When all good citizens generally agree that the only way to insure the success of our institutions is to consult the different wishes and interests of all. of the sword of fustice and of the great day of expiation expected by the coun try. Every one understand the meaning of those words, which, when they are uttered by a victorious party announce nothing less than the rule of the opposite party; the general alarm which they produce, and the spirit of reaction which they inspire to those who suffer themselves to be led, precludes any end to our evils, and are a great impediment to the reestablishment of peace. No one will live peaceably, if he thinks he is to be sacrificed on the great day of expiation. It would be in vain for the wisest laws to ensure to every one the free enjoyment of his rights: those idle promises in times of revolutions, are not more apt to quieten the public, than the sight of the most delicious dishes could satisfy the appetite of that guest who, at the table of Dennis, cons Signed Stackez, Aguire, G. de la Mora, tantly saw a sword suspended over his head. Far be it from us to ask that pub-Saldra a la mayor brevadad la goleta lic disorders should be tolerated, but when justice is spoken of, we should wish that word not to be profaned so as party who have only the same rights as the one they pretend to judge with such partiality.

The only justice which always had happy results in times of civil divisions (we speak only of political crimes) is that which apply equally to all without being oppressive to any one, And which is the tribunal that is to decide? There is the great difficulty; for it would be out of the hands of another, by the same means which this latter one had employed to obtain it. We believe then that instead of expiations and bloody swords, which can never serve any good purpose so long as others can be raised in opposition, it would be nesessary to reestablish peace and tranquillity throughout the republic; to make
