, in 1530. De Thou relates that he was forcibly taken from his parents in childhood by Ferdinand Gonzaga, on account of his fine voice, and carried by him to Milan, Naples, and Sicily. He subsequently taught music at Rome, Antwerp, &c., and finally settled at Munich, as chapel-master to Albert, duke of Bavaria. His productions are numerous, but now rarely to be met with. D. 1593.—RUDOLPH and FERDINAND, his two sons, were also good musicians, and besides producing many compositions of their own, published their father's works, under the title of "Magnus Opus Musicum Orlandi de Lasso."

LATHAM, JOHN, M.D., F.R.S., &c., an eminent ornithologist and antiquary, was b. at Eltham, in Kent, in 1740, where his father practised as a surgeon and apothecary. Among his productions are, "A General Synopsis of Birds," "Index Ornithologicus," also, "Herald's Pharmacopeia Improved," and others; but his great work, which he commenced in his 82d year, was "A General History of Birds." So indefatigable was he, and withal so capable of this undertaking, at such an advanced period of life, that, with singular fidelity to nature, he designed, etched, and colored the whole of the plates himself. D. 1837.

LATIMER, HUGH, bishop of Worcester, one of the first reformers of the church of England, was b. at Thurstaston, in Leicestershire, in 1470. He first became obnoxious to the enemies of innovation by a series of discourses, in which he dwelt upon the uncertainty of tradition, the vanity of works of supererogation, and the pride and usurpation of the Roman hierarchy. Latimer had the courage to write a letter of remonstrance to Henry VIII., on the evil of prohibiting the use of the Bible in English. Although this epistle produced no effect, Henry presented the writer to the living of West Kenton, in Wiltshire. The ascendancy of Anne Boleyn and rise of Thomas Cromwell proved favorable to Latimer, and he was in 1535 appointed bishop of Worcester. But the fall of his patrons prepared the way for reverses, and the six articles being carried into parliament, Latimer resigned his bishopric rather than hold any office in a church which enforced such terms of communion, and retired into the country. During the short reign of Edward VI. he again preached, and was highly popular at court, but could not be induced to resume his episcopal functions. Soon after Mary ascended the throne, Latimer was cited to appear before the council, in doing which an opportunity was afforded him to quit the kingdom. He, however, prepared with alacrity to obey the citation, and as he passed through Smithfield exclaimed, "This place has long groaned for me." In 1555 new and more sanguinary laws having been enacted, in support of the Catholic religion, a commission was issued by Cardinal Pole, the pope's legate, to try Latimer and Ridley for heresy, who were in consequence delivered over to the secular arm, and condemned to the flames. This sentence was put in execution at Oxford, Oct. 16, 1555. At the place of execution, having thrown off the old gown which was wrapped about him, Latimer appeared in a shroud prepared for the purpose, and with his fellow-sufferer was fastened to the stake with an iron chain. A fagot ready kindled was then placed at Ridley's feet, to whom Latimer exclaimed, "Be of good comfort, master Ridley, and play the man. We shall this day light such a candle, by God's grace, in England, as, I trust, shall never be put out." He then recommended his soul to God, and, with firm composure, expired amid the flames.—WILLIAM, a celebrated scholar of the 16th century, who taught Erasmus Greek, and was tutor to Reginald, afterwards Cardinal Pole. He was a prebendary at Salisbury, and held two livings in Gloucestershire. D. 1545.

LATOUR D'AUVERGNE CORRET, THEOPHILUS MALO DE, a distinguished soldier, citizen, and scholar of the French republic, was b. in 1743, at Carhaix, in Lower Britany. He first served in the army during the American war; and when the French revolution broke out, he was intrusted with the command of 8000 grenadiers, and distinguished himself in various successful enterprises on the Spanish frontier. In 1795 he returned to his studies; but in 1799 he once more took the field, generously serving in lieu of a friend's only son, who had been drawn as a conscript. Bonaparte rewarded his bravery by bestowing on him the honorable title of First Grenadier of France; but he did not long retain it, being killed at the battle of Neuburg, in 1800. He was well versed in history, and an eminent linguist; author of a Franco-Celtic Dictionary, and various other philological works of merit.

LATUDE, HENRY MAZERS DE, who was a prisoner in the Bastille for 35 years, was b. in 1724, at Montagnac, in Languedoc. In order to gain the favor of madame de Pompadour, he persuaded her that an attempt was to be made on her life, by a box containing the most subtle poison; and when the box arrived, it was discovered that it had been sent by Latude himself, and contained nothing but ashes. This offence, aggravated by repeated endeavors to escape, was the cause of his long and rigorous incarceration; but when his sufferings became known, by the publication of his memoirs, which he wrote soon after his liberation, they became a formidable weapon in the hands of the revolutionists, and the national assembly decreed him a pension. D. 1804.

LAUD, WILLIAM, archbishop of Canterbury in the reign of Charles I., was b. in 1573, at Reading, in Berkshire, accompanied James I. to Scotland, as one of his chaplains, in 1617; was installed a prebend of Westminster in 1620; and obtained the see of St David's in the following year. On the accession of Charles I. his influence became very great; and he was translated to the see of Bath and Wells, and in 1628 to that of London. In 1630 he was elected chancellor of the university of Oxford, to which he was a great benefactor, and which he enriched with an invaluable collection of manuscripts, in a great number of languages, ancient, modern, and oriental. In 1633 he attended Charles, into Scotland, who went there to be crowned; on his return he was promoted to the see of Canterbury, and during the same year he was chosen chancellor of the university of Dublin. The zeal which he displayed for conformity to the church, and his endeavors to introduce the liturgy into Scotland, created him numerous enemies. At the commencement of the long parliament, therefore, he was impeached by the commons and sent to the Tower. After lying there three years, he was brought to his trial before the lords, by whom he was acquitted, which so provoked the faction in the lower house, that they passed a bill of attainder, declaring him guilty of treason, which they compelled the peers to pass; and the archbishop was accordingly beheaded on Tower-hill, Jan. 10, 1644-5.—He was in the 72d year of his age, and met his fate with great fortitude. Among his works are, "Annotations on the Life and Death of King James," his "Diary," edited by Wharton, and published with his "Remains," "Officium Quotidianum," &c.

LAUDER, SIR THOMAS DICK, whose versatile pen has acquired for him a high place in Scottish literature, was b. near Edinburgh, 1784. He was one of the first contributors to "Blackwood's Magazine." His two novels, "Lochinther" and "The Wolf of Badenoch," published in early life, are remarkable for freedom and felicity of style; and these were followed at intervals by various other works, among which are "The Floods of Moray in 1829," "Highland Rambles," "Tour round the Coasts of Scotland," "The Queen's Visit to Scotland in 1842," &c. His last contribution to literature was a series of papers on the rivers of Scotland, which appeared in "Tait's Magazine." D. 1848.—WILLIAM, a literary impostor, who acquired notoriety by endeavoring to hold up Milton as a plagiarist, was a native of Scotland. In 1747 he began an attack upon Milton in the "Gentleman's Magazine," which he followed up by a pamphlet, entitled "An Essay on Milton's Use and Imitation of the Moderns in his Paradise Lost." His alleged quotations from Grotius, Massenius, and others, passed as genuine for a time, until they were exposed by Dr. Douglas, bishop of Salisbury, which drew from the fabricator an acknowledgment of his guilt. Yet after this he returned to the charge in a tract, with this title, "The Grand Impostor detected, or Milton convicted of Forgery against Charles I." D. 1771.

LAUDERDALE, JAMES MAITLAND, earl of, a very active and energetic statesman, whose opinions were at one time deemed to be of great weight, both by his own party and by his opponents, was b. in 1759. In 1780 he was returned to parliament for Newport, in Cornwall, and subsequently for Malinesbury. As a member of the lower house he joined the party of his friend Mr. Fox, and took an active part in opposing the North administration, supported Mr. Fox's India bill, and was one of the managers of the impeachment of Warren Hastings. In 1789 he succeeded to the title, and was in the following year sent to the house of lords as one of the sixteen Scottish representative peers.

In 1806, on the dissolution of the Pitt administration, he was created a peer of the United Kingdom, sworn a privy councillor, and received the great seal of Scotland. In August of the same year he was sent as minister plenipotentiary to France, with full powers to conclude a peace. D. 1840.

LAUNEY, BERNARD RENE JOURDAN DE, the last governor of the Bastille in Paris, which was erected in 1383, and destroyed July 14, 1789.

LAUNOI, JOHN DE, a French divine, b. in 1603, who defended the liberties of the Gallican church, and reformed the calendar by purging it of fictitious saints and legendary tales. D. 1678.

LAURENT, PETER JOSEPH, a mechanic, was b. in Flanders, in 1715. He is said to have constructed some hydraulic machines, when he was not more than 10 years of age; and at 21 he was made superintendent of several public works; among which was the direction of the canals in the Netherlands. He also projected the junction of the Somme and the Scheldt; for which he was honored with the order of St. Michael. D. 1773.

LAURENS, HENRY, an American patriot and statesman, was b. at Charleston, S. C., in 1724. After receiving a good school education, he engaged in commerce, and soon amassed an ample fortune. At the breaking out of the revolution he was in London, but he immediately returned to his native country, and in 1776 was elected a delegate to the general congress. He was soon chosen president of this body, and remained so till the close of the year 1778. In 1779 he received the appointment of minister plenipotentiary to Holland, but on his way thither was captured by the British, and committed to the Tower, where he was in confinement fourteen months. He was one of the commissioners for negotiating a peace with Great Britain, and in 1782 he signed with Jay and Franklin the preliminaries of the treaty. His health, however, was much impaired, and he soon returned home and passed the remainder of his life in agricultural pursuits. D. 1792.—JOHN, lieutenant-colonel, son of the preceding, was liberally educated in England, and having returned to his native country joined the American army in 1777. He displayed prodigies of valor at Brandywine, Germantown, Monmouth, Savannah, and Charleston, and was killed at the very close of the war by carelessly exposing himself in a trifling skirmish.

In 1780 he was sent as a special minister to France, to negotiate a loan, and after being subjected to a vexatious delay, he determined to present a memorial to the king in person at the levee. This purpose he carried into effect, the memorial was graciously received, and the object of negotiation satisfactorily arranged.

LAURI, FILIPPO, a painter, was the son of a Flemish artist, but b. at Rome, in 1623. His altar-pieces and other scriptural paintings are held in much esteem. D. 1694.

LVALETTE, MARIE CHAMANS, count de, was b. at Paris, in 1769. In 1796 Bonaparte appointed him his aid-de-camp, and he was frequently charged by him with difficult missions. After Napoleon became emperor, in 1803, he was appointed a count of the empire. In 1814 he was removed from the post-office; but on the 20th of March, 1815, by virtue of orders from Napoleon, who entered Paris in the evening, he resumed his former duties, and gave notice to stop the departure of the journals, dispatches, and travelling post-horses without signed orders. At the same time, he dispatched a courier to Napoleon, to describe the actual condition of the capital. On the 2d of June he was nominated a peer. On the second restoration in July, 1815, he was deprived of his functions, arrested by the sub-prefect of police, Decazes, and condemned to death as an accomplice in Bonaparte's treason against the royal authority. An appeal having been rejected, and Madame Lavalette's application for pardon being declined, his execution was fixed for the 21st December. On the evening of the 20th, his wife, her daughter, twelve years old, and her governess, presented themselves at the prison door and were admitted by the jailers as usual. A short time after the daughter and governess reappeared, supporting Madame Lavalette, apparently in great affliction. They were scarcely gone when the turnkey appeared in his cell, and Lavalette was not to be found—his wife, Madame Lavalette, had taken his place. On the escape being known, his wife was arrested, and tried, with her governess, Sir Robert Wilson, and Messrs. Hutchinson and Bruce, by the Cour Royale. The latter were condemned to a short imprisonment, and she and the governess acquitted; but she never recovered the shock caused to her nerves and constitution by the risks to which her noble fidelity had exposed her. A fixed mental alienation succeeded.

LAVATER, JOHN GASPAR, the celebrated physiognomist, was b. at Zurich, in 1741. He became pastor of the principal church of St. Peter at his native place, and was distinguished by his unwearied zeal in behalf of practical Christianity. He d. in 1801, in consequence of a wound which he received in 1799, when the French troops under Massena took Zurich by storm. He was the author of a "Treatise on Physiognomy," the "Journal of a Self-Observer," "Jesus the Messiah," "Spiritual Hymns," "Swiss Lays," &c.; but the work by which he is universally known, and which once was highly popular, is that on physiognomy. Lavater was pious, but credulous; enthusiastic, but sincere.

LAVICOMTERIE DE ST. SAMPSON, LOUIS, a violent partisan of the French revolution, who wrote "Crimes des Rois de France," "Les Crimes des Empereurs," and "Les Crimes des Papes." He became a member of the convention in 1792; voted for the death of the king; and, in 1794, was ordered by the Jacobin club to draw up the "Act of Accusation against Kings." D. 1809.

LAVOISIER, ANTHONY LAURENCE, a celebrated French chemist, was b. at Paris, in 1743; was educated at Mazarin college; and, on quitting it, devoted himself wholly to the sciences, but more particularly to chemistry. The discoveries of Black, Cavendish, and Priestley, relative to the nature of elastic fluids or gases, having attracted his notice, he entered on the same field of inquiry, with all his characteristic ardor, in the cause of science; and, possessing the advantage of a considerable fortune, he conducted his experiments on a large scale, and obtained highly interesting results. His new theory of chemistry was received with applause in Germany and France, though strenuously opposed by Dr. Priestley, whose phlogistic hypothesis it tended to overthrow. In 1789 he published his "Elements of Chemistry," a work of merit and importance. He succeeded Buffon and Tilet as treasurer of the Academy, and became also farmer-general; but notwithstanding his talents and virtues, he was condemned to death by the revolutionary tribunal of Paris, on the frivolous charge of having adulterated the tobacco with ingredients obnoxious to the health of the citizens, and was guillotined in 1794. Besides his Elements, he wrote "Chemical and Philosophical Miscellanies," "Report of the Commissioners charged to examine Animal Magnetism," "Instructions for making Nitre," &c.

LAW, EDMUND, a learned prelate, was b. at Cartmel, in Lancashire, in 1703; and, after obtaining various church preferments, was raised to the see of Carlisle in 1769. He was the author of many able theological works, among which are, "Considerations on the Theory of Religion," "Reflections on the Life and Character of Christ," an "Inquiry into the Ideas of Space, Time," &c. D. 1787.—JOHN, a celebrated financial projector, was b. in 1681, at Edinburgh, where his father, a goldsmith, resided. He was bred to no profession, but studied the mathematics, and particularly excelled as an accountant. For the purpose of remedying the deficiency of a circulating medium, he projected the establishment of a bank, with paper issues, to the amount of the value of all the lands in the kingdom; but this scheme was rejected. Having seduced a young lady in England, he killed her brother in a duel, and was obliged to leave the country. He went first to Holland, and afterwards to Venice and Genoa, from which cities he was banished as a designing adventurer; but, at length, he secured the patronage of the regent duke of Orleans, and established his bank at Paris, 1716, by royal authority. To this was joined the company of the Mississippi, a pretended scheme for paying off the national debt, and for enriching subscribers. The project became extravagantly popular, and every one converted his gold and silver into paper. In 1720 Law was made comptroller of the finances. The bubble, however, burst; and the people, enraged, besieged the palace of the regent, crying out, as they held up their hands full of bills, "See the fruits of your system." Law was exiled to Pontoise, from whence he escaped to Italy, and d. at Venice in 1729.—WILLIAM, a pious English divine, was b. at King's Cliffe, Northamptonshire, in 1685; was educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge; and lived for the most part a retired life at the house of Mrs. Hester Gibbon, aunt of the celebrated historian, to whom he had been tutor. He wrote against Bishop Hoadly, and was also the author of some valuable practical books, as, "A Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life," "A Treatise on Christian Perfection," &c. In his latter days he fell into the mystic reveries of Jacob Belmen, whose works he published. D. 1761.

LAWLESS, JOHN, the once celebrated Irish agitator, was a native of Dublin, and originally designed for the legal profession. For many years he was distinguished as a leading political character with the liberals of Ireland; and from his straightforward and fearless conduct, he acquired from all parties the title of "honest Jack Lawless." When the English government first proposed to grant emancipation to the Irish Catholics, provided their clergy were paid by the state, and the forty-shilling freeholders were disfranchised, "honest Jack" vehemently opposed the measure in the Catholic association, and thereby acquired a degree of popularity, which aroused the jealousy of his great rival co-agitator. His eloquence was energetic, forcible, and convincing; and it is generally understood, that whatever might have been the faults of the head, his heart was sound at the core. D. 1837.

LAWRENCE, Sir THOMAS, the most celebrated portrait painter of the age, was b. in 1769, at Bristol, where his father kept an inn. He early exhibited proofs of his talent for the art, having, it is said, sketched portraits in his fifth year. At the age of 6 he was sent to school, where he remained two years; and this, with the exception of a few lessons subsequently in Latin and French, constituted his whole education. Young Lawrence, however, had access to the galleries of some of the neighboring gentry, in which he employed himself in copying historical and other pieces. In 1782 his father, who had been unsuccessful in business, removed to Bath, where his son was much employed in taking portraits in crayon; and having made a copy of the Transfiguration by Raphael, the society for the encouragement of arts bestowed on him their prize of five guineas and a silver palette. In 1787 the family removed to London, and Lawrence was admitted a student at the Royal Academy. His subsequent career was successful and brilliant. He was elected royal associate in 1791, and on the death of Sir J. Reynolds, the next year, was made painter to the king. After the peace of 1814 he painted the portraits of the allied sovereigns, and the generals Bueher, Platoff, and Wellington; also Louis XVIII. and Charles X. of France; besides numerous others, consisting of the principal nobility of England, the pope, Cardinal Gonsalvi, and many other distinguished personages on the Continent. On the death of Mr. West, in 1820, Sir T. Lawrence was elected president of the Royal Academy. D. 1830.

LEBRUN, CHARLES, a celebrated painter, was b. at Paris, in 1618. He studied under Vouet and Poussin; and, after his return from Rome, was made president of the new royal academy of painting and sculpture. From 1661 he was principally employed in embellishing the residences of Louis XIV. and his nobles with works of art, and in superintending the brilliant spectacles of the court. Lebrun possessed a comprehensive genius, which was cultivated by the incessant study of history and national customs. He wrote a treatise on the passions, and another on physiognomy. D. 1690.—CHARLES FRANCIS, duke of Placentia, was b. in 1739, at Contances, in Normandy; came at an early age to Paris; and being nominated deputy to the states-general in 1789, he occupied himself, during the session, with affairs of police, finance, and domestic administration. In 1795 he was elected to the council of elders, and became president in 1796. He was appointed third consul in December, 1799; nominated arch-treasurer of the empire in 1804; and, in 1805, governor-general of Liguria and duke of Placentia. Having signed the constitution that recalled the house of Bourbon to the throne, he was created a peer of France by the king, and, in the beginning of July, was appointed president of the first bureau of the chamber of peers. After the return of Napoleon, he accepted the peerage from him, and likewise the place of grand-master of the university, a proceeding which rendered him incapable of sitting in the new chamber of peers, formed in August, 1815. In the early part of his life he translated the Iliad and Odyssey, and Tasso's "Jerusalem." D. 1824.—PONCE DENIS ECOUCHARD, a French poet, who for a time obtained the appellation of the French Pindar, was b. in 1729; became secretary to the prince of Conti, and early distinguished himself as a writer of elegant lyrics. At the commencement of the revolution, he celebrated the birth of freedom in odes, epigrams, and songs; but afterward changed his opinions. When the academi- cal establishments were reorganized, Lebrun became a member of the institute; and he received from Bonaparte, when first consul, a pension of 6000 francs. D. 1807.

LECLERC, DANIEL, an eminent medical writer, was a native of Geneva. His chief writings are, "Bibliotheca Anatomica," "Histoire de la Médecine," and "Historia latorum Lumbriorum." D. 1728.—JOHN, an eminent critic, b. at Geneva, in 1657. He was the author of numerous works; among which are, "Ars Critica," "Harmonia Evangelica," and three voluminous "Bibliothèques." He was professor of philosophy, belles lettres, and Hebrew, at Amsterdam, where he d. in 1736. So prone was he to dogmatize, and so impatient of contradiction, that he has been styled the self-constituted inquisitor of the republic of literature.

LECOMTE, FELIX, a celebrated French sculptor. Having obtained a prize for a bas-relief of the Massacre of the Innocents, while he was a pupil of Vassé, he was sent to Rome as a pensionary of the French school of arts. His statue of Phorbas preserving Oedipus procured him admission into the Academy; but the statue of Fenelon, which ornaments the hall of the national institute, is considered his chef-d'œuvre. During the revolution he lived in retirement; but, at the restoration of the Bourbons, he was nominated professor in the academy of sculpture. D. 1817.

LEDYARD, JOHN, an adventurous traveller, was b. at Groton, Conn., 1751. For a short time he resided among the Six Nations, with whose language and manners he became acquainted. He then went to England, enlisted as a marine, and sailed with Captain Cook on his second voyage, of which he published an account. He next determined to make the tour of the globe from London east, on foot, and proceeded to St. Petersburg in the prosecution of this design, through the most unfrequented parts of Finland. After waiting there nearly three months, he obtained his passport for the prosecution of his journey to Siberia. On his arrival at Yakutsk, he was prevented by the Russian commandant of the place from proceeding any further; and was conducted to the frontiers of Poland, with a threat of being consigned to the hands of the executioner, should he again be found in the Russian territories. He was next employed by the African Association to explore the interior of Africa; but he had proceeded no further than Grand Cairo, when he was attacked with a fatal disease, and d. in 1788.

LEE, ARTHUR, an eminent patriot, was b. in Virginia, in 1740, and received his education in England, taking his degree of M.D. at the university of Edinburgh. He then returned to his native state, and for some years practised physic at Williamsburg, but political affairs were then assuming so interesting an aspect, that he again went to England, and entered on the study of law in the Temple. In 1770 he visited London, and became a member of the famous society of the supporters of the bill of rights. His political publications at this period, under the signature of "Junius Americanus," were numerous, and procured for him the acquaintance of the leaders of the popular party. In 1776 he was appointed minister to France, in conjunction with Dr. Franklin and Mr. Deane, and assisted in negotiating the treaty with that nation. In 1779, in consequence of the false accusations of Mr. Deane, complaints of his political conduct were freely circulated at home, and in the following year he resigned his appointments and returned. In 1781 he was elected to the assembly of Virginia, and by this body returned to congress, where he continued to represent the state till 1785. In 1784 he was employed to arrange a treaty with the six Indian nations. He was next called to the board of treasury, where he continued till 1789, when he went into retirement. D. 1792.—CHARLES, a major-general in the army of the American revolution, was b. in North Wales, and became an officer at the age of 11 years. He served at an early age in America, and afterwards distinguished himself under Gen. Burgoyne in Portugal. He subsequently entered the Polish service, wandered all over Europe, killed an Italian officer in a duel, and, in 1773, sailed for New York. Espousing the cause of the colonies, he received a commission from congress in 1775, with the rank of major-general. In 1776 he was invested with the command at New York, and afterwards with the chief command in the southern department. In December, 1776, he was made prisoner by the English, as he lay carelessly guarded at a considerable distance from the main body of the army in New Jersey. He was kept prisoner till the surrender of Burgoyne, in 1777, and treated in a manner unworthy of a generous enemy. In 1778 he was arraigned before a court-martial, in consequence of his misconduct at the battle of Monmouth, and was suspended from any commission in the army of the United States for one year. He retired to a hovel in Virginia, living in entire seclusion, surrounded by his books and his dogs. In 1782 he went to reside at Philadelphia, where he d. in obscurity, in October of the same year. He was a man of much energy and courage, with considerable literary attainments, but morose and avaricious. He published essays on military, literary, and political subjects, which with his extensive correspondence were collected in a volume in 1792. The authorship of the Letters of Junius has been ascribed to him.—HENRY, a distinguished officer in the revolutionary army, was b. in Virginia, 1756, and graduated at the college in Princeton. In 1776 he was a captain of one of the six companies of cavalry, raised by Virginia, and afterwards incorporated into one regiment, and in 1777 added to the main body of the provincials. At the battle of Germantown, Lee was selected with his company, to attend Washington as his body-guard. In 1780, being raised to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, he was sent with his legion to the army of the South, under Gen. Greene, and continued with it till the end of the war. He distinguished himself at the battle of Eutaw springs, and in the ensuing October was sent on a special commission to the commander-in-chief, then employed in the siege of Yorktown; in 1786 he was appointed a delegate to congress, from the state of Virginia, and remained in that body till the adoption of the present constitution. He was a member of the state convention which ratified that instrument, and in 1792 he was raised to the chair of governor of Virginia. In 1799 he was again a member of congress, and, while there, selected to pronounce a funeral oration on the death of Washington. The latter years of his life were embarrassed by want, and it was while confined for debt in the limits of Spottsylvania county, that he prepared for publication his excellent "Memoirs of the Southern Campaign." He was severely wounded during the riot in Baltimore, in 1814, and his health rapidly declined. He d. 1818.—FRANCIS LIGHTFOOT, a signer of the declaration of independence, was b. in Virginia, 1734. He inherited a large fortune, and in 1765 became a member of the house of burgesses of his native state, and continued in that body till 1775, when he was chosen a member of the continental congress. He remained in this assembly till 1779, when he entered the legislature of his native state. D. 1797.—RICHARD HENRY, an eminent American patriot, and signer of the declaration of independence, was b. in Virginia, 1732, and received his education in England. He returned to his native country when in his nineteenth year, and devoted himself to the general study of history, politics, law, and polite literature, without engaging in any particular profession. In his twenty-fifth year he was chosen a delegate to the house of burgesses, where he soon distinguished himself by his powers in debate. In 1764 he was appointed to draught an address to the king, and a memorial to the house of lords, which are among the best state papers of the period. His efforts in resisting the various encroachments of the British government were indefatigable, and in 1774 he attended the first general congress at Philadelphia, as a delegate from Virginia. He was a member of most of the important committees of this body, and labored with increasing vigilance and energy. The memorial of congress to the people of British America, and the second address of congress to the people of Great Britain, were both from his pen. In June, 1776, he introduced the measure that declared the colonies free and independent states, and supported it by a speech of the most brilliant eloquence. He continued to hold a seat in congress till June, 1777, when he solicited leave of absence, on account of the delicate state of his health. In August of the next year he was again elected to congress, and continued in that body till 1780, when he declined a re-election till 1784. In that year he was chosen president of congress, but retired at the close of it, and in 1786 was again chosen a member of the Virginia assembly. He was a member of the convention which adopted the present constitution of the United States, and one of the first senators under it. In 1792 he again retired from public life. D. 1794.—NATHANIEL, a dramatist, was b. at Hatfield, in Hertfordshire; was educated at Westminster school, and at Trinity college, Cambridge; tried his fortune as an actor and a writer for the stage; became insane, and was confined in Bedlam for two years, and d., in poverty, in 1692, of injuries received during a drunken frolic. He wrote eleven tragedies, of which "The Rival Queens," and "Theodosius," are the best; and he assisted Dryden in writing "Œdipus," and "The Duke of Guise." See posessed genius, but was deficient in judgment; and his style is often bombastic.—SOPHIA, the daughter of an able actor, was b. in London, in 1750. Her first literary attempt, which, however, was not published till many years after it was written, was "The Life of a Lover." In 1780 her comedy of the "Chapter of Accidents" was so successful that the profits of it enabled her to establish, at Bath, an academy for young ladies, which was conducted by herself and her sisters. Her novel of "The Recess" established her fame. In 1803 she retired from her toils of tuition; and she d. March 13, 1824. She wrote, besides the above works, "Almeyda," a tragedy; "The Assassination," a comedy; "A Hermit's Tale," a poem; and two of the stories in her sister's "Canterbury Tales."

LEGARE, HUGH SWINTON, was b. at Charleston, S. C., in 1797; was graduated at the college of Columbia; studied law in his native place, and afterwards at Paris and Edinburgh; was elected to the state legislature in 1820, and made attorney-general of the state in 1830. On the establishment of the "Southern Review" in 1837, he was chosen, jointly with Mr. Elliott, to be the editor. He enriched its pages with some of his best writings. In 1832 he was made chargé d'affaires to Belgium. Mr. Tyler appointed him attorney-general of the United States in 1841. D. 1843. In addition to his articles in the Southern Review, he wrote for the "New York Review" several able and learned papers, such as "Demosthenes," "Origin, history, and influence of the Roman Law," and "Democracy at Athens."

LEGENDRE, ADRIEN MARIE, one of the first mathematicians of the age, filled the professor's chair at the military school at Paris, was a member of the French Academy of Sciences, and a knight of the legion of honor. In 1787 he was employed by the French government to assist Cassini and others, in obtaining accurate estimates of the relative meridional situations of Paris and Greenwich. He also distinguished himself by very profound researches concerning the attraction of elliptic spheroids, and was the first who demonstrated that the ellipse is the only figure in which the equilibrium of a homogeneous fluid mass can be preserved under the influence of rotatory motion, and that all its component molecules would be mutually attracted in the inverse ratio of the squares of their distances. On the formation of the Institute he became a member of that body; and under the imperial government he was nominated a counsellor for life of the university of Paris. In 1815 he was made an honorary member of the council of public instruction; and in 1816, conjointly with M. Poisson, examiner of candidates for the Polytechnic school. Among his works are, "Éléments de Géométrie," "Mémoires sur les Transcendentes Elliptiques," "Nouvelle Théorie des Parallèles," &c. D. 1832.—LOUIS, a French historian, b. at Rouen, in 1659; he was canon of Notre Dame, and abbot of Claire Fontaine, in the diocese of Chartres. His principal work (for he was the author of several) is a "History of France." D. 1733.

LEGÈR, FRANCIS BARRY BOYLE, ST., barrister-at-law; author of "Gilbert Earle," the "Blount Manuscripts," and "Tales of Passion." He was also editor of the "Album," and a contributor to several periodical publications. D. 1829.

LEGGETT, WILLIAM, was b. in the city of New York about 1802, was educated at the college of Georgetown, D. C., but did not take a degree, accompanied his parents to Illinois in 1819, where they were among the earliest settlers, and obtained a midshipman's warrant in 1826, but retired from the navy on account of the arbitrary conduct of one of his superior officers. Shortly after he left the service he published a volume of occasional verses, called "Leisure Hours at Sea," and wrote the tale of the "Rifle," which attracted great attention. In 1822 he established in this city a periodical named the "Critic," which was conducted with marked ability. His "Tales of a Country Schoolmaster," and "Sketches of the Sea," were collected from its pages. In 1829 he became joint editor with Mr. Bryant in the "New York Evening Post," where he displayed the noblest editorial energy and talent. In 1836 he published the "Plaindealer," a weekly paper of high character. In 1840 Mr. Van Buren appointed him chargé to Guatemala, but he d. while he was preparing to set out.

LEGOUVE, GABRIEL MARIE JEAN BAPTISTE, a French dramatist and poet, was b. in 1764, at Paris; and was admitted as a member of the Institute in 1798. He wrote six tragedies and several poems. D. 1813.

LEIBNITZ, GOTTFRIED WILHELM, Baron, a man of splendid abilities, was

b. in 1646, at Leipsic, in which city his father was a professor of jurisprudence and moral philosophy. After studying at Jena and Nuremberg, he removed to the court of Mentz, and was appointed a counsellor. In 1672 he went to Paris, where he applied himself to mathematics, and enjoyed the acquaintance of the celebrated Huygens, whose expectations he answered by the invention of an arithmetical machine. The elector of Brandenburg (afterwards Frederic I. king of Prussia) requested his advice in the establishment of the royal academy of sciences at Berlin, and, when completed, made him president of the institution. In 1711 he was made Aulic councillor to the emperor of Germany; and the emperor of Russia appointed him privy councillor of justice, with a pension. He was, after this, engaged in a controversy with Dr. Clarke, on the subject of free will, as he had been before with Newton on the invention of fluxions. His philosophical writings are very numerous, and he crowned his literary fame by an "Essai sur l'Entendement Humain." According to the Leibnitzian system of optimism, an infinite number of worlds are possible in the divine understanding; but, of all possible ones, God has chosen and formed the best. Each being is intended to attain the highest degree of happiness of which it is capable, and is to contribute, as a part, to the perfection of the whole. D. 1716.

LEICESTER, THOMAS WILLIAM, earl of, and Viscount Coke, was distinguished throughout a long and active life as one of the most princely and efficient of all the improvers of English agriculture. When upwards of 85 years of age he was raised to the peerage. He was twice married. By his first marriage he had three daughters; and by the second, contracted when he was 70 years of age and the bride not 19, five sons and one daughter. He sat in parliament for many years previous to his elevation to the peerage, and always spoke and voted on the Whig side. D. 1842, aged 90.

LEIGHTON, ALEXANDER, a Scotch divine and physician, was b. at Edinburgh, in 1568. He became professor of moral philosophy in that university, but afterwards went to Leyden, and took his doctor's degree. He then visited London, where he had a rectorship, till he was prosecuted in the star chamber for publishing two libels, one entitled "Zion's Plea," and the other

"The Looking-glass of the Holy War." He was sentenced to stand in the pillory, to have his ears cut off, his nose slit, branded on the cheek, publicly whipped, and imprisoned in the Fleet, where he remained 11 years, and d. insane, in 1644.—ROBERT, son of the preceding, was b. in London, in 1613; he received his education at Edinburgh; and in 1643 settled as minister of Newbottle, near that city. He then quitted the Presbyterian church for the Episcopal; was successively principal of Edinburgh university, bishop of Dumblane, and archbishop of Glasgow; and d. in 1684. He was a good theologian, an eloquent preacher, and a pious and disinterested man.

LELAND, JOHN, an English antiquary, was b. in London, about the end of Henry VII.'s reign; was educated at St. Paul's school, Christ's college, Cambridge, and All Soul's, Oxford; and was made chaplain and librarian to Henry VIII., who also appointed him his antiquary, with a commission to examine all the libraries of the cathedrals, abbeys, and colleges in the kingdom. He spent six years in travelling to collect materials for the history and antiquities of England and Wales; and retired to his house in London, to arrange and methodize the stores of intelligence which he had collected; but, after about two years, he d. insane in 1552, without having completed his undertaking. The great bulk of his collections, after passing through various hands, was placed in the Bodleian library, in an unfinished state. Hearne published his "Itinerary" and "Collectanea," and Hall edited his "Commentarii de Scripturis Britannicis."—JOHN, a dissenting minister; author of "A View of the Principal Deistical Writers in England," "The Advantage and Necessity of the Christian Revelation," and "Sermons." He also wrote against Tindal, Dodwell, and Bolingbroke. B. 1691; d. 1766.—THOMAS, a divine and miscellaneous writer, was b. in 1722, at Dublin, and was educated at Trinity college. In 1768 the lord lieutenant appointed him his chaplain, and subsequently gave him the vicarage of Bray, and a prebend in St. Patrick's cathedral. He was the author of a "History of Ireland," "The Life of Philip of Macedon," "A Dissertation on the Principles of Human Eloquence," &c. D. 1785.

LELY, Sir PETER, a celebrated painter, whose family name was Vander Vaes, was b. at Soest, in Westphalia, in 1617, and was a pupil of Grebber, of Haarlem. In 1641 he went to England, and from that period he gradually rose in reputation. He finished portraits both of Charles I. and Cromwell, but it was not till the restoration that he reached the height of fame and prosperity. He fell in with the voluptuous taste of the new court, in his representation of the beauties who adorned it; and by the delicacy and grace of his pencil, became the favorite painter, and was knighted by Charles II., who highly esteemed him. D. 1680.

LEMONNIER, PETER CHARLES, an eminent French astronomer, was b. at Paris in 1715, and accompanied Maupertuis in his tour towards the north pole for measuring a degree of the meridian. He wrote several works on the science, and had the honor of numbering among his pupils the celebrated Lalande. D. 1796.—LOUIS WILLIAM, brother of the preceding, was first physician to the king, and professor of botany at the Jardin du Roi. After narrowly escaping destruction during the French revolution, he retired to Montreuil, where he d. in 1779. He was the author of "Observations d'histoire Naturelle," &c., and a contributor to the Encyclopédie and other scientific works.

LEMPRIERE, JOHN, an eminent classical scholar, was a native of Jersey; received his education at Reading, Winchester, and Pembroke college, Oxford, graduated at that university; was headmaster of Abingdon grammar-school, and afterwards of the school at Exeter; and on resigning the latter, was presented to the livings of Meeth and Newton Petrock, in Devonshire, which he held till his decease, in 1824. His principal works are, the "Bibliotheca Classica, or Classical Dictionary," and a "Universal Biography."

L'ENCLOS, ANNE, or NINON DE, a celebrated female, distinguished alike by beauty, wit, and accomplishments, was b. at Paris in 1616. She was left at an early age the mistress of a good fortune; and being possessed of the highest personal as well as intellectual charms, and giving free scope to the indulgence of her passions, it is no wonder that she drew around her a circle of lovers and suitors, distinguished either for their rank or gallantry; but her love of independence, or a more unworthy cause, prevented her from forming a serious connection. Without making a traffic of her charms, she attached herself to those who pleased her; and having extended her favors, in succession, to the most celebrated men of her time, she proved to all she was quite as regardless of constancy in her attachments. This modern Lais was countenanced, complimented, and consulted by some of the most eminent writers of the day. Scarron, we are told, consulted her on his romances, St. Evremont on his poems, Molière on his comedies, Fontenelle on his dialogues, and Rochefoucauld on his maxims. Her friendship was sought by some of the most respectable of her own sex. "The power of her natural beauty," says one of her biographers, "was indeed tragically illustrated by the often-told adventure of one of her own sons, who being brought up in ignorance of his birth, fell desperately in love with his mother, and when she discovered to him the fatal secret, he, in a fit of despair and desperation, stabbed himself in her presence!" This terrible event has been introduced by Le Sage into his Gil Blas. D. 1705, in the 90th year of her age.

LENFANT, JAMES, a French Protestant divine, was b. 1691, and d. 1728. He published histories of the councils of Constance, Basle, and Pisa, very faithfully written. He likewise translated the New Testament into French, with notes, in conjunction with Beau-sobre. His other works are, a "History of Pope Joan," "Sermons," a "Preservative against Uniting with the Church of Rome," &c.

LENGLET DU FRESNOY, NICHOLAS, a French writer, was b. at Beauvais, in 1674. He was an ecclesiastic, but so much given to satire and political intrigues, that he was frequently sent to the Bastille. His death was occasioned by falling into the fire in 1755. Among his voluminous works, the best are, his "Method for Studying History" and "Chronological Tablets of Universal History," which have been translated into English.

LENNOX, CHARLOTTE, a female of considerable literary abilities, was b. in 1720. Her father, Colonel Ramsay, was lieutenant-governor of New York, by whom she was sent to England, where she married early, and was left a widow with one child. In 1647 she published a volume of poems, and 1751 her novel of "Harriet Stuart," which was followed the next year, by "The Female Quixote" and "Shakspeare Illustrated." After this appeared, in quick succession, several works translated from the French, and the novels of "Henrietta" and "Euphemia." She was also the author of some dramatic pieces. Her character was unimpeachable, and she was highly respected by Dr. Johnson and Samuel Richardson; but in her declining years she was doomed to penury and sickness, and had it not been for the relief afforded her by the Literary Fund Society, her latter days must have been truly miserable. D. 1804.

LENOTRE, ANDREW, a French architect and ornamental gardener, was b. in 1618, and studied painting under Vouet. He was a great favorite of Louis XIV., and his plans for the decoration of the park of Versailles contributed principally to establish his reputation. Delille has celebrated the talents of Lenotre, whose style of ornamental planting was fashionable, not only in France but in England, till it was superseded by the more natural style introduced by Kent, Brown, &c. D. 1700.

LENTHALL, WILLIAM, an English statesman of the 17th century, was b. at Henley, in Oxfordshire, in 1591. In 1639 he was elected into parliament for Woodstock, and in 1640 he was chosen speaker, but was turned out by Cromwell in 1653. The year following he became speaker of the parliament called by the Protector, as he did also of the Rump. D. 1682.

LEO I., surnamed the Great, and canonized as a saint, was a native of Tuscany, and succeeded Sixtus III. in the papal chair in 440. He took a very decided part against the Manichean heresy and other schismatics, persuaded Attila to withdraw his forces from the very gates of Rome, and afterwards saved the city from being burned by Genseric. D. 461.—X., GIOVANNI DE MEDICI, pope, son of the celebrated Lorenzo de Medici, was b. at Florence, in 1475. At the age of 11 he was made an archbishop by Louis XI., king of France; at 14 Julius II. invested him with the dignity of legate, and he served as such in the army which was defeated by the French, near Ravenna, in 1512. He was taken prisoner after that battle, but the soldiers showed the most superstitious veneration for his person, as the representative of the pope. He was elected to the papacy in 1513, and his coronation was celebrated with unusual pomp. He terminated the disputes which had subsisted between his predecessor and Louis XII. of France, concluded the council of Lateran, and formed a splendid library, which he enriched with inestimable manuscripts. This pontiff formed two great projects, the one to effect a general association of the Christian powers against the Turks, and the other to complete the church of St. Peter. To aid these schemes he issued plenary indulgences, which being carried into Germany, aroused the zeal of Luther, and ultimately produced the reformation. D. 1521. Leo X. was a munificent patron of learning and the arts, and his short pontificate forms one of the most interesting periods in papal history.—XII., ANNIBALE DELLA GENGA, was b. at Genoa, in 1760, and succeeded Pius VII. in the papal chair, in 1823. By the remission of many taxes, as well as by his benevolence and personal attention to the hospitals, prisons, and public institutions for the poor, he obtained the love of the people; he also endeavored to free the states of the church from robbers and banditti, as well as to suppress the remains of Carbonarism. Leo d. in Feb., 1829, and was succeeded by Cardinal Castiglione, who took the name of Pius VIII. Pius died Dec., 1830, and was succeeded by Cardinal Capellari, (Gregory XVI.)—VI., emperor of the East, called the Philosopher, succeeded his father, Basil, the Macedonian, in 886. He expelled the patriarch Photius, and defeated the Hungarians; but just before his death, which happened in 911, his fleet sustained a total defeat by the Saracens.

LEON, FRAY LUIS DE, a Spanish poet and ecclesiastic, was b. in 1527, and d. in 1591. His ode, entitled "La Profecía del Tago," has been translated into English by Mr. Wiffen, and published at the end of his translation of the poems of Garcilaso de la Vega.

LEONIDAS, the Spartan king and hero, was the son of King Anaxandrides, and succeeded his half brother Cleomenes, 491 B. C. When Xerxes, king of Persia, invaded Greece, with an immense army, Leonidas marched to Thermopylæ, and, on arriving there, posted his army, which, including the whole of the allies, amounted only to 7000 men, so skilfully, that the enemy, on coming to the narrow pass, became aware of the difficulty of carrying it by force. Xerxes, therefore, attempted to bribe Leonidas, offering him the dominion of all Greece. This proposal being rejected with scorn, the despot sent a herald to order the Greeks to surrender their arms: "Let him come and take them," was the hero's reply. Thrice did the Persians advance in great force, and thrice were they repelled, with enormous loss. Meanwhile, a traitorous Greek, named Ephialtes, led 10,000 of the enemy, by a secret path, over the mountains, who thus gained the rear of Leonidas. He now saw that all was lost, but resolved to show, by a memorable example, what the Greeks could perform in the cause of their country. After a long contest, the hero fell, surrounded by countless assailants. The gratitude of Greece raised a splendid monument to the memory of Leonidas and his brave associates, and annually celebrated the great event by warlike games and orations.

LEPAUTRE, ANTHONY, first architect to the king of France, erected the palace of St. Clond. His chief talent lay in the decoration of edifices, but his fondness for excessive ornament in a measure destroyed the simple beauty of his designs. D. 1691.—PETER, his son, was an eminent sculptor, and became royal statuary and director of the academy of St. Luke. D. 1744.

LE SAGE, ALAIN RENE, a distinguished French novelist and dramatist, was b. in 1668, at Sarzeau, in Britany, and studied at the Jesuits' college, at Vannes. In 1692 he went to Paris, where his talents and manners procured him admission into the best society, and he soon adopted the profession of an author. He studied the Spanish language, and produced a multitude of translations, or imitations, of Castilian dramas and romances. His comedy of "Crispin the Rival of his Master" first attracted the public notice; but his success as a novelist has most contributed to make him known to foreigners. "Le Diable Boiteux," known in England by the title of "The Devil upon Two Sticks," became extremely popular; the comedy of "Turcaret," added to his fame, and that fame was soon rendered imperishable by his admirable "Gil Blas." Le Sage was endowed with great literary fertility; he composed 24 dramatic pieces, and had a share in the composition of 76 others. Among his novels are, "The Adventures of Guzman d'Alfarache," "The Bachelor of Salamanca," "The History of Estovaille Gonzales," &c. D. 1747.—GEORGE LOUIS, a philosophical writer, was b. at Geneva, in 1724, and d. in 1803. He wrote "Fragments on Final Causes," and a treatise on "Mechanical Physics."

LESLIE, CHARLES, was b. in Ireland, studied at Trinity college, Dublin, and the Temple; quitted the law for divinity, and obtained preferment in Ireland. He was a zealous Protestant, but refused to transfer his allegiance to the new government by taking the oaths to King William. He wrote many political tracts, against the doctrine of resistance and in defence of hereditary right, the most important of which were in a weekly paper, called "The Rehearsal." He also wrote some treatises against deists and Socinians, among which are, "The Snake in the Grass," and "A Short and Easy Method with the Deists." D. 1732.

—Sir JOHN, a celebrated mathematician and natural philosopher, was b. at Largo, in Fifeshire, in 1766. His father, who was a joiner and cabinet-maker, intended to bring him up to some useful trade, but his fondness for calculation and geometrical exercises brought him at an early period under the notice of professors Robinson, Playfair, and Dugald Stewart, and, when he was thirteen, his parents were induced to let him enter as a student at the university of St. Andrew's. In 1790 he proceeded to London, with an intention of delivering lectures on natural philosophy; but being disappointed in his views, he found it expedient to commence writing for the press as the readiest means of obtaining a subsistence. His first undertaking of any importance was a translation of Buffon's "Natural History of Birds," which appeared in 1793, and the sum he received for this laid the foundation of that pecuniary independence, which his prudent habits fortunately enabled him to attain. In 1800 he invented that admirable and delicate instrument the differential thermometer; and in 1804 appeared his celebrated "Essay on the Nature and Propagation of Heat." For this performance he was honored by the council of the Royal Society with the Romford medals, and in 1805 he was elected to the mathematical chair in the university of Edinburgh, which, in 1819, he exchanged for that of philosophy on the death of Professor Playfair. By the invention of his hygrometer he succeeded in making the discovery of that singularly beautiful process of artificial freezing, or consolidation of fluids, which enabled him to congeal mercury, and convert water into ice by evaporation. His chief works are, "An Account of Experiments and Instruments depending on the Relation of Air to Heat and Moisture," the "Philosophy of Arithmetic," "Elements of Geometry," "Elements of Natural Philosophy," besides many admirable treatises in "Nicholson's Philosophical Journal," the "Encyclopædia Britannica," &c. D. 1832.

LESSING, GOTTHOLD EPHRAIM, an eminent German author, remarkable for the versatility of his genius, was b. in 1729, at Kamentz, in Pomerania, and was educated at Meissen and Leipsic. In the early part of his career he connected himself with theatricals, and led an erratic life, but he afterwards compensated for it by the closest mental application. At Berlin, where he sometimes resided, he became acquainted with Voltaire, the Jewish philosopher Mendelssohn, Nicolai, Ramler, Sulzer, and other literary characters. In 1770 the hereditary prince of Brunswick appointed him librarian at Wolfenbuttel, and one of the fruits of this appointment was a periodical publication, entitled "Contributions to Literary History." Among his dramatic works are, "Nathan the Wise," "Emilia Galotti," "Minna von Barnhelm," "The Misogynist," and "The Freethinker." His other principal works are, "Laocoon," "Fables," "Fragments of an Unknown," "The Hamburg Drama-turgy," and a "Dissertation on the Education of the Human Race." D. 1781.

L'ESTRANGE, Sir ROGER, a political partisan and controversial writer, was b. in 1616. His father, Sir Hamond l'Estrange, was a zealous royalist; and the son, following his example, was concerned in raising forces, and in some unsuccessful enterprises in favor of Charles I. during the civil wars, for which he was obliged to leave the kingdom. Upon the restoration he returned, and established an English newspaper, under the title of "The Public Intelligencer," in 1663, which he discontinued upon the publication of the first "London Gazette." He was author of many violent political tracts; translated Josephus, Cicero's "Offices," Seneca's "Morals," the "Colloquies" of Erasmus, and Æsop's "Fables." D. 1704.

LESUEUR, EUSTACHE, a distinguished French painter, was b. at Paris, 1617, and obtained from his countrymen the name of "The French Raphael." His conceptions are noble and elevated, his composition is simple, careful, and well arranged, the drawing is correct, in good taste, and proves his diligent study of the antique and of the great Italian masters; but his coloring is deficient in truth and vigor, which often renders his pictures too uniform. D. 1658.—JEAN BAPTISTE, a musical composer, b. 1763. After completing his studies at Amiens, he obtained various appointments, as director of music in cathedrals; but having an inclination for theatrical compositions, he resigned his place at Notre Dame in 1788, and produced several operas. "Telemachus" was his first. He afterwards composed "La Caverne," which met with the most brilliant applause, and in 1793 he produced "Paul et Virginie," the "Death of Adam," and "The Bards." — THOMAS, a mathematician and ecclesiastic, was b. at Rethel, in Champagne, 1703. He entered into the order of Minims, and became a celebrated professor of mathematics, philosophy, and theology, in the college of Sapienza, at Rome, where he d. in 1770. He joined with Father Jacquier in a "Commentary" upon Newton's Principia, and also in a profound work on the "Integral Calculus." He also published "The Principles of Natural Philosophy," and "Institutiões Philosophicæ."

LETI, GREGORY, an Italian historian, was b. in 1630, at Milan, and, after studying at Rome, went to Geneva, where he abjured the Catholic religion, and afterwards resided in England. Among his works are, Lives of "Sixtus V.," "Charles V.," "Queen Elizabeth," "Oliver Cromwell," the "History of Geneva," and a "History of the Cardinals." But the whole are so interspersed with error and fiction, that they may be regarded rather as romances than authentic histories. D. 1701.

LEUCIPPUS, a philosopher of Elea, who lived in the 5th century before the Christian era. He was the disciple of Zeno, and the master of Democritus. The atomic system originated with him, and thus, by ascribing a sensible power to the particles of matter, and setting them in motion, Leucippus and his followers accounted at once for the origin of the universe, without the interposition of divine agency. From him Descartes borrowed his hypothesis of the "Vortices," and Kepler was also much indebted to the theory of Leucippus.

LEUSDEN, JOHN, a celebrated biblical critic and theologian, was a native of Utrecht, where he distinguished himself as one of the most erudite scholars and able divines of the age. His theological works are numerous and valuable. B. 1624.

LEUWENHOEK, ANTHONY, a celebrated natural philosopher, was b. at Delft, in 1632, and was celebrated for his microscopical improvements and discoveries, chiefly anatomical, the particulars of which were published in the "Philosophical Transactions," and the memoirs of the academy of sciences. A selection from his works was published in English. D. 1723.

LEVAILLANT, FRANCIS, a traveller and naturalist, was b. at Paramaribo, in Guiana, and from childhood showed a strong predilection for the study of natural history, particularly of ornithology. In furtherance of this desire, he undertook to penetrate the interior of Africa, which he twice accomplished, though under circumstances of great difficulty. He published two narratives of his "Travels into the Interior of Southern Africa," and a "Natural History of African Birds," of "Parrots," and of the rare "Birds of the Indies." Insurmountable obstacles prevented him from pursuing his researches so far as he wished, but his travels are very amusing, and also afford much information of a philosophical nature. D. 1824.

LEVIZAC, JOHN PONS VICTOR LACONTZ DE, a French grammarian, was b. at Alby, in Languedoc, emigrated to Holland at the beginning of the revolution, and settled in England as a French teacher. He commenced his literary career as a poet, but he is best known by his grammars, dictionaries, and other practical works on the French language. D. 1813.

LEWIS, JOHN, a learned divine and antiquary, was b. at Bristol, 1675, and d. at Margate in 1746. He published "The Life of Wickliff," "Wickliff's Translation of the New Testament," "The History and Antiquities of the Isle of Thanet," "The History of the Abbey and Church of Feversham," "The Life of William Caxton," &c.—MATTHEW GREGORY, familiarly styled "Monk" Lewis, a popular romance writer and dramatist, was b. in London, in 1773, and was the son of the under secretary of war. He was educated at Westminster school, after which he travelled on the Continent, and imbibed while in Germany that taste for the marvellous and romantic which characterizes most of his writings. His first production was "The Monk," a romance admired for its talent, but justly censured for its licentiousness; he also wrote "Fendal Tyrants," "Romantic Tales," "Tales of Terror," "The Castle Spectre," a drama, and many others. He was a member of parliament, but undistinguished by any oratorical powers, and he d. in 1818.—MERRIWETHER, b. 1774, and employed by the government of the United States, with Clark, to make discoveries in the northern parts of the American continent, with a view to the extension of commerce to the Pacific ocean. In 1805 they undertook a journey for the purpose of discovering the sources of the Missouri, and they passed the winter in an icy region, 500 leagues beyond its confluence. Lewis was soon after made governor of Louisiana, and Clark a general of its militia, and agent of the United States for Indian affairs. D. 1809.

LEYDEN, JOHN, a physician, but more distinguished as a poet and oriental scholar, was b. 1775, at Denholm, Roxburghshire, and was the son of a small farmer. Displaying in early youth an eager desire for acquiring knowledge, his parents contrived to send him to a college at Edinburgh, where he first studied theology, but relinquished it for medicine; and, in addition to the learned languages, he acquired French, Spanish, Italian, German, Arabic, and Persian. In 1801 he assisted Sir Walter Scott in procuring materials and illustrations for his "Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border," and republished "The Complaynt of Scotland," with a learned preliminary dissertation, notes, and a glossary. Having obtained a doctor's degree, he was appointed assistant surgeon on the Madras establishment; after which he was made professor of the native dialects in the Bengal college, from which situation, however, he was removed, to be judge of the 24 Pergunnahs of Calcutta. His power of acquiring languages was truly wonderful, and during his residence in India he devoted himself to the study of oriental literature; but he did not long survive the influence of the climate. His "Poetical Remains" were published in 1821.

LHUYD, EDWARD, an eminent antiquary and naturalist, b. about 1670, was a native of Wales; studied at Jesus college, Oxford, in which university he succeeded Dr. Plot as keeper of the Ashmolean Museum; and was the author of a learned and valuable work, entitled "Archæologia Britannica." He also published "Lithophylacii Britannici Iconographia," and left in manuscript an "Irish-English Dictionary," and other curious papers on antiquarian subjects. D. 1709.—HUMPHREY, an antiquarian, b. at Denbigh, Wales; author of "Commentarioli Britannicæ Descriptionis Fragmentum," "De Monâ ruidum Insulâ," "De Armamentario Mano," and "The History of Cambria." D. 1570.

LIBANIUS, a celebrated Greek rhetorician, b. at Antioch, in 314. He studied at Athens, and afterwards became famous as a teacher of eloquence at Constantinople, till the jealousy of the other professors being excited by his success, he was accused of magical practices, and banished. He afterwards became preceptor to Basil and John Chrysostom, so celebrated in the Christian church; and on the accession of Julian, he was honored with his friendship, and is supposed to have assisted the emperor in some of his compositions. Many of his orations and declamations are extant, but they are verbose and pedantic.

LICHTENBERG, GEORGE CHRISTOPHER, an eminent natural philosopher, was b. near Darmstadt, in 1742; studied at Gottingen, where he was appointed professor extraordinary of the physical sciences; and succeeded Erleben, in 1777, as professor of experimental philosophy. His astronomical observations were original and important. He also indulged much in satire; and among others, possessing much wit and humor, was an effusion, entitled "The Physiognomy of Tails," in which Lavater and his system were held up to ridicule. D. 1799.

LIDDEL, DUNCAN, a mathematician and physician, was b. in 1651, at Aberdeen, where he received his education. He afterwards went to Frankfort, and then removed to Rostock, and, in 1591, was elected professor of mathematics at Helmstadt, where he took his doctor's degree in physic. In 1607 he returned to Scotland, and founded a mathematical professorship and six scholarships at Aberdeen. He wrote several works on medical subjects, and d. 1618.

LIGHTFOOT, JOHN, a learned English divine, was b. at Stoke-upon-Trent, in Staffordshire, in 1602, and educated at Christ's college, Cambridge. He made extraordinary advances in the Greek and Latin languages, and applied himself to Hebrew with singular assiduity and success. In 1629 he printed his first work, entitled "Erubium or Miscellanies, Christian and Judaical." He distinguished himself as a zealous promoter of the Polyglot Bible, and, at the restoration, was appointed one of the assistants at the Savoy conference. He became vice-chancellor of Cambridge, and d. in 1675. The works of Lightfoot, who, for biblical learning, has had few equals, were printed in 1614, and his "Remains" were published by Strype, in 1700.—JOHN, a botanist, b. at Newent, in Gloucestershire, in 1735, was educated at Pembroke college, Oxford, and became successively rector of Shelden, in Hampshire, and of Gotham and Sutton, in Nottinghamshire. He was patronized by the duchess of Portland, and drew up the catalogue of her museum. He was a fellow of the Royal and Linnæan societies, and published the "Flora Scotica." D. 1788.

LIGNE, CHARLES JOSEPH, prince de, was b. at Brussels, in 1738; entered the Austrian army at the age of 17; distinguished himself in the seven years' war; was invited to the French court by the count d'Artois, and admitted into the privacy of the royal family; was sent on a mission to Russia, where his talents and personal accomplishments rendered him a great favorite with Catharine, who made him a field-marshal, and gave him an estate in the Crimea. His knowledge, experience, activity, and acute observation appear by the numerous writings which he published at different periods; and the information he gives of the leading persons and events of his time, is detailed in an amusing and instructive manner. D. 1814.

LILBURNE, JOHN, an enthusiastic republican in the reign of Charles I., was b. in 1618, in the county of Durham. Having gone to Holland to superintend the printing of some libels on the government, he was sentenced by the star chamber council to receive 500 lashes and to stand in the pillory; for which the long parliament voted him reparation. He fought at the battle of Edge-hill as a captain of foot; but at Brentford he was made prisoner, and carried to Oxford, where he would have been hanged, had not the parliament threatened retaliation. He then obtained his liberty, and was made first a major, and afterwards a colonel of dragoons, in which capacity he served at the battle of Marston-moor, where he behaved with great gallantry. Being committed to Newgate for contempt, when brought before the house of lords for a libel on the earl of Manchester, he contrived, while thus immured, to publish pamphlets in rapid succession, in which he virulently assailed his enemies, and even charged Cromwell and Ireton with high treason. For this piece of daring, he was again tried, but he defended himself with so much boldness and ability, that he was acquitted. He possessed an unconquerable spirit, and was of so quarrelsome a disposition, that it has been appositely said of him, "that if there were none living but him, John would be against Lilburne, and Lilburne against John." D. 1657.

LILLO, GEORGE, a tragic writer of the last century, was b. in London 1693. He carried on the business of a jeweller many years, in a style of great respectability, and contrived to devote no small portion of his time to dramatic productions. He well knew how to touch the heart, and his pieces, which are subservient to the cause of virtue, are, "George Barnwell," "Fatal Curiosity," and "Arden of Feversham." D. 1739.

LILLY, JOHN, an English writer, was b. in Kent, about 1553, and d. about 1600. He wrote "Euphues," a description of different characters; also some plays, as "Endymion," "Campaspe," "Midas," acted before Queen Elizabeth; "The Maid's Metamorphosis," "The Woman in the Moon," &c.—

WILLIAM, an English astrologer, was b. in Leicestershire, in 1602. After receiving a common education, he went to London, and became book-keeper to a tradesman, at whose death he married his widow. In 1632 he became the pupil of Evans the astrologer, and soon excelled his master. He was employed by both parties during the civil wars, and even Charles I. is said to have made use of him. Lilly was certainly consulted respecting the king's projected escape from Carisbrook castle. He, however, gained more from the parliament party; and the predictions contained in his almanacs had a wonderful effect upon the soldiers and common people. His principal works are, "Christian Astrology," "A Collection of Nativities," and "Observations on the Life and Death of Charles, late king of England." D. 1681.

LIMONADE, count de, an emancipated negro slave of Hayti, b. about 1770; distinguished in the war of independence waged by Toussaint; and was secretary of foreign affairs to Christophe, when he superseded Dessalines as emperor of Hayti. He survived the suicidal death of Christophe, and the destruction of the imperial government. His sagacity and statesman-like talents were exhibited in frequent diplomatic correspondence with Napoleon's ministers.

LINCOLN, BENJAMIN, an American general, b. in Hingham, Mass., 1733; d. 1810. A farmer, he served in various civil and military offices, and soon after the breaking out of the revolution became major-general in the provincial militia, and in 1777 was transferred to the continental army. At the battle of Bemus's Heights he commanded, and the next day, while reconnoitring, received a severe wound. In 1778 he was appointed to the command of the southern army. He cooperated with Count d'Estaing in the assault on Savannah, and in 1780 was besieged in Charleston by a superior British force and capitulated after an obstinate defence. At the siege of Yorktown he received the sword of Cornwallis. He was secretary of war two years, and in 1787 commanded the forces which quelled the Shays rebellion in Mass. In the same year he was elected lieutenant-governor of that state. For several years he was collector of the port of Boston. — LEVI, an American lawyer and statesman, b. in Hingham, Mass., 1749; d. 1820. He was a member of President Jefferson's cabinet; lieutenant-governor, and for some months acting governor of Mass.; and, later, an associate justice of the U. S. supreme court.

LINDSAY, SIR DAVID, one of the most famous of the old Scottish poets, b. 1490; d. 1557.

LINDSEY, THEOPHILUS, a church of England divine, afterwards known as a unitarian preacher. B. 1723; d. 1808.

LINN, JOHN BLAIR, an American poet, b. in 1777, at Phippenburgh, Pennsylvania. In 1799 he became a preacher among the Presbyterians of Philadelphia; but continued to cultivate his poetical talents. He replied with zeal and indignation to Dr. Priestley, respecting the comparison drawn by the latter between the merits of Jesus Christ and Socrates; was the author of "The Powers of Genius," and other poems; and d. 1804.

LINNÆUS, or LINNE, CHARLES VON, the most celebrated of modern naturalists, and the founder of the present botanic system, was b. in 1707, at Roeskult, in Sweden. From his infancy he discovered a propensity and talent for the study of plants; and though destined for the church, his predilection for natural history withdrawing his attention from theological studies, his destination was changed for the medical profession. While at the universities of Lund and Upsal, he labored under great disadvantages, from the narrowness of his father's circumstances; but the patronage of Celsius, the theological professor, who was also a naturalist, improved his condition, and he obtained some private pupils. It was at this period that he formed the idea of that botanical system which has immortalized his name. In 1732 he made a tour through Lapland, and, visiting the mining district round Fahlun, formed a system of that science, which he afterwards published in his "Systema Naturæ." He next resided for three years in Holland, where he took his doctor's degree, and was superintendent of Clifford's celebrated garden at Harte-camp, near Haerlem. After visiting England, in 1738, he made an excursion to Paris, and, towards the end of that year, returned to his native country, and settled as a physician at Stockholm, where the establishment of a royal academy, of which he was one of the first members, contributed to the advancement of his reputation, by the opportunities which it afforded for the display of his abilities. In 1741 he succeeded to the professorship of medicine at Upsal, to which was added the superintendence of the botanic garden. His fame now spread through the civilized world, and scientific bodies eagerly enrolled him among their members; in 1747 he was nominated royal archiater; in 1753 he was created a knight of the polar star—an honor never before bestowed on a literary man; in 1761 he was elevated to the rank of nobility, and acquired a moderate degree of opulence, sufficient to enable him to purchase an estate and mansion at Hammarby, near Upsal, where he chiefly resided during the last years of his life. Besides his works on natural history, he published a classified "Materia Medica," &c.; but it is as the founder of a system of botanical science that he ranks as an original genius, and will continue to be remembered. D. 1778.

LINSCHOTEN, JOHN HUGH VAN, a Dutch voyager, of the 16th century, who wrote narratives of his voyages to the East Indies, and a description of the coasts of Guinea, Congo, and Angola. B. 1553; d. 1633.

LINT, PETER VAN, an historical and portrait painter of Antwerp, was b. in 1609. He painted in Italy several years, and returned to his own country increased in wealth and reputation.—A relation of his, HENDRIC VAN LINT, was an eminent landscape painter, and executed some fine views about Rome.

LIPPI, LORENZO, a painter and poet, was b. at Florence 1606, and d. 1664. He executed many fine pieces for the chapels and convents of his native city. As a poet he is known by a burlesque piece entitled "Malmantile Racquistaro," printed at Florence in 1688, under the name of Perloni Zipoli.—There were also two other Florentine artists of the name of LIPPI: one, FRANCISCO FILIPPO, who d. in 1488; and his son FILIPPO, who died in 1505; the latter was a painter of considerable talent and reputation.

LIPSIUS, JUSTUS, an eminent critic and scholar, b. at Overysche, a village of Brabant, in 1547. He studied at Aeth, Cologne, and Louvain; then went to Rome, and became secretary to Cardinal Granvella. On his return to the Netherlands, after a short time spent at Louvain, he visited the capital of the German empire, and then accepted a professorship in the university of Jena. Many tempting and honorable offers were made him by various potentates, to engage him in their service; but he refused them all; and at length d. at Louvain, in 1606. Lipsius changed his religion several times; and whether as a Catholic, a Lutheran, or a Calvinist, he was equally zealous for the time, and equally bigoted. He wrote many learned treatises, but his principal work is the "Varie Lectiones."

LIST, FREDERIC, a distinguished political economist, was long a member of the Wirtemberg parliament, whence he was expelled for the boldness of his opinions. In 1819 he conceived the idea of the "Zollverein," (the Customs Union of the German states; an institution which, after encountering many obstacles, was finally adopted by nearly the whole of Germany,) established a journal to support his views, and published several valuable works on political economy. But a series of disappointments preyed upon his mind, and in a fit of insanity he committed suicide, 1846, in the 57th year of his age.

LISTER, THOMAS HENRY, a novel writer and historian was b. in 1801, and may be said to have inherited literary tastes and capabilities, the poetical talents both of his father and grandfather having been favorably mentioned by Miss Seward. Besides "Granby" and "Herbert Lacy"—two novels which are among the best of that not very admi-nable species "the fashionable"—he published, "Epicharis," a tragedy; and the "Life and Administration of Lord Clarendon." D. 1842.

LISTON, JOHN, a very popular actor of low comedy, whose natural humor and peculiar drolleries afforded many a rich treat to the playgoers of London, was b. in St. Anne's parish, Soho, and in the early period of his life was engaged in the uninviting employment of a teacher in a day-school. He appeared in 1805 before a London audience at the Haymarket. He also obtained an engagement at Covent-garden, where he remained, increasing in public favor, till 1823, when he transferred his services to Drury-lane, and continued there till 1831; but the enormous salary of £100 a week tempted him to enlist under the banners of Madame Vestris at the Olympic theatre, where he performed six seasons, and may be said to have closed his theatrical career. D. 1846.

LITHGOW, WILLIAM, a native of Scotland, who in the reign of Queen Elizabeth travelled on foot through numerous countries in Europe, Asia, and America, over a distance of more than 36,000 miles; during which he encountered many hardships, and was at length thrown into the prisons of the Inquisition in Spain, and so cruelly tortured as to be deprived of the use of his limbs. On regaining his liberty, and coming to England, he published an account of his adventures, which he presented to James I. He also wrote a narrative of the siege of Breda. D. 1640.

LITTLE, WILLIAM, an ancient English historian, known also by the name of Gulielmus Naubrigensis, was b. at Bidlington, in Yorkshire, in 1136, and educated at the abbey of Newborough, in the same county. In his advanced years he composed a History of England, from the Norman Conquest to 1197, which for veracity, regularity of disposition, and purity of language is one of the most valuable productions of that period.

LITTLETON, THOMAS, a celebrated English judge, and law authority, was b. at Frankley, in Worcestershire. He studied at the Temple, was appointed one of the judges of the common pleas, and continued to enjoy the esteem of his sovereign, Edward IV., and the nation, until his death, at an advanced age, in 1481. The memory of Judge Littleton is preserved by his celebrated treatise on "Tenures," which is esteemed the principal authority for the law of real property in England. This work has been commented on by Coke, Sir M. Hale, and Lord Chancellor Nottingham.

LIVERPOOL, CHARLES JENKINSON, earl of, eldest son of Colonel Jenkinson, was b. in 1727, and was educated at the Charter-house, and at University college, Oxford. He entered parliament in 1761, and soon took office as under-secretary of state; in 1766 he was made a lord of the admiralty; in 1772, vice-treasurer of Ireland; in 1778, secretary at war; and, in 1784, president of the board of trade. In 1786 he was created Baron Hawkesbury; and in 1796, earl of Liverpool. D. 1808.—ROBERT BANKS JENKINSON, earl of, son of the preceding, was b. in 1770, and received his education at the same seminaries of learning as his father. At the general election in 1790, Mr. Jenkinson was returned member for Rye. In 1796, his father being created earl of Liverpool, he became Lord Hawkesbury, and was made a commissioner of Indian affairs. In 1801 he was appointed secretary of state for foreign affairs; which office, four years after, he exchanged for that of the home department. This he resigned on the dissolution of the Addington administration; and, at the death of Mr. Pitt, succeeded him as lord warden of the Cinque Ports. In 1817 he was again minister for the home department; and on the death of his father, in the year following, succeeded to the title of earl of Liverpool. In 1812, he was raised to the premiership, and he held that elevated station till 1827. D. 1828.

LIVINGSTON, JOHN H., president of Queen's college, N. J., graduated at Yale college, 1762. In May, 1766, he went to Holland, to prosecute his theological studies in the university of Utrecht, where he resided four years, obtaining the degree of doctor in theology in 1770, in which year he returned to America, and became the pastor of the Dutch reformed church in this city. At this period the Dutch churches in America were divided in the Confenetic and the Coetus parties; by the efforts of Dr. Livingston, a happy union was effected in 1772, and the Dutch church became independent of the classis in Amsterdam. In 1784 he was appointed theological professor in the Dutch church. The duties of minister and professor he performed till 1810, when he was appointed president of Queen's college, in which he remained till his death, in 1825, aged 73 years.—ROBERT, first possessor of the manor of Livingston in the state of New York, and founder of one of the most distinguished families in this country, was the son of John Livingston, who received the degree of A.M. at Glasgow, in 1621, and was the minister of Anerum, but refusing to take the oath of allegiance in 1663, was banished, and removed to Rotterdam, where he was a minister of the Scot's chapel, and d. Aug. 9, 1672, aged 69. Robert L. was b. at Anerum, in 1654, and came to America with his nephew about 1672. He was a member of the council in 1698. His wife was of the family of Schuyler, and the widow of Mr. Van Rensselaer. He left three sons, Philip, Robert, and Gilbert. A Mr. Livingston, perhaps Mr. R. L., who was many years speaker of the assembly of New York, d. at Boston, 1728.—PHILIP, a patriot of the American revolution, and a signer of the declaration of independence, graduated at Yale college, 1737. He became a merchant in New York, and as there were but few well-educated merchants in Wall-street at that time, he was soon at their head. In 1754 he was an alderman of the city of New York, and after serving in this capacity four years, was sent to Albany as a representative of the city. In this body he soon became a leader, and directed its attention to the great interests of commerce; New York being then behind Boston and Philadelphia in her exports and imports. He was one of the committee of correspondence with the agent for the colony in England, the celebrated Edmund Burke; and his letters abound in information and critical remarks. Mr. Livingston was in congress in 1776, and not only signed, but was a strenuous advocate for the declaration of independence. He was a member of the senate of New York on the adoption of the state constitution; after which, under the provisions of that constitution, he was elected a member of congress. He was not long permitted to devote himself to the service of his country, for he d. June 12, 1778.—WILLIAM, governor of New Jersey, a descendant of the family, which emigrated from Scotland, was b. about the year 1741. He was a lawyer, and early embraced the cause of civil and religious liberty. When Great Britain advanced her arbitrary claims, he employed his pen in opposing them, and in vindicating the rights of his countrymen. After sustaining some important offices in New York, he removed to New Jersey, and, as a representative of this state, was one of the principal members of the first congress in 1774. After the inhabitants of New Jersey had sent their governor, William Franklin, under a strong guard to Connecticut, and had formed a new constitution in July, 1776, Mr. Livingston was elected the first chief magistrate; and such was his integrity, and republican virtue, that he was annually re-elected till his death. During the war he bent his exertions to support the independence of his country. By the keenness and severity of his political writings, he exasperated the British, who distinguished him as an object of their peculiar hatred. His pen had no inconsiderable influence in exciting that indignation and zeal, which rendered the militia of New Jersey so remarkable for the alacrity with which, on any alarm, they arrayed themselves against the common enemy. He was in 1787 a delegate to the grand convention which formed the constitution of the United States. After having sustained the office of governor for fourteen years, with great honor to himself and usefulness to the state, he d. July 25, 1790, aged 67.—ROBERT R., chancellor of the state of New York, graduated at King's college, New York, 1765. Having studied law with William Smith, he was appointed by Governor Tryon recorder of the city; an office which he resigned at the beginning of the revolution. In April, 1775, he was elected from Dutchess county to the assembly. In 1776 he was a member of congress, and was placed on the committee with Jefferson, Adams, Franklin, and Sherman, for drawing up the declaration of independence, and on other important committees. In August, 1781, he was appointed secretary of state. On his resignation, in 1783, he received the thanks of congress. Under the new constitution of New York, which he assisted in forming, as chairman of the committee, he was appointed chancellor, and continued in that place till 1801. In 1788 he was chairman of the state convention, which adopted the federal constitution, uniting his efforts, at that time, with those of Jay and Hamilton. In 1801 he accepted the office of minister plenipotentiary to France, and proceeded to Paris. By the first consul he was received with respect, and after his mission had closed, Napoleon presented him a splendid snuff-box, with a miniature of himself by Isabey. Assisted by Mr. Munroe he made the very important purchase of Louisiana for 15 millions of dollars. In Paris he formed an intimacy with Robert Fulton, whom he assisted by his counsels and money. After his resignation and the arrival of General Armstrong, his successor, he travelled in Italy, Switzerland, and Germany, and returned to America in June, 1805. D. 1813. He caused the introduction of steam-navigation into the United States. He introduced the merino sheep, and the use of gypsum in New York. He was president of an agricultural society, and of the academy of the fine arts. He published an oration before the Cincinnati, 1787; an address to the society for promoting the arts, 1808; essays on agriculture; a work on the merino sheep.—BROCKHOLST, son of the preceding, was b. at New York, in 1757; entered the army in 1776; and being afterwards attached to the suite of General Arnold, with the rank of major, he shared in the honor of the conquest of Burgoyne. In 1779 he accompanied Mr. Jay to the court of Spain as his private secretary; studied the law on his return; and ultimately became judge of the supreme court of the state of New York, in 1802. He enjoyed the reputation of being an upright judge, an able pleader, and an accomplished scholar. D. 1823.—EDWARD, was b. at Claremont, Columbia county, N. Y., in 1764, educated at Princeton college, and admitted to the bar in New York city. In 1794 he was chosen to congress, and afterwards mayor of New York. Shortly after the purchase of Louisiana he removed to that state, where he was intrusted by the legislature with the preparation of a code of judicial procedure, to revise the system of municipal law, and to reform the penal statutes; in short, to digest and rearrange the whole legal system of the state. This he did with consummate ability; and his "Reports" to the legislature on the several subjects are brilliant, learned, and judicious essays. In 1823 he was again sent to congress; in 1831 General Jackson made him secretary of state; and in 1833 he was appointed minister to France. D. 1836.

LIVIVS, or LIVY, TRRUS, a celebrated Roman historian, was b. in the territory of Patavium, now Padua. In the reign of Augustus he went to Rome, and was held in great esteem by the emperor and many other distinguished characters. His reputation is principally built upon his "History of Rome," from the foundation of the city to the death of Drusus, in 142 books, of which only 35 have been preserved. This history is highly praised by Seneca, Pliny the Elder, Quintilian, &c., and may be regarded as one of the most valuable literary relics of antiquity.

LLORENTE, Don JUAN ANTONIO, a modern Spanish historian and ecclesiastic, b. in 1756. He was secretary-general to the Inquisition, of which court he published a "Complete History." He was also the author of "Memoirs relative to the History of the Spanish Revolution," "Political Portraits of the Popes," and other works. Having accepted a situation under Joseph Bonaparte, and written in his favor, he was compelled to quit Spain on the return of Ferdinand. D. 1823.

LLOYD, DAVID, a biographical writer of the 17th century, was b. in Merionethshire, in 1625. His principal works are, "Memoirs of the Statesmen and Favorites of England," "Memoirs of Persons who suffered for their Loyalty," a "Life of General Monk," and a "History of Plots and Conspiracies." D. 1691.—HUMPHRY, an eminent military officer and writer on tactics, was b. in Wales, in 1729. He served with great reputation in the Austrian, Prussian, and Russian armies, and rose to the rank of general. On his return to England he surveyed the coast, wrote a memoir on the "Invasion and Defence of Great Britain," "The History of the Seven Years' War," and other military treatises. D. 1783.—ROBERT, an English poet, was b. in 1733, and was the son of the Rev. Dr. Lloyd, second master of Westminster school. His first production,

"The Actor," gave rise, it is said, to the famous Rosciad of his friend Churchill. His other poems possess much merit; but his genius could not shield him from the assaults of poverty, and he d. a prisoner in the Fleet, in 1764.

LOBÄU, Count, an eminent soldier, whose name was MOXTON, was, at the breaking out of the revolution, employed as a journeyman baker in his native town, Phalsburg, in the Meurthe. But on entering the army he speedily signalized himself by acts of bravery, which were rewarded by various steps of promotion, until, in 1804, at the camp of Boulogne, Napoleon, amid the applause of the whole army, made him his aide-de-camp, and gave him the command of the third regiment of the line. In the campaign of 1805 his efficient gallantry obtained him the rank of general of brigade, and in 1807 that of general of division. In the campaign of 1809

he defended the little island of Lobau (from which he took his subsequent title) against the Austrians, completely beat them off, and took his troops, comparatively unhurt, across the Danube. In 1812 he was made aid-major of the imperial guard; in 1813, commander of the first corps of the grand army; and, in 1814, a chevalier of St. Louis. During the memorable "hundred days" he gave his support to Napoleon, and was made commandant of the first military division, and a member of the chamber of peers. In the brief but easy campaign of 1815, he commanded the sixth corps of the army of the north. He gave the Prussians a severe defeat on the 8th of June in that year, but was wounded and sent prisoner to England from that burial-place of his aspiring master's hopes—Waterloo. From that time until 1818 he remained in England; he was then permitted to return home, and in 1828 was sent as a deputy for the Meurthe, and took his seat on the opposition benches. In the revolution of 1830 he took an active part; and when Lafayette resigned the command of the national guard, Count Lobau was appointed his successor. Shortly afterwards he received his marshal's baton from Louis Philippe. B. 1770; d. 1839.

LOBEIRA, VASCO, author of the celebrated romance of "Amadis de Gaul," was a native of Porta, in Portugal, in the 14th century. In 1386 he was knighted by Joam I. on the field of battle at Aljubarotta; and he d. at Elvas, in 1403. Dr. Southey has translated Lobeira's work, and has satisfactorily proved it to be an original, and not a translation from the French, as many had before imagined.

LOBO, JEROME, a Portuguese Jesuit, was b. at Lisbon, in 1593. He went as a missionary to Abyssinia, and, on his return to Europe, became rector of the college of Coimbra, where he d. in 1678. He wrote "An Account of Abyssinia," of which Dr. Johnson published an abridged translation.

LOCK, MATTHEW, an eminent English musician, was b. at Exeter, where he became a chorister, in the cathedral. He published some musical pieces in 1657, and, after the restoration, he was employed as a composer of operas. He was also appointed composer to the chapel royal, and has acquired considerable reputation by the beautiful music to Shakspeare's Macbeth.

LOCKE, JOHN, one of the most eminent philosophers and writers of modern times, was b. at Wrington, in Somersetshire, in 1632. He was educated at Westminster school, and Christ-church college, Oxford, where he distinguished himself much by his general proficiency; and finally applied to the study of physic. In the year 1666 he was introduced to Lord Ashley, afterwards the celebrated earl of Shaftesbury, to whom he became essentially serviceable in his medical capacity, and who formed a high opinion of his general powers, and introduced him to the duke of Buckingham, the earl of Halifax, and other distinguished characters. He also confided to him the superintendance of his son's education; and when, in 1672, Lord Shaftesbury was appointed chancellor, he made Mr. Locke secretary of presentations, and, at a later period, secretary to the board of trade. On his patron retiring to Holland, to avoid a state prosecution, Locke accompanied him, and remained there several years. So obnoxious was he to James's government, that the English envoy demanded Mr. Locke of the States, on suspicion of his being concerned in Monmouth's rebellion, which occasioned him to keep private, and employ himself in finishing his "Essay on the Human Understanding." At the close of the revolution he returned to England, and was made a commissioner of appeals, and in 1695 a commissioner of trade and plantations. He d. at Oates, in Essex, in 1704. His principal works are, an "Essay on Human Understanding," "Letters on Toleration," "A Treatise on Civil Government," and "Thoughts concerning Education."

LOFFT, CAPEL, a barrister, and the author of several works in polite literature, was b. in London, 1751. He was educated at Eton and Cambridge, and was called to the bar in 1775. On succeeding to the Capel estates, in 1781, he removed to Troston, in Suffolk, and became an active magistrate of the county till 1800; when, for having too zealously exerted himself as under-sheriff to delay the execution of a young woman who had received sentence of death, he was removed from the commission. Mr. Lofft was a very considerable contributor to most of the magazines of the day; and it was to his active patronage of Robert Bloomfield that the public was indebted for the "Farmer's Boy," and other poems by that author. D. 1824.

LOFTUS, DUDLEY, an oriental scholar, was b. in 1618, at Rathfarnham, near Dublin; studied at Trinity college and at Oxford; became vicar-general and judge of the prerogative court in Ireland; and d. in 1695. Among his writings are, "A History of the Eastern and Western Churches," "The History of Our Saviour, taken from the Greek, Syriac, and other Oriental Authors," "A Translation of the Ethiopic New Testament into Latin," &c.

LOGAN, JOHN, a Scottish poet and prose writer of some eminence, was b. in 1748. Having studied for the church, his eloquence and ability procured for him the living of South Leith, in 1773. But his conduct having rendered him unpopular with his parishioners, he was induced to resign his charge; and he then proceeded to London, where he became connected with the press; and, among other productions, wrote a pamphlet, entitled "A Review of the principal Charges against Mr. Warren Hastings," which led to the prosecution of the publisher, Mr. Stockdale, who, however, was acquitted. His poems, usually printed with those of Michael Bruce, whose merits he was the first to make known, are chiefly lyrical; but he also wrote "Runnymede," a tragedy; and published the "Elements of the Philosophy of History;" besides being the author of a volume of sermons, published posthumously, which have enjoyed great popularity. D. 1788.

LOLLARD, WALTER, the founder of a religious sect in Germany, about 1315. He was burnt, at Cologne, in 1322.

LOLLI, or LOLLY, ANTONIO, a celebrated performer on the violin, was a native of Bergamo, in Italy, and b. in 1728. In Germany, Russia, England, Spain, France, and Naples he excited the admiration of the musical world; but though for many years he possessed a wonderful command over the instrument, yet during the latter part of his life not a trace was left of that extraordinary skill which had established his fame. D. 1802.

LOMONOZOF, MICHAEL WASILOWITZ, a Russian poet and historian of the last century, was b. 1711. He was the son of a fishmonger, and having fled from his father, he took refuge in a monastery, where he received his education, which he afterwards improved at a German university. In 1741 he returned to his native country, and became a member of the academy of Petersburg, and professor of chemistry. In 1764 he was made a counsellor of state, and d. in the course of the same year. His odes partake much of the fire of Pindar, and he has been justly called the father of Russian poetry. He also wrote several works in prose, particularly a "History of the Empire of Russia."

LONDONDERRY, ROBERT STEWART, marquis of, who for many years was known as Lord Castlereagh, was a native of Ireland, and b. in 1769. He was educated at Arinagh and St. John's college, Cambridge, and having made the tour of Europe, was on his return chosen a member of the Irish parliament. He joined the opposition in the first place, and declared himself an advocate for parliamentary reform; but on obtaining a seat in the British parliament, he took his station on the ministerial benches. In 1797, having then become Lord Castlereagh, he was made keeper of the privy seal for Ireland, and soon after appointed one of the lords of the treasury. The next year he was nominated secretary to the lord-lieutenant, and by his strenuous exertions and abilities, in the art of removing opposition, the union with Ireland was greatly facilitated. In 1805 he was appointed secretary of war and the colonies; but on the death of Mr. Pitt, he retired until the dissolution of the brief administration of 1806 restored him to the same situation in 1807, and he held his office until the ill-fated expedition to Walcheren, and his duel with his colleague, Mr. Canning, produced his resignation. In 1812 he succeeded the Marquis Wellesley as foreign secretary, and the following year proceeded to the Continent, to assist the coalesced powers in negotiating a general peace. In 1814 he was plenipotentiary extraordinary to the allied powers, and towards the close of the same year, to the congress of Vienna. For these services he received the thanks of parliament, and was honored with the order of the garter. On the death of his father, in 1821, he succeeded to the title of marquis of Londonderry; but he did not long enjoy it, for in a fit of insanity, brought on by excessive mental and bodily exertion in attending to his public duties, he put an end to his existence by severing the carotid artery with a penknife. This event took place on the 12th of August, 1822.

LONG, EDWARD, was b. in 1724, at St. Blaize, Cornwall. He was brought up to the law, and became judge of the vice-admiralty court in Jamaica, where his father possessed estates, and of which island his brother-in-law, Sir Henry Moore, was lieutenant-governor. Being obliged to return to England for the restoration of his health in 1769, he devoted his time to literary pursuits, and wrote an admirable "History of Jamaica," a collection of essays, entitled "The Prater," "The Antigallean," a novel; "Letters on the Colonies," &c. D. 1818.—ROGER, an English divine, eminent as an astronomer and a mathematician, was b. in 1679, in Norfolk; was educated at Pembroke hall, Cambridge, of which college he became master in 1733; was chosen Lowdnes' professor of astronomy, held livings in Huntingdonshire and Essex, was the author of a valuable "Treatise on Astronomy," and constructed at Pembroke hall, a hollow sphere, 18 feet in diameter, on the interior surface of which were represented the stars, constellations, &c., the whole being moved by means of machinery. D. 1770.—THOMAS, an English nonjuring divine, was b. at Exeter, in 1621, was educated at Exeter college, Oxford, and after the restoration, was made prebendary of Exeter, but lost that preferment at the revolution for refusing the oaths. His principal works are, "Calvinus Redivivus," "History of the Donatists," "Vindication of the Primitive Christians in point of Obedience," "History of Popish and Fanatical Plots," and "A Vindication of King Charles's Claim to the Eikon Basilike." D. 1700.

LONGEPIERRE, HILARY BERNARD DE, a French critic, b. at Dijon, in 1659; author of several tragedies in imitation of the Greek poets; but only two of them, the "Medea" and "Electra," were ever performed. D. 1721.

LONGINUS, DIONYSIUS, a celebrated Greek critic and philosopher of the third century; but whether born at Athens, or in Syria, is uncertain. In his youth he travelled for improvement to Rome, Athens, and Alexandria, and attended to all the eminent masters in eloquence and philosophy. At length he settled at Athens, where he taught philosophy, and where he also published his inimitable "Treatise on the Sublime." His knowledge was so extensive, that he was called "the living library;" and his fame having reached the ears of the celebrated Zenobia, queen of Palmyra, she invited him to the court, intrusted to him the education of her two sons, and took his advice on political affairs. But this distinction proved fatal to him, for after the surrender of Palmyra, Aurelian basely put him to death, for having advised Zenobia to resist the Romans, and for being the real author of the spirited letter which the queen addressed to the Roman monarch. His death took place in 273. He met his fate with calmness and fortitude, exclaiming with his expiring breath, "The world is but a prison; happy therefore is he who gets soonest out of it, and gains his liberty."

LONGLAND, or LANGELENDE, ROBERT, an old English poet, was b. in Shropshire. He was fellow of Oriel college, Oxford, and a secular priest, but espoused the doctrines of Wickliff. He is believed to have been the author of the "Vision of Pierce Plowman" and "Pierce Plowman's Crede," two curious poems, containing severe reflections on the Catholic clergy, and exhibiting a curious picture of the times.

LONGMAN, THOMAS NORTON, known for nearly half a century as the head of the eminent and long-established publishing firm of Messrs. Longman and Co., of Paternoster-row, was b. 1770; d. 1842.

LONGOMONTANUS, CHRISTIAN, a celebrated astronomer, was b. in 1562, at Langsberg, in Jutland, and was obliged to earn his bread by hard labor, having been left an orphan in his eighth year; notwithstanding which he studied hard, and with the assistance of the minister of the parish, acquired a good knowledge of the mathematics. At last he became a servitor in the college of Wibourg; the professors of which university recommended him to Tycho Brahe, whom he assisted in his astronomical researches, and with whom he lived 11 years. In 1605 he was made professor of mathematics at Copenhagen, where he d. in 1647. He was the author of several works, of which the principal is his "Astronomia Danica."

LONGUS, a Greek pastoral writer, whose work, entitled "Poiménia," or "The Loves of Daphnis and Chloe," is exceedingly curious, for the picture it affords of rural manners in ancient Greece, but is at the same time tainted with licentiousness. It is supposed to be the earliest specimen there is of a prose romance; but no account has been transmitted either of the age in which Longus lived, or the place of his birth.

LOOSJES, ADRIAN, a Dutch novelist, poet, and librarian, b. at Haerlem, in 1761. Always an ardent friend of liberty, he opposed Napoleon's design of converting Holland into a monarchy, with honest but abortive zeal. He was the author of "Gewarts and Gyzeslar," a drama; "Lucius Junius Brutus," "Marcus Junius Brutus," and several romances; "Life of a Dutch Family in the 17th Century," "Jean de Witt," "Conrad and Jacquelin," &c.

LOPES, FERNAM, a Portuguese historian, whose "Chronicle of Joam," describing the great struggle between Portugal and Castile, towards the close of the 14th century, exhibits, according to the opinion of Dr. Southey, all the manners, painting, and dramatic reality of Froissart. Lopes is the oldest of the Portuguese chroniclers.

LOPEZ DE RUEDA, a Spanish dramatist and actor, who in the 16th century composed humorous pieces, and with his itinerant band of performers exhibited them to his countrymen. D. 1564.

LORENZ, JOHN MICHAEL, was professor of history and rhetoric in the university of Strasburg; where he was b. in 1723, and d. in 1801. Among his writings are, "Elementa Historiæ Universæ," "Elementa Historiæ Germanicæ," and "Summa Historiæ Gallo-Francicæ, civilis et sacræ."

LORENZINI, FRANCESCO MARIA, was a native of Rome, and patronized by Cardinal Borghese, who gave him apartments in his palace and a pension. He was the author of a number of sacred dramas, written in Latin; and at the time of his death filled the situation of president of the academy of the Arcadi. B. 1680; d. 1743.—LORENZO, an ingenious mathematician, who for some offence, while in the service of Ferdinand, son of Cosmo III., was confined in the tower of Volterra, where he solaced the hours of a wearisome imprisonment, which lasted nearly twenty years, by writing a work on conic sections. D. 1721.

LORIOT, ANTHONY JOSEPH, an excellent French mechanic, who, in 1753, presented to the Academy of Sciences a machine, by means of which a child might raise a weight of several thousand pounds. He afterwards constructed machines for the naval service, and for working the mines of Pompeau; claimed the merit of inventing a kind of cement used in building, called "mortier Loriot," and an hydraulic machine for raising water. B. 1716; d. 1782.

LORRAINE, ROBERT LE, an eminent French sculptor, was b. at Paris, in 1665; studied under Girardon, and afterwards in Italy; and on his return, in 1701, produced the most beautiful of his works, the "Galatea," which at once procured his admission into the society, of which he eventually became the president. D. 1748.

LOUDON, JOHN CLAUDIUS, known as a distinguished writer on horticultural subjects, was b. at Cambuslang, in Lanarkshire, in 1783, and brought up as a landscape gardener. His works were both important and numerous; among the principal were the "Arboretum Britannicum," the "Encyclopædia of Agriculture," the "Encyclopædia of Gardening," "Hints on the Formation of Gardens," the "Encyclopædia of Cottage, Farm, and Villa Architecture," the "Suburban Horticulturist," and the "Encyclopædia of Trees and Shrubs," besides which he latterly edited the "Gardener's and Agricultural Magazines," and contributed to other publications. D. 1843.

LOUIS IX., king of France, canonized in the Roman calendar as St. Louis, was b. 1214, and succeeded his father, Louis VIII., in 1226.—XI., king of France, was the son of Charles VII., and b. at Bourges, in 1423. Active, bold, and cunning, he was the reverse of his well-disposed but imbecile father, of whose minister and mistress, Agnes Sorel, he soon showed himself a decided enemy. In 1440 he left the court, and put himself at the head of an insurrection. Charles defeated the rebels, and executed some, but pardoned his son, whom he even trusted with a command against the English and Swiss. Louis conducted himself with valor and prudence, and his father became entirely reconciled to him; but having soon entered into new conspiracies, he was obliged to take refuge in Burgundy, and lived there five years in a dependent condition. On the death of his father, in 1461, he dismissed the former ministers, and filled their places with men taken from the lower orders, without character or talents to recommend them. Insurrections broke out in various parts of his dominions; but they were soon quelled, and followed by many executions. In every thing he did, his crooked policy and sinister views were evident. D. 1483.—XII., king of France, was the son of Charles, duke of Orleans, and b. in 1462. His reign was a continued scene of warfare.—XIII., king of France, was the son of Henry IV., and b. in 1601. Being only nine years old at the death of his father, the care of him and of the kingdom was intrusted to his mother, Mary de Medicis. D. 1642.—XIV., son of the preceding, was only five years old on the death of his father, the regency being in the hands of the queen-mother, Anne of Austria, under whom Mazarin acted as prime minister. In 1651 the king assumed the government. D. 1715.—XV., king of France, great-grandson and successor of the preceding, was b. in 1710; and Louis XIV. dying when he was only five years of age, the kingdom was placed under the regency of Philip, duke of Orleans. He was crowned in 1722, and declared of age the following year. D. 1774.—XVI., the son of Louis the dauphin, and of Maria Josephine, daughter of Frederic Augustus, king of Poland, was b. in 1754, and immediately created duke of Berry. On the death of his father, in 1765, he became the heir to the throne; and in 1770 he married Maria Antoinette, an Austrian princess, of great beauty and accomplishments. In 1774 he succeeded to the crown; and was executed for his tyranny and weakness in 1793.—XVII., STANISLAUS XAVIER, surnamed "le Désiré," second son of the dauphin, (the son of Louis XV.,) was b. in 1755, and was originally known as the count of Provence. At the accession of his brother, Louis XVI., in 1774, he received the title of Monsieur; and after the death of his nephew, in 1795, from which time he reckoned his reign, he took the name and title of Louis XVIII., king of France and Navarre. D. 1824.

LOUIS PHILIPPE, ex-king of the French, the eldest son of the duke of Orleans, better known in the revolutionary times as Philippe Egalité, and of Marie, only daughter of the duke of Penthièvre, was b. in Paris, October 6, 1773. At the age of 17 his father introduced him to the Jacobin Club; in 1791, having received the command of a regiment of dragoons, he set out to join it at Valenciennes; and war being declared against Austria, he made his first campaign in 1792, fighting at Valmy at the head of the troops confided to him by Kellermann, and afterwards gaining great distinction at Jemappes, under Dumourier. Meanwhile the revolution was hastening to its crisis. In 1793 Louis XVI. was carried to the scaffold; and a few months afterwards, when the duke of Orleans, notwithstanding his connection with the revolutionary cause, shared the same fate, Louis Philippe fled to the French frontier, escaped into the Austrian territories, and refusing an invitation to enter into that service, travelled in Switzerland, Hungary, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, and America. The abdication of Napoleon, in 1814, introduced a new change in his fortunes, and he returned to Paris after an absence of 21 years. The return of Napoleon from Elba scattered the Bourbons once more, and Louis Philippe returned to England, till the expiry of the hundred days, when he repaired to France, and entered into all the honors due to his rank. A coldness which arose between him and the administration, led to his temporary retirement to England; but in 1817 he took up his permanent abode in France, and, while abstaining from politics, devoted himself to the education of his family and the patronage of literature and the arts, until the revolution of 1830 placed him on the throne, from which he was driven in 1848. Hastily quitting Paris with the queen, who had shared with him so many dangers, he made his way to the sea-shore, whence he escaped, in disguise, for England, and landed at Newhaven, in Sussex. D. 1850.

LOUISA, AUGUSTA WILHELMINA AMELIA, queen of Prussia, daughter of Charles, duke of Mecklenburg Strelitz, was b. at Hanover, in 1776, and was married to the crown-prince of Prussia, afterwards king, Dec. 24, 1793. In 1797 the king of Prussia ascended the throne, and his consort became the model of a wife, a mother, and a queen, alleviating misery wherever she could, and rewarding merit. D. 1810.

LOUTHERBOURG, PHILIP JAMES, an eminent landscape painter, was b. at Strasburg, 1740; studied under Tischbein and Casanova; and displayed great talents in his delineation of battles, hunting pieces, &c. He came to London in 1771, and while there contrived an exhibition, called the Eidophusikon, somewhat on the plan of the Diorama. He was a member of the academy of painting at Paris, and a royal academician of England. D. 1812.

LOUVEL, PETER LOUIS, the assassin of the due de Berri, was b. at Versailles, in 1783. He was by trade a saddler, and worked in the stables of the Emperor Napoleon and the French king. His disposition was gloomy, and his mind seemed devoid of interest, except on political subjects. He appeared to dwell intently on what he had heard respecting the causes of the French revolution, until he felt a rooted hatred towards the Bourbons. During six years he ruminated in silence on their destruction, and began with the youngest, as he afterwards acknowledged, from a wish to exterminate their race; having resolved to omit no opportunity of killing the others. Louvel perpetrated the fatal deed on the 13th of February, 1820. He conducted himself with firmness during his long examination, and appeared calm throughout, even in his last moments, positively declaring that he had no accomplice.

LOVE, CHRISTOPHER, an eminent Presbyterian divine, was b. at Cardiff, in 1618. He studied at Oxford, and entered into orders; but refusing to subscribe to the canons enjoined by Archbishop Laud, he was expelled the congregation of masters, and repaired to London. He was one of the commissioners for the parliament at the treaty of Uxbridge; he was also one of the assembly of divines, and chosen minister of St. Lawrence, Jewry; yet he signed the declaration against the murder of the king. After this he was concerned in a plot against Cromwell and the Independents, for which he was tried and beheaded, Aug. 22, 1651. Ashe, Calamy, and Manton, three eminent nonconformist divines, accompanied him to the scaffold, and he was deemed a martyr by the whole of the Presbyterian party.—JAMES, a dramatic writer and performer, whose real name was Danec, was, for a time, a partisan to Sir Robert Walpole, and an expectant of political preferment; but being disappointed in his hopes, and involved in difficulties, he went on the stage, and excelled in the part of Falstaff. "Pamela," a comedy; "The Village Wedding," a pastoral entertainment; and "The Lady's Frolic," a comic opera, were the productions of his pen. D. 1774.

LOVELACE, RICHARD, an English poet of the 17th century, was a son of Sir Richard Lovelace, of Woolwich, and b. in 1618. He was educated at the Charter house, and at Gloucester hall, Oxford; became a colonel in the army of Charles I., and spent the whole of his fortune in support of the royal cause; was imprisoned by the parliament, and d. in indigence in 1658. His poems, published under the title of "Lucasta," are light and elegant. He also wrote two plays, "The Scholar," a comedy, and "The Soldier," a tragedy. For spirit and gallantry, Colonel Lovelace has sometimes been compared to Sir Philip Sidney.

LOWE, Sir HUDSON, entered the army at a very early age, and served with much credit in various parts of the world; but he will be principally remembered in history as having been governor of St. Helena, while that island was the place of detention of the Emperor Napoleon. D. 1844.

LOWELL, JOHN, first judge of Massachusetts, a gentleman distinguished for his generosity and public spirit, who was among the projectors of the Massachusetts hospital, the Boston Athenæum, savings' bank, &c., &c. B. 1779; d. 1840.

LOWNDES, WILLIAM, was b. at Charleston about 1781, was educated at the college there, studied law, was chosen a member of the legislature, and was a distinguished member of congress for a period of ten years, from about 1810 to 1822, when from ill health he resigned. In 1818 he was the chairman of the committee of ways and means. He was tall, slender, emaciated, of a rueful countenance; a man of wealth and probity, modest, retiring, and unambitious; with a mind of the first order, vigorous, comprehensive, and logical, and a memory of uncommon power, and standing in the first ranks of American statesmen. There must have been some most extraordinary excellences in his character, for he was respected and beloved even by his political adversaries. Few men have appeared at Washington who gave more promise of future eminence, but he d. at sea, on his way to Europe, 1822, too early alike for the wishes of his friends and the hope of the nation.

LOWRY, WILSON, an eminent English engraver, was b. in 1762, at Whitehaven, where his father, Mr. Strickland Lowry, was a portrait painter. He was the inventor of a ruling-machine, possessing the property of ruling successive lines, either equidistant or in just gradations, from the greatest required width to the nearest possible approximation; also of one capable of drawing lines to a point, and of forming concentric circles: he likewise introduced the use of diamond points for etching, and many other useful improvements in the art, and was the first who succeeded in what is technically termed "biting in" well upon steel. For thirty years before his death he was engaged by eminent publishers on their most extensively illustrated works; and having attained to the highest rank in his peculiar branch of the art, his services were thoroughly appreciated. D. 1820.

LOWTH, WILLIAM, an eminent divine, was b. in London, in 1661, and was educated at Oxford. Being recommended by his worth and learning, he became chaplain to Dr. Mew, bishop of Winchester, and was provided with a prebendal stall in his cathedral and the living of Buriton. He was an excellent classical scholar and critic, and the author of several theological works of merit.—ROBERT, son of the preceding, and a distinguished English prelate, was b. at Buriton, in 1710, received his education at Winchester, and at New college, Oxford, in which university he was elected professor of poetry in 1741. He accompanied Mr. Legge on an embassy to Berlin, and was subsequently travelling tutor to the sons of the duke of Devonshire. In 1753 he published his "De Sacra Poesi Hebræorum Prælectiones Academicæ;" in 1758, the "Life of William of Wykeham;" in 1762, a "Short Introduction to English Grammar;" and, in 1765, he replied, in a masterly and unanswerable style to some acrimonious remarks of Warburton, who thought Dr. Lowth had aimed at his Divine Legation of Moses in the "Prælectiones." After having enjoyed some valuable preferences, he was raised to the see of St. David's in 1766, was translated to Oxford in the same year, and, in 1777, succeeded to the diocese of London. In 1778 he published his "Translation of Isaiah." The archbishopric of Canterbury was offered him, on the death of Dr. Cornwallis, but he declined the primacy. D. 1787.

LOYOLA, IGNATIUS, founder of the society of Jesuits, was b. in 1491, of a noble family, in the Spanish province of Guipuscoa. He was at first in the army, and served with distinguished bravery, but having been severely wounded at the siege of Pampeluna, he beguiled his time with books, and on reading the "Lives of the Saints," his imagination became highly excited, and he determined to devote himself from that time to works of piety. He began by making a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, not from a mere wish to see those places, which had been hallowed by the presence of our Lord, but in the hope of converting some of the infidels, who were masters of the Holy Land, or of gaining the palm of martyrdom in the attempt. Having accomplished this painful and perilous journey, he returned to Spain, more unprovided even than he had left it. In 1526 he went to the university of Alcalá, where he found some adherents; but the Inquisition imprisoned him for his conduct, which appeared strange, and rendered him suspected of witchcraft. He was not delivered from the prison of the holy office until 1528, when he went to Paris to continue his studies, the subjects of which, indeed, were only works of an ascetic character. Here he became acquainted with several Spaniards and Frenchmen, who were afterwards noted as his followers. They conceived the plan of an order for the conversion of heathens and sinners, and, on Ascension day, in 1534, they united for this great work in the subterranean chapel of the abbey of Montmartre. They then met again in 1536, at Venice, whence they proceeded to Rome, and received the confirmation of their fraternity from Pope Paul III., as "The Society of Jesus." In 1541, Ignatius was chosen general of the society, continued his abstinence and penances during life, and d. in 1566. Loyola was in person of a middle stature, of an olive complexion, with a bald head, eyes full of fire, and an aquiline nose. His fanaticism and enthusiasm were certainly dignified by sincerity, and he doubtless believed as he taught, that the Society of Jesus was the result of an immediate inspiration from heaven. He was canonized in 1622, by Gregory XV.

LUBIN, AUGUSTIN, an Augustin friar, was b. at Paris, in 1624. He became provincial-general of his order in France, and afterwards assistant-general of the French monks at Rome, but he returned to Paris, and d. there in 1695. He was made geographer royal, and wrote "The Geographical Mercury," "Notes on the Roman Martyrology," "History of the French Abbays," and the "Geography of the Bible," &c.

LUCAN, MARCUS ANNÆUS, a celebrated Roman poet, was b. at Corduba, in Spain, A. D. 37. He was a nephew of Seneca, and being taken early to Rome, he studied there under the best masters. Before he was of the legal age he was made a quæstor, and he was also admitted into the college of augurs. He excited the anger of Nero for having had the effrontery to recite one of his compositions, in a public assembly, in competition with the emperor, and was ordered never more to recite in public. This induced Lucan to join Piso and others in a conspiracy against the tyrant, for which he suffered death, 65. His "Pharsalia" contains passages of great beauty.

LUCIAN, a celebrated Greek author, distinguished for his ingenuity and wit, was b. at Samosata, the capital of Comagene, during the reign of Trajan. He was of humble origin, and was placed, while young, with an uncle, to study statuary, but being unsuccessful in his first attempts, he went to Antioch, and devoted himself to literature and forensic rhetoric. In the reign of Marcus Aurelius, he was made procurator of the province of Egypt, and d. when 80 or 90 years old. The works of Lucian, of which many have come down to us, are mostly in the form of dialogues, but none are so popular as those in which he ridicules the pagan mythology and philosophical sects. Many of them, however, though written in an elegant style, and abounding with witticisms, are tainted with profanity and indecency.

LUCILIUS, CAIUS, a Roman satirist, who served under Scipio in his expedition against the Numantians. Only a few of his verses remain, which are in the "Corpus Poetarum" of Maittaire. D. at Naples, 108 B. C.

LUCRETIA, a Roman matron, was the wife of Collatinus, and the cause of the revolution of Rome from a monarchy to a republic. Sextus Tarquinius, who contrived to become a guest in the absence of her husband, whose kinsman he was, found means to reach her chamber in the middle of the night, and finding himself repulsed, he threatened to stab her, kill a slave, and place him by her side, and then swear he had slain them both in the act of adultery. The dread of infamy succeeded, and he triumphed over her fears; but she acquainted her husband, father, and kindred of the transaction, and, in spite of their soothing remonstrances, drew a dagger, and stabbed herself to the heart. The bloody poniard, with her dead body exposed to the senate, was the signal of Roman liberty. The expulsion of the Tarquins, and the abolition of the regal dignity, was instantly resolved on, and carried into execution.

LUCRETIUS, TITUS CARUS, an ancient Roman philosopher and poet, much esteemed for his learning and eloquence. His celebrated work, "De Rebus Natura," has been translated into English by Mr. Creech. B. 98 B. C.; d. 55 B. C.

LUCULLUS, LUCIUS LICINIUS, a Roman consul and commander, celebrated for his military talents and magnificence, was b. 115 B. C. He first distinguished himself in the social war, and afterwards defeated Hamilcar in two naval battles. He also conquered various cities of Pontus, and, although overcome by Mithridates in a battle, soon acquired such advantages that he finally broke up the hostile army, and Mithridates himself sought protection in Armenia, where Tigranes refusing to surrender him to the Romans, Lucullus attacked that monarch, and completely subdued him. By a mutiny of his soldiers, who accused him of avarice and covetousness, he was deprived of the chief command, and recalled. From this time, Lucullus remained a private individual, spending in luxurious ease the immense riches which he had brought with him from Asia, without however, abandoning the more noble and serious occupations of a cultivated mind. D. 49 B. C.

LUDLOW, EDMUND, an eminent republican leader, was b. at Maiden Bradley, Wilts, in 1620, studied at Trinity college, Oxford, and at the Temple, was an officer in the parliamentary army, and fought at Edgell, Newbury, and other places, but when the "self-denying ordinance" took place, he remained out of any ostensible situation, until chosen member for Wiltshire in the place of his father. At this time the machinations of Cromwell becoming visible, he was opposed by Ludlow with firmness and openness. To establish a republic, he joined the army against the parliament, and sat also as one of Charles's judges. Nominated general of horse in Ireland, he joined the army under Ireton, and acted with great vigor and ability. When Cromwell was declared protector, Ludlow used all his influence with the army against him, on which account he was recalled, and put under arrest; but he avowed his republican principles, and, refusing all security or engagement for submission, retired into Essex, where he remained until the death of the protector. When Richard Cromwell succeeded, he joined the army party at Wallingford House, and was instrumental in the restoration of the long parliament, in which he took his seat. The restoration was now rapidly approaching, and finding the republicans unable to resist it, he quitted the country, and proceeded to Geneva, whence he afterwards, with many more fugitives of the party, took refuge at Lausanne. After the revolution he ventured to appear in London, which gave such offence, that an address was presented to King William, by the house of commons, praying his majesty to issue a proclamation for apprehending him.

On this, Ludlow went back to Vevay, in Switzerland, where he d. in 1693. He was one of the purest and most honorable characters on the republican side, free from fanaticism or hypocrisy. His "Memoirs" are interesting, and written in a manly and unaffected style.

LULLY, RAYMOND, a distinguished philosopher and scholar of the 13th century, b. at Palma, in Majorca. In his youth he had been a soldier, but he became a religious ascetic, and travelled into Africa and the East, for the purpose of converting the Mahometans to Christianity. He suffered tortures and imprisonment at Tunis, but was released by some Genoese merchants, and d. on his voyage home, in 1315. He wrote on divinity, medicine, chemistry, metaphysics, &c.; was styled "Doctor Illuminatus," and his method, which prevailed in Europe during the 14th, 15th, and 16th centuries, was dignified by the title of "Ars Lulliana."

LUSSAN, MARGARET DE, a French authoress of considerable talents, b. in 1682, was the daughter of one of Cardinal Fleury's coachmen. Among her most esteemed productions are, "La Comtesse de Gondez," "Anecdotes de Philippe Auguste," "Anecdotes of Francis I.," "La Vie de M. Crillon," and "Histoire de Charles VI."

LUTHER, MARTIN, the great reformer of the church, was b. in 1483, at Eisleben, in Lower Saxony. At the age of 14 he was sent to the school of Magdeburg, from which he removed to Eisenach, and thence to the university of Erfurt, where, in 1503, he received a master's degree, and delivered lectures on the physics and ethics of Aristotle. He was destined by his father for the legal profession, but the impression produced on him by the fate of his friend Alexis, who was struck dead by lightning while walking by his side on their road from Mansfield to Erfurt, uniting with the effect of his early religious education, induced him to devote himself to the monastic life, and he entered the monastery of Augustins, in 1505, submitting patiently to all the penances and humiliations which the superior of the order imposes upon novices. In 1507 he was constituted a priest, and in 1508 he was made professor of philosophy in the new university of Wittenberg. In this sphere of action his powerful mind soon showed itself; he threw off the fetters of the scholastic philosophy, asserted the rights of reason, and soon collected a large number of disciples. In 1510 he visited the court of Pope Leo X., at Rome, a journey which revealed to him the irreligion and corruption of the clergy, and destroyed his reverence for the sanctity of the pope. After his return, he became a preacher, and was made doctor of theology. His profound learning, together with the fame of his eloquence, soon made Luther known to the principal scholars, and esteemed as a powerful advocate of the new light which was breaking upon the world. Great, therefore, was the attention excited by his ninety-five propositions, given to the world, Oct. 31, 1517, and intended to put an end to the sale of indulgences by the Dominican Tetzel. They were condemned as heretical, but neither menaces nor persuasions could induce him to recant, and he still maintained the invalidity of indulgences, and of the papal supremacy. In 1520, Luther and his friends were excommunicated, and his writings burnt at Rome, Cologne, and Louvain. Indignant at this open act of hostility, Luther burned the bull of excommunication and the decretals of the papal canon. Being called upon by many of the German nobility to defend the new doctrine, he presented himself at the diet of Worms, April, 1521, before the emperor, and a vast assemblage of the princes and prelates of Germany. He there made an elaborate defence, and concluded it with these words: "Let me then be refuted and convinced by the testimony of the Scriptures, or by the clearest arguments, otherwise I cannot and will not recant; for it is neither safe nor expedient to act against conscience. Here I take my stand; I can do no otherwise, so help me God! Amen." He left Worms, in fact, a conqueror; but it was so manifest that his enemies were determined upon his destruction, that the elector of Saxony conveyed him to the castle of Wartburg, to save his life. In this Patmos, as he called it, Luther remained ten months, and then returned to Wittenberg, where he published a sharp reply to Henry VIII., who had written a book against him, on the seven sacraments. Luther also printed a translation of the New Testament, which greatly alarmed the Catholics, and severe edicts were issued against the reading of it by the princes of that communion. In 1524 he married Catherine de Bora, who had been a nun, by whom he had three sons. In 1529 the emperor assembled another diet at Spiers, to check the progress of the new opinions; and here it was that the name of Protestants first arose, occasioned by the protest made, on the part of the electoral princes, who were for the reformation, against the rigorous impositions brought forward in this assembly. After this, the protesting princes determined to have a common confession of faith drawn up; which was accordingly performed by Melancthon, and being presented at the diet of Augsburg, in 1530, was called "The Confession of Augsburg." In 1534 Luther's translation of the whole Bible was published, and the same year he printed a book against the service of the mass. At length, worn out, more by labor than age, this illustrious man d. at his native place, Feb. 18, 1546, having lived to see that his doctrines had taken such deep root, that no earthly power could eradicate them.

LUTTI, BENEDICT, an eminent Italian painter, on whom the emperor of Germany conferred the honor of knighthood, was b. at Florence, in 1666. He resided at Rome, where he was president of the academy of St. Luke. His paintings are rare and valuable. D. 1724.

LUXEMBOURG, FRANCIS HENRY DE MONTMORENCI, duke of, a famous general and marshal of France, b. in 1628, was the posthumous son of the count de Bouteville, who was beheaded in the reign of Louis XIII. for fighting a duel. He served when young under the prince of Condé, was made a duke and peer of France, in 1662, was a lieutenant-general at the taking of Franche-Compté, in 1668, commanded during the invasion of Holland, in 1672, and having gained the battle of Seref, in 1674, was created a marshal. He subsequently distinguished himself at the battles of Fleurus, Lenze, Steinkirk, &c., and d. in 1695.

LYCOPHRON, a Greek poet was b. at Chaleis, in Eubœa. He flourished in the age of Ptolemy Philadelphus, and was one of the seven poets termed the Pleiades. He wrote numerous tragedies, a satirical drama, and other works; but the only extant production of this writer is a poem relating to the predictions of Cassandra, the daughter of Priam, king of Troy.

LYCURGUS, the celebrated Spartan legislator, son of Ennomus, king of Sparta, is supposed to have been b. about 898 B. C. His elder brother, Polydectes, who succeeded to the throne on the death of his father, soon after died, and left the kingdom to him; but Lycurgus finding that the widow was pregnant, forbore to assume the sceptre; and the issue proving to be a boy, he faithfully fulfilled the office of guardian to it. He made the study of legislation his principal object; and having travelled for the purpose of investigating the institutions of other lands, he returned to his own country, and established those laws by which Sparta was so long governed. Having bound the king, senate, and people, by a solemn oath, not to alter any of the laws he had made until his return, he left Sparta with the avowed intention of visiting the oracle of Delphi, but he secretly determined never to see it again. Plutarch affirms, that he put himself voluntarily to death by starvation, while Lucian asserts that he died naturally, at the age of 85. The rigid character of the laws of Lycurgus was intended to make public principles predominate over private interests and affections. Children were not allowed to be the property of their parents, but of the state; which directed their education, and even determined on their life or death. The severest penalties against debauchery and intemperance were affixed; and it was enjoined that the people should all take their meals in public. They were allowed to possess neither gold nor silver; iron was used for money; the theatres were abolished, and nothing but the most indispensable knowledge was allowed to be acquired; in short, all that tended to soften and humanize mankind was prohibited, while every thing that could promote a hardy life and personal bravery was encouraged. The Spartans, under the laws of Lycurgus, consequently became a nation of warriors, who, for ages, proved the bulwark of their friends, the dread of their foes, and an example for future ages—more, however, to be shunned than imitated.

LYDGATE, JOHN, one of the oldest English poets, was a Benedictine monk of Bury St. Edmund's. He was educated at Oxford, travelled in France and Italy, opened a school on his return for the tuition of the young nobility, and d. about 1460. His "Siege of Troy" is very scarce.

LYELL, CHARLES, well known in the scientific and literary world, was b. in Fifeshire, 1767. Educated partly at St. Andrew's, and partly at Cambridge, he returned to his paternal estate of Kinordy, where he passed his whole time in those pursuits which have gained him a distinguished place among men of science. He was the discoverer of many British plants previously unknown; and his translation of the lyrical poems of Dante, with his illustrative notes, shows a profound knowledge of mediæval Italian history and literature. Sir Charles Lyell, the distinguished geologist, is his son. D. 1849.

LYMAN, PHINEAS, major-general, was b. at Durham, in 1716, and after receiving his education at Yale college, commenced his study of the law, and became eminent in its practice. In 1755 he was appointed commander-in-chief of the Connecticut forces, and held this post with much distinction till the conclusion of the Canadian war. In 1762 he commanded the American forces in the expedition to Havana, and afterwards went to England as agent to obtain from government a tract of land on the Mississippi and Yazoo, where he proposed to establish a colony. Failing in this enterprise, he was ashamed to return to his native country, and passed eleven years in England almost in a state of imbecility. He was then induced to return, and embarked with his family for the Mississippi, and d. 1788. At one period of his life he enjoyed a very high and extensive reputation.

LYNCH, THOMAS, a signer of the declaration of independence, was b. in South Carolina in 1749, was educated in England, and commenced the study of law at the Temple. In 1772 he returned to his native state, and when but 27 years of age took his seat in the continental congress of 1776. The decline of his health soon rendered a change of climate necessary, and he embarked about the close of the year 1779 for St. Eastatia. The ship in which he sailed was never afterwards heard from.

LYNDWODE, or LINDWOOD, WILLIAM, an eminent ecclesiastical lawyer of the 15th century, was keeper of the privy seal in the reign of Henry VI., and was sent repeatedly on embassies to Spain and Portugal. D. bishop of St. David's, in 1446.

LYON, GEORGE FRANCIS, an enterprising traveller, and a captain in the British navy, was b. at Chichester in 1795, and entered the service on board the Milford, of 74 guns, in 1809; from which period up to the battle of Algiers, where he was present, he was continually engaged in the active duties of his profession. In 1818 he was employed under Mr. Ritchie, on a mission to the interior of Africa. Of this expedition Mr. Lyon published his journal, under the title of "A Narrative of Travels in Northern Africa, accompanied by Geographical Notices of Soudan, and of the Course of the Niger." A more disastrous undertaking has been seldom known; the travellers suffered every kind of privation, were attacked with the most alarming disorders, and Mr. Ritchie fell a martyr to extreme suffering and disappointment while at Mourzouk, the capital of Fezzan, from which place Mr. Lyon returned. A very different scene of operations next awaited him. In 1821 he was appointed to the command of the Hecla, one of the ships belonging to Captain Parry's expedition to the polar seas; of which he also published "A Private Journal." In 1823 he was raised to the rank of post-captain, and appointed to the command of the Griper gun-brig, then fitting out for another voyage of discovery in the icy regions. Here he and his gallant crew encountered the most frightful perils, but providentially returned to England, though without effecting any part of their object. He afterwards went to Mexico as one of the commissioners of the Real del Monte Mining Company, and was wrecked on his return, near Holyhead, in 1827, losing every thing belonging to him. He again visited South America, but d. on his passage home, 1832, aged 37.

LYONNET, PETER, an eminent naturalist, was b. at Maestricht in 1707. Being bred to the law, he became one of the secretaries to the states of Holland, and their law translator from the Latin and French. In his latter years he applied to the study of natural history, particularly insects; on which subject he wrote several esteemed books, the most important of which is, "Traité Anatomique de la Chenille qui rouge le Bois de Saule." D. 1789.

LYONS, ISRAEL, an astronomer, botanist, and mathematician, b. in 1739, was the son of a Polish Jew, who was a Hebrew teacher at Cambridge. He was Sir Joseph Banks' instructor in botany, and accompanied Captain Phipps, afterwards Lord Mulgrave, as astronomer, in his voyage towards the north pole. He was one of the calculators of the "Nautical Almanac," wrote a "Treatise on Fluxions," and other works, and lectured on botany. D. 1775.

LYSANDER, a famous Lacedæmonian general, who was employed in and put an end to the Peloponnesian war. By defeating the Athenians, too, in the naval action of Ægospotamos, 405 B. C., he destroyed the Athenian ascendancy in Greece. His ambition was to obtain the sovereign power of Sparta, but he did not succeed. He was slain in the war against Thebes, 375 B. C.

LYSIAS, a Greek orator, b. at Athens, as some say, and at Syraeuse, as others maintain, 459 B. C. He obtained great fame as a rhetorical teacher, and is cited by Quintillian as an example of pure and beautiful eloquence. He lived to the age of 81. Of his 300 or 400 orations only 34 have come down to us.

LYSIPPUS, a celebrated Grecian sculptor, who worked with such extraordinary diligence, that he is said to have left behind him fifteen hundred pieces, every one of which evinced marks of superior genius. He received from Alexander the Great the singular privilege of exclusively making his effigy in cast metal; and he accordingly executed a series of figures of that prince, from childhood to maturity. He greatly improved the art of statuary, and gave to the human figure a degree of symmetry and beauty unpractised by his predecessors.

LYTTLETON, GEORGE, Lord, an elegant poet and historian, was b. at Hagley, in Worcestershire, in 1709. On the resignation of Walpole, he was made one of the lords of the treasury; was subsequently chancellor of the exchequer, but resigned in 1757, and was raised to the peerage, after which he withdrew from public affairs. He was the author of a "Dissertation on the Conversion of St. Paul," "Dialogues of the Dead," a "History of Henry II.," and "Poems." The latter are correct in versification, and replete with delicate sentiments; nor are his miscellanies in prose devoid of good taste. D. 1773.—THOMAS, Lord, son of the preceding, was a young nobleman of promising talents, but of dissipated manners; and whose death is said to have been preceded by a very extraordinary circumstance. He dreamt that a young female, dressed in white, solemnly warned him of his dissolution in three days from that time. On the third day, his lordship had a party to spend the evening with him, and about the time predicted he observed to the company present, that "he believed he should jockey the ghost;" but in a few minutes afterwards he was seized with a sudden faintness, carried to bed, and rose no more. D. 1779.

M.

MABILLON, a learned French Benedictine, famous as a writer on ecclesiastical antiquities and diplomatics, was b. in 1632, at Pierre Mont, in Champagne, and studied at the college of Rheims. He assisted D'Acheri in his Spicilegium, and published several laborious works, among which are, "De Diplomatica," the "Musæum Italicum," and "The Annals of the Order of St. Benedict." D. 1707.

MABLY, GABRIEL BONNET DE, a French abbé, eminent as a political and historical writer, was the brother of Condillac, and b. at Grenoble, in 1709. He was educated by the Jesuits at Lyons, but soon abandoned theological studies for Thucydides, Plutarch, and Livy. His works include "Parallèle des Romains et des François," "Le Droit public de l'Europe," "Observations sur les Grecs," "Observations sur les Romains," "Observations sur l'Histoire de la France," "Sur les Constitutions des Etats Unis de l'Amérique," &c. D. 1785.

MACADAM, JOHN LONDON, known as the introducer of an improved system of road-making, which bears his name, was descended from an ancient and respectable family in Kirkcudbright, Scotland, where he was b. in 1756. He was a man of science generally, and in the course of his active services as a magistrate and trustee of roads, his attention was first attracted to the want of scientific principles in the construction of roads. At that time he was in his 60th year, and the subject continued to occupy his leisure till he finally effected what may fairly be termed a national good. Government appreciating the vast utility of his plans, rewarded him by two grants, amounting together to £10,000, and he was offered the honor of knighthood, which, however, he declined, in consequence of his advanced age, and it was conferred on his son, now Sir James Nicoll M'Adam. D. 1836.

MACARTNEY, GEORGE, earl of, was b. at Lismore, near Belfast, in 1737. He was employed as ambassador from Great Britain to the emperor of China in 1792. He conducted himself with great address on that occasion; and an account of the mission was published by Sir George Staunton, who acted as his secretary. The embassy returned in 1794, and the earl was next sent to Louis XVIII., then Monsieur, at Verona; after that, he was appointed governor of the Cape of Good Hope, which he was compelled, from ill health, to resign. During his retirement in Surrey, he wrote "The State of Russia in 1767," and "The State of Ireland in 1773."

MACAULAY, CATHARINE, a female historian, was b. in 1730. In 1760 she married Mr. George Macaulay, a physician in London; and after his death she married, in 1778, Dr. Graham, a clergyman, and brother to the noted empiric of that name. In 1785 she came to America, for the purpose of visiting General Washington, with whom she maintained a correspondence during her life. Among her works are, "The History of England from James I. to the Accession of the House of Hanover," "The History of England from the Revolution to the present Time," "Remarks on Hobbes's Rudiments of Government and Society," "A Treatise on Moral Truth," "Letters on Education," &c. D. 1791.—ZACHARY, a zealous co-operator with Mr. Wilberforce and other distinguished philanthropists in the abolition of slavery in the British colonies; to which end he had devoted his eminent talents and best energies for upwards of forty years. He was the father of the distinguished historian, T. Babington Macaulay, esq. D. 1838.

MACAULEY, ELIZABETH WRIGHT, a lady, who, in the varied characters of an actress, a lecturer, and a preacher of the gospel, was well known, was b. in 1785. She left the stage on the plea of ill health, and became the occupant and preacher of a chapel in London; she also occasionally entertained audiences with dramatic recitations; and, for the twelvemonth preceding her death, she was occupied in delivering lectures on "Domestic Philosophy" in various parts of England. D. 1837.

MACCALL, HUGH, major in the army of the U. S., d. at Savannah, Georgia, 1824, aged 57. He published a "History of Georgia," 1816.

MACCALLA, DANIEL, minister at Wappetaw, S. C., was a native of Pennsylvania, and graduated at Princeton college, 1766. In 1774 he was ordained pastor of the churches of New Providence and Charleston, Penn. In the war he went as chaplain to Canada, and was made a prisoner. For some months he was confined in a prison-ship. He returned on parole at the close of 1776. D. 1800.

MACCULLOCH, JOHN, was b. in 1773, at Guernsey; entered into the artillery as assistant surgeon, and became chemist to the ordnance in 1803. He was afterwards engaged by government in the surveys of Scotland; and his mineralogical and geological survey of that portion of the kingdom is deemed his most important public work. In 1832 his able map of it was completed, and he received from government the sum of £7000. He also wrote many scientific works. D. 1835.

MACDONALD, ETIENNE JACQUES JOSEPH ALEXANDRE, duke of Tarentum, and a distinguished marshal of France, was b. at Sedan, in France, 1765. Descended from a Scotch family, which had taken refuge in France after the suppression of the rebellion in Scotland in 1745, he entered the French army in 1784, and embracing the revolutionary cause, served on the staff of Dumourier, at Jemappes, and greatly distinguished himself in the campaign in the Low Countries under General Pichegru. In 1796, as general of division, he took the command of the army of the Rhine; he then joined the army of Italy, where he became governor of Rome; and having soon afterwards been sent against Naples, his skilful retreat saved the French army from the utter ruin with which it was menaced by Suwarrow. During the 18th Brumaire, he commanded at Versailles. In 1800 he was appointed to the command of the army in Switzerland, and immortalized his name in military annals by his celebrated passage of the Splügen. In 1802 he was appointed French ambassador at the court of Copenhagen; and, on his return to Paris, Napoleon marked his displeasure at some expressions he had made use of in reference to his treatment of Moreau, by withdrawing him from active service. But in 1809 he once more took part in the Italian campaign, shared the glories of the victories at Laybach, Raab, and Wagram, his gallant conduct in the last earning for him a marshal's baton at the emperor's hands, and was appointed governor of Grätz, where his humanity gained him "golden opinions from all ranks of people." In 1810 he was created duke of Tarentum, and appointed to command in Catalonia, where, contrary to his wont, he displayed great inhumanity. He subsequently shared in the Russian campaign, and distinguished himself in the battles of Bautzen and Lutzen; but met with a severe reverse at Katzbach, where he had imprudently engaged Marshal Blücher with a greatly inferior force. After the fall of Napoleon, he was called to the chamber of peers, and made chancellor of the legion of honor. D. 1840.

MACDONOUGH, THOMAS, commodore, was a native of Delaware. He served as a midshipman in the American fleet sent to the Mediterranean. In the war of 1812, at the age of 28, he commanded the American forces on lake Champlain. In the battle of Sept. 11, 1814, after an action of two hours and twenty minutes, he obtained a complete victory. The state of New York gave him 1000 acres of land on the bay, in which the battle was fought. D. 1825, aged 39.

MACDOUGAL, ALEXANDER, major-general, was the son of a Scotchman, who sold milk in the city of New York, nor was he ashamed to acknowledge, that when a boy he assisted his father. He proved himself a zealous whig before the beginning of the American revolutionary war; in 1776 he was appointed brigadier, and major-general in 1777. He commanded in the action at White Plains, and was engaged in the battle of Germantown. In 1781 he was elected a delegate to congress; he was afterwards in the senate of New York. D. 1783.

MACDUFFIE, GEORGE, an eminent politician of South Carolina. He studied law with J. C. Calhoun and commenced the practice in connection with Edward Ford, now the rector of an Episcopal church at Augusta. Shortly after their separation he was involved in difficulties with Colonel Cumming of Augusta, which resulted in several hostile meetings, in one of which he received a wound in one of his shoulders from which he never recovered. He entered congress in 1821, and represented his state fourteen years, during which he distinguished himself as an orator, and often contended in debate with the late John Randolph. He was afterwards elected governor of his state, and in 1843 was chosen to the United States senate as colleague with Mr. Calhoun. He was once a champion of the United States bank, internal improvements, and a protective tariff, and soon after became an equally enthusiastic opponent of them all. He was an earnest and eloquent debater. D. 1851.

MACE, THOMAS, an English musician, who was an excellent performer on the lute. He published a work, entitled "Music's Monument, or a Remembrance of the best Practical Music," &c. D. 1676.

MACFARLANE, HENRY, an historical writer, was b. in Scotland, in 1734; was for some years a reporter of speeches in parliament; and afterwards kept a respectable seminary at Walthamstow. He was the author of a "History of George III.," an "Essay on the Authenticity of Ossian," "An Address to the People of Britain," &c. D. 1804.

MACHIAVEL, or MACCHIAVELLI, NICHOLAS, a celebrated political writer and historian, was b. at Florence, in 1469, of a noble family, whose members had enjoyed the highest dignities in the republic. On account of his distinguished talents, he was very early appointed chancellor of his native state, and not long afterwards advanced to the post of secretary. When Florence had recovered her liberty, by the expulsion of the Medici, he was several times charged with important embassies, which were of great use to the commonwealth. On the return of the Medici to Florence, he was deprived of his post; and being afterwards accused of participating in a conspiracy, he was imprisoned, put to the torture, and banished; all which he endured with a firmness approaching to indifference. Having returned to his native country, the favor and confidence shown him by the Medici alienated him from the affections of the Florentines; and he d. in indigent circumstances, in 1527. His chief works are, "The History of Florence," "The Life of Castruccio Castracani," "A Treatise on the Military Art," and "The Prince." This last work, if taken literally, contains the most pernicious maxims of government, founded on the vilest principles; hence the word Machiavellism is used to denote that system of policy which disregards every law, human or divine, to effect its purposes. There are many, however, who regard it rather as a covert satire upon tyranny, than as a manual for a tyrant.

MACINTOSH, LACHLAN, General, an officer of the American revolutionary war, was one of the early settlers of Georgia, and the principal military of the province. In 1776 he was appointed brigadier-general. Having served to the end of the war, he was a member of congress in 1784. In 1785 he was one of the commissioners to treat with the southern Indians. D. 1806.—JOHN, General, was an officer of the Georgia line in 1775, and served during the war with unblemished honor. In 1814 he commanded the Georgia division which went to Pensacola. D. 1826.

MACKAY, ANDREW, an eminent mathematician; author of a "Treatise on the Longitude," and a contributor to Rees's "Cyclopædia." D. 1809.

MACKEAN, THOMAS, an eminent judge, and a signer of the declaration of independence, was b. in Pennsylvania, in 1734, and after a course of academic and professional studies was admitted to the bar at the age of 21 years. His political career commenced in 1762, when he was returned a member of the assembly from the county of Newcastle. He was a member of the congress which assembled in New York, in 1765, to obtain relief of the British government for the grievances under which the colonies were suffering. In this body he behaved with much decision and energy. In 1774 he was appointed to the general congress, a delegate from the lower counties in Delaware, and was the only man who, without intermission, was a member during the whole period. Of this body he was president in 1781. In 1777 he was appointed chief justice of Pennsylvania, and discharged the duties of this office with impartiality and dignity for 22 years. In 1799 he was elected a governor of the state of Pennsylvania. D. 1817.

MACKENZIE, Sir GEORGE, an ingenious lawyer and writer, was b. at Dundee, 1636; became an eminent advocate; and gained from the covenanters the severe appellation of "bloodthirsty." When James II. abrogated the Catholic laws he resigned, but was afterwards restored by that prince. Not approving the measures of the prince of Orange, he again retired and went to London, where he d. 1691. He wrote several works of merit on the laws of Scotland; "A Defence of the Antiquity of the Royal Line of Scotland," "Essays on Moral Subjects," and some poetical pieces.—HENRY, an essayist and elegant writer of works of fiction, was the son of an eminent physician at Edinburgh, and b. in 1745. He received a liberal education; and, in 1746, became an attorney in the Scottish court of exchequer. His first production was "The Man of Feeling," which soon acquired unbounded popularity: this was followed by "The Man of the World," and he subsequently produced a third, "Julia de Roubigné." He next, in conjunction with other literary characters, published a series of Essays, under the title of "The Mirror," and afterwards "The Lounger." He also contributed many excellent papers to the "Transactions of the Royal Society of Edinburgh and of the Highland Society," of both of which he was a member. His dramatic works were by no means so successful: they consist of two tragedies, "The Prince of Tunis" and "The Shipwreck," and of two comedies, "The Force of Fashion" and "The White Hypocrite." He was the author of a political tract entitled "An Account of the Proceedings of the Parliament of 1784;" and at the commencement of the French revolution he published several others, with the view of counteracting the prevalence of democratic principles at home, which introduced him to the notice of Mr. Pitt, and some years after he was appointed comptroller of the taxes for Scotland, an office which he held till his death. D. 1831.—DONALD, was b. in Scotland, in 1783, and at the age of 17 he came over to Canada and joined the Northwest company and continued eight years with them. In 1809 he became one of the partners with the late John Jacob Astor, of New York, in establishing the fur trade west of the Rocky Mountains, and in company with Mr. Hunt, of St. Louis, he made the overland route to the mouth of the Columbia river, a feat then rarely attempted and full of perils, and remained at Astoria until it was surrendered by MacDougall to the British. He converted every thing he could into available funds and carried them safely through a mighty wilderness to Mr. Astor. After the restoration of peace, he exerted himself to secure for the United States the exclusive trade of Oregon, but after a long negotiation with Mr. Astor, and through him with Messrs. Madison, Gallatin, and other leading individuals in and out of office, the matter was abandoned, and Mr. Mackenzie, in March, 1821, joined the Hudson Bay Company, and was immediately appointed one of the council and chief factor. In August, 1825, he was married to Adelegonde Humbert, (who survives him,) and was shortly afterwards appointed governor. At this time he resided at Fort Garry, Red River settlement, where he continued to reside until 1832 in active and prosperous business, in which he amassed a large fortune. D. 1851.

MACKINTOSH, Sir JAMES, eminent as a jurist, a statesman, and a writer—equally distinguished for his extensive learning, his large views, and his liberal principles in law, politics, and philosophy—was descended of an ancient but reduced Scottish family, and b. in the county of Inverness, during 1765. After studying at King's college, Aberdeen, he spent three years at Edinburgh, chiefly in medical studies, and received a degree; but inclination soon led him to abandon that pursuit. In 1789 we find him in London, where he published a pamphlet on the regency question, which, on account of the sudden recovery of the king, attracted little notice. A visit to the Continent, at that interesting period, contributed to excite his sympathies for the French, and he published a reply to the celebrated "Reflections" of Burke, under the title of "Vindiciæ Gallicæ," or Defence of the French Revolution, 1792, a work which laid the foundation of his fame, and acquired for him the friendship both of Fox and his great antagonist. About this time he entered himself as a student of Lincoln's Inn, was soon called to the bar by that society, and commenced the practice of the law. Having obtained permission, though not without some difficulty, to deliver a course of lectures in the hall of Lincoln's Inn, on the law of nations, he published his introductory lecture, under the title of a "Discourse on the Law of Nature and Nations." The ability which it displayed, obtained him a large audience, including some of the most distinguished men of the country. On the trial of Peltier for a libel against Bonaparte, (then first consul of France,) the defence was conducted by Mr. Mackintosh, as sole counsel, in a most brilliant speech, which at once established his reputation as an advocate and an orator. The recordership of Bombay, with the dignity of knighthood, was soon after conferred on him, and, besides the discharge of the duties of his office, the nine years which he spent in India were marked by his exertions in the amelioration of the criminal law, the foundation of the Literary Society in Bombay, and his valuable communications to the "Asiatic Register." Soon after his return to England, Sir James was returned a member of the house of commons for the county of Nairn, in Scotland, 1813, and sat subsequently for the borough of Knaresborough, in Yorkshire, under the influence of the late Earl Fitzwilliam. He soon took his stand among the first parliamentary speakers, and there are few instances in which finer reasoning, or deeper learning in the history of nations, and the influence of human laws upon the feelings, passions, and interests of the human race, have been sustained, developed, and enforced by a more manly and vigorous eloquence. His greatest efforts were directed to the amendment of the criminal code, which had been undertaken by Sir Samuel Romilly, and was taken up as a solemn bequest by his friend and representative. His "History of England" is not a detailed narrative of events, but a rapid, yet clear, profound, and philosophic view of the state of the progress of society, law, government, and civilization, in which the lessons of experience, the character of men and events, the circumstances which have promoted, retarded, modified the social and political improvement of the English nation, are unfolded and judged with the acuteness of a philosopher, and the wisdom of a practical statesman. His style is simple, clear, graceful, and elegant, and often rises to eloquence, when the historian traces out the growth of liberty, and the influence of generous institutions. This admirable man died, to the deep regret of his country, May 30th, 1832, having closed his public labors, the year before, by a brilliant speech in favor of reform.

MACKLIN, CHARLES, a celebrated veteran actor and dramatist, whose real name was Mac Laughlin, was b. in the county of Westmeath, Ireland, in 1690. He appeared as a performer at the theatre in Lincoln's Inn Fields, in 1725; but it was not till 1741 that he established his reputation as an actor, by his admirable and still unrivalled performance of Shylock. He continued on the stage until 1789; but, during the last years of his life, his understanding became impaired, and he d. 1797, at the patriarchal age of 107. His "Man of the World," a comedy, exposes meanness, sycophancy, and political servility, with considerable skill; and his "Love à la Mode," a very popular farce, also attests the talents of its author.

MACKNIGHT, JAMES, a learned Scottish divine, was b. in 1721, at Irvine, in Argyleshire, and was ordained minister of Maybole, where he composed his "Harmony of the Gospels," and his "New Translation of the Epistles." In 1763 he became one of the ministers of Edinburgh, and was employed nearly 30 years in the execution of his last and greatest work, viz.: "New Translation from the Greek of all the Apostolical Epistles," with commentaries and notes. D. 1800.

MACLAINE, ARCHIBALD, a learned divine, b. at Monaghan, in Ireland, where his father was a dissenting minister, is advantageously known by his "Letters to Soame Jenyns, on his View of the Internal Evidence of Christianity," a translation of Mosheim's "Ecclesiastical History," and a volume of miscellaneous sermons. D. 1804.

MACLAURIN, COLIN, an eminent mathematician, who was b. at Kilmoddan, in Scotland, in 1698. In 1717 he obtained the mathematical professorship in the Marischal college of Aberdeen, and in 1725 was elected professor of mathematics at Edinburgh. In 1734 he entered the lists against Berkeley, which produced his excellent "Treatise on Fluxions." He also wrote several papers in the "Philosophical Transactions," a treatise entitled "Geometria Organica," another on "Algebra," and "An Account of Sir Isaac Newton's Philosophical Discoveries." In the rebellion of 1745 he took so active a part in fortifying Edinburgh, that when the Pretender approached with his forces, Mr. Maclaurin deemed it prudent to retire to York, where he was entertained by Archbishop Herring, in whose palace he d. 1746.—JOHN, Lord DREGHORN, son of the preceding, was b. at Edinburgh, in 1734; was admitted a member of the faculty of advocates; and in 1787 was raised to the bench by the title of Lord Dreghorn. His works are, "An Essay on Literary Property," "A Collection of Criminal Cases," and an "Essay on Patronage." D. 1796.

MACLEAN, LETITIA ELIZABETH, better known as Miss LANDON, or L. E. L., a celebrated English poetess, was b. in Hans-place, Chelsea, 1802. At a very early age, she attracted the notice of the reading public by her spirited short poems, published in the "Literary Gazette." Her shorter compositions, in the shape of contributions to the periodicals, are almost innumerable. In addition to those, she published "The Improvisatrice," "The Troubadour," "The Golden Violet," "The Golden Bracelet," and the "Vow of the Peacock," all in verse; and three prose novels, "Romance and Reality," "Francesca Carrara," and "Ethel Chnrchill." In June, 1833, she was married to George Maclean, esq., governor of Capo Coast castle, and proceeded thither with him. Being much afflicted with spasms, she was in the habit of taking a powerful medicine, and her death is attributed to her having incautiously taken an overdose. D. 1838.—JOHN, was the son of an eminent surgeon of the same name, in the city of Glasgow, Scotland, where he was b. 1771. After pursuing his literary, philosophical, and medical studies successively at Glasgow, Edinburgh, London, and Paris, he commenced the practice of surgery at Glasgow, in 1791. In 1795 he came to America, and in the same year was appointed professor of chemistry and natural history in the college of New Jersey, at Princeton. Two years afterwards he was chosen professor of natural philosophy and mathematics in the same institution, the duties of which office he continued to discharge with great reputation to himself, and advantage to the college, until the year 1812, when he resigned his office at Princeton, in consequence of being appointed professor of natural philosophy and chemistry in the college of William and Mary, in Virginia. D. 1814.

MACNALLY, LEONARD, a lawyer and dramatist, was b. in Dublin, in 1752, and after studying at the Middle Temple, was called to the Irish bar in 1776. He was the author of "The Rules of Evidence," and "The Irish Justice of the Peace." His theatrical productions are, "Fashionable Levities," a comedy; "Richard Cœur de Lion," an opera; "Robin Hood, or Sherwood Forest," a comic opera; and "Retaliation," a farce. D. 1820.

MACNEVIN, WILLIAM JAMES, was b. at Ballynahowne, Ireland, in 1763, educated in Germany, and practised medicine in Dublin. He early took part in the Irish agitations of 1791, was a member of the secret society of United Irishmen, and in 1798 was arrested for plotting against the British government. He was imprisoned for four years, and on his release travelled in Switzerland, of which he wrote an account, and finally entered the French army, as a captain in the Irish brigade. But disappointed in not having been sent to Ireland, he came to this country in 1805, when he was appointed professor of midwifery in the college of physicians and surgeons, and afterwards resident physician by Governor Clinton. He published several professional works, and was greatly esteemed. D. 1841.

MACNISH, ROBERT, known as "the modern Pythagorean," (the name affixed to most of his contributions to different magazines,) was b. in Glasgow, 1802. Though enjoying considerable practice as a physician, he found leisure to engage in literary pursuits; and his "Anatomy of Drunkenness," "Philosophy of Sleep," "Metempsychosis," and "Book of Aphorisms," have gained for him a high place among the most thoughtful writers of his age. D. 1837.

MACOMB, ALEXANDER, a major-general of the United States army, was b. at Detroit in 1782, entered the army in 1799, and became a major in 1808. He was a colonel during the war of 1812, and distinguished himself at Niagara and Fort George. In 1814 he was promoted to the rank of brigadier-general, and commanded at the battle of Plattsburg, where he obtained a signal victory, in connection with Macdonough on lake Champlain. In 1835 he succeeded to the office of commander-in-chief of the army. D. 1841.

MACON, NATHANIEL, long a distinguished member of congress from North Carolina. He was elected a member of the 2d congress in 1791, and continued a member of the house till 1815, when he was transferred to the senate, of which he continued a member till 1828, when he resigned and retired to private life; having been 37 years a member of the house or senate, a longer period than any other man; and for several years what is called the father of the house. He was speaker of the house of representatives in the 7th, 8th, and 9th congress. "During the long, and through all the exciting periods of his public life," says the Warrenton Reporter, "though always a conspicuous party man, no one of any party ever questioned his integrity, or the purity of his motives; and he has descended to the grave full of years and with universal respect." He was the bosom friend of Jefferson and Madison, and other illustrious patriots.

MACPHERSON, JAMES, a writer distinguished for his translations or imitations of ancient Gaelic poems, was b. at Kingeuscie, in Inverness, in 1738. Having, in 1760, produced "Fragments of Ancient Poetry, translated from the Gaelic or Erse Language," they were so well received, that a subscription was formed to enable the author to collect additional specimens of national poetry. The result of his researches was "Fingal, an Ancient Epic Poem, in six books," together with several other poems (professedly translated from originals), by Ossian, the son of Fingal, a Gaelic prince of the 3d century, and his cotemporaries. Dr. Johnson treated him as an impostor, and a violent controversy ensued concerning their authenticity. From the evidence of the contending parties, it may be concluded that Macpherson's prose epics were founded on traditional narratives current among the Highlanders; but the date of the oldest of their lays is comparatively modern; and it is now impossible to ascertain the precise extent of his obligations to the Gaelic bards of former ages. In 1764 he accompanied Governor Johnstone to Florida, as secretary. After his return he translated the Iliad into Ossianic prose; wrote a "History of Great Britain, from the Restoration to the Accession of the House of Hanover;" and also employed his pen in vindicating the measures of government during the American war. He was afterwards appointed agent to the nabob of Arcot, became a member of parliament, and d. 1796.

MACQUER, PETER JOSEPH, an eminent chemist, b. at Paris, in 1718. He wrote in the "Journal des Savans," from 1768 to 1776, the articles relating to natural philosophy, medicine, chemistry, anatomy, &c.; and published "Elemens de Chimie," &c. D. 1784.—PHILIP, his brother, was the author of an "Ecclesiastical History," and several other historical works. D. 1770.

MACROBIUS, AURELIUS AMBROSIVS THEODOSIVS, a Latin author, in the reign of the emperor Theodosius. He held the consular dignity; and was the author of a miscellaneous work, entitled "Saturnalia," curious for its criticisms, and valuable for the light it throws upon the manners and customs of antiquity. He wrote other works, and d. about the year 420.

MADDEN, SAMUEL, an Irish clergyman, b. 1687, and educated at Trinity college, Dublin, where he introduced the scheme for promoting learning by premiums at the quarterly examinations. In 1732 he published the first volume of "Memoirs of the Twentieth Century, or Original Letters of State under George VI." He founded a society at Dublin for the improvement of the arts, in 1740, similar to that which was afterwards established in London. In 1744 he published "Boulter's Monument," a poem; and a play, entitled "Themistocles." D. 1765.

MADDOX, ISAAC, an English prelate, was b. in London, in 1697. Being left an orphan, he was taken under the care of a relation, who placed him with a pastrycook; but he soon left that situation, and went to Scotland with a view of obtaining at St. Andrew's a cheap but solid education, and eventually becoming a minister of the kirk. The tenets and discipline of Presbyterianism, however, not being congenial with his sentiments, he returned to England, entered at Queen's college, Cambridge, was episcopally ordained, and rose so rapidly, that in 1733 he was made dean of Wells. In 1736 he was consecrated bishop of St. Asaph; whence, in 1743, he was translated to Worcester, where he d. in 1759. Bishop Maddox published "A Vindication of the Church of England," in answer to Neal's History of the Puritans; and 14 occasional sermons.

MADERNO, CARLO, an Italian architect of the 16th century, appointed by Pope Paul V. to complete St. Peter's, at Rome; in the execution of which he has been charged with committing some important errors. He was, however, in high repute, and built the Maffei palace, and many other public edifices at Rome. B. 1556; d. 1629.—STEPHEN, was an eminent sculptor; b. in Lombardy, 1576. D. 1636.

MADISON, JAMES, president of the United States, was b. March 16th, 1751, at the seat of his maternal grandmother in Prince George county, Va., was educated at Princeton college, under Dr. Witherspoon, and studied law in his native state. In 1776 he was chosen a member of the convention which formed the constitution of Virginia, and of the state legislature, by which he was appointed to the executive council. He was a delegate to the continental congress of 1780, and afterwards to the convention which formed the constitution of the United States, where he took a leading and important part, and was regarded as one of the wisest of its members. After it was formed, he united with Jay and Hamilton in urging its adoption, in various essays in the newspapers, under the title of the "Federalist." From 1789 to 1797 he occupied a seat in congress, where he resisted the financial measures of Hamilton, and the policy generally of Washington's administration. In 1798 he prepared the famous resolutions for the Virginia legislature, denouncing the alien and sedition laws, and prescribing the nature of the federal relations. Jefferson in 1801 appointed him secretary of state, in which office he remained till 1809, when he was elected to the presidency. The declaration of war against Great Britain in 1812, was the most important measure of his able administration. After serving two presidential terms, he retired to his seat at Montpelier in 1817, where he continued to enjoy the undivided respect and admiration of his fellow-citizens, till the close of his life on the 28th June, 1836.—

JAMES, bishop of Virginia, was educated at William and Mary college, studied law, and was admitted to the bar; but he soon resolved to devote himself to theology. In 1773 he was chosen professor of mathematics in William and Mary college, and in 1777 was appointed the president, and visited England for his improvement in science. Until 1784 he was not only president, but professor of mathematics, and afterwards professor of natural, moral, and political philosophy, until his death. He first introduced lectures on political economy. In 1788 he was chosen bishop. D. 1812.

—GEORGE, governor of Kentucky, son of the preceding, at the age of 17 went out as a soldier in defence of the western frontier, and was engaged in several battles with the Indians. In St. Clair's defeat he was wounded. In the war of 1812 he was an officer at the battle of the Raisin. After having been twenty years auditor of the public accounts, he was chosen governor for the term of four years in 1816, but in a few weeks after his election d. at Paris.

MADOX, THOMAS, a legal antiquary and historiographer, who published, in 1702, "A Collection of Charters taken from the Originals," with the title of "Formulare Anglicanum." In 1711 appeared "The History and Antiquities of the Exchequer," which was followed by his "Firma Burgi, or Historical Essay concerning the Cities, Towns, and Boroughs of England."

MÆCENAS, CAIUS CILNIUS, the friend and minister of Augustus, and the patron of Virgil and Horace, was a Roman knight, who traced his genealogy from the ancient Etrurian kings. He has been described as a pattern of every political virtue, and a most generous patron of the sciences. Though luxurious and effeminate in his hours of relaxation, he was vigilant and active in business, and well understood how to employ the favors of fortune. Many pleasant and useful qualities gained him the confidence of Augustus, which he enjoyed undiminished until his death, in the year of Rome 745, and 8 B. C. So signal were his good offices towards literary genius, that the name of Mæcenas has since become synonymous with that of a liberal patron.

MÆSTLINUS, MICHAEL, a celebrated German astronomer, was b. in the duchy of Wirtemberg, about 1542. He went to Italy, where he became intimate with Galileo; and on his return to Germany he was chosen professor of mathematics, at Tubingen, where he had Kepler for a pupil. He published many mathematical and astronomical works, and d. 1590.

MAFFEI, FRANCIS SCIPIO, Marquis, an eminent Italian writer, was b. 1675, at Verona; entered the army, and distinguished himself as a volunteer at the battle of Donawert, in 1704; but, at the end of the campaign, quitted the service, and devoted himself to literature. Among his works are, the tragedy of "Merope," a "Treatise against Duelling," a "History of Diplomacy," "Museum Veronense," and "Verona Illustrata." D. 1755.—VEGIO, a native of Lodi; author of "Epigrams," "Essays," and a "Supplement to Virgil," which he called the 13th book of the Æneid. Julius Scaliger and Gerard Vossius have declared him a great poet. B. 1407; d. 1459.—BERNARDIN, a learned cardinal, who d. at Rome in 1553, aged 40. He wrote a "Commentary on Cicero's Epistles," and a "Treatise on Medals and Inscriptions."—JOHN PETER, a Jesuit, was b. at Bergamo in 1536, and d. at Tivoli in 1603. He wrote the "Life of Ignatius Loyola," a "History of the Indies," and other works, in the purest Latin.

MAGALOTTI, LORENZO, Count, an elegant poet and learned naturalist, was b. at Florence, in 1637. He wrote many philosophical and poetical works, of which latter the most valued is his "Canzonette Anacreontiche," published under his Arcadian name Lindoro Elateo. D. 1712.

MAGEE, WILLIAM, an Irish prelate and theological writer, was b. in humble life, and admitted as sizar at Dublin university. He was soon distinguished for his scholastic attainments; and in 1806 became a senior fellow of Trinity college, and professor of mathematics. In 1801 he published his celebrated "Discourses on the Scriptural Doctrines of the Atonement and Sacrifice," a work directed against the tenets of the Unitarians, and written with peculiar force. In 1818 he was advanced to the deanery of Cork; in 1819 he was consecrated bishop of Raphoe; and, in 1822, translated to the see of Dublin. D. 1831, aged 66.

MAGELLAN, or MAGALHAENS, FERDINAND, a celebrated Portuguese navigator, who, in 1519, discovered and passed the straits which have since been called by his name. His services not being valued by his own country, he offered them to Charles V. of Spain, who intrusted him with a fleet destined to attempt a westward passage to the Moluccas; hence his discovery. He was slain in 1521 in a skirmish with the natives of one of the Philippine islands.

MAGEOGHEGAN, JAMES, an Irish priest; author of an "Ancient and Modern History of Ireland." B. 1702; d. 1764.

MAGGI, CARLO MARIA, an Italian poet, b. at Milan in 1630, was secretary to the senate of his native city, and d. there in 1690. His sonnets are much admired, and some of them have been translated into English.

MAGINN, WILLIAM, one of most fertile and versatile writers of modern times, was b. at Cork in 1793. He visited London for the first time in 1823, and settling there, wrote much, and for a variety of works. Besides the harassing demands upon him as a periodical contributor, he at this time wrote the singular and striking romance entitled "Whitehall." About the year 1828, he became sub-editor of the "Standard." He also contributed immensely to the well known Fraser's Magazine and to Blackwood. He wrote a caustic and powerful review of a "fashionable" novel, entitled "Berkely Castle." The author took offence, and in company with a friend, committed a most merciless assault upon Mr. Fraser. Aroused by this ill-treatment of his friend and publisher, Dr. Maginn instantly offered the offended author satisfaction, and a hostile meeting accordingly took place. The duel proved a bloodless one, but it was very near having a different result, the doctor being hit on the heel of his boot, and his opponent on the collar of his coat. To vast learning, eloquence, fancy, and wit, the doctor added a boyish good-humor and joviality. D. 1842.

MAGLIABECHI, ANTONIO, a learned critic, whose eccentric habits were almost as extraordinary as his varied erudition, was b. at Florence in 1633. He was placed, when a boy, as servant to a dealer in fruit, or, as others say, with a goldsmith, in which situation he discovered such a propensity to letters, that a bookseller took him into his employment, where his talents and memory made him so much talked of, that the grand-duke, Cosmo III., appointed him his librarian. His attention was wholly absorbed by his books; among them he took his rest and meals, nor could he be persuaded to leave his old apartment for one more commodious which the duke had provided for him. A threadbare cloak served him for a garment by day, and a covering by night; he had one straw chair for his table, another to sleep on, and the only luxury in which he indulged was smoking. He left no literary work deserving of particular notice; but he freely afforded information to those authors who sought his advice or assistance. D. 1714.

MAGNENTIUS, a German, who rose, from being a private soldier, to the first employments in the empire. The emperor Constantine had a great esteem for him, and in a mutiny among the troops delivered him from the fury of the soldiers by covering him with his robe. Magnentius murdered his benefactor in 350, and assumed the title of emperor; but Constantine II. avenged the death of his brother, and after a bloody battle took Magnentius prisoner, and put him to death at Lyons in 353.

MAHOMET, or MOHAMMED, the founder of a religion which has spread over a considerable portion of the globe, was b. in 570 at Mecca, a city of Arabia, of the noble family of Koreish. Losing his father in his infancy, the guardianship of him devolved on his uncle Abu Taleb, who employed him to go with his caravans from Mecca to Damascus. In this employment he continued till he was 28 years of age, when he married Khadijah, a rich widow. He continued to act for some time as a merchant; but a disposition to religious contemplation seems to have attended him from his early youth; and having remarked on his travels the infinite variety of sects which prevailed, he formed the design of founding a new one. He accordingly spent much of his time in a cave near Mecca, seemingly alone and employed in meditation and prayer. While there he framed the celebrated "Koran," or "Book," which he pretended to have received at different times from heaven by the hands of the angel Gabriel. At the age of 40 he publicly assumed the prophetic character, calling himself the apostle of God. At first he had only his wife and eight other followers; but in three years the number of his disciples was very considerably augmented. In the tenth year of his mission he lost both Abu Taleb and his faithful wife Khadijah, which so exposed him to the enmity of the Koreishites, that he found it necessary to make a temporary retreat to the city of Tayef. The fundamental doctrine inculcated in the Koran was, "There is but one God, and Mahomet is his prophet." His proselytes rapidly increased; and as they swore fidelity to him, and proffered him their assistance, he adopted the resolution of encountering his enemies with force. Being the more exasperated at this, they formed a conspiracy to murder him; warned of the imminent danger, he left Mecca, accompanied only by Abubeker, and concealed himself in a neighboring cave. Here he spent three days undiscovered, after which he arrived at Medina. It is from this event, called the Hegira, or Flight, that the Mussulmans compute their time; it corresponds with the 16th of June, 622. Mahomet now assumed the sacerdotal and regal dignity, married Ayesha, daughter of Abubeker, and declared his resolution to propagate his doctrines by the sword. The hopes of booty were thus added to the religious zeal of his partisans; and after many minor exploits with various hostile tribes of the Jewish persuasion, he sent a summons to the principal neighboring princes, particularly Chosrou Parviz, king of Persia, Heraclius, emperor of Constantinople, Mokawkas, ruler of Egypt, the king of Ethiopia, and the princes of various districts of Arabia, to embrace his new revelation of the divine law. The more remote and powerful parties gave no heed to him; others, however, submitted; and, having made himself master of Mecca, the Arabs, who regarded it as a holy city, embraced the proffered creed. In the tenth year of the Hegira, Mahomet undertook his farewell pilgrimage to Mecca. On this occasion he was surrounded with the utmost splendor, and attended by 90,000, or, as some say, 150,000 friends. This was the last important event of his life. He d. soon after his return to Medina, in his 63d year.

MAILLAR, OLIVER, was an eccentric French ecclesiastic, of the 15th century. His sermons were distinguished by their gross and ridiculous denunciation against those who might happen to offend him. Having glanced in one of them at some traits in the character of Louis XI., that king, who had just established the post in France, sent him word that he would have him thrown into the Seine. "The king is master," he replied; "but tell him that I shall get to heaven by water sooner than he will by his post horses." D. 1502.

MAILLE, duchess of, lady of the bed-chamber to Marie Antoinette, who twice escaped the guillotine by singular contingencies. On the 7th of July, 1794, a lady named Maillet, detained in St. Lazare, was executed by Robespierre's revolutionary tribunal, by mistake, in her place; on the 8th she was summoned; but having remarked to the huissier that there was a mistake in the register of her baptismal name, a delay occurred, in order to see her sister-in-law on the subject; but the latter being seized with convulsions, the examination was delayed till the 10th, during which interval Robespierre was himself guillotined, and the duchess escaped.

MAILLET, BENEDETTO DE, a whimsical but ingenious French writer, b. at Lorraine, in 1659. He successively became consul at Egypt and Leghorn, and d. in 1738. His principal work, "Tellamed," (his name reversed,) contains a singular system of cosmogony, in which he maintains that all the land of the globe was originally covered with water, and that every species of animal, man included, owes its origin to the sea.

MAILLY, JOHN BAPTIST, a French historical writer, b. at Dijon; of the academy of which place he became a member, and where he d. in 1794. His principal works are, "L'Esprit de la Fronde," "L'Esprit des Croisades," and "Fastes Juifs, Romaines, et Français."—ANTOINE, b. in 1775, was an enthusiastic French revolutionist, though a noble; and editor of the famous "Bouche de Fer." He and his brother, Minerve, were treacherously seized and beheaded, and their bodies thrown into the sea, at the siege of Acre, by Djeddar Pacha.

MAIMONIDES, or BEN MAIMON, MOSES, one of the most celebrated of the Jewish rabbis, called by the Jews the "eagle of the doctors," and the "lamp of Israel," was b. 1131, at Cordova: was profoundly versed in all the learning of the age, became chief physician to the sultan of Egypt, and d. 1204. His works are, the "Mishna Terah," the "More Nevochim," and the "Peru.

schim." The first is a code of the Jewish law; the second, which was originally written in Arabic, is an explanation of obscure places in Scripture; and the last consists of commentaries on the Mishna.

MAINTENON, FRANCES D'AUBIGNE, marchioness of, who rose to share the throne of France, was b. in the prison of Niort, where her father, Constans d'Aubigné, was confined in 1635. On his release he went with his family to Martinico, and d. there in 1646, leaving his widow so poor, that she returned to Europe without this child, who was sent after her to France, and there taken under the protection of her aunt, Madame Villette, who brought her up in the Protestant persuasion; from which, owing to the interference of her mother, a strict Catholic, she was afterwards converted. Subsequently being left in very reduced circumstances, she married the celebrated poet and novelist, Scarron. On his death, in 1660, she obtained the continuance of his pension, through the interest of madame de Montespan, who also appointed her governess of the children which she had by Louis XIV. This connection brought her merits under the observation of the monarch, who increased her pension; and, in 1679, changed her name to Maintenon, by giving her an estate with that title. Becoming fond of her society, he gradually passed from intimacy to love; Montespan was supplanted; and La Chaise, his confessor, having advised him to sanction his wishes by a secret but formal marriage, it was solemnized in 1685. After her elevation she lived in a sort of retirement from the world. Having founded the school at St. Cyr, for the education of poor girls of good family, she retired to it, after the death of the king, and there passed the remainder of her life. D. 1719.

MAISTRE, JOSEPH, count de, a distinguished supporter of absolutism and the papacy, was b. at Chambéry, in Savoy, 1755. Driven by the invasion of the French from his native country, he took up his residence at St. Petersburg, where he remained till the final fall of Napoleon permitted him to return to France, and thence to Piedmont, where he became minister of state, in 1818. His literary career began in 1796, with his work entitled "Considérations sur la France," in which he combated the revolutionary doctrines then in vogue. In 1810 appeared his "Essai sur le Principe Générateur des Institutions Politiques;" and ten years later he published his most celebrated work, "Du Pape," which may be regarded as the best defence of papal infallibility that has appeared in modern times. Besides these he wrote "Soirées de Saint Petersburg," and "Examen Critique de la Philosophie de Bacon," both posthumous publications. D. 1821.—XAVIER, his younger brother, who repaired also to St. Petersburg during the revolutionary period, gained great celebrity by his "Voyage autour de ma Chambre," "Le Lepreux de la Cité d'Aoste," "Le Prisonnier du Caucase," and "Prascovie," the last being an interesting narrative of filial devotion on the part of a Siberian girl.

MAITLAND, SIR RICHARD, an early Scottish poet, distinguished also as a lawyer and statesman, was b. in 1496. He held the office of a lord of session, and in that capacity he took the title of Lord Lethington, from his estate. He was appointed keeper of the privy seal, in the reign of Queen Mary; which office, as well as his judicial seat he resigned a few years after, and d. 1586.—

WILLIAM, of Lethington, the eldest son of Sir Richard, was secretary of state to Mary queen of Scots.—JOHN, second son of Sir Richard, succeeded his father in the office of lord privy seal, and lost it through his attachment to the interests of the queen. He was afterwards secretary to James VI., and at length chancellor of Scotland. In 1590 he was created Lord Maitland, of Thirlstane. Besides his Scottish poetry in the Maitland collection, he wrote several Latin epigrams, &c.—WILLIAM, an historian and topographer, was b. about 1693, at Brechin, in Forfarshire. He was, originally, a travelling hair-merchant, but turned his talents to literature, gained a competent fortune, and became a member of the Royal and Antiquarian societies. He wrote a "History of London," a "History of Edinburgh," and "The History and Antiquities of Scotland." D. 1757.

MALACKOWSKI, a noble Pole, b. in 1768. He was a friend of Kosciusko, and one of the victims of the partitioners of Poland. He was president of the diet from 1788 to 1792, and chief author of the constitution of 1791.

MALAPERT, CHARLES, a poet and mathematician, was b. at Mons, in 1581, became a Jesuit; and d. in Spain, 1630.

MALBONE, EDWARD G., a distinguished American painter, b. at Newport, R. I., who early displayed a remarkable taste for art, and obtained great reputation at Boston, Philadelphia, Charleston, New York, and London. D. 1807.

MALCOLM, JAMES PELLER, an artist and antiquary, was a native of America, studied painting in England, and eventually became an engraver. He was the author of "Londinium Redivivum," "Anecdotes of the Manners and Customs of London," "First Impressions," &c. D. 1815.—Sir JOHN, a distinguished military officer and diplomatist, was b. near Langholm, Scotland, in 1769. At the age of 14 he went out as a cadet to India. The first service of any importance in which he was engaged, was the siege of Seringapatam, in 1792, where he attracted the notice of Lord Cornwallis. In 1804 he concluded a treaty of alliance with Dowlah Rao Scindia; and continued to display great judgment as the diplomatic agent of the British government in India for several subsequent years. In 1827 he accepted the situation of governor of Bombay, which post he continued to fill till 1831, when he returned to England, and sat in parliament for the borough of Launceston. As an author, Sir John Malcolm also attained considerable celebrity, as may be seen in his "History of Persia," "Sketches of Persia," "Memoirs of Central India," "The Administration of British India," &c. D. 1833.

MALEBRANCHE, NICHOLAS, a French priest and celebrated philosopher, was b. at Paris, in 1638; and at the age of 22, being determined to embrace the monastic life, was admitted into the congregation of the Oratory. His attention was first directed to metaphysics by perusing Descartes' "Treatise on Man," and he immediately became a devoted partisan of the Cartesian philosophy. His famous treatise "On the Search after Truth," was first printed in 1673, and is principally distinguished by the maintenance of a mysterious union between God and the soul of man, and the doctrine that the human mind immediately perceives God, and sees all things in him. Malebranche also wrote several other works, among which are, a "Treatise on Nature and Grace," "Christian Conversations," and "Dialogues on Metaphysics and Religion." He was highly venerated for his elevated genius, and nothing could be more amiable and simple than his conversation and manners. D. 1715.

MALESHERBES, CHRISTIAN WILLIAM DE LAMOIGNON DE an eminent French statesman, was b. at Paris, in 1721. He succeeded his father as president of the court of aids; besides which he had the superintendence of the press, in which office he acted with great lenity. In 1771, on the abolition of the legal constitution, Malesherbes was banished to his country seat; but he was recalled three years afterwards, and made minister of state, which post he soon resigned, and then went to Switzerland. In 1786 he was again called to the councils of his sovereign, Louis XVI., when he drew up two memoirs, "On the Calamities of France, and the Means of repairing them;" but his advice was rejected, and he retired to his country house, where he employed himself in agricultural pursuits. He however hastened, of his own accord, to plead the cause of his sovereign in 1792; and he was one of the last who took leave of him before his execution. This attachment to a fallen master excited the jealousy of the French rulers, and caused his destruction. Shortly after his return home, his daughter, madame de Rosambo, and her husband were arrested, and conducted to Paris; and his own arrest, with that of his grandchildren, soon followed. Almost his whole family were extirpated by the merciless proscription of his persecutors. Malesherbes was beheaded, April 22, 1794.

MALHERBE, FRANCIS DE, a French poet, was b. at Caen, about 1555; bore arms in the troops of the League, was pensioned by Henry IV., and d. in 1628. His works consist of paraphrases on the psalms, sonnets, odes, and epigrams. He also translated some of Seneca's letters; and may be considered as one of the first who gave to French poetry its polish and regularity.

MALIBRAN DE BERIOT, MARIA FELICITAS, a celebrated vocal performer, was the eldest daughter of Manuel Garcia, a well-known tenor singer of the Italian opera, and was b. in Paris, in 1808. At the early age of 16, she made her debut as prima donna at the opera. This was in 1825. During the following year she accompanied her father to this country, where her union with M. Malibran, an elderly French merchant, took place. Shortly after their marriage, her husband failed, and was thrown into prison; and Madame Malibran, believing she had been deceived, separated from him, and voluntarily giving into the hands of his creditors her marriage settlement, returned to Europe. Intense study, the love of her art, and the motives she had for exertion, had already made her a performer of unrivalled excellence. In March, 1836, Malame Malibran then in Paris, having been freed, by the French courts, from the bondage of her union with Monsieur Malibran, was married to Monsieur de Beriot, a Belgian, whose extraordinary ability as a violinist had placed him in the highest rank of his profession. In May following, she resumed her English performances at Drury-lane theatre; and, at the close of the season, she accompanied her husband to Brussels, and other cities on the Continent. But the end of her career was fast approaching. Having been engaged for the Manchester grand musical festival, she arrived in that town on the 11th of September, and, though evidently indisposed, commenced her arduous task the next day. Her illness rapidly increased; and, though she endeavored to conceal it, by sustaining her part with the apparent vigor of health and unusual energy, she sank under the effort. On Wednesday, the 14th, her last notes in public were heard, in the duet, "Vanne se alberghi in petto," from "Andronico," with Madame Caradori Allan. D. Sept. 23d.

MALLET, DAVID, whose real name was MALLOCH, a poet and miscellaneous writer, was b. about 1700, at Crief, in Perthshire. His first publication was the ballad of "William and Margaret," which was followed by "The Excursion," a poem, and, in 1731, he produced the tragedy of "Eurydice." Soon after this, he formed an acquaintance with Pope, who introduced him to Bolingbroke, and about the same time he was appointed under-secretary to the prince of Wales. In 1739 his play of "Mustapha" was performed with success, and the next year he wrote, in conjunction with Thomson, the masque of "Alfred." He also published a "Life of Lord Bacon," and the works of Bolingbroke, who left them to him as a legacy, and in whose skepticism he participated. D. 1765.—PAUL HENRY, an historian and antiquary, was b. at Geneva, in 1730; was successively professor of belles lettres at Copenhagen and at Geneva. Being deprived of his fortune during the first revolutionary war, he for some time received pensions from the landgrave of Hesse and the duke of Brunswick, of which he was deprived by the late war. His merit as an antiquary was very great. Among his works are, Histories of "Denmark," "Hesse," "the Swiss," "the Hanseatic League," and "the House of Brunwick," and an "Introduction to the History of Denmark," which Dr. Percy translated, under the title of "Northern Antiquities." D. 1807.

MALMESBURY, WILLIAM OF, an English historian, who flourished in the 12th century, was b. in Somersetshire, educated at Oxford, became a monk of Malmesbury, and was elected librarian of the monastery. His "De Regibus Anglorum" is a general history of England, from the arrival of the Saxons, in 449, to the 26th Henry I., in 1126. He also wrote a "History of his Own Times," from that year to the escape of the Empress Maud from Oxford, in 1143; an "Ecclesiastical History of England," "The Antiquities of Glastonbury," and a "Life of St. Aldhelm." D. 1143.—JAMES HARRIS, earl of, a distinguished diplomatist, the only son of the author of "Hermes," was b. at Salisbury, 1746. He commenced his diplomatic career as secretary of embassy at Madrid, in 1767. Here he displayed such talent and firmness in conducting the management of the transfer of the Falkland Islands to Great Britain, that he was appointed minister at the court of Berlin; and from this period, with few interruptions, down to the close of the century, he bore a large share in all the great diplomatic transactions of the time. D. 1820.

MALONE, EDMUND, a dramatic critic and miscellaneous writer, was the son of an Irish judge, and b. at Dublin, in 1741. He studied at Trinity college and the Inner Temple, and in 1767 was called to the bar, but being possessed of an independent fortune, he retired from the profession, and devoted himself to literature. In 1780 he published two supplementary volumes to Steevens's Shakspeare, and a detection of Chatterton's forgeries. In 1790 appeared his edition of Shakspeare, and in 1795 he exposed the imposture of the Irelands. He also published a "Life of Sir Joshua Reynolds," prefixed to his writings; a "Life of Dryden," and a "Biographical Sketch of the Right Hon. William Wyndham." D. 1812.

MALPIGHI, MARCELLUS, an eminent Italian physician and anatomist. His discoveries in anatomy were considerable, particularly respecting the liver and kidneys, but his merit is still higher as a vegetable anatomist and physiologist. B. 1628; d. 1694.

MALTE-BRUN, CONRAD, a poet, geographer, and political writer, was b. in 1775, at Thyé, in the isle of Jutland. Having given offence by his writings in favor of the liberty of the press, and the enfranchisement of the peasants, he was banished to Sweden in 1796. After having resided for a time at Stockholm, he went to Paris, where he acquired great reputation, particularly as a geographer. He edited the foreign political department of the "Journal des Débats," was a contributor to the "Biographie Universelle," and produced various works; among these are his "Précis de la Géographie Universelle," "Tableau de la Pologne Ancienne et Moderne," "Poems," &c. He also published, in conjunction with Mentelle, "Géographie Mathématique, Physique, et Politique." D. 1826.

MALTHUS, THOMAS ROBERT, author of a famous, or perhaps some would have us say, an infamous "Essay on Population," full of learning and ability, was b. in Albury, Surrey, in 1766, and educated at Cambridge. He was appointed professor of history and political economy in the college of the East India Company at Haileybury, and continued to hold that situation till his death. His system is founded on the hypothesis, that population increases in a geometrical, while provisions only increase in an arithmetical, ratio. D. 1846.

MALUS, STEPHEN LOUIS, a French mathematician and experimental philosopher, was b. at Paris, in 1775, became a professor in the Polytechnic school, and subsequently served as an officer of engineers, on the Rhine, in 1797, and under Bonaparte in Egypt, where he much distinguished himself. After this he entered on a course of experiments on the phenomena of optics, and ultimately discovered the polarization of light. This discovery, the greatest since that of the achromatic telescope, gained him admission into the institute, he also received the gold medal of the Royal Society, and honors flowed in upon him from all quarters. D. 1812.

MALVASIA, CHARLES CÆSAR, an Italian ecclesiastic, author of "A History of the Painters of Bologna," and a work entitled "Marmoræ Fulvinae."

MAMBRUN, PETER, a French Jesuit, was b. in the diocese of Clermont, 1581, and d. 1661. He is celebrated for his Latin "Eclogues," and "Georgics."

MAN, CORNELIUS DE, a Dutch historical and portrait painter. B. 1621; d. 1706.

MANCO CAPAC, the founder of the Peruvian empire, and the first of its inca, reigned, as is supposed, about 400 years before the Spanish invasion in 1532. According to the tradition of the natives, he first appeared with Mama Oella his wife, and sister, in an island of the lake Titicana, and declared themselves to be children of the sun, sent down to civilize them. He is said to have instructed the natives in religion, agriculture, and the useful arts; to have founded Cuzco, and to have ruled long and prosperously over a grateful people. It is probable he was a stranger from some civilized land, who suddenly appeared in Peru, and employed religion in order to procure an ascendancy, which enabled him to form a regular government.

MANDEVILLE, Sir JOHN, an English traveller, was b. at St. Alban's, about the beginning of the 14th century; left his native country in 1332, to proceed on his peregrinations; spent 34 years in visiting various countries; and on his return, published an account of his travels; but the wonders he describes have thrown such an air of improbability over his narrative, as to stagger the belief of the most credulous. D. 1372.—

BERNARD, a Dutch physician, was b. at Dort, about 1670. He settled in London at the beginning of the 18th century, and published, in 1709, a licentious book, entitled "The Virgin Unmasked." In 1711 appeared his treatise on "Hypochondria and Hysteric Passions;" but the work by which he is most known is his "Fable of the Bees, or Private Vices made Public Benefits." He was also the author of "An Inquiry into the Origin of Honor," "Free Thoughts on Religion," &c. D. 1733.

MANES, or MANICHÆUS, the founder of a Christian sect, called, after him, Manicheans, was a native of Persia, and b. about the year 239. He obtained the tenets, which made his name famous, from the books of Seythians, an Arabian, who maintained two co-eternal principles, one good and the other evil. Upon this stock, Manes set up as an heresiarch, blending with the philosophy of Seythians, or rather of Empedocles, some notions, partly Christian, and partly heathen. He rejected the Old Testament, and taught that Christ had come to save mankind, and that he himself was the Paraclete announced in the New Testament. He also pretended to the gift of healing; but failing to cure the son of the king of Persia, he was flayed alive, and his body given to the dogs, A. D. 278.

MANETHO, an ancient Egyptian historian, who was high priest of Heliopolis, in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, about 304 B. C. He wrote the history of his country in Greek, and pretended to have taken it from the sacred inscriptions on the pillars of Hermes Trismegistus.

MANFREDI, EUSTACHIO, an eminent mathematician and astronomer, b. at Bologna, in 1674. He was appointed professor of mathematics in 1698; placed at the head of the college of Montalto, in 1704; and afterwards nominated astronomer to the Institute of Bologna. He was a member of the French Academy of Sciences, and of the Royal Society of London. D. 1739.

MANILIUS, MARCUS, a Roman poet, who flourished in the Augustan age. He undertook a didactic poem, of which we have but five books, entitled "Astronomica."

MANLEY, DE LA REVIÈRE, was the daughter of Sir Roger Manley, governor of Guernsey, a gentleman who suffered much for his adherence to Charles I., and also distinguished himself as a writer. She was left to the care of a cousin, who seduced her under the mask of a pretended marriage, and then abandoned her. Being thus dependent on her own exertions for support, she became a dramatic and political writer. Her first effort was "The Royal Mistress," a tragedy, which was successful. She then composed "The New Atalantes," in which, under feigned names, and with much warmth and freedom, she relates the amours and adventures, real and supposed, of many distinguished persons of the day. For the libels contained in this work she was committed to the custody of a messenger, but afterwards admitted to bail; and a tory administration succeeding, she lived in high reputation and gaiety. She was also employed in writing for Queen Anne's ministry; and when Swift relinquished the "Examiner," she continued it for a considerable time with great spirit. Besides the works before mentioned, she wrote "Lucius," a tragedy; "The Lost Lover," a comedy; "Memoirs of Europe towards the close of the Eighteenth Century," "Court Intrigues," "Adventures of Rivelle," &c. D. 1724.

MANLY, JOHN, a captain in the navy of the United States, received a naval commission from Washington, in 1775. Invested with the command of the schooner Lee, he kept the hazardous station of Massachusetts bay, during a most tempestuous season, and the captures which he made were of immense value at the moment. An ordnance brig, which fell into his hands, supplied the continental army with heavy pieces, mortars, and working tools, of which it was very destitute, and in the event led to the evacuation of Boston. Being raised to the command of the frigate Hancock, of 32 guns, his capture of the Fox increased his high reputation for bravery and skill. But he was taken prisoner by the Rainbow, July 8, 1777, and suffered a long and rigorous confinement on board that ship at Halifax, and in Mill prison, precluded from further actual service till near the close of the war. In September, 1782, the Hague frigate was intrusted to his care. A few days after leaving Martinique, he was driven by a British seventy-four on a sand bank at the back of Guadaloupe. Three ships of the line, having joined this ship, came to within point blank shot, and with springs on their cables, opened a most tremendous fire. Having supported the heavy cannonade for three days, on the fourth day the frigate was got off, and hoisting the continental standard on the main-top gallant mast, 13 guns were fired in farewell defiance. On his return to Boston a few months afterwards, he was arrested to answer a variety of charges exhibited against him by one of his officers. The proceedings of the court were not altogether in approval of his conduct. D. in Boston, 1793, aged 59.

MANNING, OWEN, an English antiquary and topographer, was a native of Northamptonshire; was educated at Queen's college, Cambridge; entered into orders, and became a prebendary of Lincoln, and vicar of Godalming. His principal literary labors are, "Dictionarium Saxonico et Gothico-Latinum, auctore Edvardo Lye, edidit et auxit O. M.," and the "History and Antiquities of Surrey;" published posthumously, by Mr. Bray. D. 1801.

MANSART, FRANCIS, a French architect; b. 1598; d. 1666. He built several churches, and other public structures at Paris.—JULES-HURDOUTIN, his nephew, was also an excellent architect, and the superintendent of the royal edifices. He built the palaces of Versailles, Marly, and the Great Trianon; the Hospital of the Invalides, &c.

MANSFIELD, WILLIAM MURRAY, earl of, the fourth son of David, Lord Stormont, was b. at Perth, in Scotland, in 1705. He became a student at Lincoln's Inn, and, after the usual term of probation, was called to the bar, gradually making his way to eminence. In 1742 he was made solicitor-general; two years afterwards he was created chief justice of the King's Bench; and, in 1776, he was advanced to the dignity of an earl of Great Britain. During the riots in London, June, 1780, his house was attacked by the anti-Catholic mob, and his valuable collection of books and manuscripts fell a sacrifice to the fury of the multitude, by whom the mansion was burnt to the ground. He continued for some years longer to exercise his judicial functions, but resigned in 1788, and passed the remainder of his life in retirement. At the commencement of the reign of George III., he was assailed with the utmost virulence by patriots of the day, particularly in the affair of Wilkes; while Junius poured upon him a torrent of malignant slander, which he bore with dignified silence. As a politician, Lord Mansfield inclined to the absurd maxims of toryism, but as a judge he was acute, liberal, and disinterested. D. in 1783.

- MANSI, JOHN DOMINIC, a learned Italian prelate, and an indefatigable antiquary, was b. at Lucca, in 1692. He was several years professor of divinity at Naples, and in 1765 was made archbishop of Lucca, where he d. in 1769. His principal works are, a Latin translation of "Calmet's History of the Bible," with additions; "De Veteri et Nova Ecclesiæ Disciplina," "Commentaries on the Bible," an edition of "Baronius's Annals," another of the "Councils," an edition of "Æneas Sylvius's Orations," and one of Fabricius's "Bibliotheca Latina mediæ et infimæ Ætatis."

- MANT, RICHARD, bishop of Down, Connor, and Dromore, was b. at Southampton, where his father was rector of the church of All-Saints, 1776. In 1815 he became rector of St. Botolph's, Bishopsgate-street, and, three years later, vicar of East Horsley, Surrey. In 1820 he was consecrated bishop of Killaloe, and translated to the see of Down and Connor in 1823; the care of the diocese of Dromore devolving upon him in 1842, on the death of the last bishop, Dr. Laurie. During his long life, Dr. Mant was constantly engaged in authorship, chiefly on subjects connected with his professional duties. D. 1848.

- MANTEGNA, ANDREA, an eminent painter, was b. at Padua, in 1431; and studied under Squarcione His chief residence was at Mantua, where he was much employed in oil and fresco; but he worked a great deal at Rome, and produced some admired paintings there. He had great influence on the style of his age, and distinguished himself highly in the art of perspective. D. 1505.

MANUEL, JACQUES ANTOINE, one of the most eloquent and intrepid defenders of French liberty, was b. in 1775, at Barcelonette, in the department of the Lower Alps. He entered as a volunteer in one of the battalions of the requisition, in 1793, and rose to the rank of captain. After the peace of Campo Formio, he quitted the army, studied law, was admitted to the bar at Aix, and soon acquired a high reputation for talent. In 1815 he was elected to the chamber of deputies, which was convoked by Napoleon, and after the abdication of that monarch, strenuously contended for the rights of his son. In 1818 he was elected a member of the chamber of deputies by three departments, and became one of the most formidable opponents of the ministers. He was fervid and ardent in the cause of the party to which he had attached himself; but having used some violent expressions in his first speech, in the session of 1823, on the subject of the Spanish war, his expulsion was loudly demanded; the result of which was that a body of the gendarmerie was introduced to arrest him. Manuel was again chosen to the chamber of deputies, in 1824, and d. 1827.

MANUTIUS, ALDRUS, a celebrated Italian printer and author, was b. at Bassano, in 1447; became tutor to Alberto Pio, prince of Carpi; and in 1488 established a printing office at Venice. He printed numerous valuable editions of Greek and Latin classics; compiled a Greek and Latin Dictionary and Grammar; and was the inventor of the Italic character, hence called Aldine, for the exclusive use of which, for a term of years, he obtained a patent. D. 1515.—PAOLO, son of the preceding, distinguished as a classical scholar, no less than a printer, was b. at Venice, in 1512, and d. 1574.—ALDO, the younger, was a son of Paolo, and equally celebrated as his father and grandfather. He was b. in 1547, and d. in 1597; and with him expired the glory of the Aldine press.

MANVEL, FRANCIS, a celebrated Portuguese lyric poet, b. at Lisbon, in 1734. He was the author of many odes, and other poems; was compelled to fly from his country to avoid the Inquisition, and d. at Versailles, in 1821.

MAPLETOFT, DR. JOHN, a very learned English medical and theological writer. B. 1631; d. 1721.

MARA, ELIZABETH, a celebrated public singer, whose maiden name was Schmelling, was b. in 1750, at Cassel, in Germany. She commenced her musical education by playing on the violin; but as she grew up, she cultivated her vocal talents, and attained an almost unrivalled degree of excellence. On her arrival at Berlin she sang before Frederick the Great, and though he had previously declared that he should as soon expect pleasure from the neighing of a horse as from a German singer, yet he was soon convinced of the excellence of the fair vocalist, whom he put to the test, by selecting the most difficult airs in his collection, which she executed at sight, with the utmost facility. She afterwards visited Italy, Switzerland, England, France, and Russia. Madame Mara left England in 1802, and went to reside in Russia; and when that country was invaded by Napoleon in 1812, she became a sufferer, in consequence of the destruction of her property at the conflagration of Moscow. About the beginning of 1820 she revisited England, and gave a concert at the opera house; but age had weakened her powers, and this once matchless singer exhibited only the relics of her former greatness. D. 1833.

MARAT, JOHN PAUL, was b. in 1744, at Baudry, in the province of Neuchâtel, in Switzerland. In his youth he applied himself to the study of medicine and anatomy; and settling in Paris, attracted notice as an empiric and vender of medicines. But his ambition led him to desire a more extensive popularity, and he wrote a work, which had for its title "Man, or Principles and Laws, showing the Influence of the Soul and the Body in their Relations to each other." He also published a daily paper, called, "L'Ami du Peuple." He then became president of the assembly of deputies in Paris, and in that capacity indulged his thirst for human blood. He denounced the generals of the French army as traitors to their country, and put the members of the convention under arrest. It was at this time that Charlotte Corday resolved to rid the world of its greatest monster, and he was stabbed by this enthusiastic young woman, July, 1793.

MARATTI, CARLO, an eminent painter, was b. in 1625, at Camerino, in the papal territory. He became an early pupil of Andrea Sacchi; and on account of his habit of painting female saints, was nicknamed, by Salvator Rosa, Carluccio della Madonna. He was also a good architect and an engraver; was knighted by Clement XI., who gave him a pension. D. 1718.—MARIA, his daughter, who married J. B. Zappi, was also a good artist and poetess.

MARBECK, JOHN, a musician of the 16th century, supposed to have been the first composer of the cathedral service of the church of England. He was organist at St. George's chapel, Windsor; and author of a "Concordance of the Bible," "The Lives of the Saints, Prophets, and Patriarchs," &c.

MARCELLUS, CLAUDIUS, the first Roman general who successfully encountered Hannibal in the second Punic war. Soon after the fatal battle of Cannæ, he was sent against that distinguished commander, and forced the Carthaginians to retreat, with a loss. He afterwards went to Sicily, where the siege of Syracuse was his most remarkable achievement. Marcellus fell in a sanguinary battle with his former opponent, 209 B. C., when Hannibal caused the body to be burnt with distinguished honors, and sent the ashes to his son in a costly urn.

MARCET, ALEXANDER, an eminent physician and natural philosopher, was b. at Geneva, in 1770; studied at Edinburgh, and settled in London, where he obtained great reputation as a medical practitioner and public lecturer. He was naturalized in England in 1802, but returned to his own country in 1814. He was the author of "An Essay on the Chemical History of Calculi," and of many valuable papers in the "Philosophical Transactions," &c. D. 1822.

MARCION, a heretic of the 2d century, was a native of Synope, on the Euxine. He espoused the notions of Cerdo, to which he added the doctrine of Manes, and some peculiarities of his own.

MARETS, SAMUEL DE, was a native of Picardy, and surnamed "The Little Preacher," from his diminutive stature. He was an eminent controversialist of the reformed church in the 17th century, and from his erudition and ability made a distinguished figure among the polemics of the day. He wrote a variety of theological works, particularly an excellent "System of Divinity." D. 1663.

MARGARET OF ANJOU, daughter of René d'Anjou, king of Naples, and wife of Henry VI., king of England, was an ambitious, enterprising, courageous woman. Intrepid in the field, she signaled herself by heading her troops in several battles against the house of York; and if she had not been the instrument of her husband's misfortunes, by putting to death the duke of Gloucester, his uncle, her name would have been immortalized for the fortitude, activity, and policy with which she supported the rights of her husband and son. The fatal defeat at Tewkesbury, however, put an end to all her enterprises; the king being taken prisoner, and Prince Edward, their only son, basely murdered by Richard, duke of Gloucester. Margaret was ransomed by her father for 50,000 crowns, and d. 1482.—OF FRANCE, queen of Navarre, daughter of Henry II., was b. in 1552, and ranked as one of the greatest beauties of her age, with talents and accomplishments corresponding to the charms of her person. She married Henry, then prince of Béarn, but afterwards king of France. D. 1615.—OF VALOIS, queen of Naples, and sister to Francis I., king of France, was the daughter of Charles of Orleans, duke of Angoulême, and b. in 1492. In 1509 she married Charles, duke of Alençon. Her next husband was Henry d'Albret, king of Navarre, by whom she had Joan d'Albret, mother of Henry IV. She was the authoress of some poetical pieces, and of a tract, entitled "The Mirror of the Sinful Soul," which was condemned as heretical by the Sorbonne. A volume of tales, entitled "Heptameron, ou Sept Journées de la Reyne de Navarre," which were written by her during the gayety of youth, are as free in their tendency as those of Boccaccio; and it certainly, at the present day, appears somewhat extraordinary, that a princess so pious and contemplative, should be their author. D. 1549.

MARIA LOUISA, ex-empress of the French, wife of Napoleon, was the eldest daughter of Francis I., emperor of Austria, and of his second wife, Maria Theresa of Naples, and was b. 1791. In 1810 she was married to the emperor, then in the zenith of his power; in 1811 she presented her husband with a son—afterwards called king of Rome—to the great joy of the French nation; and in 1813, on his departure to the army, she was nominated regent. In 1814 she refused to accompany Napoleon to Elba on the plea of ill-health; and having obtained by treaty with the allied powers, the duchies of Parma and Placentia, &c., she repaired thither with her chamberlain, Count Neipperg, for whom she had conceived an attachment, and whom she subsequently married. D. 1847.

MARIA THERESA, queen of Hungary and Bohemia, archduchess of Austria, and empress of Germany, daughter of the emperor Charles VI., was b. at Vienna, 1717, and in 1739, married Duke Francis Stephen of Lorraine, who in 1737, became grand-duke of Tuscany. The day after her father's death, she ascended the throne of Hungary, Bohemia, and Austria, and declared her husband joint ruler. D. 1780.

MARINI, JOHN BAPTIST, an Italian poet, was b. at Naples in 1569. He was bred to the law, which he abandoned for literature. His principal poem is an heroic, entitled "Adone," but he wrote many others. D. 1625.

MARION, FRANCIS, a distinguished officer in the revolutionary war, was a native of South Carolina. He was engaged in agricultural pursuits until the year 1759, when he became a soldier, and served with credit against the Cherokee Indians. As soon as the war between the mother country and the colonies broke out, he was called to the command of a company in his native state. In 1776 he co-operated bravely in the defence of Fort Moultrie, and soon reached the rank of lieutenant-colonel commandant of a regiment, in which capacity he acted during the siege of Charleston. He became, subsequently, brigadier-general in the militia of South Carolina, and as such was an indefatigable and most useful partisan. The country from Camden to the sea-coast, between the Pedee and Santee rivers, was the scene of his operations. Many very striking and characteristic anecdotes of his prowess and habits are related of him; and in addition to his distinction in partisan warfare, he acquired much reputation in conducting the sieges of the captured posts held by the enemy. At Georgetown, Fort Watson, Fort Mose, Granby, Parker's ferry, and Eutaw, he highly distinguished himself. D. 1795.

MARIUS, CARUS, a celebrated Roman general and demagogue, who was seven times consul. He first distinguished himself at the siege of Numantia; afterwards went to Africa as lieutenant to the consul Metellus; superseded his commander, and obtained the consulship himself, when he subdued Jugurtha, king of Numidia, whom he conducted in triumph to Rome. After this he served against the Cimbri and other barbarous nations, who had poured their myriads into Italy. In his sixth consulate he had Sylla for his rival, who marched to Rome with his army, and a civil war commenced to decide their superiority. Defeated by his rival, Marius wandered about on the coasts of Italy, and, after escaping several times, was found by some horsemen in a marsh. He was conducted naked to Minturnæ, where the magistrate, after some deliberation, resolved to obey the orders of the senate and of Sylla. But the Cimbrian slave, to whom the execution was intrusted, awed by the look and words of Marius, dropped his sword, and the people of Minturnæ, moved with compassion, conducted him to the coast, whence a vessel conveyed him to Africa. Here he remained till his party had once more triumphed in Italy, when he was recalled by Cinna and Sertorius, who making themselves masters of Rome, a terrible proscription took place. Marius enjoyed the dignity of consul for the seventh time, 86 B. C., and d. shortly after, aged 80.—THE YOUNGER, had all the determined character of his father. He usurped the consular dignity, 82 B. C., but was defeated by Sylla, and slew himself at Præneste.

MARIVAUX, PETER CARLET DE CHAMBLAIN DE, a celebrated dramatist and novelist, was b. at Paris, in 1688. His father, who was director of the mint at Riom, gave him an excellent education, and his own talents and social merits gained him many friends. The drama first attracted his attention, and he was the author of about 30 pieces; but it is as a novelist that he is chiefly known to the world of letters. Of these, "Le Paysan Parvenu," "Marianne," and "Le Philosophe Indigent," are accounted the principal. He also wrote "Le Spectateur François," &c. D. 1763.

MARLBOROUGH, JOHN CHURCHILL, duke of, was the son of Sir Winston Churchill, of Ashe, in Devonshire, where he was b. 1650. At the age of 12 years he was taken from school, to be a page to the duke of York, who, in 1666, gave him a pair of colors in the guards. His first service was at the siege of Tangier; and at his return to England, he became the favorite of the duchess of

Cleveland, who gave him £5000, with which he purchased an annuity for life. He served afterwards under the great Turenne, and distinguished himself so gallantly at the siege of Maestricht, that the king of France publicly thanked him at the head of the regiment. On his return to England he was made lieutenant-colonel, gentleman of the bed-chamber, and master of the robes to the duke of York, whom he attended to Holland and Scotland; and about this time he married Miss Jennings, maid of honor to the princess, afterwards Queen Anne. In 1682 he was shipwrecked with the duke of York, in their passage to Scotland. The same year he was made a peer, by the title of Baron Eyemouth; and when James came to the crown, he was sent to France to notify the event. In 1685 he was created Lord Churchill, of Sandridge. The same year he suppressed Monmouth's rebellion, and took him prisoner. He continued to serve King James with great fidelity, till the arrival of the prince of Orange, who created him earl of Marlborough in 1689, and appointed him commander-in-chief of the English army in the Low Countries. He next served in Ireland, and reduced Cork, Kinsale, and other strong places. But in 1692 he was suddenly dismissed from his employments, and committed to the Tower, on suspicion, not wholly groundless, of plotting to restore the exiled monarch. After the death of Queen Mary he was restored to favor; and at the close of that reign he had the command of the English forces in Holland, and was appointed ambassador extraordinary to the States, who chose him captain-general of their forces. On the commencement of Queen Anne's reign, he recommended a war with France and Spain, which advice was adopted. In the campaign of 1702, he took a number of strong towns, particularly Liege, and returning to England the following winter, received the thanks of both houses, and a dukedom. In 1704 he joined Prince Eugene, with whom he encountered the French and Bavarians at Hochstedt, and obtained a complete victory. On the 15th of May, 1706, he fought the famous battle of Ramillies, which accelerated the fall of Louvain, Brussels, and other important places; and arriving in England in November, received fresh honors and grants from the queen and parliament. In 1709 he defeated Marshal Villars, at Malplaquet, for which victory a general thanksgiving was solemnized. In the winter of 1711 he returned to England, and soon after, through party intrigues, was dismissed from all his employments. D. 1722.

MARLOE, or MARLOWE, CHRISTOPHER, an eminent poet and dramatist of the Elizabethan age, was educated at Cambridge, afterwards settled in London, and became an actor as well as a writer for the stage. Besides six tragedies of his own composition, and one written jointly with Nashe, he left translations from Ovid, Lucan, and others. His powers as a tragic writer were of a high order, and some passages in his plays are fraught with exquisite beauty. D. 1593.

MARMONTEL, JOHN FRANCIS, a distinguished French writer, b. in 1723, at Bort, in the Limousin, was the eldest son of a large family in humble life; and was educated at the Jesuits' college at Mauriac. He first settled at Toulouse, but being persuaded by Voltaire to try his fortune at Paris, he went there in 1745. By his tragedies of "Dionysius" and "Aristomenes," and other popular works, he soon gained reputation; and being patronized by madame de Pompadour, he received the appointment of secretary to the royal buildings. Soon after, he became connected with D'Alembert and Diderot in the Encyclopédie. He also had a share in the Mercure François, in which his "Tales" first appeared; but having written a satire on the duke d'Aumont, he was sent to the Bastille; from which, however, he was liberated in a few days, and in 1763 he obtained a place in the Academy, of which he afterwards became perpetual secretary. In 1797 he was chosen a representative to the national assembly for the department of the Eure; but his election being subsequently declared null, he again retired to his cottage, where he d. of apoplexy, in 1799, aged 76. His "Moral Tales," "Belisarius," "The Incas," his own "Memoirs," and "Elements of Literature," are his most esteemed works.

MAROT, CLEMENT, an eminent French poet, was b. at Cahors in 1495. Having accompanied the duke of Alençon to Italy, he was wounded and taken prisoner at the battle of Pavia; was afterwards persecuted for his attachment to the Protestant religion, and d. in 1544. As a poet he was superior to any of his countrymen who had gone before him, and greatly excelled all his cotemporaries.—FRANCIS, a painter, was the pupil of La Fosse, and an associate and professor of the French academy of painting. D. 1719.

MARRYAT, Captain FREDERIC, the most popular of England's naval novelists, was b. 1786. His first work was the "Naval Officer," published in 1829. This was followed in 1830 by the "King's Own," and in 1832 appeared "Newton Foster," a great improvement on the two former works, and "Peter Simple." Then came "Jacob Faithful," "Mr. Midshipman Easy," "Mastermar Ready," "The Pacla of many Tales," "Japhet in search of a Father," "Poor Jack," "The Pirate and Three Cutters," "Snarleyow," "Percival Keene," &c.; besides the "Phantom Ship" and "Joseph Rushbrook." In 1837 he paid a visit to the United States, and on his return he published his "Diary in America," which reflected severely on our national character. This was followed by three additional volumes, and by his "Travels of Monsieur Violet." D. 1848.

MARS, Mademoiselle, a great French comedian, was b. 1779. She made her debut at the early age of 13, and enjoyed the rare privilege of retaining the public favor till an advanced age, having kept the boards of the Théâtre Français at Paris, where she had gained innumerable triumphs, till 1841, when she retired in her 63d year. D. 1847.

MARSH, JAMES, president of the university of Vermont, and professor of philosophy there, was b. at Hartford, Ct., 1794. He was educated to theology at Andover, afterwards a professor of languages at Hampden Sydney college, and distinguished himself through life for his fine scholarship and profound thought. His preliminary essay to Coleridge's "Aid to Reflection," is a masterly piece of philosophical discussion. D. 1847.

MARSHALL, JOHN, chief justice of the United States, was b. in Fauquier county, Virginia, on the 24th September, 1755. He had some classical instruction in his youth, yet his opportunities for learning were very limited; and he never had the benefit of a regular education at any college. At the commencement of the revolutionary war, he engaged with ardor in the American cause; in 1776, he received an appointment of first lieutenant; and in 1777 he was promoted to the rank of captain. He fought against Lord Dunmore in the battle of Great-bridge, and was afterwards in the battles of Brandywine, Germantown, and Monmouth. He was a member of the convention called together in Virginia for the ratification of the constitution of the United States, and on this occasion he greatly distinguished himself by his powerful reasoning and eloquence; as he did also, subsequently, as a member of the legislature of Virginia, in the discussions relating to the treaty negotiated by Mr. Jay. He was envoy to France, in connection with General Pinckney and Mr. Gerry. The envoys, however, were not accredited; and in the summer of 1798, Mr. Marshall returned to the United States. He became a member of congress in 1799; in 1800 he was appointed to the office of secretary of war; soon afterwards he succeeded Col. Pickering as secretary of state; and on the resignation of Chief Justice Ellsworth, he became, by nomination of Mr. Adams, and the confirmation of the senate, on the 31st January, 1801, chief justice of the United States, and from that time till his death, he continued to fill the office with distinguished reputation. D. July 6th, 1836.

MARSTON, JOHN, an English dramatist, who lived in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I., and was upon terms of intimacy with Ben Jonson. He was educated at Oxford, became lecturer at the Middle Temple, and d. subsequently to 1633. He wrote eight plays, and three books of satires, called the "Scourge of Villany."

MARSY, FRANCIS MARIA DE, a French writer, was expelled the society of Jesuits on account of his opinions; and he was also sent to the Bastille for publishing an "Analysis of Bayle," in which he selected the worst part of that author's dictionary. His other works are, a "History of Mary Stuart," "Dictionary of Painting and Architecture," "Le Rabelais Moderne," and "The Modern History," intended as a continuation to Rollin's "Ancient History." D. 1763.

MARTELLI, PETER JAMES, an eminent Italian poet, was b. at Bologna, in 1665; was at first a professor of belles lettres in the university there, and afterwards secretary to Cardinal Aldrovandi. His works consist of several discourses on the art of poetry, "Dialogues on Ancient and Modern Tragedy," and "Tragedies." D. 1727.

MARTIAL or MARCUS VALERIUS MARTIALIS, a Latin poet, and the most celebrated of all epigrammatists, was a native of Spain, but went to Rome in his 20th year, and obtained the favor of Domitian, who conferred on him many favors, and raised him to the office of tribune. On the death of that emperor he returned to his native country, where he d. A. D. 104.

MARTIN, AIME, a distinguished French writer and critic, was b. at Lyons, 1786. At an early age he repaired to Paris, where he soon gained a livelihood by his pen, at one time writing in the columns of the Journal des Débats; at another, editing the works of La Rochefoucauld, Racine, and Fenelon; and he at last became professor of belles lettres at the Polytechnic school, and librarian at Sainte G n vi ve. At once the pupil and friend of Bernard St. Pierre, he collected and published his works, defended his memory from hostile attacks, married his widow, and adopted his daughter Virginia. His "Lettres   Sophie sur la Physique, la Chimie, et l'Histoire Naturelle," were highly popular; and his work on the "Education des M res de Famille" was crowned by the institute. D. 1847.

MARTINE, GEORGE, a physician, was b. in Scotland, in 1702; took his doctor's degree at Leyden, after which he commenced practice at St. Andrew's; but, in 1740, he accompanied Lord Cathcart to America, where he d. 1743. He was the author of "Tractatus de Similibus Animalibus, et Animalium Colore," and "Essays, Medical and Philosophical."

MARTINI, JOHN BAPTIST, a skillful musical composer, was b. at Bologna, in 1706, and d. 1784. He wrote a "History of Music;" also, an "Essay on Counterpoint," &c. He was chapel-master to a convent of Friars Minim; and from the school of Martini issued some of the finest composers in Italy.—MARTIN, a Jesuit and missionary of the 17th century, was a native of Trent. He went as a missionary to China, where he remained many years, and returned to Europe in 1651. The result of his observations are contained in his "Sinicæ Historiæ Decas prima à Gentis Origine ad Christum natum," "China Illustrata," and "De Bello inter Tartaros et Sinenses."

MARTOS, IVAN PETROVITCH, an eminent Russian sculptor, who was for many years director of the Academy of Fine Arts, St. Petersburg, d. 1835, aged 82. He had attained the highest excellence in his art, rivalling Canova in his draperies, and in subjects of bas-relief being superior to any of his cotemporaries. Among his best works may be reckoned the colossal group in bronze of Minin and Pozharsky, at Moscow; the Emperor Alexander, at Taganrog; the duke of Richelieu, at Odessa, &c.

MARTYN, HENRY, an able missionary, was b. in Cornwall, in 1781; was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge; and in 1805 went to India as a chaplain to the East India Company. When arrived in the East he distinguished himself by his rapid acquirement of the native languages, being soon able to translate the Common Prayer into Hindoostanee, and perform divine service in that language. From India he proceeded to Persia, and there translated the New Testament into the Persian tongue, held several conferences with the learned Mahometans, and converted some to Christianity. D. 1812.

MARTYR, PETER, a celebrated reformer, whose family name was Vermigli, was b. at Florence, in 1500. He was originally an Augustin monk, and became an eminent preacher, and prior of St. Fridian's, at Lucca; but having read the writings of Luther, Zuinglius, and other reformers, he renounced the Catholic faith, and found it necessary to quit his native country. He then, on the invitation of Edward VI., came to England, and was made professor of divinity at Oxford, and canon of Christchurch. But in the succeeding reign he was obliged to leave the kingdom; on which he went to Switzerland, and d. at Zurich, in 1562. Peter Martyr was the author of many works on divinity, including commentaries on some parts of the Old and New Testament.

MARVELL, ANDREW, distinguished by his integrity as a senator, and by his wit as a political writer, was b. at Kingston-upon-Hull, in 1620. On the death of his father he spent several years in foreign travel; was appointed secretary to the British legation at Constantinople; and on his return, in 1657, he became assistant to Milton, as Latin secretary. At the restoration he was elected into parliament for his native place, with a salary from his constituents; and he obtained a high character for diligence, ability, and integrity. He had the character of being the wittiest man of his time, and wrote a number of poetical effusions, both humorous and satirical, which were highly effective as party pieces. D. 1678.

MARY, queen of England, daughter of Henry VIII. by Catharine of Aragon, was b. in 1517. During the life of her father she experienced many marks of his brutal temper, and her inflexible opposition to his will made him sometimes form a resolution of putting her to death, from which he was diverted by Archbishop Cranmer. During the reign of Edward she could not be prevailed with to join in communion with the Protestant divines. On this account that amiable prince declared Lady Jane Grey his heir. At his death in 1553 that lady was proclaimed queen; but her reign lasted only a few days. The partisans of Mary became numerous, and she entered London without opposition. In 1554 she married Philip of Spain, eldest son of Charles V.; but her union with him was equally unpropitious to herself and the nation. The sanguinary laws against heretics were revived, and those shocking scenes of cruelty followed, which have fixed upon this princess the epithet of "bloody." D. 1558.

MARY STUART, queen of Scots, famous for her beauty, her wit, her learning, and her misfortunes, was daughter of James V., king of Scotland, and succeeded her father in 1542, eight days after her birth. In 1558 she married Francois, dauphin, and afterwards king of France, by which means she became queen of France. This monarch dying in 1560, she returned into Scotland, and married her cousin, Henry Stuart, Lord Darnley, in 1565. Being excluded from any share of the government (as he suspected) by the advice of Rizzio, an Italian musician, her favorite and secretary, the king, by the counsel and assistance of some of the principal nobility, suddenly surprised them together, and Rizzio was slain, in the queen's presence, in 1566. An apparent reconciliation afterwards took place, when Darnley, who had continued to reside separately from the queen, was assassinated, and the house he had inhabited was blown up with gunpowder, in February, 1567. In the month of May following, she wedded the earl of Bothwell, who was openly accused as the murderer of the late king. Scotland soon became a scene of confusion and civil discord. Bothwell, a fugitive and an outlaw, took refuge in Denmark; and Mary, made a captive, was treated with insult and contempt, and committed to custody in the castle of Loch Leven. After some months' confinement she effected her escape, and, assisted by the few friends who still remained attached to her, made an effort for the recovery of her power. She was opposed by the earl of Murray, the natural son of James V., who had obtained the regency in the minority of her son. The battle of Langside insured the triumph of her enemies; and, to avoid falling again into their power, she fled to England, and sought the protection of Queen Elizabeth; but that princess treated her as a personal and political rival, and kept her in safe custody for a period of 18 years. At the end of that time she was tried for a conspiracy against the life of the queen of England, condemned, and suffered decapitation, Feb. 8, 1587, in the castle of Fotheringay, where she had been confined.

MASCLEF, FRANCIS, a French theologian and orientalist, who was a canon of Amiens, and d. 1728. His works are, "A Hebrew Grammar," "Ecclesiastical Conferences of the Diocese of Amiens," and "The Catechism of Amiens."

MASCOV, or MASCOU, JOHN JAMES, a German publicist, was a native of Dantzic, studied at Leipsic, became professor of jurisprudence at Halle, and wrote the "Principles of the Public Law of the German Empire," and "A History of the Germans." B. 1689; d. 1762.

MASCRIER, JOHN BAPTIST DE, a French abbé, was b. in 1697, at Caen; and d. at Paris, in 1760. Among his works are, "A Description of Egypt," "A Translation of Caesar's Commentaries," "Reflections on the Truths of Faith," and a "History of the Revolution in the East Indies."

MASON, JOHN, a dissenting minister, was b. at Dunmow, Essex, in 1706. He was the author of an excellent little volume of ethics, entitled "Self-knowledge," of which there have been numerous editions; he also wrote "Practical Discourses for the use of Families," "An Essay on Elocution," two "Essays on the Power of Poetical and Prosaic Numbers," "Christian Morals," &c. D. 1763.—WILLIAM, an eminent English poet, was the son of a clergyman in Yorkshire, where he was b. in 1725. He studied at Cambridge, and obtained a fellowship in Pembroke hall. His first appearance as a poet was by the publication of "Isis," in which he satirized the Jacobitism and high-church principles prevalent at Oxford. This was replied to by Thomas Warton in his "Triumph of Isis." In 1752 Mason produced his "Elfrida," a dramatic poem, with choral odes on the ancient Greek model, which was well received, though the attempt to establish it on the stage proved abortive. On entering into orders he was presented to the living of Aston, and appointed one of the king's chaplains; and in 1762 he obtained the precentorship of York, with a canonry annexed. On the commencement of the American war, he became so active an advocate for freedom as to give offence at court, and was consequently dismissed from the chaplainship. Besides the tragedies of "Elfrida" and "Caractacus," he wrote "The English Garden," a poem; "Ode to the Naval Officers of Great Britain," "Memoirs of Gray," the poet, &c. D. 1797.—JOHN, was a native of Scotland, b. 1734, connected with that branch of the secession from the established church of North Britain, known by the name of Antiburghers. By a presbytery in that connection he was licensed, and not long afterwards ordained, with a view to his taking the pastoral charge of a congregation in the city of New York, where he arrived in 1761, and resided greatly respected and eminently useful until his death in 1792.—GEORGE, of Virginia, a statesman of distinction, was a member of the general convention which formed the constitution of the United States, and refused his signature to that instrument. The next year, in union with Henry, he opposed its adoption by the Virginia convention, on the ground that the government of the states would be consolidated, instead of federal, and be liable to conversion into a monarchy. He also opposed with great zeal the section allowing a continuance of the slave trade. He held a high rank among the great men of that state with whom he was cotemporary, in intellectual energy, delicacy of wit, extent of political knowledge, and eloquence. D. 1792.—JOHN MITCHELL, a divine and pulpit orator, was b. in the city of New York, in 1770, and after graduating at Columbia college, his theological studies were completed in Europe. In 1792 he returned to New York, and was established in the ministry at that place till 1811, when he accepted the appointment of provost in Columbia college. This situation his ill health obliged him to resign, and he visited Europe to repair his constitution. On his return in 1817 he again resumed his labors in preaching, and in 1821 undertook the charge of Dickinson college in Pennsylvania. In 1824 he returned to New York, and d. in 1829. He was the author of "Letters on Frequent Communion," "A Plea for Sacramental Communion on Catholic Principles," and a number of essays, reviews, orations, and sermons published at different times.—ERSKINE, the youngest son of the above, was b. 1805, pursued his theological studies in the seminary at Princeton, and in 1827, at the age of 22, was installed pastor of the Presbyterian church in Schenectady, from which he was called in 1830 to the Bleecker-street church in this city, where he labored with distinguished ability, until his death in 1850.—JOHN T., a native of Virginia, who removed in early life to Kentucky, where he occupied from 1811 to 1835 many distinguished stations, after which he became governor of Michigan. D. 1850.

MASQUE DE FER, or IRON MASK, a person confined in the castle of Pignerol, and afterwards in the isles of St. Margaret, and always disguised in a mask with steel springs, which concealed his features, without incommoding him in receiving his nourishment. He d. in the Bastille, 1703, and was privately buried under the name of Marchiali. Though no person ever could discover who he was, it is certain that he was a man of high birth, as he was treated with singular respect by his keepers, and as infinite pains were taken to prevent his holding communication with any other person.

MASSENA, ANDRE, a victorious general, created prince of Essling, duke of Rivoli, and marshal of France, was b. at Nice, in 1758. He went through the regular gradations in an Italian regiment, commencing his military career at the age of 17. After 14 years' service he obtained his discharge; but, in 1792, the revolution presented a field for the display of military talents; and his natural sentiments in favor of liberty caused him to enter the service of the French republic, where he obtained rapid promotion. Napoleon, who was quick to discover genius, formed an intimate friendship with Massena; and, after the successful battle of Loveredo, in 1796, against Beaulien, called him "the favored child of victory." He had the chief command in Switzerland in 1799, when he finished the campaign, by completely routing the Austro-Russian army under the Archduke Charles and General Korsakoff. In 1800 he commanded in Italy, but with less success than in his former campaigns. He was, however, again successful in the campaigns of 1805 and 1806, taking possession of Naples, and signalizing himself in the campaign of Poland, which terminated by the treaty of Tilsit. He was afterwards employed in Germany, and eminently distinguished himself in the memorable engagements of Essling and Wagram. His subsequent conduct in Spain, when advancing against Wellington, was equally skilful. At the landing of Napoleon, in 1815, he swore allegiance to him, was made peer, and commander of the national guard at Paris, and contributed much to the preservation of tranquillity in that city during the turbulent period which preceded the return of the king. D. 1817.

MASSILLON, JOHN BAPTIST, an eminent French preacher, was b. 1663, at Hieres, in Provence. He entered into the congregation of the Oratory, and became so celebrated for his eloquence, that the general of his order called him to Paris, where he drew crowds of hearers. In 1717 he was made bishop of Clermont, and d. 1742. His discourses were published, and are distinguished for an artless flow of eloquence, a knowledge of the human heart, and a richness of ideas.

MASSINGER, PHILIP, a distinguished English dramatist, was b. at Salisbury, in 1585. He studied at Oxford, but quitted the university without taking a degree, in consequence, it is supposed, of having become a Roman Catholic. Little is known of his personal history, yet he appears to have been intimately connected with the wits and poets of his time, and d. 1639. Some critics rank him next to Shakspeare. In tragedy, however, he is rather eloquent and forcible than pathetic; and, in richness and variety of humor, his comedy can by no means vie with that of his great master.

MATHER, INCREASE, one of the early presidents of Harvard college, was b. at Dorchester, Mass., in 1639. His learning, zeal, and general abilities were of great service to the institution over which he presided, and he was a skilful and efficient servant of the commonwealth. In 1688 he was deputed to England as agent of the province, to procure redress of grievances. When James II. published his declaration for liberty of conscience, Dr. Mather was again sent to England with an address of thanks to the king; but, before his return, the revolution occurred, and he obtained from William a new charter for the colony of Massachusetts. He was the author of "A History of the War with the Indians," "An Essay on remarkable Providences," and some other works. D. 1723.—CORRON, son of the preceding, was b. at Boston, in 1653, and d. in 1728. His principal works are, "An Ecclesiastical History of New England," "The Christian Philosopher," "Psalterium Americanum," and "The Wonders of the Invisible World, or the Trials of Witches."

MATHEWS, CHARLES, a comedian of transcendent ability, and one who was long regarded as the master-mind of the mimic art, was b. in 1776. He was the son of a bookseller in the Strand, attached to the Wesleyan connection. For many years he was accustomed to entertain whole audiences by his single efforts, in a species of entertainment entitled "Mathews at Home;" and never were admiring crowds more highly delighted than in witnessing the vivid portraits which he so accurately drew. The "At Homes" of Mathews were not only well received throughout Great Britain and Ireland, but also in this country, where some of his most felicitous portraitures were sketched. He was twice married, and had one child only, the present Charles Mathews. D. 1835.

MATSYS, QUINTIN, an eminent painter, was b. at Antwerp, 1460. He was, originally, a blacksmith, but quitted that business, and, by diligent application, became such an excellent artist, that, according to the opinion of Sir Joshua Reynolds, some of his heads are not inferior to those of Raphael. One of his best pictures is that of the "Two Misers," at Windsor. D. 1529.—JOHN, his son, was also a painter of very considerable merit.

MATTHESON, JOHN, an eminent musical composer and performer, was b. at Hamburg, in 1751; and gave such early indications of talent, that at nine years of age he was able to perform compositions of his own at the organ. He composed music for the church and for the theatre, and was always present at the performance of it. D. 1764.

MATTHISSON, FREDERIC VON, a celebrated lyric and elegiac poet, was b. near Magdeburg, in 1761; accompanied the princess of Dessau in various tours through the south of Europe; and in 1812 was appointed librarian at Stuttgart. Among his poems is to be found the celebrated "Adelaide," which, as set to music by Beethoven, is still listened to with delight. D. 1831.

MATTHIEU, PETER, a French historian, was b. at Basle, in 1583, and d. in 1621. He became an advocate at Lyons, and was made historiographer of France. He wrote "Histories of Henry IV.," "Louis XI.," and "St. Louis;" also the "History of France," and "La Guisade," a tragedy.

MATTOCKS, ISABELLA, an eminent actress, b. 1746, was the daughter of Mr. Hallam, manager of the theatres of New York, Charleston, and Philadelphia. Her forte lay in such characters as abigails, citizens' wives, &c., and she was an excellent comic singer. D. 1826.

MATURIN, ROBERT CHARLES, an Irish clergyman of the established church, was b. at Dublin, and educated in Trinity college, of that city; and, on entering into orders, obtained the curacy of St. Peter's church. "Bertram," a wild but powerful tragedy, was the first production which, by its singular success, brought him into notice as an author. Having anticipated his resources, without contemplating the possibility of a failure, he contracted embarrassments, from which he was seldom entirely free. He was the author of several popular novels, the first three of which, "The Fatal Revenge," "The Wild Irish Boy," and "The Milesian Chief," were published under the assumed name of Dennis Jasper Murphy. He also wrote the novels of "Melmoth" and "Woman;" "The Universe," a poem; and the tragedies of "Manuel" and "Fredolpho." He published, in 1824, six "Controversial Sermons," which exhibit him as a well-read scholar and an acute reasoner. D. 1825.

MAUPERUIS, PETER LOUIS MOREAU DES, an eminent mathematician and astronomer, was b. at St. Malo, in 1698. He studied at the college of La Marche, at Paris; and in 1723 was admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences, the memoirs of which institution abound with his communications. In 1736 he was sent on an expedition to the polar circle, to ascertain the figure of the earth. In 1740 he was invited to Berlin by the king of Prussia, whom he followed to the field, and was present at the battle of Molwitz, where he was made prisoner, and carried to Vienna. On regaining his liberty, he married and settled at Berlin, and was appointed president of the Royal Academy of Sciences. In this situation, however, he became involved in a quarrel with Voltaire, which imbittered his latter days, from the sarcasm with which the latter continued to assail him.

MAUREPAS, JOHN FREDERIC PHILPEAU, count de, a French statesman, b. in 1701. He was made minister of marine at the age of 24, and was afterwards at the head of the foreign department. He was hasty in his decisions, amiable in manners, quick in conception, artful, and penetrating; but being accused of writing an epigram on madame de Pompadour, it led to his banishment from court. After a lapse of 30 years he was placed at the head of the ministry by Louis XVI., but he was found incapable of performing its duties, and quite destitute of the vigor necessary to avert the troubles which then threatened the kingdom. D. 1781.

MAURICE OF NASSAU, prince of Orange, youngest son, by a second marriage, of William I., prince of Orange, b. at Dillenburg, 1567, was studying at Leyden, in 1584, when his father was assassinated. The provinces of Holland and Zealand, and, soon after, Utrecht, immediately elected the young prince stadtholder; and his talents, as a general, surpassed all expectations. D. 1625.

MAURY, JEAN SIFFREIN, a French cardinal, was b. in 1746, at Valeras; studied at Lyons; and, on entering into orders, became a celebrated preacher at Paris, where he obtained a place in the Academy, and obtained an abbey. When the revolution broke out, he was chosen one of the representatives of the clergy in the states-general, where he distinguished himself by his eloquence in behalf of his order, and also in defence of royalty. On the dissolution of the constituent assembly, he went to Italy, was nominated bishop of Nicea, and made a cardinal; and, in 1808, Napoleon gave him the archbishopric of Paris, but in 1814 he was obliged to quit the archiepiscopal palace, and retire to Rome. He was a great orator, and a man of ready wit. D. 1817.

MAVOR, WILLIAM, was a native of Aberdeenshire, and b. in 1758. He went to England early in life, and after due probationary exercise, as an assistant in a school at Burford, established himself as the master of an academy at Woodstock, where he gained the favor and patronage of the duke of Marlborough, entered into holy orders, and was presented to the vicarage of Hurley in Berkshire. Among his literary labors are a "Universal History," a collection of "Voyages and Travels," "The British Tourist," "The Modern Traveller," histories of Greece, Rome, and England; spelling and class books; miscellanies in prose and verse; and many others, whose merits are in general commensurate with their repute. D. 1837.

MAWE, JOSEPH, an eminent mineralogist and conchologist, was b. about 1755, travelled in various parts of South America, and published numerous works on the subject of his researches. Among them are, "Travels in the Interior of Brazil," a "Treatise on Diamonds and Precious Stones," "Familiar Lessons on Mineralogy and Geology," "The Linnæan System of Conchology," and "The Mineralogy of Derbyshire." D. 1829.

MAXWELL, WILLIAM H., a distinguished Irish novelist. Early in life he was a captain in the British army, and noted for his social qualities. He subsequently entered the church, and obtained the benefice of prebendary of Balla, a wild district in Connaught, with an income, but no congregation or official duties. Among his works are "Hector O'Halloran," "Story of My Life," "Wild Sports of the West," and many humorous sketches in the periodical literature of the day. D. 1850.

MAY, THOMAS, a poet and historian; was b. in Sussex, in 1594, and educated at Cambridge; after which he entered of Gray's Inn, where he wrote some plays and translated several authors, particularly Lucan. Charles I. employed him in writing two historical poems—one on the life of Henry II., and the other on the reign of Edward III. But in the civil war May joined the parliament, and was appointed their secretary and historiographer. He published the "History of the Parliament, which began in 1640," and a "Breviary of the History of the Parliament of England," a work which was extremely obnoxious to the royal party. D. 1650.

MAYER, TOBIAS, a celebrated astronomer, was b. at Marbach, in the duchy of Wirtemberg, in 1723. He taught himself mathematics, and at the age of 14 designed machines and instruments with the greatest dexterity and accuracy. His various merits procured him an invitation to Gottingen, as professor of mathematics, in 1750, and the royal society of sciences in that place chose him a member. About this time astronomers were employed in endeavors to find the longitude at sea. Mayer overcame all difficulties, and his theory of the moon, and astronomical tables and precepts, were rewarded by the English board of longitude with £3000, which sum was paid to his widow; for, exhausted by his incessant labors, this astronomer d. 1762. Among his works are "A Treatise on Curves," and a "Mathematical Atlas."—JOHANN TOBIAS, his son, b. 1752, was also professor at Gottingen, and gained distinction by his astronomical writings. D. 1830.

MAYNARD, JOHN, a judge of the supreme court of New York, and of the court of appeals. He was elected to congress in 1826, and again in 1841. D. 1850.

MAZARIN, JULIUS, a cardinal and first minister of Louis XIV., was b. of a noble family, at Piscini, in Italy, in 1602. He studied at Alcalá, in Spain, after which he went to Rome, and became attached to the service of Cardinal Sacchetti, whom he accompanied on his mission into Lombardy. While in that country, Mazarin effected a peace between the French and Spaniards, which procured him the esteem of the cardinals Richelieu and Barbarini, by the latter of whom he was recommended to the pope, who sent him as nuncio-extraordinary to the court of France. In 1641 he was made a cardinal, and on the death of Richelieu succeeded him as prime minister. At first he was rather popular, but in a short time cabals were formed against him with such effect that he was dismissed from the royal presence, and compelled to leave the kingdom. But though a price was set upon his head, Mazarin contrived to dispel the storm; and he even returned to court with increased éclat, and held the reins of power till his decease, in 1651.

MAZEPPA, JOHN, hettman of the Cossacks, whom Lord Byron has made the hero of a poem, was b. about the middle of the 17th century, in Podolia, of a poor but noble Polish family, and became page to John Casimir, king of Poland. In this situation, Mazeppa had an opportunity of acquiring various useful accomplishments; but an intrigue was the foundation of his future elevation. A Polish nobleman having surprised Mazeppa with his wife, ordered him to be tied naked upon a wild horse, and committed to his fate. The animal had been bred in the Ukraine, and directed his course thither, where some poor peasants found him half dead, and took care of him. Their warlike, roving life suited his disposition; he made himself conspicuous and beloved by his dexterity, bodily strength, and courage; his knowledge and sagacity procured him the post of secretary and adjutant to the hettman Samoilowitz; and, in 1687, he was elected in his place. He gained the confidence of Peter the Great, who loaded him with honors, and he was finally made prince of the Ukraine. But though a prince he was still a vassal, and his restless spirit made him resolve to throw off the yoke of subordination. He joined with Charles XII., who had just given a king to Poland, and aimed, by his assistance, to throw off the yoke of subordination. For a long time the intrigues of Mazeppa against Peter were disbelieved by the latter; but at length he openly joined the Swedish monarch, who, by his advice, fought the fatal battle of Pultowa. He then sought refuge at Bender, where he d. 1709.

MAZZA, ANGELO, an eminent Italian poet, b. at Parma, in 1740, in the university of which city he was afterwards professor of Greek literature. He translated the odes of Pindar, and Akenside's "Pleasures of Imagination;" and having attained a high degree of literary reputation, was admitted into the Arcadian academy at Rome. D. 1817.

MAZZHINGI, JOSEPH, Count, a distinguished composer, was the descendant of an eminent Tuscan family, but was b. in England, and of an English mother. "The Blind Girl," "The Turnpike Gate," "Paul and Virginia," and a long list of other once popular pieces, were from his fertile pen, and Sir Walter Scott warmly thanked him for the manner in which he adapted some of that great author's poetry. D. 1844.

MAZZUCHELLI, GIAMMARIA, Count, a Venetian nobleman, was b. 1707, and d. 1765. He was the author of "La Vita di Pietro Aretino" and "Gli Scrittori d'Italia;" but the work on which his fame chiefly rests is, "Notizie Storiche e Critiche."

MAZZUOLI, FRANCIS, a celebrated painter, known by the name of PARMEGIANO, was b. at Parma, 1503. He became acquainted with Correggio, but owed his eminence to his studying the works of Raphael. His reputation as a painter was very great, but he wasted his energies in the delusive labors of alchemy. D. 1540.

MEDE, JOSEPH, a learned divine, b. in 1586, at Berden, in Essex; author of the "Clavis Apocalyptica," which is considered by biblical critics as the ablest exposition of the obscure prophecies to which it refers. D. 1638.

MEDICI, COSMO DE, an illustrious Florentine, b. in 1389, was the son of John de Medici, a rich and influential merchant, who d. in 1428. The vast wealth which Cosmo thus inherited, afforded him the means of displaying his liberality, and of acquiring great influence in the republic. But the splendor and magnificence in which he lived, excited the jealousy and enmity of many of the nobles. The Strozzi, the Albizzi, and many of the first Tuscan families combined against him; but, by the most consummate art and prudent management, he extricated himself from the toils of his enemies, and eventually reigned without a rival. His superfluous wealth he expended upon public buildings, and in the encouragement of literature. He was a friend to science, an active merchant, and a sagacious statesman; and, when he d. in 1464, such was the general estimation in which he was held, that the Florentines inscribed on his tomb the title of "Father of his country."—LORENZO DE, surnamed the Magnificent, was b. 1448, and was the grandson of the preceding. He surpassed in wisdom and moderation, in magnanimity and splendor, all of his family who had gone before him, while in active zeal for the arts and sciences he also greatly excelled them. He revived the academy of Pisa, established another at Florence, collected a vast treasure of literature, and founded a gallery of art, where Michael Angelo, under his patronage, pursued his youthful studies, and improved his taste and skill. Nothing, in fact, could exceed the exertions he made for the improvement of literature; and he d. in the zenith of his renown, in 1492.

MEHEMET ALI, pasha of Egypt, and it may be safely said, one of the most remarkable men of the age, was b. at Cavalla in Roumelia, in 1769. He commenced life in the humble career of a tobacconist; but afterwards volunteered into the army, to which his taste was more congenial. In his new career he soon obtained high favor with the governor of Cavalla. In 1799, the period of the French invasion of Egypt, he was enabled to seize the pashalic of Egypt, and was then prepared to set the sultan at defiance, had the latter attempted to overthrow him. But the sultan saw that his vassal was too firmly seated to be easily displaced, and resolved to compromise by exacting an annual tribute from Mehemet Ali as an acknowledgment of his subjection. In this arrangement, which virtually constituted Mehemet Ali the independent ruler of Egypt, he had the prudence to acquiesce, and he directed himself steadily to the consolidation of his newly acquired power. In 1831, he entered into a contest with the sultan for the possession of Syria, when the superiority of his army thus disciplined became so manifest, that, in autumn, 1832, he had carried his victorious arms within a few days' march of Constantinople. For seven years subsequently, Mehemet Ali remained undisturbed by war, during which his active mind was steadily directed to the internal improvement of his kingdom. D. 1849.

MEHUL, STEPHEN HENRY, an eminent musical composer, was b. at Givet, in France, in 1763, and was an excellent organist when only ten years old. He settled at Paris in 1779, where he studied with great advantage under Glæck, became inspector at the conservatory of music, professor of composition at the royal school, a member of the academy and institute, and a knight of the legion of honor. He produced the operas of "Stratonice," "Irato," "Joseph," and "Cora et Alonzo," besides the ballets of "The Judgment of Paris," "Perseus and Andromeda," &c. D. 1817.

MEIGS, RETURN JONATHAN, an officer in the revolutionary war. Living in Connecticut in 1775, immediately after the battle of Lexington he marched a company of light infantry to the neighborhood of Boston. With the rank of major he accompanied Arnold in his march through the wilderness of Maine, in order to attack Quebec, where he was made a prisoner with captains Morgan and Dearborn. In 1776 he was exchanged and returned home, and the next year was appointed colonel. His expedition to Loug Island, in May, 1777, was one of the most brilliant enterprises of the war, for which he received the thanks of congress and a sword. After the war, about 1788 or 1789, he was one of the first settlers of the wilderness of Ohio. For the first emigrants, he drew up a system of regulations, which were posted on a large oak near the confluence of the Ohio and Muskingum rivers, the bark of the tree being cut away for the space of the sheet. Often was the venerable oak consulted. He was the agent for Indian affairs as early as 1816. D. at the Cherokee agency, 1823, at an advanced age.—RETURN JONATHAN, governor of Ohio from 1810 to 1814, when he was appointed postmaster-general of the United States. He resigned the office in 1823 and d. in 1825.

MEINERS, CHRISTOPHER, a German historian and miscellaneous writer, was b. in 1747, at Warstade, Hanover, studied at Gottingen, where he became professor of philosophy, and d. 1810, pro-rector of that university. Among his numerous works are, "A History of the Origin and Progress of Philosophy among the Greeks," "On the Origin and Decline of the Sciences among the Greeks and Romans," and others on kindred subjects.

MEISSNER, AUGUSTUS THEOPHILUS, a German romance writer and dramatist, was b. at Bautzen, in Lusatia, in 1757, studied at Leipsic and Wittenberg, and was successively keeper of the archives at Dresden, professor of belles lettres at Prague, and director of the superior schools at Fulda. Besides writing a number of historical romances and other works, he translated Hume's "History of England" into German. D. 1807.

MELA, POMONIUS, a Latin geographer, who lived in the 1st century of the Christian era. His treatise, "De Situ Orbis," contains a concise state of the world as far as it was known to the Romans. By some authors he is supposed to have been related to Seneca and Lucan.

MELANCHTHON, PHILIP, a celebrated German divine, coadjutor with Luther in the reformation, and one of the wisest and greatest men of his age, was b. at Bretten, in the palatinate of the Rhine, in 1497. He studied at Heidelberg and Tübingen, and, in 1518, was appointed Greek professor at Wittenberg, where he became the friend of Luther, and a convert to his doctrines. The Augsburg Confession was his work, and, under the sanction of the elector of Saxony, he aided in framing a code of ecclesiastical constitutions. Even his theological opponents respected the virtues, the talents, the learning, and the mild temper of Melancthon, though some zealots naturally branded him with opprobrious terms for his tolerant spirit. He wrote numerous theological treatises, Latin poems, works on history, philosophy, &c., and d. at Wittenberg, in 1560.

MELBOURNE, WILLIAM LAMB, Viscount, was the second son of the first Lord Melbourne, and b. 1779. In 1805 he was brought into the house of commons, where he joined the Whig party, and gradually rose to great distinction for his liberality, talent, and independence. In 1827 he became secretary for Ireland, but in 1828 he resigned office, and the same year he was called up to the house of lords by the death of his father. On the formation of Lord Grey's administration in 1830, he was appointed secretary of the home department, and in 1834, on the retirement of Lord Grey, succeeded to the premiership. D. 1848.

MELCHTHAL, ARNOLD OF, (so called from the place of his residence in the canton of Underwalden,) was the son of a rich farmer, who having been cruelly treated by the governor of the district, under Albert of Austria, Arnold conspired with two friends, Furst and Stauffacher, to effect the deliverance of their country, and to the plan which they formed, in 1307, was Switzerland indebted for the restoration of its ancient freedom.

MELEADEZ, DON JUAN, an eminent Spanish poet, was b. in 1754, at Ribera. He wrote three volumes of poems, which are distinguished for their graceful harmony, elegant diction, and rich imagery. He filled some public situations during the rule of Joseph Bonaparte, and left Spain on the retreat of the French. D. 1817.

MELEAGER, a Greek poet, in the 1st century before the Christian era, was the author of epigrams and other short pieces, which are among the most beautiful relics preserved in the Grecian Anthology.

MELLON, HARRIET, duchess of St. Alban's, was b. about the year 1775, and was the posthumous daughter of a Mr. Matthew Mellon, who held a commission in the East India Company's service, and whose widow married a Mr. Entwistle, a musician. Mrs. Entwistle, who was an accomplished woman, went on the stage; her husband became leader of the band in various provincial theatres; and the services of the child, who was destined at a future day to become the duchess of St. Alban's, were put in requisition at a very tender age, in order to augment a scanty and precarious income. She passed her childhood in performing such characters as Prince Arthur in King John, the duke of York in Richard the Third, &c. She made her debut at Drury-lane, in January, 1795, as Lydia Languish, in the Rivals. For several years after, Thomas Coutts, a wealthy banker, evinced for her a strong degree of friendship; and made her his wife almost immediately after the death of his former one, which happened in 1814. In 1822 the venerable banker died, appointing his widow universal legatee, and bequeathed to her his share in the banking house and business in the Strand, and all benefit and interests to arise therefrom. In June, 1827, she was married to William, duke of St. Alban's. D. 1837.

MELMOTH, WILLIAM, an eminent advocate and an excellent writer, was b. in 1666. He was a bencher of Lincoln's Inn, and in conjunction with Peere Williams, edited Vernon's Reports; but he is chiefly remembered now as the author of "The Great Importance of a Religious Life;" a valuable little book, which has gone through numerous editions. D. 1743.—WILLIAM, son of the preceding, was b. in 1710. He published excellent translations of Pliny's and Cicero's Epistles. He was also the author of the "Letters," which bear the name of Sir Thomas Fitzosborne; some poems in Dodsley's collection, and memoirs of his father. He was brought up to the law, became a commissioner of bankrupts, and d. 1799.

MELVILLE, HENRY DUNDAS, Viscount, the son of Lord Armistone, a Scotch judge, was b. in 1740; received his education at the university of Edinburgh; in 1773 became solicitor-general; and soon after was appointed to the offices of lord advocate, and joint keeper of the signet for Scotland. In 1782 he was made privy councillor and treasurer of the navy; and from that time he took a leading part in all the measures of the Pitt administration. He was appointed president of the board of control, at its formation; in 1791, made secretary for the home department; and, in 1794, secretary of war, which latter post he held till Mr. Pitt's retirement from office. He was then created a viscount; and when Mr. Pitt again became premier, he was made first lord of the admiralty. D. 1811.

MENANDER, the most celebrated of the Greek writers of comedy, was b. at Athens, 342 B. C., and is said to have drowned himself, on account of the success of his rival Philemon, though some accounts attribute his death to accident, 299 B. C., in the harbor of the Piræus. He composed 108 comedies; but there are only a few fragments remaining of the numerous dramas of Menander; from whom, however, Terence is supposed to have copied the whole of his pieces, except the "Phormio" and "Hecyra." Quintilian expresses great admiration for this dramatist, eulogizing him for copiousness of invention, elegance of expression, and a general fine feeling of nature.

MENDELSSOHN, MOSES, a celebrated Jewish philosopher, commonly called the "Socrates of the Jews," was b. of an honest but poor family, at Dessau, in 1729. He was bred to merchandise, but devoted himself to literature, in which he acquired a distinguished reputation. In 1755 he published his first piece, entitled "Jerusalem;" in which he pretended that the principle of the Jewish religion is deism. His next work was "Phædon, or a Discourse on the Spirituality and Immateriality of the Soul." He also wrote "Philosophical Dialogues," "Letter to Lavater," a "Dissertation on the Sensation of the Beautiful," "Morning Hours, or Discourses on the Existence of God," &c. At one time he was associated with Lessing, Ramler, Abbot, and Nicolai, in conducting a periodical work, entitled "The Library of Belles Lettres," which acquired great distinction in German literature.—FELIX BARTHOLDY, grandson of Moses, was b. at Berlin, February 3, 1809. His father was a wealthy banker, more favored with the gifts of fortune than of genius; and it is related of him that he was in the habit of saying, "When I was a boy people used to call me the son, and now they call me the father, of the great Mendelssohn." In his 9th year he performed at a public concert in Berlin, to the admiration of his audience; the following year the boy-artist accompanied his parents to Paris; and when he was 12 years old, he composed his pianoforte quartette in C minor, which is still found to be full of interest and originality. His first compositions were published in 1824. These were soon followed by many others, among which was an opera, called "The Marriage of Gamachio;" his first symphony, and his "Midsummer Night's Dream," which produced an electrical effect. Having now resolved to devote himself exclusively to the artist life, he was appointed, in 1833, to the directorship of the concerts and theatre of Düsseldorf, where, in 1835, he produced his great oratorio of "Paulus;" and ten years afterwards he accepted of the same office at Leipsic, whither young men of talent flocked from all parts of Europe, as well to seek the acquaintance of the leading professor of the day, as to submit their own productions to his judgment. He afterwards accepted the musical directorship at Berlin, at the earnest entreaty of the king of Prussia, but resigned it after a short time, and returned to his favorite Leipsic, where he resided till his death, acting as conductor of the concerts, and, along with his friend Moscheles, direct-tor of the Conservatory of Music. D. 1847.

MENDEZ-PINTO, FERDINAND, a celebrated traveller, was b. in Portugal, of a respectable family. He departed for the Indies in 1537, and, on the voyage, the ship was taken by the Moors, who carried her to Mocha, where he was sold for a slave; but after some adventures he arrived at Ormus, and afterwards pursued his original object. In 1558 he returned to his native country, and published a very curious, but romantic relation of his voyages, which has been translated into French and English. From his excessive credulity, Mendez-Pinto has been classed with Sir John Mandeville; and for extravagant fictions his name has become a by-word.

MENDOZA, JOHN GONZALES, a Spanish divine, who was sent ambassador to the emperor of China, in 1584; and, on his return, became successively bishop of Lipari, in Italy; of Chiapi, in New Spain; and of Popayan, in the West Indies. He wrote "A History of China," in Spanish.

MENGS, ANTHONY RAPHAEL, who has been called the Raphael of Germany, was b. at Aussig, in Bohemia, in 1726. He studied under his father, who was painter to Augustus III., king of Poland, after which he went to Rome, where he was patronized by Charles III., king of Spain, for whom he executed a number of pictures. The best of his pieces in England is an altar-piece at All Souls' college, Oxford. Mengs wrote some works on his art, which have been translated into English, and d. at Rome, in 1779.

MENNO, SIMONIS, or Simon's son, was the founder of the sect of Mennonites, or Dutch Anabaptists. He was b. in 1496, and was, originally, a Catholic priest. He maintained the necessity of rebaptism in adults; and denied that Jesus Christ received a human body from the Virgin. A price was set upon his head by Charles V., but he was fortunate enough to escape. D. at Oldesloe, near Hamburgh, in 1565.

MENSCHIKOFF, ALEXANDER, a celebrated Russian statesman and general, was the son of a peasant, and b. near Moscow, in 1674. D. 1729.

MERCATOR, GERARD, a mathematician and geographer, b. 1512, at Rupelmonde, in the Netherlands. He published a great number of maps and charts, which he engraved and colored himself; and is known as the inventor of a method of projection called by his name, in which the meridians and parallels of latitude cut each other at right angles, and are both represented by straight lines, which has the effect of enlarging the degrees of latitude as they recede from the equator. D. 1594.—NICHOLAS, an eminent mathematician, was b. at Holstein, about 1640. He settled in England, where he became a fellow of the Royal Society, and d. about 1690. His works are, "Cosmographia," "Rationes Mathematicæ," "Hypothesis Astronomica," "Logarithmotechnia," "Institutionum Astronomicarum," &c.

MERCER, HUGH, brigadier-general, was a native of Scotland, and educated for the profession of medicine. On his emigration to America, he settled and married in Virginia. He served with Washington in the war against the French and Indians, which terminated in 1763, and was by him greatly esteemed. He was with Braddock in the campaign of 1755. In the action at Fort Du Quésne he was wounded, and faint with the loss of blood he lay under a fallen tree. One of the pursuing Indians jumped upon the very tree, but did not discover him. Mercer found a brook at which he refreshed himself. In his hunger he fed on a rattlesnake, which he had killed. After pursuing his solitary way through a wilderness of one hundred miles, he arrived at Fort Cumberland. At the commencement of the revolutionary war he abandoned his extensive medical practice, and entered the army. He was distinguished at the battle of Trenton. In the action near Princeton, Jan. 3, 1777, he commanded the van of the Americans, composed principally of southern militia. While exerting himself to rally them, his horse was killed under him. He was surrounded by some British soldiers, who refused him quarter, and stabbed him with their bayonets, and bruised his head with the butt-end of their muskets, leaving him on the field as dead. He died from the wounds on his head, Jan. 19, aged about 56.—JOHN, governor of Maryland, was a soldier of the revolution. In 1782 he was elected a delegate to congress from Virginia; in 1787 he was a member from Maryland of the convention which framed the constitution of the United States, and also a member of congress from Maryland. He was governor from 1801-3. D. 1821.

MERCIER, LOUIS SEBASTIAN, a French writer, was b. at Paris, 1740. He commenced his literary career as a poet, but soon renounced poetry for criticism. He attacked the reputation of Corneille, Racine, and Voltaire, in his "Essai sur l'Art Dramatique," and published a violent philippic against the comedians for paying no attention to his remarks. In 1781 he published, anonymously, the first volume of his "Tableau de Paris;" after which he removed to Switzerland, and printed at Neuchâtel ten more volumes of that work. Returning home at the beginning of the revolution, he declared himself a friend to liberty, and in concert with Carra, he published "Les Annales Politiques" and "Chronique du Mois," two journals, displaying both moderation and spirit. He was a member of the convention, and voted for the detention, instead of the death of the king. D. 1814.

MERIAN, MARIA SIBYLLA, an ingenious female artist, was the daughter of Matthew Merian, an eminent engraver, and b. at Frankfort, 1647. She undertook a voyage to Surinam to draw the insects and reptiles peculiar to that country, of which, on her return, she published a description with beautiful colored plates. Her daughter, who accompanied her to Surinam, added a third volume to this work. The mother published another valuable performance "On the Generation and Transformations of the Insects of Surinam." D. 1717.

MERLIN, AMBROSE, a British writer, who flourished about the latter end of the 5th century. He was supposed to be an enchanter and a prophet; but the accounts we have of him are so mixed up with fiction, that to disentangle his real life from the mass would be impossible. He was the greatest sage and mathematician of his time, the counselor and friend of four English kings, Vortigern, Ambrosius, Uther Pendragon, and Arthur. The miracles ascribed to him are numerous; and, instead of dying, it was supposed that he fell into a magic sleep, from which, after a long period, he would awake. In the British Museum is "Le Compte de la Vie de Merlin et de ses Faiz et Compte de ses Prophécies," on vellum, without date or place.

MERRICK, JAMES, a divine and poet, was b. at Reading, 1720; was educated at Trinity college, Oxford; and d. 1769. His principal works are, "Poems on Sacred Subjects," "Annotations on the Psalms," and on the "Gospel of St. John," "A Metrical Version of the Psalms," and a translation of "Tryphiodorus."

MERRY, ROBERT, a dramatic writer, was the son of a merchant, and b. in London, in 1755. He received his education at Harrow, and next at Christ's college, Cambridge, after which he entered at Lincoln's Inn; but instead of being called to the bar, he bought a commission in the guards, which service he also quitted, and went abroad. While at Florence he became a member of the Della Cruscan academy, and affixed that signature to a number of poems, which being published in the English newspapers, at length became the object of the caustic satire of Gifford, in his well-known "Baviad and Mæviad." In 1791 he married Miss Brunton, an actress, with whom he came to America, where he d. in 1798. His dramatic compositions are, "Lorenzo," "Fenelon," and "Ambitious Vengeance."

MERSCH, VAN DER, leader of the Brabant patriots in 1789, was b. at Menim, and entered the French service, in which he acquired the title of "The Brave Fleming." He afterwards served in the Austrian army, and rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel. D. 1792.

MESMER, FREDERIC ANTHONY, a German physician, author of the famous doctrine of animal magnetism, which is also called Mesmerism, was b. in 1734, at Mersburg, in Suabia. He first made his doctrines known to the world, in 1766, by a thesis on planetary influence, in which he contended that the heavenly bodies diffuse through the universe a subtle fluid, which acts on the nervous system of animated beings. He quitted Vienna for Paris, in 1778; gained a number of proselytes, and received a subscription of 340,000 livres. Government at length appointed a committee of physicians and members of the Academy of Sciences, among whom was Franklin, to investigate his pretensions; and the result of their inquiries appeared in a memoir, drawn up by Bailly, which was unfavorable to the pretender of animal magnetism. This theory, however, has of late years again excited considerable attention on the Continent; it has advocates everywhere. D. 1815.

METASTASIO, PIETRO ANTONIO DOMENICO BRONAVENTURA, an eminent Italian poet, b. at Assisi, 1698, was the son of a common soldier, named Trapassi. When he was only ten years of age, his talent of extemporizing in verse attracted the notice of the celebrated Gravina, who took him under his protection, called him (by a translation of his name into Greek,) "Metastasio," paid great attention to his education, and on his death, in 1717, left him his whole estate. The young poet, being thus placed in an easy condition, devoted himself to his favorite study, and, under the guidance of the celebrated singer, Maria Romanina, (afterwards Bulgarelli,) created the modern Italian opera. Charles VI. invited him to Vienna in 1729, and appointed him poet laureate, with a pension of 4000 guilders. Thenceforward no gala took place at court which was not graced by his verses. The empress Maria Theresa bestowed upon him magnificent presents, as also did Ferdinand VI., king of Spain. He composed no less than twenty-six operas and eight sacred dramas, besides innumerable minor pieces. The poetical characteristics of Metastasio are sweetness, correctness, purity, gentle pathos, and elevated sentiment. D. 1782.

METELLI, AUGUSTIN, an eminent painter, was b. at Bologna, in 1609. He excelled in painting perspective and architecture; and, in conjunction with Michael Angelo, produced several great works. D. 1660.

METIUS, JAMES, a native of Alkmaar, in Holland, who invented telescopes about 1609.—ADRIAN, his brother, was professor of mathematics and medicine at Franeker, where he d. in 1636. He wrote "Doctrina Sphæricæ," "Astronomiæ Universæ Institutio," "Arithmeticæ et Geometricæ Practicæ," "Geometricæ pur Usum Cercini nova Praxis," &c.

METO, or METON, an Athenian mathematician, who flourished 432 years B. C. In the first year of the 87th Olympiad he observed the solstice at Athens, and invented the cycle of 19 years, to make the solar and lunar years begin at the same time. This is now called the Golden Number, from its great use in the calendar.

METTRIE, JULIEN OFFRIE DE LA, a French writer, was b. at St. Maloes, in 1709. He was a surgeon in the French guards, and in that situation wrote an infamous book, called "The Natural History of the Soul," for which he narrowly escaped prosecution. His next work was a satire against the faculty, under the title of "Penelope; or, the Machiavel in Medicine," for which he was obliged to remove to Holland, where he created new enemies by a still more atrocious book, entitled "L'Homme Machine," which being ordered to be burnt, he retired to Berlin, and was patronized by Frederic the Great, whose opinions were so congenial to the author's, that he composed his funeral eulogy with his own pen. D. 1751.

METZU, GABRIEL, a celebrated painter, b. at Leyden, in 1615, who took Gerard Douw, Terbury, and Mieris for his models, but adopted a more finished style. A lady tuning her lute, and another washing her hands in a silver basin held by her woman, are among his best pieces. He usually resided at Amsterdam, and d. there in 1658.

MEULEN, ANTONY FRANCIS VAN DER, was b. at Brussels, 1633. By his talents as a painter of battle-pieces he was recommended to Louis XIV., who always took him on his expeditions, and often pointed out the subjects which he desired him to represent. The painter had thus an opportunity of perfecting himself in this department of his art, but he had frequently to represent scenes which afforded but little scope for the display of genius. D. 1690.

MEXIA, PEDRO, a chronicler to Charles V., was b. at Seville. He was the author of a "History of the Cæsars, including the German Emperors," "Silvia de Varia Leccion," &c. D. 1552.

MEYRICK, SIR SAMUEL RUSH, an eminent antiquary, was b. at London, 1783. After taking his degree at Oxford, he became an advocate in the ecclesiastical and admiralty courts, and soon began to vary his professional avocations with those archæological studies which formed the chief boast and occupation of his life. He contributed innumerable papers to the "Gentleman's Magazine;" on all questions relating to arms and armor his authority was unassailed; and his "Critical Inquiry into Ancient Armor," &c., has procured him a high place among the most eminent antiquaries of his time. In 1832 he was created a knight of the Guelphic order, and soon afterwards dubbed a knight bachelor. D. 1848.

MICHAELIS, JOHN DAVID, a learned orientalist and biblical critic, was b. at Halle, in Saxony, in 1717, and there educated. He visited England, and for a time was preacher at the German chapel, St. James's palace; and on his return to Germany was made professor of theology at Gottingen; was honored with the order of the polar star, conferred on him by the king of Sweden; and was made an aulic councillor of Hanover. Among the most valuable and best known of his works are his "Introduction to the New Testament," translated into English by Bishop Marsh, and his "Commentaries on the Law of Moses." D. 1791.—JOHN HENRY, a German divine, was b. at Kettenburg, in Hohenstein, in 1668. He was educated at Leipsic, and next at Halle, where he taught Greek and Hebrew. In 1699 he succeeded Francke in the Greek professorship; and, in 1707, was made librarian of the university. He afterwards became professor of divinity and the oriental languages. D. 1738.

MICHAUX, ANDRE, a French traveller and botanist; author of a "History of North American Oaks" and an "American Flora." He was b. in 1746, at Satory, near Versailles; spent many years in journeying through the United States; and d. in 1802, at Madagascar.

MICKLE, WILLIAM JULIUS, a poet, was b. in 1734, at Langholm, in Dumfriesshire. In 1765 he was employed as corrector of the press in the Clarendon printing-office at Oxford, where he published a poem, called "The Concubine," in imitation of Spenser, which he afterwards republished under the title of "Sir Martyn." His principal production, a translation of "The Lusiad" of Camoens, appeared in 1775, prefixed to which is an historical and critical Introduction, with a life of Camoens; and the work is executed in a highly creditable manner. He was also the author of many of the finest pieces in Evan's "Old Ballads." D. 1788.

MIDDLETON, CONYERS, a celebrated divine and critic, was b. at York, in 1683, and educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow. In 1724 he visited Italy, and having a near observation of the ecclesiastical pomp and ceremonies, he wrote his famous "Letter from Rome," to show that the religious rites of popery were very similar to those of paganism. He was subsequently Woodwardian professor of mineralogy, and librarian, at Cambridge. His greatest literary undertaking was "The History of the Life of M. T. Cicero;" but his "Free Inquiry into the Miraculous Powers of the Church," brought on the author the imputation of infidelity, and gave rise to much vehement censure from a host of opponents. D. 1750.—ARTHUR, a signer of the declaration of American independence, was b. in South Carolina, in 1743, and received his education in Europe. Soon after his return home, he began to take an active part in the revolutionary movements, and in 1776 was chosen one of the delegates from his native state to the American congress. At the close of the year 1777 he resigned his seat, leaving behind a character for the purest patriotism and unwavering resolution. In the year 1779 many of the southern plantations were ravaged, and that of Mr. Middleton did not escape. On the surrender of Charleston he was taken prisoner and kept in confinement for nearly a year. In 1781 he was appointed a representative to congress, and again in 1782. In the latter year he went into retirement, and d. in 1787.

MIERIS, FRANCIS, a celebrated painter, b. at Leyden, in 1635, and d. in 1681. He was a pupil of Gerard Douw, whose delicate finish he rivalled, and whose coloring he was thought to excel. He had two sons, JOHN and WILLIAM, both of whom possessed considerable talent, and adopted their father's style.

MIFFLIN, THOMAS, a major-general in the American army, and governor of Pennsylvania, was b. about the year 1744. He was a member of the first congress in 1774. He took arms, and was among the first officers commissioned on the organization of the continental army, being appointed quartermaster-general in August, 1775. For this offence he was read out of the society of Quakers. In 1777 he was very useful in animating the militia; but he was also suspected in this year of being unfriendly to the commander-in-chief, and of wishing to have some other person in his place. In 1787 he was a member of the convention which framed the constitution of the United States, and his name is affixed to that instrument. In October, 1788, he succeeded Franklin as president of the supreme executive council of Pennsylvania, in which station he continued till October, 1790. In September a constitution for this state was formed, by a convention, in which he was president, and he was chosen the first governor. In 1794, during the insurrection in Pennsylvania, he employed, to the advantage of his country, the extraordinary powers of elocution with which he was endowed. D. 1800.

MIGNARD, PETER, surnamed the Roman, an historical and portrait painter, was b. at Troyes, in Champagne, in 1610. He studied at Rome; and, during his residence there of 22 years, enjoyed great favor from the popes. At length Louis XIV. sent for him to Paris; appointed him his principal painter, and director of the manufactories of Seve and the Gobelins; and ennobled him. Mignard was on habits of intimacy with the principal French wits, and was beloved by them for his social disposition. D. 1695.

MIGNON, ABRAHAM, a painter of Frankfort, was b. in 1639, and d. in 1679. He excelled in the representation of flowers, insects, and still life, which he painted with exquisite delicacy.

MILL, JAMES, an able writer and political economist, was a native of Kincardineshire, and b. in 1774. In 1818 he published his admirable "History of British India," a work of great research and powerful reasoning. He also produced other works connected with legislation and morals, viz., his "Elements of Political Economy," an "Analysis of the Human Mind," and another, entitled "Prison and Prison Discipline, Colonies, Laws of Nations, and Education." He was also the contributor of many excellent articles in the "Encyclopædia Britannica," and in the Edinburgh, Westminster, and London reviews. In morals and legislation he was the powerful auxiliary of Jeremy Bentham; in political economy, the ally of Adam Smith and Ricardo; and in metaphysics he labored to extend the philosophy of Bacon, Locke, &c., and the promoters of inductive science. He held the office of chief examiner to the East India Company. D. 1836.

MILLER, JOSEPH, a witty actor, was b. 1684, and was a favorite low comedian about the time that Congreve's plays were fashionable, to the success of which, it is said, his humor greatly contributed. D. 1738. The compilation called "Joe Miller's Jests" was the work of John Motley. The name has, however, not only been used to pass off the original stock, but thousands of other jokes and witticisms, manufactured long since the bones of Joe were deposited in the churchyard of St. Clements, in the Strand, where a stone still exists, with an epitaph written by his friend, Stephen Duck.—WILLIAM, a person who acquired great notoriety in the United States by predicting the end of the world. He was a native of Pittsfield, and during the war of 1812 served as a volunteer captain on the northern frontier. He began to speak on the advent of the millennium in 1833, and for 10 years labored assiduously to prove from the Bible that the judgment would take place in 1843. He gathered followers to the number of forty or fifty thousand; but, as his prophecies failed, the excitement died out. D. 1849, in his 68th year.—JAMES WILLIAM, an American poet and miscellaneous writer, passed his early life in a variety of different pursuits, without being able to fix himself permanently in any occupation. He pursued for a while the study of law, and subsequently engaged in literary pursuits in Boston, where he met with disappointment, and was worn by disquietude. He left his native country for the West Indies, in 1828, where he obtained a grant of land from the Spanish government, and d. in the following year, at the age of 27. A volume of his poems and sketches was published in Boston, in 1830.—EDWARD, an eminent physician, was b. in Delaware, in 1760, and in 1796 removed to New York, for the practice of his profession. He became known by an able treatise on the "Origin of the Yellow Fever," and, in conjunction with Dr. Mitchell and Dr. Smith, established the "Medical Repository." In 1807 he was elected professor of the practice of physic in the university of New York, and in 1809 clinical lecturer in the New York hospital. D. 1812. His medical treatises have been collected and published in one volume.

MILLES, JEREMIAH, an eminent English divine and antiquary; b. 1713; d. 1784. He was ardently engaged in the Chattertonian controversy, and published the whole of the supposed Rowley's poems, with a glossary.

MILLS, CHARLES, an historian, was b. at Greenwich, in 1788. He served his time as clerk to a solicitor, but relinquished his legal pursuits for others more congenial to his tastes. In 1817 he published his "History of Mohammedanism," which was succeeded by the "History of the Crusades," the "Travels of Theodore Lucas," and the "History of Chivalry."—SAMUEL J., agent of the American Colonization Society, graduated at William's college; 1809. At the theological seminary in Andover he united with Newell, Judson, Nott, and Hall, in a resolution to undertake a foreign mission. He, with the three first, offered themselves as missionaries to the general association of ministers of Massachusetts, 1810. He was ordained with other missionaries at Newburyport, 1815. He attended the first meeting of the Colonization Society, Jan. 1, 1817, which was established by the exertion of Dr. Finley. Appointed with E. Burgess, to visit England, and explore the coast of Africa for the society, he sailed in November, 1817. He sailed from England for Africa, Feb. 2, 1818, and arrived on the coast, March 12. After a laborious inspection of more than two months, he embarked on his return, in the brig Success, May 22, 1818. A severe cold which he took early in June, was succeeded by a fever, of which he d., June 16, 1818.

MILNE, JOSHUA, author of the celebrated "Treatise on Annuities and Assurances," was formerly a clerk in the banking-house of the Messrs. Currie, previous to his becoming connected with the Sun Assurance company, to which he performed the duties of actuary for upwards of 30 years. D. 1851.

MILNER, JOHN, a celebrated Catholic divine and writer on ecclesiastical antiquities and theology, was b. in London in 1752. In 1777 he was ordained a priest, and commenced his pastoral duties in 1779, at the Catholic chapel, Winchester, whither he had gone to administer spiritual aid to the French prisoners confined there. In 1798 he published his "History, Civil and Ecclesiastical, and Survey of the Antiquities of Winchester," and subsequently, a "Treatise on the Ecclesiastical Architecture of England, during the Middle Ages." In 1803 he was appointed vicar-apostolic in the midland district, with the title of bishop of Castabala. In 1818 he published a treatise, entitled "The End of Religious Controversy," containing a defence of those articles of Catholic faith usually regarded as most objectionable by Protestants. D. 1826.

MILÓ, one of the most celebrated Grecian athletes, was a native of Crotona, in Italy, and a scholar of Pythagoras. Many instances of his prodigious strength are cited, of which one will be sufficient to notice here, viz., that he once carried a bull to the sacrifice on his shoulders, and killed it with a blow of his fist.

MILTIADES, an Athenian general, who lived about 500 B. C., and has been immortalized by defeating the Persians at Marathon. This hero, who had saved his country, failed in an attack on Paros, was compelled to refund the expenses of the expedition, and d. of his wounds in prison.

MILTON, JOHN, the most illustrious of English poets, was the son of a scrivener in London, and b. in Bread-street, in 1608. From St. Paul's school he went to Christ's college, Cambridge, where he took his degree in arts, being designed for the church; but not having an inclination to that calling, he returned to his father, who had retired from business with a good fortune, and settled at Horton, in Buckinghamshire. Here he wrote his "Comus," "L'Allegro," "Il Penseroso," and "Lycidas," poems of such merit as would have alone immortalized his name. In 1638 he travelled into France and Italy, and on his return to England settled in London. The troubles breaking out between the king and parliament, Milton engaged as a political writer on the popular side; and having a great animosity to the hierarchy, he published some virulent pamphlets against the bishops. In 1643 he married the daughter of Richard Powell, esq., a magistrate in Oxfordshire. The father of the lady being a jovial country gentleman and a royalist, the residence of her husband so disgusted the bride, that in less than a month, under the pretence of a visit, she left him, and remained for the rest of the summer with her parents. Milton became incensed, and regarding her conduct as a desertion of the marriage contract, he sought to punish it by reprobation, and to this is to be attributed his treatises on the subject of "Divorce." His wife's friends, however, brought about a reconciliation. He continued an ardent champion for the liberty party, even after the execution of Charles I., which deed he vindicated in his "Tenure of Kings and Magistrates;" for which the parliament rewarded him with £1000, and soon afterwards nominated him Latin secretary to the new council of state. He also wrote against the king's book, entitled "Icon Basilike." The treatise of Milton was called "Iconoclastes, or the Image Breaker." He was next employed to answer the treatise of Salmasius, entitled "Defensio Regia, or a Defence of the late King." The reply of Milton had for its title "Defensio pro Populo Anglicano;" and it was observed by Hobbes, in regard to the two disputants, that he did not know whose style was best, or whose arguments were worst. About this time he was wholly deprived of his sight, owing to a natural weakness, and intense application to his studies. In 1652 he lost his wife, and afterwards took another. He was the friend of Cromwell, to whom he became Latin secretary. When the ancient constitution was re-established, he was excepted out of the act of indemnity, on which he kept himself concealed for some time. By the kindness, however, of Sir William Davenant and others he obtained his pardon; soon after which he lost his second wife. In the time of the plague he removed with his family to Chalfont, in Buckinghamshire, where he completed his "Paradise Lost," which was printed first in 1667. For this immortal work he had only £15, and that by instalments. After this he engaged in another, called "Paradise Regained." Besides the poems mentioned above, Milton wrote a drama on the Greek model, entitled "Samson Agonistes," which possessed uncommon beauties, though not adapted to theatrical representation. He also wrote a "History of England to the Conquest," and several tracts. In his youth, Milton was distinguished for personal beauty, his habits of life were those of a student and philosopher, being strictly sober and temperate; and his chief relaxation consisted of music and conversation. Though warm and acrimonious in controversy, and possessing lordly notions of his rights as the head of a family, he is said to have been of a serene and cheerful temper, and particularly urbane in his intercourse with society. But whatever may be thought of his domestic virtues, there can be put one opinion with regard to the sublimity of his genius and the extent of his erudition. D. 1674.

MIMNERMUS, a Greek amatory poet of the 6th century B.C., who is said to have invented the pentameter measure; but only a few fragments of his poems are in existence.

MIRABAUD, JEAN BAPTISTE DE, perpetual secretary to the French Academy, was at first a member of the congregation of the Oratory, and afterwards served in the army. His works are, translations from "Tasso's Jerusalem," and "Ariosto's Orlando," into French; "Alphabet de la Fée Gracieuse," "Le Monde, son Origine, son Antiquité," "Sentimens des Philosophes sur la Nature de l'Ame." In 1770 was published under his name, but falsely, an atheistical book, entitled the "System of Nature," the real author being D'Holbach.

MIRABEAU, VICTOR RIQUETTI, marquis de, descended from an ancient family in Provence, but originally of Naples. He was one of the principal propagators of the doctrines of the French political economists, and wrote several books in support of them. His chief work is entitled "Ami des Hommes." B. 1715; d. 1789.—HONORE GABRIEL RIQUETTI, count de, one of the most celebrated characters of the French revolution, was the son of the preceding, and b. at Bignon, in Provence, in 1749. On leaving school, he entered the military service; and his intercourse with young and dissipated officers familiarized him to all their vices. His active mind, however, could not remain idle, and he read all the books which he could on the military art. He also fell in love, and his passion was marked by all the impetuosity of a strong and wild character. His father, who systematically thwarted his inclinations, now procured his confinement in a fortress on the island of Rhé. After his liberation, he went as a volunteer, to Corsica, distinguished himself, and obtained a commission as captain of dragoons; but his father refusing to purchase him a regiment, he abandoned, though unwillingly, the military profession. In 1772 he espoused a rich heiress of Aix, but he soon squandered away the fortune he received with her, and plunged himself in debt. He was confined in different prisons, and on obtaining his liberty eloped to Holland with the wife of the President Mounnier. For this he was afterwards imprisoned in the castle of Vincennes, and remained there three years and a half. He then instituted an ineffectual lawsuit against his wife, who obtained a separation from him. In 1784 he visited London, and afterwards Berlin; and he was variously employed in literary quarrels and occupations till the commencement of the French revolution. This offered Mirabeau an ample element for his activity. He was elected deputy to the third estate of Aix, and by the courtiers he was termed the plebeian count. In this new capacity, his extraordinary eloquence, his talent, and his boldness, soon gave him irresistible weight in the assembly, and rendered him the idol of the people. Before, however, he could carry his plans into effect, a sudden illness terminated his existence in 1791. His principal works are, "A Comparison between the Great Condé and Scipio Africanus," "History of Prussia under Frederic the Great," "Original Letters containing an Account of his Life and Amours," "Secret History of the Court of Berlin," which book was burnt by the common executioner; "On Lettres de Cachet," and an "Essay on Despotism."

MIRANDA, DON FRANCISCO, General, was b. of a Spanish family, at Caraccas, of which province his grandfather was governor. In 1783 he visited the United States, and travelled on foot over a part of Europe. In the French revolution he was a major-general in the service of France. From the prison into which he was cast, he escaped to England in 1797. Having been again banished from France for opposing the first consul in 1803, he resolved to emancipate South America, from the dominion of Spain. Having obtained secret assistance and encouragement, he sailed from New York in 1806, with a number of American volunteers. At St. Domingo, he chartered two schooners; they were captured on the coast, while he escaped in his ship. In 1810 he renewed his attempt, but was obliged to capitulate to General Monteverde, who in disregard of his agreement, treated him as a prisoner. He was sent to Spain, and d. after four years' confinement in the dungeons of the inquisition at Cadiz.

MIRANDOLA, GIOVANNI PICO BELLA, count and prince of Concordia, one of the brightest ornaments of literature in the 15th century, was b. in 1463. In his youth he gave astonishing proofs of his genius; and when little more than 20 he set up in all the universities of Italy a number of difficult problems in the sciences, which he engaged publicly to defend. This extraordinary young man d. in 1494 at Florence, where he had resided some time, on terms of intimacy with the most learned and distinguished men of the age, particularly Lorenzo de Medici and Politian.

MITCHELL, SAMUEL L., a celebrated physician, was b. 1763, and was for a great number of years professor of various branches in the college of physicians and surgeons of New York. He was elected to the assembly of New York soon after the revolution, and was afterwards a senator in congress, and colleague of De Witt Clinton. He was a man of immense acquisitions, and his labors are dispersed through many volumes. He was a member of most of the philosophical societies of any note in Europe and his native country. D. 1831.—STEPHEN MIX, a distinguished citizen of Connecticut, who held various judicial offices in that state. He was b. at Wethersfield, 1743; was graduated at Yale college in 1763; was chosen tutor in the college in 1766, in which station he continued three years; entered upon the practice of law in Wethersfield in 1772; was appointed in 1779 to the office of an associate judge of the Hartford county court, and in 1790 was placed at the head of that court; in 1795 he was appointed judge of the superior court of Connecticut, and in 1807, chief justice of that court, which office he held till 1814, when he became disqualified by age. In 1783, and again in 1785, he was elected a delegate from Connecticut to the congress of the United States; and in 1793 he was appointed a senator in congress, which station he held till he became judge of the superior court of Connecticut in 1795 D. 1837.

MITFORD, WILLIAM, an eminent historical and philological writer, was b. at London, in 1734, studied at Queen's college, Oxford, and then at the Middle Temple, but he early quitted the profession of the law, and obtained a commission in the Hampshire militia, of which he rose to be colonel. He was, successively, M. P. for Newport, in Cornwall, Beeralston, and New Romney. He was professor of ancient history at the Royal Academy, and, besides his principal work, "The History of Greece," he published "An Essay on the Harmony of Language," "A Treatise on the Military Force, and particularly the Militia of this Kingdom," "Observations on the History of Christianity," &c. D. 1827.

MÖESER, JUSTUS, an eminent German advocate and author, was b. at Osnaburgh, in 1720, was educated at Jena and Gottingen, acquired great popularity on his return to his native place as an advocate and counsellor of justice. D. 1794.

MOLA, PETER FRANCIS, an eminent painter, b. in 1609, at Coldra, in the Milanese. He was a pupil of Albani, and is distinguished both as a landscape and historical painter. D. 1665.

MOLAI, JAMES DE, the last grand marshal of the knights Templars, was a native of Burgundy. He was admitted into the order about 1265, and having signalized himself by his valor in Palestine, was unanimously elected grand-marshal on the death of William de Beaujeu. The great wealth and power of the Templars, their pride and their dissolute manners, created them a multitude of enemies, and led to their destruction. At length, Philippe le Bel, king of France, and Pope Clement V. formed a plan for their extermination. They were accused of heresy, impiety, and various crimes revolting to human nature. In 1307, all the Templars throughout France were arrested at the same hour, and they were tried and convicted, some on their own confessions, and others on such evidence as could be procured. Fifty-seven were committed to the flames in 1311, and after an imprisonment of seven years, De Molai shared their fate at Paris, in 1314, declaring his innocence to the last.

MOLE, FRANCIS RENE, an eminent French comedian, b. at Paris, in 1734. During the progress of the revolution he became an associate of the Jacobins, and impiously officiated in the church of St. Roch, as the priest of the goddess of Reason. D. 1802. — MATTHEW, a French magistrate remarkable for his probity and courage in the most troublesome times, was b. at Paris, in 1584, became president of the parliament, and keeper of the seals. D. 1656.

MOLESWORTH, ROBERT, Viscount, an Irish statesman, b. at Dublin in 1656, and educated in Trinity college. When James II. landed in Ireland, he caused his estate to be confiscated; but, on the settlement of affairs under William III., he was made a privy councillor, and sent ambassador to Copenhagen, where he had a dispute with the king, which induced him to return home abruptly. He then published "An Account of Denmark," which was considered as a libel on the country, and complained of as such by the Danish ambassador in London. In 1714 he was made a commissioner of trade and plantations, and two years afterwards raised to the Irish peerage. D. 1725.

MOLIERE, JOHN BAPTIST POQUELIN DE, the most celebrated among the French writers of comedy, was b. at Paris, in 1622. His father was valet-de-chambre and upholsterer to the king, and when he became infirm, Moliere was obliged to officiate for him in the royal household, in which capacity he attended Louis XIII. to Narbonne, in 1641. On his return to Paris his passion for the stage was unconquerable; he became a provincial actor, and began also to display his dramatic powers as an author. In 1662 he produced his "Etourdi;" and having the patronage of the prince de Conti, he finally established himself at Paris. His reputation was carried to its highest summit when the "Tartuffe" appeared; and the piece was played and applauded after it had been kept back for years by the clamor of false devotees. In this, hypocrisy is fully unveiled, the characters are equally various and true, and the dialogue is elegant and natural. For twenty years Moliere wrote for the stage; and being all the time an actor also, and interrupted by various avocations, his fertility was most extraordinary. His last piece was the celebrated "Le Malade Imaginaire," to the fourth representation of which he fell a sacrifice. He himself acted the imaginary sick man in the piece; but laboring at the time under a pulmonary complaint, and exerting himself with unusual spirit, his efforts brought on the rupture of a blood-vessel, by which he was suffocated. Moliere may be regarded as the true father of French comedy; and Voltaire styles him "the best comic writer of any nation." He chastised the coxcombry, false wit, and pedantry of the day, and his works may be considered as a history of the manners, fashions, and tastes of the times. In private life he was humane and benevolent in a high degree, and no one had more friends of rank and talent, or was more lamented by them, but his matrimonial connection with a young actress, whose conduct subjected him to great annoyances, imbittered his domestic enjoyments. D. 1673.

MOLIERES, JOSEPH PRIVAT DE, a philosophical writer, was b. at Tarascon, in 1677, became a member of the congregation of the Oratory, and was a pupil of Malebranche, on whose death he quitted the society, and devoted himself wholly to physics and mathematics. He was afterwards professor of philosophy at the royal college, and d. in 1742. His works are, "Philosophical Lectures," "Mathematical Lectures," and "La Premier Partie des Elémens de Géométrie."

MOLIN, JAMES, usually called Du-noulin, a celebrated French physician, was b. in 1666, became chief physician to the army in Catalonia, at the age of 26, and on his return to Paris, in 1706, added to his reputation by his cure of the prince of Condé. In his medical practice he was so partial to venesection, that it is supposed Le Sage intended to satirize him under the character of Dr. Sangrado. D. 1755.

MOLINOS, MICHAEL, a Spanish theologian, and founder of the sect called Quietists, was b. 1627, at Saragossa, but passed the greater part of his life at Rome, where, in 1675, he published his celebrated "Spiritual Guide," which was condemned by the Inquisition ten years after its first appearance, and the author sentenced to perpetual imprisonment. He d. a captive, in 1696. The followers of Molinos, of whom Madame Guyon was the principal, were called Quietists, because they maintained that religion consists in an abstraction of the mind from external and finite objects.

MOLYNEUX, WILLIAM, an ingenious mathematician, was b. at Dublin, in 1656. The philosophical society, established at Dublin in 1683, owed its origin to his endeavors, and he became the first secretary. Soon after, he was appointed surveyor-general of the works, and chief engineer. In 1685 he was chosen a member of the Royal Society, and in 1689 he settled with his family at Chester, where he employed himself in finishing his "Treatise on Dioptrics." In this year he returned to Dublin, and was chosen one of the representatives for that city. Besides the above, he wrote "Sciotherium Telescopium;" also, "The Case of Ireland stated, in relation to its being bound by Acts of Parliament in England;" and some papers in the "Philosophical Transactions."—SAMUEL, his son, was b. at Chester, in 1689, became secretary to George II., when prince of Wales, and was distinguished by his skill in astronomy.

MONCRIF, FRANCIS AUGUSTIN PARADIS DE, a member of the French Academy, was b. at Paris, in 1687, became the favorite of fashionable society by his musical, theatrical, and poetical talents, and d. in 1770. His principal works are "An Essay on the Art of Pleasing," and a romance, entitled "Les Ames Rivaless."

MONK, GEORGE, duke of Albemarle, a distinguished military commander, and a great promoter of the restoration of Charles II., was the son of Sir Thomas Monk, of Potheridge, near Torrington in Devonshire, and b. in 1608. On the breaking out of the war between Charles I. and the Scotch in 1639, he obtained a colonel's commission, and attended his majesty in both his expeditions to the north. When the Irish rebellion began in 1641, his services there were so important, that the lords justices thought proper to appoint him governor of Dublin. On his return to England he was sent to relieve Nantwich, where he was taken prisoner by the army belonging to the parliament, and sent to the Tower, where he remained till 1646. The royal cause being now ruined, he obtained his liberty on condition of taking a command in Ireland, where he concluded a peace which displeased the parliament, who passed a vote of censure upon him for it. Cromwell, however, who thought highly of his military talents, made him lieutenant-general, and gave him the command in Scotland. But the sagacious protector had strong suspicions of Monk's sincerity; and not long before his death wrote him a letter, to which he added this postscript: "There be that tell me that there is a certain cunning fellow in Scotland, called George Monk, who is said to lie in wait there to introduce Charles Stuart: I pray you use your diligence to apprehend him and send him up to me." On the decease of the protector, the resignation of power by his son, and the contest of parties which subsequently took place, he availed himself of the commanding situation which he occupied, to crush the republicans, and promote the recall and restoration of the Stuart family to the throne, in the person of Charles II. As the reward of his loyalty, he was created duke of Albemarle, with a pension of £7000 a year, made a privy councillor, and invested with the order of the garter. In 1664 he was appointed admiral of the fleet in conjunction with Prince Rupert, and in 1666 obtained a great victory over the Dutch, in a tremendous battle, which lasted three days. D. 1670.

MONMOUTH, JAMES, duke of, a natural son of Charles II., was b. at Rotterdam, in 1619. He was distinguished by his personal attractions, his affable address, and thoughtless generosity; hence he became very popular. But he was weak-minded and pliant. He was concerned in various plots, which had for their object the exclusion of the duke of York from the crown; and he was, in consequence, ordered by Charles to quit the kingdom. On the accession of James II., being urged to the act by some of his partisans, he landed at Lyme, with scarcely a hundred followers, (June, 1685;) but his numbers were soon increased, and he assumed the title of king, and asserted the legitimacy of his birth. His forces were defeated, and the duke himself was made prisoner, having been found in the disguise of a peasant, lying at the bottom of a ditch, overcome with hunger, fatigue, and anxiety. He refused to betray his accomplices, and conducted himself with much firmness on the scaffold, where his head was severed from his body, after four unsuccessful blows. The people, of whom he was still the favorite, believed that the person executed was not Monmouth; and it was probably this belief which has led some to conjecture that the famous "Iron Mask" was the duke of Monmouth.

MONRO, ALEXANDER, an eminent physician and anatomist, of Scottish descent, was b. in London, in 1697. He wrote "Osteology, or a Treatise on the Anatomy of the Bones;" and an "Account of the Success of Inoculation in Scotland." D. 1767.—ALEXANDER, his eldest son, published numerous works, among which are, "Observations on the Nervous System," "The Structure and Physiology of Fishes," "A Description of the Bursæ Mucosæ," "Three Treatises on the Brain, Eye, and Ear," "Observations on the Crural Hernia," "Outlines of the Anatomy of the Human Body."—DONALD, his second son, became a physician in the army; and wrote "Observations on the Means of preserving the Health of Soldiers," and a "Treatise on Medical and Pharmaceutical Chemistry." D. 1802.

MONROE, JAMES, president of the United States, was b. in Virginia, in 1759, and was educated in William and Mary college. He entered the revolutionary war in 1776 as a cadet, was at the battles of Harlem Heights and White Plains, and in the attack on Trenton, and rose through the rank of lieutenant to that of captain. He was present at the battles of Brandywine, Germantown, and Monmouth, as aid to Lord Sterling. Resuming the study of the law, he entered the office of Mr. Jefferson, and after being a member of the assembly of Virginia and the council, he was elected in 1783, a member of the old congress. In 1790 he was elected a member of the senate of the United States, in 1794 went as minister plenipotentiary to France, and in 1799 was appointed governor of Virginia. In 1803 he was appointed minister extraordinary to France, in the same year minister to London, and in the next minister to Spain. In 1806 he was again appointed, in conjunction with Mr. William Pinkney, minister to London. He was subsequently governor of Virginia; in 1811 was appointed secretary of state, and continued to exercise the duties of this department, and for some time those of the department of war, till 1817. In that year he was chosen president of the Union, and in 1821 was re-elected by a unanimous vote, with the single exception of one vote in New Hampshire. He d. in New York, on the 4th of July, 1831.

MONSTRELET, ENGUERRAND DE, a French chronicler of the 15th century, b. about 1390, and d. in 1453. He was provost of Cambray, and bailiff of Wallincourt; and wrote a chronicle of events, from the year 1400 to 1453, the year in which he died.

MONTAGU, GEORGE, an eminent naturalist, was a native of Wiltshire. He devoted his particular attention to the study of ornithology and conchology; and was the author of "An Ornithological Dictionary" and "Testacea Britannica, or Natural History of British Shells." D. 1815.—MARY WORTLEY, a lady distinguished for her literary attainments, was the eldest daughter of Evelyn, duke of Kingston, and b. about 1690, at Thoresby, in Nottinghamshire. She made a great proficiency in the Latin and Greek languages, under the superintendance of Bishop Burnet. In 1712 she married Mr. Edward Wortley Montagu, whom she accompanied in his embassy to Constantinople, from which place she wrote "Letters," to Mr. Pope, Mr. Addison, and other eminent literati of the time, which are very interesting, and contain many curious facts respecting the manners of the Turks. She is also memorable for having first introduced the practice of inoculation into that country, for which millions have had cause to bless her memory. She closed a life marked by a great variety of adventures, in 1762. Her collected works have been published in six volumes; and her "Letters" certainly place her at the head of female epistolary writers in Great Britain.

MONTAGUE, ELIZABETH, an eminent female writer, was the daughter of Matthew Robinson, esq., of Yorkshire, b. 1720. She had an opportunity of prosecuting her studies under the direction of Conyers Middleton, to whom she was probably indebted for the tincture of learning which so remarkably influenced her character and manners. About 1742 she married Edward Montague, a descendant of the first earl of Sandwich. Mrs. Montague published "An Essay on the Writings and Genius of Shakspeare," which obtained a great and deserved reputation. She formed a literary society known by the name of the "Blue Stocking Club," from the circumstance that Mr. Benjamin Stillingfleet, a gentleman belonging to it, wore stockings of that color. Mrs. Montague was noticed for another peculiarity, that of giving an annual dinner on May-day to the chimney-sweepers of the metropolis. D. 1800.

MONTAIGNE, MICHAEL DE, a celebrated French essayist, was b. in 1533, at the castle belonging to his family, in Perigord. His father, Pierre Eyquem, seigneur de Montaigne, bestowed the greatest care on the cultivation of his son's promising talents; and after a course of suitable instruction Montaigne became a parliamentary counsellor, but his aversion to the duties of the station led him to retire from it. The study of man was his favorite occupation, and he therefore devoted himself entirely to philosophical subjects. His quiet, however, was disturbed by the troubles which distracted France in consequence of the cruel persecutions of the Huguenots; his castle was plundered by the leaguers, and he himself was ill-treated by their adversaries. To these causes of distress was added the plague, which broke out in Guienne, in 1586, and compelled him to leave his estate, with his family, and wander through the country, which was then the theatre of all kinds of atrocities. He then resided some time in Paris, but finally returned home, and d. in 1592. His celebrated "Essays" contain a treasure of wisdom, and may still be deemed one of the most popular books in the French language. Their style, without being pure or correct, is simple, bold, lively, and energetic. Cardinal du Perron emphatically called them the breviary of honest men; and La Harpe observes, "It is not a book we are reading, but a conversation to which we are listening; and he persuades, because he does not teach."

MONTALVAN, DON LUIS PEREZ DE, an eminent Spanish dramatist in the reign of Philip IV., whose writings are distinguished by good taste and sound judgment. D. 1639.

MONTALEMBERT, MARK RENE, marquis de, a French general, was b. 1714, at Angoulême; entered the army early in life; and in the seven years' war was attached to the staff of the armies of Russia and Sweden, to give an account of military operations to the French ministry. He published a work on fortifications, besides three volumes of correspondence on military subjects; and papers in the memoirs of the Academy of Sciences.

MONTANUS, the founder of a new sect, in the 2d century, was a native of Phrygia. He affected to be a prophet; and, having deceived two rich ladies, named Priscilla and Maximilla, by his pretended sanctity, and exalted them into prophetesses, he asserted it as an article of faith, that the fulness of the Spirit was imparted to these three chosen vessels to complete the mystery of eternal redemption. Among others who fell into this delusion were Tertallian and Theodotus.—BENEDICT ARIAS, a Spanish Benedictine, was b. at Frexened, in Estremadura, in 1527, and educated at Aleala. He was at the council of Trent, and, on his return to Spain, was employed in editing a polyglot Bible. He was one of the most learned divines of the 16th century, and d. at Seville, in 1598.—JOHN BAPTIST, an Italian physician, was b. at Verona, in 1488. He was sent to study the law at Padua, instead of which he applied to physic, and became professor of medicine. D. 1551. He translated into Latin the works of Ætius; the poem of Musæus, the "Argonautics" of Orpheus, and the "Tragopodagra of Lucian."

MONTECUCULI, RAYMOND DE, a celebrated general, was b. in 1608, of a distinguished family in the Modenese, and entered into the service of the emperor of Germany. In 1634, at the head of 2000 horse, he surprised 10,000 Swedes, and took their baggage and artillery; but he was soon after defeated, and taken prisoner. In 1637 he defeated Razolzi, prince of Transylvania; in 1664 he gained a splendid victory over the Turks at St. Gothard; and, in 1675 and 1676, he commanded on the Rhine, and foiled all the efforts of Turenne and the prince of Condé by his masterly manœuvres. D. 1680. He wrote some excellent "Mémoires" on the military art, and a treatise on the "Art of Reigning."

MONTESQUIEU, CHARLES DE SECONDAT, baron de, was b. at the castle of Brede, near Bordeaux, in 1689; and in 1716 became president of the parliament of Bordeaux. His first appearance as an author was in the publication of the "Persian Letters," a work which gave proofs of a fine genius and a solid judgment. In 1728 he was admitted a member of the Academy, on which occasion he delivered an eloquent discourse. Having given up his civil employments, he went on his travels, and remained in England three years. After his return he retired to his estate, and there completed his work "On the Causes of the Grandeur and Declension of the Romans," which was published in 1734. His greatest performance, however, is the "Spirit of Laws," which came out in 1748, and, though attacked by some writers, secured its ground in the estimation of the literary world. His other works are, "The Temple of Cnidus," a piece called "Lysimachus," and an "Essay on Taste." Burke characterizes him as "a genius not born in every country, or every time,—with an Herculean robustness of mind, and nerves not to be broken with labor." D. 1755.

MONTEZUMA, emperor of Mexico at the time of the Spanish invasion. Having, by his despotic government, made himself many enemies, they willingly joined Cortez, and assisted him in his progress. Seized in the heart of his capital, and kept as a hostage at the Spanish quarters, he was at first treated with respect, which was soon changed into insult, and fetters were put on his legs. He was at length obliged to acknowledge his vassalage to the king of Spain, but he could not be brought to change his religion. He d. in 1520, from being struck on the temple with a stone, while persuading his tumultuous subjects to receive the Spanish yoke.

MONTFAUCON, BERNARD DE, a celebrated French critic and antiquary, was b. at the castle of Sontage, in Languedoc, in 1655; became a Benedictine monk, after having engaged in the military service; and d. in 1741. He was a voluminous writer; but the most important of his works is that treasure of classical archaeology, entitled "L'Antiquité expliquée et représentée en Figures."

MONTFORT, SIMON DE, earl of Leicester, son of the Simon de Montfort who distinguished himself by his zeal and severity in the crusade against the Albigenses, was b. in France, and retired to England in 1231, on account of some dispute with Queen Blanche. Henry III. received him very kindly, bestowed upon him the earldom of Leicester, which had formerly belonged to his ancestors, and gave him his sister, the countess dowager of Pembroke, in marriage. After this, Henry appointed him seneschal of Gascony; but he ruled so despotically there, that he was recalled, and a violent altercation took place between them, in which the king applied the opprobrious epithet of "traitor" to his subject, and the latter gave his sovereign the lie. A reconciliation was, however, effected, and De Montfort was employed on several occasions, in a diplomatic and military capacity. In 1258 he appeared in parliament at the head of the discontented barons, who were all armed, and demanded that the administration should be put in the hands of twenty four barons, who were empowered to redress grievances, and to reform the state. This was conceded, and for a time submitted to; till at length hostilities commenced between the barons and the royal party, which ended in the triumph of the former at the battle of Lewes. From what precise cause it does not appear, but probably it was owing to his arrogance and rapacity, that a powerful party was raised up against him among the barons; and, according to some, this was the motive which induced him to summon knights of shires and burgesses to the parliament in 1265. Whatever may have been his motive, however, he thus became the founder of the English house of commons. In the same year was fought the battle of Evesham, in which the royal forces were led by Prince Edward; and there, in attempting to rally his troops, by rushing into the midst of the enemy, he was surrounded and slain.

MONTGOLFIER, JACQUES ETIENNE, the inventor of air-balloons, was b. in 1745, at Vidalon-les-Annonai. In conjunction with an elder brother he devoted himself to scientific pursuits, and was the first who manufactured the vellum paper, still so much admired for its beauty. One day while boiling water in a coffee-pot, the top of which was covered with paper folded in a spherical form, he saw the paper swell and rise—a circumstance that furnished him with the idea of a light machine, made buoyant by inflation, and traversing the air. After various preliminary trials, it being ascertained that a balloon, with a car attached to it, could be kept suspended by a supply of heated air, the experiment was repeated on a large scale at Versailles, when the marquis d'Orlandes ascended in the presence of the royal family, and a vast concourse of spectators. D. 1799.

MONTI, VINCENZO, one of the most celebrated poets of modern Italy, was b. at Fusignano, near Ferrara, in 1753; and became as notorious for the versatility of his political principles as for his poetic talents. He commenced his career as secretary to Luigi Braschi, nephew of Popè Pius VI., and was then a violent enemy of the French; he afterwards became a republican, next a panegyrist of Napoleon; and ended by eulogizing the emperor of Austria. His "Basvilliana," written on the murder of Hugo Basseville, the French ambassador at Rome, is a close imitation of Dante, and gained him a high reputation. His other chief works were, "Bardo della Selva nera," and a translation of Homer's Iliad; and his dramatic writings are the tragedies of "Galeotti Manfredi," "Aristodemo," and "Caius Græchus." He was successively appointed professor of the belles lettres and of rhetoric in the university of Padua, and historiographer of the kingdom of Italy; and, after the destruction of that state, he was fortunate enough to preserve his place and pension under the new government. He was also a knight of the legion of honor, and a member of many learned societies. D. 1828.

MONTMORENCY, ANNE DE, peer, marshal, and constable of France, b. in 1493, was one of the greatest generals of the 16th century. He distinguished himself under Francis I., in the wars against Charles V., and was made prisoner at the battle of Pavia, which was fought against his advice. D. 1567.—

HENRY II., duke de, was b. in 1595, and in his 18th year was created admiral of France. He defeated the Protestants in Languedoc; and, in 1628, he gained decided advantages over the duke de Rohan, leader of the Huguenots. In 1630 he held the chief command in Piedmont, and defeated the Spaniards under Doria. His services were at length rewarded with a marshal's baton; and being jealous of the influence of Cardinal Richelieu, he, with Gaston, duke of Orleans, raised the standard of rebellion in Languedoc, where, being opposed by Le Force and Schomberg, he was wounded and made prisoner. He was condemned to death by the parliament of Toulouse, and executed, in 1632.

MONTPENSIER, ANNE MARIA LOUISA, of Orleans, b. at Paris, in 1627, was the daughter of Gaston, duke of Orleans, and the niece of Louis XIII. In the civil contests which distinguished the minority of Louis XIV., she was a zealous partisan of Condé; and, in fact, her whole life was a scene of restless ambition and intrigue. D. 1693.

MONTROSE, JAMES GRAHAM, marquis of, a distinguished royalist under Charles I., was the son of the earl of Montrose, who gave him an excellent education, which was improved by a residence in France, where he held a commission in the Scotch guards. On his return home he experienced such neglect through the jealousy of the marquis of Hamilton, as induced him to join the Covenanters; but he afterwards took a very active part on the side of the king; and in a few months gained the battles of Perth, Aberdeen, and Inverlochy; for which service he was created a marquis. In 1645 his fortune changed; and after suffering a defeat from Lesley, he was obliged to leave the kingdom, when he landed in Orkney with a few followers, but was soon overpowered, conveyed to Edinburgh, and there hung and quartered.

MONTUCCI, ANTONIO, a learned philologist, particularly excelling as a Chinese scholar, was b. at Sienna, in 1762, and studied at the university there, devoting himself to the living languages with almost incredible application. In 1785 he was appointed professor of English in the Tolomei college; and, in 1789, accompanied Mr. Wedgwood to England as Italian teacher in his family. Being in London in 1792, when preparations were making for Lord Macartney's embassy to China, Montucci took the opportunity of obtaining assistance from some Chinese youths attached to the embassy, in acquiring their language, with which he was before only imperfectly acquainted. The result was he projected a Chinese dictionary, the prospectus of which he forwarded to several princes and academies in Europe. In 1806 he went to Berlin, on the invitation of the king of Prussia; but the invasion of the country by Bonaparte for some time interrupted his plans; and, returning to Italy, he d. at Sienna, in 1829. He is the author of a "Chinese Dictionary," an "Italian Pocket Dictionary," and several elementary works in that language; and he edited the "Poesie inedite de Lorenzo de' Medici," published at the expense of Mr. Roscoe.

MONTUCLA, JOHN STEPHEN, an eminent French mathematician, was b. at Lyons, in 1725; studied at the Jesuits' college, and acquired legal knowledge at Toulouse, but relinquished the law for the cultivation of mathematical science; was sent to Cayenne, in 1764, as astronomer; and d. in 1799. His chief work is his "Histoire des Mathématiques."

MOORE, EDWARD, an English poet and dramatic writer, b. 1712. In 1744 he published his "Fables for the Female Sex," and after that the comedies of the "Foundling," and "Gil Blas," and the tragedy of "The Gamester." He next became the editor of a periodical paper, called "The World," in which he was assisted by lords Lyttleton, Chesterfield, and many other men of rank and talent. D. 1757.—JOHN, a physician, and miscellaneous writer, b. in 1730, at Stirling. In 1799 he published the fruits of his travels in "A View of Society and Manners in France, Switzerland, and Germany," and in 1781 two volumes more, entitled "A View of Society and Manners in Italy." After this, he published his "Medical Sketches;" a novel entitled "Zeluco," which abounds with incident, and affords a striking illustration of Italian character and manners. In 1795 he published "A View of the Causes and Progress of the French Revolution." He subsequently published a novel, entitled "Edward, or various Views of Human Nature," and "Mordaunt, or Sketches of Life, Character, and Manners in various Countries." D. 1802.—Sir JOHN, a distinguished military commander, was the eldest son of Dr. John Moore, and b. at Glasgow, in 1761. In 1796 he went out as a brigadier-general to the West Indies, under Sir Ralph Abercromby, who appointed him to the government of St. Lucia, in the capture of which he had a principal share. On his return home, in 1797, he was employed in Ireland during the rebellion, and was raised to the rank of major-general. In 1808 he was appointed to command an army in Spain, where, after a skilful and arduous retreat before a very superior force, he fell by a cannon-ball, under the walls of Corunna, January 16th, 1809.—JAMES, governor of South Carolina, succeeded Blake in 1700, and continued in office until Sir Nathaniel Johnson assumed it in 1703. The provocations of the Spaniards induced Governor Moore, in 1702, to propose to the assembly an expedition against St. Augustine. The measure was adopted, but proved unsuccessful, and entailed a heavy burden on the colony. To answer the public exigence on this occasion, the first paper money was issued in South Carolina, under the name of bills of credit. In 1719, when the revolution took place, and Governor Robert Johnson was deposed, Colonel Moore, who had early and zealously espoused the cause of the people, was chosen governor. He was well qualified by his prudence and enterprise for the crisis, and when the transfer of the government to the king was effected, and General Nicholson was placed at the head of the government, Colonel Moore was elected speaker of the assembly, and continued to be rechosen until 1725.—Sir HENRY, governor of New York, was appointed in 1765, and arrived in the colony in November following. He continued governor until his death, 1769.

MORE, ANTONIO, a celebrated portrait

painter, b. at Utrecht, in 1519. He was very successful in his portraits, of which he painted several in England, in the reign of Queen Mary, on whose death he accompanied Philip II. to Spain; where he lived in terms of great intimacy with that monarch. D. 1575.—HANNAH, an eminent moral writer, was b. at Stapleton, in Gloucestershire, in 1744. She was one of the five daughters of a village schoolmaster. The literary abilities of Hannah early attracted notice. Her first literary production, "The Search after Happiness," a pastoral drama, was written when she was only 18 years of age, though not published till 1773. By the encouragement of Garrick, she tried her strength in tragic composition, and wrote "The Inflexible Captive," a tragedy, which was printed in 1764. Her tragedy of "Percy," the most popular of her dramatic compositions, was brought out in 1778, and ran fourteen nights successively; and her last tragedy, "The Fatal Falsehood," was produced in 1779. Shortly after, her opinions of public theatres underwent a change, and she has stated that she did not consider the stage, in its present state, as "becoming the appearance or countenance of a Christian." Her first prose publication was "Thoughts on the Manners of the Great;" this was followed by her "Estimate of the Religion of the Fashionable World." In 1795 she commenced at Bath, in monthly numbers, "The Cheap Repository," a series of tales for the common people, one of which is the well-known "Shepherd of Salisbury Plain." She subsequently produced her "Strictures on the Modern System of Female Education," "Hints towards Forming the Character of a Young Princess," "Cælebs in Search of a Wife," "Practical Piety," "Christian Morals," an "Essay on the Character and Writings of St. Paul," and "Moral Sketches of the Prevailing Opinions and Manners, Foreign and Domestic, with Reflections on Prayer." D. 1833.—HENRY, an eminent divine of the church of England, was b. at Grantham, in Lincolnshire, in 1614; was educated at Eton, and Christ's college, Cambridge; and, while at the latter, profoundly studied the most celebrated systems of philosophy, and finally settled into a decided preference for that of Plato. In 1640 he published "Psycho-Zoia, or the Life of the Soul;" a philosophical poem, which he republished, with other pieces, in 1647. He refused the highest ecclesiastical preferments, and d., universally beloved, in 1687.—Sir THOMAS, chancellor of England, was the son of Sir John More, judge of the King's Bench, and b. in London, in 1480. He was educated at Christ-church, then Canterbury college, Oxford; and, in 1499, became a student of Lincoln's Inn. At the age of 21 he obtained a seat in parliament, where he opposed a subsidy demanded by Henry VII. with such force, that it was refused by the house. At the accession of Henry VIII. he was called to the bar, and in 1508 he was made judge of the sheriff's court, and a justice of peace. In 1518 he published his "Utopia," a political romance; and about this time the friendship began between him and Erasmus, which lasted through life. By the interest of Wolsey he obtained the honor of knighthood, and a place in the privy council. In 1520 he was made treasurer of the exchequer; and in 1523 chosen speaker of the house of commons, where he resisted a motion for an oppressive subsidy, which gave great offence to his former friend, the cardinal. In 1530 he succeeded Wolsey as lord chancellor; and by his indefatigable application in that office, there was in a short time not a cause left undetermined. He resigned the seals, because he could not conscientiously lend his support to the measures of Henry respecting his divorce of Queen Catharine; and he was eventually committed to the Tower for refusing the oath of supremacy. After an imprisonment of twelve months, he was brought to his trial in the court of King's Bench, where, notwithstanding his eloquent defence, he was found guilty of treason, and sentenced to be beheaded. His behavior, in the interval, corresponded with the uniform tenor of his life; and, on July 6, 1535, he ascended the scaffold, with his characteristic pleasantry, saying to the lieutenant of the Tower, "I pray you, see me safe up; and as for my coming down, let me shift for myself."

MOREAU, JEAN MICHEL, an eminent designer and engraver, was b. at Paris, 1741. He was a man of extensive information on works of art, and his industry was truly surprising. D. 1814.—JOHN VICTOR, one of the most celebrated of modern French generals, was b. in 1763, at Morlaix, and was brought up to the bar. The army, however, was the profession of his choice, and he entered a regiment before he was 18, but was taken from it by his father. The revolution enabled him to gratify his wishes, and he made his first campaign under Dumourier, in 1792. He gained the rank of brigadier-general in 1793, and that of general of division in 1794. In the latter year he commanded the right wing of Pichegru's army, and obtained great successes in the Netherlands. In 1796 he was placed at the head of the army of the Rhine. In that year he distinguished himself by penetrating into Bavaria, and by his masterly retreat before a superior force; in 1797, by his passage of the Rhine; and in 1800, by his campaign in Germany, crowned by the decisive victory of Hohenlinden. Having engaged with Pichegru, Georges, and other royalists, in a plot against the consular government, he was brought to trial in 1804, and sentenced to two years' imprisonment, but was allowed to retire to North America. There he remained till 1813, when he was prevailed upon to join the allied sovereigns, and appeared in arms against his country. He was, however, mortally wounded at the battle of Dresden, and d. 1813.

MORETO Y CABANA, DON AUGUSTIN, an eminent Spanish dramatic poet of the 17th century, who, after writing 200 plays, became an ecclesiastic. He was cotemporary with Calderon, and was patronized by Philip IV. He may fairly be called the Spanish Molière, many of his comedies still keeping possession of the stage, from their raucy humor, striking incidents, and characteristic language of the dramatis personæ.

MORGAGNI, JOHN BAPTIST, an eminent physician and anatomist, was b. at Forli, in Romagna, in 1682; studied under Valsalva, at Bologna; and, in 1711, became professor of medicine at Padua. In 1715 he was appointed to the first anatomical professorship, in which situation he continued till his death, in 1771.

MORGAN, Sir HENRY, a celebrated commander of buccanniers in the 17th century, was the son of a Welsh farmer. He took Porto Bello and Panama from the Spaniards, and for several years continued to enrich himself and his followers by the success of his marauding expeditions against that nation. Having amassed a large fortune, he settled at Jamaica, of which island he was appointed governor by Charles II., and knighted.—WILLIAM, an eminent Welsh prelate, who had a principal concern in the translation of the Bible into Welsh, printed first in 1588. D. 1604.—WILLIAM, a distinguished mathematician, was a native of Glamorganshire. He was actuary to the Equitable Assurance company, London, and remained connected with that institution 56 years. He was the author of "The Doctrine of Annuities and Assurances of Lives," "A Review of Dr. Crawford's Theory of Heat," together with various treatises connected with the financial prosperity of Great Britain. D. 1833.

DANIEL, a distinguished officer in the army of the American revolution, was b. in New Jersey, and removed to Virginia in 1755. He enlisted in Braddock's expedition as a private soldier, and on the defeat of that general returned to his occupation as a farmer. At the commencement of the revolution he was appointed to the command of a troop of horse, and joined the army under Washington, then in the neighborhood of Boston. He distinguished himself very much in the expedition against Quebec, where he fell into the hands of the enemy. On the exchange of prisoners he rejoined the American army, was appointed to the command of a select rifle corps, and detached to assist General Gates on the northern frontier, where he contributed materially to the capture of General Burgoyne. After a short retirement from service, on account of ill health, he was appointed brigadier-general by brevet, and commanded the force by which Colonel Tarleton was routed at the battle of Cowpens. He soon after resigned his commission. In 1794 he commanded the militia of Virginia, called out to suppress the insurrection in Pennsylvania, and continued in the service till 1795. He afterwards was elected to a seat in congress. D. 1799.—JOHN, an eminent American physician, was b. in Philadelphia, in 1735, and was educated at the college in that city. He completed his medical studies in Europe, and on his return, in 1763, was elected professor of the theory and practice of medicine in the medical college in Philadelphia. In October, 1775, he was appointed chief physician to the general hospitals of the American army; but, in 1775, was removed on account of certain accusations, which he afterwards proved to be entirely groundless. He was the author of several medical treatises. D. 1789.

MORGHEN, RAPHAAEL, a celebrated engraver, b. at Naples, in 1758. He was invited to Florence in 1782, to engrave the masterpieces in the Florentine gallery; and the reputation he acquired by his labors there, induced the grand-duke to employ him in engraving Leonardo da Vinci's noble composition of the Last Supper, which is painted on the wall of the refectory in the Dominicans' convent, at Milan. In 1803 he was chosen an associate of the French Institute; and, in 1812, he was invited to Paris by Napoleon, who treated him with the most flattering kindness. His works are numerous, and include some of the most remarkable productions of the great masters.

MORHOFF, DANIEL GEORGE, a learned German author, b. at Wismar, in Mecklenburg, in 1639; was educated at Stettin and Rostock; came to England, and resided for a time at Oxford. His principal work is entitled "Polyhistor, sive de Notitia Auetorum et Rerum Commentarii." D. 1691.

MORIER, JAMES, whose novels, descriptive of Eastern life and manners, enjoyed at the time great popularity, was b. in 1780. When still very young, he made an extensive tour through the East, the main incidents of which he described in his "Travels through Persia, Armenia, Asia Minor, to Constantinople." In 1810 he was appointed British envoy to the court of Persia, where he remained till 1816, and soon after his return he published "A Second Journey through Persia," &c. During his stay in the East, he made great use of his opportunity of studying the character of the people; and the knowledge thus acquired was turned to excellent account in his "Adventures of Hajji Baba of Ispahan," (a species of "Gil Blas," like Hope's "Anastadius,") whose "Adventures in England" he described in a second series; "Zohrab, or the Hostage," "Ayesha, or the Maid of Kars," "Abel Alnutt," "The Banished," &c.; in all of which, but especially in the first three, the manners, customs, and modes of thought prevalent in the East are portrayed with a liveliness, skill, and truthfulness to nature, attained by few. D. 1848.

MORITZ, CHARLES PHILIP, a German writer, was b. at Hameln, in 1757. He travelled in England, Switzerland, and Italy; wrote many works, the chief of which are his "Travels," "The Antiquities of Rome," the novels of "Anthony Reiser and Andrew Hartknopf," and various grammatical treatises. D. 1793.

MORLAND, GEORGE, an eminent painter of rustic scenery and low life, was b. in London, in 1764. He was instructed by his father, who employed him constantly in making drawings for sale. By this means he acquired a wonderful facility of invention, and rapidity of execution. He had also great skill as a faithful copier of nature, and in the early part of his career confined himself to the delineation of picturesque landscapes; but having contracted irregular habits, he forsook the woods and fields for the ale-house; and stage coachmen, postilions, and drovers drinking, became the favorite subjects of his pencil. Some of his best pieces exhibit farm-yards and stables, with dogs, horses, pigs, and cattle, or scenes at the door of the village ale-house, designed with all the truth and feeling which communicate a charm to the meanest objects, and proclaim the genius of the artist. Many were painted in spunging-houses to clear him from arrest, or in public-houses to discharge his reckoning. D. 1804.—Sir SAMUEL, a statesman and an able mechanist, was a native of Berkshire, and b. 1625. He was employed in some diplomatic missions by Cromwell; and afterwards rendered considerable service to Charles II., for which, at the restoration, he was made a baronet. Among his inventions are reckoned the speaking-trumpet, the fire-engine, the capstan, and the steam-engine; but some of these, it is presumed, he was rather the improver than the original discoverer. D. 1696.

MORRIS, CHARLES, a celebrated English bard, whose convivial songs were once in high repute. Though many of them might well be spared, some are chaste in sentiment and felicitous in expression, while others possess, in an eminent degree, those qualities which give a zest to bacchanalian orgies. D. 1832.—GOUVERNEUR, an eminent statesman and orator, was b. at Morrisania, in 1752, was graduated in King's college in 1768, and licensed to practise law in 1771. In 1775 he was a member of the provincial congress of New York, and was one of the committee which drafted a constitution for the state of New York. In 1777 he was chosen a delegate to the continental congress, and in the following year wrote the celebrated "Observations on the American Revolution." In 1781 he accepted the post of assistant superintendent of finance, as colleague of Robert Morris; and in 1787 was a member of the convention which framed the constitution of the United States. In 1792 he was appointed minister plenipotentiary to France, and held this station till his recall by the request of the French government in 1794. In 1800 he was elected a senator in congress, from the state of New York, and in this body was very conspicuous for his political information and his brilliant eloquence. D. 1816.—LEWIS, a signer of the declaration of independence, was b. at the manor of Morrisania, near the city of New York, in 1726. He was educated at Yale college, and took an early part in the cause of the colonies. In 1775 he was elected a delegate to the continental congress, and while in this body served on several of the most important committees. His rich estates were laid waste by the British army in 1776. He left congress in 1777, d. in 1798.—ROBERT, a celebrated financier, was a native of England, removed with his father to America, at an early age, and subsequently established himself as a merchant in Philadelphia. In 1775 he was appointed a delegate to congress, and signed the declaration of independence in the following year. In 1781 he was appointed superintendent of finance, and rendered incalculable service by his wealth and credit during the exhausted state of our public funds. It has been said, and with much truth, that "the Americans owed, and still owe, as much acknowledgment to the financial operations of Robert Morris, as to the negotiations of Benjamin Franklin, or even to the arms of George Washington." He was a member of the convention which framed the constitution of the United States in 1787, and afterwards a senator in congress. In his old age he lost his ample fortune, by unfortunate land speculations, and passed the last years of his life confined in prison for debt. D. 1806.

MORRISON, ROBERT, was b. in 1782. He was bred to last-making by his father, who was also an elder of the Scotch church. But Robert had a propensity for high classical attainments. He obtained the rudiments of the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages from the local preacher he attended; and was, at length, sent by the London Missionary Society to China, where he arrived in 1807. In the course of a year or two he had prepared a grammar and dictionary of the Chinese language for the press, besides a Chinese version of the New Testament. He afterwards projected an Anglo-Chinese college at Malacca, of which he was a liberal patron until his death, which took place at Macao, in 1834.

MORSE, JEDIDIAH, a geographer, minister of Charlestown, Massachusetts, graduated at Yale college in 1783, and installed 1789. His first geographical publication was in 1784, and during his lifetime the work was kept in perpetual progress, and passed through many editions. He also published the "American Gazetteer," and the "History of New England." D. 1826.

MORTIER, Marshal, duke of Treviso, b. in 1768, was the son of a merchant, who represented the tiers état of Cambresis at the states-general in 1789. Quitting the mercantile profession, for which he had been designed, he entered the army in 1791 with the rank of captain; and having distinguished himself on various occasions, he was rapidly promoted, and intrusted with the highest commands. Being among the staff that accompanied Louis Philippe and princes to the review at Paris, on the 28th of July, 1835, it was the fate of this brave officer to be one of the victims of the assassin, Fieschi.

MORTON, THOMAS, an eminent and successful dramatist, was b. at Durham, in 1764. He entered as a student at Lincoln's Inn, but his taste for theatricals caused him to abandon his profession, and he soon gave proofs of his talents as a dramatic writer. It is remarkable, indeed, that nearly all his pieces still keep possession of the stage. They consist of "The Way to get Married," "Columbus," "Town and Country," "Zorinski," "A Cure for the Heart-ache," "Speed the Plough," "Secrets Worth Klowing," "The Blind Girl," "The Children in the Wood," "The School of Reform," "The School for Grown Gentlemen," "A Rowland for an Oliver," and "The Invincibles." D. 1838.—NATHANIEL, one of the first settlers of Plymouth, New England, and a magistrate of the colony, was the author of a "History of the Church at Plymouth," and of a volume called "New England's Memorial." This work was originally published in 1669, and a new edition of it has been recently issued.—JOHN, a signer of the declaration of American independence, was b. in the county of Chester, Pennsylvania, was a member of the provincial assembly of his native state, and in 1774 appointed a delegate to the continental congress. D. 1777.—SAMUEL G., one of the most distinguished scientific men of the United States, was b. in Philadelphia, where he passed the greater part of his life. His chief works were the "Crania Americana," and the "Crania Egyptica."

His museum of crania embraced over nine hundred human skulls, and six hundred of the inferior animals. D. 1851.

MOSCHUS, a Greek pastoral poet, a native of Syracuse, who flourished, with his friend Bion, about 200 B. C.

MOSHEIM, JOHN LAURENCE, a learned German theologian, was b. at Lubeck, in 1694; became a member of the faculty of philosophy at Kiel; and was appointed chancellor of the university of Gottingen, where he remained till his death in 1755, lecturing daily on ecclesiastical history and most other departments of theology. His principal work on this subject is the "Institutiones Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ," which was afterwards published under various other forms, and translated into German, with additions; also into English by Dr. Maelaine. Among his other numerous writings are, "De Rebus Christianorum ante Constantinum Magnum Commentarii," a "Life of Servetus," "The Ecclesiastical History of the Tartars," "Observationes Sacræ," and "Sermons," which were much admired for their pure and elegant style.

MOSSOM, ROBERT, a learned Irish prelate, who suffered much in the civil wars, but on the restoration he was made dean of Christ-church, Dublin; with which he held the bishopric of Londonderry, where he d. 1679. His works are, "The Preacher's Tripartite," "Variæ colloquendi Formulæ," "Narrative of George Wild, bishop of Derry," and "Zion's Prospect in its first View."

MOSSOP, HENRY, an eminent tragic actor, b. in Ireland, in 1729, was the son of a clergyman, and was educated at Trinity college, Dublin. He made his first appearance on the Dublin stage as "Zanga," in the Revenge; but soon removed to London, where, next to Garrick and Henderson, he was esteemed the first tragedian of his time. In 1761 he became manager of one of the Dublin theatres; but the speculation proved his ruin, and he d. in absolute penury at Chelsea, in 1773.

MOTHERWELL, WILLIAM, a poet, b. at Glasgow, in 1798; and when a youth he obtained a situation in the sheriff clerk's office at Paisley, where he continued till within a few years of his death. In 1827 he published a very interesting and valuable collection of ballads, entitled "Minstrelsy, Ancient and Modern;" and he was afterwards successively editor of the "Paisley Magazine," "Paisley Advertiser," and the "Glasgow Courier." In 1833 was published a collected edition of his own poems, some of which possess a pathos and an intensity of feeling not often surpassed. D. 1835.

MOTTEUX, PIERRE ANTOINE, a miscellaneous writer, was b. at Rouen, in Normandy, in 1660; settled in England after the revocation of the edict of Nantes; and embarking his property in trade, opened an East India warehouse in Leadenhall-street, London, and also obtained a situation in the post-office. He wrote nearly twenty dramatic pieces, and translated "Don Quixote" and "Rabelais." D. 1718.

MOTTLEY, JOHN, a dramatic writer, was b. in 1692, and wrote five dramatic pieces; also the "Life of the Czar Peter the Great," and the "History of Catharine of Russia;" but the work of his which obtained by far the greatest popularity, is the well-known collection of facetiæ, called "Joe Miller's Jests." D. 1750.

MOULIN, PETER DU, a Protestant divine, was b. at Beehny, in the Vexin, in 1568. He studied first at Sedan, and next at Cambridge, from which university he removed to a professorship of philosophy at Leyden, where he also taught Greek; but in 1599 he returned to France, and became minister at Charenton. On the assassination of Henry IV., he charged the guilt of that deed upon the Jesuits, which produced a violent controversy between him and some of that society; and, in 1615, he visited England on the invitation of James I., who gave him a prebend in Canterbury cathedral. He did not continue long in England; but after refusing the divinity professorship at Leyden, he finally settled at Sedan, of which place he became the pastor, filling at the same time the theological chair there. Among his writings are, "A History of Monachism," a treatise "On the recent Origin of Popery," &c. D. 1658.—PETER, his son, was b. in 1600, at Paris, and graduated at Leyden; but going afterwards to England, obtained, like his father, a prebend at Canterbury, and was one of the chaplains to King Charles II. He was the author of "The Peace of the Soul," "Clamor Regii Sanguinis," which, being anonymous, was attributed, by Milton, to Alexander More, and "A Defence of the Protestant Church."—LOUIS, his brother, became a violent Independent, and wrote "Parænesis ad Edificatores Imperii," dedicated to Oliver Cromwell; and 'Patronus Bonæ Fidei," a fierce invective against the church of England. D. 1683.

MOULTRIE, WILLIAM, a major-general in the army of the American revolution, was b. in England, but emigrated to South Carolina at an early age. He served with distinction in the Cherokee war in 1760, and in its last campaign commanded a company. At the commencement of the revolution he was a member of the provincial congress, and a colonel of the second regiment of South Carolina. For his brave defence of Sullivan's island in 1776, he received the thanks of congress, and the fort was afterwards called by his name. In 1779 he gained a victory over the British at Beaufort. He afterwards received the commission of major-general, and was second in command to General Lincoln at the siege of Charleston. After the close of the war he was repeatedly elected governor of South Carolina. He published "Memoirs of the Revolution in the Carolinas and Georgia," consisting chiefly of official letters. D. in Charleston in 1805.

MOUNTFORT, WILLIAM, an English actor and dramatic writer, was b. in Staffordshire, in 1659. He was an excellent comic performer; and being in the flower of his age, and one of the handsomest men on the boards, the parts of the lovers were usually allotted to him. In one of these he had captivated the affections of Mrs. Bracegirdle, an actress much admired for her personal charms. This lady had rejected the addresses of a Captain Hill, who, in company with Lord Mohun, waylaid Mountfort one night, in the winter of 1692, as he was returning from the theatre to his lodgings, in Norfolk-street, Strand; and, before he could draw his sword, ran him through the body, and killed him on the spot. Hill made his escape to the Continent, and Lord Mohun was tried by his peers for the murder, but, for the want of sufficient evidence, was acquitted. This nobleman was himself eventually killed by the duke of Hamilton, in a duel fought in Hyde Park. Mountfort was the author of five plays, and was in the zenith of his reputation at the time of his death.

MOURAD BEY, a famous Mameluke chief, was a native of Circassia. After the destruction of Ali Bey, in 1773, he obtained the government of Cairo in conjunction with Ibrahim Bey, which, notwithstanding some severe contests with Ismael Bey and the Turkish government, who tried to dispossess them, they contrived to keep. When Bonaparte invaded Egypt, Mourad opposed the French with great vigor; but he was at length obliged to retreat to Upper Egypt. He subsequently entered into a treaty with General Kleber, and accepted the title of prince of Assouan and Jirgeh, under the protection of France. He d. of the plague in 1801.

MOZART, JOHN CHRYSOSTOM WOLFGANG AMADEUS, one of the most eminent musical composers that ever lived, was the son of Leopold Mozart, sub-chapel-master of Salzburg, and himself a respectable musician. He was b. in 1756; and the precocity of his musical talent was most extraordinary. In his sixth year he had made such progress, that his father was induced to take him and his sister Maria Anna, who was also a musical genius, to Munich and Vienna, where the little artists were introduced to the emperor's court, and the unequalled execution of the boy excited universal surprise. In 1770 he composed, in his 14th year, his serious opera of "Mithridate," which had a run of upwards of twenty nights in succession. In 1775 he went to Vienna, and, engaging in the service of the emperor, he satisfied the great expectations which were raised by his early genius, and became the Raphael of musicians. Among the works of his which have remained on the German stage, and will always be the delight of every tasteful nation are, "Idomeneo," the "Nozze di Figaro," the "Zauberflöte," the "Clemenza di Tito," and above all, the splendid "Don Giovanni." D. 1792.

MUDIE, ROBERT, author of numerous works in natural history, and others of an entertaining and instructive character, was b. in Forfarshire in 1777. In 1802 he was appointed Gaelic professor and teacher of drawing in the Inverness academy. He subsequently filled other situations of a like nature: but at length turned his attention exclusively to authorship, and commenced his career with a novel, entitled "Glenfurgus." He then for a while sought employment as a reporter for the London newspapers, and his literary efforts were henceforth unceasing. Independently of his contributions to periodicals, upwards of 80 volumes from his fertile pen were in rapid succession brought before the public. D. 1842.

MULLER, CARL OTTFRIED, an eminent modern scholar and historian, was b. in 1797, at Brieg, in Silesia. He was a professor of archaeology in the university of Göttingen, and distinguished himself by his researches into mythologic lore, analyzing it and disentangling the allegorical parts from the historical. But his knowledge was by no means confined to that department of literature. His work on the Eumenides of Æschylus, and many others, fully prove his classic erudition; and his histories of the Dorians and the Etruscans have become naturalized in England as standard works. While travelling in Greece with a view to the commencement of an elaborate work on the history of that country, he was taken ill, and d. 1840.—GERARD FREDERIC, a German traveller, was b. in 1700, at Herforden, in Westphalia; was educated at Leipsic, and went to reside at St. Petersburg, where he taught Latin, geography, and history. His principal work is, "A Collection of Russian Histories." D. 1783.—JOHN VON, an eminent Swiss historian, was b. in 1752, at Schaffhausen, and studied at Göttingen. In 1780 he published the first part of his "History of the Swiss Confederation;" and shortly after he went to Berlin, where he printed "Historical Essays." His other principal work was a "Course of Universal History," but he was also the author of several others, which were published collectively at Tubingen. Muller was successively professor of Greek at Schaffhausen, and of history at Cassel, counsellor of the imperial chancery, secretary of state for the ephemeral kingdom of Westphalia, and director-general of public instruction. D. 1809.

MUNCER, THOMAS, in the early part of the 16th century, rendered himself for awhile extremely formidable in Germany, where he preached equality and the community of property, and collected 40,000 followers. He was at length defeated by the landgrave of Hesse, with the loss of 7000 of his followers, and being chased to Franchhausen, was taken prisoner, and executed at Mulhausen, in 1526.

MUNCHHAUSEN, JEROME CHARLES FREDERIC VON, was a German officer in the Russian service, who served in several campaigns against the Turks. He was a passionate lover of horses and hounds; of which, and of his adventures among the Turks, he told the most extravagant stories, till his fancy so completely got the better of his memory, that he really believed his most extravagant fictions, and felt very much offended if any doubt was expressed on the subject. Having become acquainted with Burger at Pymont, and related these waking dreams to him, the poet published them in 1787, with his own improvements, under the title of "Wunderbare Abenteuer und Reisen des Herrn von Munchhausen." The wit and humor of the work gave it great success, and it was translated into several foreign languages. D. 1796.

MUNDAY, ANTHONY, a dramatic poet of the 16th century. He was the author of the "City Pageants," enlarged Stowe's Survey of London, and d. 1633.

MUNDEN, JOSEPH SHEPHERD, a celebrated comic actor, who, from 1790 to 1813, delighted the audiences of Covent-garden with his inimitable representations; but from 1813 to 1824, when he retired from the stage, his services were transferred to Drury-lane. His humor was exuberant and racy; and though often verging on caricature, he could melt the heart by touches of true pathos, as readily as he could stir it into mirth by the exquisite drollery of his ever-varying countenance. B. 1758; d. 1832.

MUNOZ, JOHN BAPTIST, a Spanish historian, was b. in 1745, at Museros, near Valentia. He was appointed cosmographer of the Indies, and undertook by order of the king, a history of America, of which he lived to publish only one volume. His other works are, "De recto Philosophiæ recentis in Theologia Ususe, Dissertatio," "De Scriptorum Gentilium Lectione," "Institutiones Philosophicæ," &c.

MUNSTER, SEBASTIAN, a German divine, was b. at Ingelheim, in 1489, entered into the order of Cordeliers, but left them to join Luther. He then settled at Basle, where he succeeded Pelicanus in the Hebrew professorship. He published a Latin version of the Bible, from the Hebrew, with notes; "Universal Cosmography," a treatise on dialling, a Latin translation of Josephus, and several mathematical works. D. 1552.

MURAT, JOACHIM, ex-king of Naples, one of the most intrepid of the French marshals, was b. in 1771; was the son of an innkeeper at Bastide, near Cahors; and was intended for the church. The army, however, was his choice, and in 1796, Bonaparte made him his aid-de-camp. In Italy, in 1796 and 1797, and in Egypt and Syria, in 1798 and 1799, Murat displayed great valor and military talent. He returned with Bonaparte to France, assisted him in overthrowing the directory, and was rewarded with the hand of Caroline, the sister of the first consul. At Marengo and Austerlitz he was one of the most distinguished of the French leaders. In 1806 Napoleon created him grand-duke of Berg; and in 1808 he raised him to the throne of Naples. Murat took a conspicuous part in the campaigns of 1806, 1807, 1808, 1812, and 1813; but in 1814, finding that the throne of his patron began to totter, he joined the allies. In the following year, however, he was expelled from his kingdom; and having made a desperate attempt to recover it, he was taken prisoner, and shot at Pizzo, 1815.

MURATORI, LOUIS ANTHONY, an eminent Italian historian and antiquary, was b. in 1672 at Vignola, in the Modenese territories; was made keeper of the Ambrosian library at Milan, and, subsequently, librarian and archivist to the duke of Modena. His great historical collection, entitled "Rerum Italicarum Scriptores, ab anno Æræ Christianæ," "Antiquitates Italicæ, Mediæ Ævi," "Anecdota Latina," "Anecdota Græca," "Annali d'Italia," with many others, attest the magnitude of his literary labors. D. 1750.

MURILLO, BARTOLOMEO ESTEVEN, one of the greatest of the Spanish painters, was b. in 1618, near Seville. He acquired the rudiments of the art from his uncle, Juan del Castillo, and being encouraged to visit Madrid, he acquired the countenance and patronage of the celebrated painter Velasquez, then in the height of his reputation. He afterwards returned to Seville, and earned by his labors an imperishable fame. While painting the admired picture of St. Catharine, in the church of the Capuchins at Cadiz, he fell from the scaffold, and d. in consequence of the injuries he received, in 1685.

MURPHY, ARTHUR, a dramatic and miscellaneous writer, was b. at Cork, in 1727, and educated at St. Omer's. At the age of 18 he went to London, and tried his dramatic powers in the farce of "The Apprentice," which was soon followed by that of "The Upholsterer;" and, having a great inclination to the stage, he made an effort in the character of Othello, but without success. He then produced the "Orphan of China," a tragedy, which was well received. He also wrote a weekly paper, called the "Gray's Inn Journal;" and two others, in defence of government, entitled the "Test" and the "Auditor." In these, however, he failed. His plays of the "Grecian Daughter," "All in the Wrong," "The Way to Keep Him," and the "Citizen," had greater success, and produced the author wealth and fame. He also acquired considerable reputation by his "Essay on the Life and Genius of Dr. Johnson," as well as by his translation of Tacitus and Sallust, and the "Life of Garriek." D. 1805.

MURRAY, HENRY, a most voluminous and successful writer on geography and kindred subjects, was b. at the manse of North Berwick, 1779. In the early part of his career he edited the "Scots' Magazine," then in the hands of Mr. Constable, and contributed to the "Edinburgh Gazetteer;" and published successively, discoveries and travels in Africa, Asia, and America, all of which acquired for their author a liberal share of popularity. At a later period of his life he contributed no fewer than fifteen volumes to the "Edinburgh Cabinet Library," on subjects connected with his favorite study; but the work on which his fame will chiefly rest, is his "Encyclopædia of Geography." D. 1846.—JAMES, a Rhode Islander, whose real name was Lillibridge, was a partisan officer in the service of the East India Company. He entered the service of Holkar, the famous Mahratta chief, about the year 1790, and soon became noted for his bravery, military skill, and the good offices he performed to certain British officers, who had been taken prisoners, and who, but for his humane interference, would have been put to the sword. When the war broke out between the British government and Scindia, in which Holkar assisted the latter, Murray joined the British general, Lord Lake, with a body of 7000 cavalry. The marquis of Wellesley at that period had issued a proclamation recalling all British subjects from the service of the native princes, but this order could not extend to Murray, as being an American. He was treated by the British commander with great consideration, and was employed in many dangerous and important services, still retaining the command of the cavalry which he had brought with him. At the siege of Bhurtport, where the British army lost nearly 10,000 men, in four attempts to take the fort by storm, he was in continual action, and attained the character of being the best partisan officer in the army. D. 1807.—JONN, an eminent publisher, known wherever the English language is known, was b. 1778. He was a man of considerable literary acquirements;

and while his singular acuteness and judgment insured his success as a man of business, his fluency, his store of anecdote, and a certain dry quiet humor, closely allied to wit, rendered him an agreeable companion for such men as Scott, Byron, Moore, Southey, Lockhart, and a number of other celebrated writers, who were at various times his guests, and at all times, from their first acquaintance with him, his fast friends. D. 1848.—LINDLEY, a grammarian, and moral writer, was b. in 1745, of Quaker parents, at Swatara, near Lancaster, in Pennsylvania. He was originally destined for the mercantile profession; but having been severely chastised for a breach of domestic discipline, he privately left his father, who was then residing at New York, and, taking up his abode in a seminary at Burlington, N. J., he there contracted a love of books and study. He afterwards studied the law, and practised as a barrister; but, in course of time, he quitted the bar for the counting-house, and by mercantile pursuits having realized a competency, he eventually settled at Holdgate, near York. His works consist of an "English Grammar," "English Exercises" and "Key;" the "English Reader," with an "Introduction" and "Sequel" to the same; two French selections, "Le Lecteur François," and "Introduction an Lecteur François," "The English Spelling Book," "The Power of Religion on the Mind," and "The Duty and Benefit of Reading the Scriptures." These publications were all lucrative, and deservedly so; and it is no small satisfaction to know, that his private life was as amiable as his labors in the cause of education and morals were successful. D. 1826.—WILLIAM VAUS, a distinguished diplomatist, was b. in Maryland, about 1762. He studied the law in England, practised it in his native country, and became a senator of the U. S. As minister at the Hague he succeeded in preserving harmony between the American and Batavian republics; and the reconciliation between the U. S. and France was effected chiefly through his agency as envoy extraordinary to the French republic. D. 1803.

MUSÆUS, a philosopher and poet of antiquity, who is said to have been the son of Orpheus, and president of the Eleusinian mysteries at Athens. He versified the oracles, and wrote a poem on the sphere. A hill near Athens was called by his name. He is to be distinguished from Musæus the grammarian, who wrote a poem, called "The Loves of Hero and Leander."—JOHN CHARLES AUGUSTUS, an eminent German writer, b. at Jena, in 1735, was professor at the gymnasium of Weimar, and author of "Physiognomical Travels," "Popular Tales of the Germans," &c. D. 1787.

MUSGRAVE, Sir RICHARD, an Irish historian, was b. about 1758. He was a member of parliament, and collector of the excise for Dublin. In 1801 he published "Memoirs of the Rebellions in Ireland," a work which gave great offence to the Roman Catholics, on account of the picture exhibited in it of the atrocities committed by the insurgents in 1798. D. 1818.—WILLIAM, a physician and antiquary, was b. at Charlton, in Somersetshire, in 1657, and educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford. He became a fellow of the royal college of physicians, and also of the Royal Society; to which last learned body he acted as secretary. In 1691 he settled at Exeter, and d. there in 1721. Besides some Latin tracts on the gout, he published four volumes of dissertations on Roman and British Antiquities.—Dr. SAMUEL, his grandson, was also a physician at Exeter, where he d. in 1782. He rendered himself notorious in 1763, by charging the ministers with having been bribed to settle a peace advantageous to France. As a scholar he is known by an edition of Euripides, and two dissertations on the Grecian mythology and the Olympiads.

MUTIANA, GIROLAMO, an Italian painter, b. at Brescia. He was a great favorite with Pope Gregory XIII., who employed him to paint a picture of St. Paul the hermit, and another of St. Anthony, for the church of St. Peter. Sixtus V. also held him in esteem, and intrusted to him the designs for the basreliefs of the column of Trajan. At the instance of this artist, Pope Gregory founded the academy of St. Luke, which Sixtus confirmed by a brief; and Mutiano gave two houses to the institution. D. 1590.

MUTIUS, CÆLIUS, first named Codrus, and afterwards Scævola, an illustrious Roman, who distinguished himself in the war against Porsenna. When that prince besieged Rome, Mutius entered his camp to assassinate him, and, by mistake, stabbed one of his attendants. Being seized and brought before Porsenna, he said that he was one of three hundred who had engaged by oath to slay him, and added, "This hand, which has missed its purpose, ought to suffer." On saying this he thrust it into the coals which were burning upon the altar, and suffered it to be consumed. Porsenna, struck with his intrepidity, made peace with the Romans. The name of Scævola, or left-handed was given him as a mark of distinction to Mutius and his family.

MYRON, a celebrated Greek sculptor, whose works are highly praised by the Greek and Latin poets, was a native of Eleutheris, and is supposed to have flourished about 430 B. C.

MYSON, one of the seven wise men of Greece. Anacharsis, the Scythian, having inquired of Apollo, who was the wisest man in Greece, was answered, "He who is now ploughing his fields." This was Myson.

MYTENS, ARNOLD, a painter, was b. at Brussels, in 1541. He painted several capital pictures for churches in Italy; and d. in 1602.—MARTIN, a Swedish painter was b. at Stoekholin, 1695. He fixed his residence at Vienna, and was greatly esteemed by the Emperor Charles VI. D. 1755.

N.

NAHL, JOHANN AUGUST, an eminent Prussian sculptor, b. at Berlin, in 1710. He executed the admirable colossal statue of the landgrave Frederic, which stands in Frederic's square. In 1755 he was created professor in the academy of arts at Cassel, and d. there in 1731.

NANI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a Venetian historian, was b. 1616.—He distinguished himself as ambassador to the French court, where he obtained succors for the republic to carry on the war against Turkey. He was afterwards employed in other missions of importance, for which he was made proctor of St. Mark, and captain-general of the marine. He was the author of "Istoria della Repubblica Veneta," and was historiographer and keeper of the archives of the republic. D. 1678.

NAPIER, JOHN, lord of Merchiston, in Scotland, a celebrated mathematician, was b. in 1550, and educated at the university of St. Andrew's. After having travelled in France, Italy, and Germany, he returned to his native country, where he wholly devoted himself to the study of mathematics and theology. Being much attached to astronomy and spherical geometry, he wished to find out a short method of calculating triangles, sines, tangents, &c.; and to the exertions arising out of this desire is to be attributed his admirable invention of logarithms, first made public in 1614, and which alone has immortalized his name. The Napier "bones, or rods," for multiplying and dividing, were invented by him. He also made several improvements in spherical trigonometry, and was regarded by the celebrated Kepler as one of the greatest men of the age. D. 1617.—MACVEY, whose name will long be memorable in connection with the "Edinburgh Review" and the "Encyclopædia Britannica," was professor of conveyancing in the university of Edinburgh, and one of the principal clerks of the court of session. He passed as a writer to the signet in 1799; but he soon discovered a decided bias for literary pursuits; and his various acquirements, literary and legal, his profound erudition, and his sound judgment, found ample scope for their development in the last edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," of which he became editor. In 1829 he succeeded Mr. (afterwards Lord) Jeffrey, in the editorship of the "Edinburgh Review." D. 1847.

NARES, JAMES, was b. at Stanwell, 1715. In 1755 he became organist and composer to the king, and was created doctor of music at Cambridge. In 1757 he was appointed master of the choristers of his majesty's chapel. He published, besides his compositions of sacred music, which are marked by great genius, and a thorough knowledge of the science, several books of instructions. D. 1783.—ROBERT, a learned critic and theologian, was the son of the preceding. He was a prebendary of Lincoln, archdeacon of Stafford, canon of Lichfield, and rector of Allhallows, London. He established and conducted the "British Critic," a high church literary review; and among his separate works are, "Elements of Orthodoxy," "A Glossary of Words, Phrases, &c., in the Works of English Authors of the age of Queen Elizabeth," "A Chronological View of the Prophecies relating to the Christian Church," &c. D. 1829.

NASH, RICHARD, commonly called Beau Nash, the once celebrated arbiter of fashion at Bath, was b. 1674, at Swansea, in Glamorganshire. He was originally intended for the law, but entered the army, which, however, he soon quitted, and took chambers in the Temple. Here he devoted himself entirely to pleasure and fashion; and when King William visited the Inn, he was chosen master of the pageant with which it was customary to welcome the monarch. In 1704 he was appointed master of the ceremonies at Bath, and immediately instituted a set of regulations as remarkable for their strictness as for their judicious adaptation to the wants and society of the place; and as he drew the whole beau-monde to Bath, he was justly regarded as a public benefactor there. While in the plenitude of his power and popularity, Nash lived in the most splendid style, supporting his expenses by a long run of success at the gaming table. His dress was covered with expensive lace, and he wore a large white cocked hat. The chariot in which he rode was drawn by six gray horses, and attended by a long retinue of servants, some on horse, others on foot, while his progress through the streets was made known by a band of French horns and other instruments. His common title was the king of Bath, and his reign continued, with undiminished splendor for more than 50 years. His health then began to decline, and his resources grew less plentiful. As the change in his spirits and circumstances became more evident, his former acquaintances gradually forsook him, and he died in comparative indigence and solitude, in 1761.

NASMITH, JAMES, a divine, was b. at Norwich, in 1740. He published "A Catalogue of Bennet College Library," an edition of the "Itineraries of Simon and William of Worcester," a new edition of Tanner's "Notitia Monastica," &c. D. 1802.—PETER, an eminent landscape painter, was b. at Edinburgh, in 1786. At the age of 20 he removed to London, where his talents soon attracted notice, and procured him the appellation of the English Hobbima. His works are deservedly in high repute, and there are few collections of importance in England but what contain some of them. D. 1831.

NAYLOR, JAMES, a Quaker, b. at Ardsley, near Wakefield, Yorkshire, 1616. He was, in 1641, a private in the parliamentary army, and rose to the office of quarter-master under Lambert, but quitted the military life in 1649. The preaching and conversation of George Fox converted him to Quakerism, 1651, and thinking himself divinely inspired, he became an itinerant minister. In 1656 he was imprisoned for his extravagant conduct at Exeter, where his followers addressed him as the prince of peace; and afterwards, when liberated from confinement, he went to Bristol. He was accompanied by an enthusiastic cavalcade, who sang before him "Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord God of hosts, Hosanna in the highest." This fanatic zeal was noticed by the parliament. Naylor was accused and condemned as guilty of blasphemy, and as an impostor; he was exposed in the pillory, whipped, and branded on the forehead; his tongue was bored through with a red-hot iron at the Old Exchange, and he was then imprisoned in Bridewell for life. After two years imprisonment he was set at liberty, and, in 1660, he left London to return to Wakefield, to his wife and family, but d. by the way.

NEAL, DANIEL, a dissenting minister, was b. in 1678, in London; was educated at Merchant Tailors' school, and at Utrecht; became minister to a congregation in Jewin-street; and d. in 1743. He wrote a "History of the Puritans," and a "History of New England."

NEANDER, JOHANN AUGUST WILHELM, one of the most distinguished ecclesiastical historians of modern times, was b. at Gottingen, 1789. His parents were Jews. They removed to Hamburg when their son was very young; and to the excellent institutions of that city he was indebted for great part of his education. In his 16th year he was converted to Christianity, and proceeded to study first at Halle and then at Gottingen, where he gained the reputation of great learning and piety, though struggling with an extremity of poverty that would have crushed a less ardent and heroic soul. After a short sojourn at Hamburg he removed to Heidelberg, in 1811, and occupied himself in writing his first work, "The Emperor Julian and his Age," which led to his appointment to a chair of theology in that university, in 1812. A few months afterwards he was nominated to the same chair in the then infant university of Berlin, where he had Marheinecke and Schleiermacher for his colleagues; and here he labored assiduously for 38 years, producing his "History of the Christian Church," and other ecclesiastical works of the highest value. He was a person of simple but eccentric manners, and greatly beloved. D. 1850.

NECKER, JAMES, an eminent financier and statesman, was b. in 1732, at Geneva, and for many years carried on the business of a banker at Paris. His "Eulogy on Colbert," his "Treatise on the Corn Laws and Trade," and some "Essays on the Resources of France," inspired such an idea of his talents for finance, that, in 1776, he was appointed director of the treasury, and, shortly after, comptroller-general. Before his resignation, in 1781, he published a statement of his operations, addressed to the king; and, while in retirement, he produced a work on the "Administration of the Finances," and another on the "Importance of Religious Opinions." He was reinstated in the comptrollership in 1788, and advised the convocation of the states-general; was abruptly dismissed, and ordered to quit the kingdom, in July, 1789; but was almost instantly recalled, in consequence of the ferment which his departure excited in the public mind. Necker, however, soon became as much an object of antipathy to the people as he had been of their idolatry, and in 1790 he left France for ever. D. at Copet, in Switzerland, 1804.—SUSANNA, his wife, whose maiden name was Curehod, was a woman of talent, and wrote "Reflections on Divorce," and "Miscellanies." She was the object of Gibbon's early attachment.

NEEDHAM, JOHN TURBERVILLE, a natural philosopher, was b. in 1713, at London; was educated at Donay; and d. in 1781, director of the imperial academy at Brussels. Among his works are, "Inquiries on Microscopical Discoveries," "New Microscopical Discoveries," "Inquiries concerning Nature and Religion," and an "Essay on the Origin of the Chinese Empire."

NEELE, HENRY, a poet and miscellaneous writer, was b. 1798; followed the profession of an attorney; and put an end to his existence in a fit of insanity, Feb. 7, 1828. He is the author of "Poems," "Dramatic and Miscellaneous Poetry," "The Romance of English History," and "Literary Remains."

NELSON, HORATIO, Viscount, was b. Sept. 29, 1758, at Burnham Thorpe, in Norfolk, of which parish his father was the rector. At the age of 12 he went to sea as a midshipman, with his uncle, Captain Suckling. He reached the rank of post-captain in 1779, and was appointed to the command of the Hinchinbroke frigate. During the American war, and the succeeding peace, he gained the character of a good officer; the war of the revolution gave him that of a great one. In 1793 he was appointed to the Agamemnon, forming a part of Lord Hood's squadron in the Mediterranean. There he distinguished himself at the sieges of Bastia and Calvi, at the last of which he lost an eye; harassed the enemy with incessant activity; and contributed so largely to the victory of Cape St. Vincent, that he was made a rear-admiral, and received the order of the Bath. In an attack upon Santa Cruz he failed, and lost his right arm. In 1798 he destroyed the French fleet, on the 1st of August, in the bay of Aboukir; and he subsequently took an active part in the expulsion of the French from the Neapolitan and Roman territories. For this he was created a baron. In 1801 he defeated the Danes at the battle of Copenhagen, and was made a viscount; and in 1805, on the 21st of October, he crowned his achievements by the glorious victory of Trafalgar, over the united French and Spanish squadrons. This triumph, however, was dearly earned to his country by the loss of the hero who gained it. He was mortally wounded by a rifle shot, and lived only just long enough to learn that the success was complete.—THOMAS, was b. at New York, in 1738. He received his education in England, and about the close of the year 1761 he returned to his native country, and took up his residence at York. In 1774 he was chosen a member of the house of burgesses, and in the following year he was appointed a delegate to the continental congress. He held a seat in this assembly for two successive years, and again in 1779. In 1781 he succeeded Mr. Jefferson as governor of Virginia. D. 1789.—SAMUEL, b. in 1759, was one of the most ardent of the Irish patriots in 1790, and edited the "Northern Star," which produced great effects. On the rebellion being put down, in 1796, he was thrown into prison, where he remained till set at liberty by French interference, at the treaty of Amiens, in 1802. He then retired to America.

NEPOS, CORNELIUS, a Latin historian, is said to have been b. at Verona, or in its vicinity. He flourished under Julius and Augustus Cæsar, and was a favorite of the latter. He wrote the "Lives of celebrated Greek and Roman Characters."

NERO, LUCIUS DOMITIUS CLAUDIUS, a Roman emperor, was b. A. D. 37, and succeeded Claudius, by whom he had been adopted. At the commencement of his reign his conduct excited great hopes in the Romans; but he soon degenerated into one of the basest of tyrants. Some crimes, however, among which is the burning of Rome, appear to have been falsely attributed to him. He put an end to his existence in 68, in consequence of the successful rebellion of Galba.

NEUHOFF, THEODORE STEPHEN, Baron, the son of a Westphalian noble, was b. at Metz, about 1690. While a student at Cologne, he unfortunately killed a young man of rank in a duel, and fled to the Hague. But through the mediation of the Spanish minister he received a lieutenancy in the Spanish regiment of cavalry destined to march against the Moors in Africa, and, on account of his good behavior, was promoted to a captaincy. When the Corsicans, after several unsuccessful attempts to free themselves from the oppressions of Genoa, resolved, in 1735, to form a government of their own, NeuhoFF was crowned king, had silver and copper coins struck, and established an order of knighthood, under the name of the order of deliverance. Theodore, however, could not maintain himself against the Genoese and a Corsican opposition. He fled to England. Here his Dutch creditors pursued him, and being arrested, he became a prisoner in the King's Bench for some years. His liberation was effected through the instrumentality of Horace Walpole; but he d. soon after, in 1755.

NEWCORBE, WILLIAM, a learned prelate, was b. in 1729, at Barton le Clay, in Bedfordshire; was educated at Abingdon school, and at Pembroke college, Oxford; was successively bishop of Dromore, Ossory, and Waterford; was raised to the archbishopric of Armagh by Earl Fitzwilliam. Of his works the principal are, "A Harmony of the Gospels;" "An Historical View of the English Biblical Translations;" and "Attempts towards an improved Version of Ezekiel and the Minor Prophets." D. 1800.

NEWCORNER, THOMAS, a blacksmith of Dartmouth, in Devonshire, lived at the latter end of the 17th century, and the beginning of the 18th. To him belongs the merit of the first great improvement in steam-engines, by forming a vacuum under the piston, and thus bringing into action the atmospheric pressure.

NEWTON, Sir ISAAC, the greatest of philosophers, was b. December 25, 1642, at Colsterworth, in Lincolnshire, and early displayed a talent for mechanics and drawing. He was educated at Grantham school, and at Trinity college, Cambridge, and studied mathematics with the utmost assiduity. In 1667 he obtained a fellowship; in 1669 the mathematical professorship; and in 1671 he became a member of the Royal Society. It was during his abode at Cambridge that he made his three great discoveries, of fluxions, the nature of light and colors, and the laws of gravitation. To the latter of these his attention was first turned by his seeing an apple fall from a tree. The "Principia," which unfolded to the world the theory of the universe, was not published till 1687. In that year also Newton was chosen one of the delegates, to defend the privileges of the university against James II.; and in 1688 and 1701 he was elected one of the members of the university. He was appointed warden of the Mint in 1696; was made master of it in 1699; was chosen president of the Royal Society in 1703; and was knighted in 1705. Among his works are, "Arithmetica Universalis," "A New Method of Infinite Series and Fluxions," "Optics," "The Chronology of Ancient Kingdoms amended," and "Observations on the Prophecies of Daniel and the Apocalypse." D. 1727.—THOMAS, a learned prelate, was b. in 1704, at Liehfield; was educated there, at Westminster, and at Trinity college, Cambridge; and, after having filled various minor preferments, was made bishop of Bristol, in 1761. He d. in 1782. His principal work is, "Dissertations on the Prophecies." He also published editions, with notes, of "Paradise Lost," and "Paradise Regained."—GILBERT STUART, a painter of considerable merit, was b. at Halifax, Nova Scotia, in 1794; visited Italy, about 1820; and, on his return to England, entered himself a student of the Royal Academy. He confined himself chiefly to small pictures, and illustrated many subjects in the "Annuals" and other elegant publications, in a highly creditable manner. His female figures are strikingly expressive of innocence as well as beauty. D. 1835.

NEY, MICHAEL, a French marshal, prince of the Moskwa, duke of Elchingen, denominated "the bravest of the brave" by his countrymen, was the son of an artisan, and was b. in 1769, at Sarre Louis. He entered the army in 1787; exerted himself so much in the early campaigns of the revolution that he was called the Indefatigable; and rose to the rank of brigadier-general in 1796. He bore a part in all the achievements of the army of the Rhine, particularly of the battle of Hohenlinden. In all the campaigns from 1805 to 1814, Ney held high commands, and constantly signalized himself by his military skill and his daring valor. He was made a peer by Louis XVIII., and was placed at the head of an army to stop the progress of Napoleon in 1815. Ney, however, went over, with his army, to his former sovereign, and fought for him at Quatre Bras and Waterloo. On the second restoration of the Bourbons, he was condemned to death, and was shot on the 7th of December, 1815.

NICHOLS, JOHN, an antiquary and miscellaneous writer, was b. in 1744, at Islington; was apprenticed to Bowyer the printer, and became his partner; conducted "The Gentleman's Magazine" for nearly half a century; and d. November 26, 1826. Among his works are, "The History and Antiquities of Leicestershire," "Anecdotes of Bowyer," "Literary Anecdotes of the Eighteenth Century," and "Illustrations of the Literature of the Eighteenth Century."

NICHOLSON, JAMES, an officer in the American navy, was b. in Chestertown, Md., in 1737. He followed the life of a sailor till the year 1773, when he married and settled in the city of New York. Here he remained until 1771, when he returned to his native province. At the commencement of the revolution, the government of Maryland built and equipped a ship of war, called the Defence, and the command of her was intrusted to Nicholson. He performed various exploits during the war, and before the close of it was taken prisoner and carried into New York. He d. in 1806.—WILLIAM, an able writer on natural philosophy and chemistry, was b. in 1753, in London; was, successively, in the maritime service, agent on the Continent for Mr. Wedgwood, a mathematical teacher, and engineer to the Portsea water-works; and d. in indigence, in 1815. His chief works are, "An Introduction to Natural Philosophy;" "A Dictionary of Chemistry," and "The Navigator's Assistant." In 1797 he established the scientific journal which bears his name, and which he conducted till his decease.

NICOLAI, CHRISTOPHER FREDERIC, a German author, who was also a bookseller, was b. at Berlin, in 1733, and d. there in 1811. Among his numerous works are, "The Life and Opinions of Sebaldus Nothanker," "A Tour in Germany and Switzerland," and "Characteristic Anecdotes of Frederic II." He also edited "The Library of Belles Lettres," "Letters on Modern Literature," "The German General Library," and "The New German General Library," the whole forming nearly two hundred volumes.

NICOLAS, Sir NICHOLAS HARRIS, an eminent antiquary, was b. in Cornwall, 1799. At an early age he entered the navy, and received his commission as lieutenant in 1815, after an active and adventurous service on the coast of Calabria. But he appears to have been called to the bar in 1825. Shortly afterwards he was elected a fellow of the Society of Antiquaries; and he thenceforward devoted himself almost entirely to antiquarian literature, particularly in the departments of genealogy and history. Almost all his works have a substantial historical value; such for instance as his "History of the Battle of Agincourt," the memoirs in "The Siege of Carlaverock," and the "Scrope and Grovesnor Roll," the "Proceedings of the Privy Council," his "Life of Hatton," and his "Dispatches of Lord Nelson;" but the most useful in aid of other literary men were his "Chronology of History," his "Synopsis of the Peerage," and his "Testamenta Vetusta." D. 1848.

NICOLSON, WILLIAM, a learned prelate, was b. in 1635, at Orton, in Cumberland; was educated at Queen's college, Oxford; was successively, in 1702, 1718, and 1727, bishop of Carlisle, and of Derry, and archbishop of Cashel; and d. a few days after he was raised to the archiepiscopal dignity. "The English, Scotch, and Irish Historical Library," and the "Leges Marchiarum, or Border Laws," are his principal productions.

NIEBUHR, CARSTEN, a celebrated traveller, was b. in 1733, at Ludingsworth, in the duchy of Lauenberg; was sent, in company with four other learned men, by the Danish government, in 1761, to explore Arabia; was employed for six years on that mission, and was the only one who returned; was liberally rewarded by the Danish monarch; and d. in 1815. Among his works are, "A Description of Arabia," and "Travels in Arabia and the neighboring Countries."—G. B., a son of the foregoing, was, successively, professor at the university of Berlin, counsellor of state, and Prussian ambassador to the pope. While he was at Rome, he discovered some valuable fragments of two of Cicero's orations. He d. in 1830. His great work is "The History of Rome," which is far superior to most of its rivals.

NIEWLAND, PETER, a Dutch mathematician, was b. in 1764, at Dimmermeer, near Amsterdam, and d. in 1794; professor of natural philosophy, mathematics, and astronomy, at Leyden. Niewland was an instance of precocious talent. At seven years of age he wrote a poem to the "Deity," and at eight he solved difficult geometrical problems with uncommon facility. He is the author of various scientific works, and of a volume of poetry.

NIVERNOIS, LOUIS JULIUS BARON MANCINI MAZARINI, duke de, was b. in 1716, at Paris; served as colonel in the army, but was obliged by ill health to resign his commission; was, successively, ambassador at Rome, Berlin, and London, in which latter city he negotiated the peace of 1762; was imprisoned by the republicans in 1793; and d. in 1798. Among his works are, "Fables in Verse," "Dialogues of the Dead," "Dramas," and translations from the Latin, English, and Italian.

NOBLE, PATRICK, a governor of South Carolina, distinguished as a lawyer and politician. B. 1787; d. 1840.

NOLLEKENS, JOSEPH, an eminent sculptor, the son of a painter, was b. in 1737, in London; studied under Scheemaker, and subsequently at Rome under Cavaceppi; remained nine years in Italy, during which period he gained great reputation as an artist, and also improved his fortune by dealing in antiquities; returned to England in 1770; became a royal academician in 1772; and was so extensively employed, particularly on busts, that he accumulated £200,000. He d. April 23, 1823. In his character Nollekens had more than the usual share of that singularity which is supposed to be attendant upon genius.

NOLLET, JOHN ANTHONY, a French natural philosopher, was b. in 1700, at Pimpre, acquired considerable scientific reputation, and became a member of the Royal Society, and of several learned societies, and d. in 1770. Besides various works on electricity, and other subjects, he wrote "Lectures on Experimental Philosophy."

NORDEN, FREDERIC LOUIS, an eminent traveller, a captain in the Danish navy, was b. in 1708, at Gluckstadt, in Holstein. He was sent by his sovereign to France and Holland, to collect naval information, and afterwards to Egypt to describe and design the ancient monuments of that country. He d. in 1742. He is the author of "Travels in Egypt and Nubia," and of a "Memoir on the Ruins and Colossal Statues of Thebes."

—JOHN, an old English writer, who is conjectured by Wood to have been a native of Wilts. He received his education at Oxford, and wrote some strange books in divinity, with very whimsical titles, as "The Sinful Man's Solace," "Antithesis, or Contrariety between the Wicked and Godly set forth in a Pair of Gloves fit for every Man to wear," &c. He was also the author of the "Surveyor's Dialogue," "Labyrinth of Man's Life," a poem, "England, or a Guide for Travellers," and "Topographical Descriptions of Middlesex, Hertfordshire, and Cornwall." He was surveyor of the king's lands, and d. about 1625.

NORRIS, SIR JOHN, a brave naval officer, who served his country nearly sixty years, commencing in 1689, and terminating, with his life, in 1749. The frequent accidents and misfortunes which befell the ships and squadrons under his command, and which could not be warded off by any human prudence or sagacity, procured him the appellation of "Foul-weather Jack;" yet in the duties of his profession no man could be more assiduous.—JOHN, an eminent divine and Platonist, was b. in 1657, at Collingbourne Kingston, in Wiltshire, and became rector of Bemerton, near Salisbury, where he d. 1711. He ranks as one of the most eminent of the English Platonists, and was a good man, though a visionary. Among his works are, "The Theory and Regulation of Love," "Reflections upon the Conduct of Human Life," "Practical Discourses," "An Essay towards the Theory of the Ideal or Intelligible World," and "Philosophical Discourse concerning the Natural Immortality of the Soul."

NORTH, ROGER, a lawyer and miscellaneous writer, the youngest son of Dudley Lord North, was attorney-general under James II., and d. in 1733. He wrote the "Lives" of his three brothers, Lord Keeper North, Sir Dudley North, and Dr. John North, all of whom were eminent men; "Examen, or Inquiry into the Credit and Veracity of Kennet's History," "A History of Esculent Fish," and other works.—FREDERIC, earl of Guildford, better known as Lord North, was b. in 1732, and educated at Eton, and Trinity college, Oxford. After having held several less important offices, he was, in 1707, appointed chancellor of the exchequer, and, in 1770, first lord of the treasury. His administration continued through the whole of the American war, during which he was incessantly assailed by the opposition, and was often threatened with impeachment. In 1782 he resigned, but in 1783 he was for a few months a member of the coalition ministry. He was blind for some years previous to his decease, which took place in 1792.

NORTHCOTE, JAMES, an eminent portrait and historical painter, was b. in 1746, at Plymouth, where his father was a watchmaker. Having a taste for the fine arts, and being flattered by praises bestowed on his early productions, he pursued the practice of drawing and painting with so much assiduity, that Dr. Mudge, a physician of Plymouth, recommended him as a scholar to Sir Joshua Reynolds, with whom he remained five years; and on leaving that great artist he commenced business on his own account, with great success, as a portrait painter. Aspiring, however, to the loftier, though less lucrative department of historical painting, he visited Italy in 1777, and remaining there three years, he returned to London with a vastly increased reputation. In 1787 he became a royal academician, and for a period of thirty years his productions formed a conspicuous part of the exhibitions at Somerset house. He studied deeply, was an acute observer of human nature, and possessed a sound judgment, a quick perception, and great conversational powers. He wrote "The Life of Sir Joshua Reynolds," also, "Fables," "Conversations," and "The Life of Titian," in all of which he was assisted by Mr. Hazlitt. He amassed a large fortune by his profession, and his habits were too penurious to dissipate it. D. 1831.

NORTON, JOHN, a clergyman of Boston, was b. in Hertfordshire, England, in 1606. After receiving a theological education, he adopted the creed and practice of the Puritans, and in 1635 emigrated to New England. He was first settled in the ministry at Ipswich, but was afterwards prevailed on to remove to Boston. In 1662 he was appointed one of the two agents of the colony to address King Charles on his restoration, but they did not fully succeed in the objects of their mission. He d. in 1663. His theological works were numerous, and he published several political tracts.

NORWOOD, RICHARD, an English geometrician, of the 17th century, was the first who measured a degree of the meridian in England. The operation was performed in 1635, and was carried on between London and York. No particulars of his life are recorded. He wrote treatises on "Trigonometry," on "Navigation," and on "Fortification."

NOSTREDAME, or NOSTRADAMUS, MICHAEL, a famous astrologer and empiric, was b. in 1503, at St. Remi, in Provence. After having practised physic for some years, he assumed the character of a prophet, and, in 1555, published seven centuries of "Predictions," each of which was comprised in a stanza of four lines. They became popular, and he received valuable presents from Charles IX., Catharine of Medicis, the duke of Savoy, and other eminent persons. D. 1566.

NOTT, JOHN, a physician, poet, and translator, was b. in 1751, at Worcester, settled at the Hot Wells, Bristol, in 1793, as a physician, and d. there in 1826. Among his works are various poems; translations from Hafiz, Propertius, Catullus, Horace, Lucretius, Johannes Secundus, Bonafonus, and Petrarch; a "Nosological Companion," and select poems from Herriek's "Hesperides."

NOUE, FRANCIS DE LA, a French Calvinist warrior, surnamed Iron-arm, from the loss of his left arm being supplied by an artificial limb of iron, was b. in 1531, in Britany, and distinguished himself in the wars in Italy, the Netherlands, and France. He was killed in 1591, at the siege of Lamballe. La Noue was no less admired for his virtues than for his military talent. He is the author of "Political and Military Discourses," and "Remarks on Guicciardini's History."

NOVATIAN, or NOVATIANUS, a Greek philosopher, who embraced Christianity, and was admitted a member of the priesthood. He started the doctrine, that it was sinful to admit persons who had once lapsed to idolatry to communion, a practice then universal in the church. This produced a schism, in which Novatian had many partisans, who called themselves Catharites, (puritans,) or Novatians, from their founder. This sect, after the council of Nice, fell into disrepute in the Western empire, though they continued to prevail for a much longer period in the East.

NOVES, LAURA DE, the female whom Petrarch has immortalized in his poems, was b. near Avignon, in 1307 or 1308, married Hugh de Sade in 1325, and d. in 1348.

NOY, WILLIAM, a celebrated lawyer, who may be considered as one of the main authors of the civil war between Charles I. and his people, was b. in 1577, at St. Burian, in Cornwall, and studied at Exeter college, Oxford, and Lincoln's Inn. In the reign of James I. Noy sat in parliament for Helston, and subsequently for St. Ives, and was a stern opponent of the court. But in 1631 Charles converted him by appointing him to the office of attorney-general, and Noy was thenceforth an inveterate enemy of liberty. Among other pernicious measures he is said to have originated the claim of ship money. D. 1634. Among his works are, "A Treatise on the Grounds and Maxims of the Law of England," "The Perfect Conveyancer," and "The Complete Lawyer."

NUGENT, THOMAS, was a native of Ireland, but settled in London, where he produced numerous works. Among them are, "A French and English Dictionary," which has been often reprinted, "Travels through Germany," "Observations on Italy and its Inhabitants," "The Tour of Europe," "Condillac's Essay on the Origin of Human Knowledge," "Henault's History of France," &c. D. 1772.

NUMA POMPILIUS, the second king of Rome, was b. at Cures, a Sabine village, and married Tatia, the daughter of the king of the Sabines. He was chosen by the Romans as their sovereign after the death of Romulus; introduced many reformatations among them during a reign of 43 years. D. 672 B. C.

NUMERIAN, MARCUS AURELIUS, a Roman emperor, the son of Carus, succeeded to the throne A. D. 282, and after a reign of eight months, was murdered by Arrius Aper, his father-in-law. Numerian was a good writer, and an eloquent speaker.

O.

OATES, THOMAS, one of the most infamous characters that ever disgraced humanity, was b. about 1619, was educated at Merchant Tailors' school, and at Cambridge; became a Roman Catholic and a Jesuit in 1677, but, shortly after, declared himself a Protestant, and gave information of a pretended popish plot, by which means he excited a popular ferment, and brought many innocent individuals to the scaffold. In the reign of James II. Oates was tried for perjury, and a dreadfully severe sentence was passed upon him. After the revolution he was pensioned. D. 1705.

OBERLIN, JEREMIAH JAMES, a German antiquary and philologist, was b. at Strasburg, in 1735. He began his career as teacher in the gymnasium of his native place, and after he had extended his knowledge and reputation by his travels, he was transferred to the university; in 1782 he obtained the chair of logic and metaphysics, to which, in 1787, was added the office of director of the gymnasium. The French revolution interrupted his learned labors, and in 1793 he was imprisoned at Metz, and treated with great cruelty, but at the termination of Robespierre's tyranny he was liberated, and resumed his literary occupations. He published valuable editions of Tacitus, Cæsar, Ovid, and Horace, and produced a number of works on archæology, statistics, &c. D. 1806.

O'CONNELL, DANIEL, of Darrynane abbey, the great Irish "agitator," or "liberator," was the son of a small landed proprietor in the county of Kerry, where he was b. Aug. 6, 1775. Educated at the Catholic college of St. Omer, and at the Irish seminary of Douay, he at first intended to enter the church, but after the repeal of the act which prohibited Roman Catholics from practising at the bar, he became a student of Lincoln's Inn in 1794, was admitted a barrister in 1798, and soon acquired a large practice, which yielded him a handsome income. In 1809 he became connected with the associations which had the emancipation of the Catholics for their object, and the powers of eloquence, together with the boundless zeal which he displayed in this cause, soon made him the idol of his Catholic, and the dread of his Protestant, countrymen. In 1815, having applied the epithet "beggary" to the Dublin corporation, he was challenged by Alderman d'Esterre, who resented it as a personal insult. The challenge was accepted, but the alderman fell. The same year Mr. O'Connell received a hostile message from Mr. Peel, then secretary for Ireland, but their meeting was prevented by the police, who had obtained knowledge of the affair, and Mr. O'Connell soon afterwards resolved that he would thenceforward neither send nor accept a challenge for any injury that he might inflict or receive—a resolution to which he steadfastly adhered. In 1823, in conjunction with Mr. Sheil, he founded a new Catholic association, which soon extended over the whole of Ireland, and from that period down to his decease, his personal history is identified with that of Ireland. In 1828 he resolved, notwithstanding the existing disabilities, to become a candidate for a seat in parliament, and was chosen a member for Clare. He refused to take the prescribed oaths. But early in the next session the Roman Catholic relief bill was introduced and carried. He was therefore, in the month of April, 1829, enabled to sit for Clare without taking the objectionable oaths. He continued a member for eighteen years. In 1841 he was elected lord mayor of Dublin, and in 1843 "monster meetings" was held on the royal hill of Tara, on the Curragh of Kildare, the rath of Mullaghmast, and other renowned localities, for the repeal of the Irish union. A meeting for Clontarf was fixed for the 8th of Oct., when the government interfered. Mr. O'Connell was sentenced to pay a fine of £2000, and to be imprisoned for a year. This judgment was afterwards reversed by the house of lords. He retired soon after from the arena of strife, and commenced a pilgrimage in 1847, more for devotion than for health, towards Rome; but he had proceeded no farther than Genoa, when with comparatively little suffering, he expired, in his 72d year.

OCCAM, or OCKHAM, WILLIAM, a divine and philosopher, called the In-vincible Doctor, was b. at Oekham, in Surrey, in the 14th century, was educated at Merton college, Oxford, under Duns Scotus, became a Franciscan friar, and archdeacon of Stow, but resigned his preferment, wrote boldly against the pope, for which he was excommunicated, and d. at Munich in 1347. He is the founder of the scholastic sect of the nominalists.

OCKLEY, SIMON, a celebrated orientalist, was b. in 1678, at Exeter, was educated at Queen's college, Cambridge, obtained the vicarage of Swaneseay, in Cambridgeshire, and d. in indigence in 1720. He is the author of a valuable "History of the Saracens," "The Life of Hai Ebn Yokdan," from the Arabic, an "Introduction to the Oriental Languages," and other works.

OCOLAMPADIUS, JOHN, an eminent German reformer, was b. in 1482, at Weinsberg, in Franconia. He was converted to the Protestant faith by reading the works of Luther, became professor of theology at Basle, embraced the opinions of Zuinglius respecting the sacrament, contributed much to the progress of ecclesiastical reform, and d. in 1531.

OEHLenschLOEGER, ADAM, the most celebrated dramatic poet of Scandinavia, was b. at Copenhagen, 1777. When still a child he evinced great skill in writing verses; and even in his 9th year he wrote short comedies for private theatricals, in which the chief performers were himself, his sister, and a friend. These and other similar attempts created the wish to go upon the stage, and when he was in his 17th year he put his design into execution. But he soon found that the stage was not in unison with his inclinations, and he abandoned it first for the study of the law, and afterwards for general literature. In 1805 he left Copenhagen with a stipend from the Danish government, on a lengthened tour through Germany and Italy; and on his return, in 1810, he was appointed to the chair of literature in the university of Copenhagen, where he labored assiduously till his death. His earliest works were composed in Danish, but he rewrote most of them in German, and Germany has given them a prominent place in her own literature. His most important works are, "Hakon Jarl," "Correggio," "Palnatoke," "Aladdin," "Der Hirten-knabe," &c. His "Autobiography" is a beautiful performance, fully displaying the qualities for which he was distinguished through life—strong feelings and earnestness of purpose—and which gained him universal respect while he lived, and more than regal honors at his death. D. 1850.

OELRICHS, JOHN CHARLES CONRAD, a German historian and bibliographer, was b. at Berlin, in 1722, became professor of history and civil law at the academy of Stettin, published many valuable works in Latin and German, obtained the post of counsellor of legation, and resident of the duke of Deux Ponts, at the court of Berlin, in 1784, and d. in 1798.

OGILBY, JOHN, a multifarious writer, was b. in 1600, at Edinburgh, and was originally a dancing master. Being compelled by an accident to relinquish that occupation, he became an author. He was also appointed king's cosmographer, and master of the revels in Ireland, where he built a theatre. He d. in 1676. Among his works are, translations of the Iliad, Odyssey, and Æneid, and many geographical productions.

OGILVIE, JOHN, a Scotch divine and poet, was b. in 1733, and educated at the university of Aberdeen, from which he obtained a doctor's degree, was for more than half a century minister of Midmar, in Aberdeenshire, and d. 1814, respected for his piety and talents. His poetical powers were by no means inconsiderable. His chief works are, "Sermons," "Poems," "Britannia," an epic poem, "Philosophical and Critical Observations on Compositions," and "Examination of the Evidence of Prophecy."

OGLETHORPE, JAMES EDWARD, an English officer, was b. in London, in 1698, and was educated at Oxford. He was an aid-de-camp to Prince Eugene. In 1732 he settled the colony in Georgia, and laid the foundation of the town of Savannah. In 1745 he was made major-general, and was employed to follow the rebels under the Pretender. He d. in 1785.

O'HALLORAN, SYLVESTER, an Irish antiquary, was b. 1728, brought up and practised as a surgeon, and wrote several medical treatises. But it is as an antiquary and historian that he is now principally known. In 1772 he published an "Introduction to the Study of the History and Antiquities of Ireland," which was followed by a "General History of Ireland." D. 1807.

O'HARA, KANE, an Irish dramatist, who had much musical taste, and a happy talent of adapting verses to old airs. His chief productions are "Midas," which was extremely well received, and is still a favorite, "The Golden Pippin," "The Two Misers," "April Day," and "Tom Thumb." D. 1782.

O'KEEFE, JOHN, a celebrated dramatist, was b. at Dublin, in 1748, and was originally intended for the profession of a painter, but his taste for theatrical amusements interfered with his studies, and he soon forsook the easel for the sock and buskin. Having been introduced to Mr. Mossop, he obtained an engagement at the Dublin theatre; and he continued to perform in that city, and in the towns to which the company made summer excursions, for twelve years, as a comedian, with considerable success. His ambition to figure as an author was coeval with his theatrical taste; for, at the age of 15, he attempted a comedy in five acts. Among his early productions which attracted notice, was a kind of histrionic monologue, called "Tony Lumpkin's Rambles through Dublin." He at length left Ireland, about 1780, with the view of obtaining an engagement in London, but, as he did not succeed in his endeavor, he applied himself with great assiduity to dramatic composition, and between 1781 and 1798 he produced nearly fifty comedies, comic operas, and farces. Many of these acquired a flattering popularity, and some still keep possession of the stage, among which are, "Wild Oats," the "Castle of Andalusia," the "Agreeable Surprise," the "Poor Soldier," "Peeping Tom," the "Young Quaker," &c. In 1800, O'Keefe, who was then blind, and had been reduced by misfortune to a state of great embarrassment, had a benefit at Covent-garden theatre. He subsequently published his "Recollections, or Biographical Memoirs," and d. at Southampton, 1833.

OLAFSEN, EGGERT, a learned Iceland-er, who studied at Copenhagen, after which he returned to his native island, which he travelled over repeatedly in company with his fellow-student Bjarne Paulsen. The result of their observations was printed at Copenhagen, 1772. Olafsen was then appointed a magistrate in Iceland, where he devoted much of his time to natural history and poetry, but, about four years before his death, he applied almost wholly to the study of the Scriptures. He was drowned with his wife in crossing the Breidafjord in 1776.

OLDHAM, JOHN, a poet, was b. in 1653, at Shipton, in Gloucestershire, was educated at Tetbury free school, and Edmund hall, Oxford, became usher of Croydon free school, and afterwards tutor in the families of Sir Edward Thurland and Sir William Hicckes, was patronized by the earl of Kingston, and d. in 1683. His satires are rugged, but full of energy. Dryden, in a beautiful tribute to his memory, calls him

"the young,
But, ah! too short, Marcellus of our tongue!"

OLDYS, WILLIAM, an antiquary and miscellaneous writer, the natural son of a civilian, was b. in 1696, became librarian to Lord Oxford in 1726, was appointed Norroy king-at-arms, and d. in 1761. Among other works he wrote "The British Librarian," "The Universal Spectator," a "Life of Sir Walter Raleigh," and several lives in the "Biographia Britannica." He also assisted in selecting "The Harleian Miscellany."

OLEARIUS, or OELSCHLÆGER, ADAM, a learned German traveller, was b. 1599, at Aseherleben, in Anhalt; was educated at Leipsic; entered into the service of the duke of Holstein Gottorp, and was appointed secretary to the embassy which that prince sent to Russia and Persia; was, on his return, made counsellor, librarian, and mathematician, to the duke; and d. 1671. He wrote an account of his "Travels," a "Chronicle of Holstein," and other works.

OLIVET, JOSEPH THOULIER D', a French grammarian and critic, was b. in 1682, at Salins. He was originally a Jesuit, but quitted the order, to give himself up to literature. In 1723 he became a member of the French Academy, the dictionary of which body he assisted in revising. His principal works are, a valuable edition of Cicero, translations from Demosthenes and Cicero, a "History of the French Academy," and a "Treatise on Prosody." D. 1762.

OLIVER, ANDREW, was graduated at Harvard college, in 1724, and was early engaged in public employments, succeeded Hutchinson as lieutenant-governor of Massachusetts, in 1771, and retained that office till his death, in 1774. He rendered himself very unpopular by accepting from the British government the office of stamp distributor of the province.—WILLIAM ANTHONY, an eminent French naturalist and traveller, was b. 1756, at Frejus; was sent on a scientific mission to Persia by the French government, in 1792, and returned with a valuable collection, after an absence of six years. His chief works are, "Travels in the Ottoman Empire, Egypt, and Persia," "A Natural History of Coleopterous Insects," and a portion of the "Dictionary of the Natural History of Insects," in the "Methodical Encyclopædia." D. 1814.

O'MEARA, BARRY EDWARD, the confidential medical attendant of the Emperor Napoleon in his last days, and author of "A Voice from St. Helena," was a native of Ireland, and b. about 1778. He was originally a surgeon in the British navy, and was on board the Bellerophon in that capacity, on the 7th of August, 1815, when Napoleon went on board. Napoleon having observed Dr. O'Meara's skill in attending to some of the crew, and his knowledge of Italian, made overtures to him, on being transferred to the Northumberland, to accompany him to St. Helena as his surgeon, his own not being able to go with him. Having obtained Admiral Keith's permission, Dr. O'Meara assented, and remained with the ex-emperor till July, 1818, when he was recalled and deprived of his rank. He was latterly an active partisan of O'Connell's, at one of whose agitation meetings he is said to have caught the illness which terminated fatally, June 3, 1836.

OPIE, JOHN, a celebrated painter, was b. 1761, at St. Agnes, near Truro, in Cornwall, and was the son of a carpenter, who destined him to follow that business. At 10 years of age he could solve many difficult problems in Euclid, and at 12 he taught writing and arithmetic at an evening school in his native village. But drawing soon became his principal object, and he made several sketches and copies, which were much talked of in the neighborhood. After having practised for a few years in the provincial towns, he settled in London, in 1780, where he acquired both fame and fortune. He became a royal academician, and professor of painting to the academy. He wrote Lectures, a "Life of Sir Joshua Reynolds," and a "Letter on the Formation of a National Gallery." D. 1807.—AMELIA, b. in 1771, at Harwich, was highly distinguished for her literary abilities, and was the author of "A Life of Opie," "Adeline Mowbray," "Simple Tales," "The Eve of St. Valentine," &c. D. 1853.

OPITZ, MARTIN, whom the Germans call the father and restorer of their poetry, was b. 1597, at Buntzlau, in Silesia; was educated at Breslau and Frankfort-on-the-Oder; spent several years in travelling in various parts of Europe; was ennobled, and sent on a mission to Paris; and d. in 1639.

OPPIAN, a Greek poet, a native of Corycens, in Cilicia, flourished in the 2d century, and was liberally rewarded for his works by Caracalla. He wrote two poems; the one in five books, called "Halautics," on fishing; the other in four, with the title of "Cynogeticon," on hunting. Some critics have doubted whether he is really the author of the latter.

ORANGE, WILLIAM of NASSAU, prince of, the founder of the Dutch republic, was b. 1533, at the castle of Dillenburg. He was brought up in the court of Charles V., who, in 1554, gave him the command of the army in the Netherlands. Philip II., however, treated him with coldness; and the conduct of the prince, in joining with the Flemish nobles to protect the liberties of the Netherlands, converted that coldness into hatred. He was forced to fly, and, in his absence, was condemned to death. He then took up arms, and after several reverses, succeeded in wresting a part of the Netherlands from the dominion of the Spanish tyrant. But he did not witness the consummation of his labors; being assassinated, in 1584, at Delft, by Balthasar Gerard.—FREDERIC HENRY of NASSAU, prince of, stadtholder of Holland, was b. 1584, at Delft, and was brought up by his brother Maurice, whom he succeeded in 1625. He governed with wisdom and equity, and secured the independence of his country by numerous victories and conquests. D. 1647.

ORELLANA, FRANCIS, one of the Spanish adventurers to the new world, was b. at Truxillo, early in the 16th century, and accompanied the Pizarros to Peru. Passing the Andes, he embarked on the Amazons, and followed its course to the ocean. He was the first European that navigated that mighty stream, and it still bears his name. D. 1549.

ORIGEN, one of the fathers of the church, was b. 185, at Alexandria, and studied philosophy under Ammonius, and theology under Clemens Alexandrinus. Being persecuted by his diocesan, Demetrius, he went to Cæsarea, and afterwards to Athens. During the persecution of Decius, he was imprisoned and tortured. His great works are, "The Hexapla," "Commentaries on the Scriptures," and a "Treatise against Celsus." D. 253.

ORLEANS, CHARLES, duke of, was made prisoner at the battle of Agincourt, in 1415. He remained in England 25 years; and on his return to France he undertook the conquest of the duchy of Milan, to which he conceived himself entitled in right of his mother. He was not, however, successful in this enterprise; and d. 1495.—Louis, duke of, was the son of Philip the regent of France, and b. at Versailles, in 1703. In study, devotion, and acts of charity he spent his life. In 1733 he saved numbers from perishing by famine in the Orleanois; as he again did throughout France, in the dearth of 1740. He also extended his benevolence to distant countries; while in his own he founded schools, professorships, hospitals, and colleges. But his charitable occupations did not draw him aside from his studies, which he pursued with such diligence as to become master of the oriental languages, and most of the sciences. D. 1752, leaving many works in manuscript, the chief of which were "Commentaries on the Scriptures."—Louis JOSEPH PHILIP, duke of (better known by his republican appellation of Egalité,) was the cousin of Louis XVI., and father of Louis Philippe, the late king of the French. He was b. at St. Cloud, in 1747; married the daughter of the duke of Penthièvre, grand admiral of France, in 1769; was from his youth guilty of the most unbridled licentiousness; and acquired a base notoriety by his conduct during the French revolution. After the death of his father, in 1787, he became possessed of the hereditary title and estates; and, having indulged to satiety in all sensual pleasures, he found a new kind of excitement for his pallid appetites in the storms of the revolution, and a new source of pleasure in the gratifications of revenge. He had entered the navy, and was entitled by his birth to the place of grand-admiral; but having been accused of cowardice while in command of a division of the fleet against Keppel, in the action of Ushant, in 1778, instead of receiving promotion in the navy, the post of colonel-general of the hussars was created and bestowed on him. From this time may be dated his hatred of Louis XVI.; and he subsequently adopted every method to obtain popularity, with a view to political power. In the dispute between the court and the parliament, he constantly opposed the royal authority. His object evidently was to reduce the king to a state of tutelage, and procure for himself the formidable office of lieutenant-general of the kingdom. He caused scandalous libels against the queen, whom he pursued with the most bitter hatred, to be distributed; and his bust was carried in triumph through the streets by the populace. He was chosen a member of the national convention, with Marat, Danton, and Robespierre, in September, 1792, at which time the commune of Paris authorized him to adopt for himself and his descendants the appellation of Egalité, instead of the name and titles of his family; and he not only voted for the death of the king, but was present at his execution. But he was not qualified to profit by the commotions he had promoted; he was as weak as he was wicked, as indecisive as he was ambitious. The Jacobins had no longer any occasion for him; he was struck from their rolls, and included in the general proscription of the Bourbons; and was committed to prison at Marseilles, with other members of the family. Being brought before the criminal tribunal of the department, he was declared innocent of the charges of conspiracy that were preferred against him; but the committee of public safety forbade his liberation; and, after six months' detention, he was transferred to Paris, tried, and condemned to suffer by the guillotine; to which he submitted with firmness and courage, on the same day, Nov. 6, 1793.—FERDINAND PHILIPPE LOUIS, duke of, prince-royal of France, was b. at Palermo in 1810, and was the eldest child of Louis Philippe, then duke of Orleans, and afterwards king of the French, by Maria Amelia, daughter of Ferdinand, king of the Two Sicilies. The prince served with great distinction with the French army at the siege of Antwerp, and in the African war; and his horse was wounded at the time of the murderous attempt upon the life of his royal father in 1835. Young, popular, a patron of the arts and literature, and devotedly attached to his profession, every thing seemed to promise to this prince a career glorious to himself and useful to his country, when he was unfortunately thrown from his carriage, and he d. on the spot, July 13, 1842.—MARIE, princess of, daughter of Louis Philippe, ex-king of the French, was b. at Palermo, 1813. From her earliest years she evinced a remarkable love of the fine arts, and more especially of sculpture, which she cultivated with a zeal and assiduity that soon gave her a prominent place among the most distinguished artists of her time. Her marvellous statue of Joan of Arc, in the museum of Versailles, was finished before she had reached her 20th year; and besides this she produced numerous bas reliefs, busts, and statuettes, of rare beauty and excellence. In 1837 she married Alexander, duke of Wirtemberg; a union rich in promises of earthly happiness; but she was prematurely cut off by consumption in 1839, to the inexpressible grief of her family and the friends of art.

ORME, ROBERT, an historian, the son of a physician in the East India Company's service, was b. in 1728, at Anjengo, in Hindostan; was educated at Harrow; became a member of the council at Fort St. George, commissary and accountant-general, and historiographer to the company. He is the author of a "History of the Military Transactions of the British Nation in Hindostan," and "Historical Fragments of the Mogul Empire." As an historian Orme is entitled to a place among the most eminent writers. D. 1801.

OROSIUS, PAUL, a Spanish ecclesiastic of the 5th century, was b. at Tarragona, and was a disciple of St. Augustin. His chief work is a "History of Human Calamities," which was written at the request of St. Augustin, and has had the honor of being translated by Alfred the Great. The time and place of his decease are unknown.

ORPHEUS, a Greek poet, musician, and founder of some religious ceremonies, is supposed by some to be an imaginary person, but is probably a real one, though his history is involved in fable. He seems to have been a native of Thrace, son of one of the princes of that country, and to have been b. about a century before the Trojan war. He is said to have been one of the Argonauts, to have subsequently travelled in Egypt, and to have introduced Egyptian science and customs into Greece. The works attributed to him are of a much later period.

ORRERY, CHARLES BOYLE, earl of, was b. 1676, at Chelsea, and was educated at Christ-church, Oxford, under the tuition of Dr. Atterbury. He published, while at college, an edition of "Phalaris." Bentley questioned the authenticity of the epistles; Boyle replied; and this led to a warm controversy, in which Bentley was fruitlessly opposed by a confederacy of wits. Boyle succeeded to the earldom on the death of his brother; was promoted in the army, employed as an ambassador, and made an English peer, by Queen Anne; but was in disfavor during the reign of George I., and was even imprisoned for six months. He wrote "As You Like It," a comedy; and some verses. The astronomical instrument which bears his name was so called in compliment to him by Graham, its inventor. D. 1731.

ORTELL, ABRAHAM, a learned geographer, who was called the Ptolemy of his age, was b. 1527, at Antwerp. He travelled on the Continent, and in Great Britain, and formed a valuable collection of antiquities. On his return he published an atlas, which gained for him the appointment of geographer to Philip II. of Spain. His principal works are, "Thesaurus Geographicus," and "Theatri Orbis Terrarum." D. 1598.

OSSIAN, an ancient Gaelic bard, is supposed to have lived in the 3d century, and to have been the son of Fingal, a Caledonian hero, whom he accompanied in various military expeditions. His name has derived its celebrity from the publications of Macpherson, which comprise a remarkable series of ballads, on the deliverance of Erin from the haughty Swaran, king of Lochlin, by Fingal. They have been translated into all the European languages, and please by their successful delineation of the passions, picturesque expressions, bold but lovely images and comparisons, deep pathos, and tender melancholy tone.

OSTADE, ADRIAN VAN, a painter of the Flemish school, was b. at Lubeck, in 1610, and studied under Francis Hals. His pictures are characterized by an exact imitation of nature, and usually consist of alehouse interiors, with Dutch peasants smoking, quarrelling, or drinking. His coloring is rich and clear, his touch spirited and free, and all his works are highly finished. D. 1685.

OTHO, MARCUS SALVUS, a Roman emperor, was b. 32. In his early youth he was prodigal and licentious, and a favorite of Nero; but during his ten years' quaestorship of Lusitania, he distinguished himself by his upright and dignified conduct. He espoused the cause of Galba; but, disappointed in his hopes of being adopted by him, he formed a conspiracy against him, and was raised to the throne. Otho, however, retained the imperial authority little more than three months. Having been defeated by the forces of Vitellius, he put an end to his own existence, 69.

OTIS, JAMES, a distinguished American statesman, was b. at West Barnstable, Massachusetts, in 1725, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1743. He pursued the profession of the law, and establishing himself in Boston soon rose to eminence. His public career may be said to have opened with his celebrated speech against writs of assistance. At the next election he was chosen a representative to the legislature, and soon became the leader of the popular party. In 1765 he was a member of the congress which assembled at New York. In 1769 he was severely wounded in an assault committed upon him by some British officers; from one of whom he recovered large damages, which he remitted on receiving a written apology. In 1772 he retired from public life, and in May of the following year was killed by a stroke of lightning. He was a good scholar, a learned and able lawyer, a bold and commanding orator, and possessed infinite powers of humor and wit.

OTTLEY, WILLIAM YOUNG, keeper of the prints in the British museum. He was known as an artist, a collector, and an author. When scarcely 20 years of age he proceeded to Italy, where he remained about ten years, employed in taking copies of the most esteemed and valuable paintings; and on his return to England he produced a series of fac-similes of the original drawings of the best masters, under the title of the "Italian School of Design," a magnificent work, consisting of 84 plates. His other principal works are, "The Florentine School," the "Origin and Early History of Engraving," "The Stafford Gallery," and "The Critical Catalogue of the National Gallery." B. 1772; d. 1836.

OTWAY, THOMAS, a celebrated dramatic writer, was b. 1651, at Trotton; was educated at Winchester school, and Christ-church, Oxford; and, after having made a vain attempt to be an actor, became a writer for the stage. The earl of Plymouth obtained for him a cornet's commission, but at the end of one campaign in Flanders, Otway quitted the military service. The tragedy of "Alcibiades," his first piece, appeared in 1765. His finest tragedies, "The Orphan," and "Venice Preserved," were acted in 1680 and 1682. Otway lived and died poor. It has been said that he was choked by a piece of roll, which he ate too eagerly after having long fasted; but there is reason to believe that his death proceeded from fever, brought on by his violent exertions in pursuit of the murderer of one of his friends. D. 1685.

OVID, PUBLIUS NASO, a celebrated Roman poet, was b. 43 B. C., at Sulmo, and was of the equestrian order. He studied the law under Messala, but soon abandoned the bar for poetry and a life of pleasure. Virgil, Horace, Tibullus, and Propertius were his friends, and Augustus was a liberal patron to him. At length, however, for some cause which has never been discovered, the emperor banished him to Tomos, in Scythia; nor could all the prayers and lamentations of the despairing Ovid procure a remission of his sentence. D. 17.

OVIEDO, JOHN GONZALES, a Spaniard, who soon after the discovery of America visited the West Indies, to examine the natural productions of that part of the world. He published the result of his researches; and, according to Fallopius, was the first who discovered the virtues of guaiacum in the cure of syphilis. D. 1540.—GONZALVO HERNANDEZ D', a Spanish military officer, who was intendant or inspector-general of commerce in America, in the reign of the Emperor Charles V. He wrote a complete "History of the Indies;" from which succeeding writers have drawn much of their information relative to the intercourse of the Spaniards with America.

OWEN, JOHN, a divine, was b. about 1765, in London, and was educated at St. Paul's school and Cambridge. Having taken orders, he became a popular preacher, and obtained from Bishop Porteus the living of Pagglesham, in Essex, and the curacy of Fulham. On the institution of the British and Foreign Bible Society, he became one of the secretaries, and for eighteen years was the most active of its members. Among his works are, "Travels in different Parts of Europe," "The Christian Monitor," "The Fashionable World displayed," and a "Vindication of the Bible Society." D. 1822.—HENRY, a learned divine of the church of England, was b. in Monmouthshire, and educated first at Ruthin school, and next at Jesus college, Oxford, where he took his degree of M.D., but afterwards entered into orders, and obtained the vicarage of Edmonton, in Middlesex, and St. Olave, Hart-street. He d. in 1795, aged 80. His chief works are, "Observations on the Scripture Miracles," "Remarks on the Four Gospels," "An Inquiry into the Septuagint Version," "Sermons preached at Boyle's Lecture," and "An Introduction to Hebrew Criticism."—JOHN, an epigrammatist, was b. in Caernarvonshire; was educated at Winchester, and New college, Oxford; after which he became master of Warwick school, and d. in 1622. His Latin epigrams possess great point, and several of them are inferior only to those of Martial.—JOHN, a learned Independent divine, was b. at Stadham, in Oxfordshire, in 1616, and educated at Queen's college. In the civil wars he was a zealous advocate for the parliament against the king; and the very day after the execution of Charles I. he preached a sermon before the house of commons, making himself so acceptable to those in power, that Cromwell made him his chaplain, and gave him the deanery of Christ-church, Oxford, where he served the office of vice-chancellor in 1652. At the restoration he was deprived of his deanery; on which he retired to his estate in Essex. He died in 1683. Dr. Owen was a very voluminous writer. His principal works are, "An Exposition of the Hebrews," a "Discourse concerning the Holy Spirit," a "Treatise on Original Sin," "Vindiciæ Evangelicæ," "Tracts and Sermons," &c.—THOMAS, a learned judge, was b. at Con Dover, in Shropshire, and educated at Oxford; from whence he removed to Lincoln's Inn, where he became Lent reader to the society, in 1583. In 1590 he was made sergeant-at-law, and afterwards a judge of the common pleas. D. 1598.—WILLIAM, an eminent English artist, was a native of Shropshire. After studying under Charles Catton, and receiving considerable attention from Sir Joshua Reynolds, he made great progress in the art, and in 1813 was appointed principal portrait-painter to the prince regent, who offered to knight him, but he modestly declined the honor. He executed some admirable portraits of distinguished statesmen, &c., and also employed himself occasionally on historical subjects, some of which were of a first-rate character. B. 1769; d. 1824.

OWTRAM, WILLIAM, a learned English divine. He was prebendary of Westminster in the reign of Charles II., and wrote an excellent treatise "De Sacrificiis." D. 1679.

OXENSTIERNA, Count AXEL, a celebrated Swedish statesman, was b. in 1583, in the province of Upland, and studied at various German universities. Charles IX. employed him in important negotiations; and Gustavus Adolphus made him prime minister, and reposed in him an unlimited confidence. After the death of Gustavus, he for several years conducted the affairs of the kingdom with vigor and success. D. 1654.

OZANAM, JAMES, an able French mathematician, was b. in 1640, at Boulogne. He was brought up for the church, but relinquished the clerical profession on the death of his father. For many years he was in high repute as a mathematical teacher. Among his works are, "A Course of Mathematics," "A Treatise on Gnomonics," "New Elements of Algebra," and "Mathematical and Philosophical Recreations." D. 1717.

OZEROFF, VLADISLAV ALEXANDROVITSCH, a celebrated Russian tragic author, was b. in 1770, near Twer, and entered into the civil service after having attained the rank of major-general in the army. He produced, between 1798 and 1809, the tragedies of "The Death of Oleg," "Œdipus at Athens," "Fingal," "Dmitri Donskoi," and "Polixena." He also wrote some lyric poems. D. 1816.

P.

PACA, WILLIAM, a signer of the declaration of American independence, was educated at the college in Philadelphia, and pursued the profession of medicine. He was a delegate to congress from Maryland, and afterwards governor of that state. In 1788 he was a member of the Maryland convention which ratified the federal constitution, and in 1789 was appointed district judge for Maryland. D. 1799.

PACCA, Cardinal, was b. at Benevento, 1756. After rising through the usual ecclesiastical degrees, and discharging the office of nuncio at various courts, he received from Pope Pius VII. the cardinal's hat in 1801, drew up the famous bull which excommunicated Napoleon in 1809, and was in consequence imprisoned at Fenestrella. In 1813 he rejoined Pius VII. at Fontainebleau, where he induced him to withdraw the concessions a short time previously established with Napoleon by a concordat, returned to Rome with the pope in 1814, and finally retired from office in 1816, after having re-established the order of the Jesuits. D. 1844.

PACUVIUS, MARCUS, a Latin dramatist, a nephew of Ennius, was b. 218

b.c., at Brindisium, and d. at Tarentum, at the age of 90. He possessed the talent of painting as well as of poetry.

PADILLA, Don JOHN DE, a Spanish patriot, of a noble family, was the son of the commander of Castile; espoused the cause of the people; and supported it bravely during the struggle of the Spaniards for liberty, from 1420 to 1422. Being defeated and taken prisoner, at the battle of Villalar, he was put to death on the following day, and met his fate with heroic firmness.—MARIA PACHECO, his wife, was worthy of such a husband. During his life she participated in all his labors, and after his death she defended Toledo for several months, gained several advantages at the head of her troops, and did not quit the place till she was deserted by the citizens.

PAGAN, BLAISE FRANCOIS, count de, an eminent French military engineer, was b. at Avignon, in 1604. He entered into the army at an early age, and lost an eye, in 1621, at the siege of Montauban. After this he distinguished himself on several occasions, particularly at the passage of the Alps and the barricade of Suza, where he was the first to lead the way over a dangerous height. In 1642 he lost his sight entirely; notwithstanding which he pursued his military studies, and in 1645 published an excellent work, entitled "Traité de Fortification." D. 1655.

PAGANACCI, JEAN, b. at Lyons, in 1729; d. in 1797. His great work, the "Manuel des Négocians," a commercial encyclopædia, is justly esteemed in France.

PAGANEL, PETER, a member of the French legislative assembly and convention, was b. in 1745. He was chosen a deputy in 1791; and when, on the 10th of August, 1792, the unfortunate Louis XVI. sought an asylum in the hall of the representatives, he was one of the first to join in a deputation to the people, in order to restrain their violence; yet he afterwards voted for the king's death. He was consequently obliged to quit France in 1816, and he d. at Brussels in 1826. Paganel was the author of "Essai Historique et Critique sur la Révolution Française," and some other works of minor importance.

PAGANINI, NICOLO, the inimitable violinist, was b. at Genoa, 1784. His father, who was a commission-broker by trade, but a great musical amateur, initiated him in the principles of music from his earliest years; and the progress thus made under parental care was still further increased by subsequent instructions from Costa, Rolla, and Paer. His first public engagement was at Lucca. Here he found a zealous patroness in the Princess Bacchiocchi, sister of Napoleon; but in 1813 he left Lucca for Milan, and three years later his reputation had so spread abroad, that the "Leipsic Musical Gazette," no mean authority at that time, pronounced him the first violinist in the world. From this epoch dates his wondrous performance on a single string, which at a later period called forth such bursts of applause from innumerable audiences in Germany, France, and England. In 1828 he visited Vienna, where he met with an enthusiastic reception. Thence he visited the chief cities of Germany; and in 1831 he made a musical tour through France and England, where he realized enormous sums, which, however, the gambling table swallowed up, frequently even with greater rapidity than he gained them. His last years were spent at his villa Gajona near Parma; and he d. at Nice, 1840. The most absurd stories were circulated regarding Paganini during his lifetime; nor did they cease even with his death. Crimes of the deepest dye were imputed to him without a vestige of foundation; though it must be admitted that the singular cast of his countenance, his reserved character, his sudden bursts of passion, and the mysterious veil which he was fond of throwing around all his proceedings, were well fitted to awaken public curiosity, with its usual adjunct, excessive credulity.

PAGÈS, FRANCIS XAVIER, an indefatigable French romance writer, &c., was b. at Aurillac, in 1745, and d. at Paris, in 1802. Among his numerous works are, "Histoire Secrète de la Révolution Française," and "Nouveau Voyage autour du Monde, en Asie, en Amérique, et en Afrique, précédé d'un Voyage en Italie."—PIERRE MARIE FRANCOIS, viscount de, a celebrated French navigator, was b. at Toulouse, in 1748. He sailed from Cape François, in St. Domingo, in 1797, with a view to explore the Indian seas, and travel through China and Tartary to the Northern Ocean; but on arriving at the Philippine islands in October, 1798, and finding it impossible to penetrate China, he went by sea to Bassora, and travelling through the desert to Syria, he reached France in December, 1771. He afterwards sailed in Kerguelen's expedition to the south pole, and on his return proceeded as far as 81 degrees and a half of north latitude. He served in the American war, after which he retired to his estate in St. Domingo, where he was murdered during a revolt of the negroes in 1793.

PAGI, ANTHONY, a famous Cordelier, who was four times provincial of his order. B. 1624; d. 1699. He was the author of a "Critique on Baronius's Annals," and a "Dissertation on the Consulates."—FRANCIS, his nephew, also a Cordelier, assisted his uncle in his great work on Baronius, and was the author of "Breviarium Historico-chronologico-criticum." D. 1721.

PAINE, THOMAS, a political writer, was b. 1736, at Thetford, in Norfolk. He was brought up as a staymaker, but became an exciseman. Being, however, dismissed for misconduct, he came over to America, and espoused the cause of the colonies, who were then in arms against the mother country. His first literary production, a pamphlet, with the title of "Common Sense," had a powerful effect, and he was rewarded by a grant of land, and another of £500. He was also employed by the congress. In 1790 he visited England, and, in the following year, he produced his celebrated "Rights of Man," in answer to Burke's "Reflections;" for the second part of, which a prosecution was instituted against him. He was, however, beyond the reach of the English law; he having taken his seat as a member of the national convention. As a French legislator he displayed a degree of moderation, which brought upon him the hatred of the Jacobins. He was imprisoned, and was near becoming a victim to the guillotine. He at length returned to America, and d. in 1809. Besides the works already mentioned, he wrote "The Age of Reason," and some political tracts.—ROBERT TREAT, an eminent lawyer, and a signer of the declaration of independence, was b. at Boston, 1731, and was graduated at Harvard college, in 1749. After a visit to Europe of some years, he commenced the study of the law, and about 1759 settled in its practice in Taunton. He took an early and active interest in public affairs, and in 1774 was appointed a delegate from Massachusetts to the general congress. He was a member of the committee of the convention that drafted the constitution of his native state. Under the government that was organized he was appointed attorney-general, and held this office till 1790, when he was appointed a judge of the supreme court. He remained on the bench till 1804. D. in 1814.—ROBERT TREAT, a poet, son of the preceding, was b. at Taunton, 1773, and graduated at Harvard college in 1791. On leaving college he was placed in a counting-house, but soon turned his attention to literature and theatricals, and published several orations and poems. His poems were very popular and profitable, and by the sale of the song of "Adams and Liberty," he received the sum of $750. In 1800 he began the practice of law, but failed of success from the want of industry, and passed the close of his life in poverty. D. 1811.

PAISIELLO, JOHN, a celebrated composer, a pupil of Durante, was b. 1741, at Tarento. He begun his public career in 1763, by two operas, which raised him at once into popularity throughout Italy. His subsequent works extended his reputation over the whole of the Continent. Several sovereigns invited him into their service. He accepted the offer of the Empress Catharine, and resided in Russia for nine years. He next settled at Naples. In 1801 he went to Paris at the request of Bonaparte; but, after having lived nearly three years in France, he returned to Naples, and d. there in 1816.

PAJOU, AUGUSTIN, an eminent French sculptor, was b. 1730, at Paris; gained the prize at the Academy at the age of eighteen, and was sent to study at Rome, where he remained for twelve years; became professor of the academy of painting and sculpture, and a member of the institute, and of the legion of honor. His countrymen have called him the restorer of the art. Among his numerous works, some of the principal are, "Pluto holding Cerebus chained," "Psyche abandoned by Love," and statues of Demosthenes, Descartes, Bossuet, Pascal, and Turenne. D. 1809.

PALAFIX, DON JOSEPH, immortalized by his heroic defence of Saragossa, in 1808-9, was sprung from an old Aragonese family, and having entered the military service of Spain at an early age, accompanied Ferdinand de Bayonne; but on the resignation of that monarch, he returned to Aragon, and lived in retirement at a short distance from Saragossa. Proclaimed governor of Saragossa by the people who saw themselves menaced on all sides by the armies of France, he took instant measures to sustain a siege; and such was the effect of his combined intelligence and determination, that with a comparative handful of men, the city manfully resisted an overwhelming force, and at length compelled the French general to retreat after a siege of 61 days, and the loss of thousands of his men. But the reduction of Saragossa was of too great importance to the French for them not to strain every nerve to accomplish it; and Marshals Mortier and Monecy marched in November of the same year, at the head of a large army, to recommence the siege. After suffering two defeats before Saragossa, Palafox once more retired within its walls, and commenced the same vigorous course of action which had been already crowned with success; but on this occasion all his efforts were in vain; the besiegers were backed by a force more terrible than themselves, an epidemic fever was raging in the garrison; and Palafox who was attacked by it, was obliged to resign the command on the 20th February, to General St. Marc, who signed the capitulation on the following day. Palafox was now sent into France, and remained a close prisoner at Vincennes, till the restoration of Ferdinand, by whom he was sent on a secret mission to Madrid. In June, 1814, he was appointed captain-general of Aragon; but for nearly thirty years before his death he took no part in public affairs. B. 1780; d. 1847.

PALESTRINA, GIOVANNI PIETRO ALOISIO, the most celebrated master of the old Roman school of music, was b. at Palestrina, the ancient Præneste, about the beginning of the 16th century. He d. in 1594. Some of his pieces are still performed in the Sistine chapel at Rome.

PALEY, WILLIAM, an eminent divine, the son of a clergyman, was b. 1745, at Peterborough, and was educated, as a sizar, at Christ's college, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow in 1766. For ten subsequent years he resided at the university; but in 1776 he obtained the vicarages of Dalston, in Cumberland, and Appleby, in Westmoreland. Within the next nine years he became a prebendary, archdeacon, and chancellor of Carlisle. In 1785, he at once attained high reputation by his "Elements of Moral and Political Philosophy." At various intervals in the course of a few years, this work was succeeded by "Horæ Paulinæ," "A View of the Evidences of Christianity," and "Natural Theology," besides some smaller pieces. His sermons were a posthumous publication. Preferment awaited him as well as competence and fame.

He was successively made vicar of Stanwix, a prebendary of St. Pancras, subdean of Lincoln, a doctor of divinity, and rector of Bishop's Wearmouth. D. 1805.

PALISSET DE MONTENOY, CHARLES, a French satirist and miscellaneous writer, was b. 1730, at Nancy, and was throughout his life in a state of violent hostility with the French literary characters of the philosophical sect. His works form six octavo volumes. Among them are "The Dunciad;" some comedies, "Little Letters against great Philosophers," "Memoirs for a History of French Literature," and a "History of the early Ages of Rome." D. 1814.

PALISSOT DE BEAUVOIS, AMBROISE MARIE FRANCOIS JOSEPH, an eminent naturalist, was b. at Arras, in the French Netherlands, in 1752. After studying at the college of Harcourt, at Paris, he was in 1772 admitted a counsellor of the parliament of that city; and subsequently became receiver-general of territorial imposts; till the suppression of that office in 1777. He then devoted himself to the study of natural history, and he undertook a voyage to the coast of Guinea, with an intention to travel across the African continent to Egypt; but being unable to execute that design, he sailed for St. Domingo, in 1788, and there occupied some official situations. Having opposed the revolutionary attempts of the negroes, he with difficulty effected his escape to America, purposing to return to France, when he learnt that he had been proscribed as an emigrant. He occupied himself while in America as a teacher of languages, and as a musician, but he did not neglect his favorite pursuits; and on hearing that his name had been erased from the proscribed list, he returned to his native country, taking with him the rich collection of natural curiosities which he had formed. D. 1820.

PALLADIO, ANDREW, a celebrated Italian architect, was b. 1518, at Vicenza, acquired in his own country a reputation which has received the sanction of other nations and of posterity; and d. in 1580. His "Treatise on Architecture" is one of the classics of the art.

PALLAS, PETER SIMON, an eminent traveller and naturalist, was b. 1741 at Berlin; studied at Halle, Gottingen, and Leyden; and acquired so much reputation by his "Elenchus Zoophytorum" and "Miscellanea Zoologica," that Catharine of Russia invited him to

St. Petersburg, made him a member of the academy, and for six years employed him as a naturalist, in exploring various parts of her vast empire. During his tour he suffered such hardships that his hair turned white, and his constitution was severely injured. In 1794, the empress gave him an estate in the Crimea. There he resided for fifteen years; but at length he quitted Russia, and settled at Berlin. Among his numerous works are his "Travels," which Saussure denominated "an inexhaustible mine for the naturalist and statesman;" "Historical Documents on the Mongols;" and a "Physical and Topographical Description of the Taurida." D. 1811.

PALLAVICINO, SFORZA, was b. in 1647, at Rome; was employed by Pope Innocent X. in various important affairs, obtained a cardinal's hat in 1657; and d. 1667. His chief work is "A History of the Council of Trent."

PALMELLA, duke of, a distinguished Portuguese statesman, was b. in 1781. He took an active part in all the political troubles of his country during the last thirty or forty years; and it was owing to his aid and counsels that the queen of Portugal was indebted, in a great measure, for her establishment on the throne of her ancestors. A very considerable part of his life was dedicated to the diplomatic service of his country, which he represented at the congress of Vienna and in London. In 1820 he made a fruitless voyage to Brazil, to pacify the revolution which had burst forth. He was also selected to attend at the coronation of Queen Victoria; and his great wealth enabled him to vie on that occasion with the representatives of the other courts of Europe. He was several times called on to offer advice to his sovereign, but only held office for a limited period. D. 1850.

PALMER, JOHN, an eminent English actor, was b. in London, about 1742, and made his first appearance in the metropolis at the Haymarket theatre. He was afterwards engaged by Garrick at Drury-lane, and gradually rose to eminence in his profession, both in comedy and tragedy. D. 1798.—JOHN, the first projector of mail-coaches, was a native of Bath, where he was brought up as a brewer, but subsequently solicited and obtained a patent for a theatre in his native city, which concern proved eminently successful under his management. Being much in the habit of travelling from place to place, for the purpose of securing rising performers, the idea occurred to him that a better mode of conveying the mails was most desirable, and he accordingly matured the plan of transmitting letters by coaches with guards, now superseded by the railway. He succeeded in his object, though not without great opposition; but the utility of the plan soon became manifest, and he was made comptroller-general of the post-office, with a salary of £1500 a year. Some disputes, however, occurring, he lost his situation in 1792, and though he afterwards, through petitions, was reimbursed by parliament, the compensation was very inadequate to the per centage he was to have received, in case his plan succeeded. D. 1818.

PALOMINO DE CASTRO Y VELASCO, ACISCLES ANTHONY, an eminent Spanish painter, was b. 1653, at Bujalance, in Valencia; was a pupil of Valdes; became king's painter, and entered into the clerical profession in his latter days. Among his most remarkable works are, a "Confession of St. Peter," at Valencia, and five pictures in the choir of the cathedral at Cordova. Palomino wrote the "The Pictorial Museum," of which the third volume contains the lives of Spanish artists. D. 1726.

PANARD, CHARLES FRANCIS, a French dramatist, whom Marmontel surnamed the Lafontaine of the Vandeville, was b. 1694, near Chartres. He wrote eighty pieces, among which are five comedies, and thirteen comic operas. The songs of Panard are remarkable for their easy style and their piquancy. D. 1765.

PANCIROLI, GUY, a civilian, was b. 1623, at Reggio, and was professor of law at Padua, and afterwards at Turin. He is the author of various works; but the one by which he is remembered is a curious treatise on the ancient inventions which are lost, and on those inventions which belong to the moderns. D. 1599.

PANCOUCKE, CHARLES JOSEPH, one of the most eminent booksellers in France, and also a man of literary talent, was b. at Lisle, 1736. He settled at Paris, became connected with most of the distinguished authors of his time, and published many magnificent works. The Moniteur was established by him; and he also projected the Methodical Encyclopædia. Among his own productions are, a free translation of Lucretius, "On Man, and the Reproduction of different Individuals," and "Philosophical Discourses on the Beautiful." D. 1698.—ANDREW JOSEPH, his father, was a bookseller and author.

PAOLI, PASCAL, a patriot and general, (the son of Hyacinth Paoli, who was also an intrepid assertor of his country's liberty,) was b. 1726, at Stretta, in Corsica; followed his father into exile; and was educated at the Jesuits' college, at Naples. In 1755, his countrymen having elected him their generalissimo, he returned to Corsica, and acted with such vigor against the Genoese, that he confined their dominion within the narrow limits of the fortified seaports. To enact wise laws, introduce reforms, and encourage agriculture, was his next care. But all his noble labors were rendered abortive. The Genoese sold the island to France, and, after a severe struggle against the invading army, Paoli was once more compelled to become an exile. For 20 years he resided in England, subsisting on a pension from the government. In 1789 he was recalled by the constituent assembly; but, in 1793, he was proscribed by the Jacobins, and he subsequently placed Corsica under the protection of Great Britain. D. in London, 1807.

PAPIN, DENYS, an eminent natural philosopher and physician, was b. at Blois, in France. After taking the degree of M.D., he visited England; and, in 1680, became a fellow of the Royal Society. While there he made many attempts to bring the steam-engine to perfection, and published an account of an invention, which still bears his name. His work is entitled "The New Digestor, or Engine for the Softening of Bones." Papin assisted Mr. Boyle in his pneumatic experiments; and, on leaving England, he went to Marburg, where he was made mathematical professor, in 1687, and d. 1710.

PAPINIAN, ÆMILIUS, the greatest civil lawyer of antiquity, was b. about 145; was praetorian prefect under the Emperor Severus; and was put to death by Caracalla, in 212, for refusing to justify the murder of Geta. Most of his works are lost.

PARACELSUS, AUREOLUS PHILIP THEOPHRASTUS BOMBAST DE HOHENHEIM, a celebrated Swiss empiric and alchemist, was b. 1493, at Einsiedlen, in the canton of Schwitz. He lived a wandering life for several years; but, having performed some extraordinary cures, he was invited, in 1526, to fill the medical and surgical chair at the university of Basle. This post, however, he held for little more than a year, when he recommenced his peregrinations. He introduced mercury and other medicines into practice. D. at Salzburg, 1541.

PARE, AMBROSE, who is called the father of French surgery, was b. at Laval, about the beginning of the 16th century; was successively surgeon to Henry II., Francis II., Charles IX., and Henry III., and d. 1590.

PARINI, JOSEPH, an Italian poet, was b. 1729, at Basizio; was patronized by Count Firmian, governor of Lombardy, and afterwards by Princess Maria Beatrix, of Este; and was professor of belles lettres, eloquence, and the fine arts, at Milan. Parini was one of the most eminent lyric poets of Italy, and excelled also in satire. D. 1799.

PARIS, MATTHEW, an English historian, was a Benedictine monk at St. Albans, into which order he entered in 1217. Paris was an universal scholar, and a man of great probity. His history is a valuable work. D. 1259.—FRANCIS, commonly called the Abbé Paris, was b. in the French capital, where his father was counsellor to the parliament; but the son embraced the ecclesiastical life, and devoted himself to devotion and charity. He d. in 1727, and was buried in the cemetery of St. Medard, where the Jansenists pretended that miracles were wrought at his tomb; in consequence of which such crowds resorted to the place that the government caused the churchyard to be walled up in 1732.

PARK, MUNGO, a celebrated traveller, the son of a farmer, was b. 1771, at Fowlshiets, Scotland, and was brought up to the medical profession. After having made a voyage to Bencoolen, he was engaged, in 1795, by the African Society, to penetrate into the interior of Africa, and explore the course of the Niger. He arrived in the Gambia in June, and, on the 2d of December, proceeded from Pisanía, on his adventurous journey. On the 20th of July he came in sight of the long-sought river. After having traced it to a considerable distance, he was under the necessity of desisting from his enterprise. On his return to Scotland, Park married, and entered upon the practice of his profession. In 1804, however, he undertook a second expedition, for the same purposes as the first. He again reached the Niger, and embarked upon it at Bannakou, but was attacked by the natives, and drowned, in his voyage to Houssa.

PARKE, JOHN, a celebrated musician,

b. 1745, was the best hautboy player of his time, and succeeded Fischer, at Vauxhall, in 1770. About the same time Garrick engaged him, on very liberal terms, to play at Drury-lane; and, in 1783, he was attached to the Carlton-house band, at a yearly salary of £100. He was now in the highest reputation; he performed at the concert of ancient music, at the best private concerts, and was also regularly engaged at the great provincial music meetings. D. 1829.

PARKER, MATTHEW, a learned prelate, was b. 1504, at Norwich; was educated at Cambridge; and was successively chaplain to Anne Boleyn, dean of Stoke Clare, master of Bennet college, and dean of Lincoln. In the reign of Mary he was in great danger of being brought to the stake. Elizabeth raised him to the see of Canterbury, which he filled with honor to himself. He took a share in the "Reformed Liturgy," and the "Bishop's Bible," published editions of some of the old English historians, and wrote "De Antiquitate Britannicæ Ecclesiæ," and some works of less importance. D. 1575.—ISAAC, an eminent lawyer, was b. in Boston, and graduated at Harvard college, in 1786. He studied law in the office of Judge Tudor, and commenced practice at Castine, in Maine, then an integral part of Massachusetts. Removing to Portland, he was sent for one term to congress, as a representative from Cumberland county. He also held, for a short time, the office of United States marshal for that district. In 1806 he was appointed by Governor Strong associate judge of the supreme court of Massachusetts, and soon after took up his residence at Boston. In 1814 he was appointed chief justice of the supreme court, and held that office till his sudden death, in July, 1830, at the age of 63.

PARKES, SAMUEL, a chemist, was b. 1759, at Stourbridge, was educated at Market Harborough. He was a great manufacturing chemist, and a member of the geological and other societies. He is the author of a "Chemical Catechism," which has passed through numerous editions; "Rudiments of Chemistry," "An Essay on the Utility of Chemistry," and "Chemical Essays." D. 1825.

PARKHURST, JOHN, a divine, was b. 1723, at Catesby; was educated at Rugby school, and Clare hall, Cambridge; and d. 1797. He is the author of "A Hebrew Lexicon," "A Greek Lexicon," "An Address to Wesley," and "The Divinity and Pre-existence of Christ demonstrated."

PARKINSON, JOHN, a botanist, was b. 1567; was appointed apothecary to Charles I.; was nominated Botanicus Regius Primarius by Charles I. He is the author of "Paradisus Terrestris, or a Garden of all Sorts of Pleasant Flowers," and of "Theatrum Botanicum, or Theatre of Plants." D. 1640.

PARMA, ALEXANDER FARNESE, duke of, one of the most celebrated generals of the age in which he lived, first distinguished himself at the battle of Lepanto. Being appointed to the government of the Netherlands by Philip II. he gained several victories, and restored the greatest part of the provinces to the authority of his sovereign. In 1590 he compelled Henry IV. to raise the siege of Paris; and, in 1592, the siege of Rouen. In the last of these expeditions he received a wound in the arm, which he neglected, and which caused his death, at Arras, on the 2d December, in the forty-seventh year of his age.

PARMENTIER, ANTHONY AUGUSTIN, an eminent French agricultural improver, was b. 1737, at Montdidier, and was successively apothecary to the army in Hanover, and to the Hotel des Invalides at Paris. To Parmentier, France is indebted for rendering the cultivation of the potato general, and for improving and introducing various other alimentary articles. His whole attention was paid to these subjects, and all his works relate to them. D. 1818.

PARNELL, THOMAS, a divine and poet, was b. 1679, at Dublin; was educated at Trinity college, in that city; obtained, in 1705, 1713, and 1716, the archdeaconry of Clogher, a prebend in Dublin cathedral, and the vicarage of Finglass. He was the friend of Swift and Pope, the latter of whom gave the works of Parnell to the press. D. 1717.

PARNY, EVARISTE DESIRE DESFORGES, viscount de, whom his countrymen denominate the French Tibullus, was b. 1753, at the Isle of Bourbon; was sent to France, at the age of nine years; was educated at the college of Rennes; and entered into the military service. His "Elegies," inspired by an unfortunate passion, appeared in 1775, and at once gave him a conspicuous place among poets. Subsequent works sustained his reputation. It is, however, to be regretted that, in his latter years, he sullied his fame by several impious and licentious productions. D. 1814.

PARR, SAMUEL, one of the most profound of Greek scholars, was b. 1746, at Harrow-on-the-Hill, and was educated at the grammar school of that place, and at Emanuel college, Cambridge. Having, in consequence of his youth, been disappointed of becoming head master at Harrow, he established a seminary at Stanmore; which, however, he ultimately gave up, and was successively master of Colchester and Norwich grammar schools. His first church preferment was the rectory of Asterby, which he obtained in 1780. He subsequently received the perpetual curacy of Hatton, the living of Graffham, in Huntingdonshire, and a prebend of St. Paul's cathedral. Among his works are, various "Sermons," the "Preface to Bellendenus," and a "Letter from Irenopolis." D. 1825.—THOMAS, an extraordinary instance of longevity, was b. in Shropshire in 1483. He was bred to husbandry, in which he labored after he was 130 years old. Ten years before this he married a widow; and he exhibited every sign of health, when, in 1635, the earl of Arundel took him to the court of Charles I., where he d. through the change of air and mode of living, at the age of 152 years and 9 months. His body was opened by Dr. Harvey, who discovered no internal marks of decay.—CATHERINE, the sixth and last wife of Henry VIII. In 1547 she married Sir Thomas Seymour, lord admiral of England, who is said to have treated her so ill that she d. of it the year following. She wrote "Prayers," "Meditations," and other religious pieces.

PARRHASIUS, an ancient painter, the cotemporary and rival of Zeuxis, was b. about 420 B. C., at Ephesus. His vanity was equal to his talents, great as they were. Among his most celebrated works were, an allegorical picture of the Athenian people, Meleager, Hercules, and Perseus, and a high priest of Cybele.

PARSONS, THEOPHILUS, a distinguished lawyer, was b. at Byfield, Massachusetts, in 1750, and graduated at Harvard college in 1789. He studied, and pursued the practice of the law, for some years, in Falmouth, now Portland, but when that town was destroyed by the British, he retired to the house of his father in Newbury. About a year afterwards he opened an office in Newburyport. He soon rose to the highest rank in his profession, and made immense acquisitions in legal knowledge. His professional services were sought for in all directions and after thirty-five years of extensive practice he was appointed chief justice of the supreme court of Massachusetts. In 1780 he was a member of the convention which formed the constitution of the state, and of the convention which accepted the federal constitution. He was a powerful speaker, without a rival in knowledge of law, and surpassed by few in his acquaintance with science and classical literature. He continued in the seat of chief justice till his death in 1813.

PASCAL, BLAIZE, equally eminent as a geometrician and a writer, was b. 1623, at Clermont, in Auvergne. Though himself a mathematician, his father would not allow him to be taught mathematics; but such was his propensity to that science, that, unassisted and by stealth, he mastered a part of Euclid before he was twelve years of age. He was then suffered to indulge his genius. At sixteen he published a "Treatise on Conic Sections," and at nineteen he invented an arithmetical machine. Unlike many early prodigies, he more than sustained in manhood the fame acquired in youth. But his incessant mental exertions injured his health, and in some degree affected his intellect, without, however, depriving him of the use of his talents. In 1655 and 1656 he published, under the name of Louis de Montalte, his admirable "Provincial Letters." His latter days were spent in the practice of austere devotion. D. 1662.

PASQUIER, STEPHEN, an eminent French civilian and writer, was b. 1529, at Paris; was a pupil of Cujas, and first rose into reputation as an advocate by pleading against the Jesuits before the parliament. In his writings he was also a formidable adversary of that ambitious and powerful order. One of his principal works is, "Inquiries respecting France." D. 1615.

PATERCULUS, CAIUS VELLEIUS, a Roman historian, of an equestrian family, flourished in the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius. He filled the offices of tribune of the soldiers, quæstor, tribune of the people, and prætor, and commanded the cavalry under Tiberius. He is supposed by some to have been involved in the ruin of Sejanus. Only a part of his valuable "Epitome of Greek and Roman history" is extant.

PATRICK, SIMON, a learned prelate, was b. 1626, at Gainsborough; was educated at Queen's college, Cambridge; and, after having filled with honor several secondary preferments, was raised, in 1689, to the see of Chichester, for his exertions against Catholicity. In 1691 he was translated to Ely; and he d. 1707. His chief work is, "Paraphrases and Commentaries on the Old Testament."—St., the apostle or patron saint of Ireland, is supposed by some to have been a native of Cornwall, whose zeal prompted him to cross the Channel for the conversion of the pagan Irish. By others, however, he is said to have been a native of Kirkpatrick, on the Clyde; and that his name was Saccuthus, until changed by Pope Celestine. Others again assert, that he was b. in Britany, and carried by some freebooters to Ireland, where he was at first employed in keeping sheep. Be this as it may, it is allowed by all that his endeavors were crowned with great success, and that he established there a number of schools and monasteries. Nennius states that his missions continued forty years, and various miracles are attributed to him, particularly the often-repeated assertion of the absence of all venomous creatures from Ireland, ascribed by the superstitious to his holy benediction. We can no more reconcile the conflicting testimonies relative to the place of his birth, than we could determine the validity of his miraculous powers; and perhaps, for the sake of truth, the least that is said of either the better. It would seem that the latter years of his life were devoted to acts of piety and religious meditation; and that he d. at an advanced age, about the year 493. His works, or at least those ascribed to him, were published, with remarks, by Sir James Ware, in 1658.

PAUL, St. VINCENT DE, an ecclesiastic of the church of Rome, was b. in 1576. In a voyage which he made from Marseilles, his ship was taken by the Turks, and he remained in slavery some years; but having made a convert of his master, he obtained his liberty, and returned to France. Louis XIII. made him abbot of St. Leonard de Chalme, and he also had the living of Clichy, where he built a church at his own expense. He was next placed at the head of the council of conscience, and chief of the house of St. Lazare, in which situations his zeal and charity knew no bounds. He projected missions into all parts of the world, and instituted a number of benevolent establishments. He d. in 1660, and was afterwards canonized.

PAULUS, JULIUS, a celebrated Roman lawyer, of the 3d century, who, being made an imperial counsellor under Severus and Caracalla, distinguished himself by the boldness with which he delivered his opinions. Under Heliogabalus he was banished; but the Emperor Alexander Severus recalled him, raised him to the consular dignity, and appointed him prætorian prefect, after the death of Ulpian.—PETER, grand pensionary of Holland, was b. in 1754. As a minister of the marine department he displayed great activity and intelligence; but having offended the stadtholder's government, he was removed from his situation in 1787, and retired into France. He afterwards returned, and held very important offices in the state. D. 1796. Paulus was the author of a "Commentary on the Treaty of Utrecht," a "Memoir on the Equality of Mankind," and other works.

PAUSANIUS, a Greek orator and historian, settled at Rome, 170, and d. there at a very advanced age. He is the author of a valuable "Historical Description of Greece," in ten books.

PAUW, CORNELIUS DE, a learned writer, was b. 1739, at Amsterdam; was educated at Liege by a relation; refused the most tempting offers from Frederic the Great, to settle at Berlin; and became canon of Xanten. He is the author of "Philosophical Inquiries respecting the Americans, the Egyptians and Chinese, and the Greeks." All his works are ingenious, but abound with paradoxes and bold theories. D. 1799.

PEACHAM, HENRY, an ingenious writer of the 17th century, was b. at North Mims, in Hertfordshire, and educated at Trinity college, Cambridge. He afterwards went to Italy, and while in that country studied painting, music, and the fine arts generally. His principal work, entitled "The Complete Gentleman," was once extremely popular. Besides this, he published "Minerva Britannica," "Thalia's Banquet," "The Valley of Variety," "The Worth of a Penny," and the "Gentleman's Exercise." D. about 1640.

PEALE, CHARLES WILSON, was b. in Maryland, in 1741, and was successively a saddler, harness-maker, silversmith, watchmaker, carver, portrait painter, naturalist, machinist, and dentist. He founded the extensive museum at Philadelphia, which bears his name. D. 1827.—REMBRANDT, a brother of the above, was also a distinguished artist, who was well known in Philadelphia and New York.

PEARCE, ZACHARY, a learned prelate, was b. 1690, in London; was educated at Westminster school, and at Trinity college, Cambridge; was successively rector of Stapleford Abbots, and of St. Bartholomew, near the Bank, vicar of St. Martin in the Fields, dean of Winchester; and bishop of Bangor and Rochester. He wrote sermons, some papers in the "Spectator" and "Guardian," "A Commentary on the Evangelists and Acts," and other works; and published editions of Longinus, and Cicero's "De Officiis." D. 1774.

PEARSON, JOHN, an eminent English prelate, was b. at Snoring, in Norfolk, in 1612, and d. bishop of Chester, in 1686. He is principally known by his valuable "Exposition of the Creed." He also wrote "Vindiciæ Ignatii, or a Defence of the Epistles of St. Ignatius," and other learned works.—MARGARET EGLINGTON, a lady distinguished for her skill in the art of enamelling, or painting on glass, was the daughter of Samuel Paterson, the bibliographer, and married an artist named Pearson, with whom she established a manufactory of stained glass at Hampstead. Some of her productions have scarcely ever been equalled, particularly her copies of Raphael's cartoons. D. 1828

PEEL, Sir ROBERT, third son of Mr. Peel, of Peel Cross, Lancashire, was b. 1750. This gentleman evinced, at a very early age, a quickness of perception and a spirit of enterprise which led to distinguished acts in the course of his useful life. In 1770 he devoted a great portion of his time to the improvement of machinery. In 1778 he embarked in the cotton trade, accumulated an immense fortune, was created a baronet in 1801, and entered parliament the following year. D. 1830.—Sir ROBERT, son of the preceding, and the greatest statesman of his age, was b. Feb. 5, 1788. He was educated first at Harrow, and afterwards at Oxford, at both of which places he distinguished himself by his patient diligence, his correct taste, and his scholarly achievements. At Oxford he took a first-class degree both in classics and mathematics. No sooner was this accomplished, than his father, in 1809, had him brought into parliament as member for Cashel, whilst he was little more than 21 years of age; and the house of commons became thenceforward the arena of his life. He had not sat long in it until he proved himself an able speaker, and a laborious and sagacious worker. In 1811 he was appointed under-secretary of state for the colonies, under the Perceval administration. In 1812 he was made chief secretary for Ireland, and shortly after carried his measure for the reform of the currency. He in 1822 became secretary of state for the home department. Among many other useful measures identified with his name, during this period of his career, may be mentioned his plan for the reform of the criminal code, which he brought forward and carried in 1826. On the accession of Canning to the premiership in 1827, he refused to take office under that distinguished statesman; but he returned in 1828 to the office of home secretary under the duke of Wellington, and held that post during the difficult times which preceded the dissolution of the tory government in 1830. Hitherto, his political career had borne the aspect of devoted adherence to toryism; but, on accepting office under the duke of Wellington, he entered upon a course in which the influence of a different set of principles came to be apparent; for he had but feebly opposed the bill of Lord John Russell for the repeal of the test and corporation acts, and himself introduced, and carried through, in 1829, the bill for the removal of the Catholic disabilities, to which he had previously been opposed. The death of Earl Spencer, in 1834, having afforded the king a pretext for dismissing his whig ministers, Sir Robert Peel was summoned from Rome, and requested to form an administration. But his position in the house was not yet sufficiently strong to enable him to retain his place, and the government being beaten on more than one question, on the 8th of April, 1835, they resigned, and the whigs once more returned to office. In 1839 he was again prime minister for a still shorter period, the famous "Bed-chamber plot," as it was called, having compelled him to relinquish the reins almost as soon as he had grasped them. In the mean time, however, circumstances were gradually ripening to render his accession to power inevitable. Justly or unjustly, a general impression had gone abroad unfavorable to the whig administration; it was accused of administrative incapacity; and, in the summer of 1841, Sir Robert Peel led on an attack which ended in the resignation of Lord Melbourne, and placed him once more at the head of affairs. In 1842 he proposed one of the most extensive alterations in the tariff of the country that had ever been effected. Hundreds of imposts—many of them insignificant, but all of them vexatious—were swept away. The corn laws were abolished in June, 1846, and free trade proclaimed as the commercial policy of the country. Simultaneously with the passing of this measure, Sir Robert Peel resigned office, a coalition of whigs and protectionists having defeated him on the Irish coercion bill. From that period he gave a general support to the whigs, declaring that he had no wish to resume office. D. by a fall from his horse, in 1850.

PÉLAGIUS, a British ecclesiastic of the 5th century, whose real name was MORGAN, which he changed for the corresponding Greek term, signifying "born of the sea." He is said to have been abbot of Bangor; and, about the year 400, he went to Rome, where he opposed the doctrines of St. Augustin respecting original sin, irresistible grace, and eternal election, asserting the possibility of man's being saved by his own merits. Accompanied by his countryman, Celestius, he went to Palestine, and met with a kind reception from the bishop of Jerusalem. In the mean time, Augustin and Jerome attacked his tenets with great severity, and the council of Carthage condemned his opinions as heretical. At the accession of Pope Zosimus he took Pelagius and Celestius under his protection, but he afterwards turned against them, and instigated the emperor to persecute their followers.

PELLICO, SILVIO, an eminent Italian poet and martyr, b. 1794, at Florence, Italy. He wrote a fine tragedy on the story of Francesca di Rimini, narrated so pathetically by Dante, and other successful plays, but in 1820 was seized by the inhuman government of Austria and confined for nearly ten years in the dungeons of Spielberg. His "Life," written by himself, gives a most placid and touching account of the sufferings of himself, Maroncelli, and other of his companions, whose only crime was a desire to emancipate their country from ignominious and cruel thralldom. He d. in February, 1854.

PELISSON-FONTANIER, PAUL, a French author, was b. 1624, at Beziers. He was bred to the law, but was forced to retire from the bar by ill health. He held an office under Fouquet, and when that minister was overthrown, Pelisson was involved in his ruin, and was committed to the Bastille, where he remained during five years. He had, nevertheless, the courage to write three eloquent and powerful memoirs in behalf of his fallen patron. Louis XIV. at length released Pelisson, and loaded him with favors. Among his works are, "Histories of the French Academy," of "Louis XIV.," and of the "Conquest of Franche Comté." D. 1693.

PELLOUTIER, SIMON, a German historian, of a French family, was b. 1694, at Leipsic; became minister of the French church at Berlin, and librarian of the Academy; and d. 1757, a victim to intense study. His principal work is a valuable history of the Celts, particularly of the Gauls and Germans.

PELOPIDAS, an illustrious Theban, the son of Hippoclus, was the friend of Epaminondas; in conjunction with whom he rescued Thebes from the combined tyranny of the nobles and the Lacedemonians. After having been repeatedly re-elected to the government of Bœotia, and distinguished himself at Tegyra and Leuctra, he was slain, 364 B. C., in a battle against Alexander of Pheræa.

PELTIER, JOHN GABRIEL, a French political writer, a native of Nantes, b. about 1770, began his career in 1789, by the publication of a royalist journal called "The Acts of the Apostles." After the 10th of August he took refuge at London, and for many years published a monthly work, with the title of "Paris pendant l'Année." He afterwards established the "Ambigu," for a libel in which, upon the first consul, he was prosecuted by the attorney-general. He also wrote several pamphlets. D. at Paris, 1825.

PENN, WILLIAM, the founder and legislator of Pennsylvania, whom Montesquieu denominates the modern Lycurgus, was the son of Admiral Penn; was b. 1644, in London; and was educated at Christ-church, Oxford. At college he imbibed the principles of Quakerism, which, a few years afterwards, he publicly professed. He was, in consequence, twice turned out of doors by his father. In 1668 he began to preach in public, and to write in defence of the doctrines which he had embraced. For this he was thrice imprisoned, and once brought to trial. It was during his first imprisonment that he wrote "No Cross, No Crown." In 1677 he visited Holland and Germany, to propagate Quakerism. In March, 1680-81, he obtained from Charles II. a grant of that territory which now bears the name of Pennsylvania; in 1682 he embarked for his new colony; and in the following year he founded Philadelphia. He returned to England in 1684. So much was he in favor with James II. that, after the revolution, he was more than once arrested on suspicion of plotting to restore the exiled monarch; but he at length succeeded in establishing his innocence. The rest of his life was passed in tranquillity. D. July 30, 1718.

—JOHN, a signer of the declaration of American independence, was b. in Virginia, in 1719, received a common school education, and after studying the profession, was licensed as a practitioner of law. He removed to North Carolina, and was a delegate to congress from that state. D. 1788.

PENNANT, THOMAS, an antiquary and naturalist, was b. 1726, at the family seat of Downing, in Flintshire; was educated at Queen's and Oriel colleges, Oxford; became a fellow of the Royal Society, and of various other learned bodies; travelled in Great Britain and on various parts of the Continent. Among his numerous works may be mentioned his "Literary Life," "British Zoology," "A Tour in Scotland," "Arctic Zoology," "A View of Hindostan," "Outlines of the Globe," "An Account of London," and various tours. D. 1798.

PEPPERELL, Sir WILLIAM, lieutenant-general in the British service, was b. in Maine, and engaged in commercial pursuits. He was early appointed an officer in the militia, and for his services in commanding the successful expedition against Louisburg, was rewarded by the king with the dignity of a baronet. His courage and activity were much admired by the colonies. D. 1759.

PEPYS, SAMUEL, was b. at Brampton, in Huntingdonshire; was educated at St. Paul's school, and at Magdalen college, Cambridge; was patronized by his relative, Montague, afterwards earl of Sandwich; and accompanied him, as secretary, in the fleet that was sent to bring back Charles II. During the whole of the reigns of Charles II. and James II., with but one short interval, he was secretary of the admiralty, in which capacity he introduced many important improvements into the navy. He resigned after the revolution. For ten years he was president of the Royal Society. He wrote "Memoirs of the Navy;" but his most interesting work is his own "Diary," which has recently been published. D. 1793.

PERCEVAL, JOHN, first earl of Egmont, was b. at Barton, in Yorkshire, in 1683. At the accession of George I. he was created Baron Perceval, and in 1733 was made earl of Egmont. He was a principal promoter of the settlement of Georgia, in America, and d. in 1748. —JOHN, his son, second earl of Egmont, was b. at Westminster, in 1711; filled a situation in the household of the prince of Wales, and that of joint postmaster-general; was in 1762 created an English peer by the title of Lord Lovel and Holland; was made first lord of the admiralty in 1763; and d. in 1770. —SPENCER, second son of the preceding, was b. in 1762, was educated at Harrow and Cambridge, practised as a chancery barrister, and attached himself at his onset in political life to the system of Mr. Pitt, who brought him into parliament for Northampton. Mr. Perceval's knowledge of finance opened to him a field for promotion; he was appointed one of the counsellors for the crown, and soon became solicitor-general, and, in 1802, attorney-general. He advocated the union of England with Ireland, but was against concession to the Catholics; in short, he was a firm supporter of the measures of ministers during the life of Pitt, and sat on the opposition side during the administration of Fox; at whose decease, in 1807, he obtained a place in the cabinet as chancellor of the exchequer, and also that of chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster. He was supposed to have the lead in the cabinet, although he did not then hold the office of first lord of the treasury, but to this he succeeded at the death of the duke of Portland in 1809. Mr. Perceval kept his exalted station only a short period, for on the 11th of May, 1812, he was shot on entering the lobby of the house of commons, by a person named Bellingham, who avowed that he had been waiting with the view of destroying Lord Leveson Gower, late ambassador to the court of St. Petersburg.

PERCIVAL, THOMAS, a physician and miscellaneous writer, was b. in 1740, at Warrington, in Lancashire; studied at Edinburgh and Leyden; and settled at Manchester, where he founded a scientific society. Among his works are "Medical Ethics," "Moral and Literary Dissertations," and "A Father's Instructions to his Children." D. 1804.

PERCY, THOMAS, an eminent prelate, related to the Northumberland family, was b. 1728, at Bridgenorth; was educated at Christ-church, Oxford; became chaplain to the king in 1769, dean of Carlisle in 1778, and bishop of Dromore in 1782. Of his works the principal are, "The Hermit of Warkworth," a poem; a "New Translation of Solomon's Song;" and the "Reliques of English Poetry." D. 1811.—PETER FRANCIS, a celebrated French military surgeon, was b. 1754, at Montagney; was head surgeon to several of the French armies; introduced many improvements into surgical practice, and received from Napoleon the title of baron and commander of the legion of honor. Among his works are, "The Army Surgeon's Manual," and "Practical Surgical Pyrotechny." D. 1825.

PEREFIXE, HARDOUIN DE BEAUMONT DE, a French historian and divine, was b. 1605, at Paris; studied at Poitiers and his native city; and, after having acquired great popularity as a preacher, was appointed preceptor to Louis XIV. in 1644. In 1648 he was raised to the see of Rhodéz, and, in 1662, was made archbishop of Paris. His principal work is "The Life of Henry IV.," which is the best history of that monarch, and has been translated into every foreign language. D. 1670.

PEREIRE, JACOB RODRIGUEZ, a native of Estremadura, in Spain, was the first who practised in France the art of teaching the deaf and dumb. His method of instruction was quite different to that of the Abbé l'Épée; but it was considered so good that Louis XV. bestowed on him a pension of 500 francs. He wrote several treatises on the subject, and d. in 1780.

PERGOLESE, JOHN BAPTIST, an eminent musical composer, was b. in 1704, at Casoria. He was a pupil of Gaetano Greco, and was afterwards improved by the lessons of Vinci and Hasse. For a considerable part of his short life his compositions were not popular; but he at length acquired, and still retains, a high reputation. Among his principal works are, the justly celebrated "Stabat Mater;" a Mass and Vespers, written for the duke of Matelon; "Olimpiade," an opera; and the "Salva Regina," which was his last production. D. 1737.

PERICLES, an illustrious Athenian orator, warrior, and statesman, was b. between 490 and 500 B. C., and received the lessons of Zeno, Damon, and Anaxagoras. In opposition to Cimon, he espoused the popular cause, and he acquired a wonderful ascendancy over the minds of his countrymen. For forty years he was at the head of affairs in Athens, during which period he increased the military glory of the state, and embellished the capital with many magnificent edifices. D. 429 B. C.

PERIER, JAMES CONSTANTINE, an able French mechanist, was b. 1742, at Paris, and became a member of the Academy of Sciences. He and his brother, who was a partner with him, were the greatest manufacturers in France of machinery, particularly of steam-engines, and at one period had no less than ninety-three establishments. He wrote an "Essay on Steam-Engines;" and some essays in the "Transactions of the Academy." D. 1818.—CASIMIR, a celebrated French banker, and subsequently a statesman, was b. at Grenoble, in 1777. He at first entered the army, and served with reputation in the campaigns of Italy, (1799 and 1800,) but on the death of his father, a respectable merchant, abandoned the profession of arms for commercial business. In 1802 he established a banking house in company with his brother, Scipio Perier, in the management of which he acquired an intimate acquaintance with the most difficult and important questions of public credit and finance. At the revolution of 1830 he took a decided part in favor of the national liberties, was subsequently chosen president of the chambers, and finally formed one of the first cabinet of the new king, without holding the portfolio of any department. In March, 1831, he succeeded Lafitte as president of the council; and d. of cholera, in May, 1832.

PERON, FRANCIS, a French naturalist and voyager, was b. 1775, at Cerilly; entered the army in 1792, and served till 1795, during which period he was made prisoner and lost an eye; studied medicine and natural history after his discharge; and was appointed, in 1800, zoologist to the expedition which was sent to the Australian ocean. He is the author of a Narrative of his Voyage, and of "Observations on Anthropology." D. 1810.

PEROUSE, JOHN FRANCIS GALIUP DE LA, a French navigator, was b. 1741, at Albi, and entered into the naval service at an early age. In 1782 he commanded an expedition against the British settlements in Hudson's bay. He was dispatched, in 1785, with two vessels, on a voyage of discovery; and in March, 1788, he sent home an account of his progress. From that period, however, nothing more was heard of him, though vain attempts were made to ascertain his fate. Chance has, at length, recently brought to light that both his vessels were lost on different islands of the New Hebrides.

PERRAULT, CLAUDE, a celebrated French architect, was b. in 1613, at Paris, and was originally brought up to the medical profession, which, however, he abandoned for architecture, and became a member of the Academy of Sciences. The attacks which Boileau made upon him disgraced only the satirist. Perrault was a man of great genius, and his front of the Louvre is one of the noblest architectural productions of modern times. He translated "Vitruvius;" and wrote various works. D. 1688.—CHARLES, brother of the foregoing, was b. 1628, at Paris. He practised for some time at the bar, but quitted it for an office under his brother Peter, who was receiver-general of the finances of Paris. Subsequently he rose to be comptroller-general of the royal buildings. He contributed to the founding of the academies of Inscriptions, of the Sciences, and of Painting, Sculpture, and Architecture. His principal works are, "Eulogies of Illustrious Men;" and a "Parallel between the Ancients and the Moderns," the last of which drew upon him the satire of Boileau. The well-known "Fairy Tales" were also written by Perrault. D. 1703.

PERRONET, JOHN RODOLPH, a celebrated French civil engineer, was b. in 1708, at Surene, and became a member of many learned societies. Among his works are, the canal of Burgundy, and thirteen bridges. Of his bridges the finest are those of Neuilli, Nemours, Pont Saint Maxenee, and Louis XVI. at Paris. That of Neuilli was the first example of an horizontal bridge. D. 1794.

PERRY, JAMES, an able whig political writer, b. in 1756, at Aberdeen; was educated at the high school and university of his native place; settled in London in 1777, and was engaged as a writer in "The General Advertiser and London Evening Post." In 1782 he established "The European Magazine," the management of which he quitted at the end of a year, to become editor of "The Gazetteer." He afterwards purchased "The Morning Chronicle," of which he continued to be the sole proprietor till his decease; and he raised it to eminence among the public journals. D. 1821.—OLIVER HAZARD, an American naval officer, was b. in Rhode Island, 1785. Entering the navy in 1798, he served in the Mediterranean in the expedition against Tripoli, and distinguished himself in the late war with Great Britain, by obtaining a splendid victory over a superior force on Lake Erie. For this exploit he was raised to the rank of captain. He commanded the Java in the expedition to the Mediterranean under Commodore Decatur. D. 1820.

PERSIUS FLACCUS, AULUS, a Roman satirist, was b. 34, at Volterra; studied at Rome, and imbibed the Stoic philosophy from Cornutus; was intimate with Lucan, Seneca, and other eminent men; and d. in his 28th year. His six satires, animated and often beautiful, but also often obscure, have been translated into English by Dryden, Brewster, Drummond, Howes, and Gifford.

PERTINAX, PUBLIUS HELVIUS, a Roman emperor, was b. 126, at Villa Martis. After having signalized himself in arms, particularly against the Germans, and filled various important offices, among which were those of consul and proconsul in Africa, he was raised to the throne on the death of Commodus. He began his reign by restoring discipline and reforming abuses; but he was murdered in 193, by the praetorian guards, after having held the imperial dignity only eighty-seven days.

PERUGINO, PETER, an eminent painter, whose real name was VANUCCI, was b. 1446, at Citta della Pieve. He was the master of Raphael, who has introduced him in his picture of the "School of Athens." Perugino was suspicious and avaricious, and Vasari charges him with an utter want of religion. As a painter he has high merit. D. 1524.

PESCENNIUS NIGER, CAIUS, a Roman emperor, a native of Aquino, of a considerable family, was appointed governor of Syria, and commander of the legions in Asia, by Commodus. On the death of Pertinax, the troops of Pescennius proclaimed him emperor, in 193, but he was opposed by Severus. After having been defeated at Issus, in 195, he was killed by some soldiers, while he was on his flight to the Parthian dominions. His virtues rendered him worthy of a happier fate.

PËSTALOZZI, HENRY, celebrated for having introduced a new method of education, was b. 1745, at Zurich. After having studied theology and jurisprudence, he relinquished his views with respect to the church and the bar, to cultivate his own small property. Witnessing the wretchedness of the peasantry, he became anxious to ameliorate their situation by cultivating their mental faculties. In the pursuit of his benevolent purpose he published several works, and considerably injured his fortune. It was not till 1798, however, that his plans were patronized by the Helvetic government. Under that patronage, he, for several years conducted an institution, which acquired extensive celebrity. D. 1827.

PETER THE HERMIT, memorable as having been the author of the Crusades, was b. at Amiens, about the middle of the 11th century. He quitted the profession of arms to become a hermit, in which capacity he made, about 1093, a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. Indignant at the insults to which the Christians were subjected, he originated the plan of expelling the Infidels from Palestine. History has recorded the success with which he preached it after his return to Europe. He led the first irregular band of crusaders, but he displayed little talent, and most of his followers were destroyed. D. 1115, abbot of New Moutier, in the territory of Liege.

PETER I. ALEXIEVITCH, surnamed THE GREAT, czar of Russia, was b. 1672. In 1682 he succeeded to a share in the crown, and, in 1696, obtained the sole authority on the death of his brother Ivan. At an early period he began to form projects for the civilization and aggrandizement of his empire. Military and naval improvements were the first objects of his efforts, and he was ably seconded by his confidant and counselor, Lefort, a native of Geneva. He twice travelled, in 1697 and 1716, to acquire knowledge, and, in the course of his first journey, he worked as a shipwright in the dockyard at Saardam. From all quarters he likewise invited men of talent and mechanical skill to settle in Russia. In 1700 he entered upon a war with Sweden, which lasted till 1721. At the commencement of it he was repeatedly defeated, at Narva and other places, but he at length acquired the ascendancy, gained a decisive victory at Pultowa, in 1709, and wrested several provinces from the Swedes. On part of the territory thus conquered he founded St. Petersburg. In 1711, however, he was less fortunate against the Turks, by whom he was surrounded on the banks of the Pruth, and compelled to sign an ignominious peace. Against Persia he was successful, in 1723, and obliged that power to make extensive cessions to him. But amidst all his glory his latter years were clouded by domestic infelicity; his wife, Catharine, was more than suspected of being unfaithful to him; and his son, Alexis, was disobedient. The former he spared; the latter he brought to trial, and is believed to have put to death in prison. D. 1725.

PETERBOROUGH, CHARLES MORDAUNT, earl of, the son of Lord Mordaunt, was b. in 1658; distinguished himself against the Moors at Tangier, in 1680; contributed to the revolution, and was created earl of Monmouth; succeeded to the title of Peterborough in 1697; was appointed commander-in-chief of the English forces in Spain, in 1705, at the head of which he reduced Barcelona, and obtained other splendid successes, for which he was appointed generalissimo of the imperial forces; was made general of the marines, and a knight of the garter by George I.; and d. 1735.

PETERS, HUGH, a celebrated fanatic, was the son of a Cornish merchant; was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge; and, after having been on the stage, in the church, and a resident in America, took a very active part against Charles I., for which he was executed in 1660. He wrote "Discourses;" and a "Last Legacy to his Daughter."—RICHARD, an eminent judge, was b. in 1744, and received his education in the city of Philadelphia. He adopted the profession of the law, and soon obtained an extensive practice. At the commencement of hostilities with the mother country, he joined the side of the colonies, and, in 1776, was appointed by congress secretary of the board of war. His exertions in this department were highly meritorious and useful, and, on resigning the post, in 1781, he was elected a member of congress, and assisted in closing the business of the war. On the organization of the new government, he was appointed judge of the district court of Pennsylvania, and performed the duties of this office for thirty-six years. During this time he was engaged in several objects of public improvement, and issued several valuable publications in relation to agriculture. As a judge he possessed powers of a high order, and his decisions on admiralty law form the groundwork of this branch of our jurisprudence. Their principles were not only sanctioned by our own courts, but were simultaneously adopted by Lord Stowell, the distinguished maritime judge of Great Britain. D. 1828.

PÉTION, ALEXANDER, a mulatto, whose real name was SABES, was the son of a St. Domingo planter; was b. at Port au Prince, in 1770, and received a liberal education. From the commencement of the struggle between the blacks and the whites in his native island, he bore arms, and distinguished himself on various occasions. In 1807 he was elected president of the republic of Hayti, comprehending the southern and western part of St. Domingo, and this office he filled so worthily, that he was called The Father of his Country. D. 1818.

PETIS DE LA CROIX, FRANCIS, a celebrated orientalist, was b. in 1653, at Paris; was employed in negotiations with the Barbary powers, and was Arabic professor at the royal college; and d. 1713. Among his works are, "A History of Tamerlane," "Persian Tales," and "Turkish Tales."

PETIT, JOHN LEWIS, an eminent surgeon, was b. 1674, at Paris, studied anatomy under Littre, and surgery under Castel; was for some years an army and hospital surgeon, settled at Paris, gave lectures, acquired a well-merited reputation; and became director-general of the surgical school. He invented a tourniquet, and a method of extracting foreign bodies from the œsophagus; and wrote a treatise on "Diseases of the Bones," and a treatise on surgical diseases. D. 1750.

PETITOT, JOHN, an admirable painter in enamel, who so much improved that branch of the art, that he may almost be said to be the inventor of it, was b. 1607, at Geneva, and d. at Vevay, 1691. He was patronized by Charles I. of England, and afterwards, by Louis XIV. Petitot worked in conjunction with his brother-in-law Bourdier, and it is honorable to the character of both, that they lived together for half a century without the slightest disagreement.

PETRARCH, FRANCIS, one of the four greatest of the Italian poets, was b. in 1304, at Arezzo. The dissensions which distracted his country induced his father to remove to Avignon; and the first rudiments of education were received by Petrarch, at Carpentras, from Conventole. Being intended for the law, he studied it at Montpellier and Bologna. His whole soul, however, was devoted to literature; but it was not till he was in his twentieth year that the death of his father allowed him to indulge his inclination. Having settled at Avignon, he saw the beautiful Laura de Noves. Her charms inspired him with a lasting passion, the effusions of which he poured forth in those sonnets and odes which have rendered his name immortal, but which failed to gain the object of his affections. After having vainly travelled to forget or moderate his love, he settled at Vaucluse, a romantic spot, where he wrote some of his finest works. His literary reputation attracted the regard of princes; he was invited to Naples, to Paris, and to Rome; and received the laureate crown in the capitol of the latter city. Among his warmest friends and patrons was the Colonna family. In 1348 his feelings were deeply wounded by the death of Laura. He survived her, however, nearly thirty years, during all which period he was admired and honored by his own countrymen, and by foreign princes. Of all his numerous works, in prose and verse, his Italian poems alone preserve their reputation undiminished; but they are identified with literature itself, and till that is annihilated their fame is secure. D. 1374.

PFEFFEL, CHRISTIAN FREDERIC, a juriconsult and diplomatist, was b. at Colmar, in 1726. Becoming the friend of the count de Bruhl, he was employed on various diplomatic missions, and was made juriconsult to the king; but during the revolution his property was confiscated, and he was placed on the list of emigrants. He was the author of several excellent works, among which his "Abrégé Chronologique de l'Histoire, et du Droit publique d'Allemagne." D. 1807.

PHÆDRUS, JULIUS, an elegant Latin fabulist, was b. on the frontier of Thrace and Macedonia, was a slave of Augustus, by whom he was manumitted, and was persecuted by Sejanns, during the reign of Tiberius. The time of his death is not recorded. After having lain in oblivion for many centuries, his Fables were discovered by Francis Pithou, and given to the press by Peter his brother.

PHALARIS, a native of Crete, whose cruelty, and the horrid instrument with which he wreaked his vengeance on those who fell under his displeasure, have become proverbial. In 571 B. C., he made himself master of Agrigentum, in Sicily, where he was guilty of horrible cruelties. Among other instruments of destruction, he caused a hollow brazen bull to be made, so contrived, that when a fire was kindled under the body, the cries of the unhappy victim within resembled the roarings of the animal it represented. Phalaris, after commending the work, ordered Perillus, the artist, to be the first to make trial of it.

After a sanguinary reign of eight years, the citizens at length seized the tyrant, and with a severe but just retaliation consumed him by a slow fire in his own bull, 563 B. C.

PHIDIAS, one of the greatest of sculptors, an Athenian, is supposed to have been b. about 497 or 493 B. C., and to have d. 431 B. C. Little, however, is known respecting his life. Hippias is stated by some to have been his master, and Eladas by others. He executed several statues of Minerva, particularly that in the Parthenon, (the works of which temple he superintended,) a statue of Jupiter Olympus, and various other admirable productions.

PHILIDOR, FRANCIS ANDREW, a composer, was b. 1726, at Dreux; composed a great number of operas, and set Alexander's Feast, and the Carmen Seculare, to music, and d. in 1795, in London. Philidor had respectable musical talents, but he owes his fame to his consummate skill as a chess player, in which he has seldom been equalled. He wrote "The Analysis of Chess," which has passed through many editions, and may be called one of the classical works upon the game.

PHILIP II. king of Macedon, son of Amyntas II. and father of Alexander the Great, was b. 333 B. C. The art of war he learned under Epaminondas. On the death of his brother Perdiccas, he usurped the throne, at first under the guise of guardian to his infant nephew. After having repeatedly defeated the bordering powers, and enlarged his dominions by successive encroachments, he extinguished the liberties of Greece by the victory of Cheronæa. He was next appointed general of the Greeks against the Persians, and was preparing to invade Asia, when he was assassinated by Pausanias, 336 B. C.—MARCUS JULIUS, a Roman emperor, surnamed the Arab, from his being b. at Bosra, in Arabia, rose from being a common soldier to the highest rank in the army. He gained the throne, in 244, by the assassination of Gordian, and for a while his liberality rendered him popular. He was at length defeated by Decius, and was slain by his own troops in 249.

PHILLIPS, JOHN, a poet, was b. 1676, at Bampton, was educated at Winchester school and Christ-church, Oxford, and d. 1708. While at college, he wrote "The Splendid Shilling," the most popular of his works, and the poem of "Blenheim." He is the author, likewise, of "Cyder," a poem, in imitation of Virgil.—AMBROSE, a poet and dramatist, b. in Leicestershire, in the latter part of the seventeenth century; received his education, and obtained a fellowship at St. John's college, Cambridge, and became registrar of the Irish prerogative court. He wrote poems, the tragedies of "The Briton," "Humphry, Duke of Gloucester," and "The Distressed Mother," and a "Life of Archbishop Williams," and contributed to the periodical paper called the "Freethinker." His pastorals involved him in a quarrel with Pope, by whom they were insidiously attacked in the "The Guardian." D. 1749.

PHILLIPS, THOMAS, a portrait painter of considerable merit, was b. at Dudley, in Warwickshire, in 1770. Having had some initiatory practice in the country, he went to London when he was about 20, and found employment at Windsor, under Benjamin West, who was at that time engaged in decorating St. George's chapel. He was devotedly attached to his profession, but for many years he had to contend with the superior talents of West, Lawrence, Hoppner, &c., who were in their zenith; but by unceasing application, and a laudable emulation which never forsook him, he gained so much celebrity, as to number among his sitters some of the most eminent men in the kingdom. He also wrote many occasional essays on the fine arts; and, in co-operation with Turner, Chantrey, Robertson, and others, he planned and successively matured the Artists' General Benevolent Institution. D. 1845.

PHILO, JUDÆUS, a learned Jewish writer of Alexandria, who was one of the deputation sent by the Jews to lay their complaints against the Greeks of Alexandria before the emperor Caligula, A. D. 40. He wrote several works in Greek, the principal of which is entitled, "Of the Contemplative Life."—Of Byzantium, an architect, who flourished 300 B. C. He wrote a treatise on the machines used in war; and there is also attributed to him a piece, entitled "De Septem Orbis Spectaculis."

PHILOLAUS, of Crotona, a celebrated Pythagorean philosopher, who flourished 376 B. C. He belonged to the Pythagorean school, and by some is supposed to have written the "Golden Verses of Pythagoras." He is also said to have first taught the true system of the universe, revived by Copernicus, but this supposition is erroneous.

PHILOPÆMEN, a celebrated general, who has been called the last of the Greeks, was b. 223 B. C., at Megalopolis, in Acadia; became generalissimo of the Archæan league; reduced the Spartans to a tributary state, dismantled Sparta, and abolished the laws of Lycurgus; but was at length taken prisoner in a battle with the Messenians, and was put to death by poison, 183 B. C.

PHILOCLON, an Athenian, illustrious for his virtues no less than for his talents, was b. about 400 B. C., of an obscure family. Plato and Xenocrates were his masters in philosophy. Forty-five times he was placed at the head of the Athenian armies, and on all occasions displayed bravery and skill. He was, however, a lover of peace, and he discouraged hostile proceedings against the Macedonians, because he was convinced that circumstances were such as to render success hopeless. In probity and disinterestedness he was never surpassed. He was, nevertheless, condemned to die by poison, 318 B. C., and was even denied a grave in his own country. When the madness of popular passion had subsided, the Athenians raised a statue to his memory, and put his accuser to death.

PIAZZI, JOSEPH, a celebrated astronomer, was b. 1746, at Ponte, in the Valteline; entered into the order of the Theatins, and, after having been a professor at Genoa, Malta, and Ravenna, was invited to Palermo, in 1780, to fill the professorship of the higher branches of mathematics. At Palermo he obtained the establishment of an observatory, and entered into a correspondence with the most eminent European astronomers. He made a new catalogue of stars, containing seven thousand six hundred and forty-six, and, on the 1st of January, 1801, discovered an eighth planet, to which he gave the name of Ceres Ferdinandea. He is the author of "Astronomical Lessons" and of various other scientific works. D. 1826.

PICARD, JOHN, an able French astronomer and mathematician, was b. in 1620, at La Flèche, in Anjou, became astronomer to the Academy of Sciences at Paris, and made a voyage to Uraniburg to ascertain the exact longitude and latitude of that observatory. He was the first who observed the phosphoric light in the barometric vacuum, and applied the telescope to quadrants. He edited the "Connoissance des Temps, from 1679 to 1683;" and wrote a narrative of his voyage, and other works. D. 1684.—LOUIS BENEDICT, a celebrated French dramatist and romance writer, was b. 1769, at Paris, and d. there 1824. For many years he was also a popular actor. He wrote nearly a hundred dramatic pieces, most of which were crowned with success. His romances, among which may be mentioned "The History of Gabriel Desordry," "The Gil Blas of the Revolution," and "The Confessions of Laurence Giffard," are inferior to his comedies.

PICART, BERNARD, an engraver, the son of Stephen, who was of the same profession, was b. 1663, at Paris; acquired an early reputation for designing as well as engraving, and settled in Holland with his father. Among his best works are, "The Massacre of the Innocents," "Time discovering Truth," and "The Arcadian Shepherds." He also executed the plates for the "Religious Ceremonies of all Nations." D. 1733.

PICCINI, NICHOLAS, an eminent composer, was b. 1721, at Bari, and studied under Leo and Durante, of the latter of which masters he was the favorite pupil. He began his career in 1754, and soon acquired an extensive reputation by his compositions, particularly by his "La Buona," "Figliuola," and "Olympia." After a residence of nearly twenty years at Rome, he was invited to Paris. His subsequent life was checkered with much vexation and ill fortune. D. 1800.

PICCOLOMINI, OCTAVIUS, a leader of the imperial armies, one of the most distinguished generals of the thirty years' war, was b. in Italy, in 1599, and made his first military essays in that country, in the Spanish army. He passed into the service of the emperor, and rendered himself conspicuous for bravery and talent, at Lutzen, Nordlingen, and many other battles. Returning to the Spanish colors, he was appointed commander-in-chief in the Netherlands, but was soon recalled by the emperor, and was made field-marshal. His subsequent exploits gained for him the title of prince. D. 1656.

PICHEGRU, CHARLES, one of the most celebrated generals produced by the wars of the French revolution, was b. of poor parents, in 1761, at Arbois, in Franche Comté; was educated by the monks of that town; and was a tutor to the mathematical and philosophical classes at the college of Brienne, when Bonaparte was a student there. He entered into the artillery as a private soldier, and rose to be adjutant before 1789. Subsequent to the revolution he rapidly attained the rank of general of division. After having commanded the army of the Rhine, he was placed, in February, 1794, at the head of the army of the North. He defeated the allies in several actions, and soon achieved the conquest of the Netherlands and of Holland. But, in 1795, while general of the army of the Rhine, he sullied his fame by entering into negotiations with the exiled Bourbons. In 1797 he was elected a member of the council of five hundred, and was chosen president of that body. He was one of those who were transported to Cayenne by the directory, after its triumph in September; but he contrived to make his escape to England. In 1804, in conjunction with Georges and others, he visited Paris, for the purpose of attempting the overthrow of the consular government. He was arrested, and committed to the Temple; and was found dead in his bed, by strangulation.

PICHLER, CAROLINE, one of the most prolific writers that Germany has produced, was b. at Vienna, 1769. Her maiden name was Greiner. Her father held a high position at the court of Vienna; and his house was long celebrated for its reunions of all that was most distinguished in that metropolis for rank, fashion, and genius. She received a first-rate education, and showed an early predilection for literary pursuits; but it was not till after she had attained her 30th year that she appeared as an authoress, her first work, called the "Gleichnisse," being published in 1799. This was followed from time to time by various other works of considerable merit; but these were all thrown into the shade by her "Agathocles," which appeared in 1808, and was written with the view of counteracting Gibbon's attacks upon the Christian faith. Her works amount to more than 60 volumes, consisting chiefly of dramas and historical romances; of which may be mentioned the "Grafen von Hohenberg," "Die Belagerung Wien's von 1683," "Die Schweden in Prag," "Die Wiedereroberung von Ofen," "Henriette von England," "Die Frauenwürde," and the "Nebenbuhler," &c. D. 1843.

PICKERING, TIMOTHY, an American statesman, was b. at Salem, in 1748, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1763. He took an active part in the popular cause, and, in organizing the provisional government of Massachusetts in 1775, was appointed a judge of the court of common pleas for Essex, and sole judge of the maritime court for the middle district. During the war he was appointed adjutant-general, and subsequently a member of the board of war. From 1790 to 1798, at different intervals, he was employed on various negotiations with the Indians. He was successively postmaster-general, secretary of war, and secretary of state. From the last office he was removed by President Adams in 1800. From 1803 to 1811 he was a senator in congress from his native state, and from 1814 to 1817 a representative in that body. In public life he was distinguished for firmness, energy, activity, and disinterestedness. D. 1829.

PICTET DE RICHEMONT, CHARLES, was b. in 1755, at Geneva; spent several years in the military service; retired to his estate, where he devoted himself to farming and literature; and was employed in 1815 as negotiator for Switzerland at Paris, Vienna, and Berlin. He conducted (in conjunction with his brother and M. Maurice) "The Britannie Library;" translated various works from the English; and published "A Course of Agriculture," and other productions on the same subject. D. 1824.

PIERCE, EDWARD, an English painter in the reign of Charles I. and II. He was eminent in history and landscapes; but as his works chiefly consisted of altar-pieces and ceilings of churches, there are few of his pictures in existence, most of them having been destroyed in the fire of London. One of his sons was an excellent sculptor, and executed the statues of Sir Thomas Gresham and Edward III., which ornamented the royal exchange before it was destroyed by fire, Jan. 10, 1838.

PIGAFETTA, ANTHONY, a voyager of the 16th century, was one of the eighteen companions of Magellan, who survived the voyage, and returned to Seville, in 1522. In 1524 he was made a knight of Rhodes. He wrote a narrative of the voyage, the MS. of which was supposed to be lost, but was discovered, some years ago, in the Ambrosian library at Milan.

PIGALLE, JOHN BAPTIST, an eminent sculptor, was b. in 1714, at Paris; studied at Rome; became a sculptor to the French monarch, and a knight of the order of St. Michael. Among his best works are, the monument of Marshal Saxe, Love and Friendship, and statues of Silence, Mercury, and Venus. D. 1785.

PIGNOTTI, LAURENCE, an Italian poet and historian, was b. at Figliena, in Tuscany, in 1739; was educated at Arezzo and Pisa; practised as a physician at Florence; was created historiographer of the court, and became rector of the university of Pisa. His "Fables" have acquired an extensive popularity, but his great fame was acquired by his "History of Tuscany." D. 1812.

PIKLER, or PICHLER, JOHN, the most able gem engraver of the age, was b. in 1734, at Naples, and was the son of JOHN ANTHONY, who was also celebrated for his skill in the same art. He was knighted by Joseph II. His works are numerous, and highly valued. D. 1791.

PILKINGTON, JAMES, an English bishop, was b. at Rivington, in Lancashire, in 1520, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, of which he became master. During the persecution under Mary, he was obliged to leave the kingdom, but on the accession of Elizabeth he was made bishop of Durham, and d. in 1575. He wrote some valuable "Commentaries on the Scriptures."—LETITIA, the daughter of Dr. Van Lewen, a physician of Dublin, was b. in 1712. She became the wife of the Rev. Matthew Pilkington, from whom she was separated on account of the irregularity of her conduct. After this she settled in London, where she subsisted partly by writing, and partly by the bounty of her friends. She wrote "The Roman Father," a tragedy; and "The Turkish Court, or London Apprentice," a comedy; "Memoirs of her Life;" and various poems, &c. D. 1750.

PILPAY, an oriental fabulist, was a Brahmin of Hindostan, and counsellor to one of the rajahs. He is said to have flourished 2000 years before the Christian era. His fables were translated from the Persian into French, by Galland, in 1714.

PINCKNEY, CHARLES COTESWORTH, a distinguished officer of the revolutionary army, was b. in South Carolina, received his education in England, and studied law in the Temple. On returning to his native province in 1769, he devoted himself to the successful practice of his profession. On the commencement of hostilities he renounced law for the study of military tactics, and was soon promoted to the command of the first regiment of Carolina infantry. He was subsequently aid-de-camp to Washington, and in this capacity at the battles of Brandywine and Germantown. On the surrender of Charleston he was taken prisoner, and remained so till all opportunity of gaining fresh reputation in the field had passed. He was a member of the convention which formed the federal constitution, and in 1796 was appointed minister to France. When preparations were making for war on account of the expected French invasion, Mr. Pinckney was nominated a major general, but he soon had an opportunity of retiring to the quiet of private life. He was afterwards president of the Cincinnati society of the United States. D. 1825.

PINDAR, the greatest of lyric poets, was b. about 522 B. C., near Thebes, in Bœotia, and is believed to have d. about 442 B. C. He was patronized by Theron of Agrigentum, and Hiero of Syracuse, at the court of which latter prince he is said to have resided during the closing years of his existence. Little, however, is known of his real history. Of his works which were numerous, and in various kinds of composition, time has spared only four books of Odes; but what it has spared is amply sufficient to vindicate his claim to be ranked among the most illustrious of ancient bards.

PINEL, PHILIP, an eminent French physician, was b. in 1742, at St. Paul, in the department of the Taru; practised with distinguished success at Paris, particularly in cases of insanity; introduced the most important improvements into the mode of treating insane patients; acquired great popularity by his lectures. Among his works are, "A Medico-philosophical Treatise on Mental Alienation," "Philosophical Nosography," and "Clinical Medicine." D. 1826.

PINGRE, ALEXANDER GUY, an able astronomer, was b. in 1711, at Paris; was originally an ecclesiastic, and began the study of astronomy at a late period; and made a voyage, in 1760, to Isle Rodriguez, to observe the transit of Venus, and three subsequent voyages, to try the chronometers of Berthoud and Le Roy. The most important of his works is his "Cometography, or Historical and Theoretical Treatise on Comets." D. 1796.

PINKERTON, JOHN, a fertile but eccentric author, was b. in 1753, in Edinburgh. He was educated at Lanark grammar school, and served five years as clerk to an attorney; after which he settled in London, and gave himself up to literature. He began his career by poetical productions, among which were, Rhymes, Odes, and Tales, but he did not rise above mediocrity. In emulation of Chatterton he also produced two volumes of pretended ancient Scottish poems. One of his earliest works was "Letters on Literature," under the assumed name of "Robert Heron," in which he displayed a degree of vanity and impudence which has seldom been equalled. In his latter years he took up his abode in France. Among the works of this indefatigable writer are, an excellent "Essay on Medals," "The Treasury of Wit," "A Dissertation on the Origin of the Scythians and Goths," "A History of Scotland," "Iconographia Scotica," "Modern Geography," "A Collection of Voyages and Travels," "Recollections of Paris," and "Petralogy, or a Treatise on Rocks."

PINKNEY, WILLIAM, an eloquent lawyer and statesman, was b. in Maryland, in 1765, and prepared himself for the bar under the instruction of Judge Chase. He was admitted to practice in 1786, and soon gave indications of possessing superior powers. He was a member of the convention of Maryland which ratified the federal constitution. In 1776 he was appointed one of the commissioners under the British treaty. The state of Maryland also employed him to procure a settlement of its claims on the bank of England, and he recovered for it the sum of 800,000 dollars. This detained him in England till the year 1804, when he returned and resumed his professional labors. In 1806 he was sent as envoy extraordinary to London, and in 1808 received the authority of minister plenipotentiary. He returned to the United States in 1811, and soon after was appointed attorney-general. This office he held till 1814. During the incursion of the British into Maryland, he commanded a battalion, and was wounded in the battle of Bladensburg, in August, 1814. He was afterwards representative in congress, minister plenipotentiary to Russia, envoy to Naples, and in 1819 senator in congress. In the last office he continued till his death in 1822.—EDWARD COATE, son of the foregoing, was b. in London, in 1802, passed his infancy in England, and was placed as a student in Baltimore college at the age of 10 or 11. He entered the navy as a midshipman, and continued in the service for several years. On the death of his father he quitted the navy and devoted himself to the practice of the law. He published, in 1825, a volume of poems, which possess much beauty. D. 1828.

PINZON, VINCENT YANEZ, a Spanish

navigator, accompanied Columbus on his memorable voyage; was the first European who crossed the line; discovered Brazil and the river Amazon; was appointed one of the royal pilots; and d. in the early part of the 16th century.

PIOMBO, SEBASTIANO DEL, an eminent painter, b. at Venice, in 1485. He renounced music, of which he was very fond, for painting, and studied under Bellini, but afterwards took the fine coloring of Giorgione as a model. The delicacy of his pencil was much admired, and Michael Angelo encouraged him to enter into competition with Raphael, and even supplied him with designs, which Piombo often executed very happily, although by no means capable of lofty conceptions or sublime inventions. His greatest work is his "Resurrection of Lazarus," now in the British national gallery. D. 1547.

PIOZZI, HESTER LYNCH, a miscellaneous writer, whose maiden name was Salisbury, was b. 1739, at Bodvel, and was united, in 1763, to Mr. Thrale, an opulent brewer. For many years Dr. Johnson was the intimate friend of her and her husband. After the death of Mr. Thrale she accepted the addresses of Signor Piozzi; an act which occasioned a dissolution of her friendship with Johnson. For a considerable period she resided at Florence with her second husband, and while there she contributed to the "Florence Miscellany." Among her works are, "Anecdotes of Dr. Johnson," "Observations in a Journey through France, Italy, and Germany," "British Synonymy," and "Retrospection." D. 1821.

PIRANESI, JOHN BAPTIST, an eminent engraver and antiquary, was b. 1707, at Rome, in which city he d. 1778. Piranesi was one of the most indefatigable of artists, and his talents were equal to his industry.—FRANCIS, a son of the foregoing, and the inheritor of his genius, was b. 1748, at Rome. The magnificent works begun by his father he continued with such a kindred spirit that the labors of the parent and son cannot be distinguished from each other; and he executed many others of equal magnitude. D. 1810.

PIRON, ALEXIS, a French poet, dramatist, and wit, was b. 1689, at Dijon, and was about to become a barrister, when family misfortunes compelled him, not very reluctantly, to relinquish the bar. He went to Paris, and for a while earned a scanty subsistence as a copyist. To write for the stage was his next resource. He began by composing pieces for the theatre of the Comic Opera, and "Harlequin Deucalion" was his first effort. In 1728 he tried the regular drama, and produced the comedy of "The Ungrateful Son." It was not, however, till 1738, that he gained a place among the highest class of dramatists, by his admirable comedy of "Metromania," which is justly considered as a masterpiece. D. 1773.

PISISTRATUS, an Athenian, who flourished in the 5th century before the Christian era, and was distinguished for eloquence and valor. He thrice obtained the sovereign authority at Athens. Twice he was expelled, and in the last instance he remained eleven years in exile, before he could again seize the reins of power. Though bearing the name of a tyrant, Pisistratus was just and liberal. He established a public library at Athens, and collected the poems of Homer in their present form. D. 527 B. C.

PITT, CHRISTOPHER, an elegant poet, was b. in 1699, at Blandford; was educated at Winchester and at New college, Oxford; and obtained, in 1722, the living of Pimperne, which he held till his decease, in 1748. His Poems have considerable merit; and his translations of the "Æneid" and of "Vida's Art of Poetry," are of a superior kind.—WILLIAM, a celebrated statesman, the second son of the great earl of Chatham, was b. May 28, 1759, at Hayes, in Kent. The earlier part of his education he received at home, under the watchful superintendence of his father, who spared no pains to cultivate his talents, and especially to give him habits of self-possession and of public speaking. At the age of 14 he went to Pembroke hall, Cambridge. In 1780, after having studied at Lincoln's Inn, he was called to the bar, but he only once or twice went to the western circuit. He was destined to move in a higher sphere. Early in 1781 he was returned to parliament for the borough of Appleby, and immediately became one of the most distinguished members of the opposition. He began political life as the friend of parliamentary reform. While the earl of Shelburne was in office, Pitt was chancellor of the exchequer. The triumph of the coalition displaced him for a while; but, on the downfall of their administration, he returned to power as prime minister. In vain the house of commons endeavored to effect his expulsion; the parliament was dissolved; and a general election gave him an overwhelming majority. From 1786 till 1801, he continued to hold the reins of government, during one of the most stormy periods of our history; and his admirers have conferred on him the title of "the pilot that weathered the storm." He resigned in 1801; but resumed his post in 1804, and held it till his decease, which took place on the 23d of January, 1806. His dissolution is believed to have been hastened by the disastrous result of the continental coalition in 1805. With respect to pecuniary considerations no man was ever more disinterested and incorrupt, and he d. poor. In eloquence he rivalled some of the most illustrious of the ancient orators. As a finance minister he possessed great abilities, though the policy of some of his measures is more than doubtful; but in the conduct of a war he did not shine, for his plans were neither grandly conceived nor vigorously executed.

PITTACUS, one of the seven sages of Greece, who was a warrior as well as a philosopher, was b. about 650 B. C., at Mitylene, in the island of Lesbos; expelled the tyrant Melanchrus from Lesbos; governed wisely for ten years; and d. 570 B. C.

PIUS VI., whose secular name was JOHN ANGELO BRASCHI, was b. at Cesena, in 1717. His first act was to make a reform in the public treasury; he then completed the museum in the Vatican; but the greatest work of his pontificate was the draining of the Pontine marshes,—a project that baffled several of the emperors, and many of the popes. When Bonaparte entered Italy, he made the pope prisoner in the capital, which was plundered. The venerable pontiff was carried away by the victors, and hurried over the Alps to Valence, where he d. of excessive fatigue and ill-usage, 1799.—VII., or GREGORY BARNABAS CHIARAMONTI, the successor of the preceding pontiff, was b. at Cesena, in 1740. He was raised to the cardinalate in 1785; and when Bonaparte entered Imola, in 1796, the cardinal, who was also bishop of that see, found means to conciliate the favor of the French general, and thereby paved the way for his elevation to the papacy in 1800. In July, 1801, he signed the concordat; and in 1804 he crowned Napoleon at Paris, but refused to perform the same office for Louis XVIII. Notwithstanding the courtesy which he showed to Bonaparte, the latter seized the pope in 1809, and imprisoned him at Fontainebleau, where he remained till the downfall of his oppressor in 1814, when he returned to Rome to resume his authority. D. 1828. —VIII., by name FRANCIS XAVIERO CASTIGLIONI, was b. at Cingolia, in 1761, was made bishop of Montalto in 1800, created cardinal in 1816, was elected pope on the death of Leo XII., in 1829, and d. in the following year.

PIZARRO, FRANCIS, the conqueror of Peru, was b. in 1475, at Truxillo, in Estremadura, and was the natural son of a gentleman. His father did not even teach him to read, but employed him to keep the hogs at his country house. Having lost one of them, Pizarro took flight, and embarked for Spanish America. There he first distinguished himself, in 1513, under Nunez de Balboa. In 1524, in conjunction with Almagro, he discovered Peru. Charles V. gave him the government of the new-found country. By force and fraud he achieved the conquest of Peru, in 1532. In 1537 a contest arose between Pizarro and Almagro, which terminated in the defeat and execution of the latter. The son of Almagro, however, avenged his father, for, in 1541, he and some of his friends assassinated Pizarro, in his palace at Lima.

PLATO, an illustrious Grecian philosopher, the founder of the academic sect, was styled the Divine by the ancients; was b. 430 B. C., in the island of Ægina; was educated with the utmost care; and, at the age of 20, became the disciple of Socrates. After the death of Socrates, Plato visited Magna Græcia and Egypt, in search of knowledge. On his return to Athens, he opened a philosophical school, and soon numbered among his pupils many distinguished characters. Plato thrice visited the court of Sicily; once invited by the elder Dionysius, and twice by the younger. The former he so much offended, that the tyrant caused him to be seized on his passage home and sold for a slave; and the philosopher was indebted for his liberation to Anicercis of Cyrene. D. 347 B. C.

PLAUTUS, so called, it is supposed, from his feet being deformed, but whose real name was MARCUS ACCIUS, was one of the most celebrated of the Roman comic writers; was b. 227 B. C., at Sarsina, in Umbria; and is believed to have been the son of a slave. The fortune which he gained by his dramatic talents, he is said to have lost in commerce, and to have been reduced to work at a mill. D. 184 B. C.

PLAYFAIR, JOHN, an eminent mathematician and natural philosopher, was b. in 1749, at Dundee, was educated at St. Andrew's, resigned a living, and became mathematical professor at Edinburgh, and d. 1819. Playfair was celebrated as a geologist, and a strenuous defender of the Huttonian system. Among his works are, "Elements of Geometry," "Outlines of Philosophy," "Illustrations of the Huttonian Theory," and a "System of Geography." —WILLIAM, an ingenious projector and author, a brother of the foregoing, was b. 1759, at Dundee, was originally apprenticed to a millwright, was for some time a draughtsman at the Soho manufactory, obtained patents for various inventions, engaged in many speculations, and became a fertile writer upon politics and other subjects. Among his works are, "Statistical Tables," "The Statistical Breviary," "The Commercial and Political Atlas," "History of Jacobinism," "British Family Antiquity," "Political Portraits," and "France as it is." D. 1823.

PLINY THE ELDER, or CAIUS PLINIUS SECUNDUS, a celebrated Roman writer, was b. 23, at Verona, or, as some say, at Como, served in the army in Germany, and afterwards became an advocate, was a member of the college of augurs, and procurator in Spain and Africa, and was suffocated 79, while in command of the fleet at Misenum, in consequence of his having approached too near to Vesuvius, in order to observe the phenomena of the eruption. Of his numerous works his "Natural History" is the only one which is extant. —THE YOUNGER, or CAIUS CECILIUS PLINIUS SECUNDUS, the nephew and adopted son of the foregoing, was b. in 61 or 62, at Como, was a pupil of Quintilian, and pleaded successfully as an advocate in his 19th year. He was, successively, tribune of the people, prefect of the treasury, consul, proconsul in Pontus and Bithynia, and augur, and d. universally esteemed, in 115. His "Letters" and his "Panegyric on Trajan" are the only parts of his writings that remain.

PLOTINUS, a Platonic philosopher, was b. 203, at Lycopolis, in Egypt, was a disciple of Ammonius Saccas, encountered great danger in accompanying the Emperor Gordian on his expedition against the Parthians, which he did with a view to obtaining a knowledge of Persian and Indian philosophy, and d. 270. His works were translated into Latin, in 1492, by Ficino.

PLOWDEN, FRANCIS, an historian and miscellaneous writer, a native of Ireland and a Roman Catholic, was a barrister and conveyancer. A verdict of £5000 obtained against him in an Irish court, in 1818, for an alleged libel in his "History of Ireland," compelled him to retire to France, where he remained till his decease, at an advanced age, in 1829. Among his works are, "The History of Ireland," "Jura Anglorum," "Church and State," "The Case Stated," and a "Treatise upon the Law of Usury and Annuities."—CHARLES, a Jesuit, b. in England, in 1743, but educated at Rome, where he entered into the society in 1759. On his return to his own country after the suppression of his order in 1773, he was one of the most zealous advocates for their reuniting in England. He afterwards became president of the Catholic college of Stonyhurst, in Lancashire, and d. in 1821.—EDMUND, an eminent lawyer, was b. in Shropshire, in 1517, and d. 1584. His "Commentaries and Reports" are greatly esteemed.

PLUTARCH, a celebrated Greek biographer and philosopher, was b. about 50, at Cheronea, in Bœotia, and studied at Athens under Ammonius, after which he travelled in Greece and Egypt, sedulously acquiring knowledge. For some years subsequently he resided at Rome, where his lectures on philosophy attracted many illustrious auditors. Trajan was one of his hearers, and, after he became emperor, is said to have conferred on him the consular dignity, but this story is apocryphal. Plutarch at length retired to Cheronea, where he filled the office of archon. He was also a priest of the Delphic Apollo. He is believed to have d. about A. D. 120. His extant works are his "Morals," and his "Lives of Illustrious Men," the last of which, though often erroneous in point of fact, must ever be read with delight.

POCAHONTAS, daughter of an Indian chief, and much celebrated in the early history of Virginia, was b. about 1595. She became warmly attached to the English, and rendered them important services on various occasions. She married an Englishman, and in 1616 accompanied her husband to his native country, where she was presented at court. She soon after d. at Gravesend, when about to return to Virginia. She left one son.

POCOCK, EDWARD, an eminent orientalist, was b. 1604, at Oxford, was educated at Thame school, and at Magdalen hall and Corpus Christi college, Oxford, twice visited the Levant, on one of which occasions he was chaplain to the British factory at Aleppo, was Hebrew professor at Oxford, rector of Childrey, and canon of Christ-church, and d. 1691. Among his works are, "Specimen Historiæ Arabum," "Abulfaragius Historia Dynastiarum," and "Commentaries on the Minor Prophets."

POE, EDGAR A., an eccentric but brilliant American writer, whose various contributions to the magazines and newspapers acquired him considerable reputation as a poet and tale-wright. His tales are marked by a peculiar ingenuity and even power, and his poems, though not always finished, show a wonderful command of rhythmical expression. He was irregular, however, in the exercise of his faculties, and never attained the position that he might have done by more labor and care. B. 1812; d. 1849.

POGGIO BRACCIOLINI, an Italian writer of the 15th century, who contributed powerfully to the revival of classical studies, was b. 1380, at Terranova, was educated at Florence, was appointed apostolical secretary by Boniface IX., and held that office under seven other popes, discovered many ancient manuscripts in monasteries, and was appointed chancellor of the Florentine republic. Poggio was a man of eminent talent, but of licentious morals, and a satirical and quarrelsome disposition. His principal works are, a "History of Florence," "Dialogues on Nobility," and "Funeral Orations." D. 1459.

POISSON, RAYMOND, a French actor and dramatist of the 17th century, who obtained great celebrity in low comedy. He wrote a number of theatrical pieces, and d. in 1690.—PAUL, his son, was eminent as a comic actor. D. 1735.—PHILIP and ARNOULT DE ROINVILLE, the two sons of Paul, were also distinguished for their theatrical talents: the former was the author of ten comedies, and was a good tragic performer; while the latter fully supported the reputation of his family as a comic actor. D. 1753.—DENIS SIMEON, one of the most eminent mathematicians of the age, b. at Pithiviers, 1781. He was educated by his uncle as a surgeon, but revolted, on account of the delicacy of his nerves, from the preparatory anatomical studies; he distinguished himself early by the solution of difficult mathematical problems.

He was soon thereafter made assistant to M. Biot, in the college of France, and subsequently a counsellor of the university. In 1837 he was made a peer of France, and president of the Academy of Sciences. He wrote the "Traité de Méchanique," the "Recherches sur la Probabilité des jugemens en matière Civile et en matière Criminelle, &c.," "Annales de Chimie et Physique," &c. D. 1840.

POLE, Cardinal REGINALD, a statesman and ecclesiastic, descended from the royal family of England, was b. in 1500, at Stourton castle, was educated at Sheen monastery, and Magdalen college, Oxford, opposed the divorce of Henry VIII. from Catharine of Aragon, was papal legate to England, archbishop of Canterbury, and chancellor of both universities, during the reign of Mary, and d. 1558.

POLIGNAC, JULES, prince de, prime minister of Charles X. of France, whose administration produced the revolution of 1830, was sprung from an ancient family, whose vicissitudes of fortune were remarkable even in revolutionary France, and which numbered among its members the famous abbé de Polignac, who d. 1741. Driven from Paris by the clamor of the mob, his parents repaired to Vienna; but scarcely had they reached that capital, before the fate of her mistress and friend, Marie Antoinette, was communicated to his mother, and within a few days she fell a victim to her grief and affection. Deprived of a mother's care, and, before reaching manhood, Jules de Polignac proceeded to Russia, then a refuge for the royalists, and shortly afterwards repaired to Edinburgh, where the count d'Artois, afterwards Charles X., resided. Under the mingled influences of religion and loyalty, he embarked with his brother Armand in Georges' conspiracy in 1804 against Napoleon. The conspiracy was detected, the brothers were arrested, tried, and condemned to death, but, at the intercession of Josephine and Madame Murat, the emperor's sister, the sentence of death was commuted to imprisonment, and the two young men were sent to Vincennes, where they remained six years. On the restoration of Louis XVIII., Jules de Polignac devoted himself heart and soul to the so-called party of the Congregation, in the interest of the pope, the church, and the count d'Artois; and his services were rewarded by the pope conferring on him the title of a Roman prince, by which he has since been known. In 1823 Prince Polignac was sent as ambassador to London, where he remained six years, and the intrigues of the priestly party being finally crowned with success, he returned to Paris in 1829, to assume the premiership of the new ministry; but the nation was loud in its expression of distrust, till at length the unconstitutional course that he adopted towards the chambers was suddenly arrested by the "three glorious days," which led to his own overthrow, and the dethronement of his sovereign. Pursued and taken at Granville, he was tried before the chamber of peers, and condemned, but his life was spared, and, after undergoing a short imprisonment at Ham, he was allowed to go into exile. His remaining years were spent chiefly at Munich. At length he was allowed to return to France, though not to Paris; but the death of Charles X. and the duke d'Angoulême gave the last blow to a constitution already broken down by many reverses, and he sank into a state of melancholy, from which he never recovered. B. 1783; d. 1847.

POLIZIANO, or POLITIAN, ANGELUS, an eminent Italian scholar, whose family name was CINIS, was b. 1454, at Monte Pulciano, was professor of Greek and Latin at Florence, and tutor to the children of Lorenzo the Magnificent, who gave him a canonry in the cathedral of the Florentine capital. Among his works are, "The History of the Conspiracy of the Pazzi," "Poems," the drama of "Orpheus," and a translation of Herodian. D. 1494.

POLK, JAMES KNOX, a president of the United States, was b. in North Carolina, 1795. He became a member of the bar in Tennessee in 1820, and soon took a first rank among his colleagues. He was elected a member of congress in 1825, where he was distinguished for his firmness and industry, and where he was chosen speaker for three several terms. His opinions coincided with those of the democratic party, by which in 1844 he was chosen president of the republic. It was during his administration that the annexation of Texas was effected, the war against Mexico successfully terminated, and the general democratic policy maintained. D. 1849.

POLLOK, ROBERT, a Scotch clergyman and writer of sacred poetry, was b. 1799, at Eaglesham, in Renfrewshire. Being intended for the church, he was sent to the university of Glasgow to study theology; but his health became so much impaired by study, that he had scarcely entered on his ministry before he found it necessary to quit the north with a view to a residence in Italy, in order to try the effect of change of climate. He left Scotland in August, 1827, but he had only proceeded to Southampton, when his malady increased to such a degree as precluded all hope of recovery, and he d. there in the following month. His principal production is entitled "The Course of Time," a poem. He also wrote "The Persecuted Family," a narrative of the sufferings of the Presbyterians in the reign of Charles II., and "Ralph Gemmel," a tale for youth.

POLO, MARCO, a celebrated Venetian traveller, was b. about 1450, and accompanied his father and uncle, in 1471, into Tartary, where they resided for twenty-four years and acquired great riches. Marco was in high favor with the grand khan, was employed by him in missions to the most distant parts of the empire, and was for three years governor of Yang-chen-feu. After his return to Venice he was appointed to the command of a galley, but had the misfortune to be captured by the Genoese, who kept him four years a captive. To beguile the tedium of captivity, as well as to satisfy the curiosity of numerous inquirers, he wrote the narrative of his travels. An excellent translation, with notes, was published in 1818, by Mr. Marsden. D. 1523.

POLYBIUS, a celebrated Greek historian, son of Lycortas, general of the Achæans, was b. about 205 B. C., at Megalopolis. He was formed for public business by the precepts and example of Philopœmen, the friend of his father, and at the funeral of that general he bore the urn which contained his ashes. He was one of the thousand persons whom the Romans demanded from the Achæans as hostages, and he lived at Rome many years. There he became the friend of the Scipios, one of whom he accompanied to the siege of Carthage. He d. in his own country, at the age of 82. Of his works only a part of his excellent "Universal History" has been preserved.

POLYCARP, St., a Christian father and martyr, who, according to tradition, was a disciple of the apostle John, and by him appointed bishop of Smyrna. He made many converts, and violently opposed the heresies of Marcion and Valentinus; but during the persecution of the Christians under Marcus Aurelius, he suffered martyrdom with the most heroic fortitude, 169. His "Epistle to the Philippians" is the only one of his pieces that has been preserved.

POLYCLETUS, a famous sculptor, was b. at Sicyon, and flourished about 480 B. C. He is considered to have attained perfection in single figures; and a statue of a boy, executed by him was sold for 190 talents, equivalent to £20,000.

POLYGNOTUS, a painter of Thasos, about 422 B. C. He gained celebrity by a series of pictures on the war of Troy, for which he refused the presents offered him by the states of Greece; he also painted the temple of Delphi, and part of the Pœcile at Athens gratuitously, for which it was decreed that he should be supported at the public expense.

POMBAL, SEBASTIAN JOSEPH CARVALHO MELHO, marquis of, a Portuguese statesman, was b. at Soura, 1699. After having been ambassador to London and Vienna, he was, in 1750, appointed secretary of state for foreign affairs, and, in 1756, prime minister. He introduced many reforms and changes in the government, but as his measures were frequently severe and arbitrary, he raised up many enemies, and on the death of the king, in 1777, he was disgraced, and exiled to his estates, where he d. 1782.

POMFRET, JOHN, an English poet, was b. at Luton, 1667, was educated at Queen's college, Cambridge, and obtained the living of Malden. He was the author of "The Choice," a poem which has ever been popular; but owing to an equivocal expression therein, Dr. Compton, bishop of London, thought him unfit for the clerical office, and refused to induct him to another and more considerable benefice. The prelate was, however, soon after convinced of his mistake; but in the mean time Pomfret, who had been detained in London, caught the small-pox, and d. of it, 1703.

POMPADOUR, JEANNE ANTOINETTE POISSON, marchioness de, the mistress of Louis XV., in whose affections she succeeded madame de Chateauroux, was the daughter of a financier, and b. 1720. At the age of 21 she was married to M. d'Etioles; first attracted the king's notice while he was hunting in the forest of Senart; appeared at court in 1745, under the title of marchioness of Pompadour, and d. in 1764, aged 44 years. She used her influence with the king in promoting the progress of the fine arts, but her cupidty and extravagance were unbounded; and many of the evils which oppressed France in the succeeding reign have been attributed to the power she possessed of filling the most important offices of the state with her favorites.

POMPEY, CNEUS, surnamed the Great, a Roman statesman and warrior, was b. 106 B. C., and learned the art of war from his father. In his 23d year he joined with three legions the party of Sylla, recovered Sicily and Africa, and obtained the honors of a triumph. He obtained a second triumph for putting an end to the war in Spain, and a third for his splendid successes in Asia, where he considerably extended the dominion of his countrymen. About 60 B. C. he formed the first triumvirate with Crassus and Cæsar, and married the daughter of the latter. In the course of a few years, however, dissensions broke out between Cæsar and Pompey, a civil war ensued, and Pompey sustained a decisive defeat at Pharsalia. He fled to Egypt, and was assassinated there 48 B. C.

PONIATOWSKI, JOSEPH, an illustrious Polish general, who was called the Polish Bayard, was b. 1763, at Warsaw, distinguished himself in the cause of his country during the fruitless struggles of 1792 and 1794, entered the French service, and displayed conspicuous bravery and talent in the campaigns of 1806, 1809, 1812, 1813, and 1814, was appointed a marshal on the field of battle at Leipsic, and was drowned in attempting to cross the Elster, on the 19th of October.

POPE, ALEXANDER, a celebrated poet, was b. May 22, 1688, in Lombard-street, London. His father, a linen-draper, in which trade he amassed a considerable fortune, retired from business, and settled at Binfield, in Berkshire, soon after the birth of his son. Both parents were Roman Catholics, and, as Pope tells us, were of gentle blood. He himself was born deformed, small in size, and delicate in constitution. The groundwork of learning he acquired at two private schools, and from two priests, who were employed as his tutors; for the rest he was indebted to his own persevering studies. Before he was 12 years old he formed a play from Ogilby's Homer, which was acted by his school-fellows. His "Pastorals" were written when he was 16, and they obtained him the friendship of many eminent characters. They were succeeded by "The Essay on Criticism," "The Messiah," "The Rape of the Lock," "The Temple of Fame," "Windsor Forest," and "Abelard and Eloisa;" and his reputation as a poet was thus firmly established. The translation of the "Iliad," by which he gained about £5000, was completed in 1720. With the aid of Broome and Fenton he afterwards added a version of "The Odyssey." In 1721 he undertook an edition of Shakspeare, a task in which he failed. With the exception of the "Essay on Man," which was first published in 1733, and completed in the following year, his pen was chiefly devoted to satire during the remainder of his literary career. The first three books of "The Dunciad" appeared in 1723; the fourth, suggested by Warburton, was not written till 1742, and he injured the poem by substituting Cibber as the hero in the place of Theobald. D. May 30, 1744.

POPHAM, SIR JOHN, an eminent judge, was b. in Somersetshire, 1531. After serving the offices of attorney and solicitor general, he was appointed, in 1581, chief justice of the King's Bench. He d. in 1607. His "Reports and Cases," show his abilities to great advantage.

PORDENONE, (so called from his birthplace, his true name being Giovanni Antonio Licinio,) a painter of the Venetian school, and rival of Titian, was b. 1484. He executed many great works for Mantua, Genoa, and Venice; and d. at Ferrara, 1540.

PORLIER, JUAN DIAZ, surnamed El Marqueto, a Spanish patriot and general, was b. about 1775, at Carthagena, in South America, where his father held a high public situation. He first entered the navy, and served as a midshipman at the battle of Trafalgar; but when the cry of independence spread through the Peninsula in 1808, he raised a guerrilla corps, of which he became the leader, and distinguished himself in a series of brilliant actions, and effected the celebrated retreat from Santander, closely pursued by a corps four times more numerous than his own. The regency then appointed him captain general of Asturias, in which station he remained till the restoration of Ferdinand VII. Having unsuccessfully attempted to restore the constitution of the cortes in 1815, he was delivered over to the military authorities at Corunna, condemned, and executed.

PORPHYRY, or PORPHYRIUS, a philosopher, whose original name was Malchus, was b. 233, at Tyre; studied under Origen and Longinus; became a disciple of Plotinus; and d. 304, at Rome. His works against the Christians, to the number of fifteen, are lost. Among his extant productions are, "A Life of Pythagoras;" "A Treatise on Abstinence from Animal Food;" and "Questions on Homer."

PORSON, RICHARD, an eminent helenist and critic, was b. 1759, at East Ruston, in Norfolk; was educated at Eton, and at Trinity college, Cambridge; was elected Greek professor in 1793; became librarian of the London Institution; and d. 1808. In profound knowledge of Greek, critical powers, and acuteness, Porson had few equals. Among his works are, "Letters to Archdeacon Travis;" editions of "Æschylus," and some of the plays of Euripides; and Tracts and Miscellaneous Criticisms.

PORTA, BACCIO DELLA, a painter of Florence, who belonged to the order of Dominicans, and is sometimes called Fra Bartolomeo, or Il Frate. He was intimate with Raphael, and it is said, the two artists benefited by reciprocal instruction. D. 1517.—GIOVANNI BATTISTA DELLA, a natural philosopher and mathematician, was b. at Naples, in 1540. He devoted a great part of his life to the sciences, established two academies for its promotion, and was the inventor of the camera obscura. He wrote treatises on natural history, optics, hydraulics, physiognomy, and agriculture, and also produced nearly twenty dramatic pieces.

PORTER, SIR ROBERT KER, b. at Durham, 1780, became a student of the Royal Academy, and soon showed his skill by the production of several altar-pieces of considerable merit, besides his large pictures of the "Storming of Seringapatam," the "Siege of Acre," and the "Battle of Agincourt," which latter was presented to the city of London. In 1804 he was appointed historical painter to the emperor of Russia, and during his stay at St. Petersburg, he gained the affections of the Princess Mary, daughter of Prince Theodore von Scherbatoff, to whom he was afterwards married. Though he had cultivated his talents as an artist, he had always shown a decided preference for the military profession; and on leaving Russia he accompanied Sir John Moore to Spain, in the hardships and perils of which unfortunate expedition he shared till its final embarkation at Corunna. From 1817 to 1820 he was engaged in travelling throughout the East. In 1826 he was appointed consul at Venezuela, in South America, where he continued to reside till 1841, when he left his mission on leave of absence, and visited his old friends in Russia, with an intention of proceeding thence to England; but as he was on the eve of preparing for the voyage, he was seized with an apoplectic attack, and expired May 3, 1842. His works consist of "Travelling Sketches in Russia and Sweden," "Letters from Portugal and Spain," "A Narrative of the late Campaign in Russia," "Travels in Georgia, Persia, Armenia."—ANNA MARIA, was a sister of the above, and early distinguished herself as a writer of fiction. Among her novels may be mentioned "The Hungarian Brothers," "Don Sebastian," "Tales round a Winter's Hearth," "The Recluse of Norway," "The Knight of St. John," "The Barony," &c. D. 1832.—JANE, sister of the preceding, was b. at Durham, 1776. Like her sister, she soon gave indications of superior abilities, and though she did not appear before the world as an author till she was in her 27th year, her first work, "Thaddeus of Warsaw," published in 1803, at once placed her in the foremost rank as a writer of fiction. In 1809 appeared her "Scottish Chiefs," which was no less successful than its predecessor; and this was followed, at intervals more or less distant, by the "Pastor's Fireside," "Duke Christian of Luneburg," "Tales round a Winter's Hearth," (in which she was joined by her sister,) "The Field of Forty Foot-steps," &c. She also contributed largely to the periodicals of the day, and her last separate publication was "Sir Seaward's Dairy," the forerunner of a class of works lately become numerous, and of which perhaps the best specimen is the well-known "Diary of Lady Wiltoughby." In 1842 she accompanied her brother, Sir R. K. Porter, to Petersburg; and after his death she resided chiefly at Bristol, where it is said she was chiefly engaged in writing her brother's memoirs. D. 1850.

PORTEUS, BEILBY, an eminent prelate, was b. 1731, at York, and entered as a sizar at Christ's college, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. After having been chaplain to Archbishop Secker, he was, successively, rector of Hunton, prebendary of Peterborough, rector of Lambeth, king's chaplain, and master of St. Cross hospital, near Winchester. In 1776, through the queen's influence, he obtained the bishopric of Chester, whence, in 1787, he was translated to that of London. Among his works are, "Sermons;" "A Life of Secker;" and a Seatonian prize poem on Death. D. 1808.

POSTEL, WILLIAM, one of the most learned men of his age, and one of the wildest visionaries, was b. in Normandy in 1510. In his youth he supported himself at the college of St. Barbe, by waiting upon the other students. His reputation for general learning and antiquarian research induced Francis I. to send him to the East to collect manuscripts, which commission he discharged so well as to be appointed professor of mathematics and languages, but he afterwards fell into disgrace, and lost his appointments. Having wandered about from place to place, he was recalled; but lost his situation again, and d. in a monastery in 1581. Among the wild and extravagant notions that he entertained, one was, that he had died, and risen again with the soul of Adam, whence he called himself "Postellus restitutus," he also maintained that women shall have the dominion over man, and that his writings were revealed to him by Jesus Christ.

POSTHUMUS, MARCUS CASSIANUS LATINUS, a Roman emperor, one of the thirty tyrants, was of obscure birth, but rose rapidly in the army, till he obtained the command in Gaul. He assumed the imperial title in 257; ruled Gaul and a part of Spain, and obtained various successes against the Germans; and was murdered by his soldiers in 267.

POTEMKIN, GREGORY ALEXANDROVITSCH, a Russian prince and field-marshal, the minion of Catharine II., was b. 1736, in the neighborhood of Smolensk, of a noble though poor family, and was intended for the church, but obtained a cornetcy in the horse guards. Over the empress, after the death of her husband, he acquired an unbounded influence, and he retained it till nearly the end of his life. He distinguished himself against the Turks, particularly in the war of 1787, when he commanded in chief. D. 1791.

POTHIER, ROBERT JOSEPH, one of the most eminent of the French juriseonsults, was b. 1669, at Orleans; was professor of law in his native city; and d. in 1772, as much beloved for his virtues as admired for his extensive learning.

His great work is his "Digest of the Pandects of Justinian." His treatises on various legal questions form seven-teen volumes octavo.

POTOCKI, COUNT STANISLAUS, a Polish writer and statesman, of a family which has produced several eminent characters, was b. 1757, at Warsaw; was one of those who contributed most actively to establish the constitution of 1791; was appointed a palatine senator and one of the ministers of the grand duchy of Warsaw; was president of the senate in 1818; and d. 1821. Among his works are, "A Treatise on Eloquence and Style;" and "The Journey to Ciemnogrod," a satirical romance.—CLAUDIA, the wife of Count Bernard Potocki, was b. in the grand duchy of Posen, in 1802. She was the lineal descendant of the Polish ambassador, Dzialynski, who was sent to England in Elizabeth's reign, to remonstrate against the infraction of a treaty between that country and Poland, and whose bold and successful eloquence is recorded in history. During the patriotic struggle for Polish freedom, from 1830 to 1833, the Countess Potocki not only became the munificent benefactress of her countrymen, but devoted her personal energies to the sacred cause, and alleviated, by her kind attentions to the sick and wounded, much of the misery that the unequal contest entailed on the gallant spirits who strove to shake off the oppressor's yoke. Surrounded by wounded warriors, and the victims of cholera in the hospitals of Warsaw, neither the sight of hideous gashes, nor the fear of contagion deterred her from her course of charity: there, for seven successive months, she was constantly occupied; and when the day of adversity came, the remains of her fortune, her influence, her personal exertions, were entirely at the disposal of the unfortunate refugees. At one time, while residing at Dresden, where she had formed a ladies' committee for the relief of these brave men, she pledged her jewels, and most expensive dresses, for 40,000 florins, and the whole amount was instantly sent to its pious destination. For this, the Poles assembled at Dresden, presented to her a bracelet, with an inscription commemorative of the noble act, and pointing it out for national gratitude. She at length fixed her residence at Geneva; and there, in the exercise of those Christian virtues, which will immortalize her name, but worn out by silent grief, she d. in 1836.

POTTER, PAUL, a celebrated Dutch painter, the son of an artist, was b. 1625, at Enkhuysen; acquired a perfect knowledge of his profession by the time that he was fifteen; and d. 1654. His pictures are held in high estimation for their fidelity to nature, and the beauty of their execution. In representing animals he was unequalled.—JOHN, a learned prelate, was b. about 1672, at Wakefield; was educated at the free school there, and at University college, Oxford; was made bishop of Oxford in 1715, and archbishop of Canterbury in 1737; and d. 1747. He wrote "Archæologia Græca," and various theological works; and edited Clemens Alexandrinus, and Lycophrôn's "Alexandra."—ROBERT, a divine and poet, was b. 1721; was educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge; and was for some years vicar of Scarning, after which he obtained the livings of Lowestoff and Kessingland, and a prebend in the cathedral of Norwich. His original poetry consists of a volume of Poems, and two Odes from Isaiah, and is much above mediocrity. But he is best known by his spirited versions of Æschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides. D. 1804.

POUSSIN, NICHOLAS, one of the greatest of the French painters, was b. in 1594, at Andelys, in Normandy, and received instructions from Varin, Elle, and Lallement, but was more indebted to nature and his own assiduity than to their lessons. In 1624 he went to Rome, where he improved himself by studying the works of Titian, Domenichino, and Raphael, and of the ancient sculptors. Louis XIII. invited him to France in 1639, and gave him a pension, and apartments in the Louvre; but Poussin was soon disgusted with the intrigues of Vouet, Le Mercier, and Fouquieres, who envied and dreaded him for his superior genius. He therefore returned to Rome in 1642, and remained there till his decease in 1665. His pictures are numerous and highly esteemed; in landscape he particularly excelled.—GASPAR, an eminent painter, was b. 1613, at Rome. His name was DUGHET, but he took the surname of his pictorial preceptor, Nicholas, who was his brother-in-law. In landscape he acquired a high reputation. Such was the rapidity with which he worked that he often completed a picture in the course of a day. D. 1765.

POWELL, Sir JOHN, an eminent and honest lawyer, was b. of a very ancient and wealthy family at Pentrymeyrick, in the parish of Llanwrda, Caermarthen-shire. He was a judge in the court of King's Bench, in 1688, and distinguished himself so much by his integrity and ability on the trial of the seven bishops, that James II., deprived him of his office, but he was restored to it at the revolution, and sat there until his death in 1696.

POWNALL, THOMAS, a learned antiquary and politician, was b. at Lincoln, in 1722. He held several situations under government, and having greatly exerted himself in America to suppress the rising spirit of discontent among the colonists, he was in 1757, appointed governor of Massachusetts's Bay, and subsequently of Carolina. On returning to England in 1761, he was made director-general of the control office, with the military rank of colonel; but the latter part of his life was spent at Bath, in literary retirement. His principal works are, "On the Administration of the Colonies," "Description of part of North America," "Treatise on the Study of Antiquities," "On the Antiquities of the Provincia Romana of Gaul," "Descriptions of Roman Antiquities dug up at Bath," "Intellectual Physics," besides many political tracts. D. 1805.

PRADT, Abbé DOMINIQUE DE, a French ecclesiastic and a political writer, b. at Auvergne in 1759. He was grand vicar at the revolution to the Cardinal Rochefoucauld, and was elected deputy for the Norman clergy to the states-general, 1789. He opposed the union of his order to the tiers état, protested against the new order of things, and was consequently obliged to emigrate, establishing himself for a considerable time at Hamburg. In that city he published in 1788, the first of his voluminous series of political pamphlets, called "Antidote to the Congress of Radstadt." In another, termed "Prussia, and her Neutrality," he urged a coalition of Europe against the French republic. But after the revolution, which made Bonaparte first consul, he made interest with his patron, Duroc, to enter Bonaparte's service, and by dint of well-timed flattery, became his grand almoner. On the coronation of the emperor, in 1804, at which he assisted, he was invested with the title of baron, received a gratuity of 40,000 francs, was made bishop of Poitiers, and was ordained by Pius VII. in person, in 1805. On the war against Russia occurring in 1812, he was sent ambassador to the duchy of Warsaw, as he states, in his "History of the Polish Embassy," painfully and violently against his wish. During the retreat from Moscow, Napoleon had an interview with him at a lone cottage, reproached him with treachery, and divested him of his embassy. On his return to Paris, he found all his employments taken from him. He was ordered to quit Paris for his diocese, and did not return till the fall of Napoleon, and the entry of the Bourbons into France in 1814. He wrote his "Vindictory History" then, but did not publish it till after the battle of Waterloo, and Napoleon's departure for St. Helena. He was made by the Bourbons chancellor of the legion of honor; but a new disgrace overtook him, he retired from the scene, and did not reappear till after the "hundred days." He subsequently ceded all the rights of his archbishop's see to the king of the Netherlands, for a yearly pension of 10,000 francs, and, retiring into private life, occupied himself with the continued publication of political pamphlets. In all these latter publications, however, he espoused the cause of wise and temperate constitutional reform. D. 1837.

PRATT, CHARLES, EARL CAMDEN, a celebrated lawyer, the son of Chief Justice Pratt, was b. 1713; studied at Eton, King's college, Cambridge, and Lincoln's Inn; was chosen member for Downton in 1754; was, successively, recorder of Bath, attorney-general, chief justice of the common pleas, lord chancellor, and president of the council. The title of baron he obtained in 1765, and that of earl in 1786. D. 1794.—SAMUEL JACKSON, a once popular novelist and miscellaneous writer, was b. in 1749, at St. Ives, in Huntingdonshire, and, after having been an actor, an itinerant lecturer, and a bookseller, he became an author by profession. Of his numerous works the principal are, the poems of "Sympathy and Landscapes in Verse;" the tragedy of "The Fair Circassian;" the novels of "Liberal Opinions," "Emma Corbet," "The Pupil of Pleasure," "Shenstone Green," and "Family Secrets;" "Gleanings through Wales, Holland, and Westphalia;" "Gleanings in England," and "Harvest Home." D. 1814.—BENJAMIN, chief justice of New York, was b. in Massachusetts, in 1719, and was graduated at Harvard college. He studied law, and entering on its practice in Boston soon became eminent. Turning his attention to public affairs, he soon rose to political distinction, and by the influence of Governor Pownell was appointed chief justice of New York. He had made collections for a history of New England, and possessed considerable talent for poetry. D. 1763.

PRAXITELES, a famous Grecian sculptor, is believed to have been a native of Athens, to have flourished early in the 4th century B. C., and to have d. at the age of 80. He was long attached to the celebrated Phryne, of whom he executed two statues, one of which was placed in the temple of Delphi, the other in the temple of Love at Thespia. His "Venus" at Cnidus was considered as one of the most finished productions of Greece.

PREBLE, EDWARD, a distinguished naval officer in the American service, was b. at Falmouth, in Maine, 1761, and entered the navy as a midshipman in 1779. He soon rose to the rank of lieutenant, and during the revolutionary war distinguished himself by capturing a British vessel at Penobscot. In 1798 he was appointed to the command of the brig Pickering, and soon after to the Essex. He commanded, in 1803, a fleet sent against the Barbary powers, and repeatedly attacked Tripoli with considerable success. In 1804 he returned to the United States, and d. 1807.

PRENTISS, SARGEANT S., a young lawyer, b. in Maine, went to Natches and New Orleans to practise law. In 1837 he was elected to congress, but the right to his seat was disputed, and he was rejected. But the speeches he made in his own behalf, as well as his arguments before various courts, gave him a reputation as one of the most eloquent speakers in the Union. B. 1810; d. 1850.

PRESCOTT, WILLIAM, a distinguished revolutionary officer, was b. in 1726, at Groton, Mass. At the capture of Cape Breton, in 1758, he was a lieutenant of the provincial troops, and attracted, by his conduct in that campaign, the notice of the British general, who offered him a commission in the regular army, which, however, he declined; in 1774, when the struggle between the colonies and the mother country was at hand, he was appointed to command a regiment of minute-men, organized by the provincial congress, and, on receiving notice of the intended operations of General Gage against Concord, marched with it to Lexington. Before he arrived, however, the British had retreated, and he then proceeded to Cambridge, where he entered the army that was ordered to be raised, the greater part of his officers and men volunteering to serve with him for the first campaign. On the 16th of June, 1775, he was ordered to Charlestown, with three regiments, and directed to throw up works on Bunker hill. On reaching the ground, it was perceived that the neighboring elevation, called Breeds' hill, was a more suitable station; and on it the defences were erected. The next day, as is well known, General Howe with a force more than quadruple that under the orders of Colonel Prescott, attempted to dislodge him, and, after a contest among the most memorable in the American annals, succeeded in effecting that object with immense loss. Colonel Prescott was one of the last to leave the intrenchments when he found it necessary to order a retreat, and he offered to the commander-in-chief to retake the position the same night, if he would give him two regiments. In 1777 he resigned his command, and returned home; but in the autumn of the same year, he went as a volunteer to the northern army under General Gates, and was present at the capture of Burgoyne. This was his last military service. He subsequently sat in the legislature of his native state for several years. D. 1795.

PREVOST D'EXILES, ANTHONY FRANCIS, one of the most fertile of French writers, was b. 1697, at Hesdin. His early life was restless and changeful. He hesitated between a monastic and a military life, twice made a trial of both, became at last a Benedictine, and ended by flying from the convent, taking shelter in Holland, and adopting the profession of an author. His end was equally singular. In 1763 he was struck by an apoplectic fit in the forest of Chantilly, and was found apparently lifeless. As soon as the surgeon proceeded to use the knife on his body, he screamed and opened his eyes, but the incision was mortal, and he almost immediately expired. His works amount to one hundred and seventy volumes. Of his novels, the best are, "Memoirs of a Man of Quality," the "Dean of Cole-reine," "Cleveland," and "Manon L'Escout." Among his other productions are, "A History of Voyages and Travels," and "The Pro and Con," a periodical paper.

PRICE, RICHARD, an eminent dissenting minister, universally known and celebrated for his great abilities in arithmetical calculations, and for very numerous and valuable writings, theological, moral, and scientific, was b. at Llangunnor, in 1723, and became pastor of a nonconformist congregation, of Arian or semi-Arian principles, at Hackney, where he continued as long as he lived. He was the friend of man, and the most intrepid assertor of his rights. During the American war, he printed two pamphlets against that measure, one entitled "Observations on Civil Liberty," and the other, "Observations on Civil Government," for which the corporation of London voted him thanks and a gold box, and the university of Glasgow conferred on him the degree of D.D. In 1778 he had a friendly controversy with Dr. Priestley, on materialism and necessity. On the termination of the war, Mr. Pitt consulted Dr. Price respecting the best mode of liquidating the national debt, the result of which, it is said, was the adoption of the sinking fund. When the French revolution broke out, he distinguished himself by a sermon, "On the Love of Country," in which he hailed that event as the commencement of a glorious era. This drew upon the preacher some strong animadversions from Mr. Burke, in his celebrated "Reflections." D. 1791.

PRIDEAUX, HUMPHREY, a learned divine, was b. in 1648, at Padstow, in Cornwall; was educated at Westminster school, and at Christ-church college, Oxford, and d. in 1724, dean of Norwich. His great work is "The Connection of the History of the Old and New Testament." Among his other productions are, "A Life of Mahomet," and "The Original Right of Tithes."

PRIESTLEY, JOSEPH, an eminent dissenting divine and experimental philosopher, was b. in 1733, at Fieldhead; was educated at Daventry, and, after having been tutor at Warrington, and pastor to various congregations, and having acquired considerable reputation as an experimentalist and author, he became companion to the earl of Shelburne. At the end of a seven years' residence with that nobleman, he received a pension, and settled, in 1780, at Birmingham. There he proceeded actively with his philosophical and theological researches, and was also appointed pastor to a dissenting congregation. In 1791, however, the scene changed. His religious principles, and his avowed partiality to the French revolution, excited the hatred of the high church and tory party, and in the riots which took place in July, his house, library, manuscripts, and apparatus, were committed to the flames by the infuriated mob, and he was exposed to great personal danger. Quitting Birmingham, he succeeded Dr. Price, at Hackney; but, in 1794, conceiving himself to be insecure from popular rage, he embarked for America. He took up his abode at Northumberland, Penn., at which place he d. May 6, 1804. As a philosopher his fame principally rests upon his pneumatic inquiries. His works extend to between seventy and eighty volumes. Among them are lectures on "General History," on the "Theory and History of Language," and on the "Principles of Oratory and Criticism;" "Charts of Biography and History," "Disquisitions relating to Matter and Spirit," "Hartleian Theory of the Human Mind," "History of the Corruptions of Christianity," "Letters to a Philosophical Unbeliever," "Institutes of Natural and Revealed Religion," "History of Electricity," "History of Vision, Light, and Colors," and "Experiments and Observations on different Kinds of Air."

PRINGLE, THOMAS, a highly esteemed poet and miscellaneous writer, was b. at Blaiklaw, in Teviotdale, in 1789. Soon after his studies at the university of Edinburgh were completed, he obtained a clerkship in the register office; but his poetic aspirations found vent even in the dull routine of such an occupation, and, in 1816, his "Scenes of Teviotdale," which he contributed to the "Poetic Mirror," having attracted the notice of Sir W. (then Mr.) Scott, he was led to embrace literature as a profession. He was, for a short period, editor of "Blackwood's Magazine" in 1817, but a difference of politics between him and the publisher, soon led to his resignation. He became secretary of the anti-slavery society, a situation which he held till the object of that body was accomplished. Besides being the editor of the well-known annual, "Friendship's Offering," he published, in 1828, his "Ephemerides," a collection of songs, sonnets, and other juvenile pieces; and, in 1834, appeared his "African Sketches," which, together with his interesting account of a "Narrative of a Residence in South Africa," seem likely to perpetuate his fame. D. 1834.

PRIOR, MATTHEW, a celebrated poet and statesman, was b. 1664, but whether in Middlesex or Dorsetshire is uncertain. Being left fatherless, he was sent by his uncle, a vintner, to Westminster school; and, after he quitted that seminary, was fortunate enough to attract the notice of the earl of Dorset, who placed him at St. John's college, Cambridge. While he was at the university he wrote, in conjunction with Montague, "The City Mouse and Country Mouse," in ridicule of Dryden's "Hind and Panther." The work was advantageous to both. In 1691, he was appointed secretary of the embassy which was sent to the congress at the Hague. After having been gentleman of the bed-chamber, and again, in 1697, secretary of embassy, he was, in 1700, made under-secretary of state, and, shortly after, commissioner of trade. During the greatest part of the reign of Anne, he was chiefly engaged in literary pursuits; but, when the whigs were displaced, he was employed to negotiate the treaty of Utrecht, and was subsequently nominated ambassador at the French court. For his share in the treaty, he was committed to prison after the accession of George I., and was threatened with impeachment, but was at length discharged. His poems, which have long been received into the collected works of the British poets, are often spirited, and are very seldom deficient in melody or in elegance. D. 1721.

PRISCIAN, or PRISCIANUS, a celebrated grammarian, was b. at Casarea, and was the master of a famous school at Constantinople, about 525. His principal work is a treatise on grammar. His rigid attention to correctness gave rise to the saying of "breaking Priscian's head," which is applied to the violators of grammatical rules.

PROCACCINI, CAMILLO, an eminent painter, b. at Bologna, 1546. He studied the works of Parmegiano and Michael Angelo, and obtained a high reputation for the beauty of his coloring and the lightness of his touch. D. 1626.—GIULIO CESARE, his brother, b. in 1543, adopted the style of Correggio, and surpassed all his other imitators. D. 1626.—CARLO ANTONIO, another brother, excelled as a fruit and flower painter.

PROCIDA, JOHN OF, a native of Palermo, was b. of a noble family, about 1225. He was the chief of the conspiracy against Charles of Anjou; and his efforts to accomplish the expulsion of the French displayed talents of a high order, and were finally crowned with success. D. 1303.

PROCLUS, a Platonic philosopher, was b. in 410, at Constantinople. He studied at Alexandria, and at Athens, where he succeeded Syriacus in the Platonic school, and d. 485. Several of his works are extant.

PRONY, GASPARD-CLAIR-FRANCOIS-MARIE-RICHE DE, baron de Prony, a distinguished French mathematician. He was the pupil, and, subsequently, the assistant of Perronet, and was much employed by Napoleon, though the latter was deeply offended by Prony's refusal to accompany him to Egypt. Independent of his various missions as an engineer, and of his labors as a professor at the Polytechnic school, M. Prony was author of between thirty and forty volumes, chiefly of most laborious and extensive calculations. B. 1775; d. 1839.

PROTAGORAS, a Grecian sophist, was b. at Abdera, about 488 B. C.; exercised in his youth the calling of a porter; opened at Athens a school of philosophy, and acquired great reputation and riches; was banished on a charge of atheism, and perished by shipwreck at the age of seventy. Prodicus was one of his disciples.

PROTOGENES, an eminent Grecian painter, a native of Caunus, in Caria, flourished about 336 B. C. A considerable part of his life was spent in obscurity, but he was at length brought into notice by Apelles giving a large price for one of his pictures. His masterpiece was a picture of Ialysus, the founder of Rhodes, on which he was employed for seven years.

PRYNNE, WILLIAM, a lawyer and political writer, was b. in 1600, at Swanswick; was educated at Bath grammar school, and Oriel college, Oxford; studied the law at Lincoln's Inn; and was successively made barrister, bencher, and reader. His "Histrio-Mastix," a violent attack on the stage, and his "News from Ipswich," twice brought on him, in 1633 and 1637, the vengeance of the infamous star-chamber. He was branded, deprived of his ears, pilloried, fined ten thousand pounds, and doomed to perpetual imprisonment. He obtained his liberty in 1640, was elected member for Newport, and bore a prominent part in the trial of Laud, his persecutor. After the overthrow of Charles, however, Prynne endeavored to effect an accommodation between him and his subjects; and he opposed Cromwell with such boldness that the protector imprisoned him. He joined in the restoration of Charles II.; was appointed keeper of the records in the Tower; and d. 1669.

PSALMANAZAR, GEORGE, the assumed name of a singular character, who began his career in life by acting the part of an impostor. He was b. in 1679, in the south of France, and received an excellent education. Among the many disguises which he assumed was that of a native of Formosa, and to keep up the delusion he invented an alphabet, grammar, and history of the island, which were considered as authentic by many eminent men. The cheat was not discovered till after he had been sent to Oxford. He subsequently gained a subsistence by writing for the booksellers. A large portion of the ancient part of the "Universal History" was written by him; and he left behind him his own memoirs. D. 1763.

PTOLEMY, CLAUDIUS, an ancient astronomer and geographer, was b. about 70, in Egypt, but whether at Pelusium, as some say, is doubtful. Alexandria was the place where he resided. He wrote various astronomical and geographical works. The system which makes the earth the centre of the solar and planetary motions takes its name from him.

PUFFENDORF, SAMUEL, an eminent German publicist and historian, was b. in 1632, near Chemnitz, in Saxony; was educated at Leipsic and Jena; was, successively, in the service of the elector palatine, Charles XI. of Sweden, and the elector of Brandenburg; and d. in 1694. Of his works the chief are, "The Law of Nature and Nations," "The Elements of Jurisprudence," "The State of the German Empire," and an "Introduction to the History of Europe;" "Commentaries on Swedish Affairs," and "Lives of Scanderbeg, Charles Gustavus of Sweden, and Frederic III. of Brandenburg."

PUGATSCHOFF, JEMELJAN, or YEMELKA, the leader of a predatory band in Russia, and a daring impostor, was a Don Cossack, and b. in 1726. After serving in the Prussian and Austrian armies, he returned to his own country; and being possessed of a striking personal resemblance to the lately deceased emperor, Peter III., he was in 1773 encouraged to pass himself for that monarch. At first he had but few followers, but they increased to the number of 16,000 men. He several times defeated the troops of the empress; captured Kasan, the old capital of the empire; and continued his ravages for nearly two years. At length, just as Moscow was threatened, he was betrayed by some of his party, and executed, together with the other rebel leaders, at Moscow, in 1775.

PUISAYE, Count JOSEPH, one of the most able of the French royalist chiefs, was b. about 1754, at Montagne, and was descended from an ancient and noble family. He was intended for the church, but preferred the military profession. In 1789 the nobility of Perche deputed him as their representative to the states-general. He sat in the constituent assembly, and was an enlightened friend of reform. In 1793 he held a command in the departmental army, under Wimpfen, and was consequently proscribed by the convention. He took refuge in Britany, where, by dint of eloquence, talent, and activity, he organized a formidable force, under the name of Chouans. He visited England in 1794, obtained a powerful sncoor, and returned with it to France in 1795; but his hopes were blasted by envious intrigues of his own party, who occasioned the disaster at Quiberon. After having continued his efforts for two years longer, he resigned his commission, disgusted by the conduct of the Bourbons, and fixed his abode in Canada, whence he afterwards removed to England. D. 1827.

PULASKI, Count, a celebrated soldier, was a native of Poland, and made brave though unsuccessful efforts to restore his country to independence. He came to the United States during the revolutionary war, was appointed a brigadier-general in the American army, and was mortally wounded in the attack on Savannah in 1779. Congress voted to erect a monument to his memory.

PULCI, Louis, an Italian poet, was b. 1432, at Florence; was the friend of Lorenzo di Medici, Politian, and other eminent men; was the inventor of that species of heroi-comic poetry which bears the name of Berni; and d. about 1487. His great work is the "Morgante Maggiore," a truly poetical production, an idea of which may be formed from specimens translated by Lord Byron.

PULTENEY, WILLIAM, earl of Bath, the political antagonist of Sir Robert Walpole, was b. 1682, and educated at Westminster school, and Christ-church, Oxford. On the accession of George I. he was appointed a privy councillor and secretary at war; but a dispute with Sir Robert Walpole caused his removal to the ranks of the opposition. He joined Bolingbroke in conducting a paper, called the "Craftsman," the object of which was to annoy the minister. This produced a duel between Pulteney, and Lord Hervey; and the king was so much displeased with the conduct of the former, that he struck his name out of the list of privy councillors, and also from the commission of the peace. On the resignation of Walpole, in 1741, Pulteney was created earl of Bath: but from that time his popularity and influence ceased. D. 1764.

PURCELL, HENRY, a celebrated English composer, was b. 1658; was organist of Westminster abbey at the age of 18, and was afterwards appointed organist of the chapel royal; and d. 1695. Among his works are, "Anthems," "Sonatas," "Orpheus Britannicus," and the opera of "Diocletian."

PURCHAS, SAMUEL, a divine, was b. in 1577, at Thaxted, in Essex; was educated at St. John's college, Oxford; and d. in 1628, rector of St. Martin's, Ludgate. His principal work is the well-known collection of voyages, which bears the title of "Purchas, his Pilgrimages, or Relations of the World."

PUTNAM, ISRAEL, an officer in the army of the American revolution, was b. in Salem, Mass., 1718. He received but a meagre education, and removing to Connecticut, engaged in agriculture. In the French war he commanded a company, and was engaged in several contests with the enemy. In 1756 he fell into an ambuscade of savages, and was exposed to the most cruel tortures. He obtained his release in 1759, and returned to his farm. Soon after the battle at Lexington he joined the army at Cambridge, was appointed major-general, and distinguished himself at Bunker hill. In 1776 he was sent to complete the fortifications at New York, and afterwards to fortify Philadelphia. In the winter of 1777 he was stationed with a small body at Princeton, and in the spring appointed to a command in the Highlands, where he remained most of the time till the close of 1779, when he was disabled by an attack of paralysis. He was brave, energetic, and one of the most efficient officers of the revolution. D. 1790.

PYE, HENRY JAMES, a poet of an ancient Berkshire family, was b. in 1745, in London; was educated at Magdalen college, Oxford; ruined his fortune by becoming a candidate for Berks; was appointed poet laureate and a police magistrate, in 1790 and 1792; and d. in 1813. His principal works are "Alfred," an epic; "Translations of the poetics of Aristotle," "Six Odes of Pindar," and "Homer's Hymns;" "The Demo-erat," "The Aristocrat," and "Comments on the Commentators upon Shakspeare."

PYM, JOHN, a lawyer, was b. 1584, in Somersetshire. After having finished his education at Broadgate hall, Oxford, he studied law at one of the inns of court, and was called to the bar. During the reigns of James I. and Charles I. he had a seat in parliament, and was a strict Puritan, and a strenuous opponent of the arbitrary measures of the crown. He was one of the five members whom the infatuated Charles demanded to be given up to him by the house of commons. Pym d. in 1643, not long after having been appointed lieutenant of the ordnance.

PYRRHIO, a Greek philosopher, who flourished about 340 B. C., was b. at Elea, in the Peloponnesus, and was originally a painter, but became a disciple of Anaxarchus, whom he accompanied in the expedition of Alexander. On his return his fellow-citizens made him their high priest, and the Athenians gave him the rights of citizenship. He lived to the age of 90. Pyrrho founded the sect of the Sceptics or Pyrrhonists.

PYTHAGORAS, a celebrated philosopher, the founder of that school which is called the Italic, was b. about 586 B. C. at Samos, or, according to some, at Sidon, and began to travel at the age of 18. He visited Phenicia and Asia Minor, and even, it is said, Persia and India, and resided for 25 years in Egypt. On his return he taught geometry at Samos; after which he settled at Crotona, in Magna Græcia, and established a school of philosophy, which became famous. Persecution at length drove him thence, and he took refuge in the temple of the Muses at Metapontum, where he is said, but the truth of the story is doubtful, to have been starved to death, about 497 B. C. Besides being an illustrious metaphysical philosopher, Pythagoras was a great geometrician and astronomer.

Q.

QUARLES, FRANCIS, a poet, was b. 1592, near Romford, in Essex; studied at Christ's college, Cambridge, and at Lincoln's Inn; was successively cup-bearer to Elizabeth, daughter of James I., and secretary to Archbishop Usher in Ireland; suffered greatly for his attachment to the cause of Charles I., and d. 1644. His principal works are "Emblems," "Argalus and Parthenia," "Divine Fancies," and "Enchiridion." Quarles has been made an object of satire; but, with all its faults, his poetry is above contempt.

QUESNAY, FRANCIS, a physician, and the founder in France of the sect of the Economists, was b. 1694, at Mercî. He was exceedingly fond of farming in his youth, but was brought up to the profession of medicine, and became physician to Louis XV., who loved to converse with him, called him the Thinker, and ennobled him. Besides his medical productions, which are numerous, he wrote "Physiocracy," and various articles in the "Encyclopædia," and in periodicals, to promulgate his doctrines on political economy. D. 1774.

QUEVEDO DE VILLEGAS, FRANCIS, a Spanish poet and miscellaneous writer, was b. 1580, at Madrid, studied at Alcala, was obliged to quit Spain for having killed a brutal noble in a duel, held important offices under the duke of Ossuna, viceroy of Sicily; was exiled to his estate on the disgrace of the duke, but was again received into favor at court; lived for several years in retirement, devoted to literary pursuits; was thrown into a dungeon, in 1641, where he remained twenty-two months, on an unfounded charge of having libelled Count d'Olivares; and d. 1645. He stands high among Spanish authors, particularly as a satirist. His "Visions of Hell," and "Comic Tales," have been translated into English.

QUIN, JAMES, almost equally celebrated as an actor and an epicure, was b. 1693, in Covent-garden. His father, who was a barrister, d. 1710, at Dublin, where Quin was educated. Being left resourceless, he went upon the stage, and for a considerable period was confined to inferior parts. At length he rose into high reputation, and was without a rival till the appearance of Garrick. He retired from the stage in 1751, and d. in 1766. George III. was instructed by him in recitation. Thomson, with whom Quin was in habits of close friendship, has paid, in "The Castle of Indolence," an elegant tribute to his talents.

QUINAULT, PHILIP, a celebrated French lyrical dramatist, was b. 1635, at Paris, began to write for the theatre at the age of 18, became highly popular, was attacked by Boileau, with much more inveteracy than wit or justice, and d. 1668. In the species of drama to which he devoted his talents he stands without a rival. It has been said of his verses that they were already music when they were placed in the hands of the composer.

QUINCY, JOHN, an American citizen, b. 1689. Having graduated at Harvard college, in 1708, was early employed in public life. For forty years without interruption he was a representative and a member of the council; and was long the speaker of the house. He inherited an ample fortune, and discharged with fidelity the various offices with which he was honored. D. 1767, aged 78 years.—EDMUND, agent for Massachusetts at the court of Great Britain, was b. at Braintree, 1681, and graduated at Harvard college in 1699. In 1713 he was appointed a judge of the supreme court, and held a seat for a long time in the house of representatives, and in his majesty's council. In 1737 he was selected as an agent to the British court to procure a decision of the controversy respecting the boundary line between Massachusetts and New Hampshire, and d. while in London, on the 23d of February, 1738, in his fifty-seventh year.—JOSIAH, a distinguished lawyer and patriot, was b. in Boston in 1743, and was graduated at Harvard college. He soon became eminent in the practice of law, and distinguished by his active exertions in the popular cause. His powers of eloquence were of a very high order. In 1774 he took a voyage to Europe for the benefit of his health, and to advance the interests of the colonies. He d. on his return, on the 25th of April, 1775, the day that the vessel reached the harbor of Cape Ann.

QUINTILIAN, MARCUS FABIUS, a celebrated rhetorician, was b. in 42, at Rome, followed Galba into Spain, and taught rhetoric there; returned to his native city, in 68, and was long a professor of rhetoric; and d. in his 80th year. His "Institutes of the Orator" have been translated into English. "Declamations," and "A Dialogue on Oratory," are also attributed to him; but the latter is sometimes ascribed to Tacitus.

QUINTINIE, JOHN DE LA, a celebrated French horticulturist, b. at Poitiers, in 1626.

QUINTUS CALABER, or QUINTUS SMYRNEUS, a Greek poet, who wrote a supplement to Homer's Iliad. He is supposed to have lived in the 5th century, and to have been a native of Smyrna.

QUIRINI, ANGELO MARIA, a cardinal, b. at Venice, in 1684. Benedict XIII. made him archbishop and cardinal, which dignities he filled with great reputation. D. 1755.

QUIROGA, JOSEPH, a Spanish Jesuit, was b. at Lugo, in Galicia, and distinguished himself as a missionary in America. D. 1784.

QUIROS, PEDRO FERNANDEZ DE, a celebrated Spanish navigator, of the 16th century, who explored many of the islands afterwards visited by Captain Cook. D. 1614.

QUITA, DOMINGOS DOS REIS, a Portuguese poet, who early in life was a barber, but being fond of learning, and making himself master of Italian, Spanish, and French, he wrote verses, and became the author of "Inez de Castro," and four other tragedies; besides many sonnets, elegies, and pastorals. B. 1723; d. 1770.

R.

RABANUS-MAURUS, MAGNENTIS, a learned German prelate, who became abbot of the monastery at Fulda, and was afterwards archbishop of Mentz. B. 785; d. 856.

RABAUT DE ST. ETIENNE, JOHN PAUL, one of the most worthy of the French revolutionists, was b. at Nismes, in 1741, for which city he was chosen a deputy for the constituent assembly in 1789. He attached himself to the party of the Girondists, and was proscribed for opposing the Mountain party in 1793. He was subsequently guillotined. His wife killed herself; and all those who assisted him were guillotined.

RABELAIS, FRANCOIS, a humorous and satirical writer, whose works are not so much read as they are talked about. His fame has extended to all lands, and he ranks with Lucan, Cervantes, Molière, Swift, &c., among the greatest wits of the world. He was b. at Chinarc, in Touraine, about the year 1483, and was the son of an apothecary, or as some say, an innkeeper. In early life he became a monk of the Franciscan order, and entered the convent at Fontenay le Comte, where partly repelled by the ignorance and indecorum of his companions, and partly because his rude sarcastic humor made them his enemies, he was soon disgusted, and separating from them joined the Benedictines. But the monkish life not suiting his taste, he studied medicine, and for a while practised the art. Remorse, fear, or some other motive, next induced him to procure an absolution from Paul III. for his departure from his monastic vows, and he spent some time as a canon in the abbey of St. Maur des Fosses, where he wrote a greater part of his famous "Pantagruel." He was afterwards transferred to Meudon as a parish priest. He was a conscientious teacher of his people, and delighted to instruct the children of his cure in sacred music. His house was a favorite resort of learned men, and he was noted for his generosity to the needy. It is not known when he completed his great work. The date of the earliest existing edition of the first and second books is 1535, but there were previous editions which have disappeared. Whenever published, it was attacked on all sides, and on opposite grounds. The champions of Aristotle and his enemies, the friends of the Catholic and of the Reformed doctrines, Ramus and Calvin, the monks and the Sorbonne, felt aggrieved alike by its keen ridicule and cutting satire, and fell upon it without mercy. But as his subjects were the vices of the popes, the luxury and avarice of prelates, the libertinism and knavery of the monastic orders, the barbarous theological philosophy of the Sorbonne, and the no less barbarous jurisprudence of the courts, the wonder is, not that he was opposed, but that he escaped with his life. Francis the First, who pronounced his book delectable, extended to him his protection, and the hearts of the general readers echoed his sentiments and sarcasm. Rabelais wrote other works, most of them on medical topics, but none of them are comparable to the "Gargantua and Pantagruel." It alone has rendered his name immortal. He was the master of fourteen languages, and of all the sciences and most of the arts of his time.

At the age of 70, in the year 1573, he d. at Paris.

RABENER, GOTTLIEB WILLIAM, a German satirist, who was controller of the taxes for the circle of Leipsic. His works have been translated into the French and Dutch languages, and republished several times in his own country. B. 1714; d. 1771.

RABUTIN, ROGER, a French wit and satirist; he was dismissed the army for writing a lampoon, and afterwards sent to the Bastille, on account of a libel called "The Amorous History of the Gauls." D. 1693.

RACAN, HONORAT DE BENITE, a well-known French poet, and one of the earliest members of the Academy. B. 1589; d. 1670.

RACINE, JEAN, one of the greatest tragic poets of France, whose reputation and writings have spread over the whole literary world. He was b. at Ferté Milon, December 21st, 1638, but lost his parents when a child, and was educated in the abbey of Port Royal des Champs. He early discovered a love for the old Greek dramatists, especially Euripides, and was a diligent student of their works. His first production, a poem on the marriage of Louis XIV., procured him, through Colbert's mediation, a pension of 2000 livres, and a present of 100 louis d'ors. The "Thebaide," his first tragedy, appeared in 1664, and was warmly received by the public. It was an imitation of Corneille, and greatly inferior to the works by which it was followed, the "Alexandre," the "Andromache," "Les Plaideurs," "Berenice," "Phèdre," &c., most of which still keep possession of the French stage. After a mistaken piety had withdrawn the poet from the theatre, he wrote "Esther," at the request of madame de Maintenon, which was received with great satisfaction by the court, and was represented by the pupils of St. Cyr, in 1689. But after enjoying court favor for nearly all his life, he fell into disgrace with the king, and was so mortified, that he d. April 22d, 1699. A certain formal stiffness and coldness marked all the productions of Racine; yet his tenderness in the delineation of love gives him a place in the highest rank of French poets. In harmony of versification and grace of expression he is without a rival in his native language.—BONAVENTURE, an ecclesiastic, canon of the cathedral of Auxerre, who wrote an ecclesiastical history. B. 1708; d. 1755.

RADCLIFFE, ANN, a female novelist of London, whose maiden name was Ward. Her first performance was a romance called the "Castles of Athlin and Dumblaine," and the next the "Sicilian Romance." But her greatest popularity was achieved by the "Romance of the Forest," and the "Mysteries of Udolpho," the latter particularly, which is still read with breathless eagerness and attention by young masters and mistresses, who initiate themselves by stealth into the horrors and excitements of mysterious adventures. She also published a book of travels in Holland and along the Rhine. Her descriptive powers were of a high order, and have been finely appreciated by Scott, in his "Lives of the Novelists." B. 1764; d. 1823.—JOHN, a celebrated medical practitioner of Wakefield, in Yorkshire, who afterwards removed to London, and became physician to Princess Anne of Denmark. He was also consulted by William III., whose favor he lost by his free and honest speech. In 1699 the king, returning from Holland with his ankles swollen, and his body emaciated, sent for Radcliffe, and asked, "What do you think of these?" He replied, "Why, truly, I would not have your majesty's two legs for your three kingdoms!" He was never again sent for. He was b. in 1650, and when he d. in 1714, he left £40,000 for the erection of a library at Oxford, which still bears his name.

RAE, Sir WILLIAM, an eminent Scottish judge. D. 1842.

RAEBURN, Sir HENRY, an eminent portrait painter, knighted by George IV. He ranked second only to Sir Joshua Lawrence. B. at Stockbridge, near Edinburgh, 1786. D. 1823.

RAFFENEL, CLAUDE DENIS, a French author, who was killed at the siege of Athens, in 1827. B. 1797.

RAFFLES, Sir THOMAS STAMFORD, a distinguished functionary of the English East India Company, who, in 1811, became lieutenant-governor of Java. During his administration he introduced many judicious reforms. He was afterwards at the head of the factory at Bencoolen, in Sumatra, where he continued his reforms, and at last established the free port of Singapore. In the year 1823 he laid the foundation of an Anglo-Chinese college, with the necessary libraries, museums, &c. When he embarked to return to England, all his valuable collections and manuscripts were burnt in a fire which consumed the vessel. He wrote a "History of Java," in two volumes. B. 1781; d. 1826.

RAGHIB PACHA, MOHAMMED, a grand vizier of the Ottoman empire, noted for his literary taste and talent. B. 1702; d. 1768.

RAGOTSKI, FRANCIS, a patriotic prince of Transylvania, who entered into secret negotiations with Louis XIV. to bring about the emancipation of his country from Austrian rule; but his schemes having been detected, he was arrested and condemned to death for high treason. He fortunately managed to make his escape, and then roused the people of Hungary against the imperial despotism. For a time he was prosperous in his career, and was proclaimed protector, but, in the end, certain of the Hungarian states entering into an alliance with Austria, his plans were defeated, he renounced his estates, and took refuge in Turkey. He wrote the memoirs of his own life and adventures. B. 1676; d. 1735.

RAGUENET, FRANCIS, a French biographer and historian, who wrote lives of Cromwell, Turenne, &c. D. 1722.

RAGUET, CONDY, a vigorous writer on subjects of political economy, who flourished during the present century at Philadelphia. His various essays on banking, on tariffs, and the principles of taxation, are remarkable for close logic and force, and created no little influence on the political discussions of the day. B. 1784; d. 1842.

RAIKES, ROBERT, a benevolent and pious printer of Gloucester, in England, whose name will long continue to live as that of the first projector of Sunday schools. B. 1735; d. 1811.

RAIMONDI, MARC ANTONIO, a famous engraver of Bologna, employed by Raphael, and whose school surpassed all others of the same era. Pope Clement VII. imprisoned him for some over free illustrations of the Aretine verses, but was released on account of his "Martyrdom of St. Lawrence." B. 1748; d. 1540.—JOHN BAPTISTE, an orientalist of Cremona, whom Ferdinand de Medici made director of the oriental press, which originated the Propaganda. B. 1540.

RAINOLDS, JOHN, a learned Puritan divine, head of Corpus Christi college, at Oxford; who was one of the translators of the Bible into English. B. 1549; d. 1607.

RALEIGH, Sir WALTER, an illustrious English navigator and historian, b. at Budley, Devonshire, 1552. He did eminent services for Queen Elizabeth, particularly in the discovery of Virginia, and in the defeat of the Spanish armada, and lived in happiness and honor during her reign; but his sun set at her death; for, on the accession of King James, he lost his interest at court, was stripped of his preferments, and unaccountably accused of high treason, tried, and condemned to die. Being reprieved, however, he was committed prisoner to the Tower of London, where he lay many years; and during his confinement devoted the greatest part of his time to study. His writings have been divided into poetical, epistolary, military, maritime, geographical, political, philosophical, and historical. But his grand work was "The History of the World," to the end of the Macedonian empire, 323 B. C., a work of vast compass and endless variety. He received a commission from the king to go and explore the golden mines at Guiana. In the mean time his design, being betrayed to the Spaniards, was defeated; and his eldest son Walter being killed by the Spaniards at St. Thome, the town was burnt by Captain Keymis. Upon this the Spanish ambassador Gondemar, making complaints to the king, a proclamation was published immediately against Raleigh and his proceedings, and threatening punishment in an exemplary manner. Raleigh landed at Plymouth in July, 1618, and was arrested. It was found, however, that his life could not be touched for any thing which had been done at Guiana: therefore a privy seal was sent to the judges, forthwith to order execution in consequence of his former attainder; and he was beheaded in Old Palace-yard, October 29, suffering his fate with great magnanimity.

RALPH, JAMES, a miscellaneous writer, b. at Philadelphia, who accompanied Benjamin Franklin to England, where his political connections secured him a pension. He wrote a "History of England," the "Case of Authors by Profession," the "Use and Abuse of Parliaments," and an "Answer to the Memoirs of Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough." One of his works was a poem called "Night," which Pope alludes to in the "Dunciad," thus,

"Silence, ye wolves, while Ralph to Cynthia howls, Making night hideous,—answer him, ye owls!"

His dramatic attempts were failures. D. 1762.

RAMAGE, ADAM, a native of Scotland, who removed to the United States early in life. His name is identified with an improvement in the printing-press, which was among the first to enlarge the utility of that powerful engine. It was generally adopted in this country, and the press went ever afterwards by the name of the Ramage-press. B. 1770; d. 1850.

RAMBERG, JOHN HENRY, a distinguished engraver and etcher, who studied under Sir Joshua Reynolds, and became court painter at Hanover. His works were numerous, and particularly good in the line of humorous caricature. The drawings to the magnificent edition of Wieland's works were from his pencil. B. 1767.

RAMEAU, JEAN PHILIPPE, an able French theorist in the science of music. He was early attached to a strolling company of performers, for whom he produced a musical entertainment, to be represented at Avignon, when he was 18. Afterwards he was appointed organist in the Clermont cathedral; and in 1722 printed his "Traité de l'Harmonie." This was speedily followed by the "Nouveau Système de Musique Théorique," and his "Génération Musique." He also wrote a great many other works on music. He was 50 years of age when he produced his first opera, "Hippolyte et Arië," which led to "Castor et Pollux," "Dardanus," "Samson," "Pygmalion" and "Zoroastie," besides a large number of ballets and minor pieces. Louis XV. granted him a patent of nobility in honor of his merits. B. 1683; d. 1764.

RAMEL, JEAN PIERRE, a chief of battalion during the French revolution, afterwards appointed commandant of Toulouse, where he was assassinated in 1815. B. 1770.

RAMELLI, AUGUSTIN, an ingenious engineer of Milan, who was distinguished in the army of Charles V. He also wrote a curious book, called "Le Diverse et Artificiose Machine." B. 1521; d. 1590.

RAM KOMUL SEU, a learned Hindoo, who did much to promote the diffusion of knowledge at Calcutta. D. 1844.

RAMLER, CHARLES WILLIAM, a German lyric poet, translator, and critic, professor in the royal military school at Berlin. He attached himself to Frederic the Great, and was called the German Horace, though vastly inferior to the Roman poet of that name. His poetical works appeared in two volumes in 1806. B. 1725; d. 1798.

RAMMOHUN-ROY, Rajah, and by birth a Bramin, was b. 1776, in the province of Bengal. He was educated in the faith of his sect, but soon discovering the diversities of belief both among the Indian and Christian doctors, he resolved to investigate for himself and form his own opinions. In this view, he first went to Thibet and then to Hindostan, where he studied the Sanscrit and other languages. In 1803 he published a book against "The Idolatry of all Religions," which made him many enemies and forced him to retire to Calcutta, where he studied English, and translated from the Sanscrit into the Hindoo tongue. He afterwards published the "Precepts of Jesus," which gave his views of Christ's teaching. In 1831 he visited England, where he was received with the highest marks of attention. D. 1833.

RAMSAY, ALLAN, a Scotch poet, was b. in 1685, at Leadhills; was originally a wig-maker, but became a bookseller; acquired fame by his talents, and fortune by his trade; and d. in 1758. His poems contain much that is worthy of praise; but his fame rests on his delightful pastoral comedy of "The Gentle Shepherd," which is one of the classics of Scottish literature.—His son ALLAN, who was b. in 1709, and d. in 1784, was an eminent portrait painter; and wrote "The Investigator," and "The Present State of the Arts."—ANDREW MICHAEL, usually called Chevalier Ramsay, was b. in 1686, at Ayr, in Scotland; was educated at Edinburgh and Leyden; was tutor in several families of rank, among which were those of the pretender, and the duke of Argyle; and d. in 1743. His principal works are, "The Travels of Cyrus," "Lives of Turenne and Fenelon," and a "Discourse on Epic Poetry."—DAVID, an American historian, was b. in Pennsylvania, in 1749, was educated at Princeton college, and commenced the study of medicine. After practising a short time in Maryland, he removed to Charleston, South Carolina, in 1773, and soon rose to an extensive practice. He took an active and early part in the cause of the colonies, and was for some time a surgeon in the revolutionary army. In 1782 he was chosen to a seat in congress. He wrote a "History of the Revolution in South Carolina," a "History of the American Revolution," a "Life of Washington," a "History of South Carolina," and a "History of the United States." He d. in 1815.

RAMUS, PETER, a French philosopher, was b. in a village of the Vermandois, in 1515. When a boy, he obtained the place of servant in the college of Navarre, where he devoted his leisure hours to study, and became a most consummate scholar. Having ventured to attack the doctrine of Aristotle, he was interdicted from teaching philosophy; but this judgment was reversed by Henry II., and in 1551 he was made royal professor of rhetoric and philosophy. His spirit of free inquiry ultimately led him to become a Protestant; as this could not be long concealed, he was obliged to leave Paris, to which city he returned in 1571, and lost his life in the massacre on St. Bartholomew's day, in the following year. His works on mathematics, philosophy, logic, &c., are numerous.

RANCE, ARMAND JOHN LE BOUTILLIER DE, the reformer of La Trappe, was b. in 1626, at Paris, and adopted the ecclesiastical profession. He obtained several benefices before he was in orders, acquired great celebrity as a preacher, and might have risen to the most elevated stations in the church, had he not taken the resolution of retiring from the world. Various reasons are assigned for this; the most probable of which appears to be, that although he was a man of large fortune, and indulged in all the pleasures of the world, the death of the duchess of Montauban, to whom he was attached, produced such a revulsion in his feelings, that he abandoned society, and retired to his abbey of La Trappe, where he introduced a reform of the most rigid kind in the monastic discipline. He was the author of several theological works, and d. 1700.

RANDOLPH, Sir THOMAS, an eminent statesman, was b. in Kent, 1523, and d. 1590. On the accession of Elizabeth he was sent on embassies to Scotland, France, and Russia. His letters are in different collections, and his account of Russia in "Hackluyt's Voyages."—THOMAS, an English dramatic poet, b. 1605; d. 1634. His "Muse's Looking-Glass," a comedy, is well known and much admired.—THOMAS, a learned divine, was the son of the recorder of Canterbury, where he was b. in 1701, and educated at the king's school. After studying at Oxford, and obtaining his degree of D.D., he received church preferment in his native county, and became, in 1763, archdeacon of Oxford, and Margaret professor of divinity. Among his works are, "The Christian's Faith," "A Vindication of the Doctrine of the Trinity," and "A View of Our Blessed Saviour's Ministry." D. 1788.—JOHN, a learned prelate, a son of the preceding, was b. 1749; studied at Christ-church, Oxford, where he graduated, and in 1783 was elected to the regius professorship of divinity. He became, successively, bishop of Oxford, Bangor, and London; but he did not enjoy the latter diocese more than two years, having d. 1813.—JOHN, an eccentric and arrogant, but influential statesman, b. June, 1773, in Chesterfield county, Va. and received his education at Princeton college. In 1799 he was elected to congress, where he figured for nearly thirty years, as one of the most sarcastic and eloquent speakers of the house. He was also, for two years in the senate. In 1830, President Jackson appointed him minister to Russia; but he had scarcely been presented to the emperor when he returned to England. The latter part of his life was passed in ill health. D. 1833.—PEYTON, first president of the American congress, was a native of Virginia, and one of the most distinguished lawyers and patriots of that state. He was as early as 1756 appointed king's attorney for that colony, and held the office for many years. In 1766 he was elected speaker of the house of burgesses, and in 1773 a member of the committee of correspondence. The following year he was appointed a delegate to the congress which assembled at Philadelphia, and was elected its president, and also presided in the congress of 1775, till obliged to return to Virginia, when Hancock was chosen his successor. He soon resumed his seat in congress, but d. suddenly on the 22d of October, 1775, aged 52.—EDMUND, governor of Virginia, was the son of John Randolph, attorney-general of that colony before the revolution. He was an eminent lawyer, and a warm friend of the revolution. After having held several honorable stations in the state, he was in 1779 elected to a seat in congress, and held it till 1782. In 1787 he was a member of the convention which formed the federal constitution, but voted against its adoption. The next year he was chosen governor of Virginia, and in 1789 was appointed attorney-general of the United States, and in 1794 secretary of state, but engaged in an intrigue with the French minister, by which he lost the confidence of the cabinet, and resigned in August, 1795. D. 1813.

RAPHAEL, or RAFFAELLO SANZIO, DA URBINO, the most celebrated of modern painters, was b. at Urbino, 1483, being the son of a painter named Sanzio. At the age of 13 his father placed him under Perugino, where he soon surpassed his numerous compeers. Three years afterwards he went with Pinturicchio to Siena, to assist him in painting the history of Pius II., for the cathedral there; but Raphael soon left that work to visit Florence, where he improved his style by studying the designs of Da Vinci, and Michael Angelo. His favorite artist, however, was Fra Bartolomeo, who gave him a more correct knowledge of coloring. In 1508 he was invited to Rome by Julius II., who employed him to paint the "School of Athens" in the Vatican. In performing this commission, he gave such satisfaction, that the pope ordered all the pictures, already painted in the various rooms, to be obliterated, and the walls prepared for the productions of Raphael alone, who, with difficulty, succeeded in saving from destruction a ceiling, painted by his old master Perugino. On the accession of Leo X. he prosecuted his labors with increased spirit, and executed his "Attila" and the "Deliverance of St. Peter." The "Cartoons" and the "Transfiguration" were among the last of his labors. To his other talents he added that of being an able architect; the principles of which science he studied under Bramante, who recommended him for his successor in conducting the great work of St. Peter's, the general plan of which, as it now stands, was designed by Raphael. He likewise constructed a number of magnificent buildings, particularly the Caffarelli palæce at Rome. As a sculptor also he evinced great skill, though in that department of art he was able to pay but little attention. D. 1520.

RAPIN DE THOYRAS, PAUL, an historian, was b. in 1661, at Castres, in Languedoc. He studied law under his father, who was an advocate, until the revocation of the edict of Nantes drove him to England, and subsequently to Holland, where he entered a company of French cadets. In 1689 he followed the prince of Orange into England, and distinguished himself at the battle of the Boyne, and the siege of Limerick. In 1707 he settled at Wesel, in the duchy of Cleves, and devoted himself to the composition of his "History of England," which was published at the Hague, and was for a long time in great repute, being the only complete narrative of English events. D. 1725.—RENATUS, a French Jesuit and critic, famous for his skill in classical learning. B. 1621; d. 1687.

RASTALL, JOHN, a learned printer in London, who wrote a "Dramatic Description of Asia, Africa, and Europe." "Canones Astrologici," "Dialogues concerning Purgatory," "Anglorum Regum Chronicum," &c. He married a sister of Sir Thomas More, and d. in 1536.

RAULIN, JOHN, a celebrated French preacher, of the 15th century, whose sermons and letters were greatly admired, and to whom both Rabelais and La Fontaine have been partially indebted for their pathos. B. 1443; d. 1514.—JOSEPH, an ingenious French physician, was b. 1708, and d. at Paris 1784. He wrote several medical treatises.

RAVAILLAC, FRANCIS, the murderer of Henry IV. of France, was b. at Angoulême, in 1578. Having been ruined by a lawsuit, and for a long time confined in prison for debt, his naturally gloomy disposition degenerated into a morbid fanaticism, and he became accustomed to consider the good and humane Henry IV. as the arch-enemy of the church, to destroy whom would be doing God service. Filled with this notion, he followed the royal carriage from the Louvre to the Rue de la Ferronnerie, and while it stopped in the street, in consequence of some obstruction, he mounted the coach wheel, and thrusting his hand in at the window, armed with a knife, stabbed the king to the heart. He was instantly seized, interrogated, and underwent the torture; but he declared he had no accomplice, and on May 27, 1610, his limbs were torn asunder by horses.

RAWLE, WILLIAM, a lawyer and jurist of note, b. at Philadelphia 1759, read law in New York, London, and Paris, and practised in his native city. In 1789 he was chosen a member of the Pennsylvania legislature, and afterwards Washington appointed him district attorney for that state; but though frequently solicited, he never would take office. He was a member of nearly all the literary and scientific societies of the day, and first president of the Penn. Historical Society. His writings were a "View of the Constitution of the United States" and the new Civil Code, prepared by a commission appointed to revise, collate, and digest the Pennsylvania statutes. D. 1836.

RAY, JOHN, a celebrated naturalist, b. at Black Notley, in Essex, in 1628. He received his education at Catharine hall and Trinity college, Cambridge, but lost his fellowship by refusing to comply with the act of uniformity. After this he devoted himself to the study of nature, and in 1663 accompanied Mr. Willoughby on a tour through Europe, of which journey he published an account in 1673. Mr. Ray was elected a fellow of the Royal Society in 1667, and the transactions of that body afford ample proofs of his attention to science. The principal of his works are, "A Collection of English Proverbs," "The Wisdom of God manifested in the Works of the Creation," "Three Discourses concerning the Chaos, Deluge, and Dissolution of the World," "Synopsis Methodica Animalium Quadrupedum," and "Sylloge Stirpium Europeanarum extra Britanniam." D. 1705.

RAYNAL, WILLIAM THOMAS FRANCIS, an eminent French historian and philosopher, was b. at St. Genies, 1718, and after quitting the Jesuits, by whom he was educated, he became an historical and political writer. He joined the French philosophical party, as it was called, adopted their principles to the fullest extent, and became one of the writers in the "Encyclopædia." He also published several works at Paris, the principal of which was his "Political and Philosophical History of the European Settlements in the East and West Indies." This was followed by an essay on the "Revolution of America," written in a style of declamation, and full of enmity to the English. In 1791 the Abbé Raynal addressed a letter to the constituent assembly, in defence of the rights of property, which greatly irritated the revolutionists, and though he escaped the tyranny of Robespierre, he was stripped of his property, and d. in great indigence at Passy, in 1796. Among his other works are, a "History of the Stadtholdership," "History of the Parliament of England," "Historical Anecdotes," "History of the Divorce of Henry VIII. of England," "The Military School," and "Historical Memoirs of Europe."

READ, GEORGE, a distinguished American citizen, of Irish descent, b. in Maryland, 1734. He studied law, and settled in the state of Delaware, where he was attorney-general of the three lower counties from 1763 to 1775. In 1774 he was chosen a member of congress, and was continued during the revolutionary war. He was president of the convention which formed the first constitution of Delaware, a member of the convention which formed the constitution of the United States, and was a senator of the United States. From 1793 to the autumn of 1798, the time of his death, he was chief justice of the state of Delaware. In his several stations of honor and responsibility, he had the reputation for talents and wisdom.—JOHN, a lawyer of Boston, Massachusetts, distinguished for genius, learning, wit, patriotism, eloquence, and integrity, was graduated at Harvard college, in 1697. He studied divinity, and preached for some time with popularity, but at length left that profession for the law, and soon became eminent in the practice. He first reduced the redundant and obscure phraseology of the English deeds of conveyance, to the simple form now in use. He held a conspicuous place for some time also in the house of representatives and council. D. at an advanced age, in 1749.

REAL, GASPARD DE, Seigneur de CURBAN, was b. at Sisteron, in 1682, and d. at Paris, in 1752. He wrote an able work on the "Science of Government."

REAUMUR, RENE ANTOINE FERCHAULT DE, a philosophic naturalist, b. in 1683, at Rochelle; studied under the Jesuits at Poitiers, and afterwards went through a course of law at Bourges. But his tastes led him to the observation of nature; and having made himself acquainted with the mathematical sciences, he was chosen a member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, to which he had presented some memoirs on geometry. He discovered the art of manufacturing porcelain, of converting iron into steel, of tinning iron plates, and of making artificial pearls. He ascertained, also, the existence of mines of turquoises in France equal to those of Persia; and he invented a method of hatching eggs by artificial heat. But he is principally celebrated for being the first who reduced thermometers to a common standard; and the instruments constructed upon his principles still go by his name. His chief works are, "Memoirs of his Discoveries," "The History of Insects," and a "History of the Auriferous Rivers of France."

REBOLLEDO, BERNARDIN, count de, a Spanish soldier, writer, and diplomatist, was b. at Leon 1596, and d. at Madrid in 1677.

REDESDALE, JOHN FREEMAN MIFORD, Baron, an eminent English lawyer and statesman, was b. 1748, educated at New college, Oxford, and having studied at Lincoln's Inn, was called to the bar; in 1782 he published "A Treatise on Pleadings in Suits in the Court of Chancery." He was afterwards made a Welsh judge. In 1789 he was chosen M.P. for Beeralston; in 1793 he was appointed solicitor-general, and in that capacity he assisted in conducting the state trials of Hardy, Horne Tooke, and Thelwall. He succeeded Lord Eldon as attorney-general in 1799. In 1802 he was raised to the peerage, and made lord chancellor, and a member of the privy council in Ireland; but he resigned the seals in March, 1806, in consequence of the death of Mr. Pitt. D. 1830.

REDING, ALOYS, baron von, landemann and general of the Swiss, was b. 1755. On the invasion of Switzerland by the French in 1798, he commanded the troops raised to repel them; but though he obtained some advantages over the enemy, his forces were inadequate to the task assigned them, and the Swiss were compelled to submission. Having afterwards endeavored to secure some degree of independence for his country, Bonaparte had him arrested and confined in the fortress of Arbourg, but he was set at liberty in a few months. He was subsequently at no pains to conceal his antipathy to Bonaparte, and he is believed to have favored the passage of the allied troops through the Swiss territories over the Rhine, after the campaign of 1813. D. 1818.

REED, ISAAC, a critic and miscellaneous writer, was b. in London in 1742, and brought up to the conveyancing business, which he relinquished for literary pursuits. He published the poems of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, edited the Seatonian prize poems, and revised and enlarged Dodsley's "Old Plays." He afterwards also published the "Biographia Dramatica," and four volumes of humorous pieces, under the title of the "Repository;" but the work by which he is most advantageously known is an edition of Shakspeare, embodying in its pages all the most valuable notes and elucidations of former commentators, with much original information. D. 1807.—JOSEPH, a dramatic writer, was b. at Stoekton-upon-Tees, in 1743, and carried on business as a rope-maker at Stepney, till his death in 1787. He was the author of "Dido," a tragedy, "Tom Jones," a comic opera, several farces, &c.—JOSEPH, a patriot of the American revolution, was graduated at the college in New Jersey, in 1757. While a member of congress in 1778, the British commissioner endeavored to procure his influence to bring about a reconciliation between the colonies and the mother country, he rejected their offers with the reply—"That he was not worth purchasing; but such as he was, the king of Great Britain was not rich enough to buy him." In 1778 he was chosen president of Pennsylvania, and retained that office till his death, 1781.

REES, ABRAHAM, a dissenting minister, whose labors as an encyclopædist have gained for him great and deserved celebrity, was b. in Montgomeryshire, 1743, was educated at Hoxton, became theological and philosophical tutor in the new college, founded at Hackney, which place he held till 1795, when that establishment also terminated. In 1776 he was employed as editor of "Chambers's Cyclopædia," which he completed in 1786. After a lapse of 14 years, the proprietors embarked in a more comprehensive undertaking, which also Dr. Rees brought to a conclusion. Besides these literary performances, he published two volumes of "Practical Sermons," and several other works. D. 1825.

REEVE, CLARA, a novelist, was b. at Ipswich, and was the daughter of a clergyman who gave her an excellent education. She possessed great learning and research, which she displayed in her first literary essay, a translation of Barclay's "Argenis." Among her subsequent productions are, "The Progress of Romance," "Memoirs of Sir Roger de Clarendon," "The School for Widows," and the well-known tale of "The Old English Baron." D. 1808.—JOHN, a celebrated comic actor, b. in London, 1799, made his first appearance on the boards of Drury-lane, as "Sylvester Daggerwood," in 1819; was subsequently engaged at the Haymarket, English Opera-house, and Adelphi, and d. 1838. John Reeve was the absolute personification of hilarious jollity and genuine good-humor.—TAPPING, an eminent lawyer, was b. at Brook-Haven, in 1744, and was graduated at Princeton college. He established himself as a lawyer in Litchfield, Connecticut, where he founded the law school, of which, for nearly thirty years he was the principal instructor. He was for many years judge of the supreme court of that state, and some time chief justice. His legal attainments were of a high order, and as a man he possessed the esteem and respect of the community.

REGIUS, URBAN, or LE ROI, a learned poet and controversialist, distinguished also as one of the early reformers, was b. at Langenargen, in Germany. He completed his studies at Ingoldstadt, under Eckius, and when the emperor Maximilian visited that university, he made Regius his poet laureate and orator. He afterwards obtained a professorship, but when the controversy arose between Luther and Eckius, the reformed doctrines operated so strongly upon his conviction, that he sided with the former against his old tutor in polemics. In 1530 he accepted an invitation from the duke of Brunswick to settle as pastor of the church of Lunenberg, and d. in 1541.

REGNARD, JOHN FRANCIS, a comic writer, was b. at Paris, in 1655. He went to Italy about 1676, and was returning home with considerable property, when he was captured by an Algerine corsair, and sold for a slave. During his captivity, he obtained the favor of his master by his skill in cookery; but being caught in an intrigue with one of the women, he was required to turn Mahometan, or suffer death. The French consul, however, saved him by paying his ransom, and Regnard returned to France about 1681. After this he wrote a number of successful comedies, besides poems and other works; was made a treasurer of France, and lieutenant of the waters and forests; and d. 1709.

REGNAULT, MICHAEL LOUIS STEPHEN, a French advocate and statesman, was b. at St. Jean d'Angeli, in 1760; d. 1819.—NOEL, a learned mathematician and philosopher, was b. at Arras, 1683; belonged to the society of Jesuits, and d. at Paris, 1762. He published several scientific and metaphysical works, the principal of which are his "Philosophical Conversations" and his "Ancient Origin of the New Philosophy."

REGNIER, CLAUDE AMBROSE, duke of Massa, minister of justice under the government of Napoleon, was b. at Blamont, in La Meurthe, in 1736; practised as an advocate at Nancy, was a member of the constituent assembly, retired from public affairs during the reign of terror; but after the fall of Robespierre, became a member of the council of ancients, and took an active part in the senate. He assisted in the elevation of Bonaparte as first consul, and, in 1802, he was appointed grand judge, minister of justice, &c. In 1813 he became president of the legislative body, and d. in the following year.—MATHURIN, a French poet, and the first who succeeded in France as a satirist, b. at Chartres, 1572. He was brought up to the church, which he disgraced by his debaucheries; yet he obtained a canonry in the cathedral of his native place, with other benefices, and a pension. D. 1613. His "Satires" still retain a place in the standard literature of his country.

REGULUS, MARCUS ATILII, a Roman general, celebrated for his patriotism and devotion in the service of his country, was made consul a second time about 256 B. C., and, with his colleague, Manlius Vulso, commanded in the first war against Carthage.

REICHARDT, JOHN FREDERIC, a musical composer and author, was b. at Königsberg, in 1751; studied under Kant, was for a long time director of the Italian opera at Berlin, and subsequently had the direction of the French and German theatres at Cassel. Among his compositions, which are very numerous, are the "Tamerlane" of Morel, and the "Panthea" of Berquin. His literary productions are, "Familiar Letters written during a Journey in France in 1792, and again in 1803 and 1804," "Familiar Letters on Vienna," &c.; and "Napoleon Bonaparte and the French People under his Consulate," &c. D. 1814.

REICHENBACH, GEORGE OF, a distinguished mechanical artist, was b. at Mannheim, in 1772, and d. at Munich, in 1826. He and his coadjutor, Fraunhofer, were unsurpassed in the manufacture of optical instruments generally, and quite unrivalled in the execution of telescopes, heliometers, theodolites, &c.

REID, THOMAS, a celebrated Scotch divine and metaphysician, was b. 1709, at Strachan, in Kincardineshire, and educated at the Marischal college, Aberdeen. In 1764 he succeeded Adam Smith as professor of moral philosophy at Glasgow, and d. in 1796. His principal works are, "An Inquiry into the Human Mind," and "Essays on the Intellectual and Active Powers of Man." Dr. Reid was the first writer in Scotland who attacked the skepticism of Hume, and endeavored to refute the ideal theory which was then prevalent.

REINHOLD, ERASMUS, a German mathematician and astronomer, was b. at Salfeldt, in Thuringia, in 1511; became professor of mathematics at Wittenberg, and d. there in 1533. His works are, "Theoria nova Planetarum," "Ptolemy's Almagest, with a Latin version," "Prutenicæ Tabulæ Cœlestium Motuum," and "Primus Liber Tabularum Directionum."

REMBRANDT VAN RHYN, PAUL, one of the most celebrated painters and engravers of the Dutch school, was b. 1606, near Leyden. His passionate love for art disappointed his father's desire of educating him as a scholar; but he received some instruction in the art of painting from Peter Lastman, of Amsterdam, but soon returned home, and pursued his labors there, taking nature as his sole guide. He came into notice by taking a picture to the Hague, where a dealer gave him 100 florins for it; which circumstance procured him employment and pupils. Rembrandt was master of all that relates to coloring, distribution of light and shade, and the management of the pencil; and though he was deficient in some of the other requisites of a true artist, it cannot be denied that his pencil is masterly and unique, possessing an energy and effect belonging to no other painter. His etchings possess a wonderful freedom, facility, and boldness. Rembrandt married the handsome daughter of a peasant, who used to sit to him as a model. He resided during the greater part of his life at Amsterdam, and he soon acquired a large fortune. His habits, however, were low, and his avarice insatiable; so that he lived like a beggar, and descended to the meanest tricks to increase his hoard. D. 1674, or, according to some accounts, in 1688.

REMUSAT, JEAN PIERRE ABEL, an eminent linguist, was b. at Paris, 1788. He was professor of the Chinese and Tartar languages at the college de France; was admitted into the academy of inscriptions in 1816; and, after Visconti's death, in 1818, he was appointed editor of the "Journal des Savans." His principal works are, "Essai sur la Langue et Littérature Chinoises," "Plan d'un Dictionnaire Chinois," "Mélanges Asiatiques," and "Comtes Chinois." D. 1832.

RENAU D'ELISAGARAY, BERNARD, an able French naval architect, was b. in Béarn, in 1652. He was employed at Brest in the construction of large ships; and, in 1680, he conceived the idea of bomb-vessels, which were used at the bombardment of Algiers, and the success of which led to his being appointed to conduct several sieges under Vauban. For these services he was made a captain in the navy, honored with the cross of St. Louis, and rewarded with a pension of 12,000 livres. He wrote, "Théorie de la Manœuvre des Vaisseaux," and d. in 1719.

RENNEL, Major JOHN, was b. at Chudleigh, 1742; first entered the naval service as a midshipman, and served in India, but quitted it for the East India company's military service, and became surveyor-general of Bengal. Returning to England in 1782, he was elected a member of the Royal Society; and from this period he held an extensive correspondence with men of learning both at home and abroad. He now published his celebrated "Memoir and Map of Hindostan," and he assisted in the formation of the Asiatic Society. He was also the author of "Observations on the Topography of the Plain of Troy," three memoirs on the "Geography of Africa," the "Geographical System of Herodotus explained," and the "Marches of the British Army in the Peninsula of India." D. 1830.

RENNIE, JOHN, a celebrated civil engineer and mechanist, was b. at Phantassie, in East Lothian, settled in London in 1783, and first became known by the talent he displayed in the construction of the Albion Mills. His next concern was in superintending the new machinery of Whitbread's brewery, the execution of which increased his fame. He soon, however, became eminent in labors of a superior kind, and stood at the head of the civil engineers of Great Britain. Among his public works may be mentioned, Ramsgate harbor, Waterloo, Southwark, and New London bridges; the Breakwater at Plymouth, the Crinan, Lancaster, Kennet, and Avon, and other canals; and several docks and harbors, among which are those of London, Hull, and Sheerness. But the Bell Rock lighthouse, constructed on the same principle as that of the Eddystone, will, perhaps, be deemed the greatest effort of his genius. D. 1821.

REPTON, HUMPHREY, a private gentleman, distinguished by his skill in ornamental gardening and architecture, was b. at Bury St. Edmunds, in 1752. In 1783 he accompanied Mr. Windham to Ireland, and for a short time held a situation at Dublin, under government. On his return to England, he adopted the profession of landscape gardening, in which he soon obtained extensive celebrity. He published several works on miscellaneous subjects, but his principal productions are on the theory and practice of his art. D. 1818.

RESTOUT, JOHN, a French painter, was b. at Rouen, in 1692, became director of the academy of paintings, and d. in 1768.—His son, who was also a good painter, and a member of the Academy, d. at Paris in 1797.

RETZ, JOHN FRANCIS PAUL DE GONDI, a French cardinal, and a celebrated political character, was b. at Montnirail, in 1613; became coadjutor to his uncle, the archbishop of Paris; and, after many intrigues, and fighting several duels, he was made archbishop of Corinth and a cardinal. He conspired against the life of Cardinal Richelieu, and took a prominent part in opposing Mazarin during the minority of Louis XIV. In short, he was the Catiline of the day. At length Mazarin, who both hated and feared him, imprisoned him in the castle of Vincennes, whence he was removed to Nantes, from which he escaped, and subsequently travelled through Holland, Flanders, and England. In 1675 he wished to give up his cardinal's hat, and retire from the world, but the pope would not receive it; and as the latter years of his life made some amends for his former crimes, he d. at Paris, in 1679.

REUHLIN, JOHN, a celebrated German philologist, b. at Pfortzheim, in 1455. Having studied the law, and obtained the diploma of licentiate in that faculty at Poitiers, he was employed in several diplomatic missions; and while at Rome with Everard, count of Wirtemberg, he was received with the distinction due to his talents, and was particularly noticed by Lorenzo de Medici, at Florence. After the renewal of the league of Suabia, in 1500, Reuchlin was appointed judge of a tribunal at Tübingen, which office he held eleven years. In his old age he was reduced to poverty, and was persecuted by the ecclesiastics for opposing Pfeffercorn's design of burning all the Jewish books except the Bible. Reuchlin was the preceptor of Melancthon, and d. 1522. He composed the first Hebrew grammar and lexicon for the use of Christians, and he was the author of several other works.

REUVENS, JOHN EVERARD, one of the most profound lawyers Holland ever produced, was b. at Haerlem, in 1753; studied at Leyden; acquired great reputation at the Hague as an advocate; and was appointed, in 1795, counsellor to the court of justice of the province of Holland. In 1801 he became president of the high court of justice; and under the regal government, in 1806, he was nominated counsellor of state extraordinary, and subsequently vice-president of the council. On the union of Holland to France, in 1810, he became president of the court of appeal at the Hague; but was soon after invited to Paris, and made counsellor of the court of cassation; which office he relinquished, when, in 1814, the independence of his native country was secured, and returned to the presidency he had quitted at the Hague. He went to Brussels in 1816, on a legal mission, and there perished, the victim of a conspiracy, the authors of which have never been discovered.

REYNEAU, CHARLES RENE, an eminent French mathematician, was b. at Brissac, in 1656, and entered into the congregation of the Oratory. Having become well acquainted with geometry, and studied the Cartesian philosophy, he taught mathematics and physics at Toulon and Angers. He was the author of "Analyse Démontrée," and "Science du Calcul des Grands." D. 1728.

REYNER, EDWARD, a nonconformist divine, was b. in Yorkshire, and educated at Cambridge, where he took his degree in arts, and, about 1627, settled at Lincoln; but in 1662 was ejected from his living, and d. soon after. He wrote "Precepts for Christian Practice," "Vindication of Human Learning and Universities," &c.

REYNOLDS, Sir JOSHUA, an eminent English painter, was the son of a clergyman at Plympton, in Devonshire, where he was b. 1723. He early discovered a predilection for the art of drawing, which induced his father to place him, at the age of 17, with Hudson, the most famous portrait painter in London, with whom he remained three years, and then, upon some disagreement, returned home. He then proceeded to Rome, in which capital, and other parts of Italy, he spent three years. On his return to London, his talent placed him at the head of the English portrait painters; and being a man of literary abilities and an amiable companion, as well as a first-rate artist, he soon numbered among his intimate friends, several of the most distinguished characters of the day. When the Royal Academy was instituted, in 1768, he was unanimously chosen president, and was knighted; and although it was no prescribed part of his duty to read lectures, yet his zeal for the advancement of the fine arts induced him to deliver annual or biennial discourses before the academy on the principles and practice of painting. Of these he pronounced fifteen, from 1769 to 1790, which were published in two sets, and form a standard work. He was a member of the celebrated club which contained the names of Johnson, Garrick, Burke, and others of the first rank of literary eminence, and seems to have been universally beloved and respected by his associates. In 1773 the university of Oxford conferred on Sir Joshua the honorary degree of doctor of laws, and in 1783 he was appointed principal painter to the king. D. 1792.

REYNAC, FRANCIS PHILIP LAURENS DE, a French ecclesiastic, was b. at Longville, in the Limousin, in 1734. He became canon regular of Chancelade, prior of St. Maclou, at Orleans, and an associate of the academy of inscriptions. He is principally known by his "Hymns to the Sun," in the florid prose style of Fenelon. He also wrote "Idylls in prose," "Sacred Poems," &c. D. 1782.

RHEIFEK, CHRISTOPHER, a German musical composer, b. at Memmingen, in 1748. He produced the operas of "Le Nouveau Pygmalion," "Le Fils Reconnaissant," and "Rinaldo;" besides the oratorio, "Der Todgesang Jesu," and a collection of songs. D. 1796.

RHIGAS, or RIGAS, a modern Greek patriot, b. at Velestini, in Thessaly, about 1753. He was soon distinguished for his ready apprehension and extensive acquirements, being intimately acquainted with the ancient literature of Greece, as well as with the Latin, French, German, and Italian languages. Looking forward for an opportunity when his country might throw off the Turkish yoke, he conceived the project of a grand secret society, and among the discontented chiefs who became associated with him, was the pacha Passawan Oglou. He then proceeded to Vienna, which place he made the focus of an extensive correspondence with persons of intelligence possessing similar principles with himself in various parts of Europe. He also commenced a Greek journal for the instruction of his countrymen, composed a treatise on military tactics, drew up a grand chart of all Greece, in 12 divisions, and translated the travels of "Anacharsis the Younger," and other French works. But being treacherously denounced to the Austrian government by one of his associates, as a conspirator against the state, he was arrested at Trieste, and ordered to be delivered up to the Ottoman Porte. His conductors, however, fearing to be intercepted by Passwan Oglon, drowned him in the Danube, together with eight of his companions, who had been arrested at the same time, May, 1798.

RIBERA, ANASTASIUS PANTALEON DE, a Spanish poet, called the Scarron of Spain, was b. at Madrid, and on account of his wit was entertained at the court of Philip IV.—JOSEPH, called Lo SPAGNOLETTO, an eminent painter, was b. at Xativa, in Valencia, about 1589. He was at first a pupil of Caravaggio, and on going to Rome, he studied the works of Raphael, the Caracci, &c., with great advantage. He then visited Parma and Modena, and thence went to Naples, where the viceroy named him his own painter. In 1648, when Don John of Austria visited Naples, Ribera imprudently boasted to him of the beauty of his daughters, which led to an intrigue with one of them, and the prince carried her off. This so affected the father, that, according to some accounts, he left his house suddenly one day, in 1649, and was never again heard of. Others state that he d. at Naples, in 1656.

RICARDO, DAVID, celebrated for his writings on finance and statistics, was b. in London, of a Jewish family, in 1772. His character for probity, industry, and talent, early procured for him the means of support; and, becoming a member of the stock exchange, he accumulated immense property. In 1810 he appeared as a writer in the "Morning Chronicle," on the subject of the depreciation of the national currency; he advocated the principles of Malthus concerning population; and published a treatise on "Political Economy and Taxation," which affords a luminous exposition of the origin and fluctuation of national wealth and expenditure. In 1819, Mr. Ricardo was elected into parliament for the Irish borough of Portarlington; but he never spoke, except on subjects of finance and commerce, on which occasions he was always attended to with great deference. D. 1823.

RICAUT, Sir PAUL, an English traveller and historical writer, was the son of a merchant in London; received his education at Trinity college, Cambridge; and in 1661 went to Constantinople, as secretary to the embassy, and there wrote his "State of the Ottoman Empire." He was next appointed consul at Smyrna, where, by the command of Charles II., he wrote "The present State of the Greek and Armenian Churches;" and on his return home he was made secretary to the lord lieutenant of Ireland, a privy councillor, and a judge of the high court of admiralty. William III. employed him as the English resident in the Hanse Towns, where he continued 10 years. Besides the works before mentioned, he wrote a continuation of Knolles's "History of the Turks," a translation of Platina's "Lives of the Popes," and Garcilasso de la Vega's "History of Peru." D. 1700.

RICCI, LORENZO, the last general of the Jesuits previous to their suppression by Pope Clement XIII., was b. at Florence, in 1703; entered into the order of St. Ignatius at the age of 15; became, successively, spiritual director at the Roman college, and secretary of his order; and succeeded, on the death of Centurioni, in 1758, to the office of general. On the suppression of the Jesuits he was confined as a prisoner in the castle of St. Angelo, and there d. 1775.—SCRIPIO, an Italian prelate, was a nephew of the preceding, and b. at Florence, in 1741. He was raised to the bishopric of Pistoga and Prato, in 1786; and distinguished himself by strenuously seconding the Grand-duke Leopold in the attempt to introduce a reform into the ecclesiastical discipline of the duchy. By doing this, he incurred the displeasure of the pope, was obliged to resign his bishopric, and subsequently underwent much persecution; though he became reconciled to the holy see, in 1805, by signing a formula of adhesion to the bulls which he had objected to. D. 1810.—MATTHEW, a Jesuit and missionary in China, who was in such high favor with the emperor, that he gave him permission to build a church there. D. 1610.

RICCOBONI, LOBOVICO, an eminent comedian and author, was b. at Modena, in 1674, acquired an early reputation on the stage, and was popular both in his own country and at Paris. In 1729 the duke of Parma appointed him inspector of the theatres in his dominions; but in 1731 he returned to Paris, where he devoted his last years to literature, and d. 1752. He wrote several comedies and poems, besides a "History of the Italian Theatre," and other works on dramatic subjects.—ANTHON FRANCIS, son of the preceding, was b. at Mantua, in 1707, and was also an actor and a dramatic writer. His comedies were very successful, but what he gained by the stage he spent in foolish attempts to discover the philosopher's stone. D. 1772.—His wife was a celebrated French novelist; but from the neglect of her husband she suffered much, and d. in 1792.

RICE, JOHN HOLT, an eminent Presbyterian clergyman of Virginia, who was professor in the Union theological school of that state, established in 1824. He was also for some years editor of the Virginia "Evangelical and Literary Magazine." And he published "Memoirs of Samuel Davis," an "Illustration of the Presbyterian Church in Virginia," and a "Discourse before the Foreign Board of Missions." B. 1779; d. 1831.

RICHARD I., king of England, surnamed Cœur de Lion, was b. in 1157, and ascended the throne on the death of his father, Henry II., in 1189. D. 1199.—II., king of England, the son of Edward, prince of Wales, commonly called the Black Prince, was b. in 1366, and succeeded Edward III., his grandfather, in 1377. D. 1392.—III., king of England, b. in 1450, was the brother of Edward IV., and created duke of Gloucester. He is represented as having been of diminutive stature, deformed from his birth, and of a forbidding aspect; but far more depraved in his mind than forbidding in his person. Slain at Bosworth, 1485.

RICHARDSON, JONATHAN, a painter and author, was b. about 1665. He quitted the profession of a scrivener to become a pupil of Riley, the portrait painter, whose niece he married. After the death of Kneller and Dahl, he was considered at the head of his profession in England. He was the author of an "Essay on the Art of Criticism in Painting," "An Argument in behalf of the Science of a Connoisseur," "Account of Statues, Bas-reliefs, Drawings, and Pictures, in Italy," "Notes and Remarks on Paradise Lost," &c. D. 1745.—JOSEPH, a lawyer and poet, was b. at Hexham, in Northumberland, was entered of St. John's college, Cambridge, in 1774, became a student of the Middle Temple in 1779, and was called to the bar in 1784. He wrote "Criticisms on the Rolliad" and "Probationary Odes for the Laureateship," two satirical works on public characters, which were very popular at the time, and "The Fugitive," a successful comedy. D. 1803.—SAMUEL, a celebrated novelist, was b. 1689, in Derbyshire, and received his education at a common day-school. At the usual age he was bound apprentice to a London printer, and after the expiration of his time he worked as a compositor and corrector of the press some years. At length he took up his freedom, and set up business for himself, first in a court in Fleet-street, and afterwards in Salisbury square. He became one of the principal in his profession, and, by the interest of Mr. Onslow, speaker of the house of commons, obtained the printing of the Journals. In 1754 he was chosen master of the stationers' company, and, in 1760, he purchased a moiety of the patent of law-printer to the king. In 1740 he published "Pamela," the popularity of which was so great, that it ran through five editions in one year, being recommended even from the pulpit. In 1748 "Clarissa" fully established his literary reputation, and its pathos, its variety of character, and minute development of the human heart, will cause it ever to be regarded as a work of real genius. The "History of Sir Charles Grandison" appeared in 1753, and was received with great applause. Besides these works, all of which have a moral tendency, Mr. Richardson published a volume of "Familiar Letters for the Use of Young People," and an edition of "Æsop's Fables, with Reflections." His "Correspondence" with persons of eminence was published in 1804, with his "Life" by Mrs. Barbauld. D. 1761.—WILLIAM, a poet and miscellaneous writer, was a son of the minister of Aberfoyle, and was educated at the university of Glasgow. He accompanied Lord Cathcart, who had been his pupil, to Russia; and was for more than forty years professor of humanity at Glasgow. Among his works, all of which are marked by eloquence and erudition, are "Anecdotes of the Russian Empire," "Essays on Shakspeare's Dramatic Characters," "Observations on the Study of Shakspeare," poems, and tales. D. 1814.—JOHN J., an eminent judge of South Carolina, and a member of congress elect, from that state, in 1820, but he refused to quit the bench. D. 1850.

RICHELIEU, ARMAND JOHN DU PLESSIS, a cardinal, and minister of state in France, was b. at Paris, 1585. He was at first intended for the army, but the bishopric of Luçon being open to him by the resignation of his brother, he studied theology, and obtained the mitre before he was 22. He was also appointed grand almoner, and in 1616 made secretary of state. When Mary de Medici fell into disgrace, Richelieu was banished to Avignon, where he wrote his "Method of Controversy." Being soon after recalled to court, he brought about a reconciliation between the king and queen, for which he was rewarded with a cardinal's hat, and appointed prime minister. Being a man of prodigious capacity and of a restless and insatiable ambition, he formed to himself vast designs, which made his whole life a series of agitations and inquietudes: still he showed himself a patron of men of letters, and caused the arts and sciences to flourish in the kingdom. He abounded, however, rather with great qualities than good ones, and therefore was much more admired than beloved. D. 1642, amidst political storms.—LOUIS FRANCIS ARMAND DU PLESSIS, duke of, a French marshal, descended from the same family as the cardinal, was b. 1696. After the death of Louis XIV., he was admitted into the court of the regent, duke of Orleans, and he largely participated in its profligacy. He was sent to the Bastille in 1716, for fighting a duel with the count de Gacé, and again in 1719, as an accomplice with the Spanish ambassador, in a conspiracy against the regent. He distinguished himself under Villars, and afterwards at Kehl, Philipsburgh, Dettingen, and Fontenoy; conquered Minorca, forced the duke of Cumberland to submit to the capitulation of Glosterseven, and devastated the electorate of Hanover. In 1781 he obtained the rank of dean of the French marshals; and he concluded his long career, varied as it was with acts of heroism and villany, in 1788.—ARMAND EMANUEL DU PLESSIS, duke of, grandson of the preceding, was b. at Paris, in 1776, and eventually became prime minister to Louis XVIII. He emigrated at the commencement of the revolution, entered the Russian service, and distinguished himself at the siege of Ismail, for which he was rewarded with the rank of major-general. In 1801 he revisited France, when Bonaparte endeavored to attach him to his service; but he returned to Russia, and in 1803 he was appointed governor of Odessa, which city, by his prudent measures, he raised from insignificance to the height of prosperity. On the restoration of the Bourbons, he took his seat in the chamber of peers, accompanied Louis XVIII. to Ghent, and, returning with him to Paris after the battle of Waterloo, was appointed president of the council of ministers, and placed at the head of the foreign department. He soon resigned his post, but again held the office of prime minister in 1820, and d. 1822.

RICHMOND, LEGH, a clergyman, was b. at Liverpool, in 1772, became chaplain to the Lock hospital, London, and afterwards rector of Turvey, in Bedfordshire. He is principally known as the author of "Annals of the Poor," containing the "Dairyman's Daughter," and other devotional tales, written with great force, originality, and pathos. He also wrote a work, entitled "The Fathers of the English Church," &c. D. 1827.

RICHTER, JOHN PAUL FREDERIC, a celebrated German novelist, was b. in Franconia, in 1763, studied at Leipsic, was intimately associated with Goethe, Herder, and the galaxy of genius that gave its celebrity to Weimar, finally settled at Baireuth, and d. 1825. His works are very numerous. They are generally in the form of romances; but many of them treat of abstruse questions in philosophy, and with all their singularity of style, evince the profoundest erudition, infinite humor, and a richness of imagery which have earned for their author the title of "The only One." Among his most celebrated works are, "Titan," "Hesperus," "Das Campaner Thal," "Selina," and "Levana," and an admirable treatise on education.

RIDER, WILLIAM, an English divine, several years under-master of St. Paul's school, and lecturer of St. Vedast, Fosterlane. He published a "History of England," a "Commentary on the Bible," and other compilations. D. 1785.

RIDGELY, CHARLES G., was b. in Baltimore, Md., on the 2d July, 1784, and entered the navy on the 17th of October, 1799. He was the first midshipman appointed from the city of Baltimore. He was with Commodore Preble at the battle of Tripoli, and when the expedition was fitting out to endeavor to cut out the American frigate Philadelphia, then lying under the enemy's guns, and volunteers were called for, he was one of the first to offer, but was refused. Still, being most anxious to participate in that lamentable expedition, he concealed himself in the boat, but, being discovered, returned to his ship. For his gallant conduct in the Tripolitan war he received a gold medal from congress. D. 1848.

RIDLEY, GLOSTER, an English divine, and a dramatic and theological writer. B. 1702; d. 1774.—JAMES, his eldest son, was author of "The Tales of the Genii" and some other literary performances.—NICHOLAS, an eminent English prelate and Protestant martyr, was b. in 1500, at Tynedale, and educated at Cambridge. He travelled on the Continent, and, during a three years' absence from his native country, became acquainted with several of the early reformers, whose doctrines he afterwards warmly espoused. Returning to Cambridge, he filled the office of proctor to the university, and as such protested against the claims of the papal see to the supreme ecclesiastical jurisdiction in the realm. He was also chosen public orator, became one of the king's chaplains, and was finally elevated to the see of London, where he discharged the duties of his office with unwearied diligence. He was likewise employed in all the most important ecclesiastical measures of that reign, particularly in the compiling of the liturgy, and the framing of the articles of religion. But one of the most distinguished acts of his life was that of inciting King Edward to endow the three great foundations of Christ's, Bartholomew's, and St. Thomas's hospitals. Having unadvisedly concurred in the proclamation of Lady Jane Grey, he was, on the death of Edward, marked out as one of the most prominent victims of papal authority; and being condemned, as a heretic, to the stake, he snuffed, with the venerable Latimer, at Oxford, Oct. 15, 1555.

RIEDEL, FREDERICA CHARLOTTE LOUISA, Baroness, wife of Col. Riedesel, who commanded the troops at Brunswick, employed in the English service in America, in 1777, accompanied her husband, and wrote an interesting account of her adventures, entitled "Voyage de Mission en Amérique," &c. She returned to Europe in 1783; and, having lost her husband, fixed her residence at Berlin, where she d. in 1803.

RIEDINGER, JOHN ELIAS, a celebrated painter of animals, b. at Uhn, in Suabia, in 1695; d. 1767.

RIEGO, RAFAEL DEL, a Spanish patriot, was b. in the Asturias, 1785. The enthusiasm with which he embraced the cause of independence rendered him a zealous patriot, and a long imprisonment in France afforded him leisure to contemplate the miseries of his countrymen. Before he returned to Spain, he visited Germany and England. Till 1820 every effort for liberty had been followed by exile, and the horrors of the inquisition; nearly all the chiefs who favored liberty were in confinement: but the valor of Riego was at once triumphant; he delivered Quiroga from the hands of his jailers, and, on the 1st of January, his troops proclaimed the constitution. General O'Donnell made his victory difficult, but he was victorious; and in the first sitting of the cortes, in 1822, they appointed him their president. At the height of his glorious career his moderation was most conspicuous; he avoided parade, and displayed real magnanimity, prudence, and disinterestedness. Fortune, however, changed; Ferdinand VII. was reinstated. He was taken prisoner after the surrender of Cadiz, conveyed to Madrid, condemned to an ignominious death, and suffered, Nov. 7, 1823.

RIENZI, NICHOLAS GABRINI DE, a native of Rome, who in the 14th century obtained great celebrity by his attempts to restore the republic. He was of low origin, but had received a liberal education, and possessed great eloquence and lofty views, which induced his fellow-citizens to send him as one of their deputies to Pope Clement VI., then at Avignon. Rienzi, on this occasion, drew so affecting a picture of the distressed state of the city, that the pope appointed him apostolic notary, which office he discharged with great credit. But while he appeared actuated by the purest principles, he was secretly forming a conspiracy for the alteration of the government, and he let no opportunity pass of exciting the discontent of the people, by baranguing against the nobility and the defects of the public administration. By these means he became the idol of the people, who conferred upon him the title of tribune, with the power of life and death, and all the other attributes of sovereignty. What was more extraordinary, the pope confirmed the title, and Rienzi for some time governed the city with judgment and moderation. But the intoxication of supreme power betrayed him into extravagances, and he was expelled, and imprisoned for three years by Clement VI. He was released by Innocent II., who sent him again to the Roman capital as governor. But Rienzi's cruelties raised him new enemies, and he was massacred in 1354, about seven years after the commencement of his extraordinary career.

RIGAUD, HYACINTHE, an eminent portrait painter, was b. at Perpignan, in 1668, and d. at Paris, 1743. He met with distinguished patronage, and has been called the Vandyke of France.—STEPHEN PETER, Savilian professor of astronomy in the university of Oxford, was b. at Richmond, in Surrey, and may almost be said to have been the inheritor of scientific pursuits, both his father and grandfather having filled the office of observer in the royal observatory at Kew. His contributions to the scientific works of the day were both numerous and valuable. B. 1775; d. 1839.

RILEY, JOHN, an eminent painter, b. in London, in 1646. After the death of Sir Peter Lely he was appointed painter to the king, and rose greatly in public estimation; but, according to the opinion of Lord Orford, he was so distrustful of his own merit, that his modesty and humility were great impediments to his advancement. D. 1691.

RINGGLI, GOTHARD, a celebrated Swiss artist, was b. at Zurich, in 1575, and d. in 1635.

RINUCCINI, OCTAVIO, a Florentine poet, who went to France with Mary de Medici, and is said to have been the first who invented the opera, or musical drama, in the year 1600. He wrote three pieces, "Daphne," "Eurydice," and "Ariadne." D. 1621.

RIOJA, FRANCISCO DE, an eminent Spanish poet, was b. in 1600, and became librarian and historiographer to Philip IV. D. 1659.

RIPLEY, GEORGE, an English alchemist and poet, who d. in 1490. He wrote a work, entitled "A Compound of Alchymie," &c., and "Aurum Potabile, or the Universal Medicine."

RIPPERDA, JOHN WILLIAM, baron de, a celebrated adventurer, was b. of a noble family in Groningen, in 1680; served some time as colonel of infantry in the Dutch army; and, in 1715, was sent on a mission to Spain, where he acquired such an ascendancy over Philip V., that the monarch took him into his service, made him prime minister, and created him a duke. At length he fell into disgrace, and was imprisoned in the castle of Segovia, whence he escaped in 1728, and went to England.

In 1731 he went to Morocco, where he was favorably received by Muley Abdalla, and declaring himself a convert to the Mahometan religion, and taking the name of Osman, he obtained the chief command of the Moorish army at the siege of Centa. But the Moors being defeated, he fell from his second elevation; and, retiring to Tetuan, he there d. in 1737.

RIQUET, PETER PAUL DE, a celebrated French civil engineer, b. at Beziers, in 1604. He projected the noble canal of Languedoc, which opens a communication between the Mediterranean and the bay of Biscay. It was commenced in 1666, and carried on during the remainder of his life. After his death, which occurred in 1680, his two sons completed it.

RISDON, TRISTRAM, an English topographer; author of a "Description of Survey of the County of Devon." B. 1580; d. 1640.

RITSON, ISAAO, a poet and miscellaneous writer, was b. near Penrith, in Cumberland, in 1761; received a medical education at Edinburgh; went to London, where he became an author by profession; and d. in 1789.—JOSEPH, an English lawyer and antiquary, was b. at Stockton, in Durham, in 1752; settled in London as a conveyancer, and purchased the office of high-bailiff of the Savoy; and d. in 1803. As an antiquary, particularly in early English poetry, he exhibited much industry and intelligence; but his morbid singularities of temper, and his avowed contempt for religion, more than counterbalanced whatever merit he might have otherwise possessed. It would, however, be uncharitable not to attribute his imperfections to a species of long protracted mental derangement, of which distressing malady he d. in 1803. His principal publications are, "A Collection of English Songs," "The English Anthology," "Metrical Romances," "Biographia Poetica," &c.

RITTENHOUSE, DAVID, a celebrated American mathematician, was b. in Pennsylvania, in 1732. In 1769 the American Philosophical Society employed him to observe the transit of Venus; and he afterwards constructed an observatory, where he made some important discoveries. After the revolutionary war, he was appointed director of the mint and treasurer of his native province. He also succeeded Franklin as president of the Philosophical society. D. 1796.

RITTER, JOHN WILLIAM, a celebrated German philosopher, was b. at Samitz, in Silesia, in 1776. The study of electricity occupied his chief attention; and in 1798 he started the idea that the phenomena of animal life are connected with galvanic action; but, though highly scientific, he advocated the reveries of animal magnetism, &c. He wrote "Physico-Medical Memoirs," and other works. D. 1810.

RITTERSHUYS, CONRAD, an eminent civilian and philologist, b. at Brunswick, in 1560. He became professor of law at Altorf; wrote some works on civil law, and notes upon Greek and Latin authors. D. 1618.—NICHOLAS, his son, became professor of feudal law at Altorf, where he d. in 1670. He published a collection, entitled "Genealogia Imperatorum, Regum, Ducum, Comitum," &c.

RIVAROI, ANTHONY, count de, an able French writer, was b. at Bagnois, in Languedoc, in 1757, and d. at Berlin, in 1801. His chief works are, "Discours sur l'Universalité de la Langue Française," "L'Enfer," translated from Dante; "Lettres sur la Religion et la Morale," "Petit Almanach des grands Hommes," and "Lettres à la Noblesse Française."

RIVAUT, DAVID, a French mathematician, b. at Laval, about 1571, who became tutor in mathematics and military tactics to Louis XIII., and was made a counsellor of state. D. 1616.

RIVAZ, PETER JOSEPH DE, a skilful French mechanist and chronologer, b. in 1711. He made a watch which had the singular property of winding up spontaneously, invented an improved pendulum, &c. He also drained the mines of Pontpeau, in Britany, and made many mechanical discoveries. D. 1772.

RIVIERE, MERCIER DE LA, a celebrated French political economist, who obtained the post of counsellor of the parliament of Paris in 1747; was afterwards made intendant of Martinique; and, on his return, published his noted work, entitled "L'Ordre naturel et essentiel des Sociétés Politiques." The singularity of his schemes and his high pretensions were ridiculed by Voltaire, Grimm, and others; but had some of his precautionary advice been attended to, it is possible that the revolution, which he lived to witness, would not have taken place. D. 1794.—The Duke de, governor of the young duke of Bordeaux, was a devoted servant of the Bourbons.

He emigrated with the French princes in 1789, served in the army of Condé, and became aid-de-camp to the ex-king of France, Charles X. Seven times he entered France in disguise, to correspond with the friends of his royal master; but in 1804 he was arrested, tried, and sentenced to death, from which he escaped through the intercession of Josephine, his punishment being mitigated into an imprisonment for four years.

RIVINUS, AUGUSTUS QUIRINUS, an eminent botanist and physician, whose real name was Bachmann, was b. at Leipsic, in 1652. D. 1723.

RIZZIO, DAVID, the son of a music and dancing-master at Turin, was b. there in the earlier part of the 16th century. His musical abilities procured him notice at the court of Savoy, while his talents as a linguist caused him to be selected by the ambassador from the grand duke to Mary, queen of Scots, as a part of his suite. In 1564 he first made his appearance at Holyrood house, where he soon became so great a favorite with the queen, that he was appointed her secretary for foreign languages. The distinction with which he was treated by his royal mistress excited the envy of the nobles, and the jealousy of Darnley. A conspiracy, with the king at its head, was accordingly formed, for his destruction; and before he had enjoyed two years of court favor, the Lord Ruthven and others of his party were introduced by Darnley himself into the queen's apartment, where they assassinated the unfortunate object of their revenge, who fell at the feet of his royal mistress, having received no less than 56 stabs in her presence, 1566.

ROBERT, HUBERT, an eminent French painter, was b. at Paris, 1732, and may be considered the first artist of the French school who studied with effect the decline and ruin of the monuments of ancient architecture. D. 1808.—PETER FRANCIS JOSEPH, a French revolutionary statesman, b. near Givet, in 1743. Becoming secretary to Danton, he was elected a deputy to the convention, in which he voted for the death of the king. Having married Mademoiselle Keralio, he adopted the literary profession, and wrote several political works.—LOUISE FELICITE DE KERALIO, his wife, was b. at Paris, 1758, and d. at Brussels, 1821. Among her works were, "Histoire d'Elizabeth, Reine d'Angleterre," "Amélie et Caroline," besides several translations from English authors.

ROBERTS, EMMA, a lady of distinguished literary talent, and an early friend of the ill-fated Miss Landon. She was the author of "Memoirs of the Rival Houses of York and Lancaster, Historical and Biographical," "Oriental Scenes, Sketches, and Tales," &c. D. at Poonah, in India, 1840; the object of her mission thither having been the further illustration of life and manners in the East.

ROBERTSON, WILLIAM, a celebrated historian, was b. in 1721, at Borthwick, where his father was minister. Having completed his theological studies at Edinburgh, he obtained a license to preach, and in 1753 was presented to the living of Gladsmuir, in East Lothian. He soon became distinguished by his eloquence and good taste as a preacher; but it was not till 1759 that, by his "History of Scotland," he acquired a place among British classical writers. The distinction and patronage acquired by this work, which reached a fourteenth edition before his death, appeared in his successive preferments. He became chaplain of Stirling castle in 1759, king's chaplain in 1761, principal of the university of Edinburgh in 1762, and historiographer-royal of Scotland in 1764. Notwithstanding his numerous pursuits and official avocations, he found time to employ himself in his celebrated "History of Charles V.," which, in 1777, was followed by the "History of America;" and his last publication was "An Historical Disquisition concerning the Knowledge which the Ancients had of India." D. 1793.

ROBESPIERRE, FRANCIS MAXIMILIAN JOSEPH ISIDORE, one of the most celebrated and most violent leaders of the French revolution, was b. in 1759, at Arras, where his father was a lawyer. He was left an orphan at the age of nine years, but was protected by the bishop of Arras, who placed him at the college of Louis XVI., at Paris. Returning to his native place, he became an advocate in respectable practice. His political career began in 1789, when he was sent a deputy from the bailiwick of Arras to the states-general. He held a seat in all the subsequent legislative bodies, and gradually acquired influence in them, and unbounded popularity among the people, from whom he obtained the title of "the incorruptible." It was in the convention, however, that he rose to his greatest eminence. He was the acknowledged head of the Jacobins, and, after the defeat of the Girondists and Dantonists, was, in a manner, the ruler of France. He would, perhaps, have established his authority had not some of his accomplices discovered that he had devoted them to the scaffold. A struggle ensued, in which he was defeated, and, with many of his partisans, he was guillotined, July 9, 1794.

ROBIN, JEAN, a celebrated French botanist, to whose care the Jardin des Plantes, at Paris, was first confided. B. 1550; d. 1597.

ROBINS, BENJAMIN, an English mathematician of great genius and eminence, was b. at Bath, 1707, was a teacher of mathematics, became engineer-general to the East India Company, wrote "New Principles of Gunnery," and was the real narrator of Lord Anson's "Voyage round the World," though it was published under the name of Walter. D. 1751.

ROBINSON, ANASTASIA, a public singer of some eminence in the early part of the last century, who quitted the stage in consequence of her marriage with the earl of Peterborough. D. 1750.—MARY, a poetess and miscellaneous writer, whose maiden name was Darby, was b. 1758, at Bristol. At the age of 15 she was married to an attorney of the name of Robinson, which precipitate step appears to have imbittered the rest of her life. Being reduced in circumstances, she had recourse to the stage, and made her first appearance at Drury-lane, in the character of Juliet, in which she was instructed by Mr. Garrick. Her reception was very flattering, and she continued to perform in various characters till her representation of Perdita, in the "Winter's Tale," when her beauty attracted the admiration of the prince of Wales, (afterwards George IV.,) in consequence of which she quitted the stage, and became his mistress. This connection, however, was but of short duration. In 1784 she had the misfortune to be attacked by a violent rheumatism, which progressively deprived her of the use of her limbs, and she was partly dependent on her pen for the means of living. She wrote a number of poetical pieces under the name of Laura Maria; besides which she was the author of "Vanceza," a romance; "Poems," "Walsingham," a novel; her "Memoirs," &c. D. 1800.—RICHARD, archbishop of Armagh and Baron Rokeby, was b. in Yorkshire, in 1709, and d. in 1794. The archbishop, besides building a palace at Armagh, with an observatory, founded a school and a public library there.

which last he furnished with a large collection of books, and left a liberal endowment for its support. He also erected four new churches in his diocese.—JOHN, minister of the church in Holland, to which the first settlers of New England belonged, was b. in Great Britain in 1575, and educated at Cambridge. In 1602 he became pastor of a dissenting congregation in the north of England, and removed with them to Holland in 1608. It was his intention to follow his congregation to the new world, but his sudden death in 1625 prevented.

ROB ROY, which signifies Robert the Red, was a celebrated Highland freebooter, whose true name was Robert Macgregor, but who assumed that of Campbell, on account of the outlawry of the clan Macgregor by the Scotch parliament, in 1662. He was b. about 1660, and was the younger son of Donald Macgregor of Glengyle, said to have been a lieutenant-colonel in the service of James II., by his wife, a daughter of Campbell of Glenfalloch. Like other Highland gentlemen, Rob Roy was a trader in cattle previous to the rebellion of 1715, in which he joined the adherents of the Pretender. On the suppression of the rebellion, the duke of Montrose, with whom Rob Roy had previously had a quarrel, took the opportunity to deprive him of his estates; and the latter began to indemnify himself by a war of reprisals upon the property of the duke. An English garrison was stationed at Inversnaid, near Aberfoyle, the residence of Rob Roy; but his activity and courage saved him from the hands of his enemies, from whom he continued for some time to levy black mail. The time of his death is uncertain, but he is known to have survived the year 1733, and d. at a very advanced age.

ROBSON, GEORGE FENNEL, an eminent draughtsman and landscape painter in water-colors, was b. at Durham, and d. 1833.

ROCHAMBEAU, JEAN BAPTISTE DONATIEN DE VIMEUR, count de, marshal of France, was b. at Vendome, in 1725, and entered the army at the age of 16. In 1746 he became aid-de-camp to Louis Philippe, duke of Orleans; and afterwards obtaining the command of the regiment of La Marche, distinguished himself at the battle of Lafeldt, where he was wounded; obtained fresh laurels at Creveldt, Minden, Corbach, and Clostercamp; and, having been made lieutenant-general, was, in 1780, sent with an army of 6000 men to the assistance of the United States of America. Having disembarked in Rhode Island, he acted in concert with Washington, first against Clinton, in New York, and then against Cornwallis, Rochambeau was raised to the rank of marshal by Louis XVI., and, after the revolution he was appointed to the command of the army of the north; but he was superseded by more active officers, and, being calumniated by the popular journalists, he addressed to the legislative assembly a vindication of his conduct. A decree of approbation was consequently passed in May, 1792, and he retired to his estate, near Vendome, with a determination to interfere no more with public affairs. He was subsequently arrested, and narrowly escaped suffering death under the tyranny of Robespierre. In 1803 he was presented to Bonaparte, who granted him a pension, and the cross of grand officer of the legion of honor. D. 1807.

ROCHE, REGINA MARIA, a novelist, whose productions were very popular in their day, was b. 1765. Among her fictions were "The Children of the Abbey," a great favorite also; "The Nocturnal Visit," "The Monastery of St. Columb," and many others. But they have almost faded from the memory, or been overwhelmed by the myriad volumes which have succeeded them. D. 1845.

ROCHESTER, JOHN WILMOT, earl of, a witty and profligate nobleman of the court of Charles II., was b. 1648, and, on the death of his father, succeeded to his titles and estates, the latter of which, by extravagance, he soon dissipated. He became the personal friend and favorite of his sovereign, who is said to have encouraged and shared many of his exploits. The levity of his disposition frequently brought him into disgrace, and he was more than once forbidden the royal presence: his companionable qualities, however, which made him necessary to the amusement of his master, prevented his occasional exile from being ever of long continuance. His constitution at length gave way under such excesses; and, at the age of 30, he was visited with all the debility of old age. He lingered for some time in this condition, and d., professing great penitence for his misspent life, in 1680. His satirical poems are keen, but their obscenity and impiety render them alike dangerous and disgusting.

ROCKINGHAM, CHARLES WATSON

WENTWORTH, marquis of, a British statesman, b. 1730, succeeded his father in his titles and estates in 1750, and in 1765 became first lord of the treasury. American affairs formed at that time a leading subject of discussion; and Rockingham took the middle way, by repealing the stamp act, and declaring the right of Great Britain to tax the colonies. He was, therefore, deserted by some of his supporters, and retired from the ministry in 1766. He afterwards acted in concert with Chatham, in opposition to the ministry of Lord North; on the fall of which, in 1782, he was again placed at the head of the administration, but d. in the same year, and was succeeded by Lord Shelburne.

RODGERS, JOHN, a commodore of the United States navy, was b. in Maryland, 1771; served in the merchant service for several years, and entered the navy in 1797. He first distinguished himself in bringing the French frigate L'Insurgente, captured by the Constellation, safely into port in her dismantled condition. At St. Domingo he was of great service in saving the white population from the vindictive fury of the blacks. In 1802 he was successful in an engagement with the largest frigate of Tripoli. During the late war with England his exploits were of the most brilliant kind, and useful to his country. D. 1838.

RODNEY, GEORGE BRYDGES, Lord, a gallant English admiral, was the son of Captain Henry Rodney, a naval officer. He entered the navy early in life, and obtained the command of a ship in 1742. In 1749 he was appointed governor of Newfoundland; and on his return, in 1753, married the sister of the earl of Northampton. In 1759 he was made admiral of the blue; and in the same year he destroyed the stores prepared at Havre de Grace for an invasion of England. In 1761 he served on the West India station with such activity that, at the conclusion of the war, he was made a baronet. In 1768 he was elected into parliament for Northampton; but the contest ruined his estate, and he found it necessary to retire to the Continent. The French government made some overtures to him, which would have recruited his fortune. These he rejected; and, the fact having transpired, he was placed in command of a squadron, destined for the Mediterranean. In 1780 he fell in with Langara's fleet, off Cape St. Vincent, and completely defeated it; and on the 12th of April, 1782, obtained a decisive victory over the French fleet under De Grasse, capturing five and sinking one of his largest vessels. A barony and a pension of £2000 were bestowed upon him for his services; and on his decease, in 1792, a monument was voted to his memory, at the national expense, in St. Paul's cathedral. —CÆSAR, a signer of the declaration of American independence, was b. at Dover, Maryland, in 1730. He was sent as a delegate to the congress of 1774, and remained in that body till the autumn of 1776. He was afterwards president of his native state for about four years. D. 1783.

RODOLPH I., emperor of Germany, and founder of the imperial house of Austria, was b. in 1218, being the eldest son of Albert IV., count of Hapsburg and landgrave of Alsace. D. 1291.

ROEMER, OLAUS, a Danish astronomer, was b. at Arhusen, in Jutland, in 1644. He studied at the university of Copenhagen, where he applied so diligently to the mathematics, that he was appointed tutor to the dauphin of France. In 1681 he returned to his native place, and held several considerable offices previous to his decease, which took place in 1710. He made many scientific discoveries, the most important of which was that of the velocity of light, from the observation of the eclipses of Jupiter's satellites. D. 1710.

ROGERS, JOHN, an eminent English divine of the 16th century, was educated at Cambridge, and became chaplain to the factory at Antwerp, where he assisted Tindal and Coverdale in translating the Bible into English. In the reign of Edward VI. he returned to England, and obtained a prebend in St. Paul's cathedral. He was the first person executed in the succeeding reign on the score of his religion, being burnt at Smithfield, in 1555.

ROHAN, HENRY, duke of, a very distinguished peer of France, b. in 1579. After the death of Henry IV., in 1610, he became the chief of the Huguenots; and having ably maintained three wars against Louis XIII., procured a peace upon advantageous terms, 1629. He distinguished himself also as a political writer, but at length d. of wounds received at the battle of Rhinfeld, in 1638. Among his works are, "Memoirs on French Affairs," "The Perfect Captain," and "Memoirs relative to the War of the Valteline."—His widow, MARGARET DE BETHUNE, daughter of the great Sully, was a courageous woman, and defended Castres against the maréchal de Themines. D. 1660.—ANNA ROHAN, sister of the duke, was distinguished by her spirit, learning, and piety. At the taking of Rochelle, she and her mother refused to be included in the capitulation, and were made prisoners of war. D. 1646.

ROLAND DE LA PLATIERE, JEAN MARIE, a French statesman, was b. at Lyons, in 1732, and held the office of inspector-general of manufactures after the commencement of the revolution. He espoused the popular cause, and becoming closely connected with the Girondist party, he was made minister of the interior in 1792. The downfall of his party, in 1793, exposed him to proscription, but he found a secret asylum at Rouen. On hearing, however, of the condemnation and death of his wife, he deliberately stabbed himself, Nov. 15, 1793.—MANON JEAN PHILIPON, wife of the preceding, b. at Paris, in 1754, was remarkable for her beauty, and received an excellent education. After her marriage, in 1779, Madame Roland took part in the studies and tasks of her husband, and the revolution found in her a ready convert to its principles. On the appointment of her husband to the ministry, she participated in his official duties, writing and preparing many papers, and taking a share in the political councils of the Girondist leaders. She was arrested on the fall of the party, and, when condemned to death, conducted herself with great firmness, exclaiming at the time of her execution, "O Liberty, what crimes are committed in thy name!" Her death took place Nov. 8, 1793. She wrote "An Appeal to Impartial Posterity," and "Miscellaneous Works."

ROLANDINO, an old Italian historian, was b. at Padua, in 1200, and d. in 1276.

ROLLE, DENNIS, a native of Devonshire, who traced his descent from Rollo, first duke of Normandy. In 1766, he purchased a whole district in Florida, whither he proceeded with a thousand persons to people his new possessions; but through the unhealthiness of the climate, and the desertion of those who escaped disease, he soon found himself without colonists and without money; so that, in order to revisit England, he was compelled to work his passage back in an American vessel. He was then satisfied to live on his paternal estate, had a seat in the house of commons, and filled the office of sheriff for the county. He devoted much of his time to the improvement of the condition of the lower classes. D. 1797.—HENRY, an eminent lawyer and judge, was b. at Heanton, in Devonshire, in 1589, and educated at Exeter college, Oxford; after which he became a student of the Inner Temple, and was called to the bar. In 1640 he was made a sergeant-at-law, and in 1648 he accepted the office of chief justice of the court of King's Bench. He wrote "Reports," and "An Abridgment of Cases and Resolutions of the Law," which was published by Sir Matthew Hale.

ROLLIN, CHARLES, an eminent historian, b. at Paris, in 1661. He was intended for business, but his talents obtained the notice of a learned Benedictine, by which he was enabled to gratify his inclination for learning. After going through a course of theology at the Sorbonne, he received the tonsure, and was twice chosen rector of the university of Paris. When elected a third time, he was deprived of his situation by the intrigues of the Jesuits; but he employed his leisure in composing his excellent work, "On the Manner of Studying and Teaching the Belles Lettres." This was followed by his "Ancient History," and nine volumes of the "Roman History." D. 1741.

ROMILLY, SIR SAMUEL, a celebrated English advocate, and M.P. for Westminster, (descended from a Protestant family, who left France after the edict of Nantes,) was b. in London, in 1757, and placed in the office of a solicitor, which he quitted to study for the bar. Called in 1783, for some years his practice was chiefly confined to draughts in equity; but he gradually rose to distinction in the court of chancery, and ultimately took the lead, being equally distinguished by profound information and forcible eloquence. His general politics agreeing with those of the Whigs, he was, during the short administration of Mr. Fox in 1806, appointed to the office of solicitor-general, and knighted. He was particularly distinguished by the eloquence with which he pleaded the necessity of a revision of the criminal code; on which subject he also composed a very able pamphlet, entitled "Observations on the Criminal Law of England." His knowledge of the law, his great talents, and his known integrity, rendered him the highest authority of his time. This good and useful man was, by the death of his beloved wife, afflicted with a brain fever, and, during a paroxysm, he put an end to his valuable life, November, 1818.

ROMNEY, GEORGE, an excellent painter, was b. at Dalton, in Lancashire, in 1734. Having served his time to an artist named Steele, whom he soon surpassed, he came to London with a picture of the "Death of General Wolfe," which obtained the second prize in the exhibition, and sold for a considerable sum. After visiting Italy he returned to London, where he obtained great reputation. D. 1802.

ROMULUS, the founder of Rome, and brother of Remus, was the son of Rhea Sylvia, daughter of Numitor, king of Alba. D. 715 B. C.

RONSARD, PETER DE, a French elegiac and epigrammatic poet, of a noble family. B. 1524; d. 1536.

ROOKE, Sir GEORGE, a gallant British admiral, was a native of Kent, and b. in 1650. He destroyed the French and Spanish fleets in Vigo bay, in 1702, and captured several men of war, and galleons; he also bore a part in the reduction of Gibraltar, in 1704. Admiral Rooke was not less distinguished for disinterestedness than for skill and intrepidity. He d. in 1709, declaring, in allusion to the contracted fortune he left behind him, that, "though small, it was honestly acquired, and had never cost a sailor a tear, or the nation a farthing."—LAURENCE, an eminent geometrician and astronomer, b. at Deptford, in Kent, in 1763; became astronomical professor of Gresham college, and was one of the original members of the Royal Society. D. 1662.

ROSA, SALVATOR, a celebrated painter, poet, and musician, was b. at Naples, in 1615. After studying under Francanzani, he became a disciple of Ribera, with whom he went to Rome. But his taste was formed more from the study of nature among the wilds of the Apennines, than from the lessons of other artists; and he delighted in delineating scenes of gloomy grandeur and magnificence. He also wrote plays, and performed parts in them; besides which he composed many cantatas. He was liberally patronized by the grand-duke of Florence while residing in that city; the Maffei family also proved great friends to him, and it was at their seat that he wrote his celebrated satires. On his return to Rome, he executed many pictures for churches. His principal merit lay in the representation of the wild scenery of nature, storms, &c. D. 1673.

ROSAMOND, usually called Fair Rosamond, was the daughter of Walter de Clifford, baron of Hereford, and the favorite mistress of Henry II. She had two sons by Henry: William, called Long-sword, and Jeffery, who became archbishop of York.

ROSCIUS, QUINTUS, a Roman actor, b. at Lanuvium, was so celebrated for his powers of representation, that his name has ever since been the characteristic distinction of performers of pre-eminent merit. D. 61 B. C.

ROSCOE, WILLIAM, an eminent biographer and miscellaneous writer, whose life affords a memorable instance of what may be effected by persevering efforts. Placed very early in a lawyer's office, he found leisure, without neglecting any of the duties of a clerk, to make himself master of the Latin language, so as to translate the classics, and also to study other ancient languages; and he then went through the same course with the modern languages, reading the best authors in each. At the age of 16 he published "Mount Pleasant," a poem that was well received. When the projected abolition of the slave trade became a subject of public discussion he warmly interested himself in its success; and his "Scriptural Refutation of a Pamphlet on the Licitness of the Slave Trade," and his "Wrongs of Africa," appeared in 1788. In 1795 he brought out that great work on which his fame chiefly rests, entitled "The Life of Lorenzo de Medici." In 1798 he published "The Muse," a poem, from the Italian; and in 1805 appeared his second great work, "The Life and Pontificate of Leo X., the Son of Lorenzo de Medici." He also subsequently wrote several political pamphlets, and scientific treatises. Mr. Roscoe being attached to the Whig party, they supported him as a candidate to represent Liverpool, and after a severe contest with General Tarleton, in 1806, he was returned. Some time previous to this, he had become a banker at Liverpool; but the house to which he belonged ultimately failed, and his private property was wrecked. D. 1831.—HENRY, youngest son of the preceding, was b. in 1800, studied the law, and was called to the bar in 1826. Independent of many "Digests" of different branches of the law, he was the author of "Lives of eminent British Lawyers," in Lardner's Cyclopædia; a "Life of his Father," and the editor of "North's Lives." D. 1836.

ROSELLINI, IPPOLITO, one of the most celebrated archaeologists of modern times, was b. at Pisa, 1800; completed his studies at the university of his native town, in 1821; three years later obtained the chair of oriental languages, which he had prosecuted at Bologna meanwhile with great zeal under the celebrated Cardinal Mezzofante. Having made Egyptian antiquities his peculiar study, he followed eagerly in the steps of the illustrious Champollion, whom he accompanied first to Paris and then to Egypt in the prosecution of his researches; and on whose death he undertook the publication of the splendid work, the result of their united efforts, entitled the "Monuments of Egypt and Nubia." &c. D. 1843.

ROSENMULLER, JOHN GEORGE, a celebrated German theologian, was professor of theology at Erlangen and Leipsic, and distinguished himself as a preacher, and by his activity in the cause of education. B. 1736; d. 1815.—ERNEST FREDERIC CHARLES, his son, a distinguished orientalist, was b. at Leipsic, in 1763; in which university he became professor of Arabic, &c., and rendered important services to oriental literature by various learned works.—Another son, JOHN CHRISTIAN, celebrated as an anatomist, was b. at Hessberg, in 1771; became professor of anatomy and surgery at Leipsic, and d. in 1820. He was the author of "Anatomico-Surgical Delineations," a "Manual of Anatomy," &c.

ROSS, ALEXANDER, a native of Aberdeen, was master of the grammar school at Southampton, and chaplain to Charles I. His works are very numerous; the most known of which is, a "View of all Religions." He was also the author of a curious performance, called "Virgilius Evangelizans," which is a cento on the life of Christ, taken wholly from Virgil. D. 1654.—ALEXANDER, a Scotch poet, b. in Aberdeenshire, in 1699. He was educated at the Marischal college, Aberdeen, and spent his life in discharging the duties of a parish schoolmaster at Lochlee, in Angusshire. It was not till he was nearly 70 years of age that he first appeared as an author, when he published "Helenore, or the Fortunate Shepherdess," a poem which in the north of Scotland is nearly as popular as the writings of Ramsay and Burns. He was also the author of some favorite songs, and d. 1784.—DAVID, a theatrical performer at Drury-lane, contemporary with Garrick. He was educated at Westminster school; and having the advantages of a good figure and a classical education he acquired reputation both as a tragic and a comic actor. D. 1790.

ROSSLYN, ALEXANDER WEDDERBURN, earl of, an eminent lawyer and statesman, was b. in Scotland, in 1733. He received his education at Edinburgh, and was called to the bar in 1757. In 1771 he was appointed solicitor-general; in 1778, attorney-general; and, in 1780, chief justice of the common pleas, with the title of Lord Loughborough. He adhered to the party of Mr. Fox when Mr. Pitt first came into power; but joined the administration, with many others, under the alarm produced by the French revolution in 1793, when he succeeded Lord Thurlow as chancellor, which office he held till 1801, when he retired with the title of the earl of Rosslyn, and d. in 1805.

ROTHSCHILD, NATHAN MAYER, the richest man of the age, was one of five brothers, who by their wealth, connections, and financial skill have for years exercised a great control over the moneyed, commercial, and political interests of Europe. Mayer Anselm, their father, and the founder of the house of Rothschild, was born at Frankfort. Though educated for the priesthood, he turned his attention to commerce, became eminent as a banker, and being trusted with the most important affairs by the landgrave of Hesse during the dominion of Napoleon in Germany, he executed his trusts so faithfully and successfully, that his house ranked among the most celebrated on the Continent. Mayer Anselm died in 1812, leaving for inheritance to his sons the example of his life and wise counsels, an immense fortune, and unbounded credit; and they, by combining their operations, and always acting in concert, formed among themselves an invincible phalanx, whose power at one time was sufficient to influence the counsels of a mighty empire, and to regulate its financial operations. Their names and residences were as follow: ANSELM, at Frankfort; SOLOMON, at Berlin and Vienna; NATHAN MAYER, at London; CHARLES, at Naples; and JAMES, at Paris. N. M. Rothschild went to England in 1800, where he acted as agent for his father in the purchase of Manchester goods for the Continent. Shortly afterwards through the agency of his father, for the elector of Hesse Cassel and other German princes, he had large sums placed at his disposal, which he employed with such extraordinary judgment, that his means went on at a rapid rate of accumulation. Besides the essential co-operation of his brothers, he had agencies in almost every city in the world, with hosts of minor dependent capitalists who participated in his loans, who placed implicit confidence in the family, and were ready at all times to embark with them in any operation that was proposed. D. 1836.

ROTTECK, CHARLES VON, a celebrated modern historian, was born at Freiburg, in Baden, in 1775. Carefully educated under the care of his father, who had been ennobled for his medical skill, he joined the university of his native town in 1790 as a law student; and eight years later he obtained the chair of history, where his lectures laid the foundation of the great historical work which has secured him so high a place among the historians of Europe. In 1818 he exchanged the chair of history for that of politics and the law of nations; in 1819 he was chosen member for the university in the first chamber of the states of Baden; and the liberal tenor of his lectures and speeches was well seconded by numerous able works which flowed from his pen on various constitutional questions. The outbreak of the French revolution in 1830 having given fresh vigor to his liberal views, he founded several journals to enunciate and propagate his opinions; but his zeal was viewed with a jealous eye by the government, which not only deprived him of his chair in 1832, but interdicted him from editing any political journal for five years, and sought in various other ways to thwart his designs. Henceforth he was regarded as a martyr to the liberal cause; his name became a watchword to the opposition; and though in 1848 he was restored triumphantly to the enjoyment of his previous rights, the redress came too late, for he d. the same year. His fame chiefly rests upon his "Allgemeine Welt-Geschichte," which has been translated into nearly every European language.

ROUBILLIAC, LOUIS FRANCIS, an eminent sculptor, was a native of Lyons, but came to England in the reign of George I., and was employed on several great works; among which are, the monument of the duke of Argyle, in Westminster abbey; the statue of Handel, at Vauxhall; that of Sir Isaac Newton, at Trinity college, Cambridge; and many other statues and monuments in various parts of the kingdom. He long stood at the head of his profession, and had also a talent for poetry. D. 1762.

ROUELLE, WILLIAM FRANCIS, one of the earliest of the modern chemists in France, was born at Caen, in 1703. Having devoted great attention to chemical science, botany, and pharmacy, he settled at Paris as an apothecary, and afterwards became professor of chemistry, at the royal botanic garden. He also held the office of inspector-general of pharmacy at the Hotel Dieu, and was a popular lecturer. D. 1770.—HILARY MARINUS, his brother, who was a clever experimental philosopher, assisted him in his lectures, and succeeded him as professor at the royal garden. B. 1718; d. 1779.

ROUSSEAU, JACQUES, a French painter, b. at Paris, in 1630. He studied in Italy, where he acquired great skill in his art; and, returning to France, was employed by Louis XIV. He afterwards went to England, and painted many excellent pictures. D. 1694.—JEAN BAPTISTE, a distinguished lyric poet, was b. at Paris, in 1669. His father, though a shoemaker, gave him a liberal education, and at an early period he displayed a decided taste for poetry. In 1688 he became page to the French minister at the court of Denmark; after which he was secretary to Marshal Tallard, in his embassy to England. In 1701 he was admitted into the academy of inscriptions; but, in 1712, he was banished from France, on the charge of writing some grossly libellous verses, which, during the remainder of his life, and even in his last moments, he solemnly declared were forgeries, devised for his ruin.—JEAN JACQUES, one of the most eloquent writers and singular characters of the age, was the son of a watchmaker at Geneva, where he was b. in 1712. Leaving school he was first placed with an attorney, who soon dismissed him for negligence; he was then apprenticed to an engraver, from whom he ran away before he was 16, and wandered about for some time in Savoy, where he was saved from starving by a priest, and placed in a monastery. It was not long, however, before he found means to escape from this restraint, and a new scene awaited him. The noted madame de Warens, a recent convert to the Catholic church, who had left her husband at Lausanne for the pious work of proselytism, took him under her especial protection, caused him to be instructed in science and music, and continued to live with him, at intervals, on terms of more intimacy than delicacy, for about eight years. At length he left his once agreeable benefactress; but was so fortunate as to obtain the place of secretary to the French ambassador in Venice, in 1742. But it was not till 1750 that he manifested his splendid literary talents. In that year he gained the prize offered by the academy of Dijon, on the question, "Whether the revival of learning has contributed to the improvement of morals;"—taking the negative side of the question, it is said, at the suggestion of Diderot. From this period his pen became fertile and popular. He soon after brought out his "Devin du Village," a comic opera, of which he had himself composed the music. This piece was received with general favor, and the author was almost worshipped by the French; but the appearance of his celebrated "Letter on French Music," 1753, in which he pointed out its defects, excited a general storm. Singers and connoisseurs, who could not wield the pen, contributed to spread calumnies, pasquinades, and caricatures against the author, who retired to Geneva. By his change of religion he had lost the rights of a citizen. He now again embraced Protestantism, and was formally reinstated in the privileges of a free citizen of Geneva. From Geneva, Rousseau went to Chambéry, where he wrote his essay, "Sur l'Inégalité parmi les Hommes," which excited still more sensation than his prize essay. In 1760 he published "Julie, ou la Nouvelle Héloïse," a romance, of the most seductive description. His next work, entitled "Du Contrat Social," was prohibited, both in France and Switzerland. This treatise was followed, in 1762, by "Emile, ou de l'Éducation;" which was anathematized by the archbishop of Paris, and ordered to be burnt by the parliament of Paris and the authorities of Geneva. Obligated to flee from France and Switzerland, the author took shelter in the principality of Neuchâtel, where he published his "Letter to the Archbishop of Paris," and "Lettres de la Montagne," a remonstrance against the proceedings of the Genevese republic, the citizenship of which he renounced. Thenceforth his existence was passed in frequent changes of place, to escape real or fancied persecution, and in suspecting all his friends of insulting and conspiring against him. D. 1778.

ROWAN, JOHN, an eminent jurist and statesman, b. in Virginia, 1773, but early went to Kentucky, where he immediately attained the highest rank at the Western bar. In 1799 he was a member of the convention which framed the constitution of the state, in 1804 was made secretary of state, in 1806 was elected to congress, and in 1819 judge of the court of appeals, and in 1824 senator of the United States. In all these positions he took a leading part. D. 1843.

ROWE, ELIZABETH, a lady distinguished for her piety and learning, was the daughter of a dissenting minister named Singer, and was b. at Ilchester, 1674. Her principal works are, "Friendship in Death," "Letters, Moral and Entertaining, in Prose and Verse," the "History of Joseph," a poem, and "Devout Exercises of the Heart." D. 1737.—NICHOLAS, a poet and dramatist, whose father was a sergeant-at-law, was b. in 1673, at Little Berkford, in Bedfordshire; was educated at Westminster school, and was intended for the bar; but on the death of his father he gave up all thoughts of the profession, and devoted himself to the cultivation of literature. His first tragedy, which he published when he was 24, was "The Ambitious Stepmother," and its success gave him encouragement to proceed. It was followed by "Tamerlane," "The Fair Penitent," "Ulysses," "The Royal Convert," "Jane Shore," "Lady Jane Grey," and a comedy called "The Biter." He also wrote miscellaneous poems, and the "Life of Shakspeare;" but his principal performance is a translation of Lucan's "Pharsalia." On the accession of George I. he was made poet laureate, and he also obtained some government situations. D. 1718.

ROWLANDSON, THOMAS, an artist celebrated for his skill in caricature, was b. in London, 1756. He studied drawing at Paris, and, on his return, availed himself of the advantages which an attendance at the Royal Academy afforded him; rose to some degree of eminence in his profession, and d. 1827. Among his works are the plates to "Dr. Syntax," "The Dance of Life," and "The Dance of Death."

ROWLEY, WILLIAM, a dramatic writer in the reign of Queen Elizabeth.—There was also a SAMUEL ROWLEY of the same period, who wrote two historical plays.—WILLIAM, an eminent physician, b. in London, in 1743. He wrote "Schola Medicinæ universalis nova," and several tracts on medical subjects. D. 1806.

ROY, JULIAN LE, a celebrated clock and watch maker, was b. at Tours, in 1686. When very young, he showed a decided partiality for mechanical pursuits, and acquired the reputation of being a first-rate horologist. D. 1759.—PETER LE ROY, his son, was watch-maker to the king, and d. in 1785. He published "Mémoires pour les Horologers de Paris," "Etrennes Chronométriques," &c.—JULIAN DAVID, another son, became a member of the National Institute, and attached himself to architecture. He wrote "On the Ruins of the finest Monuments of Greece," "On the Construction of Christian Temples," &c.—PETER CHARLES, a French satirist and dramatic poet, was b. at Paris, in 1683. His principal pieces adapted for theatrical representation are, the operas of "Callirhœ" and "Semiramis," the ballets of "The Elements," and "The Senses," and the comedy of "The Captives," imitated from Plautus. D. 1764.

ROYER-COLLARD, PIERRE PAUL, a distinguished French statesman and philosopher, was b. at Sommepeuis, 1763. Not long after his admission to the bar at Paris, he embraced the principles of the revolution in 1789; but he soon became disgusted with the scenes of violence that prevailed, and after an abortive attempt to aid the cause of the royalists, he bade adieu for a time to politics, and gave himself up wholly to literary pursuits. In 1810 he was appointed to a chair of literature and philosophy. After the restoration he once more entered upon a political career, and gradually rose in public favor by his sagacity, moderation, and honesty, till in 1828 he was nominated president of the chamber of deputies, of which he had long been a member, but retired from this office in 1830. He was one of the founders of the school of politicians in France known by the name of Doctrinaires; and as a philosopher he has well-founded claims to esteem for having introduced in France that system of philosophy so clearly illustrated by Cousin, Jouffroy, and Damiron, and which bears so close an analogy to that of Reid and the other Scotch philosophers. D. 1845.

ROZEE, Mademoiselle, an ingenious artist, was b. at Leyden, in 1632. She neither used oil nor water colors in her pictures, but silk floss on the ground, disposed according to the different degrees of the bright and dark tints, which she applied with great judgment and taste. In this manner she executed historical subjects, landscapes, and portraits. D. 1682.

RUBENS, PETER PAUL, the most distinguished painter of the Flemish school, was b. at Antwerp, in 1577. He received an excellent education; and, after studying in his own country, he went to Italy, where he greatly improved himself after the works of the best masters, but chiefly Titian. While in Italy, he was employed by the duke of Mantua, not only as an artist, but on an embassy to Madrid. In 1620 he was employed by the Princess Mary de Medici to adorn the gallery of the Luxembourg with a series of paintings, illustrative of the principal scenes of her life. While thus engaged, he became known to the duke of Buckingham, who purchased his museum for £10,000. He was afterwards employed by the Infanta Isabella and the king of Spain, in some important negotiations, which he executed with such credit as to be appointed secretary of the privy council. On going to England with a commission from the king of Spain, he obtained the favor of Charles I. While there he painted the Apotheosis of James I. and the picture of Charles I. as St. George; for which he was knighted, and received a chain of gold. D. at Antwerp, 1640. Rubens, beyond all comparison, was the most rapid of the great masters; and, according to Sir Joshua Reynolds, he was the greatest master of the mechanical part of his art that ever existed.—ALBERT, son of the preceding, was b. at Antwerp, in 1614. He succeeded his father as secretary to the council, and was greatly esteemed by the Archduke Leopold, governor of the Low Countries. D. 1657. He wrote "De Re Vestitaria Veterum," "Regum et Imperatorum Romanorum Numismata," "De Vita Flavii Manlii Theodori," &c.

RUDDIMAN, THOMAS, a distinguished grammarian and critic, was b. 1674, at Boynsic, in Banffshire; was educated at King's college, Aberdeen; became assistant-keeper of the advocates' library at Edinburgh; set up a printing-office in conjunction with his brother; was one of the founders of the earliest library society in Scotland, in 1718, and d. 1757. His "Rudiments of the Latin Tongue," long used as an elementary book in schools, is the most popular of his productions; but he wrote other grammatical works, and was the editor of the works of George Buchanan, in Latin. He also established the "Caledonian Mercury."

RUFFHEAD, OWEN, a miscellaneous writer, was b. in London, about 1723; entered at the Middle Temple, and was called to the bar; published an edition of the statutes, and conducted a periodical paper, called the "Contest." He also wrote the "Life of Pope," &c. D. 1769.

RUFINUS, by some called TORANIUS, a priest of Aquileia, in the 4th century. He became so attached to St. Jerome, that he accompanied him to the East; but being persecuted by the Arians under Valens, he was banished into Palestine, where he founded a monastery on Mount Olivet, and employed himself in translating Greek authors into Latin. His version of Origen gave such offence to his old acquaintance, Jerome, that he wrote bitterly against him, and Rufinus was cited to Rome by Pope Anastasius, who condemned his translation, upon which he retired to Sicily, where he d. about 410.

RUMFORD, BENJAMIN THOMPSON, Count, was b. 1753, at Rumford, N. H., and was educated at Harvard college. During the American war he espoused the royal cause, obtained the rank of colonel, and was knighted. At the close of the contest he entered the Bavarian service as lieutenant-general, and was created a count, and received the order of the white eagle, for the reforms which he introduced into the army and the police. In 1798 he visited England, where he remained for four years, and took a prominent part in founding the royal institution. On his return to the Continent he married the widow of Lavoisier. He settled near Paris, and d. there August 21, 1814. His experiments and discoveries are recorded in his Essays.

RUMPH, GEORGE EVERARD, a botanist, was b. at Hanau, 1637. He took his doctor's degree in physic, after which he went as consul and senior merchant to Amboyna, where he made valuable botanical collections, the results of which were published by Burman, in 1751, under the title of "Herbarium Amboinense."

RUNCIMAN, ALEXANDER, a Scotch painter, was the son of an architect, and b. at Edinburgh, in 1736. After serving his time to a portrait painter, he went to Rome with his brother John, a most promising artist, who died in Italy. Alexander continued his studies with diligence, and, on his return home, was employed by Sir James Clerk, to decorate his house with scenes from Ossian. His best pictures are, an "Ascension," in the Episcopal chapel at Edinburgh; his "King Lear," "Andromeda," and "Agrippina." D. 1785.

RUPERT, or ROBERT OF BAVARIA, Prince, the third son of Frederic, king of Bohemia, by Elizabeth, daughter of James I., was b. in 1619, and received a military education. He commanded the cavalry of Charles I. during the civil war, and on various occasions manifested the most daring valor; but his impetuosity and imprudence more than counterbalanced the effects of his bravery; and, at length, having surrendered Bristol to General Fairfax, by whom it was besieged, the king dismissed him from his service. The prince, however, was more successful as a naval commander, particularly after the restoration, in the great Dutch war; on the conclusion of which he led a retired life, occupied wholly in scientific pursuits. He was the inventor of a composition, called the "prince's metal," improved the strength of gunpowder, found out a method of fusing black-lead, and discovered the art of engraving in mezzotinto. He was an active member of the board of trade; and to his influence is ascribed the establishment of the Hudson's Bay Company, of which he was governor. D. 1682.

RUSH, BENJAMIN, a celebrated physician, was b. in 1741, at Bristol, Penn.; was educated at Princeton college; took his degree at Edinburgh, in 1768; was chosen a member of congress for Pennsylvania, in 1776; was appointed a professor of medicine and clinical practice at the university, and d. 1813. During the devastation caused by the yellow fever in 1793, Dr. Rush highly distinguished himself, and his history of that epidemic is a work of great value. He also wrote "Medical Inquiries and Observations," and "Essays, Literary, Moral, and Philosophical."

RUSHWORTH, JOHN, an historian, was b. in Northumberland, 1607, studied at Oxford, and became a barrister. In 1640 he was appointed assistant clerk of the house of commons, was much employed in negotiations during the civil wars, and after the restoration he became secretary to the lord-keeper, Bridgman. His "Historical Collections" is a laborious and highly useful compilation.

RUSSELL, WILLIAM, fifth earl, and first duke of Bedford, was b. in 1614; received his education at Magdalen college, Oxford; was a member of the long parliament in 1640, and commanded the reserve of horse at the battle of Edgehill; but, in 1643, he joined the royal standard, and fought with great bravery at the battle of Newbury. He was not, however, in favor with the royal party, and he retired to private life till the restoration, when he assisted at the coronation, and was elected a knight of the garter. He also attended the coronation of William and Mary, who, in 1694, exalted him to the rank of marquis of Tavistock and duke of Bedford. D. 1700.

—WILLIAM, Lord, third son of the preceding, was a distinguished supporter of constitutional liberty, and was b. about 1641. In 1679, when Charles II. found it necessary to ingratiate himself with the whigs, Lord Russell was appointed one of the members of the privy council. He soon, however, found that his party was not in the king's confidence, and the recall of the duke of York, without their concurrence, induced him to resign. Although his temper was mild and moderate, his fear of a Catholic succession induced him to take decisive steps in the promotion of the exclusion of the duke of York. In June, 1680, he went publicly to Westminster hall, and, at the court of King's Bench, presented the duke as a recusant, and, on the November following, carried up the exclusion bill to the house of lords, at the head of 200 members of parliament. The king dissolved the parliament, evidently resolved to govern thenceforward without one; and arbitrary principles were openly avowed by the partisans of the court. Alarmed at the state of things, many of the Whig leaders favored strong expedients in the way of counteraction, and a plan of insurrection was formed for a simultaneous rising in England and Scotland. Among these leaders, including the dukes of Monmouth and Argyle, the lords Russell, Essex, and Howard, Algernon Sidney, and Hampden, different views prevailed; but Lord Russell looked only to the exclusion of the duke of York. He was, however, accused of having engaged in "the Rye-house Plot," which had for its object the assassination of the king on his return from Newmarket; and on this pretext he was committed to the Tower, tried, condemned, and executed in July, 1683, being then in the 42d year of his age. After the revolution, the proceedings against him were annulled.

—Lady RACHEL, wife of the preceding, was daughter of the earl of Southampton, and widow of Lord Vaughan. In 1667 she was married to Lord William Russell, and the affectionate zeal with which she assisted him when in trouble, and the magnanimity of her behavior after his death, have excited for her a general feeling of respect and sympathy. Being refused counsel upon his trial, and allowed only an amanuensis, she stood forth in that capacity, and took down the notes. She survived his lordship 49 years, which period she occupied in the exercise of pious and social duties. Her "Letters," which do equal credit to her understanding and heart, have been often reprinted. D. 1723.

—WILLIAM, an historical writer, was b. in the county of Mid-Lothian, 1746. He was brought up as a printer, which business he for a time followed, and then became an author by profession. His works are, "A History of America," "A History of Modern Europe," and "A History of Ancient Europe," which was completed by Dr. Coote. D. 1793.

RUST, GEORGE, a learned prelate, was b. at Cambridge. He became fellow of Christ's college, but at the restoration he went over to Ireland, and was preferred to the deanery of Connor and the rectory of Magee. He was afterwards made bishop of Dromore, where he d. in 1670.

RUTHERFORD, DANIEL, a natural philosopher and physician, was b. at Edinburgh, in 1749; studied in that university; succeeded Dr. John Hope as professor of botany and keeper of the botanic garden, in 1786; and d. 1819. He was the discoverer of nitrogen, and was the first who represented oxygen gas (then called vital air) as the necessary constituent of all acids.—THOMAS, an English divine, was b. at Papworth Everard, in Cambridgeshire, 1712; was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge; where, in 1745, he was appointed professor of divinity; and d. rector of Barley in Hertfordshire, with the archdeaconry of Essex, in 1771. His most important works are, "A System of Natural Philosophy," "An Essay on the Nature and Obligations of Virtue," "A Discourse on Miracles," "Institutes of Natural Law," and "Sermons."—JOHN, a senator of the United States from New Jersey, during Washington's administration. D. 1840.

RUTLEDGE, EDWARD, an eminent lawyer, and a signer of the declaration of American independence, was b. in Charleston, S. C., in 1749. His legal education was completed in England, and in 1778 he returned to his native country, and entered upon the duties of his profession. In 1774 he was appointed a delegate to the congress at Philadelphia and took an active part in the discussions of the day. After a successful practice of his profession for seventeen years, in 1798 he relinquished his station at the bar, and was elected chief magistrate of South Carolina. D. 1800.—JOHN, an eminent patriot of South Carolina, who early distinguished himself in the cause of the American revolution. He was a member of the first congress in 1774. When the temporary constitution of South Carolina was established in March, 1776, he was appointed the president, and commander-in-chief of the colony. He continued in this station till the adoption of the new constitution in 1778. In 1779 he was chosen governor. In 1784 he was a judge of the court of chancery; in 1789 a judge of the supreme court of the United States; in 1791 chief justice of South Carolina; and in 1796 chief justice of the United States. He was a man of eminent talents, patriotism, energy, and firmness. Judge Rutledge was a native of Ireland, but came to America about the year 1735. D. 1800.

RUYSCH, FREDERIC, an eminent anatomist, was b. in 1638, at the Hague, and d. in 1731.—HENRY, his son, published "Theatrum Animalium."—RACHEL, one of the most celebrated painters of fruit and flower pieces, was b. at Amsterdam, in 1664, and d. in 1750. Her pictures are distinguished for truth and splendor of coloring, united with great finish.

RUYSDAAL, JACOB, a celebrated Dutch painter, was b. at Haerlem, in 1636. He stood unrivalled in the representation of woods, groves, and pieces of water, particularly cataracts; and d. in 1681.

RUYTER, MICHAEL ADRIAN, a gallant Dutch admiral, was b. in 1607, at Flushing. He entered the naval service when he was only 11 years old, and, by dint of bravery and skill, rose to the summit of his profession. On many occasions he nobly distinguished himself when engaged against the English, especially in the terrible battle fought in February, 1653, near the mouth of the channel, when Blake commanded the English, and Van Tromp and Ruyter the Dutch. In the reign of Charles II., Ruyter gained an advantage over Prince Rupert and Monk; but, two months afterwards, another battle was fought, in which the Dutch were defeated. The following year, however, he avenged himself, by riding triumphantly in the Thames, and destroying several English men-of-war at Sheerness. He d. in the port of Syracuse, in consequence of a wound received a few days before, when engaging with the French fleet off Messina.

RYDER, SIR DUDLEY, an eminent English lawyer, was descended from an ancient Yorkshire family, and b. in 1691. He held the office of attorney-general from 1736 to 1754, was made lord chief justice, and d. 1756.

RYLAND, JOHN, a dissenting minister, who kept an academy, and officiated many years to a Baptist congregation at Northampton. He published "The Christian Student and Pastor," "Elements of Mechanics," "The Preceptor," and several tracts and sermons. D. 1792.—WILLIAM WYNNE, an engraver, was b. in London, in 1732. He attained great excellence in his art; but his end was truly melancholy, for, in order to extricate himself from some embarrassments, he, in 1782, committed a forgery on the East India Company, and was tried and executed the year following.

RYMER, THOMAS, a critic and antiquary, was a native of Yorkshire; studied at Cambridge and at Gray's Inn; and, succeeding Shadwell, in 1692, as royal historiographer, employed the opportunities afforded him by his office to make a valuable collection of public treatises, which he began to publish in 1704, under the title of "Fœdera, Conventiones, et cujuscunq; Generis Acta publica, inter Reges Angliæ, et alios Principes," 15 vols. folio, five more being added by Robert Sanderson. He also wrote some poetical pieces, and left an unpublished collection relating to English history, in 53 vols., now in the British Museum. D. 1713.

RYSBRACH, JOHN MICHAEL, an eminent statuary, was b. at Antwerp, in 1694. He went to England early in life, and derived considerable reputation and profit from the exercise of his art. Westminster abbey, and other cathedral churches, contain specimens of his abilities, among which should be noticed the monuments of Sir Isaac Newton and the duke of Marlborough. D. 1770.

S.

SAAVEDRA FAXARDO, DIEGO DE, a Spanish writer and diplomatist, was b. at Algezares, in Murcia, in 1584. He became secretary to the embassy at Rome, and afterwards was appointed sole agent for Spain at the papal court. He also assisted at some diets in Switzerland, and enjoyed for his reward the collar of St. Jago, a canonry of the church, and a seat in the council-board for the Indies. He d. in 1648.

SABATIER, ANTOINE, or SABATIER DE CASTRES, was b. at Castres, in 1742. He was a celebrated French writer, and was early connected with Helvetius and the philosophical party of the literati; but he soon left these, and showed his opposition to them in his work, "Les Trois Siècles de la Littérature Française," which procured him many enemies, but brought him into notice. Among his numerous works are, "Les Siècles Païens, ou Dictionnaire Mythologique, Héroïque, Politique, Littéraire, et Géographique de l'Antiquité Païenne," and "Les Caprices de la Fortune," &c. D. 1817.

SABELLIUS, a heretic, b. at Ptolemais, in Libya, in the 3d century, was a disciple of Noetus of Smyrna. He advanced the doctrine of unity in the Deity, declaring the Son and the Holy Ghost to be mere qualities. These tenets obtained many proselytes, and met with great success till the opposition of St. Denys caused them to be formally condemned.

SACCHINI, ANTONIO MARIA GASPARD, a celebrated Italian composer, was b. at Naples, in 1735. D. 1786.

SACHEVERELL, HENRY, an English divine, was educated at Oxford. In 1705 he was appointed preacher of St. Saviour's, Southwark, during which period he preached two famous sermons, the objects of which were to create alarm for the safety of the church, and to excite hostility against the dissenters. Being impeached in the house of commons, he was sentenced to be suspended from preaching for three years. This persecution, however, established the fortune of Sacheverell, who was collated to a living near Shrewsbury; and the same month that his suspension terminated, was appointed to the valuable rectory of St. Andrew, Holborn. D. 1724.

SACKVILLE, GEORGE, Viscount, a soldier and statesman, was the third son of the first duke of Dorset, and was b. 1716. He distinguished himself at the battles of Dettingen and Fontenoy; and in 1758 was made a lieutenant-general; but the year following he fell into disgrace for his conduct at the battle of Minden. He was tried by a court-martial, and sentenced to be dismissed from the service. Under the administration of Lord Bute, however, he was restored to favor, and in 1775 he was appointed colonial secretary of state, which he held during the American war. On quitting office, in 1782, he was created viscount. D. 1785.

SACY, Baron SILVESTRE DE, a profound and various scholar, but especially eminent as an orientalist, was b. 1758. During the stormy times of the revolution, and the sway of Napoleon, as well as under Louis XVIII., Charles X., and Louis Philippe, his splendid talents obtained for him the highest and most valuable literary appointments. His "Arabic Grammar," "Anthologie Grammaticale Arabe," and other Arabic works, are especially valuable to students. D. 1839.

SADI, SHEIK MOSLEHEDIN, one of the most celebrated poets of Persia, was b. at Shiraz, in 1175, and d. in the 120th year of his age. He studied at Bagdad, and pursued a religious course of life under the direction of the famous Sophi Abd al Kadir Ghilani, whom he accompanied on a pilgrimage to Mecca. He fought against the infidels, and carried his arms into India and Asia Minor. Being, however, taken prisoner by the Turks, he was put to work on the fortifications of Tripoli; but was redeemed by a merchant of Aleppo, who gave him his daughter in marriage with a dowry. Towards the close of his life he built a hermitage near the walls of Shiraz, where he passed his time in exercises of piety; and his tomb, on the spot where he had lived, was long visited by the admirers of his genius and devotion. He wrote "Gulistun, or the Garden of Roses," and other works.

SADLER, MICHAEL THOMAS, was b. at Snelston, in Derbyshire, in 1780. In 1825 he was chosen a member of parliament. Mr. Sadler wrote two works, "Ireland, its Evils, and their Remedies," and his "Law of Population," in which the Malthusian doctrines were impugned and refuted. D. 1835.

SAEMUND, SIGRUSON, a celebrated Icelandic priest, poet, legislator, and historian in the 11th century. He had a share in forming the ecclesiastical code, wrote a "History of Norway," and was the compiler of that Scandinavian collection of poetry, termed "Edda." D. 1135.

ST. BEUVE, JACQUES DE, a celebrated theologian, b. at Paris, in 1613. He was famous for his controversies relative to the doctrines of grace and predestination, which agitated the French church in the middle of the 17th century. D. 1677.

ST. CLAIR, ARTHUR, a general in the American army, was b. at Edinburgh, was a lieutenant under General Wolfe, and afterwards settled in Pennsylvania, and became a naturalized citizen. On the commencement of the revolution, he embraced the cause of the American army, and in February, 1777, was appointed major-general. He served with distinction, and in 1783 was elected president of the Cincinnati society of his adopted state. In 1785 he was elected a delegate to congress, and in 1787 was chosen president of that body. He was afterwards governor of the Northwest Territory, and in 1790 commanded an army against the Miami Indians. He resigned his commission of major-general in 1792. His latter years were passed in poverty. D. 1818.

ST. JUST, ANTHONY, a political agent and associate of Robespierre, was b. in 1763, and was educated for the legal profession. He voted for the death of Louis XVI., materially assisted in the destruction of the Girondists, acted as a commissioner of the national convention to the army in Alsace, where he was distinguished for his severity; and, on his return to Paris, becoming involved in the ruin of Robespierre, was guillotined, in July, 1794.

ST. LAMBERT, CHARLES FRANCES DE, a member of the national institute of France, was b. at Nancy, in 1717. He entered the army, which he left at the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, and obtained an office in the court of Stanislaus of Poland; became a devoted adherent of Voltaire's, and a favored admirer of madame de Chatelet; again entered the army, and d. in 1805. Among his works are, "The Seasons," a poem; "Oriental Tales," and a philosophical work, entitled "Catéchisme Universel."

ST. MARC, CHARLES HUGH LEFEBVRE

DE, a French author, b. at Paris, in 1698. His most important work is, "A Chronological Abridgment of the History of Italy, from the Downfall of the Western Empire."—JEAN PAUL ANDRE DES RAINSINS, marquis de, a French lyric poet, author of "Adèle de Ponthieu," &c. B. 1728; d. 1818.

ST. PIERRE, JACQUES BERNARDIN HENRI DE, a most ingenious and philosophical French author, was b. at Havre, in 1737, was educated in the engineer school at Paris, for a time followed the military profession in the service of Russia, afterwards obtained a commission in the engineer corps of France; and, retiring from a military life, he devoted the remainder of his days to literature. In 1784 appeared his "Etudes de la Nature," and, in 1788, his "Paul et Virginie," which, after passing through fifty impressions in one year, has been translated into almost all the languages of Europe. He was also the author of "La Chanmière Indienne," and several other works. D. 1814.

ST. REAL, CESAR VICHARD DE, an able French author, was b. at Chamberri, in Savoy, where he d. in 1692. He wrote "De l'Usage de l'Histoire," "Conjuration des Espagnols contre la République de Venise en 1618," and several other treatises on morals, politics, and philosophy.

ST. SIMON, CLAUDIUS HENRY, count de, was b. at Paris, 1760. He was the founder of a politico-philosophical sect, whose leading dogma is, that industry is the definitive purpose of life, and that those engaged in it constitute the superior class of society. He published a variety of works to give currency to his doctrines; among which are, an "Introduction to the Scientific Labors of the Nineteenth Century," and "Political, Moral, and Philosophical Discussions." D. 1825.—LOUIS DE ROUVROI, duke of, was b. 1675. In 1721 he was appointed ambassador extraordinary to the court of Spain, to negotiate a marriage between the Infanta and Louis XV.; and d. in 1757. His "Memoirs of the Reign of Louis XIV. and the Regency," containing a vast mass of anecdotal information, form 13 vols.

SALADIN, a famous sultan of Egypt, equally renowned as a warrior and legislator. He was b. in 1137, raised himself from the station of an officer to that of a sovereign, and supported himself by his valor and the influence of his amiable character, against the united efforts of the chief Christian potentates of Europe, who carried on the most unjust wars against him, under the false appellation of crusades. He obtained various successes over the Christians, but was defeated by Richard Cœur de Lion, and d. in 1193.

SALE, GEORGE, an English writer, who was well versed in the oriental languages. His greatest work is an excellent translation of the Koran, to which he prefixed a curious dissertation. He was also one of the principal authors of the "Ancient Universal History." B. 1680; d. 1736.

SALLUST, CAIUS CRISPUS, a Roman historian, distinguished equally for his talents and profligacy, was b. at Amiternum, 85 B.C. He was expunged from the list of senators, in consequence of his extravagance and shameless debaucheries; but being restored by Julius Cæsar, and made governor of Numidia, he there amassed an enormous fortune by acts of rapine. He d. 85 B.C. His "History of the Jugurthine War" and "The Conspiracy of Catiline," bear ample testimony to his genius; but the rigid morality displayed in his writings forms a curious contrast to the vices of the author.

SALMASIUS, or SAUMAISE, CLAUDE, an eminent French scholar, was b. at Saumur, in 1588, and succeeded Scaliger as professor of history at Leyden. In 1649 he wrote a defence of Charles I., king of England, which was forcibly and conclusively replied to by Milton. The year following he went to Sweden, on an invitation from Queen Christina; and d. in 1653. His principal works are, "Historiæ Augustæ Scriptores Sex," "De Modo Usurarum," "De Re Militari Romanorum," "Hellenistica," and several editions of ancient authors.

SALVIATI, FRANCESCO ROSSI, an eminent Italian painter, whose style of designing approached that of Raphael, though greatly inferior in sublimity and grandeur of composition. B. in Florence, 1510; d. 1563.

SANCHO, IGNATIUS, a negro, whose literary abilities attracted much notice, was b. 1729, on board a slave-ship, and carried to Carthage. While a boy he was taken to England by his master, and given to three maiden ladies, sisters, living at Greenwich, who named him Sancho. The duke of Montague afterwards took him into his service, and encouraged his love of learning; and the duchess left him an annuity at her death. He numbered among his friends, Sterne, Garrick, and other literary characters; and was the author of letters, poems, &c. D. 1780.

SANCROFT, WILLIAM, archbishop of Canterbury, was b. at Fresinfield, in 1616. He was one of the seven bishops sent to the Tower by James II.; but at the revolution he refused to take the oaths, for which he was deprived of his see. D. 1698. He wrote "The Predestinated Thief," "Modern Politics, taken from Machiavel," &c.

SANDEMAN, ROBERT, a Scotch minister, was b. at Perth, in 1723, and educated at St. Andrew's. He formed a sect which still goes by his name. In 1765 he came to New England, made many proselytes, and d. in 1772.

SANDERSON, JOHN, distinguished as a scholar and a writer, was b. at Carlisle, Pa., in 1785. He was a teacher at Clermont seminary for some time, and a contributor to "Dennie's Port Folio," and other periodicals. In 1820 he published two volumes of "Lives of the Signers of the Declaration." In 1833 he went to Europe, and on his return wrote the "American in Paris," a vivacious sketch of his impressions while abroad. He was then elected professor of Greek and Latin in the High school of Philadelphia. D. 1844.

SANDS, ROBERT C., was b. in the city of New York, 1799, and was educated at Columbia college. In 1820 he commenced the practice of the law, but his first attempt as an advocate was unsuccessful, so he turned his attention to literature. His attainments in the modern as well as ancient languages, were solid and extensive, and his mastery of his own language complete. He became an editor of the "Commercial Advertiser;" but his labors in this sphere did not interfere with his cultivation of general literature. He wrote an "Historical Notice of Cortes," which was translated into Spanish, besides essays on "Domestic Literature," the "Caio-Græco of Monti," "Isaac, a type of the Redeemer," the "Garden of Venus," &c., the "Simple Story," "Salem Witchcraft," "Monsieur de Viellecour," and, in conjunction with Mr. Eastburn, the poem of "Yanoyden." He was also engaged with Mr. William C. Bryant and Mr. Gulian C. Verplanck, in the editorship of the "Talisman." Mr. Sands was a gentleman of the finest wit, and noble character. His last poem was "The Dead of '32," which appeared about a week before his own death.

SANDYS, EDWIN, an eminent English prelate, was b. 1519, at Hawkshead, in Lancashire. At the accession of Mary he was vice-chancellor, and on refusing to proclaim her, he was deprived of his office, and sent first to the Tower, and afterwards to the Marshalsea. When Elizabeth came to the throne he was appointed one of the commissioners for revising the liturgy. He was also made bishop of Worcester, and had a share in the translation of the Scriptures, commonly called the "Bishop's Bible." In 1570 he was translated to London, and in 1576 to York, where a conspiracy was laid by Sir Robert Stapleton, to ruin him by the imputation of adultery; but it was discovered, and the parties concerned in it were punished. D. 1588.

SANSEVERO, RAYMOND DI SANGRO, eminent for his mechanical inventions and scientific discoveries, was b. at Naples, in 1710, and d. 1771. Among the multifarious and extraordinary machines invented by himself was a four-wheeled vehicle, to pass over the surface of the water, which he exhibited on the bay of Naples.

SANSON, NICHOLAS, a celebrated geographer and engineer, was b. at Abbeville, in 1600; and constructed, even while a youth, a map of ancient Gaul, remarkable for its excellence and accuracy. He subsequently produced upwards of three hundred maps, all on a large scale, with several volumes to illustrate them; reached the head of his profession, and was appointed geographer and engineer to the king. D. 1667.—NICHOLAS, WILLIAM, and ADRIAN, his three sons, who also were excellent geographers, collected and published the works of their father, as well as several of their own.

SANSOVINO, GIACOMO FATTI, an eminent sculptor and architect, was b. at Florence, in 1479. D. 1570.

SANTERRE, JEAN BAPTISTE, a French painter, was b. at Magny, near Pontoise, in 1651. He painted historical subjects, on a small size, and with great delicacy. D. 1717.

SAPPHO, a celebrated Greek poetess, b. at Mitylene, in the island of Lesbos, about 600 B. C. Her writings were highly esteemed by the ancients, and she is regarded as the inventress of the metre which bears her name; but of her works there at present exist only a "Hymn to Venus," an ode, and a few trifling fragments.—Another SAPPHO, of a later date, who is usually confounded with the foregoing, from being also a native of Lesbos, was no less distinguished for amorous propensities than for the warmth of her lyrical effusions, and is said to have thrown herself into the sea, from the promontory of Leucate, in consequence of the neglect she experienced from Phaon, her lover.

SARGENT, WINTHROP, governor of Mississippi, was a native of Massachusetts, and graduated at Harvard college in 1771. He entered the revolutionary army in 1775, and served in various capacities with reputation to the close of the war. In 1786 he was appointed by congress surveyor of the northwestern territory, and in 1787 secretary of the government established there. He attended General St. Clair as adjutant-general in his unfortunate expedition against the Indians, and was also adjutant-general and inspector under General Wayne. D. 1820.

SARPI, PETER, better known under the name of Father Paul, or Fra Paolo, was b. in 1552, at Venice. So precocious were his talents, that, at the age of 17, he publicly maintained theological and philosophical theses, consisting of 309 articles. His eloquence was equal to his learning. He did not confine his studies to theology; for anatomy and astronomy also engaged much of his attention. He was of the order of the Servites, and became provincial of the order. The Venetian government appointed him its consulting theologian, and reposed unbounded confidence in him; which he justified and repaid, by defending the ecclesiastical liberties of his country against the encroachments of the Roman pontiff. His patriotism roused the vengeance of Rome against him, and in 1607, five ruffians made an attempt to assassinate him. They failed, however, in their purpose, though they gave him fifteen wounds. He d. in 1628. His greatest work is, "A History of the Council of Trent."

SAUMAREZ, JAMES, Lord de, a distinguished officer in the British navy, was b. in the island of Guernsey, in 1757, and was descended from a French family, whose ancestor accompanied William the Conqueror to England. D. 1836.

SAURIN, JAMES, an eminent French Protestant preacher, was b. at Nismes, in 1677; was the author of 12 vols. of "Sermons," "The State of Christianity in France," "Discourses, Historical, Critical, and Moral, on the most remarkable Events of the Old and New Testaments," &c. D. 1730.—JOSEPH, brother of the preceding, was b. 1659, and distinguished himself as a mathematician.

He was originally a Protestant minister; but, in 1690, he embraced the Catholic faith, and was pensioned by Louis XIV. He contributed for some years to the "Journal des Savans," and d. 1730.—BERNARD JOSEPH, son of the last mentioned, was b. 1706, at Paris; and quitted the bar to become a dramatic writer. He was the author of "Spartacus," a tragedy; "Mœurs des Temps," a spirited comedy; and a variety of other dramas. D. 1781.

SAUSSURE, HORACE BENEDICT DE, a celebrated naturalist, was b. at Geneva, in 1740; attained an early proficiency in the mathematical and physical sciences, and was for several years professor of philosophy at Geneva. He travelled in France, England, Italy, &c.; and by the valuable observations which he made, particularly among the glaciers of the Alps, he contributed much to the advancement of geology and meteorology. He also showed great ingenuity in the construction of improved instruments adapted to scientific uses, viz., a thermometer, an hygrometer, a audiometer, and electrometer, &c. D. 1799.

SAVAGE, RICHARD, an English poet, celebrated for his genius, irregularities, and misfortunes, was b. in London, about 1698. He was the natural son of the countess of Macclesfield by Earl Rivers. No sooner did he see the light, than a most unnatural hatred took complete possession of his mother, who placed him with an old woman in the lowest state of indigence, with directions that he should be brought up in utter ignorance of his birth, and in the meanest condition. He was an apprentice to a shoemaker, when this woman dying suddenly, some of Lady Mason's (the mother of the countess) letters, which he found among her papers, discovered to him the secret of his birth. From this moment his attempts to obtain the notice of his mother were incessant, but all his assiduities and applications were unavailing; and in justice to the countess of Macclesfield it must be observed, that she always asserted that her child d. while quite young, and that Savage was an impostor. He now became an author, and, in 1723, produced the tragedy of "Sir Thomas Overbury," the profits of which produced him £200; and he was rising in reputation, when, in 1721, he accidentally killed a Mr. Sinclair, at a house of ill-fame, in a drunken quarrel. For this he was tried, and found guilty; but obtained the royal pardon, through the intercession of Lady Hertford. Soon after, Lord Tyrconnel became his patron, received him into his house, and allowed him £200 a year; but the bard and the peer quarrelled, and he was again turned adrift upon the world. A "Birth-day Ode," addressed to the queen, procured him a pension of £50., but on her majesty's death this was discontinued, and he subsequently endured much misery and privation; till at length, in 1743, he d. in the debtors' prison, at Bristol.

SAVILLE, Sir HENRY, one of the most profound and elegant scholars of his age, was b. in 1549, and after graduating at Brazenose college, Oxford, removed on a fellowship to Merton college, in the same university. In his 29th year he made a tour on the Continent for the purpose of perfecting himself in elegant literature, and on his return was appointed tutor in Greek and mathematics to Queen Elizabeth. D. 1622.

SAVONAROLA, JEROME, a Dominican, was b. at Ferrara, in 1452. He was regarded by some as an enthusiast, and by others as an impostor; but he preached with great zeal against the corruptions of the Roman church, for which he was condemned to the flames in 1498. He wrote "Sermons," a treatise entitled "The Triumph of the Cross," and other works.

SAXE, MAURICE, count de, marshal-general of the French armies, was b. at Dresden, in 1696. He was the natural son of Frederic Augustus II., king of Poland, by the Countess of Königsmark, and d. in 1750.

SAXO, GRAMMATICUS, a Danish historian, who flourished in the 12th century.

SAY, JEAN BAPTISTE, an eminent French writer on political economy, b. in 1767. He concerted with Chamfort (who was guillotined) the "Decade Philosophique," during the revolution. Bonaparte, on going to Egypt, made him his librarian extraordinary, and afterwards appointed him a member of the tribunate, from which post he was dismissed by his patron, for having the consistent honesty to vote against the creation of an emperor and empire. His "Traité d'Economie Publique" is a most valuable work, and has been compared to Adam Smith's "Wealth of Nations." Among his other works are, "Observations sur l'Angleterre et les Anglais," "Cours complet d'Economie Politique." D. 1832.

SCALIGER, JULIUS CÆSAR, generally known as the elder Scaliger, a celebrated scholar, was b. 1484, at the castle of Riva, on lake Garda, and became a page of the Emperor Maximilian, whom he served in war and peace for 17 years. When he was about 40, he quitted the army, and applied himself to the study of natural law, medicine, and the learned languages. In 1525 he accompanied the bishop of Agen to his diocese in France, where he d. 1558.—JOSEPH JUSTUS, son of the preceding, was b. at Agen, in 1540; was made professor of polite literature at Leyden, and is said to have been master of no less than 13 languages. D. 1609.

SCANDERBEG, (which means the BEY ALEXANDER,) whose proper name was George Castriot, was the son of John, prince of Albania, and was b. 1404. Being given by his father as a hostage to Sultan Amurath II., he was educated in the Mahometan religion, and at the age of 18 was placed at the head of a body of troops, with the title of sangiac. After the death of his father in 1432, he formed the design of possessing himself of his principality; and having accompanied the Turkish army to Hungary, he entered into an agreement with Hunniades to desert to the Christians. This design he put into execution; and, having ascended the throne of his fathers, he renounced the Mahometan religion. A long warfare followed; but although frequently obliged to retire to the fastnesses of mountains, he always renewed his assaults upon the first favorable occasion, until the sultan proposed terms of peace to him, which were accepted. He, however, renounced his treaty with the sultan, obtained repeated victories over the Turkish armies, completely established his power, and d. 1467.

SCARLATTI, ALESSANDRO, b. at Naples, in 1658, was educated at Rome under Carissimi, and d. 1728. The Italians called him the "glory of the art," and the first of composers. He composed about 100 operas, a great number of motets, and nearly 200 masses.—DOMENICO, his son, b. 1683, resided for a time at Rome and Naples, but finally settled at Madrid, where he obtained the appointment of chapel-master to the queen of Spain. He produced several operas and some good church music, and was on terms of friendship with Handel.

SCARPA, ANTONIO, a celebrated Italian anatomist, was b. 1746, at Friuli; and d. at Pavia, in 1826. He enjoyed an extensive reputation throughout Europe, by his admirable description of the nerves in his "Tabula Necrologiæ."

SCARRON, PAUL, a comic poet and satirist, was b. at Paris, 1610, and was intended for the church, to which he was averse, and for which his habits were decidedly unfit. At the age of 24 he travelled into Italy, where he gave himself up without restraint to indulgences of every kind, and continued his excesses after his return to Paris. At the age of 27, having appeared during the carnival at Mans as a savage, he was pursued by the populace, and being obliged to hide himself in a marsh, he lost the use of his limbs. Notwithstanding his sufferings, he never lost his gaiety; and, settling at Paris, his wit and social powers gained him a wide circle of acquaintance, among whom was the beautiful mademoiselle d'Aubigné, who after his death was known as the widow Scarron, and who was eventually rendered still more famous as madame de Maintenon. His principle writings are, his "Comic Romance" and his "Virgilie Travestie." D. 1660.

SCHADOW, JOHANN GEOFFROY, a distinguished modern sculptor, was b. at Berlin, 1764. Having evinced an early predilection for the fine arts, he repaired to Rome in 1785 for the cultivation of his taste, and after initiating himself in the school of the best Italian masters, he returned to Berlin in 1788, where he was appointed professor of sculpture in the university of that city, and subsequently director-in-chief of the academy of the fine arts. Here he lived and labored for the long period of 62 years. D. 1850.—ZONO RIDOLFO, an Italian sculptor, was b. at Rome, 1786; and was instructed by Canova and Thorwaldsen. He executed many admired sculptures and bass-reliefs, and d. 1822.

SCHÉELE, CHARLES WILLIAM, an eminent chemist, was b. in 1742, at Stralsund, in Swedish Pomerania; was brought up as an apothecary at Stralsburg, became proprietor of a pharmaceutical establishment at Kœping, and d. in 1786. He wrote "Chemical Essays," and was the discoverer of the oxalic, fluoric, malic, and lactic acids.

SCHILLER, JOHN CHRISTOPHER FREDERIC VON, one of the most illustrious names in German literature, was b. at Marbach, in Wirtemberg, in 1759. After having studied medicine, and become surgeon in a regiment, he, in his 22d year, wrote his tragedy of "The Robbers," which at once raised him to the foremost rank among the dramatists of his country. It was performed at Manheim, in 1782. But some passages of a revolutionary tendency having incurred the displeasure of the duke of Wirtemberg, he left Stuttgart by stealth, and made his way to Manheim, where, after various wanderings and many hardships, he got his tragedy of "Fiesco" brought out on the stage. The tragedies of "Cabal and Love" and "Don Carlos" were his next productions. In 1785 he repaired to Leipsic and Dresden, where he found many admirers. Here he wrote his singular romance called the "Geisterseher," and his "Philosophical Letters," and collected materials for a "History of the Revolt of the Netherlands, under Philip II." In 1787 he repaired to Weimar, where he was welcomed with great warmth by Wieland and Herder, undertook the management of a periodical called the "German Mercury," and not long afterwards made the acquaintance of Goethe, which soon ripened into a friendship only dissolved by death. In 1789 he was appointed to the chair of history in the university of Jena, and besides lecturing to crowded audiences, he published his celebrated "History of the Thirty Years' War," and engaged in various literary enterprises, which have more or less had great influence on the literature of Germany. "Die Horen" and "Der Musen-Almanach," to which the most eminent men in Germany contributed, belong to this category. He soon after settled at Weimar, in order to direct the theatre in conjunction with Goethe, in accordance with their mutual tastes and opinions; and here he at intervals published the works which, together with those above mentioned, have immortalized his name. Among these are, "Joan of Arc," "Mary Stuart," "Wallenstein," "William Tell," "History of the Remarkable Conspiracies and Revolutions in the Middle and Later Ages." &c. D. 1305.

SCHLEGEL, AUGUST WILHELM VON, a celebrated critic, poet, and philologist, was b. at Hanover, 1767. After finishing his studies at Göttingen, he became professor at Jena, where he lectured on the theory of art, and joined his brother Friederich in the editorship of the "Athenæum." In 1802 he repaired to Berlin, as a wider field for his literary predilections; accompanied madame de Staël, in 1805, on a tour through Italy, France, Germany, and Sweden; delivered lectures in Vienna, in 1808, on dramatic art; became secretary to Bernadotte, the crown prince of Sweden, in 1813; and, after studying Sanscrit in Paris, obtained in 1818 the professorship of history at Bonn, which he held till his death, 1845.—FREDERICH VON, a celebrated German critic and philologist, and a younger brother of the preceding, was b. in 1772, and studied at Göttingen and Leipsic. His first production of any importance was the "History of the Poetry of the Greeks and Romans." He then joined his brother in conducting a periodical called the "Athenæum," and after publishing the philosophical romance of "Lucinda," he visited Paris, where he delivered lectures on philosophy, and occupied himself with the fine arts. In 1804 he published a "Collection of the Romantic Poetry of the Middle Ages." After this he repaired to Vienna, and, in 1809, received an appointment at the head-quarters of the Archduke Charles, where he drew up several powerful proclamations. When peace was concluded, he delivered in Vienna the lectures known as "The History of Ancient and Modern Literature." In 1812 he edited the "German Museum," and gained the confidence of Prince Metternich by the composition of various diplomatic papers; in consequence of which he was appointed Austrian counsellor of legation at the Germanic diet, which he held from 1814 to 1818. He then returned to Vienna, and resumed his literary occupations with great zest, contributing to various journals, and producing his "Philosophy of Life," and his "Philosophy of History," which rank among his best literary efforts. Like his brother, Friederich Schlegel became a Roman Catholic; and his strong devotional tendencies may be seen in his interesting "Letters on Christian Art." D. 1829.

SCHLEIERMACHER, FREDERIC ERNEST DANIEL, equally distinguished as a theologian, a philologist, a critic, an orator, and a translator, was b. at Breslau in 1768; studied at Halle in 1781; and, after holding various ecclesiastical appointments in different parts of Germany, was called to Berlin in 1809 as preacher, and about the same time received the chair of theology in the university of that city. The influence of his writings on the German mind was and still is very great; but it was far surpassed by that which his oral instructions, and the purity and piety which his personal character exercised over those who lived within his sphere. D. 1834.

SCHOEFFER, PETER, one of the inventors of printing, was b. at Gernsheim, in the territory of Darmstadt, was a partner with Guttemberg and Faust, and having married the daughter of the latter, became sole possessor of the printing establishment. D. about 1502.

SCHOMBERG, HENRY DE, marshal of France, was descended from a German family. He served in 1617, in Piedmont, under marshal d'Estrées, and afterwards against the Huguenots in the civil wars. In 1625 he was made field-marshal, and two years afterwards defeated the English at the isle of Rhé. In 1629 he forced the passage of Susa, on which occasion he was severely wounded. The next year he took Pignerol, and relieved Casal. In 1632 he defeated the rebels in Languedoc at the famous battle of Castelnaudari, for which he was made governor of that province. He wrote a "Narrative of the War of Italy," and d. 1633.—FREDERIC ARMAND, duke of, was b. of an illustrious family, but different from the preceding. He began his military career under Frederic Henry, prince of Orange, and his son William; but in 1650 he passed into the French service, became acquainted with Condé and Turenne, and obtained the government of Gravelines and Furnes. He accompanied the prince of Orange to England at the revolution, was created a peer, made knight of the garter, and obtained a grant of £100,000. In 1689 he went with William to Ireland, and was accidentally shot as he was crossing the Boyne, by the French refugees of his own regiment.

SCHOPENHAUER, JOHANNA, a German authoress of great celebrity, was b. at Dantzic, 1770. Her chief works are, "Fernow's Leben," "Ausflucht an den Rhein," "Jugendleben und Wanderbilder," an English translation of which was published in 1847, "Sidonia," "Die Tante," and above all "Gabriele," which presents a charming picture of female character. D. 1838.

SCHREVELIUS, CORNELIUS, a learned critic, was b. at Haerlem, about 1614. His father was rector of the school at Leyden, in which office he succeeded him. His name is now principally known by his "Greek and Latin Lexicon." D. 1667.

SCHUBERT, FRANCIS, an eminent musical composer, was b. at Vienna, 1796. His melodies, known by their German name, "Lieder," have attained great celebrity throughout Germany, France, and England; among the best known are the "Erl König," "Ave Maria," "Der Wanderer," and "Die Erwartung," &c. D. 1830.

SCHUMACHER, HEINRICH CHRISTIAN, a distinguished astronomer, was b. in Holstein, 1780, was successively professor of astronomy at the university of Copenhagen, director at the observatory of Mannheim, in the grand duchy of Baden, and for many years astronomer in the observatory at Altona, and editor of the "Astronomische Nachrichten." He was a diligent and accurate observer, one of his latest labors being connected with Encke's planet Astræa. D. 1850.

SCHURMANN, ANNA MARIA DE, b. at Cologne, in 1607, whose acquirements in the learned languages, the fine arts, and polite literature were so great, that she obtained the appellation of the modern Sappho. This erudite and accomplished lady, who understood the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Chaldee, and several modern languages, and who was mistress of painting, engraving, sculpture, and music, at length became the victim of fanatical delusion. In 1650 she appeared as a zealous disciple of the enthusiast Labadie, to whom, it is said, she was secretly married; and, after his death, she retired to Weivart, in Friesland, where she d. in 1678. Her "Opuscula, or Pieces in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew," were printed in 1652. She also wrote "Latin Poems" and a "Defence of Female Study."

SCHUYLER, PHILIP, an officer in the American army, was appointed major-general in 1775, and was dispatched to the fortifications in the north of New York, to prepare for the invasion of Canada. He afterwards fell under some suspicion, and was superseded in the chief command by General Gates. He was a member of congress before the adoption of the present constitution, and afterwards twice a senator. D. 1804.

SCHWANTHALER, LUDWIG VON, an eminent sculptor, descended from a family that for generations had been distinguished in the art, was b. at Munich, 1802. At the age of 16 he entered the academy of Munich, where he soon attracted the attention of Cornelius, by whose advice he repaired to Rome; and after enjoying there the friendship and instructions of Thorwaldsen, he returned to his native city in 1827, where he found ample scope for the development of his genius in the numerous commissions intrusted to him by the royal family of Bavaria. It would be difficult with our limits to point out even a title of his productions; suffice it to say, that rich as Munich has become in works of art, it owes no small portion of its celebrity to this artist, whose marvellous power of composition and versatility of genius showed themselves no less in his admirable statues and reliefs, than in his frescoes and cartoons. D. 1848.

SCHWARTZ, BERTHOLD, a monk of the order of Cordeliers, at the end of the 13th century, was a native of Fribourg in Germany, and an able chemist. It is said, that as he was making some experiments with nitre, it led to his invention of gunpowder, which was first applied to warlike purposes by the Venetians in 1300. There is, however, much discrepancy in the accounts of this discovery; and it is certain that Roger Bacon, who died in 1292, was acquainted with an inflammable composition similar to gunpowder, the knowledge of which Europeans appear to have derived from the Orientals.—CHRISTIAN FREDERIC, a German missionary to the East Indies. In 1767, he was employed by the English society for the promotion of Christian knowledge, and he continued throughout his life to labor in the sacred cause with unceasing zeal. He was held in high esteem for his character by the Hindoos, and the rajah of Tanjore made him tutor to his son. D. 1798.

SCHWARTZENBERG, CHARLES PHILIP, Prince, an Austrian field-marshal, was b. of an ancient and illustrious family at Vienna, in 1771. He entered into the army early, and rapidly proceeded through all the grades of military rank until he became a general officer. D. 1820.

SCOTT, JOHN, a Quaker poet, b. at Bermondsey, in 1739. He resided, during the greater part of his life at Amwell, and d. in 1782. He was the author of "Amwell," and other poems, a "Digest of the Highway Laws," "Critical Essays."—JOHN, the original editor, of the "London Magazine," and the author of "A Visit to Paris in 1814," &c. His remarks on some articles in "Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine" having given offence to the editor of that work, a quarrel ensued, which ended in a duel between a friend of the editor and Mr. Scott, who, a few days after, d. of the wound he had received from his adversary.—MICHAEL, a celebrated Scottish philosopher of the 13th century, whose knowledge of the occult sciences caused him to pass among the unlettered for a magician, was b. at Balwirie, in Fifeshire. He travelled in France, Germany, and England, and was received with great distinction by the respective sovereigns; received the honor of knighthood from the Scottish monarch, Alexander III., and d. 1293.—MICHAEL, the author of "Tom Cringle's Log," was b. in Glasgow, 1789; received his education at the high school and university of that city, repaired to Jamaica in 1806, where he remained till 1822, and finally settled in Scotland, where he embarked in commercial speculations. D. 1835.—REGINALD, or REYNOLD, was a native of Kent, and received his education at Hart hall, Cambridge. He had both the good sense and courage to oppose the absurd opinion, at that time prevalent, of the existence of witches, by publishing his "Discoveries of Witchcraft." D. 1599.—SAMUEL, an eminent painter of scenery, who took Vandervelde for his model, and often excelled him. D. 1772.—SIR WALTER, who is generally placed at the head of English novelists in the 19th century, was b. at Edinburgh, in 1771. He passed the years of his youth between the pleasures of hunting, the study of the law, and an indulgence of his taste in reading old plays, romances, travels, and marvellous adventures. The antiquities and ancient poetry of Scotland seem to have early inflamed his imagination; he read the old chronicles, and made himself acquainted with the customs, obsolete laws, and even the traditions of individual families, and was versed in the localities and the superstitious belief of the inhabitants of the Scottish mountains. He made his debut as an original author in "Specimens of Ancient Scottish Poetry," which had great success. His next work, the "Lay of the Last Minstrel," was received with still greater favor. "Marmion" and "Rokeby" followed, and gave a climax to his poetical reputation; but it was soon afterwards eclipsed by the rise of Lord Byron's poetical star, his vigorous and impassioned verses diverting the public poetical taste into an entirely new channel. Subsequently appeared "Paul's Letters to his Kinsfolk" and the "Battle of Waterloo," the first successful, the latter a failure. His novels, however, are his great passport to fame. Those masterly productions, on which criticism would be out of place, need hardly be enumerated: "Waverley,"

"Tales of my Landlord," "Ivanhoe," "The Monastery," "The Abbot," "Quentin Durward," "Peveril of the Peak," "Woodstock," "Rob Roy," "The Heart of Mid Lothian," "Chronicles of the Canongate," &c. Sir Walter Scott was made a baronet by George IV., in 1821. Though from the time of the publication of "Waverley," Sir Walter had been generally considered the author of the "Scotch Novels," yet he had managed to preserve his incognito by various modes of evasion and half-denials whenever the subject was publicly mooted; and the author, whoever he might prove to be, was fancifully styled the "Great Unknown." At length, the mystery was solved. At the annual dinner of the Theatrical Fund Association in 1827, Sir Walter, in returning thanks for the honor which the company had done him by drinking his health, unreservedly declared that they were wholly and solely his own compositions. His emoluments were very large, but pecuniary difficulties with his publishers involved him in the common failure. His debts he nobly determined to reduce by new efforts, many of which, though they answered the end which the author had in view, added little to his fame, and utterly destroyed a robust constitution in writing them. D. 1832.—JOHN, a distinguished lawyer and judge of Virginia. B. 1782; d. 1850.

SECKER, THOMAS, archbishop of Canterbury, an eminent and pious prelate, was b. at Sibthorpe, in Nottinghamshire, in 1693, and was educated with a view of becoming a dissenting minister. He, however, declared that he could not conscientiously assent to the tenets held by his family, and he therefore conformed to the church of England, took orders, and obtained preferment. D. 1768.

SEDGWICK, THEODORE, a judge of the supreme court of Massachusetts, was b. at Hartford, Ct., in 1746. He was graduated at Yale college, and in 1766 began the practice of the law in Berkshire county, Mass. In 1776 he served as aid to General Thomas in the expedition against Canada. In 1785 he was a member of congress under the old confederation. His exertions during 1787 to suppress the insurrectionary spirit of the state, in what is known as Shay's rebellion, were efficient and honorable. In 1789 he was again in congress; and in 1796 a member of the U. S. senate. In 1802 he was appointed judge. D. 1813.—THEODORE, a son of the preceding, was b. at Sheffield, Mass., 1780; was educated at Yale college, and practised law in Albany. He was twice a member of the legislature of Massachusetts, and twice the democratic candidate for congress. But his life was mainly devoted to literary and agricultural pursuits. He wrote "Hints to my Countrymen," and "Public and Private Economy." D. 1839.

SEDLEY, SIR CHARLES, a celebrated wit, courtier, and poet, of the age of Charles II., was b. at Aylesford, in Kent, in 1639; d. 1701.

SEGUR, JOSEPH ALEXANDER, viscount de, second son of the marshal de Ségur, engaged when young in the military service, but having attained the post of maréchal de camp in 1790, he gave up his time entirely to the cultivation of literature, and published several romances. D. 1805.—LOUIS, count de, a French diplomatist and historical writer, was the eldest son of the marshal de Ségur, and b. in 1753. He served during two campaigns in the American war, and was afterwards ambassador to St. Petersburg and Berlin. On the overthrow of the French monarchy he relinquished his connection with affairs of state; he was, notwithstanding, arrested by order of the committee of public safety; but being liberated shortly after, he quitted France, and did not return till after the fall of Robespierre, when he was made a peer. D. 1830.

SELDEN, JOHN, an English antiquary, law writer, and historian, of most extensive acquirements, was a native of Sussex, and b. 1584. So early as 1607 he drew up a work, entitled "Analectum Anglo-Britannicum," which was quickly succeeded by several others; and in 1614 appeared his "Titles of Honor." Next followed his "De Diis Syriis" and "Mare Clausum." He now entered the field of politics, and in 1640 was elected member of parliament for Oxford. At the commencement of the disputes between Charles and the parliament, he acted with great moderation, and uniformly endeavored to prevent an ultimate appeal to the sword. In 1643, the house of commons appointed him keeper of the records of the Tower, and, the following year, one of the commissioners of the admiralty, voting him £5000 as a reward for his services. He employed all his influence for the protection of learning, and was universally esteemed for his urbanity of manners and goodness of heart. D. 1654.

SELKIRK, ALEXANDER, a sailor, was

b. at Largo, in Scotland, about 1680. He was a good navigator, and made several voyages to the South Sea, in one of which, having a quarrel with his commander, he was put ashore on the island of Juan Fernandez, with a few necessaries, a fowling-piece, gunpowder, and shot. Here he remained in solitude nearly three years, till he was taken away by Captain Woods Rogers, in 1709. On his return to England, he is said to have employed Daniel Defoe in drawing up a narrative of his adventures for the press, from which source originated the popular and interesting "Adventures of Robinson Crusoe."

SENECA, LUCIUS ANNEUS, a celebrated Roman philosopher, moralist, and statesman, the son of Marcus Annæus, an eminent orator, was b. at Corduba, in Spain, during the first year of the Christian era. His reputation soon extended to the imperial court; and his various learning and practical wisdom caused him to be appointed tutor to Nero, and procured him several important places. After his accession to the throne, his imperial pupil for a while loaded him with favors; but at length resolving to rid himself of his old preceptor, the tyrant charged him with being an accomplice in the conspiracy of Piso, and he was condemned to death. The method of his execution was, however, left to his own choice. He consequently, with the characteristic ostentation of a stoic, finished his life in the midst of his friends, conversing on philosophical topics while the blood was flowing from his veins, which he had caused to be opened for that purpose. D. 65.

SERVETUS, MICHAEL, a learned Spaniard, memorable as the victim of religious intolerance, was b. at Villanueva, in 1509; was educated at Toulouse, studied medicine at Paris, and was in constant correspondence with Calvin, whom he consulted in respect to his Arian notions. He published several anti-trinitarian works, which excited against him the violent hatred of both Catholics and Protestants; and though he was so fortunate as to escape from the persecutions of the former, he could not elude the vengeance of the latter, headed and incited as they were by his implacable enemy, the stern and unforgiving reformer of Geneva. He was seized as he was passing through that city, tried for "blasphemy and heresy," and condemned to the flames, which sentence was carried into execution, October 27, 1553. Servetus is supposed by many to have anticipated Harvey in the discovery of the circulation of the blood.

SERVIUS TULLIUS, king of Rome, was the son of a female slave. He married the daughter of Tarquin the elder, whom he succeeded, 577 B. C., and was murdered by his son-in-law, Tarquin Superbus, 534 B. C.

SETTLE, ELKANAH, an English poet, was b. at Dunstable, 1618; educated at Trinity college, Oxford; was much engaged in the political squabbles of the age, and wrote some smart pieces both in prose and verse. He was also an indefatigable writer for the stage, but none of his dramas are now acted. D. 1724.

SEVIGNE, MARY DE RABUTIN, marchioness de, daughter of the baron de Chantal, was b. in 1626. At the age of 18 she married the marquis de Sevigné, who was killed in a duel seven years afterwards. Being thus left a widow, with two children, she paid great attention to their education; and when her daughter married the count de Grignan, she kept up a correspondence with her; to which circumstance the world is indebted for those letters which are regarded as models of epistolary composition. D. 1696.

SEWARD, ANNA, daughter of the Rev. Thomas Seward, himself a poet and the author of an edition of Beaumont and Fletcher, was b. at Eyam, in Derbyshire, in 1747. She evinced a poetical taste in early life. In 1782 she published her poetical romance of "Louisa;" and she subsequently printed a collection of sonnets, and a "Life of Dr. Darwin," in which she asserted her claim to the first fifty lines of that author's "Botanic Garden." D. 1809.—WILLIAM, a biographical writer, was b. in London, 1747. He was educated at the Charter house and at Oxford; was intimate with Dr. Johnson, and other eminent literary characters; and was the author of "Anecdotes of Distinguished Persons," "Biographiana," &c. D. in 1799.

SEWELL, GEORGE, a poet and miscellaneous writer, was b. at Windsor, and after completing his education at Peter-house, Cambridge, studied medicine in Holland under the celebrated Boerhaave, and settled at Hampstead as a physician. His chief literary productions are, "Sir Walter Raleigh," a tragedy; "A Vindication of the English Stage;" translations of parts of Lucan, Ovid, and Tibullus; and "Epistles to Mr. Addison." D. 1726.

SFORZA, JAMES, called the Great, was b. of humble parentage, at Cotignola, in 1639. A company of soldiers happening to pass through his village, young Sforza joined them, and, after passing through the inferior military ranks, became a general. He obliged Alphonsus, king of Aragon, to raise the siege of Naples, and he retook several important places which had revolted; but being too eager in pursuing the flying enemy, he was drowned in the river near Pescara, in 1424.—FRANCIS, natural son of the preceding, commanded with distinction in the service of Naples; after which he married the daughter of the duke of Milan, on whose death he was chosen general of the duchy; but he abused that trust, and usurped the sovereignty. D. 1466.

SHADWELL, Sir LANCELOT, vice-chancellor of England, was b. 1799; educated at Eton and Cambridge, where he took his degree of B.A. in 1800. He was called to the bar by the honorable society of Lincoln's Inn in 1803, was appointed a king's counsel in 1821, sat for Ripon as M. P. in 1826, and was elevated to the vice-chancellorship of England in 1827. D. 1850.—THOMAS, a dramatic poet, was b. 1640, at Stanton Hall, Norfolk, and was educated at Cambridge. When Dryden was removed from the offices of laureate and historiographer royal, Shadwell was appointed his successor, which exposed him to the severity of that poet's satire, who ridiculed him under the appellation of Macfleeknoe. D. 1692. His principal plays are, "Epsom Wells," "Timon the Misanthrope," the "Virtuoso," the "Gentleman of Alsace," and the "Lancashire Witches."—CHARLES, supposed to have been the son or nephew of the preceding, wrote some plays, the best of which is entitled the "Fair Quaker of Deal." D. 1726.

SHAKSPEARE, WILLIAM, the most illustrious dramatic poet of England, was b. at Stratford-upon-Avon, April 23, 1564, and was the son of a dealer in wool, who appears also to have carried on the business of a butcher. His education was confined to what he could attain at the free-school of his native place; and being taken from it early, he made no further progress than the rudiments of Latin. In his 18th year he married Ann Hathaway, a farmer's daughter, who was considerably older than himself. Of his occupation at this period, nothing determinate is recorded; but it appears that he was wild and irregular, and that he was more than once concerned with others in stealing deer from the park of Sir Thomas Lucy, of Charlecote, near Stratford. For this he was prosecuted by that gentleman; but he retaliated by a severe lampoon on him, and then fled to London, in order to escape another prosecution. Here he formed an acquaintance with the players, and was enrolled among them, though what sort of characters he performed does not appear. Mr. Rowe observes, that he could never meet with any further account of him as an actor, than that his highest part was the Ghost in his own "Hamlet." Queen Elizabeth had several of his plays acted before her, and, without doubt, gave him many marks of her favor. She was so pleased with the character of Falstaff in the two parts of Henry IV., that she commanded him to exhibit him in love, on which occasion Shakspeare wrote his rich and admirable comedy of the "Merry Wives of Windsor." The earl of Southampton is said on one occasion to have presented him with £1000; and he enjoyed the friendship of his most eminent literary cotemporaries. Having become proprietor and manager of the Globe theatre, he realized a handsome fortune, which enabled him to spend the close of his life at his native town, where he purchased a house and estate, to which he gave the name of New Place. The house and lands continued in the possession of the poet's descendants till the restoration, when they were repurchased by the Clopton family. Here Shakspeare planted the famous mulberry tree, which remained an object of profit to the people of Stratford, and of veneration to visitors, till about 1759, when the possessor, out of hatred to the inhabitants, cut it down. Shakspeare died on his 52d birthday, in 1616, and was buried in the church of Stratford, where his monument still remains. In 1741, a monument was erected to him in Westminster abbey, and paid for by the proceeds of benefits at the two great theatres. In 1769, by the efforts of Garrick, a festival was celebrated in honor of the poet in his native town. The only notice recorded of the person of Shakspeare is to be found in Aubrey, who says that "he was a handsome, well-shaped man," and adds, that he was "verie good company, and of a verie ready, pleasant, and smooth witt." Besides his immortal plays, Shakspeare was the author of two poems "Venus and Adonis," and "Lucrece," which, although lost in the blaze of his dramatic genius, exhibit much of poetry that is worthy of admiration.

SHARP, JAMES, archbishop of St. Andrew's, a distinguished prelate of the 17th century, was b. in Banffshire, 1618, and obtained a professorship in the university of St. Andrew's. The presbytery being overturned by parliament, under Charles II., Sharp, who had treacherously promoted that measure, was rewarded with the primacy, and appointed archbishop of St. Andrew's. The wanton cruelties which followed, confirmed the horror entertained against him, and raised the fury of some of his more bigoted opponents to take his life. D. 1679.

—GRANVILLE, distinguished for his philanthropy and learning, was b. at Durham, 1734. He obtained a place in the ordnance office, which he resigned at the commencement of the American war, because he disapproved of its principles; after which he devoted his life to private study, and the active exercise of a benevolent mind. He established the right of negroes to their freedom while in England, instituted the society for the abolition of the slave trade, advocated the principles of parliamentary reform, and distinguished himself with equal zeal in other patriotic and benevolent objects; the last of which was the promotion of the distribution of the Scriptures. He was critically skilled in the Hebrew and Greek languages, and was the author of various works, the principal of which are, "Remarks on the Uses of the Definite Article in the Greek Testament," a "Short Treatise on the English Tongue," "Remarks on the Prophecies," "Treatises on the Slave Trade," on "Duelling," "The People's Right to a share in the Legislature," the "Law of Nature, and Principles of Action in Man," &c. D. 1813.

SHARPE, GREGORY, an eminent oriental scholar and able divine, was b. in Yorkshire, 1713, was educated at Westminster and Aberdeen, and eventually became master of the Temple. Among his writings are, "A Review of the Controversy on the Demoniaes," "Defence of Dr. Clarke against the Attacks of Leibnitz," "Dissertations on the Origin of Languages, and the Powers of Letters, with a Hebrew Lexicon," "Dissertations on the Latin and Greek Tongues," "Three Discourses in Defence of Christianity," an "Introduction to Universal History," and "The Rise and Fall of the City and Temple of Jerusalem." D. 1771.

SHEE, Sir MARTIN ARCHER, president and senior member of the Royal Academy, was b. in Dublin, 1769. On his first arrival from Ireland in the British metropolis, he was introduced to the notice of Sir Joshua Reynolds, and to some other distinguished persons, by his illustrious friend and countryman, Edmund Burke. He became an exhibitor at the Royal Academy for the first time in the year 1789. In 1791 he sent four portraits to the exhibition; in 1792 he exhibited seven works; and, in 1796, he reached what is now the full academical number of eight portraits. He continued equally industrious for many successive years; and was in such favor with his fellow-artists, that he was elected an associate of the Royal Academy in 1798. In 1800 he was elected a full royal academician; and of his thirty-nine brethren by whom he was chosen, he was the last survivor. D. 1850.

SHELDON, GILBERT, an eminent prelate, was b. at Stanton, in Staffordshire, 1598. On the death of Archbishop Juxon, he was raised to the primacy, and expended above £66,000 in charitable uses. But the greatest of his works was building the theatre at Oxford. D. 1677.

SHELLEY, PERCY BYSSHE, an eminent modern poet, eldest son of Sir Timothy Shelley, Sussex, was b. at Field Place, in that county, 1792. He was sent to Eton, whence, owing to his eccentricity of character, he was removed to Oxford, much before the usual period. Here a repetition of youthful irregularities occasioned his expulsion; and his family were estranged by an ill-assorted marriage. After the birth of a boy and a girl, he separated from his wife, who died shortly after. Mr. Shelley then married Miss Godwin, daughter of the author of "Political Justice" and the famed "Mary Wolstoncroft," and soon after retired to Marlow, in Buckinghamshire, where he wrote his "Revolt of Islam." About this time the guardianship of his children was taken from him, by an infamous order of the chancellor, on the ground of alleged atheistical and skeptical notions, and of certain avowed opinions regarding the intercourse of the sexes, which were deemed immoral and dangerous. He now repaired to Italy, with his second wife and a new family, and renewed an acquaintance with Lord Byron, to whom he had been known during a former visit to the Continent. There, in conjunction with his lordship and Mr. Leigh Hunt, he contributed to "The Liberal," a periodical miscellany, which contained the "Vision of Judgment," by Lord Byron, and other original productions; but which, partly owing to Shelley's untimely death, was very soon discontinued. He was drowned by the wreck of his own small sailing-boat in a violent storm, on his return from Leghorn to his house, on the gulf of Lerici, July 8, 1822. Fifteen days afterwards his body was discovered, and, agreeably to his own desire, often expressed to his friend Byron, it was burnt on the sea-shore, and the ashes conveyed to Rome, where they are interred in the burial-ground near the pyramid of Caius Cestus. The poetical works of this writer are, "Prometheus Chained," "Alastor, or the Spirit of Solitude," "Queen Mab," and "Cenci;" the whole of which display a poetical genius of the highest order, and a character of the utmost purity and benevolence.—His wife, above alluded to, b. 1797, gained great distinction by her "Frankenstein," published in 1817. She was also the authoress of the "Lives of Eminent Literary Frenchmen," published in "Lardner's Cabinet Cyclopædia;" and, among other literary performances of merit, she edited with notes her husband's poems. D. 1851.

SHENSTONE, WILLIAM, an English poet, b. 1714, at Hales Owen, in Shropshire, was the son of a gentleman farmer, residing on his own estate, called the Leasowes. He was educated at Oxford, and, on coming into possession of his paternal property, he relinquished all views of an active life, and occupied himself with rural embellishments, and the cultivation of poetry. His great desire to render the Leasowes famous for picturesque beauty and elegance, led to expenses which he could but ill support, and he was by no means a happy inhabitant of the Eden which he had created. His works consist of songs, elegies, pastorals, and miscellaneous essays. D. 1763.

SHERBURNE, Sir EDWARD, an ingenious writer, was b. in London, 1618. He held the office of clerk of the ordinance under Charles I., and suffered greatly during the civil war; but was restored to his office, and knighted by Charles II. D. 1702. He translated "Seneca's Tragedies," the "Sphere of Marcus Manilius," and other works, into English, and wrote poems.

SHERIDAN, THOMAS, (the well-known friend of Dean Swift,) was b. in 1684, and d. in 1788. He was eminent as a teacher, but, being singularly thoughtless and extravagant, he closed his life in great poverty. He was the author of some sermons, and a translation of the satires of Persius.—THOMAS, son of the preceding, was b. in 1721, at Quilea, in Ireland, and was educated at Westminster school, and at Trinity college, Dublin. In 1742 he went upon the stage, and gained much celebrity as a tragedian, both in his native country and in England. He next became manager of the Dublin company, but being ruined by the opposition of a rival theatre and by riots in his own, he relinquished the profession, and commenced as a lecturer on elocution, which for a time was very successful. During the ministry of Lord Bute, he obtained a pension of £200 a year. He subsequently became manager of Drury-lane theatre; but some disputes taking place, he retired from the situation, and resumed his attention to oratory. His principal works are, an "Orthoepical Dictionary of the English Language," and a "Life of Swift." D. 1788.—FRANCES, wife of the preceding, was the writer of "Sidney Biddulph," a novel; "Nourjahad," an Eastern tale; and the comedies of "The Discovery" and "The Dupe." B. 1724; d. 1767.—RICHARD BRINSLEY, third son of the preceding, distinguished as a statesman, wit, and dramatist, was b. at Dublin, 1751. He was educated at Harrow school, and became a student of the Middle Temple, but was not called to the bar. His first dramatic attempt was "The Rivals," which was acted at Covent-garden in 1775, with moderate success; but the "Duenna," a musical entertainment, which followed, was received with general admiration; and his "School for Scandal" gained him the highest reputation as a comic writer. On the retirement of Garrick from Drury-lane theatre, he purchased a share in that property, which qualified him for a seat in parliament; and, in 1780, he was chosen memoer for the borough of Stafford. He attained distinguished celebrity as an orator, and made the grandest display of eloquence during the progress of the impeachment of Warren Hastings. The political changes consequent on the death of Pitt, in 1806, occasioned the exaltation of the party with which Sheridan was connected, and he obtained the lucrative post of treasurer of the navy, and the rank of a privy councillor. This administration being weakened by the loss of Mr. Fox, who survived his celebrated rival only a few months, now alterations took place, and he was deprived of office, to which he never returned. At the general election in 1806, he obtained a seat for Westminster, the great object of his ambition; but he was afterwards nominated for the borough of Ilchester, which he continued to represent during the remainder of his parliamentary career. The latter part of the life of this highly talented individual was embittered by misfortunes, principally arising from his own improvidence. His profuse habits involved him deeply in debt; his failure of a seat in parliament deprived him of protection from arrest; intemperance had undermined his constitution; mental anxiety completed the destruction of his health; and his death took place amidst a complication of difficulties, fears, and sorrows, July 7, 1816. Besides the pieces already noticed, he was the author of part of "A Translation of Aristænetus," the farces of "The Critic," a "Trip to Scarborough," and "St. Patrick's Day," a "Letter to Henry Dundas," "Pizarro," a drama altered from Kotzebue, and poems. Mr. Sheridan was twice married, first to Miss Linley, a celebrated singer; and the second time to Miss Ogle, daughter of the dean of Winchester.

SHERLOCK, WILLIAM, an eminent English divine, b. 1641. He became dean of St. Paul's, and wrote numerous books and pamphlets, the greater part of which were of the controversial kind. His "Practical Treatise on Death," however, has been highly valued and very much read. D. 1770.—THOMAS, an eminent prelate, son of the preceding, b. in 1678, was distinguished as a warm and spirited controversial writer. His works are very numerous, and his sermons particularly to be admired for their ingenuity and elegance. He was, successively, dean of Chichester, and bishop of Bangor, Salisbury, and London. D. 1761.

SHERMAN, ROGER, a signer of the declaration of American independence, was b. at Newton, Mass., in 1721, and with only a common-school education, rose to distinction as a lawyer and statesman. His early life was passed in the occupation of a shoemaker. Removing to Connecticut in 1743, he was admitted to the bar in 1754, and soon became distinguished as a counsellor. In 1761 he removed to New Haven, four years after was appointed a judge of the county court, and in 1776 advanced to the bench of the superior court. He was a delegate to the celebrated congress of 1774, and was a member of that body for the space of nineteen years. He was a member of the convention that formed the constitution of the United States. D. 1793.

SHIEL, RICHARD LALOR, was b. in Dublin, 1794, was educated at Trinity college, and studied law at Lincoln's-Inn. To defray the expenses of his education, he betook himself to writing tragedies. "Adelaide" to which the passionate acting of Miss O'Neil lent a charm, was followed by the "Apostate," "Bellamira," and "Evadne." In 1831 he entered parliament, where his success as a speaker was very great. He took a deep interest in Catholic emancipation, and was the right hand of O'Connell. He was ultimately preferred to the commissionership of Greenwich hospital, and shortly afterwards made vice-president of the board of trade, with a seat in the privy council. Mr. Shiel was the first Catholic commoner upon whom this dignity was bestowed. From the general election in 1841, to the time of his departure for Florence, in 1850, he represented Dungarvon. On the return of the Whigs to office, in 1846, after the repeal of the corn-laws, Mr. Shiel succeeded to the mastership of the mint, which place being abolished last session, he proceeded to Florence as British minister at the Tuscan court. D. 1851.

SHIPPEN, WILLIAM, an eminent physician, was b. in Pennsylvania, and was graduated at Princeton college in 1754. His medical studies were completed at Edinburgh, and on his return in 1764, he began at Philadelphia the first course of lectures on anatomy ever delivered in the country. He assisted in establishing the medical school of that city, and was appointed one of its professors. D. 1803.

SHIRLEY, JAMES, an eminent English dramatic writer and poet of the Elizabethan age, was b. in London, about 1594. He became a fertile writer for the stage; and having obtained considerable celebrity, was taken into the service of Queen Henrietta Maria. He afterwards accompanied the earl of Kildare to Ireland, but returned on the breaking out of the rebellion, and resumed his scholastic employment in the Whitefriars. At the restoration many of his plays were again acted, and he appears to have been comparatively prosperous; but having lost all his property by the fire of London, in 1666, both he and his wife were so affected by the calamitous event, that they died of grief and terror within 24 hours of each other.

SHORE, JANE, the beautiful and unfortunate mistress of Edward IV., was the daughter of a London citizen, and the wife of a rich jeweller in Lombard-street. Her personal charms are represented as being transcendent; her conjugal state, infelicitous; and the monarch's admiration of her, unbounded. Her virtue was not sufficiently strong to resist her royal lover, and she unreluctantly yielded to his desires. After the king's death she became attached to Lord Hastings, and their known partiality to the young princes rendered them obnoxious to the duke of Gloucester, who accused them of witchcraft. On this charge Hastings was beheaded, and his pretended accomplice committed, by the tyrant's order, to the Tower. After undergoing the form of a mock trial, she was ordered to do penance in St. Paul's, in a white sheet, and was paraded through the public streets, the bishop of London heading the procession. Her house and fortune was seized by the protector, and the unfortunate woman was reduced to the greatest distress; but her perishing in a ditch, which is said to have given rise to Shoreditch, does not appear to be founded upon fact. Where or when she died is not known; but it is certain she was living in the reign of Henry VIII.

SHORT, WILLIAM, a native of Virginia, who was secretary of legation to France when Jefferson was minister, and afterwards chargé de France, and minister to Spain, by the appointment of Washington. His state papers were marked by great cleverness and ability. B. 1759; d. 1850.

SHRAPNEL, Lieut.-general HENRY, the inventor of the case-shot known as Shrapnel-shells, received his commission as second lieutenant in the royal artillery in 1779, and attained the rank of lieutenant-general in 1837. Shortly after the siege of Gibraltar, he invented the spherical case-shot. On the adoption of these shells by the artillery, he was granted a pension of £1200 per annum in addition to his regular pay. D. 1842.

SHUCKFORD, SAMUEL, a learned divine, who was educated at Caius college, Cambridge, and became prebendary of Canterbury, and rector of All-hallows, in Lombard-street. He wrote two works, "On the Creation and Fall of Man," and "The History of the World, Sacred and Profane." D. 1754.

SHUTER, EDWARD, a celebrated comic actor, whose talents in the delineation of humorous characters rendered him a public favorite. D. 1776.

SHUTTLEWOOD, the Right Rev. PHILIP NICHOLAS, bishop of Chichester, was b. in 1782, at Kirkham, Lancashire. He received his education at Winchester, and New college, Oxford, and was distinguished at both these learned seminaries by his superior attainments. For some considerable time he resided in Oxford, and filled the situation of tutor to his college; and when, in 1822, the wardenship of New college became vacant, he was unanimously elected to that honorable station. In 1840, Dr. Shuttleworth was promoted to the see of Chichester; but his episcopal dignity was of brief duration, this able prelate dying in January, 1842. His principal works are, a "Discourse on the Consistency of the whole Scheme of Revelation with itself and with Human Reason," "Scripture not Tradition," in which his objections to Puseyism are stated with great force and learning; a volume of excellent sermons, &c.

SICARD, ROCH-AMEROSE CUCURRON, an eminent teacher of the deaf and dumb, was b. in 1742, at Fousseret, near Toulouse. On the death of l'Épée, in 1789, the Abbé Sicard was called to Paris, to succeed him in the direction of the establishment there. In 1792 he was arrested amidst the scholars, sent to prison, and was in imminent danger of becoming a victim in the ensuing massacres. He, however, obtained his liberty, and in 1796 took part in compiling the "Religious, Political, and Literary Annals of France," for which he was sentenced to transportation, but escaped. When this storm had passed away, he resumed his situation as a teacher of the deaf and dumb, which office he held for many years with great credit to himself and advantage to his pupils. He wrote several valuable works relating to tuition, &c.; and d. 1822.

SIDDONS, SARAH, the most celebrated of English tragic actresses, was a daughter of Roger Kemble, manager of an itinerant company, and b. at Brecknock, in 1775. She commenced her theatrical career as a singer, but soon relinquished that line, and attempted tragedy. In her 18th year she was married to Mr. Siddons; when she and her husband played at Liverpool and other places, gaining both reputation and profit. In 1775 she tried her powers on the London boards, but was unsuccessful. She then obtained an engagement at Bath, where she improved rapidly, and became a general favorite. Time, with study and practice, matured her powers; and when she reappeared at Drury-lane, in October, 1782, as Isabella, her success was complete; and, from that time forward, her theatrical career was one continued triumph. She possessed every requisite, personal and acquired, for the high dramatic walk she had aspired to; and those who witnessed her in the meridian of her splendid career, never forgot her surpassing intellectual powers, or her unparalleled dignity of deportment. D. 1831.

SIDMOUTH, HENRY, Viscount, &c., was the eldest son of Dr. Addington, an eminent physician; was educated at Winchester, and Brazen-nose college, Oxford; and was intended for the profession of the law, which, however, he abandoned almost as soon as he was called to the bar, in order to follow the political fortunes of his boyhood's friend, the second William Pitt. Entering parliament for Devizes, in 1784, he in 1789 succeeded Lord Grenville as speaker of the house of commons. In 1805 he accepted the office of president of the council, under Mr. Pitt's government, and was elected to the peerage. This office he more than once resigned, and reaccepted the office of president of the council; but, on the formation of the Liverpool administration, he accepted office as home secretary. B. 1757; d. 1844.

SIDNEY, Sir PHILIP, one of the most accomplished men of the reign of Elizabeth, was the son of Sir Henry Sidney; was b. in 1554, at Penshurst, in Kent; was educated at Shrewsbury school, Christ-church, Oxford, and Trinity college, Cambridge; and subsequently travelled in France, Germany, and Italy. On his return he became a favorite of the queen, and was sent by her, in 1576, on an embassy to the Emperor Rodolph. He was knighted in 1583. When his maternal uncle, the earl of Leicester, was appointed to the command of the auxiliary forces in the Netherlands, Sidney was nominated general of cavalry. He was, however, mortally wounded, in September, in a victorious action near Zutphen, and d. on the 17th of October, 1586. Sidney was universally beloved and admired.

So high did his character stand that, in 1585, he was named as a candidate for the crown of Poland. He wrote "The Arcadia," "The Defence of Poetry," and various poems.—ALGERNON, the second son of the earl of Leicester, was b. about 1620, and received an excellent education under the eye of his father. In 1643 he returned from Ireland, where he had served during the rebellion. He joined the standard of the parliament, and was appointed a colonel, and subsequently lieutenant-general of horse. He was nominated a member of the court instituted to try Charles I., but he took no part in the proceedings, though he did not disapprove of them. To the usurpation of Cromwell he was decidedly hostile. At the restoration he became a voluntary exile, and he continued abroad for seventeen years, till his father obtained for him a special pardon. Sidney, however, was too firm a friend of liberty to be tolerated by the minions of despotism. He was involved in the Rye-house plot, and was brought to trial after Lord William Russell. The most infamous perversion of justice was resorted to, in order to convict him; and he met death with heroic fortitude. Dec. 7, 1683. Sidney is the author of "Discourses on Government."—MARY, countess of Pembroke, was the sister of Philip, and possessed kindred talents, which she assiduously cultivated. She wrote an "Elegy" on her lamented brother, a "Pastoral Dialogue in praise of Queen Elizabeth," a "Discourse of Life and Death," &c. D. 1601.

SIEYES, Count EMANUEL, usually called the ABBE SIEYES, was b. 1748, at Frejus. He was, in 1787, named a member of the provincial assembly which Necker had established at Orleans. He advocated the necessity and expediency of calling the states in 1787, and in 1789 published his pamphlet, "Qu'est ce que le Tiers Etat?" which gained immense reputation, and undoubtedly hastened the crisis of the revolution. Soon after he became one of the members for Paris in the states-general; and it was at his instigation that they assumed the name of national assembly. In 1790 he brought forward a project for repressing the licentiousness of the press, and voted for the establishment of civil and criminal juries. When the Mountain ruled, in 1795, he declined sitting in the convention, but went to Berlin as ambassador. After the 18th he was named one of the three consuls; and from that time he remained steady to the constitutional principles he first asserted, opposing the Jacobins, declining union with Bonaparte, though he remained a tacit member of the senate. In 1816 he was obliged to retire from France, in consequence of the decree against the members of the convention who voted for the death of the king in 1793, and he took up his abode in Brussels. After the revolution of 1830, he, like the other French exiles, returned to his native country; but he never reappeared on the political scene. D. 1836.

SILSBEE, NATHANIEL, a distinguished merchant of Massachusetts, who served in the senate of the United States from 1826 to 1835. D. 1850.

SIMEON, CHARLES, an eminent English divine and theological writer, was b. at Reading, in 1759. D. 1836.—The STYLITES, a ridiculous fanatic, b. about 392, at Sison, on the borders of Syria. In the plenitude of ascetic extravagance, he adopted the strange fancy of fixing his habitation on the tops of pillars, (whence his Greek appellation,) and with the notion of climbing higher and higher towards heaven, removed by degrees from a pillar of six cubits high to one of 40 cubits; and, what is truly wonderful, he was enabled to pass 47 years of his wretched existence upon his pillars. Such was the extraordinary folly of the age, that this madness was regarded as a proof of holiness; and when he died, at the age of 69, his body was taken down from his last pillar by the hands of bishops, and conveyed to Antioch by an escort of 6000 soldiers, and buried with almost imperial honors.

SIMONIDES, a Grecian philosopher and poet, was b. 558 B.C., in the island of Ceos, and d., aged 88, at the court of Hiero, king of Syracuse. He excelled in lyric poetry and elegy.

SIMPSON, THOMAS, an eminent mathematician, was b. 1710, at Market Bosworth, in Leicestershire, and was the son of a weaver, who brought him up to his own trade, and, perceiving his inclination for reading, took away his books. He in consequence left his father, and after many vicissitudes, one of which was his becoming a fortune-teller, he acquired a perfect knowledge of mathematics, and rose to be a mathematical professor at the Royal Academy, Woolwich, and a member of the Royal Society. He wrote "Treatises on Fluxions, Annuities, and Algebra," "Elements of Geometry," and other scientific works. D. 1761.

SINCLAIR, or SINCLAIRE, GEORGE, professor of philosophy at Glasgow during the period of the commonwealth. He was distinguished for his researches in philosophical science; was an able engineer, and published treatises on hydrostatics and other branches of the mathematics. He was also the author of a book, entitled "Satan's Invisible World Discovered," which was for a long time popular among the Scottish peasantry. D. in 1696.—Sir JOHN, an active and enlightened philanthropist, was b. at Thurso castle, in the county of Caithness, in 1754. D. 1835.

SISMONDI, CHARLES SIMONDE DE, one of the most eminent of modern historians and political economists, was b. at Geneva, in 1773. In 1794 the house of his father, who had been an eminent member of the government of Geneva, was pillaged, two fifths of his property confiscated, and both father and son condemned to 12 months' imprisonment. The future historian, as soon as he obtained his release, sought safety and peace in Tuscany; but here he was even more unfortunate than in his native country, for the French imprisoned him as being an aristocrat, and the Italian insurgents imprisoned him as being a Frenchman. In 1800 he returned to Geneva, where in the following year he commenced his career as an author, by the publication of "A View of the Agriculture of Tuscany." His subsequent works have been numerous and varied, including history, political economy, criticism, and biography. But the works by which he is the most widely known, and which in fact have gained him a European celebrity, are his "History of the Italian Republics during the Middle Ages," "History of the Fall of the Roman Empire," and his elaborate "History of the French." In 1838 he was elected one of the five foreign members of the institute of France, in the department of moral and political sciences. D. 1842.

SIX, JOHN, a Dutch dramatic poet, was b. in 1618, and d. 1700. The works of Six are remarkable for purity of style. He was the friend and patron of Rembrandt, and his portrait was engraved by that artist.

SKELTON, JOHN, an old English poet, was b. towards the close of the 15th century, in Cumberland; was educated at Oxford, was made poet laureate, and obtained the living of Diss, in Norfolk. He was a coarse and caustic satirist, and was obliged to take refuge in the sanctuary of Westminster, in consequence of his satires on Wolsey and the mendicant friars. D. 1529.

SKINNER, STEPHEN, a philologist, was b. in London, about 1622; was educated at Christ-church, Oxford; settled as a physician at Lincoln, and d. 1667. He was author of "Etymologicon Linguae Anglicanae."

SLOANE, SIR HANS, a distinguished physician and naturalist, was b. at Killeogh, Ireland, in 1660. He was the first in England who introduced into general practice the use of bark, not only in fevers, but in a variety of other disorders. He also formed a valuable museum of the rarest productions of nature and art, which together with his library, consisting of upwards of 50,000 volumes and 3,566 manuscripts, were purchased of his executors for £20,000 by act of parliament, and made part of the collection of the British Museum. D. 1652.

SMART, CHRISTOPHER, an English poet, b. 1722, at Shipbourne, in Kent, was educated at Pembroke college, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship, but vacated it by marriage, and having settled in London commenced author. The gayety of his disposition and the buoyancy of his spirits rendered him an acceptable companion to the wits and public writers of the day, with many of whom, particularly Pope, Johnson, Garrick, and Hawkesworth, he became intimate. He translated Pope's "Ode on St. Cecilia's Day," and the "Essay on Criticism," into elegant Latin verse; wrote a poetical version of the "Psalms;" a volume of original poems, "Hannah," an oratorio, with several odes, fables, &c. He also gave to the world translations of the works of Horace, both in prose and verse. Poverty, however, overtook him, and his distresses, aided by intemperance, so unsettled his intellects, that he was placed for awhile under personal restraint. D. 1771.

SMEATON, JOHN, an eminent civil engineer, was b. in 1724, at Austhorpe, near Leeds. His father, who was an attorney, was desirous of bringing up his son to the same profession; but he became a mathematical instrument maker. In 1759 he received the gold medal of the Royal Society, of which he was a member, for a paper on the power of wind and water to turn mills, and as an engineer he gradually rose to the summit of his profession. In 1755 the Eddystone lighthouse was burnt down, and Mr. Smeaton being recommended to the proprietors of that building as an engineer every way calculated to rebuild it, he undertook the work, and executed it in such a manner, as almost to bid defiance to the power of time or accident. His last public employment was that of engineer for the improvement of Ransgate harbor. D. 1792.

SPELLIE, WILLIAM, a printer at Edinburgh, distinguished also as a man of science and learning, was b. 1740. He was the translator of Buffon's "Natural History," and author of the "Philosophy of Natural History," and of many other ingenious works. He was a fellow of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, and was much esteemed among the literati of his native city, where he d. in 1795.

SMITH, ADAM, a celebrated writer on morals and political economy, was b. at Kirkcaldy, in Scotland, in 1723. He received his education first at Kirkcaldy school, and afterwards at the university of Glasgow, where he became professor of logic and moral philosophy, and took his degree of doctor of laws. In 1759, by the publication of his "Theory of Moral Sentiments," he acquired a reputation which was greatly heightened and extended by his "Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations," which soon became a standard work in Europe, and may be considered the precursor of the modern science of political economy. Dr. Smith was the intimate friend of Hume, and published an "Apology for his Life," which was severely animadverted on by Dr. Horne for advocating sentiments and opinions that, in a religious point of view, were wholly indefensible. D. 1790.—CHARLOTTE, a novelist and poet, whose maiden name was Turner, was b. in Sussex, in 1749. At the age of 16 she married a West India merchant, who was subsequently ruined; and her pen, which she had used before merely for her amusement, now became the support of her husband and family. Her first production was entitled "Elegiac Sonnets and other Essays." After this, she published "The Romance of real Life," the novels of "Emmeline," "Marchmont," "Desmond," "Ethelinda," "Celestine," and "The Old Manor House;" besides several poems, and tales for youth; all of which were well received. D. 1806.—ELIZABETH, a young lady of extraordinary accomplishments, the daughter of a gentleman residing at Burnhall, near Durham, was b. in 1776. According to Miss Bowdler's memoir of her, she possessed a knowledge of the mathematics, and an exquisite taste for drawing and poetry; understood the French, Italian, Spanish, and German languages; made herself acquainted with the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Syriac, Arabic, and Persian; and was thoroughly versed in biblical literature. She d. of consumption, in 1806. Her translations of the book of Job, and the "Life of Klopstock," have been published.—Sir JAMES EDWARD, an eminent English physician and naturalist, was b. at Norwich, in 1759; studied medicine at Edinburgh, and took his degree at Leyden, in 1786; visited France and Italy; and, on his return to England, published "A Sketch of a Tour on the Continent." He established the Linnæan society, and was its first president; received the honor of knighthood from George IV., and d. 1828.—JAMES and HORACE, were the sons of Robert Smith, solicitor to the board of ordnance, and b. respectively in London, Feb. 10, 1775, and Dec. 31, 1779. James was articled to his father, was subsequently taken into partnership, and eventually succeeded to his business as well as to his official appointment. Horace became a member of the stock exchange. Their first effusions were contributed to the "Pic Nic" newspaper, established by Colonel Greville, in 1802. They also wrote largely for the "Monthly Mirror" and the "London Review," and some of their best vers de société appeared in the "New Monthly Magazine," while under Thomas Campbell's editorship. But the work by which the brothers are best known, and by which they will be longest remembered, is the "Rejected Addresses," which appeared on the opening of Drury-lane theatre in 1812, and of which twenty-two editions have been sold. The popularity of this work appears to have satisfied the ambition of the elder brother. But soon afterwards Horace became an indefatigable novel writer. He commenced his novels with "Gayeties and Gravities," in 1825, and ended them with "Love and Mesmerism," in 1845; and within these twenty years he also gave to the public "Brambletye House," "Tor Hill," "Reuben Apsley," "Zillah," "The New Forest," "Adam Brown," &c., all of which were well received. James d. in 1839; Horace, 1849.—JAMES, a signer of the declaration of American independence, was a native of Ireland, removed with his father to this country at an early age, and established himself in the practice of law at York, in Pennsylvania. He was a delegate from York county to the continental congress. D. 1806.—JOHN, an adventurer, was b. at Willoughby, in Lincolnshire. In the wars of Hungary, about 1602, he served against the Turks with such valor, that Sigismund, duke of Transylvania, gave him his picture set in gold, and a pension. After this he came to America, and contributed to the settlement of New England and Virginia. D. 1631. He wrote "A History of Virginia, New England, and the Summer Isles," "Travels in Europe," &c.—JOHN PYE, an eminent nonconformist divine, was b. at Sheffield, 1775. D. 1851.—MILES, a learned bishop, was b. at Hereford, in 1563. He was well acquainted with the oriental languages, and was one of the principal persons engaged in the translation of the Bible, to which he wrote the preface. D. 1624.—ROBERT, a divine and mathematician, b. in 1689, was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, of which he became master on the death of Dr. Bentley; and was mathematical preceptor of the duke of Cumberland. He wrote "A System of Optics," and "Harmonies, or the Philosophy of Musical Sounds." D. 1763.—Sir WILLIAM SIDNEY, a chivalric and far-famed British admiral, was the son of a captain in the army, John Spencer Smith, esq., of Midgham, Sussex, where he was b. 1764. D. 1840.—SYDNEY, canon residentiary of St. Paul's, rector of Combe Florey, Somersetshire; who, for half a century, rendered himself conspicuous as a political writer and critic, was b. at Woodford, in Essex; received his education at Winchester college, and was thence elected to New college, Oxford, in 1780. He commenced his ministry as curate of Netheravon, Wilts; but soon removed to Edinburgh, where he was one of the founders of the "Edinburgh Review." His contributions to that periodical, and various other productions of his fertile and witty pen, have been collected, and have gone through numerous editions; and, more recently, his "Sketches of Moral Philosophy," or lectures upon that subject, delivered at the royal institution, have been published. D. 1845.—THOMAS, a learned English divine, historian, biographer, and critic; b. in London, in 1638, d. 1710. He wrote numerous works, among which is one "On the Credibility of the Mysteries of the Christian Religion."

SMOLLETT, TOBIAS, was b. at Dal-

quburn, in Dumbartonshire, in 1721; was apprenticed to a surgeon at Glasgow, and became surgeon's mate in a man-of-war, but quitted the service in 1746, and, settling in London, commenced his career as an author. The tragedy of "The Regicide," the "Tears of Scotland," a spirited poem, and "Advice" and "Reproof," two satires, were his first productions. In 1748 his novel of "Roderick Random" appeared, which at once rendered him popular; and it was followed, at intervals, by "Peregrine Pickle," "Count Fathom," a translation of "Don Quixote," "Sir Launcelot Greaves," the "Adventures of an Atom," "Humphrey Clinker," a "Continuation of Hume's History of England," and "Travels through France and Italy." In 1756 he established "The Critical Review," for a libel in which, upon Admiral Knowles, he suffered fine and imprisonment. When Lord Bute came into power, Smollett was engaged to support him in a weekly paper, called "The Briton," which soon had a formidable opponent in the "North Briton" of Wilkes, and was unable long to maintain its ground. As a novelist, Dr. Smollett exhibits considerable originality, with much knowledge of life and manners, and an exuberance of humor, but he is open to the charge of indelicacy. As a poet, he appears to considerable advantage in his "Tears of Scotland" and the "Ode to Independence;" but as a satirist he is coarse and virulent. D. while on his travels, near Leghorn, in 1771.

SMYTH, WILLIAM, professor of modern history in the university of Cambridge, was b. 1764. In 1807 he was appointed to the chair of modern history, which he held for forty-two years. In 1806 he published "English Lyrics," a volume of poetry, which was very favorably received; but his chief title to fame are his "Lectures on Modern History," and "On the French Revolution," and his "Evidences of Christianity." D. 1849.

SNELL, RODOLPH, an eminent mathematician and philological writer, was b. at Ondewarde, in Holland, in 1547. He became professor of mathematics, and afterwards of Hebrew, in the university of Leyden, where he d. in 1613. He published "Apollonius Batavius," and several treatises on the works of Ramus. — WILLEBROD, his son, b. at Leyden, in 1591, succeeded his father in the mathematical chair, and d. in 1626. He discovered the law of the refraction of the rays of light; and undertook the measurement of the earth, or a degree of the meridian, which Muscheubroek afterwards corrected. He published some of the works of the ancient mathematicians, and a few learned treatises of his own on mathematical subjects.

SNORRO-STURLESON, an historian and antiquary, was b. in 1178, at Dale-Syssel, in the west of Iceland, was governor of his native island, and was assassinated in 1241. He compiled the "Edda" which bears his name, and collected the "Sagas," or traditions, relative to the Norwegian monarchs.

SNYDERS, FRANCIS, a celebrated painter of the Flemish school, b. at Antwerp, in 1579. He studied under Henry Van Balen, and, after visiting Italy for improvement, settled at Brussels, under the patronage of the Archduke Ferdinand. His battles and hunting pieces are admirable, and in the representation of animals none have ever surpassed him. D. 1657.

SOANE, SIR JOHN, an eminent architect, was b. at Reading, in Berkshire, in 1752, went to London at an early age with his father, who was a builder, was placed with Mr. Dance, the celebrated architect, when about 15, and afterwards acquired more practical experience in the art under Mr. Holland. In 1772, being a student of the Royal Academy, he was awarded the silver medal for the best drawing of the Banqueting-house, Whitehall. Four years afterwards he obtained the gold medal for the best design for a triumphal bridge. Soon after this he was introduced to George III., by Sir W. Chambers, and was sent to pursue his studies at Rome. On his return to England he was employed on many public works, as well as private buildings; and on the death of Sir Robert Taylor, in 1788, he was appointed architect and surveyor to the Bank of England. Most of the public buildings of London were his. D. 1837.

SOBIESKI, JOHN III., king of Poland, surnamed the Great for his military genius and warlike exploits, was b. 1629, of an illustrious family, at the castle of Olesko, in Poland. In spite of the enormous disparity of numbers with which he had to contend in the Polish wars, from 1648 to 1674, he was often eminently successful. After coming to the throne, in 1674, he led his troops to fresh victories; overrunning Moldavia and Wallachia, and crowning all his former brilliant exploits by raising the siege of Vienna, in 1683; whereby Europe was saved from the dreadful calamities to be apprehended from an irruption of the Ottoman forces. D. 1696.

SOCINUS, LÆLIUS, an Italian sectary, was b. at Sienna, in 1525, studied at Bologna, and in 1546 became member of a secret society formed in the territory of Venice, on the principle of free inquiry. This institution being soon broken up, Socinus quitted Italy to join the reformers in Switzerland, and d. at Zurich, in 1562.—FAUSTUS, nephew of the preceding, was b. at Sienna, in 1539. Having imbibed the opinions of his uncle, he propagated them with such zeal, as to become the founder of a sect called by his name. He resided some years at the court of Florence, where he held a civil employment; but in 1574 he went to Germany, and next to Poland, where he strenuously labored to reconcile the differences existing between the Unitarian churches. The tenets of Socinus differed but little from Arianism, by rejecting the divine nature of Christ altogether, and regarding his mission as merely designed to introduce a new moral law. D. 1604.

SOCRATES, the most eminent of the Grecian philosophers, and the only one who is handed down to us as a model of wisdom and virtue, was b. in Attica, 470 B. C. His father was a statuary, in which employment Socrates was brought up, but the cultivation of his mind was the object nearest his heart, and to that his attention was unremittingly devoted. He attended the lectures of the most celebrated philosophers of his time; and studied the principles of eloquence, poetry, music, and the mathematical sciences. But the moral improvement of his fellow-men was the end and aim of all his studies and all his exertions. His method of teaching was by proposing to his hearers a series of questions in such a manner as to produce in their minds a conviction of the truth of the proposition originally advanced; a mode of argument ever since termed Socratic. As a citizen he discharged, with exemplary faithfulness, all his public duties. Three times he served in the army of his country, excelling his fellow-soldiers in the ease with which he endured the hardships of their campaigns. The last part of his life occurred during that unhappy period when Athens had sunk into anarchy and despotism, in consequence of the unfortunate result of the Peloponnesian war. Amid the general immorality, hatred, envy, and malice of such an epoch, Socrates was charged, by the infamous Melitus and Anytus, with introducing new gods, of denying the ancient divinities of the state, and of corrupting youth, &c. He defended himself with the calm confidence of innocence; but was condemned by a majority of three voices, and sentenced to drink poison. When the cup of hemlock was presented to him, he received it with a steady hand; and after a prayer to the gods for a favorable passage to the invisible world, he serenely swallowed the fatal draught.

OLON, one of the seven sages of Greece, and the celebrated legislator of Athens, was b. at Salamis, in the 6th century B. C. Inheriting but a small patrimony, he had recourse to commerce; but at the same time he applied himself to the study of moral and political wisdom, and soon became distinguished by his superior knowledge in state affairs. After having enhanced the glory of his country by recovering Salamis, he refused the sovereignty of Athens; but being chosen archon by acclamation, 594 B. C., he set himself down to the task of improving the condition of his countrymen. He abolished most of the cruel laws of Draco, and formed a new constitution, founded on the principle that the supreme power resided in the people. When Solon had completed his laws, he caused them to be engraved on wooden cylinders, and bound the Athenians by an oath not to make any changes in his code for ten years. He then left the country, to avoid being obliged to make any alterations in them; and visited Egypt, Cyprus, and Lydia. On his return, after an absence of ten years, he found the state torn by party violence, and his kinsman Pisistratus aiming at the sovereignty. He then withdrew from Athens, and is supposed to have d. at Cyprus, aged 80.

SOMERVILLE, WILLIAM, the author of "The Chase" and other poems, was b. at Edston, in Warwickshire, in 1692, where he inherited a considerable paternal estate, on which he chiefly lived, mingling an ardent attachment to the sports of the field with the studies of a man of letters. D. 1742.

SOPHOCLES, a celebrated tragic poet, who carried the Greek drama to perfection, was b. at Athens, about 496 B. C. In his 95th year he is said to have expired from excessive joy, in consequence of the unexpected success of one of his dramas at the Olympic games. Of his numerous plays, only seven have reached modern times, but they are sufficiently meritorious to establish his fame.

SORBONNE, ROBERT DE, founder of the college of that name at Paris, was b. in 1201. He was confessor and chaplain to St. Louis, who gave him the canoury of Cambrai. D. 1274.

SOUTH, ROBERT, an eminent divine, was b. at Hackney, in 1633, and educated at Westminster school, and Christchurch, Oxford. In 1660 he was chosen public orator of the university, and successively became chaplain to the earl of Clarendon, prebendary of Westminster, canon of Christchurch, and rector of Islip, in Oxfordshire. In 1693 he carried on a controversy with Sherlock, on the doctrine of the Trinity, when both disputants were charged with heresy, for attempting to explain an undefinable mystery. He was a man of great wit, and did not spare to display it even on serious occasions. His "Sermons" possess the merit of earnestness and originality. D. 1716.

SOUTHCOTE, JOANNA, was b. in the west of England, of parents in humble life, in 1750. When about 40 years of age, she assumed the airs of a prophetess; and her numerous converts, who are said at one time to have amounted to at least 100,000, put implicit faith in her rhapsodies. After having passed her grand climacteric, she was attacked with a disease which had the outward appearance of pregnancy, and she boldly announced to the world that she was destined to be the mother of the promised Shiloh. So fully persuaded, indeed, were her followers of its truth, that they made the most splendid preparations for the reception of the miraculous babe when, about the close of 1814, her death put an end to their expectations.

SOUTHERN, THOMAS, an eminent dramatic poet of the age of Charles II., was b. in Dublin, in 1660, became a servitor in Pembroke college, Oxford, and then settled in London. He wrote the "Persian Prince," "Isabella, or the Fatal Marriage," and "Oroonoko," tragedies; the "Disappointment," the "Rambling Lady," and the "Wife's Excuse," comedies. His tragedy of "Isabella" is one of the most pathetic and effective dramas in the language. He held a commission in the army, which with his writings produced him a handsome competency. D. 1746.

SOUTHEY, ROBERT, was the son of a respectable linendraper, and was b. at Bristol, in 1774. After receiving the rudiments of education at the hands of country schoolmasters, he was sent to Westminster school, and thence to Balliol college, Oxford, his early display of more than ordinary talents and a corresponding steadiness of character having led his friends to choose the church as his destination. At Oxford, however, he remained but two years, the then unsettled state of his opinions as to both church and state causing him to quit the university, and wholly renounce the idea of taking orders, in the year 1794. After travelling in Spain and Portugal, and residing in Ireland as secretary to Mr. Corry, he having for some time been married, he at length settled at Keswick, in Cumberland, in 1803. He was already pretty extensively known as the author of "Joan of Arc," "Wat Tyler," "Lines on Bradshaw the Regicide," and other pieces, which indicated more political and poetical fire than political judgment or personal prudence, and in settling at Keswick he commenced an almost unexampled career of industry on literary composition of every description: his overflowing mind and ready pen being equal to whatever could be demanded of them, a mere list of his separate publications would form a long article, not to speak of his numerous and elaborate contributions to the "Quarterly Review." But though he wrote so much, he wrote every thing both carefully and well. His biographies especially are admirable; that of the great Nelson is, perhaps, the most perfect biography in our language; while that of Wesley is highly appreciated for its candor and impartiality. The intense labors of a long life at length overpowered even his fine mind, and he remained in a state of mental darkness to the day of his death. He had received the appointment of poet laureate in 1813, and in 1835 he received a pension of £300 per annum.

SOUTHWELL, ROBERT, an English Jesuit and poet, was b. 1560, studied at Rome, and afterwards returned to England as a missionary. In 1592 he was sent to prison, where he remained three years before he was brought to trial, when, owning that he came to England in order to propagate the Catholic religion, he was condemned and executed, in 1595. He was the author of several poems possessing considerable merit.

SOUTHWICK, SOLOMON, a somewhat noted New York politician, who was originally a baker in his native state of Rhode Island, but afterwards a printer at Albany, N. Y., where he published the "Albany Register," the leading democratic paper of the state. He took an active part in the anti-mason excitement, and was once a candidate for governor. His writings have not survived him. D. 1839.

SOUZA, JOHN DE, a Portuguese historian, b. at Damascus, in Syria, about 1730, and d. at Lisbon, in 1812.

SPALLANZANI, LAZARUS, an eminent naturalist, was b. at Scandiano, in Italy, in 1729. He studied at Modena, and next at Bologna, where his cousin, Laura Bassi, was at that time one of the most distinguished professors in Italy. After having held professorships at Reggio and Modena, he became professor of natural history, and director of the museum at Pavia, where he devoted himself to experimental researches into nature, and published many valuable works on physiology. He travelled over a great part of Europe and Asia, and was enrolled among the associates of numerous societies. D. 1798. His principal works are, "Experiments on the Reproduction of Animals," an "Essay upon Animalcula in Fluids," "Microscopical Experiments," "Travels in the Two Sicilies and the Appenines," and an elaborate "Correspondence" with the most celebrated naturalists of the age.

SPARROW, ANTHONY, bishop of Norwich, in the time of Charles II., was a prelate distinguished for his learning, piety, and benevolence; and is known as a writer by his "Rationale of the Book of Common Prayer." D. 1685.

SPARTACUS, a Thracian general, who had been taken by the Romans, and made a gladiator; but escaping with a few of his companions from his tyrants, he rallied round his standard a formidable army, and repeatedly defeated the Roman forces. He was at length slain, 71 B.C.

SPEED, JOHN, a well-known English chronologist, historian, and antiquary, b. 1555. He is the author of "The Theatre of the Empire of Great Britain," "A Cloud of Witnesses," and "The History of Great Britain, from Julius Cæsar to James I." D. 1629.

SPELMAN, Sir HENRY, an eminent English historian and antiquary, was b. at Congham, in Norfolk, in 1561. James I. frequently employed him on public business, and he received the honor of knighthood for his services. He d. in 1641, leaving many valuable works, among which his "Glossarium Archæologicum" and "Villare Anglicanum" are still highly esteemed.—Sir JOHN, his son, inherited his father's taste for archæological inquiries, and was the author of a "Life of Alfred the Great." He was knighted by Charles I., and d. at Oxford, in 1648.

SPENCE, JOSEPH, a divine and critic, was b. 1698, and received his education at Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship, and was elected professor of poetry. He afterwards held the living of Great Horwood, and a prebend in Durham cathedral. He wrote an "Essay on Pope's Odyssey," but his principal work is entitled "Polymetis; or, an Inquiry into the Agreement between the Works of the Roman Poets and the Remains of Ancient Artists." The "Anecdotes collected by him, concerning eminent Literary Characters," have been published. His death, which happened in 1768, was occasioned by his having accidentally fallen into a pond.

SPENCER, JOHN, an ingenious and learned English divine and critic, was b. in 1630, at Boughton, in Kent; became master of Corpus Christi college, archdeacon of Sudbury, and dean of Ely; and d. in 1695. His principal and most erudite work is, "De Legibus Hebræorum Ritualibus et earum Rationalibus."—JOHN CHARLES, Earl (better known as Viscount ALTHORP), was b. in 1782, and was educated at Harrow, and Trinity college, Cambridge. He first entered the house of commons as member for Northampton; but from the year 1806 to 1834, when he succeeded to the peerage, he represented the county of Northampton, generally supporting all the important measures advocated by the Whig party. Shortly after the accession of William IV., he was made chancellor of the exchequer. D. 1845.—WILLIAM ROBERT, the best writer of vers de société in his time, was the younger son of Lord Charles Spencer, and was b. in 1770. He was educated at Harrow and Oxford; and in 1796 published a translation of Burger's "Lenore," beautifully illustrated by Lady Diana Beauclerc. In proof of his astonishing power of memory, it is gravely asserted that he undertook, for a wager, to get the whole contents of a newspaper by rote, which he won, by repeating it without the omission of a single word. He held the situation of a commissioner of stamps. D. 1834.—AMBROSE, late chief justice of the state of New York, was b. 1765, in Salisbury, Conn. He devoted himself to the law. In 1786 he was appointed clerk of Hudson, and in 1793 he was elected a member of the assembly of the state from Columbia county. In 1795 he was elected to the senate for three years, and in 1798 was re-elected for four years. In 1796 he was appointed assistant attorney-general for the counties of Columbia and Rensselaer. In February, 1802, he was appointed attorney-general of the state; and in 1804 he received the appointment of a justice of the supreme court, of which he was made chief justice in 1819. For many years Judge Spencer exercised a very powerful influence in the affairs of the state of New York. In 1812 he united heartily with Daniel D. Tompkins, then governor, in the memorable struggle that preceded the declaration of war against Britain, to prevent the charter of the six-million bank. In 1823 Judge Spencer retired from the bench, and resumed for a while the practice of his profession, and was subsequently employed in various public duties, particularly that of mayor of the city of Albany, and for one term, that of representative in congress. D. 1848.

SPENSER, EDMUND, one of the most illustrious among our early poets, was b. in London, about 1553; was educated at Pembroke hall, Cambridge, and, on leaving the university, took up his residence with some relations in the north of England, probably as a tutor. In 1580 he accompanied Lord Grey de Wilton, viceroy of Ireland, as his secretary, and procured a grant of 3028 acres in the county of Cork, out of the forfeited lands of the earl of Desmond; on which, however, by the terms of the gift, he was obliged to become resident. He accordingly fixed his residence at Kileolman, in the county of Cork, where he was visited by Sir Walter Raleigh, who became his patron in lieu of Sir Philip Sidney, then deceased, and whom he celebrates under the title of the "Shepherd of the Ocean." Sir Walter persuaded him to write the "Faerie Queen," the first edition of which was printed in 1590, and presented to Elizabeth, who granted the poet a pension of £50 per annum. In 1595 he published his pastoral of "Colin Clout's come home again;" and, the year following, the second part of his "Faerie Queen;" but the poem, according to the original plan, was never completed. About this time Spenser presented to the queen his "View of the State of Ireland," being the clerk of the council of the province of Munster." In 1597 he returned to Ireland; but when the rebellion of Tyrone broke out, he was obliged to fly with such precipitancy, as to leave behind his infant child, whom the merciless cruelty of the insurgents burnt with the house. The unfortunate poet came to England with a heart broken by these misfortunes, and d. at Westminster, Jan. 16, 1598-9. His remains were interred at the expense of the earl of Essex, in Westminster abbey, where the countess of Dorset raised a monument to his memory.

SPINOLA, AMBROSE, Marquis, a celebrated Spanish general, was b. in 1569. He commanded an army in Flanders, and in 1604 he took Ostend, for which he was made general of all the Spanish troops in the Low Countries, where he was opposed by Maurice of Nassau. In the war occasioned by the disputed succession to the duchy of Cleves and Juliers, Spinola took Aix-la-Chapelle, Wesel, and Breda. He was subsequently employed in Italy, where he made himself master of the city of Casal; but not being able to subdue the citadel, owing to the imprudent orders sent to him from Madrid, he exclaimed, "They have robbed me of my honor," and fell a prey to chagrin, in 1630.

SPINOZA, BENEDICT, one of the most profound thinkers of the 17th century, and the founder of modern pantheism, was b. at Amsterdam, in 1633. His parents were Portuguese Jews, who gave him the name of Baruch, which, on renouncing his religion, he altered to Benedict. He resided chiefly at the Hague; and strenuously refused to accept of any of the numerous proposals he received to enter upon a career that might have led to his worldly advancement. He was for some time a Calvinist, and afterwards a Mennonist, but at last adopted the views, religious and political, with which his name is now connected, and in support of which he published numerous works. His "Tractatus-theologico-politicus" was reprinted in London in 1765, by Hume, though without his name or that of the author. D. 1677.

SPIZELIUS, THEOPHILUS, a learned German ecclesiastic, author of an elaborate "Commentary on the State of Literature among the Chinese," and other works. D. 1691.

SPONTINI, GASPARO, a distinguished musical composer, was b. at Majolatti, near Jesi, in the Roman states, 1778. He was educated at the Conservatorio de la Pietà of Naples, and began his career when 17 years of age, as the composer of an opera, "I Puntigli delle Donne." In 1807 he was appointed music-director to the empress Josephine; and in 1808 he produced his most famous work, "La Vestale," with brilliant and decisive success. His "Fernando Cortez" appeared in 1809; and the next year witnessed his appointment to the directorship of the Italian opera in Paris, which he held for ten years. In 1820 the magnificent appointments offered by the court of Prussia tempted him to leave Paris for Berlin, in which capital his last three grand operas, "Nourmahal," (founded on "Lalla Rookh,") "Alcidor," and "Agnes Von Hohenstauffen," were produced with great splendor, but with little comparative success. D. 1851.

SPOTSWOOD, or SPOTISWOOD, JOHN, archbishop of St. Andrew's, in Scotland, was b. in 1565, educated at Glasgow, and in 1601 went as chaplain to the duke of Lennox in his embassy to France. On the accession of James VI. to the throne of England, he accompanied him; and the same year was raised to the archbishopric of Glasgow, and made one of the privy council in Scotland. In 1615 he was translated to St. Andrew's. He crowned Charles I. at Holyrood house, in 1633; and, two years afterwards, was made chancellor of Scotland; but, on the breaking out of the rebellion, he retired to London, where he d. in 1639, and was buried in Westminster abbey. He wrote the "History of the Church of Scotland."

SPRANGHER, BARTHOLOMEW, an eminent painter of Antwerp, was b. in 1546, and d. in 1623.

SPRAT, THOMAS, bishop of Rochester, an historian and poet, was b. in 1636, and d. in 1713. He wrote the "History of the Royal Society," the "History of the Rye-house Plot," "The Life of Cowley," a volume of sermons, and a few poems.

SPURZHEIM, GASPARD, a celebrated physiologist, was b. near Treves, in 1776, and received his medical education at Vienna, where he became acquainted with Dr. Gall, the founder of the science of phrenology. To this science Spurzheim became exceedingly partial; and he soon joined Gall in making inquiries into the anatomy of the brain. They quitted Vienna in 1805, to travel; visited Paris; and lectured in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and then Spurzheim came to the United States, where he d. 1832. He was a man of rare benevolence and integrity.

STACKHOUSE, THOMAS, a divine, was b. in 1630, but the place of his birth is not known; became, in 1733, after many vicissitudes, vicar of Benham, in Berkshire; and d. there in 1752. He wrote several works, of which the most important is, "A History of the Bible."

STAEL-HOLSTEIN, ANNE LOUISA GERMAINE, baroness de, a celebrated female writer, the daughter of M. Necker, the French financier, was b. in 1766, at Paris. Her talents were so early displayed that she was said never to have been a child, and the utmost care was taken to cultivate them. In her 20th year she married the Baron de Staël, the Swedish ambassador. From that period she took an active part in literature, and an almost equally active one in politics. It was through her influence with Barras that Talleyrand was appointed minister of the foreign department. At the commencement of Bonaparte's career she was one of his admirers, but she afterwards became hostile to him; and, in 1801, in consequence of her attempting to thwart his government, she was ordered to quit Paris. After having visited Germany, Prussia, and Italy, she returned to France, whence, however, she was again expelled. Her peregrinations were next extended to Moscow, Stockholm, and London; nor did she again behold her favorite abode of Paris till after the restoration of the Bourbons. In 1811 she married M. de Rocca, but their union was kept secret. D. 1817. Of her works, which form seventeen volumes, the principal are, the romances of "Delphine" and "Corinne," "Considerations on the French Revolution," "Dramatic Essays," "Considerations on Literature," "Germany," and "Ten Years of Exile."

STAHL, GEORGE ERNEST, an eminent German physician and chemist, was b. in 1660, at Anspach; studied at Jena; became physician to the king of Prussia; and d. 1734, at Berlin. Stahl invented the theory of phlogiston, which was long prevalent. His chemical and medical works are numerous.

STANDISH, MILES, the first captain at Plymouth, New England, was b. in Lancashire, in 1584, and accompanied Mr. Robinson's congregation to Plymouth in 1620. His services in the wars with the Indians were highly useful, and many of his exploits were daring and extraordinary. D. 1856.

STANHOPE, CHARLES, Earl, a politician and man of science, was b. in 1753; was educated at Eton and Geneva; was member for Wycombe till he took his seat in the house of peers, in 1786, on the death of his father; was a strenuous republican, and enemy to Mr. Pitt's administration; and d. 1816. Among his many inventions are, an improved printing-press, a monochord, an arithmetical machine, a mode of securing buildings from fire, and a double inclined plane. He wrote several political and scientific pamphlets and papers.—Lady HESTER, a very highly accomplished, but no less eccentric, English lady, niece of the celebrated William Pitt. Soon after the death of that great statesman, with whom she was domesticated, and with whose pursuits she so much sympathized, as to act upon some occasions as his private secretary, she went to Syria, assumed the dress of a male native of that country, and devoted herself to astrology, in which vain science she was a most implicit believer. She had a large pension from the English government, and for many years was possessed of considerable influence over the Turkish pachas, which, however, when habitual carelessness in money matters had deprived her of the means of bribing them, she lost. B. 1766; d. 1839.

STANSBURY, TOBIAS E., a distinguished citizen of Maryland, who from the beginning of the revolutionary war till the time of his death, participated actively in national and state affairs, and was repeatedly speaker of the house of delegates. D. 1850.

STARK, JOHN, a general in the army of the American revolution, was b. in Londonderry, New Hampshire, in 1728. During the French war, he was captain of a company of rangers in the provincial service, in 1755, and was with Lord Howe when that general was killed, in storming the French lines at Ticonderoga, in 1758. On receiving the report of the battle of Lexington, he was engaged at work in his saw-mill; and, fired with indignation, seized his musket and immediately proceeded to Cambridge. He was at the battles of Bunker's hill and of Trenton, and achieved a glorious victory at Bennington. He rose to the rank of brigadier-general, and was distinguished throughout the war for enterprise and courage. D. 1822.

STEELE, Sir RICHARD, was b. in 1671, or, according to some accounts, in 1675, at Dublin; was educated at the Charter house and at Merton college, Oxford; and entered the military service, in which he rose to the rank of captain. The "Christian Hero," which was printed in 1701, was his first production. It was followed by the comedies of "The Funeral," "The Tender Husband," and "The Lying Lover." In the beginning of Queen Anne's reign he obtained the office of gazetteer, and, in 1710, he was made a commissioner of stamps. The "Tatler" he began in 1709, and he subsequently was, in part or in whole, the author of "The Spectator," "Guardian," "Englishman," "Spinster," "Lover," "Reader," and "Theatre." In 1718 he was elected M. P. for Stockbridge, but was expelled for what the house was pleased to consider as libels. He afterwards sat for Boroughbridge. During the reign of George I. he was knighted, made surveyor of the royal stables, manager of the king's company of comedians, and one of the commissioners of forfeited estates, and gained a large sum by "The Conscious Lovers;" but his benevolence and his lavish habits kept him in a state of constant embarrassment. A paralytic attack at length rendered him incapable of literary exertion, and he retired to Llangunnor, in Caermarthenshire, where he d. 1729.

STEEN, JAN, an eminent painter, was b. at Leyden, in 1636. One of his masters was Van Goyen, whose daughter he married; but Steen proved a dissipated character, and totally neglected his family. D. 1689.

STEENWICK, HENRY, a Flemish painter, was b. 1550, and d. 1603.

STEEVENS, GEORGE, a commentator, was b. in 1736, at Stepney; was educated at King's college, Cambridge; and d. in 1800. He was a man of talent and extensive reading, but his disposition was not amiable. His first work, published in 1766, was an edition of twenty of Shakspeare's plays; the notes to which, and additions, were afterwards incorporated with those of Johnson.

STEPHENS, ALEXANDER, a miscellaneous writer, was b. in 1757, at Elgin; studied at Aberdeen; was designed for the law, but gave himself up to literature; and d. in 1821. He wrote a "History of the War of the French Revolution," and "Memoirs of John Horne Tooke;" and contributed to the "Monthly Magazine," "Public Characters," and "The Annual Obituary."

STERNE, LAURENCE, a miscellaneous writer, was b. in 1713, at Clonmel, in Ireland; and was educated at a school near Halifax, and at Jesus college, Cambridge. He successively obtained the living of Sutton, a prebend at York, the rectory of Stillington, and the curacy of Coxwold. In 1760 he published the first two volumes of "Tristram Shandy;" the remainder appeared in 1761, 1762, 1765, and 1767. Some of his latter years were spent in travelling on the Continent, and his travels gave birth to "The Sentimental Journey." D. 1768.

STEPHENSON, GEORGE, whose name will be for ever identified with the greatest mechanical revolution effected since the days of Watt—the application of steam to railroads—was b. near Newcastle, in 1781. His father was an engine-tender at a colliery; and he himself began life as a pit-engine boy at 2*d.* a day's wages. A lucky accident having given him an opportunity of showing some skill, he was advanced to the office of engineman. He was afterwards employed in forming railway planes and engines under ground, and all his leisure time was spent in working out the great problem, which he at last so happily solved. His first attempt to carry out his design was at Hetten; he subsequently planned the line between Stockton and Darlington; but his crowning achievement was the great Manchester and Liverpool line. He at once took the lead in railway engineering, became an extensive locomotive manufacturer at Newcastle, a railway contractor, and a great colliery and iron-work owner; but he always retained the manly simplicity of character which had marked his early career.

STERLING, JOHN, an accomplished critic and essayist, whose promising career was broken by long-continued illness, and at last prematurely closed, was b. at Karnes castle, in the isle of Bute, 1806. His father, who was a distinguished political writer, had him educated chiefly at home. In 1824 he went to Trinity college, Cambridge, where he had Archdeacon Hare for his classical tutor; and a year later he entered Trinity hall with the intention of graduating in law; but he left Cambridge in 1827 without taking a degree, and during the next few years he resided chiefly in London, employing himself actively in literature, contributing to the "Athenæum" and other literary journals, and preparing himself, in familiar intercourse with Coleridge, Wordsworth, and many other distinguished persons, for the peculiar career he had marked out for his exertions. Soon after his marriage in 1830, he was forced by threatening pulmonary symptoms to seek a temporary home in St. Vincent, where his family held some property. He returned to Europe in 1832. D. 1844.

STERNHOLD, THOMAS, a poet, was b. in Hampshire, and educated at Oxford; after which he became groom of the robes to Henry VIII. and Edward VI. He d. in 1549. Sternhold versified 51 of the psalms; the remainder were the productions of Hopkins, Norton, and others.

STEBUBEN, FREDERIC WILLIAM AUGUSTUS, baron de, was a Prussian officer, aid-de-camp to Frederic the Great, and lieutenant-general in the army of that distinguished commander. He arrived in America in 1777, and immediately offered his services to the continental congress. In 1778 he was appointed inspector-general, with the rank of major-general, and rendered the most efficient services in the establishment of a regular system of discipline. During the war he was exceedingly active and useful, and after the peace he retired to a farm in the vicinity of New York, where, with the assistance of books and friends, he passed his time as agreeably as a frequent want of funds would permit. The state of New York afterwards gave him a tract of 16,000 acres in the county of Oneida, and the general government made him a grant of $2,500 per annum. D. 1795.

STEWART, DUGALD, an eminent philosopher and writer, was b. in 1753, at Edinburgh, and was the son of the professor of mathematics; was educated at the high school and university of his native city; and attended the lectures of Dr. Reid at Glasgow. From Glasgow he was recalled, in his 19th year, to assist his father; on whose decease, in 1785, he succeeded to the professorship. He, however, exchanged it for the chair of moral philosophy, which he had filled in 1778, during the absence of Dr. Ferguson in America. In 1780 he began to receive pupils into his house, and many young noblemen and gentlemen, imbibed their knowledge under his roof. It was not till 1792 that he came forward as an author; he then published the first volume of the "Philosophy of the Human Mind." Among his works are, "Outlines of Moral Philosophy," "Philosophical Essays," "Memoirs of Adam"

Smith, and Drs. Robertson and Reid;" and "Prefatory Dissertations in the Supplement to the Encyclopædia Britannica." D. 1828.

STILLING, HEINRICH, a pseudonyme adopted by Hierrich Jung in one of the most remarkable autobiographies ever written, was b. at Florenburg, in Nassau, 1740. His father was a tailor, and his son at first followed the same trade; but his great natural abilities soon burst through the trammels of his lowly position, and after acquiring by his own exertions considerable knowledge of Greek and of medicine, he found means to proceed to the university of Strasburg, where he prosecuted his studies with such ardor and success that he was soon appointed to a professor's chair, and raised himself to eminence both by his ability as a lecturer and as an operator. He wrote several novels, the best of which are, "Theobald," "Herr von Morgenthau," "Das Heimweh," &c., besides several medical and mineralogical treatises; but his name is chiefly connected with his autobiography, entitled "Jugend-Jüngling-jahre, Wanderschaft und Alter von Heinrich Stilling," which, it may safely be said, has never been surpassed in interest and fidelity. D. 1817.

STILLINGFLEET, EDWARD, a prelate, was b. in 1635, at Cranbourne, in Dorsetshire; was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge; obtained various preferments, among which were, in 1677 and 1678, the archdeaconry of London and the deanery of St. Paul's; and was promoted to the see of Worcester at the revolution. Among his works are, "Origines Sacrae," and "Origines Britannicae." Among his latest literary efforts was a controversy with Locke, on some points in the "Essay on Human Understanding." D. 1699.

STOCKTON, RICHARD, a signer of the declaration of American independence, was graduated at Princeton college in 1748, and entering on the practice of the law soon rose to eminence. He settled in New Jersey, was appointed to the office of judge, and was a delegate to the congress of 1776. D. 1781.

STOLBERG-STOLBERG, FREDERIC LEOPOLD, Count, a German writer, was b. in 1750, at Bramstedt, in Holstein; was educated at Halle and Gottingen; and was employed in negotiations by the duke of Oldenburg and the prince regent of Denmark. He translated the Iliad, and the tragedies of Eschylus; and wrote "A History of the Christian Religion;" "Travels in Germany, Switzerland, and Italy;" poems, and dramas. D. 1819.

STONE, EDMUND, an eminent mathematician, the son of the dnke of Argyle's gardener, was b. in Scotland, towards the close of the 17th century. Before he was nineteen he taught himself arithmetic, geometry, Latin, and French, without any assistance. He wrote "A Treatise on Fluxions," and a "Mathematical Dictionary;" translated "Bion on Mathematical Instruments;" and published an edition of Euclid, with a Life. D. 1767.—THOMAS, a signer of the declaration of American independence, was b. in Charles county, Maryland, in 1743, and was educated to the profession of the law. He was a delegate to the continental congress of 1776, and was again a member of that body when Washington resigned the office of commander-in-chief. D. 1787.

STORCII, HEINRICH FREDERIC VON, an eminent political economist, was b. at Riga, 1766, studied at Jena and Heideberg, and on the advice of Count Roumantzof repaired to St. Petersburg, where he entered on a brilliant career as a statist and political economist; which procured for him at once the confidence of the czar, and the highest literary honors in his gift. His chief works are, his "Cours d'Economie Politique," and his "Tableau Historique et Statistique de l'Empire de Russie à la fin du 18me Siècle." D. 1835.

STORY, JOSEPH, a distinguished judge and juridical writer, was b. at Marblehead, Mass., 1779; studied at Harvard university, where he took his degree in 1798; was called to the bar in 1801, and soon acquired a distinguished reputation as a pleader. After representing Salem in the state legislature for four years, he was sent to congress in 1809, where his talents as a forensic debater were so well appreciated, that in 1811 he was appointed associate justice in the supreme court of the United States. In this capacity he displayed a thorough knowledge of the most intricate questions relating to international law, and earned such distinction as a jurist, that his name has been carried far beyond the limits of his native land. His "Commentaries on the Conflict of Laws" is looked upon as an authority in every state in Europe. D. 1845.

STOTHARD, THOMAS, an eminent English artist, was b. in London in 1755; received his education at a school in Yorkshire; and was apprenticed to a calico-printer, in Spitalfields. During his apprenticeship he showed a decided taste for the painter's art; and, having been once introduced, soon found ample employment in making designs for the booksellers. The designs made by Mr. Stothard exceed 5000 in number; it is difficult, therefore, to select from among so vast a stock; but perhaps those which particularly claim our attention are, "The Pilgrimage to Canterbury," "The Wellington Shield," etched by the artist himself; "The Four Periods of a Sailor's Life," and "The Flich of Bacon." D. 1834.—CHARLES ALFRED, a painter and antiquary, son of the eminent artist of the same name, was b. in 1787, and early displayed a talent for drawing. He became a member and historical draughtsman of the Society of Antiquaries, and was deputed by that body to take drawings from the famous tapestry at Bayeux, in Normandy. He was killed by a fall in 1821. He published "Monumental Effigies of Great Britain."

STOW, JOHN, an antiquary, was b. about 1525, in Cornhill. By trade he was a tailor, but applied himself to the study of British antiquities under the patronage of Archbishop Parker and the earl of Leicester. In his old age he was reduced to such indigence as to solicit charity by means of a brief. He wrote "A Survey of London," and "Annals of this Kingdom." D. 1605.

STOWELL, WILLIAM SCOTT, Lord, son of W. Scott, a merchant of Newcastle, and elder brother of Lord Eldon, was b. at Helworth, Durham, in 1745; was educated at Oxford, and began to practise law in 1779. He was knighted in 1788, and in 1798 became judge of the high court of admiralty and a privy councillor. In 1790 he entered parliament as the representative of Downton, and in the following year had the honor of being unanimously elected as member for the university of Oxford; which he retained till the coronation of George IV., when he was created a peer. He was the profoundest jurist of his day. D. 1836.

STRAFFORD, THOMAS WENTWORTH, earl of, an eminent statesman and minister, the eldest son of Sir William Wentworth, was b. in 1593, in London, was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, and after having travelled, was knighted, and made custos rotularum of the west riding of Yorkshire. In 1621 he was chosen one of the representatives of the county of York. For a few years he was one of the most active friends of the popular cause; stood prominently forward as an advocate for the petition of right; and was even imprisoned for refusing to contribute to a forced loan. But his seeming patriotism sprang rather from hatred of Buckingham than from principle, and was not proof against corruption. In 1628 he was gained over to the court. His apostasy was paid for by the titles of baron and viscount, and the offices of privy councillor and president of the North. In the latter capacity he acted with the most arbitrary rigor. In 1632 he was sent to Ireland as lord deputy. His conduct there, during a government of seven years, was that of a despot. It would, however, be unjust to deny that Ireland derived some benefits from his administration. In 1639, on visiting England, he obtained the garter, the title of earl of Strafford, and the dignity of lord-lieutenant. He demonstrated his gratitude by violent counsels to the infatuated Charles. But his downfall was at hand. In 1640 he was impeached by the commons, and was brought to trial, March 22, 1641. He defended himself with an eloquence and dignity worthy of a better cause. No moral doubt could exist of his crimes, but the legal proof was defective. In order to secure their victim, the commons themselves lost sight of justice, and resorted to a bill of attainder. It was passed, and Strafford, deserted by his sovereign, was brought to the block, on the 12th of May, 1641.

STRONG, CALEB, governor of Massachusetts, was b. at Northampton in 1744, and graduated at Harvard college. He pursued the profession of the law, and established himself in his native town. Taking an early and active part in the revolutionary movements, he was appointed in 1775 one of the committee of safety, and in the following year a member of the state legislature. He was a member of the convention which formed the constitution of the state, and of that which formed the constitution of the United States. Subsequently he was senator to congress, and for 11 years at different periods, chief magistrate of Massachusetts. D. 1820.

STRUTT, JOSEPH, an engraver, antiquary, and miscellaneous writer, was b. in 1749, at Springfield, in Sussex; was a pupil of Ryland, and a man of considerable talent, produced "A Dictionary of Engravers," "Sports and Pastimes of the People of England,"

"Dresses and Habits of the People of England," "Regal and Ecclesiastical Antiquities of England," "Chronicle of England," "Manners, Customs, &c., of the Inhabitants of England," "Queen Hoo Hall," "Ancient Time," and "The Test of Guilt." D. 1802.

STUART, GILBERT, an historian and miscellaneous writer, was b. in 1742, at Edinburgh, where also he was educated. He studied jurisprudence, but became an author by profession; sometimes residing in London, and sometimes in his native city. Stuart was a man of genius, but of a most unamiable disposition. He wrote "The History of Scotland," "History of the Reformation in Scotland," and other works; contributed to the "Monthly Review;" and was editor of the "Edinburgh Magazine and Review." D. 1786.—GILBERT, a celebrated painter, was b. in Newport, Rhode Island, in 1755. Soon after becoming of age, he went to England, where he became the pupil of Mr. West. He soon rose to eminence as a portrait painter, and obtained a high reputation both in England and Ireland. In 1794 he returned to his native country, chiefly residing in Philadelphia and Washington, in the practice of his profession, till about the year 1801, when he removed to Boston. Mr. Stuart was not only one of the first painters of his time, but was also a very extraordinary man out of his profession. D. 1828.

SUCKLING, Sir JOHN, a poet and courtier, was b. in 1609, at Whitton, in Middlesex; served in Germany, under Gustavus Adolphus; acquired reputation as a wit and dramatist after his return to England; raised a regiment to serve against the Scotch, in 1639; was obliged to retire to France, in consequence of having participated in a project to liberate the earl of Strafford; and d. there, in 1641. His poems have obtained a place in the standard collections.

SULLIVAN, JOHN, an officer in the army of the American revolution, was b. in Maine, and established himself in the profession of law in New Hampshire. Turning his attention to military affairs, he received, in 1772, the commission of major, and in 1775 that of brigadier-general. The next year he was sent to Canada, and on the death of General Thomas, the command of the army devolved on him. In this year he was promoted to the rank of major-general, and was soon after captured by the British in the battle on Long Island.

He commanded a division of the army at the battles of Trenton, Brandywine, and Germantown; and was the sole commander of an expedition to the island of Newport, which failed through want of co-operation from the French fleet. In 1779 he commanded an expedition against the Indians. He was afterwards a member of congress, and for three years president of New Hampshire. In 1789 he was appointed a judge of the district court, and continued in that office till his death, in 1795.—JAMES, was b. at Berwick, Me., in 1744, and after passing the early part of his life in agricultural pursuits, adopted the profession of the law. He took an early part in the revolutionary struggle, and in 1775 was chosen a member of the provincial congress. In 1776 he was appointed a judge of the superior court. He was subsequently a member of congress, a member of the executive council, judge of probate, and in 1790 was appointed attorney-general. In 1807 he was elected governor of Massachusetts, and again in the following year, in the December of which he died. He was the author of a "History of Land Titles," a "History of the District of Maine," and an "Essay on Banks." His rank at the bar was in the very first class, and in his private character he was distinguished for piety, patriotism, and integrity.

SULLY, MAXIMILIAN DE BETHUNE, duke of, a French warrior and statesman, equally brave in the field and wise in the council, was b. in 1560, at the castle of Rosny. At an early age he was placed about the person of the king of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV., to whom he ever continued to be strongly attached. He narrowly escaped being one of the victims of the massacre of St. Bartholomew. In the majority of the battles and sieges which occurred during the struggle between Henry and his enemies, Sully bore a conspicuous part. He commanded the artillery at the battle of Coutras, and had two horses killed under him, and was dangerously wounded at the battle of Ivry. Though himself a zealous Calvinist, it was he who advised the king to secure the crown by conforming to the Catholic religion. In 1597 he was placed at the head of the finances, which were then in the most dilapidated state; and by his prudent administration he at once increased the revenue and lightened the burdens of the people. After the death of Henry IV. Sully retired from public affairs, and d. 1641. His "Memoirs," written by himself, are highly interesting.

SURREY, HENRY HOWARD, earl of, eldest son of the duke of Norfolk, was b. about 1515; studied at Christ-church, Oxford; travelled in France, Germany, and Italy, in the last of which countries he fell in love with the Geraldine whom he celebrates in his verses; was captain-general of the army at Boulogne in 1546; and fell a victim, on the scaffold, to the tyranny of Henry VIII., in 1547. "He was," says Raleigh, "no less valiant than learned, and of excellent hopes;" and Warton considers him as "the first English classical poet."

SUVAROFF, or SUWARROW, Prince ALEXANDER, a celebrated Russian field-marshal, was b. in 1730, at Suskoi, in the Ukraine, and was educated at the cadet school of St. Petersburg. He distinguished himself during the seven years' war; in Poland, in 1768, against the Confederates; in 1773, against the Turks; and in 1782, against the Nogay Tartars. For these services he was rewarded with the rank of general-in-chief, the government of the Crimea, the portrait of the empress set in diamonds, and several Russian orders. In the war against the Turks, from 1787 to 1790, he gained the battle of Rymnik, took Ismail by storm, and obtained other important advantages. In 1794 he defeated the Poles who were struggling for freedom, and carried Praga by assault. When Russia joined the continental coalition, in 1799, he was placed at the head of the combined army in Italy, and, after several sanguinary battles, he succeeded in wresting that country from the French. He was less successful in Switzerland, whence he was obliged to retreat. D. 1800.

SWEDENBORG, EMANUEL, was the son of the bishop of Skara, and was b. 1689, at Stockholm. He was not twenty when he published a volume of Latin poems. On returning from his travels he was appointed assessor extraordinary to the college of Mines, and, in 1719, was ennobled. Of his many works on mining, the principal is his "Opera Philosophica et Mineralogica." In 1743 he imbibed a belief that he was admitted to an intercourse with the invisible world, and this belief he retained till his decease, 1772. On this subject he published several works, among which are "Arcana Cœlestis," "Heaven and Hell," "Divine Providence," "True Christian Religion," "Divine Love and Wisdom,"

&c. Swedenborg was no impostor, but a learned and pious man, and his books richly repay the most careful study.

SWIFT, JONATHAN, a celebrated writer, was b. in 1667, at Dublin, and was educated at Kilkenny school, Trinity college, Dublin, and Hertford college, Oxford. For some years he lived with Sir William Temple as a companion, and when that statesman died he left him a legacy and his posthumous works. From King William he entertained expectations of preferment, which were disappointed. Having accompanied Lord Berkeley, one of the lord justices of Ireland, as chaplain, he obtained from him the livings of Laracor and Lathbeggan, on which he went to reside, and to which he invited the lady whom he had celebrated under the name of Stella. He eventually married her, but would never acknowledge her as his wife. His conduct to two other ladies, Miss Waring and Miss Vanhomrigh, with whom he coquetted, was equally devoid of proper feeling. In 1701 he took his doctor's degree, and on the accession of Queen Anne he visited England. In the course of the nine ensuing years he published several works, but it was not till 1710 that he became active as a political writer. Having gone over to the tories, and become intimate with Harley and Bolingbroke, he exerted himself strenuously in behalf of his new allies. Among his labors in this cause were, "The Examiner," and "The Conduct of the Allies." It was not, however, till 1713 that he obtained preferment, and even then he was frustrated in his hope of an English mitre, and received only the deanery of St. Patrick. When he returned to Ireland he was exceedingly unpopular, but he lived to be the idol of the Irish. Of the writings by which this change was produced, "The Drapier's Letters," published in 1724, stand foremost. In 1726 he gave "Gulliver's Travels" to the world. As he advanced in years he suffered from deafness and fits of giddiness; in 1739 his intellect gave way, and he expired in October, 1745.—ZEPHANIAH, a learned lawyer, was graduated at Yale college, and established himself in the legal profession, in Windham, Conn. He was for 18 years a judge of the superior court of that state. He published a "Digest of the Laws of Connecticut," on the model of Blackstone. D. 1823.

SYDENHAM, THOMAS, an eminent physician, was b. in 1624, at Winford

Eagle, in Dorsetshire; was educated at Wadham college, Oxford, studied medicine at Montpellier; and settled in Westminster, where he deservedly attained a high reputation. D. 1689.—FLOYER, an eminent Greek scholar, was b. in 1701, and was educated at Wadham college, Oxford. In 1759 he began a translation of the works of Plato, a part of which he published; but the want of patronage involved him in embarrassments; he was thrown into prison for a small debt which he had contracted for his frugal meals; and there he perished in 1788. His fate gave rise to the establishment of the literary fund.—CHARLES WILLIAM POULETT, Lord, governor-general of Canada, was the son of Mr. J. Ponlett Thompson, a London merchant, and b. 1793. When about 20, he became resident in St. Petersburg as the correspondent of his father's firm; and, until his accession to public office in 1830, he continued to be connected with the mercantile business. His political life commenced in 1826, as member for Dover; but in 1830 being returned for both Dover and Manchester, he gave preference to the latter. On the formation of the reform cabinet, he was appointed vice-president of the board of trade and treasurer of the navy; he became president of the board of trade in 1834; and, in 1839, succeeded Lord Durham as governor-general in Canada. Whilst riding near Kingston, Lord Sydenham met with an accident by the falling of his horse, and d. September 19, 1841.

SYLLA, LUCIUS CORNELIUS, a celebrated Roman, was b. 137 B.C. After having spent a part of his youth in licentious pleasures, he distinguished himself in Africa, under Marius; in Pontus, as commander-in-chief, and on various other occasions. He rose to the consulship in the forty-ninth year of his age. He subsequently reduced Greece, and vanquished Mithridates; and, returning to Italy, overcame the Marian party, and assumed the dictatorship. By his merciless edicts of proscription he deluged Rome with blood; but, at the very moment when no one dared to dispute his power, he retired into private life. D. 78 B.C.

SZALKAI, ANTHONY, an Hungarian poet, who is considered as the founder of the dramatic literature of his country. He held an office in the house of the archduke palatine, Alexander Leopold, and d. 1804, at Buda. His "Pikko Hertzog" was the first regular drama composed in the Hungarian language. He also wrote a travesty on the Æneid.

T.

TACITUS, CAIUS CORNELIUS, a Latin historian, was b. about 56, and was of an equestrian family. The place of his birth is not known. He early cultivated poetry; he became an advocate, and he is supposed also to have borne arms. He was successively quæstor, ædile, and prætor, and in 97 attained the rank of consul. Pliny the Younger was his bosom friend, and Agricola was his father-in-law. He is believed to have d. about 185.

TALBOT, JOHN, Lord, a famous warrior, was b. in 1373, at Blechmore, in Shropshire; obtained various successes against the Irish, distinguished himself in France by his skill and valor during the reigns of Henry V. and VI., for which he was rewarded by the earldoms of Shrewsbury, Wexford, and Waterford; and was killed at the battle of Castillon, in 1453.

TALLIEN, JOHN LAMBERT, one of the most prominent characters in the French revolution, was the son of a nobleman's porter; was b. 1769, at Paris, received a good education, and early in life was successively clerk to an attorney, and in a public office, and foreman to a printing establishment. On the breaking out of the revolution, he took a violent part against the court, and he gradually acquired considerable influence. As a member of the convention, he voted for the death of the king, and for a while he participated in all the enormities of the Jacobins. At length, however, he became more moderate, and it was mainly to his courage and eloquence that France was indebted for the downfall of Robespierre. He continued to be an active member of the legislature till 1798, when he accompanied Bonaparte to Egypt. He enjoyed a place under the consular and imperial governments; remained unmolested after the accession of Louis XVIII., and d. 1820.

TALMA, FRANCIS JOSEPH, the greatest of French actors, was b. 1763, at Paris, and spent his childhood in Flanders and England, where his father was a dentist. At the age of nine years he was sent to France to be educated, whence he returned to England. The stage was early his delight, and he was at one time on the point of appearing at Drury-lane. On his settling in France, he for eighteen months followed the profession of his father; but in 1787 he came out upon the French theatre, in the character of Seide. For some time, however, he was kept in the background; but at length he attained the highest rank as a tragedian. Talma also accomplished in France a complete reformation of theatrical costume. D. 1826.

TAMERLANE, TIMUR LENC, or TIMUR BEG, was b. 1336 A. D., in the province of Kersch, the ancient Sogdiana, where his father was the chief of a tribe. He attained the sovereign authority at Samarcand, 1370. He subsequently conquered Persia, India, Syria, and many other countries; made prisoner Bajazet, the Turkish sultan; and was on the point of invading China, when he d. in 1405.

TANNAHILL, ROBERT, a Scottish poet, was b. at Paisley, in 1774, and bred a weaver. He read the works of Burns with enthusiasm, and, like many more of his countrymen, he burned to emulate him, and though he fell immeasurably short of his model, he produced some very delightful songs, and other lyric effusions. D. 1810.

TASSIE, JAMES, a modeller, was b. in the first half of the eighteenth century, near Glasgow, and was originally a stone mason, but acquired, from Dr. Quin, the art of imitating gems in colored pastes, and was so successful that he gained both reputation and fortune. He likewise modelled in wax. D. 1799.

TASSO, BERNARDO, an Italian poet, was b. in 1493, at Bergamo; was successively in the service of the prince of Salerno and the dukes of Urbino and Mantua; and d. 1569. Of his poems the principal is "Amadis de Gaul," in a hundred cantos.—TORQUATO, one of the greatest of the Italian poets, was the son of Bernardo, and was b. 1544, at Sorrento. He may almost be said to have "lisped in numbers;" and at twelve years of age he had acquired extensive knowledge. After having been educated at Rome, he went to Padua, to study law, in compliance with the wishes of his father. It was while he was there, and in his eighteenth year, that he published the poem of "Rinaldo." In 1565 Duke Alphonso of Ferrara invited him to his court, and with the exception of the time occupied by a journey to France, Tasso resided there till 1577. During this period, besides many minor pieces, he produced his "Aminta," and completed the "Jerusalem Delivered." In 1577 he secretly quitted Ferrara; having, it has been supposed, incurred the anger of the duke by his passion for the Princess Leonora of Este, his patron's sister. He returned, however, but his intellects being now in some degree affected, he was ungenerously shut up in a mad-house by Alphonso, where for seven years he experienced the most unworthy treatment. The remonstrances of several Italian princes at length procured his release. In 1592 he settled at Naples, and began to write a new poem on the subject of his "Jerusalem." This poem he finished to his own satisfaction, but posterity has not ratified his partiality for it. D. 1595.

TASSONI, ALEXANDER, an Italian poet, was b. 1565, at Modena; was successively in the service of several princes; and d. in 1635, counsellor to the duke of Modena. He was a man of extensive literary and scientific knowledge, and wrote various works; but it is to "The Rape of the Bucket," a heroicomic poem, that he owes his reputation.

TATE, NAHUM, a poet, was b. in Dublin, 1652, and was educated in the college of his native city. On going to London he assisted Dryden in some of his works; and succeeded Shadwell as poet laureate. He altered Shakspeare's play of Lear, and wrote several poems; but he is best known by the "Version of the Psalms," which he executed in conjunction with Brady.

TAYLOR, JEREMY, a prelate and eloquent writer, the son of a barber; was b. 1613, at Cambridge; and was educated at the grammar school of his native place, and at Caius college. He became chaplain to Archbishop Laud, and subsequently to Charles I., and obtained the rectory of Uppingham. During the civil war he gained a subsistence by keeping a school, till he was interdicted from teaching. Lord Carbery then appointed him his chaplain, and it was while he resided with that nobleman that he wrote most of his pieces. He was twice imprisoned by the republican government. At the restoration he was made bishop of Down and Connor; along with which see he held that of Dromore, and the vice-chancellorship of Trinity college, Dublin. D. 1667.—BROOK, an eminent mathematician, was b. 1685, at Edmonton, in Middlesex; was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge; became a fellow and secretary of the Royal Society, to the "Transactions" of which body he largely contributed; and d. 1781. Among his works are "Methodus Incrementorum," "New Principles of Linear Perspective," and "Contemplatio Philosophica."—Taylor invented the analytical formula which bears his name, and which Lagrange has made the basis of his theory of analytical functions.—GEORGE, a signer of the declaration of American independence, was b. in Ireland, 1716. Emigrating to America, he became the proprietor of extensive iron works at Durham, on the river Delaware. He was for some years a representative for Northampton county to the provincial assembly, and in 1776 was elected to the continental congress. D. 1781.—JANE, the daughter of an artist in London, was b. in 1783, and very early in life gave evident indications of poetic talent. Her first publication, "The Beggar Boy," appeared in 1804; and from that time forward she continued to publish, occasionally, miscellaneous pieces in verse. The principal of these are, "Original Poems for Infant Minds," and "Essays in Rhyme on Morals and Manners." She also wrote a prose tale, entitled "Display," which met with much success. D. 1823.—JOHN, usually called the Water Poet, from his being a waterman, was b. in Gloucestershire, about 1580. In 1596 he served in the fleet under the earl of Essex, and was present at the attack upon Cadiz. After his return he plied on the Thames, and was for many years collector for the lieutenant of the Tower, of his fees on the wines imported into London. He also styled himself the king's water poet, and the queen's waterman. When the civil wars began he retired to Oxford, where he kept a public house, as he afterwards did near Long Acre. At this place he manifested his loyalty by assuming for a sign, the "Crown in Mourning," which proving offensive, he substituted his own portrait. D. 1654.—THOMAS, a learned Grecian, commonly termed the Platonist, was b. in 1758, and placed, at 9 years of age, at St. Paul's school, with a view to orders; but he changed his mind when 15, and went to a relation, an officer at the port of Sheerness. There a celebrated dissenter instructed him in the rudiments of Latin and Greek, and he applied himself with indefatigable ardor to the study of Greek, especially the works of the Platonic sophist. Having contracted an early love marriage, he was compelled to become under-usher in a school, and, subsequently, clerk to a banker, for subsistence; but he still found time to pursue his early studies. He afterwards gave public lectures in Greek and on the Platonic writers, which introduced him to the favor of the duke of Norfolk, who furnished the funds for his great work, the excellent translation of Plato. His translations are very voluminous; the most important are the works of Aristotle, Plato, and Pausanias. D. 1835.—WILLIAM, a distinguished critic, translator, and littérateur, was the only son of an eminent merchant of Norwich, where he was b. 1765. He was originally destined for his father's business: but his early bias for literary pursuits proved so strong, that his father gave way to his inclinations, and after one or two somewhat lengthened sojourns in France and Germany, he gave himself up almost entirely to the "cultivation of the Muses" and of politics. He first became known by a translation of Bürger's "Lenore;" and stimulated by the success which followed his first attempt, he made various other translations from the same author, and from time to time contributed specimens of other German poets to different magazines and periodicals. In 1798 he formed an acquaintance with Southey, which soon ripened into the warmest friendship; and in 1802 he became the editor of the "Norwich Iris," which he made the organ of his peculiar political and religious opinions; but he soon abandoned this speculation, and henceforth engaged in the business of "reviewing," for which he found a main vent in the "Monthly Review," then under the editorship of Dr. Griffiths. Among his works should be mentioned his "English Synonymes;" and in 1830 he published a "Survey of German Poetry," consisting chiefly of his collected translations, with explanatory notes. D. 1836.—WILLIAM COOKE, an eminent writer on miscellaneous subjects, was b. at Yonghal, 1800. After prosecuting his studies at the university of Dublin with great distinction, he repaired to the metropolis, and entered upon a literary career, which, for constancy of application, and variety of subject, has had few equals in modern times. He was employed in 1846, by the British government, to inquire into the system of education on the Continent; and he was just on the eve of being placed in a position on the establishment of the lord-lieutenant of Ireland, to carry out his views, when he was cut off by the pestilence that ravaged Great Britain and Ireland in 1849. Among his chief works are, his "Manuals of Ancient and Modern History," "Life and Times of Sir Robert Peel," "History of Mahommedanism," "Revolutions and Remarkable Conspiracies of Europe;" and his last, and perhaps his most important work. "The History of the House of Orleans," published only a few weeks before his death. D. 1849.—ZACHARY, president of the United States, was b. in Virginia, 1786. His father, who had fought at the side of Washington during all the war of independence, at its conclusion settled in Kentucky, and conducted his family to their forest-home, where his son, amid the perils of savage life, had ample opportunities of developing those military qualities of which he afterwards gave so signal a proof. At the outbreak of the war with England, in 1807, he hastened to join the army, and was appointed to guard the banks of the Wabash. In 1812, while in command of the garrison of Fort Henderson, consisting only of fifty-two men, he was suddenly attacked at midnight by a hostile party, who succeeded in setting fire to the fort. But Taylor, with his handful of men, extinguished the flames, and forced the enemy to retreat. For this exploit he was raised to the rank of major. In the war against the Indians, both in Florida and Arkansas, he passed successively through all the grades of his profession, till he reached the rank of general. Nominated in 1846 to the command of a corps of observation on the frontiers of Mexico, an attack of the Mexicans gave him an opportunity of crossing the Rio Grande, and of gaining his first battle at Palo-Alto. The victories of Resaca de la Palma, Monterey, and Buena-Vista proved him at once a valiant soldier and an able general, and marked him out to the suffrages of his countrymen for the presidency. Chosen in Nov. 1848, he entered on his high office in March, 1849; but he had only filled the chair of Washington and Jefferson for sixteen months, when he was suddenly attacked by cholera, and d. July, 1850.

of Swiss liberty, was b. in the latter part of the 13th century, at Burglen, in the canton of Uri. Some doubt exists as to the truth of the story, that he was compelled to shoot at an apple on the head of his child, and that he shot the Austrian governor Gessler; but there is no doubt that he contributed to emancipate his country, and that he fought at the battle of Morgarten. D. 1354.

TEMPLE, Sir WILLIAM, an eminent statesman and writer, was b. 1628, in London, and was educated at Bishop Stortford grammar school, and at Emanuel college, Cambridge; Cudworth was his college tutor. In his 19th year he began his travels, in the course of which he resided for two years in France, and visited Flanders, Holland, and Germany. On his return he obtained a seat in the Irish parliament. Charles II. employed him as a diplomatist, in which capacity Temple displayed abilities of no common kind. He was twice dispatched on a secret mission to the bishop of Munster; as envoy extraordinary to the Hague he concluded within the short space of five days the treaty of triple alliance; he was one of the negotiators at the congress of Aix la Chapelle; he signed the peace of 1673; was appointed ambassador to the Hague in 1674, and contributed to bring about the marriage of the prince of Orange with the Princess Mary; and lastly, was one of the negotiators at Nimeguen. In 1679 he was appointed one of the king's new council, but was soon displaced for his freedom of speech. After this he retired into private life, and never again took part in public affairs. D. 1698.

TENCIN, CLAUDINE ALEXANDRINA GUERIN DE, a French writer, was b. in 1681, at Grenoble, and d. in 1749. She was early bound by monastic vows, from which she succeeded in obtaining her release, and she subsequently spent many years in political, and especially in love intrigues; in the course of which she was imprisoned, unjustly, however, on a charge of having murdered one of her lovers, D'Alembert was her son. At length she adopted a more regular mode of living, and her house became the resort of wits and men of letters. Of her novels, "The Count de Comminges" is that which is most esteemed; but they all have great merit.

TENIERS, DAVID, the elder, an eminent painter, was b. in 1582, at Antwerp; studied under Rubens, and at Rome under Elsheimer; and d. 1649. His pictures of rural festivities, conversations, fairs, fortune-tellers, and similar subjects, are usually of a small size, and are much valued.—DAVID, the younger, a son of the foregoing, was b. in 1610, at Brussels, and was instructed in painting by his father, and by Adam Brouwer and Rubens. In his youth such was his facility of imitating the styles of various masters that he was called the Proteus and the Ape of Painting. He soon, however, had the good sense to choose nature as his model, and he rose into high reputation. He was patronized by the Archduke Leopold William, the king of Spain, Christina of Sweden, and other distinguished personages. D. 1694.

TERENCE, or TERENTIUS, PUBLIUS, a Latin comic writer, is believed to have been a native of Carthage, and to have been b. about 192 B. C. Being taken a captive to Rome, he was sold to Terentius Lucanus, who gave him a good education, and enfranchised him. He was in his 25th year when he brought out his first play. His talents acquired for him illustrious friends, among whom were Scipio and Lælius. He quitted Rome when he was 35, and is supposed to have perished at sea in a storm. Of his admirable comedies only six are extant.

TERTULLIAN, QUINTUS SEPTIMIUS FLORENS, one of the most learned men of the primitive church, was b. about 160, at Carthage. Originally a bitter enemy of the Christian faith, he was converted by witnessing the firmness of the martyrs, became a priest, and was thenceforth one of the most eloquent defenders of the doctrines which he had despised. Late in life he adopted the opinions of the Montanists, and afterwards formed a sect of his own. He d. about 245. Among his works are, "An Apology for the Christians," a "Treatise against the Jews," and the five books against Marcion.

TETZEL, JOHN, a Dominican monk of the 16th century, was b. at Piern. Being appointed, in 1517, to vend the indulgences issued by Pope Leo X., for the completion of St. Peter's church at Rome, he represented them as possessing the virtue of pardoning all sins, past, present, and future. This first roused the indignation of Luther, and may truly be said to have been the primary cause of the reformation. The papal government, seeing the mischief likely to accrue from the indiscreet zeal and bigotry of Tetzal, so severely rebuked him, that he is said to have died of a broken heart, in 1519.

THALES, one of the seven sages of Greece, was b. 639 B. C., at Miletus, in Ionia, or, as some affirm, was a native of Phenicia. He travelled in Egypt and other countries, and d. in the 96th year of his age. Thales was the founder of the Ionian school of philosophy, and was an admirable astronomer and geometer. He was the first who accurately calculated a solar eclipse.

THEMISTOCLES, an illustrious Athenian, was b. 535 B. C., at Phreas. Licentious in his youth, he was reclaimed from his follies by the love of glory. He bore a conspicuous part in the battle of Marathon, and the trophies gained there by Miltiades were a stimulus to the ambition of Themistocles. When, after the banishment of his rival Aristides, he acquired the management of the Athenian affairs, he displayed splendid talents. It was by his persuasion that his countrymen were induced to confide their safety to their navy, and to him were the Greeks indebted for the glorious victory of Salamis. He rebuilt the walls of Athens, fortified the Piræus, and prevented the Spartans from gaining an ascendancy in the Amphictyonic council. The popular favor, however, was at length withdrawn from him, and he was banished for five years. Further proceedings being meditated against him, he sought an asylum at the court of Artaxerxes, and was hospitably received. He d. 470 B. C. Some attribute his death to poison taken by himself, rather than assist the Persian monarch against Athens, while others affirm that he died a natural death.

THEOBALD, LEWIS, a dramatist and commentator, was b. at Sittingbourne, in Kent, and was brought up to his father's profession, that of a lawyer, but quitted it for literature. Having offended Pope, by editing a rival edition of Shakspeare, that poet made him the hero of the "Dunciad." Yet, in spite of the wit of the satirist, Theobald is not despicable as a commentator on the bard of Avon. D. 1744.

THEOCRITUS, a celebrated Greek pastoral poet, was b. at Syracuse, and flourished in the 3d century B. C. Ptolemy Philadelphus invited him to his court, and treated him munificently. It is said that he was strangled by Hiero, tyrant of Syracuse, for having written satires upon him, but there is little or rather no evidence in support of the assertion.

THEODOSIUS, FLAVIUS, surnamed the Great, a Roman emperor, was b. in 346, in Spain. In his 18th year he defeated the barbarians, and drove them across the Danube. Gratian rewarded him with the purple, and the sway over the eastern provinces. In the course of his reign Theodosius triumphed over the Goths, and various other enemies of the empire. He vanquished Arbogaste, in 394, and added the western provinces to his dominions. D. 395.—II., surnamed the Younger, emperor of the East, grandson of the great Theodosius, was b. 400, and succeeded to the throne at the age of eight years. The early part of his reign was marked by some success against the Persians; the remainder of it was not fortunate. The code which bears his name was formed by his order, and was the work of seven lawyers. D. 450.

THEOPHRASTUS, a celebrated Greek philosopher, was b. 371 B. C., at Eresus, in Lesbos. He was a disciple of Plato and of Aristotle, the latter of whom he succeeded, and with splendid success, in the Lyceum. Twice he was persecuted by his enemies, but in both instances he eventually triumphed. Of all his numerous works time has spared only a "Treatise on Stones," parts of his "Characters," and of a "History of Animals," and some fragments quoted by other authors.

THESPIS, a Greek poet, b. at Icaria, in Attica, flourished 576 B. C. He is considered as the inventor of tragedy, from his having introduced actors in addition to the chorus. His stage is said to have been a cart, and the faces of the performers were smeared with wine lees, or, according to Suidas, with white lead and vermilion.

THEVENOT, JOHN, a French traveller, was b. in 1633, at Paris. His fortune enabling him to gratify his love of travelling, he visited several parts of Europe, and afterwards explored many countries of the East. He d. in Persia, in 1657, as he was returning from Hindostan. His "Voyages and Travels" have been often reprinted.

THOMPSON, WILLIAM, a poet and divine, was b. at Brough, in Westmoreland; was educated at Queen's college, Oxford, and d. about 1766, dean of Raphoe, in Ireland. His poems have been deservedly admitted among the collected works of the British poets. His poem on "Sickness" contains many fine passages, and his "Hymn to May" breathes more of the spirit of Spenser than most modern imitations of him. He also wrote "Gondibert and Bertha," a tragedy, and published an edition of "Bishop Hall's Satires."

THOMSON, JAMES, one of the most popular of English poets, was the son of a Scotch clergyman; was b. 1700, at Ednam, in Roxburghshire; and was educated at Jedburgh and at Edinburgh. Relinquishing his views in the church, he removed to London, where, in 1726, he published his "Winter." The three other seasons appeared in 1728, 1729, and 1730. During the same period he also produced the tragedy of "Sophonisba," the poem of "Britannia," and a poem on Sir Isaac Newton. Among the friends whom he gained by these splendid proofs of his genius, was Lord Chancellor Talbot, who chose him as a proper companion to accompany his son on the grand tour. Thomson was thus occupied for three years, in the course of which he visited most of the European courts. After his return he was made secretary of briefs by the chancellor, but the death of his patron soon deprived him of that place. For this loss, however, he was indemnified by the office of surveyor-general of the Leeward Islands, and a pension from the prince of Wales. His pen, meanwhile, was not idle. He wrote the tragedies of "Agamemnon," "Edward and Eleonora," "Tancred and Sigismunda," and "Coriolanus;" the masque of "Alfred," in conjunction with Mallet; and the poems of "Liberty," and "The Castle of Indolence." D. 1748.

THORNHILL, Sir JAMES, a painter, was b. 1676, in Dorsetshire, and after his return from his travels in Holland, Flanders, and France, rose into considerable reputation as an artist. He was employed to paint the dome of St. Paul's, the refectory and saloon at Greenwich hospital, and some of the apartments at Hampton-court. D. 1734.

THORNTON, BONNEL, a witty miscellaneous writer and poet, was b. 1724, in London; was educated at Westminster school, and at Christ-church, Oxford; took the degree of bachelor of medicine, but never practised; was in habits of friendship with many of the wits of that period; and d. 1763. The "Connoisseur" was the joint production of him and Colman. He translated a part of Plautus, and wrote a "Burlesque Ode on St. Cecilia's Day," "The Battle of the Wigs," and a variety of humorous pieces.—MATTHEW, was b. in Ireland, in 1714, and when about two or three years old his father emigrated to America, and finally settled in Worcester, Mass. He pursued the study of medicine, and commenced the practice of his profession in Londonderry, N. H. In 1776 he was chosen a delegate to the continental congress, and affixed his name to the declaration of independence. He was afterwards chief justice of the court of common pleas, and judge of the superior court of his adopted state. D. 1803.

THORWALDSEN, ALBERT, the great Danish sculptor, was the son of a carver on wood, but though the circumstances of the parent were narrow, the boy, having early shown great talent for drawing, was gratuitously and well educated at the Copenhagen academy of arts. Here he studied so effectually that he obtained two gold medals and a travelling studentship, which entitles the fortunate competitor to a salary for three years. Thus far fortunate, Thorwaldsen proceeded to Rome, where he worked with zeal and energy, but where he is said to have been for some time so overwhelmed by the magnificence of ancient art, by which he saw himself surrounded, as to have broken up not a few of his earlier works as soon as they were completed. His Jason once finished, his fortune was virtually made; orders at vast prices poured in upon him from all parts, and the splendid works completed by him from the commencement of 1800 to the close of 1837, place him in the first rank of modern sculptors. His countrymen were justly proud of him, and honored him with a public funeral. D. 1844, aged 73.

THUCYDIDES, a Greek historian, descended from the kings of Thrace, was b. 469 B. C., at Athens. Having failed to relieve Amphipolis, which was besieged by the Lacedæmonians, he was banished by his countrymen, and he retired into Thrace, where he had large possessions. Nothing certain is known of the remainder of his life, but he is supposed to have d. about 400 B. C. As an historian he ranks high among the writers of ancient times.

THURLOE, JOHN, a statesman and political writer, was a native of Essex, and b. in 1616. He was secretary of state during the protectorate; and though immediately after the restoration he was arrested on a charge of high treason, yet such was Charles II.'s opinion of his talent and integrity, that he afterwards often invited him to take part in his administration, which he thought proper to decline. D. 1668.

His state papers have been published, and form a very valuable collection.

THURLOW, EDWARD, lord high chancellor of Great Britain, was b. in 1732, and was called to the bar in 1758. He filled the offices of solicitor-general and attorney-general, was chosen M.P. for Tamworth, and became a warm and powerful supporter of the ministry in the house of commons. He retired from office in 1783, but resumed it again on the dissolution of the coalition ministry, and continued to hold the seals under the premiership of Mr. Pitt, till 1792. D. 1806.

TIBERIUS, CLAUDIUS DRUSUS NERO, a Roman emperor, was b. 34 B. C. at Rome. During the reign of Augustus, he was successful at the head of the armies in Spain, Armenia, Germany, and other provinces, but, falling into disgrace, he resided for some years, as an exile, at Rhodes. He was, however, restored to favor, and he was again victorious as the leader of the legions in Germany. On his accession to the throne, his acts gave promise of a beneficent sovereign; but he soon became licentious and sanguinary, and, after a reign of nearly twenty-three years, he d. universally hated, at Misenum, 37.

TIBULLUS, AULUS ALBIUS, a Latin poet of an equestrian family, was b. at Rome. He was the friend of Horace, and of many other eminent cotemporaries, and is believed to have d. shortly after Virgil. His four books of "Elegies" have placed him at the head of the elegiac poets.

TICKELL, THOMAS, a poet, was b. in 1636, at Bridekirk, in Cumberland; was educated at Queen's college, Oxford; was the friend of Addison, who made him under secretary of state; was appointed, in 1724, secretary to the lords justices in Ireland, and held that office till his death, in 1740. His poems, which have much sweetness and elegance, form a part of the collected works of the British poets. His translation of the first book of the Iliad occasioned the rupture between Pope and Addison.—

RICHARD, a grandson of the foregoing, was b. at Bath; obtained a pension and a place in the stamp office, and was killed, in 1793, by throwing himself in a fit of frenzy, from the window of his apartments in Hampton-court palace. He wrote two poems, "The Project," and "The Wreath of Fashion;" "Anticipation," and other political pamphlets; and the "Carnival of Venice," a comic opera.

TIEDEMANN, DIETRICH, an eminent writer, was b. 1748, at Bremervorde, in the duchy of Bremen, and d. 1803. His principal works are, "An Essay on the Origin of Languages," "System of the Stoic Philosophy," an "Investigation of Man," "The first Philosophers of Greece," and "The Spirit of Speculative Philosophy."

TIEDGE, CHRISTOPHER AUGUSTUS, a German elegiac poet, b. 1752; his chief works are, "Urania," "The Echo, or Alexis and Ida," "Denkmale der Zeit," &c. His latter years were passed at Dresden. D. 1841.

TIERNEY, GEORGE, a distinguished statesman and political writer, was b. in London, 1756, and, in 1796, he was elected M.P. for Southwark. He soon proved himself an able debater, and was one of the most formidable opponents of Mr. Pitt. During a debate in the year 1798, some words spoken in the house were the cause of a duel between him and Mr. Pitt. When Mr. Addington became minister, in 1802, he made Mr. Tierney treasurer of the navy. In 1806, under the Grenville administration, he became president of the board of control, but went out of office early in the following year, on the resignation of the ministry. On the formation of the Canning ministry, he was appointed to the mastership of the mint; from which he retired, with Lord Goderich, in 1828, and d. 1830.

TILGHAM, WILLIAM, an eminent jurist, was b. 1756, in Talbot county, on the eastern shore of Maryland. In 1772 he began the study of law in Philadelphia, but was not admitted to the practice of the profession till 1783. In 1788, and for some successive years, he was elected a representative to the legislature of Maryland. In 1793 he returned to Philadelphia, and pursued the practice of the law in that city till 1801, when he was appointed chief judge of the circuit court of the United States for the third circuit. After the abolition of this court, he resumed his profession, and continued it till 1805, when he was appointed president of the courts of common pleas in the first district of Pennsylvania. In the following year he was commissioned as chief justice of the supreme court of that state. D. 1827.

TILLI, JOHN TZERCLAES, count de, a celebrated German general, was b. at Brussels, of an illustrious family, towards the close of the 16th century. Originally he was a Jesuit, but he quitted that order to take arms. He first signalized himself in Hungary against the Turks. Subsequently he rose to high command in the Bavarian service, and next in the Imperial, and gained several victories between 1620 and 1631; in which last year he eternally disgraced himself by his cruelty at the storming of Magdeburgh. Gustavus Adolphus defeated him at Lutzen, in 1631, and again at the passing of the Lech, in 1632, in which action Tilli was mortally wounded.

TILLOCH, ALEXANDER, was b. 1757, at Glasgow, where he received a liberal education. While resident at his native place he invented stereotype printing; but, after having joined with Mr. Foulis to carry it on, and taken out a patent, he had the mortification to find that the process had been previously discovered by Ged. Settling in London, he became editor and one of the proprietors of the "Star" newspaper, and, in 1797, he established the "Philosophical Magazine." D. Jan. 26, 1825. Tilloch made some improvements on the steam-engine.

TILLOTSON, JOHN, an eminent prelate, was b. 1630, at Sowerby, in Yorkshire, and was educated at Clare hall, Cambridge. He was of a Puritan family, and was brought up in their religious principles, but he conformed to the church in 1662. Between that period and 1669, he was, successively, curate of Cheshunt, rector of Keddington, preacher in Lincoln's Inn, lecturer at St. Lawrence Jewry, and gained reputation both as a preacher and a controversialist. In 1670 he was made a prebendary, and, two years afterwards, dean of Canterbury. In 1683 he attended Lord Russell on the scaffold, and labored, but, of course, in vain, to draw from him a declaration in favor of passive obedience. This blot in his character is to be regretted. At the revolution, he was appointed clerk of the closet to his majesty, and, in the following year, he exchanged his deanery for that of St. Paul's. In 1691, after fruitless attempts to avoid the honor, he accepted, with unfeigned reluctance, the see of Canterbury, which was become vacant by the deprivation of Sancroft. This promotion, however, he did not long survive, as his decease took place in 1694. He died poor, the copyright of his "Posthumous Sermons," which sold for 2500 guineas, being all that his family inherited. His works form three folio volumes.

TINDAL, MATTHEW, a deistical writer, was b. about 1657, at Beer Ferrers, in Devonshire; was educated at Lincoln college, Oxford, and obtained a fellowship in All Souls, and d. 1733. Among his works are, "The Rights of the Christian Church Asserted," and "Christianity as old as the Creation."—NICHOLAS, nephew of the foregoing, was b. 1687, in Devonshire; was educated at Oxford; obtained various livings, and the chaplainship of Greenwich hospital; and d. 1774. He wrote a continuation of Rapin, translated Calmet and Cantemir, and abridged Spence's "Polymetis."

TINTORETTO, a celebrated painter, whose real name was JAMES ROBUSTI, was the son of a dyer, from which circumstance he derived his pictorial appellation. He was b. 1512, at Venice, and was a pupil of Titian, who became jealous of his talents, and dismissed him from his school. He rose to high reputation, and was employed by the Venetian government to paint a picture of the victory gained over the Turks in 1571. Most of his finest compositions are at Venice, where he d. 1594.

TIRABOSCHI, JEROME, an Italian writer, was b. 1731, at Bergamo, and d. 1794, counsellor and librarian to the duke of Modena. Among his works are, "Memoirs of Modenese Writers," and "Notices of Painters, Sculptors," &c., but his great production is "The History of Italian Literature."

TISSOT, SIMON ANDREW, an eminent Swiss physician, was b. 1728, at Grancy, in the Pays de Vaud; studied medicine at Montpellier; and settled at Lausanne, where he became celebrated, particularly for his new method of treating the small-pox; was for three years medical professor at Pavia; and d. 1797, at Lausanne.

TITIAN, whose name was TIZIANO VECELLI, the greatest painter of the Venetian school, was b. 1477 or 1480, at Pieve de Cadore, in Friuli; was a pupil of Zuccati and Bellini; and improved his original style by observing the works of Giorgione. He was patronized and highly honored by Charles V., Philip II., and other princes. His powers continued undiminished till almost the latest period of his existence, and, as he was indefatigable in his art, and lived to the age of nearly a hundred, his works are numerous. They still retain their rank among the highest efforts of pictorial skill. D. of the plague, 1576.

TITUS SABINUS VESPASIANUS, FLAVIUS, a Roman emperor, the son of Vespasian, was b. 40. After having distinguished himself in arms, particularly at the siege of Jerusalem, he ascended the throne A. D. 79. His early licentiousness inspired fears as to his future conduct, but he discarded his vices, and acted in such a manner as to be denominated the delight of the human race. He was the father of his people. On one occasion, having within the twenty-four hours performed no act of kindness, he exclaimed, "My friends, I have lost a day!" He reigned little more than two years.

TOBIN, JOHN, a dramatic writer, was b. 1770, at Salisbury; was educated at private schools at Southampton and Bristol; and was brought up as a solicitor. He had an irresistible propensity to dramatic composition, and at the age of twenty-four had written several plays; and he continued his labors till the close of his existence. In his applications to theatrical managers, however, he was uniformly unsuccessful; little to the credit of their judgment. It was not till he was sinking into the grave from consumption that his "Honey Moon" was accepted, and he did not live to witness its success. D. 1804.

TOLAND, JOHN, a deistical writer, was b. in 1699, near Londonderry; was originally a Catholic, but became a dissenter, and, lastly, a skeptic; was educated at Glasgow, Edinburgh; and Leyden; was employed in secret missions to the German courts; and d. 1722. Among his works are, "Christianity not Mysterious," "Nazareneus," "Pantheisticon," "Amyntor," "Tetradymus," and "A Life of Milton."

TOMLINE, GEORGE, whose family name was PRETTYMAN, a prelate and writer, was b. about 1750, at Bury St. Edmund's, where his father was a tradesman. He was educated at Bury school, and at Pembroke hall, Cambridge, and was senior wrangler in 1772. Mr. Pitt, to whom he had been academical tutor, made him his private secretary, gave him the living of Sudbury, and a prebend of Westminster, and, in 1787, raised him to the see of Lincoln, whence, in 1820, Dr. Tomline was translated to that of Winchester. D. 1827.

TOMPKINS, DANIEL D., was the son of Jonathan G. Tompkins, a revolutionary patriot, and was b. June 21st, 1774. He received his education at Columbia college, in the city of New York, and graduated in 1795. He commenced the practice of law in New York, and took a prominent part in the great party struggle which resulted in the elevation of Mr. Jefferson to the presidency of the United States. In 1803 Mr. Tompkins.

was appointed chief justice of the superior court of New York, which office he filled with reputation to himself, and to the approbation of the public. He was elected governor of the state in 1807, and during a period of great political excitement, was an active and upright chief magistrate. In 1817 he was elected to the vice-presidency of the United States, James Monroe at the same time having been raised to the presidency. In this honorable station he served his country for two terms; and finally retired from public life, in March, 1825. He d. suddenly, at his residence, in Richmond county, Staten Island, June 11th, 1825.

TOPE, THEOBALD WOLFE, an Irish revolutionary politician, and founder of the "Society of United Irishmen," was b. in Dublin, in 1763, and was bred to the bar. In 1790 he published a pamphlet, the object of which was to expose the mismanagement of the English government regarding Ireland; and, in 1793, he established the society above mentioned. He afterwards became involved in a treasonable correspondence with France, but made a sort of compromise with the British government, and was allowed to withdraw himself. He accordingly came to America in 1795, from whence he proceeded to France in the following year. By his persuasions, the French directory fitted out an expedition, consisting of 17 sail of the line, 13 frigates, &c., with 14,000 troops on board, and upwards of 40,000 stand of arms, besides artillery and warlike stores. Tone was appointed chef de brigade, under General Hoche, the commander-in-chief. They set sail Dec. 15, 1796; but, before they had all reached their destination, (Bantry bay,) a hurricane arose, in consequence of which three ships of the line and a frigate only remained together. This bold attempt being thus frustrated by the elements, the scattered ships made the best of their way back to France, and Tone was foiled in all his future endeavors to persuade the French government to undertake another expedition on a large scale. But he still persevered in those plans which he conceived would lead to a separation of Ireland from Great Britain; and he at length embarked in one of those petty armaments, the inefficiency of which, he thought, perhaps, might be remedied by his own courage and experience. He was taken prisoner in the Hoche, after fighting bravely in a desperate action, was tried by a military commission, and sentenced to be hanged. The execution of his sentence, however, he avoided, by cutting his own throat in prison, November 19, 1798.

TOOKE, JOHN HORNE, a politician and philologist, who for many years was known by his family name of Horne, was b. 1736, in Westminster; was educated at Westminster and Eton schools, and at St. John's college, Cambridge; and in 1760 was inducted to the chapelry of New Brentford. The clerical profession, however, was little suited to his habits and feelings, and he took an active part in politics. The cause of Wilkes he warmly espoused for a considerable time, but at length they became enemies. In 1771 he was attacked by Junius, but he defended himself with spirit and success against that formidable writer. Resigning his living at Brentford, he studied law at the Temple, but his ecclesiastical character proved an obstacle to his being admitted to the bar. In 1775 he was sentenced to imprisonment on a charge of having libelled the king's troops in America. Out of this circumstance arose his Letter to Dunning, which formed the basis of his subsequent philological work, "The Diversions of Purley," published in 1786. In 1790, and 1796, he stood, ineffectually, as candidate for Westminster; and in 1794 he was one of the persons who were tried at the Old Bailey, and acquitted, on a charge of treason. In 1801 he was returned to parliament for Old Sarum; but he sat only during that session, a bill being passed to prevent individuals in orders from sitting in future. D. 1812.

TOPLADY, AUGUSTUS MONTAGUE, an eminent Calvinistic divine, was b. in 1740, at Farnham, in Surrey; was educated at Westminster school, and at Trinity college, Dublin; and d. 1773, vicar of Broad Hembury, in Devonshire. Toplady was a strenuous opponent of Wesley.

TORQUEMADA, THOMAS DE, the first inquisitor-general of Spain, a man infamous for his barbarity, was b. in 1420; was a monk of the order of St. Dominic; became inquisitor-general in 1483; and d. in 1498. In the course of sixteen years he gave to the flames no less than 8,800 victims, besides executing nearly as many in effigy, condemning 90,000 to perpetual imprisonment and other severe punishments, and expelling from Spain above 800,000 Jews.

TORRICELLI, EVANGELISTA, a celebrated Italian geometrician, was b. in 1608, at Modigliana, or, as some assert, at Piancaldoli; began his education under the Jesuits at Faenza, and completed it at Rome; was invited to Florence by Galileo; and succeeded that eminent man as professor of mathematics. The grand-duke also appointed him his mathematician. D. 1647.

TORRINGTON, GEORGE BYNG, Viscount, a British admiral, was b. 1668, in Kent; became a rear-admiral in 1703; and, during the reign of Queen Anne, distinguished himself at the taking of Gibraltar, the battle of Malaga, and the relieving of Barcelona. In 1718 he defeated the Spanish fleet of Sicily; in 1721 he was created a viscount; and was afterwards appointed first lord of the admiralty. D. 1733.

TOUSSAINT L'OUVERTURE, a negro of great talents, was b. in 1743, in St. Domingo. His early years were spent in slavery on the estate of Count Noe. When the blacks threw off the yoke, the abilities and courage of Toussaint soon raised him to the highest rank among them. By his wise measures he succeeded in expelling the English, reducing the Spanish part of the island, and restoring peace and order in the colony; for which the central assembly of St. Domingo raised him the dignity of governor and president for life. Anxious to recover so valuable a possession, Bonaparte, in 1801, dispatched General Leclere with a large army. A desperate contest ensued, in which Toussaint was overcome. He was sent a prisoner to France, and d. in the fort of Joux, 1803.

TRADESCANT, JOHN, a Dutch naturalist, who, after visiting various parts of Europe, settled in England, established at Lambeth a garden of exotics, and was appointed gardener to Charles I. He d. about 1652.—JOHN, his son, who d. in 1662, published, with the title of "Museum Tradescantium," a description of his father's collection of curiosities. The flower called Tradescantia was brought from Virginia by the latter.

TRAJAN, MARCUS ULPIS CRINITUS, a Roman emperor, surnamed OPTIMUS, was b. A. D. 52, at Italica, in Spain. After having distinguished himself at the head of the legions in Lower Germany, he was, at the age of 42, adopted by Nerva. On the death of that monarch, A. D. 98, Trajan was invested with the imperial purple. The adoption of Nerva and the choice of the senate were justified by the conduct of the emperor. In his civil capacity he ruled for the welfare of his people; in his military character he sustained the glory of Rome by defeating the Dacians, Parthians, Arabians, Armenians, and Persians. The column which bears his name was raised in the Roman capital to commemorate his victories. D. 117.

TRENCK, FREDERIC, baron de, a Prussian officer, celebrated for his adventures, was b. 1726, at Königsberg, and made such rapid progress in his studies, that, at the age of 17, he was presented to the king, as the most remarkable student in the university. Frederic rapidly advanced him in the army, and manifested much regard for him; but the personal and mental accomplishments of Trenck having won the heart of the Princess Amelia, the monarch, her brother, resolved to punish him. Trenck was confined at Glatz, but contrived to escape. He then visited the north of Europe, Austria, and Italy. In 1758 he was seized at Dantzic, and was conveyed to Magdeburgh, where, loaded with irons, he was incarcerated for nearly ten years in a horrible dungeon. After his liberation he withdrew to Vienna. He was subsequently a wine merchant at Aix-la-Chapelle, and a cultivator of his estate in Hungary. In 1791 he settled in France, and in 1794 he closed his eventful career under the axe of the guillotine. He wrote his own "Memoirs," and some other works of considerable merit.

TRESHAM, HENRY, a painter and poet, was b. in Ireland, and imbibed the principles of art from West, of Dublin. He accompanied Lord Cawdor to Italy, and resided for fourteen years in that country. On his return to England he became a royal academician. He wrote three poems, "The Seasick Minstrel," "Rome at the close of the Eighteenth Century," and "Britannicus to Bonaparte." D. 1814.

TREVETT, SAMUEL R., a surgeon in the army of the United States, was b. at Marblehead, Massachusetts, in 1783, and was graduated at Harvard college. After studying the profession of medicine, he commenced practice in Boston, but being naturally of a chivalrous cast of character, he sought and obtained an appointment in the medical department of the navy. He was in the Constitution during her cruise before the last war, on board the United States when she captured the Macedonian, and was in the President when she was captured by the British fleet. He distinguished himself very much by his intrepid conduct when a passenger in the steamboat Phoenix, which was burned on Lake Champlain, in September, 1819. After the war he had been appointed surgeon of the Navy Yard at Charlestown, and in 1822 he was stationed as surgeon on board the sloop of war Peacock, bound on a summer cruise to the West Indies. He was seized with the yellow fever, and d. at Norfolk in November of that year.

TRIBONIAN, a celebrated juriconsult, was b. about the beginning of the sixth century, at Sida, in Pamphylia; obtained reputation at the bar, and rose, through a succession of state offices, to those of praetorian prefect and consul. Justinian intrusted to him the superintendence of the compiling of his new code of laws. This task was begun in 530 and completed in 534. Tribonian, whose rapacity and venality were at least equal to his talents, d. about 547.

TRIMMER, SARAH, an active and intelligent female, the daughter of Kirby, who wrote on Perspective, was b. in 1741, at Ipswich, and d. 1810.

TRISSINO, JOHN GEORGE, an Italian poet, was b. in 1478, at Vicenza; was educated at Rome and Milan, and had Chaleondyles for one of his tutors; was employed by Leo X. and his successor Clement on various diplomatic missions; and d. in 1550. Among his works are, "The Deliverance of Italy from the Goths," an epic poem; and the tragedy of "Sophonisba."

TROMP, MARTIN HERBERTSON, a celebrated Dutch admiral, was b. 1597, at Brill; began his naval career at an early age; defeated the Spaniards in 1637 and 1639; fought with great gallantry against the English, during the war which began in 1652; and was killed in an engagement in 1653.—NICHOLAS, his son, who was b. 1629, and d. 1697, emulated the fame of his father, particularly in the four days' action in the Downs, in 1666.

TROWBRIDGE, EDMUND, a learned jurist, was b. at Newton, in 1709, and was graduated at Harvard college. He pursued the profession of the law, rose to distinction, in 1749 was appointed attorney-general, and a judge of the supreme court of Massachusetts in 1767. In 1772 he resigned his seat on the bench, and d. in retirement, in 1793.

TRUMBULL, JOHN, the author of "McFingal," was b. in Connecticut, in 1750, and was educated at Yale college, where he entered at a very early age.

In 1772 he published the first part of his poem, "The Progress of Dulness." In the following year he was admitted to the bar in Connecticut, and, removing to Boston, continued his legal studies in the office of John Adams. He returned to his native state in 1774, and commenced practice at New Haven. The first part of "McFingal" was published at Philadelphia, in 1775: the poem was completed and published in 1782, at Hartford, where the author at that time lived. More than thirty editions of this work have been printed. In 1789 he was appointed state-attorney for the county of Hartford, and in 1801 was appointed a judge of the superior court of errors, and held this appointment till 1819. In 1825 he removed to Detroit, where he d. 1831.—JONATHAN, governor of Connecticut, was b. at Lebanon, in 1710, and graduated at Harvard college at the early age of 17. He early engaged in public affairs, and served his native colony in many important offices. In 1769 he was elected governor, which office he discharged with great skill and prudence for fourteen years, embracing the whole period of the revolution. In his official station he enjoyed the confidence of Washington, and the other sages and patriots of that eventful period. D. 1785.—JONATHAN, a son of the preceding, was b. at Lebanon, 1740, and was educated at Harvard college, where he graduated in 1759. For several succeeding years he resided in his native town; but when the revolution commenced, he was found among the foremost in defence of his country's rights. In 1775 he was appointed paymaster to the northern department of the army, and continued in that office until the close of the campaign of 1783. He was soon afterwards attached to the family of Washington, in the capacity of secretary and first aid. He enjoyed, in an eminent degree, the confidence and friendship of the commander-in-chief, with whom he continued until the close of the war. In 1789 he was a member of congress, and for ten years represented his native state in that body, in the house of representatives, of which he was some years speaker, and in the senate. In 1798 he was elected governor of Connecticut, and filled that office until his death, 1809.—JOHN, a son of the preceding, was b. at Lebanon, 1756, and early in life served as an aid to Gen. Washington. He was rapidly promoted, but quitted the army in 1777, when he applied himself to painting visited Europe to get the instructions of West, and rose to the highest rank in his profession. His great national pictures, some of which adorn the Capitol at Washington, and others are at Yale college, are valuable historical monuments. D. in 1843.

TRUXTON, THOMAS, an officer in the American navy, was b. on Long Island, in 1755. In 1775 he commanded a vessel, and distinguished himself by his depredations on British commerce during the revolution. He subsequently engaged in commerce, till the year 1794, when he was appointed to the frigate Constitution. In 1799 he captured the French frigate L'Insurgente; and in the following year he obtained a victory over the La Vengeance. On the close of the French war he retired from the navy, and d. at Philadelphia, in 1822.

TUCKER, ABRAHAM, a metaphysical writer, b. in 1705, in London, was the son of a merchant, and was educated at Bishop Stortford school, and Merton college, Oxford. He studied for a while at the Inner Temple, but was not called to the bar. D. 1774. His great work is, "The Light of Nature pursued," in seven volumes octavo, of which the first half was published by himself, under the fictitious name of Edward Search.—ST. GEORGE, an American lawyer and statesman, distinguished by the title of "The American Blackstone," was a zealous promoter of the independence of the United States, and bore a part in its accomplishment, not only with his pen, but his sword. D. 1828.

TUCKERMAN, JOSEPH, an eminent philanthropist of Boston, who devoted his life to the ministry of the poor, in which he displayed equal benevolence and judgment. D. 1840.

TUDOR, WILLIAM, a man of letters, was b. in the state of Massachusetts, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1796. He soon after visited Europe and passed several years there. After having been some time a member of the legislature of his native state, he was appointed, in 1823, consul at Lima, and for the ports of Peru. In 1827 he was appointed chargé-d'affaires of the United States at the court of Brazil. D. at Rio de Janeiro, 1830. Mr. Tudor was the founder, and for two years the sole editor of the "North American Review." He was the author of "Letters on the Eastern States," and a "Life of James Otis," and left a number of volumes in manuscript, nearly prepared for the press.

TULL, JETHRO, an agricultural writer, was b. about 1680; studied at one of the universities and the Temple, and was admitted a barrister; but, on returning from his travels, he settled on his estate, and devoted himself to agriculture. D. 1740.

TURENNE, HENRY DE LA TOUR D'AUVERGNE, viscount de, a consummate general, second son of the duke of Bouillon, was b. in 1611, at Sedan; had from his childhood an irresistible propensity to a military life; and was initiated in the art of war by five years' hard service under his uncles, Maurice of Nassau and Prince Frederic Henry. On his returning to France a regiment was given to him. He displayed such talent in Lorraine, Germany, Italy, and Roussillon, that, anxious to fix him in his interests, Mazarin gave him the marshal's staff in 1644. In 1645 he was defeated at Mariendahl, but was soon amply avenged by the victory of Nordlingen. During the war of the Fronde, he at first espoused the cause of the princes, and was beaten at Rhetel; but, having rejoined the royal party, he was more successful in the battles of Gien and the suburb of St. Antoine. In the war against the Spaniards, from 1654 to 1659, he gained the battle of the Downs, and a variety of other advantages. He now enjoyed some years of repose, during which he abandoned the faith of his fathers, and became a Catholic. In the campaign of 1672 all the other marshals employed were placed under his orders. Between that period and 1675 he compelled the elector of Brandenburg to sign a peace, gained the battle of Sintzheim, and, by a movement of the most masterly kind, expelled the Imperialists from Alsace, and drove them over the Rhine. He sullied his glory, however, by his barbarous conduct in the Palatinate, which country he utterly devastated by fire and sword. In 1675 he was opposed to Montecuculi, and the game of war was never played with greater skill than by the two generals. Turenne believed that he had at length found a favorable opportunity of attacking his enemy, when he was killed, July 27, 1675, by a cannon-ball, and the consequence of his death was the immediate retreat of the French.

TURGOT, ANNE ROBERT JAMES, a French statesman, was b. 1727, at Paris. He studied at the Sorbonne, and was intended for the church, but relinquished the clerical profession, and was made master of requests. In 1761 he was appointed intendant of Limoges, which office he held for twelve years, greatly to the advantage of the inhabitants of the Limousin. In 1774 he was made comptroller-general of the finances; but his benevolent views were thwarted by intrigues, and he was removed in 1776. He d. in 1781. His works form nine volumes octavo.

TURNER, WILLIAM, an English naturalist of the 16th century, was b. at Morphet, in Northumberland; was educated at Pembroke hall, Cambridge; and d. in 1568, dean of Wells. He wrote, among other things, "A History of Plants," which is the earliest English herbal.—SHARON, the well-known historian of the Anglo-Saxons, was b. in London, 1768. He was principally educated at Pentonville, and having chosen the law for his profession, he was articulated to an attorney in the Temple at the age of 15. The death of his master before his articles of clerkship were expired left him free to decide on his future career; but at the suggestion of an old client, who promised him support, he took up the business, and notwithstanding the great amount of time occupied by his literary pursuits, he continued to conduct a large professional business, which he transmitted to his family. His chief works, or rather series of works, (for they were published separately,) are, the "History of England from the earliest period to the Death of Elizabeth," and the "Sacred History of the World;" they have been repeatedly reprinted, and may be now said to form part of the standard literature of the country. Shortly before his death he published a poem, entitled "Richard III." D. 1847.—DANIEL, a commodore in the U. S. navy, who gave gallant aid to Perry in the battle of Lake Erie. The state of New York presented him a sword in testimony of honor for his services. D. 1850.

TWISS, RICHARD, an English traveller, was b. in 1747, at Rotterdam. He was a man of fortune, and spent several years in visiting various parts of the Continent. He d. in 1821, at an advanced age. Among his works are, "Travels through Spain and Portugal," "A Tour in Ireland," "A Trip to Paris in 1792," "Anecdotes of Chess," and "Miscellanies." His illiberal attack on the natives of Ireland drew on him a severe literary chastisement from the Irish poet Preston.—HORACE, a distinguished member of the British parliament, and a prolific writer, who held several political appointments, and wrote the life of Lord Eldon. He was vice-chancellor in 1844. D. 1849.

TYLER, ROYALL, a lawyer and miscellaneous writer, was b. in Boston, and graduated at Harvard college in 1776. In 1790 he removed his residence to Vermont, and soon distinguished himself in his profession of law. For six years he was an associate judge of the supreme court of that state, and for six years more chief justice. He was the author of several dramatic pieces of considerable merit; a novel called "The Algerine Captive," and numerous pieces in prose and verse published in the "Farmer's Museum," when edited by Dennie. In addition to these he published two volumes, entitled "Vermont Reports." D. 1825.

TYRTÆUS, a Greek poet, who flourished about 684 B. C., is said to have been a native of Miletus, and to have settled at Athens. He was lame, and blind of one eye. Defeated by the Messenians, the Spartans applied for a general to the Athenians, who, in derision, sent Tyrtæus, to them. The bard, however, so inspired the Spartans by his warlike songs that they were victorious. Some fragments of his battle strains are extant.

TYTLER, WILLIAM, an historical and miscellaneous writer, was b. in 1711, at Edinburgh, was educated at the grammar school and university of his native city, followed the profession of a solicitor, and d. 1792. His principal work is "An Historical and Critical Inquiry into the Evidence produced against Mary, Queen of Scots."—ALEXANDER FRASER, son of the foregoing, was b. in 1747, at Edinburgh, in which city he was educated. After having been professor of universal history, at the university, and deputy judge advocate for Scotland, he was appointed a senator of the college of justice in 1802, on which occasion he took the title of Lord Woodhouselee. In 1811 he was appointed a commissioner of judiciary. Among his works are, "Decisions of the Court of Sessions," "A Treatise on Military Law," "Elements of General History," "An Essay on Translation," "An Essay on the Life of Petrarch," and "Memoirs of Lord Kames." D. 1813.

U.

ULLOA, DON ANTHONY DE, an able Spanish naval officer and mathematician, was b. 1716, at Seville, entered the navy in 1733, and at the age of only 19 was chosen as one of the scientific characters who were appointed to measure a degree of the meridian of Peru. He was ten years a resident in South America. After his return he rose to high rank in the navy, and was employed in various important offices by the government. Spain is indebted to him for many important improvements. D. 1795. He published his "Travels," and a physico-historical work on South America.

ULPHILAS, or WUULFILAS, a Gothic bishop, who flourished about the middle of the 4th century. He was deputed by the Goths, in 377, to obtain leave from the Emperor Valens to settle in one of the Roman provinces. His decease is supposed to have taken place in the following year. He translated the "Gospels," and some other parts of the Scriptures, into the Gothic language.

ULPIAN, DOMITIUS, an eminent Roman civilian, was tutor to the Emperor Alexander Severus, who made him his secretary, and afterwards pratorian prefect. Having disoblged the soldiery by his reforms, Ulpian was murdered by them in 228. Some fragments of his works are extant.

UNDERHILL, JOHN, one of the earliest settlers of Massachusetts, was sent by Sir Henry Vane to command the troops at Saybrook in 1637. He was engaged in the expedition against the Pequots, and displayed great valor and enterprise. In 1641 he was elected governor of Exeter Dover. Removing to New York, he d. at Medford.

URFE, HONORIUS D', a French writer, was b. 1557, at Marsilles, distinguished himself as a soldier during the wars of the league, and as a negotiator at Turin and Venice, and d. in 1625. He is the author of the romance of "Astrea," which was once exceedingly popular in France, but is now completely forgotten.—His brother, the count de Lyon, wrote a volume of sonnets, with the title of "Diana."

USHER, JAMES, a divine and historian, was b. 1580, at Dublin, and was educated at Trinity college, in that city. In 1601, he took orders, in 1620 he was made bishop of Meath, and, in 1624, was raised to the archbishopric of Arnagh. The rebellion in Ireland drove him from his see, and deprived him of every thing but his library. To the cause of Charles I. he was warmly attached. He d. in 1656, at Ryegate, in Surrey. Usher is the author of many learned works, among which may be mentioned, "De Ecclesiarum Christianarum Successione et Statu," "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates," "Annals of the Old and New Testament," and "Chronologia Sacra.

V.

VADE, JOHN JOSEPH, a French writer of broad farces and songs, was b. 1720, at Ham, in Picardy. His career was cut short, in 1757, by the consequences of the dissipation in which he had spent his early youth. He was the first who introduced on the stage the coarse but emphatic slang language of the Parisian mob.

VAILLANT, JOHN FOI, a celebrated French numismatist, was b. 1632, at Beauvais, and was brought up as a physician. To the study of medals he was first led by a farmer bringing him some which he had found; and he pursued it eagerly and successfully. Employed by Colbert to collect medals for the king's cabinet, Vaillant made numerous visits to Italy, Sicily, and Greece. In one of his voyages, being pursued by an Algerine pirate, he swallowed twenty scarce gold medals, to save them from the pursuers. D. 1706.—SEBASTIAN, an eminent botanist, b. 1669, at Vigny, near Pontoise. Under his father, who was an organist, he when a child acquired a proficiency in music; but he quitted music for the study of surgery. The lectures of Tournefort, at Paris, revived Vaillant's early predilection for botany, and to that science he devoted himself. D. 1722.

VALCKENAER, LOUIS GASPAR, one of the most able of modern philologists and critics, was b. 1715, at Leenwarden, in Friesland, and studied at Franeker and Leyden, at which latter university he d. in 1785, professor of natural history, and of the Greek language and antiquities. Among his works are editions of various classical productions. His "Opuscula" were published in 1809.

VALDO, PETER, the founder of the sect called the Vandois, or Waldenses, was b. in the 12th century, at Vanx, in Dauphny, and acquired a considerable fortune as a merchant at Lyons. The sudden death of a friend produced such an effect upon his mind, that he distributed all his property to the poor, and began to translate the Bible, and explain it to them. He also taught that the laity had the same right as the clergy to preach and administer the sacraments. The general council of Lateran, in 1179, condemned his doctrines, and he and his followers were obliged to take refuge in the mountains of Dauphny and Piedmont, where, for a long period, they were brutally persecuted. A remnant of them still exists in Piedmont.

VALENS, FLAVIUS, a Roman emperor, the son of Gratian, count of Africa, was b. about 328, in Pannonia. In 364 he was admitted by his brother Valentinian to a share in the imperial authority, and he took the government of the East. After having defeated the Persians and Goths, he suffered the latter to settle in Lower Mœsia. They, however, revolted, and Valens was defeated by them, in 378, near Adrianople. A house, to which the wounded emperor was conveyed, was set on fire by the victors, and he perished in the flames.

VALENTINE, BASIL, an alchemist and chemist, of whose life little is recorded, is said to have been b. 1394, at Erfurth, and to have been a Benedictine monk. The properties of antimony were discovered by him. His "Curus Triumphalis Antimonii" has been translated into English.

VALENTINIAN I., FLAVIUS, a Roman emperor, the eldest son of Count Gratian, was b. in 321, in Pannonia; was chosen successor to Jovian, in 364; was victorious over the Alemanni and the Quadi, and d. 375.—II. FLAVIUS, the son of the foregoing, was b. in 371, succeeded to the empire in 375, with his brother Gratian, and had Italy for his portion; was dispossessed by Maximus, but was restored in 388, and was found dead in his palace in 392, supposed to have been strangled by some of his domestics.—III. FLAVIUS PLACIDUS, emperor of the West, was b. in 419, at Ravenna, and was assassinated in 455, in revenge for his having dishonored the patrician Maximus, by intriguing with his wife.

VALERIAN, PUBLIUS LICINIUS, a Roman emperor, was raised to the imperial dignity in 254. After having reigned seven years, he was defeated and taken prisoner, near Edessa, by Sapor, king of Persia. The imperial captive is said to have been treated with the utmost indignity by the victor, and to have been at length flayed alive.

VALERIUS MAXIMUS, a Roman historian, was b. in the reign of Augustus. After having served in Asia, under Sextus Pompey, he settled at Rome, and withdrew from public affairs that he might devote himself to literature. He is the author of a valuable work, "De Dictis Factisque Memorabilibus," which he dedicated to Tiberius; and which was one of the first books that was published after the invention of printing.

VALLA, LAURENCE, one of the most eminent philologists of the 15th century, who contributed greatly to the diffusion of classical literature, was b. in 1406, at Rome; was a celebrated professor at several Italian universities; was liberally patronized by Alphonso, king of Aragon and Naples; and d. in 1457. Valla was of a contentious disposition, and had several violent literary disputes with Poggio and others. His attack on the pretensions of the holy see exposed him to danger from the Inquisition. One of his principal works is "A Treatise on the Elegancies of the Latin Language."

VALLISNIERI, ANTHONY, an Italian naturalist, was b. 1661, at Tresilico, in the duchy of Modena; was appointed professor of practical medicine at Padua, in 1700; and d. in that city in 1780.

VALMIKI, the oldest and most celebrated of the epic poets of India, is the author of "Raymayana," which narrates the exploits of Rama against the giant Ravanna. He is said to have existed at a very remote period, and the stories which are told of him are manifestly fabulous. Two books of the Sanscrit text of the Ramayana, with a literal version, have been published by Carey and Marshman.

VALPERGA DI CALUSO, THOMAS DESCOMTES MASINO, an Italian mathematician and author, was b. in 1737, at Turin; was for a while in the Maltese naval service, and afterwards entered the church. Settling at Turin, he became professor of Greek and the oriental languages in the university, and president and director of one of the classes of the academy of sciences and literature. D. 1815.

VALPY, RICHARD, an eminent classical scholar, was a native of Jersey, and b. 1745, and completed his studies at Oxford, having been appointed to one of the scholarships founded in Pembroke college for the natives of Jersey and Guernsey. From Oxford he removed first to Bury St. Edmund's, and afterwards to Reading, where he had been unanimously elected headmaster of the school founded by Henry VII. D. 1836.—EDWARD, an eminent scholar, brother of the preceding, was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, and after having been assistant several years in the school at Reading, obtained the mastership of the grammar school at Norwich. He was rector of All Saints, Thwaite, and vicar of St. Mary, Walsham, Norfolk. He published "Elegantiæ Latinæ" and other classical works. D. 1832.

VALSALVA, ANTHONY MARIA, a celebrated Italian anatomist, was b. in 1666, at Imola, was professor of anatomy in the university of Bologna, and surgeon of the hospital of Incurables; and d. in 1723. Among the services which he rendered to surgery are the simplifying of many instruments, and the abolition of the practice of cauterizing the arteries of an amputated limb. He had several eminent pupils, among whom was Morgagni. His principal work is the "Anatomy of the Ear," which was the result of sixteen years' labor.

VALVASONE, ERASMUS DI, an Italian poet, was b. 1523, in Friuli; resided upon the lordship which belonged to him and bore his name; spent his time in literature and in hunting, and d. 1593.

VANBRUGH, Sir JOHN, a dramatist and architect, of whom it was said that, though he wanted grace he never wanted wit, was b. about 1672, in London. He was early in the army, but does not appear to have remained in it long. His first comedy "The Relapse," was produced in 1697. It was followed by the "Provoked Wife" and "Æsop." In 1707 he joined Betterton and Congreve in establishing the Haymarket theatre, on which occasion he brought out "The Confederacy." In 1704 he was appointed clarenceux king-at-arms, in 1714 he was knighted; and soon after, was made comptroller of the board of works and surveyor of Greenwich hospital. Though his licentiousness as a dramatist must be condemned, his talent is undeniable. As an architect much ridicule has been cast on him by ignorant or tasteless critics, but against such puny attacks the splendid piles of Blenheim and Castle Howard are alone sufficient to defend his fame. D. 1726.

VANCOUVER, GEORGE, a British navigator, was b. about 1750; entered early into the naval service; and served as midshipman under Captain Cook, in his second and third voyages. In 1790, he was appointed to command an expedition to explore the western coast of North America, to ascertain whether any communication by water exists between the Atlantic and the Pacific. On this service, which he performed skillfully, he was five years employed. He d. in 1798, when he had nearly completed for the press the account of his voyage.

VANDERVELDE, WILLIAM, called the Old, a celebrated painter, was b. in 1610, at Leyden, and was bred to the sea, but quitted it for painting. He was invited to England, with his son, by Charles II.; lived there many years, and d. in London in 1693. He excelled in marine subjects and battles; and was so anxious to be correct in his representations that he would sail, in a light vessel, close to the fleets while they were hotly engaged.—WILLIAM, called the Young, the son of the foregoing, was b. in 1633, at Amsterdam; accompanied his father to England, where his works became exceedingly popular, and d. in 1707. He surpassed even the elder Vandervelde in marine painting. Walpole denominates him the Raphael of this branch of art.—ADRIAN, an admirable landscape painter, was b. in 1639, at Amsterdam; was a pupil of Wynants; and d. 1672. Though landscape was the peculiar department of Adrian, yet he was no mean historical painter, and he drew figures with such excellence that his assistance was often sought for by his own master, and by Ruysdael, Hobbema and others.

VANDERWERF, ADRIAN, an eminent painter, was b. 1659, at Ambacht, near Rotterdam; was a pupil of Picolet and Vandermeer; was patronized by the Electoꝛ Palatine, for whom he executed many of his best works; and d. in 1718. His small history pieces are much esteemed.—His brother, PETER, who was b. at Rotterdam, in 1665, and d. in 1718, acquired fame as a painter of portraits and conversation pieces.

VANDYKE, SIR ANTHONY, one of the greatest of portrait painters, was b. March 22, 1598–9, at Antwerp, and was the son of a merchant. His mother distinguished herself as a flower painter. Henry Van Balens and Rubens were his tutors in the pictorial art; the latter, with whom he was a favorite, cultivated his talents with great care, and advised him to visit Italy. After having resided for some time at Rome, and other Italian cities, Vandyke returned to Antwerp, whence he passed over to England. Charles I. was a liberal patron to him. He knighted and pensioned him, and obtained for him in marriage the daughter of Lord Gowrie. D. 1641. His works are numerous, and are deservedly held in the highest estimation.

VANE, SIR HENRY, the younger, the son of Sir Henry Vaue, was b. 1612, and was educated at Westminster school and Magdalen hall, Oxford. Having imbibed the principles of the Puritans, he emigrated to America, and was elected governor of Massachusetts. Returning to England, he was chosen member for Hull, and, during the struggle between the king and the parliament, he took an active part on the side of the latter. He had, however, no part in the trial or death of Charles. To the authority of Cromwell he was steadily hostile, and after the death of the protector, he labored strenuously to establish a republican government. He was executed for high treason, in June, 1662, in violation of justice, and of the king's plighted word. Vane was a man of talent, and, though he was an enthusiast in religion and politics, there seems to be no valid reason to doubt his sincerity.

VANINI, LUCILIUS, a philosopher, was b. 1585, at Taurosano, in the kingdom of Naples; studied philosophy and theology at Rome: entered into the ecclesiastical state; travelled in various parts of Europe; and was at last burnt, in 1619, at Toulouse, on a charge of atheism, which appears to have been unfounded. He is the author of "Amphitheatrum Æternæ Providentiæ," "De Admirandis Naturæ," "Dialogues," and other works.

VANLOO, JOHN, a great painter, was b. at Aix, in Provence, in 1654. He became painter to the king of Sardinia, and realized a good fortune, which he lost in the Mississippi scheme. He then went to England, and was the fashionable portrait painter of the day. D. 1746.—CHARLES ANDREW, his brother, whose performances are to be found in the churches of Paris, was also a celebrated painter. D. 1765.

VAN SWIETEN, GERARD, an eminent physician, was b. 1700, at Leyden; studied at the university of that city, and of Louvain, and was a pupil of Boerhaave; became medical professor at Leyden, but lost his office in consequence of being a Catholic; and was invited to Vienna, in 1745, by the empress, who made him her principal physician, director-general of medicine in Austria, imperial librarian, a professor, and a baron. D. 1772.

VAN VITELLI, or VAN VITE, LOUIS, a celebrated architect, the son of a painter, was b. 1700, at Naples, and d. at Caserta, in 1773. Among his great and numerous works are, the palace of Caserta, the public buildings at the port of Ancona, and the churches of St. Francis and St. Dominic, at Urbino.

VAREN, or VARENIUS, BERNARD, a geographer, was b. about the beginning of the 17th century, at Amsterdam; followed the profession of a physician; and d. about 1680. He is the author of a well-executed "System of Geography," on which Newton did not disdain to comment; and "A Description of Japan and Siam."

VARGAS Y PONCE, DON JOSEPH, a Spanish geographer and navigator, was b. about 1755, at Cadiz or Seville; assisted Tofino in forming the "Atlas of the Spanish Coast;" and d. in 1821, at Madrid, a member of the cortes. He wrote, among other works, "A Description of the Pityusæ and Balearic Isles," and "A Relation of the last Voyage in the Straits of Magellan."

VARRO, MARCUS TERENTIUS, who is regarded as the most learned of the ancient Romans, was b. 116 B. C.; studied philosophy under Stilo and Antiochus of Ascalon; filled the offices of triumvir and tribune of the people; espoused the cause of Pompey, but afterwards became the friend of Cæsar, who confided to him the formation of a public library: narrowly escaped proscription by the triumvirate; and d. 27 B. C. He is said to have written between four and five hundred volumes, of which only a "Treatise on Agriculture," part of a "Treatise on the Latin Language," and some fragments, are extant.

VASARI, GEORGE, a Florentine artist and author, was b. 1512, at Arezzo; studied under Michael Angelo and other great masters; acquired a profound knowledge of architecture as well as of painting; was employed by Cosmo I. to superintend the public buildings which he erected; and d. 1574. As a painter he has merit, but he is best known by his valuable work, "The Lives of the most excellent Painters, Sculptors, and Architects."

VATER, JOHN SEVERINUS, an eminent philologist, was b. 1771, at Altenburg, in Saxony; and d. 1826, professor of the oriental languages at Halle, after having filled the theological chair at Königsberg. He is the author of various works on the Eastern tongues; the "Continuation of Adelung's Mithridates," "Synchronistic Tables of Ecclesiastical History," and a "Universal and Chronological History of the Christian Church."

VATTEL, EMMERICK, a celebrated Swiss publicist, was b. 1714, at Courret, in the principality of Neuchâtel; became envoy from Saxony to Berne, and afterwards privy councillor to Augustus III. of Saxony; and d. 1767. The work on which his fame rests is, "The Law of Nations, or Principles of Natural Law applied to the Conduct and Affairs of Nations and Sovereigns."

VAUBAN, SEBASTIAN LE PRESTRE DE, a French marshal, the greatest of military engineers, was b. 1633, at Saint Leger de Fouchret, in Burgundy. He first served in the Spanish army, under Condé, but, being taken prisoner by the French troops, Mazarin gave him a lieutenancy. The sieges of Ypres, Grave-lines, and Oudenarde, in 1658, were his first essays in the science of attack. From that period till the peace of Ryswick he was incessantly employed, either in erecting fortresses for the defence of France, or in reducing those which belonged to her enemies; and in both cases his matchless skill was equally displayed. In 1703 he reluctantly accepted the marshal's staff. The siege of Brisach was his last operation. D. 1707.

VAUCANSON, JAMES DE, an eminent mechanist, was b. 1709, at Grenoble, and d. 1782. Among his automatical performances were a flute player, and a pipe and tabor player. But even these were surpassed by two ducks, which dabbled with their beaks, ate grain, and voided it after it had undergone a sort of digestive process.

VAUGHAN, HENRY, a poet, b. 1621, at Newton, in Brecknockshire. He adopted the appellation of the Silurist, wrote a variety of poems, chiefly devotional, and d. 1695.—THOMAS, his brother, was an alchemist, on which occult subjects he wrote some extravagant books, under the name of Eugenius Philalethes. D. 1666.—SIR JOHN, a celebrated lawyer, was b. in Cardiganshire, 1608. From Christ-church college, Oxford, he removed to the Inner Temple, where he contracted an intimacy with Selden, who made him one of his executors. During the civil war he lived in retirement, but, in 1668, he was made chief justice of the common pleas. D. 1674.—SIR JOHN, one of the judges of the court of common pleas. He was called to the bar in his twenty-fourth year, and in seven years more had so greatly distinguished himself that he was made a sergeant. He gained this rank at this unusually early age, it must be remembered, while Sheperd, Best, and Lens were in the zenith of their powers and reputation; and he maintained his position subsequently with such opponents as Copley, (afterwards Lord Lyndhurst,) Wilde, and Denman. He was made a baron of the exchequer in 1827, and, in 1834, he became judge of the common pleas and a privy councillor. In private he was as amiable as in public he was able. B. 1772; d. 1839.—WILLIAM, an ingenious Welsh poet, was b. in Caermarthenshire, 1577; and was the author of a variety of miscellaneous poems, the principal of which are, "De Sphærarum Ordine," "The Golden Grove Moralized," "The Golden Fleece," &c. D. 1640.—GEORGE, a graduate of Harvard college in 1696, was the son of Major William Vaughan, a wealthy merchant of Portsmouth, N. H., who was noted for his public spirit, and for the firmness with which he resisted the claims of the proprietors of that territory. After leaving college he became the agent of the colony in England, and, in 1715, he succeeded Usher, as lieutenant-governor of it. But giving offence to the governor, the council, and the assembly, he was removed from office in 1717. D. 1724.

VAUVENARGUES, LUKE DE CLAIPIERS, marquis of, an eminent French writer on moral philosophy, was b. 1715, at Aix, in Provence, and entered the army at the age of seventeen. The fatigue which he endured in the retreat from Prague, undermined his constitution, and the small-pox completed the ruin of his health. To soothe his continual sufferings he resorted to meditation and composition. Voltaire was one of his warmest friends. The works of Vauvenargues form three volumes, and consist of Thoughts, Reflections, and Maxims, Dialogues, Characters, &c. D. 1747.

VAUVILLIERS, JOHN FRANCIS, an eminent hellenist, was b. 1737, at Paris; succeeded his father as Greek professor at the university of that city, and d. in 1801, in Russia, in which country he had taken refuge, after being condemned to transportation, as a royalist, in 1797.

VEGA, LOPEZ DE LA, a celebrated Spanish poet, was b. at Madrid, in 1562. After studying at Alcala, he entered into the service of the duke of Alva, at whose instance he wrote the heroic pastoral of "Arcadia." Soon after this he married; but, on the loss of his wife, he embarked in the Armada, prepared for the invasion of England. In this voyage he wrote a poem, called "Hermosura de Angelica," to which, when published, he added the "Dragontea," an invective against Drake and Queen Elizabeth. In 1590 he married a second time, and again became a widower, on which he entered the order of St. Francis. He still, however, cultivated poetry, and scarcely a week passed without seeing a drama from his prolific muse. Honors and wealth flowed in upon him, and he was absolutely idolized by the whole nation. At his death, which happened in 1635, the highest honors were paid to his remains, and all the poets of the age vied in encomiastic tributes to his memory.

VELASQUEZ, JAMES RODERICK DE SILVA Y, a celebrated Spanish painter, was b. 1599, at Seville; was a pupil of Herrera the Elder and Pacheco; was patronized and highly esteemed by Philip III. and IV.; and d. in 1660. Among his greatest works are, "The Expulsion of the Moors," "The Crucifixion," "Joseph's Coat," and several portraits.

VELDE, CHARLES FRANCIS, VAN DER, a romance writer, who has been called the German Sir Walter Scott, was b. at Breslau, 1799. He began his career in 1809, by writing short pieces for the journals; was afterwards a dramatist, in which he was not successful, and, lastly, became a popular novelist. His works form eighteen volumes. Among them are, "Arwed Gyllenstierna," "The Patricians," "The Anabaptists," "The Hussites," "Christina and her Court," and Tales and Legends. D. 1824.

VENDOME, LOUIS JOSEPH, duke of a great general, and a profligate man, the grandson of Henry IV., was b. 1654, and made his first campaign in 1672, at the invasion of Holland. After having distinguished himself in Flanders and Italy, he was, in 1695, appointed to command the army in Catalonia, where he reduced Barcelona with extraordinary celerity. From Italy, where, in the war of the succession, he was opposed to Prince Eugene, he was recalled, in 1708, to remedy the disasters which the incapacity of Villeroi had occasioned in the Netherlands. He failed, however, to accomplish this, and was defeated at Oudenarde. In 1709 he was sent to Spain, where he gained the decisive victory of Villa Viciosa, and established Philip on the throne. He d. suddenly in 1712. Vendome possessed abilities, but he was dirty in his habits, and depraved in his morals.

VENTURI, JOHN BAPTIST, an Italian natural philosopher, was b. 1746, at Bibiano, in the duchy of Reggio; was successively professor of metaphysics and geometry at Reggio, engineer and professor of philosophy at Modena, member of the legislative body of the Cisalpine republic, professor of physics at Pavia, and envoy from the kingdom of Italy to Berne. Napoleon gave him the cross of the legion of honor and of the iron crown. Among his works are, "Commentaries on the History and Theory of Optics," "On the Origin and Progress of Artillery," and "An Essay on the Physico-Mathematical Works of Leonardo da Vinci." D. 1822.

VERNET, CLAUDIUS JOSEPH, an eminent French painter, was b. in 1714, at Avignon, and at the age of eighteen he visited Rome, where he studied under Fergioni. His voyage to Italy turned his genius to marine painting, in which he acquired almost unrivalled reputation. After an absence of twenty-two years he returned to France. On his homeward passage a storm arose, during which he ordered himself to be tied to the mast, that he might make a faithful sketch of the scene. On his return he was employed by Louis XV. to delineate the principal ports, a task which occupied him for ten years. His descendants have inherited his talents as an artist. D. 1789.

VERNON, EDWARD, a British admiral, descended from a Staffordshire family, was b. in 1684, at Westminster, and chose the naval profession, in opposition to the wishes of his father, who was secretary of state to William III. After having served under Hopson, Rooke, and other commanders, he rose, in 1739, to the rank of vice-admiral of the blue. In that year he took the town of Porto Bello, and destroyed the fortifications. He was less fortunate in 1741, when, in conjunction with Wentworth, he failed at Carthagena. D. 1759.

VERRÓCHIO, ANDREW, a sculptor, was b. 1422, at Florence, and d. in 1488. In bronze works he surpassed all his cotemporaries. Among his chief productions are, a "Christ and St. Thomas," and an equestrian statue of Bartholomew Colleoni. He was also an able painter, and one of the best musicians of his period. He invented the method of taking the features in a plaster mould.

VERTUE, GEORGE, an able engraver, was b. 1684, in Westminster; was apprenticed to a plate engraver, and afterwards worked for seven years under Vandergucht. In 1709 he began business for himself. He was patronized by Sir Godfrey Kneller, the earls of Oxford and Burlington, and the prince of Wales. Among his engravings, which amount to five hundred, are the heads for Rapin's "England," twelve heads of distinguished poets, and portraits of Archbishop Tillotson and George I. It was principally from the materials collected by Vertue, that Horace Walpole drew his "Anecdotes of Painting." D. 1756.

VESALIUS, ANDREW, an eminent anatomist, was b. in 1514, at Brussels; was educated at Louvain and Paris, was professor of anatomy at various Italian universities; and afterwards chief physician to Charles V. and Philip II.; and d. of hunger and fatigue, in 1563, in Zante, on which island he had been shipwrecked as he was returning from a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. Vesalius displayed an extraordinary predilection for the science of anatomy at a very early period, and his treatise on "The Formation of the Human Body" was composed when he was only eighteen.

VESPASIAN, TITUS FLAVIUS, a Roman emperor, was b. at Rieti, towards the close of the reign of Augustus; and, after having been ædile, prætor, commander of a legion, consul, and proconsul of Africa, and having distinguished himself in Germany, Britain, and Palestine, was raised to the empire, 69. He reigned 10 years, and d. 79.

VESPUCCI, or VESPUCIUS, AMERIGO, an eminent navigator, was b. in 1451, at Florence; was liberally educated, and was brought up to commerce.

In 1490 he was sent by his father to conduct his commercial affairs in Spain. Stimulated, however, by the honor which Columbus had acquired, Vespucci quitted traffic, about 1499, to enter on the career of discovery. He subsequently made several voyages in the Spanish and Portuguese services, and explored a considerable extent of the South American coast. He d. in 1516. By an act of flagrant injustice to Columbus, the name of one who was only his imitator was given to the new world.

VICCARS, JOHN, a fanatical writer during the commonwealth, was b. in London, in 1582, and educated at Oxford. His tirades against church and king have the following quaint titles: "God's Ark overtopping the World's Waves," "The Burning Bush not consumed," and "God in the Mount," which were afterwards published together, under the general title of the "Parliamentary Chronicle." His rhapsodies were satirically alluded to by the author of "Hudibras."

VICENTE, GIL, the earliest and most eminent of the Portuguese comic poets, was b. about 1480, at Guimaraens, or at Barcellos; studied jurisprudence at the university of Lisbon; became a popular dramatist, and brought the drama of his country to a much more perfect state, and d. in 1577. His works were published by his son; but complete copies of them are now unattainable.

VICQ D'AZYR, FELIX, an able French anatomist and physician, was b. 1748, at Valogne, and lectured at Paris with great success upon anatomy; became principal physician to the queen. Among his works are "A Treatise on Anatomy and Physiology," "An Anatomical System of Quadrupeds," and "A Treatise on the Curing of Horned Cattle." The whole of his productions have been collected in six volumes. D. 1794.

VIDA, MARK JEROME, one of the most eminent of modern Latin poets, was b. 1490, at Cremona; studied at Padua, Bologna, and Mantua; was raised to the bishopric of Alba by Clement VII. as a reward for having written "The Christiad," and d. 1566. His works form two quarto volumes. Among them are "The Art of Poetry," "Chess," "The Christiad," "The Silkworm," "Hymns," and other poems.

VIEN, JOSEPH MARY, an eminent French painter, was b. 1716, at Montpeller; studied at Paris, under Natoire, and at Rome; was received a member of the Academy, in 1745, and became successively professor, rector, and director; and d. in 1809. Among his best works are, "St. Denis preaching," a "Sleeping Hermit," "The Parting of Hector and Andromache," and "Hector exhorting Paris to arm himself." David and Vincent were pupils of Vien.—MARIA, his wife, who d. 1805, aged seventy-seven, was an excellent painter of birds, shells, and flowers.

VIGEE, LOUIS WILLIAM BERNARD STEPHEN, a French poet and dramatist, was b. 1755, at Paris, and d. in 1820, reader to Louis XVIII. He is the author of many poems, a "Course of Literature," delivered at the Athenæum, three comedies, and the "Pro and Con," a religious, moral, political, and literary dialogue.

VIGNOLA, JAMES, whose real name was BAROZZIO, a celebrated architect, was b. 1507, at Vignola, in the Modenese territory, and relinquished painting for architecture. He constructed various magnificent edifices at Bologna, Parma, Perugia, and Rome; but his masterpiece is the Caprarola palace, and he was intrusted with the management of the works at St. Peter's after the death of Michael Angelo. For the king of Spain he drew the designs of the Escorial; and in this instance his plans were preferred to those of twenty-two other artists. D. 1578.

VILLANI, JOHN, a celebrated Italian historian, was b. before the close of the 13th century, at Florence, travelled on various parts of the Continent; filled several important offices in his native country, and d. of the plague in 1348. His "History of Florence" was continued by his brother MATTHEW and his nephew PHILIP, the latter of whom is also the author of "Lives of Illustrious Florentines."

VILLARET, CLAUDIUS, a French historian, was b. about 1715, at Paris, and was brought up to the bar, but quitted it for literature, and then went upon the stage, on which he remained till 1756. He subsequently obtained a place in the chamber of accounts, and was intrusted with the arrangement of the archives of that office—a task which led him to examine into the sources of French history. In consequence of this, he was employed to continue the work of Velly, and he is allowed to have surpassed his predecessor. His portion of the "History" extends from 1329 to 1469. His other productions are forgotten. D. 1766.

VILLARS, LOUIS HECTOR, marshal,

duke of, one of the most eminent of the French generals, was b. in 1653, at Moulins. He served his apprenticeship to the art of war under Turenne, Condé, Luxembourg, and Crequi. Soon after the peace of Nimeguen, he was sent ambassador to Vienna. In the war which was terminated by the treaty of Ryswick, he distinguished himself, and particularly at the combat of Leuze. In 1699 he was again appointed ambassador at Vienna, and in this situation he displayed infinite diplomatic skill. During the war of the succession he was commander-in-chief in various quarters, and by numerous splendid achievements acquired a right to be considered as one of the greatest generals of the age. He closed, in 1732, his military career, by the conquest of the Milanese and the Mantuan. D. 1734.—MONTEAUCON DE, a French abbé, was b. 1635, in the neighborhood of Toulouse; and acquired great reputation at Paris as a preacher, but was prohibited from preaching in consequence of his publishing "The Count de Gabalis," which his enemies pretended to be an irreligious work. He was assassinated in 1675. The idea of the sylphid machinery of the "Rape of the Lock" is borrowed from the "Count de Gabalis."

VILLEHARDOUIN, GEOFFREY DE, a French chronicler, was b. in 1167, near Arcis sur Anbe; held the office of marshal of Champagne; took a part in the crusade of 1198, and was present at the capture of Constantinople; was appointed marshal of Romania, and d. about 1218. He wrote a "History of the Events from 1198 to 1207."

VILLERS, CHARLES FRANCIS DOMINIC, a French writer, was b. in 1767, at Boulay, in Lorraine; served as a captain of artillery, but emigrated in 1792, and joined the army of Condé; subsequently abandoned military for literary pursuits, settled in Germany, and became professor of French literature at Gottingen; and d. 1815. His principal work is "An Essay on the Spirit and Influence of the Reformation brought about by Luther."

VINCENT, WILLIAM, an able critic and divine, was b. 1739, in London, was educated at Westminster school, and at Trinity college, Cambridge, was successively usher, second master, and head master, of the former seminary, and prebend and dean of Westminster, and d. in 1815. His principal works are, "The Commerce and Navigation of the Ancients in the Indian Ocean,"

"Sermons," "The Conjugation of the Greek Verb," and "A Defence of Public Education."

VINCI, LEONARDO DA, a celebrated Italian painter, the natural son of a notary, was b. in 1452, at a castle near Florence, whence he derived his name. To the personal gifts which he received from nature were joined the advantages of an excellent education, and he early acquired an extensive knowledge of mathematics and other branches of science. Verocchio was his preceptor in painting, and Da Vinci soon surpassed him. In 1489 he was invited to Milan, by Duke Louis Sforza, and he resided there for many years, acting at once as engineer, mechanist, sculptor, architect, and painter. During the period of his abode there he executed his great work, the "Last Supper," and formed the canal of Martesana. He was subsequently employed at Florence and at Rome. In 1515 he accepted an invitation from Francis I. to visit France, and he d. in that country in 1519. The story that he expired in the arms of Francis appears to be a fiction. Da Vinci is the author of a "Treatise on Painting," and of some unpublished works.

VINER, CHARLES, an English law writer, was b. about 1680, at Aldershot, in Hampshire, spent a considerable part of his life in compiling the well-known "General Abridgment of Law and Equity," endowed several fellowships and scholarships, and founded the law professorship, at Oxford. D. 1756.

VIRGIL, or PUBLIUS VIRGILIUS MARO, the greatest of the Roman poets, was b. 70 B. C., at Andes, near Mantua, and studied at Cremona, Milan, and Naples. It appears to have been in his 30th year that he first visited Rome. His object was, to obtain restitution of his lands, of which the soldiers of Octavius had taken possession after the battle of Philippi. Through the interest of Varus and Pollio he obtained from Augustus the desired order; but, when he returned with it, the military usurper compelled him to save his life by swimming over the Mincio. A second mandate, however, had the wished-for effect. The rest of his life was devoted to literature, and was cheered by the friendship of Augustus, Mæcenas, and all the other eminent men of the age. The fame which he acquired by his "Eclogues," and "The Georgics," he crowned by "The Æneid," to which last work, however, he did not live to put the finishing touches. On his return from meeting Augustus, at Athens, he d. at Brundisium, 19 B. C.

VISCONTI, JOHN BAPTIST ANTHONY, a learned Italian antiquary, was b. 1722, at Vernazza, in the Genoese territory; was educated at Rome, succeeded Winckelman as commissary of antiquities there, had a large share in the formation of the Pio-Clementine museum, and d. in 1784.—ENNIVS QUIRINUS, the eldest son of the foregoing, and more than his equal in archaeological knowledge, was b. 1751, at Rome, displayed uncommon precocity of talent, was appointed conservator of the museum of the capitol by Pius VI., was minister of the home department, and subsequently one of the consuls, of the short-lived Roman republic, was in consequence compelled to seek an asylum in France, and became there a member of the institute, professor of archæology, and administrator of the museum. Among his numerous works are, "The Description of the Pio-Clementine Museum," "Grecian Iconography," and "Roman Iconography." D. 1818.

VITELLIUS, AULUS, one of the most contemptible of the Roman emperors, was b. 15, at Rome, rose to greatness by being subservient to the vices of his imperial masters, was at the head of the legions in Lower Germany when Galba died, was raised to the throne by his soldiers, and obtained full possession of it on the fall of Otho; and was put to death, A. D. 69, after a disgraceful reign of only eight months. His inordinate gluttony was his least vice.

VITRUVIUS POLLIO, MARCUS, a celebrated Roman writer on architecture, is supposed to have been b. at Formai, in Campania, to have flourished under Julius Cæsar and Augustus, and to have lived to a very advanced age. He wrote an able work, on "Architecture."

VOITURE, VINCENT, a French wit and poet, was the son of a wine merchant, and was b. in 1598, at Amiens. His manners and talents conciliated to him the kindness of the great, and he became a favorite at the hotel de Rambouillet and at court. Gaston, duke of Orleans, was much attached to him, and made him his master of the ceremonies. Under the administration of Cardinal Mazarin, Voiture was in the zenith of his reputation, and enjoyed large pensions, but women and gambling kept him poor. In private life his character was amiable. His best poem is an "Epistle to the Prince of Condé." His "Letters," which were once considered as inimitable, are now almost wholly neglected.

VOLNEY, CONSTANTINE FRANCIS CHASSEBOEUF, count de, an eminent French writer, was b. in 1757, at Craon, in Britany. He was educated at Angers, and for three years studied medicine at Paris, but coming into possession of a small estate he was enabled to indulge his ardent desire of travelling. He spent three years in Syria and Egypt, and on his return published, in 1787, his "Travels," which established his reputation. He was elected a member of the states-general, was confined for ten months during the reign of terror, was appointed professor of history at the Normal school in 1794, and in 1795 made a voyage to the United States, whence he did not return till 1798. Napoleon created him a senator and a count. In all circumstances, however, Volney was a friend of freedom. Among his principal works are, "The Ruins," "Lectures on History," and "New Researches on Ancient History." D. 1820.

VOLTA, ALEXANDER, a celebrated experimental philosopher, who contributed largely to the progress of science, was of a noble family, and was b. 1745, at Como; was for 30 years professor of natural philosophy at Pavia; was made an Italian count and senator by Napoleon; and was a member of many learned bodies. Electricity was the first object to which Volta turned his attention; and he invented the perpetual electrophorus and the condenser. But the great invention which immortalizes his name is the Voltaic pile, to which we are indebted for so many important philosophical and chemical discoveries. D. 1826.

VOLTAIRE, MARIE FRANCIS AROUET DE, the most universal of French writers, was b. Feb. 20, 1694, at Chatenay, near Sceaux, and was educated with great care at the Jesuits' college, Paris. One of his tutors predicted that he would be the Coryphæus of deism in France; and the society which the youthful poet frequented—elegant, but irreligious—did not tend to falsify the prediction. His father destined him for the magistracy, but the literary propensity of the son was unconquerable. In his 22d year he was sent to the Bastille, by the regent, on the unfounded suspicion of his being the author of a libel, and while he was in prison he formed the plan of "The Henriade," and completed the tragedy of "Œdipus." The tragedy was represented in 1718 with distinguished success. Two others, by which it was succeeded, were less fortunate. A second unjust confinement in the Bastille induced him to take up his residence in England for three years, where he was favorably received by many illustrious characters, and obtained a large subscription for "The Henriade." In 1728 he returned to France, and between that year and 1749 he produced his tragedies of "Zara," "Afzira," "Mahomet," "Merope," and many other works; was admitted into the French Academy; and was appointed gentleman of the king's chamber in ordinary, and historiographer of France. In 1750 he accepted the invitation of the king of Prussia to Berlin. For a while the sovereign and the poet were on the most amicable terms; but in 1753 their friendship was broken, and Voltaire quitted the Prussian dominions. Paris, in consequence of the intrigues of his enemies, being no longer an eligible abode for him, he lived for short periods at Geneva and other places, and at length purchased an estate at Ferney, in the Pays de Gex, on which he finally settled. There, in possession of a large fortune, and surrounded by friends, he gave free scope to his indefatigable pen. In April, 1778, he went once more to Paris, after an absence of nearly 30 years. He was received with enthusiasm, his bust was crowned on the stage, and was placed by the Academicians next to that of Corneille; but he did not long enjoy these honors, for he expired on the 30th of May, and his death is supposed to have been hastened by an overdose of laudanum, which he took to calm the pain occasioned by strangury, and to procure sleep, of which he had long been deprived. His collected works, in the edition of Beaumarchais, form 70 volumes. "He was," says a French author "one of our greatest poets; the most brilliant, the most elegant, the most fertile, of our prose writers. There is not, in the literature of any country, either in verse or in prose, an author who has written on so many opposite kinds of subjects, and has so constantly displayed a superiority in all of them."

VONDEL, JUSTUS VANDEN, a Dutch poet, was b. 1587, at Cologne, but his parents settled in Holland while he was a child. He was by trade a hosier, but he left business almost wholly to his wife, that he might cultivate poetry, and at length he obtained an office under government. D. 1697.

VOSS, JOHN HENRY, a German poet and critic, was b. in 1751, at Sommersdorf, and was educated at Gottingen. In 1775 he began to edit the "Almanac of the Muses," and he conducted it till 1800. He was appointed rector of the college of Ottendorf, in 1778, whence he was removed to fill the same office at Eutin. At the latter place he remained for 23 years. The grand-duke of Baden invited him, in 1705, to Heidelberg. Voss wrote "Luisa," a poem, "Idylls," "Miscellaneous Poems," "Letters on Mythology," and other works; and translated Homer, Hesiod, Theocritus, Virgil, Horace, and several other Greek and Roman poets. D. 1826.

VOSSIUS, GERARD JOHN, an eminent critic and philologist, was b. in 1577, near Heidelberg; studied at Dort and Leyden; was removed from the professorship of rhetoric and chronology at Leyden, in consequence of his favoring the remonstrants; obtained a prebend in Canterbury cathedral, through the influence of Laud, with a dispensation from residence in England; and d. 1638, professor of history at Amsterdam.—ISAAC, son of the foregoing, was b. 1618, at Leyden, and acquired reputation by publishing, at the age of 21, an edition of the "Periplus of Scylax," with a Latin version and notes. After having remained some time at Stockholm, to which capital he was invited by Christina, and subsequently in his own country, he settled in England, in 1670, and was made canon of Windsor. D. in 1688.

VOUET, SIMON, a French painter, was b. 1582, at Paris; learned the rudiments of art from his father, who was also a painter; resided for several years in Italy; was recalled by Louis XIII., who employed him in the Louvre and Luxembourg palaces; and d. 1649. Lebrun, Le Sueur, Mignard, and other eminent artists, were his pupils.

W.

WADHAM, NICHOLAS, the founder of the college which bears his name at Oxford, was b. about 1536, in Somersetshire, and was educated at Christ-church college. D. 1610.

WAGHORN, THOMAS, whose name will be for ever associated with the achievement of steam communication between England and India, was b. at Chatham, 1800. At 12 years of age he was appointed a midshipman, and before he had completed his 17th year he passed in navigation for lieutenant. After a short cruise he volunteered for the Arracan war, and having received the command of the East India Company's cutter, Matchless, and seen much service by land and sea, he returned to Calcutta in 1827. From this period he turned his attention to the great project he had had long secretly at heart—a steam communication between England and India; and the ardor, perseverance, and firmness with which he worked it to completion, have gained him a name among the benefactors of his race. D. 1850.

WAILLY, CHARLES DE, an eminent architect, was b. 1729, at Paris; studied his art under Blondel, Lejay, and Servandoni, and at Rome; was a member of the Institute, and the founder of the society of the Friends of the Arts. His principal works are, the Spinola palace at Genoa, the mansion of Ormes in Touraine, and the hotel of Argenson, and the Odeon, at Paris. The Odeon was the joint production of Wailly and Peyre. D. 1798.

WAKE, WILLIAM, a learned and pious prelate, was b. 1627, at Blanford, in Dorsetshire, and was educated at Christ-church, Oxford. After leaving college, he was successively chaplain to the British embassy at Paris, preacher at Gray's Inn, king's chaplain to William III., and deputy clerk of the closet, rector of St. James's, Westminster, and dean of Exeter. He also distinguished himself as a controversialist against the Catholics, particularly in reply to Bossuet, and had the rare merit of controverting without acrimony. In 1705 he was raised to the sec of Lincoln, whence in 1716 he was translated to Canterbury. D. 1737.

WAKEFIELD, GILBERT, a scholar and critic, was b. 1756, at Nottingham, and was educated at Jesus college, Oxford. After having been a curate at Stockport, and also near Liverpool, he quitted the church, and became classical tutor at the Warrington dissenting academy. In 1790 he was appointed to the same office in Hackney college, but held it only a year. Being a warm friend to the French revolution, and as warmly hostile to the war against the republic, he took a decided part in the angry politics of that disturbed period. In 1798 he was prosecuted for a "Reply to the Bishop of Llandaff's Address to the People of Great Britain," and was sentenced to an imprisonment of two years in Dorchester jail. During his captivity a subscription amounting to £5000 was raised for him. D. 1801, soon after his liberation. Among his works are, his own "Memoirs," a translation of the "New Testament," "Silva Critica," a "Reply to Paine's Age of Reason," and editions of various classics, and of Pope's Homer.—PRISCILLA, well known by the many ingenious works which she wrote to promote juvenile improvement. She was the original promoter of banks for the savings of the poor, which are now become so general. She resided for many years at Tottenham, in Middlesex. D. at Ipswich, 1832.

WALKER, CLEMENT, a political writer of the 17th century, was b. at Cliffe, in Dorsetshire; was educated at Christchurch, Oxford; and became M. P. for Wells. Being a zealous Presbyterian, he was violently hostile to the Independents, against whom he published, in 1648, "A History of Independency." He also attacked the protector in a treatise called "Cromwell's Slaughter House." He was committed to the Tower, and d. there in 1651.—ADAM, an astronomical lecturer and miscellaneous writer, was b. 1731, in Westmoreland, and very early displayed a turn for mechanics. While following his father's business of a woollen manufacturer, he used to amuse himself with making models of mills. He was, in succession, an usher, a mathematical teacher, a tradesman, and the master of an academy; and at last became, and continued through life, a highly popular lecturer on astronomy. Among his works are, "A System of Familiar Philosophy," "Lectures on Experimental Philosophy," "A Treatise on Geography," and two "Tours." D. 1821.—JOHN, a lexicographer, was b. in 1732, at Friern Barnet, in Hertfordshire; was, at first, master of an academy, and, subsequently, a lecturer on elocution; and d. 1807. His principal works are, "A Pronouncing Dictionary," a "Rhyming Dictionary," "Elements of Elocution," and a "Rhetorical Grammar."—JOHN, a physician and geographical writer, was b. 1759, at Cokermonth, and d. 1830. This singular character passed through the various occupations of engraver, smith, one of the crew of a privateer, schoolmaster, and medical practitioner. In the latter capacity he contributed greatly to diffuse vaccination, and at the time of his decease he was at the head of the Vaccine institution. He published a "Gazetteer" and "Atlas."

WALLACE, Sir WILLIAM, a Scottish patriot and hero, the younger son of Sir Malcolm Wallace of Ellerslie, in Renfrewshire, was b. 1276. Indignant at seeing his country enslaved by Edward I. he resolved to undertake its liberation. His success at the head of a small band of followers induced many of the barons to join him, and he gained a splendid victory over Earl Warenne, at Cambuskenneth. He was appointed regent, but his elevation having excited jealousy among the nobles, he resigned the office. The defeat of the Scots, at Falkirk, compelled Wallace to resort to his original system of predatory warfare, and for seven years he continued to harass the invaders; but, in 1305, he was betrayed into the hands of Edward by Sir John Monteith, and the monarch stained his character by executing his captive as a traitor.

WALLENSTEIN, ALBERT VENCESLAUS EUSEBIUS, duke of Friedland, a celebrated German general, was b. 1583, in Bohemia, and began life as page to the margrave of Burgau, son of the Archduke Ferdinand. After having travelled over nearly the whole of Europe, he married a widow possessed of immense riches, who left him a widower at the end of four years. At the head of a formidable army raised by him for the service of the emperor, and paid from his own resources and from unlimited plunder, he, for several years, distinguished himself by his successes in Moravia, Bohemia, and Northern Germany, and was rewarded with the dukedoms of Mecklenburgh and Friedland. His enemies at length succeeded in procuring his dismissal, and he retired to Prague, where he lived with all the state of a sovereign. The progress of Gustavus Adolphus compelled the emperor, in 1632, to place Wallenstein again in command of his forces, with almost regal authority. He foiled Gustavus at Nuremberg, but was defeated at Leipsic. At length he was accused of treason, and his commission was revoked; and, while he was meditating projects of revenge, he was assassinated, in 1634, by some of his own officers.

WALLER, Sir WILLIAM, an eminent parliamentary general, was b. in 1597 in Kent, and was educated at Magdalen college and Hart hall, Oxford. On his returning from serving as a volunteer in Germany, against the emperor, he was elected for Andover as a member of the long parliament. He opposed the court, and, on the breaking out of the war, was made second in command under the earl of Essex. He fought chiefly in the west of England, and with varied fortune. The self-denying ordinance excluded him from service, and he became so much an object of suspicion to the republicans, that he was twice imprisoned. D. 1688.—EDMUND, an elegant poet, was b. in 1603, at Coleshill, in Warwickshire, and was educated at Eton, and at King's college, Cambridge. In his 16th or 17th year he sat in parliament, and in his 18th he began to display his poetical talents. His already large fortune he increased by a marriage with a rich heiress, who soon left him a widower, and he then unsuccessfully paid court to Lady Dorothea Sidney, the Sacharissa of his verses. In the long parliament he was a moderate opponent of the court, and he was one of the commissioners appointed to treat with the king at Oxford. He was either already a secret royalist, or was converted by his intercourse with the monarch; for, soon after his visit to Oxford, he entered into a conspiracy against the house of commons. It was discovered; but Waller saved his life, though at the expense of such cowardice, treachery, and cunning, as thoroughly disgraced him. He was fined ten thousand pounds, and banished. Cromwell, however, permitted him to return, and treated him with favor; and the gratitude of the poet was displayed by a splendid panegyric, and, subsequently, by the less questionable tribute of an elegy on the death of the protector. During the reigns of Charles II. and James II. he was highly distinguished at court, and was generally admired for his abilities and his wit. D. 1687.

WALLIS, JOHN, an eminent mathematician and divine, was b. in 1616, at Ashford, in Kent; was educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge; obtained, in 1643, the living of St. Gabriel, Fenchurch-street; was chosen, in 1649, Savilian professor of geometry at Oxford; was made keeper of the archives there, in 1658; retained his offices at the restoration, and was appointed one of the royal chaplains; was one of the earliest members of the Royal Society; and d.

1703. Wallis had consummate skill in the art of deciphering, and his talents were much called into use by the republican and succeeding regal governments. He was also one of the first who gave the power of speech to the deaf and dumb. As a mathematician his fame stands high both in England and on the Continent. His mathematical works form three volumes, and his theological a fourth.

WALIN, ROBERT, a miscellaneous writer, was b. in Philadelphia, and was liberally educated, but adopted no profession. He was the author of "The Hermit in Philadelphia," a satire; "The American Bards," a satire; "Sisyphi Opus, or Touches at the Times," a "History of China," some of the lives in the "Biography of the Signers of the Declaration of Independence," a "Life of Lafayette," and an account of the "Quaker Hospital, at Frankfort, near Philadelphia." D. 1824.

WALPOLE, ROBERT, earl of Orford, a statesman, was b. 1676, at Houghton, his father's seat, in Norfolk, and was educated at Eton, and at King's college, Cambridge. He first sat in parliament, in 1701, as member for Castle Rising; but in the following year he was elected for Lynn, which he thenceforth continued to represent. As a senator he soon distinguished himself among the Whigs. In 1708 he was appointed secretary at war; in 1709 treasurer of the navy; and in 1710 one of the managers of Sacheverell's trial; but, on the triumph of the Tories, he lost his offices, and was expelled the house, and committed to the Tower, on an unproved charge of breach of trust and corruption. The accession of George I. restored the ascendancy of Walpole's party, and he was made paymaster of the forces, and, subsequently, prime minister. Disputes with his colleagues, however, induced him to resign, in 1717, and he remained in opposition till 1720, when he once more became paymaster of the forces. On the retirement of Lord Sunderland, Walpole was again raised to the high situation of premier, and that situation he retained for two and twenty years, in spite of incessant attacks from political enemies of splendid talents. To maintain peace was one of the main objects of his administration. In 1742 he resigned, and was created earl of Orford. D. 1745.—HORATIO, Lord, brother of the foregoing, was b. in 1678; held various offices under the government; was employed as ambassador to France and Holland; was created a peer in 1756; and d. in 1757. He wrote an answer to "Bolingbroke's Letters on History;" and some political pamphlets.—HORACE, earl of Orford, the youngest son of Sir Robert, a man of varied and brilliant talents, was b. 1718, and was educated at Eton, and at King's college, Cambridge. In 1741 he entered parliament as member for Callington, and he afterwards represented Castle Rising and Lynn. He was a steady Whig and an independent senator, but took no active part in the business of the legislature; and in 1768 retired wholly from it. Literature and virtu were the great occupations of his life; and much of his existence was dedicated to embellishing his villa at Strawberry hill, near Twickenham, and forming a collection there. At that place he also established a private press, and printed several works. In 1791 he succeeded to the earldom; an accession of dignity which he would have been glad to have avoided. D. 1797.

WALSINGHAM, Sir FRANCIS, an eminent statesman, was b. 1536, at Chiselhurst, in Kent. After having been ambassador to France, he was, in 1573, appointed one of the secretaries of state, and was knighted. In 1581 he was a second time sent to France, and in 1583 to Scotland. In the final proceedings against Mary queen of Scots he acted a conspicuous part. D. 1590.

WALTER, JOHN, whose name is inseparably connected with the gigantic achievements of the press in modern times, was the son of Mr. John Walter, printer to the customs, and for many years chief proprietor of the "Times" newspaper. He was b. in 1773, and having, on the completion of his education, made himself acquainted with all the technicalities and routine of a large printing establishment, he, in 1803, became a joint proprietor and exclusive manager of the "Times;" and from this period, during the long course of 44 years, he devoted himself to the moral and material improvement of what has been so justly termed "the fourth estate" of the realm. D. 1847.

WALTON, IZAAK, was b. 1593, in Stafford, and kept a linen-draper's shop in London, first in the Royal Exchange, and lastly in Fleet-street, at the corner of Chancery-lane. About 1643 he quitted the metropolis, and he d. at Winchester in 1683. His "Complete Angler" has long afforded delight not only to those who are fond of angling, but to general readers of taste, and has passed through numerous editions. His Lives of Hooker, Sanderson, Wotton, Donne, and Herbert exhibit him in a highly favorable light as a biographer. Wordsworth says of them,

"The feather whence the pen
Was shaped that traced the lives of these good men Dropped from an angel's wing."

At a very advanced age Walton published, under the name of Chalkhill, "The alma and Clearchus, a Pastoral History." —GEORGE, a signer of the declaration of independence, was b. in Frederic county, Virginia, about the year 1740. He was early apprenticed to a carpenter, but at the expiration of his apprenticeship he removed to Georgia, and entered the office of an attorney at law. In 1776 he was elected to the continental congress. At the siege of Savannah he was wounded and taken prisoner, but was exchanged in September, 1779. In the following month he was appointed governor of the state, and in the succeeding January he was elected a member of congress for two years.

WARBECK, PETER, or PERKIN, an individual whose real history has been the subject of much speculation, made his appearance in England, in the reign of Henry VII., and assumed the character and title of Richard duke of York, the younger son of Edward IV., supposed to have been murdered in the Tower, together with his brother, by order of Richard III. Having been acknowledged by Margaret, duchess of Burgundy, as her nephew, he proceeded to claim the crown of England, and, landing in Cornwall, was joined by some thousands of insurgents. He laid siege to Exeter; but, on the approach of the royal army, he fled to Beaulieu abbey, in Hampshire, which sanctuary he was induced to quit, under the promise of a pardon, and he was sent in custody to the Tower of London. He was there treated as an impostor, and eventually, in 1499, was hanged, drawn, and quartered. Henry VII. published an alleged confession of the captive, purporting that he was the son of one Warbeck or Osbeck, a converted Jew of Tournay; but many have asserted that he was an illegitimate son of Edward IV.

WARBURTON, WILLIAM, an eminent prelate and writer, was b. 1698, at Newark. After having been educated at Oakham and Newark schools, he served his clerkship to an attorney, and was admitted to practice. Tiring, however, of the law, he turned to the church, and took deacon's orders in 1723. In 1726 he obtained the vicarage of Greasley, and in 1729 the rectory of Brant Broughton. Between 1723 and 1729 he published "Miscellaneous Translations," "An Inquiry into the Causes of Prodiges and Miracles," and "A Treatise on the Legal Judicature of Chancery." These were preludes to his great works, "The Alliance between Church and State," which appeared in 1738, and the first volume of his "Divine Legation," which was given to the world in 1738. His "Vindication of Pope's Essay on Man" acquired for him the friendship of that poet. He rose successively to be king's chaplain, prebend of Durham, dean of Bristol, and bishop of Gloucester; to the last of these dignities he attained in 1759. D. 1779.

WARD, ROBERT PLUMER, the well-known author of "Tremaine," was b. in London, 1765. He was called to the bar by the society of the Inner Temple, in 1790. For some years he went the western circuit, spending his long vacations at the house of his elder and only surviving brother in the Isle of Wight; and there he wrote his "Inquiry into the Foundation and History of the Law of Nations in Europe," &c., which was published in 1795, and proved successful both as a work of literature and as a professional speculation. He was now frequently employed in cases before the privy council; and afterwards entered parliament, and held office under Pitt. On the death of Mr. Pitt, 1806, he retired into the country, and occupied himself in rural pursuits; but on the formation of the Portland ministry, in 1807, he was made one of the lords of the admiralty, exchanging this office in 1811 for the clerkship of the ordnance, which he held till 1823. He then retired from parliament, and wrote "Tremaine," which, though published anonymously, produced a great sensation in literary circles, and became exceedingly popular. This was followed, in 1827, by "De Vere," which was hardly less successful; and after some years spent in retirement and on the Continent, he returned to his literary labors, and published successively his "Illustrations of Human Life," "Pictures of the World," "Historical Essay on the Revolution of 1688," and "De Clifford." D. 1846.

WARREN, JOSEPH, a patriot of the revolution, was b. in Roxbury, near Boston, 1741, and was graduated at Harvard college in 1759. He pursued the profession of medicine, and soon after commencing the practice, distinguished himself by his successful treatment of the small pox. Early engaging in politics, he obtained great influence, and rendered efficient service by his writings and addresses. He was twice elected to deliver the oration in commemoration of the massacre on the fifth of March. In June, 1775, the provincial congress of Massachusetts, of which he was at this time president, made him a major-general of their forces. At the battle of Bunker hill he fought as a volunteer, and was slain within a few yards of the breastwork as he was among the last slowly retiring from it. He was a man of the most generous and intrepid spirit, much elegance of manners, and of commanding eloquence. His loss was deeply felt and regretted. In 1776 his remains were removed from the battle-ground, and interred in Boston.—JAMES, was b. at Plymouth in 1726, and was graduated at Harvard college, in 1745. He took an early and active part in the cause of the colonies against the aggressions of the mother country, was a member of the general court, proposed the establishment of committees of correspondence, and after the death of General Warren, was appointed president of the provincial congress. He was afterwards appointed a major-general of the militia. On the adoption of the constitution of Massachusetts, he was for many years speaker of the house of representatives. D. 1808.—MERCY, the wife of General James, was the author of a valuable "History of the American Revolution," "The Adulator," and "The Group," two political pieces before the revolution, and a volume of poems. D. 1814.—JOHN, a celebrated physician, was b. in 1763, at Roxbury, Mass., and was graduated at Harvard college. He delivered the first course of lectures on anatomy, ever given in New England, and was appointed professor on the foundation of Dr. Hersey. Through life, he enjoyed a very high reputation, as a physician and anatomist. He d. in 1815.

WARTON, JOSEPH, a poet and critic, was b. in 1722, at Dunsfold, in Surrey; was educated at Winchester school, and at Oriel college, Oxford; held at various periods, the livings of Winslade, Tamworth, Thorley, Easton, and Wickham, and prebends of St. Paul's and Winchester, and was head-master of Winchester school from 1766 to 1793. D. 1800. He wrote poems, and "An Essay on Pope," contributed to the "Adventurer," translated the "Elogues and Georgics;" and edited the works of Dryden and Pope.—THOMAS, a poet, critic, and miscellaneous writer, brother of the foregoing, was b. in 1728, at Basingstoke; and was educated at Winchester school, and at Trinity college, Oxford. His first poetical work was "The Triumph of Isis," the next, "The Progress of Discontent." As a poet he was much superior to his brother. In 1757 he was chosen poetry professor at Oxford, in 1771 obtained the living of Kiddington, in 1781 that of Hill Farrance; and in 1785 was appointed Camden professor of history and poet laureate. His principal works are, poems, "Observations on the Faerie Queen," and "The History of English Poetry." Of the last work an elegant and enlarged edition was published a few years since by Mr. Price. D. 1790.

WASHINGTON, GEORGE, the illustrious founder of American independence, was b. 1732, in the county of Fairfax, in Virginia, where his father was possessed of great landed property. He was educated under the care of a private tutor, and paid much attention to the study of mathematics and engineering. He was first employed officially by General Dinwiddie, in 1755, in remonstrating to the French commander on the Ohio for the infraction of the treaty between the two nations. He subsequently negotiated a treaty of amity with the Indians on the back settlements, and for his honorable services received the thanks of the British government. In the unfortunate expedition of General Braddock he served as aide-de-camp, and on the fall of that brave but rash commander, he conducted the retreat to the corps under Colonel Dunbar in a manner that displayed great military talent. He retired from the service with the rank of colonel; but while engaged in agriculture at his favorite seat of Mount Vernon, he was elected senator in the national council for Frederic county, and afterwards for Fairfax. At the commencement of the revolutionary war, he was selected as the most proper person to take the chief command of the provincial troops. From the moment of taking upon himself this important office, in June, 1775, he employed the great powers of his mind to his favorite object, and by his prudence, his valor, and presence of mind he deserved and obtained the confidence and gratitude of his country, and finally triumphed over all opposition. The record of his services is the history of the whole war. He joined the army at Cambridge in July, 1755. On the evacuation of Boston in March, 1776, he proceeded to New York. The battle of Long Island was fought on the 27th of August, and the battle of White-plains on the 28th of October. On the 25th of December he crossed the Delaware, and soon gained the victories at Trenton and Princeton. The battle of Brandywine was fought on September 11th, 1777; of Germantown, October 4th; of Monmouth, February 28th, 1778. In 1779 and 1780 he continued in the vicinity of New York, and closed the important military operations of the war by the capture of Cornwallis, at Yorktown, in 1781. When the independence of his country was established by the treaty of peace, Washington resigned his high office to the congress, and followed by the applause and the grateful admiration of his fellow-citizens, retired into private life. His high character and services naturally entitled him to the highest gifts his country could bestow, and on the organization of the government he was called upon to be the first president of the states which he had preserved and established. It was a period of great difficulty and danger. The unsubdued spirit of liberty had been roused and kindled by the revolution of France, and many Americans were eager that the freedom and equality which they themselves enjoyed should be extended to the subjects of the French monarch. Washington anticipated the plans of the factious, and by prudence and firmness subdued insurrection, and silenced discontent, till the parties, which the intrigues of Genet, the French envoy, had roused to rebellion, were convinced of the wildness of their measures and of the wisdom of their governor. The president completed, in 1795, the business of his office by signing a commercial treaty with Great Britain, and then voluntarily resigned his power at a moment when all hands and all hearts were united again to confer upon him the sovereignty of the country. Restored to the peaceful retirement of Mount Vernon, he devoted himself to the pursuits of agriculture; and though he accepted the command of the army in 1798, it was merely to unite the affections of his fellow-citizens to the general good, and was one more sacrifice to his high sense of duty. D. after a short illness on the 14th of December, 1799.—BURNOP, an eminent judge, was b. in Westmoreland county, Virginia, and was educated at William and Mary's college. He pursued the study of the law in the office of Mr. Wilson, of Philadelphia, and commenced its practice with great success in his native county. In 1781 he was a member of the house of delegates of Virginia. He afterwards removed to Alexandria, and thence to Richmond, where he published two volumes of the decisions of the supreme court of Virginia. In 1798 he was appointed an associate justice of the supreme court of the United States, and continued to hold this situation till his death in November, 1829. He was the favorite nephew of President Washington, and was the devisee of Mount Vernon.

WATERLAND, DANIEL, a learned divine and controversialist, was b. 1683, at Wasely, in Lincolnshire, and was educated at Lincoln free school, and at Magdalen college, Cambridge, of the last of which seminaries he became master. He was also chancellor of York, archdeacon of Middlesex, canon of Windsor, and vicar of Twickenham. Among his works are, "A History of the Athanasian Creed," "Scripture Vindicated," "A Defence of Christ's Divinity," "A Review of the Doctrine of the Eucharist," and "Remarks on Dr. Clarke's Exposition of the Church Catechism." D. 1740.

WATSON, HENRY, a celebrated engineer, the son of a grazier, was b. about 1737, at Holbeach, in Lincolnshire; was one of the most remarkable mathematical contributors to the "Lady's Diary" at the age of 16; completed his education at the royal academy at Woolwich; and obtained a commission in the corps of engineers. He so much distinguished himself at the sieges of Belleisle and the Havanna, that Lord Clive took him to Bengal, as chief engineer. Among the works which Watson executed are the fortifications of Fort William, and those at Budge Budge and Melancholy Point. D. 1786.—RICHARD, an eminent prelate and writer, was b. 1737, at Haversham, in Westmoreland. He commenced his education under his father, who was master of the free grammar school at his native place, and he completed it at Trinity college, Cambridge, where he studied with unremitting application. In 1764 he was chosen professor of chemistry, and, in 1771, regius professor of divinity. In politics he was of the liberal school, and he made a full avowal of his opinions in a sermon, called "The Principles of the Revolution vindicated," which he preached before the university in 1776, and which excited much comment. In the same year he published his "Apology for Christianity," in answer to Gibbon. In 1782 he was made bishop of Llandaff; but George III. having imbibed a prejudice against him, he obtained no further promotion. Among his other works are, "Chemical Essays," "Apology for the Bible," and his own "Memoirs." D. 1816.

WATT, JAMES, a celebrated natural philosopher and engineer, the son of a tradesman, was b. 1736, at Greenock, in Scotland, and began life as a mathematical instrument maker. In that capacity he was employed by the university of his native place from 1757 to 1763. It was, in 1764, while he was engaged in repairing the model of a steam-engine, that the idea of improving the construction arose in his mind. His first discovery was that of the mode of avoiding the enormous loss of power occasioned by cooling the cylinder; his next was the substitution of the expansive power of steam instead of the atmospheric pressure. To these he subsequently added many others, which brought the steam engine to its present state of perfection. In 1774 he entered into partnership with Mr. Bolton, of Birmingham. His subsequent life was cheered by extensive fame and ample fortune. Among his other inventions are a micrometer, a copying machine, and a machine for making drawings in perspective. Watt possessed an extraordinary memory, a more than superficial acquaintance with many sciences and arts, and a knowledge of several modern languages. Some of his chemical papers are printed in the "Philosophical Transactions." D. 1819.

WATTEAU, ANTHONY, a French artist, was b. 1684, at Valenciennes. He received little instruction, and began by being a scene-painter at Paris, but his admirable genius soon raised him above that humble occupation. He gained the prize of the Academy for a picture, and thenceforth continued to increase in fame. The engravings from his compositions, to the number of 563, form three volumes. Comic conversations, movements of armies, landscapes, and grotesques, are his principal subjects. D. 1721.

WATTS, ISAAC, a nonconformist divine, b. 1674, at Southampton, and was educated at the free school there, and also at a dissenting academy in London. In his 22d year he became tutor to the son of Sir John Hartopp, and in 1702 he succeeded Dr. Chauncey as minister of a congregation in the metropolis. Nearly the last forty years of his blameless life were spent in the family of his friend, Sir Thomas Abney, at Stoke Newington. His theological and miscellaneous works form six quarto volumes, and many of them are still popular.—JANE, an accomplished female, whose maiden name was Waldie, was b. 1792, at Hendersyde Park, in Roxburghshire; displayed precocious talents; acquired music, French, Italian, Spanish, and Latin, without assistance, and painting with very little; gave proof of superior literary powers in her "Sketches of Italy," "Journal of a Tour in Flanders," and many smaller pieces; and d. 1826.

WAYNE, ANTHONY, major-general in the army of the United States, was b. 1745, in Chester county, Pennsylvania. He entered the army as colonel, in 1775, served under Gates, at Ticonderoga, and was promoted to the rank of brigadier-general. He was engaged in the battles of Brandywine, Germantown, and Monmouth, in 1779 captured the fortress at Stony Point, and rendered other important services during the war. In 1787 he was a member of the Pennsylvania convention which ratified the constitution of the United States. In 1792 he succeeded St. Clair in the command of the western army, and gained a complete victory at the battle of the Miamis, in 1794. D. 1796.

WEBBE, SAMUEL, an eminent musician, particularly celebrated for his glees, was b. 1740. His mother being left destitute, he was bound apprentice to a cabinet-maker, but, when his term of servitude expired, he abandoned his trade, and gained a subsistence by copying music. By dint of incessant study he became an excellent composer, and also acquired several languages and elegant accomplishments. He d. 1816. His glees and part songs form three volumes.

WEBBER, SAMUEL, president of Harvard college, was b. in Byfield, Massachusetts, and was educated at the college of which he afterwards became the head. He displayed an early fondness for mathematics, and in 1789 became professor of mathematics and natural history. In 1806 he was raised to the presidency of Harvard college, and discharged the duties of this office till his death, in 1810. He published, in 1801, a system of mathematics, intended as a text-book for the university.

WEBER, HENRY WILLIAM, an archaeologist and editor, was b. 1783, at St. Petersburg, of German parents; studied medicine at Edinburgh and at Jena; settled in Scotland, and devoted himself to literary pursuits; and d. in 1818, after having for some time been disordered in his intellect. Among his publications are, "Metrical Romances of the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Centuries," "The Battle of Flodden Field," a poem of the 16th century; and editions of Ford and Beaumont and Fletcher, of which the last two subjected him to severe criticism.—CARL MARIA VON, one of the most eminent of modern composers, was b. in 1786, at Entin, in Holstein, and was liberally educated. To music he displayed the warmest attachment at an early age. His instructors in the science were Heuschel, Michael Haydn, Valesi, Kalcher, and the Abbé Vogler. For a while, however, he abandoned his favorite art to practise that of lithography, but he soon returned to it. His first operas were "Das Waldmünchen," and "Peter Schmoll," the first of which was produced in 1800. He made professional tours through various parts of Germany, and was, successively, chapel-master at Breslau and at Carlsruhe, and conductor of the opera of Prague. In 1816 he was invited to Dresden by the elector of Saxony, to form a national opera, and was appointed director of music to the court. His "Freischütz" was brought out in 1821, at Berlin, and rapidly became popular throughout Europe. In 1826 he visited London, and brought out the opera of "Oberon;" but his health was now completely broken, and he d. suddenly, on the 3d of June. Weber left a prose work in manuscript, called "Lives of Artists," which possesses considerable merit.

WEBSTER, NOAH, was b. in West Hartford, 1758. His ancestor, John Webster, was one of the earliest English settlers in Hartford, and was subsequently governor of Connecticut. Noah, his father, and two more Websters, were in the army on the occasion of Burgoyne's expedition to Canada. Restored to more peaceful pursuits, he continued his studies, and in 1781 was called to the bar. Though he had considerable professional employment, his active mind could not be satisfied without diffusing some portion of its energies through the medium of the press, and he published the "First Part of a Grammatical Institute," "Sketches of American Policy," and several other works, and also established and conducted a daily paper in New York. But all these labors are comparatively insignificant when contrasted with his elaborate "English Dictionary," which, notwithstanding it contains some very serious mistakes on the subjects of etymology and the analogy of languages, is a stupendous monument of industry. D. 1843.

WEDGEWOOD, JOSIAH, an eminent manufacturer of pottery, was b. 1750. He succeeded to the business of his father, and, in 1760, began his improvements in porcelain and earthenware, which have changed the current of trade in those articles, and rendered England an extensive exporting instead of an importing country. He invented the ware which bears the name of the queen, and various other kinds. Wedgewood was also the inventor of the pyrometer, and the projector of the Grand Trunk canal. D. 1795.

WEISSE, CHRISTIAN FELIX, a German poet and dramatist, was b. 1726, at Annaberg, in Saxony; was educated at Altenberg and Leipsic; established and conducted two periodicals named the "Library of Elegant Literature," and "The Children's Friend," from which latter work Berquin borrowed his plan and part of his materials; succeeded in 1790 to a good estate; and d. 1804.

WELLS, WILLIAM CHARLES, a physician, was b. 1753, at Charleston, in South Carolina. His parents were Scotch, and he was educated at Dumfries and Edinburgh, after which he returned to his native province. Being a loyalist, he quitted America at the close of the war, and settled in London, where he d. in 1817. He is the author of "An Essay on Single Vision with Two Eyes," and of some valuable papers on the formation of dew, for which he received the gold and silver medals of the Royal Society.

WERNER, ABRAHAM GOTTLIEB, one of the most eminent of modern mineralogists, was b. in 1750, at Wehlau, in Upper Lusatia. He studied at the mineralogical school of Freyberg, in Saxony, and at Leipsic; and, in his 24th year, he published an excellent treatise on the "Characters of Minerals." In 1775 he was appointed lecturer on mineralogy at Freyberg, and inspector of the cabinet of mines. His lectures soon extended his reputation throughout Europe.

Among his works are, "A New Theory of Veins," with its application to the art of working mines; "Classification and Distribution of Mountains," and a translation of "Cronstalt's Mineralogy." His system is now very generally received. D. 1817.—FREDERIC LOUIS ZACHARIAH, a German poet and dramatist, was b. 1863, at Königsberg, in Prussia; held for some years an employment under the Prussian government; abjured Protestantism, and went to Vienna, where he became a popular preacher, and d. 1823. Among his works are, Confessions, Poems, and Tragedies.

WESLEY, SAMUEL, a divine and poet, was b. 1662, at Whitechurch, in Dorsetshire; was educated at Exeter college, Oxford; obtained the living of South Ormesby, and subsequently the rectories of Epworth and Wroot. He wrote a volume of poems, with the title of "Maggots;" "The Life of Christ," in verse; "The Histories of the Old and New Testament," in verse; "Elegies on Queen Mary and Archbishop Tillotson;" and "Dissertations on the Book of Job." D. 1735.—JOHN, second son of the foregoing, the founder of the sect of the Methodists, was b. June 17, 1703, at Epworth. He was educated at the Charter house, and Christ-church, Oxford, and was ordained in 1725. Naturally of a serious disposition, he was rendered still more so by the reading of devotional treatises; and, in conjunction with his brother Charles and some friends, he formed a religious society; to the members of which, with reference to a sect of Roman physicians, his gay fellow-collegians gave the name of Methodists. In 1735, with Charles Wesley and other missionaries, he went to Georgia to convert the Indians; but, after a residence of less than two years in the colony, during which he was extremely unpopular, he returned to England. In 1738 he began those public labors which ultimately produced such a mighty effect, and in 1739 the first meeting-house was built at Bristol. For some time he acted in conjunction with Whitefield, but the radical difference in their tenets at length produced a separation. Over the sect which he had founded, Wesley obtained an unbounded influence; and it must be owned that he earned it by his zeal and his unwearied and astonishing exertions. Two sermons he usually preached every day, and often four or five. In the course of his peregrinations he is said to have preached more than forty thousand sermons, and to have travelled three hundred thousand miles, or nearly fifteen times the circumference of the globe! On the 17th of February, 1791, he took cold, after preaching at Lambeth. For some days he struggled against an increasing fever, and continued to preach until the Wednesday following, when he delivered his last sermon. From that time he became daily weaker and more lethargic. He d. on the 2d of March, 1791, being in the 88th year of his age, and the 65th of his ministry. He published the "Christian Library; or, Extracts and Abridgments, &c., from various Writers;" "The Arminian Magazine;" a monthly publication, now continued under the title of "The Methodist Magazine," &c., &c.—CHARLES, his brother and fellow-laborer, was b. in 1703, at Epworth; was educated at Westminster school and at Christ-church; and d. 1788. He wrote hymns, poems, and sermons.—SAMUEL, a son of the latter, was a distinguished musician, D. 1837.

WEST, GILBERT, a poet and miscellaneous writer, was b. in 1706; was educated at Eton and at Christ-church, Oxford; obtained, through the influence of his friend Mr. Pitt, the offices of clerk to the privy council, and treasurer of Chelsea college; and d. 1756. He wrote poems; and "Observations on the Resurrection;" and translated Pindar.—BENJAMIN, an eminent painter, was b. in 1738, at Springfield, near Philadelphia, of Quaker parents. At the age of seven years he began to manifest his pictorial talents by sketching with pen and ink an infant sleeping in a cradle. From some Indians he obtained red and yellow, and his mother gave him a piece of indigo; and as camel's-hair pencils were wanting, he supplied the want by clipping the fur of the cat. Improving, as he advanced in years, he became a portrait painter of considerable repute, and produced some meritorious historical pictures. In his 22d year he visited Italy, where he remained for some time. In 1763 he settled in England, where he soon acquired reputation. Among his patrons was Archbishop Drummond of York, by whose means he was introduced to George III., who immediately gave him a commission to paint "The Death of Regulus," and continued ever afterwards to employ him. In 1791 he was chosen president of the Royal Academy. Among his last, and perhaps his best works, are, "Death on the Pale Horse," and "Christ healing the Sick." He d. March 18, 1820.

WESTALL, RICHARD, a draughtsman and designer, b. 1765, was apprenticed to an engraver in heraldry on silver, &c.; but his genius soared higher than this humble department of the arts, and having studied at the Royal Academy, in 1786 he commenced his splendid career, imparting to his water-color paintings a brilliance and vigor before unknown. About this time he formed a friendly intercourse with Sir Thomas Lawrence, which continued through life. Mr. Westall produced many excellent historical paintings; but he is best known as the designer of Boydell's superb editions of Milton and Shakspeare, and as the illustrator of numerous other works. D. 1836.—WILLIAM, a younger brother of the preceding, and like him an eminent artist, was b. 1782. In early life he accompanied Captain Flinders in his voyage round the world, on his return from which he illustrated Captain Flinders' work, and opened an exhibition in Brook-street, consisting of representations of the chief objects he had witnessed when abroad. In 1813 he was elected an associate of the Royal Academy. Among many works which he published may be mentioned, "A Series of Views of Picturesque and Romantic Scenery in Madeira, the Cape of Good Hope," &c., "Views of the Caves near Ingleton, &c., in Yorkshire," "Britannia delineata," "Views in London and its Environs;" "Picturesque Tour of the Thames," &c. D. 1850.

WETSTEIN, JOHN JAMES, a learned Swiss, was b. in 1693, at Basle; was a pupil of the younger Bernouilli; entered the church, but was compelled by persecution to quit his country; settled in Holland, where he became professor of theology and ecclesiastical history at Amsterdam; and d. there in 1754. Among his works is an edition of the New Testament, with the various readings which he collected from numerous manuscripts.

WETHERELL, Sir CHARLES, a distinguished chancery lawyer, was the son of the learned dean of Hereford, who for more than half a century was master of University college, Oxford. He was b. 1770, received his education at Magdalen college, and in 1794 was called to the bar. In 1818 he obtained a seat in parliament as member for Shaftesbury; and though he displayed much talent and energy in debate, "his slovenly attire, uncouth gestures, patchwork phrasology, fanciful illustrations, odd theories, recondite allusions, and old-fashioned jokes, tempted men to call him a buffoon when they ought to have admired his ingenuity, revered his learning, and honored his consistency." From 1820 to 1826 he represented the city of Oxford; subsequently he sat for Plympton; and in 1830 he was elected for Boroughbridge, which was disfranchised by the reform act. In 1824 his just ambition was gratified in being appointed solicitor-general, and receiving the honor of knighthood. Three years afterwards he succeeded Sir John Copley as attorney-general, but on Mr. Canning assuming the reins of government he resigned. He again, however, came into office in 1828, under the duke of Wellington. In 1831 he was mobbed for his anti-catholic bigotry. D. 1846.

WHARTON, PHILIP, duke of, whom Pope has so admirably characterized in his "Epistle on the Knowledge and Characters of Men," was b. 1669, and very early gave signs of those talents which he afterwards displayed and disgraced. After having, during his travels, accepted the title of duke from the pretender, he returned to England, and became a warm champion of the existing government. Having dissipated his fortune, he changed his politics again, retired to the Continent, intrigued with the Stnarts, entered into the Spanish service, and d. in indigence, in Spain, in 1731.

WHEATON, HENRY, was b. in Providence, 1785. He entered Brown university in 1798, and graduated in 1802. He studied law in the office of Nathaniel Searle, and in 1804, while yet a student of law, he went to France, where he resided a year and a half, engaged in the study of the French language and literature; and on his return to Rhode Island he was admitted to the bar. In 1812 he removed to New York, and became the editor of the "National Advocate." In New York he was appointed judge of the marine court, continuing in the practice of his profession as a chamber counsellor. He was also elected a member of the legislature, and was a prominent member of the constitutional convention of 1820. In 1815 he was appointed reporter of the supreme court of the United States. In 1827 he was appointed chargé-d'affaires to Copenhagen. In 1836 he was transferred to Berlin, and the year after was raised to the rank of minister plenipotentiary. In Prussia his services were long and eminent. On his return home, he accepted the chair of professor of international law in Harvard university, and was about to commence the duties of the appointment when he was attacked with the illness which resulted in his death. Mr. Wheaton's principal works are a "Treatise upon the Law of Captures," "Elements of International Law," "Sketch of the Law of Nations from the Peace of Westphalia," an "Essay on the Right of Search," twelve volumes of "Reports," and a "Digest of the Reports," the "Life of William Pinckney," and a "History of the Northmen." D. 1848.

WHEELOCK, JOHN, was b. at Lebanon, Connecticut, in 1754. During the revolution he held the commission of lieutenant-colonel, and obtained some military reputation. In 1779 he became president of Dartmouth college, New Hampshire, and in 1782 visited Europe to obtain contributions for that seminary. He remained in that office for 36 years. D. 1817.

WHIPPLE, WILLIAM, a signer of the declaration of American independence, was b. in Maine, 1730, and engaged in commercial pursuits. He took an early part in the controversy with Great Britain, and in 1776 was sent as a delegate from New Hampshire to the continental congress. He was afterwards brigadier-general of the troops of that state, and held several civil offices of importance. D. 1785.

WHISTON, WILLIAM, an eminent divine and mathematician, was b. in 1667, at Norton, in Leicestershire, and was educated at Tamworth school, and at Clare hall, Cambridge. In 1698 he obtained the living of Lowestoff, in Suffolk, which he resigned, in 1703, when he succeeded Sir Isaac Newton in the mathematical professorship at Cambridge. At length he adopted Arian principles, in consequence of which he was expelled from the university in 1710, lost his offices of professor and catechetical lecturer, and was even prosecuted as a heretic. Late in life he became a Baptist. Among his works are, "A Theory of the Earth," "Sermons," "Primitive Christianity Revived," and a translation of Josephus. D. 1752.

WHITAKER, JOHN, a divine, critic, antiquary, and historian, was b. 1735, at Manchester; was educated at the free school of that place, and at Corpus Christi college, Oxford, and d. in 1808, rector of Ruan Lanyhorne, in Cornwall.

His principal works are, "The History of Manchester," "A Vindication of Mary, Queen of Scots," "The Course of Hannibal over the Alps," "Criticisms on Gibbon's History," "The Ancient Cathedral of Cornwall," and "The Origin of Government." He also contributed largely to "The British Critic," and the English and Antijacobin reviews.

WHITBY, DANIEL, a learned divine, was b. 1638, at Rushden, in Northamptonshire, and was educated at Trinity college, Oxford. His controversial zeal against the Catholics gained for him the patronage of Bishop Ward, who gave him a prebend of Salisbury, and the rectory of St. Edmund in that city, with the precentorship. In his latter days he became an Arian. His greatest work is a "Paraphrase and Commentary on the New Testament." D. 1726.

WHITE, SIR THOMAS, a native of Reading, was b. 1492; acquired a fortune by trade in London, and served the office of lord mayor; was knighted for his conduct in Wyatt's rebellion, and d. in 1566. He was the founder of St. John's college, Oxford, the patent for which he obtained in 1557.—THOMAS, a divine, was b. in the 16th century, at Bristol, and was educated at Magdalen hall, Oxford. He obtained considerable church preferment, among which were a prebend of St. Paul's, and canonries of Christ-church and Windsor; and d. in 1623. He founded Sion college, in the metropolis, and an hospital at Bristol, and was a benefactor to Magdalen college, Oxford.—GILBERT, a naturalist and antiquary, was b. 1720, at Selborne, in Hampshire; and was educated at Basingstoke school, and at Oriel college, Oxford. After having taken a master's degree, and been senior proctor of the university, he retired to reside on his property in his native village; nor could he be tempted to quit it by the offer of valuable church preferment. He wrote the "Natural History and Antiquities of Selborne," one of the most amusing of books; "The Naturalist's Calendar;" and "Miscellaneous Observations." D. 1793.—JOSEPH, an eminent divine and oriental scholar, the son of a weaver, was b. 1746, at Stroud, in Gloucestershire, and received his education at Gloucester school, and Wadham college, Oxford. In 1755 he was appointed Laudian professor of Arabic, and in 1783 he delivered the Bampton lecture. In the composition of the lectures he was assisted by Dr. Parr and Mr. Badcock. He obtained a prebend of Gloucester, and the rectory of Melton, in Suffolk; and d. in 1814. Among his works are, "Ægyptiaca," "Diatessaron," and editions of the Philoxenic Syrian versions of the four Gospels, and of Griesbach's Greek Testament.—HENRY KIRKE, a poet, was b. 1785, at Nottingham, and was the son of a butcher. His delicate health protected him from being brought up to his father's trade, and he was placed with a stocking weaver, but was subsequently removed to an attorney's office. He produced several prose and verse compositions at an early age, and devoted his leisure hours to reading, and to the study of Greek and Latin. To obtain a university education, for the purpose of entering into the church, was the main object of his wishes. By the generosity of Mr. Wilberforce and some other friends, he was at length enabled to become a student at St. John's college, Cambridge. His progress was rapid, but his intense application destroyed the vital powers, and he d. in 1806. He published "Clifton Grove," with other poems; and his "Remains" were edited by Southey.—BLANCO, a miscellaneous writer, b. in Spain, but the greater part of whose life was passed in England. He was a singularly sincere and earnest religious inquirer, the friend of Channing, Coleridge, Arnold, &c., and whose memoirs, in which the struggles of his mind are unfolded, are of the deepest interest.—WILLIAM, b. at Philadelphia, in 1747, was the first bishop of the Protestant Episcopal church, who lived to a venerable age. He was chaplain to the congress of 1777, was mainly instrumental in framing the constitution of the American church, compiled the liturgy and the canons, and wrote several able works, chiefly on religious topics. D. 1836.

WHITEFIELD, GEORGE, a celebrated divine, the founder of the Calvinistic Methodists, was b. 1714, at Gloucester, where his father kept the Bell inn. He was educated at the Crypt school of his native city, and at Pembroke college, Oxford. At the university he was one of the members of the society formed by Wesley, and inflicted on himself many ascetic privations. He was ordained a deacon in 1736, and his pulpit eloquence soon became highly popular. In 1737 he sailed to Georgia, and he remained in the colony for nearly two years. He returned to America in 1739, made a tour through several of the provinces, and resided in Georgia till 1741; and he subsequently made five visits to that quarter of the globe. The foundation of the orphan house was one of the benefits which Whitefield conferred on Georgia. In England he first introduced, in 1739, the practice of preaching in the open air, and the effect of his oratory was astonishing. The tabernacles in Moorfields and Tottenham-court road were erected by his followers, and among his converts was the countess of Huntingdon. In 1741 the breach took place between him and Wesley. D. Sept. 30, 1770, at Newburyport, in New England.

WHITEHEAD, GEORGE, one of the early preachers among the Quakers, was b. 1636, at Orton, in Westmoreland, and was educated at Blencow free school, in Cumberland. At the age of 18 he began to propagate those religious doctrines which he had embraced, and he continued his labors in various parts of England, in spite of the severest persecution. After the revolution, his exertions procured from the legislature the admission of a Quaker's affirmation instead of an oath. He d. generally respected, in 1722-3. He wrote his own Memoirs, and some other works.—PAUL, a poet, was b. 1710, in Holborn; was apprenticed to a mercer, but quitted trade to study law in the Temple; acquired considerable popularity as a satirist; was appointed deputy-treasurer of the exchequer; and d. in 1774. He wrote the "State Dunces," "Manners," "Honor," "The Gymnasiad," and other poems.—WILLIAM, a poet and dramatist, was b. 1715, at Cambridge, and was the son of a baker. He was educated at Winchester school, and at Clare hall, Cambridge; became travelling tutor to Lord Nuneham and the earl of Jersey's son; obtained the registrarship to the order of the Bath; and, on the death of Cibber, was appointed poet laureate. He d. in 1785. Among his works are the tragedies of the "Roman Father" and "Creusa;" "The School of Lovers," a comedy; "Poems," and some miscellaneous pieces.

WHITEHURST, JOHN, an eminent engineer, was b. 1713, at Congleton; was brought up to his father's business of a watchmaker; followed that business at Derby, and also became celebrated for constructing philosophical instruments and hydraulic machines; was appointed, in 1775, stamper of the money weights in the mint; and d. 1788. He wrote an "Inquiry into the Original

State and Formation of the Earth," "A Treatise on Chimneys," "An Attempt towards obtaining invariable Measures of Length, Capacity, and Weight, from the Mensuration of Time," and some papers in the "Philosophical Transactions."

WHITELOCKE, BULSTRODE, was b. 1605, in London, and studied at Merchant Tailors' school, St. John's college, Oxford, and the Middle Temple. He was a member of the long parliament, and espoused the popular cause, but was moderate in his conduct. In 1648 he was appointed one of the council of state, and in 1653 was sent on an embassy to Sweden. He wrote "Memorials of English Affairs," "Notes on the King's Writ," "An Account of his Swedish Embassy," and "Labors remembered in the Annals of Life." D. 1676.

WHITGIFT, JOHN, a prelate, was b. 1530, at Great Grimsby, in Lincolnshire; was educated at Queen's college, and Pembroke hall, Cambridge; was, successively, made Margaret professor of divinity, queen's chaplain, master of Pembroke hall and of Trinity college, and dean of Lincoln. In 1577 he became bishop of Worcester, and vice-president of the Welsh marches, and, in 1583, was translated into the archbishopric of Canterbury. As primate, he distinguished himself by persecuting the Catholics and Puritans. D. 1603.

WHITTINGTON, Sir RICHARD, a citizen and mercer, and "thrice lord mayor of London," was an extensive benefactor to the metropolis, though the marvellous stories connected with his name are groundless fictions. His almshouses for thirteen poor men form an interesting object on Highgate hill, and near them stands the famous stone which commemorates his return to London at the time the church bells so invitingly recalled him, in tones which he was fain to believe assured him of future civic honors. His last mayoralty was in 1419.

WICKLIFE, WYCLIFFE, or WICLEF, JOHN, a divine and ecclesiastical reformer, who has been called "the morning star of the reformation," was b. in 1324, at a village of the same name in Yorkshire. He studied at Queen's and Merton colleges, Oxford, and early distinguished himself by opposing the mendicant friars, and by his proficiency in school divinity and the works of Aristotle. His exertions against the friars were rewarded by the mastership of Baliol college, and the wardenship of Trinity. Of the latter he was deprived by Archbishop Langham, and the sentence was ratified by the pope. Having gained the favor of John of Gaunt, Wickliff was made king's chaplain, and rector of Lutterworth. He now began vigorously to attack papal usurpation and the abuses of the church; nor did he slacken his efforts till he ceased to exist. The pope insisted on his being brought to trial as a heretic, but he was effectually protected by his patron, the duke of Lancaster. His works are very numerous. Among them are, "Triologus," "Wickliff's Wicket," and a version of the Old and New Testament. D. 1384.

WIELAND, CHRISTOPHER MARTIN, a German writer, who rivals Voltaire in universality of talent and literary fertility, was b. in 1733, at Holtzheim, near Biberach, in Suabia. He was educated by his father, a clergyman, and completed his studies at Klosterbergen and Tubingen. In his 13th year he began to compose Latin and German verses. His first published work was "The Nature of Things," in six cantos, which appeared in 1751. In the following year he went to reside in Switzerland, whence in 1760 he returned to Biberach, where he was appointed to a municipal office. His productions in prose and verse, which rapidly succeeded each other, raised him to the summit of literary reputation. The elector of Mentz nominated him professor of philosophy and belles lettres at Erfurt; and, in 1772, the duchess dowager of Saxe Weimar gave him the tuition of her two sons. His original works form 42 volumes quarto; and he translated Lucian, Shakspeare, Cicero's "Epistles," and Horace's "Satires." D. 1813.

WIFFEN, JEREMIAH HOLME, a celebrated Quaker poet, was b. 1792, and brought up to the profession of a schoolmaster, in which he was for some years engaged. The work on which his poetical fame mainly rests is a translation of Tasso, in which he adopted the Spenserian stanza. Among his other productions we must name "Aonian Hours, and other Poems," also a translation of poems from the Spanish of De la Vega, a series of stanzas illustrative of the portraits at Woburn abbey, entitled "The Russells," and his able prose work, "The History of the Russell Family," which he traces up to the heathen chiefs three centuries before the time of the conquering Rollo. D. 1836.

WILBERFORCE, WILLIAM, a distinguished philanthropist, was b. 1759, at Hull. He completed his education at Cambridge, and there obtained the friendship of Mr. Pitt. He was elected M. P. for Hull, and the next year, 1787, distinguished himself by his exertions for the abolition of the slave trade, which, after a long warfare and many struggles, was finally decreed by the British legislature, in 1807. He approved the principles of the French revolution, as they exhibited themselves at its commencement; and, on the motion of M. Brissot, in August, 1792, was voted the right of French citizenship. But, in 1801, he denounced the designs of Bonaparte, and supported all the ministerial measures of vigorous opposition to France. In his exertions to emancipate the hapless African from the chains of slavery, Mr. Wilberforce never relaxed, and he lived to see the second reading of the "Emancipation Act" carried by the house of commons. He published a "Practical View of the prevailing Religious Systems of Professed Christians," and an "Apology for the Christian Sabbath." D. 1833.

WILDE, RICHARD HENRY, was b. in Baltimore, but removed at an early age to Augusta, Ga., in which state he was admitted to the bar. The latter part of his life was spent in New Orleans. He was once attorney-general of Georgia, and at the time of his death was professor of law in the university of Louisiana. He was also distinguished in public life. In 1815, when barely above the constitutional age, he was elected to congress. At the end of two years he returned to his profession, but he was again a member of congress in 1825, and from 1827 to 1835. Mr. Wilde was more generally known as an accomplished scholar. He published several poetical effusions, which gained him credit; and his researches in Italian literature, especially the work on the "Love, Madness, and Imprisonment of Tasso," have gained him a high place among men of letters. D. 1847.

WILFORD, FRANCIS, an eminent orientalist, was b. about 1760, at Hanover; was for many years in the service of the East India Company in Hindostan; and d. 1822. Many of his papers are printed in the "Asiatic Researches."

WILKES, JOHN, a celebrated political character, was b. 1717, in Clerkenwell, and was the son of a rich distiller. He began his public career as member for Aylesbury, and lieutenant-colonel of the Buckinghamshire militia. By some panphlets which he wrote against the Bute administration, in 1762, he gained reputation; but it was to his periodical paper, "The North Briton," and especially to No. 45 of it, that he was indebted for his popularity. That number the government determined to prosecute, and, accordingly, a general warrant was issued against the author, printer, and publisher. Wilkes contended that the warrant was illegal; obtained a decision to that effect from the court of common pleas, and large damages from the secretary of state and his subordinate myrmidons. Still bent on his ruin, the ministry renewed the prosecution in a regular manner, and commenced another for an obscene poem. He was also dangerously wounded in a duel with Mr. Martin, one of their partisans. Giving way to the storm, he retired to France, upon which he was outlawed, and expelled from his seat. In 1768, being elected for Middlesex, he returned, and was condemned to a fine of £1000, and 22 months imprisonment, and was subsequently expelled a second time for a libel. Again he was chosen, but, in utter contempt of all right, the house declared him ineligible to sit in that parliament, and seated Colonel Luttrell, who had but a small number of votes. This infamous vote was afterwards expunged from the journals. In 1770 he was chosen an alderman of London, in which capacity he set at defiance the mandates of the house. In 1772 he was sheriff; in 1774, lord mayor; and in 1779 he became chamberlain of the city. In 1775 he was once more sent to parliament by Middlesex, and he was a steady opponent to the American war. D. 1797. Two collections of his correspondence have been published.

WILKIE, Sir DAVID, a painter of distinguished merit, was b. near Cupar, in Fifeshire, in 1785, his father being a minister of the Scotch church. In 1805 he went to London, and soon attracted notice by the excellence of his earliest efforts, his career of fame commencing with his "Village Politicians," "Blind Fiddler," "Rent Day," &c. His reputation was now established, and in 1811 he was made a royal academician, from which period he regularly produced, and as regularly sold at increasing prices, his most celebrated pictures, of which we shall merely mention a few, as "Dis-training for Rent," "The Penny Wedding," "Blind Man's Buff," "The Village Festival," "The Reading of the Will," and "Chelsea Pensioners Reading the Gazette of the Battle of Waterloo." D. 1841.

WILKINS, JOHN, a prelate and mathematician, was b. in 1614, at Fawsley, in Northamptonshire, and was educated at New Inn hall, and Magdalen hall, Oxford. Having espoused the popular cause, and being married to Cromwell's sister, he was made warden of Wadham college, and, by Richard Cromwell, was appointed master of Trinity college. The restoration deprived him of these preferments, but he soon obtained others, and, in 1668, was raised to the bishopric of Chester. He d. in 1672. He was the founder of that association which afterwards became the Royal Society. Besides his mathematical works, reprinted in two volumes, he wrote an "Essay towards a real Character and Philosophical Language," and various theological pieces.

WILKINSON, JEMIMA, a bold and artful religious impostor, was b. in Cumberland, R. I., about the year 1753. Recovering suddenly from an apparent suspension of life, in 1773, she gave out that she had been raised from the dead, and laid claim to supernatural power and authority. Making a few proselytes, she removed with them to the neighborhood of Crooked Lake, N. Y., where she d. in 1819.

WILLARD, SAMUEL, an eminent divine, was b. in Massachusetts, and received his education at Harvard college, where he was graduated in 1650. He was settled over the old south church in Boston, and became the most celebrated among his cotemporaries in the ministry. In 1701 he was made vice-president of Harvard college, and continued in this office till his death, in 1707. He published a large number of sermons, and a folio volume of divinity.

WILLIAMS, JOHN, a divine and statesman, was b. in 1582, at Aberconway, in Wales, and was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. After having held several minor but valuable preferments, he was made bishop of Lincoln, and keeper of the great seal, in 1621. Of the office of lord keeper he was deprived by Charles I., on his accession. He was subsequently prosecuted in the star-chamber, and sentenced to a fine of £10,000, and imprisonment in the Tower. The proceedings were, however, rescinded in 1640, and in the following year he was translated to the see of York. During the civil war he made an ineffectual attempt to hold out Conway castle against the parliament.

D. 1650. Williams was a strenuous opponent to Laud.—Sir CHARLES HANBURY, a poet and diplomatist, was b. in 1709; was educated at Eton; was for a considerable period one of the members for the county of Monmouth; held the paymastership of the marines; was employed as ambassador to Dresden and St. Petersburg; and d. insane, in 1759. His poems are spirited and witty, but licentious.—DAVID, a miscellaneous writer, was b. in 1738, in Cardiganshire; was educated at a dissenting academy; and became a dissenting minister. Changing to a deist, he opened a chapel to diffuse his newly adopted opinions, and for some time his hearers were numerous. The subsequent part of his life was dedicated to literary pursuits and to private teaching. The Literary Fund was founded by him. Among his chief works are, "Lectures on the Principles and Duties of Religion and Morality," "Lectures on Education," "Lectures on Political Principles," and a "History of Monmouthshire." D. 1816.—HELEN MARIA, a poet and miscellaneous writer, was b. in 1762, in the north of England, and was ushered into public notice when she was 18, by Dr. Kippis. Between 1782 and 1788 she published "Edwin and Eltruda," a poem, "Peru," a poem, and other pieces, which were afterwards collected in two volumes. In 1790 she settled in Paris. There she became intimate with the most eminent of the Girondists, and, in 1794, was imprisoned, and nearly shared their fate. She escaped, and took refuge in Switzerland, but returned to the French capital in 1796, where she continued to reside till her decease, 1827.—ROGER, one of the founders of Rhode Island, was b. in Wales, in 1599, and received his education at Oxford. He was for some time a minister of the established church, but dissenting, he removed, in 1631, to New England, and preached till 1636 at Salem and Plymouth. Being banished from the colony on account of his religious opinions, he removed with several others to Rhode Island, and laid the foundation of Providence. They there established the first society in which was enjoyed perfect liberty of conscience. For several years Williams was president of the colony. D. 1683.—OTHO HOLLAND, an officer in the American army, was b. in Maryland, in 1748, served in various capacities during the revolutionary war, and fought at the battles of Guilford, Hobkirk's hill, and the Eutaws. Before the disbanding of the army he was made brigadier-general. For several years he was collector at Baltimore. D. 1794.—WILLIAM, a signer of the declaration of American independence, was b. at Lebanon, Conn., in 1731, and was educated at Harvard college. From the university he returned home, and for some time devoted himself to the study of theology. At an early period of the revolution he embarked in the cause of his country, and was a delegate from his native state to the continental congress. D. 1811.

WILLIAMSON, HUGH, an American physician, was b. in Pennsylvania, in 1735, and received his education at the college of Philadelphia; but relinquished the clerical profession, for which he had been intended, and turned his attention first to mathematics, and subsequently to medicine. After visiting Edinburgh and Leyden, at which latter university he obtained the degree of M. D., he returned and practised in Philadelphia. He was one of the committee appointed by the American Philosophical Society, 1769, to observe the transit of Venus over the solar disc; and he attracted considerable attention by his observations on the remarkable comet which then made its appearance, as he came to the conclusion that comets, instead of being ignited masses, are inhabited planets. He was appointed to the medical staff of the revolutionary army, and, at the restoration of peace, he became a member of congress. Among his chief works are, "The History of North Carolina," and "Observations on the Climate of America." D. 1819.

WILLIS, BROWNE, an eminent antiquary, was b. in 1682, at Blandford, in Dorsetshire, studied at Westminster school, and at Christ-church, Oxford; was elected M. P. for Buckinghamshire in 1705; became a member of the society of antiquaries in 1717, and d. in 1760. Willis was a man of an eccentric character. Miss Talbot, who gives a ludicrous description of him, declares, that "with one of the honestest hearts in the world he has one of the oddest heads that ever dropt out of the moon." His principal works are, "Notitia Parliamentaria," "A Survey of the Cathedrals of England," "History of the Mitred Parliamentary Abbeys," and "a History of Buckingham."—FRANCIS, a physician, celebrated for his skill in cases of insanity, was b. about 1718, in Lincolnshire, and was educated at Brazennose college, Oxford. He was brought up to the church, and obtained a college living in the metropolis; but subsequently took the degree of M. D., and practised as a physician. He restored George III. to sanity, and was amply rewarded by a parliamentary grant. D. 1807.

WILLUGHBY, FRANCIS, an eminent naturalist, was b. 1635, in Lincolnshire, and was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge. Ray was his tutor, and was subsequently his fellow-traveller on the Continent, his frequent guest, and his executor. In 1662 he became a member of the Royal Society. He d. in 1674. He wrote a Latin treatise on ornithology, another on ichthyology, and some papers in the "Philosophical Transactions." The treatises were edited, after Willughby's death, by Ray.

WILSON, ALEXANDER, the celebrated ornithologist, was b. at Paisley, Scotland, and came to Delaware in 1794. Removing to Philadelphia he became acquainted with Mr. Bartram, the naturalist, and devoted himself to the cultivation of natural history. His great work is the "American Ornithology," splendidly executed, and very accurate and comprehensive. He possessed considerable taste for literature, and published several small poems of much beauty. D. 1813.—JAMES, a signer of the declaration of independence, was b. in Scotland, about 1742. He was well educated, and after completing his studies emigrated to America. Settling at Philadelphia, he received an offer to enter the office of Mr. John Dickinson and pursue the study of the law. He soon distinguished himself, and was appointed a delegate to the continental congress, where he continued from 1775 to 1777. He was a member of the conventions which framed the constitution of Pennsylvania and that of the United States, and in 1789 was appointed one of the judges of the supreme court of the United States. In 1797 he was made professor of law in the university of Pennsylvania, and in this capacity delivered a course of lectures, afterwards published. D. 1798.—THOMAS, a prelate eminent for piety, was b. 1653, at Barton, in Cheshire. He was educated at Trinity college, Dublin. The earl of Derby, to whom he was chaplain, and whose son he accompanied to the Continent as tutor, nominated him in 1697, bishop of the Isle of Man. He held the see during fifty-eight years, and though his annual income was only three hundred pounds, he refused to accept an English bishopric. Scanty as were his means, he was benevolent to the poor, built a new chapel at Castleton, founded parochial libraries, and introduced important improvements in the agriculture of the island. D. 1755.—RICHARD, a celebrated painter, was b. 1714, at Penegos, in Montgomeryshire. He received a liberal education, and, having manifested a genius for painting he was placed under an obscure portrait painter named Wright. He himself began his career in the same branch of art. On his visiting Italy, however, he was advised by Zuccarelli to devote himself to landscape, and fortunately, he followed that advice. His picture of "Niobe" was exhibited in 1760. He attained great reputation, but nevertheless, the latter part of his life was clouded by poverty. He d. in 1782. Fuseli declares that "Wilson's taste was so exquisite, and his eye so chaste, that whatever came from his easel bore the stamp of elegance and truth."

WINCHESTER, ELHANAN, an American divine, who visited England about 1788, attempted to found a Philadelphia society, and disseminated his peculiar tenets by means of preaching, and of a Philadelphia magazine. He succeeded in establishing a sect called Winchestarians, or Universalists, which is still in existence. His distinguished tenet was the ultimate redemption of all mankind, and even of the devils. He returned in 1792 to his native country. Among his works are, "Lectures on the Prophecies," "The Universal Restoration," and an heroic poem on Christ.

WINCKELMAN, JOHN JOACHIM, a celebrated German antiquary, was b. in 1717, at Steindall, in Bradenburgh. After having been professor of the belles lettres at Seehausen, and librarian to Count Bunau, he became a Catholic, and went to Rome, where the pope appointed him president of antiquities, and librarian of the Vatican. He was murdered in 1768, at Trieste, while on his return from Germany to Italy. His principal works are, "A History of Art among the Ancients," "Ancient unedited Monuments," "Reflections on the Imitation of the Productions of the Greeks in Painting and Sculpture." On "Allegory," and "Letters on Herculaneum."

WINDER, WILLIAM H., an officer in the American army, was b. in Maryland in 1775, was educated for the bar, and pursued his profession in Baltimore with great success. In 1812 he received a colonel's commission, was promoted to the rank of brigadier-general, and served with reputation during the war with Great Britain. He commanded the troops at the battle of Bladensburg. On the declaration of peace he resumed the practice of his profession. D. 1824.

WINDHAM, WILLIAM, a statesman, was b. in 1750, at Felbrig, in Norfolk, and was educated at Eton, Glasgow, and University college, Oxford. In 1782 he was elected M. P. for Norwich, and for a short time secretary to the viceroy of Ireland. He continued to act with the Whigs till 1793, when he adopted the sentiments of Burke; and in the following year, he was appointed secretary at war, with a seat in the cabinet. In 1801 he resigned. To the peace of Amiens he was strenuously hostile. During the brief possession of power by the Whigs in 1806, he held his former office. D. 1810.

WINGATE, EDWARD, a lawyer and mathematician, was b. in 1593, in Yorkshire, studied at Queen's college, Oxford, and at Gray's Inn; was sent to France to instruct Henrietta Maria in the English language; took the popular side in the civil war, and d. in 1656. Among his works are, "Natural and Artificial Arithmetic," "The Exact Surveyor," "Ludus Mathematicus," "Maxims of Reason," and "an Abridgment of the Statutes."

WINSLOW, EDWARD, was b. in Worcestershire, in 1594. He was among the first settlers of New England, in 1620, and was repeatedly elected governor of the colony they founded at Plymouth. He went several times as an agent to England, and in 1655 was appointed a commissioner to superintend the expedition against the Spaniards in the West Indies. D. near Jamaica in the May of that year.—JAMES BENIGNUS, a celebrated Danish anatomist, was b. in 1669, at Odensee; settled in France, and in 1699 became a Catholic. In 1743 he succeeded Mr. Hunald as professor of anatomy and physiology at the Royal Botanic Garden. He d. in 1760. Winslow was a member of several learned bodies. His principal work, which still preserves its reputation undiminished, is "An Anatomical Exposition of the Structure of the Human Body."

WINSOR, FREDERIC ALBERT, an enterprising projector, to whom the public is indebted for the beautiful gas-light which now illuminates the streets, &c.; made his first public experiments at the Lyceum, in the Strand, in 1803. He afterwards lighted with gas the walls of Carlton palace gardens, on the king's birthday in 1807; and during 1809 and 1810, he lighted one side of Pall Mall, from the house which he then occupied in that street. He followed up his object with great perseverance, and at length obtained a charter of incorporation for a gas-light and coke company. In consequence, however, of some misunderstanding with the parties with whom he was associated he did not obtain his expected remuneration. In 1815 he went to Paris, where he also erected gas-works, and established a company. D. 1830.

WINSTANLEY, WILLIAM, a literary barber who wrote the "Lives of the Poets," "Select Lives of England's Worthies," "Historical Rarities," &c. D. about 1690.

WINTER, JOHN WILLIAM DE, a Dutch admiral, was b. in 1750. Having been an active partisan in the revolution which broke out in 1787, he was obliged to take refuge in France, when the party of the stadtholder prevailed. In France he entered the army, served under Dumouriez and Pichegru, and in a short time rose to the rank of general of brigade. In 1795, when Pichegru invaded Holland, De Winter returned to his country, where the states-general made him vice-admiral and commander of the naval forces at Texel. Here, with 29 vessels, of which 16 were ships of the line, he was completely defeated by Duncan, Oct. 7, 1797. D. 1812.—PETER VON, an eminent German musician, b. at Mannheim, in 1754, and at the age of 10 years was appointed a member of the orchestra of the elector. He composed a variety of operas, oratorios, and other pieces of vocal and instrumental music, many of which possess very considerable merit. D. 1825.

WINTHROP, JOHN, first governor of Massachusetts, was b. at Groton, England, in 1587. He arrived with the colonists in Salem in 1630, having a commission as their governor, and held this office, with the exception of six or seven years, till his death in 1649. He kept a minute journal of the affairs of the colony, which has been published, and possesses much value.—JOHN, son of the foregoing, was b. in England, 1605, and received his education at Cambridge. He came to Massachusetts in 1633, and subsequently visiting England, returned and established a colony at Saybrook, Conn. In 1657 he was chosen governor of that colony, and remained so till his death in 1676. He was distinguished for his love of natural philosophy, and was one of the founders of the Royal Society of London.—JAMES, a man of letters, was b. at Cambridge, Mass., in 1752, and was graduated at Harvard college. He was for twenty years librarian of that institution. His acquirements in the exact sciences, the ancient and modern languages, and in biblical and polite literature were extensive. D. 1821.

WIRT, WILLIAM, an eminent advocate and essayist, b. at Bladensburg, Md., 1772, and studied law in Leesburg, Va., where he was admitted to the bar, in 1792. He was appointed chancellor of the eastern district of Virginia in 1802, and district attorney in 1816. The part he took in the famous trial of Aaron Burr gave him his greatest distinction as an eloquent pleader. His "Letters of the British Spy," first published in a Richmond paper; the "Old Bachelor," and a "Life of Patrick Henry;" the latter, written in a highly florid style, enjoyed great popularity in their day. D. 1835.

WISHART, GEORGE, a Scotch martyr, was b. at the commencement of the 16th century. Little is known of his early life; but he is said to have embraced the Protestant faith while travelling in Germany; to have resided for some years at Cambridge; and to have taught at Benet college. In 1544 he returned to his native land, and exerted himself zealously in preaching the doctrines of the Reformation. In 1546 he was seized by Cardinal Beaton, was brought to trial, and was mercilessly condemned to the flames.

WISTAR, CASPAR, a celebrated physician, was b. in Philadelphia, 1761. He studied medicine under Dr. John Redman, and completed his professional course at the schools in London and Edinburgh. Returning in 1787 to his native city, he soon distinguished himself in his profession, and in 1789 was elected professor of chemistry in the college of Philadelphia. In 1782 he became adjunct professor of anatomy, midwifery, and surgery, with Dr. Shippen; and on the decease of that gentleman, in 1808, sole professor. His acquirements in professional knowledge were very extensive, and he obtained much popularity as a lecturer. D. 1818.

WITHER, GEORGE, a poet, was b. 1588, at Bentworth in Hamshire, and was educated at Magdalen college, Oxford. He studied law at Lincoln's Inn, but did not practise. In 1613 he was committed to prison for his satires, called "Abuses Stript and Whipt." In the civil war he espoused the popular cause, and rose to the rank of major-general. After the restoration he was again incarcerated for his writings, and remained for more than three years in durance. He d. in 1667. Of his numerous works many are hasty and incorrect, but in his "Shepherds Hunting," and some of his other pieces, there is much of genuine poetry.

WITHERSPOON, JOHN, a signer of the declaration of independence, was b. in Scotland, 1722, and was educated at the university of Edinburgh. He studied divinity, and became one of the most influential and distinguished of the Scottish clergy. Being induced to accept the presidency of the college at Princeton, he removed to New Jersey with his family in 1768. In 1776 he was appointed a delegate to the continental congress, and retained a seat there during the war. On the return of peace he resumed his duties at the college. D. 1794.

WODHULL, MICHAEL, a poet, was b. 1740, at Thenford, in Northamptonshire; was educated at Winchester school, and at Brazenose college, Oxford; lived on his paternal estate, and amused his leisure hours with literature; and d. in 1816. He wrote poems, which have a considerable portion of merit; and translated the tragedies of Euripides.

WOLCOTT, JOHN, a poet, better known by the name of Peter Pindar, was b. 1738, at Doddbrook, in Devonshire; was educated at private seminaries; and was apprenticed to his uncle, an apothecary at Truro, who ultimately left him the bulk of his property. Having taken a degree, he accompanied Sir William Trelawney to the government of Jamaica, as physician. While residing in that island he took orders, and was presented to a living. On his return to England he settled at Truro, whence he removed to Helstone. It was while he was living in Cornwall that he drew from obscurity the painter Opie; and in 1780 he went with him to settle in London. Wolcott's first publication, "An Epistle to the Reviewers," appeared in 1778. After his arrival in the metropolis, his productions rapidly succeeded each other, and were highly popular. Among his most finished works are, "Lyric Odes to the Royal Academicians," and "The Leusiad." In the decline of life he became blind, and he d. January 14, 1819.—OLIVER, governor of Connecticut, was b. 1727, and received his education at Yale college. He served as captain in the French war, and studied medicine though he never practised. He was a delegate to the congress of 1776, signed the declaration of independence and the articles of confederation, and remained a member till 1785. In 1785 he was elected deputy governor, and was re-elected till 1796, when he was made governor. D. 1797.

WOLF, FREDERIC AUGUSTUS, an eminent German philologist, was b. 1759, at Ilaynrode, in Holstein; was educated at Gottingen; was appointed professor, in 1783, at the university of Halle, where he remained for twenty-three years; had a considerable share in founding and organizing the new university at Berlin, in 1808, and became professor of it; and d. in 1824. He edited, and added notes and dissertations to, many Greek and Roman classics; and wrote "A History of Roman Literature," and other works.

WOLFE, JAMES, a celebrated general, the son of a lieutenant-general, was b. 1726, at Westerham, in Kent, and distinguished himself, before he was 20, at the battle of Laffeldt. He increased his reputation so much by his conduct at Minden and Louisburgh, that Pitt selected him to command the expedition against Quebec. Wolfe overcame all obstacles, scaled the heights of Abraham, and compelled the enemy to risk the province on the issue of a battle. In the moment of victory he fell, mortally wounded. Cries of "They run!" struck his ear. Rousing himself from the faintness of death, he inquired, "Who run?" and being told that it was the French, he exclaimed, "Thank God, then I die contented!" and immediately expired. D. 1759.—CHARLES, an Irish divine and poet, was b. 1791, at Dublin; was educated at Trinity college, Dublin; obtained the enacy of Ballyclog, which he exchanged for that of Castle Caulfield; and d. of consumption, in February, 1823. He wrote the well-known "Ode on the Death of Sir John Moore," beginning with, "Not a drum was heard;" and the praise which, after his decease, was bestowed upon that piece, induced his friends to publish a volume of his "Remains."

WOLFIUS, CHRISTIAN, an eminent German mathematician and philosopher, who filled the professor's chair in the university of Halle, and was eventually created a baron of the empire. His principal works are, "Elementa Matheseos Universæ," "A System of Philosophy," and a "Treatise on the Law of Nature and Nations."—JOHN CHRISTOPHER, a divine and philologist, b. in 1683. He was author of many works on Hebrew and Greek literature, and bequeathed a vast collection of rabbinical and oriental books to the public library at Hamburgh, where he d. in 1739.—JEROME, an eminent critic and classical scholar, who d. at Augsburg, in 1580.—JOHN, an historical and miscellaneous writer, who was employed as a diplomatist, and at his death, in 1600, was governor of Mindelsheim.

WOLLASTON, WILLIAM, an ethical and theological writer, was b. 1659, at Cotton Clanford, in Staffordshire; was educated at Sidney college, Cambridge; took orders; but obtained an independence which turned his views from church preferment; and d. 1724. His principal work is, "The Religion of Nature Delineated."—WILLIAM HYDE, a physician and experimental philosopher, the great-grandson of the foregoing, was b. 1766, and was educated at Caius college, Cambridge. Fortunately for the interests of science, his want of patronage as a physician, at Bury St. Edmunds and London, induced him to give up the medical profession in disgust, and devote himself to scientific pursuits. The result was that he became one of the most eminent chemists and experimentalists of modern times. Among his discoveries are the two metals, palladium and rhodium, and the method of rendering platina malleable, by the last of which he is said to have gained thirty thousand pounds. Among his inventions are, a sliding scale of chemical equivalents, a goniometer, and the camera lucida. His papers in the "Philosophical Transactions" are numerous. D. 1828.

WOLSEY, THOMAS, Cardinal, an eminent prelate and statesman, the son of a butcher, was b. 1471, at Ipswich. He was educated at Magdalen college, Oxford. His first preferment of importance was that of chaplain to Henry VII., who gave him the deanery of Lincoln, as a reward for his expeditious execution of some diplomatic business. Being introduced to Henry VIII. by Fox, bishop of Winchester, he made a rapid progress in the royal favor, till at length he reached the highest pitch of power to which a subject can aspire. He lived in princely state; and his train consisted of eight hundred persons, of whom many were knights and gentlemen. Charles V. and Francis I. were suitors for his influence with his master, and bought it by pensions and professions of respect. His great ambition was, to fill the papal chair, but in this he was disappointed. At length his capricious sovereign became his enemy. The conduct of Wolsey relative to the divorce from Catharine of Aragon was the first cause of offence. In 1529 he was deprived of the seals, a part of his property was seized, and he was impeached. A full pardon, however was granted to him, and in 1530 he retired to Cawood castle. There, in the autumn of that year, he was again arrested, on a charge of high treason, and he d. at Leicester, on his way to London, on the 28th of November. He founded a collegiate school at Ipswich, and the college of Christ-church, and several lectureships, at Oxford.

WOOD, ANTHONY, a biographer and antiquary, was b. 1632 at Oxford, and was educated at Merton college. The perusal of some works on heraldry, and of Dugdale's "Warwickshire," inspired in him a taste for antiquarian lore. His "History and Antiquities of Oxford," which was translated into Latin by Dr. Fell, appeared in 1774, and his "Athenæ Oxonienses" was published in 1691. An attack upon Lord Clarendon, in the last of these works, subjected him to a sentence of expulsion, and his Jacobitical prejudices rendered him an object of hatred to the Whig party. D. 1695.

—ROBERT, a scholar and a man of taste, was b. in 1716, at Riverstown, in the Irish county of Meath; made the tour of Greece, Egypt, and Palestine, in 1751; was appointed under-secretary of state in 1759; and d. 1771. He wrote a "Description of the Ruins of Balbec," "The Ruins of Palmyra," and an "Essay on the Life and Writings of Homer."

WOODBURY, LEVI, was b. at Frankestown, N. H., about the year 1790, was graduated at Dartmouth college in 1809, and was admitted to the bar in 1812. In 1816 he was appointed secretary of state, and at the commencement of the next year a judge of the superior court. In 1819 he removed to Portsmouth; he was elected governor in 1832. He was elected to the United States senate, in which body he served from 1824 to 1831. In the spring of 1831 he was appointed secretary of the navy by General Jackson. After holding that office for several years, he was nominated to the post of secretary of the treasury, by General Jackson, after the rejection of Mr. Taney, by the senate. He left the cabinet at the end of Mr. Van Buren's administration, in 1841, after having belonged to it about 10 years. He was immediately elected to the United States senate, by the legislature of New Hampshire, and remained there until he was appointed one of the justices of the supreme court, by President Polk, who had previously offered him the office of minister to England. D. 1851.

WOODDESON, RICHARD, an eminent civilian, was b. in 1745, at Kingston, in Surrey; was educated at Kingston grammar school, and at Pembroke and Magdalen colleges, Oxford; was chosen Vinerian professor, on the resignation of Sir Robert Chambers; and d. 1822. He wrote "Elements of Jurisprudence," "A Systematic View of the Laws of England," and a "Brief Vindication of the Rights of the British Legislature," in reply to Mr. Reeves.

WOODFALL, a printer and parliamentary reporter, was b. about 1745, and was the son of a printer who was proprietor of "The Daily Advertiser." He was brought up to his father's occupation, but was so fond of the stage that for a short time he was an actor, and, to the close of his life, never missed being present at the coming out of a new piece. He was successively editor of "The London Packet," and "The Morning Chronicle," and editor and owner of the "Diary." Woodfall had an astonishingly retentive memory, and was the first who gave a full and immediate detail of the proceedings of the legislature. D. 1803.

WOODHOUSE, ROBERT, an eminent mathematician; was educated at Cambridge; was Plumian professor in 1822, and keeper of the observatory in 1824. He wrote "The Principles of Analytical Calculation," a "Treatise on Trigonometry," a "Treatise on Isoperimetric Problems," an "Elementary Treatise on Plane Astronomy," and several papers in the "Philosophical Transactions." D. 1757.

WOOLSTON, THOMAS, a deistical writer, was b. 1669, at Northampton, and was educated at Sidney college, Cambridge. The perusal of the writings of Origen gave him a fondness for allegorizing, and his first work, "The Old Apology for the Truth of the Christian Religion revived," was meant to prove that the actions of Moses were typical of Christ and the church. He gradually became a deist, and at length his "Six Discourses on Miracles," and his "Defence of the Discourses," brought upon him a prosecution for blasphemy, and he was fined and imprisoned. D. within the rules of the King's Bench, in 1732.

WORCESTER, EDWARD SOMERSET, marquis of, a man of highly inventive talents, was b. about 1697; was employed, when earl of Glamorgan, by Charles I. to negotiate with the Irish Catholics; and d. in 1667. In 1663 he published his curious pamphlet called "The Scantlings of One Hundred Inventions." Among those inventions is the steam-engine, though described, like all the rest of the articles, in a somewhat enigmatical manner. He afterwards put forth a tract, which he called "An Exact and True Definition of the most stupendous Water-commanding Engine." Walpole, who was ignorant upon the subject, calls him "a fantastic mechanic," and some later writers have endeavored to depreciate his merit; but the feasibility of many of his projects has been amply proved.—NOAH, an eminent divine of Massachusetts, whose devotion to the cause of peace acquired for him the name of the Apostle of Peace. He was the secretary of the first peace society, and by his "Calm Review of the Custom of War," and other works, he succeeded in attracting a large share of public attention to the subject. Dr. Channing, in his "Sermon on the Philanthropist," makes a beautiful allusion to his life. D. 1837.

WORDSWORTH, WILLIAM, was b. at Cockermonth, in Cumberland, April 7th, 1770. He received the rudiments of his mental culture at Hawkshead school, and in the year 1787 was entered at St. John's college, Cambridge. Having completed his studies and taken his academical degree, he made the tour of France and Switzerland, at a period when the revolution in France had attained its grand crisis; and its influence upon the fiery imagination and sensitive mind of Wordsworth was no less forcible than that produced upon those of his friends and frequent companions, Coleridge, Southey, and Lloyd. The earnest thoughts that had been generated by his continued meditations upon this theme found an utterance in his "Descriptive Sketches" and "Evening Walk," both of which made their appearance in 1793. In 1797 he had conceived a plan for the regeneration of English poetry. In 1798 he published, in conjunction with Coleridge, a collection of "Lyrical Ballads." The majority of these productions were from his own pen. This book, so far from making converts to Wordsworth's peculiar way of thinking, met everywhere with the bitterest contempt and ridicule. Still many of his readers sympathized with his views, and through their encouragement he was induced to publish two other volumes of poetry in 1807. In 1814 appeared his great work, "The Excursion." Several works followed this, among which may be mentioned "The White Doe of Rylstone;" and in 1842 appeared a volume containing several poems written in the poet's early youth, accompanied by others written in his old age. In 1843 he succeeded his friend Southey as poet-laureate. For many years Wordsworth enjoyed the privilege of receiving that gerudon of love and admiration, while living, which are too frequently only scattered like garlands upon the tomb of genius. Thousands of his admirers made a pilgrimage to the poet's sanctuary, Rydal Mount; and not a few crossed over from other lands to catch a glimpse of that great man who has filled the world with his fame. D. 1850. His noble autobiographical poem, "The Prelude, or the Growth of a Poet's Mind," was a posthumous publication.

WORMIUS, OLAUS, an able Danish physician and antiquary, was b. in 1588, at Aarhusen, in Jutland; studied at Marburg, Strasburgh, and Basle; was successively professor of belles lettres, Greek literature, and physic, at Copenhagen, and was made a canon of the cathedral of Lunden by Christiern IV., as a reward for his medical services. D. 1654.

WOTTON, SIR HENRY, a diplomatist and miscellaneous writer, was b. in 1568, at Broughton hall, in Kent, and was educated at Winchester school, and at New college and Queen's college, Oxford. After having visited France, Germany, and Italy, he was appointed secretary to the earl of Essex, whom he accompanied on his expedition against the Spaniards, and into Ireland. On the fall of that nobleman, Wotton went to reside at Florence. James I. employed him as ambassador at Venice, and on various missions to Italian and German princes. He was made provost of Eton college in 1624. He wrote "Elements of Architecture," "The State of Christendom," and "Reliquiæ Wottonianæ." Some of his poems are spirited and elegant. D. 1639.

WOULFE, PETER, an eminent chemist, who d. 1805. His character was marked by great eccentricity. He was a firm believer in alchemy. His apartments were so filled with furnaces, and the articles of a laboratory that his fire-side was not easily reached. He breakfasted at four in the morning; and his mode of curing any serious indisposition was to take a place in the mail to Edinburgh, and immediately return from that city. He invented an apparatus for experiments on gases; and contributed several papers to the "Philosophical Transactions."

WOUVERMANS, PHILIP, an eminent artist, the son of an indifferent historical painter, was b. in 1620, at Haarlem, and was a pupil of Wynants; but much improved himself by an indefatigable study of nature. Great as was his merit, he was so poorly patronized as to be always in narrow circumstances; and, before his death, he ordered a box filled with his designs to be burned, that his son might not be allured to embrace "so uncertain and miserable a profession." D. 1668.

WRAGG, WILLIAM, was b. in South Carolina, in 1714, and was educated in England, where he studied law and entered upon its practice. Not long afterwards he returned to his native country, in 1753 was made one of the king's council for the province, and in 1769 was offered the seat of chief justice, which he declined. When the revolution commenced he maintained a conscientious opposition to the measures of the colonies, and determined to return to England. He embarked for that country and was wrecked in a violent storm on the coast of Holland, in September, 1777. A monument is erected to his memory in Westminster abbey.

WRAXALL, SIR NATHANIEL WILLIAM, baronet, an eminent traveller and historical writer, was b. at Bristol, in 1751. He entered into the civil service of the East India Company, and in 1771 acted as judge-advocate and paymaster of the forces for the presidency of Bombay. Next year he returned to England, and then travelled on the Continent, visiting almost every country from Naples to Lapland. He published several "Tours," the "History of the House of Valois," "Memoirs of the Courts of Berlin, Dresden, Warsaw, and Vienna," "The History of France," &c. In 1813 he was created a baronet; and, in 1815, he published his last work, "Historical Memoirs of his Own Time." In these memoirs, which contain a fund of anecdote, was a libel on Count Woronzow, the Russian ambassador, for which Sir Nathaniel was sentenced to a fine and six months' imprisonment. D. at Dover, while on his way to Naples, in 1831.

WREN, SIR CHRISTOPHER, a celebrated architect and mathematician, son of the dean of Windsor, was b. 1632, at East Knoyle, in Wiltshire, and was educated at Wadham college, Oxford. His mathematical talents were precociously manifested; in his 13th year he invented an astronomical instrument and a pneumatic machine; and at 15 he wrote "A New System of Spherical Trigonometry." He was one of the earliest members of the philosophical society at Oxford, which afterwards ripened into the Royal Society. In 1657 he was chosen Gresham professor of astronomy, and in 1661 Savilian professor at Oxford. During this period he made many curious discoveries in astronomy, natural philosophy, and other sciences. It was in 1663 that his architectural talents were first called into action, when he was commissioned to prepare designs for the restoration of St. Paul's cathedral. The fire of London, however, soon opened to him a wider sphere. Between 1668 and 1718, he built St. Paul's, (which was begun in 1675,) the Monument, the hospitals of Chelsea and Greenwich, various edifices at Oxford and Cambridge, Winchester castle, the new part of Hampton court, and nearly sixty churches. In 1680 he was chosen president of the Royal Society. In 1718 political intrigue unworthily deprived him of the surveyor-generalship of his majesty's works, which he had held during half a century. D. 1723.

WRIGHT, EDWARD, a mathematician, was b. at Garveston, in Norfolk, in the latter end of the 16th century; was educated at Caius college, Cambridge; accompanied the earl of Cumberland in his voyages; and was appointed mathematical lecturer to the East India Company. The true method of dividing the meridian line was first discovered by him. He wrote "The Correction of certain Errors in Navigation," and "The Haven finding Art." D. 1615.—JOSEPH, an eminent painter, commonly known as Wright of Derby, was b. in that town, in 1734, and was a pupil of Hudson, after which he studied in Italy.

On returning to England he resided for two years at Bath, and then settled at Derby, where he d. 1797. He displayed no common talents in portrait, landscape, and historical painting. Among his principal works are, "The Eruption of Vesuvius," "The Head of Ulleswater Lake," "The Dead Soldier," "The Destruction of the Floating Batteries at Gibraltar," "Belshazzar's Feast," "Hero and Leander," and "The Lady in Comus."—SILAS, was b. at Amherst, Mass., on the 24th of May, 1795, was graduated at Middlebury college, 1815, and a few years afterwards was admitted to the bar in the state of New York. In 1825 he was elected to the senate of the state, where he soon distinguished himself for sagacity and talent. The next year he was chosen a member of congress. In 1829 he was made comptroller of the state; and, in 1833, a senator of the United States. His position there was early assumed, and long maintained with the utmost integrity and power. D. 1847.

WYAT, Sir THOMAS, a statesman and poet, was b. in 1503, at Allington, in Kent; was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, and at Oxford; was a favorite of Henry VIII.; was employed on various diplomatic missions; and d. in 1541. His poems have very considerable merit, and were printed with those of his friend, the accomplished earl of Surrey.

WYATT, JAMES, an eminent architect, was b. about 1743, at Burton, in Staffordshire; studied architecture and painting at Rome; succeeded Sir William Chambers as surveyor of the board of works; was for a while president of the Royal Academy; and was killed, September 5, 1813, by the overturning of a carriage. Among his works are, the Pantheon, Kew palace, Fonthill abbey, various improvements at Windsor, Westminster, and Salisbury, and the wings to the duke of Devonshire's villa at Chiswick.—R. J., an accomplished sculptor, was b. in 1795, in Oxford-street, London, where his father, Edward Wyatt, was then settled. At an early age he was articled to Charles Rossi, for the term of seven years; and during that term his services at the Royal Academy were so successfully prosecuted, as to entitle him to the award of two medals upon different occasions. At the time Wyatt was under the tuition of Rossi, he executed a monument in the church of Esher, in memory of Mrs. Hughes, and another in the chapel at St. John's Wood. When Canova visited England, he became so far interested in Wyatt, as at once to promise him his protection and the permission to work in his studio at Rome. Thither he proceeded in the early part of the year 1821, after having spent some time in Paris under the celebrated Italian sculptor Bozio; and so devotedly did he prosecute the labors of his profession, that only once in this lengthened term of nearly 30 years did he revisit his native country, and that occasion was in the year 1841, when he was honored by the queen with a commission for his statue of Penelope, which in Rome was considered the best of his works. His group of "Ino and the Infant Bacchus," a statue of "Glycera," "Musidora," a statue; two statues of Nymphs, and "Penelope," a charming statue, the property of her majesty, are all works of high merit. D. 1850.

WYCHERLEY, WILLIAM, a wit and dramatist, was b. about 1640, at Cleve in Shropshire. He studied at Queen's college, Oxford, and the Middle Temple, but paid little attention to law. His "Love in a Wood," which was acted in 1672, gave him popularity, and he became a favorite of Charles II. and the duke of Buckingham. His marriage with the countess of Drogheda, however, deprived him of the smiles of the sovereign, and her jealousy embittered his existence. After her death, the succession to her property involved him in lawsuits, and he spent several years in prison, till he was released by James II. He d. in 1715. He wrote, besides the comedy already mentioned, "The Gentleman Dancing Master," "The Country Wife," "The Plain Dealer," "Poems," and some pieces which were published after his decease.

WYNDHAM, Sir WILLIAM, a celebrated statesman, was a native of Somersetshire, and b. in 1637. Having been elected M. P. for the county, he soon became conspicuous as one of the ablest senators in the house. He was appointed secretary of war, and afterwards chancellor of the exchequer; but being displaced on the death of Queen Anne, he took a leading part in opposition, and signalized himself by his defence of the duke of Ormond and the earls of Oxford and Strafford, when impeached by the commons. He was committed to the Tower in 1715, on the charge of being concerned in the rebellion of the earl of Mar, but was never brought to trial. D. 1740.—CHARLES, his eldest son, became earl of Egremont, and d. in 1763.

WYTHE, GEORGE, a signer of the declaration of American independence, was b. in Virginia, in 1726. His early course was dissipated, but at the age of 30 he reformed, turned his attention to literature, studied law and commenced its practice. At the breaking out of the revolution he was a distinguished leader of the popular party. He was for some time speaker of the house of burgesses, and in 1775 was elected a member of congress. He was one of the committee to revise the laws of Virginia in 1776, and had a principal share in preparing the code adopted in 1779. Soon after he was appointed one of the three judges of the high court of chancery, and subsequently sole counsellor. He was a member of the convention of Virginia to consider the constitution of the United States. His death, which was attributed to poison, took place in 1806.

WYTFENBACH, DANIEL, a learned philologist, was b. 1746, at Berne; studied at Marburg, and at Gottingen, under Heyne; and became professor of philosophy and literature at the Remonstrants' college at Amsterdam. He was subsequently appointed philosophical professor at the institution called the Illustrious Athenæum, in the same city; and, in 1799, he succeeded Ruhnken at Leyden. D. 1820. He published an edition of the moral works of Plutarch.

X.

XAVIER, St. FRANCIS, denominated the Apostle of the Indies, was b. 1506, at the castle of Xavier, in Navarre; studied at Paris; became one of the first and most zealous disciples of Ignatius Loyola; was sent to the East by John III. of Portugal, to propagate the gospel; performed his mission in Hindostan, the Moluccas, and Japan; and was on the point of landing in China, when he d. 1552.

XENOCRATES, a Greek philosopher, was b. 406 B. C., at Chalcedon; was a disciple of Plato; succeeded Speusippus in the Platonic school; and d. about 314 B. C. Such was his command over his passions, that the beautiful Phyrne in vain endeavored to rouse them, though she had confidently wagered upon her success. His works are lost, with the exception of a "Treatise on Death."

XENOPHANES, a Greek philosopher, was b. in the 7th century B. C., at Colophon, in Asia Minor; settled at Elea in his 18th year; and d. there at the age of more than 100. He founded the Eleatic sect, and his doctrines were delivered in verse.

XENOPHON, a celebrated philosopher, historian, and general, a native of Athens, was b. about 445 B. C., and was a disciple of Socrates. After having borne arms at the battle of Delium, and in the Peloponnesian war, he became one of the body of Greek auxiliaries, who fought on the side of the younger Cyrus against Artaxerxes. When the Grecian leaders were treacherously slain, after the battle of Cunaxa, the arduous task of conducting the retreat was intrusted to Xenophon, and he performed it with consummate skill. Subsequently he served under the banners of Thrace and of Lacedæmon. D. at Corinth, 360 B. C.

XIMENES DE CISNEROS, Cardinal FRANCIS, an eminent Spanish statesman, was b. in 1437, at Torrelaguna, in Old Castile, and was educated at Alcalá and Salamanca. After having filled various benefices, he became a monk of the Franciscan order, and obtained great reputation as a preacher. In his 56th year, Queen Isabella made him her confessor, and, two years afterwards, he was raised to the archbishopric of Toledo. It was not, however, till he received the express injunction of the pope that he would accept the archiepiscopal dignity, and he continued to preserve the austere habits of a Franciscan. He subsequently became prime minister, and a cardinal, and Ferdinand, on his death-bed, appointed him regent till the arrival of Charles V. D. 1517.

XYLANDER, WILLIAM, a learned critic, whose real name was HOLTZEMANN, was b. 1532, at Angsburch; displayed a profound knowledge of the classics at an early age; was chosen Greek professor at Heidelberg, in 1558; and d. 1576.

Y.

YALDEN, THOMAS, a divine and poet was b. 1671, at Exeter; was educated at Magdalen college, Oxford; obtained, successively, the livings of Willoughby, Chalton, and Clanfield, and the preachingship of Bridewell hospital; was implicated with Bishop Atterbury, but was soon released, and d. in 1736. His poems have been admitted into the collected works of the British poets.

YATES, FREDERIC HENRY, a popular and versatile actor, first made his appearance on the stage in a piece called "The Actor of All Work," in 1817. In the following year he was engaged at Covent-garden, subsequently may be said to have performed in every line of character from Shakspeare's tragedy to the broadest farce, and it was not easy to decide whether his pathos or his humor were most admirable. As manager of the Adelphi theatre his taste and skill were also universally allowed. D. 1842.—RICHARD, a comic actor, who for many years was a public favorite in Fondlewife, in the "Old Bachelor," and similar characters: D. 1796.—ANNA MARIA, his wife, was a tragic actress of great ability; and on the death of Mrs. Cibber, in 1765, she for a time became the unrivalled heroine of the stage. D. 1787.

YEARSLEY, ANNE, a writer of poems, novels, and dramas, was b. about 1756, at Bristol, and was originally a milkwoman. Some of her verses obtained for her the patronage of Miss Hannah More, under whose auspices a volume of her productions was published by subscription in 1785. The profits enabled her to open a circulating library at the Hot Wells. Among her works are, "Poems," "Earl Godwyn," a tragedy, and "The Royal Captives," a romance. D. 1806.

YORK, FREDERIC, duke of, second son of George III., was b. in 1763, at Buckingham-house, Westminster. In 1784 he received the title which he bore till the end of his life, and in 1787 he took his seat in the upper house. He narrowly escaped death in 1789, in a duel with Colonel Lenox. In 1791 he married the eldest daughter of the king of Prussia. He was placed at the head of the British army in Flanders in 1793, and, after alternate success, was expelled from that country by the French. Nor was he more fortunate in 1799, when he was employed in Holland, he being under the necessity of signing a disadvantageous convention. His office of commander-in-chief, to which he was appointed in 1795, he resigned in 1809, in consequence of the charges which were brought against him by Colonel Wardle. He was, however, reinstated by the prince-regent, and held it till his decease, on the 5th of January, 1827. It is but justice to say that he administered it in a manner which was highly beneficial to the army.

YOUNG, EDWARD, a poet and miscellaneous writer, was b. 1681, or, according to some, in 1679, at Upham, in Hants, and was educated at Winchester school, and at New college, Oxford. He was designed for the law, and took his degree of doctor, but he at length chose the clerical profession, and, in 1723, was ordained, and appointed chaplain to the king. His poetical reputation he had already established by the poems of "The Last Day," "The Force of Religion," and "The Love of Fame," and the tragedies of "The Revenge," and "Busiris." In 1730 he obtained the living of Welwyn, and though for several years he (to use his own words) "besieged court favor," he received no further church promotion. His "Night Thoughts" are supposed to have been prompted by the death of his wife, whom he lost in 1741. He d. in 1755. His poetical and prose works form four vols.—ARTHUR, an eminent agricultural writer, was b. 1741, at Bradfield, in Suffolk. He was apprenticed to a wine merchant, at Lynn, in Norfolk; but quitted that business to engage in farming. In furtherance of his wish to improve the husbandry of his country, he not only made innumerable experiments on his own land, but also travelled over the greatest part of the British islands, and in France, Spain, and Italy. In 1770 he published his "Farmer's Calendar," which became a popular work; and in 1774 he established "The Annals of Agriculture." On the establishment of the board of agriculture he was appointed secretary, an office which he held till his decease in 1820. Among his principal works, besides those already mentioned, are his "Tours in England, Ireland, and France."—MATTHEW, a mathematician and divine, was b. 1750, in the county of Roscommon; was educated at Trinity college, Dublin, at which, in 1786, he became professor of philosophy; was raised to the see of Clonfert by Marquis Cornwallis, and d. in 1800. He wrote "An Essay on Sounds," "An Analysis of the Principles of Natural Philosophy," and "The Method of prime and ultimate Ratios."—SIR WILLIAM, a miscellaneous writer, was b. in 1750, at Charlton-house, near Canterbury, was educated at Eton, Clare-hall, Cambridge, and University college, Oxford; was M. P. for St. Maves, in 1783, and d. 1815, governor of Tobago. His principal works are, "The History of Athens," and "The West India Common Place Book."—THOMAS, an eminent philosopher and physician, a nephew of Dr. Brocklesby, was b. 1774, was educated at Göttingen and Edinburgh, and was physician to St. George's hospital, and foreign secretary to the Royal Society. Besides contributing a great number of valuable papers to the supplement to the "Encyclopædia Britannica," and to many scientific periodicals, he wrote several works, of which the chief are, "A Course of Lectures on Natural Philosophy," "An Introduction to Medical Literature," a "Practical and Historical Treatise on Consumptive Disease," and "Elementary Illustration of the Celestial Mechanics of La Place." To Dr. Young belongs the merit, which has been claimed for M. Champollion, of having discovered the means of deciphering the Egyptian hieroglyphics. D. 1827.

YPSILANTI, Prince ALEXANDER, son of Demetrius, hospodar of Wallachia, in 1802, accompanied his father when he took refuge in Russia. He entered into the Russian army, attained the rank of major-general, and was made aid-de-camp to the emperor. When the Greek revolution broke out he was chosen to hoist the standard of freedom in Wallachia and Moldavia. He was, however, routed by the Turks, and was forced to fly into Austria, where he was long held captive in the fortress of Mongatz. D. at Vienna, 1821.

YRIARTE, Don THOMAS DE, an eminent Spanish poet, was b. about 1760, at Tenerife; studied at Madrid; held office under government, and was made editor of the "Madrid Mercury." Of his works, which form eight volumes, the principal are, "Comedies," "Music," a poem, "Literary Fables," "Moral Epistles," and "Miscellanies." D. in 1791.

Z.

ZABAGLIA, NICHOLAS, an architect, was b. 1674, at Rome, and d. there in 1750. His first occupation was that of a carpenter at the Vatican; but the various masterly mechanical engines which he invented, and the abilities which he displayed, caused him to be appointed architect of St. Peter's. Zabaglia is the inventor of the method by which fresco paintings are transferred from the plaster on which they were originally executed.

ZACCARIA, FRANCIS ANTHONY, a Jesuit, was b. 1714, at Venice; succeeded Muratori as librarian at Modena; retired to Rome after the dissolution of his order; and d. there, in 1795, professor of ecclesiastical history at the Sapienza college. Of his 106 printed works, the most important are, "Literary History of Italy," "Literary Annals of Italy," "Anecdotes of the Middle Ages," and "Numismatic Institutions."

ZACHARIA, JUSTUS FREDERIO WILLIAM, a German poet, was b. 1726, at Frankenhäusen, in Thuringia; was educated at Leipsic; was appointed professor of poetry in the Caroline college, at Brunswick; and d. 1777. His poems—among the best of which are, "Phæton," "The Four Parts of the Day," and "Woman in the Four Stages of her Life"—form nine volumes octavo.

ZARCO, JOHN GONZALES, a Portuguese navigator of the 15th century. He discovered, in 1417 and 1419, the islands of Porto Santo and Madeira. In 1421 he was made governor of a part of the latter island, and founded Funchal. Zarco is said to have introduced the use of artillery in ships.

ZENDRINI, BERNARD, an eminent Italian mathematician, but especially celebrated for his skill in hydraulics, was b. in 1679, at Savio; studied at Padua; and settled at Venice as a physician. His profound knowledge of the subject caused him to be appointed chief hydraulic engineer at Ferrara, and the same office, with the superintendence of all the waters, rivers, and ports, was afterwards conferred on him by the Venetian republic. He was also employed by the Austrian government and the republic of Lucca. Many works of great importance were executed by him. D. 1747.

ZENO, OF ELEA, a philosopher, was b. about 463 B. C., at Elea, in Magna Græcia, and was a disciple of Parmenides. The invention of dialectics is ascribed to him. His native city having fallen under the dominion of a despot, he endeavored to deliver it, but failed; and, being put to the torture, he is said to have bitten off his tongue, and spit it into the face of the tyrant.—The founder of the sect of the Stoics, was b. about 362 B. C., at Citium, in the isle of Cyprus, and quitted mercantile pursuits to become a philosopher. After having received the lessons of Crates, Stilpo, Xenocrates, and Polemon, he himself opened a school of philosophy in the Stoa, or painted portico, whence his followers were called Stoics. He taught for nearly fifty years; was highly respected by the Athenians; and d. 264 B. C.—NICHOLAS and ANTHONY, two brothers, natives of Venice, who, about 1388, are believed to have discovered the Feroe islands, Greenland, and Newfoundland. Their voyages were first published, in 1538, by Mercolini.—APOSTOLO, an eminent Italian writer, was b. in 1668, at Venice. In 1691 he founded the academy "degli Animosi," and in 1710 he began "The Literary Journal," of which the first 20 volumes are from his pen; the remainder being the composition of his brother. Having obtained reputation by his dramatic compositions, Charles VI., in 1718, invited him to Vienna, and appointed him his historiographer and laureate. Zeno resided for eleven years at the imperial court, and produced nearly forty pieces. He returned to his own country in 1731, and d. in 1750. His theatrical compositions form ten volumes; and his Letters, and other prose compositions, nearly twenty.

ZENOBIA, SEPTIMA, queen of Palmyra, was descended from the Ptolemies, and her mind was cultivated by the lessons of Longinus. After the death of Odenatus, in whose labors of war and government she had participated, she assumed the title of Queen of the East, pushed her conquests in various directions, and rendered Palmyra one of the most splendid of oriental cities. Aurelian made war against her, and, after having gained two battles, laid siege to Palmyra. She was taken while attempting to escape; was carried to Rome to grace his triumph; and d. there, in private life, about 300.

ZEUXIS, a celebrated painter of antiquity, is believed to have been b. about 497 B. C., and to have d. about 400 B. C. He was a native of Heraclea, but of which of the cities bearing that name is not known, though it is supposed to be the Heraclea of Magna Græcia. He brought to perfection the management of light and shade. Of his own merit he had a sufficiently lofty idea; for, having become rich, he gave away his pictures, on the ground that no price was equal to their worth.

ZIMMERMAN, JOHN GEORGE, a physician and miscellaneous writer, was b. 1723, at Brugg, in the canton of Berne; studied medicine under Haller in Gottingen; practised for some years at his native place; was appointed, in 1763, chief physician to the king of England at Hanover; attended Frederic of Prussia on his death-bed; was a violent literary opponent of the Illuminati and the French revolutionists; and d., in 1795, a victim to hypochondriac disease. Among his works are, "A Treatise on Solitude," (once highly popular;) "An Essay on National Pride;" and "A Treatise on the Experience of Medicine."—EERIARD AUGUSTUS WILLIAM VON, a German naturalist, was b. at Weltzen, 1743; studied at Gottingen and Leyden; and obtained the professorship of natural philosophy at the Caroline college at Brunswick. His first work was a treatise on the "Analysis of Curves;" and in 1777 he published "Specimen Zoologia," the outline of his "Geographical History of Man and Quadrupeds." He visited England three times, and printed there, in 1787, his "Political Survey of the Present State of Europe;" and he subsequently employed his pen in opposing the revolutionary statesmen of France; for which he was ennobled by the Emperor Leopold II. After this he published several geographical works, one of the best of which was a "General Survey of France and of the United States of America." D. in 1815.

ZINCKE, CHRISTIAN FREDERIC, a German painter, was b. about 1684, at Dresden; studied under Boit; settled in England in his 22d year; became justly celebrated for the beauty of his enamel portraits; and d. in 1767.

ZINZENDORF, NICHOLAS LOUIS, Count, the restorer of the Moravian sect, was b. in 1700, at Dresden; was a son of the elector of Saxony's chamberlain; and studied at Halle and Wittenberg. He early manifested an enthusiastic turn of mind with respect to religious concerns. In 1721, having given an asylum on his estate to some of the persecuted Moravian brethren, he espoused their doctrines, and became the head of their church. To spread those doctrines, and procure toleration for the professors of them, he travelled over a large part of Europe, visited America. He d. in 1760. The Moravians, and their head, were long the subject of many gross calumnies, from which, however, their meritorious conduct has amply vindicated them.

ZISCA, JOHN, a celebrated Bohemian warrior, was b. about 1380, of a noble family. His real name was TROCHZNOW, but he received the appellation of Zisca, or one-eyed, after having lost an eye in battle. When the Hussites rose in arms to oppose the succession of Sigismund to the crown of Bohemia, they placed Zisca at their head, and he justified their choice by numerous victories over the enemy. Though he lost his other eye during the contest, he compelled Sigismund to submit to humiliating terms of peace. D. 1424.

ZOEGA, GEORGE, an eminent Danish archaeologist, was b. 1755, at Dahler, in Jutland; was educated at Altona and Gottingen; resided for many years at Rome, as consul for Denmark, and was much esteemed by Pius VI., and d. in 1809. Among his works are, "A Treatise de Origine et Usu Obeliscorum;" "Numi Ægyptii;" and the "Ancient Basso Relievoes of Rome."

ZOLLIKOFFER, GEORGE JOACHIM, a Swiss divine, was b. 1730, at St. Gall; was educated at Bremen and Utrecht; was, successively, a minister in the Pays de Vaud, the Grisons, and at Leipsic; and d. in 1798. Of his "Sermons," which form fifteen volumes, a part have been translated into English.

ZOROASTER, an ancient philosopher, of whose history little or nothing that is authentic is known. There are supposed to have been several of the name. The most celebrated, however, the Zerdusht of the Persians, is believed to have been the reformer of the Magian system of religion, and the author of the Zendavesta, which contains the doctrines that he taught. Irreconcilable differences exist among the learned as to the time in which he flourished. Volney fixes his birth 1250 B. C.

ZOUCH, RICHARD, a distinguished civilian, was b. about 1590, at Anstey, in Wiltshire; was educated at Winchester school, and at New college, Oxford; became regius professor of law at Oxford, principal of St. Alban's hall, warden of the cinque ports, and judge of the admiralty; and d. in 1660. His numerous works in civil, military, and maritime jurisprudence, all of them in Latin, are still esteemed.—THOMAS, a divine and biographer, was b. 1737, at Sandal, in Yorkshire; was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge; and d. in 1806, rector of Scrayingham, and prebendary of Durham. Late in life the bishopric of Carlisle was offered to him, but he refused it. Among his works are, memoirs of Sir P. Sidney, of Dean Sudbury, and of Sir George Wheeler; "An Inquiry into the Prophetic Character of the Romans," and "The Crucifixion," a Sea-sonian prize poem.

ZSCHÖKKE, HEINRICH, whose name occupies an important place in the annals of German literature and Swiss history, was b. at Magdeburg, 1771. He commenced life as a strolling player, but afterwards found means to study philosophy and divinity at Frankfurt-on-the-Oder; and, after many years of travels and varied adventures, he devoted himself to the education of youth, and fixed his residence in Switzerland, in 1792. Here he rendered great political services to his adopted country; and for more than forty years sent forth, at intervals, from his peaceful retreat at Aarau, various works of philosophy, history, criticism, and fiction; displaying at once the versatility of his acquirements, his fertile imagination, and a power and felicity of expression attained by few. His checkered life had given him a deep insight into the springs of human action; and few writers have more largely contributed to entertain and improve their fellow-men. His chief productions are, "Miscellen für die neueste Weltkunde," "History of Switzerland," "Bilder aus der Schweiz," "Das Goldmachedorf," "Stunden der Andacht," &c. His works have been collected in forty volumes, including his autobiography, and tales, which have been translated into English. D. in 1848.

ZUCCARELLI, FRANCIS, a celebrated

Italian painter, b. at Florence, 1710. He went to England about 1752, and met with such encouragement, that he saved a handsome independence, and returned to his own country, where he d. 1788.

ZUCCHERO, TADDEO, an eminent Italian painter, b. at Urbino, in 1529, who attained to great proficiency in the art, and d. in his 27th year.—FREDERICO, his younger brother, b. 1543, resided several years in England, where he grew into high repute, and painted the portrait of Queen Elizabeth. Previous to his going to that country he had given great offence to Pope Gregory XIII. by caricaturing several distinguished persons connected with the papal court; but his friends in England succeeded in restoring him to favor at Rome; and, on his return, he established an academy of painting in that city, which he continued to superintend till his death, in 1609.

ZUMBO, GAETANO JULIUS, a celebrated modeller in wax, was b. 1656, at Syracuse, in Sicily; and d. at Paris, in 1701. For the grand duke of Tuscany he executed, in colored wax, several admirable works. The most celebrated of these bears the name of the "Putrefaction." It exhibits five figures—a dying person, a dead body, a corpse in a state of incipient corruption, one half corrupted, and another in the last stage of corruption and a prey to worms. His masterpieces, a Nativity and a Descent from the Cross, are at Genoa.

ZURITA, JEROM, a Spanish historian, was b. 1512, at Saragossa, and, after having been employed in various offices at home, and on a mission to Germany, was appointed historiographer of Aragon. He d. in 1581. His greatest work is "Annals of the Crown of Aragon," in seven folio volumes.

ZWINGLI, or ZUINGLIUS, ULRIC, one of the most enlightened and tolerant of the Protestant reformers, was b. in 1484, at Wildhaus, in Switzerland, and was educated at Basle, Berne, and Vienna. On his return to Basle, he was appointed a classical teacher when he was only 18. In 1506 he took the degree of M.A., and was chosen minister of Glaris. In 1512 and 1515 he accompanied the auxiliary Swiss troops to Italy, and was present at the disastrous battle of Marignan; a circumstance which inspired or increased his abhorrence of all war except that which is undertaken for the defence of our native land. In 1516 he was made preacher at Einseidlen, and it was at that period that he entered upon the career of ecclesiastical reformation. In 1518 he became rector of Zurich. Steadily but prudently he pursued his course of reform, and, in 1524, had the gratification of seeing his doctrines adopted by the great council of Zurich. His influence among the Swiss Protestants continued to be powerful during the remainder of his life. In 1531, war having broken out between the Catholic and Protestant cantons, Zuinglius was ordered by the senate to accompany the troops, and was unfortunately slain in the skirmish at Cappel.

A.

ABBAS, PACHA, a grandson of Mehemit Ali, was born 1813, and became viceroy of Egypt in 1848. He directed the attention of his people toward agricultural industry, released them from the pressure of severe taxation, and removed, as far as possible, all restrictions on free internal trade. He expended large sums in making a carriage road across the desert to Suez, in improving the Nile navigation, and in constructing a railroad from Cairo to Alexandria. D. 1854.

ABDUL MEDJID, KHAN, sultan of Turkey, b. 1822; d. 1861.

A'BECKETT, GILBERT ABBOTT, a popular English writer. His first successful literary venture was a comic paper called "Figaro in London." He was called to the bar in 1841, but continued to employ a portion of his leisure in writing for the press. He wrote the "Comic Blackstone" and "Comic History of England," and was a constant contributor to "Punch," as well as to some of the London daily journals. In 1849 he was appointed one of the metropolitan police magistrates, which office he held until his death. D. 1856.

ABERT, JOHN J., many years chief of the United States corps of engineers. b. 1790; d. 1863. He entered the military academy as a cadet in 1808, and remained until 1811. In 1814, while employed in the war-office, he volunteered for the defence of the capital, and in Nov. 1814 was appointed topographical engineer, with the rank of major. In 1824 he was brevetted lieutenant colonel, and in 1829 was placed at the head of the topographical bureau. When the present corps of topographical engineers was organized, under the act of congress of 1838; he was appointed its colonel and chief; a position which he held until Sept. 1861, when incapacity for further service necessitated his resignation.

ADAIR, SIR ROBERT, a British diplomatist whose services date in the time of Fox and Canning. He was the last surviving friend of Charles James Fox. B. 1763; d. 1855.

ADAM, SIR CHARLES, a British admiral, and governor of Greenwich Hospital. D. 1853.

ADAMS, CHARLES, the historian of "The Patriot War," b. 1787; d. at Burlington, Vt., 1861. — CHARLES BAKER, an American naturalist, b. 1814. He conducted the geological survey of Vermont in 1845. His favorite department was the study of the molluscas, concerning which he published many valuable papers. D. 1853. — FRANCIS, a Scottish physician, translator of Greek medical writers, b. 1797; d. 1861. He translated the writings of Paulus Ægineta, a physician of the sixth or seventh century, and afterwards of Hippocrates and Aretæus.

ADAMSON, JOHN, an English author. He wrote a memoir of Camoens, and published two volumes on the history, antiquities, and literature of Portugal. Portuguese literature was his particular study. B. 1787; d. 1855.

AIKINS, ARTHUR, an English writer and scientific man, b. 1773; d. 1854. He was the author of the "Manual of Mineralogy" and "A Dictionary of Chemistry and Mineralogy."

AKERS, BENJAMIN PAUL, an American sculptor, b. near Portland, Me., 1825, was in the first instance a printer, but was attracted by the sight of Chantrey's statue of Washington to the study of the art in which he afterwards excelled. He opened a studio in Portland in 1849, and amongst those whose busts he modelled was Henry W. Longfellow. He visited Italy in 1851-2, and on his return executed a statue of "Benjamin in Egypt." During the next three years he was extensively employed upon busts of public men, including Edward Everett, Gen. Houston, and Judge McLean. In 1855 he again visited Europe, and during a three years' residence in Rome executed a model of "Una and the Lion," a statue of St. Elizabeth of Hungary, the "Dead Pearl-diver," and an ideal head of Milton. He returned to the United States, but was induced by impaired health to revisit Rome in 1859, where he made a small clay model of a statue of Commodore M. C. Perry. He came back to Portland in 1860, suffering under consumption, and removed to Philadelphia, where he d. 1862.

ALAMAN, LUCAS, a Mexican statesman, a member of Santa Anna's cabinet, and the author of many of his most despotic measures. A staunch monarchist, Alaman endeavored to extricate Mexico from chaos by suppressing every form of freedom and rendering the executive absolute. He proposed the abolition of the liberty of the press, the restoration of the power and the confiscated property of the Jesuits, the imposition of heavy taxes upon a people already impoverished, and the adoption of a foreign policy inimical to the United States. His measures undoubtedly contributed to the excitement which culminated in the revolution of 1855, a few months previous to which event he died.

ALBERT, FRANCIS AUGUSTUS CHARLES EMANUEL, Duke of Saxony, Prince of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha, and prince consort of the Queen of Great Britain, was born at Rosenau in 1819. He was educated under the Consistorial Councillor Florschütz and at the university of Bonn. In 1838 he visited England with his father, and two years afterwards was married to Queen Victoria at St. James's Palace. As prince consort, he played with rare discretion the difficult and elevated part assigned to him. He avoided all connection with politics, but took a warm interest in social questions, and devoted himself to various pursuits which gave him a high character amongst all parties. He was a man of refined taste, and an accomplished musician and draughtsman. He paid great attention to agriculture and had a model farm near Windsor, in the management of which he availed himself of every scientific appliance and improvement. As head of the fine arts commission and chairman of the council of the Great Exhibition of 1851, his services were invaluable. He held a large number of official positions, and was a patron of art and literature. D. 1861.

ALEXANDER, ARCHIBALD, D. D., an eminent Presbyterian divine, b. in Virginia, 1772, was licensed as a preacher in 1791, and spent some years in itinerant missionary service in his native state. In 1798 he accepted the presidency of Hampden Sidney College, which he left about nine years afterwards to become pastor of a church in Philadelphia. The theological seminary at Princeton was established in 1811, and Dr. Alexander was elected as its first professor, having in his sole charge the various branches of theological education. He was, however, gradually relieved by the appointment of other professors, the department of polemic and pastoral theology being finally assigned as his special charge, and to this he devoted his attention until his death. He was a voluminous writer, and published numerous works on theological subjects. D. 1851.—JAMES WADDELL, D. D., eldest son of the preceding, distinguished as a clergyman and scholar, b. 1804; d. 1859. He held a professorship for some time in the theological seminary at Princeton, and afterwards became pastor of the Fifth Avenue church in New York. His published works are numerous and popular.—JOSEPH ADDISON, D. D., third son of Dr. Archibald Alexander, was b. 1809, and graduated at the college of New Jersey in 1826. In 1830 he was appointed adjunct professor of ancient languages in that institution, which post he resigned in 1833; and in 1838 he was elected to a professorship in the Princeton theological seminary. He was an excellent linguist, and published several commentaries upon portions of the Scriptures. D. 1860.—COLONEL of the royal engineers. He constructed the English field works before Sebastopol. D. of apoplexy in his tent, 1854.

ALEXANDRE, A., a famous writer on chess, born in Germany about 1773; d. in Paris in 1851.

ALLEN, JOSEPH W., an English landscape painter, b. 1803; d. 1852.—DAVID OLIVER, author of a "History of India," and for 26 years an American missionary in that country. He was b. in Barre, Mass., 1800; graduated at Amherst college, 1823, and prepared for the ministry at Andover theological seminary. He was ordained in 1827, and forthwith embarked as a missionary for Calcutta, whence he proceeded to Bombay. He superintended the printing establishment in Bombay some years, and supervised several publications in the Mahratta language, including an edition of the Scriptures. D. 1863.

AMHERST, WILLIAM PITT, ambassador extraordinary of England to China in 1816, and afterward governor-general of India. B. 1773; d. 1857.

AMMEN, FRIEDRICH AUGUST VON, a distinguished medical writer. b. at Göttingen, 1799; d. at Dresden, 1861.

AMPÈRE, JEAN JACQUES ANTOINE, a French writer, traveller, and member of the Institute, was b. at Lyons, 1800. At an early age he was one of the principal contributors to the "Revue Française," established by Guizot, in opposition to the government. In 1837 he obtained the chair of French Literature at the college of France. Amongst his separate works are, the "History of Poetry," "The Literary History of France before the 12th Century," and "The History of French Literature of the Middle Ages." His tours in Germany, Italy, Egypt, and on this continent supplied him with observations which his extensive erudition and general knowledge enabled him to work up into articles for the "Revue des Deux Mondes." His contributions have been collected and published under the title, "Littérature et Voyages." D. 1864.

ANCELOT, JACQUES ARSENE FRANCOIS POLYCARPE, a French dramatist, whom Louis Philippe rewarded with a pension for the tragedy "Louis IX." His pension terminated with the reign of his patron. In 1849 he took up the copyright question, and was instrumental in negotiating some of the treaties concluded by France in relation thereto. B. 1794; d. 1854.

ANDERSON, GEORGE B., b. in Wilmington, N. C., 1834, graduated at West Point in 1852, became a first lieutenant in the 2d dragoons in 1855, and adjutant in 1858. He resigned his commission, April 25, 1861, and, having entered the Confederate service, was appointed a brigadier-general. In this capacity he commanded the North Carolina coast defences, and led a brigade at the battle of Antietam, where he was mortally wounded. D. 1862. — ISAAC, a Presbyterian divine, b. in Rockbridge county, Virginia, 1780; d. in Maryville, Tennessee, 1857. He received a license to preach from the Union Presbytery in 1802, but for some years relied upon his farm and the products of school teaching for his income. Inspired by the example of Whitfield, he engaged in missionary labor throughout a large part of Tennessee. When settled as the pastor of a church in Maryville, he directed his attention to the necessity of facilitating the studies of young men desirous of entering the ministry; and after encounttering many obstacles, he succeeded in establishing the Western theological seminary, which has since risen to importance.

ANDERSSON, CHARLES JOHN, an African explorer, b. in Sweden in the first part of the present century, d. in Southern Africa in 1856. In 1849 he visited England, taking with him a collection of living animals and specimens which he had obtained during numerous hunting excursions in his native country. His object was to dispose of these with the view of procuring the means of gratifying his passion for new explorations and adventures. He had already made some progress towards this end, when he met an Englishman named Galton, who was about making a journey to Southern Africa, and invited Andersson to accompany him at his expense. Andersson accepted the offer, and, in company with his friend, sailed from England in the early part of 1850. During the greater part of the next four years he was engaged in exploring the wilds of Southern Africa, meeting with many startling adventures. He visited lake Ngami, then recently discovered, penetrating thither by a route previously considered impracticable, and explored for some distance the river Tioghe, which flows into the lake from the north. Returning to England, he published a book giving an account of his discoveries; but his love of adventure soon led him to return to the scene of his former exploits. Having visited lake Ngami and the Tioghe a second time, he started in company with an Englishman, Mr. Green, to make a journey in an easterly direction from that neighborhood, and had already visited a region never before trodden by the foot of a European, when on one of his hunting excursions he was attacked and crushed to death by a wounded elephant.

ANDRAL, GABRIEL, an eminent physician of Paris, and professor of general pathology and therapeutics in the medical academy. His investigations rendered important service to medical science, in acknowledgment of which he was, in 1842, elected member of the Institute of France. Many of his works have been translated into German and other languages. B. 1797; d. 1853.

ANDREWS, EBENEZER S., b. at Boston, 1766; d. 1851. He served an apprenticeship with Isaiah Thomas, printer and bookseller, Worcester, and in 1788 commenced business with him in Boston. Success led them to establish branches of their business at Baltimore and Albany. They published the works of Noah Webster and Rev. Dr. Morse, and the "Massachusetts Magazine."

ANGELL, JOSEPH KINNICUTT, b. at Providence, R. I., 1794, graduated at Brown University, 1813, studied law and established himself in the practice at Providence. He edited the "United States Law Intelligencer" from 1829 to 1831, and was the first reporter of the decisions of the supreme court of Rhode Island. In connection with Samuel (afterwards chief justice) Ames, he published the "Treatise on Corporations"; and he afterwards published treatises on "Common Carriers," the "Law of Insurance," "Limitation of Actions," "Tide-waters," and "Water-courses," all of which are highly esteemed by the profession. D. at Boston, 1857.

ANGELO, HENRY, a colonel in the British service, organized a sword drill for the navy, invented a bayonet drill for infantry, and introduced a drill exercise for the sabre, which the Duke of Wellington made an army regulation. B. 1780; d. 1852.

ANGLESEY, HENRY WILLIAM PAGET, Marquis of, a British general. B. 1768. He commenced his military career by raising a regiment, at his own expense, among his father's tenantry, with which he served under the Duke of York in Flanders. In 1808 he attained the rank of major-general, and distinguished himself in the retreat of Sir John Moore, which ended in the battle of Corunna. During the Peninsular War he commanded the heavy brigade under Wellington, and at Waterloo headed the terrible cavalry charge that annihilated the French cuirassiers. In this action he lost a leg. In consideration of his services he was made Marquis of Anglesey. In 1827 he was appointed master of the ordnance, and in 1828 viceroy of Ireland. The latter office he retained only one year, but he was reinstated in 1840, and held the office for three years. In 1846 he was again made master of the ordnance, and in 1847 was raised to the rank of field marshal. D. 1854.

ANSON, GEORGE, commander-in-chief of the British forces in India, d. at Kurnaul, 1857. He served in the Scotch fusilier guards at Waterloo.

ANTHON, JOHN, an American jurist, author of an "Analysis of Blackstone's Commentaries," "Nisi Prius Reports," and other legal works, b. 1784. He was the second son of Geo. C. Anthon, an eminent physician of New York, and graduated with honor at Columbia college in 1801. After studying law in the office of Mr. Hopkins, he was admitted to practice in the supreme court of the state. He commanded a company of militia during the war of 1812, and on the return of peace resumed his professional labors. He was one of the founders of the New York Law Institute. In 1861 he received the degree of LL. D. from Columbia college. D. 1863. — HENRY, D. D., a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, brother of John Anthon, b. in New York, 1792; d. 1861.

APPLETON, JAMES, b. in Ipswich, Mass., 1785; d. 1862. He was a colonel of the militia force in 1812, and, at the close of the war held the rank of brigadier-general. — SAMUEL, a wealthy merchant of Boston, Mass., remarkable for his philanthropy. B. 1776; d. 1853. He founded a professorship of natural philosophy at Dartmouth college, with a gift of $10,000; and placed $200,000 in the hands of his executors to be applied to "scientific, literary, religious, and charitable purposes." — NATHAN, a brother, and for many years a mercantile partner of the preceding, distinguished for wealth, enterprise, and public spirit. D. in Boston, 1861. — WILLIAM, a younger brother, also a successful merchant, and a man of much influence, d. in 1862. He was twice elected to represent Massachusetts in congress. — JOHN, b. in Beverly, Mass., 1815; d. in Portland, Me., 1864. He commenced the practice of the law in 1837, and in the winter of 1838-9 assumed the editorship of the Argus, a democratic journal published at Portland, which he conducted some years, during a part of the time holding a local office. In 1845, on the invitation of Mr. Bancroft, the secretary of the navy, he became chief clerk of the navy department; subsequently succeeding Mr. Trist as chief clerk of the state department. In 1848 he was appointed, by President Polk, charge d'affaires of the United States to Bolivia. On his return from that mission he resumed the practice of law at Portland, in partnership with Nathan Clifford, now one of the judges of the supreme court of the United States; but in Sept. 1850 was elected, from the Portland district, a member of the thirty-second congress. In 1855 he joined Mr. Buchanan, at London, as secretary of legation. In 1857 he was appointed assistant secretary of state; and in May, 1860, he was appointed minister to Russia, whence he returned to die.

ARAGO, FRANCOIS, the astronomer of France, and one of the most illustrious men of science of the age, was b. at Estagel, in the south of France, in 1786. At an early age he was placed at a public school at Toulouse, from which he removed to become a candidate for a scholarship at the polytechnic school of Paris. Having passed the required examination with honor, he entered upon his studies in 1804, and rapidly rose to distinction. He left the polytechnic to join the staff of the observatory at Paris, and shortly after this appointment he proceeded with M. Biot to Spain, there to measure an arc of the meridian. While engaged in this undertaking, war broke out between France and Spain, and, under pretence that the fires which he made on the mountain tops as signals to his associates, were intended to enlighten the march of the French troops, he was seized and put into prison; but escaping after a brief confinement, he reached the port of Algiers, and after enduring many hardships, and encountering many dangers both by sea and land, he was safely landed in France, in 1809. On reaching Paris, as a reward for his zeal, he was elected, at the age of 23, a member of the Academy of Sciences, in the place of Lalande. He was appointed about the same time a professor of the Ecole Polytechnique; and now may be said to have commenced that eminent scientific career which he pursued with undiminished vigor to within a few days of his death. His determination of the diameters of the planets, afterwards adopted by Laplace, the discovery of colored polarization, and that of magnitude by rotation, are only specimens of his contributions to scientific literature; but the subjects in which he gained the highest distinction are magnetic and rotatory polarization, magnetism by the action of currents, and magnetism by rotation. To him the world owes the invention of the polariscope. In 1830 he was nominated director of the observatory of the bureau des longitudes; and he succeeded Fourier, whose éloge he pronounced, as perpetual secretary of the Academy of Sciences. The "Annuaire des Longitudes" was under his direction; and he founded, in conjunction with Gay-Lussac, the "Recueil des Annales de Physique et de Chimie." As a politician, often occupying a conspicuous position, Arago was earnest, simple-minded, and consistent. When a youth, he avowed his republican principles, by refusing to subscribe to the constitution of the empire. After the revolution of 1830, which placed Louis Philippe on the throne, he occupied a distinguished place in the chamber of deputies. In 1848, on the downfall of the monarchy, he was named a member of the provisional government, and, as minister of war and marine, he succeeded in obtaining the adhesion of the whole of that important service to the republic; but after the social outbreak of June, 1848, which ended in the temporary dictatorship of General Cavaignac, he finished his political career. He was ready to renounce his hardly earned position at the observatory rather than take the new oath to Louis Bonaparte, after the coup-d'état of December, 1851; but the government consented to forego the exaction. D. 1853. — JACQUES ETIENNE VICTOR, brother of the preceding, a dramatic writer and journalist, was b. at Estagel in 1790, and d. at Paris, 1855.

ARBUCKLE, MATTHEW, brevet brigadier-general in the United States army, b. in Virginia, d. in Fort Smith, Arkansas, 1851, in command of the 7th military department, after 30 years of frontier service.

ARCHER, BRANCH T., a physician, b. in Virginia, 1790, and professionally educated at Philadelphia, removed to Texas in 1831, and became one of the prominent actors in the events that preceded and followed her revolution. He presided over the assembly known as the Consultation of Texas, in November, 1835, and was elected by that body one of the commissioners, with Stephen F. Austin and William H. Wharton, to proceed to the United States, and present the cause and condition of Texas to the people of the Union, and solicit aid from them in the struggle for independence. Upon his return, he was elected a member of the first congress, and was speaker of the house of representatives. He was secretary of war from 1839 to 1842, under President Lamar's administration, at the close of which, in 1842, in consequence of broken health, he retired to private life. D. in Brazoria county, Texas, 1856. — WILLIAM S., a Virginia legislator; representative in congress from 1820 to 1835, and senator from 1841 to 1847. B. 1789; d. 1855.

ARISTA, MARIANO, b. of Spanish parents in Mexico, 1802, entered the army as a cadet at the age of 11, and figured prominently during the struggles, turmoil, and revolutions through which his native country has passed. Espousing the cause of Mexican independence, he served with distinction in the war with Spain. After the overthrow of the Mexican empire and the establishment of the federal system, he became an active leader of the Yorkinos, a body of political freemasons, organized to counteract the intrigues of other lodges. He joined Santa Anna in the revolt against Pedraza, and aided in elevating Guerrero to power. He was rewarded by promotion to the grade of lieutenant-colonel, and yet again to the brevet of general of brigade. Santa Anna, on obtaining the presidency, placed him second in command of the army. When the revolt in favor of church privileges broke out in Michoacan, Arista accompanied Santa Anna, but the former, during the march, joined the movement of Duran, and proclaimed Santa Anna dictator. Their plans were frustrated by the refusal of Santa Anna, and his return to the city of Mexico. Duran and Arista followed; assaulted the city and were repulsed; and then, retiring, fortified themselves at Guanajuato. Attacked by Santa Anna, they capitulated, and Arista was driven from Mexico. He sought refuge in the United States, and remained here about a year and a half. A decree of amnesty restored him to his military status, and in 1836 he again entered the service of the Mexican government, continuing actively employed, now against French invaders, anon against insurgents, and always with more or less distinction. Upon the breaking out of the war between Mexico and the United States, Arista exerted himself unsuccessfully to put the eastern frontier in a condition for effective defence. He commanded at the battles of Palo Alto and Resaco de Guerrero. In 1848, President Herrera appointed him minister of war, and in the fall of 1850 he was elected president of the republic. The measures he deemed essential to the restoration of the country to strength and solvency were not sustained by congress, and the revolt at Mazatlan, followed by the proclamation of Santa Anna at Guadalajara, having brought matters to a crisis, Arista vacated his position in Jan. 1853, delivering the government into the hands of the presiding judge of the supreme court. Arista retired to his farm, but, being formally banished, he proceeded to Europe, and died in Spain on the 9th of August, 1855, being the day on which the usurper of his seat fled from the city of Mexico. At his own request, his heart was carried to Mexico, whither his remains were taken in 1857; the government of Alvarez declaring, by a special decree, that he had "merited well of his country," and otherwise heaping honors on his memory.

ARLINCOURT, VICTOR, Viscount d', a French poet and novelist, commenced his literary career with an allegory flattering the vanity of Napoleon. The restoration of the Bourbons found him the flatterer of Louis XVIII., who showed himself less susceptible of poetic praise than Napoleon had been. Arlincourt tried the drama, but unsuccessfully. The revolution of 1830 again brought him to the surface, this time with political satires, under the guise of historical novels. In 1848 he became avowedly political, and calumnious attacks upon the leaders of the revolution led to his prosecution and conviction for libel. The remainder of his days was passed in retirement. B. 1789; d. 1856.

ARMANSPER, JOSEPH LOUIS, Count von, b. in Lower Bavaria, 1787. He occupied various positions of trust and influence in Bavaria, participating in the Congress of Vienna, and in 1825 presiding over the chamber of deputies. On the accession of King Louis he was made secretary of the treasury and of foreign affairs, and in this position assisted in organizing the German Zollverein. His hostility to the Catholics brought him into collision with the king, and he retired into private life. He was restored to favor, however, and was made president of the regency instituted over Greece during the minority of King Otho, ruling almost absolutely from 1833 to 1837. Becoming unpopular, he was dismissed, and leaving Athens in 1837, retired to his estates in Bavaria, where he d. 1853.

ARPELLINI, CARLO, an Italian patriot, b. 1776. After the flight of the pope to Gaeta in 1848, Arpellini was chosen a member of the triumvirate by whom the affairs of the Roman republic were administered during its brief existence. On its subversion he retired to Brussels, where he d. 1863.

ARMISTEAD, LEWIS A., a brigadier-general in the Confederate service, b. in Virginia, killed at Gettysburg, 1863. He was educated at West Point, and made an honorable record in the battles of Contreras, Churubusco, Molino del Rey, and Chapultepec.

ARNAUD, MARSHAL DE ST., born at Paris, of humble parentage, in 1801, distinguished himself in the French wars in Algeria, and was for a time governor of Constantine. On his return to France, he was appointed commander of the second division of the army of Paris, and minister of war. He was subsequently appointed commander-in-chief of the French forces in the Crimea, where he was attacked by cholera, and died on the voyage to Constantinople, 1854.

ARNDT, ERNST MORITZ, a German poet, historian, journalist, patriot, and statesman, b. 1769; d. in Bonn, 1859.

ARNOLD, LEMUEL A., governor of Rhode Island in 1831 and 1832, and representative in congress from 1845 to 1847. B. at St. Johnsbury, Vermont, 1792; d. 1852. — THOMAS KERCHEVER, author of numerous text-books for the study of ancient and modern languages, which have been extensively used in English and American schools, was b. 1800. He was a clergyman of the English church, and an occasional writer on religious questions. D. 1853.

ARNOTT, DR. ARCHIBALD, a Scotch physician, b. 1771, entered the British army as a surgeon, took part in the expeditions to Egypt, Calabria, and Holland, and in the Peninsular campaign, and retired from active service in 1826. He was attached to the 20th regiment of foot, stationed at St. Helena, where his professional services were called in aid of Napoleon, on whom he became a regular medical attendant. He stood by the bedside of the emperor in his last moments, and held his right hand when he died. One of the emperor's last acts was to present a gold snuff-box to Dr. Arnott, on which with his dying hand he had inscribed the letter N. The doctor was also liberally remembered in Napoleon's will; and the British government, to mark its approbation of his conduct, granted him £500. He published an account of the death and post-mortem appearance of Napoleon. D. 1855.

ARTHUR, RICHARD, a vice-admiral in the British navy, which he entered as a captain's servant. B. 1778; d. 1854.

ASHBY, TURNER, b. in Fauquier county, Va., 1824, was a farmer and politician when the civil war broke out. He then espoused the Confederate cause, raised a regiment of cavalry, and served with Gen. T. J. Jackson in the Shenandoah valley. He was appointed a brigadier-general in May, 1862, and on the 6th June was killed in an engagement near Harrisonburg, Va.

ASHER, ADOLPHUS, b. in Germany, lived several years in England, and wrote several works in the English language. After a brief residence at St. Petersburg, he settled as a bookseller at Berlin, and became eminent in the business. D. 1853.

ASTER, ERNEST LUDWIG, b. in Dresden, 1778, served in the Saxon and also in the Russian army. Joining the Prussian service in 1815, his skill as a mathematician and tactician, and his familiarity with the military systems of Europe, soon led to promotion, and he became major-general and inspector-general of the Prussian fortifications. The fortification of Coblenz and Ehrenbreitstein was effected under his guidance, and he was appointed commandant of these fortresses. Was made general in 1842, and d. at Berlin in 1855. — KARL HEINRICH, brother of the preceding, b. 1782, d. 1855, earned fame as a writer on military subjects.

ASTROS, PAUL THERESE DAVID D', cardinal archbishop of Toulouse and Narbonne, b. 1772; d. 1851.

ATHERTON, CHARLES HUMPHREY, b. at Amherst, N. H., 1773, was a representative in congress from 1815 to 1817, and long stood at the head of the bar in Hillsborough county. D. 1853. — CHARLES G., son of the preceding, b. 1804, was many years a member of the New Hampshire legislature, and for some time speaker of the house. In 1837 he took his seat at Washington as a member of the house of representatives, and in the following year introduced a series of resolutions affirming the sovereignty of states in the matter of slavery, condemning the abolition agitation as unconstitutional, and declaring that no action should be taken on any petition designed to further abolition views, or to promote interference with slavery by federal authority in any shape. The resolutions were carried, and formed the basis of the 21st rule of the next congress, by which anti-slavery petitions were laid on the table as a matter of course. The rule remained in force until 1845, two years previous to which Mr. Atherton had been elected to the senate. He acted uniformly with the democratic party, and d. 1853.

ATKINSON, THOMAS WITLAM, distinguished as a traveller among the Siberian tribes and the dependencies of China, was b. in Yorkshire, England, 1799. In 1846, with the approval and under the protection of the Russian authorities, he commenced his journeyings in regions until then unknown to European travellers. He afterwards published a "Narrative of Seven Years' Explorations and Adventures in Siberia, Mongolia, the Kirghis Steppes, Chinese Tartary, and part of Central Asia," and also "Travels in the Regions of the Upper and Lower Amoor," illustrating both from his own sketch-book. D. 1861.

ATTERBORN, PETER DANIEL AMADEUS, a Swedish poet and distinguished professor at the university of Upsal, b. 1790; d. 1855.

ATTWOOD, THOMAS, originator of the Birmingham political union, one of the most powerful agencies in carrying the English reform bill; and founder of the Birmingham school of currency economists — advocates of paper money as opposed to the principle of Sir Robert Peel's bill. B. 1783; d. 1856.

AUFFENBERG, JOSEPH VON, baron, a prolific German dramatist, b. 1798; d. 1857.

AUGUR, HEZEKIAH, b. at New Haven, Conn., 1791, obtained reputation as a sculptor, — "Jephthah and his Daughter" being the best known of his works. He was also the inventor of the carding machine. D. 1858.

AUPICK, JACQUES, a French general, senator, and diplomatist, b. 1789; d. 1857.

AYRTON, WILLIAM, b. 1777, an English writer on music, was editor of the "Harmonicon" from 1823 to 1833, wrote the musical articles and biography in the "Penny Cyclopædia," from 1833 to 1844 edited the "Sacred Minstrelsy" and the "Musical Library," and wrote some of the musical notices in "Knight's Pictorial Edition of Shakspeare." D. in London, 1858.

B.

BAGBY, ARTHUR P., b. in Virginia, 1794, removed to Alabama in 1818, where he was successively member of the legislature, speaker of the house, governor, and senator in congress. He was minister to Russia, 1849-53, and d. in Mobile, 1858.

BAGOT, RICHARD, b. 1782, was consecrated bishop of Oxford in 1829; and in 1845 succeeded Bishop Law in the see of Bath and Wells. His bishopric is memorable for the cessation of "Tracts for the Times," in obedience to his mandate as bishop of Oxford. During the latter years of his life he was subject to mental aberration. D. 1854.

BAILEY, GAMALIEL, an American journalist, b. in New Jersey, 1807, studied medicine in Philadelphia, and took his degree in 1828. He began his career in journalism, as editor of the "Methodist Protestant," in Baltimore. In 1831 he removed to Cincinnati, and was appointed physician to the cholera hospital. In 1836 he joined James G. Birney in conducting the "Cincinnati Philanthropist," the first anti-slavery newspaper published in the West, of which he afterwards became sole editor. This paper, in 1847, was merged in the "National Era," published at Washington, which was owned and edited by Dr. Bailey for many years. He was a man of great cultivation and refinement, moderation, firmness, and courage. Both in Cincinnati and in Washington repeated attempts were made to destroy his paper by mob violence, but he was never intimidated or driven from his post. D. 1859, on board the steamer Arago, on his passage to Havre. — JACOB WHITMAN, an eminent microscopist and algologist, b. in Massachusetts, 1806, was educated at West Point, served six years as a lieutenant in the United States army, and in 1839 was appointed professor of chemistry, botany, and mineralogy in the West Point military academy, which office he filled until his death. His chief claim for scientific distinction rests upon his investigations with the microscope. His observations, recorded with great care, and illustrated by his own pencil, together with complete and admirably arranged collections of specimens, and all his scientific books and papers, he bequeathed to the Boston Society of Natural History. D. 1857. — GUILFORD D., colonel United States service, b. in New York, 1834, killed at the battle of the Seven Pines, 1862. He graduated at West Point in 1826, and being in Texas during the early stages of the secession movement, he refused to be included in Gen. Twiggs's surrender in 1861. He raised a volunteer regiment in New Jersey, and at the time of his death was chief of artillery in Gen. Casey's division.

BÂINE, A. C., a lawyer by profession, but known as the author of a work entitled "Divine Faith and Natural Reason," written and published after his change from Presbyterianism to Catholicism. B. at Raleigh, N. C., 1810; d. in Nevada, 1863.

BAIRD, ROBERT, D. D., a Presbyterian minister and author, b. in Fayette county, Pa., 1798; d. suddenly at Youkers, N. Y., 1863. He pursued his theological studies at Princeton, and was licensed as a preacher in 1822. In 1827 he connected himself with the American bible society, and subsequently with the missionary society of New Jersey; and in 1829 became agent of the American Sunday school union. He visited Europe in 1835, and for eight years devoted himself to the promotion of Protestantism in southern Europe, and of temperance reform in Great Britain and elsewhere. He visited Europe twice subsequently: in 1846, to attend the meeting of the Evangelical Alliance in London, and the World's Temperance Convention in Stockholm; and in 1862, when he upheld the cause of the Union with great effect in London and other cities. His most widely known publication is "A View of Religion in America," issued in Scotland in 1842, and which obtained a wide circulation in continental Europe. Among his other works are a "History of the Temperance Societies," "Protestantism in Italy," a "History of the Albigenses, Waldenses, and Vaudois," and a "Visit to Northern Europe."

BAKER, EDWARD D., b. in England; d. at Leesburg, Va., Oct. 21, 1861. His father was a weaver, and, having been brought to the United States when very young, was left an orphan in Philadelphia. In his nineteenth year he removed to Illinois, where he studied law, and soon acquired a good position at the bar. After serving in the Illinois legislature for two years, he resigned, and in 1846 went to Mexico as a colonel of volunteers, acquitting himself with credit at Cerro Gordo. He was a representative in congress from Illinois, from 1849 to 1851. In 1852 he settled in San Francisco, devoting himself to his profession, but subsequently removed to Oregon, which state he represented as a senator in congress, taking his seat in March 1861. On the outbreak of the rebellion he entered enthusiastically into the struggle for the Union, — raising the California regiment mainly in Philadelphia. While leading his men in battle, he was shot from his horse and killed.

BALDWIN, ROGER SHERMAN, who has been pronounced "the ablest lawyer that Connecticut has ever produced in any part of her history," was b. in New Haven, 1793; his father being a descendant of a Puritan emigrant, and his mother the daughter of Roger Sherman. He graduated with high honors at Yale college in 1811; studied law under Judges Reeve and Gould at Litchfield; and in 1814 was admitted to the bar. He commenced practice in his native city, and soon attained a high rank in his profession. In 1837 he was elected to the state senate, reelected in 1838, and chosen president pro tem. of that body. In 1840 and 1841 he was a representative in the general assembly, and in the latter year was associated with J. Q. Adams in the argument before the supreme court of the United States, in the case of the Africans of the Amistad. In 1844 and 1845 he was governor of the state, and in 1847 was elected to the United States senate by the legislature of Connecticut, serving until 1851. He subsequently engaged in his professional duties. He was a member of the peace congress of 1861, and d. 1863.

BALFOUR, REV. WALTER, b. in Scotland, 1776, and educated as a Presbyterian; emigrated to the United States at the age of 20, and was very popular as a preacher. At about the age of 30 he became a Baptist, and continued a preacher in the Baptist church until 1819, when he became a Universalist from reading Professor Stuart's letters to Dr. Channing. He wrote and preached zealously in behalf of the opinions he had espoused. Some of the standard works of the denomination are from his pen. D. 1852.

BALLOU, HOSEA, a distinguished Universalist clergyman, was b. in Richmond, N. H., 1771. He was the son of a Baptist minister, and was brought up in the faith of that sect, but embraced the doctrines of Universalism soon after he became old enough to think for himself. He began to preach at the age of 21; was first settled in Dana, Mass., then in Barnard, Vt., then in Portsmouth, N. H., then in Salem, Mass., whence he removed to Boston (1817), where he continued to reside until his death. He established the "Universalist Magazine" and the "Universalist Expositor," and was a voluminous writer. He united more persons in marriage than any other minister in the country, and preached over 10,000 sermons. D. 1852. — Rev. HOSEA, D. D., a relative of the preceding, and himself for several years editor of the "Universalist Quarterly Review," b. in Mass.; d. 1861. He was eminent as a preacher and writer, and was president of Tufts college, Medford, Mass., the chief collegiate institution of his denomination. — SULLIVAN, major of the 2d Rhode Island regiment of volunteers, b. 1829; killed at the battle of Bull Run, 1861.

BANGS, NATHAN, D. D., author of a "History of the Methodist Episcopal Church," and for many years an eminent minister of the Methodist church in the United States, b. in Stratford, Conn., 1788; d. 1862. He commenced his ministerial career in 1801, and, besides his labors as a preacher, served the body with which he was connected in various capacities. At one time he edited the "Christian Advocate and Journal," and at another, the "Methodist Quarterly Review."

BANKS, THOMAS CHRISTOPHER, a writer on the genealogy of the British peerage. B. 1760; d. 1854.

BARBER, CHARLES, an artist, and president of the Liverpool academy. D. 1854.

BARBOUR, JOHN S., an influential member of the Virginia legislature, and member of congress from that state from 1823 to 1833. B. 1790; d. 1855.

BARCLAY, CAPTAIN, a famous pedestrian; d. 1854.

BARKER, JAMES N., a versatile writer, b. in Philadelphia; d. in Washington, 1858. He gained the rank of major in the war of 1812; and for a number of years was a contributor to dramatic and poetical literature.

BARKSDALE, WILLIAM, brigadier-general in the Confederate service, b. in Rutherford county, Tenn., 1821; killed at Gettysburg, 1863. He was a successful lawyer, a prominent democratic politician in Mississippi, and a representative in congress from 1853 to 1860. He resigned his seat to join the secessionist movement, and served in the Confederate army from the commencement of the conflict.

BARLOW, PETER, mathematical professor at the Woolwich military academy, and author of an "Essay on Magnetism," and of a treatise on the "Theory of Number," b. 1777; d. 1862. His discovery of the means of correcting the local attractions on the compasses of ships secured for him great distinction.

BARRON, JAMES, commodore in the United States navy, d. at Norfolk, Va., April 21, 1851, aged 82. He commenced his naval career as a youth under his father, who held the rank of "Commodore of all the armed vessels of the Commonwealth of Virginia" during the revolutionary war, and until the disbanding of the state navy. He was afterwards in private service until the formation of the Federal navy in 1798, when he received the commission of lieutenant, and served with credit under Commodore Barry in the brief war with France. In 1799 he was promoted to the highest grade in the navy, and ordered to the Mediterranean, where he distinguished himself as a scientific seaman and efficient officer. He was in active service afloat, with short respite, until 1807, when he commanded the Chesapeake at the time of her encounter with the British frigate Leopard, since which time he had not been on sea-duty. In 1820 he fought a duel with Commodore Decatur, in which the latter was mortally wounded.

BARRUNDIA, JOSE, minister to the United States from Honduras, made himself favorably known by his enlightened efforts to advance the civilization and welfare of Central America. B. 1784; d. in New York, 1854.

BARRY, SIR CHARLES, an eminent architect, b. 1795, was articled at an early age to a firm in Lambeth. On completing his term, he travelled in Italy, Greece, and other countries, studying carefully the architecture of each, and returning to England with an evident bias in favor of Italian. In his subsequent works he employed sometimes Grecian and Italian forms, but gradually acquired a preference for Gothic. Among the numerous buildings of which he was the architect, the new palace of Westminster is that by which his name will be most widely known. D. 1860.

BARTLETT, WILLIAM HENRY, an English artist and author, b. 1809; d. at sea, 1854. He furnished the drawings and a portion of the letter-press of 19 large 4to volumes, containing about 1000 plates, illustrating the scenery of England, Ireland, Switzerland, America, Egypt, &c.

BARTOW, General in the Confederate army; killed at Bull Run, 1861.

BATTHYANYI, KASIMIR, Count, a Hungarian statesman, b. 1807. He was one of the prominent champions of Hungarian independence. After having officiated as governor of various provinces, he became minister of foreign affairs under the administration of Kossuth, and subsequently shared his exile in Turkey. In 1851 he repaired to Paris, from which place he addressed a series of letters to the "London Times," reflecting rather severely upon Kossuth's character as a statesman and patriot. D. in Paris, 1854.

BAUR, FERDINAND CHRISTIAN, a German scholar and theologian, b. at Tübingen, 1792; d. 1861. He became professor of evangelical theology in 1826, and is considered the founder of the Tübingen school, which has been described as a "modified rationalism." He was a voluminous writer, but the work by which he is most widely known is the "Historical Manual of Christian Dogmas."

BAYARD, GEORGE D., b. in New York, was killed in the attack on Fredericksburg, Va., Dec. 13, 1862. He graduated at West Point in 1856, entered the 1st cavalry as 2d lieutenant, and in 1861 became captain in the 4th cavalry. He took command of the 1st Pennsylvania volunteer cavalry, and in April, 1862, was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers. He served in the army corps of Gen. McDowell, was under Gen. Pope in Virginia, and fell whilst attached to the command of Gen. Franklin.

BAYLY, THOMAS HENRY, b. in Accomac county, Va., 1810, graduated at the university of that state, and was admitted to the bar in 1830. For several successive years he was a member of the general assembly of Virginia; he was next judge of the circuit superior court of law; and in 1844 was elected representative in congress, remaining a member from that time until his death in 1856. He was for a time chairman of the house committee of ways and means. He lived and died on the same spot where his ancestors from England landed in 1666, and where they established the family home.

BEAUFORT, HENRY SOMERSET, Duke of, b. 1792; d. 1854. He served conspicuously in the Peninsular war.

BEAUMONT, WILLIAM, an American surgeon, who earned distinction by discoveries relating to the laws of digestion, the result of a series of remarkable physiological experiments upon Alexis St. Martin, a Canadian. Dr. Beaumont, whilst a surgeon in the United States army, stationed at Michillimackinac, Michigan, in 1822, was called to attend St. Martin, a youth in the service of the American fur company, who had been accidentally shot; the charge of a musket having entered his left side, fracturing two ribs, lacerating the lungs, and entering the stomach. Long-continued care restored him to health; an opening into his stomach remaining, through which its entire action was observable. In 1825 Dr. Beaumont commenced the experiments, which he continued at intervals during many years; and his published narrative has been recognized by the medical world as a valuable contribution to the knowledge of the human stomach, its secretions and operations. B. 1796; d. at St. Louis, 1853.

BEAZLEY, SAMUEL, an English architect and author, d. 1851, in his 66th year. He built a great many theatres, and wrote numerous farces and burlettas, and two novels, one of which, "The Roué," had quite a reputation. He wrote the English libretto of "La Sonnambula," and of some other operas.

BECK, JOHN BRODHEAD, an American physician, b. 1794, graduated at Columbia college, commenced the practice of medicine in New York in 1817, and soon rose to distinction. In 1826 he was appointed professor of materia medica and botany in the college of physicians and surgeons; but he subsequently exchanged the chair of botany for that of medical jurisprudence, which department, together with that of materia medica, he continued to hold until his death. He assisted his brother, T. Romeyn Beck, in the preparation of his great work on "Medical Jurisprudence." D. 1851.—LEWIS C., an American naturalist, b. 1800; d. 1853. He published works on chemistry, botany, and other branches of natural science. At the time of his death he was professor of chemistry in the Albany medical college.—THEODORE ROMEYN, an American physician, author of a valuable treatise on the "Elements of Medical Jurisprudence," was b. 1791 at Schenectady, N. Y. In 1815 he was appointed professor of the institutes of medicine in the college of physicians and surgeons of the western district of N. Y., and two years afterwards, still retaining his professorship, he became principal of the Albany academy. In 1849 he became the editor of the "American Journal of Insanity," and continued in charge of it for four years. He was earnest in the promotion of all philanthropic enterprises. D. 1855.

BECKWITH, JOHN CHARLES, major-general in the British army, distinguished himself under Wellington in Portugal and Spain, and at Waterloo. An incident directed his attention to the sufferings of the Waldenses, and in 1827 he visited Piedmont to mature plans for their improvement. He made his home at Torre, in the valley of Piedmont and thenceforward labored with a rare philanthropy for the benefit of the people in whom he had become so deeply interested. B. 1790; d. 1862.

BEDINGER, HENRY, was a representative in congress from Virginia from 1845 to 1849; and from 1853 to 1858 was United States minister to Denmark, where he negotiated the treaty which settled the vexed question of the Sound dues. D. 1858.

BEE, BARNARD E., b. in Charleston, S. C., was killed at the battle of Bull Run, July 21st, 1861. He graduated at the United States military academy; was promoted for gallantry at Cerro Gordo; was brevetted captain after the battle of Chapultepec; and in 1857-8 served in Utah as acting lieutenant-colonel of volunteers. He resigned his commission in the United States army, March 3, 1861, and became brigadier-general in the Confederate army.

BEECHER, LYMAN, D. D., an eminent American clergyman, and the father of the family of whom the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher and Mrs. Stowe are two notable members, was b. in New Haven, 1775. He graduated at Yale college in 1793, and in 1799 was ordained minister of the Presbyterian church at East Hampton, Long Island. In 1810 he became pastor of the first Congregational church, Litchfield, Conn., where he remained until 1826. He then removed to Boston, as pastor of the Hanover Street church, and during nearly seven years' labor there he obtained distinction by his vigor as a controversialist and his zeal as a preacher. In 1832 he accepted the presidency of the Lane theological seminary at Cincinnati, in which position he remained for nineteen years, during part of the period officiating as pastor of a Presbyterian church. He returned to Boston in 1851, retaining much of the power as a preacher which had through life distinguished him. In 1855 he was attacked by paralysis, and soon afterward removed to Brooklyn, N. Y., where he d. Jan. 10, 1863. Many of his sermons and addresses have been published; and since his death an autobiography, with selections from his works, has appeared, under the editorial supervision of his son, Rev. Charles Beecher.

BEECHEY, FREDERICK WILLIAM, entered the British navy in 1806, at the early age of ten years, and was with the British force at New Orleans in 1813-14. He made four Arctic voyages, the first in 1818, under Commander Franklin. For three years from 1825 he was engaged in a voyage of discovery in the Pacific, a narrative of which he published. In 1854 he was made rear-admiral, and filled the office of president of the Geographical Society, when he d. in 1856, in his 61st year.

BELKNAP, WILLIAM G., an American officer, b. at Newburgh, N. Y., 1794, entered the army as lieutenant in 1813, and distinguished himself in the attack on Fort Erie. He was brevetted for gallant service during the Florida war, and in the Mexican war for his gallantry in the battles of 8th and 9th of May, 1846. He served at Buena Vista, and received a sword from his fellow-townsmen, and the brevet of brigadier-general for his bravery. D. in Upper Texas, 1851.

BELL, LUTHER V., a distinguished physician, b. in Francetown, N. H., 1806; d. 1862. He published several professional works, and was a recognized authority in regard to the treatment of the insane. For nearly 20 years he was the superintendent of the McLean insane asylum at Somerville, Mass.; and at the time of his death he was medical director of Gen. Hooker's division of the army of the Potomac.

BELLOT, JOSEPH RENÉ, a French naval lieutenant, was b. in Paris, 1826, entered the service at an early age, distinguished himself on various occasions, and ranked as an officer of the highest promise. In the spring of 1851 he obtained permission to take part as a volunteer in the expedition then fitting out in England to search for Sir John Franklin. He sailed as second in command of Lady Franklin's vessel, the Prince Albert, which left Aberdeen in May, 1851, and returned in the following year. An important result of this expedition was the discovery of a strait separating Somerset Land from Boothian Felix, which was named Bellot Strait. On his return to France, Bellot urged his government to fit out an expedition to the Polar Seas; but without waiting for a decision, he sailed a second time for those regions with Capt. Inglefield, in the Phoenix. In August, 1853, while leading a party over the ice from Beechey Island to Sir Edward Belcher's squadron in Wellington Channel, he was carried out to sea on an ice-floe during a violent gale, slipped from the ice, and perished. He had endeared himself to all his companions by his noble and chivalrous qualities, and his name will ever be remembered in the annals of Arctic adventure.

BEM, JOSEF, b. in Galicia, 1795, was brought up for the army, and served with the French in the campaign of 1812 against Russia. On the reconstruction of the duchy of Warsaw, in 1815, Bem reentered the Polish service, but the tyranny of the Archduke Constantine soon drove him from it in disgust. On the outbreak of the revolution in 1830, Bem was appointed major of artillery, gained high honor, and rose to the rank of general. He subsequently lived in exile, chiefly in France and England, always laboring for the cause of Poland, and often amid the greatest difficulties and privations, teaching languages for very scanty pay both in Oxford and London. From this situation the promised reforms in Galicia recalled him to his native country, and involved him in the war of independence in Hungary. Within four months he was the tenant of a pauper hospital in England, and the triumphant leader of a victorious army in Transylvania. When he took command of the army, it consisted of but 12,500 men, of whom only one half were in a fit state to undertake a campaign. With this force, in three months' time, he drove an Austrian army of 100,000 men, together with 10,000 Russians, across the frontier, and compelled them to seek refuge in Wallachia. On the defeat of the Hungarian arms Bem sought refuge in Turkey, and became a convert to Islamism. He died of a fever at Aleppo, in 1851.

BENJAMIN, PARK, a prolific contributor to American periodical literature, was b. in British Guiana in 1809, but was sent to this country at an early age by his father, a New-England merchant. After studying at Harvard, and graduating at Trinity college, Hartford, he applied himself to law, and commenced its practice in Boston in 1832. But his inclinations attracted him to literature, and he was editorially connected, in succession, with the "New England Magazine," the "American Monthly Magazine," the "New Yorker," and the "New World." He was a frequent contributor, in prose and verse, to other journals, and later in life appeared as a public lecturer. D. 1864.

BENTON, THOMAS HART, an American statesman, was b. in North Carolina, 1782, studied law, and in 1811 commenced the practice of his profession at Nashville, Tenn. During the war of 1812 he raised a regiment of volunteers, and in 1815 he was appointed lieutenant-colonel in the regular army. At the close of the war he removed to St. Louis, where he edited a newspaper and took an active part in politics; and on the admission of Missouri into the Union he was elected one of the first senators from the new state. He took his seat in the senate in 1821, and served continuously in that position for 30 years. He had great readiness and skill as a debater, and wielded a commanding influence. He was a firm supporter of the administrations of Jackson and Van Buren. Throughout the long controversy relating to the United States Bank, he was the main stay of his party in the senate. He addressed himself to a consideration of the whole question of finance, and did much to consolidate public sentiment in favor of the sub-treasury system, which was eventually adopted. It was from the financial policy which he thus enunciated that he derived the sobriquet of "Old Bullion." Upon the question relating to the Oregon boundary, the annexation of Texas, the Mexican war, and other important matters, he took a leading and influential part. He was a bitter personal enemy of Mr. Calhoun, and a life-long opponent of the nullification doctrines of that statesman. Although from a slave state, he opposed the slavery extremists in the controversies excited by the "Wilmot proviso"; and when instructions were sent to him by the legislature of Missouri, based upon certain resolutions introduced in the senate by Mr. Calhoun, Mr. Benton denounced the instructions as not being expressive of the sense of the people, and as designed to produce a separation of the states. Through the opposition excited by this bold course, he failed of a reelection, and his senatorial career ended in 1850. Determined to appeal directly to the people, he announced himself as a candidate for the house of representatives, and in 1852, after a thorough canvass, was elected over all competitors. In the session that followed, he opposed the Kansas-Nebraska bill in a memorable speech, and pursued a course so distasteful to his old opponents, who had acquired ascendancy in Missouri, that, at the election in 1854, they again succeeded in defeating him. In 1856 he consented to become a candidate for governor, and once more canvassed the state with his accustomed energy; and though he failed of his election by a few votes, he produced a gratifying reaction in the disunion sentiment that was then making headway in the state. In 1856 he voted for Buchanan, in opposition to his own son-in-law, Fremont, believing that the former would restore the principles of Jackson's administration, — an expectation in which he was bitterly disappointed. After his defeat in 1856 he ceased to take an active part in politics, and devoted himself with wonderful industry to literary pursuits. He completed his "Thirty Years' View," a connected narrative of the working of the government during the period of his senatorial career, and then entered upon the laborious task of condensing the debates of congress, in which work he was occupied upon his death-bed. D. in Washington, 1858.

BERANGER, JEAN PIERRE DE, a great lyric poet, b. at Paris in 1780; d. 1857. To his grandfather, who was a tailor living in the Rue Montorgueil, and an aunt by the father's side, he was indebted for his early nurture and education. When he was ten years of age he went to reside at Peronne, in Picardy, with his aunt, and here he led for some time an indolent and unsettled life, trying several occupations, including that of a pot-boy, and settling in none, till he was at last apprenticed to a printer in the town, and from this period gave himself up to literary pursuits. In 1795 his father took him to Paris, where he wanted his assistance in certain banking operations in which he was engaged; but in 1798 the bank failed, and Beranger bade adieu to financial operations forever. During the period that followed he produced his best songs; but embittered by disappointment and hopeless of success, he collected all the poems he had written and sent them to Lucien Bonaparte, the brother of the first consul, who was known to be a liberal patron of literature, and in this instance did not belie his reputation. With the assistance thus rendered, Beranger soon found employment for his pen. In 1805-1806 he assisted in editing Landon's "Annales de Musée," and in 1809 he was attached to the university with the small salary of 1200 francs, which, however, sufficed for all his wants. Meanwhile he went on cultivating the Muses, and delighting all who knew him with the songs, chiefly amatory, which he then composed. In 1815 he first came before the world as an author, though many of the poems then printed had been circulated in manuscript, and the sensation produced by this first publication was immense. France hailed in Beranger a poet who was not only able to sing of love and wine as none since Anacreon had ever sung of them before, but who gave the noblest and most heart-stirring expression to that sense of blighted glory and humbled pride which then smouldered in the breast of the whole people. His second series of songs, published in 1821, cost him his place and three months' imprisonment in St. Pelagie; and for his third series, published in 1828, he was condemned to nine months' imprisonment in La Force, and a fine of 10,000 francs. But the fine was paid by the poet's admirers, while, from behind his prison-bars, Beranger kept up so deadly a fire on the government that he contributed more effectually to destroy it than all the blows of the heroes of the "Three Glorious Days." After the election of Louis Philippe to the throne, he declined to accept of any reward for his services, and retired first to Passy, next to Fontainebleau, and finally to Tours, where he completed what he called his "Mémoires Chantants," by the publication of his fourth series of songs. At the revolution of February, 1848, Beranger was elected to the constituent assembly, but he soon resigned, and finally retired from political life. His last years were solaced by the kindness of friends, who admired in him the straightforward honorable man as well as the national poet.

BERESFORD, JOHN GEORGE, Lord, Protestant archbishop of Armagh, and chancellor of the university of Dublin, b. 1773; d. 1862. He was the second son of the first Marquis of Waterford. — WILLIAM CARR, Viscount, a British general, b. in Ireland, 1768. He entered the army at the age of 16, became major-general while serving in Portugal in 1808, fought all through the Peninsular war and took part in the victories of Salamanca, Vittoria, Bayonne, Orches, and Toulouse. In 1823 he was advanced to the dignity of viscount, and afterwards became successively lieutenant-general of the ordnance, general of the army, and master-general of the ordnance. His military efficiency consisted chiefly in his successful reorganization of the Portuguese troops. D. 1854.

BERRY, HIRAM GEORGE, major-general of volunteers in the United States service, b. in Maine, 1824, killed at the battle of Chancellorsville, 1863. At the commencement of the civil war he entered the service as colonel of the 4th Maine volunteers, and having distinguished himself in several engagements, was made brigadier-general in April, 1862. He shared the most arduous duties in the battles of Williamsburg, Fair Oaks, Centreville, Manassas, and Fredericksburg; and in January, 1863, was appointed major-general. He was killed while leading his brigade in one of the many desperate bayonet charges which marked the struggle at Chancellorsville.

BERTHOLD, ARNOLD ADOLPH, a

German naturalist, professor at Göttingen, and author of several works on natural history. B. 1803; d. 1861.

BERRIEN, JOHN MACPHERSON, an American lawyer and statesman, was b. in New Jersey, 1781. He was admitted to the bar in Georgia, where he soon attained eminence in his profession; and in 1810, after having served for some months as solicitor of the eastern district, he was appointed to a seat on the bench. He officiated in this capacity until 1822, when he became a member of the Georgia senate, from which he was transferred, in 1824, to the senate of the United States. He was appointed United States attorney-general by President Jackson in 1829, and held that office until 1831, when he resumed the practice of his profession in Savannah. In 1840 he was again elected to the national senate, where he continued to represent his state for the ensuing twelve years, taking a prominent part in all the exciting debates which arose during that period. He ranked high as an orator, and left a reputation for eminent ability as a public man. D. at Savannah, 1856.

BETHAM, SIR WILLIAM, b. 1779; d. 1853; was remarkable for his labors in genealogy, heraldry, and other subjects of antiquarian research. He published many works, and devoted much attention to the antiquities of Ireland and the Celtic tongue.

BETHUNE, GEORGE W., a distinguished clergyman, was b., 1805, in New York, and in 1826 entered the Presbyterian ministry, but shortly afterwards transferred his relations to that of the Dutch Reformed church. He was first settled in Rhinebeck, whence, in a few years, he removed to Utica, and in 1834 accepted a pastorate in Philadelphia. In 1849 he became the minister of a church in Brooklyn, where he remained about 10 years, resigning his office on account of ill health, and making a visit to Europe for the fourth time. On his return he became associate pastor of the church in 21st street, New York; but his health again failing, he sailed for Europe, and had reached Florence a short time before his death. Dr. Bethune attained considerable distinction as an author, both in prose and verse. D. at Florence, Italy, 1862.

BEXFIELD, WILLIAM RICHARD, an English doctor in music, composer of "Israel Restored"; b. 1824; d. 1853.

BIBB, GEORGE M., b. in Virginia, 1772, graduated at Princeton college. Having settled in Kentucky, he served in the legislature of that state, and was for three successive terms its chief justice; was chancellor of the chancery court of Louisville, senator in congress from 1811 to 1814, and again from 1829 to 1835, and in 1844 was appointed secretary of the treasury by President Tyler. D. 1859.

BIBBY, THOMAS, a classical scholar and book collector, noted for his eccentricities; b. in Kilkenny, Ireland, 1799; d. there, 1863. When very young he distinguished himself at Trinity college, Dublin, by his attainments as a classical scholar and in various branches of science. The peculiarities of his character were a bar to advancement, and were made a pretext, by relatives, for confinement in a private lunatic asylum. On obtaining his release, he went into absolute seclusion, which he maintained for the rest of his life, denying himself many of the necessaries of life, although possessed of fortune, and rarely leaving his house except to attend church or to add to his accumulation of books. He published "Gerald of Kildare" and "Silken Thomas," two dramatic poems.

BICKERSTETH, EDWARD, an English clergyman, b. 1786. After practising for some years as a solicitor in Norwich, he became interested in religious movements, and in 1815 was ordained a deacon in the Anglican church. During the next 15 years he was the secretary of the church missionary society. In 1830 he became rector of Walton, in Hertfordshire, where he spent the remainder of his life. His publications are numerous, consisting chiefly of devotional treatises and sermons. D. 1851. — HENRY, LORD LANGDALE, brother of the preceding, b. 1783, graduated at Cambridge in 1805, was admitted to the bar in 1811, rose to eminence in the equity courts, and in 1836 was elevated to the peerage as Lord Langdale, and created a privy councillor. D. 1851.

BILLAULT, AUGUSTE ADOLPHE MARIE, a French advocate and senator, b. at Vannes in 1805. After studying law at Rennes, he settled at Nantes, and rose rapidly to reputation and practice as an advocate. In 1837 he was elected to the chamber of deputies by three constituencies, of which he chose that of Ancenis. At first he followed M. Thiers, and filled the office of under-secretary of state. Afterwards, aided by M. Dufaure, he undertook a moderate though progressive opposition, but was conciliated by an offer of the law business of the Duke d'Aumale, the most wealthy prince of the Orleans family. When the revolution of February, 1848, occurred, he aspired to a place in the government; and having been elected representative for the Loire Inférieure, he took his place in the ranks of the democratic party. When Louis Napoleon seized the dictatorship of France, M. Billault became his president of the corps législatif, and in 1854 accepted the appointment of minister of the interior. He was a commander and grand officer of the Legion of Honor. D. 1863.

BINGHAM, KINSLEY S., b. in Onondaga county, New York, 1808; d. in Michigan, 1861. He was long a prominent member of the Michigan legislature; served that state in both branches of congress, and was elected governor of the state in 1854 and 1856.

BIRD, GOLDING, an English naturalist, b. 1815, was educated for the medical profession, but abandoned his practice to follow his favorite studies. D. 1854.

—ROBERT M., author of "Calavar," the "Infidel," "Nick of the Woods," and other successful books; was a physician by profession, and practised in Philadelphia. He is best known by his tragedy of "The Gladiator," written for Mr. Edwin Forrest. He was for some time editor of the "North American Gazette." B. in Delaware, 1803; d. at Philadelphia, 1854.

—REV. CHARLES SMITH, a minister of the English church, and author of numerous controversial works. B. 1795; d. 1862.

BIRNEY, JAMES G., an American politician, was b. in Kentucky, 1792, and in early life established himself as a lawyer in Alabama. Becoming interested in the question of slavery, he at first advocated the colonization scheme; but in 1834, having returned to Kentucky, he came out in favor of immediate emancipation, at the same time emancipating all his own slaves. Finding it impossible to disseminate his views through the press in his native state, he removed to Cincinnati, and there published a paper called "The Philanthropist," which, after encountering violent opposition, became a powerful instrument in forming public opinion. In 1836 he went to New York as secretary of the American anti-slavery society, to the objects of which he continued to devote himself for many years. Through his exertions a political organization, called the Liberty party, based upon the single idea of operating against slavery under the constitution, was formed in the northern states; and in the elections of 1840 and 1844 he was the candidate of this party for the presidency. D. at Perth Amboy, New Jersey, 1857.

—DAVID BELL, major-general United States service, and the son of the preceding, was b. in Huntsville, Alabama, 1825. He accompanied his father to Cincinnati, and engaged in mercantile pursuits; transferring his home to Philadelphia in 1848, and there commencing the practice of law. In 1861 he raised the 23d regiment of Pennsylvania volunteers, and in December of that year was assigned to the command of a brigade. In February, 1862, having been promoted to the rank of brigadier-general, he took the command of a brigade in the army of the Potomac, and rendered conspicuous service at Williamsburg, in Pope's campaign in Northern Virginia, at the second battle of Bull Run, at Fredericksburg, and Chancellorsville. He was promoted to the rank of major-general, and commanded the third army corps at Gettysburg after the wounding of General Sickles. He was subsequently transferred to the command of the 10th corps of Butler's army of the James, and participated in the operations south of the James river. There he contracted fever, which necessitated his removal, and he d. at Philadelphia, October, 1864.

BIRT, JEAN BAPTISTE, a French savant, b. 1774, author of numerous scientific works. He was learned in all branches of science, but distinguished himself especially in optics. He was a companion of Arago in measuring an arc of the meridian. D. 1862.

BISHOP, SIR HENRY ROWLEY, an eminent modern English composer, b. 1786; d. 1855. In 1806 some pieces which he wrote for the ballet of "Tamerlane and Bajazet" brought him into favorable notice; but his first original composition of note was the "Circassian Bride," which was received with great enthusiasm on its first appearance at Drury Lane in 1809, though the whole of the music perished in the conflagration that destroyed that theatre the day after its performance. His reputation obtained for him the office of composer and director of the music of Covent Garden theatre in 1810; and, during the fourteen years that he held it, he produced nearly sixty pieces of greater or less importance, many of which, such as "The Vintagers," "Guy Mannering," "The Miller and his Men," still keep possession of the English stage. In 1826, after the success of Weber's "Oberon" at Covent Garden, he wrote "Aladdin" for the rival house, but this composition was received with such coldness by the public that he thenceforward withdrew from the theatre; but during the next thirty years he gave to the world numerous songs, glees, and other vocal pieces, many of which enjoy even greater popularity than his larger and more ambitious performances. He also contributed to several publications, especially the "Melodies of Various Nations," the later volumes of Moore's "Irish Songs," and the "Scottish Melodies," published by Mr. George Thomson, the friend of Burns. For a short period he was professor of music in the University of Edinburgh. Soon after Victoria's accession to the throne he was knighted, and at the time of his death he held the chair of music in the University of Oxford. His last days were clouded with disease as well as by pecuniary difficulties. — GEORGE, an English astronomer, b. 1784; d. 1861.

BISSELL, WILLIAM H., b. in Coopers-town, N. Y., 1811, began life as a physician, practised law in Illinois, commanded a regiment of volunteers in the Mexican war, was elected to congress in 1849, served two terms, and in 1856 was chosen governor of Illinois by the republican party. D. 1860.

BLACK, JOHN, long editor of the London "Morning Chronicle," was the son of a Scottish cottager, and worked his way to literary celebrity under no ordinary difficulties. B. 1783; d. 1855.

BLACKFORD, ISAAC, senior justice of the court of claims, d. in Washington, 1859, aged 64. He was a native of New Jersey, but in early life removed to Indiana. He was a judge of the supreme court of that state from 1818 to 1852, and published eight volumes of reports of its decisions.

BLAKE, REV. JOHN LAURIS, D. D., an Episcopal clergyman, author of a text-book of natural philosophy and astronomy, of a biographical dictionary, and of "The Farm and Fireside." B. 1788; d. in Orange, N. J., 1857.

BLANQUI, JEROME, ADOLPHE, a distinguished writer on political economy, b. at Nice, 1854. His most important work, "Histoire de l'économie politique en Europe depuis les anciens jusqu'à nos jours." was published in 1837. In 1846-48 he sat as a member of the chamber of deputies from Bordeaux. D. 1854.

BLENKER, LOUIS, brigadier-general of United States volunteers, b. in the Grand Duchy of Hesse Darmstadt, 1812; d. in New Jersey, 1863. Actively connected with the revolutionary movements of his native country in 1849, he came to this country when despotism regained its sway, and settled on a farm in Rockland county, N. Y. The outbreak of the civil war found him engaged in commercial pursuits in the city of New York; but these he abandoned to raise the 8th regiment of N. Y. volunteers, with which, in May 1861, he proceeded to Washington, with the rank of colonel. He was soon afterward placed in command of a brigade attached to Gen. McDowell's army, and in the following August he was commissioned a brigadier-general. He took part in the battle of Cross Keys in June 1862, but saw little further active duty. He was mustered out of service about seven months before his death.

BLIGHT, WILLIAM, a British rear-admiral, b. 1785; d. 1862.

BLOMFIELD, CHARLES JAMES, b. 1786, was made bishop of London in 1828, and occupied that position for 28 years. He was author and editor of various works on classical and theological subjects. In parliament he took a leading part in the maintenance of high-church principles. D. 1857.

BOCHSA, ROBERT NICHOLAS CHARLES, a distinguished musician and composer, b. in France, 1789. When but 7 years old he performed in public on the pianoforte. At the age of 16 he began to study the harp, upon which instrument he soon acquired a preëminence which he never ceased to maintain. Napoleon I. appointed him first harpist at his private concerts; and he held the same position with Louis XVIII., on the restoration of the Bourbons. In 1817 he went to England, where he pursued a successful career for more than 30 years, and became professor of the harp at the royal academy of music. In 1847 he came to the United States with Madame Anna Bishop, with whom he made many musical tours, and whom he finally accompanied to Australia, where he d., 1856.

BODISCO, ALEXANDER, for a long time Russian minister in the United States, b. 1779, early entered the civil service of his country in the department of foreign affairs. He was attached to that part of the imperial chancery which accompanied Alexander in his campaigns, was next made private secretary to Count Suchtelen, imperial commissioner to conclude the convention with Sweden, and also attended Suchtelen during the campaigns of 1813-14, and at the congress of Vienna. Upon the appointment of Suchtelen as ambassador at Stockholm, Bodisco became his secretary of legation, and, upon his death, temporarily filled his place as chargé d'affaires. From this post he was transferred to the same office at Washington, where he d., 1854, after holding the position 17 years. He was married to a lady of Georgetown, D. C.

BONAPARTE, JÉROME, the youngest brother of Napoleon I., was b. at Ajaccio, 1784. On Napoleon becoming first consul, he removed Jérôme from college and placed him in the naval service. When hostilities broke out between France and England, in 1803, Jérôme cruised off the West India Islands. Forced to quit that station, he came to the United States, where he married Miss Elizabeth Paterson, the daughter of a Baltimore merchant. The marriage was a misalliance in the estimation of his brother, and Jérôme's wife was forbidden to enter France. Under this interdiction she proceeded to England, where she gave birth to a son, Jérôme Napoleon Bonaparte. Napoleon, on becoming Emperor, caused the marriage to be annulled by a decree of the council of state. The pope, however, refused to ratify the divorce. As Jérôme made no figure at sea, Napoleon transferred him from the naval to the military service, and in 1807 he entered the army with the rank of general. In the same year he married Frédérique Catherine, daughter of the king of Würtemberg; some time after, Napoleon I. erected Westphalia into a kingdom, and created Jérôme king. Compelled to abandon his territories on the abdication of Napoleon, he lived in exile until the return from Elba, when he repaired to Paris and distinguished himself at Waterloo. After the final abdication of his brother, he lived chiefly at Trieste, where he purchased a palace, until Louis Napoleon became ruler of France. Jérôme was then recalled to Paris, and was created a marshal of France. D. 1860.—CHARLES, Prince of Canino, the eldest son of Lucien Bonaparte, b. 1803; d. 1857. He was the author of a work on American ornithology and on the "Zoölogy of Europe." In 1848 he was elected president of the Roman constituent assembly.—LENAÏDE CHARLOTTE JULIE, a daughter of Joseph, b. in Paris, 1804; married, 1822, to Charles Lucien Jules Lannat Bonaparte, Prince of Canino. D. in Naples, 1854.

BOND, WILLIAM CRANCH, an American astronomer, b. in Portland, Me.,

1789. Having gained a high reputation at his private observatory in Dorchester, Mass., he was made director of the observatory at Cambridge, in 1839. His labors there, in connection with his son's, have added largely to our knowledge of astronomy, and observers are indebted to his practical skill for several inventions of great value in the mechanism for recording observations. D. 1859.

BONIPLAND, AÏME, a naturalist, fellow-traveller with Humboldt, and the author of several botanical works. B. 1774; d. in Paraguay, 1858.

BOOLE, GEORGE, professor of mathematics in Queen's college, Cork, b. in the city of Lincoln, England, 1816; d. at Ballintemple, near Cork, 1864. He was eminently self-taught, and distinguished as one of the ablest mathematicians of the day. The publication of an essay from his pen, "On the Mathematical Analysis of Logic," procured for him the bronze and gold medals of the Royal Society; and after his appointment to the professor's chair, the university of Dublin conferred on him the honorary degree of LL. D., and subsequently the university of Oxford that of D. C. L. His principal work is "An Investigation into the Laws of Thought," which has been pronounced "by far the most successful attempt that has ever been made to reduce the process of general reasoning to mathematical formulæ."

BOOTH, JUNIUS BRUTUS, an English tragedian, b. in London, 1796. He made his début at Covent Garden theatre in 1814, as Richard III. with so much success that he was regarded as the rival of Edmund Kean, then just rising into fame. The managers of Drury Lane theatre induced him to act there in the same plays with Kean; and when, after a few nights, he reappeared at Covent Garden, the audience broke out against him in a riot which drove him for a time from the London stage. In 1821 he made his first appearance in the United States, and from that time until the close of his life he acted repeatedly in every theatre in the country; and in spite of certain irregular habits, which sometimes interfered with the fulfilment of his engagements, he enjoyed a popularity which few actors have acquired. During the latter part of his life he resided with his family at Baltimore, making occasional professional excursions to other cities. He had just returned from a lucrative tour to California when he d. on the passage from New Orleans to Cincinnati, 1852. He is most closely identified with the part of Richard. His other favorite personations were Iago, Shylock, Hamlet, Sir Giles Overreach, and Sir Edward Mortimer.

BORLAND, SOLON, a brigadier-general in the Confederate service, b. in Virginia; d. in Texas, 1864. He was a senator in congress from 1848 to 1853, and represented the United States as minister to Central America under President Pierce.

BORRER, WILLIAM, an English botanist, and one of the authors of a work on "British Lichens," b. 1782; d. 1862.

BOSQUET, MARSHAL, commander of the first division of the French army of the Crimea, was b. at Pau, in the department of the Lower Pyrenees, 1810. He served with distinction in Algeria, and figured in the Crimea wherever fighting was going forward. He was wounded in the capture of the Malakoff, and on his return to France was treated with high distinction. D. 1861.

BOUGARS, THEODORE XAVIER THOMAS, Count de, b. in France, 1792; d. in New York, 1862. He formerly held high rank in the French army, and commanded a regiment of New York volunteers in the Mexican war.

BOULIGNY, JOHN EDMOND, b. in New Orleans, of Creole descent, in 1724, was a representative of Louisiana in the 36th congress, and remained steadfast to the Union after his State had been committed by its secession leaders to the rebellion. D. in Washington, 1864.

BOURDON, PIERRE L. M., a French mathematician, b. 1799, author of treatises on Algebra and Arithmetic, and other books in popular use. D. in Paris, 1854.

BOUVIER, JOHN, an American jurist of French birth, b. 1787. He emigrated to this country in his 15th year, and settled in Philadelphia, where he was admitted to the bar in 1818, and in 1838 was made associate judge of the court of criminal sessions. He wrote several law-books, the most important of which is the "Institutes of American Law." D. 1851.

BOWEN, JOHN S., major-general in the Confederate army, b. in Georgia, and educated at West Point; d. in Raymond, Miss., 1863.

BOXER, EDWARD, an English admiral, d. 1855.

BOYD, LINN, b. in Nashville, Tenn., 1800; d. in Kentucky, 1859. He served several sessions in the Kentucky legislature; represented that state in congress from 1835 to 1837, from 1839 to 1847, and from 1847 to 1855; during his last term occupying the chair of speaker of the house. — JAMES, b. at Paisley, Scotland, 1795, originally devoted himself to the study of medicine. Renouncing this profession, he addressed himself to theology, and in 1822 became a preacher of the gospel. In turn, he abandoned preaching, and accepted the classical mastership of the high-school of Edinburgh. While occupying this position he labored assiduously and successfully in the field of classical and general editorship. D. 1856.

BRADISH, LUTHER, b. in Cummington, Mass., 1783; d. at Newport, R. I., 1863. He studied law in New York, was several times elected to the New York legislature, was lieutenant-governor of the state, and in 1842 the unsuccessful candidate of the whig party for governor. He was assistant United States treasurer at New York under President Fillmore, and during the late years of his life took an active interest in various philanthropic movements.

BRADLEY, CHARLES W., a Chinese scholar, and United States consul to China under President Pierce, d. 1865. He was formerly secretary of state of Connecticut.

BRADY, HUGH, an American officer, b. in Pennsylvania, 1768, entered the army as ensign in 1792, and served under Wayne in his famous Indian campaign after the defeat of St. Clair. Retiring soon after, he was recommissioned by Mr. Jefferson in 1808. In 1812 he was appointed colonel, and distinguished himself at Lundy's Lane and at Chippewa, where he headed his regiment and was severely wounded. In 1825 he was placed in command of the military department at Detroit, Mich., where he d., 1851. He contributed largely to preserving peace on the frontier during the patriot disturbances in Canada.

BRAHAM, JOHN, a celebrated singer, b. in London, 1774; d. 1856. His parents, who were Jews, died when he was still a child, but he was confided to the care of Leoni, an Italian singer of celebrity, and made his début as a public singer before he had attained his eleventh year, when, from the quality and compass of his voice, he was enabled to sing several bravura songs that had been written for Madame Mara. In 1794 he appeared at Bath at some concerts that took place under the direction of M. Rauzzini, who, appreciating his talent, gave him musical instruction for three years. In 1796 he was engaged for Drury Lane theatre, and his début in an opera called "Mahmoud" was so successful that in the year following he was engaged for the Italian opera house. Hoping, however, to achieve a reputation more permanent than could be obtained by any other course, he resolved to visit Italy, and there to complete his musical education. On his return to England he made his début at Covent Garden in 1801. This is the point from which may be dated that triumphant career, during which he created a constant furor. Mr. Braham was also renowned as a composer. Not only did he write several of the most popular songs, but he composed a tolerably long list of entire operas, as they were called in their time. though, according to present notions, they were merely dramas interspersed with occasional songs. The only vocation which Mr. Braham tried without success was that of manager of the St. James's theatre, London, which he built as an opera house, and which was first opened in 1836.

BRANCH, LAWRENCE O. B., a general in the Confederate army, b. in North Carolina in 1820, was killed at the battle of Antietam, Sept. 1862. He was a lawyer by profession, and was a representative in the 34th, 35th, and 36th congresses.—JOHN, an influential citizen of North Carolina, b. in that state, 1782; d. 1863. He graduated at the university of North Carolina in 1801, and after studying and practising law, was in 1811 elected a state senator, being reelected every year until 1817. He was then elected governor of the state; again entered the state senate in 1822; served in the United States senate from 1823 to 1829; and was in the latter year appointed secretary of the navy by President Jackson. In 1831 he was elected to a seat in congress as representative, in 1834 was again elected to the state senate, and in 1843 was appointed governor of the territory of Florida; after which he retired to private life.

BRAVO, NICOLAS, a Mexican general and statesman, b. 1792, was the son of Leonardo Bravo, who died heroically in the service of his country in its struggle for independence. Nicolas held a command in the revolutionary army, and soon after the capture of his father by the Spaniards, 200 Spanish prisoners, some of them of high rank, fell into his hands. He thereupon sent a flag of truce to the Spanish viceroy, offering to liberate his own prisoners, if the viceroy would send his father as a prisoner to Spain, instead of executing him. The proposal came too late, Leonardo having died of prison fever; but Nicolas at once, with the greatest magnanimity, released all his prisoners, assigning as a reason that he wished to free himself from the temptation of a terrible revenge. He served throughout the war against Spain, and in 1817 was taken by the viceroy Apodaca and imprisoned in the city of Mexico until the general amnesty granted by Ferdinand VII. When Iturbide established the independence of Mexico in 1821, he was supported by Bravo; but when in the following year he proclaimed himself emperor, Bravo opposed and aided in deposing him. Bravo became a member of the provisional government, and in 1824, when the federal constitution took effect, he was elected to be vice-president until 1829. In 1827 he headed an unsuccessful revolt against the government, and was banished to Guatemala for six years. President Bustamante recalled him in 1830, and gave him an important military command. In 1839, during a short period, he was charged with the supreme administration of the government; and again from October 1842 to March 1843 he was substituted by Santa Anna, during his absence, as dictator at the head of the army. For the last time he held executive power as temporary president in 1846, when he was deposed by a revolution. He served in the war with the United States, and participated in the battle of Cerro Gordo. D. 1854.

BRAYLEY, EDWARD WEDLAKE, an antiquarian and miscellaneous writer, was b. in Lambeth, England, 1773; d. 1854.

BRENTON, SAMUEL, b. in Kentucky, 1809, was a minister from the age of 20 until 1848, when he was appointed register of the Fort Wayne land-office. He was a member of congress from Indiana in 1851 and again in 1855. From 1853 to 1855 he was president of Fort Wayne college. D. 1857.

BRISBANE, GENERAL SIR THOMAS MACDOUGALL, b. 1773, was governor of New South Wales from 1821 to 1826. He established the observatory at Parramatta, the result of which is the Brisbane catalogue of southern stars. His name was on the British army-list sixty-seven years. D. 1860.

BRITTON, JOHN, an English antiquarian, b. 1771, was the author and compiler of "Architectural Antiquities of England," and numerous other valuable and richly illustrated architectural and topographical works. He published in 1847 an "Essay on the Authorship of the Letters of Junius," in which he endeavored to prove that Junius was Col. Barré. D. in London, 1857.

BROCKEDON, WILLIAM, an author, artist, and inventor, b. in Devonshire, England, 1787; d. 1854. "Italy, Classical and Picturesque," and "Egypt and Nubia," are his best known works.

BRODERICK, DAVID COLBRETH, b. in Washington, D. C., 1819, was the son of an Irish stone-cutter. The family removed to New York during his infancy, where, about the age of 18, he was left without relations, his parents and only brother having died. His generous heart and open hand soon attracted to him devoted friends, and his energetic character and strong will enabled him to acquire a large political influence. In 1846 he was a democratic candidate for congress from New York city, but was defeated. In 1850, having removed to California, he was elected to the senate of that state, of which body he was chosen president. In 1856 he was sent to the United States senate, and took his seat in March, 1857. When the attempt was made to force the Lecompton constitution upon the people of Kansas, he took sides with the republicans and anti-Lecompton democrats against the measure, and denounced its authors and supporters. His freedom of speech and fearlessness of character gave offence to the pro-slavery party, which at that time domineered over California; and on his return home, at the close of the session, they assailed him with bitter personal abuse, which he was not slow to retort. The result was a challenge from Judge Terry, a notorious duellist, and a duel, in which Broderick received a mortal wound. D. 1859.

BRODERIP, WILLIAM JOHN, b. in Bristol, England, studied law, and was called to the bar in 1817. He edited a work on "Sewers," and was associate editor of several volumes of law reports (Broderip and Bingham). For 34 years he held the office of police magistrate. He was a devoted student of natural history, and published many articles on that subject. He wrote the zoological articles for the "English Cyclopaedia." D. in London, 1859.

BRODHEAD, THORNTON F., colonel of the 1st Michigan cavalry, wounded at the second battle of Bull Run; d. 1862. He was b. in New Hampshire in 1822, and was a lawyer by profession. He had a high reputation for soldierly qualities, having served with distinction in the Mexican war as an officer of the 15th United States infantry.

BRODIE, SIR BENJAMIN COLLINS, bart., an eminent English surgeon, professor of the medico-chirurgical society, and president of the royal college of surgeons, b. 1783; d. 1862. His practice is said to have yielded an average income of $60,000 per year for nearly 40 years. He was a skillful operator and a profound anatomist. He published "Lectures on Diseases of the Urinary Organs," "Observations, Pathological and Surgical, on Diseases of the Joints," "Physiological Researches," and "Physiological Inquiries."

BROKE, CHARLES ACTON, commander in the British navy, was the son of Admiral Broke, who commanded the Shannon in the action with the Chesapeake. D. 1855.

BRONSON, GREENE C., a prominent lawyer and politician, b. in Oneida, N. Y., about 1798; d. at Saratoga, 1863. He resided many years at Utica, where he enjoyed a lucrative practice and a high professional reputation. He was elected to the state assembly in 1822, and from 1829 to 1836 filled the office of attorney-general. He was then, successively, puisne judge of the supreme court of judicature, chief justice of the supreme court, and one of the judges of the court of appeals. Removing to New York, he lost heavily by speculation, and in 1853 accepted the position of collector of the port, from which, however, he was removed in the following year. From 1859 until his death he was counsel for the city corporation. He was an influential member of the democratic party, and was the "Hard Shell" candidate for governor in 1855. — DAVID, b. in Maine, 1799, represented the Norridgewock district of that state in congress from 1841 to 1843, and for many years afterward was judge of the supreme judicial court. D. 1863.

BRONTË, CHARLOTTE, an English novelist, b. 1816. She was a daughter of Rev. Patrick Brontë, who, at the time of her birth, was curate of Thornton church, and in 1820 became vicar of Haworth. His wife died in the following year, leaving Charlotte and five other children, four of whom were girls, in the sole care of their father, a kind-hearted but eccentric religionist, whose narrow means and peculiarities of temper, combined with his isolated position, cut them off from the ordinary delights of childhood, except such as they could find among themselves, and forced from them a precocious development of thoughtfulness and self-reliance. In 1824 Charlotte and three of her sisters were placed at a boarding-school. Hard fare, severe discipline, and bad management rendered them all unhappy. The situation—a place called Cowan's Bridge—proved sickly. The two elder sisters were taken home with impaired health, and both of them died in the summer of 1825. With an impression of her bitter experience at this place that sunk deep into her heart, Charlotte, accompanied by her younger sister Emily, returned home in the ensuing autumn. She was now the oldest of the children, and she devoted herself assiduously to the care of the family until the winter of 1831, when she was again put to school at a place called Roe Head. Here she passed two years; and in 1835 she reentered the school as a teacher, in which vocation she labored with all her might, until failing health forced her to give up her situation. Again she spent a short and happy season at home, fulfilling all the duties of a daughter and elder sister; but, determined to make her own way in the world, she went forth once more in the year 1839, and for two years undertook the hard and uncongenial occupation of governess. Her next plan was that she and her two sisters should open an independent school. With this view Charlotte and Emily went to a school at Brussels, to qualify themselves for the task. They were induced to prolong their stay and take part in the teaching; Charlotte remained there two years, and returned with new and varied acquirements. Arrangements were now made for opening the proposed school; but the three sisters met with so little encouragement beyond good wishes, that they at last gave up the project in despair. During this period and thenceforth the sisters remained at home, dividing their time between household cares and literary labors. In 1846 they put forth a volume of poems, under the names of "Curren, Ellis, and Acton Bell." It met little favor. Making a new effort to gain the public ear, they each wrote a prose tale. These were "The Professor," by Charlotte; "Wuthering Heights," by Emily; and "Agnes Grey," by Anne: the names assumed in the volume of poems being still retained. The two latter found a publisher; the first was everywhere refused. Under the weight of all this discouragement, Charlotte composed her novel of "Jane Eyre," which was published in 1847. Its success was triumphant, and the reputation of the author, whose real name was yet unknown, was established at once on a firm footing. But this great success was followed by as great afflictions. Charlotte's sister Emily died in December, 1848; and in less than six months, Anne, the youngest of this remarkable trio, was also laid in the grave. On the publication of "Shirley," Charlotte Brontë's second novel, in 1849, the secret of the authorship transpired, and Charlotte took her place among the literary stars of the time. In 1854 she became the wife of Rev. Mr. Nicholls, her father's curate. The newly married pair lived happily at the parsonage, and Charlotte's careworn life seemed to have reached a season of rest and joy. But it was near its close. She d. at Haworth, 1855.

BROOKE, FRANCIS J., for 30 years judge of the court of appeals of Virginia, b. near Fredericksburgh, Va., 1763. In 1780 he entered the patriot army as a lieutenant, and served till the close of the war. He was admitted to practise law in 1788. After serving in the state legislature for several years, he was elected, in 1804, a judge of the general court; and in 1811, of the court of appeals, to which he was reelected in 1831 under the revised constitution. D. 1851.—GEORGE M., an American officer, entered the army from Virginia, in 1808, as first lieutenant, and d. at San Antonio, Texas, in command of the 8th military department, 1851. He was four times brevetted for meritorious services,—the last time in 1848, as major-general, for his conduct in the prosecution of the war with Mexico.

BROOKS, PRESTON S., b. in South Carolina, 1819, was elected to the legislature in 1844; commanded a company in the Palmetto regiment in the Mexican war; and in 1853 was sent to congress. In May, 1856, he made an assault upon senator Sumner, of Massachusetts, while that gentleman was writing at his desk in the senate chamber. A majority of the house of representatives having voted for his expulsion, on account of this affair, Mr. Brooks resigned his seat; but his constituents having approved his conduct, he was reelected to congress by a unanimous vote. He d. suddenly in Washington, 1857.

BROWN, JOHN, the leader of an attack upon Harper's Ferry, Va., was b. in Connecticut about 1799. On the settlement of Kansas, Brown removed thither, and, having settled at Osawatomie, became an active and fearless partisan leader of the free state forces during the bloody and desolating struggle in 1856-7. In 1858 he conceived a plan for carrying war into the slave-holding states, and with this view met a number of confederates in secret convention at Chatham, Canada, where a plan for inaugurating an emancipation war was resolved upon, and a constitution formed for the provisional government of the states in which the contemplated insurrection might gain hold. Brown was named commander-in-chief, and in this capacity issued several military commissions to his followers. On the night of Sunday, Oct. 16th, 1859, Brown and 21 followers suddenly entered Harper's Ferry, seized and occupied the armory buildings, and captured several government officers and workmen, with some of the principal inhabitants of the place. On the next day several conflicts occurred, Brown losing some of his adherents, and they, on the other hand, killing some of the residents, including the mayor. Eventually, Brown and those who remained with him, together with his prisoners and a few slaves who had joined him, retreated into the fire-engine house, within the armory enclosure, and there resisted several attacks, with loss of life on both sides. Meanwhile, a body of United States troops arrived, with two pieces of artillery, under command of Colonel Lee; and on Tuesday morning, Brown having refused to surrender, the door of the building was battered down, and a hand-to-hand fight ensued. Brown was cut down by a sabre-stroke, after being wounded several times with bayonets, and all of his companions were killed or wounded except two, who were taken without injury. He was indicted, and tried before the county court for treason and murder, and being found guilty was hanged, Dec. 2, 1859.—JAMES, b. in Acton, Mass., 1800, commenced his business career as assistant in the Cambridge university bookstore, and ended it as a partner in the widely known publishing firm of Little, Brown, & Co., of Boston. A thorough bibliographer, he exercised great influence as a publisher; and his taste, energy, and enterprise contributed largely to improvement in the mechanical execution and appearance of American books, and especially of law books. He was a student of natural history, and bequeathed to the Boston natural history society a valuable collection of works on ornithology. D. in Watertown, Mass., 1855.—AARON V., b. in Virginia, 1795; d. in Washington, 1859. He graduated at Chapel Hill university in 1814, and in 1815 removed with his parents to Tennessee, where he devoted himself to the study of law: and when admitted to practice, became a partner of the late James K. Polk, in Giles county, serving, in the mean time, for a number of years in the legislature of Tennessee. In 1839 he was elected a member of congress, and reelected in 1841 and 1843. On his retirement from congress, in 1845, he was elected governor of Tennessee. His last official position was that of postmaster-general in the cabinet of President Buchanan. Among the measures which marked his administration of postal affairs, may be mentioned the establishment of a new and shorter oceanic communication to California, by Tehuantepec, of the great overland mail from Memphis and St. Louis to San Francisco, and another across the continent, via Salt Lake. His principal political speeches were published in a collected form in 1854. He took an active part in the southern convention held at Nashville in 1850, and was the author of the "Tennessee Platform."—ROBERT, an English botanist, b. 1773. He was the botanist of an expedition to Australia in 1801, and returned to England in 1805 with a rich collection of specimens. He was appointed conservator of the library and botanical collections of Sir Joseph Banks, which were eventually deposited in the British museum; and in 1827 he was appointed keeper of the botanical department of that institution, which position he held until his death. In 1849 he was elected president of the Linnæan society. Vegetable physiology is indebted to him for several important discoveries. D. in London, 1858.—SAMUEL, a Scottish chemist and poet, b. at Haddington, 1817, entered the university of Edinburgh as a student of medicine in 1832, and graduated with distinguished honor. He began his public career in 1840, by delivering a course of lectures on the philosophy of the sciences. Pursuing his favorite study of chemistry, in which he had conceived some original theories, he devoted himself for years, with unremitting toil, to experiments in his laboratory. His apparent success in some elaborate processes for transmuting metals almost led to the belief that the dreams of alchemy were about to be realized. In 1849 he delivered in Edinburgh a series of lectures on the history of chemistry. In the following year he published the "Tragedy of Galileo." His lectures and essays embrace a great variety of subjects. Some of his papers entitle him to a high place among philosophical thinkers. His prose and verse are almost equally marked by the mixture of poetic feeling and calm reasoning. The fascination of his conversation and personal character gained him the friendship of some of the highest literary persons of the age. D. in Edinburgh, 1856. — GOULD, an American grammarian, b. in Rhode Island, 1791, was a teacher by profession, and published his "Institutes of Grammar" to supply a deficiency in the text-books used by his pupils. The success of this work led him to prepare "The Grammar of English Grammars," published in 1851, a comprehensive and masterly treatise by which its author will long be remembered. D. 1857.

BROWNELL, CHARLES CLARENCE, a native of Connecticut, d. in Egypt, 1862, while engaged with the Petherick expedition in search of the sources of the Nile. — THOMAS CHURCH, right reverend, presiding bishop of the protestant episcopal church in the United States, b. in Westport, Mass., 1779; d. at Hartford, 1865. He entered Providence college, now Brown university, in 1800, and graduated at the Schenectady Union college in 1804. He remained several years connected with the latter institution, successively, as tutor in Latin and Greek, as professor of belles-lettres and moral philosophy, and as professor of chemistry and mineralogy. In 1813 he exchanged the congregational for the episcopal church, and in 1816 was ordained by bishop Hobart. Retaining his professorship in Union college, he commenced his ministerial career as a missionary in Schenectady and the vicinity. He became assistant minister of Trinity church, N. Y., in 1818, and in the following year was elected bishop of Connecticut. He was the founder of Trinity college, Hartford, and was for some years its president. He contributed largely to the current theological literature of the time, and published "The Family Prayer Book," and a voluminous compilation entitled "Religion of the Heart and Life."

BROWNING, ELIZABETH BARRETT, an English poetess, was b. in London, 1809, of a family in affluent circumstances. She was educated with great care, and at a very early age began to write for periodical publications. In 1826 she published her first volume of poems, and during the ensuing twelve years three more volumes from her pen were given to the public. In these as well as in the "Drama of Exile," a subsequent work, the subjects treated were of a nature to call forth the highest powers of mind; and the boldness and vigor displayed by Miss Barrett in grappling with such themes, indicated a remarkable degree of literary ability. About the time of the publication of the last-mentioned work her health was seriously impaired by the rupture of a blood-vessel, and for a long time she was in a critical condition. For the sake of the climate she was taken to Torquay, and while there her nervous system received a fearful shock from the death by drowning of a beloved brother, who perished within sight of the house where she was residing. Removed by slow stages to her home in London, her life for many years was that of a confirmed invalid. She sought relief from pain in abstruse studies, embodying the fruits of her research in new productions from her own pen. The first collected edition of her poems was published in 1844. In 1846, her health having somewhat improved, she became the wife of Robert Browning. Soon after this event Mr. and Mrs. Browning removed to Florence, where they resided for the most part until her death. Italy, and the affairs of Italy, in which she took the deepest interest, inspired some of the finest of her later poems. "Aurora Leigh," a narrative poem of English life, was her last extended effort. D. in Florence, 1861.

BRUAT, ARMAND JOSEPH, a French admiral, b. 1796. He was appointed in 1845 governor of the Marquesas, and soon after governor of all the French establishments in Oceania. He was second in command of the Black-Sea squadron in 1854, and took an active part in the first bombardment of Sebastopol. He succeeded admiral Hamelin in the command of the squadron. D. 1855.

BRUCK, BARON DE, an Austrian financier, b. 1799; d. 1860. He was appointed minister of finance at Vienna in 1855, and held the office until the day preceding his death. Suspected of complicity in extensive frauds connected with his office, he was removed, and then committed suicide.

BRUNEL, ISAMBARD KINGDOM, an eminent English engineer, was b. in 1806, while his father, the constructor of the Thames tunnel, was engaged in erecting the great block-factory in Portsmouth dockyard. From the earliest age he showed not merely high mechanical and scientific ability, with unwearied industry and devotion to his profession, but a love of art which is exhibited in all his works. Various as these are, they have all the common characteristic of size and grandeur in design. Having taken an active part with his father in the construction of the Thames tunnel, he was engaged, after the stoppage of that work, in building docks at Sunderland and Bristol. At the latter place he was engaged as engineer of the line of railroad known as the Great Western. On this line, following out his ruling idea, he introduced what is called the broad gauge, which has been made the subject of vehement controversy. As an effort of engineering, however, the Great Western railroad is remarkable for the magnificence of its works as well as for the speed and security of its locomotion. The South Devon and Cornish railways are not less conspicuous specimens of his wonderful mechanical powers; and the failure of the atmospheric principle, as applied to the South Devon railway, never shook his belief that it would be hereafter employed with success. Communication with the United States, as directly connected with the Great Western railroad, suggested the idea of the steamship Great Western, to which he gave double the power and tonnage of any vessel then in existence. His next work, the Great Britain, was more than double the size of the Great Western, and showed conclusively, on the rocks of Dundrum bay, that ships of very large size can with safety be built only of iron. To him also is owing the introduction and general adoption by British shipbuilders of the screw, as a method of propulsion in place of the paddle-wheel. Having carried out this principle with success, he proceeded to work out the idea which found its realization in the Great Eastern. This idea was that long voyages could only be made economically and speedily by steamers capable of carrying coal for the whole outward voyage, and also for the return voyage, in cases where a supply could not easily be obtained at the outport. This ship was the last great effort of his life. Long and intense exertion had impaired his strength, which failed altogether under his last efforts for the completion of the Great Eastern; and the life of this great engineer, who was not less estimable for his private worth than eminent for his scientific powers, was closed prematurely in 1859.

BUCH, LEOPOLD VON, a German geologist, pronounced by Humboldt "the greatest geologist of the age," was b. at Stolpe in Brandenburg, 1774. His life was one continued round of observation, travel, and investigation. He published the results of his researches in numerous learned works, in which he advanced many important theories. D. in Berlin, 1853.

BUCHAN, PETER, a Scottish antiquarian, distinguished for his researches in ballad poetry, d. 1854.

BUCHANAN, THOMAS MCKEAN, lieutenant-colonel United States navy, b. in Pennsylvania; killed on the gunboat Calhoun, at Bayou Têche, La., 1863.

BUCKINGHAM, JAMES SILK, an English traveller, lecturer, and writer, was b. at Flushing, 1784. In his youth he followed the sea, and after engaging in various adventurous enterprises, he took command of a ship in the service of the Imaun of Muscat. Being ordered to convoy slave-ships, he threw up his commission, and established a newspaper at Calcutta. The freedom of his animadversions on public affairs offended the authorities, in consequence of which he returned to England, where he employed himself as a journalist, with varying success. He published his Arabian travels in numerous volumes, and became a popular lecturer on political and social questions. He found time for European travel, which furnished him material for several volumes. In 1832 he was elected to parliament, where he retained his seat until 1837. Soon after his retirement he made a lecturing tour to America, and published his observations in nine octavo volumes. He afterwards resumed his occupation as a lecturer and writer, and continued to be an earnest advocate of temperance and other social reforms. D. in London, 1855.—JOSEPH TINKER, a New-England journalist, b. in Windham, Conn., 1799, began life as a printer, published a monthly magazine in 1806, and afterwards established and edited successively, "The New England Galaxy," "The New England Magazine," and "The Boston Courier," the first number of which last-named paper appeared in 1824. He retired from the editorship of the "Courier" in 1848. D. in Cambridge, 1861.

BUCKLAND, WILLIAM, a geologist and clergyman of the church of England, b. in 1784, received his early education at Winchester, and entered Corpus Christi college, Oxford, in 1801. From an early age he had shown a great predilection for natural science, and on his being appointed to the readership of mineralogy and geology in Oxford university, his profound knowledge of the subject, joined to his powers of exposition, awakened an interest for the pursuits of science, in contradistinction to those of literature. His first work was the "Vindiciæ Geologiæ," published in 1820, in which he showed the harmony that prevails between nature and revelation; and the year following he made the discovery of the remains of animals in the caves at Kirkdale, which formed the basis of his work entitled "Reliquiæ Diluvianæ; or, Observations on Organic Remains attesting the Action of an Universal Deluge." From this period his pen was occupied with geological subjects; and his disquisitions not only displayed great powers of observation and unwearied industry, but many of the general conclusions at which he arrived hence became part and parcel of the great laws of geological science. His "Geology and Mineralogy," which formed one of the Bridgewater treatises, has become a standard work. In 1825 he was appointed to the living of Stoke St. Charity, in Hampshire, and also became a canon of Christ church; and twenty years later he was nominated dean of Westminster by the late Sir Robert Peel. His zeal for science suffered no abatement, however; he continued to take an interest in all questions involving social amelioration; but in 1850 his intellect gave way, and from that period till his death, in 1856, he remained in a state of mental weakness.

BUCKLE, HENRY THOMAS, an English author, b. at Lee, 1822, was intended by his parents for a mercantile career, and after receiving an excellent education, entered a commercial house. In his eighteenth year his father died, leaving him a large fortune, and he immediately gave up commerce for literature. In 1857 he published the first volume of his "History of Civilization," embracing only a part of the introduction to a vast work that the author had undertaken. It showed an extent of attainments and a breadth of generalization which attracted universal attention. The second volume appeared in 1861. The plan that Buckle conceived was based on the idea that he was to live to the age of three score and ten; but his early death left his work a splendid fragment. D. at Damascus, 1862, while travelling in the east for his health.

BUFORD, JOHN, a distinguished cavalry officer in the United States service, b. in Kentucky, 1825; d. at Washington, 1863. He graduated at West Point, in 1848, and received a commission in the 1st dragoons, from which he was promoted to the rank of major in the inspector-general's corps. In 1862 he was appointed a brigadier-general, serving in Virginia, under Gen. Pope, and on Gen. McClellan's staff at Antietam. He commanded the reserve cavalry brigade, under Gen. Stoneman, and exhibited great gallantry and skill at Gettysburg, and in other engagements in which cavalry took a part. He was next assigned to the command of the cavalry in the army of the Cumberland, but was prostrated by typhoid fever, the product of toil and exposure. On his death-bed he received a major-general's commission.

BULLARD, HENRY ADAMS, b. in Groton, Mass., 1788, was educated at Harvard college, and while studying the law in Philadelphia, became aid and secretary of General Toledo, who was organizing an expedition to revolutionize New Mexico. In 1813 he accompanied the general and his recruits to Natchitoches, whence they entered the Mexican territory, but were repulsed by the Spanish forces. Young Bullard managed to reach Natchitoches, where he commenced the practice of his profession. In 1822 he was made a judge of the district court, and in 1831 was elected to congress from the western district of Louisiana, and reëlected the following session. In 1834 he was made judge of the supreme bench, and so continued till he was displaced by the new constitution, in 1840, and returned to practice in New Orleans. In 1847 he was appointed professor of the civil law, in the law school of Louisiana. In 1850 he was again elected to congress. D. 1851.

BUNSEN, CHRISTIAN CHARLES JOSIAS, chevalier, b. at Korbach, in the principality of Waldeck, 1791; d. at Bonn, 1860. He was educated at Marburg; afterwards at Göttingen, where, in 1811, he was admitted into the gymnasium, and, in 1813, published an essay, "De Jure Atheniensium Hæreditario," which attracted great attention. In 1815 he became acquainted with Niebuhr at Berlin; and after a stay in Paris, where he studied Oriental languages under Silvestre de Sacy, he went to Rome, where Niebuhr, the Prussian minister, procured for him the post of secretary of embassy. On Niebuhr's retirement, in 1824, he was appointed chargé d'affaires, and afterwards minister, by Frederick III., to whom he had recommended himself by his great theological learning. After a sojourn of twelve years in Rome, he was sent as Prussian minister, first to Switzerland, and then to England. But his eminence as a scholar and writer has eclipsed his political character and services. His writings are numerous and elaborate, but they have met with much hostile criticism. He labored with unwearied diligence in theology, history, and archaeological research. Among his chief works are the "Church of the Future," "Hippolytus and his Age," "Christianity and Mankind, their Beginnings and Prospects," and "The Place of Egypt in the History of the World." On some of these and other works he was constantly engaged at Heidelberg, where he chiefly resided from the year 1854 until his death.

BURGESS, TRISTAM, an American statesman, was b. in Rochester, Mass., 1770. He had few advantages of early education, but was a great reader, and devoted himself earnestly to self-improvement. At 21 he entered the Wrentham academy, and by teaching school in the winter months, he acquired the means of continuing his studies until he was fitted for college. He graduated at Rhode Island college (now Brown university) in 1793, and in 1799 was admitted to the bar. He soon gained a high reputation and an extensive practice. In 1811 he was elected to the state legislature, by the federal party; and in 1815 he was made chief justice. The triumph of the republicans having removed him from this post in the ensuing year, he became professor of oratory and belles-lettres in Brown university, which place he filled until his election as a representative to congress, in 1825. His great excellence as a debater, the characteristics of which were fervid eloquence and withering sarcasm, combined with clear reasoning power, soon placed him in the first rank of the public men of the day. He served for five successive terms, during which he took a leading part in discussing the important measures that were brought forward. He opposed with vehemence the compromise tariff bill of Mr. Clay; and this opposition, doubtless, caused his defeat in 1835, — the democratic-republican party having gained the ascendancy in Rhode Island. He never again took part in public affairs, but cultivated his farm, near Providence, until his death, which occurred in 1853.

BURMEISTER, HERMANN, a German naturalist, b. at Stralsund, 1807. He was for many years an instructor in the gymnasium of Cologne. In 1842 he became professor of zoology in the university of Halle. His published works are numerous and important. D. 1859.

BURNAP, GEORGE WASHINGTON, a unitarian clergyman, b. in Merrimac, N. H., 1802, graduated at Harvard college in 1824, was ordained pastor of the first independent church in Baltimore, 1828, and continued its pastor until his death. In 1849 he received the degree of D. D. from Harvard college. He was a voluminous writer on theological and doctrinal subjects, and a frequent contributor to periodicals. D. in Philadelphia, 1859.

BURNET, JACOB, one of the founders of the city of Cincinnati, was b. at Newark, N. J., 1770. He was admitted to the bar in 1796, and soon after settled in Cincinnati, then a village of 500 inhabitants. He gained high rank as a lawyer, was a member of the territorial government of Ohio for 4 years, and after its admission into the union was several times elected to the state assembly. In 1821 he was appointed judge of the supreme court of Ohio, and in 1828 he was elected United States senator. He was a man of great influence and public spirit, and took a leading part in scientific and benevolent enterprises. He published in 1847 an instructive volume of "Notes on the Northwestern Territory." D. 1853.

BURTON, WILLIAM EVANS, an English comedian, b. in London, 1804. Intended for the church, he received a classical education, and at an early age edited a magazine. His success in amateur theatricals led him to become a professional actor. He gained also quite a reputation as a dramatic author. In 1834 he came to the United States, where he continued to reside until his death, and was widely and favourably known as a manager, actor, and author. In Philadelphia he erected the National theatre, and in 1837 started the "Gentleman's Magazine." He was proprietor of the opera house in New York, which was burned in 1841. In 1847 he opened a theatre in Palmo's opera house, which he managed for nearly 10 years. In 1856 he purchased the Metropolitan, afterwards known as Burton's Theatre, in Broadway. He had great ability as an actor, excelling especially in low comedy. He had a very full Shakspearean library. Of his literary works the best known is probably his "Cyclopedia of Wit and Humor." D. in New York, 1860.

BURY, LADY CHARLOTTE, daughter of the duke of Argyll, authoress of "Marriage in High Life," "Memoirs of a Peeress," "The Divorced," and other novels, b. 1775; d. 1861.

BUSH, GEORGE, an American theologian, was b. in Norwich, Vt., 1796, graduated at Dartmouth college, 1818, was ordained in the Presbyterian church, and was for four years a missionary in Indiana. In 1831 he was elected professor of Hebrew and Oriental literature in the university of New York. Within the next four years he published a "Life of Mohammed," a "Treatise on the Millennium," and a volume of "Scriptural Illustrations"; and in 1840 he began the issue of a series of commentaries on the Old Testament. He edited in 1844 the "Hierophant," a monthly magazine: and in the same year he published his "Anastasis," in which he opposed that view of the resurrection which implies a reconstruction of the material body. This work attracted much attention, and he answered the many attacks which were made upon it in a treatise entitled the "Resurrection of Christ." In 1845 he connected himself with the Swedenborgian church, translated from the Latin the diary of Swedenborg, and afterwards in numerous addresses and short treatises, and as the editor of the "New Church Repository," labored to develop and maintain the principles of that philosopher. In 1847 he published a work on the higher philosophy of mesmerism. Personally he was distinguished for his simple manners, and the geniality and kindness of his disposition. He was a man of marked character, and of as distinctly marked personal appearance. D. 1859.

BUSTAMANTE, ANASTASIE, a Mexican soldier and statesman, was b. in Guadalajara, 1782. He began life as a physician, but when the revolution of 1810 broke out he entered on a military career in the service of the Spanish government. Disgusted at length with the cruelties of the Spaniards, he joined the patriots and fought in the republican ranks. He sustained the plan of independence proposed by Iturbide in 1821, and was promoted by him to the rank of general of division, and made commandant-general of the interior provinces. In 1829 he was called to the vice-presidency of the republic. He took part against the president Guerrero in the following year, and was charged with the executive power until August, 1832. Being succeeded in the presidency by Pedraza, he took command of the army, and was soon after overthrown and banished by Santa Anna. He went to France, but on the outbreak of the Texan revolution returned to Mexico, and in 1837 was again elected to the presidency, which he held, except during a short interval, until 1841, when he was again overthrown by Santa Anna. He fled to Europe, but upon the fall of Santa Anna, in 1845, again returned to Mexico, and gave his services to his country in many offices until his death. He was one of the most honorable of the public men of Mexico. D. 1851.

BUTLER, ANDREW PICKENS, b. in Edgefield district, S. C., 1796, graduated at South Carolina college in 1817, and soon attained distinction as a lawyer and politician. In 1824 he was elected to the legislature, where he took a prominent part, and in 1833 he was made a judge of the court of common pleas, from which position he was subsequently transferred to the supreme bench of the state. He held this office until 1846, when he was elected to the United States senate, where he was continued by re-election until his death. He was made chairman of the judiciary committee, and took a conspicuous part in the debates, especially upon all subjects affecting the peculiar interests of the South. His last speech was in reply to Mr. Sumner and in defence of South Carolina. D. 1857. — BENJAMIN F., b. in Kinderhook, N. Y., studied law with Martin Van Buren, and commenced practice as his partner. He served in the state assembly, and was one of the revisers of the New York statutes. During part of Jackson's administration he was attorney-general, and was afterwards, for a time, United States district attorney in New York. Worn out by overwork in his profession, he sailed for Europe in October, 1858, hoping to recover his health, but d. in Paris shortly after his arrival.

BYRON, LADY NOEL, Baroness Wentworth, the widow of Lord Byron, b. 1793; d. in London, 1860.

C.

CABET, ETIENNE, leader of the French communists, or Icaris, was b. at Dijon, 1788. He adopted the profession of the law, and in 1816 defended General Veaux, who, in conjunction with some others, was tried for conspiracy against the restored Bourbons. The ardor with which Cabet defended his client drew upon him the suspicion of the authorities, and subsequently he quitted Dijon for Paris. On the fall of the elder Bourbons he was appointed procureur-general for Corsica. One of his first acts, on arriving in Corsica, was to denounce the constitution of July; and he was immediately recalled. On his return to Paris he threw himself into the ranks of the opposition, and became a conspicuous member of the chamber of deputies. He established a democratic newspaper, and in 1834 was prosecuted for alleged libels on Louis Philippe, and condemned to two years' imprisonment. Escaping to England, he remained there until the amnesty of 1839 permitted his return to Paris. In 1842 he enunciated his communistic opinions; his "Voyage en Icarie," published in that year, attracting great attention among the Parisian workmen. Having procured a tract of land in Texas, a portion of his followers left France to found a community, and Cabet subsequently joined them. In his journey through this country, he heard of the expulsion of the Mormons from Nauvoo, and in 1850 he and his disciples removed to that city, where for a time they lived harmoniously and prosperously. Dissensions arose, however, in the midst of which Cabet was made the subject of harsh aspersions. He d. in St. Louis, 1856.

CADY, DANIEL, b. 1772, was for 50 years one of the leading lawyers of the state of New York. In his 75th year he was elected a judge of the supreme court, but resigned in 1855. He continued to practise his profession until struck with blindness in April, 1859, and he d. in the following October.

CALDWELL, CHARLES, an American physician, b. in Caswell county, N. C., 1772. He studied medicine in Philadelphia, and practised there with much success during the prevalence of the yellow fever in 1793. In 1816 he filled the chair of natural history in the university of Pennsylvania. He afterwards removed to Lexington, Ky., and took the chair of medicine in the Transylvania university. He left this position in 1837 to establish a medical school in Louisville, over which he presided for the next 12 years. He had great celebrity as a medical writer and teacher, and published some valuable biographical and literary works. D. in Louisville, 1853.

CALHOUN, JOHN, notorious for his agency in the attempt to make Kansas a slave state, d. at St. Joseph, Mo., 1859. He was appointed surveyor-general of Kansas by President Pierce, and was president of the Lecompton convention.

CALVERT, CHARLES B., an eminent agriculturist, b. in Prince George county, Md., 1808; d. 1864. He served in the Maryland legislature, and in the 37th congress; but his title to distinction rests upon his labors for the improvement of agriculture, and especially the introduction and raising of superior breeds of cattle.

CAMPBELL, JOHN, lord chancellor of England, was b. at Springfield, Scotland, 1781, educated at the university of St. Andrews, entered as a student at Lincoln's Inn in 1800, and called to the bar in 1806. He won a prominent place as an advocate, and in the midst of a large practice found time to publish a valuable series of reports; but his whig politics were so distasteful to Lord Eldon that he did not receive the appointment of king's counsel till 1827. In 1830 he was elected member of parliament; in 1832 he became solicitor-general; in 1834, attorney-general and member of parliament for Edinburgh, which he continued to represent until 1841, when he became lord chancellor of Ireland and a British peer. The fall of the Melbourne cabinet in that year left him at leisure to indulge in literary pursuits, as the fruits of which he presented to the world the "Lives of the Lord Chancellors and Keepers of the Great Seal," and the "Lives of the Chief Justices." The return of the liberal party to power in 1846 gave him the post of chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, and a seat in the Russell cabinet. Five years afterwards, on the retirement of Lord Denman, he became lord chief justice of England. He held this position until the fall of the Derby government in 1859, when Lord Palmerston removed him from the queen's bench to the woolsack. As a constitutional lawyer Lord Campbell had no superior; as a judge, his decisions were characterized by sound legal knowledge and acute discrimination. D. 1862. — SIR JOHN, a British major-general, killed in the assault on the Redan, 1855. — SIR COLIN, afterwards Lord Clyde, was b. at Glasgow, and in 1808 joined the British army. He served in the expedition to Portugal and Walcheren, and shared the fortunes of Sir John Moore in the Peninsula. He also served for a brief period in the war with the United States. In 1842 he commanded a regiment in the expedition to China. The Indian mutiny brought him into greater prominence. He was a brigadier-general in the Punjaub campaign, and achieved distinction at Chillianwallah. He gained fresh laurels in the Crimea, distinguishing himself particularly at the Alma and at Balaklava. The revolt of the Sepoys recalled him to the east, this time in the capacity of commander-in-chief of the Indian army. Courage, coolness, and precision were his chief characteristics as a soldier. D. 1863.

CAMBRELING, CHURCHILL C., b. in North Carolina, 1786; d. at West Neck, Long Island, 1862. At an early day he engaged, with John Jacob Astor, in mercantile pursuits. Subsequently he directed his attention to politics, and from 1821 to 1839 was a representative in congress from New York. As chairman of the committee of commerce, he produced various reports of great value; one, on commerce and navigation, having been republished in London, besides running through several editions in this country.

CAMERON, JAMES, colonel of the 79th Highland regiment of New York, formerly a Pennsylvania editor, b. 1801; killed at Bull Run, 1861.

CANNING, CHARLES JOHN, viscount, a British statesman, son of the celebrated George Canning, was b. at Brompton, 1812. He graduated at Oxford with high honor, entered parliament in 1836, and took office in the cabinet of Sir Robert Peel, in 1841. In 1852 he became post-master-general, with a seat in the cabinet under the Aberdeen administration. In 1855 he succeeded the marquis of Dalhousie as governor-general of India. He had hardly got seated in his office when the Sepoy rebellion broke out; and he was as much censured for his leniency at the beginning of the outbreak as for his severity afterward. He devoted all his energies to the suppression of the insurrection by the military power, and then to pacificatory measures for the reestablishment of order. He retired from office early in 1862, and d. soon after his return to England.

CAPEL, SIR THOMAS BLADON, a British admiral, who commanded the squadron which blockaded New London in the war of 1812. D. 1853, aged 77.

CAPUA, CHARLES FERDINAND, prince of, the son of Francis I., king of the Two Sicilies, and brother of Ferdinand II., b. 1812; d. at Turin, 1862.

CARBUCCIA, GENERAL, a distinguished French archaeologist, and one of the commanders of the French army in the East; d. 1854.

CAREY, JOHN L., a political economist, and successively editor of the "Baltimore American" and "New Orleans Crescent." D. 1852.

CARLETON, HENRY, formerly judge of the supreme court of Louisiana, and author of a volume on "Liberty and Necessity." b. in Virginia, 1783; d. 1863. He graduated at Yale college, and for many years held a distinguished position in the bar of New Orleans.

CARLOS, MARIA ISIDOR, pretender to the crown of Spain, was a son of Charles IV., b. 1788. In 1833, when his brother Ferdinand died, Don Carlos proclaimed himself king. Maria Christina, the regent, branded him as a rebel, and concluded with Britain, France, and Portugal the so-called quadruple alliance, the effect of which was to exclude Carlos and Miguel, the champions of absolutism, from Spain and Portugal. Carlos succeeded in kindling a civil war in the northern provinces of Spain, which raged for several years, but in 1839 he was driven from the Spanish territory. He passed the rest of his life in exile, and d. in Trieste, 1855.

CARROLL, SIR WILLIAM FAREBROTHER, a distinguished officer of the British navy, b. 1785; d. 1862. During his naval career he was 67 times in action upon sea and land.

CASS, THOMAS, b. in Framley, Ireland, 1821, but from early infancy a resident of Boston, Mass., distinguished himself as the colonel of the Massachusetts 9th regiment, a gallant body of Irish citizens who were among the first to respond to the call of the government for volunteers in the suppression of the great rebellion. He d. in July, 1862, from a wound received while bravely leading his men in one of the battles before Richmond.

CASSEL, JOHN, a London publisher, eminent for his successful efforts to provide the working classes of England with a sound and healthy literature. He originated the "Popular Educator," a publication fairly exemplifying the enterprises with which he sought to promote the intelligence and virtue of his readers, and the title of which describes his own character as a business man. His publications extended to almost every branch of human knowledge, and combined excellence of form with an unprecedented lowness of price. He was essentially a self-educated and self-made man. B. in Manchester, 1817; d. in London, 1865.

CASTANOS, GENERAL, duke of Baylen, a distinguished Spanish soldier, and one of the most conspicuous of the commanders who acted with Wellington against Napoleon during the peninsular war. B. 1757; d. 1852.

CATHCART, SIR GEORGE, a British general, b. in London, 1794. He served as aide-de-camp to Wellington at Waterloo. In 1837 he was placed in command of the British forces south of the St. Lawrence, in Canada, and subsequently assumed the governorship and command of the army at the Cape of Good Hope. Appointed to the 4th division in the Crimea, he fell at the battle of Inkerman, 1854.

CAVAIGNAC, LOUIS EUGENE, a French general, was b. in Paris, 1802, and, after a thorough military education at the polytechnic school, entered the army as lieutenant, 1827. He served many years with distinction, a great part of the time being passed in Africa, where he signalized himself by his courage and coolness; attained the rank of brigadier-general; and, finally (1848), was made governor-general of Algeria, and promoted to the rank of general of division. The same year, having been elected to the constituent assembly, he returned to Paris, where he arrived two days after the disturbances of May 15, and was immediately appointed minister of war. During the siege of Paris, in the following June, the national assembly appointed him dictator, and on his resignation of that trust, when quiet was restored, unanimously elected him chief of the executive power. When the presidential election came on, he was the candidate of the middle-class republicans; but was defeated by Louis Napoleon by an immense majority. On the coup d'état of 1851 he was arrested and thrown into prison. After his release he lived in retirement at his country seat, refusing to take the oath of allegiance to the emperor for the sake of any public office. D. suddenly, 1857.

CAVOUR, COUNT CAMILLE DE, a Sardinian statesman, was b. at Turin, 1809. He first became known in public life as one of the founders of "Il Risorgimento," a journal of liberal politics, established in 1847. He entered the Sardinian chamber of deputies in 1849, and subsequently succeeded Santa Rosa as minister of commerce and agriculture. In 1851 he was also intrusted with the "Ministry of Finance"; and in 1852 he succeeded the Marquis d'Azeglio as president of the council. During this period of his administration he introduced free-trade principles into the commercial code of Sardinia, and by favorable treaties extended the traffic of the kingdom with foreign countries. In 1855 he brought about the accession of Piedmont to the Anglo-French alliance, and dispatched Sardinian troops to share in the Crimean expedition. He took an active part in the peace conferences at Paris, and there called the attention of the great European powers to the cause of Italy. He concluded the alliance, in 1859, between France and Sardinia for the deliverance of the Peninsula from the domination of Austria; and in July of that year, in consequence of the French emperor's sudden termination of the campaign against Austria, he resigned his office. In January, 1860, he again assumed the presidency of the council, and was placed at the head of the department of foreign affairs, as well as of the interior. His masterly management secured the recognition of the principle of Italian unity; and in March, 1862, he presented to a new parliament a bill constituting the new monarchy, under the title of the kingdom of Italy. His acknowledged patriotism did not shield him from an attack in parliament by Garibaldi, who bitterly opposed some of Cavour's measures. Garibaldi subsequently sought a reconciliation, through the king. Cavour's health, already impaired by extraordinary labor, suffered severely under the excitement of an attack from such a quarter, and in May he was seized with apoplexy. A second attack was followed by prostration, from which he did not rally. D. June 6, 1862.

CESARE, GIUSEPPE, an Italian historian, b. in Naples, 1783; d. 1856. For several years he edited a periodical entitled "Il Progresso." He wrote a history of the Lombard league. But his most important production is his "Storia di Manfredi re di Sicilia e di Puglia," which appeared in 1837.

CHAMBERS, DAVID, b. in Allentown, Penn., 1780; d. at Zanesville, O., 1864. In 1794 he was employed as a confidential express to carry despatches from General Henry Lee to President Washington, during the whiskey insurrection; in 1796 he was placed in the office of the "Aurora" newspaper, to learn the printer's trade; and after spending the sixteen subsequent years on a farm in Virginia, he removed to Zanesville, O., where he conducted a newspaper, and was elected state printer. When the seat of government was removed to Columbus, he was appointed secretary of the senate; during the years 1812 and 1813 he was aide-de-camp to General Cass; and was a representative in congress, from Ohio, from 1821 to 1823. He subsequently served a number of years in the state legislature of Ohio; was speaker in 1844, and was a member of the constitutional convention of 1851.

—JOHN, b. in New Jersey, 1779, removed at an early age to Kentucky, and commenced the practice of law in Mason county. He was a volunteer aide-de-camp to General Harrison at the battle of the Thames in 1813. On the elevation of the latter to the presidency in 1840, he was appointed governor of Iowa, and while occupying this office he exhibited ability and prudence in his treatment of the Indians, and the settlement of aboriginal quarrels. Under President Taylor he was appointed commissioner to negotiate with the Sioux Indians in Minnesota. He was also a member of congress, first in 1823, and afterward from 1836 to 1840. D. near Paris, Ky., 1852.

CHANNING, EDWARD TYRREL, b. in Newport, R. I., 1790, commenced the practice of the law in Boston, and was an early and a frequent contributor to the "North American Review." In 1819 he received the honorary degree of A. M. from Harvard college, and in the same year was appointed Boylston professor of rhetoric and oratory, which office he held 32 years, the college conferring upon him the degree of LL. D. in 1847. D. 1856.

CHARLES III., DUKE OF PARMA, b. 1823, succeeded to the throne in 1849; on the 26th March, 1854, was stabbed in the streets of Turin; and d. on the following day.

CHARLON, JOHN JAMES, a distinguished English painter, chiefly of landscapes and marine pictures. D. at an advanced age, 1854.

CHASE, PHILANDER, D. D., a protestant bishop, b. in Cornish, N. H., 1775, graduated at Dartmouth college, studied theology in Albany, and was ordained in New York in 1798. After spending several years in missionary labors in western New York and in New Orleans, he became rector of Christ church in Hartford, Conn. In 1817 he went to Ohio, where he set about enlarging and establishing the episcopal church; and in 1819 he was consecrated as bishop of the diocese embracing that state. In 1823 he visited England to solicit donations towards founding a college and theological seminary in Ohio. With the means thus obtained he purchased 8000 acres of land, giving the names of two English noblemen, Gambier and Kenyon, to the site and the college thereby established. He resigned his jurisdiction in 1831, and removed to Michigan. In 1835 he was chosen bishop of the new diocese of Illinois. He visited England again in behalf of Christian education; and Jubilee college, in Peoria county, Ill., where he spent the remainder of his life, was founded in 1838 through his exertions. D. 1852.

CHÉRI, ROSE, MARIA CIZOS, a successful French actress, b. 1824; d. 1861.

CHETHAM-STRODE, SIR EDWARD, a British admiral, distinguished by his services at Genoa, Toulon, Danzig, and Algiers. B. 1775; d. 1862.

CHETWOOD, JOHN J., an eminent lawyer of New Jersey, and an active promoter of the great railroad enterprises of that state. B. 1800; d. 1861.

CHEVES, LANGDON, an American statesman, b. at Rocky River, S. C., 1776; studied law, attained eminence in his profession, and at early age became a leading member of the general assembly of his state, to which he was elected from the city of Charleston. From 1811 to 1816 he was a representative in congress, where he displayed great ability, and held the position of speaker of the house during the second session of the 13th congress. Declining a reelection after the close of the war, he was chosen one of the judges of the superior courts of South Carolina. In 1819 he was made president of the bank of the United States, then on the verge of failure, and by his judicious management during the next three years restored its affairs to a healthy condition. On his resignation of this office he became chief commissioner under the treaty of Ghent, and after executing his duties in that capacity, he declined to accept any further public trust, but devoted himself to the care of his plantation. As early as 1830 he declared himself in favor of a southern confederacy. He was a delegate to the Nashville convention in 1850, and a member of the South Carolina convention of 1852. D. at Columbia, S. C., 1857.

CHICKERING, JESSE, b. 1798, an American statistician. He studied theology, and afterwards medicine, which he practised in Boston for 10 years; but his studious habits not agreeing with the active life of a physician, he retired from the profession and devoted himself to statistics. He published works on the "Population of Massachusetts," on "Immigration into the United States," and numerous valuable reports and articles. D. 1855. — JONAS, an American mechanic, celebrated for his skill and enterprise in the manufacture and improvement of pianofortes, was b. at New Ipswich, N. H., 1798; and d. at Boston, 1853.

CHILDS, THOMAS, brevet brigadier-general, and a distinguished officer in the United States army. D. 1853.

CHOATE, RUFUS, an American advocate, b. in Essex, Mass., 1799, graduated at Dartmouth college, 1819, and for one year remained attached to the college in the capacity of tutor. He then studied a few months in the Cambridge law school, and afterwards went to Washington, where he was for about a year in the office of William Wirt. Having returned to the north and completed his professional studies, he was admitted to the bar in 1824, and began to practise law in Danvers, Mass., but soon removed to Salem. His success was marked, and he rapidly acquired a brilliant reputation. He was elected to the legislature, and served one year in each branch. With this exception, he was devoted wholly to his professional labors until 1832, when he accepted a nomination for congress, and was elected to the house of representatives. After serving acceptably for one term, he declined a reëlection, removed to Boston, and took rank at once among the leaders of the bar. For the next eight years he toiled assiduously, winning a succession of forensic triumphs. In 1841 he was elected to the United States senate in place of Mr. Webster, who had entered the cabinet. At the close of his term, in 1845, he resumed his labors at the bar, from which he was never again diverted except by the occasional delivery of a public address. He was a member of the state constitutional convention in 1853, and was for some years one of the regents of the Smithsonian institution. In politics he was a whig of the old school, and when that party ceased to exist, he never entered heartily into any new political organization. His fears of a dissolution of the Union led him to oppose the republican party, even to the extent of advocating the election of James Buchanan. Worn down by over-work, he embarked for Europe in July, 1859, hoping to restore his shattered health; but, his strength failing rapidly, he was obliged to leave the steamer at Halifax, where he d. soon after his arrival.

CHOULES, JOHN OVERTON, D. D., a baptist clergyman, b. in Bristol, England, 1801, came to America in 1824; was principal of an academy about two years; and afterwards was the pastor of churches in Rhode Island, New York, and Massachusetts. He was author and editor of several volumes — principally historical works. D. in New York, 1856.

CHRZANOWSKI, ADALBERT, a Polish general, b. in the palatinate of Cracow, 1789; d. at Paris, 1861. He was educated in the military school at Warsaw, and served in the French artillery under Napoleon. Returning to Poland, he joined the army then being organized, and was for several years attached to the staff of the Russian general D'Auveray. In 1828-29 he served in the Turkish campaign on the staff of General Diebitsch. In 1830, being at Warsaw, he participated in the patriotic rising of his countrymen, was intrusted with the command of the fortress of Mödlin, and was chief of the staff of Skryznecki, the Polish generalissimo. He took part in all the principal conflicts, and was made general of division, in consideration of the energy and judgment he had displayed. As governor of Warsaw he was suspected by the Poles of treason to their cause, and certainly he resided there unmolested, after the entry of the Russians into that city. He went to Paris, but the Polish exiles shunned him, and he remained in obscurity until 1849, when the king of Sardinia invited him to undertake the reorganization of the Piedmontese army. Here he was again suspected of treachery, more particularly in connection with the defeat at Novara. He returned to Paris in 1850, and was not afterwards employed.

CLARK, WILLIAM TIERNEY, an English civil engineer of distinguished merit. He devoted much attention to the construction of suspension bridges; the Pesth bridge being one of the monuments of his genius. D. 1852, aged 69.

CLAY, HENRY, an American statesman, b. in Hanover county, Va., 1777. His father, a baptist clergyman, died in 1782, leaving but scanty means for the support of his family, and Mr. Clay was inured from necessity to a life of labor. Having received a common-school education, he became at an early age a copyist in the office of the clerk of the court of chancery at Richmond. While here, he attracted the notice of the eminent Chancellor Wythe, through whose advice and direction his education was greatly improved; and in 1796 he entered the office of Attorney-General Brooke, and devoted himself to the study of the law. He was licensed as an attorney in 1797, and commenced the practice of his profession at Lexington, Ky., where he took a high position. He began his political career about the same time, by taking an active part in the election of delegates to frame a new state constitution, contending, though unsuccessfully, for the gradual abolition of slavery. In 1803 he was elected to the legislature; and in 1806 he was appointed to fill an unexpired term in the United States senate. In 1807 he was again elected to the legislature, of which he was chosen speaker. His course here brought him into collision with Mr. Humphrey Marshall, whom he was provoked to challenge, and with whom he fought a duel. At the session of 1809-10, Mr. Clay again appeared in the United States senate, having been elected to fill a vacancy for 2 years, caused by resignation; and during this period he distinguished himself by several brilliant speeches. In 1811 he was sent to the house of representatives, of which body he was immediately chosen speaker. He was a warm advocate of the war with Great Britain, and throughout that crisis sustained Mr. Madison's war measures with great zeal. In 1814 he was appointed one of the commissioners to negotiate the treaty of peace at Ghent. Returning home in 1815, he was again sent to congress, and was again elected speaker. He retained this position by reelection till 1821. During the year 1818 he made memorable speeches in favor of recognizing the independence of the South-American republics. In the same year he advocated a national system of internal improvements. In the session of 1819-20 he exerted himself for the protection of American industry; and this was followed by equally important services in adjusting the Missouri compromise. After the settlement of these great questions, he withdrew from congress in order to attend to his private affairs. In 1823 he returned to congress, and was again chosen speaker by a large majority. During this session he warmly seconded the efforts of Mr. Webster, in behalf of the recognition of the independence of Greece. In the exciting contest for the presidency, which took place in 1824, Mr. Clay was a candidate, and received a small vote. The choice between the two highest candidates, Jackson and Adams, having devolved upon the house of representatives, Mr. Clay, as speaker, gave the casting vote in favor of John Quincy Adams, during whose administration he held the office of secretary of state. For the acceptance of this office he was subjected to much reproach from the democratic party, on the assumption that it was the consideration of a bargain made by Mr. Adams to secure his vote. This slander was thoroughly refuted, and is now admitted to have been wholly unwarranted. It served, however, as a continual text for abuse by Mr. Clay's opponents; and the attacks made upon him by Mr. John Randolph led to a hostile meeting with that person, which happily terminated without bloodshed. In 1831 Mr. Clay was again sent to the senate, and in 1832 was a candidate for the presidency, but was defeated by General Jackson. During the session of 1833, when the tariff question was agitating the whole nation to an alarming extent, he brought forward his celebrated compromise bill, which, after a hard struggle, was passed. Soon after its passage he made a tour of the middle and eastern states, and was greeted with demonstrations of welcome and admiration. He remained in the senate until 1842, when he resigned his seat, and took, as he supposed, his final leave in a speech of great beauty. Throughout the whole of the administrations of Jackson and Van Buren, he contended fiercely but openly against what he conceived to be executive usurpation and corruption. His speeches upon the important measures which were agitated during this period, form some of the most stirring passages in the political history of the country. In 1839 his name was again prominent among the whig candidates for the presidency; but Gen. Harrison having received the nomination, Mr. Clay gave him a cordial support. Upon the election of a whig administration, he endeavored to carry through his system of domestic policy, but was thwarted in his efforts by the vetoes of President Tyler. In 1844 he was the whig nominee for the presidency. Defeated by Mr. Polk, the democratic candidate, he remained in retirement until after the election of General Taylor, when, in 1849, he again took his seat in the senate. Here, during the famous session of 1849-50, he devoted all his remaining energies to secure the passage of the series of measures known as the compromise acts. His efforts during this session weakened his strength and hastened his death. As his disease was gaining the mastery, he sought for relief in a visit to Havana and to New Orleans, but with no permanent benefit. At the commencement of the session of 1851-52 he came to Washington, but was unable to participate in the active duties of the senate. Sensible of his failing health, he sent in his resignation, to take effect on the 6th of September, 1852. But he was not to see that day. He d. on the 29th of June, amid the scenes of his proudest and most glorious triumphs.

—JAMES B., a son of the distinguished statesman, b. in Washington in 1817, received his classical education at Transylvania university, in Kentucky, and at the age of 15 went to Boston, where he spent two years in a counting-house. From Boston he removed to Missouri, and settled upon a farm, and when 21 years of age he returned to Kentucky. After spending two years in the manufacturing business, he graduated at the law school of Lexington, and practised law, as the partner of his father, until 1849. During that year President Taylor appointed him chargé d'affaires to Lisbon. In 1851 he again took up his residence in Missouri, but returned to Kentucky in 1853, when he became the proprietor of Ashland. He was elected to congress in 1857, serving one term, and on the committee of foreign relations. He was also a member of the peace convention of 1861, held in Washington. Soon after the commencement of the civil war, however, he retired to Canada, a voluntary exile; and d. in Montreal, Jan. 26, 1864.

CLAYTON, JOHN M., an eminent statesman, b. in Delaware in 1796, was educated at Yale college, studied law, and commenced practice, in 1818, in his native state. He soon attained distinction, and was appointed to several local offices, and in 1829 was chosen a member of the United States senate. He resigned in December, 1836, but was again elected in 1845, and remained senator till appointed secretary of state by Gen. Taylor. Whilst in this office, he negotiated the treaty with Sir Henry Bulwer, commonly known as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Resigning on the death of Taylor, he was for a third time elected to the senate, and took his seat in March, 1851, where he vindicated, with great ability and eloquence, the principles of his famous treaty. He was a great reader, thinker, and talker, with remarkable power of concentrating his faculties on the subject immediately occupying his attention. His senatorial bearing was dignified and conciliatory, and he spoke with energy and effect. He was long a trusted and popular leader in the whig party. D. 1856.—THOMAS, b. 1778, was a member of the lower house of congress, from Delaware, from 1815 to 1817, and of the senate from 1823 to 1826, and again from 1837 to 1847. He was at different times a member of the Delaware legislature, chief justice of the court of common pleas, and chief justice of the superior court. D. 1854.

CLEAVELAND, PARKER, LL. D., author of a treatise on mineralogy and geology, b. in Massachusetts, 1780; d. in Brunswick, Me., 1858. From 1805 until his death, he was professor of natural philosophy, chemistry, and mineralogy in Bowdoin college; during the earlier part of the period officiating also as professor of mathematics.

CLEBURNE, PATRICK R., major-general in the confederate service, b. at Queenstown, Ireland, 1828, killed in battle at Franklin, Tenn., Nov. 1864. His earliest military experiences were as a private in the British army, from which he purchased his discharge in 1847. He then came to the United States, and, settling at Helena, Ark., studied law with the Hon. T. B. Hanly, chief justice of that state. The outbreak of civil war, in 1861, found him successfully engaged in the practice of his profession. He joined the confederate ranks as a private, but was elected captain of his company, and aided in wresting the Little Rock arsenal from the United States. A few months later he became colonel, and having been transferred to Bowling Green, Ky., was placed in command of a brigade of Gen. Hardee's division. In March, 1862, Cleburne was commissioned a brigadier-general, and performed a conspicuous part in the battle of Shiloh. He was also engaged in the battle of Farmington, and having led two brigades into Kentucky, was wounded in the battle of Richmond. He was with Gen. Bragg at the battle of Perryville, where he had two horses shot under him, and was himself again wounded. In Dec. 1862 he took the command of a division in Hardee's corps, with the rank of major-general, and served in the battle of Murfreesboro'. He was in the battle of Chickamauga, in 1863, and repulsed Gen. Sherman at Mission Ridge, and Gen. Hooker at Ringold Gap. He was in the field, at the head of his old division, during the Atlanta campaign, and covered Hood's defeated army at Jonesboro', Ga., in Aug. 1864, subsequently moving north with Hood, and investing Dalton. He met death in the hottest part of the conflict at Franklin.

CLINTON, HENRY FYNES, an eminent scholar, and the learned author of the "Fasti Hellenici," and the "Fasti Romani," was b. in London, 1781, and d. 1852. He was also the author of "An Epitome of the Civil and Literary Chronology of Greece," from the earliest account to the death of Augustus.

CLONCURRY, VALENTINE BROWNE LAWLESS, Lord, of Cloncurry, in Ireland, b. 1773, and educated for the bar. A member of the society of united Irishmen, he was arrested in 1798, on a charge of treason, but after several examinations before the privy council was liberated. He was again arrested in 1799, and did not regain his freedom till 1801, having in the mean time, by the death of his father, inherited the family title. He remained at variance with the English government till 1821, when he became reconciled to George IV., and after a time took his seat as a sworn member of the privy council. D. 1853.

CLOUGH, ARTHUR HUGH, b. in Liverpool, 1819; while studying at Oxford, wrote a "Long Vacation Pastoral," describing the adventures of an Oxford in the highlands of Scotland, which was republished in this country. In 1848-9 he was in Italy, actively sympathizing with the liberals of that country in their resistance to French domination at Rome; his impressions being afterwards embodied in "Amours de Voyage," a story in verse, which he contributed to the "Atlantic Monthly." He next became professor of the English language and literature at University college, London, but resigned the appointment, and, emigrating to the United States, settled as a teacher, at Cambridge, Mass., where he wrote for the "North American Review," and revised Dryden's translation of Plutarch's "Lives." The offer of a good official position induced him to return to England, but his health subsequently became impaired, and he d. in Florence, 1861. In addition to the works named, he published "Mari Magno," a series of tales.

COBB, WILLIAMSON R. W., b. in Ray county, Tenn., 1807, removed at a very early age to Alabama, became a farmer, and in 1845 commenced his public career as a member of the state legislature. From 1847 to 1860 he was a representative of his adopted state in congress, where he was chairman of important committees. He identified himself with the secession movement, and d. 1864.

COBDEN, RICHARD, one of England's great men, b. 1804; d. 1865. His father was a tenant farmer at Midhurst, Sussex, and the boy left home at an early age to fill a situation in a London warehouse. Being steady and industrious, and gaining a thorough knowledge of the business, he worked his way into the esteem of his employers. As an aid to mental expansion, he had great faith in foreign travel, and contriving to connect business with intellectual improvement, he made a tour of the United States, and traversed a considerable portion of Europe. He was energetic and anxious to rise, and seeing a good prospect before him, he entered into business on his own account in Lancashire. Being fortunate enough to produce a new style of printed fabrics, more tasteful and elegant than any supplied by his rivals in the trade, he became a prosperous man. A pamphlet from his pen, entitled "England, Ireland, and America," and another on "Russia," drew attention to his literary qualifications. He entered boldly into the question of free trade, and was one of the originators and most untiring speakers of the anti-corn law league. He was returned to the house of commons, in 1841, as member for Stockport, and at once took an influential position amongst debaters. Sir R. Peel acknowledged that his measure of 1846, which practically affirmed the justice of the views upheld by Mr. Cobden, was in no small degree attributable to the "unadorned eloquence" of the cotton-printer. The corn laws repealed, Mr. Cobden was presented with a testimonial of $350,000 for his services to free trade; and having retired from business, he purchased an estate in his native place, where he resided until his death. He was elected member for the west riding of Yorkshire in 1847, and represented that constituency for some years, finally retiring under the impression that his reelection would not be secure. In 1857, after opposing Lord Palmerston's Chinese policy, and driving that minister to a dissolution, he was started as a candidate for the representation of Huddersfield and defeated, but was immediately after elected for Rochdale. In 1859 he travelled extensively in the United States; and, during his absence, Lord Derby's ministry having been overthrown, Lord Palmerston proposed that he should accept office, but he refused. In 1860 he visited Paris, at the request of Louis Napoleon, to discuss informally changes in the commercial legislation of France; and subsequently acted as British commissioner in arranging the details of the commercial treaty, which owed its origin in a great measure to himself. On questions of foreign policy, he maintained the doctrine of non-intervention, and braved the displeasure of his countrymen by the persistent advocacy of peace principles and measures. From the first moment of civil war in this country, he pronounced in favor of the union, and during the four years' conflict his voice was ever foremost in vindicating the cause and policy of the north, and in pointing out the perils of the course which Britain, under the guise of "neutrality," has pursued. Although not dangerously ill, he absented himself from parliament during the early part of the session of 1855. Despite a severe bronchial affection, however, he hastened to London to speak on the Canadian defence bill, and to vindicate the government of the United States from the mistrust with which the old-world rulers profess to regard it. The journey and the effort accelerated his death, which occurred with unexpected suddenness on the 2d of April.

COCKBURN, HENRY DUNDAS, a Scotch jurist, b. 1779, distinguished himself as an advocate, became solicitor-general, and in 1834 was raised to the bench as one of the lords of session, when he took the title of Lord Cockburn. He was a contributor to the "Edinburgh Review," and published a life of his friend Lord Jeffrey, and an interesting volume of memorials. D. 1854. — SIR GEORGE, a British admiral, b. 1772. His greatest achievement was the attack on Washington, D. C., in the war of 1812, in which he burned the capitol and the public buildings. D. 1853.

COCKE, PHILIP ST. GEORGE, a general in the confederate army, b. in Virginia; d. Dec. 1861. He shot himself at his residence in Powhatan county, but whether by accident or design is not known.

COCKERELL, CHARLES ROBERT, a distinguished architect, b. in London, 1788. Early in life he spent several years of study among the remains of classic architecture in Asia Minor, Sicily, Athens, Rome, Pompeii, and elsewhere. In 1811-12 he and others excavated the ruins of the temple of Jupiter at Ægina, and of Apollo at Phygaleia. Subsequently, the capitol and forum of Rome, and other buildings of antiquity, employed his talents as an architectural draughtsman. In 1829 he was elected associate of the royal academy; in 1839, R. A.; and in 1840, professor of architecture. In 1841 he was chosen one of the eight "Associés étrangers" of the academy of the institute of France; and in 1843, one of the ten "members of merit" of the academy of St. Luke's at Rome; besides being also member of the academies of Munich, Berlin, and Berne. He remained an adherent of classic architecture as the style to be imitated in the nineteenth century, but he nevertheless executed designs more than once in Gothic. D. 1863.

COCKTON, HENRY, an English writer, author of "Valentine Vox," and other contributions to light literature. B. 1808; d. 1853.

CODRINGTON, SIR EDWARD, admiral in the British service, b. 1770; d. 1851. He served in the battle of Trafalgar, but his name is chiefly known as chief commander in the action of Navarino, where the naval forces of the pacha of Egypt were annihilated by the combined squadrons of Great Britain, France, and Russia.

COLBURN, HENRY, an eminent London publisher, proprietor of the "New Monthly Magazine," the "Court Journal," and other periodicals. D. 1855.

COLERIDGE, SARA, b. at Keswick, 1803, the only daughter of Samuel Taylor Coleridge, and the inheritor of much of his genius, d. 1852. She married her cousin, Henry Nelson Coleridge, and assisted him in editing her father's works. Her romance of "Phantasmion" indicates the possession of a high degree of imaginative power.

COLQUHOUN, JAMES, b. 1780, son of the celebrated writer Patrick Colquhoun, was distinguished as a diplomatist and writer on the civil law. D. 1855.

COLQUITT, WALTER T., b. in Virginia, 1799, studied law in Georgia, and practised with great success in the courts of that state. He was elected judge in 1826. In 1838 he was sent to congress as a member of the house, and in 1842 was elected United States senator. He supported the Polk administration, opposed the Wilmot proviso, and took an active part in the Nashville convention. D. in Macon, Ga., 1855.

COLT, SAMUEL, the inventor of the revolver now universally known, b. at Hartford, Conn., 1814; d. 1862. In his boyhood he had an aversion to the restraints of school, preferring the workshops of his father, who was a manufacturer of woollen, cotton, and silk goods; and in his fourteenth year running away, and shipping as a boy before the mast on a ship bound for the East Indies. On his return he passed through a brief apprenticeship in his father's factory, in the dyeing and bleaching department, of which he acquired a knowledge of practical chemistry. In his 18th year, with a scanty education and a superficial knowledge of chemistry, he set forth as a lecturer on that science, visiting nearly all the chief places in the United States and the British provinces, with a success mainly attributable to his skill as an experimenter. He first conceived the idea of the great invention with which his name is associated while at sea; and the money acquired by his lectures enabled him to improve the models he had made. When 21 years of age he took out his first patent for revolving fire-arms, first in England and France, and afterward in the United States. He succeeded in organizing a company, called the Patent Arms Company, for the manufacture of his revolver, and the business was proceeded with at Patterson, N. J., in 1835. All efforts to induce the adoption of the invention by the government were for a time unsuccessful. It first came into favor with officers of the army during the Florida war, but the demand for it ceased at the conclusion of Indian hostilities. The Patterson company suspended in 1842, and the manufacture of repeating fire-arms was not resumed until after the commencement of the Mexican war, when General Taylor sought a supply. Colt entered into a small contract with the government, and having incorporated into his model improvements suggested by experience, temporarily hired an armory at Whitneyville, near New Haven. Other orders followed, and he then commenced business on his own account at Hartford, on a scale which grew until it attained gigantic proportions. In 1852 he planned the erection of the armory, which, before his death, had no equal in extent, or in respect of the perfection of its machinery. This establishment was erected on a large tract of meadow land, within the corporate limits of Hartford; a huge embankment being constructed to keep out the floods to which the land was periodically exposed. Here he built an armory, with accommodation for the manufacture of 1000 fire-arms per day; workshops for the manufacture of machinery for making these fire-arms elsewhere; warerooms, offices, and numerous dwellings for his employes. The total expenditure on the grounds and buildings has been computed at upwards of $2,500,000. When his invention had become thoroughly known, Mr. Colt visited Europe and entered into large contracts with several European governments, more particularly those of Great Britain and Russia.

COLTON, REV. CALVIN, author of the "Life and Times of Henry Clay," of a work on political economy, and of several political pamphlets. He was b. at Longmeadow, Mass., 1812, and was for some years pastor of a congregational church, afterwards becoming an episcopalian minister. In 1852 he was appointed a professor in Trinity college, Hartford, Conn. At the time of his death — which occurred in Savannah, Ga., 1857 — he was editing a collection of the speeches of Henry Clay. — WALTER, b. in Rutland, Vt., 1797; entered the United States navy as chaplain, in 1830. On the breaking out of the Mexican war he was detached from the frigate Congress by Commodore Stockton, and appointed alcalde of Monterey, in California, to which office he was afterwards elected by the people. He also officiated as judge of admiralty during the war. He was author of several popular works, of which "Deck and Port," and "Three Years in California," are still republished. D. 1851.

COMBÉ, GEORGE, an eminent phrenologist and author, b. at Edinburgh, 1788; d. 1858. After pursuing his studies at the high school and university of his native city, he was articled to a lawyer, and passed as writer to the signet in 1812. In 1816 he became a convert to the views of Dr. Spurzheim, who was then on a visit to Edinburgh, and in the course of three years had so familiarized himself with the subject that he published "Essays on Phrenology," which afterwards expanded into his "System of Phrenology"; and in 1824 he founded the "Phrenological Journal," as the means of promulgating his views. In 1828 he gave to the world his ablest work, "The Constitution of Man," which excited the liveliest controversy at the time of its appearance, but the validity of the main principles on which it is based has now been generally recognized. During all this period, and for some time afterwards, Mr. Combe had followed his professional pursuits; but in 1837 he addicted himself exclusively to literature, visited the United States and Germany, and, though himself in delicate health, devoted his whole time to the promulgation of his moral, social, and philosophical views, by means of lectures and the press. Besides publishing his "Notes on America," in 1841, his "Notes on the Reformation in Germany," in 1846, "The Life" of his brother, Dr. Andrew Combe, and various other works, Mr. Combe was a frequent writer on monetary science; and his contributions to the "Scotsman" newspaper on this and kindred subjects gave him as high a rank as a political economist as he had before enjoyed as a phrenologist and philosopher.

COMER, THOMAS, a musician and actor, b. in Bath, England, 1790, made his début on the London stage in 1818. In 1827 he came to this country, and for two years resided in New York, where he appeared successfully in English opera. He then became musical director of the Tremont theatre, in Boston; and in that city, connected from time to time with various theatrical establishments, he continued to reside until his death. He ranked high as a musical performer and composer, and was much esteemed for his social qualities. D. 1862.

COMONFORT, YGNACRO, a Mexican soldier and politician, b. 1812. Educated in the Jesuit college of Puebla, he entered the Mexican army in 1832, and attached himself to the liberal party, of which he thenceforward was an active leader. He was prefect and military governor of Tlapa in 1834. In 1842 and 1846 he was elected to the Mexican congress, which was on both occasions summarily dissolved by Santa Anna. In the revolution which followed, Comonfort played a conspicuous part. He was dismissed from office in 1853, on the return of Santa Anna to power, and joined Alvarez in the revolutionary movement, which, in 1855, drove Santa Anna from the country. In December of that year, Comonfort became provisional president, but encountered the hostility of the church and conservative party, arrayed in insurrection. In the armed contests which ensued, he was again and again successful; and in Nov. 1857 he was proclaimed constitutional president. Within a month, his enemies triumphed; Gen. Zuloaga was appointed provisional president, and Comonfort was an exile, fleeing for his life. He reached the United States in safety, and soon proceeded to Europe. In 1859 he returned to Mexico and joined Juarez, by whom he was made chief commander of the Mexican troops on the invasion of their country by the French. In Nov. 1863 he was murdered while on his way to San Louis Potosi.

COMSTOCK, JOHN LEE, b. in Connecticut 1789, a physician by profession, was the compiler of numerous valuable school-books. His "Natural Philosophy" had a sale of 300,000 copies, and was republished in England and in Germany. D. at Hartford, 1838.

COMTE, AUGUSTE, the founder of the system of "Positive Philosophy," b. at Montpellier in 1795; d. 1857. He was educated at Paris, in the polytechnic school, where he distinguished himself by his love of speculation, and his dissatisfaction with the existing philosophic schools and actual social condition of his country. On leaving college he became acquainted with the celebrated Saint-Simon, and being attracted by his personal character, and charmed by the originality of his views, he joined the band of brilliant disciples which the genius and ambition of that distinguished social reformer gathered around him. On the death of its founder, in 1825, Comte deserted the Saint-Simonian school, to found one of his own; and during the next 20 years devoted himself to the elaboration of an original system of scientific thought—since known as the "Positive Philosophy." The great text-book of his system, entitled "Cours de Philosophie Positive," extending to six volumes, gradually appeared at intervals between the years 1830 and 1842. During this time he led a quiet, scientific life, as professor of mathematics in the Ecole Polytechnique; and almost immediately after the conclusion of his great work published two popular treatises connected with the subject of his chair, one on analytical geometry, the other on astronomy, both of which were successful. In 1844 he issued an outline and defence of his system in a single volume, entitled "Discours sur l'Ensemble du Positivisme." Whatever may be thought of the positive philosophy, either as to the perfection of the parts or as to its completeness as a whole, it cannot be denied that to Comte belongs the honor of being the first who grasped the true principle for the coördination of the sciences; that, in an age of vast speculative and scientific activity, he first rose from the empirical classification of facts to a genuine science of principles. Even his assailants concede that he possessed great general force of intellect, rare speculative power, and that he reaches the happiest generalizations in every branch of science he undertakes to expound. A condensed translation of Comte's great work has been published in England by Miss Martineau.

CONANT, H. C., a frequent contributor to American periodical literature, authoress of a "History of English Bible Translation," and translator from the German of Neander's and other theological works. She was the daughter of the Rev. Jeremiah Chaplin, formerly president of the Waterville college, Me., and the wife of the Rev. Thomas J. Conant, an Orientalist and biblical scholar. D. 1865.

CONDER, JOSIAH, was b. in London, 1789, and at an early age manifested literary taste and power. In 1814 he became proprietor and editor of the "Eclectic Review," which he conducted successfully during 23 years. He compiled the "Modern Traveller," and in 1832 assumed the editorship of the "Patriot" newspaper, then and long afterward the organ of the English congregationalists. D. 1855.

CONE, REV. SPENCER H., D. D., originally an actor; exchanged the mimic stage for the editorship of a Baltimore daily paper in 1811, and in 1823 became pastor of a church in New York, where he continued until his death, in 1855.

CONINGTON, FRANCIS THIRKILL, author of a "Handbook of Chemical Analysis," and scientific examiner in the university of Oxford, b. 1828; d. 1863.

CONRAD, ROBERT T., an American writer, b. in Philadelphia, 1810, was admitted to the bar at an early age, and for some years was connected editorially with the newspaper press. He resumed the practice of the law in 1834, and the next year was appointed recorder of the recorder's court, and subsequently judge of the court of sessions. While on the bench he wrote the tragedy of "Aylmere" for Mr. Edwin Forrest. After returning to the bar he edited "Graham's Magazine," wrote leading articles for the "North American," and held the office of mayor of Philadelphia. He published a volume of poems in 1852. D. 1858.

CONYBEARE, WILLIAM DANIEL, an English divine, dean of Llandaff, b. 1787, was principally distinguished for his attainments and researches in geology, on which subject he contributed some valuable papers. He d. 1857. — His son, W. J. CONYBEARE, was a prominent clergyman of the broad church party of the English church, and wrote various essays and sermons that attracted much attention. D. 1857.

COOK, HENRY F., a confederate brigadier-general, b. in Mississippi; killed in Virginia, 1863. He served in the Mexican war, and distinguished himself at Monterey.

COOKE, GEORGE WINGROVE, an English author and journalist, b. 1814. He was the correspondent of the "London Times" during the war with China which resulted in the taking of Canton; and distinguished himself by the conscientious accuracy and literary finish of his letters, which have been republished in a collected form, under the title, "China and Lower Bengal." Of his other works, the "History of Party" is best known. D. 1865.

COOPER, JAMES FENIMORE, an American novelist, b. 1789 in Burlington, N. J. In his first year he was removed with the family to Cooperstown, N. Y., where his father had been for some time a large land-owner. At 13 he entered Yale college, where he remained only three years, leaving it to enter the United States navy as a common sailor. He was six years in the naval service, and was promoted to the ranks of midshipman and of lieutenant. In 1811 he married and removed to Mamaroneck, Westchester county, where he began his career as an author by the publication of a novel of English life, entitled "Precaution." It was not successful. Three years afterwards the "Spy" appeared, and established at once a reputation which it was difficult to increase. After an interval of two years, "The Pioneers" followed, written, as he said, "exclusively to please himself." It was not so stirring as the "Spy," and not so popular, but it has perhaps greater artistic merit. "The Pilot" next brought itself into immediate comparison and competition with Scott's "Pirate," and not to Cooper's disadvantage. The Edinburgh Review conceded to him the empire of the sea. "Lionel Lincoln" was less successful; but, after a brief interval, "The Last of the Mohicans" more than regained for him the ground he had lost. Next came the "Red Rover," the best of his sea-tales, and "The Prairie," in 1828. About this time he went to Europe with his family, and remained till 1833. His residence there gave rise to several publications for the admonition and rebuke of his countrymen, which added nothing to his reputation, and materially damaged his home popularity. For several years he was a standing subject of ridicule and abuse with the press, till he compelled it to treat him with decency, by the most remarkable series of suits for libel on record. In the midst of these litigations he produced the "Pathfinder," one of his most finished works. A series of tales founded on the anti-rent troubles in the state of New York succeeded, but failed to excite much interest. Between 1842 and 1850 he published no fewer than eleven novels, which exhibit no decline of the inventive faculty, or of constructive skill, though none of them attained the popularity of some of his earlier works. His only historical production is a "Naval History of the United States," which is the best work on the subject, though it lacks the interest which his pen imparted to his fictions. Cooper was a fine-looking man, with marked faults and noble elements of character, prejudiced, haughty, and overbearing, but generous, and never intentionally unjust. His works have been translated into several European languages, and have become a permanent portion of American literature. A beautiful edition of them in 32 volumes, with illustrations, has since been published in New York. D. at Cooperstown, Sept. 14, 1851. — EDWARD S., an eminent surgeon, professor and president of the medical department of the university of the Pacific, b. in Somerville county, O., 1821; d. in San Francisco, 1862. — JAMES, b. in Frederick county, Md., 1810; d. 1863. He was admitted to the Pennsylvania bar in 1834; was elected a representative in congress, from Pennsylvania, in 1838, and reelected in 1840; in 1843 he was elected to the state legislature, and reelected in 1844, 1846, and 1848, serving in 1847 as speaker; in 1848 he was appointed attorney-general of Pennsylvania, and in 1849 was chosen a senator in congress for the term of six years. During his service in congress his health was feeble, and on his return to Pennsylvania he settled in Philadelphia. He subsequently removed to Maryland, and on the outbreak of the civil war he was appointed brigadier-general, and took command of the Maryland volunteers. While in command of Camp Chase, O., he was attacked with the illness which proved fatal. — BRANSBY, a distinguished English surgeon, nephew of Sir Astley Cooper. B. 1792; d. 1853.

CORCORAN, MICHAEL, who first came into public notice as colonel of the 69th regiment of New York state militia, was b. at Carrowkeel, Sligo county, Ireland, 1827. He came to the United States in 1849. On the call for troops by the federal government in April, 1861, he took the field with his regiment, and was engaged in the battle of Bull Run, where he was wounded and taken-prisoner. He was imprisoned at Richmond, Charleston, Columbia, and Salisbury, but, although treated with uncommon harshness, he rejected an offer for his liberation, tendered with the condition that he should not again take up arms against the seceded states. In August, 1862, he was exchanged, and was immediately appointed a brigadier-general of volunteers, his commission dating from the battle of Bull Run. He then applied himself to the organization of an Irish legion, which took part in the battles of the Nansemond river, and Suffolk, in April, 1863, and checked the advance of the enemy upon Norfolk. In August, 1863, the legion joined the army of the Potomac; and in the following December General Corcoran was killed by a fall from a horse.

CORR, M. ERIN, the son of an expatriated Irishman, b. at Brussels, 1803; d. at Paris, 1862. He was a member of the royal academy of Belgium, and as an engraver enjoyed a European reputation.

COTTENHAM, CHARLES CHRISTOPHER PEPPYS, earl of, lord high chancellor of England from 1836 to 1841, and again appointed in 1846. B. 1781; d. 1851. He was of the family of the author of the celebrated diary of the times of Charles II.

COTTLE, JOSEPH, a bookseller whose name is familiar in literature as that of the early friend of Coleridge, and the author of an interesting volume of recollections. B. 1774; d. 1853.

COUCH, RICHARD QUILLAR, an English surgeon and savant, b. in Cornwall, 1816; d. 1863. He cultivated a taste for marine zoölogy, and conducted elaborate observations on obscure points of natural history; and contributed papers on these, subjects to scientific societies. He was also a geologist, reporting largely on the progress of geology in the mineral district in which he pursued his profession. His papers on the diseases and mortality of miners have been translated into French.

COX, DAVID, the greatest of the English water-color landscape-painters, d. 1859.

CRABB, GEORGE, an English barrister and philologist, b. 1778, was a teacher in his youth, and studied in Germany. He graduated at Oxford at the age of 43, and was 51 years old when he was admitted to the bar. He wrote a "History of English Law." He is most generally known by his treatise on "English Synonyms." D. 1854.

CRANCH, WILLIAM, an American jurist, b. in Weymouth, Mass., 1769, graduated at Harvard college, 1787, and was admitted to the bar in 1790. After practising for three years in the courts of Massachusetts and New Hampshire, he removed to the District of Columbia, where he passed the remainder of his life. In 1800 he was appointed one of the commissioners of public buildings, and in 1801 was appointed, by President Adams, one of the assistant judges of the circuit court for the district, of which court, in 1805, he was appointed chief justice. He published nine volumes of reports of the decisions of the United States supreme court, and six volumes of the decisions of his own court. He ranked very high as a jurist and as a man. D. 1855.

CRAVEN, TUNIS AUGUSTUS MACDONOUGH, commander United States navy, b. in New Hampshire, entered the service as midshipman - in 1829, and was for many years actively employed in the coast survey. In Sept. 1861 he was sent to Europe, in command of the screw-sloop Tuscarora, to cruise for confederate privateers, and continued in this service until the summer of 1863. Early in the following year he was placed in command of the Ericsson monitor Tecumseh, in which he served in the James river. He was next ordered to join Admiral Farragut, and was killed by the explosion of the torpedo which destroyed the Tecumseh while attempting the passage of the Mobile forts, Aug., 1864.

CRAWFORD, THOMAS, an American sculptor, was b. in New York, 1814. He exhibited at an early age a remarkable taste for art, in which he was encouraged by his father, who caused him to be thoroughly instructed in drawing and carving, and in modelling in clay. In 1834 he went to Italy, and was at Rome as a student, where he fortunately gained admittance to the studio of Thorwaldsen, and enjoyed his instruction and friendship. In 1839, having previously executed numerous busts and a few original pieces, he designed his "Orpheus," now in the Boston athenæum, the work which first established his reputation. His studio in Rome soon became a favorite resort of strangers. He was very felicitous in modelling from life. One of the most characteristic of his works of this class is the bust of Josiah Quincy, executed for the library of Harvard university. Of his ideal busts, the "Sappho" and "Vesta" are good examples. His scriptural compositions are remarkable for the spirit and dignity of their treatment. Among the noblest of his works are his bronze statue of Beethoven, in the Boston music hall, and the bronze equestrian statue of Washington, at the capitol in Richmond, Va. He suffered for the last years of his life from a malignant tumor or cancer of the eye, which nearly deprived him of sight, and caused him to renounce his art entirely, leaving many works unfinished. He was removed to Paris, and afterwards to London, for the benefit of medical treatment, and d. in London, 1857, after an intensely painful illness.

CREUZER, GEORGE FREDERIC, a German philologist and antiquary, b. 1771; d. in Heidelberg, 1858. His literary fame rests chiefly on his "Symbolics and Mythology of the Ancient Nations," published in 1840. He was the author of several other works of great learning and research.

CRIGHTON, REV. ANDREW, a Scottish divine, many years editor of the "Edinburgh Advertiser." D. 1855.

CRITTENDEN, JOHN J., a distinguished American statesman, b. in Woodford county, Kentucky, 1786; d. at Louisville, July 25, 1863. During the war of 1812, he served as major under General Hopkins in his expedition, and was aide-de-camp to Governor Shelby at the battle of the Thames. After adopting the profession of law, he served a number of years in the state legislature, and was chosen speaker of the house; he entered congress as a member of the senate, from Kentucky, in 1817, serving then but two years. From 1819 to 1835 he continued in the practice of his profession, residing principally at Frankfort, and again occasionally representing his county in the state legislature. In 1835 he was again elected to the United States senate, and continued to serve in that body until March, 1841, when he was appointed attorney-general by President Harrison. In Sept. 1841 he resigned, with the other members of the cabinet, except Mr. Webster, and retired to private life, from which, however, he was soon called by the legislature, to resume his seat in the United States senate, in 1842. He was also elected a senator for another term of six years, from March, 1843, but, in 1848, having received the Whig nomination for governor of Kentucky, he retired from the senate, and was elected to that office, which he held until his appointment as attorney-general by President Fillmore. He was a fifth time elected to the United States senate in 1855, for the term ending in 1861, and was, when he retired, the oldest member of that body. He also sat as a representative in the 37th congress.

CROKER, JOHN WILSON, a British statesman and author, b. in Ireland, 1780, was educated at Trinity college, Dublin, and called to the Irish bar in 1802. In 1807 he entered parliament, where he held a seat, with little intermission, till 1832, and became a leading member on the tory side. From 1809 to 1830 he was secretary to the admiralty, and in 1828 he was sworn a privy councillor. From his youth he devoted his leisure to literature, and displayed great ability, especially as a satirical writer. He was one of the founders of the "Quarterly Review," and a frequent contributor to its columns. After the passage of the reform bill, to which he was bitterly opposed, he retired from public life, and was known only as an author and reviewer. His caustic political articles, and his slashing literary criticisms, often dictated by his prejudices, gained him many enemies. He was himself severely criticized by Macaulay and by D'Israeli, upon both of whom he retorted with all his powers of sarcasm. D. 1857. — THOMAS CROFTON, an Irish author, b. in Cork, 1798; published collections of Irish legends and songs, and contributed frequently to "Fraser's," the "New Monthly," and other magazines. D. in London, 1854.

CROLY, GEORGE, a British clergyman and author, b. in Dublin, 1780, was for many years rector of a parish in London, and was an eloquent and impressive preacher. Besides some interesting works on professional subjects, his writings comprise satires, lyrics, dramas, tales, and critical articles of a high character. His tragedy of "Catiline," published in 1822, though not produced upon the stage, is an admirable specimen of the unacted drama. His comedy of "Pride shall have a Fall" was played with great success at Covent Garden theatre in 1824. The most popular of his tales is "Salathiel," founded on the legend of the Wandering Jew. He edited the works of Pope and of Jeremy Taylor, and made some valuable contributions to historical and biographical literature. D. 1862.

CROWE, REV. FREDERICK, b. in Belgium; d. in New York, 1858. He labored for 13 years in the dissemination of the scriptures in Spanish America, and was the author of a valuable historical work on Central America.

CROWELL, WILLIAM, D. D., b. at Hudson, N. Y., 1804, was an accomplished clergyman of the episcopal church, and wrote some lyrical poems of much beauty in commemoration of the church observances. He was a rector, successively, of Christchurch, Boston; of St. Peter's, at Auburn, N. Y.; and of the church of the Advent, in Boston. D. 1851.

CROWNINSHIELD, BENJAMIN W., made secretary of the navy under President Madison in 1814; resigned in 1818. He was a merchant of Salem, Mass., and represented that district in congress from 1823 till 1831. D. in 1851, aged 77.

CUBITT, SIR WILLIAM, a civil engineer, for many years connected with great public works in England, b. 1785; d. 1861. He was knighted for his services in superintending the construction of the Crystal Palace, in London, in 1851.

CUNNINGHAM, REV. J. W., an English poet and theologian, author of "A World without Souls," b. 1780; d. 1861.

CURRY, OTWAY, lawyer, editor, and poet, b. 1803; d. in Marysville, O., 1855.

CURTIS, DR. THOMAS, editor of the "Encyclopædia Metropolitana," and the "London Encyclopædia," b. 1788; d. 1859. He was one of the victims of the burning of the steamer North Carolina, in Chesapeake Bay, being at the time a resident of Limestone Springs, S. C. — EDWARD, a lawyer and politician, b. in Vermont; d. in New York, 1856. He was representative in congress from 1837 to 1841, and was appointed collector of New York by President Harrison. He was an intimate friend of Daniel Webster.

CUSTIS, GEORGE WASHINGTON PARKE, the adopted son of George Washington, b. in Maryland, 1781, was brought up at Mount Vernon, and remained a member of Washington's family until 1802, when he went to reside at Arlington, an estate of 1000 acres in the neighborhood of Washington. He erected the mansion known as Arlington house, and devoted his life to literary and agricultural pursuits. His father, John Parke Custis, from whom he inherited his estate, was a son of Mrs. Washington by her first husband, and an aide-de-camp to General Washington at the siege of Yorktown. D. at Arlington house, 1857.

CZARTORISKI, ADAM JERZY, a Polish patriot, b. 1770, was sent to St. Petersburg, in 1795, as a hostage for the fidelity of his family, and there became intimate with the grand duke Alexander, afterwards emperor, through whose influence he was employed in the diplomatic service of the Russian government,—a position in which he was enabled for many years to benefit his native country. He left the service of the emperor on the creation of the duchy of Warsaw, in 1807, and lived in retirement till 1813, when he was appointed by Alexander senator palatine of the new kingdom of Poland, in which capacity he was the advocate of liberal ideas. On the outbreak of the revolution, in 1830, he was called to preside over the provisional government; and he convoked the diet which proclaimed the independence of Poland in 1831, and made him president of the national government. He resigned this dignity to serve as a private soldier in the ranks of the army; and after the fall of Warsaw, (Sept. 1831,) he shared the fate of the Polish emigration in France. He was excluded from the amnesty, and his estates in the Russian Polish provinces were confiscated. In 1848 he issued a proclamation calling upon the representatives of Germany and France to unite for the restoration of Poland. He retained his estates in the Austrian Polish provinces; and being the choice of the monarchical party in the Polish emigration, he sustained his position by a munificence which made his hotel in Paris a place of refuge for his suffering compatriots. D. 1860.

D.

DACRES, JAMES RICHARD, a vice-admiral of the British navy. He commanded the Guerrrière in her action with the United States ship Constitution in 1812. For the surrender of his ship he was tried by a court-martial, but was honorably acquitted. D. 1853.

DAGGETT, DAVID, b. in Massachusetts, 1764; was admitted to the bar in New Haven, Conn., in 1786. He acquired an extensive practice, was chosen to the legislature several times, and in 1813 was elected to the United States senate, where he served one term, at the close of which he resumed the duties of his profession in his adopted state. In 1826 he was chosen judge of the supreme court, and in 1832 was made chief justice of the Connecticut supreme court, retiring, by limitation of age, in 1834. He was an accomplished lawyer, and a man of great ability. D. 1851.

DAGUERRE, LOUIS J. M., inventor of the daguerrotype, was b. at Cormeille, France, 1789. He commenced his career as a scene-painter in Paris, and, while engaged in painting panoramas, conceived the idea of brightening the effect of such views by throwing colored lights and shadows upon them, so as to represent the various changes of the day and season. This invention, called the diorama, was perfected in 1822, and for many years Daguerre was employed in preparing pictures for exhibition. In 1838 he succeeded in fixing upon metallic plates distinct impressions of the images thrown upon them by the lens of the camera, a process on which, in connection with Niepce, he had been experimenting for many years. This invention, now known as the daguerrotype, was announced in 1839, and excited a profound interest. Daguerre was made an officer of the legion of honor, and an annuity of 6000 francs was bestowed upon him on condition that his process should be made public. To the end of his life he continued to labor in the improvement of his invention, and left two works on the subject. He d. in 1851.

DAHL, JOHAN CHRISTIAN CLAUSEN, a celebrated Norwegian landscape-painter, b. 1788; d. in Dresden, 1857.

DALHOUSIE, JAMES ANDREW BROWN RAMSAY, Marquis of, b. 1812. He was governor-general of India during the last Sikh war, and to his policy Britain owes the annexation of the Punjab, of Pegu, Bezar, Nagpore, and Oude. He returned to England in shattered health in 1856, and d. 1860.

DANBY, FRANCIS, one of the finest of English historical painters, b. 1793; d. 1861.

DANDOLO, COUNT EMLIO, an Italian patriot, soldier, and man of letters, d. in Milan, 1859. He published travels in Egypt, in Soudan, and in Palestine.

DANIEL, PETER VAIL, b. in Stafford county, Va., 1785, studied law at Richmond, and was admitted to the bar in 1808. He was twice chosen a member of the house of delegates, and from 1812 to 1835 held the office of privy councillor, being a portion of the time lieutenant-governor and ex officio president of the council. In 1836 he was appointed judge of the federal district court, and in 1841 was made a judge of the supreme court of the United States. D. 1860.

DANIELS, JOHN M., a native of Virginia, proprietor and editor of the "Richmond Examiner," and one of the most pungent and vigorous writers in the South. He was minister to Sardinia under Presidents Pierce and Buchanan. D. 1865.

DARBY, WILLIAM, a geographer and statistician, b. in Pennsylvania, 1775; d. in Washington, 1854.

DARLINGTON, WILLIAM, a learned American botanist, b. in Chester county, Penn., 1782; d. 1863. He wrote largely on botany and kindred subjects, and his devotion to science received a grateful recognition from naturalists and scientific societies in the United States and in Europe. Apart from science, he was an active and a sagacious man of business, and filled many positions of trust and emolument in his native state.

DAVID, PIERRE JEAN, a French sculptor, commonly called David d'Angers, b. in Angers, 1789, was a pupil, though not a relative, of the famous painter of the same name. In 1811 he gained the first prize for sculpture from the academy of the fine arts, and with it a pension enabling him to finish his education in Italy. After passing five years at Rome he visited London; and on his return to Paris established his reputation by his statue of Condé, which is now at Versailles. His subsequent works, which are very numerous and widely distributed, embrace a great variety of subjects, including medals, busts, and statues of celebrities of all countries. The mausoleum of Bozzaris, at Missolonghi, presented by him as a token of his sympathy with the Grecian struggles for independence, is one of his best productions.

He was an ardent republican in politics, and represented the people of his native department in the constituent assembly of 1818. After the coup d'état of Louis Napoleon he was proscribed, and spent three years in exile, during which time he visited Greece. He d. at Paris, 1856, and his funeral was attended by a large crowd of eminent men.

DAVIES, GRIFFITH, b. in Wales, 1788, acquired a high reputation as an actuary. D. in London, 1855.

DAVIS, JOHN W., commissioner to China under President Polk, and governor of Oregon under President Pierce, was b. 1799. He sat in the house of representatives of Indiana several years, and as a member of congress from that state from 1835 to 1837, from 1839 to 1841, and from 1843 to 1847. During the last term he was speaker of the house. D. 1859. — JOHN, was b. in Northborough, Mass., 1787, and graduated at Yale college in 1812. He entered the profession of law, and established himself in its practice at Worcester, Mass. He was distinguished in early life as an active and zealous member of the federal party. Upon the breaking up of old party lines, during the presidency of Monroe, he became a member of the national republican party. By this party he was elected a representative to congress in 1825, and, by successive reëlections, held the office until 1834. Here he distinguished himself by his familiarity with financial and commercial questions, and took part in the tariff debate of 1828. In 1833 he was the candidate of the national republican party for governor of Massachusetts, and was elected by the legislature, — Hon. J. Q. Adams and Hon. Marcus Morton being the opposing candidates. In 1834 he was elected governor by a majority of about 17,000. In 1835 he succeeded the Hon. Nathaniel Silsbee as United States senator. In 1840 he was again elected governor by a large majority, and was reëlected the following year. In 1845 he was elected by the legislature to fill the vacancy made in the United States senate by the death of Hon. Isaac C. Bates, and remained in that body until 1853, when he declined a reëlection. Upon news of his death, the legislature of Massachusetts, which was in session, adopted resolutions in honor of his memory and of his great public services, and a committee attended the funeral services at his burial. D. 1854.

DAY, THOMAS, son of Rev. Jeremiah Day, was b. at Washington, Conn., 1777, graduated at Yale college, and in 1799 was admitted to the practice of the law in Hartford, where he resided until his death in 1855. He was twice elected secretary of the state of Connecticut, and for a series of years was associate judge, and then judge of the Hartford county court. From 1805 to 1853 he reported the decisions of the supreme court of the state, and also edited several English law works.

DAYTON, WILLIAM L., b. in Somerset county, N. J., 1807, graduated at Princeton college in 1825, was admitted to the bar in 1830, and, after serving a term in the state senate, was appointed a justice of the superior court of the state. He sat in the senate of the United States from 1842 to 1851; and from 1857 to 1861 he was attorney-general of New Jersey. President Lincoln appointed him minister to France, and he d. in Paris, 1864.

DEARBORN, HENRY A. S., b. in New Hampshire, 1783, was educated to the bar, and was made collector of the port of Boston, Mass., by Madison, and held the office till 1829. Near the commencement of the war of 1812 he was brigadier of the militia, and had command of the troops in Boston harbor. He held several elective places of trust under the state government, and represented the Norfolk district in congress from 1831 to 1833. He was passionately fond of horticulture and agriculture, and interested himself in the establishment of rural cemeteries, writing much on all these subjects. He was the author of a work on the commerce of the Black Sea, a biography of Commodore Bainbridge, and one of his father, General H. Dearborn, embodying his journals of the revolutionary war. D. 1851.

DE BIELKE, RODOLPH, an eminent Danish diplomatist; d. 1858.

DECAMPS, ALEXANDRE GABRIEL, one of the most celebrated painters of the modern French school, b. 1803; d. in Paris, 1860.

DEHAVEN, EDWIN J., commander of the Grinnell expedition to the arctic regions, b. in Pennsylvania, in 1819, entered the United States navy as a midshipman in 1829, and passed his examination in 1835. He served in the Wilkes' exploring expedition to the antarctic regions, 1839 to 1842; and for his gallantry and skill on trying occasions was promoted to a lieutenantcy. From 1843 to 1848 he was on duty in the Mediterranean, the Pacific, and the Gulf of Mexico. During the next 18 months he was attached to the Washington observatory, where his scientific attainments found scope in the construction of the ocean charts, with which Maury's name has been more especially connected. He was selected to command the first expedition, fitted out at the expense of Mr. Henry Grinnell, to search for Sir John Franklin, and sailed from New York in May, 1850, with two brigs, the Advance, of 140, and the Rescue, of 90 tons; and the published narrative of the cruise is amongst the most interesting contributions to the records of arctic observation and adventure. The expedition was absent 16 months, and soon after its return Lieutenant Dehaven was placed in command of the schooner Arago, and employed in the coast survey of the Gulf of Mexico. In 1857 the effects of the arctic snows upon his vision assumed a form which obliged him to retire from active duty, and from that period until his death he remained on the retired list. D. 1865.

DE LA BECHE, SIR HENRY THOMAS, a geologist, and founder of the London museum of practical geology. D. 1855.

DELACROIX, FERDINAND VICTOR EUGENE, a French painter, and the admitted chief of the romantic school, was b. near Paris in 1798. He received a liberal education, and at the age of 18 entered the atelier of the classic painter Pierre Guérin, who had already for pupils Géricault and Ary Scheffer. These pupils abandoned the traditions of their instructor, and became declared partisans of the romantic school. His principal pictures are "The Massacre of Scio," "Dante and Virgil in the Inferno," "Algerine Women," "The Jewish Wedding." The artistic merits of Delacroix are a subject of controversy; but though not likely permanently to hold the high rank his admirers claim for him, he undoubtedly possessed superior power, and his influence upon contemporary French art was great, and in many respects beneficial. D. 1863.

DELANCEY, RIGHT REV. WILLIAM H., protestant bishop of the diocese of western New York, b. in Westchester county, N. Y., 1797; d. 1865. He graduated at Yale college in 1817, was ordained in 1820, and was elected bishop in 1838.

DELANE, WILLIAM FREDERICK AUGUSTUS, for many years manager of the "London Times" newspaper, b. 1793; d. 1857.

DE LA ROCHE, PAUL, one of the most distinguished painters of the modern French school, was a successful teacher of the art, and at one time his studio was the most frequented of any in Paris. Among his most celebrated pictures are "The Children of Edward," and "The Death of Queen Elizabeth," both of which are in the Luxembourg gallery. For the last 19 years of his life he declined to exhibit his pictures, and lived in entire seclusion. D. 1856, in his 60th year.

DEMBINSKI, HENRI, a Polish patriot and soldier, and commander-in-chief under Kossuth in Hungary, b. in the palatinate of Cracow in 1784; d. in exile, in Paris, 1864.

DEMPSTER, JOHN, D. D., one of the founders and professors of the Biblical institute at Concord, N. H., and of a similar institution at Evanston, Ill. B. in Florida, N. Y., 1794; d. 1863.

DENMAN, THOMAS, Lord, b. in London, 1779, was chief justice of the king's bench from 1832 to 1850, performing the functions of the high office with rare independence of character. As a politician, prior to his elevation to the bench, he was a consistent advocate of popular rights as understood by the party of whom Brougham was the recognized leader. D. 1854.

DENNISTOUN, JAMES, an historical writer and amateur of art, distinguished by his acquaintance with the history and literature of Scotland. D. 1855.

DE QUINCEY, THOMAS, b. in 1785, was educated at the Manchester grammar school and the university of Oxford. In early youth he became an opium-eater, and by this habit ruined his fortune and impaired an intellect which would, in all probability, have secured for him a more enduring reputation than that which he has achieved by desultory contributions to periodical literature. From straitened circumstances he began, when about 40 years of age, to contribute to the "London Magazine" his "Confessions of an Opium-eater," a work remarkable for exuberant although ill-regulated imagination, and still more so for an excessive self-contemplation and minute analysis of his own mental condition and feelings, — characteristics clearly traceable to the habit in which he indulged. He continued thenceforth to work at a great variety of subjects. In 1832 he went to Scotland, and there lived, not only admired but esteemed by the few who were admitted to his society, till his death, which took place at Edinburgh, 1859. His essays have been republished by a Boston firm, and have won a more extended appreciation in the United States than they ever enjoyed in Britain.

DERBISHIRE, STEWART, one of the earliest of the class of writers whom the "war correspondence" of recent years has multiplied indefinitely. Starting in life an officer in the British army, and afterward practising as a barrister in London, he went to Spain, at the commencement of the constitutional war, as the correspondent of a London journal. Besides acquitting himself well as a ready and graphic writer, he distinguished himself by bravery as a volunteer in several hotly contested engagements, eliciting honorable mention by both Spanish and English commanders. The mission of the earl of Durham to Canada brought Mr. Derbshire to that province, where he rendered essential service to the cause of liberal government. He finally received the appointment of "Queen's Printer" in the province, an easy and lucrative position, which he held until his death, in 1863.

DE ROS, JOHN FREDERICK FITZGERALD, a British rear-admiral, author of "Travels in the United States," b. 1804; d. 1861.

DESPRETZ, CESAR MANSUÈTE, a French scientific author, b. at Lessinès, 1789; d. at Paris, 1863. His early studies were confined to chemistry, of which he was the teacher at the polytechnic school; but he subsequently applied himself to physical science, and more especially to investigations relating to the phenomena of heat and its effect in changing the forms and conditions of different bodies. He was elected to the academy of sciences as the successor of Savart; and was a member of the institute of France, and professor of physics to the faculty of sciences. He published a "Treatise on Chemistry," and a "Treatise on Elementary Physics," in addition to many contributions to scientific journals.

DEVRIENT, WILHELMINA SCHROEDER, a singer and actress, famous in the German theatres, b. 1805; d. 1860.

DE WOLF, JOHN, formerly professor of chemistry in Brown university, Providence, R. I., b. 1786; d. 1862.

DICK, THOMAS, D. D., a Scottish theologian, author of the "Christian Philosopher," and other works, b. 1773; d. 1857.

DICKERSON, MAHLON, b. in New Jersey, 1770, was successively judge of the supreme court of that state, governor, and United States senator. He joined the cabinet of President Jackson in 1834, as secretary of the navy, and retained the position until 1838. D. 1853.

DILLWYN, L. W., a Welsh naturalist, and the reputed father of English botany, b. 1778; d. 1855.

DOD, CHARLES ROGER, a London journalist, and the originator of the "Parliamentary Companion," and works relating to the peerage, baronetage, and knightage of Great Britain. B. 1793; d. 1855.

DOHENY, MICHAEL, a member of the "Young Ireland" party in 1848, and one of the many orators of whom that party then could boast, d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 1862. On his arrival in this country he applied himself to the practice of the law, and for a time was also connected with journalism in New York.

DONALDSON, JOHN WILLIAM, D.D., b. 1812, was educated in the London university, and graduated at Cambridge, where his classical acquirements gained him distinction. Within five years after taking his degree he published his "New Cratylus," the first of a series of works which raised him to high eminence in the science of philology. After holding for a short time a fellowship at Trinity college, he became master of King Edward's school, in the town of Bury St. Edmund's. Several years later he resigned this post, and devoted himself altogether to scholarship and biblical criticism, in both of which he exhibited the highest powers, while the peculiar views which in both he enunciated were met by much controversy. As a grammarian and linguist his reputation is unquestioned; his theological works, especially "Jashar," written in Latin, incurred severe condemnation from many who appreciated his great learning. He next undertook the compilation of a Greek lexicon; but his strength failed under incessant exertion, and he d. in 1861.

D'ORSAY, Count, a leader of European fashion, and also an accomplished painter and sculptor, b. 1798; d. in Paris, 1852.

DOST MOHAMMED, Khan, emir of Cabul, b. 1785; d. 1863.

DOTY, JAMES DUANE, governor of Utah, b. in New York, 1799; d. at Salt Lake city, 1865. He removed to the West in early life, and was appointed district judge of the then Northwest territory. Subsequently, he represented Wisconsin as a delegate in congress, and also filled the gubernatorial chair of that territory prior to its admission as a state. He went to Utah, in 1861, as superintendent of Indian affairs, and two years later was appointed to the office he held at the time of his death.

DOUGLAS, STEPHEN ARNOLD, an American statesman, b. at Brandon, Vt., 1813. He lost his father while an infant, and his mother being left in destitute circumstances, he entered a cabinet shop at Middlebury, in his native state, for the purpose of learning the trade. After remaining there for several months, he returned to Brandon, where he continued for a year at the same calling, but his health obliged him to abandon it, and he became a student in the academy. His mother having married a second time, he followed her to Canandaigua, in the state of New York. Here he pursued the study of the law until his removal to Cleveland, O., in 1831. From Cleveland he went still farther west, and finally settled in Jacksonville, Ill. He was at first employed as clerk to an auctioneer, and afterwards kept school, devoting all the time he could spare to the study of the law. In 1834 he was admitted to the bar, soon obtained a lucrative practice, and was elected attorney-general of the state. In 1837 he was appointed by President Van Buren register of the land-office, at Springfield, Ill. He afterwards practised his profession, and, in 1840, was elected secretary of state, and the following year judge of the supreme court. This office he resigned, after sitting upon the bench for two years, in consequence of ill health. In 1843 he was elected to congress, and continued a member of the lower house for four years. In 1847 he was elected to the senate of the United States, where he distinguished himself as a debater. He was chairman of the committee on territories, and having adopted the doctrine of "squatter sovereignty," took a prominent part in the angry contests respecting slavery in the territories, which preceded the secession movement. In 1860 he was nominated to the presidency by a section of the democratic party, but was defeated. He d. June 3, 1861.—

SIR HOWARD, a general in the British service, author of an essay "On the Construction of Military Bridges," and "A Treatise on Naval Gunnery," b. in Hampshire, 1776; d. 1861. From 1823 to 1829 he was governor of New Brunswick, and was equally eminent as a soldier, a politician, and a man of science.

DOWNES, JOHN, commodore United States navy, b. in Canton, Mass., 1785, entered the navy in 1802, and was in active service during the war of 1812. He was a lieutenant on board the Essex, with Commodore Porter, in his conflict at Valparaiso, in 1814, with two British vessels, the frigate Phœbe and the sloop-of-war Cherub. In 1817-18 he commanded the Macedonian and other ships in the Pacific, when Lord Cochran commanded the Chilian fleet. In 1831 he commanded the frigate Potomac, and bombarded the town of Quallah Battoo, on the coast of Sumatra, in reprisal for injuries done to American seamen by Malay pirates. His sea-service covered a period exceeding 24 years. D. 1854.

DRAKE, DANIEL, M. D., author of a work on the diseases of the Valley of North America, and otherwise eminent in the annals of western medicine. B. 1785; d. in Cincinnati, 1852.

DRUMMOND, SIR GORDON, a British officer, who saw much service in the American war of 1812, and commanded in the action near the falls of Niagara, where he was severely wounded. D. 1854, aged 83.

DUFOUR, LÉON, a French naturalist, and a voluminous contributor to the literature of natural science. His microscopic examinations of the insect world gained for him especial distinction, and furnished material for an extended series of papers from his pen. B. 1780; d. 1865.

DUGGAN, PETER PAUL, an American artist, b. in New York, and for some years a resident of London. D. in Paris, 1861.

DUMÉRIL, ANDRÉ MARIE CONSTANT, a French naturalist, and author of works on natural history. B. 1774; d. in Paris, 1860.

DUNBAR, GEORGE, author of a Greek lexicon, and professor of Greek in the university of Edinburgh. B. 1774; d. 1851.

DUNCAN, JOHNSON K., brigadier-general in the confederate service, d. 1863. He entered West Point from Pennsylvania in 1845, and served in the United States artillery until 1855, when he resigned. In 1861 he joined the confederate cause with a colonel's commission, but rose to a brigadier-generalship, and was in command at forts Jackson and St. Philip when they were bombarded by United States vessels. — PHILIP BURY, an English miscellaneous writer, and for many years keeper of the Ashmolean museum at Oxford, in which position he labored successfully, and with rare unselfishness, to promote the study of natural science. B. 1772; d. 1863.

DUNDAS, SIR JAMES W. DEANS, admiral in the British service, and in 1852 commander-in-chief of the Mediterranean and Black Sea fleet. B. 1786; d. 1862.

— SIR RICHARD SAUNDERS, a British vice-admiral, b. 1802; d. 1861. In 1855 he was commander-in-chief of the Baltic fleet, and in that capacity attacked and captured Sweaborg.

DUNDONALD, THOMAS COCHRANE, earl of, was b. 1775, and entered the British navy at an early age. Ability and courage, displayed on many occasions, earned for him brilliant honors; but of these he was summarily stripped by the admiralty, on a false charge of having, in 1814, spread a report that Napoleon had fallen, in order to influence the funds. It was not until 1847 that he was reinstated in his rank in the British service. D. 1860.

DUPONT, (DE L'EURE.) JACQUES CHARLES, chief of the provisional government of France in 1848, was b. in the department of Eux, 1767. He was called to Paris on the occurrence of the revolution of 1830, when he became minister of justice. The reaction under Louis Philippe deprived him of this position, and he then identified himself with the opposition in the chamber of representatives. After the revolution of February, 1848, he was proposed by Lamartine as head of the government, and was universally approved in that capacity. D. 1855.

— SAMUEL FRANCIS, rear-admiral United States navy, was b. at Bergen, N. J., 1803. In 1815 he was commissioned midshipman, and two years afterward made his first cruise in the Franklin, under Commodore Stewart. In 1836, having attained to the grade of lieutenant, he was placed in command of the Warren, which was at the time attached to the squadron in the West Indies. When the Mexican war broke out, he was commander of the frigate Congress, in which capacity, and as commander of the sloop of war Cyane, he distinguished himself on several occasions off the California coast. He was promoted to a captaincy in 1856, and in 1857-58 he commanded the steam-frigate Minnesota in the China waters. Early in 1861 he was placed in command of the Philadelphia navy yard, but was soon after summoned to more active duties. As commander of the South Atlantic blockading squadron, he conducted the naval attack upon Port Royal, defeating the rebel fleet under Tatnall, securing possession of tort Walker, and reestablishing national authority at that important point. The brilliancy and success of his attack upon fortifications of great strength aroused the world to a sense of the naval power of the republic, and called forth the formal thanks of congress. In March, 1862, he undertook an expedition against Fernandina, Flor., which he captured with the assistance of a land force. In the following August he was made rear-admiral. He made an unsuccessful attack on Charleston in April, 1863, and then arrived at the conclusion—sustained by subsequent experience—as to the insufficiency of a purely naval attack upon that city. Two months later he was relieved from duty, and thenceforward he remained “awaiting orders” until his death, which occurred in June, 1865. His reputation was that of a brave and chivalrous sailor.

DUYCKINCK, GEORGE LONG, a New York littérateur, b. 1822; d. 1863. He was one of the editors of “The Literary World” from 1848 to 1853; and of the “Cyclopædia of American Literature.”

His separate publications include biographies of George Herbert, Bishop Ken, Latimer, and Jeremy Taylor.

DWARRIS, SIR FORTUNATUS, known to lawyers by his treatise on “Statutes, their Rules of Construction, and the Proper Boundaries of Legislation and Judicial Interpretation.” B. 1787; d. 1860.

DWIGHT, REV. HARRISON GRAY OTIS, an American missionary, who labored nearly 30 years at Constantinople, b. in Conway, Mass., 1803; killed by an accident on the Northern Vermont railroad, 1862. He was the author of “Christianity brought Home from the East,” and other works.—MARY ANNE, authoress of a work on Grecian and Roman mythology, and editor of an abridgment of Langé’s “History of Painting.” B. in Northampton, Mass., 1806; d. in Morrisania, N. Y., 1858.

E.

EGERTON, FRANCIS, earl of Ellesmere, b. 1800; d. 1857. He adorned his rank by a taste for literature and a liberal patronage of the fine arts, and published poems and sketches of travel.

EGG, AUGUSTUS LEOPOLD, a painter, b. in London in 1816, exhibited at the academy in 1838, and ten years afterward was elected an associate. He was an admirable illustrator of Shakspeare and Le Sage, to some of whose lighter fancies he has given a charm beyond the reach of written description. Among his chief works are “Le Diable Boîteux,” “The Victim,” “Gil Blas exchanging Rings with Camilla,” “Katharine and Petruccio,” and “Buckingham rebuffed.” A more important work is “Peter the Great seeing Catherine for the first time”; a picture which the artist excelled by two other works of a more recent date; one, “The Life and Death of Buckingham,” the other a “Triology,” without a title. D. 1863.

EGLINTON, ARCHIBALD WILLIAM MONTGOMERIE, earl of, known in connection with the revival on his estate in Scotland, on a scale of great magnificence, of the tournament of the middle ages. B. 1812; d. 1861.

ELCHINGEN, Duc D’, the younger son of Marshal Ney, and the inheritor of his father’s title, d. at Gallipoli, on his way to take a command in the East, 1854.

ELGIN and KINCARDINE, the earl of, b. 1811, was the representative in the male line of the Scottish house of Bruce, and the son of the nobleman who enriched the art treasures of England by his collection of sculpture, generally known as the “Elgin marbles.” In 1842 he was appointed governor of Jamaica, where he remained until 1846, when he was transferred to Canada as governor-general. In 1857 he went to China as ambassador extraordinary, and after arranging serious difficulties between the European and native population, procured a treaty which gave Britain freer access to China than had been enjoyed before. Violations of the treaty led to his return to the East, where he d. 1863.

ELLETT, CHARLES, an American engineer, author of a pamphlet on “Coast and Harbor Defences,” and many other papers relating to professional subjects, was b. at Penn’s Manor, on the Delaware, 1810. Amongst the works constructed under his direction are the suspension bridge across the Schuylkill, at Fairmount; the first suspension bridge across the Niagara; and the first at Wheeling, Va. He was engaged on the Baltimore and Ohio and the Reading railroads, and other important enterprises. Being at Washington when the civil war commenced, he prepared a plan for the use of steam-vessels as rams in naval warfare, but the navy department declined his propositions. They were, however, entertained by the secretary of war; and

Mr. Ellet, having been commissioned as colonel of engineers, in a short time converted several light-draught river steamers into rams, by building bulk-heads of heavy timbers around their machinery, and by strengthening their bows with timbers internally, and a sheathing of iron bars externally. With this fleet he bore a gallant part in the naval battle off Memphis, June 4, 1862, disabling and sinking several of the enemy's vessels. In the midst of the conflict he was struck by a musket-ball above the knee, and d. at Cairo, June 21. — CHARLES RIVERS, son of the preceding, b. in Philadelphia, 1841; d. 1833. When the civil war commenced he was studying for the medical profession, but accompanied his father to the west in the spring of 1862, and commanded one of the rams at the action off Memphis. After his father's death, he was placed in command of the Mississippi marine brigade, and distinguished himself by many dashing exploits with the ram Queen of the West, rendering essential service to General Grant during and after the siege of Vicksburg. His death was occasioned by exposure to the noxious miasma of the river.

ELLIOT, WILLIAM, a South Carolina poet, author of "Piëso," a tragedy, b. 1789; d. 1863. He was senator in the state legislature in 1832, but resigned when instructed by his constituents to vote for the nullification of the tariff law. When the movement for secession began, he opposed it unflinchingly in a series of letters over the signature "Agricola." He was a frequent contributor to the southern press on agricultural and sporting topics. — SIR HENRY MILES, author of a "Biographical Index to the Historians of Mohammedan India, and a Glossary." B. 1809; d. 1854.

ELLIS, JOHN WILLIS, governor of North Carolina, and one of the most active promoters of secession in that state, b. 1820; d. 1861. Prior to his election as governor, he was a judge of the superior courts of law and equity. On the 2d January, 1861, he took possession of Fort Macon at Beaufort, of the United States works at Wilmington, and of the United States arsenal at Fayetteville; and on the 20th April the United States mint at Charlotte was seized under his orders.

ELLSWORTH, HENRY L., son of Hon. Oliver Ellsworth, of Windsor, Conn., b. 1791; d. in New Haven, 1858. After graduating at Yale college, studying law, and practising in Windsor and Hartford, he was appointed by General Jackson commissioner among the Indian tribes south and west of Arkansas. About two years later he was appointed commissioner of patents of the United States. While in this office he gave special attention to the agricultural interests of the country, and published valuable reports on these subjects. After about ten years he left the patent-office, and established himself at Lafayette, Ind., in the settlement and cultivation of extensive tracts of land,—his intelligent enterprise contributing materially to the improvement of the agriculture of the state. — EPHRAIM ELMER, the originator of the Zouave drill and organization in the United States, b. in Saratoga county, N. Y., 1837, was killed at Alexandria, Va., 1861. He organized the first Zouave corps in Chicago, where he was studying law, and after the installation of President Lincoln received a lieutenant's commission, preparatory to his employment in the war department. The outbreak of civil war changed his purposes. Proceeding to New York, he organized a Zouave regiment from the members of the fire department, and within five weeks from the commencement of his task, he marched at the head of his regiment to Alexandria. Here he tore down a secession flag which was flying over a hotel, and was shot by the proprietor of the house. The murderer was killed immediately afterward by Francis E. Brownell, one of Ellsworth's companions.

ELMES, JAMES, an English architect and author, b. 1783; d. 1862. He was largely employed on the periodical press of London, and among his separate publications are "Memoirs of the Life and Works of Sir Christopher Wren," "Horæ Væivæ," and "Thomas Clarkson, a Monograph."

ELPHINSTONE, MOUNTSTUART, author of a "History of India," and distinguished for his civil services in British India, b. 1778; d. 1859.

ELTON, Sir CHARLES ABRAHAM, an English poet of some distinction, b. 1779; d. 1853. His "Translation of Hesiod," his "Specimens of Classic Poets," in three volumes, and "History of the Roman Emperors," display varied learning and sound taste. He was also the author of "Boyhood, and other Poems." But of original poetry his best-known piece is "The Brothers," suggested by the melancholy loss of his two eldest sons, who were drowned.

EMBURY, Mrs. EMMA C., a daughter of Dr. J. R. Manley, of New York, and authoress of "Guido, and other Poems,"

"Glimpses of Home Life," and other works. D. 1863.

EMMONS, EBENEZER, a distinguished geologist, b. in Middlefield, Mass., 1798. He adopted the profession of medicine, and acquired the reputation of a successful practitioner. He was, however, an ardent student of the natural sciences, and, in 1833, was chosen professor of natural history in Williams college, Mass., — a position which led him to assist in the survey, and to prepare a report on the quadrupeds of that state. He was subsequently employed upon the geological survey of New York, — his reports forming several volumes of the series to which the authorities of the state have properly attached the highest importance. Facts acquired during the progress of this extended work gradually induced him to doubt the completeness of the theory then entertained by American zoölogists in regard to the older fossiliferous works of the continent; and ultimately he promulgated a system known as the "Taconic," which, though at first bitterly assailed, now ranks among the admitted truths of geological science. Previously American writers, adopting the nomenclature of the English classification, grouped the oldest series of stratified fossiliferous rocks, found in the state of New York, into a system entitled the "silurian"; the "Potsdam sandstone," the lowest member of the series, being considered as representing, with its fossils, the epoch when animal life first appeared. Dr. Emmons's investigations brought him to the conclusion that there is an enormously thick series of rocks beneath the oldest part of the silurian system, indicating an epoch of time far beyond the silurian era, and revealing a period of animal life much more remote than any before known. The reception accorded to the discovery was discreditable to the spirit of Dr. Emmons's scientific contemporaries. They derided the product of his researches, and treated him as an innovator whom it was desirable to put down for the sake of their borrowed theory. But justice, though tardy, came at last. The geological survey of Canada demonstrated the soundness of his views touching the ante-silurian strata; and, still later, geologists in Sweden and Bohemia brought to light the similarity of their primordial formations and fossils with those discovered by Dr. Emmons in New York. Meanwhile he had been engaged to conduct the geological survey of North Carolina, where he rendered further service to the science to which he had devoted his energy and talent. He d. at New Brunswick, N. C., 1863.

EMPSON, WILLIAM, professor of law at the East India college, and at the time of his death editor of the "Edinburgh Review." D. 1852.

ERNEST AUGUSTUS, king of Hanover, duke of Cumberland, &c., was the fifth son of George III., and was b. in 1771. As duke of Cumberland, he was one of the most odious of the English Tories, because the most unrelenting in his hostility to liberal principles and measures. He succeeded to the throne of Hanover in 1827, and at once signaled his reign by abolishing the constitution, which, four years before, had been granted by his predecessor, and by the adoption of other measures equally harsh and despotic. D. 1851.

ERSKINE, DAVID MONTAGUE, eldest son of the celebrated Lord Erskine, b. 1777. In 1800 he married a daughter of the late General John Cadwallader, of Philadelphia, and in 1806 was appointed envoy and minister to the United States. He succeeded to the peerage in 1823, and d. 1855.

ESPY, JAMES P., author of a theory of storms, and for some time in the employ of the United States government as a meteorologist. B. 1785; d. 1860.

ESTCOURT, MAJOR-GENERAL JAMES BUCKNALL, died of cholera before Sebastopol, 1855. He accompanied the expedition to the Euphrates in 1835.

EVANS, ARTHUR BENONI, a profound classical scholar and author, was b. in Berkshire, England, 1781. He was at once a linguist, naturalist, numismatist, musician, mechanic, anatomist, artist, and divine. D. 1855.

EVERETT, EDWARD, distinguished alike as a scholar, an orator, and a statesman, was b. in Dorchester, Mass., 1794. He received his early education at Boston, entered Harvard college in 1807, and in 1811 graduated with the highest honors, undecided as to a pursuit for life. After leaving college, he accepted the post of tutor, and, having turned his attention to theology, in 1813 succeeded the Rev. J. S. Buckminster in the pastorate of the Brattle-Street church in Boston. Although less than twenty years of age, and with a singularly juvenile appearance, he soon acquired celebrity in the pulpit. He added to his clerical reputation by publishing a "Defence of Christianity," abounding with indications of biblical and philological learning, and with references to German writers whose names were then all but unknown in this country. In 1814 he was invited to accept the new professorship of Greek literature in Harvard college, with permission to visit Europe. He accepted the office, and, before entering on its duties, proceeded to England, and thence to Göttingen, in order to study the German language and literature, and methods of instruction. Having visited Paris, Rome, Greece, and Turkey, he returned to the United States, after an absence of five years, and entered forthwith upon the duties of his professorship. To his lectures as professor, he added Sunday discourses in the college chapel; and by his efforts imparted a marked impulse to the studies of the university. In 1820 he became editor of "The North American Review," which, under his management, rose to a circulation and an influence which it had previously failed to acquire. He continued his editorship of this periodical until 1824, in which year he delivered the annual oration before the Phi-Beta-Kappa Society at Cambridge, Mass., in the presence of an immense audience, including Gen. Lafayette, then on a visit to this country. This was the first of a series of orations and addresses delivered by Mr. Everett on public occasions of almost every kind during a quarter of a century, and afterwards republished in a collected form. Up to 1824 he had abstained from any active participation in politics, but was then elected to congress by the constituency of Middlesex, Mass., without solicitation on his part. He served 10 years in the house of representatives, being all the time a member of the committee on foreign affairs, and for a period its chairman. His whole congressional career was one of work and usefulness, and his influence in the house was proportionately great. He retired from congress in 1835, and was for four successive years chosen governor of Massachusetts, being defeated by the democratic candidate, in 1839, by a single vote. In 1841 he was appointed by President Harrison to represent the United States at the English court; a position which he filled for five years, with honor to himself and his government. During this official residence in England, the university of Oxford conferred upon him the degree of D. C. L. On returning to this country, in 1845, he was chosen president of Harvard college, and retained the office until 1849, when ill health compelled him to resign. His administration of the office scarcely realized the expectations of his friends; for though preëminently qualified for it in many respects, his lack of everything like personal magnetism deprived him of the sympathies of the students, while his excessive sensitiveness exposed him to annoyances from which a less formal habit would have been exempt. On the death of Mr. Webster, in 1852, he was appointed secretary of state by President Fillmore, and held the office until the advent of the Pierce administration. In 1853 he took his seat in the United States senate, but resigned the post in the following year, under the advice of his physician. He subsequently varied the quiet life of a scholar by the delivery of various orations, all worthy of his rhetorical fame: and by efforts for the collection of a fund for the purchase of Mount Vernon, for which purpose he realized upwards of $100,000. He also wrote a memoir of Daniel Webster, whose collected writings he edited. In 1850 he was nominated a candidate for the vice-presidency of the United States, with John Bell for the presidency, but was defeated. In the deplorable conflict which has since been waged, Mr. Everett did not for an instant hesitate as to his course. At the outset he pronounced decidedly and unqualifiedly for the Union, and through all subsequent stages he never wavered in his allegiance to the cause of the national government; on every occasion aiding it by his personal influence, his voice, and his pen,—so obliterating all remembrance of former political differences, and strengthening his hold upon the affections of his countrymen. He d. of apoplexy, at his residence in Boston, Jan. 15, 1865. — HORACE, lawyer and statesman, b. in Vermont, represented a congressional district of that state from 1829 to 1843 with an ability which gave him high reputation. He was a successful jury advocate. D. 1851, aged 71.

EYRE, SIR WILLIAM, major-general, at one time commander of the British forces in Canada, and one of the heroes of the Crimean war, d. 1859.

F.

FABER, GEORGE STANLEY, a writer on prophecy, b. in England, 1774; d. 1855.

FARNHAM, ELIZA W., Mrs., a philanthropist, who for years employed herself in labors to reform criminal and vicious women, and more recently promoted and managed plans for aiding and protecting women emigrating to the western states. Her maiden name was Burhans, and she was b. in Albany county, N. Y., 1815. Amidst her active labors she found leisure to write "Life in Prairie Land," "California, In-doors and Out," and "My Early Days"; and also to edit Sampson's "Criminal Jurisprudence." D. 1864.

FARNSWORTH, ELON J., brigadier-general in the United States volunteer service, b. in Livingston county, Mich., 1835; killed at Gettysburg, 1863.

FARRAR, JOHN, b. in Lincoln, Mass., 1779, graduated at Cambridge in 1803, was appointed Greek tutor in Harvard college in 1805, and Hollis professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in 1807. In 1818 he published "Elements of Algebra," translated from the French of Lacroix, which was succeeded in the nine following years by eleven other works, translated from Legendre, Biot, Bézout, and others, on different subjects of mathematics and physics. These treatises were adopted for the course of instruction, not only at Cambridge, but at the United States military academy, and other principal institutions of learning throughout the country; and, though since partly superseded in the progress of science, they introduced that very taste and knowledge which now require a more elaborate apparatus. He contributed several articles on scientific subjects to the early numbers of the "North American Review," and was officially connected with the academy many years. He received the degree of LL. D. from Bowdoin college. D. 1853.

FAUCHER, LÉON, a French writer, eminent as a political economist, b. at Limoges. 1803; d. at Marseilles, 1854. He received his education at the college of Toulouse, where he attained great distinction. He began his career by tuition, and went to Paris in 1825, where he entered upon a connection with the press. The revolution of 1830 opened to him the editorship of "Le Temps." He subsequently became editor of the "Courrier Français," and in 1838 began to contribute to the "Revue des Deux Mondes" a series of papers on financial questions, which have given him high rank among the political economists of his age. In the last years of Louis Philippe's reign he sat as deputy for Rheims, entered keenly into the political contests which then raged in parliament, and ardently opposed M. Guizot. When that minister's hostility to reform led to the overthrow of the monarchy in 1848, M. Faucher obtained a seat in the national assembly, and became, for a short period, minister of the interior during the presidency of Louis Napoleon. After the coup d'état of Dec. 1851, he was offered the post of senator; but he refused to serve the despotic government then established, and retired from public life.

FELIX, ELISA RACHEL, a French actress, remarkable for tragic power, was the second daughter of a Jew pedler, and was b. at the Swiss village of Münf, 1820. For 10 years after her birth, the family pursued their wanderings through Switzerland and Germany, and then settled at Lyons. The eldest child sang at the cafés to the accompaniment of an old guitar; and little Rachel collected the small guerdon, which formed the sisters' contribution to the general expenses. In 1830 the family removed to Paris, where Rachel sang with her sister at the places of public resort on the Boulevards. On one of these occasions the little minstrels arrested the attention of M. Choron, founder of the royal institution for the study of sacred music, who made arrangements for including them among his pupils, and charged himself with the future fortunes of Rachel Felix. Choron discovered, however, that her sonorous organ was better suited for declamatory than for musical expression, and he transferred her as a scholar to M. St. Aulaire, a dramatic instructor. Under his tuition she learned rapidly, and, in 1836, was admitted to the Conservatoire, joining the class conducted by Michelot. In 1837 she made her début at the gymnase under the name which she made famous in "La Vendéene," written expressly for the display of her powers. Her effort made little or no sensation, and the "Vendéene" was withdrawn. After studying further under Samson, the veteran actor and author, she appeared at the Théâtre Français, in 1838, as Camille, in "Les Horaces"; startling the Parisian critics by the exhibition of a tragic genius equal to the finest inspirations of a Raucourt or a Duchesnois, combined with originality in the manner of its development. During the winter of 1838 she acted, in addition to the part which made her reputation, that of Emilie, in "Cinna," Hermione, Aménade, in "Tancrède," Eriphile in "Iphigénie," and Aulide and Monime, in "Mithridate." To these she afterward added the Roxane of Bajazet, which, with Pauline, in "Polyeucte," and the "Phédère," may be numbered among her most wonderful impersonations in the classic drama. With every fresh representation, her power over the public seemed to increase, and the life of the young Jewess has been described as a continued ovation, in which all classes combined to do her honor. Gradually Mdlle. Rachel formed a distinct répertoire, from the works of the modern school of dramatic writers, becoming familiar to the public as Mademoiselle de Belle Isle, Diane, Louise de Ligueroles, Adrienne Lecouvreur, Lady Tartuffe, and other parts. But her greatest successes were achieved in parts in which she appeared as the interpreter of the genius of a past age, rather than of that in which she lived. Mdlle. Rachel d. in 1858; ill health having for some time previous compelled her to abandon her professional avocations.

FELTON, CORNELIUS CONWAY, an eminent Greek scholar, and one of the most distinguished professors of Harvard college, b. at West Newbury, Mass., 1807; d. 1862. He was elected college professor of Greek in 1832, and, in 1834, was appointed Eliot professor of Greek literature, which position he held until his elevation to the presidency of the institution in 1860. He visited Europe twice — in 1853 and 1858; devoting his attention principally to Greece, its monuments of art and glory, its ancient literature, and its modern institutions. Besides publishing many works connected with Grecian history, language, and literature, he contributed a life of Gen. Eaton to Sparks's "American Biography," and numerous articles to the "North American Review," the "Christian Examiner," and the "American Cyclopædia."

FERDINAND, duke of Genoa, younger brother of Victor Emanuel, b. 1822; d. 1855.

FERGUSON, SIR ADAM, a friend of Sir Walter Scott, and a man of note in the literary circles of his day. D. 1855, aged 86.

FERRIER, SUSAN, who d. at Edinburgh, 1854, was the authoress of "Marriage," and other novels, all characterized by the fidelity and dry humor with which they portray characters and scenes of common life. Writing at first anonymously, she was greeted by the author of "Waverley" as "a sister shadow."

FIELD, GEORGE, memorable for his successful application of chemistry to the arts, d. 1854. He was author of "Chromatics," "Outlines of Analogical Philosophy," and other works.

FIELDING, COPLEY VANDYKE, an English artist, remarkable for the beauty of his marine subjects and landscapes. B. 1797; d. 1854.

FINDEN, WILLIAM, a celebrated English engraver, b. 1787; d. 1852.

FINLAISSON, JOHN, an English actuary, author of "New Tables of Life Annuities," b. 1784; d. 1860.

FINLEY, REV. JAMES B., author of "Sketches of Pioneer Methodism," and "Prison Life," was a methodist preacher, who labored long and zealously in Ohio. B. 1780; d. 1857.

FISHER, ELWOOD, a secessionist before secession, and originator and principal editor of the "Southern Press," a journal established at Washington in 1850. B. 1808; d. at Nashville, Tenn., 1862. — REDWOOD, journalist, and writer on political economy and statistics, b. in Philadelphia, 1783; d. 1856. For some years he was engaged in that city as a merchant.

FITZ, HENRY, the inventor of a method of perfecting object-glasses for refracting telescopes, b. in Newburyport, Mass., 1808; d. in New York, 1863. He was originally a printer, but for many years preceding his death had been engaged as a telescope-maker; and the excellence of his instruments secured the favor of astronomers in various parts of the world.

FITZGERALD, THOMAS H., served with distinction in the war of 1812, under General Harrison, and, in 1848 and 1849, was a senator in congress from Michigan under the appointment of the governor. D. 1855.

FITZWILLIAM, FANNY ELIZABETH, a popular actress, wife of a well-known delineator of Irish characters. D. 1854.

FLETCHER, G., a Wesleyan minister, who was born on 2d Feb. 1747, at Clarbrough, in Nottinghamshire, d. 1855, at the age of 108 years. He spent 83 years of his life in active pursuits. He was 21 years a farmer; 26 years in the army; was at the battle of Bunker Hill, and followed Abercrombie into Egypt. He then entered the West India dock company's service, where he continued 36 years, when he retired on their bounty, still preserving, up to within six months of his decease, astonishing activity both of mind and body; often travelling great distances by rail, and preaching two or three times a day for the objects of charity and benevolence.

FLOY, JAMES, D. D., a minister of the methodist episcopal church, b. in New York, 1806; d. 1863. In 1838 he was censured by the governing body of his church for having attended an anti-slavery convention at Utica; and as a delegate to the quadrennial general conference he was the leader of the anti-slavery party. He was a frequent writer in the "Methodist Quarterly Review," and, in 1856, editor of the "National Magazine."

FLOYD, JOHN BUCHANAN, secretary of war in President Buchanan's administration, and a prominent secessionist, b. in Virginia, 1805; d. 1863. A lawyer by profession, he sat for a time in the state legislature, and, in 1853, was governor of the state. As secretary of war he was privy to the plans of the leaders of secession, and public opinion charges him with abusing his official powers and opportunities to promote plans for the overthrow of the national government. The wholesale transfer of arms and ammunition from northern to southern arsenals in 1860, and the dispersal of the army in remote localities, are the facts upon which this opinion mainly rests. He resigned his seat in the cabinet when Mr. Buchanan refused to withdraw the United States troops from Charleston harbor. An abstraction of bonds, to a large amount, took place during his term of office, and was made the ground of an indictment against him by the grand jury of the District of Columbia, but he had left Washington, and a trial did not take place. He took a position as brigadier-general in the confederate army, but without achieving a single success.

FOCKEY, M., the only one of the deputies of the Nord to the convention who voted against the execution of Louis XVI. D. at Lille, 1853, aged 95.

FONTAINE, LOUIS, a French architect; d. 1854.

FOOTE, ANDREW HULL, rear-admiral, b. in New Haven, 1806, entered the United States navy as acting midshipman in 1822, and made his first cruise in the squadron which in the following year operated against pirates in the West Indies. In 1838 he accompanied Commodore Read in his voyage of circumnavigation, as first lieutenant of the sloop John Adams, and was engaged in the attack upon the pirates of Sumatra. From 1849 to 1852 he was attached to the African squadron, and as commander of the brig Perry was vigilant in his efforts to suppress the slave-trade. He was promoted to be a commander in 1852, and in 1856 sailed in the sloop Portsmouth for the China station. One of his boats having been fired upon by the forts at Canton, he attacked the largest, and having effected a breach in its walls, carried the work by assault. He then attacked and carried in succession three other forts, all being granite structures, and mounting in the aggregate 176 guns. In 1861 he was commissioned a captain, and appointed flag-officer of the flotilla fitting out against the confederates in the western waters. In Feb. 1862 he attacked, with seven gunboats, fort Henry, on the Tennessee river, and compelled an unconditional surrender. A few days afterwards he attacked fort Donelson, but was obliged to haul off the fleet in consequence of injuries experienced by the Louisville and the flag-ship St. Louis. In this engagement Foote was wounded in the ankle. He nevertheless operated at various points on the Mississippi, and in the siege of Island No. 10. His wound, still unhealed, necessitated temporary absence. On recovering his health he was placed in charge of the bureau of equipment and recruiting, under the new organization of the navy, with the rank of rear-admiral. He d. June 26, 1863, while preparing to relieve Admiral Dupont in command of the South Atlantic blockading squadron.

FORBES, SIR JOHN, a distinguished physician, one of the editors of the London "Cyclopædia of Practical Medicine," and of the "British and Foreign Medical Review," b. 1787; d. 1861. He introduced to English practitioners the discovery of auscultation, having translated Laennec's treatise in 1821, and three years afterward published a work from his own pen on the subject. — EDWARD, professor of natural history in the university of Edinburgh, b. in the Isle of Man, 1815; d. 1854. The British government, in 1841, appointed him naturalist to the Beacon on its surveying expedition to the Mediterranean, and operations conducted while thus engaged gave rise to his theories on the nature and distribution of submarine life in reference to geological changes. He subsequently became professor of botany in King's college, London; then secretary and curator to the geological society; then paleontologist to the government school of mines; finally succeeding Professor Jameson in the chair which he occupied at the period of his death. His lectures and works placed him in the front rank as one of the most philosophic naturalists of the time.

FORD, RICHARD, a distinguished author and connoisseur, was b. in London, 1796, graduated at Oxford, and called to the bar in 1819, though he never practised his profession. After several years spent in foreign travel, and a lengthened sojourn in Spain, he gave himself up to his literary tastes, contributing chiefly to the "Quarterly Review" essays on politics, literature, and art. Though possessed of varied acquirements, Spain and everything connected with it were his favorite subjects; and his "Hand-book of Spain," first published in 1845, has taken its place among the best books of travel, humor, and history in the English language. His "Gatherings in Spain," a kind of popular abridgment of the larger work, was published in 1848, and, like its predecessor, attained great success. D. 1858.

FORREST, ROBERT, a self-taught Scottish sculptor, d. 1853.

FORWARD, WALTER, secretary of the treasury of the United States under President Tyler, and author of an able report which contributed to the enactment of the tariff of 1842, was b. in Connecticut, and removed in 1803 to Pittsburg, Penn., where he studied and practised law for 20 years, when he went into political life, and was sent to congress. He was appointed by President Taylor minister to Denmark. D. 1852.

FOURDRINIER, HENRY, celebrated for the improvements he applied to the manufacture of paper, b. in London, 1766; d. 1855.

FOWLER, RICHARD, a London physician and author, b. 1765; d. 1863. He was in Paris during the first revolution, and was intimate with Mirabeau and other leading actors in the terrible struggle. He returned to England with his attachment to liberal principles undiminished, and remained a friend of progress throughout life. He was an active member of the British association for the advancement of science. His published works include "Experiments and Observations on Animal Electricity," besides a number of essays on "Belief," "Population, and the Causes which promote or obstruct it," the "Influence of Man's Instinct on his Intellectual and Moral Powers," and cognate subjects.

FOX, WILLIAM JOHNSTON, an eloquent speaker, a well-known English reformer, and for several years a representative of Oldham in the house of commons, was b. 1786. His father was a poor Norwich weaver, and the son, who early evinced signs of talent, was sent by the church to a congregational college to be educated for the ministry. After leaving college he entered the ministry, but soon found himself unable to conform even to the non-conformists. For a time he joined the unitarians, but these again he left behind, and took an independent position as lecturer in a chapel in Finsbury, London. Here his eloquence attracted an audience remarkable for its intellectual character, and including many of the most distinguished men in England. While preaching in Finsbury he employed his pen actively on the liberal side of politics, editing the "Monthly Repository," which he established, and contributing to the "Westminster Review," and the newspaper press. The agitation for the repeal of the corn laws called him to the platform as co-laborer with Bright and Cobden. Guizot, in his life of Peel, has honored some of the speeches delivered by Fox with selections, as the most finished examples of oratory which that conflict produced. D. 1863.

FRANCIS, REV. CONVERS, D. D., "Parkman Professor of Pulpit Eloquence and the Pastoral Care" in Harvard college, and author of various discourses, sketches, and memoirs. B. in West Cambridge, Mass., 1796; d. 1863.

FRANKLIN, SIR JOHN, b. in Lincolnshire, England, 1786, entered the British navy in 1800, and served in the action of Trafalgar. He served afterward on various stations, the last of which was the coast of the United States during the war of 1812-15. He commanded the boats of the Bedford in a fight with the American gun-boats at New Orleans, one of which he boarded and captured. He was wounded in the action, and for his gallantry was made a lieutenant. His first voyage to the Arctic ocean was in 1818; his second extended from 1819 to 1822; the third from 1823 to 1827. He then served his government in other capacities, the most notable of which was the governorship of Tasmania, where he continued until 1843. On his return to England he was appointed to the command of another expedition to discover the northwest passage. It consisted of the ships Erebus and Terror, which sailed from the Thames on the 19th of May, 1845, with instructions directing Sir John Franklin to proceed through Lancaster Sound and Barrow's Straits to Cape Walker, and thence, if possible, to Behring's Straits; at the same time, in case of circumstances rendering this course impossible, he had full liberty to try any other passage. The voyage as far as Baffin's Bay was prosperous; and the ships were last seen, with all well on board, moored to an iceberg in the middle of that bay, and about 200 miles from the entrance of Lancaster Sound. This was on the 26th of July of the same year. From that date their fate has been shrouded in darkness, although expeditions were despatched in search of them, as well from the United States as from England. That they perished there is now no reason to doubt, though with regard to the manner or locality in which they encountered death, there is nothing better than surmise. The discovery to which the most importance attaches was made by Dr. Rae in 1854, but that amounts to little more than that in the spring of 1850 a party of about 40 white men were seen by the Esquimaux on King William's Island, and a few months subsequently their bodies were found by the savages near Back's Great Fish River. That these men were a part of Franklin's expedition is considered certain, but according to the tales of the Esquimaux, no man of Franklin's age was amongst them. The conjecture is that he had previously perished.

FRAZER, JAMES BAILLIE, a distinguished traveller and novelist, was b. in Invernesshire in 1783. In 1820 he published "A Tour through the Snowy Range of the Himalaya Mountains"; in 1825, "A Narrative of a Journey into Khorassan, in the years 1821 and 1822, including an Account of the Countries to the Northeast of Persia"; and, in 1826, "Travels and Adventures in the Persian Provinces." In 1828, like his contemporary, Mr. Morier, he described the life and manners of the Persians in a fictitious narrative, "The Kuzzilbash, a Tale of Khorassan." In 1838 appeared his work, "A Winter Journey from Constantinople to Teheran, with Travels through various Parts of Persia." He wrote, also, "A History of Persia," and a Scottish story, "The Highland Smugglers." D. 1856.

FREDERICK VIII., king of Denmark, the son of Christian VIII. and the Princess Charlotte Frederike of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, b. in Copenhagen in 1808, ascended the throne in 1848, and d. at his palace in South Jutland, 1863.

FREDERICK AUGUSTUS, king of Saxony, b. 1797, succeeded his uncle 1836, and was killed by an accident which overturned his carriage, 1854.

FRELINGHUYSEN, THEODORE, b. in Millstown, N. J., 1787; d. 1862. He was attorney-general of his native state from 1818 to 1829, and one of its senators in congress from 1829 to 1835. From 1839 to 1850 he was chancellor of the university of New York; and while filling this position was the candidate of the whig party for vice-president upon the ticket with Henry Clay. In 1850 he was elected president of Rutgers college, where he officiated until his death. He was an earnest and exemplary Christian, and was intimately associated with the various religious and philanthropic movements of his time.

FROST, JOHN, LL. D., author of a "Pictorial History of the United States," and compiler of an almost endless number of school-books, was b. in Kennebunk, Me., 1800, and d. in Philadelphia, 1859.

FRY, WILLIAM HENRY, a musical composer and journalist, b. in Philadelphia about 1814; d. at Santa Cruz, Dec. 1864. His education was completed at a catholic college in Maryland, and at an early age he exhibited the musical talent which afterwards won for him honorable distinction. Four overtures, performed by the philharmonic society of his native city, were his first orchestral compositions; and in 1845 he produced the opera of "Leonora." From 1846 to 1852 he resided in Europe, studying art, and maintaining a brilliant correspondence with the "New York Tribune," with which he remained connected until his death. On his return to this country, in 1852, he delivered a series of lectures on the history of music, introducing symphonies of his own composition. He also composed a "Stabat Mater," which was produced at New York in 1855. His culture, fertility, and enthusiasm were brought into play as a journalist, and rendered him a prominent member of a corps in many respects distinguished. He was an ardent politician, of the school represented by the "Tribune," and more than once made his mark as an orator in election campaigns. For years preceding his death he was the victim of consumption, the ravages of which, however, long failed to abate his intellectual power, or to lessen his interest in the cherished pursuits of his life. — JOSEPH REESE, brother of the preceding, and, like him, an accomplished scholar and enthusiastic student of the literature of music, d. 1865. He was a member of a banking firm, but amidst the pressure of ordinary business found time to translate and adapt Bellini's opera of "Norma," and to produce the libretto of the operas of "Notre Dame" and "Leonora."

FULLER, ARTHUR B., a unitarian clergyman, b. at Cambridgeport, Mass., 1824, joined the 16th regiment Massachusetts volunteers as chaplain early in the war, and was killed while crossing the Rappahannock, Dec. 1862. He was a brother of Margaret Fuller, Countess D'Ossoli, and edited her works.

G.

GADSDEN, JAMES, United States minister to Mexico under President Pierce, and through whose agency the "Gadsden purchase" was effected, was b. in Charleston, 1788, and, after graduating at Yale college, entered public life at an early age. He served in the war of 1812, and with General Jackson in the Seminole war. D. 1858.

GALES, JOSEPH, an eminent journalist, was b. near Sheffield, England, 1786, and came to this country, at the age of seven, with his father, who was a bookseller at Sheffield, and publisher of a newspaper called "The Sheffield Register." Having published in this journal articles too liberal for the tory government of the day, Mr. Gales was compelled to fly to the United States, settling first in Philadelphia and afterwards at Raleigh, N. C. Joseph Gales was educated at the university of North Carolina, and in 1807 settled in Washington. In 1810 he became the sole proprietor of the "National Intelligencer," then a tri-weekly. In 1812 his brother-in-law, William W. Seaton, became his partner, and in 1813 they began to issue the "Intelligencer" daily, and so continued until his death. He occasionally reported the debates in congress before congressional reporting attained to the system upon which it has of late years been conducted. As a writer he was distinguished by great force and clearness, and by a courtesy which won for him the esteem of his political opponents. D. 1860.

GALLAUDET, THOMAS H., was b. at Philadelphia, Pa., 1787. In 1800 the family removed to Hartford, Conn., and he graduated at Yale college in 1805. Soon after leaving college he engaged in the study of law at Hartford. In 1808 he was chosen tutor in Yale college, and he continued in this office until 1810. After this he was for a short time engaged in mercantile business, but in 1811 he devoted himself to the study of theology, and in 1814 he was licensed to preach. His labors were now directed into a new field, and, becoming interested in the subject of instructing deaf mutes, he engaged as a pioneer in this work of benevolence, and to it he devoted a large part of his life. In 1815 he went to Europe, in order to learn the best method of instruction. Having accomplished this object, he returned in August of the year following, and in April, 1817, the asylum for the deaf and dumb was opened in Hartford. This was the first public institution of the kind in this country. In consequence of impaired health, he resigned his place as principal of the asylum in the year 1830, continuing still to be one of its directors, and never ceasing to take an interest in its affairs. After a short respite from his laborious occupations, he employed himself in the preparation of various works designed to aid in the education of the young, and he engaged in numerous undertakings of Christian philanthropy. In June, 1838, he commenced his labors as chaplain of the Connecticut Retreat for the Insane, at Hartford; and he discharged the duties of this office up to his last illness. D. 1851.

GARDNER, WILLIAM, an English writer on music and the fine arts. B. 1764; d. 1854.

GARESCHÉ, JULIUS P., colonel United States service, and chief of Major-General Rosecrans's staff, b. in Cuba, of American parents, 1821; killed while on duty, Dec. 31, 1862.

GARNETT, ROBERT SELDEN, b. in Essex county, Va., 1822, was graduated at West Point, and in 1843-4 was assistant instructor in infantry tactics. He was aide-de-camp to General Wool, and afterward to General Taylor, distinguishing himself in the battles of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma, and being brevetted a captain for gallantry at Monterey, and a major at Buena Vista. Other promotions followed, and in 1856-7-8 he served on the Pacific coast, and in operations against the Indians in Washington territory. On the outbreak of the civil war he resigned his commission, and, having joined the confederates, was appointed by the Richmond authorities adjutant-general of the army of Virginia, and commander of their forces in the western part of that state. His troops were defeated at Rich mountain, and whilst attempting to escape he was killed at Carrick's Ford, July 14, 1861.—RICHARD B., b. in Virginia, and from 1841 to 1861 an officer in the United States army. He resigned at the commencement of the civil war, and joined the confederates with the rank of colonel. He was afterward made brigadier-general, and was killed at Gettysburg, 1863.

GAVIN, HECTOR, a physician and zealous promoter of sanitary reform in England. His best known works are in connection with the inquiries he conducted into the causes of disease in the densely populated towns of the north of England, during the last visitation of cholera. D. at Balaklava, 1855.

GÉRARD, JULES, the hero of the well-known work "Le Tueur de Leons," was drowned in the river Jong, in Africa, December, 1864. He was b. in 1817, and having volunteered for the Algerine campaign in 1841, there entered upon the adventurous life which made him king amongst lion-killers. He rose to the rank of sub-lieutenant in the French army, and received the decoration of the legion of honor.—MAURICE STEPIEN, a French general, who took part in all the great battles of the empire, d. in Paris, 1852, senior marshal of France.

GIBBS, JOSIAH WILLARD, LL. D., professor of sacred literature in the Yale theological seminary, and distinguished as a philologist, b. in Salem, Mass., 1790; d. 1861. Besides contributing to scientific and critical periodicals, he translated Storr's "Historical Sense of the New Testament," and Gesenius's "Hebrew Lexicon of the Old Testament," and published "Philological Studies," "Latin Analyst," and other works.

GIBSON, JOHN B., son of colonel George Gibson, a distinguished officer of the revolutionary war, who fell in a conflict with the Indians in 1791. B. in Carlisle, Pa., 1780, he was admitted to the bar in 1803; was sent twice to the state legislature; in 1812 was appointed judge in northern Pennsylvania; and in 1818 was elevated to the supreme bench. He became chief justice in 1827, and held the office until 1851, when the elective principle was applied to the judiciary. He was then elected to the supreme bench by the democratic party, for nine years, but d. 1853.

GIDDINGS, JOSHUA REED, b. in Bradford county, Penn., 1795; d. in Montreal, 1864. His parents were among the first settlers in the Western Reserve, O., and his education was necessarily very limited. He served for a short time as a soldier in the war of 1812, and in 1817 commenced the study of the law. He was admitted to the bar in 1820, and eight years afterward was elected to congress, which he entered an avowed abolitionist. From the outset he made himself conspicuous by a constant and unyielding opposition to slavery, neglecting no opportunity of presenting his views, and from time to time embodying them in resolutions, which created great excitement. In 1842, having introduced a series of resolutions in reference to the Creole case, he was formally censured by the house, on the motion of Mr. Botts of Virginia. Mr. Giddings resigned his seat, with the view of appealing to his constituents, by whom he was immediately reelected. In 1843 he joined Mr. Adams in an address to the people of the United States against the annexation of Texas, declaring that its consummation "by any act or proceeding of the federal government, or any of its departments, would be identical with dissolution." In party politics he acted with the whigs until 1848, when he refused to support General Taylor, and acted with the free-soil party, with whom he remained allied. He retired from congress in 1859, having served in that body 21 years. President Lincoln appointed him consul-general to Canada, and he occupied that position at the period of his death, which occurred suddenly while playing at billiards. In 1843 he published a series of political essays, and in 1858, "The Exiles of Florida."

GILBERT, JAMES WILLIAM, an eminent authority on banking, b. in London in 1794, was for several years clerk in London and provincial banks. About 1828 he became manager of a branch of the Provincial bank of Ireland, from which position he withdrew to assume the management of the London and Westminster bank, a joint-stock institution, which, under his direction, rose to great prosperity and influence. He published "A Practical Treatise on Banking," "The History and Principles of Banking," "Banking and the Currency,"

"The Logic of Banking," and a "History of Banking in America." D. 1863.

GILBERT, SIR WALTER RALEIGH, a British general, served for 50 years in the Indian army, passed through much service, and fixed public attention on himself as a first-rate commander on the Sutlej, Punjab. D. 1853, aged 63.

GILLIS, JAMES, captain United States navy, superintendent of the Washington observatory, eminent as an astronomer, and as the author of a notable development of scientific instrumental art in the United States. In 1838 he organized the first working observatory in this country, and in 1842 planned a naval observatory, the construction of which under his superintendence was completed in 1845. Four years afterward he proceeded to Chili on a scientific mission; remaining there three years, and making a series of astronomical observations now being published by the United States government. In 1858 and 1860 he visited Peru and Washington territory, respectively, to report the total eclipses which occurred in those years. In 1861, when lieutenant-Maury joined the confederates, Captain Gillis was placed in charge of the observatory at Washington, where his attainments and industry heightened his reputation. He d. suddenly, 1865.

GILMAN, REV. SAMUEL, D. D., pastor of the unitarian church in Charleston, S. C., b. in Gloucester, Mass., 1791; d. 1858. He contributed largely to periodicals on a wide range of subjects, from profound discussions to sparkling essays, some of which have been republished under the title, "Contributions to American Literature."

GILPIN, HENRY D., an eminent lawyer, and in 1840 attorney-general of the United States, was b. in 1801. He compiled "Opinions of the Attorneys-General," and published a volume of reports, besides engaging in other literary labors, as essayist, biographer, and translator. D. 1860.

GIOBERTI, VINCENZO, an Italian patriot, statesman, and writer, was b. at Turin in 1801. In 1825 he was ordained priest, and soon afterwards was appointed court chaplain at Turin. Banished in 1833, without any formal process, on account of his liberal tendencies, the remaining 19 or 20 years of his life were spent chiefly in exile. After remaining a few years in France, he began to teach philosophy in a private seminary at Brussels. His first writings were philosophical, viz., "La Teoria del Sovrannaturale," published in 1837; the "Introduzione allo Studio di Filosofia," in 1840, following out the subject of the former treatise, and combating the principles of Kant and Victor Cousin in favor of the old catholicism of St. Thomas Aquinas and St. Buonaventura; three volumes more in 1842, entitled "Errori Filosofici di Antonio Rasmini"; and then the treatise "Del Bello e del Buono," on the principles, respectively, of taste and morals. In 1843 appeared the most celebrated of his works, "Primato," in which the moral and civil preëminence of Italy over all the nations of the earth is set forth; and the success of which was exemplified in the Italian frenzy for the reforms of Pius IX. and the enthusiasm that led to the revolution of 1848. In that year Gioberti was recalled to his native country amid popular acclamation. On the proclamation of the Sardinian constitution he was elected deputy for Turin, took an active part in all the great political questions then agitating Europe, and finally became prime minister of Sardinia. But his hopes for Italy were soon blighted. In 1849 he returned into voluntary exile, and spent his last years in Paris in writing his "Rinnovamento Civile,"—the final manifesto of the great statesman and philosopher. He d. 1852, and his remains received an honored interment in his native city.

GIRARDIN, MADAME DE, formerly Mdle. Delphine Gay, celebrated among the literati of France for her poems and other popular works, b. 1803; d. 1855. She was the wife of Emile de Girardin, and frequently wrote for the "Presse."

GLADDEN, ADLEY H., a confederate brigadier-general, b. in South Carolina, was mortally wounded at the battle of Shiloh, April 6, 1862, and d. soon afterward. He served with distinction as major of the Palmetto regiment of South Carolina volunteers in the Mexican war.

GLIDDON, GEORGE R., b. in England, succeeded his father as American consul in Egypt, and while there explored the archaeological remains of the country with a diligence that enabled him to make valuable contributions to learning, both by lectures and writings. An essay on the production of cotton in the Valley of the Nile, directed attention to the fitness of that region for a product which has since been cultivated there with advantage. The most notable of his works, however, was one entitled "Types of Mankind," prepared in conjunction with Dr. Nott, of Mobile, in which the doctrine of the unity of the human race is combated with ingenuity and force.

He was subsequently connected with the Honduras inter-oceanic railroad company, and d. in Panama, 1857.

GOODRICH, CHAUNCEY ALLEN, editor of "Select British Eloquence," and compiler of Greek and Latin educational works, was b. in New Haven, Conn., in 1790. He was a professor in Yale college during the greater part of his life, and a lexicographer of recognized ability. In 1847 his revised edition of "Webster's Dictionary" appeared; and in 1859 he published a supplement, enriched with a copious collection of synonyms. D. 1860. — SAMUEL GRISWOLD, universally known as "Peter Parley," was b. in Ridgefield, Conn., 1793. In 1824 he established himself in business in Hartford, Conn., but soon removed to Boston. From 1828 to 1842 he edited "The Token." From 1827 to 1857 he published tales under the name of "Peter Parley." He was the author of many volumes and historical and geographical school-books. In 1838 he published a volume of poems, and another in 1851. In 1857 he published his "Recollections of a Lifetime; or, Men and Things that I have seen;" in which he says of himself, "I stand before the public as the author and editor of about 170 volumes, of which 116 bear the name of 'Peter Parley.' Of these about 7,000,000 of volumes have been sold, and now (1857) about 300,000 are sold annually." He was at one time a member of the senate of Massachusetts, and was consul at Paris during Mr. Fillmore's administration. D. 1860. — REV. CHARLES A., a congregational minister, author of a "Bible History of Prayer," "Great Events of American History," "Universal Traveller," and other works, b. 1790; d. 1862. He was a brother of S. G. Goodrich, and was associated with him in the preparation of part of the "Peter Parley" series.

GOODYEAR, CHARLES, the inventor of the art of vulcanizing India-rubber, b. in New Haven, Conn, 1800; d. 1860.

GORE, MRS. CATHERINE FRANCES, a writer of fiction, b. in London, 1800; d. in 1861. She succeeded in depicting scenes from daily life, as in her "Women as They are," "Mothers and Daughters," and many similar works. In "Hungarian Tales" she portrayed the habits and customs of Hungary. As a gentle satirist, her "Cecil," "The Woman of the World," and "The Sketch-Book of Fashion," may be named. In 1823 she was married to an officer of the life guards, and became a widow in 1846.

For some time previous to her death, Mrs. Gore was deprived of sight.

GORTSCHAKOFF, Prince MICHAEL, a Russian general, b. in 1795, came into notice as an officer of artillery in the war between Russia and Turkey in 1828-1829. In the subsequent campaign against Poland he commanded the artillery, and had 70 guns under his orders in the battle of Ostrolenka. In 1846 he was named military governor of Warsaw; and in 1852 he visited London to represent the Russian army at the funeral of the Duke of Wellington. In the following year he was appointed to command the army for the occupation of the Danubian principalities, which gave occasion to the Crimean war. In that war he distinguished himself not more on the field than in the defence of Sebastopol. He was subsequently appointed governor of Poland; and in this office he died at Warsaw, 1861.

GOULBURN, HENRY, many years a member of the British parliament, and chancellor of the exchequer under the Duke of Wellington, and subsequently under Sir Robert Peel. B. 1789; d. 1856.

GOURGAUD, BARON, a French general, engaged at Waterloo and other great battles of Napoleon, and who attended the ex-emperor to St. Helena. B. 1783; d. 1852.

GRAHAM, SIR JAMES ROBERT GEORGE, an English statesman, with great administrative talents, b. 1792. He entered public life an ultra-liberal, and soon made himself felt by his powers of sarcasm, and his industry as a pamphleteer. In 1834 he left the reform party, and joined the Tories in the battle respecting the established church in Ireland; in more recent years adhering to Sir Robert Peel's free-trade measure, but retiring from office on the defeat of the Irish coercion bill. His official career was disgraced by an abuse of power as postmaster-general. The tragic fate of the brothers Bandiera induced Mazzini to suspect that his letters had been opened in the London post-office, and their secrets betrayed. By an adroit stratagem, suspicion was converted into conviction; and the odium of espionage was fixed upon Sir James Graham. D. 1861.

GRATTAN, THOMAS COLLEY, a popular novelist, was b. in Dublin, 1796. Distantly connected with the Irish orator, Henry Grattan, he was set apart for the legal profession, but he abandoned the law in search of military glory. He never saw military service, however, and, having married, settled in the south of France as an author, producing "Highways and Bye Ways," and romances and tales in rapid succession. In 1839 he was appointed British consul at Boston, where he remained until 1853. A pamphlet from his pen in support of the British pretensions on the northeastern boundary question attracted attention. D. 1864.

GRAUL, CARL, a German scholar, author of "Travels in the East," and translator of oriental poems. He was professor of missionary knowledge at Erlangen, where he d., 1864.

GRAY, FRANCIS CALLEY, an early and frequent contributor to the "North American Review," and author of a pamphlet entitled "Prison Discipline in America," being a strong argument and appeal against the system of solitary imprisonment. B. in Salem, Mass., 1790, he was the son of a well-known merchant, William Gray; and having inherited ample wealth, he devoted his acquirements and leisure to various literary and scientific societies. He represented Boston in the state legislature, was six years state senator, and, in 1839, a member of the executive council. D. 1856.

GRAYSON, JOHN BRECKINRIDGE, b. in Kentucky, 1807, was graduated at West Point in 1826, and thenceforward served in the army of the United States until July 1, 1861, when he resigned, and was appointed a brigadier-general in the confederate army. He was chief of commissariat to the army of Gen. Scott in Mexico, and received brevet promotions for gallantry at Contreras, Churubusco, and Chapultepec. D. 1862.

GREEN, THOMAS J., a general in the confederate army, b. 1801; d. in North Carolina, 1863. He took a leading part in the Texan war of independence, was a member of the Texan congress, and the leader and historian of the Mier expedition. During a residence in California he was elected a state senator, and was major-general of the militia. — JOSEPH HENRY, an English surgeon, the associate of Sir Astley Cooper in the lectureship on anatomy and physiology at St. Thomas's hospital, and the successor of Sir Benjamin Brodie as a member of the court of examiners. He published lectures entitled, respectively, "Vital Dynamics" and "Mental Dynamics." B. 1791; d. 1863.

GREENLEAF, SIMON, LL. D., was b. in Newburyport, Mass., 1783. His father was a captain in the revolutionary army, and on his mother's side he was connected with the family of the late Chief Justice Parsons. While he was yet quite young, his father removed to Maine, and when he was eighteen years old he entered, as a law student, the office of Ezekiel Whitman, of New Gloucester, where he remained three years. In 1806 he married, and began the practice of the law in Standish, Me., whence, after a residence of six months, he removed to Gray, where he remained twelve years. In 1818 he removed to Portland. In 1820, upon Maine's becoming a state, and the establishment of the supreme court, he was appointed reporter of its decisions. He held that office until 1832, when he was superseded by a political opponent. He remained in Portland one year afterwards, and in 1833, upon the death of Professor Ashmun, he was appointed Royall professor of law in the Dane law school, which office he held until 1846, when he was transferred to the Dane professorship, then vacant by the death of Judge Story. He held this professorship but two years, when, in 1848, his failing strength becoming unequal to its labors, he resigned the place. Before removing to Cambridge, Mr. Greenleaf was an author of law books. Besides his Reports, nine volumes in number, he published, in 1821, a volume of Overruled Cases; in 1842, the first volume of his work on Evidence; in 1846, the second volume, and in 1853, the third and concluding volume. In 1846 he published an annotated edition of Cruise's Digest of Real Law. He also published "An Examination of the Testimony of the Four Evangelists by the Rules of Evidence administered in the Courts of Justice, with an Account of the Trial of Jesus"; and other works. He was once elected to the Maine legislature, but there devoted himself chiefly to amendments of the statute law of the state. D. 1855.

GREENOUGH, GEORGE BELLAS, the first president of the geological society of London, b. 1777; d. 1854. The inheritor of an ample fortune, he employed his time, money, and talents to promote the study of geology and physical geography. — HORATIO, an American sculptor, b. in Boston in 1805, graduated at Harvard college in 1825, and soon after left for Italy. He rapidly rose to eminence by the excellence of his portrait busts, his group of sleeping cherubs, executed for Cooper the novelist in 1829, his "Medora," the angel "Abdiel," and other ideal works. In 1833 he commenced his colossal Washington, which occupied him for 10 years. He returned home in 1851, and d. at Boston in 1853.

GREGG, JOHN, confederate brigadier-general, b. in Alabama, 1828; killed in battle in Virginia, Oct. 1864.

GREGORY, WILLIAM, DR., an accomplished chemist, the author of several treatises, and professor of chemistry in the university of Edinburgh, d. 1858.

GRIFFIN, GEORGE, an eminent member of the New York bar, and author of two theological works, "The Sufferings of our Saviour," and "The Evidence of Christianity." B. 1778; d. 1860.

GRIMALDI, STACEY, author of "Origines Genealogicæ," and other antiquarian works, and an English barrister of some distinction. B. 1791; d. 1863.

GRIMKE, FREDERICK, author of "Considerations upon the Nature and Tendency of Free Institutions," b. at Charleston, S. C., 1791; d. in Chilli-cothe, O., 1863. He filled positions upon the Ohio bench: first as presiding judge of a circuit court of common pleas; afterwards as judge of the supreme court.

GRIMM, JACOB LUDWIG, historiographer, the elder of the "Brothers Grimm," whose names are associated with the popular literature of Germany, was b. at Hanau, 1785. After studying for some time for the legal profession, he turned his attention to literary pursuits, and eventually became librarian at Wilhelmshohe in Westphalia. His next appointment was at Cassel, whence he went to Göttingen, where he was elected one of the professors of the university. On account of his protest against the abrogation of the fundamental law in Hanover, upon the accession of the late king, he was deprived of his office and banished from the kingdom. He returned to Cassel, and in 1841 went to Berlin, where he became active as a member of the academy of sciences, and in connection with the university. Here he published many works relating to the history and archæology of Germany, with others relating to the characteristics of his countrymen. Of his philosophical investigations it may be said that they were directed to setting forth the intellectual life of the German people, as manifested in their language, their mediæval laws and beliefs, their customs and poetry, both in themselves and in their relations to other nations. He also edited a collection of Spanish romances, and a number of the productions of the middle ages. D. 1863.—LUDWIG EMIL, a brother of the preceding, professor of painting in the academy at Cassel, and an engraver of great merit; b. 1790; d. 1863.

GRISWOLD, RUFUS WILMOT, an American author and editor, was originally a printer, but became a preacher in the baptist church. Literature, however, attracted him from the pulpit, and he was associated with the editorship of literary periodicals in Boston, New York, and Philadelphia. He edited several separate works, the principal of which are, "Poets and Poetry of America," "Prose Writers of America," "Female Poets of America," "Sacred Poets of England and America," and "The Poets and Poetry of England in the Nineteenth Century." He also published "Curiosities of American Literature," as an appendix to Disraeli's great work, and "The Republican Court; or, American Society in the Days of Washington." He was b. in Rutland county, Vt., 1815; and d. in New York, 1857.

GROTEFEND, DR. GEORGE FREDERICK, distinguished as an antiquary and a scholar, was a native of Hanover, and d. there in 1853. He was the author of many profound treatises on various branches of philology; but his chief title to fame rests on his being the first to decipher the Persepolitan cuneiform inscriptions, which have proved so fertile in their results in the hands of Botta, Hincks, Layard, Rawlinson, and other eminent scholars.

GRUND, FRANCIS J., a well-known contributor to the American press, b. in Germany about 1803; d. in New York, 1863. He was an excellent linguist, writing English as though it were his native tongue, and corresponding with French and German journals as well as with leading papers of Baltimore, New Orleans, and other cities. He adhered to the democratic party, and received a foreign appointment from President Buchanan. On his return to this country, he edited the Philadelphia "Age." He was the author of a work on "The Americans; their Moral, Social, and Political Relations," published in 1837.

GUEST, SIR JOHN, one of the largest ironmasters in the world, who, by his own skill and industry, raised to the greatest prosperity a most important branch of British trade, and accumulated a colossal fortune. D. 1852.

GUNNISON, Captain J. W., corps of topographical engineers, United States army, was massacred by a party of Utah Indians on the Sevier river, 1853. Captain Gunnison graduated with distinguished honor at West Point in 1837, and was assigned, as a second lieutenant, to the second regiment of artillery. Upon the organization of the corps of topographical engineers in 1838, he was transferred to that corps and continued a member of it until his death. He bore an honorable part in the Seminole war, was engaged for some time in improving the inland navigation along the coast of Florida, and for about ten years was employed in the survey of the northwestern lakes and the improvement of the harbors. In the years 1849 and 1850 he was associated with Captain Stansbury, of the corps of topographical engineers, in the survey of the great Salt Lake region, and made an able report thereon. When in charge of one of the surveys authorized by congress, for the determination of the best railroad route across to the Pacific, he met with his untimely fate.

GURNEY, REV. JOHN HAMPDEN, son of Sir John Garney, b. 1802; d. 1862. He was a clergyman of the church of England, and the author of psalm and hymn books, besides an endless catalogue of published sermons and lectures.

GUTZLAFF, DR. CHARLES, a well-known Chinese scholar, traveller, and missionary, was b. in Stettin, Prussia, 1803. In early life he was remarkable for an ardent love of learning, joined to an adventurous spirit; and having resolved to devote himself to missionary labor in foreign parts, he volunteered to go to the Dutch settlements in the East, under the auspices of the Netherlands missionary society. Before proceeding thither he went to England, where he became acquainted with many friends of missions, and especially with Dr. Morrison, then on a visit to that country after a long residence in China. This meeting with Dr. Morrison gave Gutzlaff a strong bias toward China as his ultimate field of labor. In 1823 he proceeded to Singapore, and such was his aptitude for languages, that, before he had been there two years, he was able to converse fluently in five eastern languages, and to read and write as many more. In August, 1828, in company with Mr. Tomlin, an English missionary, Dr. Gutzlaff set out to visit the kingdom of Siam. They remained for six months at Bangkok. Early in 1830 he returned alone to Siam, and in the spring of the following year made his first voyage to China. At Bangkok he became naturalized as a subject of the celestial empire, by adoption into a particular clan or family. Having assumed a Chinese name, and wearing the Chinese dress, and conforming to their customs, he visited, along with the crew of the junk in which he sailed, a large tract of the coast without any molestation. After a six months' voyage he reached Macao safely in Dec. 1831, when he had the satisfaction of being welcomed by his friend Dr. Morrison. In February of the following year he was appointed surgeon and interpreter to an expedition that was sent out by the East India company to survey the coasts and obtain information as to the ports where commerce might be established. They returned to Macao early in September. In little more than a month he started on a third voyage, as far as Teensin and Mantchou Tartary. Of these three voyages he published, in 1834, "A Journal of Three Voyages along the Coast of China, in 1831, 1832, and 1833," containing much information, and full of the author's personal adventures. He afterwards published two other works, "A History of China," and "China Opened," the last of which contains the most comprehensive and correct account yet given in English popular literature of the topography, history, customs, laws, and literature of the celestial empire. In 1834 he was appointed interpreter to the British superintendency, and subsequently secretary to the plenipotentiary, secretary to the government of Hong Kong, and superintendent of trade in China, which offices he held at the time of his death. In 1849 he revisited Europe, but returned to his post at Victoria in the following year, and was actively engaged there until a fortnight before his death, which took place in 1851.

GUYON, General, Khurchid Pasha, a daring and skilful military officer. When scarcely 16 he joined the British legion in Portugal. After its disbandment he entered the Austrian army and served several years in an Hussar regiment, when he married, and quitted the service. When the Hungarian war broke out he was appointed by the Hungarian ministry to the command of a battalion, and distinguished himself by a succession of the most brilliant exploits. At the end of the war he was taken into the Turkish army as lieutenant-general, with the rank of pasha, but refused to change his religion. D. at Constantinople in 1856, as it was supposed by poison, the victim of female jealousy.

GWILT, JOSEPH, an eminent practical architect, and the author and editor of many works relating to his profession. He was b. in London 1784, and d. 1863. His principal publications are, "Rudiments of Architecture," and an "Encyclopædia of Architecture;" and his editorial labors included notes to Sir W.

Chambers's "Treatise on the Decorative part of Civil Architecture," and Peter Nicholson's "Principles of Architecture."

GWIN, WILLIAM, commander United States navy, b. in Columbus, Ind., 1831, entered the service, as a midshipman, in 1847. When the war broke out, in 1861, he was on duty as lieutenant in the Mediterranean squadron, but was ordered home, and assigned to the Cambridge on blockading duty on the Atlantic coast. In Jan. 1862, he was placed in command of the gun-boat Tyler, of the Western flotilla, and took part in the battles of Fort Henry, Fort Donelson and Shiloh. In July, 1862, he was made a lieutenant-commander. He added to his already brilliant reputation in the expedition up the Yazoo river, to meet the confederate ram Arkansas; and was mortally wounded in the attack of the Benton upon Haines's Bluff, Jan. 3, 1863.

H.

HACKLEMAN, PLEASANT A., b. in Indiana; on the outbreak of the civil war entered the United States service as colonel of the 16th Indiana volunteers, with whom he served in Virginia and Maryland, until the expiration of their twelve months' term. He was then appointed a brigadier-general of volunteers, and assigned to the command of Gen. Grant in the southwest. Killed at the battle of Corinth, Oct. 4, 1862.

HALDANE, JAMES ALEXANDER, b. at Dundee, 1768, distinguished himself by the devotion with which he applied himself to plans of Christian usefulness. Retiring from the naval profession with a moderate fortune, he became a zealous evangelical laborer, at first occupying himself with itinerant preaching in the villages around Edinburgh, and afterwards making successive tours throughout Scotland, opening Sunday schools, and with the aid of his brother, Robert Haldane, multiplying places of worship. Eventually he accepted the office of pastor in the tabernacle, Edinburgh; and in that capacity he exercised, without any emolument, all the public and private duties of a minister with unbroken fidelity and zeal for a period of 50 years. D. 1851.

HALE, BENJAMIN, D. D., author of "Scriptural Illustrations of the Liturgy," and other works, b. in Newburyport, Mass., 1797; d. 1863. — JAMES T., a lawyer and politician, judge in the 20th judicial district of Pennsylvania, and representative in congress from that state from 1859 to his death. B. 1810; d. 1863. — NATHAN, editor of the "Boston Advertiser," and one of the originators of the "North American Review," and the "Christian Examiner," b. in West Hampton, Mass., 1784; d. 1863. He served in the state legislature, and in two constitutional conventions; and was the first president of the Boston and Worcester railroad.

HALEVY, JACQUES ELIE FROMENTAL, a popular musical composer, b. in Paris, 1800; d. at Nice, 1862. He was the favorite pupil of Cherubini, was sent to Rome by the French academy to complete his professional studies, and in 1854 was elected perpetual secretary of the French academy of fine arts. He composed many operas, some of which were brought out with success in every capital of Europe.

HALL, BAYNARD, D. D., b. in Philadelphia, 1798, passed through his theological studies at the Princeton seminary, and for many years was active and influential as a preacher and in the work of education. He wrote largely and well, and d. in Brooklyn, 1863. — MARSHALL, M. D., an English physician, and the author of works on, as well of as important discoveries in, the practice of medicine, b. 1791. He visited the United States in 1853-4, as a lecturer. His last effort in the cause of science was the discovery of the method of restoring asphyxiated persons. D. 1858.

HALLAM, HENRY, one of the most distinguished modern authors, was b. in 1778. He was one of the earliest contributors to the "Edinburgh Review;" but the vast extent of his learning and research was unknown till 1818, when he published his "View of the State of Europe during the Middle Ages." In 1828 he published "The Constitutional History of England," which may in some respects be considered a sequel to the preceding, and which Lord Macaulay has pronounced to be "the most impartial book" that was ever written; and in 1837 and 1839 he gave to the world his "Introduction to the Literature of Europe in the Fifteenth, Sixteenth, and Seventeenth Centuries," which confirmed the substantial reputation he had already gained both in Europe and America. The last years of Mr. Hallam's life were spent in superintending various new editions of his works as they were called for by the public. D. 1859.

HALLETT, BENJAMIN F., b. at Barnstable, Mass., 1798, graduated at Brown university in 1816, and was admitted to the practice of the law. His energies and talents were, however, directed to politics, and for many years he was one of the most prominent and influential partisans in the state,—first as a member of the anti-masonic party, afterwards of the democratic party. He was the author of the Cincinnati platform of 1856. D. 1862.

HAMEL, DR. JOSEPH, a learned Russian, b. 1788; d. in London, 1862. He wrote a history of the steam-engine and of the electric telegraph, and was a member of the imperial academy of sciences, St. Petersburg.

HAMILTON, SIR WILLIAM, bart, professor of logic and metaphysics in the university of Edinburgh, b. 1788. He was called to the Scottish bar in 1813. In 1821 he was appointed professor of history in the university of Edinburgh, and in 1836, professor of logic and metaphysics. In 1852 he published a volume of essays under the title of "Discussions in Philosophy, Literature, Education, and University Reform." He was engaged some years upon an edition of Dugald Stewart's works, the first volume of which appeared in 1854. D. 1856.—

JAMES, b. in South Carolina, 1792, served with honor in the war of 1812; then applied himself to the practice of the law in Charleston; then sat in the state legislature; and from 1822 to 1829 was a representative in congress, where he was the staunch champion of free trade and of the South Carolina interpretation of southern rights. On the passage of the tariff bill of 1828, he urged upon his state an armed resistance thereto. In 1828 he was elected governor, and in that capacity recommended to the legislature the passing of the nullification act, by which the state was placed at issue with the federal government. His successor, Governor Hayne, appointed him commander-in-chief of the troops raised for the defence of the state. He afterwards took an active interest in the affairs of Texas, was her representative to England and France, and her advocate when the question of admission into the union came up for action. He lost his life by a collision between the steamboats Galveston and Opelousas, near the coast of Texas, Oct. 15, 1857.

HAMMER-PURGSTALL, JOSEPH, baron von, b. at Gärtz, in Styria, 1774; d. 1856. In 1796 he became private secretary to the Baron de Jenisch, then attached to the Austrian foreign office. In 1799 he was sent as dragoman to Constantinople, whence he was transferred to Egypt, and employed as interpreter to the English army in Sir Ralph Abercrombie's campaign, and was subsequently Austrian consul in Moldavia. His whole life was devoted to Oriental literature, and besides contributing papers, philological and historical, to many literary journals, he published numerous independent works, of which his "History of the Assassins" and "History of the Ottoman Empire" may be considered the chief.

HAMMOND, JABEZ D., lawyer, legislator, and author, d. in Cherry Valley, N. Y., 1855. He served in congress, 1815-1817; and in the state senate until 1821. In 1838 he was county judge; and in 1845 succeeded Mr. Van Buren as a regent of the university of New York. He was the author of the "Life and Times of Silas Wright," the "Political History of New York," and several other works.—JAMES H., b. in South Carolina, 1807, adopted the profession of law, edited the "Southern Times," and from 1835 to 1837 was a representative in congress. In 1842 he was elected governor of South Carolina, and on the expiration of his term of office retired to his plantation on the Savannah river, where for several years he devoted himself to literary and agricultural pursuits. In 1857 he was elected to the United States senate, but resigned after the passage of the ordinance of secession by his state in Dec. 1860. D. 1864.

HARCOURT, OCTAVIUS VERNON, a British admiral, b. 1793; d. 1863. He entered the navy in 1806, and was engaged in active service about 30 years.

HARDING, GEORGE PERFECT, an artist, famous for his copies of historical subjects. D. 1854.—DUFFIELD J., an eminent English painter in water-colors, b. 1798; d. 1863.

HARDINGE, SIR HENRY, a British general, b. 1785, entered the army at an early age, and served with great distinction in the peninsular war. At the battle of Ligny he lost his left hand. In 1826 he entered parliament, and was soon after made secretary of war, to which post, after serving from 1830 as secretary of Ireland, he returned, and held it till appointed governor-general of India in 1844. In 1852 he succeeded Wellington as commander-in-chief, and in 1855 was advanced to the rank of field marshal. D. 1856.

HARE, CHARLES JULIUS, a clergyman of the church of England, whose tenderness, courage, philosophy, and piety, rendered him one of the most notable and most eminently useful men of his time. A powerful and eloquent preacher, fearless in the discussion of public questions, the charges delivered to his clergy as archdeacon of Lewes uniformly attracted great attention. As an author, few of his contemporaries equalled him in the extent, variety, and accuracy of his knowledge,—in his acquaintance with every form of opinion that prevailed throughout Europe, and especially with the researches and speculations of the great German writers in philosophy, theology, history, and general literature. His earliest appearances as an author were in his translation of the German romances and tales of Foiquè and Tieck. And, in conjunction with Thirlwall, bishop of St. David's, he had the merit of introducing the English-speaking public to an acquaintance with the labors of Niebuhr in the field of ancient Roman history. Minutely familiar with German speculation in the department of theology, perhaps no person has exercised a greater influence than Archdeacon Hare in stimulating the ardor with which the works of the great German critics are now read and studied in a language other than that in which they wrote. A man of independent thought, he was noted for several eccentricities, one of which was his adoption, on principle, of a strange, but, as he thought, right etymology of the English. Thus, he wrote preacht for preached, and publisht for published, and adhered to this mode of spelling in all matters, grave or gay, secular or sacred. B. 1795; d. 1855. — ROBERT, a distinguished chemist, the inventor of the compound blowpipe, the author of several brilliant discoveries, especially in electro-galvanism, and in later life a disciple of spiritualism; b. 1781; d. in Philadelphia, 1858.

HARLEY, JOHN PRITT, a comedian of high rank, who made his first appearance on the English stage in 1815. B. 1790; d. 1858.

HARRIS, JOHN, D. D., principal of New College, London, and author of "Mammon," "The Great Teacher," and other religious works. B. 1802; d. 1856.

— THADDEUS WILLIAM, M. D., b. in Dorchester, Mass., 1795, was the son of Rev. Dr. Harris, and a naturalist of high repute. In 1831 he was chosen librarian of Harvard college, and held the office until his death, in 1856. He was a learned botanist, but it was as an entomologist that he acquired distinction amongst naturalists. His "Treatise on some of the Insects of New England which are injurious to Vegetation," is recognized as a permanent contribution to science. He was, moreover, an antiquarian, though known only by the fruits of occasional investigations. D. 1856.

— THOMAS L., b. in Norwich, Conn., 1816; d. at Springfield, Ill., 1858. Having studied law, and been admitted to practise in the eastern states, he removed to Illinois in 1842. At the commencement of the war with Mexico, he raised and commanded a company, and joined the fourth regiment of Illinois volunteers. He was afterwards elected major of the regiment, and, owing to the sickness of his superior officers, was chief in command during most of the campaign. He was at the taking of Vera Cruz, and served in the navy battery with a detachment during the day of its terrible fire; was also at Cerro Gordo, and after the wounding of General Shields took command of the regiment, and was honorably mentioned in government despatches, for placing a twenty-four pounder battering cannon on the heights of Cerro Gordo during the night preceding the battle. While absent in the army, in 1846, he was elected a senator in the Illinois legislature, and in 1848 was chosen a representative in congress, serving through the thirty-first, and being reelected to the thirty-fifth congress.

HART, JOSEPH C. author of "Marian Coffin," and other works, and American consul at Santa Cruz, Canary Islands; d. there, 1855.

HARVEY, LOUIS P., governor of Wisconsin, b. at East Haddam, Conn., 1820; was drowned while en route with supplies for the wounded after the battle of Shiloh, 1862. He removed to Wisconsin in 1840; was a teacher, and afterward an editor at Kenosha; served in the state senate from 1855 to 1857; was elected secretary of state, and, in 1861, governor. — SIR JOHN, a British officer, lieutenant-governor of Nova Scotia, d. 1852.

HAVELOCK, SIR HENRY, major-general in the British army, rendered eminent by his services in the field in India, was b. at Bishopwearmouth in 1795, and received his first appointment a month after the battle of Waterloo. He embarked for India in 1823, and in the following year served in the first Burmese war. In 1838, having been a subaltern 23 years, he was promoted to a company, and soon afterward accompanied the army collected for the invasion of Afghanistan, on the staff of Sir Willoughby Cotton. He was subsequently placed on the staff of General Elphinstone in the Punjab, as Persian interpreter. When Cabul was blockaded by the eastern Ghilzies, Havelock joined Sir R. Sale, was present at the forcing of the Khoord Cabul Pass, and commanded the column by whom Mahomet Akbar was compelled to raise the siege of Jellalabad. In 1843, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, he entered into the Sikh war, and at the close of the Sutlej campaign was made deputy adjutant-general. In 1857 he was sent to the Allahabad as brigadier-general, and defeated the Mahratta leader, Nena Sahib, for which he was rewarded with a major-generalship. Havelock d. 1857, leaving the reputation of an earnest Christian as well as that of a valorous soldier.

HAVILAND, JOHN, an eminent architect. He was b. in England in 1792, studied with Elmes, and commenced his career in Russia. Preferring liberty to royal patronage, he came to this country warmly recommended by John Quincy Adams, then minister at St. Petersburg. He constructed, from his own designs, many public works in this country. He paid particular attention to the construction of jails and prisons, especially those on the separate system. D. in Washington, D. C., 1852.

HAWKER, PETER, lieutenant-colonel in the British army, but more particularly eminent in the sporting world, d. 1853. He made many valuable improvements in fire-arms, and was the author of "Instructions to Young Sportsmen in all that relates to Guns and Shooting."

HAWTHORNE, NATHANIEL, a popular American author, b. at Salem, Mass., 1804. He was left fatherless at an early age, and his education suffered from feeble health. His studies were completed at Bowdoin college, where he graduated in 1825. The chronic grief which the death of her husband inflicted upon his mother seems to have tinged his own youthful character, and to have rendered him prone to seclusion for some time after he had reached manhood. His first literary production was a romance, published anonymously at Boston in 1832, and followed in 1837 by his "Twice-Told Tales," of which he gave a second series in 1842. These had already appeared in serial publications, and the reception accorded to their reissue was hardly worthy of his subsequent fame. Mr. Longfellow, however, praised them in the "North American Review"; and another critic of not less celebrity characterized them as "full of glancing wit, of tender satire, of exquisite natural description, of subtle and strange analysis of human life, darkly passionate and weird." In 1838 he was appointed a weigher and gauger in the Boston custom-house; but being an adherent of the democratic party, he was removed, on the advent of President Harrison's administration, in 1841. He next joined the Brook Farm community, at West Roxbury, Mass., where, with its other inmates, he appears to have experienced sufficient disappointment to reconcile him to the old ways of the outside world. In 1843, having married, he went to reside in the village of Concord, and tenanted the Old Manse, from whose windows the minister of the parish observed the conflict between his friends and the British troops on the 19th April, 1775. Here he passed three years, and of his personal history at this time he has given some delightful glimpses in the introduction to "Mosses from an old Manse," a collection of tales and sketches. In 1846 he was appointed surveyor of the port of Salem by President Polk, and the historical associations of the quiet and venerable place furnished materials for the most graphic and satirical efforts of his pen. His ancient opponents, the whigs, regained supremacy in 1849, and Mr. Hawthorne again passed into retirement, this time, however, seeking a residence amidst the hills of Berkshire. In 1850 he published "The Scarlet Letter," a romance of deep interest, written with extraordinary power. His "House of the Seven Gables" appeared in 1851; and in the following year "The Blithedale Romance," wherein he reproduces his experiences of his old and affectionately remembered home at Brook Farm. About the same time he removed to Concord, the residence of his friend, Franklin Pierce, then the democratic candidate for the presidency. Mr. Hawthorne so far entered into the campaign as to publish a life of Mr. Pierce, who rewarded his biographer with the office of consul at Liverpool, which he held until 1857. In a work entitled "Our Old Home," he describes his impressions of England and her people. After travelling on the continent of Europe, he returned to the United States, and d. at Plymouth, N. H., in May, 1864. Besides the works already named he published "True Stories from History and Biography," and other minor productions.

HAWTREY, EDWARD CRAVEN, provost of Eton college, England, an accomplished scholar, and remarkable as a translator. His "Il Trifoglio" contains translations of poems in Greek, Italian, and German. B. 1789; d. 1862.

HAYDN, JOSEPH, author of "Dictionary of Dates," "The Book of Dignities," and other standard works of literature. D. in London, 1856.

HAYES, CATHERINE, a celebrated vocalist, was b. in Limerick, 1820. Her taste for music and talent for its acquirement were early displayed, and she was placed as a pupil with Signor Sapio, a teacher of music in Dublin. She afterwards studied under Viardot Garcia at Paris, and Ronconi at Milan. Her first appearance was at Marseilles, in "I Puritani," in 1845, where her success was so great that no one knew her to be a debutante. Engaged for La Scala, at Milan, the beauty of her voice and the purity and simplicity of her style at once commanded success. At Venice, Rome, Florence, and Genoa, she was equally successful. In 1849 she appeared at the Italian Opera, London, and at the close of the season sang in the "Messiah," with an éclat that established a reputation as an interpreter of sacred music not second to that she had earned upon the stage. She accepted an engagement in the United States in 1851, and after performing in all our great cities, proceeded to California and South America, and thence to Australia and India. She returned to London in 1855, and to the United States in 1856. Subsequently she was married in London, to William Avery Bushnell, of New York, who had had the management of her affairs for some years, and her public appearances then became less frequent. D. 1861. Perhaps Miss Hayes never had a rival in rendering with deep sensibility, mournful pathos, and heart-speaking expression, the melodies of her native country.

HAYNAU, JULIUS J. VON, an Austrian general noted for his cruelty to the Hungarians in 1849. B. 1786; d. at Vienna, 1853.

HAYS, ALEXANDER, brigadier-general United States volunteers, b. at Pittsburg, 1823. He graduated at West Point in 1844, and received a commission in the United States infantry. He gained a reputation for gallantry in the Mexican war, on his return from which he applied himself to business pursuits. In 1861 he raised a regiment of volunteers, and was commissioned colonel of the 63rd Pennsylvania infantry. He fought at Seven Pines and Fair Oaks, and in May, 1862, was nominated for a brevet of major in the United States army. He distinguished himself in subsequent engagements, and in September, 1862, was promoted to the rank he held at his death. He shared in the battle of Fredericksburg, was wounded at Chancellorsville, served at Gettysburg, and commanded the second brigade in Grant's battles in the Wilderness. In one of these he was killed, May, 1864.

HEAD, SIR GEORGE, elder brother of Sir Francis Bond Head, author and commissariat officer; d. 1855.

HEG, HANS C., colonel of United States volunteers, and acting brigadier-general, b. 1829; killed at Chickamauga, 1863. He was a native of Norway, and at an early age came to the United States with his father, who settled in Wisconsin. In 1859 he was elected to the office of commissioner of prisons of that state. He entered the United States service, in 1861, as major of the 4th Wisconsin militia, and in Sept. of the same year became colonel of the 15th Wisconsin volunteer infantry, with whom he served under generals Pope, Buell, and Rosecrans. In April, 1863, he was placed in command of a brigade in the army of the Cumberland, and took part in the movements of the 20th corps in Tennessee, finally falling at the head of his men.

HEINE, HEINRICH, a celebrated German writer, b. in Düsseldorf, 1799; d. in Paris, 1856. His first work, Gedichte, afterwards published as "Youthful Sorrows," appeared in Berlin in 1822; a series of poems suggested by an early disappointment in love. About the same time he published two plays, Almansor and Radcliff, with the Lyrisches Intermezzo. In 1825 he received the degree of doctor of law at Göttingen. Having removed to Hamburg he published the Harzreise, the first part of his Reisebilder, a work which excited an extraordinary sensation throughout Germany. In 1827 he went to Munich to edit, with Dr. Lindner, the Politische Annalen, returning to Berlin in 1829. The liberality of his views, and the free exercise of his remarkable powers of sarcasm and invective, brought down upon him the hostility of the Prussian authorities, and to escape prosecution in 1831 he went to Paris, where he acquired great influence as an author, and acquired the reputation of being the wittiest French writer since Voltaire. His contributions to the German press strengthened his hold upon the opinions of the German people, and made him more formidable than ever to the despotisms he assailed. His "History of Modern Literature in Germany" appeared in 1833, followed by L'Allemagne, a work characterized by relentless sarcasm and the recklessness of its attacks. This book, it has been said, "produced a perfect storm of fury in Germany," while in France its effect was in no small degree to arrest the current of romanticism. In 1847 Heine was attacked by a painful spinal complaint, from which he suffered almost without intermission until his death. Anguish did not check his pen, however, for he continued to write energetically as before, and without any perceptible weakening of the qualities which had secured him distinction. Notwithstanding the defiant tone of his writings, their infidelity and occasional licentiousness, and their indifference to the feelings of his contemporaries and the memory of literary friends, his private life exhibited affection and rare sympathy for suffering. Towards the close of his life he passed from absolute unbelief to theism, mingled with a fondness for the reading of the Bible; but, by his own request, all religious rites were omitted at his funeral.

HELM, BENJAMIN HARDIN, confederate brigadier-general, b. in Kentucky, educated at West Point, and for a short period an officer of the United States dragoons. He served under General Bragg at Shiloh, and commanded a division at Stone river and Chickamauga, being killed in the latter battle, Sept. 1863.

HENDERSON, J. PINCKNEY, b. in North Carolina, 1808, emigrated to Texas in 1836, and was forthwith appointed attorney-general of that republic by President Houston. In 1837 he became secretary of state, and soon afterwards proceeded to England and France as minister plenipotentiary, with authority to solicit the recognition of the independence of Texas. In 1838 he made a commercial arrangement with England, and in 1839 a commercial treaty with France. In 1844 he was appointed a special minister to the United States, which mission resulted in the annexation of Texas. In 1845 he was a member of the convention which framed the constitution of the state of Texas. In Nov.

of the same year he was elected governor of the state; and when the Mexican war broke out, in 1846, he took command in person of the volunteer troops called for by General Taylor, served six months as major-general, and distinguished himself at the battle of Monterey, subsequently receiving from congress, for his services, a vote of thanks, and a sword valued at $1500. In 1857 he was elected a senator in congress, and d. in Washington in the following year.

HENSHAW, DAVID, appointed secretary of the navy of the United States by President Tyler, but rejected by the senate, was b. in Massachusetts, and was a man of uncommon energy, and a political writer of much force and spirit. He was a frequent contributor to the "Boston Statesman," and his articles attracted much attention. D. 1852, aged 62.—JOSHUA SIDNEY, a native of Boston, was for some time professor of mathematics in the United States navy, after which he was admitted to the practice of the law, and settled in Utica. He published a "Manual of Consuls," "Around the World," and other works. His original name was Belcher, which was changed by the legislature of Pennsylvania. B. 1811; d. 1859.

HENTZ, Mrs. CAROLINE LEE, authoress of "Ernest Linwood," and other novels, and a well-known contributor to periodicals, b. in Lancaster, Mass.; d. in Florida, 1856.

HERBERT, HENRY WILLIAM, a popular writer, b. in London, 1807, was educated at Eton and Cambridge. In 1830 a pecuniary reverse suddenly reduced him from affluence to poverty, and he sought to retrieve his fortune in the United States. On his arrival in this country, and for eight years afterwards, he officiated as Greek teacher in a classical school. During this period, in addition to his classical studies, he turned his attention to authorship, editing the "American Monthly Magazine," from 1833 to 1836, besides writing for other periodicals. In 1835 he published "The Brothers"; in 1837, "Oliver Cromwell"; in 1842, a third historical novel, "Marmaduke Wyvill"; and, in 1846, "The Roman Traitor," a romance founded on Catiline's conspiracy. In 1848 he published a poetical translation of the "Prometheus" and "Agamemnon" of Æschylus. He is most widely known as "Frank Forester," under which nom de plume he was the author of many sporting sketches, in addition to two textbooks of sporting and natural history, the "Field Sports," and the "Fish and Fishing" of North America, both of which were eminently successful. A "Treatise on the Horse" is his most elaborate production. He committed suicide in New York, 1858.

HERRICK, EDWARD CLAUDIUS, many years officially connected with Yale college, and author of valuable contributions to the "American Journal of Science," b. in New Haven, 1811; d. 1832. Amongst the most noticeable of his writings were papers on meteoric showers, and on the "Hessian Fly and its Parasites." His attainments in entomology, meteorology, and astronomy were considerable, and as a bibliographer and local historian he enjoyed a high reputation.

HERRIES, JOHN CHARLES, an English politician, and member of various torty administrations, d. 1855.

HICKS, THOMAS H., governor of Maryland from 1858 to 1862, and senator from that state in congress in the place of the late James A. Pearce, d. in Washington, 1865.

HILDRETH, SAMUEL PRESCOTT, a writer on geology, palæontology, and meteorology in "Silliman's Journal of Science," and author of works relating to the early settlement of the northwest territory, b. in Methuen, Mass., 1783; d. 1863. He was educated a physician, and removed to Ohio in 1806, settling at Marietta in 1808, and continuing his profession there until his death. He formed and classified a valuable cabinet of natural history, and an extensive scientific library, both of which he donated to Marietta college. — RICHARD, an American journalist and author, b. in Deerfield, Mass., 1807, received his education in an academy of which his father, a congregational clergyman, was preceptor. He graduated at Harvard in 1826, and was admitted to the practice of the law in 1830. About this time he contributed various articles to Boston periodicals, and in 1832 he became a political writer for the Boston "Atlas," then an influential journal, with which he remained connected until 1834. Impaired health led him to seek a southern climate, and while residing in Florida he wrote an anti-slavery novel entitled "Archy Moore," afterwards enlarged and republished as "The White Slave." On his return to Boston he translated from the French of Dumont Bentham's "Theory of Legislation," to which succeeded a "History of Banks," written with the view of promoting the system of free banking, with security to bill-holders, which has since been adopted in several states. Resuming his connection with the "Atlas," he earnestly advocated the election of General Harrison to the presidency. In 1840 he published "Despotism in America," a work discussing the slavery question in its various aspects; and also contributed freely to the theological controversy then being waged in Massachusetts. He resided three years in British Guiana, where he labored as a journalist, and where he wrote his "Theory of Morals," published at Boston in 1844. In 1853 his "Theory of Politics" appeared. His most important work, however, is a "History of the United States" from the earliest colonial settlements to the end of Monroe's first presidential term, — a plain, unambitious, chronological narrative, useful for reference, though not always entirely trustworthy as to facts, but meagre and uninteresting in style. In 1855 he wrote a volume entitled "Japan as it was and is." For several years he was editorially attached to the New York "Tribune," whose columns bore evidence of his unflagging industry and his unabated love of political controversy. On the accession of Mr. Lincoln to the presidency, Mr. Hildreth accepted the consulship at Trieste. His health had for some time previously been precarious, and he was compelled to retire from the office early in 1864. Death had even then set its seal upon him, and after a lingering illness he d. in the city of Florence, July 11th, 1865.

HILL, ISAAC, was b. in Massachusetts, 1788. In 1798 his parents removed to Ashburnham, Mass., where they had purchased a small farm. In 1802 he was apprenticed to Joseph Cushing, who had just commenced the publication of the "Amherst Cabinet." Upon the expiration of his apprenticeship, in 1809, he went to Concord, New Hampshire, and purchased the "American Patriot," and on the 18th of April, 1809, as editor and publisher, he issued the first number of the "New Hampshire Patriot." Mr. Hill, while editor of the "Patriot," was twice chosen clerk of the state senate, was once elected a representative from the town of Concord, and was elected to the state senate in 1820, 1821, 1822, and 1827. In 1828 he was the democratic republican candidate for United States senator, and received the votes of the members of his party, but the opposition had a majority in the legislature, and Governor Samuel Bell was elected. In 1829, soon after General Jackson entered upon the duties of the presidency, he appointed Mr. Hill second comptroller of the treasury; and he entered upon the duties of that office on the 21st of March in that year. Mr. Hill held the office of comptroller until April, 1830, when his nomination was rejected by the senate. He returned to New Hampshire, and at the next session of the legislature was elected to the United States senate for six years. He remained in that body about five years, when, in 1836, having been elected governor of New Hampshire by a majority of nearly 9000 votes, he resigned the senatorship to enter upon the office of chief magistrate of his state. He was reelected governor in 1837, and again in 1838; and in June, 1839, retired to private life. In 1840 he was appointed by President Van Buren to the office of sub-treasurer at Boston, which he held until removed in March, 1841. He also held for many years the office of pension agent. D. in Washington, 1851.

NICHOLAS, a distinguished lawyer of New York, state reporter from 1840 to 1845, and one of the authors of "Notes to Phillips's Evidence." B. 1806; d. 1859. — AMBROSE POWELL, major-general in the confederate service, b. in Culpepper county, Va., 1826. He graduated at West Point in 1847, and joined the first artillery, in which he continued until March, 1861. He then resigned, and was made colonel of the 13th Virginia infantry, which he commanded at Manassas. In May, 1862, he commanded a brigade at the battle of Williamsburg, and was soon afterward promoted to a major-generalship. He was engaged in the seven days' battles before Richmond, and took part in the battle of Antietam. As commander of the 3d corps of the confederate army he distinguished himself at Chancellorsville and Gettysburg. He occupied an important part in the confederate position before Petersburg, and was killed in one of the closing battles of the war, April 1, 1865.

HILLHOUSE, AUGUSTUS LUCAS, b. in New Haven, Conn., 1791; after graduating at Yale, went to France, in 1815, laboring under infirm health, and there engaged in literary pursuits. He translated into English Michaux's "North American Sylva." D. near Paris, 1859.

HINCKS, REV. THOMAS D., professor of Hebrew and oriental languages in the Belfast academy, b. 1787; d. 1857.

HINRICHS, HERMANN FRIEDRICH WILHELM, professor of philosophy at Halle, b. in the grand duchy of Oldenburg, 1794; d. in Thuringia, 1861.

HITCHCOCK, EDWARD, D. D., LL. D., long identified with Amherst college, and an author of high repute in the domains of science and theology, b. in Deerfield, Mass., 1793. After being principal of an academy and pastor of a congregational church, in 1825 he became professor of chemistry and natural history in Amherst college, and held this position until 1845, when he was made president of the college and professor of natural theology and geology. At different periods he was engaged as state geologist of Massachusetts, of Vermont, and of the first district of New York. His scientific publications embrace "Geology of the Connecticut Valley," "Reports on the Geology of Massachusetts," "Illustrations of Surface Geology," "Elementary Geology," and the "Ichnology of New England." His "Religion of Geology and its Connected Sciences" holds a high rank in the literature of natural theology. Amongst his works on practical religion are a "Memoir of Mary Lyon," "A Wreath for the Tomb," and "Lectures on the peculiar Phenomena of the Four Seasons." He was a strenuous advocate of total abstinence, and wrote two or three works in its support. D. 1864.

HOAR, SAMUEL, LL. D., b. in Lincoln, Mass., 1778, was admitted to the bar in 1805, and having opened an office in Concord, Mass., soon attained to professional position. He was a member of the convention for revising the state constitution in 1820, state senator in 1825 and 1833, member of the executive council in 1845 and 1846, representative in the legislature of the state in 1850, and representative in congress from 1835 to 1837. In 1844 he was appointed agent, under a resolve of the legislature of Massachusetts, to proceed to South Carolina and aid the colored citizens of Massachusetts, imprisoned by the authority of South Carolina, by testing in the courts of the United States the constitutionality of the act of the legislature of South Carolina, authorizing the imprisonment of colored persons who should enter that state. On his arrival in South Carolina, and making known the object of his mission, it was considered an unwarrantable interference with the state's rights. There was great excitement in Charleston, and he was expelled from that city by the citizens, Dec. 5, 1844, the legislature having passed resolutions on that day authorizing the governor to expel him. In 1812 he married Sarah Sherman, youngest daughter of Roger Sherman of Connecticut. D. 1856.

HODGSON, FRANCIS, a scholar and man of letters, and an intimate friend of Lord Byron. D. 1852, aged 72. He was the author of a successful translation of Juvenal.

HOFFMAN, OGDEN, an eminent nisi prius lawyer, in early life entered the United States navy, and served as midshipman through the war of 1812. When peace was declared he resigned and entered upon the study of the law. On being admitted to the bar he practised in Goshen, Orange county, until 1826, when he removed to the city of New York, and speedily worked his way to distinction. In 1828 he was a representative in the state legislature. He held the office of district attorney for the city, and also United States district attorney for the southern district of New York. In 1853 he was elected attorney-general. D. 1856.

HOGAN, JOHN, an eminent Irish sculptor, b. 1801; d. 1858.

HOLMAN, JAMES, popularly known as "The Blind Traveller," was b. in 1791, and entered the British navy when very young. He was constantly afloat till 1810, when he was obliged to leave the naval service by an illness which ended in the total deprivation of sight, and which resulted from the anxious discharge of his professional duties; he was soon afterwards appointed a naval knight of Windsor. But the almost monastic seclusion of that foundation was ill suited for his active mind, and in spite of his severe infirmity he determined to undertake travels in all parts of the globe. His first journey, made in the years 1819, 1820, and 1821, was through France, Italy, and Switzerland, the parts of Germany bordering on the Rhine, Holland, and the Netherlands. He published a narrative of his travels on that occasion. He next travelled through Russia, Siberia, Poland, Austria, Saxony, Prussia, and Hanover, in 1822, 1823, and 1824, and while passing through the Russian territories, he was suspected by the government to be a spy, and was conducted as a state prisoner from the eastern parts of Siberia to the frontier. His Russian travels were published in two volumes. In 1834 he published his principal work, recording a still wider reach of travel and inquiry, entitled a "Voyage Round the World," in four volumes. This publication embraced the journals of a vast route, including Africa, Asia, Australasia, and America, traversed between the years 1827 and 1832. His last journeys were made through Spain, Portugal, Wallachia, Moldavia, and Montenegro, Syria, and Turkey, and his last employment was in preparing for the press his final journals. D. 1857.

HOOPER, WILLIAM HULME, lieutenant British navy, author of "Ten Months amongst the Tents of the Tuski," and "Incidents of a Boat Expedition to the Mackenzie River," b. 1828; d. 1854, from the effects of exposure and privation experienced during four years' Arctic service in search of Sir John Franklin.

HOPE, Sir HENRY, a British admiral, b. 1787; d. 1863. He entered the navy in 1798; and in 1815 commanded the Endymion 40-gun frigate in the engagement with the United States ship President, which he took as a prize to England.

HOPKINS, JOSIAH, D. D., a Presbyterian clergyman, author of a theological text-book, entitled "The Christian Institute," b. in Pittsford, Vt., 1786; d. 1862.

HORNE, THOMAS HARTWELL, author of "An Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures," was for many years a barristers' clerk in London, pursuing knowledge under difficulties, and eking out a scanty living by literary labor in his leisure hours. In his youth he struggled with skepticism, and in his 20th year published "A Brief View of the Necessity and Truth of the Christian Religion," the result of his own inquiries into the authenticity and inspiration of the Scriptures. This early effort was the foundation of the great work by which he became as widely known in the United States as in England, and which has been translated into most of the languages of Europe and several of those of India. When 39 years of age he was ordained a clergyman of the church of England, and at a later date received the degree of D. D. from the university of Pennsylvania. B. 1780; d. 1862.

HOUSTON, SAMUEL, b. in Rockbridge county, Va., 1793; d. in Huntersville, Tex., 1863. His early years were passed amidst poverty and hardship; his father having died, and his mother having removed with her family to Tennessee. The pursuits of frontier life brought young Houston into contact with the Cherokee Indians, with whom he remained several years. Returning to border civilization, he served in a country store, and, despite his own scanty education, undertook a school. In 1813 he enlisted in the army, and served under General Jackson in the war with the Creek Indians. He distinguished himself on several occasions, and at the conclusion of the war had risen to the rank of lieutenant, but soon resigned his commission, and commenced the study of law at Nashville. He was, in 1823, elected to congress, and continued a member of that body until, in 1827, he became governor of Tennessee. In 1829, before the expiration of his gubernatorial term, he resigned his office, and went to take up his abode among the Cherokees in Arkansas. His wanderings led him to Texas, where he obtained a seat as a delegate in the convention called to form a constitution previous to its admission into the Mexican union. The constitution drawn up by the convention was rejected by Santa Anna, who called upon the Texans to surrender their arms. They determined upon a resistance; a militia was organized, and Austin, the founder of the colony, was elected commander-in-chief, in which office he was shortly after succeeded by General Houston. He conducted the war with vigor, and finally brought it to a successful termination by the battle of San Jacinto, which was fought in April, 1836. In May, 1836, he signed a treaty, acknowledging the independence of Texas, and in October of the same year he was inaugurated the first president of the republic. At the end of his term of office he became a member of the Texas congress. In 1841 he was again elevated to the presidential chair. In 1846 Texas became one of the states of the union, and General Houston was elected to the senate, of which body he remained a member until the close of the thirty-fifth congress. He was afterwards elected governor of Texas.

HOWARD, GEORGE WILLIAM FREDERICK, Earl of Carlisle, b. 1802. For many years he occupied a prominent place in the house of commons as Lord Morpeth; was chief secretary for Ireland under Lord Melbourne, and more recently lord-lieutenant of Ireland. He travelled in the East, and published his impressions under the title, "Diary in Turkish and Greek Waters"; and having visited the United States, lectured on the subject to societies of mechanics. He was a hearty friend of the north as against the Richmond confederacy, and labored earnestly to counteract the intrigues of southern sympathizers in England. D. 1864.

HOWELL, JOSUA B., brigadier-general of United States volunteers, commanding a brigade in Major-General

Terry's division before Petersburg, was killed by a fall from his horse, Sept. 1864. He was born toward the close of the last century.

HUBBARD, JOSEPH STILLMAN, professor of mathematics in the United States navy, performing duty in the naval observatory at Washington, and an astronomer of no ordinary reputation, b. in New Haven, Conn., 1823; d. 1863. He was an extensive contributor to the "Astronomical Journal." — SAMUEL DICKINSON, b. at Middletown, Conn., 1799, although educated for the law, entered business life as a manufacturer. He served as a representative in the 29th and 30th congress. In 1852 he was appointed postmaster-general, and held the office until the close of President Fillmore's administration. D. 1855.

HUC, EVARISTE REGIS, the Abbé, labored as a missionary in China, and in that capacity penetrated into the heart of the Chinese empire. In 1852 he published "Travels in Tartary, Thibet, and China"; and he also wrote in other forms concerning Christianity in China, and the peculiarities of the Chinese people. B. 1814; d. 1860.

HUGER, DANIEL ELLIOTT, for nearly half a century honorably identified with the public service of South Carolina, as a member of the state legislature, judge, and United States senator, d. 1854.

HUGHES, JOHN, D. D., b. in Ireland in 1798, came to the United States in 1817, and for a brief term served with a florist, to learn the art of gardening. He next entered a catholic seminary at Emmitsburg, Md., and having been ordained a priest in 1825, settled in Philadelphia. In 1830 he carried on a controversy with the Rev. John Breckinridge on the question. — "Is the protestant religion the religion of Christ?" The matter was afterwards collected into a volume which attracted wide attention. In 1832 he founded St. John's church in Philadelphia, and became its rector. In 1834 he renewed the discussion with Mr. Breckinridge orally, the question on this occasion taking the form, — "Is the Roman Catholic religion, in any or in all its principles and doctrines, inimical to civil or religious liberty?" He was next appointed coadjutor bishop of New York, having been consecrated in 1838; and in the following year was made administrator of the diocese. On the death of Bishop Dubois, in 1842, he succeeded to the full dignity of bishop, and he forthwith applied himself to a reform in the tenure of church property and the adjustment of church debts in his diocese. To obtain pecuniary aid in the same connection, he visited France, Austria, and Italy, in 1839. On his return he took up the work of catholic education, organizing St. John's college at Fordham, N. Y., and directing a powerful agitation for the modification of the common-school system. He held the first diocesan synod of New York in 1842; and in 1845 revisited Europe to obtain the services of Jesuits, brothers of the Christian schools, and sisters of mercy. In 1847 the sees of Albany and Buffalo were erected, and in 1850 New York was raised to the dignity of an archiepiscopal see, the archbishop proceeding to Rome to receive the pallium at the hands of the pope. The first provincial council of New York was held in 1854. Subsequently the archbishop became involved in a controversy with Mr. Erastus Brooks, a member of the state senate and one of the editors of the New York "Express," growing out of the question of church property. The letters on both sides were collected by the archbishop and republished in a volume, with an introduction from his pen. In 1858 he laid the corner-stone of a cathedral in the city of New York, and to the last labored persistently in the interest of his church. D. 1864.

HULSEMANN, JOHN GEORGE, chevalier de, Austrian minister at Washington, was b. at Stade in Hanover, educated at Göttingen, and for several years editor of a journal at Vienna. He came to the United States in 1841 as chargé d'affaires, and afterward became resident minister, in which position he remained until obliged by ill health to return to Europe in 1863. D. 1864.

HUMBOLDT, FREDERICK HENRY ALEXANDER, Baron, b. at Berlin in 1769, was educated for employment in the direction of the government mines, successively, at Göttingen, Frankfort-on-the-Oder, at Hamburg, and at the mining school at Freiberg. He was appointed assessor to the mining board in 1792, subsequently exchanging the post for that of a director of the works at Bayreuth. These duties he abandoned in 1795, to devote himself to those pursuits in which he won so much renown. Having acquired considerable acquaintance with the different countries of Europe, he sailed in 1799, in company with Bonpland, for South America. After exploring the extensive territory which now forms the state of Venezuela, they crossed the steppes of Calobozo, and embarked on the Orinoco, proceeding to the extrema Spanish port, Fort St. Carlos; returning to Cumana, after having travelled thousands of miles over a trackless wilderness. Having explored nearly all that was interesting in South America, Humboldt returned to Europe in 1804, and commenced a series of colossal publications in nearly every department of science. In 1829 he explored Siberia and the Caspian Sea. The work by which Humboldt is most widely known in the United States is his "Cosmos," the basis of the book being a series of lectures delivered in Paris and Berlin. "Cosmos" was designed by its illustrious author to be an educational medium, to develop in the people an appreciation of nature. D. 1859.

HUME, JOSEPH, b. at Montrose in 1777, was the son of a master mariner, and was left fatherless at an early age. His mother, the mistress of a little shop, apprenticed him to a surgeon-apothecary. In 1796 he was admitted to the college of surgeons at Edinburgh; and having obtained a professional appointment in the service of the East India company, he left for the East at the commencement of the Mahratta war. In India he mastered the native languages, and acted as interpreter of Persian to the army, being at the same time postmaster, paymaster, and commissariat officer. These multifarious occupations enabled him to return to England, in 1808, with a well-earned fortune. In 1812 he bought a seat in parliament, which he lost almost immediately by a dissolution. Six years afterward he was more fairly elected, and — with a brief intermission — he continued a member of the house of commons, until his death in 1855. His public services as an economist are well known. His dogged perseverance and inflexible principles enabled him, year after year, to be the means of lopping off items of expenditure. The blue books and parliamentary papers of a quarter of a century may be regarded as a monument of his amazing industry, and of his victories over innumerable abuses.

HUMPHREY, HEMAN, D. D., president of Amherst college, author of a "Tour in France," "Sketches of the History of Revivals," "Domestic Education," "Letters to a Son in the Ministry," and other works, b. in Connecticut, 1779; d. 1861.

HUNT, EDWARD B., an officer in the United States service, b. in Livingston county, N. Y., 1822. After filling the position of principal assistant professor of civil and military engineering at West Point, he became the assistant of Professor Bache in the coast-survey bureau, where he remained until 1855. He was next engaged in engineering operations on the Atlantic coast, being for five years employed in the construction of defensive works at Key West. In 1862 he was appointed chief engineer of the 5th army corps, but was soon afterwards appointed to special service by the navy department, to superintend the construction of a submarine battery of which he was the inventor. While engaged in this task he received an injury from the premature discharge of a shell, from the effects of which he d., 1863. — FREEMAN, founder of the "Merchants' Magazine," and author of "Lives of American Merchants," b. in Quincy, Mass., 1804, d. in New York, 1858. His early literary labors were in connection with Boston periodicals, and with "The Traveller," a miscellany which he established in New York in 1831. — FREDERICK KNIGHT, a London journalist, for some years editor of the "Daily News," b. 1814; d. 1854. — JAMES HENRY LEIGH, essayist, journalist, and poet, was b. in Middlesex, 1784. At the age of fifteen he entered the office of one of his brothers, an attorney, removing thence to a situation in the war-office. While thus employed he contributed to various periodicals, writing more especially theatrical criticisms. In 1808 he became, with a brother, joint editor and proprietor of the "Examiner" newspaper. Under their management, the "Examiner" was thrice subjected to government prosecution; twice was the journal acquitted; but on the third occasion, having been guilty of describing the prince regent as "an Adonis of fifty," — the brothers Hunt were amerced in a penalty of £500, and two years' imprisonment. One of the fruits of the imprisonment was the well-known story of "Rimini." In 1822 Leigh Hunt joined Shelley and Byron in the management of the "Liberal," but Shelley's death and a rupture with Byron soon led to the abandonment of the venture. Thenceforward Hunt eschewed politics, and addressed himself to general literature, his later years being rendered comfortable by a pension granted by the British government. D. 1859. — WILLIAM, painter in water-colors, was b. in London, 1790. He first exhibited as an artist in 1824, and his originality at once secured him a high position. He was not only a masterly artist, but a poet; the objects he painted being "seen and felt by him as they exist, and conveyed by a mystery of art" which critics have ineffectually attempted to explain. Ruskin has spoken of him as among the greatest in a school rife with great colorists. D. 1864.

I.

INGERSOLL, CHARLES J., author of a "History of the Second American War with Great Britain," and other works, was b. in Philadelphia, 1782, and d. 1862. He was a representative in congress from 1813 to 1815, and from 1841 to 1847. He was appointed by President Polk minister to France, but failed to obtain confirmation by the senate.

INGHAM, CHARLES C., an American portrait-painter, b. 1797; d. in New York, 1863.

INGRAM, HERBERT, founder and proprietor of the "Illustrated London News," and member of the British parliament, b. 1811, was drowned in Lake Michigan, 1863.

ION, JACOB BOND, a South Carolina statesman, b. 1782, entered the United States army, in 1811, as captain of the first regiment of artillery, and served until 1815. He was afterwards appointed to the command of the fortifications at Charleston and Savannah. He was an influential member of the South Carolina senate, and for some years its president, and took an important part in the convention of 1832, by which the ordinance of nullification was passed. D. 1859.

IRVING, WASHINGTON, b. in New York, 1783, was the youngest son of William Irving, a descendant of an Orkney family, his mother being an Englishwoman. An ordinary school education terminated in Irving's 16th year, and he then commenced the study of the law. In 1802 he contributed to the "Morning Chronicle" newspaper a series of papers upon the theatres, manners, and local events of the town, over the signature of Jonathan Oldstyle. Symptoms of a pulmonary affection led Irving, in 1804, to seek relief in the south of Europe, where he visited Genoa,

Messina, Naples, and Rome. Thence he passed through Switzerland to Paris, Flanders, Holland, and finally to England; returning to New York and resuming his law-studies in 1806. All his inclinations, however, were in the direction of a literary life, and he never practised law. In conjunction with James K. Paulding and his elder brother William, he projected "Salmagundi," a serial publication, which was continued during a year, and was highly popular. "Knickerbocker's History of New York" followed about two years afterward, and became an immediate favorite with every lover of genuine humor. In 1810 he wrote a biographical sketch of Thomas Campbell, which secured him the friendship of that author. Meanwhile Irving had joined two of his brothers as a silent partner in mercantile pursuits. But he continued his literary labors, and in 1813-14 edited the "Analectic Magazine" in Philadelphia. In 1814 he became aide-de-camp and military secretary, with the title of colonel, on the staff of Gov. Tompkins. On the termination of the war he proceeded again to Europe, and remained there 17 years. The first year or two of his stay in England passed in travel, rural wanderings, and pleasant social intercourse, amongst others, with Walter Scott. The failure of the New York firm of which he was a member deprived Irving of his property, and threw him upon his literary resources for support. The "Sketch-Book" was the earliest product of his labor, and brought him profit and distinction. The winter of 1820 he spent in Paris, where he enjoyed the intimacy of Thomas Moore. "Bracebridge Hall" appeared in 1821, Murray having paid 1000 guineas for the copyright without seeing the manuscript. Irving next visited Dresden, and in 1824 published the "Tales of a Traveller." In 1825 Alexander H. Everett, United States minister to Spain, commissioned Irving to translate the documents relating to Columbus just collected by Navarrette. The "History of the Life and Voyages of Christopher Columbus" was the result, followed by the "Voyages and Discoveries of the Companions of Columbus." During his residence in Spain Irving also gathered the material which he embodied in the "Chronicle of the Conquest of Granada," the "Alhambra," "Legends of the Conquest of Spain," and "Mahomet and his Successors." He had returned to England in 1829, having received the appointment of secretary of legation to the American embassy at London. In 1831 the university of Oxford conferred on him the degree of LL. D., and in the following year he returned to New York, where he was entertained at a public dinner under the presidency of Chancellor Kent. In the summer of the same year he accompanied Commissioner Ellsworth on his journey to remove the Indian tribes across the Mississippi, and acquired a strong interest in the adventurous life of the West. "A Tour on the Prairies" appeared in 1835, "Astoria" in 1836, and in 1837 "Adventures of Captain Bonneville in the Rocky Mountains and the Far West." In 1841 he wrote a Life of Margaret Miller Davidson, to accompany an edition of her poetical remains. In 1842 he was appointed minister to Spain, which post he filled four years. On his return he published, in a separate form, "Oliver Goldsmith, a Biography," which had been prefixed to a Paris edition of that author's works. In 1848-50 he revised an edition of his works, published by Mr. G. P. Putnam. His last and largest work, the "Life of Washington," was completed in 1859. Irving's latter days were passed serenely and happily at Sunnyside, his home, near Tarrytown, surrounded by a genial circle of relatives and friends. He was never married, in consequence of the death of the young lady — Miss Hoffman — whom he loved, and whose well-worn bible lay on a table at his bedside when he died. He d. suddenly, from disease of the heart, Nov. 28, 1859.

ISABEY, I. B., a French miniature-painter, d. in Paris in 1855, aged 88, the last survivor of the famous school of art to which he belonged.

ITURBIDE, MADAME HUATE DE, ex-empress of Mexico, b. about 1790; d. at Philadelphia, 1861. Her husband, Augustin de Iturbide, the first emperor of Mexico of European descent, was executed by the Mexican government in 1824, from which time his widow resided in the United States.

IVES, ELI, an eminent American physician, professor of materia medica, and afterward professor of the theory and practice of medicine in Yale college, b. in New Haven, 1779; d. 1861.

J.

JACKSON, THOMAS JONATHAN, more generally known as "Stonewall" Jackson, a lieutenant-general in the confederate service, b. in Lewis county, Va., 1826. He graduated at West Point in 1846, served in Mexico with Magruder's battery, was brevetted captain for gallantry at Contreras and Churubusco, and major at Chapultepec. In 1852 he resigned in consequence of ill health, and became a professor in the military institute at Lexington, Va., marrying, and attaching himself to the presbyterian church, of which he became a zealous elder. Thus he remained until his state declared itself out of the Union, when he resumed his military career with the rank of colonel in the army of Virginia. His first movement was upon Harper's Ferry, which he occupied April 18, 1861. At Martinsburg, July 2, he was attacked and compelled to retreat by the union forces under General Patterson. He participated in the battle of Bull Run as brigadier-general, and was with the main army of the confederates at Centreville during the winter of 1861-62. On March 23, near Winchester, he encountered unsuccessfully the troops under General Shields; the circumstance that he and his forces were described by another as having "stood like a stone wall" in the conflict, giving rise to the appellation by which he was afterwards distinguished. His subsequent movements against Generals Banks, McDowell, and Shields, secured for him a reputation as a bold, dashing, and withal successful soldier. After taking part in the series of battles which for the time relieved Richmond and closed the Chickahominy campaign, he led the advance of General Lee's army as it moved north against General Pope, and having repeatedly defeated him, crossed the Potomac into Maryland and occupied Frederick; recrossed and captured Harper's Ferry, with 11,000 union prisoners, and having joined Lee's main body, bore a prominent part in the battle of Antietam. During the winter of 1862 Jackson held command of the right wing of the confederate army stationed near Fredericksburg, having meanwhile been promoted to a lieutenant-generalship. On the 2d May, 1863, he made an impetuous charge upon the 11th federal corps under General Howard, routing them completely and forcing them toward Chancellorsville. Darkness arrested the contest, and Jackson, who had been in the foremost position, turned with his staff toward his own lines. A South Carolina regiment, mistaking the cavalcade for union cavalry, fired a sudden volley, and Jackson fell from his horse, wounded in both arms. He d. on the 10th May, and was honored with a public funeral in Richmond. — CONRAD FEGER, brigadier-general of volunteers in the United States army, b. in Pennsylvania, killed at Fredericksburg, Va., Dec. 13, 1862. He entered the war as colonel of the 9th Pennsylvania reserves in 1861, and in July, 1862, took command of the brigade previously under General Ord, in General McCall's division. — JAMES S., another union officer, with the rank of brigadier-general of volunteers, b. in Kentucky, 1822; killed at Perryville, Oct. 8, 1862. He was a lawyer by profession, but served in the Kentucky cavalry in the Mexican war. — CLAIBORNE F., b. in Fleming county, Ky., 1807, settled in Missouri, and became one of its most prominent politicians, wielding great influence in the state legislature, taking an active part in the organization of the banking system, and filling the office of bank commissioner. He was elected governor in 1860, and employed all the means at his command to plunge the state into secession. In July, 1861, having left the capital on the approach of General Lyon with United States troops, he was deposed by the state convention. He became general in the confederate army, and d. at Little Rock, Ark., 1862. — CHARLES, justice of the supreme court of Massachusetts from 1813 to 1823, was b. in Newburyport, 1775, and admitted to practice in Essex county in 1796. In 1832 he was placed at the head of the commission to revise the statutes of the commonwealth, and was a member of the corporation of Harvard college from 1825 to 1834. D. 1855.

JAHN, FREDERICK LUDWIG, the inventor of the modern system of gymnastics, was b. in Pomerania, 1778, and went to Berlin in 1809. The French were then masters of Germany, and Jahn, who was a teacher in a private institution, established his first gymnasium in 1811, as a covert means of nourishing patriotic feelings amongst his countrymen. To him the affiliated societies of "Turners" owe their paternity. D. 1852.

JAMES, G. P. R., one of the most prolific of modern novelists, was b. in London. Some of his earliest literary efforts were seen by Washington Irving, who advised him to aim at something higher. The novel of "Richelieu" was the result of this encouragement. Published in 1828, it met at once with signal success. During the succeeding 20 years his pen was constantly at work in this division of the literary field, all his novels belonging too obviously to one class — and that a mediocre one — to call for enumeration. In 1852 he came to the United States as a consul, and remained some years. In 1858 he was appointed consul at Venice, and d. there, 1860. — JOHN ANGELL, author of many popular religious works, and pastor of a congregational church at Birmingham, England, b. 1784; d. 1859. — CHARLES T., b. in West Greenwich, R. I., 1806; d. 1862. Having turned his attention to mechanics as connected with the cotton interest, he wrote a series of papers on the culture and manufacture of cotton in the south. He was a senator in congress from 1851 to 1857 from Rhode Island. He subsequently invented a rifle-cannon, and met his death from the explosion of a shell of his own invention.

JAMESON, MRS. ANNA, an eminent art critic, b. in Dublin, 1796; d. in England, 1860. Her "Loves of the Poets," "Lives of celebrated Female Sovereigns," "Characteristics of Women," "Sacred and Legendary Art," and "Commonplace Book of Thoughts, Memories, and Fancies," are amongst the most important of her labors. Her maiden name was Murphy. — ROBERT, mineralogist and geologist, b. at Leith, 1773; d. 1854. He was for many years editor of the "Edinburgh Journal," a periodical devoted to natural history and science, and was a fellow of several of the learned societies of the United States. — CHARLES DAVIS, brigadier-general of volunteers in the United States army, b. in Gorham, Me. 1827; d. in 1862 of camp-fever, contracted on the peninsula of Virginia. He joined the service as colonel of the 2d Maine volunteers in May, 1861, and was promoted to the rank he held at the time of his death as a recognition of his gallantry at Bull Run. In 1861 and 1862 he was the candidate of the "war democrats" of Maine for the office of governor of that state.

JARVIS, REV. S. FARMER, D. D., b. at Middletown, 1787, an episcopalian minister. Ardently devoted to the interests of the church, he was ordained deacon and priest of his native place by his father, the Right Rev. Abraham Jarvis, D. D., the then bishop of the diocese. In 1811 he was appointed rector of St. Michael's, in the diocese of New York, and in 1813 rector of St. James's church, New York. He resigned his charge in 1819 and became professor of biblical learning in the general theological seminary. Subsequently he was elected rector of St. Paul's, Boston, which appointment he held more than seven years, and then went to Europe, where he remained several years, collecting materials to aid him in the works he was projecting for the benefit of the church. On his return, in 1835, he became rector of Christchurch, Middletown, and while in that office he received from the general convention of 1838 the appointment of "Historiographer of the Church." He prepared an ecclesiastical history of the church, a portion of which has been published. D. 1851.

JAY, WILLIAM, the second son of John Jay, b. in New York, 1789; d. in Bedford, Westchester county, 1858. Educated at Yale college, he studied law at Albany, but was induced by weak health to return to the country and aid in the management of his father's estate, which, at his death in 1839, he inherited. Soon after 1812 he was appointed first judge in Westchester county, which office he held until 1843. He was an early and efficient advocate of the American Bible society, and was one of its vice-presidents. He was also a warm advocate of Sunday-schools, of the peace movement, temperance, and African colonization, and wrote and published much on all these subjects. He was also in correspondence with anti-slavery leaders, and sympathized generally with every philanthropic movement of his day. He published the life and writings of his father.

JELLACHICH, JOSEPH, Baron von, marshal in the Austrian service and Ban of Croatia, was b. 1801, and having been educated in the military academy at Vienna, entered the Austrian army in 1819. Long engaged in the bloody warfare carried on upon the Bosnian frontier, he acquired great influence over the people of Croatia. And when, in 1848, the Hungarians began their struggle for national independence, he induced the Croats to send an embassy to Vienna to declare their readiness to pour out their blood in defending Austrian supremacy. The proposal of the Croats was seized with eagerness by the court at Vienna, and Jellachich returned Ban, or commander-in-chief of the Croat forces. It is now notorious that the deputies who waited on the emperor at Vienna were Jellachich's own purchased instruments. Ban Jellachich collected his army, and had 40,000 men, exclusive of a considerable force from the Austrian regulars, besides arms and ammunition sufficient for every purpose. He fought a battle near Siotok and retreated; and during the night he withdrew his troops to fight again, in a most treacherous manner. His courage, however, did not fail, and he remained in the field until Görgei's surrender and the subjugation of Hungary; Haynau being, part of the time, his commander-in-chief. In 1853, when a dispute arose between Austria and Montenegro, the Ban was appointed commander of the corps of observation on the Danube. D. 1859.

JENIFER, DANIEL, a prominent member of the Maryland legislature, a representative in congress from 1831 to 1833, and from 1835 to 1841; and minister to Austria under presidents Harrison and Tyler. D. 1855.

JERROLD, DOUGLAS, b. in London, 1803. His father was manager of the theatres of Sheerness and Southend, but his own boyish preferences took a nautical turn. A midshipman's commission, and a little active service, soon obliterated the preference, and taught him that his physical strength was unequal to the pursuit. Retiring from the sea, he was apprenticed to a printer, and the cucōthes scribendi soon developed itself. His first attempts were at dramatic criticism, and were so successful as to lead to his transfer from the duties of compositor to those of literary assistant on the Monitor. At 18 he commenced writing for the stage, farce succeeding farce with great rapidity. His "Black-eyed Susan" was produced at the Surrey theatre with unbounded success: it retrieved the fortunes of Elliston, the manager of the Surrey, and gave T. P. Cooke independence. "The Mutiny at the Nore" followed, and others which it were needless to enumerate. Transcending all these efforts, at length appeared his "Rent-Day," suggested by Wilkie's celebrated picture. His success as a dramatic author led Jerrold to become, with Hammond, joint lessee of the Strand theatre, and the enterprise yielded a substantial reward. Becoming ambitious, they exchanged the modest Strand for the pretentious Drury Lane, and the profits of the former were speedily absorbed by the losses of the latter. Jerrold then entered the field of general literature, and contributed some of the most effective sketches to "The Heads of the People," a serial at the time in course of publication. When Punch was started he was absent from England, but on his return he became one of its most constant and most brilliant contributors. His early contributions to Punch were signed "Q," and among them was one on the custom of blessing colors for the army, which the society of friends reprinted for general distribution. "The Story of a Feather," "The Candle Lectures," and "Punch's Letters to his Son," will keep green the memory of Jerrold's connection with that periodical. Notwithstanding his success as a writer, the ventures undertaken by Jerrold on his own account were pecuniary failures. The Illuminated Magazine, the Shilling Magazine, and his Weekly Newspaper, all of them come within this category. He afterward became editor of Lloyd's Newspaper, which, under his management, attained a large circulation. His views of social ethics and of political questions were on the side of the many and against the few. He abhorred the cant which contributes so much to respectability in England, and waged a bitter warfare upon the shams and wrongs which enter so largely into its government. He d. 1857, in the full vigor of his powers. His literary friends presented a testimonial to his widow in the form of an annuity, the result of various performances for her benefit.

JESSUP, THOMAS S., brevet major-general United States army, b. in Virginia, 1790, entered the army in 1808, and served with distinction in the war of 1812. D. 1860.

JOHNSTON, JAMES, F. W., a popular writer on chemistry and some of the allied subjects, b. at Paisley, Scotland, 1786; d. 1855. The best known of his works is the "Chemistry of Common Life." — GEORGE, a physician at Berwick-on-Tweed, a voluminous writer on zoölogy, conchology, and botany. D. 1855. — ALBERT SYDNEY, a confederate general, b. in Mason county, Ky., 1803, graduated at West Point in 1825, served in the Black Hawk war, and in 1836 entered the Texan army, in which he rapidly rose to distinction. In 1846 he commanded a volunteer Texan regiment in Mexico, and served as inspector-general at the siege of Monterey. In 1857 he directed the expedition against the Mormons, and commanded the district of Utah until 1860, when he was removed to San Francisco and placed in command of the department of the Pacific. When the civil war broke out in 1861, he joined the confederates, and was appointed commander-in-chief of the confederate army of the west. He was killed in the battle of Shiloh, April 6, 1862.

JOMARD, EDMÉ FRANCOIS, a French writer on geography, archæology and education, b. 1777; d. 1862. He introduced the Lancasterian system of education into France, and was director of the Institut des Egyptiens, formed for the education of young Egyptians sent by Mehemit Ali to study in Paris.

JONES, ROGER, brevet major-general, adjutant-general of the United States army. He commenced his military career in 1809, as a lieutenant of marines, which commission he held at the outbreak of the war of 1812 with Great Britain, when he was appointed a captain of artillery in the army. His services in the campaigns of 1813 and 1814 on the Niagara frontier, and his gallantry as a major of the staff in the conflicts of Chippewa, Lundy's Lane, and the sortie of Fort Erie, won for him the respect and admiration of his brother officers, and the approbation of the government. He was raised, in 1825, to the post of adjutant-general, which he held at his decease. D.

1852. — JOHN N., brigadier-general confederate service, was b. in Virginia. 1820, and after being educated at West Point, entered the United States army. In 1845 he was appointed assistant instructor of infantry tactics at West Point, but subsequently rejoined the army. He resigned in 1861, and accepted a commission in the confederate army, in which he rose to the rank of brigadier-general. He was killed in battle in Virginia, May, 1864.

JUDD, SYLVESTER, REV., author of "Margaret, a New-England Tale," and other works, was b. at Westhampton, Mass., 1813, graduated at Yale, studied theology at Cambridge, and settled as pastor of a unitarian church at Augusta, Me., where he d., 1853.

JUDSON, MRS. EMILY, (Emily Chubbuck), widow of Adoniram Judson, the well-known baptist missionary to Burmah. As Fanny Forrester she had considerable celebrity as a writer. D. 1854.

JULLIEN, M., a popular musical composer and conductor, b. in France, 1812, performed on the violin in concerts at the age of five, and after directing concerts in Paris, in 1839 went to London, where for 15 years he was a celebrity. He visited this country in 1856, and gave a series of monster concerts in the principal cities. Subsequently he experienced pecuniary reverses, and d. in a lunatic asylum near London, 1860.

K.

KANE, ELISHA KENT, honorably known in connection with Arctic explorations, was a son of Judge Kane, and was b. in Philadelphia in 1822, graduated at the university of Virginia, studied medicine in the university of Pennsylvania, where he graduated in 1843; was soon appointed surgeon to the American mission to China, and travelled extensively in the East and in Egypt, and traversed Greece on foot; served next on the western coast of Africa, was in the Mexican war, and was then in the coast-survey; went as senior surgeon to the first American expedition in search of Sir John Franklin, and published on his return a narrative of the expedition, and soon started in command of the second expedition, which will ever be the noblest monument to his memory. His constitution yielded to the exposure and hardships he had encountered, and he d. in Havana, Cuba, Feb. 16, 1857. His death elicited expressions of sympathetic mourning from all parts; and many cities in the United States passed resolutions honoring his memory.

KEARNY, PHILIP, major-general of volunteers in the United States army, b. in New York, 1815, and educated for the law; in 1837 joined the first dragoons with a commission as second lieutenant. Being sent to France to study and report upon the French cavalry tactics, he entered the polytechnic school, fought in Algeria as a volunteer in the ranks of the chasseurs d'Afrique, and returned to this country with the cross of the legion of honor. He served with the rank of captain under General Scott in Mexico, distinguishing himself at Contreras and Churubusco, and winning additional laurels, but losing his left arm in the attack upon the capital. His next service was in California, where he commanded an expedition against the Indians of the Columbia river. He resigned his commission in 1851, and again went to Europe; serving as volunteer aid on the staff of a French general during the Italian war of 1858, and receiving from the Emperor Napoleon a second decoration of the legion of honor. He returned to the United States immediately after the battle of Bull Run, and having been appointed brigadier-general of volunteers, was placed in command of a New Jersey brigade in General Franklin's division. He served through the Chickahominy campaign in command of a division in General Heintzelman's army corps, and on July 4, 1862, was commissioned major-general. After General McClellan's retreat to the James river, Kearney's division was engaged in various battles between the Rappahannock and Washington, and in one of these, near Chantilly, Va., he was killed, Sept. 1, 1862.

KEATING, JOHN, a native of France, b. 1760, was an officer in the service of Louis XVI., on the death of whom he came to the United States, with a number of families of the French noblesse and the military, and founded the colony known as "The Asylum," near Towanda, Penn. He was the grandson of Jeffries Keating, who raised a troop of horse during the siege of Limerick. D. 1856.

KEIM, WILLIAM H., a brigadier-general in the United States service, b. 1813; d. 1862. He entered service in the civil war with the position of major-general conferred by Governor Curtin of Pennsylvania, and at the outset was in General Patterson's division on the upper Potomac. He joined McClellan's division as a brigadier-general in the fall of 1861, and commanded a brigade composed principally of Pennsylvania regiments.

KEISER, Dr., formerly head of the medical staff of the German army, professor in the university of Jena, and an extensive contributor to German literature. B. 1779; d. 1832.

KEITT, LAWRENCE M., b. in South Carolina, 1824; d. in battle in Virginia, 1864. From 1853 to 1860 he was a representative in congress, resigning in December of the latter year to take part in the secession movement then at work in his native state. He was an active promoter of the ordinance of secession, and was afterwards elected to the confederate congress.

KEMBLE, CHARLES, the last surviving brother of a distinguished family of actors, b. in South Wales, 1775; d. 1854. He possessed remarkable powers as a comedian, and acted the subsidiary characters of the drama with great effect. Miss Fanny Kemble, afterward Mrs. Butler, is his elder daughter. — JOHN MITCHELL, an eminent Anglo-Saxon scholar and archaeologist, and the eldest son of Charles Kemble, was b. 1806. In 1826 he entered at Trinity college, Cambridge, and there graduated B. A. and M. A., at the same time acquiring eminence as a speaker at the "Union," a literary society of which Tennyson, Charles Buller, Maurice, Sterling, and Trench were members. Soon after leaving college, he, with other Englishmen, was induced by General Torrijos to engage in an enterprise for the deliverance of Spain from the tyranny of Ferdinand, reimposed upon the nation by the Bourbons. The plot was betrayed to the Spanish government, and Torrijos and several of his friends were shot. By an accident Kemble was prevented from landing in Spain, and thus escaped the fate of his comrades. He next resided in Germany, where he became an intimate friend and disciple of the celebrated Jacob Grimm. Returning to England, Kemble was appointed editor of the "British and Foreign Review," during the management of which he produced his "Saxons in England," a work mainly founded on a collection of documents relating to the Saxon period, which he had amassed from various sources. A great archaeological work, the "Horse Ferales," for which he found materials amongst the ancient sepulchres of Germany and England, was left by Mr. Kemble unfinished, his death occurring suddenly in Dublin, 1857.

KEMENY, BARON, one of the most celebrated officers of the Hungarian war of independence, afterwards chief to the Hungarian committee in England. D. in London, 1852, aged 63.

KENRICK, FRANCIS PATRICK, D. D., an eminent catholic controversialist and biblical critic, b. in Dublin, 1797. After receiving a classical education in Ireland, he proceeded to Rome to study for the church, and in 1821 was ordained a priest. He came to the United States in the same year, and for nine years officiated as the head of an ecclesiastical seminary at Bardstown, Ky. In 1830 he was consecrated bishop of Arath, and coadjutor to bishop Conwell, of Philadelphia. On the death of the latter, in 1842, Dr. Kenrick became his successor. In 1851 he was transferred to the archiepiscopal see of Baltimore, and in 1859 received from the pope "the primacy of honor," conferring upon him and his successors precedence over other catholic prelates in the United States. He was the author of many controversial works, all of them remarkable for learning and power; and also of two treatises on dogmatic theology, "Theologia Dogmatica" and "Theologia Moralis," which are extensively used as text-books. At the time of his death he was engaged upon a revised English version of the scriptures, a large part of which has been published. D. in Baltimore, 1863.

- KENT, VICTORIA MARIA LOUISA, Duchess of, the mother of Queen Victoria, b. in Saxe-Coburg, 1786; d. near Windsor, 1861. She was married twice; first to the Prince of Leiningen, who d. in 1814, and in 1818 to Edward, Duke of Kent, fourth son of George III. — WILLIAM, an American jurist, son of Chancellor Kent, b. 1802; d. 1861.

KESTNER, CHEVALIER, author of a volume on painting and of different essays on the fine arts. At one time Hanoverian minister at the court of Rome. D. at Rome, 1853.

KETTEL, SAMUEL, b. in Newburyport, Mass., 1800, early engaged in literary pursuits, and was an assistant of Mr. Goodrich in preparing the "Peter Parley" books. A self-educated man, he became an accomplished linguist, and translated one of the Parley volumes into modern Greek. He was for some time a contributor to the "Boston Courier," and on the retirement of Mr. Buckingham, in 1848, he assumed the editorship of that journal. He was representative from Boston in the state legislature in 1851-52; and d. in Malden, Mass., 1855.

KIDD, JOHN, professor at Oxford, England, author of one of the "Bridge-water Treatises," and of works on medicine, mineralogy, and geology. B. 1775; d. 1857.

KILVERT, REV. FRANCIS, an English clergyman, author of "Memoirs of the Life and Writings of Bishop Hurd." B. 1793; d. 1863.

KING, WILLIAM, the first governor of Maine, and one who figured conspicuously in the political relations of the state, was b. in Scarborough in 1768, and was a brother of Hon. Rufus King. He removed to Bath about the commencement of the present century. His name is identified most intimately with all that relates to the separation from Massachusetts, and the adoption of the state constitution. D. 1852. — PHILIP PARKER, rear-admiral, was b. at Norfolk Island, of which his father was then governor, and entered the British navy in 1807. He served in several expeditions, among which was a survey of the coasts of Australia in 1817, the results of which are contained in a work which, with an accompanying atlas, he compiled. In 1825 he was employed to survey the southern coast of America, from the entrance of the Rio Plata round to Chiloe, and of Terra del Fuego, and in 1832 published a volume entitled "Sailing Directions to the Coasts of Eastern and Western Patagonia," &c. On retiring from active service, in 1830, he went back to Australia and d. there, 1856. —

THOMAS STARR, — author of "The White Hills, their Legends, Landscapes, and Poetry," and a distinguished unitarian clergyman, b. in New York, 1824. His father, the Rev. F. F. King, a universalist minister, d. early, and at the age of 12 the son entered upon employment to assist in the family's maintenance. He devoted his leisure hours to study, and after preaching in Woburn and Charlestown, became pastor of the unitarian church in Hollis street, Boston, with which he was connected from 1848 to 1860. In the latter year, being invited by the unitarians of San Francisco to be their minister, he removed to that city. Apart from his pulpit efforts, he enjoyed great popularity as a lecturer. D. 1864.

— T. BUTLER, long prominent in the politics and in connection with the internal improvements of Georgia, was b. in Hampden, Mass., 1804, and, after studying law, removed to Georgia in 1823 and became a planter. He sat several years in the state senate, and was thrice elected a representative to congress. He also took an active part in the Milledgeville convention in 1833, and in the Macon railroad convention in 1836. He resided some time in California, but on his return to Georgia was again elected a state senator. He identified himself with the secession authorities at an early stage of the civil war, and went to Europe as a commissioner. D. in Georgia, 1864. —

WILLIAM, R., many years a senator in congress from Alabama, during a part of which he officiated as president pro tem.; minister to France; and elected vice-president of the United States in 1852. He was b. in North Carolina in 1786, but removed to Alabama, and devoted himself to planting. At the time of his election as vice-president his health was feeble, and when the period of the inauguration arrived he was in Cuba, where the oath of office was administered by the United States consul. He returned to Alabama, and d. 1853.

KINGSLEY, JAMES L., was b. in Windham, Conn., 1778. He graduated at Yale college in 1799. He returned to the college as tutor in 1801, and for half a century was one of the prominent instructors in that institution. In 1805 he was chosen professor of languages and ecclesiastical history. In 1831 he relinquished instruction in Greek, on the appointment of Professor Woolsey, and he ceased to teach Hebrew about the year 1836. After that period his department was limited to the Latin language and literature. He was also the librarian of the college from 1805 to 1824. In 1851 he resigned his official connection with the college, but consented to retain his title as professor emeritus. He was a scholar of extensive, varied, and exact learning, and as a writer distinguished for accuracy, terseness, and force. Many important papers on subjects of literary and classical criticism were published by him in the reviews and other periodical works. D. 1852.

KIRK, EDWARD N., brigadier-general United States service, b. in Ohio, wounded in the battle of Stone river, d. 1863. He commanded a brigade at Shiloh and Corinth.

KITTO, JOHN, a theological writer, whose labors and researches have contributed largely to the diffusion of biblical literature, was b. at Plymouth, England, and received little more than the bare rudiments of education. An accident during his boyhood deprived him of his hearing, and so shattered his nervous system as to unfit him for the manual labors of his father's trade,—that of a jobbing mason. A long confinement developed a taste for reading, and eventually the idea sprung up in his mind that the taste for books might be turned to account as a means of support. His reading was chiefly, though not exclusively, directed to sacred literature, and after two extensive tours which he was enabled to make through northern Europe and western Asia,—where the observance of manners and customs analogous to those described in the scriptures interested and impressed him,—he returned to England, resolved to use the literary materials he had amassed for the illustration of the sacred volume. The "Pictorial Bible" was the first work he attempted, and its success secured him ready employment from booksellers in other compilations of a similar nature. "The Pictorial History of Palestine" and "The Court of Persia" were amongst the next products of his labor, which he continued with untiring assiduity, rarely contenting himself with less than fourteen hours of literary work. In conjunction with several coadjutors, he next projected and edited "The Cyclopædia of Biblical Literature" and "The Journal of Sacred Literature"; following these with the "Daily Illustrations of the Bible,"—a compilation distinguished by skillfulness of arrangement and simplicity of style, and bringing together a vast fund of information relating to sacred history, biography, geography, and antiquities. His rare attainments in theology earned for him the degree of doctor in divinity, and a pension of $500 was granted to him by the British government. His labors proved too much for his strength, and a painful neuralgic affection incapacitated him for literary exertion for a couple of years. With a view to the restoration of his health he removed to Cannstadt, in Germany, and there d. in 1855.

KNOWLES, JAMES SHERIDAN, dramatist and author, b. at Cork, 1794; d. 1862. A passion for the drama was manifested at a very early age. On his removal to London, he obtained an introduction to William Hazlitt, of whom he was afterward accustomed to speak as his mental sire, and through whom he made the acquaintance of many literary men. After a residence of fourteen years, he exchanged London for Dublin, and in the latter city made his debut as an actor. The effort was not successful, and for a time the stage was abandoned. At Belfast he opened an academy as a teacher of grammar and elocution, and while thus employed produced the dramas on which his celebrity principally rests. Having been made the recipient of a pension of $1000, his pen lapsed into idleness. Yet later in life he turned from dramas to theology, from the stage to the pulpit, identifying himself zealously with the baptist church.

KOLOWRAT, LIEBSTENSKY FRANZ ANTON, Duke of, b. in Prague, 1778; d. 1861. He held an influential position in Bohemia, and in 1826 was called to the counsels of the Austrian empire. He founded the Bohemian national museum at Prague, and bequeathed to it a large and valuable library, with an endowment.

KOLTES, JOHN A., b. in Rhenish Prussia, in 1823, came to this country in 1846, and served in the Mexican war. In 1861 he raised a German regiment and took the field in support of the Union. He was killed at the battle of Gainesville, Va., 1862, being at the time an acting-brigadier-general in General Steinwehr's division.

KOWER, the MAHARANEE JENDAN, the favorite wife of Runjeet Singh, Maharajah of Lahore, — at one time the most powerful sultana in Asia, — b. about 1780; d. in exile in England, 1863.

KOZMIAN, ANDREAS EDOUARD, the Polish translator of Shakspeare, d. in Galicia, 1864.

KRAITSIR, DR. CHARLES, a Hungarian philologist, b. 1804, was educated in the university of Pesth; and having taken part in the Polish revolution, was exiled, and came to the United States in 1833. He became professor of modern languages in the university of Virginia, and published some treatises on philology. D. 1860.

KRASINSKI, COUNT VALERIAN, a Polish diplomatist and historical writer, exiled from his country; d. at Edinburgh, 1855.

KUYLER, FRANZ THEODORE, professor of the history of art in the royal academy, Berlin, b. at Stettin, 1808; d. 1858.

L.

LABLACHE, LOUIS, a lyric comedian, b. 1792. He made his début in England in 1830, and for many years reigned supreme on the stage of the Italian opera. D. in Naples, 1858.

LACORDAIRE, JEAN BAPTISTE HENRI, an eloquent catholic priest, long the most celebrated preacher in Paris, b. in the department of Côte d'Or, France, 1802. In his youth he went through a course of law studies at Dijon, and was then an avowed sceptic. He was admitted to the bar in 1822, and practised in Paris until 1824, when he entered the theological seminary of St. Sulpice. He was ordained to the priesthood in 1827, and in 1830 became the associate of Lamennais and Montalembert in the publication of "L'Avenir." When the pope, Gregory XVI., in 1832, issued an encyclical letter denouncing the principles propounded in this journal, Lacordaire bowed to the authority of the church, and devoted himself to preaching at Notre Dame. In 1840 he entered the convent of Minerva, and took the Dominican habit, in the following year resuming his place in the pulpit of Notre Dame, where with white robe and shaven head he enchained crowded assemblages, including the most eminent men in Paris. His liberal political views adhered to him, and when the revolution of 1848 occurred he was elected to the constituent assembly, and ranged himself with the most decided republicans. He seems to have found the alliance distasteful, for he soon resigned. Political allusions, however, were introduced into his discourses, and in 1853 led to his temporary retirement from Notre Dame. In the following year he retired permanently, and assumed the direction of the college of Sorreze. In 1860 he was elected to the academy of France as the successor of M. de Tocqueville. D. 1861.

LAMAR, MIRABEAU B., the second president of the republic of Texas, and subsequently United States minister to Central America; d. 1859.

LAMENNAIS, HUGUES FELICITÉ ROBERT DE, one of the most extraordinary men of his time, was b. at St. Malo in 1782. He entered the catholic priesthood with extreme ultramontane views. Soon after Napoleon had concluded the "Concordat" with the pope, he published his "Reflections on the State of the Church," which gave great offence to the imperial government, and was suppressed. In 1811 he became teacher of mathematics in the chief school of St. Malo. Here he wrote his "Tradition de l'Eglise." He hailed the restoration of the Bourbons with satisfaction in 1814, and during the "Hundred Days" he escaped to England. After the fall of Napoleon in 1815, he returned to France; and in 1817 he published the first volume of his "Essai sur l'Indifférence en matière de Religion." Soon afterwards he became connected with the "Conservateur," a royalist journal; and after his return from a journey to Rome, he published, in 1825, his "Religion considérée dans ses Rapports avec l'Ordre civil et politique," in which he contended that the pope should be placed, as in the middle ages, at the head of all temporal and spiritual matters. For proclaiming these doctrines he was brought to trial, and condemned to pay a small fine. A change now came over him. Without abandoning his ultramontane views, he became a strenuous advocate for the separation of church and state. These opinions were set forth with great power in his "Progrès de la Revolution," published in 1829, which foretold the revolution that placed Louis Philippe on the throne in 1830; and in conjunction with M. Montalembert and the Abbé Lacordaire, he then started the "Avenir," with the view of effecting a holy alliance between the catholic church and democracy. But these sentiments found no echo at Rome; and after a short period passed in negotiating, and in a visit to the pope, the "Avenir" was discontinued. M. Lamennais then quitted Paris for some time; and in 1834 he sent forth the "Paroles d'un Croyant," in which he threw off his allegiance to the pope, who, in return, issued an encyclical letter, in which it was formally condemned. Various works of a similar tendency emanated from his fertile pen. In 1840 he was condemned to a year's imprisonment, and a fine of 2000 francs, for a publication entitled "Le Pays et le Gouvernement," in which king Louis Philippe, his ministers, and the parliament were assailed. The next few years were occupied with the preparation of his "Esquisse d'une Philosophie," of which four volumes have appeared. After the revolution of 1848, he was elected a member of the constituent and legislative assemblies; and on the coup d'état, he retired into private life. Towards the close of 1853 he was attacked by a fatal disorder; and strong efforts were made by his friends to induce him to be reconciled to the church, but in vain. He died on January 27, 1854, and in compliance with his will, his remains were cast into the common grave of the poor, no funeral ceremonies being performed over them.

LANDER, FREDERICK WILLIAM, b. in Salem, Mass., 1822, was educated as a civil engineer, and for several years practised his profession in his native state. He was employed by the federal government on several important occasions, including a survey to determine the practicability of a railroad route to the Pacific along the northern boundary of the United States. From a second survey of the same nature, organized at his own expense, he alone of all the party engaged returned alive. Subsequently he surveyed and constructed the central overland wagon route to the Pacific, exploring passes in the Wahsatch mountains until then unknown, and gaining a decisive victory over the Pah Ute Indians, by whom he and his party were attacked. At the commencement of the civil war in 1861, he offered his services to the national government, and was employed on several secret missions in the southern states.

He served as a volunteer aid on the staff of Gen. McClellan, and distinguished himself by coolness and courage in the capture of Philippi and the battle of Rich Mountain. In July he was appointed a brigadier-general of volunteers, and served with great efficiency at various points on the Upper Potomac. At Edward's Ferry he was wounded in the leg, but before the wound was healed reported for duty, and was placed in command of Gen. Kelley's forces at Romney. From this period to the end of February, 1862, despite debility resulting from his wound, he performed much arduous work with daring and skill, and by a succession of dashing and impetuous charges strengthening the attachment of his troops, and eliciting a special letter of thanks from the war department. Ill health now compelled him to apply for a respite from active duty. Pending compliance with his request, he prepared for a midnight surprise upon the enemy; but the exertion proved too much for his enfeebled frame, and on the 2d March, 1862, he d. suddenly of congestion of the brain. His death was made the subject of a deservedly eulogistic special order issued to the army of the Potomac by Gen. McClellan.

LANDOR, WALTER SAVAGE, an English poet and littérateur, author of "Imaginary Conversations," started life with an ample private fortune. In 1806 he sold large estates which he had inherited, and in 1808 raised, at his own expense, a body of troops, with whom he joined Blake, the viceroy of Galicia. For his services to Spain he received the thanks of the supreme junta. He married in 1811, and retired to Italy. More recently he returned to England, and made Bath his home; all the time maintaining intimate relations with the leaders of European liberalism, and using his means to further their cause. Events of a painful though private nature led to his final abandonment of England, and he d. in Italy, 1864.

LANDSEER, JOHN, a celebrated engraver, b. in London, 1761. His best works at an early period were vignettes; and indeed these have been rarely if ever surpassed. A quarrel with the royal academy on the question of admitting engravers to the rank and title of royal academicians, largely alienated him from the profession. Of his productions afterwards nothing of importance remains to be recorded, except the "Antiquities of Dacca," a work chiefly of illustration, of which the name sufficiently denotes the character. His literary and antiquarian productions consist of "Observations on the Engraved Gems brought from Babylon to England by Abraham Lockett, Esq., considered with reference to Early Scripture History," and "Sabæan Researches," founded also on remains brought from Babylon by Captain Lockett. D. 1852.

LANG, OLIVER, an eminent ship-builder, and the first to design a steam vessel for the English navy. D. at Woolwich, 1853.

LANGDALE, LORD HENRY BICKERSTETH, a celebrated English lawyer, b. 1783; d. 1851.

LANSDOWNE, HENRY PETTY FITZ MAURICE, Marquis of, an English statesman, of the whig party, b. 1780, entered parliament in 1802, and succeeded Pitt as chancellor of the exchequer in 1806. He was home secretary, 1827; and lord president of the council at three different periods. For many years he was leader of the whig party in the house of lords. D. 1863.

LARDNER, DIONYSIUS, DR., was b. in Wexford, Ireland, and in 1817 graduated at Trinity college, Dublin. He remained at the university ten years, and published treatises on mathematics, and on the steam-engine, and wrote various scientific articles. In 1827 he was elected professor of natural philosophy and astronomy in the London university. He held the office only a short period, and then devoted himself to the publication of the "Cabinet Cyclopædia." In 1840 he visited the United States, where he lectured with great success. He returned to Europe in 1845. His last important work was the "Museum of Science and Art." D. 1859.

LARNED, BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, paymaster-general of the United States army, with the rank of colonel, b. in Massachusetts, 1791; d. 1862. He entered the army, as an ensign in an infantry regiment, in 1813, and in the following year distinguished himself in the defence of Fort Erie. — WILLIAM AUGUSTUS, professor of rhetoric and English literature in Yale college, and a contributor to the "New Englander," b. in Thompson, Conn., 1806; d. of apoplexy in 1862. He prepared and printed, but did not publish, an edition of the "Oration of Demosthenes on the Crown," with notes.

LAROCHE, BENJAMIN, French translator of Shakspeare and Byron, b. 1798; d. 1852.

LAVALETTE, ELIE A. F., rear-admiral United States navy, b. in Virginia; d. at Philadelphia, 1862.

LAWRENCE, CORNELIUS VAN WYCK, a prominent banker of New York, and formerly an active politician, b. 1791; d. 1861. — ABBOTT, the fifth son of Samuel Lawrence, was b. in Groton, Mass., 1792. Having enjoyed such advantages of education as the district schools of that time and the Groton (now Lawrence) academy afforded, he came to Boston, and in 1808 entered his brother Amos's store as clerk. In 1814 he formed a partnership with his brother, under the firm of A. and A. Lawrence. The first year of the partnership proving unsuccessful, Mr. Lawrence had serious thoughts of entering the army, but returning peace bringing back a vigorous revival of the commercial and industrial interests of the country, he relinquished the idea. The firm entered largely into the importing business, and he went several times to Europe as the importing agent of the firm. Upon the establishment of the tariff, Mr. Lawrence and his associates turned their energy to the building up of American manufactures. He was one of the seven delegates from his state to the Harrisburg convention of 1827, and until his death he aided, by his money, advice, and experience, this great department of American labor. The city of Lawrence, projected by him, perpetuates alike his name and the memory of his deeds. His views upon these subjects are illustrated in a series of letters addressed to the Hon. Wm. C. Rives of Virginia, and published in one of the Richmond papers in 1846. In 1834 he was elected to congress and served the term. He declined a reëlection, but consented, in 1839, to be a candidate to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Richard Fletcher; was elected, and took his seat in the house in December of that year. In 1842 he was appointed a commissioner on the part of Massachusetts to arrange the northeastern boundary question, and rendered most efficient service. In 1849 he was invited by General Taylor to take a seat in his cabinet. He declined the offer, but accepted the appointment of minister to Great Britain. D. 1855. — AMOS, brother of Abbott Lawrence, and for many years his partner in business, was a prosperous merchant, and acquired a large fortune, which he distributed with unsurpassed generosity. His unostentatious charities amounted in a few years to several hundred thousand dollars. B. 1775; d. 1852.

LAWSON, HENRY, an English savant, b. 1774; d. 1855. In 1846 he published "The Arrangement of an Observatory for Practical Astronomy and Meteorology," and in the following year a "History of the New Planets."

LEAKE, WILLIAM MARTIN, b. 1777; d. 1860. He commenced his career in the British army, but soon afterward devoted himself to the illustration of Greek topography and antiquities. These subjects he treated with great learning and accuracy in his "Researches in Greece," published in 1814, and in his "Topography of Athens," and "Journal of a War in Asia Minor," published in 1821 and 1824. These works were followed by "Travels in Northern Greece," "Peloponnesiaca," and "Numismatica Hellica."

LEE, HARRIET, the author of the "Canterbury Tales," and other works of great literary merit, d. near Bristol, 1851, at the age of 95. — SAMUEL, a great master of biblical and oriental literature, and regius professor of Hebrew in the university of Cambridge, was originally a carpenter. A record of his studies and advancement exhibits remarkable perseverance in self-education under embarrassing circumstances, rewarded at last by the highest success in the career marked out for himself. He edited the scriptures in the Arabic, Persian, and Malay languages. B. 1783; d. 1852. — WILLIAM L. was b. at Sandy Hill, N. Y., 1821. He graduated at Norwich university in 1841, and was for one year superintendent of the military academy in Portsmouth, Va.; studied law at the Dane law school in Cambridge, and in 1844 began to practise law in Troy, N. Y. His health failed him and he sailed for Oregon, on the way touching at Honolulu, where he was persuaded to remain. He was at once appointed to a high judicial position, and on the reorganization of the judiciary, after the adoption of the constitution of 1852, he was made chief-justice and chancellor. He was a member of the privy council, and in 1851 was speaker of the legislative assembly. He was one of the three commissioners to draft the new constitution, and the civil and penal codes were chiefly prepared by him. In 1855 he was envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from the Sandwich Islands to the United States. D. in Honolulu, 1857.

LEECH, JOHN, an artist, whose weekly contributions to Punch earned for him a world-wide celebrity, was b. in London, 1816, and d. 1864. He succeeded in hitting the most salient points of the incidents he illustrated, and his likenesses are so well sketched as at once to suggest the subject of his pencil in all possible peculiarities. He published, in a collected form, some hundreds of his sketches, entitled "Pictures of Life and Character," forming an ample fund of humor.

LESLIE, CHARLES ROBERT, artist and author, was b. of American parents in London, 1794. In 1799 his father left England and settled in Philadelphia, where the young painter was educated. He returned to England in 1811, where he received instruction from West and Allston, both American-born artists. Leslie was elected associate of the academy in 1821; R. A., in 1826. Seven years afterward he was appointed by the United States government professor of drawing to the military academy at West Point, which post he resigned after a few months' trial, and returned finally to England, where he soon secured a high position as the most poetic of painters, and the one most truly progressive in his excellence. His art was as refined as it was unconventional. Of Shakspeare he was the only imaginative illustrator of his time. His scenes from "Don Quixote" exhibit qualities kindred to those of the text. Sterne, Fielding, Smollett, and other congenial authors, he adequately put on canvas, often in language more refined than their own. Leslie's earliest works included historical and religious themes, "Saul and the Witch of Endor" being one. Among his more successful early pictures were, "Sir Roger de Coverley," "Anne Page and Slender," and "May-day in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth." All these are universally known in their engraved form. In "Martha and Mary," and "The Pharisee and the Publican," he displayed a capacity for treating religious subjects with deep feeling and in an original style. A favorite subject with him was the story of Lady Jane Grey. His pictures from domestic life are unapproachable in sweetness of feeling and of art. Among his more important portrait-pieces are "Sir Walter Scott," "Coronation of the Queen," and the "Christening of the Princess Royal." In 1844 he executed one of the frescos from "Comus," for Prince Albert, in the Buckingham palace summer-house. Leslie was a lover of literature, and keenly relished the great authors of the last century, whom he delighted to reproduce on canvas. In 1845 he produced a "Life" of his friend Constable, a genuine and unaffected piece of biography. He was professor of painting at the academy from 1848 to 1851; and his lectures have been published, with additions, as a "Hand-Book for Young Painters." D. 1859.

LEWIS, SIR GEORGE CORNEWALL, an English statesman and author, b. 1806; d. 1863. He was educated at Eton and Oxford, and in 1831 was called to the bar. In 1847 he entered the house of commons, and he remained a member of it until his death, with the exception of three years, during which he lacked a constituency. He was secretary of the board of control in 1847, secretary to the treasury in 1850; became chancellor of the exchequer, under Lord Palmerston, in 1855, and secretary for the home department in 1859. On the outbreak of the civil war in this country, in 1861, he was one of the first to avow his sympathy with the cause of the Union. For a short time he was editor of the "Edinburgh Review," and was well known as a classical scholar and writer on historical and allied subjects. His most important work is an "Enquiry into the Credibility of Early Roman History."

LICHTENSTEIN, MARTIN CHARLES HENRY, professor of natural history in the university of Berlin, and a distinguished physician, b. 1780; d. in Denmark, 1857.

LINCOLN, ABRAHAM, sixteenth president of the United States, was b. in Hardin county, Ky., Feb. 12th, 1809. His grandfather removed from Virginia to Kentucky in 1782, and was soon afterward killed by Indians. Thomas Lincoln, Abraham's father, migrated with his family, in 1816, to Spencer county, Ind., where Abraham labored on a farm for ten years; his schooling being confined to intervals so brief that in the aggregate it did not exceed 12 months. At 19 he was a hired hand on a Mississippi flat-boat, trading between St. Louis and New Orleans. In 1830 he accompanied his father to a new home in Macon county, Ill., where he assisted in building a log-house and in splitting rails to fence the first field. In 1831 he engaged in the construction of a flat-boat and in its navigation to New Orleans, working so much to the satisfaction of his employer that on his return he was placed in charge of a mill and store at New Salem, Menard county, Ill. In the Black Hawk war he joined a company of volunteers, was elected their captain, and served through the campaign. At its close he was nominated by the whigs of his district a candidate for the state legislature, but without success. He next kept a country store, and then became postmaster of New Salem. Here he commenced the study of law, for a time also doing the work of an assistant surveyor. In 1834 his whig friends elected him a member of the legislature. In 1836 and 1840 he was reelected, and by his course acquired popularity and influence. He was chairman of the finance committee, and in connection with his colleague from Sangamon county, wrote a notable protest against the passage of resolutions protecting slavery in Illinois; affirming the injustice and inexpediency of the institution, but declaring that congress had no power to interfere with it. Meanwhile he had been licensed to practise law, and had removed his residence to Springfield, the capital of the state. In 1844 he canvassed Illinois and part of Indiana for Henry Clay, and in 1846 was elected a representative in congress from the central district of Illinois. He took his seat in Dec. 1847, and in his congressional career supported the Wilmot proviso, voted for the reception of anti-slavery petitions, urged inquiry into the constitutionality of slavery in the District of Columbia, and affirmed the expediency of abolishing the slave-trade there; and, finally, submitted a plan for the abolition of slavery in the district and for the compensation of slave-owners. He supported a protective tariff, favored the reduction of the price of public lands, opposed the annexation of Texas and the Mexican war; but voted for the war-loan bill and for resolutions prohibiting slavery in the territory to be acquired from Mexico. In 1849 he was a candidate for the United States senate, but was defeated. On retiring from congress he resumed the practice of his profession at Springfield, but reappeared in the political arena on the repeal of the Missouri compromise, and did much to secure the defeat of General Shields, and the election of Judge Trumbull to the senate in his place. Mr. Lincoln was now thoroughly identified with the republican party, and was pressed as a candidate for the vice-presidency upon the national convention which nominated Fremont and Dayton in 1856. In 1858 his party unanimously nominated him for the United States senate in opposition to Mr. Douglas. The two candidates traversed the state simultaneously, speaking at the same place on the same day, and Mr. Lincoln's speeches in this canvass first gained for him a national reputation. He avowed himself adverse to the unconditional repeal of the fugitive-slave law, and refused to pledge himself against the admission of any more slave states into the Union, if the people of any new state chose to adopt a slave constitution. Some of his utterances, read in the light of subsequent events, sound prophetic. "I believe," he said, "this government cannot endure permanently half slave and half free. I do not expect the Union to be dissolved; I do not expect the house to fall; but I do expect it will cease to be divided." Although Mr. Lincoln had a majority over his opponent on the popular vote, he was defeated in the legislature. In May, 1860, he was nominated for the presidency by the republican national convention assembled at Chicago, and was elected. His popular vote, with three other candidates in the field, was 1,857,610; and his vote in the electoral college 180, against 143 for all others. His election was the signal for the movements which southern politicians had threatened. The brief addresses he delivered at various points of his journey from Springfield eastward, did not indicate an appreciation of the gravity of the crisis. He anticipated little difficulty, and congratulated his hearers that "nobody was hurt." On his arrival at Philadelphia, Feb. 21st, 1861, he was informed of a plan for his assassination during his passage through the streets of Baltimore. He spoke at Harrisburg on the next day, and having returned privately to Philadelphia, left by the regular night train for Washington, where he arrived on the morning of the 23d. His inaugural address was candid and conciliatory. He declared that he had no purpose, "directly or indirectly, to interfere with the institution of slavery where it exists"; but he left no room to suppose that secession would be tolerated. His peaceful overtures were of no avail. Fort Sumter, in Charleston harbor, was bombarded and compelled to surrender. On the 15th of April, President Lincoln issued his first proclamation calling out 75,000 of the militia, and convening an extra session of congress. By other proclamations he declared the blockade of all the ports of the United States south of the Chesapeake, increased the regular army and navy, and called for 500,000 volunteers to serve during three years. These measures were promptly ratified by congress. His desire still was to restore peace and unity, without interfering with the institution of slavery. Hence his modification of the order of General Fremont for the emancipation of the slaves of rebels in Missouri, and his repudiation of the similar order of General Hunter in regard to South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, with the reservation to himself of the right to take such a step, as commander-in-chief, when it should become a military necessity. He held, further, that compensation should attend emancipation. Events did not allow Mr. Lincoln long to halt upon the subject. On Sept. 22, 1862, he issued a preliminary proclamation, setting forth his purpose to emancipate all slaves in states, or parts of states, which should remain in insurrection on the first of the ensuing January. This radical change of policy he justified as a military measure. With regard to Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, and such portions of Tennessee, Louisiana, and West Virginia, as were loyal or under the control of the Union forces, it had been Mr. Lincoln's desire that they should adopt some plan of gradual emancipation; and accordingly, on the 6th of March, 1862, he recommended to congress the passage of a resolution pledging the pecuniary aid of the national government to any state adopting a system of gradual and compensated emancipation. He afterward urged this measure upon members from the border slave states, and renewed it in his message of Dec. 3, 1862. These proceedings served to prepare the public mind for the emancipation proclamation of Jan. 1st, 1863. In letters published during this year he defended the conscription law, the principle of military arrests in time of civil war, and the employment of colored regiments then being raised. In the summer of 1864 attempts were ineffectually made to induce him to modify his policy on the slavery question; but he persisted in holding "the integrity of the whole Union and the abandonment of slavery" an essential condition of any negotiation looking toward peace. How generally the people of the loyal states shared this determination was proved by the majority with which Mr. Lincoln was reelected to the presidency in Nov., 1864. In his message to congress in December he renewed his recommendation for the passage of a constitutional amendment forever prohibiting slavery within the United States, and the popular will found a reflex in the decision of congress in favor of the measure. In January, 1865, overtures for peace were received, and Mr. Seward, secretary of state, was ordered to Fortress Monroe to meet commissioners appointed by Mr. Jefferson Davis. On that occasion the instructions dictated by Mr. Lincoln embodied three conditions as indispensable to peace: 1. The territorial integrity of the Union; 2. No abandonment or modification of executive or congressional action on the subject of slavery; 3. No armistice. Subject to these terms, Mr. Lincoln was so earnestly desirous of peace, that he followed Mr. Seward on the mission, and was present with him at a conference with the Richmond commissioners in Hampton Roads. The effort, though bootless, and undertaken at the risk of displeasing a section of his own party, vindicated Mr. Lincoln's position, and greatly increased his moral influence in the north. The effect was heightened by the tone and style of the brief address delivered by Mr. Lincoln on his second inauguration, March, 1865. A few weeks later, when the strategy of General Grant had restored Richmond to the Union, and President Lincoln temporarily occupied the mansion which Mr. Jefferson Davis had hastily abandoned, the same firmness, mingled with the same conciliatory spirit, was exhibited. The terms on which General Lee surrendered were dictated by General Grant in conformity with Mr. Lincoln's instructions; and he made no secret of his intention to afford the confederate leaders an opportunity to leave the country. He was not permitted, however, to witness the final triumph of the war he conducted, or of the policy he inaugurated in the interest of justice and humanity. He lived to hear only the earliest echoes of the nation's joy. While sitting in a private box at Ford's theatre, Washington, with Mrs. Lincoln and some friends, on the night of Friday, April 14, 1865, an assassin entered and shot him in the back of the head; at the same instant leaping upon the stage from the box, brandishing a knife and exclaiming, "Sic semper tyrannis," and escaping from the rear of the building. The president was conveyed in a state of syncope to a neighboring house, where he lingered, totally insensible, until a few minutes after seven on the following morning. The murderer was recognized as J. Wilkes Booth, an actor; and it was subsequently ascertained that the horrible deed was but one feature of a scheme for the concurrent destruction of the president, the vice-president, the secretary of state, and General Grant. Besides the president, Mr. Seward alone suffered, and he not mortally. The death of Mr. Lincoln, at such a time and under such circumstances, appalled the country. Business was for several days suspended. A poignant sorrow pervaded all classes, and manifested itself in a thousand ways. They who deemed themselves constrained to oppose particular measures of his administration, now joined his party supporters in bearing testimony to the inflexible honesty of his purpose and the gentleness of his nature. It was felt that though greater statesmen and abler men have passed away, to him belongs the credit of having cautiously but judiciously adapted his measures to the needs and temper of the times. His remains were conveyed to Springfield, Ill., for interment, amidst memorable evidences of mourning along the entire route.

LINDSAY, JAMES B., a remarkable linguist, a native of Scotland, b. 1800; d. 1862. He published the Lord's Prayer and the Creed in 50 different languages, and at the time of his death had nearly completed a polyglot dictionary of equal extent.

LINGARD, DR. JOHN, the Roman catholic historian of England, b. in Winchester, 1771; d. 1851. Learned and conscientious, he lived in illustrious humility, preferring the quiet prosecution of his studies and duties to the honor of a cardinal's hat.

LISTON, MRS., formerly Miss Tyrer, widow of the well-known John Liston, and a meritorious comic actress, d. 1854.

LITTLE, HENRY, a confederate brigadier-general, b. in Mississippi, 1818; killed in battle, 1862. He was formerly an officer in the United States army, and at the commencement of the civil war commanded the post of Albuquerque in New Mexico. — JACOB, for many years a leading operator on the New York stock exchange, b. in Mass., 1797; d. 1865.

LOCKE, JOHN, b. in Fryeburg, Me., 1792, studied medicine, and having received the degree of M. D. at Yale college in 1819, was for a time a surgeon in the United States navy. After conducting schools in Kentucky and Cincinnati, in 1836 he was appointed professor of chemistry in the medical college of Ohio. He was a zealous geologist, and was connected with the geological surveys of Ohio and of the mineral region of Lake Superior. His name is especially associated with magnetical researches and the "magneto-astronomical clock." D. 1856.

LOCKHART, JOHN GIBSON, the son of a Glasgow minister, and the son-in-law and biographer of Sir Walter Scott, b. 1794. Educated at Glasgow and Oxford, he went to Germany to study its literature, and soon became a professional author. He was one of the earliest, most active, and most sarcastic of the writers in "Blackwood's Magazine," and was considered responsible for much of the unscrupulous bitterness which characterized its palmy days. In 1819 he published anonymously "Peter's Letters to his Kinsfolk." He next collected his spirited versions of Spanish ballads, and then produced, in succession, his novels, "Valerius," "Reginald Dalton," "Adam Blair," and "Matthew Wald." He assumed the editorship of the "Quarterly Review" in 1826, and retained it until 1853, when ill health compelled his retirement. His "Life of Scott" appeared in the interim. A visit to Italy failed to restore his health, and he d. at Abbotsford in 1854.

LONDONDERRY, CHARLES WILLIAM, Marquis of, author of a history of the Peninsular war, in which he served with distinction. d. 1854.

LONGWORTH, NICHOLAS, an Ohio vine-grower, b. in New Jersey, 1782. Having studied law, he removed to Ohio in 1803, and settled at Cincinnati, then a little village. The practice of his profession enabled him to acquire real estate, which the growth of Cincinnati invested with enormous value. In 1828 he withdrew from law and applied himself to the culture of the grape, with a view to the production of wine. He at first attempted the acclimation of foreign vines without success; and after experimenting with native grapes, he fixed upon the Catawba and Isabella as the varieties best fitted for wine in the climate and soil of southern Ohio. He gradually became a wine manufacturer on a large scale, and secured for his wines the first place in the list of American products. D. 1863.

LOUDON, JANE WEBB, the authoress of many works on botany and floriculture, b. near Birmingham in 1800; d. 1858. Obligated to depend on her own exertions for support, in 1826 she went to London and wrote "The Mummy," a work of fiction which not only secured the young authoress a name, but by various scientific improvements mentioned in it as having taken place in the year 2126 (the period in which the story was laid) attracted the attention of the well-known botanist, Mr. Loudon, and led to an acquaintance which ended in their marriage. During the first years of her married life, Mrs. Loudon assisted her husband in his various publications, but wrote but little on her own account; when, however, the whole profit of her husband's publications was absorbed in paying the debt of the "Arboretum et Fruticetum Britannicum," which he had published on his own account, Mrs. Loudon once more put forth her energy and talents, and for many years supported her family entirely by her own writings. Her works were chiefly on botanical subjects, the principal being "The Ladies' Flower Garden," in six quarto volumes; "The Amateur Gardener's Calendar," "The Ladies' Country Companion," "Botany for Ladies," "Gardening for Ladies," "British Wild Flowers," and "The Ladies' Companion to the Flower Garden."

LOVEJOY, OWEN, b. in Maine, 1811, exchanged preaching for politics, and acquired celebrity by the vehemence with which he denounced slavery as a representative of Illinois at Washington, where he served from the 35th to the 38th congress. D. 1864.

LOVELACE, ADA AUGUSTA, Countess of, only child of Lord Byron, — "sole daughter of my house and heart," — b. 1815; d. 1852. She inherited neither poetical genius nor poetical taste, mathematics and metaphysics being her favorite studies. She married the Earl of Lovelace (originally Lord King) in 1835; and in their issue the lineage of Locke and Byron is united.

LUCAS, FREDERICK, a Roman catholic polemical writer of masterly ability; founder and editor of the London "Tablet"; and representative of Meath in the house of commons, died in his 43d year, 1855. He was educated a member of the society of friends, and was, by marriage, a relative of John Bright. — SAMUEL, brother of the preceding, b. 1811; d. 1865. He was managing proprietor and editor of the "Star," a London daily journal, radical in its home politics, and especially endeared to Americans by the earnestness with which it sustained the northern states and the Union from the inception of the civil war. Through life Mr. Lucas was a consistent advocate of political reform, and a zealous co-worker in all movements for social amelioration. He was a member of the society of friends; and his death is represented as having been hastened by the loss of his friend, Mr. Cobden.

LUTTRELL, HENRY, a famous wit and epigrammatist, many years distinguished in London literary society, and the author of a "Letter to Julia," and other light verses, d. 1851, aged 86.

LYNDHURST, JOHN SINGLETON Copley, Lord, b. at Boston, 1772; d. in London, 1863. When a child, he was taken to England by his father, a painter, now best known by his "Death of Lord Chatham" in the Vernon gallery. After preliminary studies, he went to Cambridge, where he obtained high honors. In 1804 he was admitted to the English bar, and for some time travelled the midland circuit without any special success. Some political trials brought him into notice, and he entered the house of commons, under tory auspices, in 1818. As solicitor-general he was engaged in the trial of Queen Caroline, was subsequently attorney-general, and in 1827 became lord chancellor during the administration of Lord Canning. On the retirement of his party from government, he was appointed chief baron of the exchequer by its successors. He again became lord chancellor under Sir R. Peel, but after the break-up of the Peel government in 1846, he did not hold office. As a politician, Lord Lyndhurst adhered to toryism to the last, and was among the most unrelenting of its exponents. As a chancery judge he was highly spoken of by all parties, and as an orator he had few to equal him among the peers. His last appearance of any note as an orator was in 1860, when, although eighty-eight years of age, he spoke with great clearness and force of argument.

LYON, NATHANIEL, brigadier-general of volunteers in the United States army, b. at Ashford, Conn., 1819, graduated at West Point, and served with honor in the Florida war, throughout the Mexican campaign, and at various posts on the western frontier. After the outbreak of hostilities in 1861, — having gained the full rank of captain, — he was placed in command of the arsenal of St. Louis, Mo., and played a conspicuous part in the early troubles of that state. To his energy and judgment may be attributed the frustration of the plans of Gov. Jackson, who, with Gen. Sterling Price, the commander of the state militia, resisted the acts performed by Capt. Lyon under national authority, and called for a large body of militia to "repel the invasion of the state." Captain Lyon — now brigadier-general of volunteers — took possession of Jefferson city with the state archives, and followed Jackson and Price with the militia, to Booneville, where he defeated them on the 17th June, 1861. On August 1, he met and defeated a body of confederates under command of Gen. McCulloch. The latter, however, was soon afterward reinforced by Price, and their combined forces threatened the position then held by Gen. Lyon in S. W. Missouri. A battle ensued at Wilson's Creek, on the 10th August, in which he was killed.

LYONS, LORD EDMUND, an English diplomatist and commander of the British fleet during the Crimean war, b. 1790; d. 1858.

LYTLE, WILLIAM HAINES, b. at Cincinnati, 1826, served with distinction in the Mexican war, at the conclusion of which he applied himself to the practice of law in his native city. In 1861 he accepted the colonelcy of the 10th Ohio volunteers, and took part in the battle of Rich Mountain. He commanded a brigade at Carnifax Ferry, where he was wounded. After his recovery he assumed the command of the Bardstown camp of instruction. He next commanded the 17th brigade under Gen. Mitchell, and was again wounded at Perryville, where he was taken prisoner. Early in 1863 he was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers, and served under Gen. Rosecrans until killed at Chickamauga, Sept., 1863.

M.

MACAULAY, THOMAS BABINGTON, b. in Leicestershire in 1800, was the son of Zachary Macaulay, well known as the coadjutor of Clarkson and Wilberforce in their exertions against the slave-trade. Educated at Cambridge, he soon began to acquire distinction; gaining the chancellor's medal for a poem entitled "Pompeii," in 1819, and for another poem in 1821. He graduated in 1825, and in the same year contributed his essay on Milton to the "Edinburgh Review." In 1826 he was called to the bar, and in 1830 entered parliament, shortly afterward becoming secretary to the board of control for India, and bearing a conspicuous part in the debates on the reform bill. In 1834 he accepted a seat in the supreme council of Calcutta, and during a three years' residence in India applied himself to the preparation of a new code of law, the virtue of which, in deference to native prejudices, has remained untried. In 1847 the liberality of his views on the Maynooth question brought upon him the indignation of presbyterian Edinburgh, and the orator and statesman was deprived of his seat in the house of commons. Other constituencies were eager to secure the honor of his service, but he withdrew from political life, and consecrated his energies to historic studies. His contributions to the "Edinburgh" closed with an essay on Chatham. The fruit of more continuous labor appeared in 1849, in the publication of the first instalment of the "History of England." Honors were now showered upon him. The university of Glasgow elected him its lord rector; he was appointed professor of ancient history in the royal academy; Prussia conferred upon him its order of merit; and Edinburgh, repentant of its intolerance and narrow-mindedness, restored him to parliament. The third and fourth volumes of his history appeared in 1854, and subsequently he took farewell of parliamentary life; retiring to give exclusive attention to the completion of the task he had assigned himself, — "to write the history of England from the accession of James II. down to a time which is within the memory of men still living." The task, however, was left unfinished. He d. 1859, in London, with the style and title of Baron Rothley, having been created a peer of the realm in consideration of literary and political services.

MACGILLIVRAY, WILLIAM, a Scottish naturalist, d. 1852.

MACKAY, CHARLES, an eminent Scotch actor, whose Bailie Nicol Jarvic elicited from Sir Walter Scott the praise that the part seemed made for him and he for the part, b. 1787; d. 1857.

MACKENZIE, CHARLES KENNETH, a London littérateur, and in early life aid-de-camp and military secretary to the Duke of Wellington. B. 1788; d. in New York, 1862. — WILLIAM LYON, the leader of the Upper Canada rebellion in 1837, was b. in Dundee, Scotland, 1794, and was brought up to the trade of a weaver. About 1825 he emigrated to Canada, and entered into business as a storekeeper, in which for years he prospered. He then became an active politician, published and edited a newspaper in opposition to the tory theory and practice of colonial administration, and after a time was elected to the legislature of the sparsely peopled colony. The prevalence of flagrant corruption, the unscrupulous exercise of his prerogative by Sir F. B. Head, the governor, and the indifference of the colonial office to the appeals and remonstrances of Canadians, were fruitful causes of discontent; and Mackenzie, in his double character of member of parliament and newspaper editor, strenuously exerted himself to foster the feeling. His efforts, and those of his co-patriots, resulted in the insurrection of Dec. 1837. A few days, however, sufficed for the defeat and dispersion of the insurgents; Mackenzie, after many narrow escapes, managing to reach the United States side of the Niagara. Here he was joined by sympathizers from both sides of the line, with whose aid he maintained a position of hostility on Navy Island, in the Niagara river. This camp was broken up through the exertions of General Scott, and Mackenzie was tried at Rochester for a breach of the neutrality laws, found guilty, and sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment. On regaining his liberty he became connected with the press. For several years afterward he resided in New York, where he was employed as a writer for the "Tribune," occasionally visiting Washington and Albany as a correspondent for that journal. He published several political pamphlets. One of these, compiled from papers to which he had access as an employé in the New York custom-house, created much excitement, and subjected him to severe censure for an alleged abuse of official position. On the proclamation of an amnesty, in 1849, he returned to Canada, and having regained a seat in the provincial legislature, entered afresh into political warfare. He retired from parliament about 1859, but continued for some time to publish a weekly political sheet. He d. in Toronto, 1861.

MACLEAN, SIR GEORGE, a distinguished British officer connected with the commissariat service, b. 1795; d. 1861.

MAGINNIS, JOHN, a New Orleans journalist, connected, successively, with the "Picayune," the "Delta," and the "True Delta," the last-named having been commenced by him in 1849. He was b. in Dromore, Ireland, 1814, and d. 1863.

MAI, ANGELO, Cardinal, chief librarian of the Vatican, and memorable for his discoveries of lost portions of the classics. He made the discoveries when he was keeper of the Ambrosian library at Milan, in 1814, and they were published in a collected form in the years 1825 to 1838. B. 1782; d. 1854.

MAINZER, DR. JOSEPH, originator of the system for popularizing instruction in music, was b. at Trèves, 1801. He studied under Kinck, organist to the Grand Duke of Darmstadt, scholar of Kittel, the last pupil of Sebastian Bach. He afterwards proceeded to Munich and Vienna, where he exercised himself under the two celebrated composers, the Chevalier Seyfried and the Abbé Stadler. At Rome he was admitted to the school of the Abbé Baini, the director of the pontifical chapel. On his return to his native place he turned his attention to the development of his new system of teaching music, which he had long before conceived, and which now began to attract attention in Germany. In 1830 he went to Paris, where he soon found a field for his plan of teaching and popularizing music; but the police became jealous of his ascendancy, and invited him to close his singing-school in the Place de l'Estrapade,—an invitation which he was not free to refuse. During his residence in Paris, Mainzer was a regular contributor to the "Revue des Deux Mondes," the "Revue du Nord," "La Balance," published by Böerne, and for six years he was the réducteur of the musical department of the "National." He was also the Paris correspondent of the "Musical Gazette" of Leipsic. In 1844 he went to England, where he found an ample field for his scheme of teaching singing to the masses; and in 1848 he took up his abode in Manchester, where he labored till his death, in 1851.

MALMSTRÖM, B. ELIS, a Swedish poet and writer, b. 1816; d. 1865. His earliest appearance as a poet was in 1840, when, under the title of "Angelica," he published a collection of elegies, for which he had been awarded a prize by the Swedish academy. His most ambitious effort is "Ariadne," an epic, which, however, enjoyed less favor than his miscellaneous poems. The latter have passed through several editions, and are distinguished by thoughtfulness, grace, and purity. He was also the author of some historical essays and other critical productions.

MANBY, GEORGE WILLIAM, captain in the British army, the inventor of apparatus for saving lives in cases of shipwreck, d. 1854.

MANGUM, WILLIE P., b. in Orange county, N. C., 1792; d. 1861. He studied law, rose to eminence in his profession, entered into politics, and was elected to the house of commons in 1818. In 1819 he was elected a judge of the superior court, and from 1823 to 1826 served as a representative in congress. He was elected a United States senator in 1831, reëlected in 1841, and for a third term in 1848, serving, on one occasion, as president pro tem. of that body. In 1837 he received 11 electoral votes for president of the United States; and, during the administration of President Tyler, was president of the United States senate.

MANIN, DANIEL, an Italian patriot, b. 1804. Educated at Padua, he became a student of jurisprudence, a translator of the Roman law, and an assailant of the treachery and despotism exercised by Austria toward his native country. Avoiding secret societies, and always zealously supporting order, he imparted immense moral force to the demand he urged for a separate government for Venice and Lombardy, a revision of codes, an annual budget, freedom of worship, and freedom of the press. When the revolution of 1848 broke out he was in prison; and, liberated by a decision of the tribunal, he was placed at the head of affairs, and a month afterward was proclaimed dictator of the republic. To his genius and spirit the resistance of Venice through a year's siege by Austria was mainly attributable; and when capitulation became inevitable, he retired to France, where he d. 1857.

MANN, HORACE, LL. D., an eminent educational reformer, b. in Franklin, Mass., 1796, graduated at Brown university, and then labored there for some time as tutor and librarian. He afterwards practised as a lawyer in Norfolk county, Mass., and in Boston. Elected to the state senate, he labored strenuously and successfully to mature the system of education and charitable institutions; and in 1835 was appointed one of the commissioners to superintend the publication of the revised statutes of the state. He was for 12 years secretary of the board of education of Massachusetts, and his annual reports are an enduring monument to his fame. The great cause of common-school education in the United States is indebted to no man more than to him. In 1848 he was elected to succeed John Quincy Adams in congress, and served as representative there until 1853, when he was appointed president of Antioch college. In that capacity he officiated with the self-sacrificing zeal which had been one of the characteristics of his life; dying at Yellow Springs, O., 1859.

MANSFIELD, JOSEPH KING FENNO, brigadier-general in the United States army, b. in New Haven, Conn., 1803, was graduated at West Point in 1822, and appointed second lieutenant in the engineer corps. From that time until 1838 he was engaged in various capacities upon government works, attaining to a captaincy in the latter year. He was chief-engineer under General Taylor in the Mexican war, in the course of which his gallantry was rewarded with promotion to a colonelcy. In May, 1841, he was commissioned a brigadier-general, and was placed in command of the department of Washington, and for a brief time of the department of Virginia. He was afterward assigned, successively, to Cape Hatteras, Camp Hamilton, Newport News, and Suffolk, Va. He was summoned to Washington as a member of the court of inquiry into the circumstances of the second battle of Bull Run; but preferring active service, he was ordered to report to General McClellan, and placed in command of the corps previously under General Banks. General Mansfield took part in the battle of Antietam, Sept. 17, 1862, and was mortally wounded at the head of his troops.

MANTELL, GIDEON ALGERNON, author of "The Wonders of Geology," "Thoughts on a Pebble," and other geological works, b. 1790; d. in London, 1852.

MARCHI, PADRE, an eminent archæologist, and keeper of the Kircherian museum in Rome, d. 1860.

MARCY, WILLIAM LARNED, a statesman and diplomatist, b. in 1786 in Sturbridge, Worcester county, Mass., graduated at Brown university in 1808, and after teaching school in Newport, R. I., studied law and commenced practice in Troy, N. Y. He was appointed recorder of that city in 1816, was made state comptroller in 1823, and removed to Albany. In 1829 he was appointed judge of the supreme court of the state, and was chosen senator in congress in 1831, was elected governor of New York in 1832, and re-elected in 1834. He was secretary of war from 1845 to 1849, during Mr. Polk's administration, and secretary of state from 1853 to 1857, in the Pierce administration. Integrity distinguished him in every office, and his administration of the state department was marked by hard work, and great judgment and ability. He d. suddenly at Ballston Spa, N. Y., July 4, 1857.

MARIA DA GLORIA, Queen of Portugal, b. 1819; d. 1853. She was daughter of the emperor of Brazil, Pedro I. and on the death of her grandfather, John VI., was designated successor to the crown of Portugal by virtue of the act of renunciation executed by Pedro. Don Miguel, however, usurped the throne, and her accession, in 1833, was secured only after war. Her reign was a continual scene of intrigues at court, and of discontent rising into rebellion throughout the country.

MARIA ADELAIDE, Queen of Sardinia, daughter of the Archduke Reigrier of Austria, b. 1822; d. 1855. — THERESA, queen-dowager of Sardinia, daughter of the Archduke Ferdinand of Austria, b. 1801; d. 1855.

MARMONT, MARSHAL, Duke of Ragusa, b. 1774; d. in 1852 at Venice, where he had lived in exile since the dethronement of Charles X., at which time he was commandant of Paris.

MARRAST, ARMAND, a leading journalist of France. He played a conspicuous part in the revolution of Feb. 1848, when he was chosen mayor of Paris and a member of the provisional government. He was the author of the French constitution of 1848. D. 1852.

MARSHALL, THOMAS F., judge of the Louisville circuit court, and representative in congress from Kentucky from 1841 to 1843. B. 1801; d. 1864.

MARTIN, JOHN, an English painter, endowed with original genius and imaginative power, b. 1783; d. 1854. The greatest of his paintings are the "Fall of Babylon," "Macbeth," "Belshazzar's Feast," the "Fall of Nineveh," and "Pandemonium." Martin stands amongst painters as Dante or Milton stands amongst poets,—mystic grandeur and supernatural terror contrasting with exquisite touches of nature's loveliness.

MASON, J. L., one of the most skilful officers of the United States engineer corps, was b. in Providence, R. I., and educated at West Point. He served under General Scott in Mexico, and was brevetted major and afterwards lieutenant-colonel for gallant conduct. Appointed by President Pierce to superintend the construction of the fortifications at San Francisco, he contracted fever while crossing the isthmus, and d. 1853. — JOHN Y., b. in Virginia, 1795; d. in Paris, 1859. After officiating as a district-court judge, he was elected to congress in 1831, and served till 1837. He was secretary of the navy under President Tyler; attorney-general and secretary of the navy under President Polk; and minister to France under presidents Pierce and Buchanan.

MATTHEW, THEOBALD, REV., the apostle of temperance, b. in Tipperary, 1796, was ordained at Dublin, and soon began to labor as a missionary at Cork. His special labors in the temperance cause commenced in 1839, and by these he conferred incalculable benefit on the Irish people; many of whom believed for a time that he possessed superhuman power, not only to save them from the evils consequent upon intemperate habits, but that he could heal the sick, restore sight to the blind, and grant absolution for mortal sins. D. 1856.

MAUBOURG, the Countess ANASTASIE DE LA TOUR, daughter of the Marquis de Lafayette, b. in Paris, 1777; d. at Turin, 1863. She remained with her father during his captivity in the citadel of Olmutz, and on her return to France married the Count of Tour-Marbourg.

MAY, WILLIAM, commander United States navy, b. 1815; d. 1861. He entered the navy in 1831, and was engaged in the exploring expedition to the South Sea. During the Mexican war he was the executive officer of the brig Porpoise, and was severely wounded at the capture of Tobasco.

MCLUNEY, WILLIAM J., commodore United States navy, entered the service in 1812, and was an acting lieutenant on the Wasp during the engagement between that vessel and the British ship Frolic. He received his commission as commander in 1839, and in 1851 was commissioned as captain. In 1853 he was appointed to the command of the Powhatan, attached to the East India squadron under Commodore Perry, and returned in 1856 with a reputation for gallantry and tact. From 1858 to 1860 he commanded the home squadron. D. in Brooklyn, 1864.

MCCOOK, ROBERT L., b. in Jefferson county, Ohio, 1837, adopted the law as a profession, but entered the United States service in 1861 as colonel of the 9th Ohio volunteers. He served in Western Virginia and in S. E. Kentucky, and in March, 1861, was made brigadier-general of volunteers. He commanded a division in Thomas's corps of Buell's army, and was murdered by guerillas, while lying sick in an ambulance, near Salem, Ala., Aug. 5, 1862.

MCCORD, D. J., a South Carolina lawyer of considerable repute, one of the authors of Nott and McCord's reports, and the successor of Dr. Cooper as editor of the statutes at large of that state. D. 1855.

MCCULLOCH, JOHN RAMSAY, a voluminous compiler of statistics and writer on political economy, was b. in Wigtownshire in 1783, and was for several years a contributor to the Edinburgh press. In 1828 he left Scotland to become professor of political economy in the university of London. In 1838 the British government appointed him to a sinecure office, and subsequently granted him a pension of $1000 for literary services. His best known works are a "Dictionary of Commerce and Commercial Navigation," and a "Dictionary of Geography," both of which are valuable for reference. He edited "The Wealth of Nations," and his "Principles of Political Economy" are held in high repute by the advocates of free trade. D. 1864. — BEN., b. in Ruthersford county, Tenn., 1814, removed to Texas, and distinguished himself on various occasions in the Mexican war. He was appointed marshal of Texas by President Pierce, and a commissioner to adjust the difficulties with the Mormons in Utah by President Buchanan. He threw himself zealously into the secession movement, and in June, 1861, was appointed a brigadier-general of the forces of Arkansas. He led a corps of Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas troops into Missouri, and was killed in the battle of Pea Ridge, March 7, 1862.

MCGRIGOR, SIR JAMES, b. 1772, entered the British army as surgeon in 1793, and passed 55 years in active service, during 35 of which he was director-general of the army medical department. He was with the army in Egypt during the outbreak of the plague, an account of which he published in 1804, entitled, "Medical Sketches of the Expedition to Egypt from India." He afterwards published a "Sketch of the Medical History of the British Armies" during the Peninsular war. D. 1858.

MCKEAN, WILLIAM W., commodore United States navy, b. in Pennsylvania, 1801, was the son of Judge McKean, and entered the service in 1814. He commanded a schooner in Porter's squadron in 1823-24, and was actively engaged in suppressing piracy on the coast of Cuba and among the islands of the bay. He was frequently employed upon special service, and commanded the screw-steamer Niagara, which conveyed the Japanese ambassadors to their home. For a brief period he commanded the West Gulf blockading squadron. His connection with the service extended over nearly half a century, and his active employment over more than thirty years. D. 1865.

MCLANE, LOUIS, served in the United States navy as a midshipman under Decatur; studied law, and was admitted to the bar; represented Delaware in congress; was for two years minister to England under President Jackson; and, successively, secretary of the treasury and secretary of state. While the Oregon negotiations were pending, he again accepted the mission to England. On retiring from active political life, he officiated as president of the Baltimore and Ohio R. R. Co. B. at Smyrna, Del., 1786; d. in Baltimore, 1857.

MCLEAN, JOHN, a distinguished American lawyer and statesman, b. in Morris county, New Jersey, 1785; d. in Cincinnati, 1861. During his childhood his father emigrated with his family to Virginia, whence he removed to Kentucky, and finally settled in the state of Ohio. Here the son received a scanty education; and, having determined to pursue the legal profession, he engaged at the age of 18 to write in the clerk's office at Cincinnati, in order to maintain himself, by devoting a portion of his time to that labor, while engaged in his studies. In 1807 he was admitted to the bar, and entered upon the practice of the law at Lebanon, Ohio. In 1812 he became a candidate to represent his district in congress, and was elected by a large majority. He professed the political principles of the democratic party, being an ardent supporter of the war and of President Madison's administration. In 1814 he was again elected to congress by a unanimous vote, a circumstance of rare occurrence, and remained a member of the house of representatives until 1816, when—the legislature of Ohio having elected him a judge of the supreme court of the state—he resigned his seat in congress at the close of the session. He remained six years upon the supreme bench of Ohio. In 1822 he was appointed commissioner of the general land-office by President Monroe; and in 1823 he became postmaster-general. In 1829 he was appointed by President Jackson a justice of the United States supreme court.

MCLEOD, XAVIER DONALD, b. in New York, 1821, graduated at Columbia college, and in 1845 entered the ministry of the episcopal church. He visited Europe, 1850-52, and whilst there became a convert to the catholic church. On his return to the United States he became a contributor to various periodicals; some of his poems which appeared in "Putnam's Monthly" and the "Knickerbocker Magazine" exhibiting much talent. He also published a "Life of Sir Walter Scott," and several works of fiction. Removing to the West, he was for a time connected with the press of St. Louis, and afterward held the professorship of rhetoric and belles-lettres at the catholic college near Cincinnati. Eventually he was admitted to the priesthood, and was killed by a railroad accident whilst on an errand of mercy. D. 1865.

MENAB, SIR ALLAN NAPIER, bart., a Canadian politician, who earned knighthood by the seizure and destruction of the Caroline, an American steamer used by the Mackenzie insurgents in 1837. He was several times a member of the provincial cabinet, and in 1858 had a baronetcy conferred upon him. B. 1798; d. 1862.

MCPHERSON, JAMES B., major-general United States volunteers and brigadier-general of the regular army, b. in Sandusky, Ohio, 1828, graduated at the head of his class at West Point, and entered the United States army with a brevet rank of second lieutenant of engineers. He became an assistant instructor of practical engineering at the military academy, and in the autumn of 1854 was appointed assistant engineer on the defences of New York harbor. He was subsequently employed in a similar capacity on other government works, and was engaged as chief of engineers on the Pacific coast when the civil war broke out. In August, 1861, he was placed in charge of the fortifications of Boston harbor, and in the following November became aid-de-camp to Gen. Halleck in the department of the west, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel. He was chief-engineer of the expeditions against Forts Henry and Donelson, and was made brevet major of engineers; remaining with Gen. Grant after the reduction of these works. For services at Shiloh he was nominated lieutenant-colonel of engineers. The engineering works during the siege of Corinth were under his direction. In May, 1862, he was promoted to the rank of brigadier-general of volunteers, and the various military railroads in the department of West Tennessee were placed under his management. He again distinguished himself at the battle of Corinth, and having been promoted to the rank of major-general of volunteers, was assigned to the command of the Union forces at Bolivar, Tenn. He served with Gen. Grant in other important engagements, and was highly commended by that general for his skill and gallantry during the siege of Vicksburg. When Gen. Grant was placed in command of the United States armies, Gen. McPherson took the command of the army and department of the Tennessee. He was killed in battle before Atlanta, July, 1864.

MEADE, RIGHT REV. WILLIAM, D.D., bishop of the protestant episcopal church in Virginia, author of "Family Prayer," "Lectures on the Pastoral Office," and other works on doctrinal questions and local church history. B. 1789; d. 1862.

MEANS, ISAAC H., ex-governor of South Carolina and colonel in the confederate army, killed in battle, 1862.

MELLONI, MACEDONIO, a celebrated natural philosopher, director of the meteorological observatory on Mount Vesuvius, d. 1854, aged 53.

MELVILLE, VISCOUNT, first lord of the British admiralty from 1812 to 1827, and again under the administration of Wellington, b. in 1771; d. 1851.

MERCER, CHARLES FENTON, b. in Fredericksburg, Va., 1778; d. 1858. In his 20th year, when an invasion by the French was deemed imminent, he offered his services to General Washington, and received from him a commission as first lieutenant of cavalry, and soon after that of captain, which he declined. In 1803, after spending a year in Europe, he returned and practised law. From 1810 to 1817 he was a member of the general assembly of Virginia. In 1811 he was again called to military duty by the federal government; and in 1813 was appointed aid to the governor, and rose to the rank of brigadier-general of militia, having command of the forces at Norfolk. In 1816, as chairman of the committee on finance, in the legislature, he devoted his time to the promotion of internal improvements, and was chief supporter of the plan for the construction of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal. He was a member of congress from 1817 to 1840. In 1853 he visited Europe from philanthropic motives, at his own expense, and used his efforts for the entire abolition of the African slave-trade, conferring with the chief executive officers of most of the kingdoms of Europe on the subject.

MESSAROS, LAZARUS, a Hungarian general and patriot, b. 1796, was a member of the Hungarian academy of sciences and Hungarian minister of war in 1848. He was confined in Kutaia from August, 1849, to May, 1851, and on his release went to England, remaining there two years, and then coming to the United States. In 1858 he returned to England, and d. there in the same year.

METCALFE, THOMAS, b. in Virginia, 1780, served in the war of 1812, and in 1813 commanded with distinguished gallantry a company of infantry at the battle of Fort Meigs. He was a member of the Kentucky legislature for many years, a representative in congress from that state, 1819-29; then governor of Kentucky until 1833. In 1834 he served in the state senate; and in 1848 was appointed to fill Mr. Crittenden's unexpired term in the United States senate. D. 1855.

MEYERBEER, GIACOMO, a German composer, b. at Berlin, 1794, studied at Darmstadt under Volger. His earliest dramatic piece, "Jephthah's Daughter," was not successful on its first performance; nor did "The Two Caliphs," brought out at Vienna, receive more encouragement. Meyerbeer now discovered that he was working upon a mistaken principle, and repaired to Italy to study melody. His first successful work, "Romilda e Constanza," was performed at Padua in 1818; and after that time his reputation steadily increased. "Les Huguenots," "Le Prophète," "L'Etoile du Nord," "Le Pardon de Plœmel," and "Robert le Diable," are the operas by which he is best known. D. 1864.

MILES, DIXON H., b. in Maryland, 1803, graduated at West Point in 1824, and by meritorious conduct obtained rapid promotion in the United States army. He distinguished himself in the Mexican war, and in 1848 was appointed civil and military governor of Jalapa. He adhered to the Union cause in 1861, and had charge of the 5th division at the battle of Bull Run. He was in command of Harper's Ferry in Sept., 1862, and having failed to obtain reinforcements, surrendered the post, with about 14,000 men and a large quantity of arms and military stores. He was mortally wounded by a shell after the surrender had taken place.

MILLER, JAMES, b. in Peterborough, N. H., entered the United States army in 1810, and distinguished himself in the battles of Chippewa, Bridgewater, and Lundy's Lane. At the last-named battle he gave the answer, "I'll try, sir," when asked if he could take an important position held by the English troops. He was subsequently governor of Arkansas and collector of the port of Salem. D. 1851. — JAMES, colonel of the 81st regiment of Pennsylvania volunteers, killed before Richmond, 1862. He served under General Scott in Mexico, and for his gallantry was promoted to a captaincy. — HUGH, editor of the Edinburgh Witness, and celebrated as a geologist and fine descriptive writer, exemplified in his career the power of genius in overcoming the most formidable obstacles. Left fatherless in childhood, the education he received was that of the peasantry of Scotland; and at an early age he was sent to earn his bread at the craft of a mason. Hard manual labor did not prevent him from pursuing the work of self-cultivation, and when in his 27th year he published a volume of poems, without, however, achieving much poetical reputation. "Scenes and Legends of the North of Scotland," formed his first prose work, and indicated the possession of the peculiar talent which he afterwards employed with great success. An appointment conferred upon him in a Cromarty bank removed him from the drudgery on which his sustenance had hitherto depended, and increased his facilities for literary culture. Entering zealously into the conflict which resulted in the secession of what was known as the evangelical section of the church of Scotland, he was chosen to be intrusted with the free-church organ, then about to be started in Edinburgh—the Witness, through the columns of which he for several years exerted a wide influence on the ecclesiastical and educational events of Scotland. Geological investigations now occupied his leisure, and in 1840 his discoveries in the old red sandstone were first made known by Sir Roderick, then Mr. Murchison. The publication of the "Old Red Sandstone" followed, and confirmed his celebrity as a discoverer and writer. His subsequent works were, "First Impressions of England and its People," "Footprints of the Creator," and "The Testimony of the Rocks." Over-exertion of the brain gradually impaired the strength of a frame originally powerful; his reason tottered, and in a paroxysm of insanity he committed suicide. B. 1802; d. 1856.

MITCHELL, NAHUM, a prominent citizen of Massachusetts, b. 1769; d. suddenly, Aug. 1, 1853, while attending the first celebration of the embarkation of the pilgrims at Delft Haven. He was, successively, a representative in the general court of the state, representative in congress, state senator, one of the governor's council, judge of the circuit court of common pleas, and chief justice. He contributed a volume to local history, and compiled and published the "Bridge-water Collection" of sacred music. — SIR THOMAS LIVINGSTON, surveyor-general of New South Wales, and the inventor of the "Boomerang Propeller" for steam-vessels, b. 1792; d. 1855. — ORMSBY MACKNIGHT, eminent as an astronomer, and author of "Planetary and Stellar Worlds," and "Popular Astronomy," b. in Union county, Ky., 1810. He commenced life at an early age as clerk in a store in Ohio, and in 1825 was appointed to a cadetship in West Point. He graduated in 1829, and for two years thereafter was assistant professor of mathematics. He afterward studied law, and entered upon its practice in Cincinnati. In 1834 he became professor of mathematics, philosophy, and astronomy, in Cincinnati college, and in 1845 succeeded in establishing an observatory in that city. Without resigning his position in Ohio, in 1859, he accepted the directorship of the Dudley observatory at Albany, N. Y., and succeeded in greatly improving its apparatus. In Aug., 1861, he abandoned his scientific pursuits, and threw his influence into the Union scale. He accepted a commission as brigadier-general of volunteers, and served in the department of the Ohio, under the command of Major-general Buell. For his services in this connection he was appointed a major-general. In Sept., 1862, he was appointed commander of the department of the south, and in the following month d. of yellow fever at Beaufort, S. C. — REV. ELISHA, D. D., professor of chemistry, mineralogy, and geology, in the university of North Carolina, and a frequent contributor on scientific subjects to the American "Journal of Science." He was b. in Connecticut, and graduated at Yale college in 1812. He was killed in Yancey county, N. C., 1857, having fallen over a precipice on Caney River, while engaged in making scientific observations.

MITFORD, MARY RUSSELL, than whom none has better depicted English rural life in its most genial aspects, was b. at Alresford, in Hampshire, in 1789. Her father, Dr. Russell Mitford, was an impulsive and warm-hearted man, who fostered the premature capacity displayed by his daughter by all the appliances that wealth and taste could furnish; but his irregularities and extravagance frequently plunged him into great difficulties, which his daughter shared and bore in the most unrepining spirit. When she was about 10 years of age, she gained a lottery prize of £20,000, which her father soon ran through. After spending some time at a boarding-school in London, she returned to her father, who in the meanwhile had settled near Reading. Yielding to a strong impulse of literary enthusiasm, she soon appeared as the author of some miscellaneous poems, which attracted considerable attention; and these were followed by various others; but as yet she had only written for amusement; and it was only when the extravagant habits of her father rendered it necessary, that she thought of turning her talents to some account. In the "Annuals" she found at once a fertile and a remunerative field for her labors; but it was not till the series of rural pictures which she had written for the "Lady's Magazine" were collected into the volume entitled "Our Village," in 1832, that her fame was established. From this period her little cottage in Berkshire became a place of literary pilgrimage, not only to her fellow-countrymen, but for lovers of literature, both from the continent and the United States. In 1842 she received a pension from the British government. Meanwhile she continued to prosecute her literary pursuits with equal industry and ability. As early as 1823 she had published the striking tragedy of "Julian," which, however, is better fitted for the study than the stage; and she next produced "Foscari," "Charles I.," and "Rienzi," all of them highly intellectual compositions, though the last only has proved successful on the stage. After some years spent in seclusion, she again, and when she was deep in the vale of years, came before the world as an author, her last productions being a collected edition of her works, "Atherton, a Tale," and "Recollections of a Literary Life." D. 1855. — REV. JOHN, a poet, and editor of the works of Gray, Milton, and Dryden, d. 1859.

MITZKIEVITCH, ADAM, a Polish poet and professor of the Slavonic language in the college of France. D. 1855.

MOIR, DAVID MACBETH, the "Delta" of "Blackwood's Magazine," b. 1798; d. at Dumfries, Scotland, 1851. His "Autobiography of Mansie Wauch" is well known as a separate work on both sides of the Atlantic.

MOLE, LOUIS MATHIEU, Count, a French statesman, descended from the old noblesse, made his advent into public life as the author of "Essais de Morale et de Politique," which attracted the attention of the first Napoleon, and led to official employment, rising higher and higher so long as the empire lasted. During the hundred days he became one of Napoleon's peers, and resumed his old functions of director-general of bridges and roads, which he continued to exercise under the second restoration. When Louis Philippe became king, he appointed M. Mole foreign minister, and at a later period prime minister. On the outbreak of the revolution in 1848, he retired; re-appearing prominently only once again, and then as auditor to the council of state during the presidency of Louis Napoleon. B. 1780; d. of apoplexy, 1855.

MOLESWORTH, SIR WILLIAM, an English statesman of the highest type, who devoted great attention to the colonies of Great Britain, and cherished plans fitted to prepare them for liberation and independence. B. in London in 1810, he entered the house of commons in 1832, representing at different periods a division of Cornwall, Leeds, and Southwark, and always working with the advanced wing of the reform party. Appointed secretary of state for the colonies, he seemed at last to have realized the object of his laborious life, when death put an end to his usefulness, Oct. 22, 1855. To the politician he added the character of the philosopher and man of letters, editing and publishing at his own cost the works of Hobbes in English and Latin.

MONSON, HON. WILLIAM JOHN, a writer on archæological and antiquarian subjects, and author of a book of travel. B. in Tanjore, India, 1796; d. in London, 1862.

MONTAGU, BASIL, editor of Lord Bacon's works, and author of his life, b. 1770; d. 1851. He was the natural son of the Earl of Sandwich, by whom he was educated for the bar.

MONTANELLI, GIUSEPPE, an Italian scholar and patriot, b. in Tuscany, 1813; d. 1862. As a boy, he displayed talent as an organist and musical composer. He studied law, and at 18 obtained the degree of doctor of laws. At 23 he published a volume of poems, in which genius and culture were strongly manifested. At 27 he was chosen professor of Tuscan and commercial law in the university of Pisa; and while occupying this chair, he published "a Philosophical Introduction to the Study of Commercial Law," and other works on subjects connected with the study of the law. In 1844 he organized the "Italian Brothers," a secret republican association, aiming at "the elevation and moral improvement of the individual" as the precursor of "the regeneration of the nation"; and in the following year he originated a journal entitled "Italy," to propagate the liberal principles of the brotherhood. When the revolution of 1848 broke out he organized the university legion, composed of his fellow-professors and the students; and having joined the Tuscan contingent, he encountered the Austrians under Radetzki, and being severely wounded, was taken prisoner on the field of Mantua. On regaining his freedom he returned to Tuscany, and was appointed by the grand duke governor of Livourna, then in a state of insurrection. His administration of affairs was successful, and he next became chief of a new ministry. Provoked by the treachery of the grand duke, the people were with difficulty restrained from a fresh rising, and in 1849 he fled. Montanelli, Mazzini, and Guerrazzi formed the triumvirate chosen by the people to carry on the government. The restoration of the grand duke necessitated the exile of Montanelli, and for some years he resided in Paris, where he wrote tragedies for Ristori, and also his "Recollections." Still later, he incurred the displeasure of Italian liberals by the advocacy of a confederation of states as opposed to the united kingdom of Italy.

MONTEZ, LOLA, Countess of Landsfeld, b. in Limerick, 1824; d. in New York, 1861. She married when very young, but her husband—an officer named James—treated her cruelly, and she left him. She appeared as a dancer in Paris in 1840, and was for a time the mistress of Dujarrier, editor of the "Presse." Transferred to the stage at Munich, she became the favorite of king Louis of Bavaria; acquiring over him a remarkable influence, and using it as a partisan in the politics of the country. In 1846 the king conferred upon her the title of countess of Landsfeld, but her intrigues provoked resistance, and she was obliged to leave the country. Returning to England she married a Mr. Heald, and, being threatened with prosecution for bigamy, fled to Spain. In 1850 both her husbands died, and she reappeared in England. In 1852 she came to the United States and performed as a dancer, and also in a dramatic piece designed to embody her own version of her adventures in Bavaria. She subsequently went to Australia and England, coming again to the United States in 1859, and lecturing on trivial subjects. For several months previous to her decease, she suffered from paralysis.

MONTGOMERY, JAMES, a poet whose genius was made subordinate to devotion, was born of Moravian parents in Ayrshire, Scotland, 1771. Commencing life behind the counter of a miscellaneous store, in 1782 he entered the employment of Mr. Gales, of Sheffield,—father of the late Joseph Gales of the Washington "National Intelligencer,"—then proprietor and editor of the "Sheffield Register." With politics too liberal for the time, Mr. Gales found it convenient to quit England, and Montgomery assumed the editorship of the journal, which he renamed the "Iris." Always moderate and conciliatory, he was nevertheless twice prosecuted and imprisoned by the tory government of the day. He retained the editorship of the "Iris" till 1840, when he retired with a government pension. His larger poems are, "The Wanderer in Switzerland," "The West Indies," "The World before the Flood," "Greenland," and "The Pelican Island." As a prose writer he has not left any shining mark. D. 1854.—ROBERT, author of the "Omnipresence of the Deity," and surnamed by irreverent satirists "Satan Montgomery," was an English episcopal minister, with some reputation as a pulpit orator. D. 1855.

MONTHOLON, COUNT, one of Napoleon Bonaparte's generals, distinguished for his fidelity to his commander in every phase of his fortunes. After the battle of Waterloo, together with his wife and children, he shared voluntarily the emperor's exile at St. Helena. B. 1779; d. 1853.

MOORE, THOMAS, b. in Dublin in 1780, early evinced the tastes and capabilities which afterward rendered him one of the most popular poets of his time. His parents were catholics, as he always professed to be; and family intimacy with many of the United Irishmen impressed upon his boyish mind a vivid sense of the sufferings and wrongs of Ireland. He was a student at Trinity college when disaffection sought vent in rebellion, but though he wrote anonymously in its favor, his mother's influence restrained him from implicating himself more deeply. He went to London, in 1798, to study for the bar. His poetical aspirations, however, soon made the law subordinate, and he gave to the world a translation of Anacreon, following with the "Poems of Thomas Little," and another volume still more obnoxious to propriety. A severe but just criticism of these amatory productions appeared in the "Edinburgh Review," and led to an abortive duel between Moore and Jeffrey. His reputation as a song-writer, his musical accomplishments, and his general companionable qualities opened to Moore the road to aristocratic society; and in 1804 the patronage of Lord Moira procured for him a registrarship in Bermuda. The position involved him in pecuniary embarrassments, from which he honorably extricated himself out of the products of his literary labors. Thenceforward he was professionally a man of letters, residing principally at Sloperon, near Devizes, and basking in the favor of the whig aristocracy. Lord Melbourne granted him a pension of $1500 in 1835, and in 1850, when his health was broken, other $500 were granted to Mrs. Moore. He d. in 1852. The "Irish Melodies" are the most exquisite of his poems; as "Lalla Rookh" is the most ambitious. His most witty efforts are found in the political satires through which, from time to time, he served his whig friends. As a prose writer Moore never gained a reputation for more than good taste and care.

MOREHEAD, JAMES T., a prominent lawyer in Kentucky; lieutenant-governor and governor of that state; and a member of the United States senate from 1841 to 1847. B. 1796; d. 1854.

MORGAN, JOHN MINTER, a philanthropic co-laborer of Robert Owen, but differing from him in the recognition of religious principles as the basis of social and industrial reform. Morgan wrote "The Revolt of the Bees," "The Christian Commonwealth," and other works, and labored strenuously in behalf of projects which were never realized. He was b. and d. in London, 1783—1854. — Lady SYDNEY, known in early life as Miss Owenson, the authoress of "The Wild Irish Girl," and other fictions, and in later years by her sketches of France, Italy, and Ireland, b. 1783; d. 1859. — CHARLES W., commodore United States navy, b. 1790; d. 1853. He entered the navy in 1808, served gallantly in the action between the Constitution and the Guerriere, and twice commanded the United States naval force in the Mediterranean. — JOHN H., a noted confederate soldier, b. in Kentucky, 1826. In 1861 he abandoned a manufacturing business in which he was engaged, and, throwing himself into the confederate ranks, raised a body of horsemen, at the head of whom he conducted a series of guerrilla operations in Missouri and Kentucky. For these he was commissioned colonel, and afterward brigadier-general. He joined the forces of Gen. Bragg in Tennessee, and resumed his operations as a raider south of the Cumberland. His most extensive raid extended into Kentucky, Indiana, and Ohio; and in the last-named state he and many of his followers were captured. He escaped from prison in Nov., 1863, and having again reached the confederate lines, was restored to a command including Western Virginia and Eastern Kentucky. He was next attached to the cavalry force operating for the defence of Atlanta, and, in a raid designed to interrupt Gen. Sherman's communications, was killed, Sept., 1864.

MORLOT, FRANCIS NICHOLAS MADELEINE, archbishop of Paris, the successor of the murdered Archbishop Sibour, and a writer on theological topics. He was b. at Langres in 1795, and studied in the ecclesiastical college of Dijon. In 1839 he was made bishop of Orleans, and in 1842 archbishop of Tours. He was created cardinal in 1853. D. 1862.

MORNY, the DUKE DE, whose precocious intelligence led Talleyrand to say, "This little gentleman will be a minister some day," was b. in Paris, 1811, and was the son of Queen Hortense by Count Flahaut. He was therefore half-brother to Napoleon III. In his 21st year he received a commission in a regiment of lancers. He served with distinction in Africa, under the late Duke of Orleans, and, under the command of Gen. Changarnier, took part in the campaign of Moscara and the first campaign of Constantine, in the latter of which he was wounded. Retiring from the army in 1838, and being possessed of independent means, he devoted himself to industrial and economical questions, buying a large manufactory for the production of sugar from beet-root. In 1842 he was returned to the chamber of deputies by the electors of Puy-de-Dome. After the revolution of 1848 he at first kept aloof from politics, but in 1849 he was again returned by his former constituency to the legislative assembly, when he at once identified himself with the policy of Louis Napoleon. During the coup d'état he was one of the few who were in the confidence of the emperor. He was appointed on the same day (Dec. 2. 1851) minister of the interior, which position he resigned in January, 1852, on the question of the confiscation of the Orleans property. In 1854 he was appointed president of the corps législatif. He represented France at the court of Russia during the coronation of Alexander II., and married at the same time a Russian princess. In 1858 he was made member of the privy council. The Duke de Morny was as successful on the bourse as in politics. He was in the confidence of his imperial relative in all things, and the information he thus acquired he turned to profitable account. He has, indeed, been described as "a jobber of the first magnitude." From a man of very moderate means he rapidly rose to be one of the richest men of Europe. His liberality, however, kept pace with his riches. And he was, withal, a graceful man, a great wit, the lion of French society, the idol of his fair countrywomen, and a devoted adherent of the empire. D. 1855.

MORRIS, HENRY W., commodore United States navy, and grandson of Gouverneur Morris, b. in New York, 1805; d. 1863. He entered the navy as mid-shipman in 1819, but did not receive his commission as captain until 1856. In Jan., 1862, he assumed command of the steam sloop-of-war Pensacola, which joined the blockading squadron in the Gulf of Mexico, and performed an important part in the attacks upon Forts Jackson and St. Philip, and upon the Chalmette batteries. — GEORGE P., a lyric poet and journalist, b. in Philadelphia, 1802. In his boyhood he contributed verses and sketches to New York journals, and in 1823 he assisted in starting the "New York Mirror," with which he continued associated until its discontinuance in 1842. In the following year he joined N. P. Willis in the publication of the "New Mirror," and in 1844 commenced the "Evening Mirror." Some time after he issued the "National Press," a weekly journal, which in 1846 was metamorphosed into the "Home Journal," of which he remained one of the editors until his death. Mr. Morris's reputation rests, however, less upon his newspaper enterprises than upon his songs and poems. His poems have been published in a collected form, and have gone through many editions; and not a few of his songs are allied to melodies not likely to be forgotten. His "Woodman, spare that Tree," "We were Boys Together," "Land-ho!" "My Mother's Bible," and "The Origin of Yankee Doodle," would alone be sufficient to keep his memory fresh in the hearts of multitudes. Among his other productions are the libretto of "The Maid of Saxony," "The Deserted Bride, and other Poems," a volume of prose sketches, and a volume of selected American songs. D. 1864. — CHARLES, commodore United States navy, was b. in Woodstock, Conn., in 1784, entered the navy as midshipman in 1799, and was from that time distinguished for his professional enthusiasm and aspirations. In the war with the Barbary States he showed in several instances the intrepidity, energy, and judgment which characterized his after-life. He was a volunteer to aid Decatur in the destruction of the Philadelphia, and was the first upon her deck. On the breaking out of the war of 1812 he was a lieutenant, and was the executive officer of the Constitution in 1812, in her memorable escape, after a chase of sixty hours, from the British squadron, and also when she, during the same season, captured the Guerriere. In this action he was shot through the body by a musket-ball. In Sept., 1813, for special services, he was promoted to the rank of post-captain over the heads of some of his seniors, his commission dating from the day of the surrender of the Guerriere. In that year he took command of the Adams sloop-of-war, was disabled by a storm, ran into Penobscot Bay and up the river for repairs, and being attacked by a superior force, destroyed his vessel. After the conclusion of the war he was employed in important commands at sea and on shore. He was the captain of the Brandywine, which carried Lafayette to France in 1825, and afterwards commanded squadrons on the Brazil and Mediterranean stations. His last sea-service was his cruise in the Delaware, in 1844; and from that time he was almost constantly at the head of some one of the bureaus of the navy department at Washington. At the time of his death (1856), he was chief of the bureau of hydrography and repairs.

MOTT, VALENTINE, the most eminent surgeon in America, b. at Glen Cove, L. I., 1785; d. in New York, April 26, 1865. He received the degree of M. D. at Columbia college in 1806, and after studying two years in London under Astley Cooper, Abernethy, and Cline, proceeded to Edinburgh, where he remained a year. On his return to the United States, in 1809, he became professor of surgery in Columbia college, and so remained until 1813, when he assumed the same professional position in the college of physicians and surgeons. From 1826 to 1830 he was connected with the Rutgers medical college; thence returning to the college of physicians and surgeons. He originated the university medical college, and was its professor of surgery and relative anatomy. His rare sagacity in the diagnosis of disease, and his extraordinary skill in surgery, established for him a fame as great in Europe as that which he enjoyed in this country. Astley Cooper said of him, "He has performed more of the great operations than any man living, or that ever did live." His original operations as a surgeon, indeed, challenged the admiration of the professional world. "As early as 1818," a writer has remarked, "Dr. Mott placed a ligature around the brachiocephalic trunk, or arteria innominata, only two inches from the heart, for aneurism of the right subclavian artery, for the first time in the history of surgery." "He excised the entire right clavicle for malignant disease of that bone, where it was necessary to apply 40 ligatures; an operation which Dr. Mott himself asserts to be the most dangerous and difficult that can be performed upon the human body."

'He was the first to tie the primitive iliac artery for aneurism. He has tied the common carotid 46 times, cut for stone 168 times, and amputated nearly 1000 limbs. He early introduced his original operation for immobility of the lower jaw, and succeeded after many eminent surgeons had failed. In 1821 he performed the first operation for osteosarcoma of the lower jaw. He was the first surgeon who removed the lower jaw for necrosis." No professor ever won more completely the esteem of his pupils, or enjoyed more universally the regard of the members of the profession he so eminently adorned. He published a translation of "Valpean's Operative Surgery," in four vols., and contributed many papers to the scientific journals of this country and Europe. In private life he was distinguished for integrity and benevolence.

MÜGGE, THEODORE, a voluminous novelist, and founder and editor of the "National Zeitung," b. in Berlin, 1806; d. 1861.

MULLER, JEAN, DR., a German physiologist and anatomist, b. 1801; d. 1858. — HIERONYMUS, a German scholar and writer on education, b. 1785; d. 1861.

MULREADY, WILLIAM, a painter, b. at Emis, Ireland, 1785; d. near London, 1863. In his 15th year he entered the royal academy as a student. His pictures at first were small, and it was not until 1815, when he exhibited his "Idle Boys," that his position was assured; its merits being recognized by his election as an associate of the academy. In 1816 his "Fight Interrupted" secured his elevation to the rank of R. A. He never relaxed in his efforts or in his studies, even when an acknowledged master of his art. His works are exceedingly numerous, although of late years he appeared only on rare occasions before the public. Engrossed as he was in perfecting his powers of expression, a very simple range of subject throughout sufficed. The strife and humors of school-boy life, or of the village, supplied materials in later as in earlier years. A sketch from nature of "A Street Preacher" he made in 1809; a finished drawing of the same, in 1822. Pictures finished in 1830 ("The Dog of two Minds"), or in 1840 ("Fair June"), were commenced 20 or 30 years before; gradually ripening under his hands. In 1840 he executed 20 designs for an illustrated edition of the "Vicar of Wakefield"; and from this source were subsequently derived many of his finest pictures. In 1848 an exhibition of his works was formed at the London society of arts, and the public and private galleries of England are rich in examples of his genius.

MUNDT, THEODORE, a prolific German writer, for a time professor at Breslau, and subsequently librarian of the university of Berlin, b. 1808; d. 1861.

MUNDY, SIR GEORGE, admiral in the British service, b. 1777; d. 1861. He distinguished himself in the battles of St. Vincent and the Nile.

MURDOCK, JAMES, D. D., studied theology under Dr. Dwight, and in 1802 was ordained pastor of the church at Princeton, Mass. He was successively professor of Greek and Latin in the university of Vermont, and professor of sacred rhetoric and ecclesiastical history in the theological seminary at Andover, Mass., whence he removed to New Haven. Amongst his works are, a translation of Mosheim's "Ecclesiastical History," a version of the New Testament from the Syriac Peshito, a translation of Muencher's Dogmatic History, and "Sketches of Modern Philosophy." B. at Westbrook, Conn., 1776; d. in Mississippi, 1856.

MURE, WILLIAM, who held a high reputation amongst European scholars, was b. 1799, and was educated at Westminster and the university of Edinburgh. He studied subsequently in Germany. His chief work, "A Critical History of the Language and Literature of Ancient Greece," was left unfinished; but the several portions of it, on the epic and lyric poets, and the historians, may be regarded as separate works. The first two volumes are almost wholly devoted to an examination of the Iliad and Odyssey, in which he endeavors to prove the essential unity of both these poems, together with the identity of their authorship. D. 1860.

MURRAY, DANIEL, catholic archbishop of Dublin, b. 1768; d. 1852.

MUSPRATT, SUSAN CUSHMAN, known before her marriage as an accomplished actress, and the sister of Charlotte Cushman, b. in Boston, Mass., 1822; d. near Liverpool, 1859.

N.

NACHIMOFF, ADMIRAL, commander of the Russian fleet when the Turkish ships were destroyed at Sinope, in 1853. Killed at Sebastopol, 1855.

NAPIER, SIR CHARLES JAMES, lieutenant-general in the British army, was b. in 1782. His first laurels were won under Sir John Moore in the Peninsular war, where he was made prisoner during the retreat on Corunna. He afterward fought under Wellington in some of the severest actions in the Peninsula. Appointed governor of Cephalonia, he joined Lord Byron in drawing up a plan for securing the independence of Greece; winning the gratitude of the Cephalonians, but being snubbed by the authorities he served. In 1841 he went to India, as commander of the Bombay army, and at once applied himself to the reform of abuses with an energy that incurred the displeasure of the East India monopoly, and the authorities under its influence. In 1843 he entered upon a campaign in Afghanistan, achieving great victories at Meeanee and Hyderabad, and adding Scinde to the conquered territories of Britain. As governor of Scinde he carried into effect many salutary reforms. The scheme of conquest was completed by the battles of Ferozeshah and Sobraon, and in 1847 he returned to England. The occurrence of another Sikh war, in 1849, led him back to India, but only for a brief period. He d. near Portsmouth, 1852. — SIR GEORGE THOMAS, a younger brother of the preceding, served in the Peninsula, and as governor of the Cape of Good Hope. D. 1855. — SIR WILLIAM FRANCIS PATRICK, another brother, general and historian, b. 1785; d. 1830. — SIR CHARLES, vice-admiral, commander of the Baltic fleet during the Russian war. The glory he had won in Egypt, Syria, and Spain, faded before Cronstadt; the sole products of this his last command having been the blockade and the affair of Bomarsund. B. 1783; d. 1860.

— NELSON, WILLIAM, b. at Maysville, Ky., 1825, was shot in a personal quarrel by brigadier-general J. C. Davis, at Louisville, 1832. He entered the United States navy in 1840, and in 1861 was detailed, with the rank of lieutenant-commander, to command the gun-boats on the Ohio river. Being transferred to the department of the secretary of war, he was appointed brigadier-general, and subsequently major-general of United States volunteers, and served with efficiency in Eastern Kentucky, and about Corinth, Miss. — WOLFRED, a leader of the Lower Canadian insurrection in 1837, was the son of an English commissariat officer, and was b. at Montreal toward the close of the last century. He commenced the practice of the medical profession in 1811, and served as surgeon during the war with the United States. In 1827 he entered the field of colonial politics, and soon identified himself closely with the party struggling against the petty tyranny which prevailed under the sanction of the colonial office. Popular discontent found vent in the partial and imperfectly organized rebellion of 1837, and Dr. Nelson commanded the small armed force which encountered, and for the time defeated, the government forces at St. Denis on the Richelieu river. He was, however, speedily compelled to seek safety in flight, and being captured near the frontier, was taken to Montreal, and there tried, and banished to Bermuda. On his release he settled at Plattsburgh, N. Y., where he practised his profession until permitted to return to Canada. Being there, he was elected to the provincial parliament, from which he retired to accept the office of inspector of prisons, which he held until his death in 1863.

NESSSELRODE, COUNT, a Russian diplomatist and statesman, was b. of German parents in Livonia, about 1770. His father was the ambassador who negotiated the marriage between the eccentric Paul and a princess of Wurtemberg; and young Nesselrode, having been educated at the Imperial military college of St. Petersburg, received a commission in the guards from the empress Catherine. When Paul ascended the throne he appointed Nesselrode one of his aid-de-camps; but the latter soon showed the bent of his disposition by entering into the diplomatic service. His first occupation was that of attaché to the Prussian court. In 1807 he was connected with the embassy to Paris, and subsequently took part in the various events which transpired till the fall of Napoleon, in 1814; suiting his policy to the various changes with a dexterity which added to his influence at home and abroad. When Napoleon was branded as the common enemy, and the congress assembled at Vienna, Nesselrode appeared in the Austrian capital as Russian plenipotentiary, and exercised his diplomatic skill to procure the partition of Poland; and the annexation of a great part of Saxony to Prussia. From that date to 1856 he was the servant of successive czars, with the office of minister of foreign affairs. After nearly 60 years of labor in the service of the state, during which he yielded, willow-like, to every storm, he is said to have become an object of suspicion to his sovereign and to the heads of both the great parties in Russia. He was suspected by the czar of retaining his long-cherished predilections in favor of France; and while the German party blamed him for the Crimean war, the Muscovites expressed their indignation at his supposed goodwill towards the allied powers. He retired from public life in 1856; visited Paris in 1857, and d. 1862.

NEWCASTLE, HENRY PELHAM CLINTON, Duke of, b. 1811. He was chief secretary for Ireland in 1846; war minister during the earlier campaigns in the Crimea; and, finally, secretary of state for the colonies. He visited the United States as director of the movements of the Prince of Wales. D. 1864.

NEWCOMB, HARVEY, D. D., editor of various religious journals, and author of the "Cyclopædia of Missions," and a great number of smaller works, b. in Thetford, Vt., 1803; d. in Brooklyn, 1863. His ministerial services were in connection with the congregational church in Massachusetts and Pennsylvania.

NICHOL, JOHN PRINGLE, author of "The Architecture of the Heavens," "The Solar System," and other works, and professor of astronomy in the university of Glasgow, b. 1804; d. 1859.

NICHOLAS, (NICOLAI PAVLOVITCH) Emperor of Russia, b. 1796; d. suddenly of paralysis of the lungs, 1855. The death of his brother and predecessor on the throne, Alexander, Nov. 30, 1825, proved the signal for a wide-spread revolt, at the head of which were many officers of distinction, who, having served with the Russian army in Germany, had acquired ideas of constitutional government. The conspiracy extended from St. Petersburg to Kief; and in the capital the populace were supported by the guards, under pretence of supporting Prince Constantine, who had long before resigned the crown in favor of Alexander. It was under these circumstances that Nicholas ascended the throne. His personal daring, and the terrible use he made of his cannon in the streets of St. Petersburg, overcame his rebellious subjects; and he was crowned with unusual pomp in 1826. The affairs of Greece then occupied the attention of the Western powers, resulting in the treaty of London, 1827, between England, France, and Russia. Simultaneously war had proceeded between Russia and Persia, and the victorious arms of Paskievitch extended the Russian frontier to the Arras. In 1828 Nicholas declared war against Turkey, for alleged violations of the treaty of Bucharest, and in the following year obtained the treaty of Adrianople, surrendering to Russia the Circassian coast of the Black Sea. The struggle of the Poles for liberty next occupied the attention of the czar; it lasted from Nov., 1830, to Oct., 1831, when the wreck of the patriot army surrendered to Rüdiger and Paskievitch. Scarcely had this cruel conflict terminated when the revolt of the Pasha of Egypt against the Grand Sultan led Nicholas to send an expedition to the Bosphorus. The treaty of Unkiar Skelessi followed (July, 1832), the effect of which was to close the Dardanelles against the fleets of Europe. Although these events produced complications of no ordinary difficulty amongst the Western powers, bringing Britain and France to the verge of war, and causing the operations of Britain against Mehemet Ali in Syria, the career of Nicholas presented no point demanding mention until the outbreak of the revolutionary flame which involved the greater part of Europe in 1848. The peril of the house of Hapsburg afforded a pretext for interference; and in July, 1848, the Russian troops were marched into Hungary, where Bem and Dembinski at the head of 20,000 Poles had joined the Magyars. The surrender of Gorgey to the Russian General Rüdiger, on the 11th of August, blasted the hopes of the Hungarians, and relieved the czar from the presence of a constitutional government in close proximity with his dominions. In 1852 Nicholas asserted the right of Russia to the protectorate of the Greek church throughout Turkey; and in support of the claim part of the Russian army was ordered towards Moldavia. Two divisions crossed the Pruth in July, 1853, the interim having been occupied by the mission of Prince Menschikoff to Constantinople, and the naval demonstrations on the part of England and France in Besika Bay. The war in the Crimea followed, during the progress of which Nicholas breathed his last. The temper and policy of

Nicholas were alike imperial; he moved among his courtiers and subjects with the stern, haughty bearing of a demi-god, or a hero of the ancient world; all his designs tending to the advancement of the glory of his country and the improvement of his people, so far as these are compatible with absolute government.

NICHOLS, JOHN BOWYER, the son of a well-known literary biographer of the last century, and himself for a long time publisher and editor of "The Gentleman's Magazine," b. in London, 1779; d. 1863. He edited many works, and was an industrious writer of literary memoirs. — REV. ICHABOD, D. D., author of a work on "Natural Theology," was a graduate of Harvard college, and having studied theology, settled in Portland, Me., in 1809, and continued there until 1855, when he removed to Cambridge. He was b. in Portsmouth, N. H., 1784, and d. in Cambridge, 1859. He left a work, entitled "Hours with the Evangelists," nearly ready for publication.

NICOL, WILLIAM, a lecturer on natural philosophy, d. in Edinburgh, 1851, aged 83. His name is associated with the invention of the single image prism of the calcareous spar, known to the scientific world as Nicol's prism.

NICOLLINI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, an eminent sculptor, b. near Pisa, 1782; d. 1861. The most widely known of his statues are, "Arnold of Brescia," "Ludovicus the Moor," "Filippo Strozzi," and "Rosa Munda."

NIEMANS, BARON VON, a learned traveller, d. in Cairo, 1858. He was on the eve of a journey into the interior of Africa, to ascertain the fate of Dr. Vogel.

NILES, JOHN M., one of the founders, and long a principal editor of the "Hartford Times," senator in congress from 1835 to 1839, postmaster-general in Mr. Van Buren's administration, and again senator from 1842 to 1848. B. 1788; d. 1856.

NITZCH, GREGORY WILHELM, a German philologist, b. 1790; d. 1861.

NOAH, MORDECAI MANASSEH, for more than 30 years connected with the New York press, b. in Philadelphia in 1785. In his youth he was apprenticed to a mechanical business, which he soon abandoned to study law, and follow political and literary pursuits. In 1813 he was appointed United States consul to Morocco. The vessel in which he took passage to enter upon the duties of his office was taken by the British, and after several weeks' detention in England, he was permitted to proceed to the place of his appointment. On his return, in 1816, he settled in New York, and became a proprietor and editor of the "National Advocate," a democratic journal, which he left on his election as sheriff of the city and county. He subsequently established the "Enquirer," which was merged in the "Courier." When that journal joined the whigs, Noah established "The Evening Star," which he edited for many years with great success. It finally declined in circulation and was merged in other journals. D. 1851.

NORMANBY, CONSTANTINE HENRY PHELPS, Marquis of, b. 1797; d. 1863. He was governor of Jamaica when the emancipation of the slaves was effected, was lord-lieutenant of Ireland from 1835 to 1839, and, successively, secretary for the colonies and home secretary. In 1846 he was ambassador to Paris, and in that capacity recognized the provisional government of 1848. He remained in Paris until after the coup d'état and the elevation of Louis Napoleon to the imperial throne, officially favoring both events. He wrote "A Year of Revolution," being his Parisian experience of 1848-9; and several novels, now almost forgotten.

NORTHUMBERLAND, ALGERNON PERCY, Duke of, b. 1792; d. 1865. He entered the British navy in 1809, rose to the rank of captain in 1815, and was appointed admiral on the reserved list in 1862. In politics he adhered to the tory party, but rarely acted in public life.

NORTON, REV. ANDREWS, D. D., was b. in Hingham, Mass., in 1786, studied theology, graduated at Cambridge in 1804, was tutor in Bowdoin in 1809-10, was tutor in Cambridge in 1810-11, teacher of theology from 1813 to 1819, Dexter professor of sacred literature from 1819 to 1830, and librarian from 1813 to 1821. Dr. Norton was a profound scholar, and for talent, acquirements, and influence, one of the most remarkable men in New England. He was the author of several theological works, the principal one being, "Evidences of the Genuineness of the Gospels." In his publications he supported the views of the Unitarians. He also wrote verses of a devotional cast, and of great beauty and sweetness. D. 1853.

NOVELLO, VINCENT, a popular English musical composer, b. 1781; d. 1861.

NUGENT, MARSHAL, a soldier in the Austrian service more than 60 years, and the recipient of honors from successive emperors. B. in Ireland, 1777; d. at Croatia, Austria, 1862.

NUTTAL, THOMAS, b. in England, 1786, was brought up a printer, and came to the United States in early life. Here he studied botany and geology, and published the "Genera of North American Plants," "The Birds of the United States," and other works. From 1822 to 1834 he was professor of botany in Harvard college. He travelled in California, and published several papers on the shells and plants found there. He returned to England to enjoy an estate devised to him on condition that he should reside on it, and d. 1859.

O.

O'BRIEN, WILLIAM SMITH, an Irish patriot, descended from the ancient kings of Munster, was b. at Dromoland, 1803. He was educated at Harrow and Cambridge, and having inherited a fortune from his mother, entered parliament, in 1830, as member for Ennis, and afterwards for Limerick. Though connected with aristocratic families, he joined O'Connell in demanding a repeal of the union as the only remedy for Irish grievances. But O'Connell and O'Brien differed on an essential point: the former believed in the efficacy of moral force, while the latter contended that nothing could be extorted from the British government except by demonstrations of physical power. The Young Ireland party, of which O'Brien was the leader, was gaining ground steadily when the French revolution of 1848 broke out. He proceeded to Paris; was received with sympathy by the provisional government, and returned impressed with the conviction that Ireland would be supported by France in separating from England. The Earl of Clarendon, then lord lieutenant, at once suspended the habeas corpus act, and placed the disaffected districts under martial law. O'Brien held on his way firmly, reviewing assemblages of peasantry, and pronouncing insurrection inevitable. He led an attack upon a police station at Balingarry, July 29, 1848, and in the following September was arrested on a charge of high treason. He was found guilty and condemned to death, but the penalty was commuted to transportation for life, and that again was mitigated in 1856. On his return to Ireland, O'Brien abstained from active participation in political affairs, although he avowedly cherished his old opinions as to the wrongs of his native country and their remedy. D. 1864. — FITZ JAMES, a poet and brilliant writer, b. in Ireland, 1829; came to the United States about 1850; enlisted in the 7th regiment, N. Y. state militia, April, 1861; in Jan., 1862, was appointed upon the staff of Gen. Lander; and in the following month received a wound in a skirmish in Virginia from the effects of which he died.

O'CONNELL, MAURICE, eldest son of Daniel O'Connell, called to the Irish bar in 1827, entered parliament for Clare in 1831, and d. 1853. — JOHN, third son of Daniel O'Connell, and the editor of the "Life and Speeches" of his father. B. in 1810, he entered the house of commons in 1832, and published two volumes of "Parliamentary Recollections and Experiences." D. 1858.

O'CONNOR, ARTHUR, General, was a prominent actor in the Irish rebellion of 1798, and after that event went to France, where the first consul appointed him general of division. In 1809 he married the daughter of Condorcet, niece on her mother's side to Marshal Grouchy, and in 1834 purchased from the heirs of Mirabeau the chateau of Bignon, where he d., 1852. — FEARGUS, nephew of the preceding, b. in 1796, at Dargan castle, county Meath. He obtained a seat in the house of commons, in 1832, as a supporter of Daniel O'Connell, but subsequently addressed himself to the working classes of England, and became the leader of the chartist movement. In 1847 he was elected to parliament by the chartists of Nottingham, and as proprietor and editor of the "Northern Star" set afoot the movement which resulted in the famous petition for the charter, and the formidable popular gathering in London in 1848. He originated a land scheme, with the view of facilitating the acquisition of small freehold allotments, but it totally failed, and involved him in unmerited disgrace. Calumny and embarrassment overturned the balance of his reason, and he was finally consigned to a private asylum at Chiswick, where he d., 1855. Although violent in his politics, he was honest in his intentions, and so far from mercenary that his devotion to the cause he espoused left him a beggar. The remnant of his followers expressed their sense of his disinterestedness in the motto displayed at his funeral,—"He lived and died for us."

OERSTED, HANS CHRISTIAN, the discoverer of electro-magnetism, b. at Rudkjøbing, in Denmark, 1777; d. 1851. When twelve years of age, he became assistant to his father, who was an apothecary; but in 1794 he entered the university of Copenhagen, where he soon distinguished himself by the closeness of his application to study, and his originality of thought. In 1801 he left Copenhagen on a tour through Germany, France, and Holland; and in 1806 he was appointed to the chair of natural philosophy in Copenhagen, where he labored assiduously till his death. In 1820 his labors were crowned by his discovery of electro-magnetism. Renown and honorable testimonials were then showered upon him from every side. Many learned societies elected him as their member; the royal society of England sent him the Copley medal, and the institute of France, as an extraordinary acknowledgment, presented him with one of the mathematical class prizes, worth 3000 francs. In 1836 he visited England; and at the meeting of the British association, held at Southampton in that year, Sir John Herschel, in reference to his discovery, used these words:—"The electric telegraph, and other wonders of modern science, were but mere effervescences from the surface of this deep recondite discovery, which Oersted had liberated, and which was yet to burst with all its mighty force upon the world. If I were to characterize by any figure the advantage of Oersted to science, I would regard him as a fertilizing shower descending from heaven, which brought forth a new crop, delightful to the eye, and pleasing to the heart." How this prophetic anticipation has been realized all the world knows. On his return to Copenhagen, he continued to labor in his scientific pursuits, varied with excursions into the regions of politics and literature.

OKEN, LORENZ, an eminent German physiologist, successively professor of natural history at Jena, Munich, and Zurich. The work on which his reputation mainly rests is his "Physio-philosophy" (which has been translated by the Ray society), and which is remarkable for proclaiming the law of unity that pervades the composition of all animal bodies.—a theory that in the hands of Geoffroy Saint Hilaire, in France, and of Owen, in England, has since been prolific in gigantic results. B. 1778; d. 1851.

OLIN, REV. STEPHEN, D. D., LL. D.,

born in Vermont, graduated at Middlebury college; was an eloquent preacher connected with the methodist episcopal church, and a professor in Franklin college, Georgia; in 1833 he was elected president of Randolph college, Macon, Geo., and subsequently president of the Wesleyan university at Middletown. He published "Travels in the East," and various lectures and discourses. D. 1851.

ONDERDONK, RIGHT REV. BENJAMIN TREADWELL, protestant bishop of the diocese of Eastern New York, b. in New York, 1791; d. 1861. He was elected to the episcopate in 1830, but was suspended from the exercise of his episcopal functions, in 1845, in consequence of charges affecting his clerical character and reputation.

O'NEILL, JOHN BRUCE RICHARD, Viscount and Baron, b. 1780; d. 1855. He was the last of the hereditary chiefs of Ulster.

OPIE, AMELIA, an English authoress, b. 1771; d. 1853. The daughter of Dr. Alderson, of Norwich, she was married to John Opie, an eminent historical painter, in 1784, and survived him nearly half a century. Her works have been chiefly admired for their simplicity and genial feeling.

ORFILA, MATTHEW JOSEPH BONAVENTURA, a distinguished toxicologist, b. at Mahon, in Minorca, studied at Valencia and Barcelona, in 1807 repaired to Paris, where he remained until his death in 1853. Having graduated in medicine, he for some years supported himself by public lectures, and in 1823 was appointed to the chair of chemistry. During the reign of Louis Philippe, M. Orfila was made dean of the faculty of medicine; but after the revolution of February, 1848, the provisional government revoked his functions. His scientific reputation may be said to have commenced with his "Treatise on Poisons; or, General Toxicology"; but there is scarcely a department of medical jurisprudence which he has not profoundly investigated, and the treatises which he has published on these and analogous subjects have given him a world-wide reputation.

ORLOFF, ALEXEI FEODOREWITCH, Prince, a Russian general and statesman, an illegitimate son of Duke Feodor Orloff, b. 1787; d. 1861.

ORMOND, JOHN BUTLER, Marquis of, a distinguished contributor to the belles-lettres, b. in Dublin, 1808; d. 1854.

ORTON, REGINALD, an English surgeon and writer on medical subjects, and the author of experiments in inducing spontaneous generation by means of electricity. B. 1810; d. 1862.

OTEY, RIGHT REV. JAMES HEWEY, bishop of the protestant episcopal church in Tennessee, and known throughout the Southwest as "The Good Bishop." B. in Virginia, 1799; d. at Memphis, 1863.

OWEN, ROBERT, an English social reformer, b. 1771; d. 1858. He entered early upon commercial life, and at the age of 18 became partner in a cotton-mill. In 1801 he married the daughter of David Dale, a Glasgow manufacturer, and the proprietor of a large cotton factory in New Lanark, Scotland, of which Owen became the manager. Here he introduced various reforms, which, without lessening the profits of the enterprise, improved the condition and added greatly to the prosperity of the working people employed. It was here, and under Owen's direction, that the first infant school was established. After a time the factory ceased to be successful, and Owen's connection with it terminated. Possessed of a large fortune, mainly derived from his father-in-law, he entered upon his career as a social reformer, promulgating, in 1812, his "New Views of Society." His views in relation to the formation of human character and belief brought him into antagonism with the religious bodies, and excited hostility to plans for improving the position of the industrial classes by an application of the coöperative principle. In 1823 he came to the United States for the purpose of establishing, at his own cost, a society formed on his theory of modified communism. He bought from Rapp the settlement of New Harmony, in Indiana, embracing 30,000 acres of land and dwellings for 2000 persons; but the experiment proved a failure. In 1827 he returned to England, where other but smaller experiments of a similar nature ended in loss and disappointment. In 1828 he went to Mexico, on the invitation of the government, to carry out his experiment there, but effected nothing. He returned to England with faith in his principles and plans unshaken by events, and for many years labored in various ways to promulgate his views and apply them in practice. In his old age, deism culminated in spiritualism, and he published several conversations purporting to have been held with Benjamin Franklin and other persons. — DAVID DALE, son of the preceding, b. in Lanarkshire, Scotland, 1807; d. in New Harmony, Ind., 1860. A student of geology and other branches of natural science, he received the degree of M. D. from the Ohio medical college in 1835, and two years afterward was employed by the legislature of Indiana to make a geological reconnoissance of the state. Subsequently he examined the mineral lands of Iowa; and in 1848 was employed by the government to conduct a geological survey of Wisconsin, Iowa, and Minnesota. The task occupied three years, and its results are embodied in a quarto volume, published in 1852. From 1852 to 1857 he was employed in conducting a survey of Kentucky, four volumes relating to which have been published. In 1857 he was appointed state geologist of Arkansas. He was an assiduous worker, and d. in the midst of his usefulness; death being hastened by the exposure incident to camp life in the miasmatic region in which he was last employed.

OWSLEY, WILLIAM, formerly judge of the supreme court of Kentucky, and in 1844 elected by the whig party governor of the state. B. 1792; d. 1862.

OXLEE, JOHN, an English divine, reputed to have been master of 120 languages or dialects. B. 1779; d. 1854.

P.

PAIXHAN, GENERAL, a French general of artillery; d. of cholera at Metz, 1854.

PALGRAVE, SIR FRANCIS, was b. in London, 1788, of Jewish parents. His father, Mr. Meyer Cohen, was long known as a wealthy member of the stock exchange; but on the breaking out of the war with France, in 1803, he sustained heavy losses, which entailed on the son the necessity of working for a living.

In 1823 he married, and obtained permission to change his name from Cohen to Palgrave, that being the maiden name of his wife's mother. He was called to the bar in 1827. In 1832 he published the "Rise and Progress of the English Commonwealth," and "Observations on the Principles, &c., of New Municipal Corporations." In the same year he was knighted, in acknowledgment of his contributions to constitutional and parliamentary history. In 1838 he was appointed to the post of deputy keeper of her majesty's records, an office which he retained till his death. Among his numerous works, "The Merchant and the Friar," an imaginary history of Marco Polo and Friar Bacon, is well known; as also are his "Hand-book for Travellers in Northern Italy," and his "History of England and Normandy." This last work is only a fragment. He contributed also a long series of important articles to the Edinburgh and Quarterly Reviews. With Mr. Hallam, he shares the merit of having founded the modern school of historical criticism of the middle ages. D. 1861.

PALMER, ROBERT M., United States minister to the Argentine confederation, b. at Mount Holly, N. J., 1820; d. 1862.

PANGALOS, M. VARNAVAS, the oldest of the patriots who struggled for the independence of Greece, and one of those who sacrificed a large fortune to the cause. D. at Athens, 1855, aged 111.

PARIS, JAMES AYTON, a very eminent physician, d. in London, 1856, in his 72d year. He founded the royal geological society of Cornwall, and gave the miners the great boon of the "tamping bar," by which they are enabled to pursue their labors amid inflammable gases, without fear of striking fire from the rock. He was the author of a "Life of Sir Humphrey Davy," and a work called "Philosophy in Sport." In 1844 he was made president of the college of physicians, and remained so till his death.

PARKER, REV. THEODORE, b. in Lexington, Mass., 1810; d. in Florence, Tuscauy, May 10, 1860. He entered Harvard college in 1830, but did not graduate; entered the divinity school at Cambridge in 1834; and was settled as a unitarian pastor in West Roxbury in 1837. In 1840 he received the honorary degree of master of arts from Harvard college. In 1841, in an ordination sermon, he uttered the sentiments which led to the theological controversies which marked the active years of his life. In 1843 he visited Europe; began to preach in Boston in 1845, and in 1846 was settled over the twenty-eighth congregational society in that city. In 1859 his health failed, and he went to Europe to seek its restoration, but without success. He was a ripe scholar, of extensive and varied attainments. Radical in his opinions in religion and politics, and vigorous and denunciatory in his utterance of them, he excited a large opposition. But he was much beloved by those acquainted with him for his simplicity and purity of character. He collected a valuable library, which he bequeathed to the city of Boston, to be made part of the public library. His most widely-known publication is "A Discourse on Matters Pertaining to Religion," which has had a very large circulation in Europe. — HYDE, a British vice-admiral, d. 1854.

PARMA, FERDINAND CHARLES DE BOURBON, Duke of Parma, b. 1823, was the son of Charles II. and the Princess Theresa of Sardinia. On the death of Marie Louise, in 1847, his father became Duke of Parma; abdicating in favor of his son, who assumed the title of Charles III., in 1849. He was assassinated in 1854.

PARRIS, ALBION K., a representative of Maine in congress in 1815 and 1817, governor of the state from 1821 to 1826, senator in congress 1827-8, and judge of the supreme court of the state from 1828 to 1836. He then became second comptroller of the treasury department at Washington, and retained the office until 1851. B. 1785; d. 1857.

PARRY, SIR WILLIAM EDWARD, rear-admiral in the British service, was engaged on the North American station from 1813 to 1817. In 1819 he was selected to prosecute discoveries in the Arctic regions under Captain Buchan, and was rewarded with the rank of commander. Three other expeditions in the Arctic seas were undertaken by him, as captain of the Hecla, and secured for him knighthood. He was afterward employed by his government in various capacities. B. 1790; d. 1855.

PASCO, JOHN, rear-admiral, was the signal-officer at Trafalgar when Nelson gave the order, "England expects every man to do his duty." B. 1776; d. 1854.

PASKIEWITSCH, IVAN FIDOROVITZ, a celebrated Russian general, b. 1782, was appointed at an early age aide-camp to the Emperor Paul. In 1805 he made his first campaign as captain in an auxiliary corps which was sent to the assistance of the emperor of Austria against the French. He distinguished himself in the wars with France, Turkey, and Persia, and in suppressing the Polish insurrection. Succeeding to the command, on the death of General Diebitsch, he signally defeated the Poles and captured Warsaw, for which services he was raised to the dignity of Prince of Warsaw. He was appointed lieutenant of the kingdom of Poland, and held the position till his death in 1856.

PASLEY, SIR CHARLES WILLIAM, lieutenant-general in the British service, and colonel commandant of royal engineers, b. 1780; d. 1861. He was eminent as an engineer, and was inspector-general of railways in Great Britain. He published a treatise on "Military Instruction," and "An Essay on the Military Policy and Institutions of the British Empire."

PASQUIER, ETIENNE DENIS, Duke, a French statesman, b. 1767; d. 1862. He filled important offices under the empire, and a non-political office under the Bourbons. After the second restoration he accepted a seat in the cabinet formed by Talleyrand, and in 1819 assumed the portfolio of foreign affairs. Under Louis Philippe he became president of the chamber of peers, and as such presided at the trial of Louis Napoleon for the Boulogne attempt. He was not heard of in public life after the revolution of 1848.

PASSAVANT, JOHANN DAVID, an artist and writer on art, b. at Frankfort-on-the-Main, 1787; d. 1861. He published "Essays upon the Fine Arts," "Artistic Voyage to England and Belgium," "Raphael of Urbino," "Christian Art in Spain," and other works.

PASTA, JUDITH, a celebrated singer, b. 1798; d. at her villa on the Lake of Como, 1865. She was a Jewess by birth, and at the age of 15 became a pupil at the Milan conservatory of music. A few years later she appeared in opera at Venice and Milan, and in 1821 went to Paris, where she at once achieved a triumph. In 1824 she had become an European celebrity, for whom Bellini and Pacini composed their most exquisite operas. Her earliest fame was won in the operas of Rossini; and she was the admitted creator of "Anna Bolena," the "Sommambula," and "Norma." She was a dramatic singer in the fullest force of the term; and her voice in its prime is said to have had the full range of two and a half octaves. Her efforts on the stage enabled her in a brief period to realize a large fortune, and for many years previous to her death she had been removed from the public view.

PATMORE, PETER GEORGE, a well-known contributor to the English periodical press, and the author of numerous works. Hazlitt's "Liber Amoris" is addressed to him, as are also some of Charles Lamb's epistles. B. 1787; d. 1855.

PATTERSON, FRANCIS E., brigadier-general of volunteers in the United States service, b. in Philadelphia, 1827; d. 1862.

PAULDING, JAMES KIRKE, essayist, and a voluminous writer of novels, was b. in Dutchess county, N. Y., 1779, and in early manhood removed to New York. His sister had married the elder brother of Washington Irving, and the acquaintance thus formed led to Paulding's participation in the publication of "Salmagundi," in 1807. He was from that time to the close of his life engaged more or less in literary pursuits. A pamphlet of his, entitled "the United States and England," brought him to the acquaintance of Mr. Madison, and into the political arena. In 1814 he was made secretary of the board of navy commissioners; afterwards navy agent at New York; and he was secretary of the navy during the administration of Mr. Van Buren, after which time he retired from public life. D. 1860.

PAULUS, H. E. G., a distinguished orientalist and critic, b. 1791; d. at Heidelberg, 1851. He was professor of church history and biblical exegesis in Heidelberg university, having previously been at Jena and Wurzburg.

PAXTON, EDWARD F., a confederate brigadier-general, b. in Virginia, and educated at the military academy of that state. He served under "Stonewall" Jackson, first as adjutant-general of his brigade, and afterward as commander of a brigade at Antietam, Fredericksburg, and Chancellorsville. In the last of these battles he was killed, May, 1863. — SIR JOSEPH, the son of an English yeoman, was b. in 1802, and received the scanty rudiments of education in the free school of Woburn, Bedfordshire. His abilities as a gardener attracted the notice of the Duke of Devonshire, who became his patron and benefactor. The taste and skill which he displayed in the gardens of Chatsworth soon made him well known as a horticulturist and landscape gardener. In the erection of extensive glass conservatories, he obtained the germ of the idea which was afterwards expanded in the crystal palace of 1851, of which he was the designer and architect. His success in the novel undertaking earned the honor of knighthood, and led to his connection with many public works. He superintended the construction of the palace, and designed the plan of the grounds at Sydenham. He edited several works on horticulture and botany, and, though not an educated man, was a member of many of the learned societies in Europe. He also sat some years as member for Coventry in the house of commons. D. 1835.

PAYNE, JOHN HOWARD, an American actor and dramatist, was b. at New York in 1792. From childhood he was a prodigy. In his 13th year he was a writer for the press, and editor of the "Thespian Mirror." At 16 the youthful Roscius appeared as "Norval" in Douglas, at the Park theatre, New York. At Boston he appeared, among other characters, in those of "Hastings," "Rolla," "Edgar," and "Hamlet." In 1812 he went to England, and made his debut at Drury Lane in his 21st year. In 1826 he edited a London dramatic paper called "The Opera Glass." A great number of dramas were prepared by him when on the London stage, chiefly adaptations from the French, and in some of them Charles Kemble appeared. The now cosmopolitan air of "Home, Sweet Home," first appeared in Howard Payne's "Clari, the Maid of Milan." In his latter years he occupied the post of consul of the United States at Tunis, where he d., 1852.

PEABODY, EVERETT, Col. of the 25th Missouri regiment, b. in Springfield, Mass., 1830, killed in the battle of Shiloh, April 6, 1862.

PEARCE, JAMES A., b. in Virginia, 1805; d. in Maryland, 1862. He was a member of the Maryland legislature in 1831; a representative in congress from that state from 1835 to 1839, and from 1841 to 1843; and a senator in congress from 1843 to 1852. He also held the post of professor of law in Washington college, Chestertown.

PEASE, CALVIN, D. D., professor of Greek and Latin in the university of Vermont, and afterward its president, and from Nov., 1861, pastor of a presbyterian church in Rochester, N. Y. He contributed papers on classical and other subjects to the "Bibliotheca Sacra," and was the author of several published discourses. B. in Canaan, Conn., 1813; d. 1863.

PEDRO V., King of Portugal, b. at Lisbon, 1837; d. 1861.

PEENY, DR., an African traveller, d. July 26, 1861, while exploring E. Central Africa, with the view of discovering the sources of the White Nile.

PEET, REV. STEPHEN, b. 1795, graduated at Yale college in 1823, and after officiating as a pastor in Euclid, O., proceeded to the territory of Wisconsin, and labored strenuously in the organization of churches. He was largely concerned in the establishment of Beloit college, and in the founding of a theological seminary for the northwestern states. D. in Chicago, 1855. — EDWARD, author of text-books for the use of deaf mutes, and professor in the New York institution for the deaf and dumb. B. in Hartford, Conn. 1826; d. 1862.

PEGRAM, WILLIAM JOHNSON, a confederate brigadier-general, b. at Petersburg, Va., 1841, was a son of Gen. James W. Pegram, and in the spring of 1861 was a student in the university of his native state. He volunteered as a private in the artillery, and, having distinguished himself in successive engagements, rose rapidly to the rank of colonel, to which he was promoted after the battle of Gettysburg. He subsequently became brigadier-general in Gen. Hill's corps, and was killed before Petersburg, April 2, 1865.

PÉLISSIER, AMABLE JEAN JACQUES, Duc de Malakoff, marshal in the French army, was b. at Maromme, 1794. After completing his general and military education at St. Cyr, he entered the French military service, and obtaining promotion, went to Spain in 1823, where he highly distinguished himself. In 1829 he proceeded to Greece, where his talents and bravery again became conspicuous, and were duly rewarded. His next campaign was undertaken in Africa, serving in Algiers, till from the failure of his health he was obliged to return to France. In 1840 he was again sent to Africa, and for some years was occupied in reducing the wild tribes of the desert to submission. On one of these expeditions he destroyed about six hundred of the enemy in a cavern, into which they had retreated, by burning fagots at its mouth; an act of barbarity which drew on Péliissier the indignation of the world. His services in the Crimea restored him to favor. He joined the French army before Sebastopol in 1855, and, succeeding Canrobert in the chief command, was highly successful, and for his gallantry was created duke of Malakoff, marshal of France, and G. C. B. of Great Britain. He succeeded M. Persigny as ambassador to London in 1858, from which office, however, he was recalled in 1859. D. 1864.

PENDER, WILLIAM D., major-general in the confederate service, b. in North Carolina; killed at Gettysburg, 1863.

PENDERGAST, GARRET J., commodore United States navy, b. in Kentucky, 1800; d. 1862. His term of service extended over more than half a century.

PENDLETON, NATHANIEL GREENE, a lawyer and statesman, — a son of Nathaniel Pendleton, an officer in the revolutionary war, and second of Gen. Alex. Hamilton in his duel with Aaron Burr, — b. in Georgia, 1793; d. in Cincinnati, 1861. He was a representative of Ohio in congress from 1841 to 1843.

PENNINGTON, WILLIAM, b. in Newark, N. J., 1797, was governor of that state from 1837 to 1843, and as chancellor, ex officio, took a prominent part in the "Broad seal controversy." He was elected a representative to the 36th congress, and became speaker of the house. D. 1862.

PEPE, GULIELMO, an Italian patriot and general, b. in Calabria, 1783; d. 1855. In 1799 he sided with the French party in the Neapolitan kingdom, for which he was condemned to death, but the sentence was commuted to exile, on account of his youth. In 1815 he fought under Murat for the independence of Italy, and continued in the Neapolitan service after the restoration of the Bourbons. In 1820 and 1821 he was the leader of the revolutionary party, for which he was again exiled, and resided in France and England until 1848. On the outbreak of the Italian revolutions in 1848, he returned to Naples, and was appointed commander-in-chief of the army sent to Central Italy against the Austrians by the constitutional government of Ferdinand II. At Bologna he received orders to return, which he refused to obey, but resigned the command of the army, and repaired to Venice, when he was made commandant, which command he held until the surrender of that city in 1849, and there ended his long and checkered military career. From Venice he went to Paris, and continued to reside there until the coup d'état of 1852, when he finally removed and settled in Piedmont.

PERCIVAL, JAMES GATES, educated as a physician, but better known as a poet and geologist, was b. at Berlin, Conn., 1795, and received from Yale the degree of M. D. in 1820. In the same year he published his first volume of poems. In 1822 appeared the first number of "Clio"; a second followed a few years later, and the third was issued in 1827. In 1824 he was for a short time in the service of the United States as professor of chemistry in the military academy at West Point, and subsequently as a surgeon connected with the recruiting station at Boston. In 1827 he was employed to revise the manuscript of Dr. Webster's large dictionary, and not long after this he published a translation of Malte-Brun's Geography. In 1835 he was appointed, in conjunction with Professor C. U. Shepard, to make a survey of the geology and mineralogy of Connecticut. Dr. Percival took charge of the geological part, and his report thereon was published in 1842. In 1843 appeared at New Haven his last published volume of poetical contributions, entitled "The Dream of a Day, and Other Poems." In 1854 he was appointed state geologist of Wisconsin; his first report being published in 1855. Exposure incident to his duty undermined his health, and he d. at Hazel Green, Wis., 1856.

PEREIRA, JONATHAN, a London physician, author of "Elements of Materia Medica," and distinguished for his knowledge of pharmacy and general science. B. 1804; d. 1853.

PERRY, MATTHEW COLBREATH, commodore United States navy, b. in South Kingston, R. I., 1795, entered the navy in 1809, and rose to a captaincy in 1837. During a part of the war with Mexico he commanded the gulf squadron, and in 1852 commanded the Japan expedition, with which his name is inseparably connected. D. 1858. — JAMES H., b. 1811; d. while in command of Fort Pulaski, Ga., 1862. Although educated at West Point, and schooled as a soldier in the Texan war of independence and in Mexico, the commencement of the civil war found him a D. D., and ministering as pastor of a church in Brooklyn. Leaving the pulpit, he raised the 48th regiment New York state volunteers and served as its colonel.

PETIGRU, JAMES LOUIS, a lawyer and statesman, b. in Abbeville district, S. C., 1789, and educated at the university of that state. From 1822 to 1830 he was attorney-general of the state. During the nullification crisis of 1830-32 he took issue with Messrs. Calhoun, McDuffie, and Hayne, and became one of the leaders of the Union party, opposing the protective system, but at the same time denouncing the proposed remedy of nullification by the state veto. The movement of 1861 did not alter his views. He remained a Union man till the last, although his advanced years prevented him from taking an active part in the controversy. D. 1863.

PFEIFFER, IDA, one of the most remarkable of modern travellers, b. in Vienna in 1795; d. 1858. Her maiden name was Reyer, and having married in 1820, she devoted herself for twenty years to domestic duties and the education of her children. On the death of her husband, in 1840, she was seized with an irresistible desire to visit foreign countries, and soon afterwards commenced that career of travel which ended only with her life. Besides visiting all the countries of Europe and great part of Asia, in 1846 she made her first voyage round the globe, returning in 1848; and again in 1851 she sailed from London, penetrated Borneo, visited Java and Sumatra, and found her way back to England by California, South America, and the United States, in 1854. Her last expedition was directed towards Madagascar, in 1856. With the exception of her last adventurous trip, she published an account of all her travels; and her two "Voyages Round the Globe" were translated into English.

PHILLIPS, RICHARD, an eminent English chemist, b. 1776; d. 1851. He first attracted the attention of the scientific world by the publication, in the "Annals of Philosophy," of analyses of mineral waters, and of minerals of a rare kind. In 1817 he was appointed lecturer on chemistry at the London hospital; and he was appointed to deliver several courses of lectures at the London institution. About this period he was also appointed by the government professor of chemistry at the military college, Sandhurst; and lecturer on chemistry at Grainger's school of medicine in Southwark. In 1821 Mr. Phillips became the sole editor of the "Annals of Philosophy"; in 1822 he was elected a fellow of the royal society, and published a paper in the "Transactions," in which his name was honorably associated with that of Mr. Faraday. In 1824 Mr. Phillips published his first translation of the "Pharmacopœia Londinensis"; and from the celebrity which he gained as a pharmaceutical chemist, he was consulted by the college of physicians with respect to the chemical preparations of the work issued by that body in 1836. In 1839 he was appointed chemist and curator of the museum of practical geology, then in Craig's court, which office he held at the time of his death. Scattered through the "Transactions of the Royal Society" and the pages of the "Philosophical Magazine" will be found his numerous contributions to science; and all the chemical articles of the "Penny Cyclopædia" are from his pen.—SAMUEL, author of "Caleb Stukely," and literary reviewer for the London "Times." B. 1815; d. 1854.—CHARLES, author of a "Life of Curran," and an eminent member of the English bar, b. in Ireland, 1788; d. in London, 1858.

PILLERSDORF, BARON, an Austrian statesman, b. 1787; d. 1862.

PINCKNEY, RICHARD SHUBRICK, b. in South Carolina, 1797, entered the United States navy in 1814, and was made commander in 1841. He was engaged in the operations against the Algerine pirates, receiving severe wounds; and during the Mexican war commanded the Decatur. D. 1854.

PLACE, FRANCIS, co-laborer of Hardy and Horne Tooke in the constitutional association, through which, toward the close of the last century, English reformers battled the tyranny and corruption of their government. B. 1772; d. 1854.

PLUMMER, JOSEPH B., brigadier-general of volunteers in the United States army, b. in Massachusetts, 1822; d. 1862. He served from the commencement of the civil war, principally in Missouri and in the neighborhood of the Mississippi.

PLUNKET, WILLIAM CONYNGHAM, Lord, b. 1761, was the son of an Irish presbyterian minister. After practising with success as a barrister, he became a member of the Irish parliament, under the patronage of Lord Charlemont. He opposed the government of the day, and with especial energy resisted the legislative union. Suddenly he deserted his friends and passed over to the government; appearing for the crown on the prosecution of the patriot Emmet, and laboring to secure his conviction with savage earnestness. His recreancy was rewarded with promotion. In 1803 he became solicitor-general for Ireland, and in 1805, attorney-general. For years his political fortunes were associated with those of the English whigs, but under the Castlereagh government he earned the gratitude of the tories by apologizing for the Manchester massacre, and defending their most despotic measures. Somewhat later he advocated catholic emancipation. In 1827 he was raised to the peerage, and became chief justice of the common pleas in Ireland. He was chancellor of Ireland for many subsequent years, retiring from public life in 1841. D. 1854.

POINDESTER, GEORGE, a delegate from the territory of Mississippi to congress, 1807-13; a representative in congress, 1817-1819; the second governor of the state under the state constitution, 1819-1821; United States senator, 1831-1835. D. 1853.

POINSETT, JOEL ROBERTS, was a native of South Carolina, of delicate health in youth, and the sole survivor of a large family. He went abroad for his health and passed his early life in England and on the continent. He travelled extensively in Europe, and penetrated far into the interior of Asia. He passed a portion of his life in the Spanish-American states, and with Clay and Webster espoused their cause, and that of Greece, in the house of representatives, where he served from 1821 to 1825. In 1825 he was appointed by President Adams, though of different politics, minister to Mexico. His return was in the midst of the nullification excitement, in which he was a devoted and active Union man. He was secretary of war during Mr. Van Buren's administration. Since 1840 he had been in retirement, occasionally, however, writing upon the topics of the day. He censured the war with Mexico, though declared by the politicians with whom he had always acted. His latest labors were devoted to the preservation of the Union, and to save from secession or revolution his native state. B. 1779; d. in Statesburg, S. C., 1851.

POLK, WILLIAM H., a brother of President Polk, b. in Tennessee, 1815, served with distinction as a major of dragoons in the Mexican war, was chargé d'affaires to Naples under President Tyler, and a representative in congress from 1851 to 1853. He resisted the allurements of secession, and d. a Union man at Nashville, 1862.—LEONIDAS, b. in Raleigh, N. C., 1806, graduated at West Point in 1827, and was appointed brevet 2d lieutenant of artillery. He soon resigned the appointment, and, having studied theology, was ordained deacon in the episcopal church in 1830. In 1838 he became missionary bishop of Arkansas and the southern portion of the Indian territory, with provisional charge of the dioceses of Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana, and the missions in Texas. In 1841 he was chosen bishop of Louisiana, and retained the office until after the commencement of the civil war. In July, 1861, he doffed the clerical character and accepted a commission as major-general from the confederate government. At the outset he fixed his head-quarters at Memphis, but in September he transferred them to Columbus, Ky., which place he fortified and occupied until its evacuation in March, 1862. He joined Beauregard at Corinth, and took part in the battle of Shiloh. In Sept., 1862, he shared in the invasion of Kentucky, commanding the 2d army corps under Bragg, and in the following month fought at the battle of Perryville. He commanded the first corps of Bragg's army at Murfreesboro', and was engaged in the struggles at Stone River, which were followed by the retreat of the confederate army to Tullahoma, Ala. In Sept., 1863, he served under Bragg at Chickamauga, and for an alleged disobedience of orders was sent to Atlanta under arrest. He did not again appear in the field until Jan., 1864, when he was appointed the temporary successor of General Johnston in the command of the confederate department of the Mississippi, and in this position measured skill with General Sherman. A few months later he again encountered General Sherman, this time in western Georgia; and on the 14th June, 1864, he was killed at Pine Mountain, while making telescopic observations of the Union lines.

PORTER, JAMES MADISON, son of General Andrew Porter, of the revolutionary army, and himself a volunteer in the war of 1812, b. 1792; d. 1862. He was secretary of war in President Tyler's cabinet, and filled many prominent positions in Pennsylvania.—WILLIAM DAVID, commodore United States navy, a son of the hero of the Essex, and a brother of rear-admiral D. D. Porter, was b. in New Orleans, and was appointed a midshipman in 1823, having served before the mast during the two previous years. He served in the Mexican war in 1846-'47. In 1849 he was appointed to the command of the store-ship Erie, and of the Waterwitch in 1851. In Sept., 1861, he was ordered to St. Louis, where he superintended the construction of an iron-clad gun-boat, in the command of which he distinguished himself at various points on the Mississippi. Amongst his achievements were the defeat of four confederate gun-boats, the bombardment of Natchez, and the attack upon the batteries of Vicksburg and Port Hudson. D. in New York, 1864.—GEORGE RICHARDSON, joint-secretary of the British board of trade, and an able cultivator of statistical science, was b. in 1792. His first connection with the board of trade was at the direct request of Lord Auckland, in 1832, when he was appointed chief of the statistical department. Under Lord Dalhousie, the superintendence of the newly formed railway department was also committed to his care. Both these offices he filled in 1846, till, on the retirement of Mr. MacGregor, he was advanced to the post of joint-secretary. The greater part of the results of his study and labor are scattered through many official reports and papers, contributed by him to the London statistical society, the British association, and other public bodies. But the most lasting monument of his talent and industry is his "Progress of the Nation," which has gone through several editions. D. 1852.

POSEY, CONRAD, confederate brigadier-general, b. in Mississippi; d. in Virginia, 1863.

POTTER, ALONZO, protestant episcopal bishop of Pennsylvania, b. in Dutchess county, N. Y., 1800; d. at San Francisco, 1865. He graduated at Union college in 1818, became professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in 1821, and in the same year was ordained deacon. He removed to Boston in 1825, and was for six years rector of St. Paul's in that city. In 1831 he was elected vice-president and professor of moral philosophy in Union college, which subsequently conferred upon him the degree of LL. D. The degree of D. D. he received at Harvard and Gambier. In 1845 he was consecrated to the bishopric he held at the time of his death. His eloquence, ability, character, and zeal rendered him conspicuous amongst the prelates of his church. He was the author of "A Hand-book for Readers and Students," and other publications.

POTTINGER, SIR HENRY, bart., a distinguished English soldier and diplomatist, was b. in 1789, went to India as a cadet in 1804, and at an early age attracted the attention of the civil and military authorities there by his energy, information, and ready administrative powers. During his long sojourn in that country he was employed in almost every branch of the public service; gradually rising through all the ranks of the service till he reached that of major-general; and after the Afghanistan campaign, in 1839, being raised to the baronetage, as a reward for services which he had rendered in the discharge of his difficult duties. Early in 1841 he was appointed envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to China, where his sagacity contributed in no slight degree to bring about the treaty in 1842. He was subsequently appointed governor and commander-in-chief of the island of Hong-kong, which post he held from April, 1843, to the spring of the following year, when he returned to England, was sworn a member of the privy council, and received a pension of £1500 a year. In 1846 he was appointed to the governorship of the Cape of Good Hope, and discharged that office until Sept., 1847, when he was relieved. In 1850 he went again to India, and held the post of governor and commander-in-chief of the presidency of Madras until the year 1854, when he finally returned to England. D. 1856.

POWELL, BADEN, one of a small band of church of England divines who have struggled amidst difficulties to liberalize theological thought, was b. in 1796, and, having taken first-class honors at Oxford, assumed clerical functions. In 1827 he was appointed Savilian professor of geometry in the university of Oxford, — an office which he retained to the time of his death. He is well known as an author of works on purely scientific subjects, and of others on the relation of science to theology. In the former class he published the "History of Natural Philosophy" in 1834; a "View of the Undulatory Theory of Light," with many others. Belonging to the latter, he wrote "The Connection of Natural and Divine Truth," "The Unity of Worlds and of Nature," "Christianity without Judaism," "The Order of Nature," and others, in which he sought to define the limits of faith and of knowledge. In 1837 he was elected a fellow of the geological society; and although chiefly known for his labors in physics, and especially in light and heat, he contributed much, by a variety of writings, to the general acceptance by the public of geological investigations. His broad and liberal views, and his fearless assertion of the truths to which he was conducted by reasoning on facts, exposed him to much opposition. His clear style, philosophical tone, and extensive learning secured for him, as a writer, the sympathy and support of the friends of intellectual progress, while in private he was esteemed by all for his constant readiness to assist and instruct, and his unassuming kindness. D. 1860.

PREBLE, WILLIAM PITT, LL. D., an honored citizen of Maine, b. 1783; d. 1857. In 1820 he was appointed a judge of the supreme court of the state, which office he held until 1829, when, with Mr. Gallatin, he accepted the position of agent to present the claim of the United States before the king of the Netherlands, in the controversy with Great Britain in regard to the northwestern boundary. In 1832 he was one of the commissioners of Maine in Washington on the same subject.

PRELLER, LUDWIG, an archaeologist and classical scholar, b. at Hamburg, 1809; d. at Weimar, 1861.

PRENTISS, JOHN H., a prominent democratic politician in the state of New York, and formerly an influential journalist, b. 1784; d. 1861. — SAMUEL,

LL. D., one of the most learned, eloquent, and upright members of the Vermont bar, was b. in Stonington, Conn., 1782, studied at Northfield, Mass., and Brattleboro', Vt., and commenced practice at Montpelier in 1803. After some service in the state legislature, and on the bench of the supreme court of the state, he went as senator to congress from 1831 to 1842. In the latter year he was appointed judge of the federal district court, which office he held until his death, in 1857.

PRESCOTT, WILLIAM HICKLING, an eminent historian, b. at Salem, Mass., in 1796, was the son of a solicitor, and grandson of that Prescott who commanded the American troops at Bunker Hill. When he was twelve years of age his family removed to Boston, where he afterwards resided, and where his classical training was continued with success by Dr. Gardiner, a pupil of Dr. Parr. In 1811 he entered Harvard college, and graduated in 1814 with honors appropriate to his favorite studies, and with an intention to devote himself to the legal profession. But the great misfortune of his life had befallen him. Before he had graduated, an accidental blow had deprived him of the sight of one eye, and the natural consequence soon followed. The other became weakened by the increased labor thrown upon it; and after a severe illness, during which he was entirely blind, he found the sight of his remaining eye so much impaired, that he was compelled to give up his professional studies and hopes of success at the bar. The two next years he spent in Europe, travelling for health in England, France, and Italy, and seeking the aid of the greatest oculists of London and Paris. He returned to this country with renovated health; but for his great misfortune he found no relief. Still he was not disheartened, but turned with alacrity to those studies which remained within his reach. He resolved to become, in the best sense of the word, an historian, and freely gave himself 10 years to prepare for the task he had always loved. He next selected his subject, and, having done this, gave 10 years more to his "History of Ferdinand and Isabella," one of the few important periods in the affairs of modern Europe that seemed to invite the hand of a master. With this, in 1838, at the age of 42, he appeared before the world as an author, publishing simultaneously in London and Boston. His work was received on both sides of the Atlantic with unhesitating applause. It has since passed through several editions, and has been translated into German, Italian, French and Spanish. The seventh revised edition of this work appeared in 1854. His "Conquest of Mexico" was first published in 1843, and the "Conquest of Peru" in 1847. Two volumes of "Phillip the Second" appeared in 1855; and the third volume shortly before his death, in 1859. In 1856 he published an edition of Robertson's "Charles the Fifth." Literary honors were heaped upon him from nearly all countries. He was made an honorary member of a large number of societies in this country and Europe. In his private life, "the man was more than his books. His character was loftier than all his reputation."

PRESSNITZ, VINCENS, the founder of hydropathy, b. 1799, at Gräfenberg, Austrian Silesia; d. 1851.

PRESTON, WILLIAM B., a native of Virginia, d. 1862. He was a representative in congress from that state from 1847 to 1849; and secretary of the navy, under President Taylor, in 1849 and 1850. He took part in the rebellion of 1861 as a member of the confederate congress. — WILLIAM CAMPBELL, LL. D., an eminent southern lawyer and statesman, was b. in Philadelphia, 1794, his father being then in that city as a member of congress from Virginia. He graduated in South Carolina, studied law in the office of William Wirt, and after visiting Europe was admitted to the bar in 1821, and settled in Columbia, S. C. From 1834 to 1843 he was a senator in congress, where he was a strenuous advocate of states' rights and free trade. D. 1860.

PROSSI, TOMMASE, an Italian author and poet, b. 1789; d. 1854.

PROTET, AUGUSTE LEOPOLD, a French rear-admiral, long employed in attempts to suppress the slave-trade, and to promote geographical explorations in the interior of Africa. He was b. in 1809, and was killed in action in China, 1862.

PROUDHON, PIERRE JOSEPH, a vigorous French political writer, b. 1809, was the son of a poor cooper, and was destined to follow the trade of his father. His education was provided by benevolent neighbors, who noticed the boy's parts. He was apprenticed to a printer, and was noted for his habits of order and the excellence of his work; while he led a life of privation, saving every sou to assist his parents. In 1830 he was offered a connection with the management of a journal of the "prefecture," but he refused; preferring to a ministerial sinecure the independence of an obscure artisan. As he labored, he improved his mind, and from putting in type the writings of others, he began to be a writer himself. Proceeding from Besançon to Paris, he wrote for several publications, and then, making a start on his own account, published the work in which he propounded the dogma, "La propriété, c'est le vol." He originated several journals and published other works, expounding the views of philosophic socialism with a degree of power as a logician and writer which won the respect of his adversaries. He was imprisoned more than once as the utterer of ideas at variance with the present order of political and general society. D. 1865.

PROUT, SAMUEL, an eminent water-color painter, b. at Plymouth in 1794; d. 1852. His "Studies" were published in 1816; followed by "Progressive Fragments," in 1818; by "Rudiments of Landscape Views," and other works. His illustrations of France, Italy, Flanders, and Germany are considered the finest of his works.

PUGIN, AUGUSTUS NORTHMORE WELBY, the son of a French gentleman who fled to England at the period of the revolution, was b. in 1810, and d. 1852. He inherited a taste for gothic architecture from his father, who published several valuable works on that and kindred subjects, and was an enthusiast in art from his earliest years. Having joined the Roman catholic church in 1834, his architectural talents soon found extensive employment; and the cathedral of St. George, Southwark, the church of St. Barnabas at Nottingham, the Cistercian abbey of St. Bernard in Leicestershire, the cathedral churches of Killarney and Enniscorthy, and Alton Castle, which are amongst the best known of his works, will long remain memorials of his genius and taste. His architectural treatises are full of valuable artistic studies: among these may be mentioned his "Gothic Furniture," "Contrasts," &c., "The True Principles of Pointed or Christian Architecture," "The Glossary of Ecclesiastical Ornament," &c. &c. Of the revival of mediæval taste in building and decoration he was the chief promoter; and "The Mediæval Court" in the crystal palace of 1851 was associated in the mind of every visitor with the name of Pugin. While still in the prime of life, he was afflicted with insanity, from which he recovered only to pass into the shadow of death.

PUTNAM, JOHN N., an eminent Greek scholar, and professor of the Greek language and literature in Dartmouth college. B. 1823; d. 1863.

Q.

QUEKETT, JOHN, an English microscopist, b. 1815; d. 1861.

QUINCY, JOSIAH, b. in Boston, 1772; d. 1864. After graduating at Harvard, and adopting the profession of the law in his native city, he was elected a representative in congress in 1804, and held that station eight successive years. He was chosen state senator for Suffolk from 1814 to 1820; representative from Boston, and speaker of the house, in 1821; judge of the municipal court in Boston in 1822, and mayor in 1823. He held the office of mayor six successive years, until he declined a reelection in December, 1828. In 1829 he was chosen president of Harvard university, and held that office until his resignation, in 1845. His published works are "Speeches in Congress, and Orations on Various Occasions," "Memoir of Josiah Quincy, Jr., of Massachusetts," "Centennial Address on the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Settlement of Boston," "A History of Harvard University, from 1636 to 1836," "Memoir of James Grahame, Historian of the United States Army," "Memoir of Major Samuel Shaw," "History of the Boston Athenæum," "A Municipal History of the Town and City of Boston, from 1630 to 1830."

QUITMAN, JOHN A., eminent as a lawyer, soldier, and statesman, b. in Rhinebeck, N. Y., 1799, removed at an early age to Ohio, and thence to Mississippi. For a time he was chancellor of the superior court of chancery of Mississippi, and having become a planter, soon played a distinguished part in the politics of the state. In 1846-'47 he volunteered for the Mexican war, and was engaged in most of the important actions. President Polk commissioned him as major-general, and on the surrender of the city of Mexico he was made its governor. He was elected governor of Mississippi in 1855, and a representative in congress in 1855 and 1857; his personal merit and characteristics winning for him high esteem apart from political alliances. He was an adherent of Mr. Calhoun and a supporter of his doctrines, and was the acknowledged leader of those favorable to the annexation of Cuba. D. 1858.

R.

RADETZKY, FIELD MARSHAL, b. 1765, began his career in 1781, as cadet in an Austrian cavalry regiment. Having checked Napoleon at Aspera in 1809, he was made field marshal. In 1831 he was appointed commander-in-chief of Austrian Italy, which position he held till 1857. He defeated the patriots in 1848, and with an iron hand suppressed the insurrection in Milan in 1853. He was ruthless in his despotism. D. 1857.

RADOWITZ, JOSEPH VON, a Prussian general and military writer, b. 1797; d. 1854.

RAGLAN, LORD, commander-in-chief of the British army in the Crimea, b. 1788, was first known as Lord Fitzroy Somerset. He served on the staff of Wellington in the expedition to Copenhagen, and as his military secretary in the Peninsula. At Waterloo he lost his right arm. From 1827 to 1852 he held the office of military secretary at the horse guards, being then appointed master-general of the ordnance and raised to the house of peers. In 1854 he proceeded with the allied armies to the Crimea, where he d. 1855, eleven days after the unsuccessful attack upon the Redan and Malakoff.

RAINS, JAMES E., confederate brigadier-general, b. in North Carolina, and educated at West Point, took part in the Seminole wars, and was promoted for gallantry. He resigned his commission in the United States service in 1861, and distinguished himself by skill and daring at the head of confederate troops at Shiloh and Perryville. Killed at Stone River, 1862.

RANSOM, THOMAS E. GREENFIELD, brigadier-general United States service, b. in Windsor county, Vt., 1834. He was a civil engineer by profession, but at the outbreak of the civil war was engaged in trade in Illinois. He was one of the first to raise a company of volunteers, and served with honor in Missouri, Kentucky, and in the operations of General Grant on the Tennessee and Cumberland rivers. In the attack upon Fort Donelson he was wounded. He was again severely wounded at Shiloh, where, according to an official report, he performed "prodigies of valor." In Aug., 1862, he was assigned to the command of the district of Cairo, and in the following January was made brigadier-general. He took part in the campaign against Vicksburg, commanded the post of Natchez, served with General Banks in the Red River expedition, and was for the third time wounded in the battle at Sabine Cross-roads. Shortly after the capitulation of Atlanta he was seized with dysentery, and he d. at Rome, Ga., Oct., 1864.

RANTOUL, ROBERT, member of congress from the second district in Massachusetts, was b. in Beverly, Mass., 1805, graduated at Harvard university in 1826, studied law in Salem with Hon. John Pickering, afterwards with the Hon. Leverett Saltonstall, and commenced practice in Gloucester, in his native county, in 1829. He was elected representative to the general court from Gloucester in 1834. In 1837 he was appointed a member of the board of education. In 1843 he was made collector of the port of Boston; and in 1845, by President Polk, he was appointed district attorney for the district of Massachusetts. In 1851 he was elected senator in congress during the remainder of the term made vacant by Mr. Webster's resignation, and in the same year was elected to congress from the second district by the combined votes of the democrats and free-soilers. D. 1852.

RAUCH, CHRISTIAN, a German sculptor, was b. at Arolsen, in Waldeck, 1777, and having early evinced a taste for art, received an education suited to his inclinations. He obtained an appointment in Berlin in 1797, which gave him leisure to pursue sculpture, and eventually he received instructions from Canova and Thorwaldsen. A variety of statues and busts of eminent men, some produced in Berlin, others in Rome, raised him to the highest position in his profession. His statues of Blucher, Goethe, and Frederick the Great, are masterpieces of art. D. 1857.

RAWLE, WILLIAM, an eminent lawyer, author of "A View of the Constitution of the United States," and for many years reporter of the decisions of the supreme court of Pennsylvania. B. 1781; d. 1858.

RAY, JOSEPH, a mathematician, author of three treatises on arithmetic, and two on algebra, b. in Virginia, 1807; d. in Ohio, 1855.

READ, REAR-ADMIRAL GEO. CAMPBELL, of the United States navy, b. in Ireland; d. 1862. He was third lieutenant on board of the Constitution during the engagement with the Guerriere in 1812, and was for some years commander of the African squadron. — ABNER, commander in the United States navy, distinguished by the exploits of his gunboat, the New London, in the Mississippi Sound and at Sabine Pass in 1862. In 1863 he commanded the steam sloop-of-war Monongahela, and was mortally wounded at the batteries above Donaldsonville, in July of that year.

REDFIELD, WILLIAM C., b. at Middletown, Conn., 1789; d. in New York, 1857. Trained as a mechanic, he engaged in steamboat navigation, and remained connected with this field of enterprise through life. With few early advantages he rose from an humble position to an eminent place among men of practical science. He was the first president of the American association for the advancement of science, in 1848. But he is chiefly known as a meteorologist, and especially for his successful researches into the phenomena of violent storms and gales, which he showed to be large progressive whirlwinds. He published numerous papers on this and allied subjects in the "American Journal of Science" and elsewhere, and his views were adopted, illustrated, and extended by Reid, Piddington, Thom, and others.

REED, ANDREW, D. D., an English congregational minister, remarkable for his labors in establishing benevolent institutions in London, b. 1787; d. 1862. He was a member of the deputation sent by the English independents to the United States in 1834, and was one of the authors of the work published on their return, embodying the results of their study of the people and institutions of this country.

REHAUSEN, BARON DE, a Swedish diplomatist, b. 1802; d. 1854.

REID, SIR WILLIAM, major-general in the British service, a colonial governor, and author of a well-known work on "The Law of Storms." D. 1858. — SAMUEL CHESTER, the designer of the present United States flag, b. in Norwich, Conn., 1783; d. in New York, 1861.

During the war of 1812 he commanded the privateer brig General Armstrong, carrying seven guns and 90 men; and with this vessel encountered three British vessels, — the Plantagenet, ship of the line; the Rota, frigate; and the Carnation, brig. These vessels — part of the expedition concentrating at Jamaica for a descent upon New Orleans — were met by Reid at Fayal, and one of the most remarkable naval battles on record occurred Sept. 26 and 27, 1814. Reid succeeded in thoroughly disabling the enemy, and scuttled his vessel to prevent her capture. After the war Captain Reid became a sailing-master in the United States navy. As warden of the port of New York, he did much toward organizing the pilot service, and invented the signal telegraph at the battery and the Narrows communicating with Sandy Hook.

RENO, JESSE L., b. in Virginia, 1825, distinguished himself in the Mexican war, and was subsequently, in succession, assistant professor of mathematics at West Point, secretary of the board of artillery, and connected with the coast survey. In 1853 he became first lieutenant of ordnance, and in 1860 captain. In Nov., 1861, he was appointed by the United States government brigadier-general of volunteers, and in 1862 major-general of volunteers. He served in North Carolina, under General McClellan in the Peninsula, at Fredericksburg, and in the battles near Manassas. He was killed at the battle of South Mountain, 1862.

RENOUARD, ANTOINE AUGUSTIN, a French bibliographer, author of "Annales de l'Imprimerie des Alde," "Elemens de la Morale," and other works. B. 1765; d. 1853.

RENSHAW, WILLIAM B., a gallant officer of the United States navy, b. in New York, entered the service as a midshipman in 1831, was promoted to a lieutenancy in 1841; and in 1861, having become commander of the United States steamer Westfield, was assigned by Admiral Farragut to the command of the squadron blockading Galveston. His vessel got aground, and having determined to destroy it, an explosion prematurely occurred by which he was killed, Jan. 1, 1863.

RENEWICK, JAMES, from 1820 to 1854 professor of chemistry and physics in Columbia college, and author of "Outlines of Natural Philosophy," "Treatise on the Steam Engine," "The Practical Application of the Principles of Mechanics," and other works, biographical and scientific. He was of Scottish origin, though b. in New York, 1792. He was one of the commissioners for exploring the northeastern boundary, whose report resulted in the Ashburton treaty, and during his life took an active interest in public affairs. D. 1863.

REYNOLDS, JOHN FULTON, an officer in the United States army, b. in Lancaster, Pa., 1820. He graduated at West Point, and served with distinction in the Mexican war. In May, 1861, he was appointed lieutenant-colonel of the 14th United States infantry, and in August, brigadier-general of volunteers, with the command of the first brigade of the Pennsylvania reserve corps. In June, 1862, having joined the army of the Potomac, he was engaged in several severe engagements, in one of which he was taken prisoner. He was released in the following September, and assumed command of the first army corps, with the rank of brigadier-general in the regular army. He fought in the first battle of Fredericksburg, and in Jan., 1863, was nominated major-general of volunteers. In June he was appointed to the command of the right wing of Hooker's army, and on the 1st July was killed in the battle of Gettysburg.

RICARDO, JOHN LOUIS, nephew of the eminent political economist, and an influential member of the house of commons, b. 1812; d. 1862. He was one of the most active promoters of the repeal of the British navigation laws, and labored to effect a more liberal understanding of the question of maritime rights in time of war.

RICE, JAMES C., brigadier-general United States volunteers, b. in Worthington, Mass., 1830. He was educated at Yale, and for a time was a teacher in the south. At the outbreak of the civil war he was engaged in the practice of law in New York. Abandoning his profession, he volunteered as a private in the Garibaldi guard, but was soon made first lieutenant. For his conduct at Bull Run he was promoted to a captaincy, and at the termination of the Peninsular campaign, in 1862, he was made colonel. He served under General Burnside at Fredericksburg; and so distinguished himself at Chancellorsville and Gettysburg that he was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers on the recommendation of General Meade. He was killed in battle at Spottsylvania court-house, 1864.

RICARDSON, JAMES, an enterprising African traveller, d. 1851. — ISRAEL B., major-general of volunteers in the United States army, b. in Vermont, 1821, engaged in the civil war, in 1861, as colonel of the 2d Michigan volunteers, was wounded at Antietam, and d. at Sharpsburg, Md., Nov. 3, 1862. — SIR JOHN, a naturalist and Arctic explorer, was b. at Dumfries, in Scotland, in 1787. He studied medicine in the university of Edinburgh, and for some years served as medical officer in the British navy. Zeal and ability displayed at the siege of Copenhagen, in 1807, secured him promotion, and he subsequently served in the war with the United States. In 1819 he sailed with Sir John Franklin, as surgeon and naturalist, and in 1825 joined the same intrepid navigator on a second exploratory voyage. On the latter occasion Richardson commanded two boats, in which he discovered the passage between the mouths of the Mackenzie and Coppermine rivers. In 1829 he began the publication of the zoology of these northern regions, a work which established his reputation as a naturalist. In 1838 he was appointed physician to the fleet, and in 1840 an inspector of hospitals. Eight years afterward he once more sailed for the Arctic regions, this time in search of Franklin. An account of the expedition was published in 1851. Among his other works are the "Fauna Borealis Americana," "Zoölogical Appendix to Sir Edward Parry's Second Voyage," and the "Ichthyology of the Voyage of the Erebus, the Terror, and the Sulphur." He was a member of many scientific bodies. D. 1865.

RIDDLE, EDWARD, head-master of the Greenwich hospital schools, and mathematician and astronomer. B. 1788; d. 1854.

RIETSCHEL, ERNST, a German sculptor, b. in Saxony, 1804, entered the Dresden academy of arts in 1820, and in 1826 studied under Rauch at Berlin. A year in Italy, sustained by means furnished by the government of Saxony, completed his professional training. In 1828 he returned to Dresden, and in 1832 was appointed professor in the academy. During his subsequent career he was liberally patronized by continental royalty. D. 1861.

RIGOLLOT, MARCEL JEROME, a French physician, president of the society of antiquaries of Picardy, b. 1857; d. at Amiens, 1855. In 1813 he joined the French army, and was intrusted with the care of several hospitals. He filled many important offices, and was the author of valuable works upon natural history and antiquarian researches.

RINTOUL, ROBERT STEPHEN, projector, editor, and proprietor of the London "Spectator," which won for him high reputation as a journalist. B. 1787; d. 1857.

RIPLEY, OLIVER H., colonel of the 61st Pennsylvania regiment, b. 1826, studied and practised law, served in the Mexican war, and was killed before Richmond, 1862. — ROSWELL SABIN, author of two volumes entitled "The War in Mexico," and distinguished for gallantry at Cerro Gordo and Chapultepec. He retired from the United States army in 1853. He was brigadier-general in the confederate service, and was engaged in the siege of Fort Sumter, and wounded at Antietam. He was b. in Ohio, and d. in Charleston, S. C., 1863.

RITCHIE, THOMAS, b. in Essex county, Va., 1779, for many years editor of the Richmond "Enquirer," in which position he wielded great influence in the councils of the democratic party. For a time he also conducted the Washington "Union." D. 1854. — LEITCH, a journalist and prolific miscellaneous writer, was b. at Greenock, Scotland, about the beginning of the present century. He furnished the letter-press of many of the "Annuals," wrote largely in newspapers and reviews, edited the "Indian News," and for several years conducted "Chambers's Journal." He produced upwards of 30 original volumes, edited and partly wrote upwards of 40 more; and this apart from his contributions to periodicals. D. 1865.

RITTER, KARL, a distinguished German geographer, b. 1779; d. in Berlin, 1859. He began his literary career in 1805 by the publication of "Europe: a Geographical and Historical Picture." In 1819 he became professor in Berlin. In 1821 he published the first volume of his "Erd Kunde," the 24th volume of which appeared a few days before his death.

ROBBINS, REV. ROYAL, D. D., author of the "World Displayed," and "Outlines of History," b. in Connecticut, 1788; d. 1861. For nearly 50 years he was a congregational minister in his native state.

ROBERTS, GEORGE W., colonel United States volunteers, b. in Westchester county, Penn., 1833, entered the service, at the commencement of the war, as major of the 42d Illinois regiment, and distinguished himself greatly in the Southwest. Killed in battle, Dec. 31, 1862. — DAVID, an artist, b. near Edinburgh, 1796; d. 1864. Pictures painted after a visit to Spain gained him the first laurel; but his best known labors are embraced in "Sketches in the Holy Land, Syria, Idumea, Arabia, Egypt, and Nubia," engraved by Haghe, with descriptions by Dr. Croly.

ROBINSON, SIR FREDERICK PHILIPS, a British general, entered the army as ensign in 1777, and served five years in the war of the American revolution. In 1814 he commanded a brigade in Canada, and forced the passage of the Saranac in command of the forces intended for the attack of Plattsburgh. D. 1852, in his 88th year. — EDWARD, a biblical scholar, author of "Biblical Researches in Palestine and in the Adjacent Countries," b. in Southington, Conn., 1794. He graduated at Hamilton college, N. Y., but completed his studies at Andover, where for a time he was associated with Professor Stuart in the translation of text-books from the German, and in the labors of the theological seminary. In 1830 he was appointed professor extraordinary of sacred literature and librarian at Andover, and in 1837 professor of biblical literature in Union theological seminary, New York, which office he held until his death. He visited Palestine twice, in company with Dr. Eli Smith; and the published record of his observations and inquiries obtained for him great favor amongst biblical scholars, here and in Europe. He edited the "Biblical Repository," and afterward the "Bibliotheca Sacra." Amongst his other works are, "The Harmony of the Four Gospels," in Greek and English, and a Greek and English Lexicon of the New Testament. D. in New York, 1863.

ROBSON, FREDERICK, a comedian with a style peculiarly his own, was b. at Margate, Kent, 1821, and for several years struggled in vain to obtain a position on the stage. His first great success was achieved at the Queen's Theatre, Dublin, and led to his engagement at the Olympic, London, where he remained a most popular actor until his death, in 1864.

RODMAN, ISAAC PEACE, b. at South Kingstown, R. I., 1822, was a member of the state senate of Rhode Island in 1861. When the United States government called for volunteers, he resigned his seat, raised a company, and as captain in the 2d Rhode Island regiment was in the battle of Bull Run. He commanded the 4th Rhode Island volunteers as colonel, at the taking of Roanoke Island; and at the battle of Newbern carried the enemy's works at the point of the bayonet. He was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers, April, 1862, and d. in the following September, having been mortally wounded at Antietam.

ROGERS, SAMUEL, author of "The Pleasures of Memory," and other poems, b. near London, in 1763; d. 1855. His life ranged over four successive generations in the history of English literature. In early youth he looked up to the critical throne of Samuel Johnson; his first volume was printed in the same year with the first volume of Burns; he passed his brightest days in the reigns of Scott and Byron and Wordsworth; and in his old age he witnessed the era in which the place of dictator is claimed for Tennyson. The son of a London banker, he was always affluent; having neither difficulties to combat nor misfortunes to suffer. Even for a literary man, his life was uneventful. Loving alike fashion, literature, and art, he passed his days as an amateur in letters, painting, and music, and as a friend or patron of literary men and artists. His poems exhibit an elegant but imitative mind, and he paid $50,000 to artists for illustrated editions.

ROLPH, JOHN A., an able artist and landscape-engraver, b. in Essex, England, 1798; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 1862. He came to this country in 1833, and from that period occupied a high professional position in New York.

ROSA, FRANCISCO MARTINEZ DE LA, a Spanish statesman and author, b. in Granada, 1789; d. 1862. He participated in the struggles of the time of Ferdinand VII., and was punished for his liberalism by a five years' imprisonment in a Spanish fortress on the Barbary coast. The revolution of 1820 secured his liberation, but when French arms had restored Ferdinand to the throne, the statesman and writer was driven into exile. He was recalled in 1831, and afterward filled several high official positions.

ROSMINI, ABBE, distinguished in Italy as the founder of an order called the Rosminiani, and as a writer on moral philosophy. B. 1797; d. 1855.

ROSS, SIR JOHN, a distinguished navigator, b. 1777, entered the British navy in 1786, and was constantly engaged in active service to the close of his life. In 1818 he was associated with Sir W. E. Parry in an expedition to Baffin's Bay; from 1829 to 1833 he prosecuted further researches in the same direction in the "Victory" steamer, equipped by Mr., afterwards Sir Felix Booth; making valuable discoveries, and being knighted on his return to England. In 1850 he made a last expedition to the Arctic Ocean in search of Sir John Franklin. He published narratives of his principal voyages and other nautical works. D. 1856. — SIR JAMES CLARK, rear-admiral, an Arctic explorer, b. in London, 1800. He entered the British navy in 1812, and in 1827 was made commander for his services under Sir W. E. Parry, in an attempt to reach the north pole. In 1829 he embarked with his uncle on the remarkable voyage of the "Victory." For the determination of the exact position of the north magnetic pole and eminent scientific and geographical discoveries, he received the rank of post-captain in 1834. He commanded the expedition, consisting of the "Erebus" and "Terror," which left England in 1839 on a voyage of discovery to the Antarctic Ocean; and in 1848 was appointed to command the first expedition sent in search of Sir John Franklin. D. 1862. — SIR WILLIAM CHARLES, a celebrated miniature painter, b. in London, 1794; d. 1860.

ROTHSCHILD, BARON ANSELM, the eldest brother of the financial house of the Rothschilds, b. 1773; d. at Frankfort, 1855.

ROUSSIN, M., an admiral and peer of France, b. 1781; d. 1854. During peace he was engaged in scientific surveys.

ROUTH, MARTIN JOSEPH, a learned English writer, the friend of Porson, Parr, and other names of another generation, d. 1854, in his 100th year. His principal works are the "Reliquiæ Sacræ," and an edition of Burnet.

RUBINI, GIAMBATISTO, a famous tenor singer, b. in Italy, 1795. He commenced his musical career by playing the violin in the church of Romano, and made his first appearance on the stage at Naples in 1815. In Paris and London he acquired a brilliant reputation and a large fortune. D. 1854.

RUDE, FRANÇOIS, a distinguished French sculptor, b. at Dijon, 1784; d. 1855. He was the principal artist employed in 1836 to decorate the "Arc de Triumphe de l'Étoile."

RUFFIN, THOMAS, b. in North Carolina, represented Missouri in congress from 1856 to 1861, when he allied his fortunes to those of the seceded states, occupying a seat in the confederate congress, and serving as a colonel in the confederate army. He was wounded in battle in Virginia, and d. 1863.

RUFFNER, REV. HENRY, president of Lexington college, Va., and author of a pamphlet against the continuance of slavery in that state. B. 1788; d. 1861.

RUSH, RICHARD, b. in 1780, d. 1859. He was attorney-general of Pennsylvania in 1811; of the United States, from 1814 to 1817; edited an edition of the laws of the United States in 1815; was temporary secretary of state in 1817; was minister to England from 1817 to 1825; was secretary of the treasury in the administration of John Quincy Adams; was candidate for vice-president with Mr. Adams in 1829. In 1829 he went to Holland, to obtain a loan; in 1837, to England, to obtain the Smithson legacy; and in 1847 was appointed minister to France by President Polk. During the latter part of his life he did not participate actively in public affairs. He wrote frequently for the press, and published "Memoranda of a Residence at the Court of St. James."

RUSK, THOMAS J., b. in South Carolina, 1803, studied law, and practised with success in Georgia. In the early part of 1835 he removed to Texas, and was a prominent actor in all the important events in the history of the republic and state of Texas. He was a member of the convention that declared Texas an independent republic, in March, 1836; was the first secretary of war, participated in the battle of San Jacinto, and took command of the army after General Houston was wounded. He continued in command of the army until the organization of the constitutional government, in October, 1836, when he was again appointed secretary of war, and resigned after a few months. He afterwards commanded several expeditions against the Indians, served as a member of the house of representatives, and as chief justice of the supreme court, which last office he resigned early in 1842. In 1845 he was president of the convention that consummated the annexation of Texas to the United States. Upon the admission of Texas into the Union he was elected one of the senators in the congress of the United States, in which office he served two terms, and had just entered upon the third term, when he d. at Nacogdoches, Tex., under very painful circumstances. Intense grief, occasioned by the loss of his wife, overpowered his reason, and in a moment of insanity he committed suicide, 1857.

S.

SAINT HILAIRE, AUGUSTE, a French naturalist, distinguished for his researches into the vegetation of the Brazils, and of South America generally. B. 1779; d. 1853.

SALE, SIR ROBERT HENRY, illustrious in the annals of Anglo-Indian warfare, was b. 1782, and entered the British service in 1795. He figured in the Burmese war of 1824-6, but his title to distinction rests upon his achievements in Afghanistan, where his troops always formed the advance. In 1840 he defeated Dost Mohammed at Purwan-Dutrah, and compelled him to surrender to Sir W. McNaughton. In 1841 he commanded the brigade which stormed the Khoord Cabul Pass, and retreated upon Jellalabad, followed by the army of Akhbar Khan. Sale and his troops were besieged in this place from Nov. 1841 to April, 1842, when he attacked and routed the besieging army. He was at the battle of Moodkee, Dec., 1845, where his left thigh was shattered by a grape-shot which proved mortal to him. — LADY FLORENTIA, wife of the preceding, remarkable for the daring constancy with which she accompanied her husband in all his campaigns. At the period of the Cabul disasters she became the prisoner of Akhbar Khan, and afterwards published a memoir of her captivity. D. 1854.

SALTOUN, ALEXANDER GEORGE FRASER, Lord, remembered for his defence of Hougoumont at the battle of Waterloo. B. 1785; d. 1853.

SANDERS, WILLIAM P., an officer of the United States army, b. in Kentucky, graduated at West Point in 1856, and received a commission in the 1st dragoons. For some time after the commencement of the civil war he served as captain in the 6th regular cavalry, but afterward became colonel of a Kentucky volunteer regiment, and earned an honorable name in the Southwest. He was then appointed brigadier-general of volunteers, and commanded a cavalry division in East Tennessee. He was wounded in the battle at Campbell's station, and d. at Knoxville, 1863.

SAN MIGUEL, EVARISTO, a Spanish journalist, statesman, and soldier, b. 1780; d. 1862. His advocacy of constitutional government exposed him to the displeasure of Ferdinand VII., and having joined Riego in his unsuccessful

Andalusian expedition, he was exiled to Zamora. He was recalled in 1822, and filled the post of minister of foreign affairs in the liberal cabinet then formed. In this position he resented the interference of the holy alliance to put down liberal movements; and when France undertook the task of crushing out constitutional freedom, he joined the army in Catalonia, and took part in almost every engagement of the ensuing three years. He was severely wounded, and was finally taken prisoner. Offered the alternative of exile, he proceeded to England, where he remained eight years. The amnesty of 1834 restored him to his rights, and from then until his death he was prominently before his countrymen; sometimes high in office, at other times simply as a representative, — but always in support of the liberal principles for which he had written, fought, and bled. He was the author of the "Hymn of Riego," a popular Spanish war-song; and also of a history of Philip II.

SARGENT, LUCIUS M., JR., lieutenant-colonel 1st Massachusetts cavalry, was the second son of a well-known writer of the same name, and was b. in Boston, Sept. 15th, 1826. Having graduated at Harvard college, he applied himself for a time to art, and became a very accomplished draughtsman. He then studied surgery, in which he rose rapidly to distinction, and became one of the prominent physicians of Boston. When the civil war broke out, he entered the army as surgeon, but was subsequently appointed captain of cavalry, and was engaged in many skirmishes and dangerous movements, in one of which he was badly wounded in the lungs. After a short respite he rejoined his regiment as lieutenant-colonel. He was killed in action by a shell, Dec. 9th, 1864, near Bellfield, Va., while leading a gallant charge against the enemy. He was a brave and skilful officer, and greatly beloved by his men. He left some pen-and-ink sketches of military scenes, which show considerable talent for art. His elder brother, Horace Binney Sargent, who served in Louisiana, was brigadier-general by brevet.

SAVAGE, JOUX, an eminent jurist, for 14 years chief justice of the supreme court of the state of New York, b. 1779; d. 1863.

SCHEFFER, ARY, an eminent painter of the French school, was b. in Holland in 1795. He was brought up in France, enjoyed the instructions of Guérin, acquired at an early age great reputation by his pictures, and was one of the founders of the French romantic school. Among his best efforts are "Francesca da Rimini and her Lover encountering Dante and Virgil in the Inferno," a group of great beauty; "Christ comforting the Weary and Heavy-laden," the "Dead Christ," and the two pictures of "Mignon," from Goethe's "Wilhelm Meister." Scheffer was at an early age instructor of the children of Louis Philippe, and, among others, trained as an artist the Princess Marie. D. 1858.

SHELLING, FREDERIC WILLIAM JOSEPH, the last survivor of the series of German philosophers of which Kant, Jacobi, Herbart, Fichte, and Hegel were the other chiefs, was b. at Leonberg, in Würtemberg, in 1775, and d. 1854. He studied first at Tübingen, where he and Hegel became intimate friends, both being at the time very young men; thence he went to Leipsic and Jena. At Jena he studied under Fichte, whom he succeeded in the chair of philosophy at that university in 1798. In 1803 he was transferred to Würzburg; and in 1807, thence to Munich, where he remained till 1841, when he accepted a chair at Berlin. This chair he soon relinquished, and the last years of his life were spent in comparative seclusion. By the nature of his speculation, developed in a number of fragmentary publications, chiefly in the earlier part of his life, Schelling's place in the great series of German philosophers is considered to be between Fichte and Hegel, the former of whom died in 1814, and the latter in 1831. Schelling's metaphysical theory is generally known by the name of the "System of Identity." It rests on the principle that the two elements of thought, the objects, respectively, of understanding and reason, called by the various terms of matter and spirit, objective and subjective, real and ideal, &c., are only relatively opposed to one another as different forms of the absolute or infinite, hence sometimes called the two poles of the absolute.

SCHIMMELPENNINCK, MARY ANNE, author of "Memoirs of Port Royal," was b. near Birmingham, in 1778, of parents belonging to the society of friends; her maiden name being Galton. Having joined the Moravian body, she became eminent by her efforts to promote religious and benevolent movements; publishing essays on various subjects, including some of a secular cast. Amongst the latter was an ingenious theory on the "Principles of Beauty." She d. in 1856, leaving an autobiography which has since been published, and which is eminently a soul-history struggling its way from darkness and mist to brightness and radiance.

SCHLEY, WILLIAM, author of "A Digest of the English Statutes"; representative in congress from Georgia; and governor of that state in 1836 and 1837. B. in Maryland, 1786; d. at Augusta, 1858.

SCHLOSSER, FRIEDRICH CHRISTOPHE, professor of history at Heidelberg, b. in Jever, 1776; d. 1861. He was a voluminous writer, but his greatest work is a "History of the Eighteenth Century, and of the Nineteenth to the Overthrow of the French Empire," published at Heidelberg, 1823-46, and translated and published in England in eight volumes, 1843-52.

SCHNEIDER, JOHN CHRISTIAN FREDERICK, a composer, classed among the musical creators of Germany, was b. near Zittau, in 1786. The list of his works includes almost every form of musical composition, theatrical writing alone excepted. His oratorios—the works by which he is best known in England—comprise his "Deluge," "Last Judgment," "Paradise Lost," "Pharaoh," "Christ, the Master," "Absalom," "Christ, the Child," "Gideon," "Gethsemane and Golgotha," besides cantatas, psalms, hymns, and other service music. At the time of his death he was chapel-master to the Duke of Anhalt-Dessau. D. 1853.

SCHOMBURGK, SIR ROBERT HERMANN, a traveller and naturalist, b. in Thuringia, 1804. He undertook an exploratory voyage to Guiana in 1835, under the auspices of the royal geographical society of London, and his botanical researches were rewarded by the discovery of that remarkable plant, the Victoria Regia water-lily. He was afterwards appointed British consul at St. Domingo, and yet later consul-general in Siam; in both of which positions he pursued his favorite studies, and transmitted reports of results in papers to the scientific societies of England. He published a "Survey of British Guiana," "Views in the Interior of Guiana," and a "History of Barbadoes." D. in Berlin, 1865.

SCHOOLCRAFT, HENRY ROWE, LL. D., a writer on Indian ethnology and history, and on the geology of the Lake Superior copper region, b. in Albany county, N. Y., 1793. His early studies embraced chemistry and mineralogy, and he subsequently studied geology, Hebrew, and some of the modern languages. He visited the trans-Mississippi region in 1817-18, and in 1820 acted as geologist to an expedition to the Upper Mississippi and the Lake Superior region, under Gen. Cass. In 1822 he was appointed Indian agent on the northwestern frontier, and from 1828 to 1832 was a member of the territorial legislature of Michigan. In the latter year he conducted a government expedition in the Northwest, and was the discoverer of the source of the Mississippi. His next official employment was as commissioner to treat with the Indian tribes on the upper lakes for the cession of territory; after which he was appointed acting superintendent of Indian affairs, and in 1839 chief disbursing agent for the northern department. His principal work, prepared under a resolution of congress, is in quarto and illustrated, and entitled "Historical and Statistical Information respecting the History, Condition, and Prospects of the Indian Tribes of the United States." He published records of his various explorations, the more important of which have been brought together in a "Narrative of an Exploratory Expedition to the Sources of the Mississippi River in 1820, resumed and completed by the Discovery of its Origin in Itasca Lake in 1832"; and also "Algie Researches," "Personal Memoirs," and some Indian tales and legends. D. 1864.

SCHWARZENBERG, PRINCE FELIX, an Austrian statesman, b. 1800; d. 1852. While attached to the Austrian embassy at St. Petersburg he became involved in a political scrape, in connection with a conspirator, which caused his expulsion from the Russian dominions. He was afterwards attached to the Austrian embassy in London, where he became acquainted with, and ruined, an English lady of high rank, and was compelled to fly under circumstances which forever precluded his reappearance on British ground. He was subsequently sent as Austrian minister to Turin and Naples. In 1848 he took part in the war that broke out between Austria and Sardinia, and was wounded; and in November of the same year he was recalled to Vienna, and became prime minister of the Austrian empire, which office he held at the time of his death.

SCORESBY, WILLIAM, D. D., b. 1790; d. 1857. The son of a Yorkshire seaman engaged in the whale fishery, he commenced life as mate of the Resolution, and in 1806 sailed into the highest latitude then reached by navigators. His account of the Arctic regions is one of the most interesting records of maritime adventure ever written. He afterwards became a minister of the church of England, and a contributor to various scientific periodicals, especially with respect to magnetical observations, which he pursued with diligence and success. In connection with these investigations he visited the United States in 1847. He also lectured on "Zoistic Magnetism," and published works on various subjects.

SCRANTON, GEORGE W., an extensive iron manufacturer in Pennsylvania, and an active and influential promoter of railroads constructed to serve the iron and coal interests of that state, was b. in Connecticut, 1811, and d. at Scranton, Penn., 1861. He was elected to congress in 1858.

SCRIBE, EUGÈNE, a French dramatic author, b. at Paris, 1791, began his career at an early age, and through life labored for the stage with untiring industry and eminent success. He was one of the most ingenious inventors of a plot, and both England and the United States incessantly received free translations of his works. He wrote the libretto to "Fra Diavolo," and other popular operas. D. 1861.

SCROOP, WILLIAM, author of "Days of Deer Stalking," and "Days and Nights of Salmon Fishing," b. 1771; d. in London, 1852.

SEALSFIELD, CHARLES, b. in Germany, early emigrated to the United States, and in 1829-30 was one of the editors of the New York "Courrier des États Unis." He returned to Europe in 1830, and, during a lengthened residence in Switzerland, wrote, in German, a series of works on American society, institutions, and characteristics, the principal of which have been translated and republished in this country. D. 1864.

SEBASTIANI, HORACE, b. in Corsica, 1771, served in many battles during Napoleon's career, was created marshal of France in 1840, and was ambassador at Naples and London under Louis Philippe's regime. D. at Paris, 1851.

SEDGWICK, THEODORE, biographer of William Livingston, and a New York lawyer of considerable repute, b. in Albany, 1812; d. 1859.—JOHN, major-general United States army, b. at Cornwall, Conn., 1817, graduated at West Point in 1837, and entered the service as 2d lieutenant in the second artillery. In 1839 he was promoted to a first lieutenancy. During the Mexican war he distinguished himself, and at its close stood with the full rank of captain. In 1855 he was commissioned major and transferred to the first cavalry. He was stationed at Fort Leavenworth during the early stages of the Kansas troubles, and led detachments of dragoons against both of the hostile parties. He afterwards commanded at Fort Riley, and was stationed at Fort Wise when the civil war began. He was appointed, successively, lieutenant-colonel of the second cavalry, and colonel of the fourth cavalry, and in August was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers, and assigned command of a brigade in Heintzelman's division of the army of the Potomac. Early in the ensuing year he exchanged this for a division in Sumner's army corps. At the battle of Fair Oaks, May, 1862, he rendered gallant and important service, and was rewarded with the brevet rank of brigadier-general in the regular army. He shared in the closing scenes of General Pope's Virginia campaign, and marched with his command under General McClellan into Maryland. In the battle of Antietam he was twice wounded, and was carried off the field. He did not return to active duty until the following December, when he took command of the ninth corps, with the rank of major-general of volunteers. He temporarily commanded the right grand division of the army of the Potomac, and in February, 1863, was placed in command of the sixth corps, at the head of which he gained great distinction in the battles of Fredericksburg and Gettysburg. With his own and a part of the fifth corps, he performed important service at Rappahannock station, and other points, in the abortive campaign of General Meade. During the absence of the latter general, General Sedgwick commanded the army of the Potomac, and was twice offered the permanent command, but on each occasion refused to undertake it; the reported ground of his refusal being an unwillingness to accept so heavy a responsibility "without the assurance that he would be at perfect liberty to fight when, where, and how he thought best." He took part in the battles of the Wilderness, under General Grant, and was shot by a confederate sharpshooter, near Spottsylvania court-house, May, 1864.

SELWYN, WILLIAM, author of "Selwyn's Nisi Prius," b. 1774; d. 1855.

SERGEANT, JOHN, an eminent lawyer, was b. in Philadelphia, and for nearly 50 years was distinguished in his profession. He served as a representative in congress from 1815 to 1823, and from 1827 to 1829. He was the leading champion of the North in the famous discussions of the Missouri compromise. President Adams appointed him minister to the Panama congress. In 1832 he was the whig candidate for the vice-presidency. D. 1852.

SEWELL, WILLIAM GRANT, author of "The Ordeal of Free Labor in the British West Indies," and for some years connected with the New York press, b. in Quebec, 1829; d. 1862. — GENERAL SIR WILLIAM, a British officer, who served with distinction under Wellington in Portugal, and for many years in India. D. 1862.

SEYMOUR, HEZEKIAH C., a distinguished engineer, b. 1812; d. in Rockland county, N. Y., 1853. His name is associated with the construction of the New York and Erie railroad, and with the railroad from Toronto to Collingwood, in Canada. He was afterwards engineer-in-chief of the state of New York.

SHAKESPEAR, SIR RICHMOND CAMPBELL, a colonel in the British East India service, distinguished in the Sikh war, and knighted for his services at Khiva in reconciling the Khan to the Emperor of Russia, and terminating the slavery of Europeans in that country. D. 1861.

SHAW, LEMUEL, LL. D., chief justice of the supreme court of Massachusetts, b. at Barnstable, 1781; d. 1861. He was a graduate of Harvard college, and in early life was assistant editor of the Boston "Gazette." He was admitted to the New Hampshire bar in 1804, and shortly afterward commenced practice in Boston. He was for several years a member of the state legislature, and was appointed to the bench in 1830.

SHEAFFE, SIR ROGER H., a British military officer, b. in 1763, entered the army in 1778; he served in Holland and in the expedition to the Baltic, and was made a baronet for his services in a rally of the British troops after the fall of General Brock, at Queenston, in Upper Canada. D. 1851.

SHERWOOD, MARY MARTHA, a popular and prolific writer of works designed for youth, b. 1774; d. 1851.

SHREVE, HENRY M., Captain, for 40 years closely connected with the commercial interests of the western states, d. 1851. He was superintendent of the western rivers imports during three administrations, and by his ingenuity greatly advanced the safety of western commerce. In 1814-15 he served under General Jackson in several hazardous enterprises.

SIBLEY, HENRY H., b. in Louisiana, 1815; d. near El Paso, Texas, 1862. He was an officer in the United States service until May, 1861, when he resigned, and was appointed a brigadier-general in the confederate army. He attempted the conquest of New Mexico, and attacked Fort Craig, Jan. 5, 1862, but was repulsed. Compelled to retreat, with his supplies cut off, his soldiers became insubordinate, and he was killed. — GEORGE CHAMPLAIN, major United States army, b. in Great Barrington, Mass., 1782; d. 1863. He performed many important services in the Indian country, amongst which was the exploration of the Grand Sabine and Salt Mountain, at the head of 100 Osage warriors. He was one of the three commissioners who surveyed and marked out a road from Missouri to New Mexico.

SIBOUR, MONSIEUR MARIE DOMINIQUE AUGUSTUS, Archbishop of Paris, b. 1792, was assassinated by Veges, a priest, in the church of St. Etienne du Mont, Paris, 1857.

SIGOURNEY, LYDIA HUNTLEY, b. at Norwich, Conn., in 1791, very early in life gave signs of a talent for poetry, having been accustomed while a child to versify her ideas and impressions with something like system. A volume of miscellaneous pieces, in prose and verse, introduced Miss Huntley to the public in 1815. Four years later she married Mr. Charles Sigourney, a merchant of Hartford; but the union in no way interfered with the cultivation of her peculiar endowments, or the prosecution of her literary plans. In 1822 she published "Traits of the Aborigines of America," a descriptive poem in five cantos; and in 1824, a prose "Sketch of Connecticut Forty Years since." The ensuing 14 years afforded evidence of her industry, her productions during that period having been "A Collection of Prose Tales," a volume of "Sketches," another of "Minor Poems," "Zinzendorf," "Letters to Mothers," "Letters to Young Ladies," and "Poetry for Children." She visited Europe in 1840, devoting one summer to England and Scotland; and on her return published a charming record of her wanderings, entitled "Pleasant Memories of Pleasant Lands." She subsequently published "Pocahontas," the most carefully finished of her long poems, and other works of less importance. Her favorite themes were drawn from the fountain of domestic loves and feelings, and the aim of all her labors was to purify and elevate. D. 1865.

SILL, JOSHUA WOODROW, brigadier-general in the United States army, b. in Chillicothe, O., 1831, killed in the battle of Stone River, 1862. He graduated at West Point, but in 1860 exchanged his position in the army for a professorship in the Brooklyn collegiate and polytechnic institute. In 1861 he was appointed assistant adjutant-general of Ohio, and served in General Nelson's Kentucky expedition as colonel of the 23d Ohio volunteers. His courage and skill secured him promotion, and when killed he was in command of a brigade in General Sheridan's division.

SILLIMAN, BENJAMIN, LL. D., an eminent American chemist and geologist, b. in Trumbull, Conn., 1779. He graduated at Yale in 1796, and after filling the post of tutor, studied law, and was admitted to the Connecticut bar in 1802. In the same year he was offered the chair of chemistry in Yale college, but did not enter upon its duties until 1804, having employed the interval in studies at Philadelphia, under Dr. Woodhouse. He subsequently prosecuted his studies in London and Edinburgh, and after an absence of more than a year resumed the duties of his professorship, which he retained until 1853, when he resigned, and was made professor emeritus; continuing his lectures on geology, however, until 1855, when his academic labors terminated. As a chemist he made many important discoveries; and to his instruction and influence the country is largely indebted for the advance that has been effected in the sciences of mineralogy and geology. He was one of the first to popularize scientific knowledge by public lectures, which he delivered at different periods in nearly all the chief cities of the Union. He established the "American Journal of Science and Art" in 1818, and for 20 years was its sole editor. His independent publications were numerous, and ranged from 1810 to 1853, the earliest and the last being records of European travel. His text-book on "Chemistry" appeared in 1830, and his edition of Bakewell's "Geology," with notes, originally issued in 1829, passed through several editions. He retained his mental and bodily vigor in old age, and never ceased to be interested in all questions connected with the advancement of science and the welfare of humanity. D. 1864.

SIMPSON, SIR GEORGE, governor of the Hudson's Bay company's territories, was b. in Rosshire, Scotland, 1796. In early youth he was sent to take a share in the troublous contests then raging between the chartered Hudson's Bay company and the unchartered but active and energetic Northwest company of Canada. From his tact and daring, and plausibility of speech and demeanor, he was mainly instrumental in accomplishing a coalition of the contending parties, — a coalition by which the Northwest company retained over one half of the capital stock of the united association, and secured more than half of the offices in the territory for their resident associates. Mr. Simpson was appointed resident governor of one of the divisions of the country thus restored to harmony, and a few years afterwards he was appointed governor of the whole of what is called the Hudson's Bay company's territories, an office which he held till his death. The Hudson's Bay company was originally established, and large grants of land were made to it, that the nature of the country itself and the capabilities and resources of the surrounding territory on all sides, might be inquired into and reported upon to the British government; but it was not till 1836, when it became necessary to have some good grounds on which to crave from the British government a renewal of their charter, that the company attempted to fulfil the obligations imposed upon them by their first charter. In that year, however, Mr. Simpson was instructed by the directors of the company to make arrangements for the equipment of an expedition to connect the discoveries of Captains Ross and Back. This he did, and the expedition was successful under the conduct of his nephew, the late Thomas Simpson, noted in Arctic discovery. During a period of three years the expedition traced the coast of America from the mouth of the Mackenzie river to Point Barrow, and from the mouth of the Coppermine river to the Gulf of Boothia. In consideration of the services of the Arctic expedition, knighthood was conferred on Governor Simpson. D. 1860.

SINCLAIR, CATHERINE, author of "Modern Accomplishments," "Modern Society," "Scotland and the Scotch," and several novels founded on fashionable life. B. at Edinburgh, 1800; d. 1864.

SLOCUM, JOHN S., colonel of a regiment of Rhode Island volunteers, b. 1824; killed, 1861. He served with distinction in the Mexican war.

SMITH, PERSIFER F., major-general United States army, b. in Pennsylvania, settled as a lawyer in New Orleans, and entered the army in 1846, as colonel of the mounted rifles. He gained great distinction in Mexico, and in 1847 was brevetted major-general. He d. at Leavenworth, 1858, being at the time in command of the military department embracing Utah and the Plains. — CHARLES FERGUSON, a major-general of United States volunteers, b. in Pennsylvania, 1806; d. 1862. He graduated at West Point in 1825, served with distinction in the Mexican war, winning the successive brevets of lieutenant-colonel and colonel. In Aug., 1861, he was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers, and placed in charge of the United States troops at Paducah, Ky. His gallantry shone conspicuous in the successful attack on Fort Donelson, and was rewarded with a major-generalship. — CALEB B., b. in Massachusetts, 1808, settled in Indiana as a lawyer, and established and edited the "Indiana Sentinel." He served in the state legislature and in congress, and was secretary of the interior under President Lincoln; resigning the office, however, to accept that of a district court judge in Indiana. D. 1864. — ALBERT, a prolific English writer, light as gossamer, but entertaining. Amongst his works are the "Wassail Bowl," "The Scattergood Family," "Christopher Tadpole," and the "Pottleton Tragedy." In 1849 he visited the East, telling his story in "A Month at Constantinople." Two years later he ascended Mont Blanc, and on his return to London produced an entertainment, which he repeated a thousand times in the Egyptian hall. B. 1816; d. 1860. — THOMAS SOUTHWOOD, an English physician, eminent as a medical writer, and yet more eminent as a philanthropist and sanitary reformer, b. 1790; d. 1861. He was an intimate friend of Jeremy Bentham, and an ardent supporter of all measures for securing the rights and promoting the happiness of the people. He was during many years employed by the English government as a member of the "Health of Towns Commission," and did much to improve the systems of drainage, sewerage, and ventilation of London and other large communities. — DR. JUNIUS, was b. in Plymouth, Conn., and graduated at Yale college in 1802, studied law, and soon after went to London, and there resided many years, engaged in commerce. He devoted a considerable portion of his life to two great public enterprises, — the establishment of transatlantic steam navigation, and the naturalization of the tea-plant in the United States. To the first he early directed his attention, maintained its practicability, and sought to apply to it the test of experiment, long before it came to be regarded as a regular, efficient auxiliary of foreign commerce. During the last years of his life he assiduously engaged in the propagation and nurture of the tea-plant at Greenville, S. C., and considered that he had secured for it a thrifty growth upon American soil. While devoted to the prosecution of this enterprise, he received, in Feb., 1852, an injury which resulted in his death. — REV. ELI, a zealous and learned missionary, was b. at Northford, Conn., 1801. After graduating at Yale college, and completing a course of theological study at Andover, he embarked on a missionary of the American board, and took charge of their printing establishment at Malta. This was in 1826. Soon afterward he was transferred to the mission in Syria, with which he was connected for the remainder of his life. An exploration of Armenia was made by him, in company with Rev. H. G. O. Dwight, in 1830 and 1831, and an account thereof was published in 1833, in two volumes. Not long after this he published a collection of missionary sermons and addresses. In 1838, and again in 1852, he was the companion and coadjutor of Professor Edward Robinson in his extensive and thorough exploration of Palestine and the regions adjacent, and contributed in an important degree to the success of the enterprise. His knowledge of the Arabic, and his acquaintance with the wants of those who use this language, qualified him for the service which he rendered in the production of a new form and font of Arabic type. The first font was cast at Leipsic, under his superintendence, and others have since been cut and cast in this country. About the year 1846 he commenced a new translation of the Bible into Arabic, and this labor he prosecuted with zeal and devotion up to the close of life. D. at Beyrut, Syria, Jan. 11, 1857.

SMYTH, THOMAS A., brigadier-general United States army, killed in battle near Farmville, Va., 7th April, 1865. A native of Ireland, he came to this country when a boy, and settled at Wilmington, Del., where he was engaged in the business of coach-making at the commencement of the civil war. He raised a company at Wilmington, and joined a Philadelphia regiment, in which he served as captain for three months. Returning home, he became major of a Delaware regiment, and rose steadily until he attained the rank of brigadier-general in the summer of 1864. In this capacity he distinguished himself by an energy and daring that endeared him to the army of the Potomac, and elicited praise from his superiors. He was shot in the mouth by one of the enemy's sharpshooters in the decisive engagement preceding the surrender of General Lee. General Smyth was an active member of the Fenian brotherhood, and president of the Potomac circle.

SOLOMON, ABRAHAM, an English painter, b. 1823; d. 1862. Among his best known paintings are, "Waiting for the Verdict," "Second Class" and "First Class," and "The Lion in Love."

SOMERSET, SIR HENRY, a lieutenant-general in the British army, b. 1794; d. 1862. He served under the Duke of Wellington in the Peninsula, was in the campaign of the Netherlands, commanded in South Africa many years, and took an active part in the Kafir wars; and, lastly, filled the position of commander-in-chief at Bombay.

SONTAG, HENRIETTA, b. at Coblenz, in 1805, of parents belonging to the theatrical profession, received a musical education at Prague, and appeared at Vienna as a soprano singer about 1821. Her success as a singer and actress led to her being chosen, successively, by Weber and Beethoven to take a part in their operas. She then appeared in Paris and London. A marriage with Count Rossi for a time withdrew her from the stage. The political events of 1848 necessitated her return to the stage, and she succeeded Mdle. Lind at London. She afterwards visited the United States, and d. in the city of Mexico, of cholera, 1854.

SOULT, NICOLAS JEAN DE DIEU, Duke of Dalmatia and Marshal of France, was b. 1769. He entered the ranks of the army in 1785, and received a lieutenant's commission in 1791. He rose rapidly, and particularly signalized himself in the victory of Fleurus. In 1799 he served under Massena in Switzerland, and in the following year was wounded and taken prisoner during the defence of Genoa. His bravery and skill now attracted the notice of Napoleon, who employed him under his own eye, and in 1804 he was the first of the marshals whom Napoleon created, as he was afterward the first marshal whom Napoleon made a peer. He was the chief organizer of the army which assembled at Boulogne for the invasion of England; and when that army was countermarched into Germany against the Austrians, he led the main column, sharing largely in the glories of Ulm and Austerlitz, and, in the next year, of Jena. He was sent into Spain, in 1808, and engaged Sir John Moore at Corunna. Passing into the north of Portugal, he was defeated by Wellington, and retreated into Spain, the southwest part of which he subdued, with the exception of Cadiz. He lost the battle of Albuera, against Beresford, in 1811. Recalled to aid Napoleon after the Russian campaign, he was sent back to Spain, in 1813, to stem the advance of Wellington. He was unsuccessful; and after a series of engagements in and near the Pyrenees, Soult retreated into France, exhibiting at every point strategic abilities of the highest order. He had led his army safely out of Toulouse after the final battle, when the news arrived of Napoleon's first abdication. In 1815 he fought at Waterloo as one of Napoleon's major-generals. On the second return of the Bourbons, he was for a time proscribed, but was ultimately restored to all his dignities. Under Louis Philippe he enjoyed civic distinction. D. 1851.

SOUTHEY, CAROLINE, the second wife of Robert Southey, b. 1787; d. 1854. She was the only child of Captain Bowles, and for many years contributed anonymously to English literature. It was not until after the publication of "Ellen Fitz Arthur," and several of the pathetic novelettes which she had contributed to "Blackwood's Magazine," under the title of "Chapters on Churchyards," that her name and identity became known beyond her limited family circle. She was married to Southey in 1839. — HENRY, brother of Robert Southey, the poet, and an eminent London physician, b. 1783; d. 1865. He was deemed the highest medical authority in England in reference to lunacy.

SOWERBY, GEORGE BRETtingham, an eminent conchologist, a writer in the scientific periodicals of London, and originator of the "Zoological Journal." His principal work, "Genera of Recent and Fossil Shells," in two volumes, remains uncompleted. B. 1790; d. 1854.

SOYER, ALEXIS, a celebrated professor of the culinary art, a Frenchman by birth, but a long time resident in England. D. 1857.

SPENCE, WILLIAM, one of the authors of the "Introduction to Entomology," b. 1783; d. 1860.

SPENCER, JOHN C., the son of Chief Justice Ambrose Spencer, was b. in Hudson, N. Y., 1788. His father, on being appointed to the bench, removed to Albany. He entered Williams college, but soon went to Union college, where he graduated. He was called to the bar in 1809, and lived in Canandaigua until 1845, when he removed to Albany, where he resided until his death. In 1811 he was made master in chancery; in 1813 he was brigade judge-advocate in active service on the frontier; in 1814 was appointed postmaster of Canandaigua; in 1815 was assistant attorney-general for the western part of the state, and in 1816 was elected to congress, where he served two years. While there, he was one of the committee who examined into the affairs of the United States bank, and their report was drawn by his hand. When, 15 years afterwards, the final struggle came, and General Jackson was using the means furnished to his hand by this report, Mr. Spencer was found among the friends of the bank. In 1820 he was first elected to the assembly, and was chosen speaker. The next year he was returned, but was in the minority. In 1824 he was elected to the state senate, and served four years. He joined the anti-masonic party, and was appointed by Gov. Van Buren special attorney-general, under the law passed for that purpose, to prosecute those connected with the alleged abduction of Morgan. In 1832 he was again elected to the assembly. In 1839 he was appointed secretary of state and superintendent of common schools, and did much to reduce them to a system. He was appointed reagent of the university in 1840. In October, 1841, he was made secretary of war by President Tyler, and in March, 1843, was transferred to the treasury department, but resigned in 1844, from his opposition to the annexation of Texas. He achieved his highest fame from his connection with the revision of the statutes of New York. Not content with merely preparing the statutes, he followed them up with a series of essays explaining their purposes. So great confidence was placed in him by the people, that he was selected to revise the whole body of the law of the state; but his advancing age compelled him to decline the task. D. 1855.

SPOHR, LOUIS, a musical composer, b. 1780; d. in Hesse Cassel, 1859.

STANGER, WILLIAM, a physician and naturalist, attached to the Niger expedition in 1841. D. 1854.

STANLEY, ANTHONY DUMOND, professor of mathematics in Yale college, published a treatise on spherical trigonometry, revised an edition of Day's algebra, and edited a valuable set of mathematical tables. B. at East Hartford, 1812; d. 1853.

STEELE, WILLIAM, b. in the city of New York, 1762, entered the revolutionary army at the age of 16, and took an active part in the struggle for independence. In 1794 he commanded a troop of New Jersey horse, and aided in suppressing the insurrection in Pennsylvania. D. 1851.

STEERS, GEORGE, a naval constructor and shipbuilder, was b. in Washington, 1821, and removed to New York when quite young. The yacht America and the steamships Adriatic and Niagara were constructed on his models, and were the means of gaining for him a high professional position. D. 1856.

STEINLA, MORITZ, a Prussian engraver, and professor of engraving at the Dresden academy, b. 1792; d. 1858. His best work is the engraving of the "Madonna" of Holbein.

STEPHEN, A. J., an English barrister and sergeant-at-law, author of "Commentaries on the Laws of England," and "Pleadings in Civil Actions." B. 1788; d. 1864.

STEPHENS, MRS. HARRIET MARION, authoress of "Hagar the Martyr," and many tales, sketches, and poems. B. 1823; d. 1858.

STEPHENSON, ROBERT, an engineer, b. near Newcastle-on-Tyne, 1803, served an apprenticeship in the locomotive works of his father, the celebrated George Stephenson. In 1828 he received a prize for the best locomotive, which should consume its own smoke, weigh no more than six tons with its complement of water, and draw a train of twenty tons at a rate of ten miles an hour. In 1833 he superintended the construction of the London and Birmingham railroad, and he was shortly afterwards invited to Belgium by the king to advise upon the best system of railroad lines through that country. In 1846 he visited Norway, and reported with a view to the construction of a railroad there. He displayed especial skill as an engineer in tunnels and bridges for railroad purposes; the Britannia bridge over the Menai Straits, and the Victoria bridge over the St. Lawrence being among the monuments of his genius. D. 1859.

STEVENS, ROBERT L., b. 1788, the son of John Stevens, the builder of the Phoenix, the second steamboat in this country, devoted much time to the improvement of steam-machinery and steamboat models, and was one of the projectors of the Camden and Amboy railroad. He invented an improved bomb of a sugar-loaf form, and was afterwards commissioned by the federal government to build a steam-battery for harbor defence. D. 1856. — ISAAC INGALLS, b. in North Andover, Mass., 1818, was killed in battle in Fairfax county, Va., Sept. 1, 1862. He graduated at the West Point military academy in 1839, and entered the corps of engineers, in which service he continued until 1853, when he was appointed governor and superintendent of Indian affairs for the territory of Washington. Disputes in which he became officially involved, led to his resignation, but not until he had been elected a delegate of the territory in congress, where he served two terms. He was chairman of the Breckinridge executive committee at Washington in 1860, but steadily opposed every movement in the direction of secession. As an officer of the army, he was at the siege of Vera Cruz under General Scott; fought in several subsequent battles; was severely wounded in the final assault upon the city of Mexico, and was twice brevetted for gallant services. In September, 1861, he was appointed a brigadier-general in the volunteer service, and was assigned a command under Gen. Sherman in the expedition to Port Royal. He commanded the principal column in the unsuccessful assault on the confederate position near Secessionville, June 16, 1862. He was ordered to reinforce Gen. McClellan after the retreat of the army of the Potomac from before Richmond; and had charge of a division in Gen. Pope's command at the time of his death.

STEVENSON, S. W., a numismatist, author of "A Dictionary of Roman Coins." D. 1854. — THOMAS G., brigadier-general United States volunteers, was a son of the Hon. J. T. Stevenson, of Boston. In 1861 he recruited the 24th regiment Massachusetts volunteers, which was attached to the Burnside expedition; and was thenceforward in active service. He displayed judgment and gallantry in various expeditions on the North Carolina coast, and in Feb., 1863, was made brigadier-general of volunteers. He bore a part in the operations which resulted in the reduction and capture of the confederate works on Morris Island, and in the attack on Fort Wagner was intrusted with the command of the reserves. Exposure and hardship brought on illness, and he visited the North to recover his health. Returning to duty, he was assigned to the command of the first division of the 9th corps in Virginia, and was killed in battle, May, 1864.

STEWART, REV. ALEXANDER, a Scottish writer, and one of the principal contributors to the "Edinburgh Encyclopædia." B. 1781; d. 1862.

STOCKS, JOHN ELLERTON, b. 1820, held a medical appointment in the service of the East India company, and being a zealous and practical botanist, availed himself of his opportunities to form an extensive collection of Indian plants with drawings made by native artists. These he took to England, with a view to the publication of an extensive work, but in the midst of his labor he d., 1854. His published papers are chiefly contained in Sir W. J. Hooker's "London Journal of Botany."

STONEHOUSE, REV. WILLIAM BROCKLEHURST, clergyman of the church of England, author of "The Crusade of Fidelis," and other religious works. B. 1793; d. 1862.

STORER, GEORGE W., rear admiral United States navy, b. in New Hampshire, received a midshipman's warrant in 1809, and a lieutenant's commission in 1813. He served, successively, in the Independent, the Congress, the Java, and the Constitution, — the last being at the time the flag-ship of Commodore Rodgers in the Mediterranean squadron. He was promoted to a captaincy in 1837, and in 1841 commanded the frigate Potomac on the coast of Brazil. On his return he assumed the charge of the Portsmouth navy yard; and in 1848 took the command of the Brazil squadron. In 1855 he became governor of the Philadelphia naval asylum, and in 1862 was promoted to the grade of rear-admiral. D. at Portsmouth, 1864.

STORRS, WILLIAM LUCIUS, chief-justice of Connecticut, and a profound jurist, b. at Middletown, 1795; d. 1861.

STRAIN, ISAAC G., lieutenant United States navy, b. in Pennsylvania, d. in Aspinwall, 1857. He conducted explorations in the interior of Brazil and the peninsula of California; and in 1849 crossed from Valparaiso to Buenos Ayres, embodying his observations in a narrative entitled "The Cordillera and Pampa." He was attached to the Mexican boundary commission, and yet later conducted an expedition across the Isthmus of Darien.

STRANGFORD, PERCY CLINTON SYDNEY SMYTHE, Viscount, a British diplomatist, b. 1780; d. 1855. Whilst minister at the court of Lisbon, he prepared and published translations from Camoëns.

STRANGWAYS, THOMAS FOX, b. 1790, was brigadier-general commanding the British artillery in the Crimea, and was killed at Inkerman, where a round-shot blew away his leg.

STRICKLAND, E., a traveller and naturalist, and the successor of Dr. Buckland as professor of geology at Oxford. In 1847 he began his editorial labors upon the zoölogy and geology of Professor Agassiz, for the Ray society. B. 1811; killed by a railway accident, 1853.

STRONG, GEORGE C., brigadier-general of the United States volunteers, b. in Stockbridge, Vt., 1833. He graduated at West Point, and held positions at the Watervliet arsenal and elsewhere. In 1861 he entered upon active service, and was on the staff, successively, of General McDowell and General McClellan. He was afterward detailed as an ordnance officer to the department of the Gulf; distinguishing himself at Biloxi. He commanded the assaulting column at Fort Wagner, Charleston harbor, where he was mortally wounded, July, 1863.

STRUTHERS, JOHN, a minor Scottish poet, author of "The Poor Man's Sabbath," b. 1776; d. 1853.

STRUVE, FRIEDRICH GEORG WILHELM VON, a Russian astronomer and author, b. in Altona, 1793; d. 1864. In 1817 he was appointed director of the observatory of Dorpat, and in 1839 accepted the same position in the observatory of Pulkowa. His labors in various branches of astronomical science gained him a European reputation. He published several works, some of them voluminous, and was a contributor to the "Transactions" of the St. Petersburg academy of sciences.

STUART, REV. MOSES, D. D., was b. at Wilton, Conn., 1780, and graduated at Yale college in 1799. He was admitted to the bar in Danbury, Conn., in 1802. About the same time he became tutor in Yale college, and continued in office about two years. Soon after entering on the tutorship he determined to leave the legal profession, and engaged with great zeal in the study of theology. In March, 1806, he was ordained pastor of the first church in New Haven, and here continued about four years. In Feb., 1810, he was inaugurated professor of sacred literature in the theological seminary at Andover, Mass., which station he filled with distinguished usefulness and success during most of the remainder of his life. He published numerous commentaries and theological treatises. D. 1852.

—DUDLEY, LORD, b. 1803, commenced his career as a liberal politician in 1830. When Prince Adam Czartoryski and the wreck of the Polish army arrived in England, Lord Stuart espoused their cause, and thenceforward, throughout his life, labored with unflinching devotion to secure the restoration of Poland. He rejected every proposal to take office, declaring that he would accept no other than that of ambassador at the court of Warsaw. He d. at Stockholm, 1854. In early life he married the daughter of Lucien Bonaparte, Prince of Canino. — ALEXANDER, judge of the vice-admiralty court of Nova Scotia; d. 1865. The case of the steamer Chesapeake, seized by confederate pirates on the passage from New York to Portland, was tried before him, and his decision restored the vessel to its owners. — JAMES E. B., major-general in the confederate army, was b. in Patrick county, Va., about 1829. He entered the West Point academy in 1850, and four years afterward received a commission as second lieutenant in a mounted rifle corps, from which he was transferred to the first regular cavalry. He served in New Mexico, and acquired a reputation for fearlessness and skill in various conflicts with hostile Indians. In May, 1861, he joined the confederates, and was made colonel of a Virginia cavalry regiment. He commanded the cavalry attached to Beauregard's and Johnston's armies at the first battle of Bull Run, and in the following September routed a Union force at Lewinsville, Va. For the latter service he was rewarded with a brigadier-generalship. Early in the Peninsular campaign of 1862 he conducted a series of dashing cavalry expeditions, preliminary to the more daring and more formidable raid through and around General McClellan's army, in June, during which he destroyed a great quantity of Union supplies, made many captures, and widely diffused a feeling of insecurity. On his return he was promoted to the rank of major-general, and placed in command of a division of cavalry. His next exploit was at Cattle's Station, Va., where he dashed upon General Pope's forces, and penetrated to headquarters, carrying off Pope's papers and dress-uniform. In October he made a raid into Pennsylvania, and another into Maryland, taking possession of Chambersburg, and doing much damage on the line of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad. At the various places he visited he respected private property other than horses, but seized and destroyed public property to an immense amount. He encountered Pleasanton at the Barbee's Cross-roads in November, and in December took part in the battle of Fredericksburg; after which he crossed the Rappahannock and effected another of his raids in safety. In May, 1863, he assumed control of "Stonewall" Jackson's corps, and in June accompanied Lee toward Maryland, marching and doing damage in various directions, and reaching Gettysburg in time to take part in the battle. In October he had several engagements with the Union cavalry. In May, 1864, during the battles in the Wilderness, he was met by General Sheridan and driven back. In turn he followed Sheridan, and on the morning of May 12th met the Union forces under General Wilson and Colonel Gregg. While preparing for an engagement, he was singled out at short range and mortally wounded, dying a few hours subsequently at Richmond, whither he had been taken in an ambulance.

STURGE, JOSEPH, a member of the society of friends, and an active participator in various philanthropic movements, b. 1794; d. in England, 1859. He visited the United States as a laborer in the anti-slavery cause.

SUE, EUGENE, one of the most effective and prolific novelists of France, was b. in Paris, 1801. After studying medicine in the hospitals and schools, he entered a company of the royal body-guards, as aide-major, in 1823, and soon afterwards was transferred to the staff of the French army then preparing to enter Spain, under the Duc d'Angoulême, and was present at the siege of Cadiz, and at some minor operations. In 1825 he exchanged the army for the naval service, and visited America, Asia, and the Mediterranean coasts; thus obtaining a knowledge of ocean scenes and sailor-life, which he afterwards turned to good account in his earlier tales. In 1828 he took part in the engagement at Navarino. In the following year, by the death of his father, he came into the possession of a considerable fortune, and he now became a painter, and entered the studio of Gudin. After contributing to some minor stage-pieces, now forgotten, he wrote various novels, chiefly illustrative of naval life. From 1832 to 1840 Eugène Sue had confined himself to that class of fictions in which he endeavored to emulate, if not to surpass, Fenimore Cooper in sea adventures, and Sir Walter Scott in historical delineations. But, changing on a sudden his political views, he embraced the opinions of the socialists, and in his novel of "Mathilde," published in 1841, he labored to expose the wrongs of the lower classes and the miseries of the poor, which he afterwards developed with so much power and success in the "Mysteries of Paris," and the "Wandering Jew." These two novels were welcomed with great enthusiasm in France, and brought him a large accession of fame and fortune. In the columns of the "Constitutionnel," Eugène Sue, in 1846, published his "Martin l'Enfant Trouvé," a socialist romance, and in the following year, "Les Sept Péchés Capitaux." "Les Mystères du Peuple," published in 1849-1856, which was intended to be an exposure of the misery to which the common people of every country have been reduced in all ages of the world by injustice and tyranny, was suppressed by the government in 1857. In 1848, after the revolution of February, Eugène Sue adopted the strongest democratic and socialist opinions, and was elected in 1850 a member of the National assembly. When Louis Napoleon perpetrated the coup d'état, in December, 1851, Eugène Sue was driven into exile, and d. proscribed, in 1857.

SUMNER, JOHN BIRD, D. D., Archbishop of Canterbury, author of "Evidences of Christianity," "Expository Lectures," and other theological works, and the leader of what is known as the "Evangelical Section" of the English church, b. 1780; d. 1862.—EDWIN VOSE, brevet major-general in the United States army, b. in Boston, Mass., 1796; d. 1863. He served in the Black Hawk war, as second lieutenant in the second infantry, and on the Indian frontier, as captain of the second dragoons. He afterward commanded the school of cavalry practice at Carlisle, Pa. He became major in 1846; in 1847, led the cavalry charge at Cerro Gordo, where he was wounded; and was brevetted lieutenant-colonel. He gathered further laurels at Contreras, Churubusco, and Molino del Rey; and in 1848 was commissioned lieutenant-colonel of the first dragoons. For a time he commanded the department of New Mexico. In 1855 he was made colonel of the first cavalry, and during the next three or four years held important posts on the western frontier. In March, 1861, he was appointed brigadier-general in the regular army, and in 1862 commanded the first army corps in the army of the Potomac. He served at the siege of Yorktown, and was twice wounded in the battles of the Chickahominy. He was then made major-general of volunteers, and brevet major-general in the regular army. He was again wounded in the battle of Antietam.

SUSINI, MRS. ISABELLA HINCKLEY, an American vocalist, a daughter of Dr. Hinckley, of Albany, and wife of Signor Susini, d. in New York, 1852. She appeared successfully in Italian opera in several of the capitals of Europe, and afterward in the chief cities of the United States.

SUTHERLAND, GEORGE GRANVILLE SUTHERLAND LEVESON GOWER, Duke of, b. 1786; d. 1861. He was the owner of immense estates in Scotland, from which he drove a host of small farmers and peasants, whose presence interfered with his plans for improving herds of cattle and sheep.

SYMINGTON, W., author of a work on the "Atonement and Intercession of Christ," and another on the "Mediatorial Dominion of Christ," b. 1795; d. 1862. He was professor of theology in the seminary of the reformed presbyterian church in Scotland.

SYMONS, JELINGER COOKSON, editor of the London "Law Magazine," and a prolific writer of essays and pamphlets, b. 1810; d. 1860. He originated the theory that the moon does not rotate upon its axis.

SZECHENYI, COUNT STEPHEN, a distinguished Hungarian, and one of the leaders of the revolution in 1848. B. 1793; d. near Vienna, 1860.

T.

TACHE, SIR ETIENNE P., a prominent French Canadian politician, b. at St. Thomas, Lower Canada, 1795; d. 1865. He served with the British in the war of 1812-14, and afterward adopted the medical profession. During the period of excitement which culminated in the abortive rising of 1837, Dr. Tache took an active part in opposition to the policy of the British government. He subsequently became a zealous loyalist, and having entered the Canadian legislature, held office as a member of different administrations. In 1848 he was made a life member of the legislative council; in 1858 was knighted by Queen Victoria; and in 1864 became premier of the provincial cabinet. He held, from the pope, the rank of knight of the Roman order of St. Gregory.

TALFOURD, THOMAS NOON, the author of "Ion," b. at Reading, 1795, was instructed in classical literature by Dr. Valpy. Called to the bar in 1821, he received a sergeant's gown in 1833. In 1835 he entered parliament, and published his celebrated tragedy, followed at intervals by "The Athenian Captive," "Glencoe," and the "Castilian." He was appointed a judge of the common pleas in 1849, and whilst on the bench at Stafford, in 1854, suddenly expired. His prose works are, a "Life of Charles Lamb," "Vacation Rambles," and a biography of Mrs. Radcliffe. He was greatly beloved for kindness of heart, and all the virtues of social intercourse.

TALLMADGE, NATHANIEL P., territorial governor of Wisconsin under President Tyler, was a lawyer by profession, b. in Columbia county, N. Y., 1795. He served for some years in the New York legislature, and was a senator in congress from 1838 to 1844. D. 1864.

TALMADGE, JAMES, b. in Dutchess county, N. Y., 1788, was a representative in congress, 1817-19, and strenuously opposed the adoption of the Missouri compromise. He was an active member of the convention which framed the constitution of 1821; in 1824 was elected lieutenant-governor under Clinton; and in 1846 was a member of the constitutional convention of the state. He was president of the American institute in New York during the last 20 years of his life. D. 1853.

TANEY, ROGER BROOKE, for 27 years chief justice of the supreme court of the United States, was b. in Calvert county, Md., 1777. He graduated at Dickinson college, Penn., in 1795, and in the following year commenced the study of the law in Annapolis. He was admitted to the Maryland bar in 1799, and began the practice of law in his native county, removing to Frederick, Md., in 1801. He was elected a delegate to the general assembly, and in 1816 was elected a state senator. He removed to Baltimore in 1822, where he resided until his death. In 1827 he was appointed attorney-general of Maryland, and in 1831 attorney-general of the United States. In Sept., 1833, President Jackson appointed him secretary of the treasury, as successor of Mr. Duane, who was dismissed because of his refusal to remove the government deposits from the United States bank. Mr. Taney, on succeeding to the office, carried out the policy of the president, but the senate rejected his nomination. He was nominated an associate justice of the supreme court in 1835, but again failed to obtain confirmation by the senate. In March, 1836, President Jackson appointed him to the supreme court as the successor of Chief Justice Marshall; and the majority of the senate having become democratic, the nomination was this time confirmed. He began his judicial labors in Jan., 1837, and continued them to the very close of life. D. 1864.

TAPPAN, ARTHUR, many years a New York merchant, but more generally known as one of the earliest and most influential members of the anti-slavery party, b. in Northampton, Mass., 1786; d. 1865. The circumstance which first brought his name into prominence as an abolitionist was his payment of the fine required to obtain the release of Mr. W. L. Garrison from the Baltimore prison, where he was confined for the publication of an article on the domestic slave-trade. In conjunction with his brothers, Mr. Tappan originated the mercantile agency business in the United States. Throughout life he enjoyed a reputation for benevolence and integrity.

TAYLOR, ISAAC, an English writer and essayist, and brother of Jane Taylor, whose literary contributions are well known, was b. in Suffolk, England, in 1787. He was educated privately by his father, a nonconformist minister, and was originally destined for the pulpit. Relinquishing the idea, he next turned his attention to the legal profession, but ultimately betook himself to literature, and for many years lived in rural retirement. Here he wrote and published anonymously "The Natural History of Enthusiasm," which was favorably received by the religious public. His works on "Fanaticism," "Spiritual Despotism," and "The Physical Theory of Another Life," were also popular among the orthodox nonconformist communities; although the labored obscurity of his style, and his indefinite mode of expression, proved serious obstacles to his literary fame. For calm beauty, and a cheerful, hopeful tone, he produced nothing superior to his "Home Education," "Saturday Evening," and "Spiritual Christianity." His "Ancient Christianity" was an attempt to meet Dr. Pusey and his disciples on their own ground, and to controvert their position by a discussion of the writings of the early fathers. He was also the author of "Loyola and Jesuitism," and

"Wesley and Methodism." In addition to his gifts as an author, he possessed a certain amount of mechanical genius, which he turned to some profitable account in originating various designs of a useful character. D. 1865.—JOHN W., b. in Saratoga county, N. Y., 1780; d. in Cleveland, 1854. He was long a leading politician in his native state; elected to the state legislature in 1811, and to congress in 1813. He was speaker of the house during the passage of the Missouri compromise.—RICHARD, a London printer, whose press was long the favorite one for classical and scientific publications, was b. 1731. He established the "Annals of Natural History." D. 1858.—GEORGE W., brigadier-general of volunteers in the United States army, b. in Hunterdon county, N. J., 1808, was mortally wounded in the second battle of Bull Run, and d. at Alexandria, Va., Sept. 1, 1862. He served in the Mexican war, but at the outbreak of the civil conflict in 1861 he was engaged in mining and the manufacture of iron in his native county. He became colonel of the 3d New Jersey volunteers, and was promoted after the battle of West Point. He commanded his brigade in the seven-days' struggle before Richmond.

TELEKI, COUNT LADISLAUS, a Hungarian writer, scholar, and patriot, b. 1811, was sent to Paris in 1848 by the Hungarian government to urge a recognition of Hungarian nationality. The triumph of Austria made him an exile, with sentence of death pronounced against him. In 1860 he ventured to visit Dresden, when he was arrested by the police and delivered to the Austrian government. He received a conditional pardon, and in April, 1861, obtained a seat in the Hungarian diet. His patriotic impulses led him to oppose the Austrian emperor, and so to violate the pledge upon which pardon had been granted. He committed suicide in Pesth, May 8, 1861.

TERRELL, DR. WILLIAM, a prominent citizen of Georgia, a member of the state legislature, and from 1817 to 1821 a representative in congress. He was an active promoter of agricultural improvement, and munificently provided for the establishment of a professorship of agriculture in the state university. D. 1855.

TERRILL, WILLIAM R., brigadier-general of volunteers in the United States army, b. in Virginia, entered the United States army in 1853, and in May, 1861, was captain in the fifth artillery. He raised a regiment for service in Kentucky, and for his gallantry at Shiloh was appointed to the position he held at his death. He was killed at the battle of Perryville, Ky., Oct. 8, 1862.

THACKERAY, WILLIAM MAKEPEACE, novelist and essayist, b. at Calcutta, 1811, was the son of the Rev. Richard Thackeray, who held a situation in the East India company's civil service. He was educated in England, and left Cambridge university without taking a degree. He went to Rome as a professional student of art, but abandoned the purpose, and, on returning to London, gave himself to literature. He contributed occasionally to the "Times," but first gained distinction by a series of tales, essays, and sketches written for "Fraser's Magazine" under the pseudonym of Michael Angelo Titmarsh. His earliest separate publications, such as "The Paris Sketch-Book" and the "Chronicle of the Drum," were not very successful, although the genius of Thackeray as a humorist was even then appreciated by critical minds. It was in the pages of "Punch" that he became a power in the literature of England. "The Snob Papers" and "Jeames's Diary" placed his reputation as a satirist beyond cavil. "Vanity Fair" followed as a separate publication, and in 1849-50 the "History of Pendennis," and "Rebecca and Rowena," — the latter a burlesque continuation of Sir Walter Scott's "Ivanhoe." The "Kickleburys on the Rhine," issued in 1851, drew upon Thackeray a severe castigation from the "London Times," to which he replied in "An Essay on Thunder and Small Beer." His next novel, "Esmond," appeared in 1852, the scene being laid in the days of Queen Anne; and out of his study of the leading characters of that age arose "Lectures on the English Humorists," a series of the most agreeable biographical sketches in the language. Prior to the collected publication of the lectures, they were delivered by Thackeray in London and in the chief cities of the United States. His success as a lecturer led Thackeray to prepare another series, — "The Four Georges," — which were also delivered in the United States. In 1857 he became a candidate for parliamentary honors, but was defeated by his opponent. "The Newcomes" and "The Virginians" were amongst the latest productions of this eminent writer, who d. suddenly in London, 1864.

THIERRY, J. N. AUGUSTIN, the greatest of modern French historians, was b. 1795 in Blois, of poor parents, and passed through his studies at the college of his native town. In 1811 he entered the normal school, and two years afterward was appointed professor in a provincial college. He removed to Paris in 1814, sharing the wild ardor of the time, but without fixed ideas or predilection for any distinct branch of science. He yearned, as he himself said, for a future, he knew not exactly what; for liberty assured by a government "with the greatest possible amount of individual guaranties, and the least possible amount of administrative action." Fascinated by the daring scope of St. Simon's views, Thierry quitted the university and attached himself to the celebrated economist as secretary and disciple. The relation was of brief duration, for in 1817 he entered the ranks of journalism as a writer for the "Censeur Européen." The polemics of the day led him to the study of history, then dull and arid; and, as yet unconscious of his vocation and destiny, he thus laid the foundation of his power as the founder of the new school of French history. The voice of the Bourbon was supreme, and the courtly historians upheld the pretensions of the rulers with an insolence that challenged controversy. Montlosier had reproduced an historical system based upon the distinction between the conquered and the conquerors in France. Thierry accepted the fact of the conquest as the premises on which to found his claims in favor of the conquered. An assailant of the theories of Montlosier, and a defender of the revolution, Thierry produced his great work, the "Histoire de la Conquete de l'Angleterre par les Normands." With sight and health impaired, Thierry sought recuperation in Switzerland. His general health improved, but, almost blind, he returned to Paris to resume his labors in the field of history, aided by one as secretary who has since taken a brilliant position in literature and journalism, — Armand Carrel. Thierry's next work was the "Lettres sur l'Histoire de France." Illness soon compelled him to betake himself to the baths of Luxeuil. During his absence the Academie Française awarded him the Gobert prize of $2000; and Guizot selected him to compile for the government all the materials to be found throughout France bearing upon the history of the third estate. Blindness and paralysis did not deter Thierry from the prosecution of his favorite studies, which he continued to the last. D. 1856.

THINEMAN, F. A. L., DR., a German ornithologist, b. 1792; d. near Dresden, 1857.

THOMPSON, ZADOCK, professor of natural history in the university of Vermont and state naturalist, author of a gazetteer and history of Vermont, and other works, b. 1797; d. 1856.

THOMSON, THOMAS, a successful chemical teacher, author of a "System of Chemistry," and one of the original editors of the "Encyclopædia Britannica." He was b. in Perthshire, 1773, and commenced his lectures at Edinburgh in 1800. He invented the system of symbols now in universal use, though modified in some respects by subsequent discovery, and introduced the use of Greek and Latin numerals to designate the various degrees of oxidation, &c., of which bodies are susceptible. He opened the first laboratory in Scotland for practical manipulation. Thomson's discoveries include chlorocromic acid, hyposulphurous acid, hydrosulphurous acid, potash oxalates of chromium, potash chromate of magnesia, chloride of sulphur, many salts, and above fifty species of minerals. D. at Glasgow, 1852. — CATHARINE, a prolific authoress, the widow of an English physician. Her first efforts were biographical and historical, including lives of Wolsey and Raleigh, and "Memoirs of the Court of Henry VIII." She next published a series of historical novels, among which were, "Anne Boleyn," "Ragland Castle," "The White Mask," "The Chevalier." She subsequently wrote "Court Secrets," the "Queens of Society," "Wits and Beaux," and other works. D. 1862.

THORBURN, GRANT, the "Laurie Todd" of the newspapers, and the hero of Galt's novel, b. in Dalkeith, Scotland, 1773; d. in New Haven, 1863. A threatened prosecution of a political nature led him, in 1792, to emigrate to the United States, and on his arrival here he worked for some time at the trade of a nail-maker. He afterwards embarked in the seed business, in which he made for himself a name and a fortune. Many of his contributions to the press were quaint reminiscences of New York life and society at the beginning of the century.

THOREAU, HENRY D., author of "Life in the Woods," and "A Week on the Concord and Merrimaek Rivers," and widely known as an observant and thoughtful writer and an eccentric man, b. in Boston, 1817; d. 1862. He graduated at Harvard in 1837, and was for three years a teacher. Sharing the views of Ralph Waldo Emerson, he removed to Concord, whence he made numerous pedestrian excursions through the woods and mountains of New Hampshire and neighboring states; treasuring observations which served him well when he commenced authorship. For upwards of two years he dwelt in a shanty erected by himself in the woods near Concord, and there gathered the materials of the work which first made him known in the literary world. Two posthumous volumes from his pen were published in 1863, and a third appeared in 1865.

THORNWELL, JAMES HENRY, D. D., an eminent South Carolinian, b. 1811, graduated at Columbia college in 1829, and then entered upon the study of the law. This he abandoned for theology, and he became the pastor of a presbyterian church, successively, in Columbia and Charleston. In 1836 he was chosen professor of logic and belles-lettres in South Carolina college; in 1840, professor of the evidences of christianity and chaplain of the college; in 1852, president of the college; in 1856, senior professor of the presbyterian theological seminary at Columbia. He was an active and influential politician as well as a divine; an advocate of slavery; and an adherent and warm friend of John C. Calhoun. He was one of the most ardent promoters of secession, and opened the first sitting of the South Carolina secession convention with prayer. He published several pamphlets, sermons, and addresses, and also a controversial work, entitled "Arguments of Romanists Discussed and Refuted." D. 1862.

TIECK, LUDWIG, b. at Berlin, 1773, studied, successively, at Halle, Göttingen, and Erlangen. From boyhood poetry was his favorite study, but though always a pleasing versifier, his endowments manifested themselves most finely in prose. His literary career has been divided into three epochs. In the first he was one of the Romanticists; some of his works being dramatic and poetical parodies, others belonging to the class known as art-novels. Other pieces were saintly or historical legends dramatically treated. Others again — and these the most popular of all — are popular legends, related in a prose narrative form, full of playful fancy, beautiful description, and a pleasing simplicity of manner. Years of painful illness intervened between these productions and his translations of the old English drama. After many wanderings he took up his residence in Dresden in 1819, where he enjoyed a pension and honorary counsellorship. Besides collecting his earlier works, he wrote critical and dissertative novels. D. 1853.

TILDEMANN, FRIEDRICH, a German physiologist and anatomist, b. in Hesse Cassel, 1781; d. in Munich, 1861.

TILGHMAN, LLOYD, a confederate brigadier-general, a native of Maryland, and a graduate of West Point, killed at Champion Hill, Miss., 1863.

TOCQUEVILLE, ALEXIS C. H. CLEREL DE, eminent as a philosophic thinker and writer, was b. at Verneuil in 1805, and was admitted a member of the French bar in 1825. In the following year he was appointed juge d'instruction at Versailles; which office he held for three years, exchanging it in 1830 for that of juge-suppléant. In 1832 he was sent on a joint mission with M. G. de Beaumont to America, to inquire into the penitentiary system of the United States, with a view to its introduction into France. Here he spent two years, visiting the different states, and inquiring assiduously into the institutions of the country. As the results of his researches and reflections he published in 1835 his "Démocratie en Amérique," which has been pronounced to be the best and profoundest work that has appeared from a foreign pen on the United States. In 1839 he became a member of the chamber of deputies, and his senatorial efforts were remarkable for largeness of view and that sagacity and foresight which distinguish the statesman from the mere politician. After the revolution of 1848 he was returned both to the national and legislative assemblies, when he vigorously opposed the prevalent theories as to the organization of labor. In June, 1849, he was appointed minister of foreign affairs, but resigned his portfolio in October, in consequence of the president's message appearing to deviate from the system of moderation to which he was attached. As a private member of the legislative chamber, he continued to oppose the personal system of the Elysée; to the last he remained a faithful adherent of parliamentary government; and he was one of those who protested against the coup d'état of Dec. 2, 1851, and with the rest of his colleagues was thrown into prison till the illegal deed was consummated. From this period he devoted himself entirely to literary pursuits; and in 1856 he published an elaborate work on the "Ancien Régime et la Révolution," which for profound and original views and beauty of style has rarely been surpassed. D. 1859.

TOOKE, THOMAS, an eminent merchant and writer on financial subjects, was b. in 1774, at St. Petersburg, where his father, well known as the author of the "History of Russia" and the "Life of Catherine II.," held the office of chaplain to the British factory. Early in life he entered into mercantile pursuits as partner in one of the largest houses engaged in the Russian trade, and there gained the great experience and knowledge of details which became so conspicuous in the works on financial subjects which he afterwards produced. In 1820 he drew up the document known as the "Merchant's Petition in Favor of Free Trade," and from this period to the close of his life he was an active participator in all the inquiries and legislation connected with social and financial reform in Great Britain. His "History of Prices," in six volumes, has secured for him a place in the first rank of political economists. It embodies a great mass of information with respect to the commercial history of England during the eventful period of 56 years, ending with 1856, and is no less valuable to speculative than to practical inquirers. D. 1858.

TOWNSEND, GEORGE, D. D., a theologian, author of "The Chronological Arrangement of the Holy Bible," "Accusations of History against the Church of Rome," and other works, b. 1787. In 1847 he went to Italy to convert the pope, but his published account does not show satisfaction with the result of his labors. D. 1857.

TRACY, REV. E. C., a congregational minister, formerly editor of the "Boston Recorder," and subsequently of the "Vermont Chronicle." B. 1796; d. 1862.

TRAILL, THOMAS STUART, professor of medical jurisprudence in the university of Edinburgh, and editor of the last edition of the "Encyclopedia Britannica." B. 1782; d. 1862.

TRIMBLE, ISAAC E., b. in Virginia, 1801, was graduated at West Point, but abandoned the army and took high rank as a civil engineer. In 1861 he joined the seceded states as a brigadier-general, and was killed at the battle of Cedar Mountain, Aug. 9, 1862.

TURNER, JOSEPH MALLERD WILLIAM, one of the most remarkable of English landscape-painters, was b. of humble parents in London, 1775. His abilities appear to have been rapidly developed, for though unaided by instruction from any master, he obtained admission as a student into the royal academy in 1789, and in 1790 was an exhibitor in the academy. His elaborate drawings soon procured a public recognition of his talents, having been elected an associate of the royal academy in 1800, and an academician in 1802. For 50 years he was one of the most distinguished members of that institution; and after a successful life, in the course of which he accumulated a large fortune, he d. in obscure lodgings, under an assumed name, at Chelsea, 1851. He was buried by the side of Sir Joshua Reynolds in St Paul's. His pictures and property he bequeathed to the British nation. Turner's earlier style was characterized by elaborate finish; his latest, by excessive looseness of execution. — WILLIAM W., remarkable as a self-taught linguist, was b. in England in 1810, and while yet young came to New York as a journeyman printer. He acquired a familiar knowledge of the Hebrew, Sanscrit, and other Oriental languages, besides those of modern Europe. He edited various Lexicons, and prepared a dictionary of one of the African languages for the Smithsonian institution. He was professor of Oriental literature in the Union theological seminary at Schenectady, and in 1852 was appointed librarian of the patent-office at Washington. D. 1859. — REV. SAMUEL H., an episcopal clergyman, distinguished for his critical scholarship, b. in Philadelphia, 1791; d. 1861. In 1818 he was appointed professor of historic theology in the general theological seminary at New York; in 1821, professor of biblical learning and interpretation of the scriptures in the same institution; and, in 1831, professor of Hebrew in Columbia college.

TWIGGS, DAVID EMANUEL, b. in Georgia, 1790, entered the United States army as captain in 1812, and served throughout the war with Great Britain, and at its conclusion held the position of captain in the seventh infantry, with the brevet rank of major. He distinguished himself in the Mexican war, and was brevetted major-general, and presented with a sword by congress, for gallant conduct at Monterey. In 1847 he commanded a division under General Scott, and in 1848 was military governor of Vera Cruz. In 1861 he was in command of the Union troops in Texas, and treacherously surrendered military stores and materials into the hands of the state authorities, and the troops under his charge to the rebel authorities. He held the rank of major-general in the confederate army for a short time, but soon afterward resigned, and d. 1862.

TYLER, JOHN, one of the presidents of the United States, b. in Charles City county, Va., 1790. He had barely attained to manhood when he was elected to the state legislature. Five years afterward he was elected to congress, and in 1826 to the gubernatorial chair of his native state. Before the expiration of the term of this office he was chosen to fill a vacancy in the senate of the United States, where he officiated as president pro tem. of that body. He served in this capacity until a difference of opinion having arisen between General Jackson and himself, he resigned his seat in 1836. In 1840 he was selected by the whig party as their candidate for vice-president. He was elected to that office by a large majority, and entered upon the discharge of his duties in March, 1841, when the death of the president, General Harrison, shortly after raised him to the chief magistracy of the republic. His term of office expired in 1845, after which he lived in retirement in Virginia until early in 1861, when he reappeared at Washington as a delegate to the peace congress, of which body he was president. A few weeks later he became a member of the Virginia convention which passed the ordinance of secession, and subsequently of the confederate congress. D. in Richmond, Jan. 17, 1862.

U.

UHLAND, JOHANN LUDWIG, a German lyric poet, b. in Tübingen, 1787. Having studied law, he took his degree in 1810, but afterwards visited Paris, where he applied himself to the study of the old French poets. After his return home he was employed in the department of the minister of justice in Würtemberg; was elected to the second chamber in 1816; became professor at Tübingen in 1829, but resigned his post in consequence of not being admitted to the chamber. At the regeneration of Germany, in March, 1848, the name of Uhland again assumed political weight. The Würtemberg ministry having sent him as a delegate to Frankfort, he took part in the reorganization of the congress. Uhland wrote his earlier poems during the height of the romantic period, but the brightness of the imagery, and the purity and simplicity of the thoughts, elevated them above the ruling influences. He sought material for his poems among the traditions of all the nations of the west of Europe, but always invested them with the pure German character and expression. He was always quite as much of a politician as a poet, and entered into and expressed himself strongly on the various phases of politics that in turn agitated the German people. His principal works are, "Ernest, Duke of Swabia," a tragedy; "Louis the Bavarian," a drama; "Dramatic Poems;" "Walter of the Vogelweide." "The Black Knight," "The Castle by the Sea," and other of his ballads have been made familiar to American readers by Longfellow's translations. D. 1862.

UPHAM, TIMOTHY, b. in Deerfield, N. H., 1807, commenced mercantile life in Portsmouth in 1807. On the breaking out of the war of 1812, he joined the army with the rank of major, and was placed in command of the forts and harbor of Portsmouth, and superintended the recruiting service. In July, 1812, he received a commission in the 11th infantry, and in September joined the army in Plattsburg. He saw considerable service, and was promoted to be lieutenant-colonel in the famous 21st regiment, commanded by Colonel Miller, and at the sortie from Fort Erie he commanded the reserve. At the close of the war his health was so shattered that he resigned his commission. He subsequently held office under the federal government, and d. in Charlestown, Mass., 1855.

URE, DR. ANDREW, an eminent chemist, and writer on chemistry and the kindred sciences, was b. in Glasgow in 1778. After pursuing his studies at the universities of Glasgow and Edinburgh, he succeeded Dr. Birkbeck as Andersonian professor of chemistry and natural philosophy at Glasgow in 1806, where he gained fame as a lecturer and for his success in his class experiments. In 1818 he brought forward his "New Experimental Researches on some of the leading doctrines of caloric, particularly on the relation between the elasticity, temperature, and latent heat of different vapors, and on thermometric measurement and capacity," which was read before the royal society, and published in their "Transactions" for that year. In 1821 appeared the first edition of his "Dictionary of Chemistry," which procured him the friendship of Sir H. Davy, Dr. Wollaston, and Dr. E. D. Clarke. This was followed by various papers which he contributed to philosophical journals, his "System of Geology," published in 1829, and by his "Philosophy of Manufactures," and his work on the "Cotton Manufactures of Great Britain," published, respectively, in 1830 and 1831. His last great work was the "Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines," a work of immense labor and research, which has gone through many editions, and has been translated into the leading continental languages. D. 1857.

V.

VALPY, ABRAHAM JOHN, editor of London editions of the classics, d. 1854.

VAN BRUNT, GERSHOM J., commodore United States navy, b. in New Jersey, 1800, entered the service in 1818, and d. at Dedham, Mass., 1863. He was commissioned commander of the Minnesota in 1862, and after taking part in the reduction of the Hatteras forts, was engaged in the blockading service at Hampton Roads. He had the supervision and equipment of General Banks's New Orleans expedition.

VAN BUREN, MARTIN, a president of the United States, b. at Kinderhook, N. Y., 1782; d. near that place, July 24, 1862. He enjoyed only an ordinary education, and in 1796 began the study of the law, which he continued until 1803, when he was admitted to the bar. He had meanwhile taken an active part in politics, and in 1808 was appointed by Governor Tompkins surrogate of Columbia county. In 1812 he was elected to the state senate. He continued a member of that body until 1820, having been, during that period, a supporter of the war and the canal project. A portion of this time he also held the office of attorney-general. He was a member of the constitutional convention of the state of New York in 1821, and in February of the same year he was elected to the United States senate, and reelected in 1827, serving until 1829. The following year the gubernatorial chair of the state of New York became vacant by the death of Governor Clinton, and Mr. Van Buren was selected as the candidate for that office, by the democratic party of the state. He was elected, but his career as governor was brief, for he soon afterward accepted from President Jackson the office of secretary of state. The president appointed him ambassador to England, but the senate refused to confirm the nomination. He received a large majority of the electoral votes for vice-president in 1832, which office he continued to fill during President Jackson's term. In 1836 he was nominated for the office of president, and elected. In 1840 he was again nominated for the same office, but defeated by the whig candidate, General Harrison. He was equally unsuccessful in 1848, as the candidate of the free-soil section of the democratic party.

VANDENHOFF, JOHN, a dramatic performer, b. at Salisbury, England, 1790, was of Dutch origin, his grandfather having been an Amsterdam merchant. After filling engagements in the theatres of several country towns, he appeared in Liverpool in 1814, and made his first mark as Rolla in "Pizarro." He appeared first in London in 1820, and played King Lear and Coriolanus with distinguished ability. He visited the United States twice, on each occasion meeting with great success. He retired from the stage in 1858, and d. 1861.

VANDEBURCH, M. EMILE, a French dramatist, originally an officer in the army of La Vendée, b. 1795; d. 1862. His enacted productions exceed a hundred dramas.

VANDERLYN, JOHN, an American painter, was b. in Kingston, N. Y., and went to Paris in 1796 to study his art, remaining there five years. His masterpiece, painted in Rome, is entitled, "Marius on the Ruins of Carthage." His portrait of Washington hangs in the hall of the United States house of representatives, and another of his paintings fills a panel in the rotunda of the capitol. His last work was a portrait of President Taylor. D. 1852.

VAN DORN, EARL, b. in Mississippi, 1823, graduated at West Point in 1842, and in the Mexican war distinguished himself on several occasions. In the spring of 1861 he resigned his commission in the United States army, and joined the confederates with the rank of colonel. He captured the steamship Star of the West, and forced the surrender of several companies of United States infantry at the time stationed in Texas. In Jan., 1862, he was placed in command of the trans-Mississippi district as major-general, but after the battle of Pea Ridge was superseded. He was killed in a private quarrel in Tennessee, 1863.

VAN EYCKEN, JOHN, a distinguished painter, d. in Brussels, 1854.

VAN NESS, CORNELIUS P., b. 1781; d. in Philadelphia, 1852. He was chief justice of Vermont, and afterwards governor of that state. He was appointed by President Jackson minister to Spain, and remained there in that capacity nine years.

VEDDER, DAVID, a Scottish poet and prose writer, d. 1854.

VERNET, EMILE JEAN HORACE, a French historical painter, b. at Paris in 1789. His early days were passed in comparative poverty, and his taste for art was employed in various humble ways in gaining a livelihood. His first exhibition was in 1809, and having chosen military incidents for illustration, the popular taste soon showed its appreciation of his productions. In 1812 he received a medal; in 1814 became a chevalier of the legion of honor; and in 1825, an officer of the same order. His reputation being now established, he changed his style of painting, and adopted historical subjects. Amongst his productions of this class are his "Judith and Holofernes," "The Arrest of the Princes by Order of Anne of Austria," and "The School of Raphael." In 1849 he painted the "Taking of Rome by Oudinot," and in 1855 received a medal of honor at the Paris exhibition. He produced other paintings in various departments of the art. D. 1863.

VESTRIS, MADAM, for 30 years the spirit of English light comedy and burlesque, was the daughter of the well-known engraver Bartolozzi. She was b. in 1797, and gave early evidence of extraordinary ability as a musician and linguist. At 16 she married Vestris, ballet-master of the king's theatre, and entered upon the dramatic profession at that establishment, but without much success. She then played several years in drama and tragedy in the French language at Paris. Returning to England in 1819, she accepted an engagement at Drury Lane, where she created an extraordinary sensation in a burlesque of Mozart's opera of Don Giovanni, called "Giovanni in London." From this time she reigned the spoiled favorite of the London theatrical public till her death, in 1856.

VILLEPIGUE, JOHN B., b. 1834, resigned a first lieutenancy in the United States service in March, 1861, and entered the confederate army as colonel of a Georgia and Mississippi regiment, which command he held at the bombardment of Fort Pickens in November. He was then appointed brigadier-general, and took part in the battle of Corinth. D. at Port Hudson, La., 1862.

VISCONTI, LOUIS JOACHIM TULLIUS, an eminent French architect, b. 1791; d. 1853.

VON BIELA, BARON WILHELM, a celebrated astronomer, at an early age entered the service of Austria, and in the year 1826, when quartered with his regiment at Josephstadt, in Bohemia, made the interesting discovery of the comet (called after him) circulating between the sun and the orbit of Saturn. Retiring from the army, he spent the last years of his life in the study of his favorite science, and in correspondence with the eminent savants of the continent. D. at Venice, 1856, in his 74th year.

VON LANGSDORFF, GEORGE FREDERICK, BARON, botanist and traveller, d. at Friedburg, 1852.

VON SCHWARTZENBERG, PRINCE FELIX, b. 1800; d. of apoplexy at Vienna, 1852. He represented Austria at various courts, served in a military capacity in the war with Sardinia, 1848, and succeeded Prince Metternich as prime minister.

VOROSMARTY, MICHAEL, a Hungarian poet, closely connected with the periodical literature of his country, and an active participator in its politics, b. 1800; d. 1856.

W.

WADSWORTH, JAMES SAMUEL, brigadier-general United States volunteers, b. in Livingston county, N. Y., 1807. He was educated at Harvard and Yale colleges, and was admitted to the bar in 1833. He never practised law, however, for, being the inheritor of princely estates, he preferred to apply himself to their management and improvement. He was an active member of the democratic party, and when the schism in that party occurred, he allied himself to the free-soil section. The Kansas Nebraska bill drove him into yet more decided antagonism to slavery, and in 1860 he was offered the republican nomination for governor, but refused it. He was chosen presidential elector, and as such cast his vote for Mr. Lincoln. He was a commissioner to the peace conference at Washington in Feb., 1861, and on the outbreak of hostilities he offered his services to the government. He served as volunteer aid, with the rank of major, on the staff of General McDowell, at the first battle of Bull Run, and in August, 1861, was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers, and assigned a brigade in McDowell's division. In March, 1862, he was appointed military governor of the District of Columbia, and while exercising the duties of this office received the republican nomination for governor of New York. He was defeated by Mr. Seymour. In Dec., 1862, he resumed active military service as commander of a division in Sigel's army corps. He took part in the battle of Chancellorsville, under General Hooker, and distinguished himself at Gettysburg. He was subsequently transferred to Warren's corps, and in May, 1864, while commanding a division under General Grant in the march towards Richmond, was killed on the second day of the battles in the Wilderness.

WAINWRIGHT, JONATHAN MAYHEW, D. D., provisional bishop of the eastern episcopal diocese of New York, was b. in Liverpool, of American parents, 1792, graduated at Harvard college, and having studied theology, ministered, in succession, in Hartford, Conn., Boston, and New York, until his appointment as provisional bishop in 1852. He was a ripe scholar and a learned theologian, and received an honorary degree at Oxford, England. D. 1854.

WAKEFIELD, EDWARD, author of "Ireland, Political and Statistical," d. 1854. — EDWARD GIBBON, an English writer, principally known in connection with efforts to reform prison discipline, and with plans for the colonization of South Australia and New Zealand. Of prison management he wrote from experience, having suffered three years' confinement for abducting an heiress of 15. In 1833 he published a book on "England and America," containing the germ of the theories afterwards acted upon in South Australia and other colonies. He was among the first to urge upon England the importance of occupying the islands of New Zealand, which to this day suffer more or less from his views and plans. When Lord Durham came to Canada as governor-general, to study the causes of the political troubles under which that colony labored, and to suggest remedies, Wakefield accompanied him as private secretary; and to him, in conjunction with Charles Buller, the celebrated "Durham Report" may be ascribed. B. 1796; d. 1862.

WALDO, DANIEL, b. in Windham, Conn., 1762; d. 1864. He served in the American army in 1778; graduated at Yale in 1788; studied theology; and in 1792 was made pastor of a congregational church in West Suffolk, Conn. In 1809 he commenced missionary labor in the states of Pennsylvania and New York; subsequently preaching at Cambridgeport, Mass., in Rhode Island, at Harvard, and for 12 years at Exeter, Conn. He retained his bodily and mental powers to the last, having served two years as chaplain of congress when nearly 100 years of age.

WALLACE, WILLIAM HARVEY LAMB, brigadier-general of volunteers in the United States army, b. in Urbana, O., 1820, was a lawyer in Illinois, and in May, 1861, was made colonel of the 11th Illinois volunteers. In Feb., 1862, he commanded the first brigade of McClelland's division of Gen. Grant's army. He displayed great gallantry in the capture of Fort Donelson, and having been mortally wounded at Shiloh, d. April 10, 1862. — BENJAMIN, J., D. D., editor of the "Presbyterian Quarterly Review," and pastor of various churches in Pennsylvania and Kentucky. B. 1810; d. 1862.

WALLACK, JAMES WILLIAM, b. in London, 1795; d. in New York, 1864. Inheriting histrionic talent, he made his appearance on the stage when but seven years old. One of his earliest patrons was Richard Brinsley Sheridan, from whom he received an engagement at Drury Lane. In 1817 he succeeded Mr. Booth in playing Iago to Kean's Othello, and in the following year came to New York, making his first appearance at the Park theatre in the character of Macbeth. From 1820 to 1850 he played alternate periods in this country and in England; permanently fixing his residence in New York in 1851. Here he established a theatre on Broadway, in which he commenced a career of uninterrupted success as manager; building a new theatre in 1861, and maintaining the same high standard of artistic excellence until his death.

WALLICH, NATHANIEL, a celebrated botanist, author of the "Flora Indica," and "Plantæ Asiaticæ Rariores," b. in Denmark, 1796; d. in London, 1854. In early life he served in the Danish settlement of Serampore, but at the conquest of that place by the British entered the service of the East India company.

WARBURTON, ELIOT BARTHOLOMEW GEORGE, author of "The Crescent and the Cross," an admirable description of eastern travel, was b. near Tullamore, Ireland, in 1810. He also published "Memoirs of Prince Rupert and the Cavaliers," "Reginald Hastings," and "Darrien; or, the Merchant Prince"; besides contributing to periodical literature, and editing "Hochelaga" and "The Conquest of Canada." On the 2d of January, 1852, he sailed for the West Indies in the Amazon mail steampacket, with the view of recruiting his health, and of accomplishing a long cherished purpose of visiting the new world. But his wishes were not destined to be realized. Shortly after midnight on the morning of the 4th of January, the Amazon was destroyed by fire in the bay of Biscay, and the last of the survivors on leaving the ship saw Eliot Warburton standing with the captain and two or three officers on the poop of the wreck, calmly awaiting their fate.

WARD, JAMES HARMAN, commander in the United States navy, compiler of a "Manual of Naval Tactics," and author of "Elementary Instructions on Naval Ordnance and Gunnery," b. in Hartford, Conn., 1806, killed in the attack on Matthias Point, June 27, 1861. — BARON, was b. in Yorkshire, England, and served when a boy as a jockey at Vienna for four years, when he became employed by the Duke of Lucca. He was there promoted from the stable to be the valet to his Royal Highness until 1846. Eventually he rose to the position of minister of the household, and was minister of finance until 1848, when he became an active agent of Austria during the revolution. He returned to Parma as prime minister, negotiated the abdication of Charles II., and placed Charles III. on the throne. He represented Parma at the court of Vienna until the death of Charles, in 1854, when he retired from public life and engaged in agricultural pursuits. He was able to write and speak German, French, and Italian. D. in Vienna, 1858.

WARDLAW, RALPH, a Scottish theologian and D. D., and pastor of a congregational church in Glasgow. His principal works are "Discourses on the Socinian Controversy," "Man's Responsibility for his Belief," "Lectures against Religious Establishments," and "Sermons." B. 1779; d. 1853.

WARNER, MRS., the last great actress of the English stage, d. 1854. — SAMUEL ALFRED, a master in the British navy, whose "invisible shell" was the subject of repeated experiments by the British government. A government commission decided against his pretensions, and a "long range," of which he claimed to be the inventor, was never brought to trial. D. 1854.

WARREN, JOHN COLLINS, eminent as a physician and student of the natural sciences, was b. in Boston, 1788, and after acquiring a knowledge of his profession from his father, Dr. John Warren, passed some years in the hospitals of London and Paris. Returning to Boston, he commenced practice and speedily took a high position. In 1806 he was appointed assistant professor of anatomy and surgery in Harvard college; and in 1815 was made full professor, and so continued until his resignation in 1847, from which time until his death he was emeritus professor. He was one of the originators of the Massachusetts general hospital and McLean asylum, and was president of the Massachusetts medical society from 1832 to 1836. During the later years of his life he devoted much of his time to the study of the natural sciences. His museum of specimens in comparative anatomy, osteology, and paleontology was very extensive; and he had, probably, the most perfect skeleton of the "Mastodon Giganteus" of North America known to be in existence. He published and distributed his work on the mastodon of this country, and issued an enlarged edition a few weeks before his death, which took place in Boston, 1856.

WARRINGTON, COMMODORE LEWIS, was b. at Williamsburg, Va., in 1782. After graduating at William and Mary college, he entered the navy in 1800. His services in the Tripoli war and the war of 1812 made his name familiar to the American people as a brave, energetic, and skilful captain. At the time of his death he was chief of the ordnance bureau. D. 1851.

WASHINGTON, JOHN MACRAE, major United States army, was b. in Virginia, 1793, graduated at West Point in 1813, and entered the artillery as lieutenant in 1817. Heroic conduct on the field of Buena Vista was rewarded with a brevet as lieutenant-colonel. In 1848 he commanded an expedition across the plains of Mexico, viâ El Paso, to the Pacific ocean, and for a year afterward he acted as the military governor of New Mexico. D. 1853. — JOHN A., a collateral descendant of the Washington family, and formerly proprietor of Mount Vernon, was colonel in the confederate army, and was killed in a skirmish, Sept. 15, 1861. — BAILEY, related by blood to George Washington, was b. in Westmoreland county, Va., 1787, and entered the United States navy as a surgeon in 1810. He was the surgeon of the Enterprise when she captured the Boxer, during the war of 1812, and served on Lake Ontario under Com. Chauncey, who selected him as fleet-surgeon. He acted in the same capacity under Commodores Rodgers, Elliott, and Paterson successively, in the Mediterranean; closing his sea career during the Mexican war. D. 1854.

WATERMAN, THOMAS G., a lawyer, resident at Binghampton, N. Y., from 1812 until his death; judge of the court of common pleas of his own county; and author of a volume on the "Powers and Duties of Justices of the Peace." B. 1788; d. 1862.

WATERTON, CHARLES, an English naturalist, b. towards the end of the last century, d. 1865. His "Essays on Natural History" have the charm of freshness, and display a love of nature which their author cherished to the last. He passed the greater part of his life in elegant retirement at Walton Hall, Yorkshire, pursuing his favorite study, and preserving from molestation the multitudes of birds which made his estate their home.

WATKINS, TOBIAS, physician, b. in Maryland, 1780, was surgeon in the United States army during the last war with Great Britain, and was assistant surgeon-general from 1818 to 1821. He was fourth auditor of the treasury from 1824 to 1829. He was a frequent contributor to the journals and medical periodicals of his day; and at the time of his death, in 1855, was engaged in preparing a history of the British invasion of the District of Columbia.

WATSON WALKER, author of "Jockie's far awa'," and other Scottish songs, d. 1854.

WATTS, ALARIC ALEXANDER, poet and journalist, b. in London, 1799; d. 1864. An illustrated work, entitled "Lyrics of the Heart," includes his choice poems. He was early connected with the English newspaper press, and contributed prose and poetic sketches to various periodicals.

WEALE, JOHN, a London publisher, editor of a rudimentary series of scientific works, b. 1792; d. 1862. Among many larger works which he compiled were, "Drawing-Books for Engineers and Architects," "On the Making of American Railways," and "Papers of Architecture and Archæology."

WEBB, ALEXANDER STUART, brigadier-general United States service, b. in New York about 1834. He was a son of James Watson Webb, formerly of the New York "Courier and Enquirer," and minister to Brazil under President Lincoln's administration. He was educated at West Point, and after holding a commission for a brief period in the United States infantry, was appointed acting assistant professor of mathematics in that institution. He joined the Union army in 1861, and distinguished himself at Yorktown, Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, and Gettysburg. His merit was rewarded with rapid promotion, and he commanded the first brigade of the 2d corps of Gen. Hancock during the battles in the Wilderness. Killed May, 1864.—PHILIP BARKER, eminent as a scholar and botanist, author of a work entitled "Histoire Naturelle des Isles Canaries," in many volumes quarto, splendidly illustrated, and of a learned work on the wild-flowers of Spain. D. in Paris, 1854.

WEBSTER, DANIEL, one of the most eminent of American statesmen, was b. in Salisbury, N. H., on the 18th of January, 1782, and was the son of Ebenezer and Abigail Webster. His father had served in the French and in the revolutionary wars, and had distinguished himself as the captain of a volunteer company under Stark at Bennington. Young Webster received an ordinary school education, and in his 14th year was placed in Phillips academy at Exeter, N. H., at that time under the care of Dr. Abbot. After a few months' stay in Exeter, he was placed with the Rev. S. Wood for tuition and preparation for college. Six months sufficed to put the ambitious student in a condition to enter Dartmouth college, which he did in August, 1797. In August, 1801, he commenced his legal education in his native town, under the supervision of Mr. Thompson, and completed his preparatory training for the bar, in March, 1805, in Boston, when he was admitted to practice in the Suffolk court of common pleas. He began practice in the village of Boseawen, whence he removed to Portsmouth, N. H., in September, 1807, having declined the offered clerkship of the county court of common pleas in Hillsborough, N. H. It was in the 13th congress, which first met in extra session in May, 1813, that Daniel Webster commenced his political career, having been chosen representative from New Hampshire in the previous November. Of the house Henry Clay was speaker, who appointed the new member on the committee of foreign affairs. Mr. Webster delivered his maiden speech on the 10th of June, 1813, and almost immediately assumed a front rank amongst debaters. His speeches, chiefly on topics connected with the war then raging between England and the United States, were characterized by masterly vigor, and by uncommon acquaintance with constitutional learning, and the history and traditions of the government. He advocated the improvement and increase of the navy; and in 1816, when at the close of the war commerce and manufactures attained a sudden development, entered prominently into the discussion of the tariff. In this he considered a moderate degree of protection as the established policy of the United States. He opposed the passage of the national bank bill of April, 1816. He removed to Boston in the same year, and took the place which belonged to his commanding talent and legal eminence. The trial of the famous Dartmouth college case, in March, 1818, involving constitutional questions, was one of high importance, and brought into requisition Mr. Webster's peculiar abilities. Mr. Webster retired from congress in 1817, but was re-elected from Boston in 1822. On the 19th of January, 1823, he made his great speech in behalf of the Greeks, and one on the Panama mission in April, 1826. Besides these, his Plymouth oration of the 22d December, 1820, that at Bunker Hill in 1825, and his eulogy upon Adams and Jefferson in 1826, are well known. In January, 1828, Mr. Webster took his seat in the United States senate. The great encounter with Colonel Hayne, of South Carolina, took place in January, 1830, and was one of the most interesting, and perhaps one of the most important, epochs in his life. Mr. Webster supported the bill of 1832 for the recharter of the bank; in the nullification movement of that year he cooperated with President Jackson, and made a speech in reply to Mr. Calhoun in February, 1833. The fiscal policy of Jackson and Van Buren found a steady opponent in Mr. Webster, as well in its original form of an unlimited expansion of the paper of the state bank, as in the substitute of an exclusively metallic currency for the government, which was brought forward after the league of the deposit banks had exploded. General Jackson's protest of April 17, 1834, against the action of the senate, drew forth a powerful speech on the 7th of May. On the independent treasury bill of 1838, Mr. Webster also made several elaborate speeches. In the spring of 1839 he visited Europe, making a hasty tour through England, Scotland, and France. On the accession of General Harrison to the presidency in 1841, he was named secretary of state. In 1842 he negotiated with Lord Ashburton the settlement of the northeastern boundary question with Great Britain, and the treaty made by these diplomatists was ratified August 20th of that year. In May, 1843, Mr. Webster resigned his position, and returned for a short time to private life, but was reelected to the senate in 1845. He opposed the war with Mexico in 1846, but sustained the administration by voting for liberal supplies, and facilitated every approach to an honorable peace. Foreseeing the evils arising from a great acquisition of territory, he opposed those portions of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo which related to that subject. In the settlement of questions arising from these accessions, Mr. Webster took a great part, and brought the whole weight of his talents and influence to the accomplishment of the compromise of 1850. On the decease of General Taylor, Mr. Webster was called by President Fillmore to the department of state, and remained to the last days of his eventful life in the discharge of the duties of that office. A few weeks after Mr. Webster's accession to this department, Chevalier Hülsemann, the Austrian minister, addressed a complaint to the American government in reference to its alleged interference in the internal affairs of Austria. This was answered by Mr. Webster in one of the finest state papers in the archives of diplomacy. In addition to the jurist and statesman, Mr. Webster united the character of an accomplished scholar. He was familiar with many of the great writers of antiquity, and master of the entire range of English literature. His memory was stored with choice passages from the poets, and the entire range of the history of Great Britain, civil and parliamentary, was at his command. He d. at his home in Marshfield, Mass., Oct. 24, 1852. — FLETCHER, the last member of the family of the illustrious statesman, b. at Portsmouth, N. H., 1812; d. at Alexandria, Va., 1862. He was assistant secretary of state under his father during the administrations of Presidents Harrison and Tyler, and accompanied Mr. Caleb Cushing as secretary of legation to China. He held office at Boston under the administrations of Presidents Pierce and Buchanan. In 1861 he responded to the President's call for troops, and raised the 12th regiment Massachusetts volunteers, of which he became the colonel. He was engaged in active service, and was mortally wounded in the second battle of Bull Run.

WEED, STEPHEN H., b. in New York, graduated at West Point in 1854, and acquired distinction as an officer of the United States artillery. His gallantry at Chancellorsville was rewarded with a brigadier-general's commission. Killed at Gettysburg, 1863.

WELLES, CORNELIUS M., one of the class of unostentatious philanthropists to whom the civil war furnished unceasing employment, was b. in Weathersfield, Conn., 1828, and for a short time was a bookseller in Hartford. In 1851 he commenced his career of active benevolence by establishing ragged or mission schools in Hartford, whence he travelled to California and Australia as a lay missionary in the mining districts. In 1855 he returned to Hartford, and resumed his labors. Ill health, however, rendered change of climate necessary, and proceeding to South America, he organized mission schools at Buenos Ayres and Rio Janeiro. In Dec., 1859, he came to New York, and organized the Beulah mission, which after a time embraced schools, religious services, and charity. In 1862 he was appointed missionary to the freedmen in the district of Columbia, but became more widely known by his efforts to alleviate the sufferings and minister to the wants of sick and wounded soldiers. He was on the field in the battle of Cedar Mountain, in the engagements before Washington during Gen. Pope's campaign, at Antietam, Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, and Gettysburg; and in each case was among the foremost in the work of humanity. D. 1863.

WELLESLEY, ARTHUR, afterwards Duke of Wellington, was b. at Dangan castle, Ireland, 1769. His father was Lord Mornington, and his elder brother, who succeeded to the family honors, was created Marquis Wellesley for his services as governor-general of India. After receiving his education at Eton, Arthur Wellesley was sent to the military school of Angers, in France, to be instructed in the art of war, for which he had already evinced a predilection. His first commission in the British army was in the 33d regiment, and he entered into active service in 1793, when his regiment formed part of the British contingent which marched across from Ostend to join the allied army in Flanders. In 1799 he was sent with his regiment to India, where the British forces were on the eve of war with Tippoo Saib. He took part in the siege of Seringapatam, and though not a participator in the final and successful assault, was appointed governor of the place, over the head of the hero by whom the assault had been conducted. His rank at this time was colonel. In 1803 he was made general, and received the command of one of the armies destined to operate against the Mahrattas. During the progress of the war he performed several brilliant achievements; the final defeat of the Mahrattas being mainly attributable to his judgment, energy, and courage. He returned to England Sir Arthur Wellesley. His next employment was under Lord Cathcart in the expedition to Copenhagen, in 1807. In the following year he accompanied the British forces to Portugal, and participated in the first action with the French under General Junot. Next year he was appointed to the sole command of the British army in Portugal, where he conducted a series of successful operations against the French, under Marshal Soult. When the French, in great force, under Marshal Massena, reinvaded Portugal in 1810, they were again met by Wellesley, now Viscount Wellington. The maintenance of the position of Torres Vedras against a greatly superior force constituted the chief event of the year. In January, 1812, he took Ciudad Rodrigo by storm, and shortly afterward Badajoz. He next defeated Marmont, near Salamanca, and advancing to Madrid, he compelled the evacuation of the whole of the south of Spain by the French troops. An attempt to advance northward was less successful, and Wellington was obliged to retreat to the Portuguese frontier. In May, 1813, he advanced with forces largely increased, and came up with the French army in the plain of Vittoria. The battle which ensued was decisive of the fate of the peninsula. The French regained their frontier with only a single gun. Wellington pushed forward, and after a succession of victories, finally defeated Soult on the heights of Toulouse, in the spring of 1814. On his return to England honors and emoluments were showered upon the victorious general: he received a field marshal's baton and the thanks of parliament; was made a duke, and had conferred upon him grants amounting to $2,000,000. On the return of Napoleon from Elba in 1815, Wellington was appointed to the command of the united army of British, Hanoverians, and Belgians, terminating the contest at Waterloo on the 18th June. Peace being restored, Wellington was placed by the allies in command of the army of occupation, a position he held three years. He resigned in Oct., 1818, and returned to England, where, in the following year, he was appointed commander-in-chief of the army, retaining the appointment, with a brief intermission, and regularly discharging its duties, till the time of his death, which took place in Sept., 1852. From 1827 to 1830, Wellington was prime minister, and for short periods subsequently occupied a seat as a member of the cabinet. In politics he was a tory, and for the last 25 years of his life led the tory party in the house of lords. He was honored with a public funeral, and buried in St. Paul's, beside Nelson.

WENCESLAS, CLEMENT, Prince Metternich, Duke of Portella, was b. in 1773. At the age of 15 he entered the university of Strasbourg, but completed his studies at Mayence. In 1790 he made his public appearance as master of ceremonies at the coronation of the Emperor Leopold II., and in 1794 was attached to the Austrian embassy at the Hague. In 1801 he was appointed minister at the court of Dresden, and afterwards, in 1803-4, as ambassador to Berlin. He took a leading part in the arrangement of the coalition which was dissolved by the battle of Austerlitz. After the peace of Presburg he was Austrian minister at the court of Napoleon, where he remained until the war broke out in 1809, when he returned to the Austrian court, and was appointed minister of foreign affairs. He suggested the marriage between Napoleon and an Austrian archduchess, conducted the negotiations, and after Napoleon was divorced from Josephine, escorted Marie Louise to Paris. In 1813, on the field of Leipsic, he was raised to the dignity of a prince of the empire. He took a prominent part in the subsequent conferences and treaties, and signed the treaty of Paris in behalf of Austria. At the age of 42 he was chosen to preside at the congress of Vienna, and subsequently exerted a powerful influence in the affairs of Europe. D. 1859.

WEST, SIR JOHN, a British admiral, b. 1774, entered the navy in 1788, and d. 1862. — ROBERT A., a native of England, many years editor of the New York "Commercial Advertiser," and more recently head of the bureau of military justice in the office of the judge-advocate-general at Washington. D. 1865.

WESTMACOTT, SIR RICHARD, a distinguished sculptor, b. in London, 1775. Having received the first rudiments of instruction in the studio of his father, who was a sculptor of some eminence, he visited Rome in 1793, studied for a time under Canova, and received the following year from the academy of Florence their first premium for sculpture. Having passed some years in the classic regions of Italy, and made himself familiar with the best remains of ancient art, he returned to England, and established himself in London, where he soon gained an extensive reputation. In 1805 the Royal academy of London elected him an associate of their body, and he became in 1816 a Royal academician. The works of art by which he is best known are, his statues of Addison, Pitt, Erskine, Spencer Perceval, the late Duke of Bedford, and of Charles James Fox; the equestrian bronze statue of George III.; and his monuments to Sir Ralph Abercromby, Lord Collingwood, and others, in Westminster Abbey, and St. Paul's cathedral; together with the elegant and classical figure of Psyche, so much admired by every lover of art for its elegance of form and chastity of expression. Besides these, he designed the colossal statue of Achilles in Hyde Park, and the statue of Nelson at the Liverpool Exchange, and, together with Flaxman and Baily, a portion of the figures on the frieze of the marble arch originally erected at Buckingham palace, but now standing at Cumberland gate, London. His latest work was the sculptured pediment at the British museum. In 1827 he succeeded Flaxman as professor of sculpture in the Royal academy, and held that appointment until his decease. Among the best known of his productions are, "The Distressed Mother," "The Houseless Traveller," his "Euphrosyne," together with a large alto-relievo, "The Death of Horace." D. 1856.

WHATELY, RICHARD, Right Rev., Archbishop of Dublin, a distinguished theological and political writer, b. 1789, was educated at Oriel college, Oxford, of which he was elected a fellow in 1819.

In 1822 he was appointed to read the Brompton lectures, and in the same year received the rectory of Halesworth, in Suffolk. He was made president of St. Alban's hall, and professor of political economy, in 1830; and in 1831 was consecrated Anglican archbishop of Dublin. He took an active part in founding the national system of education in Ireland, and was a member of the Board of Irish education until 1853. His earliest effort as an author appeared in 1819, entitled "Historic Doubts relative to Napoleon Bonaparte," being an ingenious attempt to show the fallacy of sceptical criticism. Afterwards he wrote, the "Elements of Logic," "Elements of Rhetoric," "Errors of Romanism, traced to their Origin in Human Nature," "Introduction to Political Economy," "Thoughts on Secondary Punishments," and other works. D. 1863.

WHEATON, NATHANIEL SHELDON, D. D., b. in Marbledale, Conn., 1792; d. 1862. He graduated at Yale in 1814; in 1818 was chosen rector of Christ church, Hartford; in 1831 was appointed president of Trinity college, Hartford; and in 1837 accepted the rectorship of Christ church, New Orleans. He published a "Journal of a Residence in London, and of Tours in England, Scotland, and France."

WHITE, ALBERT S., a representative and senator in congress from Indiana, b. in Orange county, N. Y., 1803; d. 1864. Eight months prior to his death he was appointed by President Lincoln judge of the district court of Indiana.

WHITING, HENRY, brevet brigadier-general, was commissioned a cornet of dragoons in 1808, and passed honorably through the successive grades to that held by him at his decease. He served with reputation on the Niagara frontier in the war of 1812 with Great Britain. In the war with Mexico he filled the high and responsible post of quartermaster-general to the army of occupation, and shared with it in the glory of the field of Buena Vista. The brevet of brigadier-general conferred on that occasion attests the appreciation of his services in that conflict. D. 1851.

WHITTLESEY, FREDERICK, was b. at Washington, Conn., in 1799, and graduated at Yale college in 1818. He was admitted to the bar at Utica, N. Y., in October, 1821. In 1822 he established himself as a lawyer at Rochester, N. Y., and was soon intrusted with many important public offices. In 1830 he was elected representative to congress from Western New York, and he continued a member until 1835. In 1839 he was appointed vice-chancellor of the eighth judicial circuit of the state of New York, and held this office for eight years, until it ceased under the provisions of the new constitution. At this time he was chosen judge of the old supreme court, which was to continue in existence until July, 1848. In January, 1850, he was elected professor of law in Genesee college at Lima, N. Y. D. 1851. — ELISHA, b. in Connecticut, 1783; d. 1863. He was appointed auditor of the post-office department in 1841, and held the office of first comptroller of the treasury from 1849 to 1857, during which period his unswerving integrity secured the respect of all parties. He was reappointed by President Lincoln in 1861.

WIERTZ, ANTHON, an eminent Belgian painter, b. at Dinant, 1806, received his artistic education under Van Brée, at Antwerp. His conceptions were characterized by originality, and his influence on the Belgian school, in form and color, was great and beneficial. The government built for him at Brussels an extensive museum, in which he accumulated vast treasures of art, which, upon his death, in pursuance of an agreement, became the property of the state. He was an accomplished art critic, and received from the Royal academy of England a prize for an essay on the old Flemish school. D. 1865.

WILDE, SAMUEL SUMNER, b. in Taunton, Mass., 1771; d. 1855; was the last survivor of the delegates to the Hartford convention. From 1815 to 1850 he filled an associate justiceship of the supreme court of Massachusetts.

WILKINSON, JESSE, commodore United States navy, b. in Virginia, 1784, entered the navy in 1805, and d. 1861.

WILLARD, SIDNEY, author of "Memoirs of Youth and Manhood," and an extensive contributor to the "Monthly Anthology," "Christian Examiner," and "North American Review." He was son of President Willard, of Harvard college; was b. in Beverly, Mass., 1780, and d. 1856.

WILLIAMS, EDWIN, a statist and geographer, editor of the "Annual Register," and the "Statesman's Manual." D. 1854. — EDWARD, a Welsh bard and writer, by trade a cooper, d. 1854. — THOMAS, an officer in the United States army, b. in the state of New York, 1818, was acting assistant professor of mathematics at West Point in 1840-41, and earned distinction by his career under

Gen. Scott in Mexico. In Sept., 1861, he was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers, and served on the Potomac and at Hatteras Inlet. He commanded the land forces coöperating with the gunboat fleet in the attack upon Vicksburg after the capture of New Orleans, and was killed in battle at Baton Rouge, La., Aug. 5, 1862. — ELEAZAR, an American clergyman, by some alleged to be the lost Bourbon prince, b. at Caughnawaga, N. Y., about 1787; d. at Hoganstown, N. Y., 1858. — REV. JOHN, a Welsh scholar, and the author of various works on Celtic Archæology. B. 1811; d. 1862. — FREDERICK SIMS, an English barrister, author of "Improvements of the Jurisdiction of Equity," and other professional works, b. 1812; d. 1863. He also published "The Wonders of the Heavens," and a work suggested by a controversy on the doctrine of eternal punishment. — CHARLES KILBORN, an American jurist and an influential Vermont politician, and governor of that state in 1850 and 1851; b. 1782; d. 1853. — THOMAS SCOTT, an eminent Connecticut lawyer, an associate judge of the supreme court of errors, and from 1834 to 1847 chief justice; b. 1777; d. 1861.

WILLSHIRE, SIR THOMAS, Bart., a British general, b. at Halifax, Nova Scotia, 1790; d. 1862. His fields of service were, Buenos Ayres, 1806-7; Portugal, 1808; Spain, 1812; South Africa, 1818-22; India, 1822-39. His most brilliant exploit was the capture of the fortress of Khelat in 1839.

WILSON, JOHN, popularly known by the nom de plume of Christopher North, was b. at Paisley in 1785, of wealthy parents, and completed his studies at Oxford, where he obtained the Newdegate prize for his first poem. For some years afterwards he lived in the beautiful vicinity of Windermere, where he became intimate with Coleridge, Southey, and Wordsworth, and imbibed some of the dreamy sweetness of the lake school of poetry. Pecuniary difficulties, in some degree the result of youthful excesses, obliged him to remove to Edinburgh, where he studied law, without, however, assuming the professional toga. His earliest works as a poet were "The Isle of Palms," "The City of the Plague," and "Unimore," the first of which appeared in 1812. As a novel writer he failed to achieve a strong position, although "The Trials of Margaret Lindsay" and "The Foresters" are known as exquisite specimens of composition. In 1820 he was appointed professor of moral philosophy in the university of Edinburgh, — an appointment which, in view of his reputed habits, called forth loud condemnation in certain quarters. About the same time commenced his connection with "Blackwood's Magazine," of which for thirty years he was the leading spirit. The famous series of political and literary pieces known as "The Noctes Ambrosiane," marked his advent as a periodical writer, and secured him standing room amongst the literary Titans of his native land. Paralysis necessitated his retirement from the professorship and editorship in 1851, and he d. 1854. — HARRY BRISTOW, D. D., an antiquarian and religious writer, b. in London, 1774; d. 1854. — JOHN, a landscape and marine painter, b. in Scotland, 1774; d. 1855. — JAMES, founder, and many years editor of the London "Economist," a colaborer of Cobden and Bright in the anti-cornlaw agitation, member of parliament, and finally financial member of the Indian council in India; b. 1805; d. in Calcutta, 1860. He was the author of several works on political economy. — HORACE HAYMAN, an Oriental scholar, b. 1786, went to India as assistant-surgeon in 1808. He soon obtained official employment of another character, and in 1819 completed a dictionary of the Sanskrit language. Under the title of the "Hindu Theatre" he rendered four ancient Sanskrit dramas into English. He was the first to introduce the study of English language and literature in the education of the natives of India, and himself directed the studies of the Hindu college at Calcutta from the time of its establishment. While still engaged in a course of practical usefulness as well as learning in India, he was elected, in 1833, to the Sanskrit professorship in the university of Oxford; and from that time until his death, in 1860, he continued his services in the progress of Sanskrit scholarship, publishing many original works, as well as editing others, and contributing a series of articles to the "Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society." — JAMES, a Scottish naturalist and author, brother of "Christopher North," b. 1795; d. 1856. He was a voluminous contributor to the "Encyclopædia Britannica."

WINDISCHGRATZ, ALFRED, Prince de, an Austrian general, b. at Brussels, 1787. He entered the army in 1804, and took part in the German campaigns against Napoleon. His conduct at Leipsic gained him the grade of colonel, and after the fall of the French emperor he was decorated with orders. In 1826 he was promoted to the rank of major-general, and placed in command of a brigade at Prague. In 1833 he became general of division; and after the popular movements in 1848 he was for some time military governor of Vienna, whence he proceeded to govern Bohemia. In the war with Hungary the forces of that country almost invariably gave way before him, but for a time retrieving their sinking fortunes, they compelled the Austrians to retire from Buda-Pesth; and in April, 1849, Windischgrätz was removed from his command. The manner in which he exercised his authority rendered him one of the most odious of the instruments of despotism. Yet notwithstanding the censure of Europe on his execution of Robert Blum, he was invited to resume the governorship of Bohemia, but declined the office. He retired to his Bohemian estates, and d. 1862.

WINSLOW, HUBBARD, D. D., author of "Controversial Theology," "Christianity applied to our Civil and Social Relations," "Relation of the Natural Sciences to Revelation," "Moral Philosophy," and other works. He was b. in Williston, Vt., in 1800, graduated at Yale college in 1825, and in 1829 became pastor of a congregational church in Dover, N. H. In 1832 he removed to Boston, and assumed the pastorate of the Bowdoin street congregational church. From 1844 to 1853 he superintended a seminary for young ladies in that city. In 1858-59 he was minister of a presbyterian church in Geneva, N. Y.; whence he removed to New York city, where he d. 1864. — MIRON, D. D., brother of the preceding, b. 1789; d. 1864. After graduating at Yale college, he left Boston as a missionary in 1819. He labored many years in Ceylon, and subsequently founded a mission at Madras. He was an eminent Oriental scholar, and the author of a "Dictionary of the Tamil and English Language." His other works are, "Hints on Missions to India," and a "Memoir of Mrs. Harriet L. Winslow."

WINTHROP, THEODORE, an officer of volunteers in the United States army, and author of brilliant campaign sketches in the "Atlantic Monthly," b. in New Haven, Conn., 1828, killed in the battle of Great Bethel, June 10, 1861. After his death, two works of fiction from his pen were published — "Cecil Dreeme" and "John Brent." — F., a brigadier-general in the Union army, b. about 1840, killed in the action at Five Forks, Va., April 2, 1865. He entered the service soon after the commencement of the rebellion, and at the time of his death commanded a brigade in Gen. Sheridan's cavalry.

WISEMAN, NICHOLAS, cardinal, b. in 1802 at Seville, where his father, an Englishman, was engaged in business. His early education was received at Waterford, and at St. Cuthbert's college, near Durham. He was afterwards member of the English college at Rome, where he was created a D. D. in 1824. He became, not long after, professor of Oriental languages in the Roman university; and rector of the English college in 1829. In 1835 he delivered a series of sermons on the "Doctrines and Practices of the Catholic Church," which were published. He subsequently delivered a series of "Lectures on the Connection between Science and Revealed Religion," which were also published, and secured him a high reputation. In 1840 he was appointed coadjutor to Bishop Walsh of the midland district (England), and president of St. Mary's college, Oscott. In 1850 he was chosen vicar apostolic of the London district, and in the following year was appointed archbishop of Westminster, and raised to the dignity of cardinal. It was on the occasion of this appointment that Lord John Russell introduced into parliament his "Ecclesiastical Titles Bill," but the circumspect conduct of Dr. Wiseman, his moderation and true liberality, did much toward allaying violent opposition, and the bill never amounted to more than a dead letter. Dr. Wiseman delivered numerous lectures on various subjects on behalf of public institutions in England and Ireland during the later years of his life. Besides the publications named, he was the author of a volume of personal reminiscences entitled "Recollections of the Last Four Popes," and was one of the founders of, and a copious contributor to, the "Dublin Review." D. Feb. 15, 1865. His funeral was the greatest that has been seen in England since the interment of the Duke of Wellington.

WISHAW, FRANCIS, an English engineer, the inventor of a system of telegraph signals which, with some alterations, are still in use. B. 1805; d. 1854.

WOLFF, JOSEPH, the son of a Jewish rabbi, b. at Weilersbach, Germany, 1795, embraced the Catholic faith at the age of 17, and was baptized a benedictine monk near Prague. In the next year he commenced the study of the Oriental languages, and profited by the teaching of the Redemptorist fathers at Vienna.

From 1814 to 1816 he studied at Tübingen, extending his range to ecclesiastical history and biblical exegesis. After travelling in Switzerland and Italy, he became a pupil of the Collegio Romano at Rome, and afterward of the college of the Propaganda; being expelled from the latter in 1818, because of his dissent from some of the teachings of the church. On his return to Vienna, however, he made peace with ecclesiastical authority, and entered a Redemptorist monastery. But he again rebelled, and proceeded to London, where he found a friend in Henry Drummond, a wealthy banker, upon whose suggestion he went to Cambridge to resume his Oriental studies; having formally avowed his conversion to Protestantism. In 1821 he commenced a five years' missionary tour in the East, visiting Egypt, Mounts Horeb and Sinai, and Jerusalem, distributing copies of the Scriptures, and laboring alike among Jews, Mohammedans, and Pagans. In this tour he was supported mainly by Mr. Drummond; his peculiar habits not being in conformity with the rules of regular missionary organizations. In 1826 he returned to England, and married a daughter of the Earl of Orford. From 1827 to 1836 he was engaged in missionary labors in various parts of Eastern Europe, Asia, and Africa, encountering divers perils and hardships innumerable. Early in 1837, after one of his narrowest escapes, he reached Bombay, and sailed thence for New York. Here he was ordained deacon by Bishop Doane, visited the principal cities, preached before congress, and received the degree of D. D. In 1838 he proceeded to England; and having, during a visit to Dublin, received priest's orders from the Bishop of Dromore, he settled as a curate of the Church of England, in Yorkshire. In 1843, on the receipt of the news of the imprisonment of Colonel Stoddart and Captain Conolly at Bokhara, Dr. Wolff was sent by private individuals in England to attempt their release or learn their fate. He reached Bokhara too late to render them help, and only escaped their fate through the intervention of the Persian ambassador. On his return to England he was presented to a rural vicarage, where he labored till his death, in 1862. Dr. Wolff's published works are, "Journal of Missionary Labors," "Mission to Bokhara," "Missionary Labors and Researches," and "Travels and Adventures."

WOODBIDGE, WILLIAM, who was prominent among the public men of Michigan, b. in Connecticut, 1780; d. in Detroit, 1861. He served Michigan in congress, on the bench of the supreme court, and as governor. His career at Washington was one of usefulness. Daniel Webster, in a note to his speech in defence of the Ashburton treaty, attributed to Mr. Woodbridge the first suggestion that was ever made to him for inserting in that treaty a provision for the surrender of fugitives under certain circumstances, upon the demand of foreign governments.

WOODS, LEONARD, D. D., Emeritus professor of theology in the Andover theological seminary, and the author of a course of theology in five volumes. B. 1773; d. 1854.

WORONZOFF, PRINCE MICHAEL, served in the Russian army in several campaigns against Napoleon. He represented Russia at the conference at Aix-la-Chapelle. In 1823 he was appointed governor of New Russia, which office he held until the commencement of the Crimean war. In 1845 he commanded an expedition against the Circassians. B. 1782; d. 1856.

WORTLEY, LADY EMMELINE CHARLOTTE ELIZABETH, b. 1806; d. 1855. She published "Travels in the United States during 1849-50," a "Visit to Portugal and Madeira," and more than one volume of poetry.

WRIGHT, FANNY, once celebrated as a deistical and political agitator, was b. at Dundee, 1796. Her first work, "A Few Days in Athens," appeared in 1818, and attracted some attention. She visited the United States, and in 1821 published in London her "Views on Society and Manners in America." In 1825 she returned to this country, and in 1833 made her advent as a public lecturer, in which capacity she wielded considerable influence. For a time she was associated with Robert Owen, at New Harmony, Ind., and edited the "Gazette" published there. She contracted an unhappy marriage with M. Darusmont. D. at Cincinnati, 1853. — GEORGE, brigadier-general United States volunteers, b. at Norwich, Vt., 1803, graduated at West Point in 1822, and entered the army as second lieutenant in the third infantry. He served in the Florida and Mexican wars; distinguishing himself at Contreras, Churubusco, and Molino del Rey. His gallantry secured for him steady promotion, until in 1855 he filled the colonelcy of the ninth infantry. During the two following years he added to his reputation by services against the Indians in Oregon and Washington territories. In Sept., 1861, he was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers, and subsequently held the positions of commander of the district of Oregon and commanding general of the department of the Pacific. After the close of the rebellion he was appointed to the military command of the new department of the Columbia; and while on his way to Washington territory was drowned on the steamship "Brother Jonathan," off the coast of southern Oregon, July 30, 1865.

WULF, CHRISTIAN, Captain of the Danish navy, was the son of Admiral Wulf, for many years at the head of the naval academy in Copenhagen, and known as a translator of Shakspeare. Captain Wulf early joined the navy, and gained distinction for his military services. Inheriting the literary taste and scholarship of his father, and entertaining an interest and sympathy for the history and institutions of the United States, he published a translation of Bancroft's "History of the United States" into the Danish language. He was at the time of his death making the tour of the United States. B. 1810; d. in Beaufort, N. C., 1856.

WURTEMBERG, FREDERICK CHAS., king of, b. 1781, succeeded his father, Frederick I., in 1816. In the same year he married Catherine Paulowna, daughter of Paul, late Emperor of Russia, and after her death, Pauline Theresa Louisa, his cousin, daughter of Louis Frederick, Duke of Wurtemberg. He d. 1864, his long reign having been quiet and uneventful.

WYATT, MATTHEW COTES, an English sculptor, b. 1778; d. 1862. He achieved his highest reputation by his equestrian statues, among which are those of the Duke of York and Wellington in London.

WYON, WILLIAM, a medal engraver of admirable skill, and for many years engraver in the London mint. He was b. at Birmingham, though of German descent, in 1795, and d. 1851.

WYSE, SIR JOHN, author of "Walks in Rome," and "Oriental Sketches," b. 1792; d. 1862. He represented Tipperary and subsequently the city of Waterford, in the British parliament, and was minister plenipotentiary at the court of Athens.

Y.

YANCEY, WILLIAM LOWNDES, an American orator and politician, b. in Georgia, 1814, studied law in South Carolina, and in 1837 settled in Alabama, where he edited the "Cahawba Democrat" and "Wetumpka Argus." He was a representative in congress, from Alabama, from 1844 to 1847. Before entering congress he had served in the Alabama legislature, and subsequently was a member of various political conventions, first at Baltimore in 1848, then at Cincinnati in 1856, and at Charleston in 1860, in which he bore a conspicuous part. He advocated the election of Mr. Breckinridge before the people. He was a leading member of the convention of Alabama, which met at Montgomery, Jan. 7, 1861; and reported the ordinance of secession which was passed Jan. 14. In February he proceeded to Europe as a commissioner from the confederate government, to urge its claims to recognition by foreign powers. He returned in Feb., 1862, and in a speech delivered at New Orleans discouraged every expectation of foreign aid, on the ground that the nations of Europe are irreconcilably hostile to slavery. He was elected a senator from Alabama in the confederate congress, and on arriving at Richmond was elected by the members opposed to the Davis administration as their leader. This position he declined. D. July, 1863. As an orator, Mr. Yancey was remarkably effective, although his powers were those of the rhetorician rather than of the reasoner or statesman.

YARRELL, WILLIAM, a naturalist, author of various works, among which are "Histories of British Birds and British Fishes." B. 1780; d. 1856.

YOUNG, ALEXANDER, D. D., author of "Chronicles of the Pilgrim Fathers of the Colony of Plymouth," and "Chronicles of the First Planters of the Colony of Massachusetts Bay," was pastor of the sixth Congregational church of Boston; having graduated at Harvard college in 1820. B. 1800; d. 1854. — AUGUSTUS, a geologist and naturalist, b. in Arlington, Vt., 1785; d. 1857. He wrote much on scientific subjects, and acquired a reputation as a mathematician as well as in relation to geology and mineralogy. In 1856 he was appointed state naturalist. He had previously been a politician, and served both in the state legislature and in congress.

Z.

ZOLLICOFFER, FELIX K., a brigadier-general in the confederate army, b. in Tennessee, 1812, d. Jan. 19, 1862. In 1829 he became the editor of a newspaper at Paris, Tenn. In 1834 he was editor and publisher of the "Columbian Observer," in the same state; in 1835 he was elected state printer, and reelected in 1837; in 1842 he removed to Nashville, and edited the "Banner"; in 1843 he was elected comptroller of the state treasury, and was reelected in 1845 and 1847; in 1849 was elected to the state senate; in 1851 and 1852 again edited the "Nashville Banner," and was elected a representative in congress from Tennessee in 1853, where he continued until March, 1859. He was a delegate to the peace congress in 1861, but after the battle of Bull Run entered the confederate service, and assumed command of East Tennessee. He was defeated at Camp Wild Cat, Ky., and was killed in battle near Mill Spring in that state.

ZOOK, SAMUEL KOSCIUSZKO, United States brigadier-general, b. in Pennsylvania, 1823, killed at Gettysburg, 1863. He acted as colonel of the 57th New York state volunteers in the bloody campaign of the Peninsula, receiving his commission as brigadier-general in Nov., 1862. At Chancellorsville and Gettysburg he greatly distinguished himself.

ZWIRNER, ERNST FRIEDRICH, a German architect, who in 1833 undertook the completion of the cathedral of Cologne, and labored persistently until 1860, when he gave the finishing touches to a structure which is one of the finest efforts at a reproduction of the Gothic architecture of the middle ages. B. in Silesia, 1802; d. at Cologne, 1861.
