It is added by Mr. Robert-Margill, That the remedies applied to a disease, must be thought both by the physician, and the patient or sick man, meekest and most fitting for the curing of the disease. But so it is, that the pannel and supplicants were sick of a disease; and therefore they in curing by the remedies as were thought fittest and most helpful by them, contained in the application, must be thought therein to have had a good mind, and that they thought and used the remedies according to the nature of the disease, as being most fit. Their disease was fear of displeasure from his majesty; for we must not think according to the Stoicks, That only 'vires animi quas phantasias philosophi appellat, quibus mens hominis prima statim specie rei ad animum accedentis pellitur, non voluntatis sint, neque arbitrii;' but that also 'assentiri et co-opinari incidunt in virum sapientem.' But so it is, that this disease was filial, erga patrem patrie. And like bairnes who are dung (i. e. children that are beat) go back again to their father, so the pannel and other supplicants having by chance looked upon the piece quarrelled, did think it a very good remedy to appease his most sacred majesty, their father. As it is reported of the spear of Achilles, that he who wounded them with fear, might cure the same wound, in shewing that they might have represented grievances, which are diseases, to the only physician. And in our acts of parliament, declamations are forbidden ad plebem: so it must be thought of writings also, in the conception of the pannel, 'quæ per plebem distribuuntur atque ita divulgantur' which is not in our case; ergo, &c.

It is answered by his majesty's Advocat, That all ought to be repelled, in respect of the dittay, and of the particular points of reproaches, which not so meikle (much) as by the conception or meaning of the pannel can be justified. And all which is opposed, is either against the relevancy of the dittay, which is remitted to the justice; or against the verification thereof, which is proper to the assyze. And if the justice and assessors desire a more special answer to be made to the particulars, the king's Advocat offered to clear the samem by word in hearing of parties.

the pannel, That that part of the dittay anent the pannel's alledged divulging and dispersing of the said alledged libel, is not relevant to infer the crime and punishment concluded in the said dittay; because divulging and dispersing are not contained in the acts of parliament whereupon the dittay is libelled, and so cannot be the ground and warrant thereof. Secondly, In so far as the dittay bears, that the said libel was divulged by giving the said copy to Dunmure; giving, and not granting, that divulging is warranted by the said acts, or can be sustained as a warrant against the pannel to infer the said crime and pain, that cannot be called divulging, because Dunmure's own depositions bear not, that he received the said libel from the pannel to copy or divulge, but that he took it up only to read upon very strict conditions; which being the true manner of his receipt thereof from the pannel, cannot be called properly divulging: because to divulge, properly, is to affix in loco publico, as Mr. Thomas Ross did, whom my Lord Advocat cited; who affixed his seditious pasquils, and invectives against his nation, whereof he was the confessed author, upon the public parts and places of the town and university of Oxford. Or to divulge is to tyne (drop), and cast down papers in kirks, tolbooths, or high-streets, as did Francis Tennant, likewise cited by my Lord Advocat; who left and of purpose tynt (dropt) his infamous mis-sives in the kirks. And it is universally maintained, that the delivering of a libel or writing to one only, cannot infer divulging; albeit it is not granted that the pannel delivered the said writ to Dunmure.

To that part of the said dittay bearing that the said libel was divulged by delivering thereof to the earl of Rothes; it is answered, That that was not divulging, because it is confessed in the said dittay, that it was delivered to the earl of Rothes to have been presented to his sacred majesty: and it is contended, as before, That that which is affirmed in the said dittay to be divulging, is more properly to be called revealing, as indeed it was. So that it is retorted, to free the pannel not only of divulging, but of all crime for hearing or not apprehending; because if the pannel delivered it, as the dittay bears, to have been presented to his sacred majesty, ergo, not as infamous, reproachful, or scandalous: which must be presumed by all manner of presumptions in favour of the pannel, that he did not consent to the presenting thereof to his highness, as being in his least thought or imagination scandalous, or otherwise as the dittay bears; but only to have been revealed to his sacred majesty as a piece which he and the other supplicants did think and conceive might have been graciously accepted, as others of that kind had formerly been received by his gracious majesty.

To that part of the dittay bearing the copying thereof by Mr. Robert Dalgleish, the pannel's servant; it is answered, quod non relevant to infer divulging, because the said Mr. Robert his deposition bears, that he did only deliver the copy to my lord his master, and did no farther. Neither depones he, that my lord did any farther but took the copy from him; which in no sense can be properly called divulging, for the reasons before adduced.

To that part of the said dittay bearing Mr. J. Dunmure's keeping the said copy in his hands, by the space and in manner libelled; it is answered, non relevat, because it is not, ut supra, that the pannel gave him the copy, but that he took it, as the deposition bears. And what he did thereafter without any warrant, command or allowance of the pannel, cannot be laid to the pannel's charge, but to his own; seeing the manner of his receiving and divulging thereof, is notoriously known to have been against his promise, or without the knowledge or consent of the pannel, by abusing his trust given to him by the pannel, though innocently, who was free of all his subsequent proceedings. And there being no fraud or malice in that point upon the pannel's part, who was wronged by Dunmure, though innocently; that cannot be called the pannel's divulging: for who lives, and may not be deceived and abused in that manner as he was, though innocently, on Dunmure's part?

To that part of the dittay anent Mr. John Dunmure his answer to the earl of Traquair; it is answered, That the same cannot be respected as relevant to infer divulging, because the pannel's deposition bears that he gave no warrant nor direction to Dunmure to return answer to the said earl: but that in discourse with Dunmure, the pannel answered not those words, 'That as honest men would put their faces thereto' (i. e. justify it) 'as the pannel himself'; but the pannel's answer only was 'in these words, 'That as honest men as the pannel himself knew of it:' meaning of the earl of Rothes and other supplicants, who had intended to cause make offer of the same to his royal majesty, and accordingly did make offer thereof by the said earl of Rothes.

And to that part of the said dittay, concluding that the said pannel being a nobleman of good learning and understanding, should have revealed, should have not concealed, should have apprehended the author; it is alledged, non relevat ut supra, and absolvitur ought to be granted from that conclusion, for the reasons mentioned before in the defences and duplies made for the pannel, who still contends that as he never did conceive or understand the said supplication, as the dittay enforces and bears the same upon him; so his own commentary and declaration anent his meaning and sense thereof, ought only to be received, to free and vindicate him from the crime and pains libelled. In respect whereof, the said dittay anent the point of divulging can no ways be respected as relevant, but absolvitur ought to be granted to the pannel therefrom.

It is added by Mr. Alexander Pearson to this last and fifth exception, That the point of Dittay anent divulging is not relevant, and cannot infer the pains concluded by the Dittay, because the said point of Dittay is not founded upon any act of parliament mentioned in the proposition thereof, but only upon the civil law, which the leidges cannot nor are obliged to know in all the sanctions thereof; specially seeing by divers acts of parliament, to wit, king James 1, parl. 3, cap. 48. king James 4, parl. 6, cap. 79. by the which it is statute, That all the king's leidges live and be governed under the king's laws and statutes of the realm only, and not by any laws of other countries: And therefore cannot infer the pains concluded by the Dittay.

Farder, The pannel ought to be assoilzed from that point of the Dittay of divulging, because the pannel is not nor cannot be counted formally divulger of the alledged infamous libel; he not having knowledge or opinion of the writ quarrelled, that it was infamous: but having just and probable cause to think of it otherwise, ut supra. And as credulity by the civil law defends in theft, so by the like reason it ought to defend the pannel here, anent divulging, as is confirmed in the fourth exception proponed for the pannel, which I here repeat, and which defence is most relevant by the civil law, whereupon only this point of Dittay is urged, and therefore should elide the same.

Item, Farder, The civil law does not make any to be divulger of an infamous libel, but after knowledge of the same to be infamous: which is clear by the ordinance of the law set down in Lege Unica, Codice de famosis Libellis, which commands the finder of an infamous libel presently to destroy it; which the finder cannot do, but after knowledge of the writ to be such. And 'tis also clear by the prohibition of the said law, bearing, 'si vim earum manifestaverit;' which requires divulging of an infamous libel, in the form and strength thereof. In respect whereof, the pannel ought to be assoilzed from that point of divulging.

It is added by Mr. John Nisbet, That divulging is not relevantly qualified in law, by the imparting of the alledged libel to my lord Rothes and to Mr. John Dunmure; because it was imparted to neither of them in quality of an infamous libel, but to my lord Rothes in the contrair quality of an supplication, to be presented by him to his majesty, as is acknowledged in the Dittay; and to Mr. John Dunmure as a confident of the pannel's, under promises of secrecy; which procedure and qualities of imparting are far from the nature of divulging; for the word itself implieth a public dispersion, and the express law requirith 'manifestationem publicam et dolosam publicationem;' Canone qui in alterius, Causa 5. Quest. 1. Dolosum. Canone 4. eadem Causa et eadem Quest. 'Et Libellus famosus dicitur Pasquillus, quod in urbe Roma ad truncam Pasquini cujusdam statuam affigi solet.' Harprechtus in Tractatu Criminali, § Injuria. Sectione de famoso Libello, 'Et qui libellum famosum ab alio acceptum vicissim alii, et uni tantum secreto tradidit, libelli famosi pena non est plectendus, quia ex conditione secreto facta non obscuro colligitur animus non diffamandi; et quia libellum fa-

It is added by Mr. Robert Macgill, That the divulging qualified in the Dittay is not relevant and out-setting is required: Pharm. Quæst. 105. Inspect. 11. num. 485. 487. And the reason is, ‘quod convicium dicitur quasi convolium,’ Leg. Item, apud Labionem 15. § 4. F. de Injuriis, ubi § ‘sequenti ait dici vociferationem in unum collatum:’ additis § 8. et 11 et 12. ‘Quod oportet in cætu dici, et cum vociferatione vulgare, etiam Nænio Marcello est in vulgus dare, et quasi multis audientibus ac non taciturnus dicere.’ Then ‘ei dispersionem et divisionem superaddunt, ut sit in plurium manus sparsio ab una eademque facta, et maxime si in plebem distributio fiat, unde savitque animis ignobile vulgus. Quippe ut Cicero pro Plancio, non est consilium in vulgo, non ratio, non discrienem non diligentia.’ And even in that title of the ninth book of the Cod. de Seditiosis, it is added, ‘Et his qui plebem contra rempublicam audent colligere.’ And so have I said not long since, that these private writings, and the dispersing of them, must be understood in our acts of parliament, as the declamations therein mentioned, that is, to the meanest and commonest sort; and that to ten at least, ‘quia non dicitur notorium nisi per decem saltem transeat;’ Boerius Tractatu de Seditiosis, Præmiss. 7. ‘quippe quod populus dici non posse, nisi sint decem:’ Ibidem Præmiss. 3. And remits here what I have said de Seditiosis, in the end of my second exception. But so it is, that the communicating of the piece quarrelled to Mr John Dunmure, in that mean sort as is contained in the deposition, and consequently in the Dittay, cannot be thought a divulging in manner above expressed; ergo the pannel ought to be assoilized from that part of the Dittay.

It is answered by my Lord Advocat, That the alleadgance ought to be repelled, in respect of the Dittay, which in this part anent divulging is founded upon the common law, Leg. Unica de famosis Libellis. And which common law, in the case where we have no particular law nor statute of our own, is obligatory against the leidges. And the acts of parliament cited by the defenders, That the leidges shall be ruled by the laws of the kingdom alienarily, (only) and not by the laws of other kingdoms, excludes only the particular laws of particular kingdoms; but excludes not neither the laws of God, neither the laws of nature, neither the laws of nations, nor the common law: otherwise, odious crimes against which there are no municipal laws, as Sodomia, Plagium, privati Carceres, &c. should be unpunishable. And as to the exception proposed against the relevancy, and the alleadgance of the civil law anent divulging visi; opposes the Dittay, bearing the divulging thereof to three particular persons in manner therein libelled.

It is dplyed by the pannel and his procurators, That the point of divulging being founded only upon the civil law, if it were sustained, is only relevant to infer the pain of the civil law, which is not capital, ‘Nisi non libellus famosus continet delicta capitalia in alium impropertata.’ Secus in eo impropertetur delictum non capitale, aut alia quævis culpa.’ Glossa in Leg. Unica. Codice de famoso Libello, in verb. si quis famosum. Phar. Quæst. 105. num. 11. And of the canon law, which has ever had more force with us: ‘Pœna etiam atrocissimi libelli est tantum flagellatio.’ Canone, qui in alterius Causa 5. Quæst. 1.

It is farther dplyed by Mr. Roger Morat, to that part of my Lord Advocat’s reply, bearing, That the alleadgance made against divulging ought to be repelled, in respect of the Dittay, bearing the divulging by the pannel to three several persons: it is dplyed thereto, That the said reply ought to be repelled, in respect of the said alleadgance proponed against the said member of divulging, and hail qualifications thereof, to the saids three persons; whereunto there is no answer given by my Lord Advocat. And therefore remits the said alleadgance, and hail members of it, as yet unanswered, to be considered by the judge as most relevant in itself. In respect whereof, the said alleadgance, and hail members thereof, stands relevant, notwithstanding of the reply.

It is triplyed by my Lord Advocat, That the pain by the common law is capital; and the quotation by Mr. John Nisbet is a gloss, without warrant. And albeit some respect might be had to an infamous libel against a subject, yet none in that which concerns our sovereign, tending to the disturbance of the estate and public peace.

It is quadruplyed by Mr. John Nisbet, That we oppose the glosses aforesaid acknowledged and followed by all the doctors, and founded upon the equity of retaliation; and oppose likewise the fore-said Citations out of the canon law itself, and the hail title of the canon law De Maledictis, where detractors of the pope himself are only obnoxious to the pain of flagellation.

Curia legitime affirmata, the said 17th of December, 1634, &c.

My Lord Advocat, after some speech delivered by the pannel’s procurators, verbo declared to my Lord Justice-General, That what was spoken was only a summary recapitulation of that which is at length set down by the pannel’s procurators in their defences; and offered to his lordship, if it were his lordship’s pleasure that he, as pursuer, should clear by his answer verbo; and otherwise, that my Lord Justice, with consent of his assessor, would close (put an end to) all farther writing, and declare that no more should be added, but that interlocutor may be pronounced of that which is proponed and written already. To the which my Lord Justice made answer, That there was no necessity to answer farther than is said and written already.

It was thereafter humbly craved by the pannel and his procurators, that if any thing should occur to be demanded whereupon he desired to be heard before interloquitor, that my Lord Justice would be pleased to hear him, he proposing the same, verbo in his lordship's audience.

My Lord Justice-General, with advice of his lordship's assessors, declares that all further writing in this matter shall cease before the dittay be found relevant, and referred by interloquitor to an assize; and continues interloquitor upon the exceptions proponed in this process, and answers made thereto, till Friday next, the 19th of December instant.

The said 19th of December it was continued till the next day, the 20th.

The said 20th of December, 1634, Curia legitima affirmata, &c. Pannel and Procurators as above.

My Lord Justice-General and his lordship's assessors having read and considered the Dittay, hail exceptions, replies, duplies, with all that is proponed for the pannel by his procurators in this process, and my Lord Advocat's answers made thereto; by interloquitor repel the first exception proponed by the pannel and his procurators against the relevancy of the dittay, in respect of the acts of parliament standing unrepealed. Repel the second exception in respect of the dittay, and acts of parliament whereupon the same is founded. Repel the third exception in respect of the dittay, and that there may be more authors than one; and likewise sustain these words of the dittay, 'That the Pannel' is 'Adviser, Deviser, and Consulter,' in respect they all signify one thing with art and part. And as to the qualification of the interlining, set down therein, remit the same to the assize, as proper to be cognosced by them, with the hail remanent qualifications and presumptions contained in the said dittay, to be proven to the said assize. Repel the fourth exception in respect of the dittay, and scandalous and reproachful libel mentioned therein; which my Lord Justice, with advice of his lordship's assessors, find to be of that nature, notwithstanding of any thing propounded in the contrair in the pannel's favour. As to the last exception, repel the samen, and sustain the point of the dittay aient the divulging of the infamous libel, to be tried and proven conjunctim with any one of the rest of the articles of the said dittay found relevant, as said is, to infer the punishment prescribed by the act of parliament; and declare, That if it shall be only proven per se, to be punished per panam arbitrariam. And in respect of the former interloquitor, ordain the dittay to pass to the trial of an assize. And for that effect, continues this matter to the 11th day of February next to come; and ordain the pannel to be returned to his ward within the castle of Edinburgh.

Curia legitima affirmata, the said 11th of February, 1635.

John Lord Balmerino delatced of the Crimes contained in his Dittay, contained in his preceding Process.

The Justice Deputs (being Alexander Colvil of Blair, and Mr. James Robertson, Advocat) foresaids, with advice of the Assessors, before mentioned, continues this Dyet, aient the Trial of the said John Lord Balmerino, for the crime specified in his Dittay, to the 11th of March next to come. The persons of Assize are warned, &c.

The said 11th of March, it is continued till the 18th of March, 1635. And the said 18th day, in respect of the absence of Mr. Roger Mowat, the Pannel's principal Procurator, by reason of sickness and the gout, the Justice continued the Dyet till the 20th of March thereafter, 1635.

The said 20th of March, 1635. Pannel and Procurators as before.

The names of the persons of Assize (Jury) William earl Mareschal, James earl of Murray, William earl of Dumfries, Mungo viscount of Stormond, John earl of Lauderdale, John earl of Traquair, George lord Forrester of Corstorphine, James lord Johnstoun, sir Alex. Strachan of Thornton, kn. sir Robert Grier of Lagg, sir John Charters of Amisfield, sir Alex. Nisbet of Westnisbet, kn. sir Patrick Agnew of Lochnair, kn. sir James Baille of Lochend, John Gordon of Buskie.

It is alleged by the pannel and his procurators, that the Earl Mareschal cannot be admitted upon the assize, because he has received information and particular instruction—of the pannel's guiltiness of the crimes given up in the dittay, and particular direction what to do in case he pass upon the assize; which they refer to the nobleman's own oath and declaration: who being sworn, declared that he received no such instruction or information of any person. Whereupon, being purged of partial counsel, the justice admits him upon the assize.

It is alleged against the earl of Dumfries, that he cannot be received upon the assize, because he has given out his prejudiced opinion against the pannel, affirming, before any probation led, that the pannel is guilty of the dittay; which the pannel referred to his lordship's oath, alleging that in law a declinator is only to be proven against an assizer by his oath: and farther affirms, that the said William earl of Dumfries has been solicited and dealt with by prayer to find the pannel guilty of the dittay, which being referred to the said earl his oath, he denied any such matter, that he either gave out speeches of the pannel's guiltiness, or that he was solicited or dealt with by prayer, or otherwise; the justice admits him, in respect of his declaration.

It is alleged against my lord Blantyre, that he cannot be upon his assize, because he has publickly reported to sundry, that the pannel to his judgment is guilty of the dittay, and cannot be cleared thereof; which they refer to his lordship's oath: who being sworn, declared that he could not deny that he had spoken such speeches. Whereupon he was repelled, and ordained to stand aside.

It is alledged by the pannel and his procurators against my lord Johnston, the laird of Lug, the laird of Amisfield, the laird of Thortoun, the laird of Westnisbet, that they cannot be received upon the assize, because they have all been solicited by prayer and request to find the pannel guilty; and that the lord Johnston has declared to sundry, that if he were on his assize, he could not but find him to be guilty: likewise, affirmed by Thortoun, that as the dittay is founded upon the acts of parliament, the pannel must be guilty, and none can acquit him thereof; and that Westnisbet had affirmed in public conference, by his betrayed opinion, that he would hie (convict) the pannel, and do his endeavour cause others file him of the dittay. Whereupon the forenamed persons having by their oaths denied the premisses, the justice thereupon having purged them of partial counsel, admits them upon the assize. Whereupon my Lord Advocat asked instruments. Likewise admits my lord of Traquaire, notwithstanding of the declinator proposed against him verbo, by the pannel's procurators.

My Lord Advocat, for verifying of the dittay, 1st, Repeats the acts of parliament whereupon the dittay is founded, (viz.) the 10th act of the 10th parliament of his majesty's dearest father, king James the sixth, holden at Linlithgow the 10th day of December, 1585; the other act being the 205th act of his majesty's 14th parliament, holden at Edinburgh upon the 8th day of June, 1594.

2dly, Produces his majesty's warrant or letter, direct for examination of Mr. John Dunmure, whereof the tenour follows:

"To the right reverend father in God, our right trusty and well-beloved counsellor; To our right trusty and right well-beloved cousins and counsellors; To the reverend fathers in God, our trusty and well-beloved counsellors; and to our trusty and well-beloved counsellor, the Archbishop of St. Andrews, Primate and Metropolitan of all Scotland; the Earl of Mortoun our Thesaurer, the Earl of Traquair our Deputy-Thesaurer, the Bishops of Edinburgh and Ross; and to sir John Hay of Baro, our Clerk-Register of our said kingdom."

"C. R.; Right reverend and reverend fathers in God, our trusty and well-beloved counsellors, right trusty and right well-beloved cousins and counsellors, and trusty and well-beloved counsellors; we greet you well. Having seen the copy of a Petition, which hath been in the hands of Mr. Peter Hay of Naughtoun: And he being required by us to declare from whom he had the said Petition, hath done the same by naming one Dunmure, dwelling in Dundee, a notary there: It is our pleasure, that you call them before you; and having received the said

Mr. Peter Hay his information, and examined the said Dunmure concerning the author of that petition, and who may be any wise necessary unto it, you inform yourself so far as you can in all things concerning it, and certify us what ye find thereabout, that we may cause take such further order with these that shall be found to have had hand therein, as we shall think fitting. And for your so doing, these presents shall be your sufficient warrant. From our court at New-Mercat, the 3d of March 1634."

Item, Produces Mr. John Dunmure's two Depositions, made the 15th of March 1634, and the 7th June after, whereof the tenour follows:

"I Mr. John Dunmure confess and declare, That the copy of the petition, remonstrat to the king's most sacred majesty, to have been delivered by me to Mr. Peter Hay of Naughtoun, was intrusted by me to him upon his faith and promise never to have been imparted or divulged to any other, and that he should redeliver to me the same, after the reading and consideration thereof: And that I extracted the said copy with my own hand against the direction, and by (without) the knowledge of him from whom I had the first copy and warrant thereof. So help me God. And this for amplification of my confession of the said matter, made in presence of the lords commissioners, receivers thereof, the 14th of March instant, by thir presents written and subscribed with my hand at Edinburgh the 15th of March 1634. Sic subscrib. JOAN. DUNMURE."

At Edinburgh, 7 June, 1634. Sederunt, St. Andrews, the earl of Roxburgh, Traquair, Brochin, Clerk-Register, Advocat.

The which day Mr. John Dunmure, being deeply sworn upon his knees, ratified, and approved his former deposition of the date the 15th of March, 1634; and declares, That at the time he received his said supplication of my lord Balmerino, the said lord Balmerino desired him that he would take it, and give him his opinion thereof; and as he loved his credit, he would keep it, and shew it to no man living, but only give his own opinion there-aneut: And declares that there was nothing spoken about the copying thereof; but is persuaded, if that my lord Balmerino had known that he would have copied it, he would never have given the same out of his hand. And depones, after the receipt thereof he abode three days in Edinburgh, and during that time copied the same, and did return the same to my lord Balmerino: but no ways told him that he copied the same. And depones, he shewed the same to no person, nor had no purpose to divulge it, but did take it home with him to Dundee, and did keep it close and secret by himself by the space of six weeks, till the laird of Naughtoun came to him in his own chamber in Dundee of purpose to ask his advice in some affairs, in respect he was his ordinary writer, as his custom was: And depones, that after some conference with the laird of Naughtoun, he took the same out of his pouch (pocket), and said to the laird, He knew that he was a man of judgment, and well-acquainted with the affairs of the kingdom; and said, Here is a paper whereof he would be glad to have his judgment, providing he would keep it secret, and return the same back again: Which the laird faithfully promised. Whereupon the deponer gave the said paper to the laird. Whereupon he began to read: And before he had ended it, he said to the deponer, Mr. John, I intreat you heartily that I may have this paper to Naughtoun, that I may read it, and consider it at leisure. To the which the deponer answered he would, providing he would keep it secret, and shew it to no man, as he had promised: which the laird of Naughtoun faithfully promised to do. And declares upon his great oath, That if he had known the laird would not have kept it secret, he would not have given it for all the world. As also depones, That within a month or five weeks after the deponent went to the laird of Naughtoun's house, as he was going through Fife, and craved the paper back with great earnestness; who answered trifle, trattle, ye need not be so curious; that there was a gentleman at his own table told him that there was three copies thereof going through Fife, and my lord Balmerino had given one thereof to Mr. William Scott, another to Mr. Alexander Henderson, and the third that the gentleman would not name. And the deponer declares, after that time he met Naughtoun divers time in Dundee, and asked the paper back, which he ever shunned. And declares, about October last Naughtoun came to the deponer's chambers in Dundee, and told him that he had given the paper to my lord St. Andrew; at which the deponer was mightily moved. Item, depones, After this first declaration he went to my lord Balmerino, who after conference with him, my lord Balmerino desired him to go to the earl of Traquair, and tell him that better men nor my lord Balmerino himself would set their faces thereto. Sic subscrib. JOAN. DUNMURE.

St. Andrews, J. Morton, Roxburgh, Traquair, Da. Episc. Brechin, J. Hay, Tho. Hope.

5thly, Produces three Depositions subscribed by the pannel and the lords of committee, one dated the 9th of June 1634; the second the 16th of June 1634; and the third the 1st of August 1634. Of the which three Depositions the tenour follows, viz.

Apud Edinb. the 9th of June 1634. Sederunt St. Andrews, Thesaurer, Roxburgh, Traquair, Brechin, Clerk-Register, Advocat.

The which day John lord Balmerino being examined upon his great oath, depones as after follows: Imprimis, depones, That the libel produced is the just copy of the libel given by him to Mr. John Dunmure, so far as he remembers. Item, Being interrogat to what use he gave him the same, and upon what occasion, depones, That Mr. John Dunmure having given to him the copy of my lord Brechin his sermon preached at his majesty's coronation, and Mr. John having seen the paper, he gave it to him to look upon, but to keep it to himself alone, and to show it to no other, as he respected his lordship's credit: And depones, That he never knew that Mr. John Dunmure had copied the same. Item, Being interrogat from whom he had the paper he gave to Mr. John Dunmure, depones, As he remembers he received the principal of the same from Mr. William Haig. Item, Being interrogat who was author and penner of the said libel, depones, That it was Mr. William Haig who gave it him, and as he thinks, was the author thereof. Item, Being interrogat to what use Mr. William Haig gave his lordship that paper, depones, That Mr. William Haig said he thought it a fit supplication to be presented to his majesty which he had made out of some collections which he had gathered upon some conferences which he had with sundry persons the time of the parliament. Item, Being interrogat what he did with the paper which he received from Mr. William Haig, depones, he received two of them from Mr. W. Haig, whereof one was to be presented to the king, if it had been thought expedient, which he delivered to my lord of Rothes; and the other he caused his man Mr. Robert Dalgleish copy; and gave Mr. Haig his own back again, which he thinks he destroyed. And the paper which he shewed Mr. John Dunmure, was it which his man wrote, as he remembers. Item, Being interrogat if Mr. William Haig had any warrant or command to draw up the said supplication, or if any lord or any of his knowledge was at the penning thereof, depones, That he had no warrant from him, nor knew of any warrant given to him, nor that any was present at the forming thereof. Item, Declares that the earl of Rothes and the deponer having read the supplication, thought it no ways fit to be presented to his majesty, but to be absolutely suppress. Item, Being interrogat if he had any of the saids copies, declares, After the receipt of Mr. John Dunmure his copy, he cast the samen in the fire; and for the other, he did diligence to seek the samen out and find it, and exhibit the samen to the lords: and declared, that he had no more concerning that purpose. Item, Being interrogat if he gave any copies of the said supplication, or shewed it to any person, depones, That he neither gave copies therco', nor shewed it to any except to the earl of Rothes and Mr. John Dunmure. Sic subs. BALMERINO.

The which day John lord of Balmerino being examined upon his oath if he knew any thing of Mr. William Haig his going out of the country, depones, That he knew nothing of his away going until Wednesday last; that a man of the lady Yeaster's told him, when he was going to Balcleugh's burial, that Mr. William Haig was gone out of the country. Item, Being inquired anent that part of Mr. John Dunmure's deposition, That after his first declaration he went to the deponer, who after conference with him desired him that he would go to the earl of Traquair, and say, 'That better men than the deponer himself will set their faces thereto:' the said lord Balmerino depones, That he never gave Mr. John Dunmure such a commission, but only told him in conference, That there were better men than the deponer himself who knew of that matter. And being inquired what these were that he meant of, depones, That it was the earl of Rothes, to whom he delivered the supplication, conform to the former deposition. Item, Being inquired whether he had interlined some lines in the said libel which was exhibited by him to the lords, and whether he did the same before he shewed it to Mr. John Dunmure, or to the earl of Rothes, depones that it was the earl of Rothes to whom he delivered the supplication, conform to his former deposition. Item, Being inquired whether he had interlined some lines in the said libel which was exhibited by him to the lords, and whether he did the same before he shewed it to Mr. John Dunmure or to the said earl of Rothes, depones, That Mr. John Dunmure never saw this interlined libel, but only the copy which was cast in the fire after the redelivery thereof: And depones, That the copy interlined lying before the lords was the copy delivered by him to the earl of Rothes, but was not interlined, while the earl of Rothes redelivery thereof to him: And depones, That never any saw it since the interlining thereof.—Sic subs. BALMERINO. St. Andrews, Morton, Roxburgh, Traquair, Da. Ep. Brechin, J. Hay, Thomas Hope.

Follows the Tenour of his lordship's third Deposition.

The which day John lord Balmerino being asked upon his great oath, if he shewed to Mr. Haig the Warrant of his appearance before the lords upon Saturday the 7th of June, depones, that after dinner Mr. Haig came to his house, and asked by what warrant he was convened before the lords; and the deponer took the warrant out of his pocket, and shewed the same: and adheres to his former deposition, anent Mr. Haig his parting, or to the purpose thereof. Item, being interrogat if he received any letters from Mr. Haig since his parting, depones, that he received at his back coming from Balcleugh's burial a letter from his lady, direct from Mr. Haig, but without either date or place, which he produced: as also received from Thomas Haliburton a letter direct from Mr. Haig, with some note concerning my lord Jedburgh's business. And sick-like depones, he received a letter from Adam Watt, which concerned some business betwixt my lord Yeaster and Mr. Haig; and in the end desired the deponer to assist sir Lewis Stewart, and other friends that he had written unto for procuring of him a remission: which letter, after the deponer had dealt with the lord Yeaster, he cancelled and burnt. And last grants he received a letter from Campbure the 27th of June, which he received from Mr. Robert Bruce; which he exhibits, and which letter bears Mr. Haig has granted that he was the penner of the said supplication, and therefore protests that the same may be delivered up and given to him. And being asked anent that part of the said letter, which bears that the earl of Rothes and such other honest men that did once approve the said supplication, if the deponer did ever allow and approve the samen; answers, that he did never allow nor approve the samen to be presented to his majesty, but thought it fit to be suppress. And in the rest adheres to his former depositions.—Sic subs. BALMERINO.

The same day, in presence foresaid, it being asked whether he did allow and approve the same himself, in the matter and substance; he declared, that he neither allowed nor allows the samen, and declares he condemns the same both in matter and form. Sic subs. BALMERINO.

6thly, Produces Mr. Robert Dagleish, servitor to the pannel, his Depositions, dated July 3, 1634, whereof the tenor follows, Apud Edinb. 8 July 1634.

The which day Mr. Robert Dagleish being sworn upon his knees, and the libel being shewn to him, denies that he knows the hand-writing or the writer: grants that my lord Balmerino being in his place of Barnetown shortly after the parliament, and being to go to Edinburgh, about four after noon delivered to the deponer a paper to be copied, which he did copy that same night, and sent it with the copy thereof to his master inclosed in a paper, the next day in the morning. And being asked if that he had copied another to himself, grants that he had made another copy which he kept to himself, which he did without the command or knowledge of his master; which copy he exhibited presently in presence of the lords. Item, being demanded if he did communicate that copy which he kept to himself to any other, depones upon his great oath, that he did neither show nor give the copy thereof to any other: but grants, while he was copying the same in Barnetown, Mr. William Colvill minister of the parish came in and read the same, but got no copy thereof. And also depones, That since the beginning of the trial about Pasch (Easter last, the lady Balmerino asked of the deponer if he had kept a copy of the foresaid libel to himself, and desired a sight thereof; and when she heard the same read, she said that he was a fool in keeping, and had bin cast it in the fire.—Sic subc. MR. ROBERT DALGLEISH.

Sederunt, St. Andrews, Roxburgh, Stirling, Traquair, Rosse, Clerk of Register, Advocat.

The whilk day Mark Cass, writer, being examined upon his great oath, depones, That about eight or ten days before Mr. Haig his going away furth of the country, he being in Mr. Haig's chamber, Mr. Haig asked him what news: to whom he answered, he had no news, but that he heard that my lord Balmerino was troubled for a petition that had been written. Likeas Mr. Haig asked him if he knew who was writer thereof, whilk he depones that he answered him he knew not, neither did he know. Thereafter Mr. William Haig told him that he was the penner thereof, and took out the paper and read it over to him, and said that Rothés and Balmerino knew the paper, because it should have been presented to the king. Item, Being asked if he knew of Mr. Haig's away going, depones, That upon Sunday the 8th of June the deponer being in Newbottle kirk at the communion, Mr. Haig sent a boy to him before the ending of the sermon in the afternoon, and desired him to come out to him; who came out and met with him in the hill of Newbottle, but spake nothing with him there. And then they went out together to the green of Newbottle, where he told the deponer that he was to go to the South Country, and that he had received for his comprizing of Maxwellheugh, disposed by him to the earl of Roxburgh, the sum of 20,000 marks, which he had paid to Mr. John Sharp and others; and that there rested yet 8,400 and some odd marks. And that he had taken the deponer his name to the bond thereof to his own use, and that he would trust him with it till his return; and then delivered to him the bond thereof, and said to him that he would return shortly. Item, Depones, that he received a letter from Mr. William Haig from Yarmouth, in which there was inclosed a letter direct from Mr. William Haig to Thomas Haliburton, which he sent to the said Thomas: And the contents of the letter to himself was; that he desired the deponer to assist his nephew, the said Thomas Haliburton, to get a trunk carried to Holland by the address of Mr. Robert Bruce; and that he should make the said Thomas forpear to do it, if I should find by sir Lewis Stewart the appearance of the quitting of this service. And depones, That he shewed this letter to Thomas Haliburton, who was then present in Edinburgh, and declared to the said Thomas, that he would not speak the said sir Lewis Stewart in such a business; and rave (tore) out so much of the letter as concerned sir Lewis Stewart, and desired the said Thomas that he would take it to him, because sir Lewis knew Mr. Haig his hand-writing: which the said Thomas refused, and said that sir Lewis would believe him but (i. e. without) the letter: And immediately after he read the said letter in presence of the said Thomas. Item, Remembers that the letter did bear that he was presently going abroad. Item, Remembers that he received from Mr. William Haig since his parting in all three letters, whereof the said letter was one, and the other two which he exhibited to the lords.—Sic subs. MARK CASS with my hand.

At Edinb. the 31st of July, 1634. Sederunt, St. Andrews, Thesaurer, Roxburgh, Traquair, Edinburgh, Rosse, Clerk-Register, Advocat.

The foresaid deponent depones, That the 20,000 marks paid to Mr. William Haig upon the Saturday, was employed as after follows, viz. 8,400 marks to Mr. John Sharp; then rested 11,600 marks, whereof there was lent to the earl of Lothian 7,600 marks, and 4,000 marks to the lord Balmerino; wherefore (for which) the deponer received bonds which are blank in the name, in the deponer's hands. Item, The deponer produced two letters from Mr. Haig, one of the date nono Junii from Bimmerside, with a command to him to receive a packet to be delivered to my lord Balmerino; which packet to his knowledge and memory Adam Watt delivered to my lord Balmerino. Item, The other letter of the 23d of June, dated from no place, which the deponer received from Adam Watt, who had in hand a letter to my lord of Lothian, which he received: and delivered a letter to my lord Balmerino, and another to the earl of Traquair; which letters were received by Adam Watt from sir Lewis Stewart. Item, Depones upon his great oath, That he never opened the little coffer, nor trunk; but once that he opened the little coffer, and took out the keys of the trunks, but never stirred the papers, nor none others to his knowledge: but that he heard that Thomas Haliburton had looked in the coffer before, but knows not whether he took any papers out or not. Item, Declares that since Mr. William Haig his away going, there came a trunk of his home, which is in William Dick his hands, whereof he has the key; and that he never opened the same, but alienarily (only) once at the desire of Mr. Alex. Johnston advocat, who alledged he had some clothes and other gear therein, which he had put in Mr. Haig's trunk when Mr. Haig and he was at London the last vacance. And the deponer grants he received the key of the trunk from William Frier, inclosed in a letter from London written by the said William Frier, and dated before Mr. Haig's going away out of the country. Item, The deponer remembers, that Mr. Haig told him that the pamphlet was written by a man employed by the lady Limplum for that effect.—Sic subs. MARK CASS, with my hand.

8thly, Produces four letters from Mr. Haig to the pannel, dated 27 June, 1 July, 10 July, and 1 August, 1634. Of the which four letters, the tenour follows:

To the right honourable my singular good lord my lord Balmerino, These at Barnetown; to be sent to him by Mr. George Lawson, or Adam Watt, writer in Edinburgh.

My lord; now that it has pleased God to bring me safely through the seas, though slowly (in three days and three nights from Yarmouth) to this place, I begin with these to pray your lordship either to use your talent to get me home otherwise, or to give vigour to that way I wrote to your lordship from Yarmouth. I thought it fit to be taken, to get a compendious way to an end of my troubles by their means, who for private respects have given the name of a crime to that Supplication, which though I cannot deny the penning of, yet would not have brought to me any inconvenience, if it had either been used as once intended, or, after changed of purpose, kept from those base bodies that put it into the hands of such, as have been able to make hard constructions of it. And seeing for whatsoever I now suffer in my private fortune, in my weak body, or in my name, by the contrivance or knavery of Mr. John Dunmore, I may justly blame your lordship; I do here advise your lordship, by the persuasion I have of your own integrity, of your honourable mind and good-will to me-wards, and by your knowledge of the pains I have been ever willing to take for an ingenious furtherance of all that concerns my lord of Somerset amongst us; even to take pains to obtain to me a remission, for doing that which is termed a crime, and that by means of these that have termed it so; and make them sensible that it shall be more for their credit so to make an end of the business, than to drive me to such defences and apologies as the publishing of will gall them, more than the blazing of the Supplication. Withal it may please your lordship to represent to my lord of Rothes, and such other honest men, as I know did once approve that Supplication, that since a hard character is made of it by these that have wrested in the king's ire the sense of it, they should do right both to themselves, their prince, and country, by another Petition to represent that whereas they intended to have delivered to his majesty the foresaid Supplication by such as did dis-assent to that church-article, and changed purpose, because the paper could not hold all their subscriptions, and other good respects, very compatible with their most humble duties to his majesty; yet since the foresaid Supplication has come to his majesty's hands by such as have made wrong constructions of it, therefore to conclude craving humbly that his majesty would give them leave to be interpreters of their own language, and the desire of their Petition (for the reasons it containeth, which is, that no private respect, but mere affection to his majesty, did rule their whole carriage in the late parliament. But in this I submit my desire to your lordship and their judgment and pleasure. Howsoever, since I suffer for that which truly had their allowance, I think they are in honour bound to use discreet means to relieve me off this cross, at least to help my poor estate in some measure to bear out the burden of it. I suffer enough in the toil of my body, and wounds given to my name, though your lordships amongst you free me of all the charges that will be inevitable to me in this course: a little help from each honest man, that will possibly pity me, would do this business. Thus your lordship may see these lieth a heavy burden on my stomach, when it is brought so low as to beg; yet I shall rather starve than discover so much to any other than your lordship, to whom only I can lay open the silly and low thoughts that misery, and the fear of it, may bring to, my lord, your lordship's most respecting servant, Campbire, June 27, 1634. Wm. Haig.

Postscript. Whatsoever bonds are in miney to my behoof, I do not think one great thereof mine, till my lord Yeaster be satisfied; which will be easily done (upon the grounds I have sent a note of to Mark Cass), if your lordship move him to a submission (wherein Mark Cass and Thomas Haliburton shall take burden for me); but we will never end otherwise. Pray my lord of Rothes to help your lordship to induce him to a submission to any that your lordship and he can condescend upon; and tell him of his old letter to my lord of Anchrani, That he should settle with me at any man's sight I liked. But get him to a submission in writing for his good as well as mine: for if God please to call me, he will find that he shall not make so good a condition, as he may do now.

The Second Letter.

My lord; Just as I had done closing of my letters written to your lordship with others at Camphire, the conservator newly arrived here from London came to my chamber in an inn kept by his mother-in-law: and hearing I was arrived there from Scotland, was very curious to ask news. And because I could tell him nothing, at last wandering, asked me by way of question, if I heard nothing of a petition, which a number (35) said he of lords had resolved to give to the king, craving a relief of the act made in the church-business, and a discharge of any further payment and taxations. I laughed, and told him that I durst assure him there was no such matter. That cannot be, said he, for I have this from such as has best intelligence about the court; and have seen a letter, bearing under the hand of one of the Commissioners, that they had had my lord Balmerino that day before them, who had behaved himself very modestly, and was to be before them the next day, where they hoped to get good satisfaction in all they were about. Then I answered, I heard your lordship was called for by some of the council, but had not learned, nor so much as asked for what: and that the council might have many things ado with your lordship that I was ignorant of, and could not in good manners inquire. I protest, said he, that is a business in all men's mouths about court; and I wonder, said he, you have not heard of it. I have not truly, said I: And so we left that theme, and drunk together, and within a quarter ane hour after I left that town, and to one Alexander Speir, a factor in it, a packet to Mr. Robert Bruce; under whose cover there is a letter of the 27th of June to your lordship, the contents whereof I will not repeat here, but beseech your lordship to have respect unto it, as well in so far as it beseecheth your lordship to use your talent for shortening my troubles, as in the care I humbly beseech your lordship to take to induce my lord Yeaster to a submission, without which there is no hope of any conclusion with him. I will long to hear from your lordship what posture this business works itself unto, and what success I may expect in the way I am contented be taken to end my troubles, by their means that has occasioned them. Thus having nothing to say but what I have formerly written, and beseeching your lordship not to be swear (slow) in writing to me, (under cover to my lord of Auton, James Howstoun or James Wright, merchants in Amsterdam, or to Alexander Speir in Camphire, or to William Murehead by the way of London) I crave leave, and rest, my lord, your lordship's most respecting servant,

Amsterdam, July 1, 1634.

Directed to the right honourable my singular good lord, my lord Balmerino, These, at Barnetown.

The Third Letter.

My lord; I know that repetition of my desires express in my letters to your lordship from Yarmouth, Camphire, and Amsterdam, were enough to accuse me of distrust of your lordship's either memory or good-will to me-wards. Wherefore these are only to beseech your lordship to let me know what posture that business is in, which occasioned my voyage hither; and what issue I may expect by your lordship's means, and such others as I have written unto there, as well of the troubles I am now under, as of that business I prayed your lordship to manage with my lord Yeaster. I intend to fix about Delft before the 27th instant, and stick there till I hear from Scotland or England what I may expect. So your lordship may put all you write to me under cover to Mr. John Forbes, a minister (though now silenced by order from Canterbury) of the English that are about their staple in that place, Mr. Robert Bruce, or Mr. Alexander Colvill, by David Junken's means; and otherwise also will get them sent to Mr. Forbes, and he will make them find me: so will William Murehead, if your lordship please write that way too. My lord, your lordship's most respecting servant,

Croning, 10 July 1634.

The Fourth Letter.

My lord; I send here to your lordship my lord Jedburgh's discharge for the crop 1633, and his daughter Mary's receipt for 100*l*. as a protection for my lord Jedburgh, to be made use of, as your lordship has occasion. His lady was speaking to me to procure her a house near New-bottle, called Bryanckirk; which cannot be, because my lord of Lothian has lent it to his uncle sir John Murray. But I intend to speak to Mark Cass, and try if he can spare Cockpen; which being near Coal, and out of Tiviotdale way, I think were very convenient for my lord Jedburgh, since he suits some house in Lothian, to be free of the importunity of his Tiviotdale creditors, and other inconveniences his dwelling at Jedburgh makes him onnoxious unto. There is also within this packet Mr. Lewis his discharge of 600 marks to my lord Jedburgh, and a note of Mr. Lewis his writings, with an assignation to be subscribed by my lord Jedburgh, for recovery of some moneys he paid for Mr. John Home: I intended it for Mrs. Anne's help, before your lordship and I went to Tiviotdale; and when his brother captain Home was assisting his chief's process, and was likely to have adventured to pay that sum for Mr. John, if he had found him pressed (being then in Edinburgh) by some good caption. It shall be well done to make the best use of it yet that can be. I have also inclosed in this packet Mr. Cornelius Aneslie's discharge for 300 marks for the interest of his money preceding Whitunday last: I was not able to pay the principal till the 7th of June, and then he refused: I hope to do it honestly at Mertimas, before which time I hope to return armed against all inconveniences that cost or power shall be able to put upon me, by evil interpreting what was well meant. I have left to my nephew Thomas Haliburton the key of my chamber and trunks, with direction to be given to your lordship to be made use of during my absence; whereof I shall write to your lordship the reason at more length by the first occasion. I rest, My lord, your lordship's most affectionate, and respecting servant, WILLIAM HAIG.

"In the parliament holden at Edinburgh in the month of May 1617, the noblemen after named were chosen to be of the lords of the articles, viz. duke of Lennox, marquis of Hamilton, marquis of Huntley, earl of Argyle, earl of Montrous, lord Ogilvy, lord Sanquair, lord Scoone.—Sic subs. J. HAY, Cl. Regist."

"In the parliament holden at Edinburgh in the month of June 1621, the noblemen after named were chosen to be lords of the articles, viz. the earl of Angus, the earl of Mortoun, the earl of Nithsdale, the earl of Wigton, the earl of Roxburgh, the earl of Balcleugh, lord Scoone, lord Carnegie.—Sic subs. J. HAY, Cler. Regist."

After the production whereof, his majesty's Advocate affirms, that he writes now produced for verification of the dittay, the said dittay is thereby verified in the hall points thereof, referred to the assize; and in respect thereof protests, if they cleange (clear) upon so clear probation, for wilful error.

Thereafter it was alledged by the pannel, that the earl of Rothes's deposition ought to be produced and read.

To the which it is answered by my Lord Advocate, That he uses not the same as a point of his probation.

To the which it is dplyed, That it will serve (being read and produced) for clearing of the pannel's innocency; and that by interloquitor of before, the said deposition was by the justice's interloquitor produced and given up to the pannel; and therefore it is most necessary to be produced to the assize, and cognosed by them.

Thereafter my Lord Advocate, for eschewing of delays, did produce the earl of Rothes his deposition, with this protestation, That he uses not the samen as a verification of the dittay, but only for satisfying of the interloquitor given out by the justice before, and to cut off all occasion of clamour that any part of the process were withdrawn; and when the pannel shall find any all eagance or objection thereupon, he shall have a sufficient answer, of the which deposition the tenour follows.

The which day John earl of Rothes, being sworn upon his great oath, and the libel being shewn to him, grants that this is the libel that was shewn to him by or from my lord Balmerino; which he took and read till about twenty lines in the beginning, and no farther, in presence of the earl of Cassiles and the lord Yeaster, being with him in coach, going to Dalkeith: who finding it of such a strain, and having told them that his majesty had given him an express command to 'suppress all that was of that nature, the deponer and they, all in one voice, thought it should be suppressed; and the deponer did put it in his pocket. And having occasion that same day to meet his majesty at Dalkeith, and his majesty falling in conference with him anent information made to his majesty against him, he purged himself clearly to his majesty; and having received from his majesty of before strait commandment for suppressing all petitions of the nature of that which was moved in the time of the parliament, he shewed to his majesty that he had faithfully done the same ever since, and added thir words; 'Sir, there is a Petition given me 'presently to be looked upon and considered, 'which I have in my pocket, which I have 'according to your majesty's command sup- 'pre-s'd; if your majesty be pleased to look 'upon it.' Which his majesty answered, 'It 'is no matter: I have no leisure: I am 'going to the park.' And declares, that it remained in his pocket-unlooked upon by him, or any other, by the space of eight days, or thereabouts; after the which he returned the same back again, inclosed in a paper which was sealed, to my lord Balmerino, to whom before he had told his judgment of it, that it was altogether to be suppressed. And depones upon his great oath, that he neither shewed it to any, nor gave any copy thereof to any; but remembers before he sent it to my Lord Balmerino, he caused copy it by his own servant, which is yet extant, uncommunicated to any, and whereof he had no memory at all, till he heard that Mr. Peter Hay of Naughton had shewn it to others; and then he searched the same, and found it out. Item, Being interrogat if he knew the hand-writ of the libel, or who was the author or penner thereof; depones, he knows not the writer thereof, and knew not certainly who was the author and penner thereof, till he heard that Mr. William Haig was bruted (i. e. named) for the penning thereof, of whom he had ever suspicion, because he has ever been busy upon such idle and foolish toys. And being asked if he gave his advice anent the penning thereof to Mr. William Haig, or any other; depones upon his great oath, that he neither gave his advice to him, or any other, anent the penning thereof, but ever thought it fit to be suppress; and declares, that he never knew any consultation either before or after anent the same. And the said earl of Rothes promised with all diligence to send the copy which he has inclosed to the lords; and promised upon his oath and honour not to copy the same. Sic subs. ROTHEUS.

My Lord Advocate declares that he uses not the last part of Mark Cuss his deposition.

It is objected and alledged by Mr. Alex. Pearson against the probation of the dittay ad-

diced, First, To the probation of the first part thereof against the pannel, as author, consultor, &c. that the pannel's alledged interlining does not prove him to be consultor with Mr. Haig, in the penning and first drawing up thereof, because the alledged interlining is long after, yea, after the offer made thereof to his majesty, to whom no subject can be presumed to represent a supplication interlined. And deposition to that point of dittay, the pannel's the 16th of June, which bears the interlining not to have been made while after the earl of Rothes's redelivery of the writing to the pannel, which was more than six or seven months after. Oppones also the other copy of the writing quarrelled, produced by my Lord Advocat, which wants the interlining; and which evinces the interlining not to have been at the penning and forming thereof, and consequently the alledged interlining proves not the pannel's advice in the penning and first drawing up thereof.

Item, The alledged interlining proves not the pannel to be consultor anent the scandalous libel, because the said alledged interlining is not of any matter of reproach or scandal, whereupon the said libel is now challenged, or can be challenged, and so has no accession thereto as scandalous; and therefore proves not the pannel's advice anent the scandalous libel.

Item, The alledged interlining proves not that point of the dittay, because by the pannel's deposition, 16 June, never man saw it since the interlining thereof; and therefore nothing can be enforced or concluded thereupon, and is alike as if the same had never been interlined. For even an infamous libel found with a party in secret, who did suppress the same, and never manifest it to another, does not make or prove him guilty of the infamous libel.

That part of the dittay, bearing, That by letters sent by Mr. Haig to the pannel, it is affirmed by Mr. Haig, that he had the allowance of the pannel to the penning of the writ quarrelled, is no ways proven by the missive letter, nor by any of them. And where the said missives, or any of them, may seem to concern any purpose of allowance of the writing quarrelled, that is no ways of the pannel's allowance, nor can be so expounded; for the letter from Camphire, dated 27 June, directed to the pannel himself, and which speaks of their allowance in the third person, extends not to the pannel, and makes not the allowance therein mentioned (if any be) to be the pannel's allowance.

Farder, Although the said missive affirmed as the dittay bears, yet the same can no ways be respected, nor make faith against the pannel for his conviction; because Mr. Haig being guilty as author, his alledged declaration, if any be, (no ways granting the same) can be no probation at all against the pannel; because it is an undoubted maxim in law, 'Quod socius aut particeps criminis adversus alium fidem non facit.' Accomplice in a crime's declaration cannot make probation against any other whom he alledges to be guilty,

To the first part of the dittay, and probation thereof, oppones the dittay itself, which bears Mr. Haig to be author, and which makes point of dittay against the pannel for not apprehending of Mr. Haig, author thereof. Oppones also Mr. Haig's grant that he was author and penner thereof, contained in his missive letter, 27 June. Oppones also Mr. Haig his fleeing furth of the country for the same cause; and since his flight, his intreating of his friends for procuring to him a remission for it, as is reported in the pannel's depositions the 1st of August. Oppones also the pannel's oath and declaration the 9th of June, wherein he has deponed, That Mr. Haig had no warrant from him, and that he knew nothing of the forming of it. Oppones also Mark Cass his deposition, which bears Mr. Haig to have confessed to him that he was the penner thereof.

It is alledged by Mr. John Nisbet against the verification of the dittay, That the pannel's depositions cannot be used to verify the dittay, inferring capital guilt and punishment upon the pannel, because the pannel was induced to depone under promise and assurance of impunity: And in law, a confession elicited upon promise of impunity, cannot enforce capital guilt, as is abundantly astructed in the dispute. It is likewise alledged by him that Dunmure's deposition, Dalgleish's depositions, and Haig's letters cannot be used against the pannel, because they being all involved in the same acts whereupon the pannel is indicted, they cannot prove against the pannel to disburden themselves; seeing in law these with whom scandalous pieces are found are presumed to be authors, unless they condescend upon the author or deliverer of these pieces to them.

It is alledged by Mr. Alexander Pearson, That the second part of this dittay against the pannel, as guilty of hearing, concealing, not apprehending, divulging of an infamous libel, &c. is not proven, because there is nothing adduced against the pannel, to prove the pannel's knowledge of the writing quarrelled to be scandalous or seditious, without which the pannel is not, nor cannot be counted guilty of the crimes libelled. And oppones thereto the just and probable cause contained in the second exception, and remanent defences proponed for the pannel, which the pannel had moving him to think otherwise of the writing quarrelled; to wit, The writing itself in title, form, strain, beginning and ending, and in all, an humble supplication; the same being first delivered to the pannel as a supplication to be presented to his majesty. [The pannel's deposition 9 June.] Next was delivered by the pannel to the earl of Rothes of purpose to be presented to his majesty. [The pannel's deposition foresaid; and also affirmed by the dittay itself.] Last it was offered by my lord of Rothes to his majesty; as the earl of Rothes's deposition bears, 3 July: Which offer of my lord of Rothes to his majesty is acknowledged by my Lord Advocat, conform to his lordship's answer in the defences proponed for the pannel. Op-pones also the pannel's quality, life and conversation, which is in such a far distance from the crimes libelled, that it excludes all presumption and probability thereof against the pannel.

To that point of the Dittay aggravating the pannel's not apprehending Mr. Haig, by the pannel's shewing to him the warrant of his citation before the committee and thereby giving him occasion to escape; opposes the pannel's deposition of the 16th of June, which bears that the pannel knew nothing of Mr. Haig his going off the country before the third day after Mr. Haig's escape.

That part of the Dittay bearing the pannel to be guilty of divulging and dispersing of the alleged infamous libel, is not proven. 1st, The pannel his causing Mr. Robert Dalgleish his servant copy the same, proves not the pannel's dispersing thereof in public; Mr. Robert Dalgleish being the pannel's household servant, and he having copied the same infra privatos parietes, which proves not dispersing in public. 2dly, The delivery of the writ quarrelled to the earl of Rothes of purpose to be presented to his majesty, proves no ways divulging of a scandalous libel: But the delivery thereof, qualified as said is, and followed with ane real offer thereof made to his majesty, cuts away its being offered as a scandalous libel, and divulging thereof; both because of his majesty's sacred person, which is far transcendent above all presumed injuries, and also, 'quia calumnia est adversus absentem.' Farther, since in law and reason, intention of law and reason differences crimes by the purpose of the party, let the purpose of the pannel difference now this his act, which does make the same to be presentation of a supplication, and not divulging of an infamous libel. 3dly, The delivery of the writ by the pannel to Mr. Dunmure proves not divulging; and opposes thereto the pannel's deposition of the 9th of June, which bears that the pannel gave the writ to Dunmure to look upon to himself alone, and to shew it to no other, and that he never knew that Dunmure had copied the same, till Dunmure was called in question for it. Opposes likewise Mr. Dunmure's deposition, which bears in this same manner. Opposes also the law 'quod in maleficiis voluntas spectatur, non exitus;' and that the pannel's purpose is declared by his deposition foresaid.

It is answered by my Lord Advocat, That the interlining is not found relevant per se, but with the remanent circumstances; and so far as interlining is libelled, which is indefinitely, without respect of time, (whether before or after shewing of it to Dunmure) it is clearly proven by the pannel's own deposition, and by ocular inspection of the scandalous libel produced by the pannel, which is interlined with his own hand in two divers places. And for proving the pannel to be author, adviser, &c. his receiving it immediately from Haig, delivering it to the earl of Rothes, interlining of it quocumque tempore, dispersing of it to Dunmure, and giving the power of it to Dalgleish his own man, is sufficient to verify that part of the dittay. To the whilk is added Haig his confession in his letter, which in two passages thereof bears, that it was allowed by them in whose name the same was framed, of the which number the pannel was one. Where it is alleged that the not apprehending is not verified, or concealing of Haig, &c. because it is not proven that the pannel had knowledge that it was a scandalous libel; it is answered, That the pannel knew Haig to be author, which is proven by his depositions: and the justice by interloquitor has found it to be a scandalous libel, and there is no necessity to prove his knowledge. And as to divulging it is not found relevant solo, but being conjoined with any part of the Dittay; and it is proven in terminis as it is libelled by the pannel's depositions. And as to the pannel's intention, it is not a part of the dittay, the pannel being verified to have been author or deviser, not apprehender of Haig, or concealer of him, or divulger of the scandalous libel; which is clearly proven by the writs produced. And therefore alledges that the assize, notwithstanding of their objections proponed, ought to find the dittay clearly proven: otherwise, protests for wilful error and remeid of law.

It is duplyed by Mr. John Nisbet for the pannel, Whereas it is replied by my Lord Advocat, that the receipt of the piece from the author immediately after compiling of it, joined with interlineation, and the author's testimony of the pannel's approving of it, verifies the pannel's concurrence with the author in framing the piece found scandalous; we oppose the pannel's reiterated depositions, bearing that he had no accession in the framing, and gave no previous warrant to the framer, and disclaiming knowledge of the framing of it, which must elide all the presumptions adduced by my Lord Advocat; seeing it is incontraverted in law, that a qualified confession cannot be disjoined, as is clearly proven in my dispute, chiefly since the pannel has deponed so ingenuously, without any obligation in law, and upon assurance foresaid.

Whereas it is replied by my Lord Advocat, That the pannel intrusting of his man Mr. Robert Dalgleish with the piece, his imparting of it to Dunmure, and to my lord of Rothes, verifies divulging, opposes our dispute, and the authorities of the laws cited by us, requiring a public exposing, and a fraudulent intention to defame. And we oppose the condition of the pannel's delivery of it to Dunmure, that it should be illi soli; Dunmure's copying of it without the pannel's knowledge: then of the pannel's delivery of it to Dunmure, to found his opinion in judgment; all clearly verified by Dunmure's deposition.

Where it is replied by my Lord Advocat, That Haig's evasion, the pannel's knowledge that he was author of the piece now found scandalous, verifies the point of not apprehending the author; and that it is not necessary to prove the pannel's knowledge of the piece: It is duplyed, That we oppose the incontraverted practick of all countries where apprehending of parties is enjoined, and resetting is prohibit; that declarator should precede, as in authors of heretical books, forbidden to be received by the law; because every man is not able to discern those pieces, which are debated and contraverted amongst the learnedest. And we oppose the pannel's own depositions, bearing that he knew not assuredly Haig to be author thereof, but thought only he was author; and therefore not obliged to apprehend summarily and abruptly. In respect hereof the assize can no ways find the pannel guilty of the Dittay, and alledged crime specified therein.

Whilks persons of assize being received, sworn, and admitted, after accusation of the said John lord Balmerino by dittay of the crimes foresaids, mentioned and set down therein, and production, and reading judicially of the writs, and probation used and produced by his majesty's Advocat for verifying thereof, they removed all together, furth of court to the council house of Edinburgh, where first, by plurality of votes, they elected and chused the said John earl of Traquair Chancellor. Thereafter received and voted upon the hail points of the said Dittay; and being riply and at length advised therewith, and with the writs and probation used and produced by his majesty's Advocat for instructing of the same, and with the objections made by the pannel and his procurators there against, and answers made by his majesty's Advocat to the said objections, all read in their presence and audience, re-entered again in court; where they by report and judicial declaration of the said John earl of Traquair, Chancellor of the said Assize, found, pronounced, and declared the said John lord of Balmerino to be cleared and acquit of the first part of the said Dittay, wherein he is indicted as author, deviser, consuler, adviser, airt and part of the firming and penning of the infamous or scandalous libel mentioned therein: As also of not apprehending of Mr. William Haig, whom he affirms in his deposition to have been author of the said libel: And likewise to be cleared, assoilzed, and acquit of the divulging and dispersing of the said scandalous libel amongst our sovereign lord's subjects, in manner specified in the said Dittay. And last, found, pronounced, and declared the said John lord of Balmerino to be allenarly filed and convict of the hearing of the said infamous libel, concealing and not revealing of the said Mr. William Haig, affirmed by him to be the author thereof.

The Justice General upon consideration of the said John lord Balmerino his conviction by the fore-named persons of assize of the foresaid point of Dittay, anent the hearing of the infamous libel therein contained, concealing and revealing of Mr. William Haig, author and penner thereof, found and declared, by advice of his lordship's assessors, That the said John lord of Balmerino has there-through incurred the pain of death contained in the acts of parliament; suspending always the execution thereof, until the time his majesty's gracious will and pleasure be shown and declared thereanent: in whose sacred majesty the manner, time, and place of the execution of the said sentence is remitted by the justice: and the said John lord of Balmerino ordained in the mean time to be returned to ward within the castle of Edinburgh, to remain therein while his majesty's pleasure be signified.*

The King being informed hereof, was pleased to grant him a Pardou.

145. Proceedings in the Star-Chamber against Dr. JOHN BASTWICK, Mr. HENRY BURTON, and WILLIAM PRYNN,* esq. for several Libels: † 13 CHARLES I. A. D. 1637. Written by their Friends.

AN Information was exhibited in the Star-Chamber by the Attorney-General, against John Bastwick doctor in physic, Henry Burton batchelor of divinity, and William Prynn barris-

* 1 Clar. Hist. p. 73. 153. 2 Rushw. p. 380.

† Kennet, after mentioning the opinion which the judges had given on the legality of Ship Money, proceeds: "It was a less invidious opinion which the same Judges had delivered in the case of Burton and Bastwicke, who had been so fierce in their Libels against the government, that it was considered by the king's counsel how to draw them into an arraignment of High-Treason. For which purpose there was a meeting of the Judges at Serjeant's-Inn, before whom the king's counsel laboured to prove, that divers passages in the Books of the ter at law, Defendants, for writing and publishing seditious, schismatical and libellous Books against the Hierarchy. They prepared their Answers, but the counsel being backward for said authors did amount to High-Treason. But when the council withdrew, the Judges in debate among themselves, came to these resolutions. 1. 'That if there were any thing in the Books that amounted to treason, no indictment could be found good for treason, unless it was grounded upon the statute of 25 Ed. 3. either for compassing the king's death, or imagining the same, or else for levying of war. 2. That if any man seditiously, maliciously and of purpose to raise rebellion, and to incite rebellion, did take arms to reduce the course of government of the state, either fear of offending the court, they petitioned they might sign their Answers themselves, which was denied; and the 28th of April the court ordered them to put in their Answers by Monday seven-night under their counsel's hands, or else the matters of the Information to be taken pro confesso. Mr. Prynne, May 5, again petitioned them, that having been for above a week debarred access to his counsel, and his servant who should solicit for him being detained close prisoner in a messenger's hands, and it being difficult to get his counsel to repair to him during the term; he having been a barrister at law, prayed he might (according to former precedents in that court) have liberty to put in his Answer by the day prefixed, under his own hand, and not under his counsel's, who refused it out of fear and cowardice; for which he alleged these Reasons:

1. Close, Dr. Layton, and others, had been allowed this, and there is but one precedent against it; where, upon a special reason, and in case of a woman, not of a man, much less of a lawyer, it was denied.
2. Upon an ore tenus in this court, in many cases at the Council-Table, in parliament, and in the King's-Bench upon Indictments and Informations (especially in cases of felony or treason) the Defendants make their defence without counsel.
3. Counsel is allowed not of necessity but favour, as a help to the Defendants; but when they find them no help, but that they advise them to their prejudice, why may they not answer without them?
4. Every Answer, in the eye of the law, is the Defendant's, not the counsel's.
5. Shall an innocent man suffer without conviction, through the want, fear, neglect, ignorance, diversity of opinions, or treachery of counsel?
6. The law of nature teacheth every creature, man especially, to defend himself, and in the present case the Defendant's Answer resteth upon Books, matters of divinity, and other points, wherein counsel have little skill: how can they defend him in a cause they understand not?
7. At the general Day of Judgment, every man shall be allowed to make Answer for himself, much more should earthly Judges allow the same, where others will not or dare not.
8. By the judicial law among the Jews, and by the civil law among the Pagan Romans, every one might answer for themselves: Naboth, Susannah, Christ, and others, though unjustly condemned, yet were not condemned as guilty for not answering by counsel.
9. St. Paul, when he was slandered and accused by Ananias the high-priest, and Tertullus, and 'ecclesiastical or civil, and thereby to compass the king's destruction, this was treason. 3. That such Indictment was to be framed upon the said statute of 25 Ed. 3.' This Resolution being delivered by the Lord Chief Justice to the king and council, had this regular effect, that the said offenders were not indicted of High-Treason, but prosecuted in a softer manner, though afterward thought severe and arbitrary."

several times before Felix, Festus, and king Agrippa (three heathen magistrates) was suffered to speak for himself without any counsel assigned.—The Defendant therefore hopes, he being accused in this court, by the English prelates and high priests instigations, of sedition and other such like crimes, as St. Paul was, shall enjoy the same privilege and freedom before Christian Judges, as St. Paul had among Pagans; which his adversaries will not be against, unless they will be deemed more unreasonable than Ananias himself: especially the Defendant having been a barrister and counsellor at law formerly, and admitted in this court to put in Answers under his hand in other men's cases.

Upon reading this and a Petition from Dr. Bastwick to the same purpose, alledging his counsel refused to sign his Answer, the court adhered to their former order, that they should by Monday put in their Answers under counsel's hands, or else to be taken pro confesso. Prynne and Bastwick thereupon left their Answers under their own hands at the office, and tendered another draught thereof to the court.

Before this petition of Mr. Prynne, he and the two other Defendants put in a Cross-Bill under all their hands, against the archbishop of Canterbury and others of the prelates, wherein they charged them with usurping upon his majesty's prerogative royal, with Innovations, licensing popish and Arminian Books, &c. and set forth the substance of their Answers. The Bill being ingrossed and signed by them, Mr. Prynne tendered it to my Lord-Keeper, praying it might be accepted without counsel's hands, who durst not sign it: The Lord-Keeper upon reading the Cross-Bill refused to admit it, but delivered it to the king's Attorney. The Archbishop nettled thereat, demanded the Opinion of the Judges, whether they could not be punished as Libellers; who all but one answered negatively: for it was tendered in a legal way, and the king's courts are open to all men. The Archbishop then applied to the court of Star-Chamber, and informed them, That in some Books and pamphlets lately published, his grace and the other bishops are said to have usurped upon the king's prerogative, and proceeded in their courts contrary to law. He prayed the court would require the Judges to give their Opinions therein; and the court accordingly desired their Opinions in the points following:

1. Whether process may not issue out of the ecclesiastical courts in the names of the bishops? The Judges answered affirmatively.

2. Whether a Patent under the Great Seal be necessary for keeping Ecclesiastical Courts, and for citations, suspensions, excommunications and other censures? Whether citations must be in the king's name, and under his seal of arms? The like for institutions, inductions, and corrections of ecclesiastical offences? They answered, that a Patent under the Great Seal is not necessary in any of these cases; nor is it necessary that summons, citations, or other process ecclesiastical, or institutions, inductions, or corrections of ecclesiastical offences should be in the king's name, or with his stile, or under his seal, or that their seals of office have in them the king's arms, the statute of 1 Edw. 6. ch. 2. being not now in force.

3. Whether Bishops, Arch-deacons, &c. may keep any Visitation, without commission under the Great Seal? They answered they may. Which Opinion of the Judges being certified into the Star-Chamber under the hands of 11 of the 12, the court, at the prayer of the Attorney-General, ordered the said Certificate to be recorded there, and in the other courts at Westminster, the high commission and other ecclesiastical courts; and afterwards the original certificate to be delivered to the archbishop of Canterbury, to be preserved among the records of his court.

Dr. Bastwick having left his Answer at the office as aforesaid, the court taking notice that it was five skins and a half of parchment close written, and (as was alledged) contained much scandalous defamatory matter, ordered, That all the matters of the Information, wherewith he was charged, should be taken pro confesso. Dr. Bastwick notwithstanding petitioned again, that his Answer might be accepted under his own hand, but to no purpose: And Mr. Prynne in a second Petition desiring of the court not to require impossibilities of him, his counsel's hands not being at his command (for thus the most innocent man may be betrayed and condemned, through the unfaithfulness, wilfulness, fear, corruption, or default of counsel), he prayed them to deal with him as they would be dealt with themselves, were they, which God forbid, in his condition, and as they would have Christ proceed with them at the Day of Judgment. He craved only so much favour and justice as Christ found before Pilate, and Paul before Felix, Festus, and Agrippa, or as every traitor or felon enjoys in the court of justice, to answer for himself, when his counsel will not, cannot, or dare not; especially in this weighty cause highly concerning his majesty's Royal Prerogative, the safety of Religion, and the good of the whole realm. He prayed the Cross-Bill and Answers of him and the other Defendants against the prelates late dangerous encroachments, innovations, practices and oppressions, may be accepted under the defendants own hands; and the petitioner, upon granting his Petition, should ever pray for their lordships, &c.—The Court hereupon commanded Mr. Holt, one of Mr. Prynne's counsel, to repair to him in the Tower, and take instructions for his Answer: and the Lieutenant of the Tower was sent for and checked by the lords for suffering Mr. Prynne to dictate such a Petition; and one Gardener who writ it from his mouth by the Lieutenant's license, was the same evening, by a warrant from the Archbishop and others, apprehended by a pursuivant, detained about 14 days, and not released till he had given bond to appear when called.

Mr. Prynne, upon Mr. Holt's repairing to him, gave him his fees, and Instructions for drawing his Answer; and the same being agreed on and settled by Mr. Holt, and Tomlin his other counsel, Mr. Holt's clerk ingrossed it; but Holt then refused to sign it, saying he had express order to the contrary, and would not do it for 100*l.* and in the mean time Tomlin went into the country. Mr. Prynne thus deluded, requested the Lord Keeper, the Chief Judge of that court, to command Mr. Holt, who had drawn it, to sign it; but the Lord Keeper answered, he had no power to command counsel to sign an Answer. And the court, May 19, positively ordered that for their contempt in not putting in their Answers, the matters against Bastwick and Prynne should be taken pro confesso, and the Cause against them should be heard the first sitting of the next term. As for Mr. Burton's Answer, it was signed by Mr. Holt; but after it had been near three weeks in court, upon Mr. Attorney's suggestion that it was scandalous, the court referred it to the two Chief Justices Bramston and Finch. The latter reviled Holt exceedingly, and told him he deserved to have his gown pulled over his ears for drawing it: Holt replied, it was only a Confession or explanation of the charge in the Bill, and a recital of acts of parliament, and how that could be scandalous or impertinent he could not conceive. But the two Justices certified it to be all scandalous and impertinent, except the usual words in the beginning, 'The said Defendant by Protestation not confessing,' &c. and the words in the latter end, containing his plea of Not Guilty, the common avowment that he was ready to prove the matters of Answer, his Prayer of a favourable interpretation, and to be dismissed. So all the body of his Answer, containing about 40 sheets of paper, was expunged, and nothing but the head and feet remained: And by his Plea of Not Guilty to all, he was made to deny what he had confessed, and justified in his Answer: And the Examiner coming to him afterwards to the Fleet, with Interrogatories grounded on his Answer, he refused to be examined unless his Answer might be admitted as it was put in, or be permitted to put in a new one. The Court ordered the Examiner to repair to him a second time with the Interrogatories; but persisting in his refusal to be examined, for that the Answer now in court was none of his, the court ordered the matter of the Information and Interrogatories to be taken against him pro confesso; and on the 13th of June the Court ordered the cause against all the three Defendants to be heard the next day, and that in the mean time they should have liberty with their keepers to attend their counsel. This was looked upon as a short warning by some, who affirmed, that by the course of the court, a subpena ad audiendum judicium should have been served upon them 15 days at least before the day of hearing, which was not done. However Mr. Prynne made use of his liberty, and repaired to Mr. Tomlin (then newly returned) with his Answer newly drawn up and ingrossed as aforesaid, who signed it, but Mr. Holt said he durst not; then Mr. Prynne tendered it thus signed to Mr. Goode at the office, but he utterly refused to take it.

Mr. Burton in his Answer, set forth the substance of his Sermon which he preached the 5th of November in his parish church in Friday-street, touching the innovations brought into the church.

Dr. Bastwick in his Answer termed the Prelates Invaders of the king's Prerogative, Contemners of the Scriptures, advancers of Popery, superstition, idolatry, profaneness, oppression of the king's subjects, in the impious performance whereof they shewed neither wit nor honesty; Enemies of God and the king, and servants of the Devil.

Mr. Prynne's Answer was much against the Hierarchy, but in more moderate and cautious expressions.

June 14. The Lords being set in their places in the Star-Chamber, and the three Defendants brought to the bar, to receive their Sentences, the Lord Chief Justice Finch looking earnestly on Mr. Prynne, said, I had thought Mr. Prynne had no ears, but methinks he hath ears; which caused many of the lords to take the stricter view of him, and for their better satisfaction, the usher of the court was commanded to turn up his hair, and shew his ears: upon the sight whereof the lords were displeas'd they had been formerly no more cut off, and cast out some disgraceful words of him. To which Mr. Prynne replied, 'My lords, there is never a one of your honours, but would be sorry to have your ears as mine are.'

L. Keeper. In good faith he is somewhat saucy.

Mr. Prynne. I hope your honours will not be offended, pray God give you ears to hear.

L. Keeper. The business of the day is to proceed on the Prisoners at the bar.

Mr. Prynne then humbly desired of the court to give him leave to make a motion or two, which being granted, he moved, First, That their honours would be pleas'd to accept of a Cross-Bill against the Prelates, signed with their own hands, being that which stands with the justice of the court, which he humbly craves; and so tendered it.

L. Keeper. As for your Cross-Bill, it is not the business of the day; hereafter if the court shall see just cause, and that it favours not of libelling, we may accept of it: for my part I have not seen it, but have heard somewhat of it.

Mr. Prynne. I hope your honours will not refuse it, being it is on his majesty's behalf. We are his majesty's subjects, and therefore require the justice of the court.

L. Keeper. But this is not the business of the day.

Mr. Prynne. Why then, my lords, I have a second motion, which I humbly pray your honours to grant; which is, that your lordships will be pleas'd to dismiss the Prelates here now sitting, from having any voice in the censure of this cause (being generally known to be adversaries) as being no way agreeable with equity or reason, that they who are our adversaries, should be our judges. Therefore we humbly crave they may be expunged out of the court.

L. Keeper. In good faith, it is a sweet motion, is it not? Herein you are become libellous. And if you should thus libel all the lords and reverend Judges, as you do the most reverend Prelates, by this your plea, you would have none to pass Sentence upon you for your libelling, because they are parties.

Mr. Prynne. Under correction, my lord, this doth not hold, the case is not alike, for here are only one or two members of the court, who are said to be libell'd against, and your lordship yourself in your case against Norton absented yourself from the hearing, because a party, which is usually done by the lords in like cases.—But this prevailed nothing.

Mr. Prynne. Then I have a third motion, which is, that your lordships will receive my Answer to the Information signed with one counsel's hand, which as soon as I could get signed, I tendered at the office, but it was refused.

L. Keeper. Your Answer comes now too late, proceed to the business of the day. Read the Information, which was read being very large, and having these five Books thereto annexed, Dr. Bastwick's Latin 'Apology,' his Litany, Mr. Burton's book entitled, 'An Apology for an Appeal to the king's most excellent majesty, with two Sermons for God and the King,' preached on the 5th of November last: The News from Ipswich, and the Divine Tragedy, recording God's fearful Judgments against Sabbath-Breakers.—The king's counsel being five, took each of them a several Book.

Mr. Attorney began with Dr. Bastwick's Latin Apology; next unto the Attorney, serjeant Whitfield falls upon Mr. Burton's book, saying, In good faith, my lords, there is never a page in this Book, but deserves a heavier and deeper Censure than this court can put upon him.

Next followed the Archbishop, who in like manner descanted on The News from Ipswich, charging it to be full of pernicious lyes; and especially vindicating the honour of Matthew Wren, bishop of Norwich, as being a learned, pious, and reverend father of the Church.

Next followed the king's Solicitor, (Mr. Littleton) who descanted upon the Divine Tragedy; to which part of it concerning God's judgments on Sabbath-Breakers, he said, That they sat in the Seat of God, who judged these accidents which fell out upon persons suddenly struck, to be the judgments of God for Sabbath-breaking. He enlarged himself upon that passage which reflected upon his majesty's late Attorney-General, Mr. William Noy, who, (he said) was most shamefully abused by a slander laid upon him, as if God's Judgment fell upon him, for so eagerly prosecuting Mr. Prynne for his 'Histrio-mastix,' which judgment was this; that he laughing at Mr. Prynne, while he was suffering upon the pillory, was struck with an issue of blood in his privy-parts, which could never be stopt till the day of his death, which followed soon after: but the truth of this, my lords, you shall find to be as probable as the rest, for we have here three or four gentlemen of good credit and rank, to testify upon oath that he had that issue long before. And the Solicitor called out for room to be made for the gentlemen to come in, but none such appeared.

Lastly followed Mr. Herbert, who descanting upon Dr. Bastwick's Litany, concluded jointly with the rest, that it deserved a heavy censure.

L. Keeper. You hear, gentlemen, wherewith you are charged, and now lest you should say you cannot have liberty to speak for yourselves, the court gives you leave to speak what you can, with these conditions: 1. That you speak within the bounds of modesty. 2. That your Speeches be not libellous.

They all three answered, they hoped so to order their speech, as to be free from any immodest or libellous speaking.

L. Keeper. Then speak in God's name, and shew cause why the court should not proceed in censure (as taking the cause pro confesso.)

Mr. Prynne. I expected some particular Charge to be proved against me: Dr. Bastwick and Mr. Burton are charged with particular Books to the Information annexed, but none of the Books are laid to me; my sole offence, for which the Information must be taken pro confesso, is my not putting in my Answer under counsel's hand by a day prefixed; whereas I entered my appearance, and took out a copy of the Information, which being taken out, I endeavoured to draw up my Answer; but being shut up close prisoner, I was deserted of all means by which I should have done it; for I was no sooner served with the Subpœna, but I was shortly after shut up close prisoner, prohibited of pen, ink, and paper, and so disabled to draw up my Answer, or Instructions for counsel; my servant who should solicit for me was in prison, without being admitted to bail, my friends denied access, and my chamber twice searched; and after I had drawn some Instructions, and part of my Answer (having then obtained liberty of pen and ink) they were taken away by Mr. Nicolas, Clerk of the Council; your lordships refused to let me put in my Answer under my own hand, though a counsellor at law, contrary to former precedents; your lordships did at last assign me counsel, but they neglected to come to me, and when by order of the court Mr. Holt came to me in the Tower, I gave him my Fee and Instructions, and afterwards Mr. Holt and my other counsel agreed upon my Answer, caused it to be ingrossed, and promised to sign it, but Mr. Holt refused to do it then; afterwards Mr. Tomlins signed it, and it was carryed to the office, but they refused it. Here it is, I tender it upon my oath, which your lordships cannot deny with the justice of the court.

L. Keeper. We can give you a precedent, that this court hath proceeded and taken a cause pro confesso, for not putting in an Answer in six days; you have had a great deal of favour shewed you, in affording you longer time, and therefore the court is free from all calumny or aspersion for rejecting your Answer, not signed with counsel's hands.

Mr. Prynne. But one word or two, my lords, I desire your honours to hear me: I put a case in law, If an award be made that A shall together with B and C enter into a bond of 100*l.* to S, the award is void, because A hath no power to compel B and C to enter into such a bond: my case is the same. The court ordered me to put in my Answer under counsel's hands; I endeavoured it, they refused to sign it, I had no power to compel them, and desired the court to order them to sign it; but the court replied they had no power to force them; how then could I, a close prisoner, compel them, if the court could not? By this means the most innocent person in the world may be made guilty of what crimes you please. I appeal to Mr. Holt, if I have not used all my endeavours to get him to sign my Answer.

Mr. Holt. There was so long time spent ere I could do any thing after I was assigned his counsel, that it was impossible his Answer could be drawn up in so short a time as was allotted; for after long expectation, seeing he came not to me, I went to him, where I found him shut up close prisoner, so that I could not have access to him; whereupon I motioned to the Lieutenant of the Tower to have free liberty of speech with him concerning his Answer, which being granted me, I found him very willing and desirous to have it drawn up; whereupon I did move in this court for pen and paper, which was granted, the which he no sooner had gotten but he set himself to draw up Instructions, and in a short time sent me 40 sheets, and soon after I received 40 more; but I found the Answer so long, and of such a nature, that I durst not set my hand to it, for fear of giving your honours distaste.

Mr. Prynne. My lords, I did nothing but according to the directions of my counsel, only I spake my own words: my answer was drawn up by his consent, it was his own act, and he did approve of it; and if he will be so base a coward, to do that in private which he dares not acknowledge in public, I will not have such a sin lie on my conscience, let it rest with him. Here is my Answer, which though it be not signed with their hands, yet here I tender it upon my oath, which you cannot in justice deny.

L. Keeper. Your case is good law, but ill applied; the court desires no such long Answer, but whether you are Guilty or not Guilty.

Mr. Prynne. By the statutes of Phil. and Mar. and of Eliz. in the case of libelling the king or queen, the party's confession, or two witnesses face to face are required, else no conviction, and here is neither; nor is there in all the Information one clause that doth particularly fall on me, but only in general. There is no Book laid on my charge, and shall I be condemned for a particular act, when no accusation of any particular act can be brought against me? This were most unjust and wicked. Here I tender my Answer to the Information upon my oath; my lord, you do impose impossibilities upon me, I could do no more than I did.

L. Keeper. Well, hold your peace, your Answer comes too late. What say you, Dr. Bastwick?

Dr. Bastwick. My honourable lords, methinks you look like an Assembly of Gods, and sit in the place of God; Ye are called the Sons of God; and since I have compared you to gods, give me leave a little to parallel the one with the other, to see whether the comparison between God and you doth hold in this noble and righteous cause. This was the carriage of Almighty God in the cause of Sodom, before he would pronounce Sentence, or execute Judgment, he would first come down, and see whether the crime was altogether according to the cry that was come up. And with whom doth the Lord consult, when he came down? With his servant Abraham, and he gives the reason; 'for I know,' (saith he) 'that Abraham will command his children and household after him, that they shall keep the way of the Lord to do justice and judgment.' My good lords, thus stands the case between your honours and us this day: there is a great cry come up into your ears against us from the king's Attorney; why now be you pleased to descend and see if the crime be according to the cry, and consult (with God) (not the Prelates, being in the adversary part; who, as it is apparent to all the world, do proudly set themselves against the ways of God, and from whom none can expect justice or judgment) but with righteous men, that will be impartial on either side, before you proceed to censure, which censure you cannot pass on us without great injustice before you hear our Answers read. Here is my Answer, which I here tender upon my oath: My good lords, give us leave to speak in our own defence. We are not conscious to ourselves, of any thing we have done that deserves a Censure this day in this honourable court, but that we have ever laboured to maintain the honour, dignity, and prerogative royal of our sovereign lord the king; let my lord the king live for ever. Had I a thousand lives, I should think them all too little to spend for the maintenance of his majesty's royal prerogative. My good lords, can you proceed to censure before you know my cause? I dare undertake, that scarce any one of your lordships have read my Books: and can you then censure me for what you know not, and before I have made my Defence? O my noble lords! is this righteous Judgment? This were against the law of God and man, to condemn a man before you know his crime:

The Governor before whom St. Paul was carried, who was a very Heathen, would first hear his cause before he would pass any censure upon him; and doth it besem so noble and Christian assembly to condemn me before my Answer be perused, and my cause known? Men, brethren, and fathers, into what an age are we fallen? I desire your honours to lay aside your Censure for this day, to enquire into my cause, and hear my Answer read; which if you refuse to do, I here profess, I will clothe it in Roman buff, and send it abroad unto the view of all the world, to clear mine innocency, and shew your great injustice in this cause.

L. Keeper. But this is not the business of the day; why brought you not in your Answer in due time?

Dr. Bastw. My lord, a long time since I tendered it to your honour, I failed not in any one particular: and if my counsel be so base and cowardly, that they dare not sign it for fear of the Prelates, as I can make it appear, therefore have I no Answer? My lord, here is my Answer, which though my counsel out of a base spirit dare not set their hands unto, yet I tender it upon my oath.

L. Keeper. But, Mr. Doctor, you should have been brief; you tendered in too large an Answer, which, as I heard, is as libellous as your Books.

Dr. Bastw. No, my lord, it is not libellous though large; I have none to answer for me but myself, and being left to myself, I must plead my conscience in answer to every circumstance of the information.

L. Keeper. What say you, Mr. Doctor, are you Guilty, or not Guilty? answer yea, or no: you needed not to have troubled yourself so much about so large an Answer.

Dr. Bastw. I know none of your honours have read my Book; and can you with the justice of the court, condemn me before you know what is written in my Books?

L. Keeper. What say you to that was read to you even now?

Dr. Bastw. My lord, he that read it did so murder the sense of it, that had I not known what I had written, I could not tell what have made of it.

L. Keeper. What say you to the other Sentence read to you?

Dr. Bastw. That was none of mine, I will not father that which was none of my own.

L. Dorset. Did not you send that Book, as now it is, to a nobleman's house, together with a letter directed to him?

Dr. Bastw. Yea, my lord, I did so, but withal you may see in my Epistle set before the Book, I did at first disclaim what was not mine. I sent my Book over by a Dutch merchant, who it was that wrote the Addition I do not know, but my Epistle set to my Book made manifest what was mine, and what was not; and I cannot justly suffer for what was none of mine.

L. Arundel. My lord, you hear by his own Speech the cause is taken pro confesso.

L. Keeper. Yea, you say true, my lord.

Dr. Bastw. My noble lord of Arundel, I know you are a noble prince in Israel, and a great peer of this realm; there are some honourable lords in this court, that have been forced out as combatants in a single duel; it is between the Prelates and us, at this time, as between two that have appointed the field. The one being a coward goes to the magistrate, and by virtue of his authority disarms the other of his weapons, and gives him a bullrush, and then challenges him to fight. If this be not base cowardice, I know not what belongs to a soldier. This is the case between the Prelates and us, they take away our weapons (our Answers) by virtue of your authority, by which we should defend ourselves, and yet they bid us fight. My lord, doth not this savour of a base cowardly spirit? I know, my lord, there is a decree gone forth (for my Sentence was passed long since) to cut off our ears.

L. Keeper. Who shall know our Censure, before the court pass it? Do you prophesy of yourselves?

Dr. Bastw. My lord, I am able to prove it, and that from the mouth of the Prelates own servants, that in August last it was decreed, that Dr. Bastwick should lose his ears. O my noble lords! is this righteous judgment? I may say, as the Apostle once said, What, whip a Roman! I have been a soldier able to lead an army into the field, to fight valiantly for the honour of their prince: Now I am a physician, able to cure nobles, kings, princes, and emperors; and to curtailize a Roman's ears like a cur, O my honourable lords! is it not too base an act for so noble an assembly, and for so righteous and honourable a cause? The cause, my lords, is great, it concerns the glory of God, the honour of our king, whose prerogative we labour to maintain and to set up in a high manner, in which your honours liberties are engaged: And doth not such a cause deserve your lordships consideration, before you proceed to censure? Your honours may be pleased to consider, that in the last cause heard and censured in this court, between sir James Bagg and the lord Mohun, wherein your lordships took a great deal of pains, with a great deal of patience, to hear the Bills on both sides, with all the Answers and Depositions largely laid open before you; which cause when you had fully heard, some of your honours now sitting in court, said, you could not in conscience proceed to censure, till you had taken some time to recollect yourselves. If in a cause of that nature, you could spend so much time, and afterwards recollect yourselves before you would pass censure; how much more should it move your honours to take some time in a cause wherein the glory of God, the prerogative of his majesty, your honours dignity, and the Subjects Liberty is so largely engaged? My good lords, it may fall out to be any of your lordships cases to stand as delinquents at this bar, as we now do: It is not unknown to your honours, the next cause that is to succeed ours, is touching a person that sometimes hath been in greatest power in this court: And if the mutations and revolutions of persons and times be such, then I do most humbly beseech your honours to look on us, as it may befall yourselves. But if all this will not prevail with your honours to peruse my Books, and hear my Answer read, which here I tender upon the word and oath of a soldier, a gentleman, a scholar, and a physician, I will clothe them (as I said before) in Roman buff, and disperse them throughout the Christian world, that future generations may see the innocency of this cause, and your honours unjust proceedings in it; all which I will do, though it cost me my life.

L. Keeper. Mr. Doctor, I thought you would be angry.

Dr. Bastw. No, my lord, you are mistaken, I am not angry or passionate; all that I do press, is, that you would be pleased to peruse my Answer.

L. Keeper. Well, hold your peace. Mr. Burton, what say you?

Mr. Burton. My good lords, your honours (it should seem) do determine to censure us, and take our cause pro confesso, although we have laboured to give your honours satisfaction in all things. My lords, what you have to say against my Book, I confess I did write it, yet did I not any thing out of intent of Commotion, or Sedition: I delivered nothing but what my text led me to, being chosen to suit with the day, namely the 5th of November; the words were these, &c.

L. Keeper. Mr. Burton, I pray stand not naming texts of Scripture now; we do not send for you to preach, but to answer to those things that are objected against you.

Mr. Burton. My lord, I have drawn up my Answer to my great pains and charges, which Answer was signed with my counsel's hands, and received into the court, according to the rule and order thereof. And I did not think to have been called this day to a Censure, but have had a legal proceeding by way of Bill and Answer.

L. Keeper. Your Answer was impertinent.

Mr. Burton. My Answer (after it was entered into the court) was referred to the Judges, but by what means I do not know. Whether it be impertinent, and what cause your lordships had to cast it out, I know not; but after it was approved of, and received, it was cast out as an impertinent Answer.

L. Finch. The Judges did you a good turn to make it impertinent, for it was as libellous as your Book, so that your Answer deserved a censure alone.

L. Keeper. What say you, Mr. Burton, are you Guilty or not?

Mr. Burton. My lord, I desire you not only to peruse my Book here and there, but every passage of it.

L. Keeper. Mr. Burton, time is short, are you Guilty or not Guilty? What say you to that which was read? Doth it become a minister to deliver himself in such a railing and scandalous way?

Mr. Burton. In my judgment, and as I can prove it, it was neither railing nor scandalous; I conceive that a minister hath a larger liberty than always to go in a mild strain: I being the pastor of my people, whom I had in charge, and was to instruct, I supposed it was my duty to inform them of these Innovations that are crept into the Church, as likewise of the danger and ill consequence of them: as for my Answer, ye blotted out what ye would, and then the rest which made best for your own ends, you would have to stand; and now for me to tender only what will serve for your own turns, and renounce the rest, were to desert my cause, which before I will do, or desert my conscience, I will rather desert my body, and deliver it up to your lordships to do with it what you will.

L. Keeper. This is a place where you should crave mercy and favour, Mr. Burton, and not stand upon such terms as you do.

Mr. Burton. There wherein I have offended through human frailty, I crave of God and man pardon: and I pray God, that in your Sentence you may so censure us, that you may not sin against the Lord.

Thus the Prisoners desiring to speak a little more for themselves, were commanded to silence. And so the lords proceeded to Censure.

L. Cottington. I condemn these three men to lose their ears in the Palace-yard at Westminster; to be fined 5,000*l.* a man to his majesty; and to perpetual imprisonment in three remote places of the kingdom; namely, the castles of Carnarvon, Cornwall, and Lancaster.

L. Finch. I condemn Mr. Prynne to be stigmatized in the cheeks with two letters (S & L) for a Seditious Libeller. To which all the lords agreed. And so the Lord Keeper concluded the Censure.

Archbishop LAUD'S Speech.*

My lords; I shall not need to speak of the infamous course of libelling in any kind: nor

* The original of the following Letter from Bastwick to Laud, is among the MSS. in the library of Lambeth Palace, which the Archbishop of Canterbury obligingly permitted to be copied for this work, (A. D. 1809.)

† To Will. Canterburie, repentance and mercie from our Lord God.

‘ Sir; About three daies ago there came to me
‘ a messenger not unexpected, who cited me
‘ into the Star Chamber, to answer to certaine
‘ crimes which there be objected against me. It ‘ is well, neither am I afraid, neither doe I seeke ‘ priuily to eschew the danger of the Triall, only ‘ let this bountie of yours (although you be a ‘ cruel man) be granted unto us. It shall egg ‘ forward us miserable men, not only in word
‘ but in deed; but one thing there is which ‘ troubleth me much, povertie and want of ‘ money, to which your most deuouring prison ‘ hath brought mee. I beseech you therefore ‘ that you would take pittie upon mee poore man, ‘ and to grant some small parcell of moneyes of the punishment of it, which in some cases was capital by the imperial laws. As appears: (Coel. l. 9. f. 36. In Jul. c. 75.)

Nor how patiently some great men, very great indeed, have borne ‘ animo civili’ (that’s Suetonius’s word) ‘ laceratam existimationem,’ the tearing and rending of their credit and reputation, with a gentle, way, a generous mind. But of all Libels, they are most odious which pretend Religion; as if that of all things did desire to be defended by a ‘ mouth that is like an open sepulchre,’ or by a pen that is made of a sick and a loathsome quill.—There were times when Persecutions were great in the Church, even to exceed barbarity itself: did any Martyr or Confessor, in those times, libel the governours? Surely no; not one of them to my best remembrance: yet these complain of persecution without all shew of cause, and in the mean time libel and rail without all measure. So little of kin are they to those which suffer for Christ, or the least part of Christian Religion.

My lords, it is not every man’s spirit to hold up against the venom which Libellers spit. For St. Ambrose, who was a stout and worthy prelate, tells us, (In 1. Apol. David. c. 6.) not that himself, but that a far greater man than he, that is, king David, had found out (so it seems in his judgment it was no matter of ordinary ability) grande inventum, a great and mighty invention, how to swallow and put off those bitter contumelies of the tongue; and those of the pen are no whit less, and spread farther. And it was a great one indeed, and well beseeemed the greatness of David. But I think it will be far better for me to look upward, and practise it, than to look downward, and discourse upon it.

In the mean time I shall remember what an Antient under the name of St. Jerome tells me, ‘ indignum est et præposterum,’ it is unworthy in itself and preposterous in demeanour, for a man to be ashamed for doing good, because other men glory in speaking ill. And I can say it clearly and truly, as in the presence of God, I have done nothing, as a Prelate, to the

‘ out of your treasure, soe much as may suffice to paie the scribes for coppieing out
‘ of briefes and articles, for without coppies
‘ how shall the controversie be decided, and ‘ without fees the scribes hands growe faint,
‘ but yf you will not support the expences I ‘ will indeuour for this that I poore wrtche
‘ being altogether fallen to decaye may be admitted (in forma pauperis); it troubleth me ‘ very much that I should interrupt you with ‘ my petition, you being at all times employed ‘ with waitie affaires, but the necessitie of the ‘ times and of my fortunes is so urgent that I ‘ cannot comend my service unto you, without ‘ some molestacion unto your urgent occupations.

‘ How thou forest in thy pallace demandeth
‘ in limbo patrum;

JOHN BASTWICK.

utmost of what I am conscious, but with a single heart, and with a sincere intention for the good government and honour of the Church, and the maintenance of the Orthodox-Truth and Religion of Christ professed, established, and maintained in this Church of England.

For my care of this Church, the reducing of it into order, the upholding of the external worship of God in it, and the settling of it to the rules of its first Reformation, are the causes (and the sole causes, whatever are pretended) of all this malicious storm, which hath loured so black upon me, and some of my brethren. And in the mean time, they which are the only, or the chief Innovators of the Christian world, having nothing to say, accuse us of Innovation; they themselves and their complices, in the mean time, being the greatest Innovators that the Christian world hath almost ever known. I deny not but others have spread more dangerous Errors in the Church of Christ; but no men, in any age of it, have been more guilty of Innovation than they, while themselves cry out against it: 'Quis tulerit Gracchos?'

And I said well, 'Quis tulerit Gracchos?' for it is most apparent to any man that will not wink, that the intention of these men, and their abettors, was, and is, to raise a Sedition; being as great incendiaries in the state (where they get power) as they have ever been in the Church; Novatian himself hardly greater.

Our main crime is (would they all speak out as some of them do) that we are Bishops; (Burton Apol. p. 110.) were we not so, some of us might be as passable as other men. And a great trouble it is to them, that we maintain that our Calling of Bishops is Jure Divino, by divine right; of this I have said enough, and in this place, in Leighton's Case; nor will I repeat. Only this I will say, and abide by it, that the Calling of Bishops is Jure Divino, by divine right, though not all adjuncts to their calling. And this I say in as direct opposition to the Church of Rome, as to the puritan humour. And I say further: That from the apostles times, in all ages, in all places, the Church of Christ was governed by Bishops; and Lay Elders never heard of till Calvin's new-fangled device at Geneva.

Now this is made by these men, as if it were contra regem, against the king, in right or in power. But that's a mere ignorant shift; for our being Bishops Jure Divino, by divine right, takes nothing from the king's right or power over us. For though our office be from God and Christ immediately, yet may we not exercise that power, either of order or jurisdiction, but as God hath appointed us, that is, not in his majesty's, or any Christian king's kingdoms, but by and under the power of the king given us so to do.—And were this a good argument against us, as Bishops, it must needs be good against Priests and Ministers too; for themselves grant that their calling is Jure Divino, by divine right; and yet I hope they will not say, that to be priests and ministers is against the king, or any his royal prerogatives.

Next suppose our callings as Bishops, could not be made good Jure Divino, by divine right; yet Jure Ecclesiastico, by ecclesiastical right, it cannot be denied. And here in England the Bishops are confirmed, both in their power and means, by act of parliament. So that here we stand in as good case, as the present laws of the realm can make us. And so we must stand, till the laws shall be repealed by the same power that made them.

Now then, suppose we had no other string to hold by (I say suppose this, but I grant it not) yet no man can libel against our Calling (as these men do) be it in pulpit, print, or otherwise, but he libels against the king and the state, by whose laws we are established. Therefore, all these Libels, so far forth as they are against our calling, are against the king and the law, and can have no other purpose than to stir up Sedition among the people. If these men had any other intention, or if they had any Christian or charitable desire to reform any thing amiss; why did they not modestly petition his majesty about it, that in his princely wisdom he might set all things right, in a just and orderly manner? But this was neither their intention, nor way: for one clamours out of his pulpit, and all of them from the press, and in a most virulent and unchristian manner set themselves to make a heat among the people; and so by mutiny, to effect that, which by law they cannot; and by most false and unjust calumnies to defame both our callings and persons. But for my part, as I pity their rage, so I heartily pray God to forgive their malice.

No nation hath ever appeared more jealous of Religion, than the people of England have ever been. And their zeal to God's glory hath been, and at this day is a great honour to them. But this zeal of theirs, hath not been at all times and in all persons alike guided by knowledge. Now zeal, as it is of excellent use where it sees its way, it is so very dangerous company where it goes on in the dark;* and these men, knowing the disposition of the people, have laboured nothing more than to misinform their knowledge, and misguide their zeal, and so to fire that into a Sedition, in hope that they, whom they causelessly hate, might miscarry in it.

For the main scope of these Libels is, to kindle a jealousy in men's minds, that there are some great plots in hand, dangerous plots (so says Mr. Burton expressly p. 5.) to change the Orthodox Religion established in England; and to bring in I know not what, Romish Su-

* You may see it in the example of St. Paul himself, whose very zeal in the darkness of his understanding, which he then had, made him persecute Christ and his Church, Acts xxi. 3, 4. And he was very dangerous company then; for he breathed out threatenings against the disciples, Acts ix. 1. So true is that of St. Greg. Naz. Orat. 21. Zelus iracundiam acuit: all zeal puts an edge to anger itself. And that zeal needs be dangerous in the dark.

perstition in the room of it. As if the external decent Worship of God could not be upheld in this kingdom, without bringing in of Popery.

Now by this art of theirs, give me leave to tell you that the King is most desperately abused and wounded in the minds of his people; and the Prelates shamefully.

The King most desperately: for there is not a more cunning trick in the world to withdraw the people's hearts from their Sovereign, than to persuade them that he is changing true Religion and about to bring in gross Superstition upon them.

And the Prelates shamefully: for they are charged to seduce, and lay the plot, and be the instruments.

For his Majesty first. This I know, and upon this occasion take it my duty to speak: there is no prince in Christendom more sincere in his religion, nor more constant to it, than the king. And he gave such a testimony of this at his being in Spain, as I much doubt whether the best of that faction durst have done half so much as his majesty did, in the face of that kingdom. And this, you, my lord, the earl of Holland, and other persons of honour, were eye and ear witnesses of, having the happiness to attend him there. And at this day, as his majesty (by God's great blessing both on him and us) knows more, so is he more settled and more confirmed, both in the truth of the religion here established, and in resolution to maintain it.

And for the Prelates: I assure myself, they cannot be so base as to live Prelates in the Church of England, and labour to bring in the Superstitions of the Church of Rome upon themselves and it. And if any should be so foul, I do not only leave him to God's judgment, but (if these Libellers, or any other, can discover that his base and irreligious falshood) to shame also, and severe punishment from the state: and in any just way, no man's hand shall be more, or sooner against him, than mine shall be.

And for Myself: To pass by all the scandalous reproaches which they have most injuriously cast upon me, I shall say this only; 1. I know of no Plot, nor purpose of altering the Religion established. 2. I have ever been far from attempting any thing that may truly be said to tend that way in the least degree: and to these two I here offer my oath. 3. If the king had a mind to change Religion, which I know he hath not (and God forbid he should ever have), he must seek for other instruments. For basely as these men conceive of me, yet I thank God, I know my duty well both to God and the king: and I know that all the duty I owe to the king, is under God. And my great happiness it is (though not mine alone, but your lordships and all his subjects with me) that we live under a gracious and religious king, that will ever give us leave to serve God first, and him next. But were the days otherwise, I thank Christ for it, I yet know not how to serve any man against the truth of God, and hope I shall never learn it.

But to return to the business: What is their art to make the world believe a Change of Religion is endeavoured? What? why forsooth, they say, there are great Innovations brought in by the Prelates; and such as tend to the advancing of Popery. Now that the vanity and falshood of this may appear, I shall humbly desire your lordships to give me leave to recite briefly all the Innovations charged upon us, be they of less or greater moment; and as briefly to answer them. And then you shall clearly see, whether any cause hath been given of these unsavoury Libels; and wial, whether there be any shew of cause to fear a Change of Religion. And I will take these great pretended Innovations in order as I meet with them.

First, I begin with the "News from Ipswich."

Where the first Innovation is, (p. 2), 'That the last year's Fast was enjoyed to be without Sermons in London, the suburbs, and other infected places, contrary to the orders for other Fasts in former times: whereas Sermons are the only means to humble men,' &c.

To this I say, 1. That an after-age may, without offence, learn to avoid any visible inconvenience observed in the former. And there was visible inconvenience observed in men's former flocking to Sermons in infected places.—2. This was no particular act of the Prelates; but the business was debated at the Council-Table, being a matter of state, as well as of religion. And it was concluded for no Sermons in those infected places, upon this reason; that infected persons or families, known in their own parishes, might not take occasion upon those by-days to run to other churches, where they were not known, as many use to do, to hear some humorous men preach: for on the Sundays, when they better kept their own churches, the danger is not so great altogether.—Nor, 3, is that true, that Sermons are the only means to humble men. For though the preaching of God's Word, where it is performed according to his ordinance, be a great means of many good effects in the souls of men; yet no Sermons are the only means to humble men. And some of their Sermons are fitter a great deal for other operations: namely, to stir up Sedition, as you may see by Mr. Burton's; for this his printed Libel was a Sermon first, and a libel too. And it is the best part of a Fast to abstain from such Sermons.

2. The second Innovation is, (p. 3.) 'That Wednesday was appointed for the Fast-day, and that this was done with this intention, by the example of this Fast without preaching, to suppress all the Wednesday-Lectures in London.'

To this I answer, 1. That the appointing of Wednesday for the Fast-day, was no Innovation; for it was the day in the last Fast before this: and I myself remember it so, above forty years since, more than once. 2. If there had been any Innovation in it, the prelates named not the day: my Lord-Keeper, I must appeal to your lordship; the day was first named by your lordship, as the usual and fittest day: and yet I dare say, and swear too, that your lordship had no aim to bring in Popery; nor to suppress all, or any the Wednesday-Lectures in London. Besides, these men live to see the Fast ended, and no one Wednesday-Lecture suppressed.

3. The third Innovation is, (p. 3.) 'That the Prayer for seasonable weather was purged out of this last Fast-book, which was (say they) one cause of Shipwrecks and tempestuous weather.'

To this I say, 1. in the general; this Fast-book, and all that have formerly been made, have been both made and published by the command of the king, in whose sole power it is to call a Fast. And the Archbishop and Bishops to whom the ordering of the Book is committed, have power under the king to put in, or leave out, whatsoever they think fit for the present occasion; as their predecessors have ever done before them. Provided that nothing be in contrary to the doctrine or discipline of the Church of England. And this may serve in the general for all alterations, in that or any other Fast-book, or books of devotion upon any particular occasions, which may and ought to vary with several times; and we may, and do, and will justify, under his majesty's power, all such Alterations made therein.

—2. For the particular. When this last Book was set out the weather was very seasonable; and it is not the custom of the Church, nor fit in itself, to pray for seasonable weather when we have it, but when we want it. When the former Book was set out the weather was extreme ill, and the harvest in danger; now the harvest was in, and the weather good.—3. It is most inconsequent to say, that the leaving that Prayer out of the Book of Devotions, caused the Shipwrecks and the Tempests which followed. And as bold as they are with God Almighty, in saying it was the cause, sure I am, God never told them that was the cause. And if God never revealed it, they cannot come to know it: yet had the Bishops been Prophets, and foreseen these accidents, they would certainly have prayed against them.—4. Had any minister found it necessary to use this Prayer at any one time during the Fast, he might with ease, and without danger, have supplied that want, by using that prayer to the same purpose which is in the ordinary Liturgy.—5. I humbly desire your lordships to weigh well the consequence of this great and dangerous Innovation. The Prayer for fair weather was left out of the Book for the Fast; therefore the prelates intend to bring in popery. An excellent consequence, were there any shew of reason in it. 4. The fourth Innovation is, (p. 3.) 'That there is one very useful Collect left out, and a clause omitted in another.'

To this I answer, 1. as before: It was lawful for us to alter what we thought fit. And 2. Since that Collect made mention of preaching, and the Act of State forbids Sermons on the Fast-days in infected places; we thought it fit, in pursuance of that order, to leave out that collect. And 3. For the branch in the other, which is the first collect; though God did deliver our forefathers out of Romish Superstition, yet (God be blessed for it) we were never in. And therefore that Clause being unfittingly expressed, we thought fit to pass it over.

5. The fifth Innovation is, (p. 3.) 'That in the sixth Order for the Fast, there is a Passage left out concerning the Abuse of Fasting in relation to merit.'

To this I answer, That he to whom the ordering of that Book to the press was committed, did therefore leave it out, because in this age and kingdom there is little opinion of meriting by Fasting. Nay, on the contrary, the contempt and scorn of all Fasting (save what humourous men call for of themselves) is so rank, that it would grieve any Christian man to see the necessary orders of the Church concerning fasting, both in Lent, and at other set times, so vilified as they are.

6. The sixth Innovation is, (p. 3.) 'That the lady Elizabeth and her princely children are dashed' (that is their phrase) 'out of the new collect, whereas they were in the Collect of the former Book.'

For this, 1. The author of the News knows full well that they are left out of the Collect in the latter editions of the Common Prayer-book, as well as in the Book for the Fast. And this was done according to the course of the Church, which ordinarily names none in the Prayer, but the right line descending. Yet this was not done till the king himself commanded it; as I have to shew under his majesty's hand.—2. I beseech your lordships to consider what must be the consequence here: the queen of Bohemia and her children are left out of the Collect, therefore the Prelates intend to bring in Popery; for that (you know) they say is the end of all these Innovations. Now if this be the end and the consequence, truly the Libellers have done very dutifully to the king, to poison his people with this conceit, that the lady Elizabeth and her children would keep Popery out of this kingdom, but the king and his children will not. And many as good offices as these have they done the king quite thorow these Libels, and quite thorow his kingdoms. For my part, I honour the queen of Bohemia, and her line, as much as any man whatsoever, and shall be as ready to serve them; but I know not how to depart from my allegiance; as I doubt these men have done.

7. The seventh Innovation is, (p. 3.) 'That these Words (who art the father of thine elect and of their seed) are changed in the preface of that collect, which is for the prince and the king's children.' And with a most spiteful inference, that 'this was done by the prelates to exclude the king's children out of the number of God's Elect.' And they call it 'an intolerable impiety, and horrid treason.'

To this I answer, 1. That this Alteration was made in my predecessor's time before I had any authority to meddle with these things, farther than I was called upon by him. 2. This is not therefore to lay any aspersion upon my predecessor, for he did in that but his duty; for his majesty acknowledges it was done by his special direction, as having no children to pray for. And 3d, this Collect could not be very old, for it had no being in the Common-Prayer-book all queen Elizabeth's time, she having no issue.—The truth is, it was made at the coming in of king James; and must of necessity be changed over and over again, pro ratione temporum, as times and persons vary. And this is the 'intolerable Impiety and horrid Treason' they charge upon us.

In this method the Innovations are set down in the 'News' from Ipswich. But then in Mr. Burton's 'News from Friday-street' (called his 'Apology') they are in another order, and more are added. Therefore with your lordship's leave I will not repeat any of these, but go on to the rest, which Mr. Burton adds.

8. The eighth Innovation is, That in the Epistle the Sunday before Easter, we have put out 'In,' and made it, 'At the Name of Jesus' every knee shall bow: which alteration, he saith, is directly against the act of parliament. (Burton's Apology, p. 2.)

Here give me leave to tell you, it is 'At the Name of Jesus,' in the late learned Translation made in king James's time. About which many learned men of best note in the kingdom were employed, besides some prelates. But to this I answer: 1. 'Tis true, the Common Prayer-book was confirmed by act of parliament, and so all things contained in it, at the passing of that act. But I hope if any thing were false printed then, the parliament did not intend to pass those slips for current. 2. I am not of opinion, that if our word be put in for another, so they bear both the same sense, that there is any great matter done against the act of Parliament. 3. This can make no Innovation. For 'In the Name,' and 'At the Name of Jesus,' can make no essential difference here. And Mr. Prynne (whose darling business it hath long been to cry down the honour due to the Son of God, at the mentioning of his saving name Jesus) knows the Grammar rule well, 'In a place, or at a place,' &c. 4. If there were any error in the change of 'In' into 'At,' I do here solemnly protest to you, I know not how it came: for authority from the Prelates, the printers had none; and such a word is easily changed in such a negligent press as we have in England. Or if any altered it purposely, for ought I know, they did it to gratify the preciser sort; for therein they followed the Geneva translation, and printed at Geneva 1557, where the words are, 'At the Name of Jesus.' And that is eighty years ago; and therefore no Innovation made by us.

5. This I find in the queen's injunctions, (52.) without either word, In or At, 'Whensoever the Name of Jesus shall be in any lesson, sermon, or otherwise pronounced in the church ('tis enjoined)—that due reverence be made of all persons, young and old, with lowliness of course, and uncovering of the heads of the menkind, as thereunto doth necessarily belong, and heretofore hath been accustomed.' So here is necessity laid upon it, and custom for it, and both expressed by authority in the very beginning of the Reformation; and is therefore no innovation now.

9. The ninth Innovation is, 'That two places are changed in the Prayer set forth for the fifth of November; and ordered to be read (they say) by act of parliament. The first place is changed thus, from, root out that Babylonish and antichristian sect which say of Jerusalem, &c.' Into this form of words; 'root out that Babylonish and antichristian sect, (of them) which say, &c.' The second place went thus in the old: 'Cut off those workers of iniquity, whose Religion is Rebellion. But in the book printed 1635, 'tis thus altered: Cut off those workers of iniquity, who turn Religion into Rebellion, &c.'

To this I say, 1. 'Tis a notorious untruth, that this Book was ordered to be read by act of parliament. The act of parliament indeed is printed before it: and therein is a command for Prayers and Thanksgivings every 5th of November, but not one word or syllable for the Form of Prayer. That's left to the Church, therefore here's no innovation against that act of parliament. 2. The Alteration first mentioned, that is, 'That sect,' or 'that sect of them;' is of so small consequence, as it is not worth the speaking of. Besides, if there be any thing of moment in it, it is answered in the next. 3. Both for that and the second place, which seems of more moment; and so for the rest not only in that Book, but that other also for his majesty's coronation; his majesty expressly commanded me to make the Alterations, and see them printed. And here are both the Books with his majesty's warrant to each of them. So that herein I conceive I did not offend, unless it were that I gave not these men notice of it, or asked them leave to obey the king.

Against this there can be but two Objections, should malice itself go to work. The one is, that I moved his majesty to command the change. And the other, that now, when I saw myself challenged for it, I procured his majesty's hand for my security.

To these I answer clearly; 1. That I did not move the king, directly, or indirectly, to make this change. And 2dly, That I had his majesty's hand to the Book, not now, but then, and before ever I caused them to be printed, as now they are. And that both these are true, I here again freely offer myself to my oath. And yet 3dly, That you may see his gracious majesty used not his power only in commanding this change, but his wisdom also;

I shall adventure to give you my Reasons, such as they are, why this alteration was most fit, if not necessary.

My first Reason is, In the litany of Henry 8*, and also under Edward 6 †, there was this Clause; 'From the Tyranny of the bishop of Rome, and all his detestable enormities, from all false doctrine, &c. Good Lord deliver us.' But in the Litany in queen Elizabeth's time this Clause about the Pope was left out, and it seems of purpose, for avoiding of scandal: And yet the prelates for that were not accounted Innovators, or introducers of Popery. Now it is a far greater scandal to call their religion Rebellion, than it is to call their chief bishop tyrant. And this reason is drawn from scandal, which must ever be avoided as much as it may.

My second Reason is, That the Learned make but three religions to have been of old in the world, Paganism, Judaism, and Christianity. And now they have added a fourth, which is Turcism, and is an absurd mixture of the other three. Now if this ground of theirs be true, as it is generally received, perhaps it will be of dangerous consequence sadly to avow, that the Popish religion is rebellion. That some opinions of theirs teach rebellion, that's apparently true, the other would be thought on, to say no more. And this reason well weighed, is taken from the very foundations of religion itself.

My third Reason is, Because if you make their Religion to be Rebellion, then you make their Religion and Rebellion to be all one. And that is against the ground both of state, and the law. For when divers Romish priests and Jesuits have deservedly suffered death for Treason, is it not the constant and just profession of the state, that they never put any man to death for religion, but for rebellion and treason only? Doth not the state truly affirm, that there never was any law made against the life of a papist, quatenus a papist only? And is not all this stark false, if their very religion be rebellion? For if their religion be rebellion, it is not only false, but impossible, that the same man in the same act should suffer for his rebellion, and not for his religion.

And this king James of ever-blessed memory understood passing well, when, in his Præmonition to all Christian monarchs, (p. 336.) he saith, 'I do constantly maintain that no Papist either in my time, or in the time of the late queen, ever died for his conscience.' Therefore he did not think their very religion was rebellion. Though this Clause passed through inadvertency in his time: And this Reason is grounded both upon the practice and the justice of the law.—Which of these Reasons, or whether any other better, were in his majesty's thoughts when he commanded the Alteration of this Clause, I know not. But I took it my duty to lay it before you, that the king had not only power, but reason to command it.

10. The tenth Innovation is, (p. 3.) 'That the Prayer for the Navy is left out of the late Book for the Fast.'

To this I say, there is great reason it should. For the king had no declared enemy then, nor (God be thanked) hath he now. Nor had he then any Navy at sea; for almost all the ships were come in, before the Fast-book was set out.—But howsoever, an excellent consequence it is, if you mark it; the Prayer for the Navy was left out of the Book for the Fast, therefore by that, and such-like Innovations, the Prelates intend to bring in Popery. Indeed, if that were a piece of the prelates plots to bring in Popery from beyond sea, then they were mightily overseen that they left out the Prayer for the Navy. But else what reason or consequence is in it, I know not, unless perhaps Mr. Burton intended to befriend Dr. Bastwick, and in the Navy bring hither the Whore of Babylon to be ready for his christening, as he most profanely scoffs.—Well; I pray God the time come not upon this kingdom, in which it will be found, that no one thing hath advanced or ushered in Popery so fast, as the gross absurdities even in the Worship of God, which these men, and their like, maintain both in opinion and practice.

11. The 11th Innovation is, (p. 105.) 'The reading of the second Service at the Communion-Table, or the Altar.'

To this, 1st, I can truly say, That since my own memory, this was in use in very many places, as being most proper (for those Prayers are then read which both precede and follow the Communion) and by little and little this ancient custom was altered, and in those places first where the emissaries of this faction came to preach. And now if any in authority offer to reduce it; this ancient course of the Church is by-and-by called an Innovation. 2. With this the Rubrics of the Common Prayer-Book agree; for the first Rubric after the Communion tells us, that upon Holy-days, though there be no Communion, yet all else that's appointed at the Communion shall be read. Shall be read? That's true, but where? Why, the last Rubric before the Communion tells us, that the priest, standing at the north side of the holy table, shall say the Lord's Prayer with that which follows: So that not only the Communion, but the Prayers which accompany the Communion, which are commonly called the second Service, are to be read at the Communion-Table. Therefore if this be an innovation, it is made by the Rubric, not by the Prelates; and Mr. Burton's scoff that this 'second Service must be served in for dainties, savours too much of belly and profanation.

12. One thing sticks much in their stomachs,

* It was put into the litany of Henry 8, his time, as appears in his primer, with his Injunction before it.

† And it is in both the Service-Books of Edw. 6, both that which was printed, 1549; and in that which was after, an. 1552.

and they call it an Innovation too. And that is, 'bowing, or doing reverence at our first coming into the church, or at our nearer approach to the holy table, or the altar,' (call it whether you will) in which they will needs have it, that we worship the holy table, or God knows what. (P. 105).

To this I answer, 1st, That God forbid we should worship any thing but God himself. 2. That if to worship God when we enter into his house, or approach his Altar, be an innovation, it is a very old one. For Moses (Num. xx. 6.) did reverence at the very door of the Tabernacle; Hezekiah, and all that were present with him, when they had made an end of offering, bowed and worshipped (2 Chron. xxix. 29.); David calls the people to it with a Venite, 'O come let us worship and fall down, and kneel before the Lord our Maker (Psal. xc. 6.): And in all these places, I pray mark it, it is bodily worship.—Nor can they say, that this was Judaical worship, and now not to be imitated. For long before Judaism began, Bethel, the House of God, was a place of reverence, therefore certainly, of, and to God. (Gen. xxviii. 17, &c.)

And after Judaical worship ended, Venite, Adoremus, as far upwards as there is any track of a Liturgy, was the Introitus of the priest all the Latin church over. And in the daily Prayers of the church of England, this was retained at the Reformation; and that Psalm, in which is Venite, Adoremus, is commanded to begin the Morning Service every day. And for aught I know, the priest may as well leave out the Venite, as the Adoremus; the calling the people to their duty, as the duty itself, when they are come.

Therefore even according to the Service-book of the Church of England, the priest and the people both are called upon, for external and bodily reverence and worship of God in his church. Therefore they which do it, do not innovate. And yet the government is so moderate, God grant it be not too loose there while, that no man is constrained, no man questioned, only religiously called upon, Venite, Adoremus, 'Come, let us worship.'

For my own part; I take myself bound to worship with body, as well as in soul, whenever I come where God is worshipped. And were this kingdom such as would allow no holy table standing in its proper place, and such places some there are, yet I would worship God when I came into his house. And were the times such as should beat down Churches, and all the curious carved work thereof, with axes, and hammers, and such times have been, Psal. lxxiv. 6, yet would I worship in what place soever I came to pray, though there were not so much as a stone laid for Bethel. But this is the misery; it is superstition now-a-days for any man to come with more reverence into a church, than a tinker and his bitch come into an ale-house; the comparison is too homely, but my just indignation at the profaneness of the times makes me speak it.

And you, my honourable Lords of the Garter, in your great solemnities, you do your reverence, and to Almighty God, I doubt not, but yet it is versus altare, towards his Altar, as the greatest place of God's residence upon earth. I say the greatest, yea greater than the pulpit; for there it is 'Hoc est Corpus meum.' This is my body; but in the pulpit, it is at most but, 'Hoc est Verbum meum,' This is my word. And a greater reverence, no doubt, is due to the Body than to the Word of our Lord. And so, in relation, answerably to the throne where his body is usually present, than to the seat, whence his word useth to be proclaimed. And God hold it there as his word; for as too many men use the matter, it is 'Hoc est verbum diaboli,' This is the Word of the devil, in too many places (witness Sedition, and the like to it). And this reverence ye do when ye enter the Chapel, and when you approach nearer to offer. And this is no innovation, for you are bound to it by your Order, and that is not new.

And Idolatry it is not, to worship God towards his holy table; for if it had been idolatry, I presume queen Elizabeth and king James would not have practised it, no not in those solemnities. And being not idolatry, but true divine worship, you will, I hope, give a poor priest leave to worship God as yourselves do; for if it be God's worship, I ought to do it as well as you; and if it be idolatry, you ought not to do it more than I.

I say again, I hope a poor priest may worship God with as lowly reverence as you do, since you are bound by your order, and by your oath, according to a constitution of Henry the 5th (as appears In Libro Nigro Wudesoriensi, p. 65.) to give due honour and reverence 'domino Deo, et altari ejus, in modum virorum ecclesiasticorum;' that is, to the Lord your God, and to his altar (for there is a reverence due to that too, though such as comes far short of divine worship) and this in the manner as ecclesiastical persons both worship and do reverence.

The story which led in this Decree is this: King Henry the 5th, that noble and victorious prince, returning gloriously out of France, sat at this solemnity; and finding the Knights of the Order scarce bow to God, or but slightly, and then bow towards him and his seat, started at it (being a prince then grown as religious as he was before victorious), and after asking the reason, (for till then the knights of the order never bowed toward the king or his seat) the duke of Bedford answered, It was settled by a Chapter Act three years before. Hereupon that great king replied, No; I will none of this, till you the knights do it satis bene, well enough, and with due performance to Almighty God. And hereupon the fore-named act proceeded, that they should do this duty to Almighty God, not slightly, but 'ad modum virorum ecclesiasticorum,' as low, as well as decently as clergymen used to do it.

Now if you will turn this off, and say, it was the superstition of that age so to do; Bishop Jewel will come in to help me there. For where Harding names divers ceremonies, and particularly bowing themselves, and adoring at the Sacrament, I say, 'Adoring at the Sacrament,' not 'adoring the Sacrament:' there bishop Jewel (that learned, painful, and reverend prelate) approves all, both the Kneeling and the Bowing, and the standing up at the Gospel (which as antient as it is in the church, and common custom, is yet fondly made another of their Innovations:) And further the bishop adds, 'That they are all commendable gestures, and tokens of devotion, so long as the people understand what they mean, and apply them unto God.' (Bishop Jewel's Reply to Harding's Answer, art. 3. div. 29). Now with us the people did ever understand them fully, and apply them to God, and to none but God, till these factious spirits, and their like, to the great disservice of God and his church, went about to persuade them that they are superstitious, if not idolatrous gestures; as they make every thing else to be, where God is not served slovenly.

13. The thirteenth Innovation is, The placing of the holy Table altar-wise, at the upper end of the chancel; that is, the setting of it North and South, and placing a rail before it, to keep it from profanation, which Mr. Burton (P. 4, 6, 105,) says, is done to advance and usher in Popery.

To this I answer, that it is no Popery to set a rail to keep Profanation from that holy Table: nor is it any Innovation to place it at the upper end of the chancel as the altar stood. And this appears both by the practice and by the command and canon of the church of England. First, By the Practice of the church of England. For in the king's royal chapels, and divers cathedrals, the holy Table hath ever since the Reformation stood at the upper end of the choir, with the large or full side towards the people. And though it stood in most parish churches the other way, yet whether there be not more reason, the parish churches should be made conformable to the Cathedral and mother Churches, than the Cathedrals to them, I leave to any reasonable man to judge. And yet here is nothing done either by violence or command, to take off the indifferency of the standing of the holy Table either way, but only by laying it fairly before men, how fit it is there should be order and uniformity: I say, still reserving the indifferency of the standing.

But howsoever I would fain know, how any discreet, moderate man dares say, that the placing of the holy Table altar-wise (since they will needs call it so) is done either to advance or usher in Popery? For did queen Elizabeth banish Popery, and yet did she all along her reign, from first to last, leave the Communion-Table so standing in her own chapel royal, in St. Paul's and Westminster, and other places; and all this of purpose to advance or usher in that Popery which she had driven out? And since her death have two gracious kings kept out Popery all their times, and yet left the holy Table standing as it did in the queen's time, and all of purpose to advance or usher in Popery, which they kept out?

Or what is the matter. May the holy Table stand this way in the king's chapel or cathedrals, or bishops chapels, and not elsewhere? Surely, if it be decent and fit for God's service, it may stand so (if authority please) in any church. But if it advance or usher in any superstition and Popery, it ought to stand so in none.

Nor hath any king's chapel any prerogative (if that may be called one) above any ordinary church to disserve God in by any superstitious rites. Where, give me leave to tell you, that the king and his chapel are most jeeringly and with scorn abused, in the last leaf of Mr. Burton's mutinous Appeal; for such it is.

Secondly, This appears by the Canon or Rule of the church of England too: for it is plain in the last Injunction of the queen, That the holy Table ought to stand at the upper end of the choir, North and South, or altar-wise. For the words of the queen's Injunctions are these: 'The holy Table in every church' (mark it I pray, not in the royal chapel of cathedrals only, but in every church) 'shall be decently made and set in the place where the altar stood.' Now the Altar stood at the upper end of the choir, North and South, as appears before by the practice of the church. And there to set it otherwise, is to set it cross the place, not in the place where the altar stood: and so 'Stulti dum vitant vitia'—weak men, as these Libellers are, run into one Superstition while they would avoid another; for they run upon the Superstition of the Cross, while they seek to avoid the Superstition of the Altar. So you see here's neither Popery nor Innovation in all the practice of queen Elizabeth, or since. These words of the Injunction are so plain, as that they can admit of no shift.

And give me leave to tell you, that a very learned prelate of this Church, and one whom I think, these men will not accuse, as a man like to advance or usher in Popery, is of the same opinion: It is my lord the bishop of Salisbury. Some difference was lately rising about placing the Communion-Table in a parish church of his Diocese. The bishop carefully to prevent all disorder, sends his Injunction (May 17, 1637.) under his hand and seal to the curate and church wardens, to settle that business: In which he hath these two Passages remarkable. I have seen and read the order. The first passage is this: 'By the Injunction of queen Elizabeth' (saith he) 'and by Can. 82, under king James, the Communion Table should ordinarily be set and stand with the side to the East-wall of the chancel.' Therefore this is no Innovation, since there is Injunction and Canon for it. The other passage is this: 'It is ignorance' (saith that learned bishop) 'to think that the standing of the holy Table there relishes of Popery.' Therefore, if it do not so much as relish of Popery, it can neither advance it, nor usher it in. And therefore this is a most odious slander and scandal cast upon us.

So here is enough both for the Practise and Rule of the Church of England since the Reformation. Now before that time, both in the East and other churches of Christendom, in the East and West, ordinarily, the holy Table or Altar stood so: against this Mr. Burton says little.

But the Lincolnshire minister comes in to play the Puritan, for that. Concerning which Book (falling thus in my way) and the nameless Author of it, I shall only say these two things. The one is, That the Author prevaricates from the first word to the last in the Book; for he takes on him both for the name and for the placing of the holy Table, and the like, to prove that generally and universally, and ordinarily in the whole Catholic Church, both East and West, the holy Table did not stand at the upper end of the choir or chancel. And this he must prove, or he doth nothing.

Now when he comes to make his Proofs, they are almost all of them particular, few or none general and concludent; for he neither brings testimonies out of the general and received Rituals of the Eastern and Western Churches, nor of Fathers and Histories of the Church, which speak in general terms of all, but where they speak of particular churches only.—So that suppose the most that can be, that is, suppose his quotations be all truly alledged, and true too in the sense that the minister takes them (though in very truth, the places, most of them, are neither truly alledged, nor sensd) yet they are but Exceptions of, and Exemptions from, the general practice. And you know both in law and reason, 'Exceptio firmat regulam in non exceptis.' So that upon the sudden I am not able to resolve, whether this minister hath done more wrong to himself or his readers, for he hath abused both.

The other is, That in the Judgment of very many learned men, which have perused this Book, the Author is clearly conceived to want a great deal of that learning to which he pretends; or else to have written this Book wholly, and resolutely against both his science and his conscience. And for my own part, I am fully of opinion, this Book was thrust now to the press, both to countenance these Libellers, and, as much as in him lay, to fire both church and state. And though I wonder not at the minister, yet I should wonder at the bishop of the diocese (a man of learning and experience,) that he should give testimony to such a business, and in such times as these.

And once more, before I leave the holy Table, name, and thing; give me leave to put you in mind, that there is no danger at all in the altar, name, or thing. For at the beginning of the Reformation, though there were a law for the taking down of the altars, and setting up of holy Tables in the room of them; yet in some places the altars were not suddenly removed. And what says the queen in her Injunction to this? Why, she says, 'That there ' seems no matter of great moment in this, ' saving for uniformity, and the better imitation ' of the law in that behalf.' Therefore for any danger or hurt that was in the altars, name, or thing, they might even then have been left standing, but for uniformity, and the imitation of the law.—But howsoever, it follows in the same Injunction, ' that when the altar is taken ' down, the holy table shall be set in,' (not cross) ' the place where the altar stood;' which (as is aforesaid) must needs be altar-wise.

14. The fourteenth and last Innovation comes with a mighty charge, and it is taken out of an Epistle to the temporal lords of his majesty's privy council. Of which Epistle we got one sheet, and so (for aught I yet know) that impression staid: In that sheet is this charge; the words are, ' The prelates, to justify their ' proceedings, have forged a new Article of ' Religion brought from Rome, which gives ' them full power to alter the doctrine and discipline of our church at a blow, (as they interpret it) and have foisted it (such is their language) into the beginning of the twentieth ' article of our church.' And this is in the last edition of the Articles, anno 1628. in affront of his majesty's declaration before them, &c.

The clause (which they say is forged by us) is this: ' The church' (that is, the bishops, as they expound it) ' hath power to decree Rites ' and Ceremonies, and authority in matters of ' faith.' (The word is ' controversies of faith,' by their leave.) ' This clause (say they) is a ' forgery fit to be examined, and deeply censured in the Star-Chamber. For it is not to ' be found in the Latin or English articles of ' Edward 6. or queen Elizabeth, ratified by ' parliament.' And then in the margin thus, ' If to forge a will or writing be censurable in ' the Star-Chamber, which is but a wrong to a ' private man; how much more the Forgery of ' an Article of Religion, to wrong the whole ' church, and overturn religion, which concerns ' all our souls? This is a heavy charge, my lords, but I thank God the Answer is easy.

And truly I grant, that to forge an Article of Religion in whole, or in part, and then to thrust it upon the church, is a most heinous crime far worse than the forging of a deed; and is certainly very deeply censurable in this court. And I would have humbly besought you, that a deep Censure might have been laid upon it, but that this sheet was found after, and so is not annexed to the Information, nor in Judgment at this present before you.

But then, my lords, I must tell you, I hope to make it as clear as the day, that this Forgery was not, that this clause mentioned was added by the prelates to the Article, to gain power to the church, and so to serve our turns. But that that clause in the beginning of the Article was by these men, or at least by some of their faction, rased out, and this to weaken the just power of the church, to serve their turns.

They say (to justify their charge) that this Clause is not to be found in the Articles, English or Latin, of either Edw. 6. or queen Elisabeth. I answer, The Articles of Edw. 6. and those made under queen Elizabeth, differ very much. And those of Edw. 6. are not now binding. So whether the clause be in or out of them, it is not much material.

But for the Articles of the Church of England, made in the queen's time, and now in force, that this Clause for the power of the church to decree ceremonies, and to have authority in controversies of faith, should not be found in English or Latin copies, till the year 1628, that it was set forth with the king's declaration before it, is to me a miracle; but your lordships shall see the falshood and boldness of these men.

What! Is this affirmative clause in no copy, English or Latin, till the year 1628? Strange! Why, my lords, I have a copy of the Articles in English, of the year 1612, and of the year 1605, and of the year 1593, and in Latin of the year 1563, which was one of the first printed copies, if not the first of all. For the Articles were agreed on but the 29th day of January, anno 1562-3. And in all these, this affirmative Clause for the church's power is in. And is not this strange boldness then to abuse the world, and falsely to say 'tis in no copy, when I myself, out of my own store, am able to shew it in so many, and so antiently?

But, my lords, I shall make it plainer yet: For it is not fit concerning an Article of Religion, and an Article of such consequence for the order, truth, and peace of this church; you should rely upon my copies, be they never so many, or never so ancient.

Therefore I sent to the public Records in my Office; and here under my officer's hand, who is a public notary, is returned me the twentieth Article with this affirmative clause in it. And there is also the whole body of the articles to be seen.

By this your lordships see how free the prelates are from forging this part of the Article. Now let these men quit themselves and their faction as they can, for their Index Expurgatorius and their foul rasure in leaving out this part of the Article. For to leave out of an Article is as great a crime as to put in; and a main rasure is as censurable in this court as a forgery.

Why, but then, my lords, what is this mystery of iniquity? Truly, I cannot certainly tell; but as far as I can, I'll tell you. The Articles you see were fully and fairly agreed to, and subscribed in the year 1562-3. But after this, in the year 1571, there were some that refused to subscribe; but why they did so, is not recorded. Whether it were about this Article or any other, I know not. But in fact this is manifest; that in that year 1571, the Articles were printed both in Latin and English, and this clause for the church left out of both. And certainly this could not be done, but by the malicious cunning of that opposite faction. And though I shall spare dead men's names where I have not certainty; yet if you be pleased to look back and consider who they were that governed businesses in 1571, and rid the church almost at their pleasure, and how potent the ancestors of these Libellers began then to grow, you will think it no hard matter to have the Articles printed, and this clause left out.

And yet 'tis plain, That, after the stir about Subscription in the year 1571, the Articles were settled and subscribed unto at last, as in the year 1562, with this clause in them for the church: for looking farther into the Records which are in mine own hands, I have found the book of 1562-3, subscribed by all the lower house of convocation, in this very year of contradiction, 1571. Dr. John Elmar (who was after lord bishop of London) being then procurator: Alexander Nowel, dean of St. Paul's, having been procurator in 1562-3, and yet living, and present and subscribing in 1571. Therefore, I do here openly in Star Chamber charge upon that pure sect this foul corruption of falsifying the articles of the church of England, let them take it off as they can.

I have now done, and 'tis time I should, with the Innovations charged upon the prelates, and fit to be answered here. Some few more there are, but they belong to matter of doctrine, which shall presently be answered, justo volumine, at large, to satisfy all well minded people. But when Mr. Burton's Book, which is the main one, is answered, (I mean his Book, not his railing) neither Prynne, nor Bastwick, nor any attendants upon Babshakel, shall by me or my care be answered. If this court find not a way to stop these libellers mouths and pens, for me they shall rail on till they be weary.

Yet one thing more, I beseech you, give me leave to add. 'Tis Master Burton's Charge (p. 175.) upon the prelates, That the Censures formerly laid upon malefactors, are now put upon God's ministers for their virtue and piety. A heavy charge this too. But if he, or any man else, can shew that any man hath been punished in the High Commission, or elsewhere, by the prelates, for virtue and piety, there is all the reason in the world we should be severely punished ourselves. But the truth is, the virtue and piety for which these ministers are punished, is for preaching schism and sedition, many of their sermons being as bad as their libels; as Burton's libel was one of his sermons first. But whether this stuff have any affinity with virtue and piety, I submit to any Christian reader.

And yet Mr. Burton is so confident of his innocence, even in this cause wherein he hath so foully carried himself, that he breaks forth into these words, (p. 7): 'I never so much as once dreamed, that impiety and impudency ' itself, in such a Christian state as this is, and ' under such a gracious prince, durst ever thus ' publicly have called me in question, and that ' upon the open stage, &c.' You see the boldness of the man, and in as bad a cause, as, I think, in this kind ever any man had.

I shall end all with a passage out of St. Cyprian, (lib. 1, ep. 3); when he, then bishop of Carthage, was bitterly railed upon by a pack of schismatics, his answer was, and it is now mine: They have railed both bitterly and falsely upon me, and yet 'non oportet me paria cum illis facere;' it becomes not me to answer them with the like, either levities or revilings, but to speak and write that only which becomes Sacerdotem Dei, a priest of God. Neither shall I in this give way (though I have been extremely vilified) to either grief or passion to speak, remembering that of the psalmist, 'Fret not thyself, else shall thou be moved to do evil.' Neither yet by God's grace shall the reproaches of such men as these, make me faint or start aside, either from the right way in matter of practice (they are St. Cyprian's words again) or 'à certâ regulâ,' from the certain rule of faith. And since in former times, some spared not to call the master of the house Beelzebub, how much more will they be bold with them of his household, as it is in St. Matthew. And so bold have these men been; but the next words of our Saviour are, 'Fear them not.' I humbly crave pardon of your lordships for this my necessary length, and give you all hearty thanks for your noble patience, and your just and honourable Censure upon these men, and your unanimous dislike of them, and defence of the Church. But because the business hath some reflection upon myself, I shall forbear to censure them, and leave them to God's mercy, and the king's justice.

On the 30th of June following, the SENTENCE was executed, when Dr. Bastwick, Mr. Prynne, and Mr. Burton, were conveyed to the pillory in the Palace-yard, Westminster.

Dr. Bastwick and Mr. Burton first meeting, they did close one in the other's arms three times, with as much expressions of love as might be, rejoicing that they met at such a place, upon such an occasion, and that God had so highly honoured them, as to call them forth to suffer for his glorious Truth.

Then immediately after, Mr. Prynne came, the doctor and he saluting each other, as Mr. Burton and he did before. The doctor then went up first on the scaffold, and his wife immediately following came up to him, and saluted each ear with a kiss, and then his mouth. Her husband desired her not to be in the least manner dismayed at his sufferings: and so for a while they parted, she using these words 'Farewel my dearest, be of good comfort, I am nothing dismayed.' And then the doctor began to speak these words:

Dr. Bastwick. There are many that are this day spectators of our standing here, as delinquents, though not delinquents, we bless God for it. I am not conscious to myself wherein I have committed the least trespass (to take this outward shame) either against my God, or my king. And I do the rather speak it, that you that are now beholders may take notice how far innocency will preserve you in such a day as this is; for we come here in the strength of our God, who hath mightily supported us, and filled our hearts with greater comfort than our shame or contempt can be. The first occasion of my trouble was by the prelates, for writing a Book against the Pope, and the pope of Canterbury said I wrote against him, and therefore questioned me: but if the presses were as open to us as formerly they have been, we would shatter his kingdom about his ears: but be ye not deterred by their power, neither be affrighted at our sufferings; let none determine to turn from the ways of the Lord, but go on, fight courageously against Gog and Magog. I know there be many here who have set many days apart for our behalf (let the prelates take notice of it) and they have sent up strong prayers to Heaven for us, we feel the strength and benefit of them at this time; I would have you to take notice of it, we have felt the strength and benefit of your prayers all along this cause. In a word, so far I am from base fear, or caring for any thing that they can do, or cast upon me, that had I as much blood as would swell the Thames, I would shed it every drop in this cause; therefore be not any of you discouraged, be not daunted at their power; ever labouring to preserve innocency, and keep peace within, go on in the strength of your God, and he will never fail you in such a day as this: as I said before, so I say again, had I as many lives as I have hairs on my head, or drops of blood in my veins, I would give them all up for this cause. This plot of sending us to those remote places, was first consulted and agitated by the Jesuits, as I can make it plainly appear. O see what times we are fallen into, that the lords must sit to act the Jesuits plots! For our own parts, we owe no malice to the persons of any of the prelates, but would lay our necks under their feet to do them good as they are men, but against the usurpation of their power, as they are bishops, we do profess ourselves enemies till doom-day.

Mr. Prynne shaking the doctor by the hand, desired him that he might speak a word or two. With all my heart, said the doctor.—The cause (said Mr. Prynne) of my standing here, is for not bringing in my Answer, for which my cause is taken pro confesso against me. What endeavours I used for the bringing in thereof, that God and my own conscience, and my counsel knows, whose cowardice stands upon record to all ages. For rather than I will have my cause a leading cause, to deprive the subjects of that liberty which I seek to maintain, I rather expose my person to a leading example, to bear this punishment: and I beseech you all to take notice of their proceedings in this cause. When I was served with a subpoena into this court, I was shut up close prisoner, that I could have no access to counsel, nor admitted pen, ink or paper to draw up my Answer by my instructions, for which I fee'd them twice, though to no purpose, yet when all was done, my Answer would not be accepted into the court, though I tendered it upon my oath. I appeal to all the world, if this were a legal or just proceeding. Our accusation is in point of libel

(but supposedly) against the prelates; to clear this now, I will give you a little light what the law is in point of libel, of which profession I have sometimes been, and still profess myself to have some knowledge in. You shall find in case of libel, two statutes: the one in the second of queen Mary, the other in the seventh of queen Elizabeth. That in the second of queen Mary, the extremity and height of it runs thus, That if a Libeller doth go so far and so high as to libel against king or queen by denomination, the height and extremity of the law is, that they lay no greater fine on him than an hundred pounds, with a month's imprisonment; and no corporal punishment, except he doth refuse to pay his fine; and then to inflict some punishment in lieu of that fine at the month's end. Neither was this censure to be passed on him, except it were fully proved by two witnesses, who were to produce a certificate of their good demeanor for the credit of their report, or else confessed by the libeller. You shall find in that statute 7 Eliz. some further addition to the former of 2 Mariae, and that only in point of fine and punishment, and it must still reach as high as the person of the king or queen. Here this statute doth set a fine of 200*l.*; the other but 100*l.* This sets three months imprisonment, the former but one: so that therein only they differ. But in this they both agree, namely at the end of his imprisonment to pay his Fine, and so go free without any further question: but if he refuse to pay his fine, then the court is to inflict some punishment on him correspondent to his fine. Now see the disparity between those times of theirs and ours. A libeller in queen Mary's time was fined but 100*l.*; in queen Elizabeth's 200*l.*: in queen Mary's days but a month's imprisonment; in queen Elizabeth's three months, and not so great a fine if they libelled against king or queen. Formerly the greatest fine was 200*l.*, though against king or queen: now 5,000*l.*, though but against the prelates, and that but supposedly, which cannot be proved: Formerly, but three months imprisonment; now perpetual imprisonment: Then, upon paying the fine, no corporal punishment was to be inflicted; but now, infamous punishment with the loss of blood, and all other circumstances that may aggravate it. See now what times we are fallen into, when that libelling, if it were so, against prelates only, shall fall higher than if it touched kings and princes.

That which I have to speak of next, is this: The Prelates find themselves exceedingly aggrieved and vexed against what we have written concerning the usurpation of their Calling, where indeed we declare their call not to be Jure Divino. I make no doubt, but there are some intelligencers or abettors, within the hearing, whom I would have well to know and take notice of what I now say. I here in this place make this offer to them, That if I may be admitted a fair dispute, on fair terms, for my cause; that I will maintain, and do here make the challenge against all the prelates in the king's dominions, and against all the prelates in Christendom, (let them take in the pope, and all, to help them) that their Calling is not Jure Divino. I will speak it again, I make the challenge against all the prelates in the king's dominions, and all Christendom, to maintain, that their calling is not Jure Divino. If I make it not good, let me be hanged up at the Hall Gate.—Whereupon the people gave a great shout.

The next thing that I am to speak of, is this: The Prelates find themselves exceedingly aggrieved and vexed against what I have written in point of law, concerning their Writs and Process, That the sending forth of Writs and Process in their own name, is against all law and justice, and doth intrench on his majesty's prerogative royal, and the subject's liberties. And here now I make a second challenge against all the Lawyers in the kingdom, in way of fair dispute, that I will maintain, the prelates sending forth of Writs and Process in their own names, to be against all law and justice, and intrencheth on his majesty's prerogative royal, and subjects liberty. Lest it should be forgotten, I speak it again, I here challenge all the whole Society of the Law, upon a fair dispute, to maintain that the sending forth of Writs and Process in the prelates own names, to be against all law and justice, and intrencheth on the king's prerogative royal, and the subjects liberty. If I be not able to make it good, let me be put to the tormentingest death they can devise.

We praise the Lord, we fear none but God and the king: Had we respected our Liberties, we had not stood here at this time: it was for the general good and liberties of you all that we have now thus far engaged our own liberties in this cause. For did you know how deeply they have intrenched on your liberties in point of Popery; if you knew but into what times you are cast, it would make you look about you: and if you did but see what changes and revolutions of persons, causes and actions, have been made by one man, you would more narrowly look into your privileges, and see how far your liberty did lawfully extend, and so maintain it.

This is the second time that I have been brought to this place; who hath been the author of it, I think you all well know: For the first time, (7 Feb. 1633.) if I could have had leave given me, I could easily have cleared myself of that which was then laid to my Charge; as also I could have done now, if I might have been permitted to speak: that book (Historiastix,^{*}) for which I suffered formerly, especially for some particular words therein written, which I quoted out of God's Word and antient Fathers, for which notwithstanding they passed censure on me; that same Book was twice licensed by public authority, and the same words I then suffered for, they are again made use of, and applied in the same sense by Heylin, in his Book lately printed and dedicated to the king.

Dr. Bastwick. And there is another Book of his licensed, wherein he rails against us three at his pleasure, and against the Martyrs that suffered in queen Mary's days, calling them Schismatical Hereticks; and there is another book of Pocklington's licensed (Altare Christianum.) they be as full of lies as dogs be full of fleas; but were the presses as open to us as they are to them, we would pay them, and their great master that upholds them, and charge them with notorious blasphemy.

Mr. Prynne. You all at this present see there be no degrees of men exempted from suffering: Here is a reverend Divine for the soul, a Physician for the body, and a Lawyer for the estate: I had thought they would have let alone their own Society, and not have meddled with any of them. And the next (for aught I know) may be a bishop. You see they spare none of what society or calling soever, none are exempted that cross their own ends. Gentlemen, look to yourselves; if all the Martyrs that suffered in queen Mary's days are accounted and called schismatical heretics and factious fellows*; what shall we look for! Yet so they are called in a Book lately come forth under authority. And such factious fellows are we, for discovering a Plot of Popery. Alas, poor England, what will become of thee, if thou look not the sooner into thine own privileges, and maintainest not thine own lawful liberty? Christian people, I beseech you all, stand firm, and be zealous for the cause of God, and his true religion, to the shedding of your dearest blood, otherwise you will bring yourselves, and all your posterities, into perpetual bondage and slavery.

Now the Executioner being come to sear him, and cut off his ears, Mr. Prynne spake these words to him: Come, friend, come, burn me, cut me, I fear not. I have learned to fear the Fire of Hell, and not what man can do unto me: come sear me, sear me, I shall bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus: Which the Executioner performed with extraordinary cruelty, heating his iron twice to burn one cheek: and cut one of his ears so close, that he cut off a piece of his cheek. He said, 'The more I am beaten down, the more am I lift up.'

Upon the day for Execution, Mr. Burton being brought into the Palace-yard, unto a chamber that looked into the yard, where he viewed three pillories there set up: Methinks (said he) I see Mount Calvary, where the three crosses (one for Christ, and the other two for the two Thieves) were pitched: and if Christ were numbered among thieves, shall a Christian

* The archbishop of Canterbury being informed by his spies what Mr. Prynne said, moved the lords then sitting in the Star-chamber, that he might be gagged, and have some further censure presently executed upon him; but that motion did not succeed.

(for Christ's cause) think much to be numbered among rogues, such as we are condemned to be? Surely, if I be a rogue, I am Christ's rogue, and no man's. And a little after, looking out at the casement towards the pillory, he said, I see no difference between looking out of this square window and yonder round hole. Pointing towards the pillory, he said, It is no matter of difference to an honest man. And a little after that, looking somewhat wishfully upon his wife, to see how she did take it, she seemed to him to be something sad; to whom he thus spake: Wife, why art thou so sad? To whom she made answer, Sweetheart, I am not sad. No, said he? See thou be not, for I would not have thee to dishonour the day, by shedding one tear, or fetching one sigh; for behold there, for thy comfort, my triumphant chariot, on which I must ride for the honour of my Lord and Master: and never was wedding day so welcome and joyful a day as this day is; and so much the more, because I have such a noble captain and leader, who hath gone before me with such undauntedness of spirit, that he saith of himself, I gave my back to the smiters, my cheeks to the nippers, they plucked off the hair, I hid not my face from shame and spitting, for the Lord God will help me, therefore shall I not be confounded: therefore have I set my face like a flint, and I know I shall not be ashamed. At length being carried toward the pillory, he met Dr. Bastwick at the foot of the pillory, where they lovingly saluted and embraced each other; and parting a little from him, he returned and most affectionately embraced him the second time, being heartily sorry he missed Mr. Prynne, who was not yet come, before he was gone up to his pillory, which stood alone next the Star Chamber, and about half a stone's cast from the other double pillory, wherein the other two stood; so as all their faces looked southward, the bright sun all the while, for the space of two hours, shining upon them. Being ready to be put into the pillory, standing upon the scaffold, he spied Mr. Prynne new come to the pillory, and Dr. Bastwick in the pillory, who then hastened off his band, and called for a handkerchief, saying, What! shall I be last, or shall I be ashamed of a pillory for Christ, who was not ashamed of a cross for me? Then being put into the pillory, he said, Good people, I am brought hither to be a spectacle to the world, to angels and men; and howsoever I stand here to undergo the punishment of a rogue, yet except to be a faithful servant to Christ, and a loyal subject to the king, be the property of a rogue, I am no rogue. But yet if to be Christ's faithful servant, and the king's loyal subject, deserve the punishment of a rogue, I glory in it, and I bless my God, my conscience is clear, and is not stained with the guilt of any such crime as I have been charged with, though otherwise I confess myself to be a man subject to many frailties and human infirmities. Indeed that Book intitled, "An Apology for an Appeal, with sundry Epistles and two Sermons, for God and the king," charged against me in the Information, I have and do acknowledge (the misprinting excepted) to be mine, and will by God's grace never disclaim it whilst I have breath within me. After a while, he having a nosegay in his hand, a bee came and pitched on the nosegay, and began to suck the flowers, which he beholding, and well observing, said, Do ye not see this poor bee? she hath found out this very place to suck sweet-ness from these flowers; and cannot I suck sweetness in this very place from Christ? the bee sucking all this while, and so took her flight. By and bye, he took occasion from the shining of the sun, to say, You see how the sun shines upon us, but that shines as well upon the evil as the good, upon the just and unjust, but that the Sun of Righteousness (Jesus Christ, who hath healing under his wings) shines upon the souls and consciences of every true believer only, and no cloud can hide him from us, to make him ashamed of us, no not of our most shameful sufferings for his sake: And why should we be ashamed to suffer for his sake who hath suffered for us? all our sufferings be but flea-bitings to that he endured: he endured the cross and despised the shame, and is set on the right hand of God. He is a most excellent pattern for us to look upon, that treading his steps, and suffering with him, we may be glorified with him. And what can we suffer, wherein he hath not gone before us even in the same kind? Was he not degraded, when they scornfully put on him a purple robe, a reed into his hand, a thorny crown upon his head, saluting him with, 'Hail King of the Jews!' and so disrobed him again? Was not he deprived when they smote the shepherd, and the sheep was scattered? Was not violence offered to his sacred person, when he was buffeted and scourged, his bands and his feet pierced, his head pricked with thorns, his side gored with a spear, &c.? Was not the cross more shameful, yea and more painful than a pillory? Was not he stript of all he had, when he was left stark naked upon the cross, the soldiers dividing his garments, and casting lots upon his vesture? And was he not confined to perpetual close imprisonment in man's imagination, when his body was laid in a tomb, and the tomb sealed, lest he should break prison, or his disciples steal him away? and yet did he not rise again, and thereby brought deliverance and victory to us all, so as we are more than conquerors through him that loved us? Here then we have an excellent pattern indeed.

One said unto Mr. Burton, Christ will not be ashamed of you at the last day. He replied, He knew whom he had believed, and that Christ was able to keep that he had committed to him against that day. One asked him how he did? He said, Never better, I bless God, who hath accounted me worthy thus to suffer. The Keeper keeping off the people from pressing near the pillory; he said, Let them come and spare not, that they may learn to suffer. The same Keeper being weary, and sitting down, asked Mr. Burton if he were well, and bid him be of good comfort. To whom he replied, Are you well? If you be well, I am much more, and full of comfort, I bless God. Some asked him if the pillory were not uneasy for his neck and shoulders? He answered, How can Christ's yoke be uneasy? This is Christ's yoke, and he bears the heavier end of it, and I the lighter; and if mine were too heavy, he would bear that too. O good people, Christ is a good and sweet master, and worth the suffering for! And if the world did but know his goodness and had tasted of his sweetness, all would come and be his servants; and did they but know what a blessed thing it were to bear his yoke, O who would not bear it? The Keeper going about to ease the pillory by putting a stone or a brickbat between, Mr. Burton said, Trouble not yourself, I am at very good ease, and feel no weariness at all: And espying a young man at the foot of the pillory, and perceiving him to look pale on him, he said, Son, Son, what is the matter you look so pale? I have as much comfort as my heart can hold, and if I had need of more, I should have it. One asked him a while after if he would drink some aqua vite. To whom he replied, that he needed it not; for I have, said he, (laying his hand upon his breast) the true Water of Life, which like a well doth spring up to eternal life. Pausing a while he said with a most cheerful and grave countenance, I was never in such a pulpit before, but little do ye know (speaking to them that stood about him) what fruits God is able to produce from this dry tree. They looking stedfastly upon him, he said, Mark my words, and remember them well: I say, Little do you know what fruits God is able to produce from this dry tree; I say, remember it well, for this day will never be forgotten; and through these holes (pointing to the pillory) God can bring light to his Church. The Keeper going about again to mend the pillory, he said, Do not trouble yourself so much: But indeed we are the troublers of the world. By and bye, some of them offering him a cup of wine; he thanked them, telling them he had the wine of consolation within him, and the joys of Christ in possession, which the world could not take away from him, neither could it give them unto him. Then he looked towards the other pillory, and making a sign with his hand, cheerfully called to Dr. Bastwick, and Mr. Prynne, asking them how they did? Who answered, Very well. A woman said unto him, Sir, every Christian is not worthy of this honour, which the Lord hath cast upon you this day. Alas, (said he) who is worthy of the least mercy? But it is his gracious favour and free gift, to account us worthy in the behalf of Christ to suffer any thing for his sake? Another woman said, There are many hundreds which by God's assistance would willingly suffer for the cause you suffer for this day. To whom he said, Christ exalts all of us that are ready to suffer afflictions for his name with meekness and patience; but Christ's military discipline in the use of his spiritual warfare, in point of suffering, is quite forgotten, and we have in a manner lost the power of religion, in not denying ourselves, and following Christ as well in suffering as in doing. After a while Mr. Burton calling to one of his friends for a handkerchief, returned it again, saying, It is hot, but Christ bore the burden in the heat of the day; let us always labour to approve ourselves to God in all things, and unto Christ, for therein stands our happiness, come of it what will in this world.

One said to Mr. Burton, The Lord strengthen you. To whom he replied, I thank you, and I bless his name he strengthens me. For though I am a poor sinful wretch, yet I bless God for my innocent conscience in any such crime as is laid against me; and were not my cause good, and my conscience sound, I could not enjoy so much unspeakable comfort in this my suffering, as I do, I bless my God. Mrs. Burton sending commendation to him by a friend: He returned the like to her, saying, Commend my love to my wife, and tell her I am heartily cheerful, and bid her remember what I said to her in the morning; namely, That she should not blemish the glory of this day with one tear, or so much as one sigh. She returned answer, That she was glad to hear him so cheerful, and that she was more cheerful of this day than of her wedding-day. This answer exceedingly rejoiced his heart, who thereupon blessed God for her, and said of her, she is but a young soldier of Christ's, but she hath already endured many a sharp brunt, but the Lord will strengthen her unto the end: And he having on a pair of new gloves, shewed them to his friends thereabout him, saying, My wife yesterday of her own accord bought me these wedding gloves, for this is my wedding-day.

One said to him, Sir, by this sermon (your suffering) God may convert many unto him. He answered, God is able to do it indeed. And then he called again to Dr. Bastwick and Mr. Prynne, asking them how they did; who answered as before. Some speaking to him concerning that suffering of shedding his blood: he answered, What is my blood to Christ's blood? Christ's blood is a purging blood, but mine is corrupted and polluted with sin. One friend asked another standing near Mr. Burton, if there should be any thing more done unto him? Mr. Burton over-hearing him answered, Why should there be no more done? For what God will have done must be accomplished. One desired Mr. Burton to be of good cheer: he thus replied, If you knew my cheer, you would be glad to be partaker with me; for I am not alone, neither hath God left me alone in all my sufferings and close imprisonment since first I was apprehended. The halberd-men standing round about, one of them had an old rusty halberd, the iron whereof was tacked to the staff with an old crooked nail; which one observing, and saying, What an old rusty halberd is that? Mr. Burton said, This seems to me to be one of those halberds which accompanied Judas when he went to betray and apprehend his master.

Mr. Burton said again, I am persuaded that Christ my Advocate is now pleading my cause at the Father's right-hand, and will judge my cause, though none be found here to plead it, and will bring forth my righteousness as the light at noon-day, and clear my innocency in due time. A friend asked Mr. Burton, if he would have been without this particular suffering? To whom he said, No, not for a world. Moreover, he said that his conscience in the discharge of his ministerial duty and function, in admonishing his people to beware of the creeping in of popery and superstition, exhorting them to stick close unto God and the king in duties of obedience, was that which first occasioned his sufferings; and he said, As for this truth I have preached, I am ready to seal it with my blood, for this is my crown both here and hereafter. I am jealous of God's honour, and the Lord keep us that we may do nothing that may dishonour him, either in doing or suffering; God can bring light out of darkness, and glory out of shame: and what shall I say more; I am like a bottle which is so full of liquor, that it cannot run out freely; so I am so full of joy, that I am not able to express it.

In conclusion, some told him of the approach of the Executioner, and prayed God to strengthen him. He said, I trust he will, why should I fear to follow my master Christ, who said, 'I gave my back to the smiters, and my cheek to the nippers that plucked off my hair; I hid not my face from shame and spitting; for the Lord God will help me, therefore shall I not be confounded; therefore have I set my face like a flint; and I know that I shall not be ashamed.'

When the Executioner had cut off one ear, which he had cut deep and close to the head in an extraordinary cruel manner; yet he never once moved and stirred for it, though he had cut an artery, so as the blood ran streaming down upon the scaffold, which divers persons standing about the pillory seeing, dipped their handkerchiefs in, as a thing most precious, the people giving a mournful shout, and crying for the surgeon, whom the croud and other impediments for a time kept off, so that he could not come to stop the blood; he all the while held up his hands, said, Be content, it is well, blessed be God. The other ear being cut no less deep, he then was freed from the pillory, and came down, where the surgeon waiting for him, presently applied remedy for stopping the blood after a large effusion thereof, yet for all this he fainted not in the least manner, though through expence of much blood he waxed pale. And one offering him a little wormwood-water, he said, It needs not; yet through importunity he only tasted of it, and no more, saying, His master, Christ, was not so well used, for they gave him gall and vinegar, but you give me good strong water to refresh me, blessed be God. His head being bound up, two friends led him away to an house provided him in King-street, where being set down, and bid to speak little, yet he said after a pause, This is too hot to hold long: Now lest they in the room, or his wife should mistake, and think he spake of himself concerning his pain, he said, I speak not this of myself; for that which I have suffered is nothing to that my Saviour suffered for me, who had his hands and feet nailed to the cross: and lying still a while, he took Mr. Prynne's sufferings much to heart, and asked the people how he did, for, said he, his sufferings have been great. He asked also how Dr. Bastwick did, with much compassion and grief; that himself (being the first that was executed) could not stay to see how they two fared after him.

Soon after the execution of the Sentence, they were severally sent prisoners to the respective castles of Carnarvon, Launceston in Cornwall, and Lancaster, and afterwards on the 27th of August following, it was ordered by the king and council, That Dr. Bastwick should be removed to the castle or fort of the Isle of Scilly, Mr. Burton to the Isle of Guernsey, and Mr. Prynne to which of the two castles of the Isle of Jersey the governor should think fit; and that none be admitted to have conference with them, or to have access to them, but whom the captains of the said castles or their deputies should appoint; they not to be allowed pen, paper, or ink, nor any books, but the Bible and Common-Prayer book, and other books of devotion, consonant to the doctrine and discipline of the Church of England; no letters or writings to be brought them, but what shall be opened, nor any to be sent from them: that the wives of Bastwick and Burton should not land or abide in any of the said Islands, and if they did, they should be detained in prison till further order from the board; and the conductors of the said three prisoners, either by sea or land, to suffer none but themselves to speak to them in their passage. Accordingly they were sent to the said three Islands, where they remained till the beginning of the Long Parliament 1641, when upon their respective petitions they were sent for up, discharged and restored. Their Petitions were as follow:

To the Honourable the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses of the Commons House of Parliament; the humble Petition of WILLIAM PRYNNE, late Exile and close Prisoner in Jersey,

In all humbleness sheweth; That your petitioner, though not conscientious to himself of any voluntary or apparent offence against the laws of the realm, (to which he ever studied to conform himself) through the malicious practices and persecutions of some Prelates and Church-men, (especially the now archbishop of Canterbury, and Peter Heylin, doctor in divinity) whose Errors and Innovations, contrary to the doctrine and discipline of the Church of England, and extravagancies in the High Commission, and other ecclesiastical courts, your Petitioner for his own relief, being there unjustly prosecuted, (had to his weak power oppunged) hath within eight years last past, undergone two heavy Censures in the Star-Chamber Court.

The first upon an Information there exhibited against your Petitioner, by Mr. Noy deceased, then Attorney General, for some misconstrued passages, inoffensive in themselves, and in your petitioner's true intention, being for the most part the words of other approved authors, comprised in a book, styled Histromastix, written by the petitioner, against common interludes, and licensed for the press by Mr. Thomas Buckner, household chaplain to the then archbishop of Canterbury, authorized by the state to license books, and by him exacted, and approved both in the written and printed copy, before its publication, and so confessed the Information; for which authorized Book and Passages, your petitioner, before the hearing of the cause, was not only imprisoned in the Tower of London, without bail or mainprize, for a whole year's space, denied access to his counsel, convenient time to examine Witnesses, and make Breviats to instruct his counsel (the information being general, and reciting no particular clauses of the Book excepted against) the only means of his Defence illegally suppressed, some of his counsel tampered with to make no justification, contrary to your petitioner's instructions and desire, whereby his cause was miscarried; but also at the hearing, by reason of those malicious and perverse glosses on the said Passages, which the said Heylin had collected and presented to his majesty's learned counsel, who repeated his instructions only, your petitioner was fined 3,000*l.* to his majesty, expelled the University of Oxford, and Lincoln's-Inn, degraded from his profession of the law, wherein he never offended, set in the pillory in the Palace-Yard at Westminster, where he lost one of his ears, and two days after on the pillory in Cheapside, where he lost the other ear: and had his said licensed Books there publicly burnt before his face, by the hangman, in a most disgraceful manner; and adjudged after to remain a prisoner during his life.

That after the said Censure, to defame and injure your petitioner the more, he was charged wrongfully in the Decree, as censured for perjury, (though not taxed for it by the court) and between his sufferings in the pillory, the books of his study (twice surveyed, and restored to him by order from the lords) before any fine estreated, by a warrant out of the high commission, signed by the said Archbishop and others, were seized on by Cross a messenger, who carried them to his house; with which warrant your petitioner charging the said archbishop upon occasion, in the open court of Star-Chamber; he there publicly disavowed the same (though your petitioner can yet produce it under his own hand) promising withal, that the books should be restored forthwith; which notwithstanding were all still detained by his means, till they were extended and sold for your petitioner's fine: who shortly after, by an order out of the said court sent to the Tower to be executed, was there shut up close prisoner, and Dr. Reeves sent thither to search his chamber for the pamphlet, which the said archbishop would wrongfully have fathered upon your petitioner, whose friends have been unjustly prosecuted in the exchequer, and elsewhere, sundry years, for his fine aforesaid.

And your Petitioner further saith, that about Easter was three years, during his imprisonment in the Tower, by means of the said archbishop, a new information was exhibited in the said court against your petitioner, and others, with certain Books thereto annexed; denying the prelates jurisdiction over other ministers, to be Jure Divino. Charging them with many errors and innovations in religion, usurpation upon his majesty's prerogative, and subjects liberty, abuses, and extortions, in the high commission, and other ecclesiastical courts, suppressing preaching, and painful ministers without a cause; licensing Popish, Arminian, and other erroneous books against the Sabbath; setting up Altars, Images, and Crucifixes; removing and railing-in Communion Tables, and hewing down to them, altering the Book of Common Prayer, the books for the Gunpowder-Treason, and late Fast, in some material passages in favour of Popery and Papists. Which things, (though very notorious, and oft complained against by this honourable house, in former and late parliaments) were yet reputed scandalous. And though neither of the said Books was particularly charged on your petitioner, in the said Information, nor any witness produced to prove him either author or disposer of any of them; yet by denying your petitioner liberty to draw up his own Answer, (though once a barrister at law) when as his assigned counsel refused to do it, by close imprisoning your petitioner, and his servant, by debarring him pen, ink, and paper, whereby to answer, or instruct his counsel; searching his chamber, and taking away part of his Answer there found; denying him access to his counsel, and conference with his co-defendants, even at counsel, though jointly charged with him; rejecting the Cross-bill exhibited by him for his defence; threatening master Holt, one of your petitioner's assigned counsel, sent by the then Lord Keeper to the Tower, to draw up your petitioner's Answer, and commanding him not to sign it, after it was engrossed, whereupon he refused to subscribe it, contrary to his promise to your petitioner; and by refusing to accept your petitioner's answers to the said information, signed with his own, and master Tomlins, the other of his counsel's hands, though tendered by your petitioner, both at the Star-Chamber Office, and in the open court at the hearing; the said information, for default of Answer (though two Answers were thereto tendered by your petitioner) was taken pro confesso against your petitioner, and he thereupon fined 5,000*l.* to his majesty, pilloried, stigmatized on both cheeks, mutilated and dismembered, in a most barbarous manner, and the small remainder of his ears, left after his first execution, cut off, to the hazard of his hearing, and life; and adjudged to perpetual close imprisonment in the gaol of Carnarvon castle in North-Wales; a nasty dog-hole, far remote from your petitioner's friends. Which Sentence was unduly drawn up and executed upon your Petitioner, as his Attorney's Clerk informed, before it was entered into the book, or your petitioner could get any copy of it, to except against the same, as he had just cause.

That immediately after the Execution of the same Sentence, your petitioner sent to the said Archbishop to desire him to release or bail his servant (who was detained close prisoner for ten weeks space in the messenger's hands, and oft examined and solicited, by fair promises and threatenings, causelessly to accuse your petitioner, against whom they wanted evidence) that so he might attend him during his sores, which the said Archbishop out of his grace and charity utterly refused; saying that he intended to proceed against his said servant in the High Commission, where he hath ever since vexed, censured, and banded him from prison to prison, only for refusing to accuse and betray your petitioner.

That after the said heavy Sentence, your petitioner by an order in the said court (by way of addition to the said Censure) was inhibited the use of pen, ink, and paper, and all books; except the Bible, and the Book of Common Prayer, and some few books for private devotion; and before his wounds were perfectly cured, he was by order removed from the Tower to Carnarvon; and some of his friends in Chester, who visited him there in his passage, in the presence of his conductors, who had no order to restrain any person from resorting to him, were for this very cause sent for by a messenger, to appear before the lords of the privy council, and likewise cited into the High Commission at York, where they were imprisoned and fined, to the ruin of their estates, and enjoined to make a public recantation in the cathedral church, and in the Town-hall of Chester: The said commissioners further decreeing, that three pictures of your Petitioner found in Chester, should be publickly burnt at the High Cross there, which was done accordingly.

That your Petitioner, since his said Sentence, hath been publickly reviled at, and libelled against, both by the High Commissioners at York, and in sundry churches, both at Chester and elsewhere, and in divers licensed printed books, compiled by the said Heylin, and published by the Archbishop's privity or command; and that sundry of his friends houses, studies, books, and writings have been violently broken up, ransacked and taken away, and themselves prosecuted in the High Commission, out of malice, for the relation they had to your Petitioner.

That after your Petitioner had continued some ten weeks space close prisoner in Carnarvon, he was, about three years since, by a warrant from the lords of the council, made in the summer vacation, (to which the said Archbishop's band was first subscribed) ordered by way of exile, to be embarked and transported with all privacy into one of the castles in the isle of Jersey, and his conductors thereby charged not to admit any person whatsoever, but themselves only, to speak with your Petitioner in his passage: Whereupon, after some injuries there received by Mr. Griffith, the king's attorney in those parts, who endeavoured to seize upon the furniture of his chamber for his own use, your Petitioner was embarked among papists, in a bruised shipwrecked vessel, full of leaks, and after fourteen weeks voyage in the winter season, through dangerous storms and seas, which spoiled most of his staff and bedding, and threatening often shipwreck to him, he arrived at the said isle, and was conveyed close prisoner into Mount Orgate castle there, where the Lieutenant Governor, by another extra-judicial order, to which the said Archbishop's name was first, was ordered to keep your Petitioner close prisoner in a chamber, suffer none but his keepers to speak with him, to intercept all letters to him; to permit him neither pen, ink, nor paper, either to write to his friends for necessities, or to petition for relief, and to permit him no book but the Bible, and those afore-named books, without giving any order for his diet there: so that being deprived of his calling and estate, exiled and shut up close prisoner among strangers, remote from all his friends, denied all address to him by person or letters, he had certainly perished in his almost three years close imprisonment there, had not the extraordinary providence and goodness of God, which he shall ever adore, and the noble charity of those under whose custody he did remain, furnished him with such diet and necessities, as preserved him both in health and life, in this his close imprisonment and exile.

May it therefore please this honourable house, to take these your Petitioner's almost eight years tragical grievances, of new and dangerous example, into your most sad and just considerations, that so they may not become precedents to the prejudice of posterity; to grant him liberty to send for and examine all necessary witnesses; to order all clerks, registers, and other officers of the Star Chamber, or elsewhere, speedily and freely to grant him the copies of such Orders, Decrees, and Writings, as his cause shall require, to release him upon bail (being now but a prisoner only upon an extra-judicial order of the lords, and not by virtue of any Sentence or Decree in court) to grant him liberty to plead and prosecute his own cause, since counsel hath so often failed him, and to give him such satisfaction and relief as the justice and equity of his cause shall merit. And your Petitioner shall ever pray for your safeties,

WILLIAM PLYNN.

To the Honourable the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses of the Common House of Parliament; The humble Petition of JOHN BASTWICK, Doctor in Physick, lately retained close Prisoner and Exile, in the Island of Scilly;

Most humbly sheweth; That your Petitioner having about six years since set out a Book in Latin, called 'Elenchus Religionis Papisticæ,' with an addition thereunto, called 'Flagellum Pontificis, et Episcoporum Latialium;' being thereunto provoked by one Richard Short, a Papist that maintained the Pope's Supremacy, the mass, and papal Religion: In which book your Petitioner (for preventing all misinterpretation of his pious and good intentions therein) in his Epistle to the Reader, fully declared himself, That your Petitioner meant nothing against such bishops as acknowledged their authority from kings and emperors; yet, because your petitioner (the better to shew the papal usurpation over other princes) therein only maintained by way of argument (as other orthodox writers of that subject have done) a parity of the said bishop of Rome, or all other bishops or presbyters, by the word of God, deuying his and their Supremacy over other ministers to be by the divine institution:

Thereupon a pursuivant, by authority from the High Commission Court, came into your Petitioner's house at Colchester in Essex, in his absence, and the said pursuivant, assisted with the then bailiffs and constables of Colchester, aforesaid, ransacked his said house, together with his chests and trunks, and with great violence broke open your petitioner's study, which was in his apothecary's house, and took and carried away divers of your petitioner's books, writing, letters, and what else the pursuivant pleased, without making of restitution of them to your petitioner.

And then your petitioner was prosecuted in the said High Commission court, principally for his said Book; where after a long and chargeable prosecution, he was the 12th of February 1634, fined 1,000*l.* to the king, excommunicated, debarred to practise physick, the chiefest means of his livelihood; his said Book ordered to be burnt; that he should pay costs of suit, and be imprisoned till he should make a Recantation. The which heavy Censure was only for the said book, wherein your petitioner maintained the prerogative of a king against the papacy. Whereas one Thomas Chawney, of Essex, lately wrote a Book in maintenance of the papal religion, and in defence of the church of Rome, and avers it to be a true church; the which book is dedicated to the archbishop of Canterbury, and was and is patronized and defended by the said archbishop, and the said Chawney never troubled for it. After which censure declared as aforesaid, all the bishops that were then present, denied openly that they held their jurisdiction from his majesty; and affirmed, that they had it from God only. And the archbishop of Canterbury, among other erroneous sayings uttered by him, maintained the said Chawney's book; and maintained that the church of Rome was a true church, and that it erred not in fundamentals: And he, and other the said bishops, there defamed the holy scriptures, and abused reverend Master Calvin. In regard whereof, and for the vindicating of your petitioner's innocency in the matters for which he was most unjustly censured, as aforesaid, your petitioner published in print another book in Latin, intitled, 'Apo-

'logeticus ad Præsules Anglicanos,' expressing the truth of his Proceedings, and speeches of his said Censure. For which last mentioned book, and his book called the 'Litany,' not then in print, an Information was exhibited against him and others in the Star-Chamber, to which your Petitioner's Answer being drawn and engrossed, was only subscribed by himself, because he could get no counsel to set their hands to it; your Petitioner tendered the said Answer, first at the Star-Chamber Office, and after in open court at the Star-Chamber bar, but it would not be accepted for want of counsellors hands to it: contrary to former precedents. But the court of Star-Chamber took the said Information pro confesso, and censured your Petitioner 5,000*l.* fine to the king, to stand in the pillory, and to lose both his ears, and to be close prisoner in Launceston Castle in Cornwall. All which hath been executed upon him with great extremity, to the peril of his life. After all which extremity, your Petitioner (by what order he knoweth not, it being no part of his Censure in Star-Chamber) was transported from the said Castle to the island of Scilly, a place so barren that it affords not ordinary necessaries: where he hath been in close durance for three years or more, and not suffered to have any of his friends come at him, his very wife being prohibited, by the lords of the council's order, under pain of imprisonment, not to set her foot upon any part of the said island to enquire of his welfare. So that your petitioner hath been exiled from his wife and divers small children three years and more; besides the great straits and miseries which he hath sustained during the said time. All which is contrary to the law of God and man, and the liberties of a free subject; and to the utter undoing of your petitioner, his wife, and children.

May it therefore please this honourable assembly, to take these pressing grievances of your Petitioner into your considerations, and to afford him such relief therein, as in your grave wisdoms shall seem consonant to justice and equity; and to assign him for counsel, Mr. Atkins, Mr. Ludbore, Mr. Tomlins, Mr. Gurdon, and Mr. Randal, to assist him in this his complaint; and to order that your petitioner may take out gratis such copies of the said Censures, Warrants, and Orders, and other the proceedings in the said several courts, as shall or may any way concern this his sad, yet most just complaint, with warrant, from this honourable house, to bring in his witness.

And your Petitioner, as in duty bound, shall ever pray for your prosperities. J. BASTWICK.

The humble Petition of HENRY BURTON, late Exile, and close Prisoner in Castle-Cornet, in the Isle of Guernsey,

In all humbleness sheweth; That whereas your petitioner, on the 5th Nov. 1636, did preach two Sermons in his own parish church in St. Matthew Friday-street, London, for the which he was, in December then next following, summoned to appear before Dr. Duck, one of the Commissioners for causes ecclesiastical, at Chiswick in the county of Middlesex: where (with the register of the High Commission court) the said Dr. Duck tendered to the petitioner the oath ex officio, to answer to certain articles there presented: Which oath the Petitioner refusing to take, did then and there appeal from the said court unto the king's majesty; which appeal the said Dr. Duck did admit, and the said register, by Dr. Duck's direction, did then and there enter in writing.

Notwithstanding which said Appeal, a special High Commission court was shortly after called at London, consisting of four or five doctors; where the said Commissioners proceeded illegally to suspend the petitioner in his absence; by means whereof, as of the threatenings of the said Commissioners, he was enforced to keep his house, until a serjeant at arms, with divers pursuivants, and other armed officers, assisted by alderman Abell, then sheriff of London, beset the petitioner's house at eleven o'clock at night, and violently broke open his doors with iron crow, and the like, and surprised him in his house; he making no resistance at all. Where having first searched his study, and taken away such books as they pleased, they carried your petitioner to prison; whence, the next day, being the 2nd of February, by a pretended order from the lords of the council, he was conveyed to the Fleet, and there kept close prisoner.

During which imprisonment, an Information was exhibited against the petitioner and others, in his majesty's court of Star-Chamber; whereby he was charged, inter alia, with the publishing of a certain Book, containing, "An Apology for an Appeal," with the said two sermons, intitled, "God and the king." Wherein he taught subjects to yield all manner of due obedience to their lawful king, and reproved all lawless innovations in religion, &c. Which Information the petitioner upon his oath under the hand of M. Holt being then of his counsel, assigned by special order from the said court, did put in his Answer wherein he alleged such things only as his said counsel conceived to be material, and pertinent to his just defence in publishing the said Book; but denied all other matters in the said information contained. Which said Answer being admitted and received in court, the petitioner (being then a close prisoner) not only attended the exhibiting of Interrogatories, according to the custom of that court, but withal, after some universal delay, did write unto the king's Attorney to hasten them; but before the Examiner came, the petitioner heard that his said Answer was referred to sir John Bramston, kt. L. C. Justice of the King's-Bench, sir John Finch, then chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and was by them wholly expunged as impertinent and scandalous, save only the not Guilty. And the petitioner understanding the Answer he was to make to the Interrogatories was to be reckoned as a part of his Answer admitted in court, but afterwards expunged as impertinent and scandalous, as aforesaid: so as if he should then have answered the Interrogatories, he should thereby have assented to the said act of the said Judges, and so the condemnation of his cause before the hearing; whereby he should have contradicted his former oath, that his said Answer was a true Answer; and so should justly have brought himself under the guilt of wilful perjury, and his cause under just censure. For that very reason he held himself not bound, as he conceived, to answer the Interrogatories: for that his said answer was so expunged, and the (Not Guilty) as the foot so tied to the head without the main body, and in the judge's own words, as the petitioner could not in any sort take or acknowledge it now for other than the judge's own answer; as may appear upon record in the same court.

Nevertheless the Court taking the same Information pro confesso, and refusing to permit a copy of the petitioner's own true Answer, as also of his reasons of not answering the Interrogatories, both which at his censure he tendered to the court, desiring they might be then and there publicly read the 14th of June, 13 Caroli Regis, proceeded to censure: whereby your petitioner was censured in a fine of 5,000*l.* to his majesty, to be deprived of his ecclesiastical benefice, degraded from his ministerial function and degrees in the university, and ordered to be set on the pillory, where both his ears were to be cut off; confined to perpetual close imprisonment in Lancaster-castle: debarred the access of his wife or any other to come to him but his keeper; and denied the use of pen, ink, and paper. All which, except the fine, was executed accordingly. And after his close imprisonment for twelve weeks in the common jail in the said castle, he was, by what extrajudicial order he knows not, transported by the conduct of one Brian Burton, appointed by the high sheriff of Lancaster, who used your petitioner very basely and deceitfully, in that his transportation, which was in the winter season, through dangerous seas, to the apparent hazard both of his health and life, to the said castle of Guernsey, where he remained a close prisoner and exile almost three whole years; his wife utterly prohibited, upon pain of imprisonment, to set her foot upon any part of the island where she might but inquire how her husband did: contrary to the laws of God and the liberties of this kingdom.

May it therefore please this honourable house, to take the petitioner's sad cause into consideration; and for better manifestation of his grievance in this cause, to assign him for counsel Mr. Serjeant Atkins, Mr. Tomlins, and Mr. Gordon, to assist him in his cause, and to command that he may take out such copies gratis out of the said several courts as do or may concern his cause.

And your Petitioner, as in duty bound, shall daily pray for your prosperities. H. BURTON.

These Petitions being read, they were referred to the Committee appointed for inquiring into the proceedings of the Star-Chamber and High Commission Court, and upon their Report the house came to the following Resolutions.

1. Resolved, "That the Precept made by the archbishop of Canterbury and others, high commissioners for causes ecclesiastical within the realm of England, for the apprehending the body of Dr. Bastwick and searching for and seizing his books; and the messengers acting thereupon in searching Dr. Bastwick's house, and seizing his Books and Papers, are against law and the liberty of the subject. 2. That the Sentence given against Dr. Bastwick by the High Commissioners, and the proceedings whereupon that sentence is grounded, and the execution of that sentence, are against law; and that the sentence is void, and that Dr. Bastwick ought to be restored to the exercise and practice of physick, and to have reparation and recompence for his damage and loss sustained by the said sentence and execution. 3. That all those several commissioners of the high commission court which voted against Dr. Bastwick, in the Sentence pronounced against him, ought to give satisfaction to Dr. Bastwick."

The house afterwards resumed the Debate concerning Dr. Bastwick, Whereupon it was farther,

4. Resolved, "That the proceedings against Dr. Bastwick are against the law and liberty of the subject, as also the Sentence against him ought to be reversed, the fine of 5,000*l.* discharged, and he have reparation for his losses and sufferings. 5. That the Orders and Warrants from the Council-Board for Dr. Bastwick's exile, and transferring him from the castle of Launceston to the isle of Scilly, and his imprisonment there, are against the law and liberty of the subject, and that he ought to have reparation for his losses and damages sustained by those orders, and that imprisonment.

"Present at the sentence in the Star-Chamber these lords and privy-counsellors following: The Lord Keeper, duke of Lenox, earl of Pembroke, earl of Holland, lord Cottington, sir Thomas Jermin, Lord Treasurer, marquis Hamilton, earl of Dorset, earl Moreton, lord Newburgh, Mr. Secretary Cooke, Lord Privy Seal, earl of Arundel and Surry, earl of Bridgewater, viscount Wimbleton, sir Henry Vane, Mr. Secret. Windebank."

As to Mr. Burton;

1. Resolved, "That the four Commissioners, Dr. Duck, Dr. Worrall, Dr. Sams, and Dr. Wood, proceeded unjustly and illegally in suspending Mr. Burton ab officio et beneficio, for not appearing upon the summons in the first process. 2. That the breaking open Mr. Burton's house, and arresting his person without any cause shewed, and before any suit depending against him in the Star-Chamber, and his close imprisonment thereupon, are against the law and liberty of the subject. 3. That John Wragg hath offended in searching and seizing the Books and Papers of Mr. Burton, by colour of a general warrant dormant from the High Commissioners, and that the said warrant is against Law and the Liberty of the Subject; and that serjeant Dendy and alderman Abell have offended in breaking open the house of Mr. Burton, and ought respectively to make him reparations for the same. 4. That Mr. Burton ought to have reparation and recompence for damages sustained by the aforesaid proceedings from Dr. Duck, &c. 5. That the Warrant from the Council-Board, dated at Whitehall, Feb. 2, 1636, for the committing Mr. Burton close prisoner, and the commitment thereupon, is illegal, and contrary to the liberty of the subject. 6. That the archbishop of Canterbury, bishop of London, and the earl of Arundel, the earl of Pembroke, sir Henry Vane, secretary Cooke, and secretary Windebank, do make reparation to Mr. Burton for his damages sustained by his imprisonment."

As to Mr. Prynne;

1. Resolved, "That the Sentence given against Mr. Prynne in the Star-Chamber, February 17, 9 Car. is illegal, and given without just cause, and ought to be reversed; and that Mr. Prynne ought to be discharged of the fine of 5,000*l.* imposed by the said Sentence, and of all extents thereupon, and of his imprisonment decreed by that Sentence. 2. That Mr. Prynne ought to be restored to his degrees in the University of Oxford, and to the society of Lincoln's-Inn, and to the exercise of his profession of an Utter Barrister at law, and to his chamber again at Lincoln's-Inn. 3. That Mr. Prynne ought to have reparation for such damages and prejudice as he hath sustained by the said Sentence and proceedings. 4. That the Sentence given against Mr. Prynne in the Star-Chamber, 14 Junii 1637, 13 Car. is illegal, and given without any just cause, and therefore ought to be reversed; and that he ought to be discharged of the fine and imprisonment thereby decreed, and that he ought to have reparation and recompence for the damages sustained by that Sentence, and the execution thereof.—That the Warrant dated 27 Aug. 13 Car. for the transportation of Mr. Prynne from Caernarvon-Castle to the isle of Jersey, and his imprisonment there, and other restraints therein mentioned, are against the law and liberty of the subject, and that he ought to be discharged of that imprisonment, and to have reparations for his damages sustained thereby. 5. That the Imprisonment of Mr. Prynne, by a warrant dated the 1st of Feb. 1632, under the hands of Thomas lord Coventry, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of England, Richard lord archbishop of York, Henry earl of Manchester, Edward earl of Dorset, Henry lord viscount Falkland, William lord bishop of London, Edward lord Newburgh, and sir Thomas, Jermin, is unjust and illegal, and that they ought to give Mr. Prynne

"The Sentence of the Court," says Kennet, "was a Fine of 5,000*l.* upon each delinquent to the king, with pillory and loss of ears, and the very remainder of ears: after which suffering, they were committed close prisoners, one to the castle of Lancaester in Cornwall, another to the castle of Lancaster, and a third to Carnarvon castle in Wales; from whence they were afterward removed to remote islands, and no access of friends allowed to them. And here, though the insolence of these men was very great, their punishment was thought extremely to exceed it. Some moderate penalties might have left them under the neglect of being bold and imprudent writers. But these terrible blows upon them, raised them in the eyes of the people into the reputation of sufferers and confessors for the best of causes, Religion, Liberty, and Property. The lord Clarendon delivers a wise and true opinion of these men, and their prosecution. 'They were three persons most notorious for their declared malice against the government of the church by bishops, in their several Books and Writings, which they had published to corrupt the people, with circumstances very scandalous, and in language very scurrilous and impudent; which all men thought deserved very exemplary punishment: they were of the three several professions which had the most influence upon the people, a divine, a common lawyer, and a doctor of physic; none of them of interest, or any esteem with the worthy part of their several professions, having been formerly all looked upon under characters of reproach: yet when they were all sentenced, and for the execution of that Sentence brought out to be punished as common and signal rogues, exposed upon scaffolds to have their ears cut off, and their faces and foreheads branded with hot irons (as the poorest and most mechanic malefactors used to be, when they were not able to redeem themselves by any fine for their trespasses, or to satisfy any damages for the scandals they had raised against the good name and reputation of others) men begun no more to consider their manners, but the men; and each profession, with anger and indignation enough, thought their education, and degrees, and quality, would have secured them from such infamous judgments, and treasured up wrath for the time to come.'"

Lord Clarendon says, "There cannot be a better instance of the unruly and mutinous spirit of the city of London, which was then the sink of all the ill-humours of the kingdom, than the triumphant entry which some persons at that time made into London, who had been before seen upon pillories, and stigmatized as libellous and infamous offenders: of which classes of men scarce any age can afford the like. There had been three persons of several professions some years before censured in the Star-chamber, William Prynne a bartsiter of Lincoln's-inn, John Bastwick a doctor of physic, and Henry Burton a minister and lecturer of London.—The first, not unlearned in the profession of the law, as far as learning is acquired by the mere reading of books; but being a person of great industry, had spent more time in reading divinity; and which marred that divinity, in the conversation of factious and hot-headed divines: and so, by a mixture of all three, with the rudeness and arrogance of his own nature, had contracted a proud and venomous dislike to the discipline of the Church of England; and so by degrees, as the progress is very natural, an equal irreverence to the government of the state too; both which he vented in several absurd, petulant, and supercilious discourses in print.—The second, a half-witted, crack-brained fellow, unknown to either university, or the college of physicians; but one that had spent his time abroad, between the schools and the camp, for he had been in or passed through armies, and had gotten a doctorship, and Latin; with which, in a very flowing style, with some wit and much malice, he inveighed against the prelates of the church in a book which he printed in Holland, and industriously dispersed in London, and throughout the kingdom; having presumed, as their modesty is always equal to their obedience, to dedicate it 'to the sacred majesty of the king.'—The third had formerly a kind of relation by service to the king; having, before he took orders, waited as closet-keeper, and so attended at canonical hours with the books of devotion upon his majesty when he was prince of Wales; and a little before the death of king James took orders: and so his highness coming shortly to be king, the vapours of ambition fuming into his head that he was still to keep his place, he would not think of less than being clerk of the closet to the new king, which place his majesty conferred upon, or rather continued in, the bishop of Durham, Dr. Neyl, who had long served king James there. Mr. Burton thus disappointed, and, as he called it, despoiled of his right, would not, in the greatness of his heart, sit down by the affront; but committed two or three such weak, saucy indiscretions, as caused an inhibition to be sent him, 'that he should not presume to come any more to 'court;' and from that time he resolved to revenge himself of the bishop of Durham, upon the whole order; and so turned lecturer and preached against them; being endued with malice and boldness, instead of learning and any tolerable parts.

"These three persons having been for several follies and libelling humours, first gently reprehended; and after, for their incorrigibleness, more severely censured and imprisoned; found some means in prison of correspondence, which was not before known to be between them; and to combine themselves, in a more pestilent and seditious Libel than they had ever before vented; in which the honour of the king, queen, counsellors, and bishops, was with equal licence blasted and traduced; which was faithfully dispersed by their proselytes in the city. The authors were quickly and easily known, and had indeed too much ingenuity to deny it; and were thereupon brought together to the Star-Chamber ore tenus; where they behaved themselves with marvellous insolence; with full confidence demanding 'that the bishops who sat 'in the court, being only the archbishop of 'Canterbury, and the bishop of London, might 'not be present, because they were enemies, 'so parties;' which, how scandalous and ridiculous soever it seemed then there, was good logic and good law two years after in Scotland, and served to banish the bishops of that kingdom both from the Council-table and the assembly. Upon a very patient and solemn hearing, in as full a court as ever I saw in that place, without any difference in opinion or dissenting voice, they were all three censured as scandalous, seditious, and infamous persons, 'to lose their ears in the pillory, and to be imprisoned in several jails during the king's pleasure;' all which was executed with rigour and severity enough. But yet their itch of libelling still broke out, and their friends of the city found a live of communication with them. Hereupon the wisdom of the state thought fit, that those infectious sores should breath out their corruption in some air more remote from that catching city, and less liable to the contagion: and so, by an order of the lords of the council, Mr. Prynne was sent to a castle in the island of Jersey; Dr. Bastwick to Scilly; and Mr. Burton to Guernsey; where they remained unconsidered, and truly I think unpitied, for they were men of no virtue or merit, for the space of two years, till the beginning of this present parliament.

"Shortly upon that, Petitions were presented by their wives or friends, to the house of commons, expressing their heavy censures and long sufferings; and desiring, by way of appeal, 'that the justice and rigour of that 'sentence might be reviewed and considered; 'and that their persons might be brought from 'those remote and desolate places to London, 'that so they might be able to facilitate or 'attend their own business.' The sending for them out of prison (which was the main) took up much consideration: for though very many who had no kindness, had yet compassion for the men; thinking they had suffered enough; and that though they were scurvy fellows, they had been scurvily used: and others, had not only affection to their persons as having suffered for a common cause; but were concerned to revive and improve their useful faculties of libelling and reviling authority; and to make those ebullitions of their malice not thought noisom to the state: yet a Sentence of a supreme court, the Star-Chamber (of which they had not yet spoke with irreverence) was not lightly to be blown off: but, when they were informed, and had considered, that by that Sentence the petitioners were condemned to some prisons in London; and were afterward removed thence by an order of the lords of the council; they looked upon that order as a violation of the Sentence: and so made no scruple to order 'That the prisoners should be removed from those foreign prisons, to the places to which they were regularly first committed.' And to that purpose, warrants were signed by the Speaker, to the governors and captains of the several castles, 'to bring them in safe custody to London:' which were sent with all possible expedition.

"Pryn and Burton being neighbours (though in distinct islands) landed at the same time at Southampton; where they were received and entertained with extraordinary demonstrations of affection and esteem; attended by a marvellous conflux of company; and their charges not only borne with great magnificence, but liberal presents given to them. And this method and ceremony kept them company all their journey, great herds of people meeting them at their entrance into all towns, and waiting upon them out with wonderful acclamations of joy. When they came near to London, multitudes of people of several conditions, some on horseback, others on foot, met them some miles from the town; very many having been a day's journey; and they were brought, about two of the clock in the afternoon, in at Charing-cross, and carried into the city by above ten thousand persons, with boughs and flowers in their hands; the common people strewing flowers and herbs in the way as they passed, making great noise, and expressions of joy for their deliverance and return; and in those acclamations, mingling loud and virulent exclamations against the bishops, 'who had so cruelly prosecuted such godly men.' In the same manner, within five or six days after, and in like triumph, Dr. Bastwick returned from Scilly; landing at Dover; and from thence bringing the same testimonies of the affections and zeal of Kent, as the others had done from Hampshire and Surrey, was met before he came to Southwark by the good people of London, and so conducted to his lodging likewise in the city." 1 Clarendon, 199.

By the Habeas Corpus Act, 31 Car. 2, § 12, it is enacted, That no subject of the realm, inhabitant or resident of England, Wales, or Berwick upon Tweed, shall be sent prisoner to Scotland, Ireland, Jersey, Guernsey, &c. or other place beyond the seas, under heavy penalties upon all persons concerned in contriving such commitment, or transportation.

146. Proceedings in the Star-Chamber against Dr. JOHN WILLIAMS, Bishop of Lincoln, for publishing false News and Tales to the Scandal of his Majesty's Government; for revealing Counsels of State contrary to his Oath of a Privy Counsellor; and for tampering with the King's Witnesses: 13 & 14 CHARLES I. A. D. 1637: [2 Rushw. Coll. 416. 803.]

Sir John Banks knight, his Majesty's Attorney-General, Plaintiff, the right reverend Father in God, John Lord Bishop of Lincoln, Walter Walker, Tho. Lund, Cadwalader Powel, Richard Williams, William Catlin clerk, Ed. Lake, Jo. Mosteyn, and George Walker, Defendants.

PRIGEON'S credit coming in question, being a material Witness for the Bishop of Lincoln, the king's Attorney-General let fall the first Bill, fearing a defect of testimony, and preferred a second Bill against the bishop for 'tampering with the king's witnesses,' and upon that account the Cause came on the 11th of July, 1637, which held nine days debate in hearing; and great was the concourse of people every day to the court of Star-Chamber to hear this great Cause, the Bishop being at that time much pitied by the people, who then cast out speeches that that Bishop was prosecuted because the state wanted Money to go to war against the Scots, and that it was fit he should bleed in his purse by the Censure of the court of Star-Chamber to pay a round fine to the king of 10 or 12,000l.

The Information doth charge the said Bishop with a practice unduly to gain the sight and perusal of certain Examinations taken by the Lords of his majesty's Privy-Council, and commanded by them to be kept secret from the view of all men, to the end unlawfully and corruptly to procure Witnesses, directions and instructions for Witnesses to make Proofs to contradict and weaken the said Examinations: and for practising and corruptly tampering with Witnesses to retract their former Testimonies, and to vary from the same upon their second Examination: And for tampering with, and soliciting other Witnesses, produced, and to be examined for his majesty, not to depose against the said Lord Bishop, but to conceal their knowledge, and say they did not remember; and for Perjury in an Affidavit made by the Defendant Catlin in this Court, and subornation thereof: And for other offences, as by the said Complainant's Information more at large it doth and may appear.

Upon full and deliberate hearing whereof it plainly and evidently appeared to this honourable Court, that there being another Cause formerly depending in this court, between his majesty's Attorney-General Plaintiff, and the said Lord Bishop of Lincoln Defendant, for publishing false News and Tales, to the scandal of his majesty's Government, and for revealing of Counsels of State contrary to his oath of a privy-counsellor; one John Prigeon, gent. was in that cause examined as a Witness for the Defendant, and by an Order made in Hillary Term 10 Car. regis, liberty was given to the Plaintiff to examine the credit of the said Prigeon upon certain Exceptions, which were delivered into this court: And liberty given to the Defendant also to examine Witnesses to uphold and maintain his credit; in one of which Exceptions was, amongst other things, contained, That the said Prigeon being by one Elizabeth Hodgson, upon her oath, accused to have begotten a bastard child on her body: And being by the two next justices of the peace adjudged the reputed father; and appealing from them to the next Quarter-sessions held in the 9th year of his majesty's reign; to mislead the court of Quarter-sessions, and to free himself from that accusation, did at several times, and by several persons and means, after he was so accused, labour to corrupt the said Elizabeth Hodgson, and for money to procure her to lay the said bastard child on some other father, and to swear that some other, and not the said Prigeon, had begotten the said bastard; and that he did labour some Witnesses that could have testified against him, touching the said bastard, at the said Quarter-sessions, to suppress their Testimonies, and drew or endeavoured to draw others to equivocate upon their oaths, when they did appear.

Mr. Gardiner, Recorder of London, made a long and witty defence for the Bishop for several days together, much of which is repeated by some of the lords in their Speeches, which, for brevity sake, we omit; referring the reader to those repetitions which some of the lords do make of the Defence.

As to the first Bill depending against the bishop of Lincoln in the court of Star-Chamber, it was occasioned by the Examinations taken by some of the privy-council, of sir John Lamb, and Dr. Sibthorp, who, amongst divers other things, testified against the bishop of Lincoln, that the said bishop did give them great discouragement in their proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Courts against the Puritans; and that the Bishop asked sir John Lamb, what kind of people those Puritans were of whom he complained, and whether they did pay the Loan-Money? to which sir John replied, They did conform upon that account, and paid their money; but nevertheless they were Puritans, not conformable to the Church: to which the bishop replied, If they pay their monies so readily to the king, the Puritans are the king's best subjects, and I am sure, said the Bishop, the Puritans will carry all at last. These Examinations were sealed up, and Mr. Trumbel, clerk of the council, was required to keep them secret, and permit none to see them; but a discovery thereof was made to the Bishop, which, amongst other matters of state, was the occasion of the first Bill in this court against the Bishop, as the Information did set forth.

Sir John Banks knight, his Majesty's Attorney-General, his Reply in the Case against the Bishop of Lincoln.

May it please your lordships; Your lordships have heard a Defence made by the Defendant's counsel, that consists more of observation than of proof, and in examination of his Defence, I shall make it appear plainly, that they very much fail in their own observations. In their observations they have been curious in distinction of times, place, and other circumstances, to descant upon the particulars of witnesses, and men that were no parties to the suit; but for the main substantial parts of the Defence they have omitted. I shall desire to observe to your lordships, that, with a great scandal on his majesty's Proceedings in this Court, they have told you stories and tales that should be ground of this suit, viz. That it was through malice and hatred between sir John Mounson, Mr. Amcocks, and Prigeon; whereas it shall appear unto your lordships, that the suit was upon most just grounds, for the vindicating of public justice, and that sir John Mounson hath done nothing in this Cause, but according to the duty of his place, and clearing his own reputation. It will be necessary, since these things have been stirred, not for your lordships information, who knows it well, but for the satisfaction of the world, to clear and justify his majesty's proceedings, that I give you some information of the true ground of this suit, and of the necessity of it.

Michaelmas 4 Car. an Information was exhibited against my Lord Bishop by my predecessor, and that was for the contriving and publishing divers false Tales and News, to the scandal of his majesty's Government, and for revealing some things contrary to the duty of his place, and oath, as a Privy-Counsellor. This Cause came to issue, and in the examination of Witnesses, another issue happened, a collateral matter by itself touching the credit of Prigeon: Upon examination of this it fell out, (which we could not discover before publication in the first Cause) that there had been such tampering, seducing, and labouring of the king's Witnesses, as never was in any cause: There hath been such preparations, such instructions, such limitations to his own Witnesses, to direct them how far they should swear, to what to give answer, and to what not. My lords, these proceedings, if they might be suffered, tend totally to the subversion of all justice: for the proceedings in this Court, as in all other courts, is by examination of Witnesses returned in parchment, not viva voce; therefore if any be instructed what to swear to, and it so returned in writing, whether through threats, or for fear, or favour, or affection, it is impossible you should give a just Sentence, though you intend it never so clear. My lords, this appearing after publication in the first Cause, it was time, for example sake, to bring this Cause and these Misdemeanors to a public Sentence, to be a terror to all others for the like. So as, my lords, this Cause is not grounded upon the fabulous story between sir Jo. Mounson, Mr. Amcocks, and Prigeon, but upon these just grounds and proceedings; and herein we have great cause to bless God, and magnify his majesty's justice, that we live not under a cobweb-law, that taketh small flies, and lets great ones pass. This presence doth tell us, that honourable persons who do deserve well have his majesty's favour, and their own merits do receive a double honour; and this person, how great soever, if he deserve ill, he must receive a sentence according to his just demerit.

My lords, I shall come now to the particular Charges, and therein I shall begin with the first Charge, which is concerning the tampering with the four Witnesses, who deposed about this bastard-child; wherein the state of the question standeth thus. In February 10 Car. there was an Order for the examination of Prigeon's credit: among other things there fell out a question concerning a bastard-child, whether John Prigeon was the reputed father yea or no? There was for the proof of the fact produced before the justices Dr. Topham and Dr. Farmery; and before the justices at public sessions several witnesses, four of them, Lunn, Wetherel, Anne Smith, and Tub, deposed directly, that this Prigeon was the father of this child; some by confession from him, some by confession from herself being the mother of the child, who were present at the time of her delivery.

These Examinations thus taken for the truth of it that he was the father of the bastard-child, the justices did certify it in public sessions accordingly. But now my lord of Lincoln conceiveth with himself, that he cannot support the credit of Prigeon (which concerned him so much) unless he could get these four witnesses to vary from their former testimony, and by his agents hath laboured as you have heard. To this they have seemed to make some Answer: 1. The Order made 2 Maii 9 Car. and that was before sir John Bowles, serjeant Callis, and others; and that Order was to acquit Prigeon of the bastard-child, and to lay it upon one Booth. To that I shall give a clear answer: first of all, Dr. Topham and Farmery that were the men that took the Examinations concerning this bastard-child, were not present at the making of this Order. Secondly, The Witnesses, those four of them that should give the testimony for the Proof, no one of them were present: and it is proved that Wetherel was hired to be absent: and in the last place, this Order 2 Maii was contraried by the Order 3 Oct. when all the other justices save sir John Bowles were present at the sessions. And for the order that was confirmed by the court of King's-Bench, it was upon the regality of the order, but not in respect of the fact. And, my lords, there is another ground of it; for at that time Prigeon had submitted to keep the bastard-child, and given bond to discharge the parish, and maintain the child. This was proved by two witnesses: but the offence is not concerning this bastard-child; for suppose a man had a bastard-child, will that make his testimony wholly void? The Charge is, that after such time, as this was fully deposed by four witnesses, there must be a labouring with them, and giving of money to make a retraction. 1. For Wetherel's retraction, your lordships have heard he was examined at the sessions 1 Oct. that he did confess there John Prigeon intreated him not to appear at the sessions, and that he should answer to no more questions than the court asked him; this was his deposition at the sessions. Being examined in the second Cause, there he doth mince his Deposition, 160 Int. he saith Prigeon did not draw him by bribes or rewards to equivocate. And that it was for bribes and rewards it appeareth by George Walker's Examination; for he sweareth, that this money was to be paid to a butcher by 6d. in a joint; so it was not given as a bribe, but by 6d. in a joint of meat. George Walker sweareth, that Owen and Powel shewed Wetherel a Dictionary, and shewed him the meaning of the word Equivocation and Subornation, and this discourse was related to Elizabeth Smith. To which the Recorder replied, Mr. Attorney mistakes himself; I will not (saith the Attorney) touch upon any thing in my Reply that will not plainly appear in the Books.

To take off this Charge concerning Wetherel, they have read Wetherel's Deposition, (against whom all this proof is) to the 2, 3, 4, and 5 Int. to which Interrogatories his Deposition is a plain negative pregnant, made upon a leading Int. thus: Whether did Powel at the time and place aforesaid request you to write your name to any note at all? (to shew that it is leading) Wetherel answereth Int. 5, That the said Powel did not in January aforesaid, at the place aforesaid, request him to write his Answer to any note, or to any note to such effect; so he sweareth he did not at that time and place shew such a note. The Deposition of Walker is, That by the direction of Owen and Powel he tendered the note, as by the direction of the lord bishop. Another thing upon the examination of Wetherel, he was not examined till the 16th of May 13, and at that time he had copies of Walker's Examinations, and so prepared himself.

This is the answer I give to the Deposition of Wetherel.

They had next George Walker, a Defendant, who hath confessed against himself sufficient matter, for which I hope your lordships will Sentence him. It is proved he was employed to tamper with Alice Smith, and he must be the man to give an account to my lord bishop of the proceedings. They say it was a lawful and justifiable thing to ask a witness a question, and that Wetherel was but asked the question, and nothing more: my lords, here is more than asking the question, it appeareth in the proof that there was a Note delivered by Powel to Walker to subscribe, there was shewing to Wetherel a Dictionary to expound the words Equivocation and Subornation; so it was not an asking for bare information, but a tendering of notes to avoid equivocation in the cause.

In the next place they have insisted upon the Deposition of Lunn and Alice Smith; wherein they say, that what they have said was but an explanation of what they had formerly sworn, and no retraction, and that it was lawful for a witness to explain himself: but it will appear to be a plain retraction. 1. Alice Smith did depose formerly, that Prigeon sent for her, desiring her to see if she could get the woman lay the child upon any other. That was her Deposition at the sessions. But in the second Cause she sweareth it was to get her to lay the child upon any other that she reputed to be the father of it, and not upon himself. And so for Anne Tub her Deposition at the sessions, that Prigeon had offered her 20s. to get her lay the child upon any other but upon him; but her Deposition in the second Cause to lay the child upon some that were the true father: so here is a Deposition that a bribe should be given to lay the child upon any other but upon Prigeon, and now to depose to lay the child upon the true father, is a crossing of the former deposition, and far from an explanation.

They have taken some Exceptions to George Walker, to shew how improbable a thing it was, that he should be a fit person to negotiate in this business, and they told your lordships some reasons: George Walker and Prigeon were not kind, and therefore unlikely George Walker should be employed for supporting the credit of Prigeon. 1. In this particular they have not read that there was any difference between them two. 2. George Walker might be very well made choice of to be employed, for he was a proctor in my lord bishop's Court. 3. Suppose there were differences between them two, this was an employment for the bishop of Lincoln; for this was a service for my lord bishop, who was much engaged to maintain the credit of Prigeon, for it appears out of his own mouth by three witnesses, that it had cost him 1,200*l.*, and 1,000*l.* to maintain his credit; for Prigeon at this time had taken the child upon him, but the service that was to be done was for the bishop, and therefore George Walker a fit man for it. But they say here was only a question asked of Alice Smith, whether she had said so? here was no tampering with her to alter her Deposition: Look upon the Deposition of Alice Smith to Int. 29, 31, and there it will appear unto your lordships, it was not a bare asking of a question; did not he say it was to lay the child upon any other that was the true father? but the very question asked, they endeavoured to have proved in the second Cause. The question was, whether that Alice Smith could depose that Prigeon said unto her, Get the woman to lay the child upon the true father? George Walker brought word to the bishop they could get nothing from her as yet.

E. Smith Int. 29. saith, Alice Smith did then and there seriously affirm, that Prigeon offered her 5*l.* to lay the bastard child upon any other, and not upon him: and then this Deponent asked her, if she were not mistaken, for he meant it was to lay the child upon any other that was the right father; she answered again, no, she was not mistaken, the 5*l.* was to procure her to lay it upon any other, and not upon him; and said further, that the woman had acknowledged Prigeon had twice the use of her body against the church wall; that George Walker, in the presence of Pawel and Owen, and others, related unto them the substance and effect of the whole discourse with Alice Smith at Morton; and one of them desired to write his Letter to the bishop to give him satisfaction, and told this Deponent it was desired by Owen and Pawel to give his lordship an account of their journey; in which Letter was expressed, that they could gain nothing out of Alice Smith.—My lords, to confirm this we read George Walker Int. 17. who proveth the like pressing of Alice Smith; and in the end the consequence was, Alice Smith did vary from what she had formerly sworn.

Next place they have given some Answer unto Robert Richardson, to the 35 Int. (which being read was to this effect) saith, John Prigeon the elder did acquaint this Deponent to come and speak with the bishop of Lincoln before his Examination, and accordingly his lordship did in his little parlour speak with this Deponent, and did then and there acquaint him, that he had seen the copy of the Examinations taken at the Sessions, and did ask this Deponent who drew up the same; this Deponent answered his lordship, that he did it as clerk of the peace: the Bishop said, he was mistaken in the penning of the Deposition, for that he should have said, to lay the child upon the right father, and not otherwise: The Bishop asked how he would interpret the Record; he said he could think no otherwise of it than as the Witness had sworn. And this Deponent further saith he verily believeth his lordship would have had him to have altered the Record, that it might not trench upon Prigeon's credit, for he would have had him given it a right father.

My lords, your lordships may observe first of all, that my Lord Bishop sent for Richardson to come to him and speak with him, before he should be examined; then my lord asked who drew the Deposition of Anne Tub and Alice Smith; he told him they were drawn up in open court; he said he thought the Deponent was deceived, for it should be upon the right father; so here was a retraction, which was the point in issue. 3. He asketh him how he would interpret the Record, and wished him to be tender of Prigeon's credit.

My lords, this is of great consequence; for if my Lord Bishop could have gained the razing of this Record, to lay the bastard child upon any other that was the right father, then he had gained the cause; for the tampering with Witnesses was the ground of the cause.

The next Objection they made, was touching the fetching away of this same Alice Smith. They have told your lordships, that she was brought to Huntington, and not finding the commissioners there, they brought her up to London, and here she was examined, and if the king's Council would have examined her, they might have exhibited Inter; and they have told your lordships, that the Charge was, that she was shifted from place to place, that she might not be examined as a witness for the king. They have utterly mistaken this Charge of the Information; for the Charge is, that they did shift her away from place to place, that she should not be examined as a witness at the commission. 2. Of purpose to cause her to vary and retract her testimony, by working with her during the time of the execution of the commission, that she should have been examined for the king: For this commission was executed at Bedford but 12 miles from Huntington, where they were with Alice Smith; and if they had not an end in it, they might as well have brought her to Bedford, being but 12 miles, as to London, being 50 miles. 9 Martij the commission was executed at Bedford: 13 Martij executed at Leicester: 21 Martij adjourned and executed at Lincoln: 7 Aprilis executed at Huntington; and the very day that she was examined at London, this Alice Smith they sent unto her, and proffered her money, told her she should never want; she went away in poor habit, glad to borrow her maid's cloaths, returneth again gentewoman-like, and lendeth money.

They say, when she was at London, she continued there keeping an Ale-house at Whittington's Cat till the sickness in Michaelmas Term, and then was forced to go into the country; and all that time they might have examined her for the king, living in so open a manner. I agree, she might have lived openly at Whittington's Cat, and be known to the Justices of the Peace for keeping of an Ale-house, or perhaps for her good behaviour; but how the prosecutor of the Cause should come to find her, I know not: when she was with her husband, all his goods had like to have been taken in execution, and he had not 40s. to redeem them; yet she had means enough to furnish an Ale-house, and to live afterwards gentewoman-like. But, my lords, they have pressed us how we bring these Charges home upon my Lord Bishop, nothing fixeth upon him they say; God forbid he should be charged, unless he be an actor or procurer.

1. Observe these retractions, and these variations in the Depositions, they were procured to maintain the credit of Prigeon: It appeareth by three Witnesses that have been read, out of my Lord Bishop's own mouth, that the maintaining of the credit of Prigeon hath cost my Lord Bishop 1,200*l.* and another speaketh of 1,000*l.* If this Charge come not home to my Lord Bishop, why should he conclude himself of expending 1,200*l.* to maintain his credit; for it did concern my Lord Bishop, for he was his principal Witness in the first Cause.

Owen and Powel were the servants of the Bishop; and when in their journey they could not prevail any thing with Alice Smith, then the account of this must be given to my Lord Bishop, and Walker must write a letter accordingly: Cui bono, say they, who should receive benefit but Prigeon? Prigeon was the principal witness in the first Cause, my Lord Bishop did maintain his credit; it was no advantage to Prigeon, for the bastard child was submitted unto. And then your lordships have heard what a tampering hath been with Richardson, and that by my lord himself, who sent for him to come and speak with him before he was examined; and if he had prevailed with Richardson upon this, there had been an end of the business, for the retraction of Anne Tub, and Alice Smith, and Wetherel, had been as he would have it; then for the leading Inter' exhibited by himself in this Cause; so as I say these things trench upon the Bishop, and upon Cadwallader Powel, and George Walker, that were employed about Alice Smith: he procured Wetherel to subscribe a note, would have the meaning of the words equivocation and subornation to be expounded; and this is the man must give an account of the proceedings with Alice Smith to the Bishop; and all this appeareth upon his own Examination.

These are the things upon the first Charge.

I shall proceed to the second Charge, my lord bishop of Lincoln's scandal of the public Justices of the sessions, in saying the Order 3 Oct. was a pocket-order, made in an inn or an ale-house, and before any witnesses were examined. Your lordships may remember, that upon this Charge we made Proof, 1. That the matter of the Order was resolved by the whole court. 2. That what sir Jo. Mounson did was at the open sessions, at the desire of the other justices. 3. That my lord bishop of Lincoln had notice of the due making of this Order, and was satisfied it was justly and duly made; yet when sir John Mounson was gone into the country, he questioned it, that it was not made legally, but was a pocket-Order made in an inn or an ale-house; proved by three witnesses.

That which hath been said against this Charge, That the bishop had reason to question this Order 3 Oct. for J. S. told him sir John Mounson pulled it out of his pocket upon the bench; it appeareth by Dr. Farmery, William Parkinson, and Mr. Dallison, that my lord bishop was informed the Order was duly made, yet he doth publish it to be made in an inn or an ale-house.

Next place they say Parkinson was a single witness; he was no single witness, neither for the Tampering, nor for the Scandal: for it appears by William Amcocks, the bishop would have had the Order 3 Oct. impeached; and that if he were examined, he should say nothing: Richardson said, that the bishop would have had him accuse sir John Mounson for the undue making of the order; so as I say for the scandal, and for the tampering in this kind, Parkinson was not a single witness; nor in the affirming that the bishop said it had cost him 1,000*l.* to maintain the credit of Prigeon, for sir Tho. Mounson and Smith both swear the bishop said it had cost him 1,200*l.* and Parkinson speaketh of 1,000*l.* and said further, that the Bishop threatened to bring him into the Star-Chamber, because he would not comply with the bishop; but they say against Parkinson he was prepared by an Affidavit. For that, I must remember unto your lordships that this Affidavit was made by Parkinson upon occasion of the abuse offered by my lord bishop at the execution of the Commission; at which time the second suit was not thought of, for it was doubted whether we should proceed upon the Affidavit according to many precedents, or by way of Information, which was the cause of this information. They say this report might be raised by Prigeon; besides, no time appears, when this scandal was raised; they are mistaken in this, for it appeareth by Parkinson 43 Int. that the bishop said 20 Martij. 10 Car. it was a Pocket-Order, and made before witnesses were examined; and then Richardson Int. 78, to the same purpose; and E. Smith Int. 78, that this scandalous report was published in March 10. They say here was only a breach of a promise; the bishop only made a promise to sir John Mounson, that his order should not be examined after he was gone into the country; and will your lordships punish a man for the breach of a promise: the breach of the promise was not the thing, as the betraying of the truth in the king's cause, and it was the policy of the bishop to send away sir John Mounson, and afterwards draw it into question in his absence.

I do not remember any more they have said concerning this charge. But now it appeareth upon this charge, 1. That the bishop hath published that this order was made in an inn or an ale-house, before any witnesses were examined, to the scandal of public justice. That is the first offence in this second charge. 2. It is scandalous against his own knowledge, proved by three witnesses. 3. His endeavour to suborn Parkinson, 1. To send for him before he was examined, and would have had him say the order 3 Oct. was made in an inn or an ale-house. 2. To affirm to Parkinson, that some of the justices had confessed as much, and did threaten him, that if he did not agree with the justices, he should be questioned in the Star-Chamber; and when he could not prevail with him, then he did direct him, if he were examined he should answer only to the bare Inter; so in these particulars my lord bishop is concerned in this charge. Lunn, he is concerned in this also, for he was employed to speak with Parkinson, and kept him from the church, lest he should meet with Kilvert who was an informer: And Int. 5, he wished Parkinson to answer to no more than to the bare Int. and he should be well paid for his pains. So as I shall leave this second charge, which doth reflect upon my lord bishop and Lunn. And whereas they have pretended, that sir John Mounson should be an enemy to Prigeon, there was no proof at all of that in the books; for in truth he was the best means to release Prigeon, to get the order in the King's-Bench.

The third Charge is concerning the Affidavit of Catlin 11 Maj. 11 Car. made a scandalous Affidavit, which was, that Parkinson told him, he came to swear against the bishop, and that sir John Mounson had promised him 100*l.* for it, and he would swear home, and feather his nest by swearing against my lord bishop. 1. Your lordships have observed what manner of person he was that made the Affidavit, he appeareth by the sentence in the high commission to be a common swearer, a common bail, &c. so infamous, as I shall not need to repeat the thing in the sentence; and for any thing said to support his credit, nothing will sway with your lordships judgments. That that Affidavit is false, appeareth by Parkinson's oath; and that it was contrived in an Inn in the presence of Walker and Mostein is plainly proved.

In this the Defendants Counsel first make objection against the Sentence, that this sentence was after such time as he was examined; and though he be convicted of a scandal subsequent, that doth no way blemish his testimony: 1. I say, by the sentence it doth appear it was for offences done three or four years before his deposition taken; so the sentence was for matter of offence done before his deposition, and the sentence is but declaratory of what he was then: But they have read five ministers, that Catlin is a man of good credit, and one that preacheth well, and maketh a conscience of an oath. 1. These witnesses are but such witnesses as we produce upon our law-wager, or for compurgators; they swear only as in common charity: every man is bound to think another man honest, unless they did know the contrary, and some of these witnesses live a great way off, some 40 miles. The main part of their defence hath been to discredit Parkinson, and that they have done two ways: 1. They say he was a disguised person, and came in a minister's habit, and called himself by the name of parson Watson, to entrap Catlin, and therefore a witness not to be believed. 2. They do pretend that Parkinson's deposition was taken to fortify his affidavit.

For the first, this great matter that he should be a disguised person, and forswear his name, and called himself by the name of Parson Watson, and Catlin not to know him, the matter was thus.

When Parkinson did see what an Affidavit Catlin made against him, he did say that this Catlin did not know him: to that end and purpose, going with Mr. Culverwell a gentleman of 400*l.* per annum, went purposely into Catlin's company to see if he did know him. We shall prove unto your lordships, that Parkinson did not come in any disguised habit; true, he was in a black suit, but in no minister's habit, nor coat upon it, but in a black suit proper for a justice of peace's clerk: Your lordships will rather believe that which is judicially sworn, than extrajudicially spoken. I shall desire to read two or three witnesses to prove, that Parkinson did not come in any such disguised habit; which being read, Mr. Attorney proceeded, saying, 1. I shall observe, that the two witnesses, Booth and his wife, swear he did not come in any minister's habit. 2. It appeareth for half an hour together Catlin did not know Parkinson, till Mr. Culverwell's laughing at parson Watson's proffer to preach at Catlin's church next day.

In this third Charge I shall observe, how it trencheth upon these Defendants, (1.) You find Catlin guilty of perjury in making of a false Affidavit against Parkinson; and that he hath been formerly indicted of perjury, your lordships have heard by the sentence in the high commission. Walker and Mostein were present at the contriving of the affidavit. It was all one to Catlin whether to swear against sir Jo. Mounson, or Dr. Farmery.

My lord bishop of Lincoln (it should seem) did take this as a courtesy done unto him, for he did intend to give Catlin a living of 80*l.* per annum, but that he was advised by Walker to stay this living till this cause was heard. My lord bishop writ his letter unto Richardson on Catlin's behalf, that if any indictment were at sessions against Catlin for a common barrator, he should stay the same, and Powel his own servant carried the letter. Besides witnesses swear Catlin did boast of his favour from the bishop: he brought gold home with him, besides 3*l.* given him to bear his charges.

I shall now proceed unto the fourth Charge, which standeth thus: 20 Martii 10 Caroli, a Commission was executed at Lincoln, and this was to examine him touching the credit of Prigeon; divers Witnesses were there produced on the king's part. My lord bishop, and other the Defendants did draw from the king's witnesses what they had deposed, and threatened some of them after they were examined on the king's part; this is the charge.

Lancelot Harpham to the 94th Inter. saith, upon this deponent's relation my lord bishop willed Lunn to call for pen, ink and paper, and willed this deponent to write down the substance of what he had sworn, which this deponent by his lordship's persuasions did; but when his lordship had read the same he liked it not, but willed the said Lunn to write down the substance of this deponent's Relation, which he did accordingly, and then this deponent subscribed his name thereunto; then the Attorney-General said, here was the offence of the bishop to draw from Harpham the substance of what he had sworn, the charge being for tampering with Harpham, and other the king's witnesses. Bates saith he was sent with a message from the bishop to Edward Smith. These things are laid as crimes upon my lord bishop in this fourth charge. (1.) In sending for Edward Smith before he was examined, and conveying him out at the back-door, that my lord bishop should instruct him what to depose, sending for him after examination, questioning him what he had deposed, and told him he had sworn maliciously. Next place was this message intended for Edward Smith. (3.) The threatening of Edward Smith the king's witness, that he would sit upon his skirts; (4.) My lord bishop's sending for Harpham after he was examined, making him set down the substance of his deposition. (5.) William Amcock sweareth that Powell shewed him an interrogatory ready drawn to swear unto, and willed him to be careful what he swore, when he was examined for the king; For Lunn, he said, he never played the knave but in this business.

As to the executing of the Commission at Lincoln in March, 10 Caroli, wherein Kilvert was employed to attend for the king: my lord bishop of Lincoln called him base fellow, saucy fellow, base rascal, proved by three witnesses. The charges is likewise against Lunn, who called him base fellow, and told him 'if the business were over, he should know he was a man.' These imperious speeches from the bishop must needs dishearten the witnesses that did come for the king.

Lastly, As to the Charge for undue getting of Copies, to the intent to make a Counter-proof of the King's Witnesses. Your lordships may remember how Allen gave information to the king against the bishop, for the contriving of false news and tales scandalous to the king's government. The referrees that took the examination of Dr. Jo. Lamb, Dr. Sibthorpe, and others, they did trust sir William Beecher in this examination; they gave him a charge that the examinations should be kept secret, accordingly he sealed them up, and when his waiting month was done, he delivered them over to Mr. Trumbell; yet by undue means my lord bishop got copies thereof. (1.) It appeareth by sir William Beecher, inter. 5, that he was moved by several persons at court, to let the lord bishop understand the effect of these examinations; and that my lord bishop made use of those examinations, it appeareth by the proof that hath been read; and that the seal was broken off, and copies delivered to his steward. Now whether these be not strong presumptions, that my lord bishop had the sight of them, I must leave to your lordships.

My lords, I have done with the particular Charges, and your lordships have heard in the prosecution of this Cause, and in the proof of it, a heap of Offences, all tending to the subversion of public justice; a labouring, tampering, suborning, seducing and sending away of the king's Witnesses to suppress the truth, to swear against the truth, and to cause Witnesses to make retraction; a scandal raised against the proceedings of the justices at the sessions, and in particular an aspersion cast on the person of sir John Mounson, as though he had made the order in an Inn or an Ale-house, before any witnesses were examined. I hope your lordships will clear him in his reputation, that he hath done nothing in this cause but what becometh a person in his place, and what at other times hath been done by him and other justices in a public manner. My lords, these Offences, if they were committed by an ordinary person, are great crimes in themselves, but being done by my lord bishop of Lincoln, who is procurator, to be a guide, a light, a judge among the king's people, and to have a superintendent cure of souls within his diocese, these things considered in his person must needs aggravate his offences, for him that should be a light, to become darkness, and a guide to lead men into error, a judge to overturn the course of justice, in suborning of witnesses, &c. These things if they be not remedied will draw upon this nation, that infamy that was upon the people of Greece, that they would buy and sell testimony, dare mutuum testimonium: But what followed upon that, but the subversion and ruin of the common-wealth? For him that hath this superintendent cure of souls, to do any thing for the destroying of mens souls, it is an high offence. Fleta lib. 5. cap. 10. who writ in the time of E. 2. Si Perjurus, &c. That the man-slayer killeth the body, but the suborner killeth his own soul, and the soul of him that sweareth.

1. Against my lord bishop I pray Judgment, that he may be deeply fined, and receive a declaratory Sentence of this Court, as unworthy of any Ecclesiastical Dignity or Sacred Orders, and to be recommended to the High-Commission for that purpose; Pas. 34, Eliz. in a suit in the Star-Chamber against the bishop of St. Davids for contriving and publishing of a forged Will, he was here fined and referred to the High Commission for further proceedings.—10 Jac. John — bishop of Down was convented before the High Commission, and was there degraded for suborning of Witnesses.

Third place, I desire not only a Reparation of the credit of sir Jo. Mounson, but damages for the scandal; and though he be neither party nor relator, yet damages have been given by this court to a third person.—Mich. 31 Eliz. Three gentlemen that were no parties had 300*l.* damages given them, as in the case of the king's attorney against Price, damages were given to a sheriff that was no party.

Mr. Attorney-General having ended his Reply, the court proceeded to pass their censure: and the lord Cottington first begun and spake to this effect:

The Lord Cottington. "My lords; The business we are now met about, to put a period unto which hath taken up so much time already in this Court, that I intend to be very short in what I have to say. If we go to the well-head, and look at the original, (from whence these foul streams have issued) it is very small, and the inconveniences my lord hath fallen into, are rather of his own seeking, than any ways properly offered unto him out of the former passages, which touched his reputation in this court: however that maxim stands true, 'Quisq. est fabricator suæ fortunæ.' I am sure in this, that through the whole passage and current of it, he hath sought and wrought his own overthrow; and I am sorry that so great a person, so wise, and so well-experienced a man, and one who hath sate here himself, should now come to be censured for so foul crimes, so far unbeseeming his function, and those dignities he hath been graced withal in this commonwealth. I find (all the way) several undue practices, many heinous attempts, and foul faults in his agents, countenanced (nay maintained and set on) by his instigation, for which I hold both him and them worthy the censure of this court.

"I promise brevity, therefore I omit the relating of any thing concerning the truth of the matter, which concerned Alice Smith and Elizabeth Hodgson. If that Prigeon had been free from the getting of the bastard, and that he had suffered that way innocently; it had been better for my lord of Lincoln to have advised him to a patient undergoing that affliction, and have stopt the public defamations, which might grow thereupon, with as little noise as he might, 'Quam queat minimo:' but these stirs which follow after, and the great expences which my lord bishop of Lincoln was at to preserve Prigeon's reputation, plainly shewed there was somewhat more in it than ordinary, when, rather than that should be tainted, my lord would absolutely overthrow his own.

"Prigeon was to be a witness for my lord bishop, and a main person he was, on whom he depended for the clearing himself of those charges, which your lordships know he was taxed withal, by the first bill. In the mean time a bastard is laid unto him by Elizabeth Hodgson, which in my lords estimation was much disabling to Prigeon's testimony; and therefore my lord bishop what doth he? He not only labours to suppress a truth, and to conceal a fault in his witness, but he will have him discharged of it, 'Quo jure quæve injuria,' it matters not.

"Hereupon the proceedings of the justices of the peace must be either made none, or put out of order, so that they stand instead of none. A new father must be found, and because there was a commission to be sate upon, and witnesses to be examined, some must be absent till the commission was over: others are deterred and threatened, and sir John Mounson and Dr. Farmary must be held for to act nothing that must stand in this cause, (though in the public sessions) but their orders in that cause are pocket-orders.

"Owen and Powel, two servants to my lord bishop of Lincoln, they set their wits to work to convey Alice Smith out of the way, and that with rewards of no small value. Letters are written, and much ado there is; the several misdemeanors of Lunn and Walker are apparent enough; and Catlin he comes not behind the rest, nor must I let him pass, although he hath better luck in the carriage of his knavery than any of the rest; and for the procuring, gaining, and keeping of depositions from the custody of the council-table, and the clerks there, it is plain enough, I will make my word good, and go to Censure.

“ Lunn, (who is an agent in all the business) I hold him unfit for to be an officer any more, (he now being a Proctor-Register) I fine him at 300*l*. And for my lord bishop of Lincoln, I fine him at 10,000*l*. to the king, and to be imprisoned in the Tower during his majesty's pleasure, and to be suspended from all his ecclesiastical functions, both ab officio et beneficio; and I refer him over to the High Commission-Court to Censure him as they think fit concerning his degrees, and to repair sir John Mounson's reputation, to pay him for the injury done to him, in particular, 1,000 marks.”

Sir John Finch. “ My lords; This Cause hath held us already nine days. I find in it six Charges. 1. The first and main is for tampering with Witnesses, to retract their Testimonies, or to vary from the same. 2. For seducing them not to depose at all. 3. For undue practising to gain a sight of some Examinations kept in the Council-Chamber by the Clerks of the Council. 4. For preparing and instructing Witnesses by the said Examinations. 5. Perjury in Catlin in an Affidavit, and subornations thereof. 6. Other undue proceedings, whereby to cause witnesses to say, that they did not remember, or the like.

“ I will only insist upon two things. 1. How this trenched upon my lord bishop of Lincoln. 2. How far, and in what manner he pursued it.

“ I question not whether the child gotten upon the body of Elizabeth Hodgson be Prigeon's, yea or no; however the Justices of the Peace at the sessions, Dr. Topham and Dr. Farinay give up, that it is laid to him: yet legally Prigeon is free, for by a Statute 18 Eliz. though the Order be, yet an Appeal may be made. Now in the second place, what is this to my lord bishop of Lincoln, utrum pater sit necn? ”

“ The Bishop is taxed for scandalous Words in matter of state, contrary to his duty as a subject to his sovereign, contrary to his Oath as a Privy-Counsellor. Now Prigeon being a Witness, must justify that no such fault slipt from my Lord Bishop, his testimony, which seems to be suspected, and why? not for the having a child fathered upon him, but for that he goes about in publico to suborn witnesses, and to wrest the truth by unlawful courses, and it is to be thought that he, who was of such an evil conscience, as that he would cause others, by any way of bribes, gifts, threats, or the like, to forswear themselves, and hazard their souls, might himself easily be tampered withal to do unjust acts, and to take that false oath also by himself, being led to it by hopes and rewards, which he by all means sought to procure in others, for his own safety.—Now if my Lord Bishop had used other means, and gone the right way to maintain the credit of his witnesses in a fair manner, it had been commendable; but whether he did so or no it is to be enquired after.

“ By the way, my lord, give me leave to say what I think, it is not always necessary in this Court to have a truth proved by two or three Witnesses: men will be wary in Bribery, and Extortion, and the like, to do it in public, or to have many acquainted with those works of darkness. And singularis Testis many times shall move and induce me verily to believe an act done, when more Proofs are shunned.

“ But to come to some of the particulars. I find here, that Wetherel hath been often tampered withal, by two of the bishop's servants, Owen and Powel, and there was a note shewed to George Walker to enquire of Wetherel, whether Prigeon had done any thing with him or no?—But to take off this, (Mr. Recorder saith) George Walker is singularis Testis. Now it's plain Wetherel swears punctually, that he met with Prigeon, and was advised to speak sparingly, and no more than he needs must.

“ For Alice Smith, she deposeeth that Prigeon wished her to win Eliz. Hodgson to lay it to somebody else, and he would give her 20*s*. and so doth Anne Dove; now Alice must afterwards equivocate, and say, she was proffered money to get her to lay it on the right father, which to induce her to is no hurt.—And I find, that Alice Smith is carried away on horse-back by Powel, and absented till the commission was set, and was past, at Lincoln, and then brought back again by Powel. And I find she went out poor and needy, she returns well clad, gentlewoman-like, and able to lend 8*l*. at a time, who was, before Owen and Powel tampered with her, so poor, that her goods were distrained upon for rent.

“ George Walker, he saith he could do no good with them, and so writes to the bishop. Now for Richardson, the Bishop told him, that he knew the orders that were made at the sessions, and Richardson is tampered withal to suppress that order, and told, that if he would, he might do the bishop good service.

“ Now for Lunn, I find him run through with the bishop in all the case, he teacheth to smother and to equivocate; so that I find Powel, Owen and Walker, guilty of the first charge; Lunn I shall sentence, but not for that charge.

“ Now my lord himself, out of his own mouth, professed to two witnesses, viz. to sir John Mounson, and one Edward Smith, that to defend Prigeon's credit it had cost him 1,000*l*. if not 1,200*l*.—My Lord Bishop excepts against some Witnesses, as Bates I hold him faulty, and for Mr. Kilvert's misdemeanors, though he did provoke my lord, yet he should have forborn. It was not so much to affront my Lord Bishop, as to animate his witnesses for the king, which the presence of so great a person might have daunted.

“ And your lordships know, that in the circuit, if a great man have a cause at the bar, he is not to sit on the bench, his nod or frown, nay his bare presence, (by way of observation) may do much with inferior persons. I discommend my lord for his passion, and commend Kilvert for the zealous prosecution of his cause. I must clear sir John Mounson, and for Pattison disguising of himself in the habit of a minister, (true it is, a shift they had to find out what might be;) But the matter was apparent to all they know he was a counterfeit.

“ And for Catlin’s testimony, I weigh it not; but I find my lord tampering with Smith, with Edward Smith. He must be brought in by Mr. Mostein, and at the back door too, and after that he had taken his oath, was told he had sworn maliciously, and was advised beforehand what to say, and the bishop chid him, and asked why he would be sworn, and not acquaint him, and let him know before; and there is many proofs of my Lord Bishop’s dehorting and terrifying others.—For Walker, I shall not Censure him, being not the manner of this court to censure, when he is not charged with any particular, but in general.—For Luna, I find him threatening Mr. Kilvert, and I find him tampering divers ways, and getting the writings from the clerks.—I agree with my lord Cottington, and fine him 1,000 marks. I clear Mostein. Catlin I leave with a non liquet; and do censure Lunn to be disabled, by way of his profession, either to be register or proctor any more.—For Cadwallader Powel and Owen, I agree with my lord Cottington.—And for my Lord Bishop, I censure him 10,000*l.* Fine to the king’s majesty, to be suspended ab omni officio et beneficio, during his majesty’s pleasure, and likewise to be imprisoned in the Tower during the king’s pleasure, as my lord Cottington said before; also for to repair the credit of sir John Mounson, I fine him 1,000 marks to him; and sure, my lords, his person doth not diminish, but rather aggravate his faults: for to be faulty in scandalizing his master, and then suborningly to bolster up his fault, by such gross and unbecoming manner, is worse in him than it had been in another man.

“ For as Mr. Attorney well noted, for him that is set to have a care of souls, to be corrupter of them; for him that is set as a light on a hill, to hide the truth; I call to mind his greatness, his place and his dignity: but had he lived a private ignorant man, I should have gone very deep with him; but he that hath knowledge to rectify himself, and hath sat in the place to direct consciences, to wrest and wrong consciences, I must go as deep full in every thing as my lord Cottington, and I shall here crave your excuse, and end.”

Sir John Bamston. “ I believe, my lords, that the Lord Bishop is guilty of three of the Charges, and I conceive he had a sight of the Writings, from the Council-Chamber.—I find him procuring some to absent, to deter others, and all to support Prigeon’s credit. Alice Smith first deposeth, that Prigeon offered her *5*l. to prevail with Elizabeth Hodgson to lay the child to any other man.—Now my Lord Bishop be must intermeddle to support his credit. I disallow of his tampering with Wetherel; to wish a witness to keep away, or to wish him to say less than he knows, is not justifiable; it not so much concerned him, but it seems he thought it did, and therefore he must spend 1,000*l.* or 1,200*l.* to make that good: So sir John Mounson and Alice Smith deposeth, Alice Smith is fetched, and carried, and maintained, enriched by the bishop’s servants. I find many shifts in my Lord Bishop to effect his desire; it’s plain she went away poor, returns rich. Wetherel must be tampered withal, is also plain by several confessions.

“ Now to the second Charge, the slander is laid on the justices: Sir John Mounson saith openly in court, the order apparently made, yet the bishop strives to suppress it. He useth all the ways he can, either by fair enticements, or by foul menaces and threats, to have them in the Star-Chamber, &c.—Now, my lords, however he prevailed not, yet he attempted, he endeavoured subornation of perjury: And wisely did Mr. Attorney to lay the charge in that manner he did, for undue and unjust undertaking to suborn witnesses, it’s a crime equal, though he effect it not, yet it’s maleficium condemnationis, and is censurable.—I find my lord bishop of Lincoln much to blame in tampering, persuading, threatening, and directing of Witnesses. A foul fault in any, but in him most gross, who hath curam animarum, throughout all his diocese. To destroy souls is most odious, and to be severely punished.

“ To proceed therefore to Censure, I meddle not with Bates his testimony, but I shall fine Powel 300*l.* I clear Mostein: And for Luna I shall fine him 1,000 marks, and to be disabled also from his function. And for my lord of Lincoln, I hold him not fit to have the care of souls, and therefore I do censure him to be suspended ‘tam ab Officio, quam a Beneficio.’ and agree for the Fine of 10,000*l.* and imprisonment during the king’s pleasure. And for sir John Mounson, I find he hath done nothing but as he ought, and therefore I hold it fit his credit should be repaired, and to that end I shall agree with my lord Cottington to give him 1,000 marks.”

Mr. Secretary Windebanke. “ It is needless for me to relate the business, or to declare the name of the crime for which this great person is censured here in this court. To free your lordships from any further trouble, having seriously considered the matter, I do find not only my Lord Bishop himself, but also his agents faulty; and therefore for the fines, punishments, and imprisonments both to him and them, I agree in all with my lord Cottington; and for sir John Mounson also.”

Sir Thomas Germaine. “ I agree with my lord Cottington.”

The Earl of Lindsey. “ I do agree with my lord Cottington in omnibus.”

The Earl of Arundel. “ My lords, the cause is great, the person eminent, the prosecutors, as in relation to the king, to be respected. The person that now is on the stage to be censured, one of the grave bishops of the realm, one who himself hath born sway, and hath sat in a high office under two famous kings, and now comes to be censured for undue proceedings in matter of justice. He who had the protection of equity, now hath turned to be a subverter of right, and an oppressor of the truth, by concealing her from that she delights in, the light: unduly menacing, deterring, and debarring witnesses in a cause of such a nature, as concerned so great a person as the greatest we have to do withal, under God, on earth. I protest I speak it with grief, I am sorry for his person, much more for his profession, no child being more revered to a mother, than I am tender of the church, and of that coat: But upon such blemishes to forbear censure, were to allow of them: I do therefore agree with my lord Cottington in the fine, imprisonment, and in all the rest."

The Earl of Manchester. "My Lords; I cannot but admire to see, that a man of that eminency for parts and fortune to overshoot himself so far, and to be transported in so ignoble a way, as my lord bishop of Lincoln hath been, that he would undo his own to maintain the credit of another man. Give me leave a little to unfold the occurrences, that it may appear how this came about, and what occasioned this his so gross an error. About the fourth year of his now majesty's reign, a bill was exhibited into this court against my lord bishop of Lincoln, the complaint was about matter of state: now Prigeon was a main witness for the clearing my lord from being held guilty of what was thus alledged. The Bill was slow-paced, and slept from 4 till almost 8 Car. Regis, and now a provocation begets an Information Nov. 8th; and in February following the bastard is born, here is a touch upon Prigeon's credit, this matters not to the bishop for ought we see; but in May following it must be laid on another father, and one Boons is found out for the same purpose, and it must be fathered on him. The justices of assize publicly ordered, and set it down, that it is laid upon Prigeon, and hereupon he is thought to be disabled of his testimony for the bishop of Lincoln, if he have occasion to use him, for his clearing in case of those accusations and informations laid against him.—Whereupon this Prigeon must be set upright, and made an honest man, and be rectified, though it be by indirect and unlawful means; nay, most unconscionable courses, by wresting the consciences, and falsifying oaths for the same.

"Now, my lords, your lordships well know, that every man's state, every man's credit, his possessions and livelihood, much depends upon oaths; for if not upon the jurors, yet the witnesses in any case of evidence, be it for matter of title, or matter of fact, if they be by sinister courses, and by bribes and threats, be it for fear or for love, if they be caused to swear against their consciences, and that tye be taken away whereby they stand obliged before God and men to give right to the truth, no man is sure of any thing he enjoys, nor can expect to get any thing that is unjustly detained and withheld from him in the proceeding of any court whatsoever.—And I find my lord bishop much to blame, and indeed no more than an abettor in many passages of this cause tending this way.

"There be six faults he is charged withal, and I find him faulty in three great ones.—For his tampering with Witnesses, it is plain enough, and I am sorry it breaks out so in all the way as the cause goes. 1. In withdrawing Witnesses, and absenting them out of the way. 2. In preparing, fitting, and disposing Witnesses to his own ends. 3. In deterring them before they are to take Oath, and threatening them after. 4. In sifting out unlawfully, by indirect and sinister courses, what Evidence and Proof was given, so to be better enabled to have cross Oaths and Proofs against the Evidence that was before. 5. To cause witnesses to speak less than they know, and to conceal the truth, or at least to vary from that which they had formerly sworn. 6. Getting the copies out from the Clerks of the Star-Chamber, and keeping them a long time from that place, where they ought to be and reside.

"Now for a man of art, of a prompt and ingenious wit, a well-experienced man, who hath been a Judge, and well knew the inconveniences of these defaults, and the grossness of them, to run into them so violently, and so foul, I cannot but admire, and much pity him.—Nay, he doth take upon him to defend, and to patronize Catlin too, although it be absolutely to overthrow and undo himself. But as it is said, 'Nemo læditur nisi a seipso,' if my lordship had not been over-busy for to do those men good, he had never done himself this harm.

"Now for Kilvert's affront to him, I must needs say it may seem over-much in the place where it was done, being in the chief place of the diocese, and to his own person: but being it was in such a cause, where witnesses were to be heard and examined for the king, and my lord being a great man in that place, I pass it by, as his zeal and earnestness in prosecution of the cause, which might else have suffered, had he not used the better courage, and put the better face upon it.

"For the getting the Writings from the Council-Chamber, it is plain enough, and they were absent long enough, and whether he had used or perused them it matters not; surely he would not have them gotten from their due station, and place of abode, only to lie by him, but that he would make use of them. And I must needs commend sir William Beecher's discretion and ingenuity for his courage in that particular.

"Your lordships have heard already by the two Lord Chief Justices, what the nature of these crimes are, though it be not subornation of perjury, yet it is manifest injury to the witnessing of a truth; and I suppose both they that do prevail, and they that are over-ruled and won to such dishonest courses, are much faulty; and therefore I shall agree with my lord Cottington for the Fine upon the two servants of my lord bishop, Owen and Powel. And also I fine Lunn in 1,000 marks; I clear Moslein, and I must not let Catlin escape, if I can legally do it, but he hath better fortune than the rest, though I think not a whit less culpable.—And for my Lord Bishop, I must; for his fine, imprisonment, and suspension from his dignities, offices, and benefices, agree with my lord Cottington, and so in all the rest.”

The Lord Treasurer. “My Lords; This Cause hath held a great time, your lordships have had much patience and great attention, and applied yourselves to give ear to the defences that have been made therein, which have been very well performed by the counsel on my Lord Bishop’s behalf.—The cause is great, a great man that is this day sentenced, and in a matter of very high nature for me, my lords, to run over the several charges, and to explain how and wherein I find my Lord Bishop and his agents culpable, and very well deserving the censure of this court for their crimes, it were bootless, nay altogether needless to insist upon the tampering with Alice Smith, and Wetherel, with the undue practices of Lunn, Owen and Powel, these things have been copiously set out before, and for me to repeat, or to make any relation of my observations in the occurrences and passages of the cause, it were but actum agere. The business falls out very unhappily, and all the way carries with it a relish. My Lord Bishop’s encouraging and setting on the several agents, that were used for the clearing and justifying Prigeon’s reputation; so that in the prosecution of the matter, probable surmises come to be violent and forcible instigations; and whereas my Lord Bishop strives to suppress a fault, which is like to redound to Prigeon’s disesteem; my lord utterly overthrows his own credit, and labouring to take a stain out of another’s face, opens several scars and ulcers in his own.—My Lord Bishop might better have let the truth have been bolted out, than so smother it, as to injure his own reputation, and cause himself to undergo far heavier and fouler aspersion, than the crimes in his witnesses could ever have brought upon them or him.—I much pity him, and I am heartily sorry that he was so over led with desire, as so hotly to pursue a thing that might with a great deal of more discretion have been let alone.—And truly I conceive it is now apparent to him, and he himself is sorry for his own intemperate prosecutions; and I hold no censure can be so heavy to him, as that your lordships should hold him censurable, and that he should now incur the dislike and condemnation of this court, wherein he hath sat as eminent in place and dignity, as the rest that now are to pass Sentence upon him.—What Censure therefore my lord Cottington before me hath given, both for Lunn, Owen, and Powel, both in number, rate, and weight, I agree unto; and so I do also for the fine upon my Lord Bishop of Lincoln, his imprisonment during the king’s pleasure, and the rest.”

The Lord Archbishop of Canterbury. “Sorry I am, my lords, that such a man as my Lord Bishop of Lincoln for profession; and sorry that he, being so wise, so discreet and understanding a man every way, should come to stand culpable of such faults as should deserve the censure of this court, and in this nature, that it should fall out that by being over-active and over-doing businesses of other mens, to do his own, nay even thereby also to undo himself.—We have adversaries too too many amongst ourselves, but this day’s work opens a way for the Romanists to take advantage by it, to see so eminent a person as a bishop, and so eminent a bishop as he, to become thus censurable in a thing of so high a nature in this high court, it opens way I say to them of rejoicing, which I would to God had not been at all, or at least not by him.

“When I look upon and consider his excellent parts, both of nature, and achieved unto by study and art; when I think upon his wisdom, learning, agility of memory, and the experience that accompanies him with all those endowments, it puts me to stand; that after he had been overtaken in one error in the first cause, he should not have recalled himself, and made a stand, but that he hath now run into a far worse, and more desperate a one in this cause, by obnoxious and criminal ways, even to a very precipitation and downfall of himself and his credit. What though there was some question made, and some proofs on foot, whereby his loyalty to the king his master seemed to be in dispute, and his discretion might have some ways come to trial in matter of words, discovering his affection in some matter of state? must he seek unlawful means to procure his actions and words to be lawful, and leave the course of a good conscience to bolster up a fancy of innocency in another man, and make himself plainly faulty, for to make another man seem free from shame? I could wish heartily from my heart (however this cause be, let it be as it is) that his deportment in passion had been like to that of St. Cecilia. I read it in a very good author, and it is not impertinent, nor unworthy whatsoever patience, when a great stir there was, and all the stream and current run quite against her to bear her down in a most furious and violent manner, she mildly in the heat of these storms, and when those billows seemed to overwhelm her, and hide her from all hopes of being admitted hearing her to plead her innocency, much less to gain success to her desires, it being told her there were many witnesses against her, but none that did, or would be, or seem to appear for her, or in her behalf. She used the saying of holy Job, ‘Testis meus est in Coelis,’ My witness is above: and so it fell out, for as the story saith) when the matter came to be scanned, the witnesses that were against her, (by what means, or from whence, or how, I know not) but they were so daunted and struck with such an amazement, that it was their general vote, 'Nos nihil habemus contra Ciceliam.' I have it in St. Augustine, a Father of the Church, whose authority there is no doubt of, he being held learned amongst the best of that time, lib. 1. 'Contra hæreticum donatum.' It had been better with my Lord Bishop if he had had such a cause: I am sure if the circumstances of his behaviour had been more temperate and mixed with more patience, the event could not have been so unlucky, and his Censure so sharp, as it is now like to be.

"I may be bold to say it, my lords, for it's no untruth; I have been five several times upon my knees to the king my master in his behalf, I delivered for him several petitions myself into the king's own hand, and I then did that (which had I known what now I do) I should not have done. I sent him under my own hand the king's answer upon every petition. And after all those five several services, I must tell you, my lords, I was but coarsely dealt withal, nay very ill requited; yet was I overcome to move again at Christmas last, and I have it under his own hand, or (if his secretary writ the letter) his own hand and name is underscribed, that he had better and more hopes by my once moving the king, than he had formerly had, by the solicitation and means of all the friends he had at court.—And no longer ago than at Christmas last I moved the king my master again in his behalf; and then (had he solicited that which was intended for his good, and prosecuted the same with submission) it had in all likelihood gone better with him than he could have expected, nay, I think, as the case stood, better than he then desired.—But a cross business came just in the way at the very time, (of which your lordships, or the most part of you, I am sure, are privy to) and had not I then interposed myself, (the king being then so exasperated against him) he had fallen. But to let pass my desires, and the earnestness I used, and the tenderness I had, lest my public aspersion should have been opened, and such as could not have been wiped away, but needs must have left a stain to my coat.

"I must needs say thus much for his majesty, he was very inclinable to have had a fair reconciliation, as may appear by his often asking what Lincoln did, 'doth he seek to repair my credit? Hath he any shew of sorrowfulness for his fault?' And, my lords, I may safely say, because I truly speak it, who ever penned his petitions, howsoever they seemed to be his friends, or whosoever advised him to let them pass in that form, they did him, though questionless he is able to pen them himself, an injury, yet if he did it by advice they were not therein his friends, for in them all there is not one word tending to submission and confession, or so much as an acknowledgment of a fault, whereby any shew of recantation in that nature might be made to his majesty, as both in duty he ought, and in wisdom ought have made proffer of, and with more safety and assurance have performed, insomuch as that by his stiff and stubborn behaviour, there was no way but to have the business fully ript up, heard, and decided.

"Yet there were not wanting divers ill disposed persons, who bruited it forth, and very boldly gave out, that my lord bishop of Lincoln had not made any fault, or done or spoken ought, but that which he could stand unto, and needed not to be ashamed of, only that he was rich and must be let blood, he might well spare it, and the king wanted 10,000*l.* or 12,000*l.* and so he should have little said to him, if it was once condescended unto, and either given by him, or gotten from him. But howsoever these reports go, the king is just as he is honourable; and though he was inclined to mercy (for so the bishop of Lincoln had found it, if he had sought it seasonably) yet now you see, there is cause, and just cause of censurè, and in a very high nature of desert in him to be sentenced by this court.

"Now for the nature of the cause, the several Charges of the proofs, and the defences also that have been by the lord bishop's council, hath fully and amply been opened by the two lords chief justices, and if I should attempt any thing this way, it were but needless labour to myself, and would breed a tedious troublesomeness to your lordships, dictum diere would be all, when I had said all.

"I leave to meddle with the manner of the proceedings, and must give Mr. Attorney a great and large commendation, and Mr. Solicitor also for their wise stating of the cause, and for their wisdom, wit, temper, and patience in the prosecuting of the same.—The matter is ill, and howsoever it perhaps be not subornation of perjury, yet to tamper with witnesses, to threaten, deter, afright, corrupt, or to silence, or absent those that are to witness a truth, and to give evidence in a court of justice, are ejusdem nature, a very foul crime and a most odious and detestable fault, in any man of what condition soever he be: and if these things be suffered and may go unpunishable, no state can stand, and it destroys the interest of meum et tuum, and no man is sure of what he holds, or can say whether he hath an estate or no.

"It is a point that ruins all right, and is the utter enemy and subverter of all justice, and must needs overthrow any state, where it is not weeded out and prevented by severe animadversion and corrections when it happens to be found out. First, It destroys maximum mandatum, the great Commandment given by the great Lawgiver, God himself, 'Thou shalt not bear false witness.' In the 5th of Leviticus, if a man know a truth he is not to conceal it; nay, he is to witness it. In the 23d of Exodus, a man is not in any case to bear unjust witness, and so in the ninth of Deuteronomy, it is in criminalibus, and he that did bear false witness was to suffer per legem talionis that same punishment and loss, which by his false testimony the other party had undergone.

"In all the time that passes from the creation of the world until the law, I do not find that the Holy Ghost once made mention of any, that attempted in this way. I find no shadow nor overture of any such crime; the corruption of nature had not then grown to the height, and so over-flowed the banks, as to break out so outrageously, and produce any such ill disposed persons.

“Insomuch as I find not any tract, no vestigia of the like precedent for above 3,000 years, and the fathers of the church upon that place, where it is said, ‘out of the mouth of two or three witnesses shall every thing be justified;’ they descant upon it, why two or three witnesses in matters of consequence? Because, say they, so many should not be subject to be tampered withal, being they might be of several tempers, several conditions, and so the truth might be had by some of them, if not by all.

“And for a long time I read of none, but of the devilish practice and leading piece of impiety set on foot by Jezebel, for what cause, and how prosecuted, you all well know, and what she was, how she sped, and what end she made is recorded to posterity. Yet, my lords, I pray you observe and note with me, how warily the Holy Ghost goeth about in the setting out of this fact, and the passages therein in the 21st verse, as if the Spirit of God was unwilling to display and discover the heinousness of this monster hatched by this vile woman; as if he would not have it seen, he shadows it forth in a low stream, that there came in two sons of Belial and said, &c. As if the original of this odious practice was not rooted in human nature, but took his birth from hell, it came in with two sons of Belial in the devil’s name.

“Well, afterwards such a tutor could not want apt scholars, and, as Saint Paul saith in another case, ‘when I come to speak of it ‘after the manner of men,’ I find it then practised, and that, with a witness, ‘it out-faced the God of truth,’ though truth itself must not be trodden underfoot; but this engine fetched from hell, must be planted to defeat the counsels of God Almighty. They found out and hired false witnesses against Christ himself, who they were you know, Mark 14, 55. ‘The chief priests and the elders, and all the whole council sought false witness against Jesus to put him to death;’ and after Christ Stephen had the same measure, Acts 6, 11. ‘Then they suborned men, who said, we have heard him speak blasphemous words against God and against Moses.’

“Thus amongst those stiff-necked and hard-hearted Jews, the fault was in use when sin and iniquity grew ripe, and, as the Prophet saith, ‘Faith and truth could scarce be found ‘amongst mortal men;’ but the subversion and destruction of their city follows, and there comes in the government of a warlike nation and people, the Romans; amongst whom I find some laws made against false witnesses, and those very severe ones.

“Besides other laws, in the law of the twelve Tables there is a strict law confirmed against it; and these twelve tables were not made by any mean advice or persons, but by the persons of a powerful council and the decemviri: that be that was found faulty in this notorious crime, he was to be thrown down a steep high rock, to have his bones shivered all to pieces, enonte Tarpeio, or e saxo Tarpeio; afterwards the law-givers pursued this fault with banishment and confiscation of goods, ‘Confiscatio bonorum fiat et puniatur uti pro crimine falsi.’ Within those times was a heavy and most severe punishment, whereby their posterity also was branded with the fault of them that went before them. In the ninety-fifth Council I find a course set down for the prevention of this crime, and a punishment set for the offenders therein. And in later times Bartolus often meets with it, and goes very precisely and exactly in the case, that if so be it be found in any man, so much as an overture of tampering with witnesses, it is censurable; reus est, he is guilty, though he effect not his purpose, if he menace, threaten, or deter a witness. And so, my lords, shall I do, though he but barely attempt to smother, deter, or hinder any witness, when he is to give his testimony; be it by words, looks or actions, promises or threats, it comes much to one in my opinion upon the matter.

“Now, my lords, to come unto the laws of the church, if we peruse the Canon and Ecclesiastical Law, there we shall often in every age, have somewhat or other still established against it. In the Canon Law the second part of the Decretals, if any man shall be a suborner of witnesses, ‘Etiam instigator aut compulsus a domino,’ if he bring a false testimony (though he be even enforced to it by his superior lord, governor or his master) deliver him over to excommunication, ‘et sic maneat usque ad exitum vitæ,’ and so he must stand and remain in that state and case during term of life. A grievous thing, and a most heavy burthen, the sentence of excommunication is to an offender, though now in these looser times it be slighted and little set by; yet in cases of this nature when the offence is so high and transcendent, and of condition tending to the ruin and condemnation of the soul, the party at that time, and for that present, even dallying, mocking and abusing of God to his very face, to be left void of the Communion of Saints, to be bereaved of the benefit of being a member of Christ’s flock, and cut off from that holy body the church, I think that no man is in a worse and a more miserable estate, and more to be pitied, if he be insensible of it himself.

“To come to the first council of Macedon, the seventeenth canon, ‘Si sit ille inter falsos juratores, reus esto.’ And what is he guilty of? Of no small matter. Ranked and ranged in the degree and place of a murderer et ca homicidii.—Nay, he is worse than a manslaughterer for he that kills a man destroys but one, and that but the body neither, for he cannot any ways infringe the union of his soul that it had with his Maker. But he that goes about to suborn and procure false witnesses; he at one time destroys two souls, both his own, and the soul of him that he so in that kind intermeddles withal; and unless he be rejoined again by the renewing of faith and serious and hearty repentance, he sets both their souls and God at odds.

“Afterwards you find it in the western parts of England, and in France, in the 17th council of Agatha, you have a tamperer with witnesses adjudged to death (even in the time of Alexicus, who was no better than a barbarous Goth) this crime was disallowed, made horrid, and held severely to be punished. You may find it in St. Augustin, who lived about some 400 years after Christ; and indeed he most excellently sets it out in his 88th Sermon, ‘De Nativitate Domini,’ either he had it out of that council, or the council out of him, being much what both at one time and in one age. Some parts of Greece I find did affect and patronize lying, but Tully wittily guids them for it, saying, they were not wise to countenance folly; yet I find that Aristotle in his rhetoricks concerning the Interrogatories to witnesses, gives admirable rules, and such as (though short) comprehends the most what of the most settled and the wittiest, and the safest ways used now a days in that kind, lib. 2. Rhet. you may read the ways of prevention herein by him set down.

“And to come into our own country about the year 1224, in the reign of king Hen. 3, and your lordships know, that it was a troublesome time; yet I read that Stephen Langley, my predecessor (then archbishop of Canterbury) judged a council to be held at Oxford: the main business was for the reformation of two points; the one was concerning Marriage, the other concerning Exheriditation, &c. where I find a foul penance inflicted and set out for him, that shall either bear false witness by himself, or procure it in another.

“For he that is a tamperer this way, he is guilty of no small crime doing, doing (at the same time) wrong to three of the greatest persons in the world, viz. 1. To God. 2. To the king. 3. To the innocents.—First, He manifestly wrongs God by a notorious contempt, by a very slighting and vilifying his omniscience, omnipresence and omnipotency. He robs God of that which is his very essence, for God is truth, (and who dare thus out-face God’s truth!) and wittingly deviseth and practiseth to lay it aside and keep it from the light; I find him in very nature to be abhorred and held unfit for human society. Aristotle himself in that glimmering he had of divine learning, deciphers such a one, and sets him out by these very characters: he must be one ‘qui pietatem non curat,’ a man that matters not at all for piety; he must either deny the Deity, or else think he can escape the reach of the celestial powers, such a one ‘qui putat se latere Deo,’ he is able to skulk on the one side, and absent himself from the hand of God at his pleasure.—Secondly, In the next place, another great person (unto whom he doth injury) is the king, whom he plainly cheateth to his face, and wrongs in the very seat of justice, even forcing his officers, the grave and learned judges, will they will they, to do injustice: for if the witnesses be suborned and give in false evidence, the jurors cannot come near the truth, and the judges must needs enact, order, and sentence what otherwise they neither would, nor ought to have done.—Last of all, the third person that is wronged in conspectu Dei, is a person of no small esteem, the innocent (one many times little enough esteemed, God knows, in the eye of the world, but gracious and great in the sight of God,) and he is also most shamefully wronged and abused; nay, perhaps undone by the indirect practices of those false witnesses. Sometimes his person is traduced, his fame and credit either stained or else quite taken away, or so shaken that it’s a shy matter to deal with him; another while his estate; his birth-right, is wrested from him, or else withheld, and for a time withheld from him: one while his goods, another while his lands, a third time himself, is at stake; so life, lands, goods, and all are in danger: well though such witnesses be against him, his plea is never a whit the worse in Furo Cæli, his inheritance is laid up amongst the saints, ‘Testimonium ejus est in cælis,’ ‘doubtless there is a reward for the righteous, verily there is a God that judgeth the earth, for there is nothing hid which shall not be revealed.’

“And thus, my lords, have I said what I thought fit, though not so much as the crimes deserve, for my time being scantied, I have laid it out (though roughly) yet so as it may easily be seen of what a vile nature this cankered and pestilent weed is, and from whence it had its original, and how odious and detestable it hath been to all ages, how dangerous the effects be that proceed from it, and therefore how carefully it ought to be looked unto and suppress in all common-wealths.

“I shall make my word good in my brevity concerning the last thing I am to perform, and shall pass over the sentence very speedily; to make any repetitions were but actum agere (as my lord of London said) therefore I will be short. I find much tampering and striving by my lord bishop’s agents for to suppress and decline a truth. I wonder that Lake should be sent to the university of Cambridge presently to take the degree of doctor, and that they would let him pass. I cannot commend Mostein (though otherwise a very civil and deserving man, and I think very true and trusty to his master) yet to be present when a blank is put up, and an Affidavit to be made to a blank by his pivity and in his presence, this is not honest; he might have done well to have disallowed the proceedings, or at least not been present, and have countenanced the same. And Walter Walker, though he be a solicitor, and must and ought to follow the causes he undertakes, with as much skill, industry, and advice as he may, yet he might have been ashamed of this blank Affidavit, and he ought indeed to have suppress it.

“ If Walker had been a good servant it had gone better with the bishop, than now it is like to do: and if Walker do escape sentencing it's more by hap than skill, more by luck than honesty. I find him to be a very arrant honest man in all the business, and my lord bishop is a very miserable man, thus to defend Prigeon's good name with the loss of his own.

“ Catlin, he must have a living given him, and well he deserved it, but as yet he had not played his part to the full, and therefore stay your hand (my lord saith Walker) till the business be done. A manifest plain proof that there was some use to be made of this cunning and crafty fellow, to countenance the business in hand. And I can say no less, than that I find Catlin to be a very lewd man, a very incendiary, and truly to be paralleled with that Catlin of Rome, against whom so many learned and eloquent orations were writ, by Cicero that famous orator.

“ For Lunn, let him go on in God's name, to be put off from the place and offices that he hath; and for Powel, I could go deeper than any before me hath yet done, who prosecutes an unjust act so long, so oft, and never repents of it.

“ For Kelvert's affronting of my lord bishop in that manner he did, I must set that, and the bishop's offering to be present at the examination of the witnesses, both in one distance, and they may very well the one of them quit the other; and I must commend Kelvert, or any man else that shall go on in the king's business, and concerning so great a matter; for if he had gone on piningly, faintly, and cowardly have put his head in a hole: if he had, by my lord's presence, and by the terms he used, gone sheepishly on in his business, the matter might have failed. Some of your lordships have condemned him for his bold carriage toward a bishop in his own diocese, but I cannot, for my lord and his passions were more to be condemned. A temper would better have befitted him, and indeed he ought not to have given any such occasion, and therefore it may be said, ‘ Etiam si ego dignus sum hac contumelia, indignus tamen qui fecerit.’ I pass that by as to be excused by reason of the weightiness of the matter.

“ For the gaining of Papers from the Council Table, I find my Lord Bishop had them long enough in his custody, and they were returned unsealed; and I do find that he proceeds to counter-proofs directly, according as he was informed by these papers, which in my mind shews apparently that he both had them and perused them.

“ For sir John Mounson, the king is wounded through his sides, I have known him a long time, and I never knew nor heard any thing of him but good, and therefore do hold 1,000 marks little enough for reparation of his credit, who did nothing but that which was his duty, and belonged to his place.

“ Now for my lord bishop of Lincoln, truly I am heartily sorry to do that which I must do, both by reason he is of my own coat, and also by reason of the place he hath in former time sustained in this court amongst your lordships, and in this commonwealth, but I must not forbear to do that which my conscience leads me unto, and less I must not do than for to discharge that as I ought to do.

The Lord Keeper. “ This Cause, my lords, is a cause of great consequence, and it is a very foul matter, though I must needs say the defences that hath been made in it, hath been very fair by Mr. Recorder, and the counsel on my lord of Lincoln's behalf.

“ Mostein I must acquit, for Catlin I came resolved to Censure him for perjury; but seeing the court lets him pass, I shall not sentence him, though he is a very notorious actor, and had a hand in that Blank Affidavit, and helped Smith, and countenanced and directed him what to swear, and what to let alone.

“ All my lord's actions, for which he is much to be blamed, are subsequent to that Affidavit; I must do my duty, and discharge my conscience, and shew my love to the common good, whatever my private wishes are, that things had not fallen out thus with my lord as they do.

“ I shall divide all into two parts, some things I hold faulty, and some I shall not censure; I shall not censure Mr. Kilvert for his unmannerliness, though the affront was great to a man of his place in the country, where he was bishop of the diocese, and in the chief seat of his jurisdiction. Mr. Kilvert might have forborn him somewhat in that respect; but the cause being of that high nature, and concerning them it did, he had somewhat the more reason to be the more confident and bolder in the prosecution thereof than ordinary, and for that concerning sir William Beecher I find no proof of it.—I find that Lunn, Tubb, and Wetherel, were tampered withal, but I cannot find my Lord Bishop faulty with them: For George Walker, I find him censurable; and so is my lord also himself in other matters, as will appear when I shall come at them.—I find by the proof of two Witnesses, that my lord confessed himself, that it cost him 1,000*l.* or 1,200*l.* to bolster up Prigeon's reputation, and to do this he falls into error concerning the order made by sir John Mounson; that must be suppressed, and I know not how so much money should be expended, but upon such courses as were used with Smith and Catlin.—Catlin told Smith he should be made by it; so that the order must be to undermine the witnesses, and get them to vary from what they had formerly sworn before the justices at the public sessions. I know that men in cases of this nature do not blindly promise this or that; but I find Walker goes about by questions at first a-far off, and then comes close to instruct Smith what to swear; and rewards are not behind, neither do I conceive in such cases, that there are ever two witnesses to be expected, but as my Lord Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas explained it, singularis Testis shall induce me to believe a truth in some cases, and it must of necessity, when circumstances concur with the same.

“ So that whatsoever Mr. Recorder said, the return of that order made by the justices was coram non Judge, it matters not with me. The witnesses knew nothing of the questionableness of the proceedings, but went on the way their consciences at that time led them: Now for my lord bishop of Lincoln to seek to dishearten them, to terrify them by threats, and seek otherwise after by rewards and promises to subvert, or at least, to divert the current of justice, I know not how to excuse them, but that he is much to blame to give such ill names and disgraceful titles to an order made in court, as to call it a Pocket Order, thereby bringing an odium and defamation upon the justices, who proceeded as they ought, and in open court, as appears by Dr. Farmary, and by Ascot, who had both of them a hand in it, as I take it, as well as sir John Mounson, and therefore their credits must be repaired also.

“ For Alice Smith, she was tampered withal by Owen and Powell to salve up Prigeon's credit; and after that she had taken one oath before the justices, then, for the present the commission to be sat at Lincoln, she is taken and withdrawn out of the way, and hath rewards given her, as is apparent, either to deny, or alter, and vary from what she had sworn before. She had 5l. offered her to persuade Eliz. Hodgson to lay the child to another father; and then afterwards it was given her to persuade her to lay it to the right father; and yet here is no false oath, but may be true, as I can instance that a deposition may be made by a party that may swear two things that are contrary, and yet the depositions of both of them may be true.

“ And yet an Attainder hath been upon the like; now upon an attainder the punishment is great, he loseth his freehold, and goods, all are forfeited to the king, his houses are to be razed down, meadows plowed up, and woods to be felled, and he himself to be imprisoned or banished, his wife and children to be turned out of all.

“ So in another Case, (Fitz-Herb. Natura brevium, lib. 19.) one hath a hold from an abbot, and a rent is due, as Foster in fee he holds jure rectorie, and it is sworn he had common, time out of mind: And if the words jure rectorie, be not exprest, all may be true.

“ In this case of Alice Smith it may be questioned what money was promised, 5l. to what end? to swear that she was moved to get the child laid to another: Well, afterwards she must swear that it was to lay the child to the right father, Mr. Valentine and Mr. Powell shewed her the interrogatories, she must swear against the first order, and Mr. Valentine said his heart trembled at the questions.—There is much cunning in this way of tampering with a witness, for my Lord Bishop asks them leading questions, by which they have instructions what, and how far to swear.—And Prigeon tells Richardson, that if he could get the order altered, he might do the bishop special service.

“ Now it may be, said he, may not a man meddle, nor question with a witness? yes, but with certain limitations, for else, if the witnesses be made and corrupted, the jurors and judges both of them may be abused; and if that witnesses may be led and instructed by questions, or the like, it comes all to one as subornation.—A solicitor may warn Witnesses to come in, he may incite them, and enforce them, and one as well as the other: but for a stranger to labour a juror or a witness, is not so allowable.—But a solicitor must not instruct a witness, nor threaten him, nor carry letters to him, to induce him this way, or that; yet he may discourse with him, and ask him what he can say to this or that point, and so he may know whether he be fit to be used in the cause or no: by which means this court is freed from the labour of asking many idle questions of the witnesses to no end, if they can say nothing to them, and so spend good time to no end nor purpose; yet he may not persuade him, or threaten him to say more or less, than he of himself was inclined unto, and was by his conscience before-hand bound to deliver as truth.

“ The term in law is called embracery of a Jury, amplexus, to curry favour, when one hugs them, and houses them in their arms to procure respect unduly to their own ends; you have it mentioned 13 H. 4. & 16, when there is a leading of a Jury 22 H. 6, whereupon it hath been ordered, that in cases which have any relation to great persons, who usually are on the bench, they are upon trials to absent themselves, and not to be in presence of the bar.

“ And as my Lord Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas well insisted upon in this case, the countenance of a great man, and one that is powerful in the country to do a poor witness harm in another way upon any other occasion, when it shall come to his turn, and occasion be offered for him to do it; the very looks I say of such a man is able to put the witness off from what he was resolved to speak, and dash him out of countenance, that he will either, for fear that such a man shall take dislike at him, or for hopes of much favour with him, and to gain his good will, speak sparingly of the matter in hand, at least, if he do not altogether decline another way in his words to that which he in his conscience knows to be the very truth.—So that in the point it is plain, that when a man shall alter the testimony of a witness, and cause him to decline from the truth, whether it be by threats, promises, or rewards, it hath ever been much disallowed, and he that attempts the same is censurable, though perhaps he effects it not.

"Now, my lord, to come to the Censure, for I have been somewhat the more bold upon your patience, than I would otherwise, because I would have it appear low for one way, and wherein one may not tamper, or meddle with witnesses, which thing is the main matter in this case we have had so long in hand; for had not my lord bishop moved this way, I should not have found in matter in this bill to have sentenced him at all.

"But for to justify Prigeon's credit, and to make him stand upright, and to clear the reputation of him, and others, so much money is spent, and the unjust and undue undertakings have been made by my lord of Lincoln's servants, and his agents, to tamper, seduce, and withdraw the witnesses aside against the laws of God and man, and to the very overthrow of my lord himself.

"For Cadwallader Powell it is plain all the way what he did, and in what undue courses he sought to suppress the truth; I shall agree with your lordships for him in his fine, and do censure him at 300*l.* fine; and for Owen, I shall also agree with you in his fine of 300*l.* Also for Lunn, I could go deeper, and set him a greater punishment than your lordships have, but do agree with you in his fine of 1,000 marks, and to be disabled from being in any office or practice hereafter in his profession, or in any other court.

"Now for my lord bishop of Lincoln, truly I am heartily sorry for him; but ex se cadit, he is the cause of his own overthrow, 'Et ruit Roma viribus suis,' no man hurts him but himself. I think of him as a great person, and more to be pitied for that he is a church-man, and in so eminent a rank as a bishop, and none of the meanest of that dignity: and as my lord of Canterbury spoke, that it was the more grief to him to pass sentence in so deep a manner upon him, by reason he was of the same coat: so, my lords, I cannot but be sensible of his precedence to me in that place I now undergo by the favour, and at the pleasure of the king's majesty, my honoured master.—For a man of his wisdom, of that experience, and having seen the various changes of times, and of several men's fortunes, lived in that eminency, and so well-literate, to seek his own overthrow, to support and maintain the reputation of another, is a thing not to be so much as dreamed on, or could be once thought upon, that such weakness should ever fasten and take place in a person so well-guarded and accompanied with virtues and commendable qualities, as my lord bishop was ever esteemed to have.—And for a Church-man, whose profession is to support men's consciences in the right way, and for to reduce them into it when they shall chance to err, for him to be a seducer of the conscience, is a fouler and worse stain in him than in another.

"But when to that sacred calling (the professors whereof are ever to be had in respect) shall be added another Charge, and care by the favour of the king, to become a judge, and a judge of that great court of Chancery, where equity and conscience give the very denomination of the court; to be advanced to this eminency is a thing of great consequence, and to be admitted to this place is a sign of great trust reposed and placed in that servant by his master. Now I cannot, my lords, but be heartily sorry, and very much pity, that a Church-man, and bishop, and one that hath been a prelate, and eminently dignified for the space of this 16 or 17 years at least together, should so grossly be overseen in the countenancing and cherishing such foul crimes; Nay, a man that had born the great seal of England before two such great kings, and been highly graced with so many large testimonies, and remarkable favours from them both, to uncase himself of all those, and that at once, and for so small a matter, so little really in itself concerning him, I cannot but wonder how he should fall into such an error, and more pity his misfortunes to see him so much his own enemy.—But as it hath been observed by you all, he hath overthrown himself: And therefore I must do my duty, and proceed to his censure also, as I have in the rest; 'vincat veritas et fiat justitia.'

"I shall agree with my lord Cottington for his Fine to the king in 10,000*l.* and so I do also with my lord Cottington for his imprisonment in the Tower during his majesty's pleasure. And withal to be suspended from all his Ecclesiastical Dignities, offices, and functions, and so all with my lord Cottington, 'ab officis et beneficiis,' and to be referred to the High Commission for the rest."*

PROCEEDINGS AGAINST THE BISHOP OF LINCOLN AND LAMBERT OSBALDSTON.

February 14, 1638-9.

The Bishop of Lincoln, together with Lambert Osbaldston, Schoolmaster of the Grammar School at Westminster, was charged by Information in this court of Star-Chamber, to have plotted together to divulge false News and Lies, to breed a disturbance in the State, and difference between two great persons, and peers of the realm, viz. the late lord treasurer Weston, and the present archbishop of Canterbury. The Charge was grounded upon these following Passages written by Mr. Osbaldston to the bishop of Lincoln:

"My dear Lord; I find for certain, which I

* "This bishop of Lincoln, (once a great minister of state) wrestled through these difficulties and close imprisonments; was at last set at liberty out of the Tower, and called by the king's writ to sit in the house of peers, and after that was advanced by the king, and restored to all his ecclesiastical dignities and functions." Rushworth.

report sub sigillo, that the great Leviathan, and the little Urchin, are a great storm in Christmas weather, and are at a very great distance one with another, insomuch that your lordship hath been inquired of more than once, if you were come, and when you will? And the great man was heard to justify the words which you were questioned for, namely, 'That you had as good a right to the Deanery of Westminster, as the king to his crown.' And he was heard to say, 'That they were no more than he himself would say.' The jealousy grows great and sharp between the Leviathan, and the little meddling Hocus-Pocus; and if it increase, there is hopes your lordship will enjoy the blessing of the king's grace. Your lordship will hear, that the lord's grace of Canterbury is come to lodge in court, so is the lord treasurer: your lordship, I hope, will pick out my meaning. Westminster-College, Jan. 9, 1633."

In another Letter.

"My dear Lord; I cannot be quiet but I must write to your lordship. The sport is grown tragical, any thing would be given for a sound and thorough charge to push at and confound the little Urchin. The Spaniards and the Hollanders are both approvedly and firmly joined to effect the same, if your lordship lend your assistance, which I am bound to implore and require. Let them in the mean time scratch one another to the bones. I use freedom of heart, it is something of revenge that a brave soul, as your lordship is, hath some hopes of support in the midst of a flood of destruction. Westminster-School, Jan. 30, 1633."

Likewise, there was produced the Bishop's Letter of the 2nd of February, to a friend, to this purpose:

"Mr. Osbaldston reported to me by letters, That it was desired that I should contribute my endeavours to be useful to the Lord-Treasurer against the little great man, and assured me that they were mortal enemies. But for my part I refuse to meddle with any such thing; yet I pray you learn whether it be so or no, lest some have gulled Mr. Osbaldston in his three last letters. If the Lord Treasurer would be served by me, he must free me from the bonds of the Star-Chamber, otherwise let them fight it out for me."

It was answered in the behalf of Mr. Osbaldston, That what was done by him, was done in private letters, sealed to an honourable friend. And it was confessed to be error in him to use such familiarity in some passages therein expressed. That he doth deny, That by the appellations therein mentioned, he did mean the Archbishop's Grace, or the Lord-Treasurer. But he meant thereby one Spicer, which took upon him to be a doctor and was none; that he had divers times used, between jest and earnest, to call him 'little Urchin,' 'Vermin,' 'little Hocus Pocus in the Velvet,' 'Jekkin,' and that there were some differences between him and the bishop of Lincoln; and by 'Leviathan,' he meant, Chief Justice Richardson, who had formerly committed Spicer, in Westminster-hall; and he confessed he did merrily use that name, the person being apt to take a jest in good part.

On the bishop of Lincoln's part it was offered, That if any such Letters were sent by Mr. Osbaldston, yet he denied the receipt of them; and for the interpretation of those Appellations, he conceived the writer was the best interpreter; that he had many times heard Mr. Osbaldston call Spicer by the name of 'Hocus,' 'Pocus,' and he used to call Richardson by the name of 'Leviathan,' and denieth the publishing of any such Letters, or so much as the speaking of any such at his table.

The Attorney General urged, That the Interpretation given by the Defendants would not serve their turn. That those Letters of Mr. Osbaldston were found in a box in the bishop's house at Bugden; and when the bishop heard they were found, he said, 'Osbaldston was un-done.' That the Bishop's secretary Walker, and the clerk of his kitchen, had heard their master discourse of the subject matter of these Letters, and that these names of appellation were frequent, between the Bishop and Osbaldston, and that by them was meant the Archbishop and the Treasurer.

But it was further offered, in the behalf of Mr. Osbaldston, That the Interpretation made by others, should not be the ruin and destruction of the defendants. That the bishop's said secretary and clerk of his kitchen, witnesses against him, were lately censured in this court for tampering with Witnesses, and were persons expecting the mercy of the court; and witnesses were heard on the behalf of Osbaldston, that he frequently called Dr. Spicer the 'little Hocus Pocus,' and the 'little Urchin;' and the reason was, because Spicer had made many promises to give a Library worth 40*l.* to the School at Westminster, but failed in the performance. And it was further proved, that he frequently called the L. C. J. Richardson, 'Leviathan,' who had committed Dr. Spicer in Westminster-hall.

And in the Defence of the bishop of Lincoln it was further urged, That his said secretary, Walter Walker, did frequently receive, and had commission to open his Letters in his absence; and what letters he received he could not tell; and if those letters were found at his house, they were laid up and concealed by his Secretary.

And further the Bishop petitions the court, informing them how unable he was to make his defence, being his majesty's close prisoner in the Tower. After which, Mr. Attorney General replied.

Sir JOHN BANKS'S REPLY about the Censure of my Lord Bishop of Lincoln, and Mr. Osbaldston, the 14th of Feb. 1638, in the Star-Chamber.

"My Lords; The Defendants' Counsel in their Defence, does except against the charge of the Information, and they laboured much to tie the matters charged in the Information to the very day of the month, seeking thereby to escape the Charge, contrary to their judgments and the common course of justice.—Also they made question where those Letters should be found: but if they will, they may know that they were found at my lord bishop of Lincoln's house at Bugden; as is manifest by their own witnesses Interrogatories, 1 and 7f.—In the Answer to which Interrogatories, three Witnesses do all say, That they heard they were found in a band-box in my lord of Lincoln's wardrobe.

Mr. Recorder. “ My Lords; We have examined four Witnesses, which do all depose, That there were no Letters found in the band-box, and that his lordship did never leave any letters to be kept there.”

Mr. Herbert. “ It appears by their own Witnesses, that there were such Letters found; but this is not to the purpose where they were found, but now they are found, the heinousness of them is the point in hand.”

Lord Keeper. “ It may be that some of the lords may find some things in the Depositions that may serve one way or other, therefore I think it good they should be read; but for my own part, I am satisfied in my judgment.”

Mr. Attorney General further proceeded, saying; “ My lords, the Defendants counsel have made two Defences, one for Mr. Osbaldston and the other for the bishop of Lincoln. The counsel for Mr. Osbaldston except against the Witnesses that prove the interpretation of the Letter, and would have Mr. Osbaldston to expound his own meaning, and if this should be allowed, every libeller would thereby escape the censure of the court.—First, They except against Cadwallader Powel, because he was before sentenced in the Star-Chamber; but, my lords, his Censure in the Star-Chamber was not for any matter of perjury, or crime that should take away his testimony; and the same thing for which he was sentenced was my lord bishop himself sentenced at the very same time.—Secondly, The second Exception was, that Mr. Powel and Mr. Walker were made Defendants in this court to take away their testimony in this cause, and the reason why they were not proceeded against (said the King's Attorney) was, my lords, because my lord bishop of Lincoln would not perfect his Examination, by which we should have the better proceeded against them, and when my lord bishop hath perfected his examination, they shall be proceeded against.

“ Again, they except and say, that Walker being secretary to my lord bishop of Lincoln, he ought not to be witness against my lord of Lincoln.—My lords, when a Secretary is called and examined upon oath, he ought to discover the truth of what he is examined upon, and not to perjure himself.

“ Again, they say, that there are no express words in the Letters, whereby it doth certainly appear, that these words were not meant of my lord's grace of Canterbury. My lords, this sticks at all causes of justice: for if they shall be suffered to interpret their own words, by this means all Libellers would escape punishment.

“ The third part of the Defence is this: that Mr. Osbaldston should call Dr. Spicer, ‘ Vermin, Hocus Pocus, Urchin,’ and the like: therefore say they, those terms in these letters are not to be applied to the archbishop of Canterbury, but to Dr. Spicer. This is no exclusion, for I shall shew that those words must needs be intended and spoken against the archbishop of Canterbury, and not of Dr. Spicer.

“ In the Letter of the 9th of Jan. the words cannot be applied to be spoken of so mean a man as Dr. Spicer: and so likewise in the Letter of the 30th of Jan. wherein he desires, that it should be kept secret: and if these words had been spoken of Dr. Spicer, they needed not be kept so secret. For ‘ Hocus Pocus’ and ‘ Vermin’ being spoken of Dr. Spicer, were published in Westminster Hall, and other places thereabouts, and therefore needed no secrecy.

“ And that by the ‘ great Leviathan,’ it should be understood to be meant of the lord Richardson, there is no colour for it, my lords.

“ As for Osbaldston, he hath long been a turbulent meddler, and a false intelligencer of the affairs of state; I may say he is ‘ Hocus Pocus,’ and a juggler in the affairs of state; and yet I am sorry that I shall charge him with that which is worse than the charge laid against him in the information, for he is guilty of gross and wilful perjury, for he hath denied upon oath that which was plainly proved against him.

“ Another argument is, This Osbaldston is now run away, which in our sense doth shew a guiltiness of the offence. 25 H. 5. ‘ One being indicted for felony, if he runs away, he forfeits his goods.’

“ As for my lord bishop of Lincoln, he stands upon three things. 1. That he received not the letters. 2. That he did not publish them. 3. That he did not entertain them.—For the first, it is proved by witnesses, That two days after Twelve-tide he gave order that his Letters should be opened that concerned his law suits, so that thereby he might colour the matter, that they might not come into his own hands. Again he doth not say, that he did not receive the letter of the 9th of January; besides his own Letter of the 3d of January, makes mention of three Letters which he received from Mr. Osbaldston: in one of which he should contribute money to the use of the Lord Treasurer for the ruin of the ‘ little great man’: so that it is confessed by his own writings that he did receive them. And the Letter of the 30th Jan. was sent by a special messenger to Lincoln, therefore it is most probable that he received it, and your lordships have heard Cadwallader Powel say, That my lord of Lincoln demanding of him, Whether any of Osbaldston's letters were found? And he answering that they were. Then said the bishop, Osbaldston is undone: so that I conceive your lordships will not think, but that his lordship received the letters.

"But it is objected, That this is no offence: for, say they, it is no offence to receive libellous letters, and to keep them private. And as for my lord of Lincoln, he did never publish any of them: and there is difference betwixt Osbaldston's Case and my lord bishop of Lincoln's, for they were only sent to my lord of Lincoln, but he did never contrive nor publish any of them.—It is evident that he did publish these, for they were spoken of by Powel and Walker, and the women did talk of them in the market.

"But they say, That some of his attendants never heard him publish any such Speeches at his own table. It is like he did not make it his table-talk: but, my lord, under favour, my lord of Lincoln hath been too forward to entertain and publish libellous letters. If any receive libellous letters, the receiving is not a publishing of them, as it is in 9 Report fol. 59. In the 5th Report, there is difference betwixt Words and Letters, which concern a private man and a public officer. If they do concern a private man, it is no offence in him that conceals them: but if they concern a public officer, he that doth conceal them, is guilty, and shall be punished for a libeller. And I conceive my lord of Lincoln to be guilty of perjury in this cause: and, my lords, that perjurers are punishable in this court, (though they are not charged in the information) doth appear. Hill. 2 Eliz. & Hill. 4 Eliz.

"My lords, I do wish that this age that is so much infected with devising and divulging scandalous Letters and Words, that some exemplary example might be made, that we might hear no more of such scandalous matters.

"My lords, before the Conquest they had very strict laws against Libellers, (as to have their tongues slit); and in the time of Ed. 1. and Ed. 2. there were special commissioners appointed to enquire after libellers, as in the close Roll. Parliament, and so I humbly leave them to your lordships."

The Court proceeding to Sentence, declared in general, "That they had received satisfaction that Mr. Osbaldston was the contriver, writer, and publisher of those odious Appellations of those two great persons. That his Defence was ridiculous, and that his end was the ruin of the archbishop of Canterbury.—As for the bishop of Lincoln, they said, he was a person of quality, parts, and abilities, and one that once sat as judge in this court: that he shewed himself very indiscreet in concealing those letters, and had thereby made himself guilty of a high crime."

But for further satisfaction, take these Speeches following made in Court at the said Censure.

Sir John Finch, Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, spake first, the Lord Cottington being absent.

"My Lords; There are two Defendants, so there are two Charges in the Information against them. 1. They are charged with giving nicknames unto two honourable persons of this realm. 2. They are charged to plot, and contrive to work an utter ruin and overthrow to my lord archbishop of Canterbury. And in those Charges, I shall observe several steps and degrees. 1. An endeavour and agreement between Osbaldston and my lord bishop of Lincoln, to reproach and scandalize these two noble persons. 2. A publishing and divulging of the same.—In the second Charge I observe these steps. 1. A false rumour raised by them. 2. A publishing of the same. 3. An endeavour to work the ruin of the lord archbishop of Canterbury, by contributing charges to effect the same.

"And how far Osbaldston and the bishop of Lincoln are guilty, I appeal to your lordships. I shall now shew the extent of the Information, the Charge being laid to be in or about the 10th Feb. M. 9 Car. Which Charge doth comprehend all libellous letters, either before or since 9 Car.

"But it's true, if in the Letters will not appear that sense which is contained in the Charge, then they shall not be within the charge of the Information, and therefore the Information admits of as much favour to the Defendants as may be: for this court doth rather desire to find men innocent than guilty.

"I shall now come to the particulars, and shall herein observe the course of the Defendant's counsel, who have distinguished my lord of Lincoln's Case from Osbaldston's, and so shall put a difference between them: for though Osbaldston be guilty, yet it's possible that my lord of Lincoln may not be guilty.

"And as for Osbaldston, I hold him as clearly guilty of the Charges in the Information, as any have been sentenced in this court. For first, Osbaldston was the contriver and publisher of those scandalous Letters; and I think there is no doubt at all, but that they were meant of the late Lord Treasurer, and the now lord bishop of Canterbury. Secondly, your lordships may observe, what interpretation the lord bishop of Lincoln would make of them: How that my lord of Lincoln himself did conceive that he meant the archbishop of Canterbury.—The third is by Witnesses: 1. Walker said, That he saw divers letters wherein Osbaldston explained his meaning, That he meant my Lord Treasurer, and my lord's grace of Canterbury. Again he saith, he saw some letters wherein Osbaldston used by-words, which my lord of Lincoln did not understand until Osbaldston had explained them. Again he saith, His lordship did explain many of these dark words that Osbaldston wrote unto him, shewing that he meant my lord's grace of Canterbury. Again he saith, That Osbaldston spoke base words of the archbishop. And these be his Reasons why he conceives, that by the words in the letters he means the archbishop of Canterbury; which I conceive be very good and sufficient reasons.

“The second witness is Cadwallader Powel, who saith, He used these words in a letter, ‘The little vermin, the false mediator, the Hoccus Pocus.’ And the bishop of Lincoln being in the Tower, demanded of Powel, Whether any of Mr. Osbaldston’s letters were found? who answered, That they were found; Then, said the bishop, Osbaldston is undone.

“Thus I have thought good to make a difference betwixt my lord of Lincoln and Mr. Osbaldston; for it is confessed by my lord of Lincoln, that by one of those is meant my Lord Treasurer; but that shall not convict Mr. Osbaldston, but it is plain by his own words what he meant. And that by those words should be meant Dr. Spicer, I hold it so ridiculous a defence, that I think he could not have deceived his school boys with it. And that by ‘Levianathan’ should be meant my lord Richardson, there is no colour for that; though for Dr. Spicer were confounded, what would the king or state suffer by his ruin or confusion? so that certainly it is meant of the archbishop of Canterbury.—For Mr. Osbaldston’s going away, it is not judicially known unto me, and therefore leave it to your lordships.

“And as for the second Charge, That he did plot and contrive for the ruin of the lord archbishop of Canterbury, I hold that he is guilty, and that he did stir my lord of Lincoln, to contribute money for that purpose.

“For my lord of Lincoln, I shall only say this, That the Letter of the 9th of January is such a turbulent and scandalous Libel, that a man of place and quality should not give any way thereunto; but that he should receive it, entertain it, and publish it, this shews that he had long a rancor and hatred towards my lord archbishop. And for the nick-names, I shall find my lord of Lincoln guilty as far forth as Mr. Osbaldston, for he did entertain these letters, and did publish them, and it was an agreement and confederacy so to do.

“By way of Defence my lord bishop of Lincoln’s counsel did allege; 1. That there was an agreement between Osbaldston and my lord of Lincoln. Again, they said, That there was no certain appellation of my lord archbishop of Canterbury. 2. There was proof that my lord of Lincoln did not speak any such words at his table. 3. They endeavoured to prove, That my lord of Lincoln never wrote any Letters containing any libellous matter; when as there was a letter under his own hand, which he would not confess, although he was brought like a bear to the stake, and three times examined about it.

“Again they said, That he did not receive them, and yet he wrote an answer to them. Again, admit he did receive them, yet he did not publish them, but only delivered them to Mr. Walker his secretary. Mr. Attorney well remembered the law, That if a libellous letter concerning a private person, then he may conceal it; but if it concern a public officer, then the concealing of it makes him guilty thereof: and that the letters were published is most certain, for they were openly spoken of by women in the market.

“Another thing of Mr. Recorder’s was this; That if my lord bishop of Lincoln did understand Osbaldston’s meaning, yet he did not understand that he meant my Lord Treasurer, and my lord’s grace of Canterbury.—Then, I say, he hath scandalized my Lord Treasurer, and my lord archbishop of Canterbury; for by his own writing he saith, That it was meant of these persons.

“The next is, the charge of a Plot laid for the ruin of my lord archbishop of Canterbury, but I will not condemn my lord bishop of Lincoln for that.

“The next Defence of Mr. Recorder was from this, That Mr. Osbaldston wrote to the bishop of Lincoln, saying, ‘I hope you will pick out the meaning,’ &c. so that there was no confederacy and agreement between them. 1. I say, he received the letters, and published them. 2. He was so far from nipping these scandals in the buds, that he enquired further after them. 3. That he was ready and willing to contribute money towards the ruin of my lord archbishop of Canterbury.

“I am sorry that a man of his rank and condition, should make himself companion with a school-master. And as for the aspersion which they cast upon Mr. Walker, to take away his testimony, I see no just cause thereof. For they said, Either his Deposition is impossible and beyond his knowledge, or else that his reasons that moved him thereunto, are insufficient. But for my part I know not how a better reason can be given.

“Another objection against Walker is this, That it was long before these Letters were brought forth; and that these are not all, but there should be a third letter. I say, It is a wonder that so many were brought forth now. But that they had been lost, or that my lord of Lincoln had burnt them: for had I a friend that I professed so much kindness to, as he did to Osbaldston, I should be very sorry that he should suffer for his letters.

“For the testimony of Cadwallader Powel, I hold his testimony as fit to be taken as my lord bishop of Lincoln.—And for the Charge of the Defendants counsel, for the subtil prosecution by the solicitor Kilvert, I shall say little, I know him to be of a good carriage in other businesses, therefore if any fault be, I shall only desire that it may be amended for the time to come. I hold that these Witnesses stand upright; and as for the other witnesses, I submit unto your lordships, for in sentence I must consider the nature of the cause, and the persons. First, I shall not acquit my lord bishop of Lincoln, nor condemn him so much as Osbaldston. I must consider the persons offending, and the persons against whom they have offended. For the persons offended, the first is the lord treasurer of England, one of his majesty’s privy-council.

And the second is the metropolitan of England, who hath ever carried himself with great trust and fidelity towards his majesty and the public good. And I verily think, that none can accuse him of the least corruption. In a court where most causes of the clergy are tried, I did never receive any private message from his lordship in the behalf of any clergyman, which is a thing to be much observed in him.

“For Mr. Osbaldston, he hath been a parson, a prebend, and a schoolmaster. My lords, I will not suffer him, he is so turbulent a person, and scandalous libeller, to teach and instruct others. I would have him therefore deprived of all his spiritual dignities and promotions, that he never have any place in the church; neither hold I it fit that he should teach scholars, (should I do him justice, I should adjudge him some severe corporal punishment:) I would have him deprived in the high-commission court, and then to be set on the Pillory in this Palace-Yard. And that he may be an example to his boys, I would have him also to stand in the pillory in the Dean's-Yard, and one ear to be nailed in the Palace, and the other ear to be nailed in the Dean's-Yard. I do fine him 5,000*l.* and imprisonment during the king's pleasure.— And I do fine my lord bishop of Lincoln 5,000*l.* And I give to my lord archbishop of Canterbury, 5,000*l.* a-piece for damages.”

My Lord Chief Justice Bramston. “My lords; There are two Defendants, and they have made two defences. I find my lord bishop of Lincoln to be guilty, though not so full and in so high a nature as Mr. Osbaldston. They are charged to plot and confederate together, to scandalize two honourable persons, and to raise discord in the state, and to seek the ruin and overthrow of my lord archbishop of Canterbury. Osbaldston wrote a letter of the 9th of January, and other letters, which my lord bishop of Lincoln is charged with to receive and publish. That Osbaldston is guilty of every part of the Charge, I shall not need to make any question; neither shall I much stand upon the validity of the witnesses, for I see nothing but that he is guilty of all the charge.

“I will begin with the first letter of the 9th Jan. in which he would have two other persons meant there, and not my lord treasurer, and my lord's grace of Canterbury; but the one to be meant my lord Richardson, and the other doctor Spicer.

“Now what comparison was there between those two persons? The one was Lord Chief Justice, and as for the other, every one knows what he is; so that it cannot be meant of these two persons, for there is no comparison between them. And for these words, the ‘little meddling Hocus Pocus works his own confusion,’ &c. How would this be meant of Dr. Spicer? For how did Dr. Spicer work his own confusion? And who would give so much to confound Dr. Spicer? He is no such eminent person, that any should give so much to confound him. So that this letter is very clear against Osbaldston.—And it shews a petulant spirit, and an inveterate hatred and malice, that he did long bear against my lord of Canterbury, without any reason or cause at all, for he doth not shew that he had ever received any wrong or injury from his grace.

“I come now to the other letter, wherein Osbaldston writ to the bishop of Lincoln to contribute charges to my Lord Treasurer, for ‘the ruin of the little great man;’ by which must needs be meant the archbishop of Canterbury; so that I shall not stand longer upon Mr. Osbaldston; for if there were no witnesses against him, yet I find matter enough in his own letters to prove him guilty of the whole charge, and therefore I sentence him with my lord Finch.

“For my lord of Lincoln, I cannot sentence him as a Libeller, for there must be either a contriving or a publishing to make a man a libeller, as Mr. Recorder well observed. But I find him guilty of this charge, That he received the libellous letters; and of this charge, That he assented to contribute money for the ruin of my lord archbishop of Canterbury.

“But it is objected, That he concealed the libel, and therefore he is not guilty. The concealing of it doth not clear my lord bishop of Lincoln. For (as Mr. Attorney well observed) there is a difference between a Letter that concerns a private person, and a public officer, If a libellous Letter concern a private person, he that receives it may conceal it in his pocket, or burn it; but if it concern a public person, he ought to reveal it to some public officer or magistrate. But it is true, if he divulge it to any but to a magistrate, he is a libeller; and why should my lord of Lincoln keep these letters by him, but to the end to publish them, and to have them at all times in a readiness to publish upon every occasion?

“For his being degraded, I leave it to those of the Ecclesiastical court, to whom it doth belong. And for the other part of his Sentence of the Pillory, I am very sorry and unwilling to give such a Sentence upon any man of his calling and degree. But when I consider the quality of the person, and how much it doth aggravate the offence, I cannot tell how to spare him: for these considerations that should mitigate, makes the offence the greater, which makes me join with my lord Finch in that part also.

“For my lord of Lincoln, I do fine him 3,000*l.* and imprisonment. And seeing the Offence is against so honourable a person as my lord's grace of Canterbury, and there is not the least cause of any aggravance or wrong that he hath done to my lord of Lincoln, therefore in damage I join with my lord Finch.”

Secretary Windebanck, and Secretary Cook, did both join with my lord Brampton for the bishop of Lincoln, and with my lord Finch for Mr. Osbaldston.

Mr. Comptroller. “My lords; For Osbaldston, considering his place, I cannot but condemn him very much, for by what hath been alledged, I verily believe that he did mean my Lord Treasurer, and my lord archbishop of Canterbury: And my lord bishop of Lincoln, and Mr. Osbaldston, are both guilty of crimes in a high nature; one would have thought that my lord bishop of Lincoln, being a person of that place and quality, should not have run himself into such danger as to have meddled with such matters; for had he not met with good counsel, I conceive that he had plunged himself in as deep as Osbaldston in these practices. And as for Osbaldston's Sentence, I agree with my lord Finch. And for my lord bishop of Lincoln, I hold with my lord Bramstone. As for my lord of Canterbury his carriage, it is well known to be upright, and therefore I leave it."

Lord Newburgh. "My lords; For Osbaldston, I find him guilty of every part of the charge; for the other I cannot sentence so deep; for I think my lord of Lincoln is not guilty of the plotting and confederating, for the scandalizing of those two honourable persons; I leave it to your lordships judgment, and lay all the charge upon Osbaldston."

"Aristotle in his politicks, admits not in the government, of any school-master to the exercise of civil duties, school-masters commonly proving the apes of tyranny; and being used to imperiousness over scholars, if you put a sword of justice into his hand, you may easily guess how he will lay about him in the state and city. I know not with what spirit of vanity this school-master was possessed, but we see the monstrous birth of it; if the pedant had kept within his rules, he might have been taught not to have disturbed government. Look upon this pragmatikal person, and behold the fact, and what were the motives, what the reasons to bring himself upon the stage. His ill thoughts express in ink as black as his crime; his pen was steeped in vinegar and gall. What was it that stained the bishop of Lincoln's ear with the poison of ignominious titles? It was the pedant. Who was it, that as a thief that had stolen another's good name away, cries, burn my letters, on purpose to go in darkness of the night? It was a parson. Who was it that endeavoured to stain the purity of my lord archbishop's honour with foul aspersions of titles, 'little grace, little urchin, vermin,' &c.? It was Mr. Osbaldston.

"Well, I will speak what I think, I fear none but God and the king, and I speak in truth, I am sure I shall offend neither of them, I have enquired of them who are learned in the laws, who say, That the plainest sense is to be taken. The divines will tell you, that the easy places shall explain the more obscure. And if any man would examine those letters, and with judicious comparing the title of 'little grace' with the other, he will be forced to confess the sense of the other, or else be blind at noon-day. But as truth may be cleared by strong and solid reason, so it may be darkened and shadowed by the colours of probability of appearances.

"But, my lords, I think the school-master alleges his services to the Commonwealth, and his being slighted for it; that he hath been these many years, and dedicated his pains and time for the good of the flowers of the kingdom, generosa debentur. But I will consider him as a man subject to his passion, (which to take away, were to take the man himself:) I will allow him his infirmities, but observe a little his envy, see his merits and deserts, which he hath so foully abused, with the height of insolency and bold access, to the very secrets of empire and government, to the disgrace of those men of which the Commonwealth consists. I know not, (my lords) the fault of the man may transport my Speech that I abuse your patience; but I shall give my censure of him; I learned in the university, how that a syllogism doth ever follow the worst part, 'sequitur de teriorem ad partem,' I am sure his letter doth: he might have found a better medium to make up a syllogism of a libel, for he hath concluded in the worst body of all the figures, viz. in Bocardo: So I must concur with my lord Finch in censure.

"As for my lord of Lincoln, linked in this cause, I honour the man for many causes, in many relations, but for his secretary Walker, and the clerk of his kitchen, and the rest (where-ever the letters were found); they have dealt like Aoteon's hound, that turned against and devoured his master; the false secretary, the unjust steward, and unlawful clerk of the kitchen, who were fed at my lord bishop of Lincoln's table in his prosperity, and now in his adversity they fall upon their master to devour him. I must say of him, he hath forgotten himself, and agree to the censure which the lord chief justice Bramstone hath given against him. He did not as Peter did, when he had denied his master, gone out and weep bitterly for his offence; but he justifies himself, and therefore he is fallen into the lime-twigs of his adversary."

The Earl of Arundel. "My lords; For Osbaldston, I find him guilty of every part of the charge; and that he is not sentenced in a higher nature is, 'causa de bona fortuna,' for had he been suffered to have persisted in his course, he had surely fallen into most dangerous error. And therefore I join in sentence for him with my lord Finch. I am sorry for my lord bishop of Lincoln, he hath shewed himself very indiscreet, being a person of place and quality, he now falls low in his estate and dignity; and these things will make his spirit fall lower than his body; and therefore I agree in all things with my lord Finch."

Marquis Hamilton. "My lords; For Osbaldston, I find him guilty of the whole Charge. For my lord bishop of Lincoln, I cannot find him so deeply guilty as Osbaldston. But certainly my lord's grace of Canterbury hath been exceedingly wronged. Therefore I give da-images with my lord Finch. And for Osbaldston, I sentence him with my lord Finch. And as for my lord bishop of Lincoln, I join with my lord Brampton."

The Earl of Manchester, Lord Privy-Seal. "My lords; For Osbaldston, if you take his words, his meaning, and the end, they will appear to be very heinous. 1. His words, to bring contempt and disgrace upon my lord bishop of Canterbury. 2. His meaning is expressed in the words themselves, to be against two honourable persons. 3. And for the end, that was most dangerous and pernicious. It was to overthrow and work the confusion and ruin of my lord's grace of Canterbury.

"Setting aside all the witnesses, I will condemn my lord Bishop of Lincoln out of his own mouth, for he denies all. 1. He denies the receiving of the letter. 2. The entertaining of them. 3. The publishing of them. Not as Peter did when he had denied his Master, to go out and weep bitterly for his offence, but to justify himself: Yet how can my lord of Lincoln deny the letter that he wrote with his own hand, and yet he will not confess it to be his own letter.

"And after he was prisoner in the Tower, he called to Mr. Cadwallader Powel, and demanded if any of Mr. Osbaldston's letters were found? Who answered, That they were found. Then said the bishop, Osbaldston is undone. 2. He desired that they should be kept close and secret. 3. Though they were kept close, and only put into the pocket, if they concern a public person, he is a libeller.

"For Osbaldston, besides all the corporal punishment, I hold fit that he should acknowledge his offence in writing to my lord's grace of Canterbury.

"And as for the bishop of Lincoln, I hold that he should also make an acknowledgment in writing to the archbishop, for he is a person of great place and quality. And my lord of Lincoln is under canonical obedience to the archbishop by his oath, and disobedience is a breach of his oath; therefore he should acknowledge his offence under his own hand.

"For my lord's grace of Canterbury, he hath ever carried himself with much gravity in his place, and piety towards God and the king, and the public good; therefore I leave him in honour as I found him, and sentence the bishop of Lincoln with my lord Bramstone: and Osbaldston with my lord Finch."

The Earl of Holland joined in sentence with my lord Finch for Osbaldston, and with my lord Bramstone for the bishop of Lincoln.

The Lord Keeper. "My lords; If I be not mistaken, it is misspending of time in opening the cause, therefore I shall use as much brevity as may be. And, first, I shall begin with the first letter, and think it fit that this letter, and all the copies thereof, should be suppressed. Yet I may make this use of it, That Osbaldston and my lord bishop had a long time continued intercourse of writing scandalous letters, and false news.—Again, I make this use of it, That my lord of Lincoln having received such a letter so scandalous against the king and state, did conceal the same.

"My lords, for the letter of the 9th of Jan. my lord bishop of Lincoln doth deny that he received it; and therefore I think that he conceived it to be a scandalous letter, which made him to deny it. Again, he kept the letters by him, that he might have the words ready to tell unto every one at his pleasure. And as for the letter of the 30th of Jan. he denieth to make a perfect answer to it.

"It was the saying of one that was late Lord Chancellor, 'That he never liked a cause, where there were divers Answers in it;' neither can I like this, when my lord bishop of Lincoln hath been so often examined, and will not make a perfect answer, for he hath thrice been examined upon this letter, which is a shrewd argument unto me, that he knew well that there was scandalous matter contained in it.

"Next, my lords, is the publishing of these libellous letters, and I think it very fit that my lord of Lincoln should be charged with the publishing of them. If they were in the band-box, then that was a publishing of them; and he delivered a letter to his secretary, which was a publishing thereof.—But it is true, if a man deliver a letter to his secretary, and command that he should keep it secret, I conceive that is not a publishing of it. If there were no other proof but this, I should think my lord bishop of Lincoln and Mr. Osbaldston to be guilty, not only of contriving, but also of publishing and divulging scandalous Libels against the lord archbishop of Canterbury, and the state.—As for Witnesses, although there is no need, for it is plain without witnesses, yet there be divers witnesses that prove it.

"Now it remains that I should proceed to Censure. It concerns the late Lord Treasurer, one of his majesty's privy-council, and my lord archbishop of Canterbury, two honourable persons: And my lord archbishop had not only been a friend to the bishop of Lincoln, but a faithful mediator for him to his majesty, and was always very faithful in returning his majesty's answer unto him; and yet notwithstanding all this, my lord of Lincoln hath done many heinous offences against the said archbishop of Canterbury. For Osbaldston his Censure, I agree with my lord Finch, and do add thereunto, confession of the offence, and submission: And for my lord bishop of Lincoln, I agree with my lord Bramstone."

The SENTENCE of the Court was,

"That Mr. Osbaldston should be fined 5,000*l.* to the king, and pay 5,000*l.* damages to the archbishop; be deprived of all spiritual dignities and promotions; imprisoned during the king's pleasure, and make submission.—That the bishop of Lincoln be fined in 5,000*l.* to the king, and 3,000*l.* to the archbishop; to be imprisoned during the king's pleasure, and to make submission.—And Osbaldston was sentenced to stand in the pillory in the Dean's-yard, before his own school, and his ears to be only nailed to the pillory.*

It so happened, though the report was that Osbaldston was run away, that he was in Court standing in the croud at the Censure; and when he heard the said censure of some of the lords, he guessed the cause would go against him, and knowing the rule of the court, That if the warden should espy him in court, he might command his tipstaff to apprehend him; as soon as the major part of the court had past Censure upon him, although the Lord Keeper had not then given his sense; therefore he got out of court, went to his study at the school, burnt some papers, and writ on a paper, which he left on his desk, 'That if the archbishop enquire after me, tell him, I am gone beyond 'Canterbury.' Whereupon messengers were sent to the port-towns to apprehend him; but he lay hid in a private house in Drury-Lane, till the parliament met in November, 1640.*

Concerning this Bishop and this Case lord Clarendon writes thus: "Dr. Williams, as is said, was a man of a very imperious and fiery temper; he had been Keeper of the Great Seal of England in the time of king James. After his removal from that charge, he had lived splendidly in his diocese, and made himself very popular amongst those who had no reverence for the court; of which he would frequently, and in the presence of many, speak with too much freedom, and tell many stories of things and persons upon his own former experience; in which, being a man of great pride and vanity, he did not always confine himself to a precise veracity, and did often presume in those unwary discourses, to mention the person of the king with too little reverence. He did affect to be thought an enemy to the archbishop of Canterbury; whose person he seemed exceedingly to contemn, and to be much displeas'd with those Ceremonies and Innovations, as they were then called, which were countenanced by the other; and had himself published, by his own authority, a Book against the using those Ceremonies, in which there was much good learning, and too little gravity for a bishop. His passion and his levity, gave every day great advantages to those who did not love him, and he provoked too many, not to have those advantages made use of: so that, after several Informations against him in the Star-Chamber, he was sentenced, and fined in a great sum of money to the king, and committed prisoner to the Tower, without the pity, or compassion of any, but those, who, out of hatred to the government, were sorry that they were without so useful a champion; for he appeared to be a man of a very corrupt nature, whose passions could have transported him into the most unjustifiable actions. He had a faculty of making relations of things done in his own presence, and discourses made to himself, or in his own hearing, with all the circumstances of answers, and replies, and upon arguments of great moment; all which, upon examination, were still found to have nothing in them that was real, but to be the pure effect of his own invention. After he was sentenced in the Star-Chamber, some of his friends resorted to him, to lament, and condole with him for his misfortune, and some of them seemed to wonder that in an affair of such a nature, he had not found means to have made some Submission, and Composition, that might have prevented the public hearing, which proved so much to his prejudice in point of reputation, as well as profit. He answered them with all the formality imaginable, 'That they had reason indeed to wonder at him upon the event; but when they should know how he had covered himself, he believed they would cease to think him worthy of blame.' And then related to them, 'That as soon as publication had passed in his cause, and the books were taken out, he had desired his council, who were all able men, and some of them very eminent, in the vacation time, and they at most leisure, to meet together, and carefully to look over, and peruse all the Evidence that was taken on both sides; and that then they would attend him such a morning, which he appointed upon their consent, at his own house at Westminster: That they came at the time appointed; and being then shut up in a room together, he asked them, whether they had sufficiently perused all the Books, and were thoroughly informed of his Case? To which they all answered, that they had not only read them all over together, but had severally every man by himself perused them again, and they believed they were all well informed of the whole. That he then told them he had desired this conference with them, not only as his council, by whose opinion he meant to govern himself, but as his particular friends, who, he was sure, would give him their best advice, and persuade him to do every thing as they would do themselves, if they were in his condition. That he was now offered to make his peace at court, by such a humble Submission to the king, as he was most inclined, and ready to make; and which he would make the next day after his cause was heard, though he should be declared to be innocent, of which he could make no doubt; but that which troubled him for the present, was, that the infamiousness of the Charge against him, which had been often exposed, and enlarged upon in several motions, had been so much taken notice of through the kingdom, that it could not consist with his honour to divert the hearing, which would be imputed to his want of confidence in his innocence, since men did not suspect his courage, if he durst rely upon the other; but that he 'was resolved, as he said before, the next day after he should be vindicated from those odious aspersions, he would cast himself at the king's feet, with all the humility, and submission, which the most guilty man could make profession of. It was in this point he desired their advice, to which he would, without adhering to his own inclination, entirely conform himself; and therefore desired them, singly in order, to give him their advice.' He repeated the several, and distinct discourse every man had made, in which he was so punctual, that he applied those phrases, and expressions, and manner of speech to the several men, which they were all taken notice of frequently to use; as many men have some peculiar words in discourse, which they are most delighted with, or by custom most addicted to: and in conclusion, 'That they were unanimous in their judgments; that he could not, with the preservation of his honour, and the opinion of his integrity, decline the public hearing; where he must be unquestionably declared innocent; there being no crime, or misdemeanor proved against him in such a manner, as could make him liable to censure: they all commended his resolution of submitting to the king as soon as he had made his innocence to appear; and they all advised him to pursue that method. This, he said, had swayed him; and made him decline the other expedient, that had been proposed to him.'

"This relation wrought upon those to whom it was made, to raise a prejudice in them against the justice of the cause, or the reputation of the council, as they were most inclined; whereas there was not indeed the least shadow of truth in the whole Relation; except that there was such a meeting, and conference, as was mentioned, and which had been consented to by the bishop upon the joint desire, and importunity of all the council; who, at that Conference, unanimously advised and desired him 'to use all the means and friends he could, that the cause might not be brought to hearing; but that he should purchase his peace at any price; for that if it were heard, he would be sentenced very grievously, and that there were many things proved against him, which would so much reflect upon his honour, and reputation, and the more for being a bishop, that all his friends would abandon him; and be for ever after ashamed to appear on his behalf.' Which advice, with great passion, and reproaches upon the several persons for their presumption, and ignorance in matters so much above them, he utterly and scornfully rejected. Nor indeed was it possible, at that time, for him to have made his peace; for though upon some former addresses, and importunity on his behalf by some persons of power, and place in the court, in which the queen herself had endeavoured to have done him good offices, the king was inclined to have saved him, being a bishop, from the infamy he must undergo by a public Trial; yet the bishop's vanity had, in those conjunctures, so far transported him, that he had done all he could to have insinuated, 'that the court was ashamed of what they had done; and had prevailed with some of his powerful friends to persuade him to that composition.' Upon which the king would never hear more any person who moved on his behalf.

"It had been once mentioned to him, whether by authority, or no, was not known, 'that his peace should be made, if he would resign his bishopric, and deanery of Westminster, for he had that in commendam, and take a good bishopric in Ireland; which he positively refused; and said, he had much to do to defend himself against the Archbishop here; but if he was in Ireland, there was a man, meaning the earl of Strafford, who would cut off his head within one month.'

"This Bishop had been for some years in the Tower, by the Sentence of the Star-Chamber, before this parliament met; when the lords, who were the most active and powerful, presently resolved to have him at liberty. Some had much kindness for him; not only as a known enemy to the archbishop of Canterbury; but as a supporter of those opinions, and those persons, which were against the Church itself. And he was no sooner at liberty, and brought into the house, but he defended, and seconded the lord Say, when he made an invective with all the malice, and bitterness imaginable, against the archbishop then in prison; and when he had concluded, that bishop said; 'that he had long known that noble lord, and had always believed him to be as well affected to the church as himself; and so he continued to make all his address to that lord, and those of the same party. Being now in full liberty, and in some credit, and reputation, he applied himself to the king; and made all possible professions of duty to his majesty, and zeal to the church; protesting 'to have a perfect detestation of those persons, who appeared to have no affection or duty towards his majesty, and of all evil intentions against the religion established; and that the civility he had expressed towards them, was only out of gratitude for the good will they had shewed to him; and especially that he might the better promote his majesty's service.' And it being his turn shortly after, as dean of Westminster, to preach before the king; he took occasion to speak of the Factions in Religion; and mentioning the Presbyterian Discipline, he said, 'it was a government only fit for taylors and shoemakers, and the like: not for noblemen, and gentlemen;' which gave great scandal, and offence to his great patrons; to whom he easily reconciled himself, by making them as merry with some sharp sayings of the court, and by performing more substantial offices for them.

"When, upon the Trial of the earl of Strafford, it was resolved to decline the judgment of the house of peers, and to proceed by Bill of Attainder; and thereupon it was very unreasonably moved, 'That the bishops might have no vote in the passing that act of parliament;

' because they pretended it was to have their hand in blood, which was against the old canon; this bishop, without communicating with any of his brethren, very frankly declared his opinion, 'that they ought not to be present;' and offered, not only in his own name, but for the rest of the bishops, 'to withdraw always when that business was entered upon:' and so betrayed a fundamental right of the whole Order; to the great prejudice of the king, and to the taking away the life of that person, who could not otherwise have suffered.

" And shortly after, when the king declared, that he neither would, nor could in conscience, give, his royal assent to that Act of Attainder; when the tumults came about the court with noise and clamour for justice; the lord Say desired the king to confer with his bishops for the satisfaction of his conscience; and desired him to speak with that bishop in the point. After much discourse together, and the king insisting upon many particulars, which might induce others to consent; but were known to himself to be false; and therefore he could never in conscience give his own consent to them; the bishop, as hath been mentioned before, amongst other arguments, told him; 'that he must consider, that as he had a private capacity, and a public, so he had a public conscience as well as a private; that though his private conscience, as a man, would not permit him to do an act contrary to his own understanding, judgment, and conscience; yet his public conscience, as a king, which obliged him to do all things for the good of his people, and to preserve his kingdom in peace for himself and his posterity, would not only permit him to do that, but even oblige, and require him. That he saw in what commotion the people were; that his own life, and that of the queen's, and the royal issue, might probably be sacrificed to that fury; and it would be very strange, if his conscience should prefer the life of one single private person, how innocent soever, before all those other lives, and the preservation of the kingdom.'

" This was the argumentation of that unhappy casuist; who truly, it may be, did believe himself; for towards the end of the war, and when the king's power declined; he, being then an archbishop, did in person assist the rebels to take a castle of the king's; in which there was a garrison, and which was taken by a long siege; because he might thereby the better enjoy the profits of his own estate, which lay thereabouts. Upon all these great services he had performed for the party, he grew every day more imperious; and after the king thought it necessary to make him archbishop of York, which, as the time then was, could not qualify him to do more harm, and might possibly dispose, and oblige him to do some good; he carried himself so insolently, in the house and out of the house, to all persons, that he became much more odious universally, than ever the other archbishop had been; having sure more enemies than he, and few or no friends, of which the other had abundance. And the great hatred of this man's person and behaviour, was the greatest invitation to the house of commons so irregularly to revive that Bill to remove the Bishops."

Wilson, however, in his History of the Life and Reign of James the First, speaks very favourably of him; and Hacket, bishop of Litchfield (who had been his chaplain) has left an ample and encomiastic account of his Life. He was canuchus ab utero; yet Wilson tells us that his intimacy with the countess of Buckingham gave rise to scandal: he had been chaplain to Bacon, from whom the Great Seal being taken in May 1621, it was in July following (having been held two months by commissioners) given to Williams, as Lord Keeper. In the same month he was made bishop of Lincoln. He held the seal somewhat more than four years. From Lincoln, he was translated to York in 1641, and he died in 1650. He seems to have been of a rash and insolent, though servile, temper, and of selfish, temporising and trimming political conduct. For more respecting him, see the Note to vol. 2, p. 1163, and the Case of the twelve Bishops, A. D. 1641, post.—He had preached king James's funeral sermon, and printed it with the title of "Great Britain's Solomon." The text was 1 Kings, c. xi. ver. 41, 42, and part of 45. Of the Discourse Harris in his Life of James gives some specimens, which will probably be sufficient for most readers. The flattery is at least as gross as might be expected; the style is pedantic, agreeably to the taste and practice of the time. The preacher exhibits sufficient powers of invention in his praises of the modern Solomon, and very considerable industry and ingenuity in the discovery of resemblances between him and his prototype.

147. Proceedings in the Case of SHIP-MONEY, between the KING and JOHN HAMPDEN,* esq. in the Exchequer, 13 CHARLES I.†
A. D. 1637.

THE SPEECH OF THOMAS Lord COVENTRY, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of England, by command from his majesty, to all the Judges of Assize of England, in the Star Chamber, June 17, 1635.

MY Lords the Judges; The Term being done and ended, the Assizes are at hand: you are to divide yourselves for your several circuits. Circuits are for the service of the king and the good of the people; they are the execution of the king's laws, and administration of justice. In the Term, the people follow and seek after Justice; but in the Circuit, Justice followeth and seeketh after the people. So gracious is the frame and constitution of the king's government, that twice a year, at the least, Justice followeth the subjects home to their own doors; which, as it is a great ease to the trouble, charge, and travail of the country, so it giveth the peo-

* "Mr. Hampden was a man of much greater cunning, and it may be, of the most discerning spirit, and of the greatest address and insinuation to bring any thing to pass which he desired, of any man of that time, and who laid the design deepest. He was a gentleman of a good extraction, and a fair fortune, who, from a life of great pleasure and licence, had on a sudden retired to extraordinary sobriety and strictness, and yet retained his usual cheerfulness and affability; which, together with the opinion of his wisdom and justice, and the courage he had shewed in opposing the Ship-money, raised his reputation to a very great height, not only in Buckinghamshire, where he lived, but generally throughout the kingdom. He was not a man of many words, and rarely begun the discourse, or made the first entrance upon any business that was assumed; but a very weighty speaker, and after he had heard a full debate, and observed how the house was like to be inclined, took up the argument, and shortly, and clearly, and craftily, so stated it, that he commonly conducted it to the conclusion he desired; and if he found he could not do that, he was never without the dexterity to divert the debate to another time, and to prevent the determining any thing in the negative, which might prove inconvenient in the future. He made so great a shew of civility, and modesty, and humility, and always of mistrusting his own judgment, and esteeming his with whom he conferred for the present, that he seemed to have no opinions or resolutions, but such as he contracted from the information and instruction he received upon the discourses of others, whom he had a wonderful art of governing, and leading into his principles and inclinations, whilst they believed that he wholly depended upon their counsel and advice. No man had ever a greater power over himself, or was less the man that he seemed to be, which shortly after appeared to every body, when he cared less to keep on the masque." Lord Clarendon.

To which, when relating the circumstance of his death, he adds:

"He was a gentleman of a good family in Buckinghamshire, and born to a fair fortune, and of a most civil and affable deportment. In his entrance into the world, he indulged to himself all the licence in sports and exercises, and company, which were used by men of the most jolly conversation. Afterwards, he retired to a more reserved and melancholy society, yet preserving his own natural cheerfulness, and vivacity, and above all, a flowing courtesy to all men; though they who conversed nearly with him, found him growing into a dislike of the Ecclesiastical Government of the Church, yet most believed it rather a dislike of some churchmen, and of some introducements of theirs, which he apprehended might disquiet the public peace. He was rather of reputation in his own country, than of public discourse, or fame in the kingdom, before the business of Ship-money: but then he grew the argument of all tongues, every man enquiring who, and what he was, that durst, at his own charge, support the liberty and property of the kingdom, and rescue his country, as he thought, from being made a prey to the court. His carriage, throughout this agitation, was with that rare temper and modesty, that they who watched him narrowly to find some advantage against his person, to make him less resolute in his cause, were compelled to give him a just testimony. And the judgment that was given against him, infinitely more advanced him, than the service for which it was given. When this parliament began, being returned knight of the shire for the county where he lived, the eyes of all men were fixed upon him, as their Patrie Pater, and the pilot that must steer the vessel, through the tempests, and rocks which threatened it. And I am persuaded, his power and interest, at that time, was greater to do good or hurt, than any man's in the kingdom, or than any man of his rank hath had in any time: for his reputation of honesty was universal, and his affections seemed so publicly guided, that no corrupt, or private ends could bias them.—He was of that rare affability, and temper in debate, and of that seeming humility and submission of judgment, as if he brought no opinion of his own with him, but a desire of information, and instruction; yet he had so subtle a way of interrogating, and, under the notion of doubts, insinuating his objections, that he infused his own opinions into those from whom he pretended to learn, and receive ple a better knowledge of Justice; and the end of it, that they may bless God and the king for the same.

It hath been the custom, that before your Circuit you should receive such Directions as the king, or his council, thinks reasonable to impart unto you, for the service of the king and weal of the people: In the declaring whereof, I shall say little of the just acts you are to do between party and party, only that you do them. And even with them who were able to preserve themselves from his insuasions, and discerned those opinions to be fixed in him, with which they could not comply, he always left the character of an ingenious, and conscientious person. He was indeed a very wise man, and of great parts, and possessed with the most absolute spirit of popularity, and the most absolute faculties to govern the people, of any man I ever knew. For the first year of the parliament, he seemed rather to moderate, and soften the violent and distemper'd humours, than to inflame them. But wise and dispassion'd men plainly discern'd, that that moderation proceeded from prudence, and observation that the season was not ripe, rather than that he approv'd of the moderation; and that he begot many opinions, and motions, the education whereof he committed to other men; so so far disguising his own designs, that he seem'd seldom to wish more than was concluded; and in many gross conclusions, which would hereafter contribute to designs not yet set on foot, when he found them sufficiently backed by majority of voices, he would withdraw himself before the question, that he might seem not to consent to so much visible unreasonableness; which produced as great a doubt in some, as it did approbation in others, of his integrity. What combination soever had been originally with the Scots for the invasion of England, and what farther was enter'd into afterwards in favour of them, and to advance any alteration of the government in parliament, no man doubts was at least with the privacy of this gentleman.

"After he was among those members accused by the king of High Treason, he was much altered; his nature and carriage seeming much fiercer than it did before." [Upon this passage Mr. Laing has a very shrewd observation in relation to the character of king Charles, and the sentiments respecting him which his conduct had inspired.] "And without question, when he first drew his sword, he threw away the scabbard; for he passionately oppos'd the overture made by the king for a treaty from Nottingham, and as eminently, all expedients that might have produced any accommodations in this that was at Oxford; and was principally relied on, to prevent any insuasions which might be made into the earl of Essex towards peace, or to render them ineffectual, if they were made; and was indeed much more relied on by that party, than the general himself. In the first entrance into the equal right between poor and rich; the particulars are left unto yourselves, as they happen in your Circuits. But since you are sent by the king to hear the causes of the people, it is his majesty's pleasure, that you so hear and order the same, that they may have no cause to complain to his majesty either for denial or delay of justice.

Of the Trial of capital offenders, I shall say as little; that part of Justice moveth in a frame, troubles, he undertook the command of a regiment of foot, and performed the duty of a colonel, upon all occasions, most punctually. He was very temperate in diet, and a supreme governor over all his passions, and affections, and had thereby a great power over other men. He was of an industry and vigilance not to be tired out, or wearied by the most laborious; and of parts not to be imposed upon, by the most subtle, or sharp; and of a personal courage equal to his best parts; so that he was an enemy not to be wished wherever he might have been made a friend; and as much to be apprehended where he was so, as any man could deserve to be. And therefore his death was no less pleasing to the one party, than it was condole'd in the other. In a word, what was said of Cinna, might well be applied to him; 'he had a head to contrive, and a tongue to persuade, and a hand to execute, any mischievous chief.' His death therefore seem'd to be a great deliverance to the nation." Lord Clarendon.

† "Our greatest news here now is that we have a new Attorney General (William Noy), which is news indeed, considering the honour of the man, how he hath been always ready to entertain any cause whereby he might clash with the prerogative, but now, as Judge Richardson told him, his head is full of Proclamations and devices how to bring Money into the Exchequer. He hath lately found out among the old Records of the Tower some precedents for raising a Tax called Ship Money in all the port towns when the kingdom is in danger." James Howell's Letters, 2d B. l. sect. 6, letter xi. to sir Arthur Ingram, dat. Jan. 30, 1633 (1634). Other particulars of this now occur in other letters of Howell. Some mention of him as a lawyer was made by Thierlof C. and Buller J. in the Case of the bishop of London v. Disney Fytche in Dom. Proc. 178. (See Cunningham's Law of Simony.) "Mr. Noy," says Selden, (Table Talk) "brought in Ship Money first for maritime towns, but that was like putting in a little sugar that afterwards you may put in a greater. He that pulls down the first brick does the main work; afterwards it is easy to pull down the wall." On the office of Attorney General and the operation of the office upon the character and conduct of the officer, some observations will be found in the Case of Rex v. Horne. A. D. 1777. post.

"The Narrow Seas were at this time" (says Kennett) "infested with Pirates of all the

and if all officers under you did their parts, you should walk in so straight a path, that you would find it very hard to tread awry: therefore you had need to heed them narrowly, lest they pervert justice. Look to the Corruptions of the Sheriffs and their Deputies: the partiality of Jurors; the bearing and siding with men of countenance and power in their country. When you meet with any such, your proceedings ought to be severe and exemplary against them, other-neighbour nations, and the Dutch began to challenge such a right of Fishery, as would have robbed the king of that Dominion, which had been always claimed and exercised by his royal ancestors. To carry on this new pretension, they encouraged their learned Grotius to assert their free use of Shipping, in a Treatise stiled Mare Liberum; answered, and sufficiently refuted, by our excellent antiquary Mr. Selden, in his Mare Clausum, of which the materials had been formerly thrown together at the motion of king James; and were now put in order, and within a twelve month published at the command of king Charles. But this controversy was not likely to be determined in paper: Therefore to shew a just concern for the honour and safety of the nation, the king on May 5, published two several Proclamations. In the first declaring his royal will and pleasure, 'That no mariner or seafaring men, shipwright or ship carpenter, whatsoever, being his majesty's subjects, should without the King's License, or the License of the admiral of England, enter or attempt or go about to enter, into the service of any foreign prince or state, or be employed out of this realm in any sea service whatsoever, unless it were in the king's own service, or of some of his subjects. And if any at this time be in the service of any foreign prince, that they forthwith return under a great penalty.' In the other of the same date he declares his farther pleasure 'concerning the Flags to be employed for his royal navy, as well as for the ships of his subjects of South and North Britain; and conceiving it meet for the honour of the king's own Ships in his navy royal, and of such other Ships as are, or shall be employed, in the king's immediate service, that the same be by their Flags distinguished from the ships of any other of his subjects; doth therefore prohibit and forbid, that none of the subjects of any of his nations and kingdoms, shall from henceforth presume to carry the Union Flag in the main-top, or other part of any of his ships, that is, St. George's Cross and St. Andrew's Cross joined together; but that the same Union Flag be still reserved as an ornament proper to the king's own ships, and ships in his immediate service and pay, and none others. And his majesty's farther will and pleasure is, that all other ships of his subjects of England or South Britain, bearing flags, shall from henceforth carry the red cross, commonly called St. George's cross; and also that all the other ships of the king's subjects wise Justice shall be overborne, howsoever in your own persons you bear yourselves with never so much uprightness.

And because the time of Assize is very short, and expieth in a few days, it is necessary that you afford as much time as may be unto those businesses that are most general, and most concern the public; the Trials of Nisi prius, and particular causes, they are in the number of those things that are not to be left undone; but those 'of Scotland, should from henceforth carry the white cross, commonly called St. Andrew's cross.'

"But the great difficulty was how to raise money for fitting out a Navy sufficient to guard the seas; as necessity seemed now to require not only against the encroachments of the Dutch, but against the growing insolence of the Turkish and Algerine pirates. By degrees a Project was framed out of ancient Records by Mr. Attorney General Noy, to impose upon every sea-port and place of merchandize the finding such a number of ships and men, in proportion to their wealth and trade, or to compound with commissioners at such a rate. The first Writ for this Tax called Ship-Money was dated the 20th of October, beginning with the city of London in this form:

THE FIRST WRIT FOR SHIP-MONEY.

'Carolus Rex, &c. To the Mayor, Commonalty and Citizens of our City of London, and to the Sheriffs of the same City, and good men in the said City and in the liberties, and members of the same, greeting;

'Because we are given to understand that certain thieves, pirates and robbers of the sea, as well Turks, enemies of the Christian name, as others, being gathered together wickedly taking by force, and spoiling the ships and goods and merchandizes, not only of our subjects but also of the subjects of our friends in the sea, which hath been accustomed anciently to be defended by the English nation; and the same at their pleasure have carried away, delivering the men in the same to miserable captivity. And forasmuch as we see them daily preparing all manner of shipping further to molest our Merchants, and to grieve the kingdom, unless Remedy be not sooner applied, and their endeavours be not more manly met withal; also the dangers considered, which on every side in these times of war do hang over our heads, that it behoveth us and our subjects, to hasten the defence of the sea and kingdom with all expedition or speed that we can: We willing, by the help of God, chiefly to provide for the defence of the kingdom, safeguard of the sea, security of our subjects, safe conduct of Ships and Merchandizes to our kingdom of England coming, and from the same kingdom to foreign parts passing: Forasmuch as we and our progenitors kings of England, have been always heretofore masters of the aforesaid sea, and it would be very irksome unto things that concern the general and public good, you are to account them as the weightier matters of the law; and therefore you are to take them into your prime and chief care and cogitation. Now among those, I shall commend unto you in the first place, The presenting and convicting of Recusants; for as it concerneth Religion, so it hath relation to his majesty's Profits, which are two great motives, to which you may add a third, because the king hath many us, if that princely honour in our times should be lost, or in any thing diminished. And although that charge of defence, which concerneth all men, ought to be supported by all, as by the laws and customs of the kingdom of England hath been accustomed to be done: notwithstanding, we considering, that you constituted in the sea coasts, to whom by sea as well great dangers are imminent, and who by the same do get more plentiful gains, for the defence of the sea, and conservation of our princely honour in that behalf, according to the duty of your allegiance against such attempts, are chiefly bound to set to your helping hand: we command, firmly enjoining you the aforesaid mayor, commonalty and citizens, and sheriffs of the said city, and the good men in the said city and in the liberties, and members of the same, in the faith and allegiance wherein ye are bound unto us, and as ye do love us and our honour, and under the forfeiture of all which ye can forfeit to us, that ye cause to be prepared and brought to the port of Portsmouth, before the first day of March now next ensuing, one ship of war of the burthen of 900 tons, with 350 men at the least, as well masters as very able and expert skilful mariners; one other ship of war of the burthen of 800 tons, with 260 men at the least, as well skilful masters as very able and expert mariners; four other ships of war, every of them of the burthen of 500 tons, and every of them with 200 men at the least, as well expert masters as very able and skilful mariners; and one other ship of war of the burthen of 300 tons, with 150 men, as well expert masters as very able and skilful mariners. And also every of the said ships with Ordnance, as well greater as lesser, gun-powder and spears and weapons, and other necessary arms sufficient for war, and with double tackling and with victuals, until the said 1st of March competent for so many men, and from that time for 26 weeks at your charges, as well in victuals as men's wages, and other things necessary for war, during that time, upon defence of the sea in our service in command of the admiral of the sea, to whom we shall commit the custody of the sea, before the aforesaid 1st day of March, and as he on our behalf shall command them to continue, so that they may be there the same day at the farthest, to go from thence with our ships, and the ships of other faithful subjects, for the safeguard of the sea, and defence of you and yours, and repulse and years since assigned these forfeitures to the public defence.

In the next place, I do require you, that you make a strict inquiry after Depopulations and Inclosures; a crime of a crying nature, that barreth God of his honour, and the king of his subjects: Churches and houses go down together. His majesty knoweth and taketh notice, that according to former directions given you in this place, you have given it in charge to the vanquishing of whomsoever busying themselves to molest or trouble upon the sea our merchants, and other subjects and faithful people coming into our dominions for cause of merchandize, or from thence returning to their own countries. Also we have assigned you the aforesaid mayor and aldermen, of the city aforesaid, or any thirteen or more of you, within thirty days after the receipt of this writ, to assess all men in the said city, and in the liberties, and members of the same, and the landholders in the same, not having a ship, or any part of the aforesaid ships, nor serving in the same, to contribute to the expence, about the necessary provision of the premises, and to assess and lay upon the aforesaid city, with the liberties and members thereof, viz. upon every of them according to their estate and substances, and the portion assessed upon them, and to nominate and appoint collectors in this behalf. Also we have assigned you the aforesaid mayor, and also the sheriffs of the city aforesaid, to levy the portions so as aforesaid, assessed upon the aforesaid men and landholders, and every of them in the aforesaid city, with the liberties and members of the same, by distress and other due means, and to commit to prison all those whom you shall find rebellious, and contrary in the premises, there to remain until we shall give further order for their delivery. And moreover we command you, that about the premises ye diligently attend, and do and execute those things with effect, upon peril that shall fall thereon, but we will not that under colour of our aforesaid command, more should be levied of the said men, than shall suffice for the necessary expences of the premises; or that any who have levied money for contribution, to raise the aforesaid charges, should by him detain the same, or any part thereof, or should presume by any manner of colour to appropriate the same to other uses. Willing, that if more than may be sufficient shall be collected, the same may be paid out among the contributors, for the rate of the part to them belonging. Witness, myself at Westminster the 30th day of October, in the tenth year of our reign.

"This Writ was read in a common council held at Guildhall Dec. 2, where the matter gave a general disgust, and brought out this Resolution upon it. 'This Court, after due and serious consideration taken of the premises, conceiving that by their ancient liberties, charters, and acts of parliament, they ought to be freed grand Inquests to inquire of these things, but to little effect: and without doubt the freeholders of England do hate and detest them. Depopulation is an oppression of an high nature, and commonly done by the greatest persons that keep the Jurors under and in awe; and that is the cause there are no more presented and brought in question: but however your Charge and Inquiry, touching this point, hath not taken effect worthy his majesty's care and your pains; and discharged of those things which by the said Writ are required by them to be done, doth order and agree, That the draught of a Petition touching the said business, this day read to this Court, shall be engrossed, and with all dutiful respect for and on this city's behalf, humbly presented to the king's most excellent majesty.

Which Petition was drawn up, and presented in this form:

To the king's most excellent majesty; The humble Petition of your faithful subjects, the mayor and commonalty, and citizens of your city of London, most humbly shewing;

That where your majesty by Writ bearing teste 20 Oct. last, commanded your petitioners, at their charge to provide 7 ships of war furnished with men, victual, and all warlike provisions, to be at Portsmouth by the first of March next, and to continue from thence by the space of 26 weeks in your majesty's service, upon the defence of the seas, and other causes in the said writ contained:— Your petitioners do in all submissive humbleness, and with acknowledgment of your sacred majesty's many favours unto your said city, inform your majesty that they conceive, that by ancient privileges, grants, and acts of parliament (which they are ready humbly to shew forth) they are exempt and are to be freed from that charge. And do most humbly pray, That your majesty will be graciously pleased, That the petitioners, with your princely grace and favour, may enjoy the said privileges and exemptions, and be freed from providing of the said ships and provisions.—And they shall pray, &c.

“This Petition seemed to have no other effect, but only to express a dissent, when there must follow a compliance. And the example of submission, however extorted from the city of London, would have its sure and certain influence upon all inferior places. The legal right of this aid was not yet disputed in any court of justice, but it created a general offence and odium. The nobility and gentry had reason to be jealous of any methods of raising Money out of parliament: The merchants and traders had the Grievance of thinking the whole burden cast upon them: The Clergy could not at first obtain an Exemption from their considerable share in it; and the Country Farmers thought it little less than seizing their corn and cattle to be sent on Shipboard. The murmurs yet his majesty willeth, that you do not cease, but enquire on still; for it is his resolution, against all opposition, to make all men see he hath a care of this overspreading evil, and of the means of his people having churches and towns demolished, and his people eaten up like bread, to satisfy the greedy desires of a few, who do waste as profusely, as they gather together unconscionably, and bring unto their posterity that woe which is pronounced against were indeed so universal, and so artificially improved by the enemies of the court, that they looked upon the death of the projector to be a Judgment sent upon his head. Mr. Attorney General Noy departed this life August 9.”

Lord Clarendon speaking of the innovations made about this time in the proceedings of the Court of Star-Chamber, says, “These errors (for errors they were in view, and errors they are proved by the success) are not to be imputed to the court, but to the spirit, and over-activity of the lawyers themselves; who should more carefully have preserved their profession, and its professors, from being profaned by those services, which have rendered both so obnoxious to reproach. There were two persons of that profession, and of that time, by whose several, and distinct constitutions (the one knowing nothing of, nor caring for the court; the other knowing, or caring for nothing else) those mischiefs were introduced, Mr. Noy, the Attorney General, and sir John Finch, first, lord chief justice of the common pleas, and then lord keeper of the great seal of England. Mr. Noy upon the great fame of his ability and learning (and he was very able and learned) was by great industry and importunity from court, persuaded to accept that place, for which all other men laboured (being the best for profit, that profession is capable of) and so he suffered himself to be made the king's Attorney General. The court made no impression upon his manners, upon his mind it did: and though he wore about him an affected morosity, which made him unapt to flatter other men; yet even that morosity and pride rendered him the most liable to be grossly flattered himself that can be imagined. And by this means the great persons, who steered the public affairs, by admiring his parts and extolling his judgment as behind his back, wrought upon him by degrees for the eminency of the service, to be an instrument in all their designs; thinking that he could not give a clearer testimony, that his knowledge in the law was greater than all other mens, than by making that law which all other men believed not to be so. So he moulded, framed and pursued the odious and crying project of Soap; and with his own hand drew and prepared the Writ for Ship-Money, both which will be the lasting monuments of his fame. In a word, he was an unanswerable instance how necessary a good education and knowledge of men is to make a wise man, at least a man fit for business.”

“On the death of Mr. Noy, sir John Banks

those that 'lay house to house, and field to field,' to dwell alone in the midst of the earth.

The next thing that I shall mention unto you, is, the rectifying and reforming of Ale-houses and Tippling-houses, and those I account one of the greatest pests of the kingdom. First, therefore, let none be enabled to set up or continue without licence: there are a kind of people that do take upon them licences, recognizances, or laws, or what you will, and who have been a great deal the worse, because they see a great multitude tolerated that have no licence; and therefore I give it in charge, to take a course that none be permitted unless they be licensed: And for the licensed Ale-houses, let them be but a few, and in fit places; if they be in private corners and ill places, they become the dens of thieves, they are the public stages of drunkenness and disorder. In market towns, or in great places or roads, where travellers come, they are necessary.

Next unto this, let those that be licensed be held strictly to it, according to law. It hath been observed, and very truly, that in the Taverns, Inns, and Ale-houses in England, by the falshood of their measure, and their unjust prices, they have drawn more money from the guest, than out of the Excise of Ale and Beer are drawn out in Holland. A strange thing, that people for a public work, for any thing that is good, should be loth to part with any thing, and yet, with open eyes, to see themselves deceived by such base and lewd people.

Next unto this, let care be taken in the choice of Alehouse-keepers, that it be not appointed to be the livelihood of a great family: one or two is enough to draw drink, and serve was constituted Attorney-General by patent dated Sept. 27, 10 Car. And sir Robert Heath being without reason given removed from the honour of lord chief justice of the common pleas, sir John Finch was advanced to that honour. Great were the discourses what the occasion should be of that sudden advancement. But four days after the Writ for Ship-Money coming forth, it was conceived by common discourse, that he was to be instrumental to advance that business. His concern in this invidious matter is thus represented by lord Clarendon. "Sir John Finch had much that Mr. Noy wanted, but nothing that the other had. Having led a free life in a restrained fortune, and having set up upon the stock of a good wit, and natural parts, without the superstructure of much knowledge in the profession by which he was to grow: he was willing to use those weapons in which he had most skill, and so (being not unseen in the affections of the court, but not having reputation enough to guide or reform them) he took up Ship-Money where Mr. Noy left it; and being a Judge carried it up to that pinnacle, from whence he almost broke his own neck; having in his journey thither, had too much influence on his brethren, to induce them to concur in a judgment they had all cause to repent."

the people in an Alehouse; but if six, eight, ten, or twelve, must be maintained by Alehouse-keeping, it cannot chuse but be an exceeding disorder, and the family by this means is unfit for any other good work or employment. I have not skill enough to understand all the inconveniencies that come from this one ill fountain, and my memory will not contain what I have so many times observed of them myself; but your lordships have a knowledge and experience of them, therefore I will leave them unto you: only this, that because in many places they swarm by default of the Justices of the Peace, that set up too many, and there are none, except yourselves at the Assizes, all the year long can meet with this evil, but the Justices of the Peace. And if the Justices of Peace will not obey your Charge herein, certify their default and names, and I assure you they shall be discharged. I once did discharge two Justices for setting up one Alehouse, and shall be glad to do the like again upon the same occasion.

In the next place, I will commend unto you the Punishment of Vagabonds and wanderers; to beguile the Alehouses of such unruly guests; it would make some way of amendment to those Alehouses: and it cannot be deny'd, but the law hath appointed hands enough to do this work; the Constable, Headborough, Tything-men, and the rest of the inferior Officers, and the Watchmen, who may do all with a particular warrant from the Justices of Peace; and the Justices of the Peace are bound to call them to an account, and to punish them for their neglect. If this were done, and other officers were chosen as they ought to be, not people of little wealth, and as little understanding, but that they were elected out of the better sort of Yeomanry, and the watches kept by able men, I am sure that these loose people that wander up and down will quickly be gone: therefore you may do well to let it be known in the country, that the Lords of Leet and those that have the elections of constables and officers, they are by the law answerable for their choice. There have been Precedents, that where an insufficient coroner hath been chosen by a county, the whole county hath been answerable to the king for the coroner's fault. And if the Lords of Leet, and their Homagers, and those that make choice of the Constables and Officers, were sometimes awakened by soon seizing of their Leets, or Fine, or Quo warranta, I make no doubt, but the country would be better served many years after, for some such service done; therefore I could wish that this were made known unto the country, that the lords, and those that choose them, were answerable for their defaults.

Now for bringing loose people in order, the House of Correction hath need to be looked unto, and be put in readiness, that those that are idle may not want work. 'Ducere volentes, trahere nolentes.' And for the Houses of Correction, as it is in some countries, it were convenient they were placed near the Jail; that not idle persons only, but the prisoners of the Jail also might be made to work, and eat the labour of their own hands: this, as it hath been formerly, so it is now commended by his majesty to see it effected so soon as may be.

The binding out of Apprentices is a thing fit to be pressed throughout all your circuit. Opposition hath been made against it by some, though without any ground or law: sometimes the parents are not willing to leave their children, though they have not meat to feed them at home; sometimes the parishioners are not willing to give them clothes, and those that bid them are negligent: and all these must be over-ruled, and made smart for their opposition and neglect.

In a word, you are to call upon all to whom it belongeth, but especially to the Justices of the Peace, to see his majesty's printed Order be put in execution. You are to justify yourselves, what justices of the peace are diligent in it, and who neglect, and so to certify to the Lords of the Council.

I have but one thing more to give you in Charge, and it is a thing of great weight and importance; it concerneth the honour of his majesty and the kingdom, and the safety of both. Christendom is full of war, and there is nothing but rumours of war: what hath been done of late years abroad by fire and sword, it were a pity and grief to think of; yet we have by the goodness of God, and his majesty's provident care, all this while enjoyed a most happy peace and plenty. As it is a good precept in Divinity, so it holdeth in Policy too; 'Nunc tua res agitur, jam proximus ardet;' which if we observe, to defend ourselves, it would be a warning to all nations, and we should be the more assured to enjoy our peace, if the war abroad do make us stand upon our guard at home. Therefore no question it hath ever been accounted the greatest wisdom for a nation to arm, that they may not be enforced to fight; which is better than not to arm, and to be sure to fight. Therefore his majesty in these doubtful times, hath not only commanded, that all the Land-Forces of the kingdom should be set in order and readiness, but to set to Sea a royal Fleet at his majesty's great charge, but with the assistance of the Maritime places of this kingdom.

The causes and occasions and times of war, with the preparations and ordering of them, is proper to the king; and dutiful obedience in such things does best become the subject. And yet his majesty hath vouchsafed, even by his writ, to declare enough to satisfy all well-minded men, and to express the clearness of his princely heart, in aiming at the general good of his kingdom.

The Dominion of the Sea, as it is an antient and undoubted Right of the crown of England, so it is the best security of the land; for it is impregnable so long as the sea is well guarded: therefore, out of all question, it is a thing of absolute necessity, that the guarding of the sea be exactly looked unto; and those subjects whose minds are most fixed upon the honour of their king and country, will with no patience endure to think of it, that this dominion of the sea, which is so great an honour, should be either lost or diminished. Besides, for safety sake, the dominion of the sea is to be kept, and the seas guarded. The Wooden Walls are the best walls of this kingdom; and if the riches and wealth of the kingdom be respected for that cause, the Dominion of the Sea ought to be respected: for else, what would become of our wool, lead, and the like, the prices whereof would fall to nothing if others should be masters of the seas? There is a Case in the Book of Assize, fol. 43, which putteth me in mind of certain men that went down into the country, and carried a report, that no wool should pass over the sea that year; upon this wool fell to so low prices, that the men that carried the report were questioned and fined. And now if a report alone, and that a false one too, wrought such an effect upon the wools in England, think what would be wrought by a real loss of the dominion of the sea in all our commodities, if our trade should be at the command of other princes and states. Therefore, as his majesty, out of his great wisdom, hath found it expedient to set to sea that Fleet that is now upon the sea; so his majesty being engaged both in his honour, and the honour of the kingdom, he findeth it to be of absolute necessity, to strengthen this with a greater strength and more shipping the next year. Therefore, upon advice with his council, he hath resolved, that he will forthwith send forth new Writs for the preparation of a greater Fleet the next year, and that not only to the maritime towns, but to all the kingdom besides: For since that all the kingdom is interested both in the honour, safety and profit, it is just and reasonable that they should all put to their helping hands.

Now that which his majesty requireth from you, and doth command, is, That in your Charges at the Assizes, and in all places else, where opportunity is offered, you take an occasion to let the people know how careful and zealous his majesty is to preserve his honour, and the honour of this kingdom, and the Dominion of the Sea; and to secure both sea and land by a powerful fleet, that foreign nations may see, that England is both ready and able to keep itself, and all its rights. And you are to let them know how just it is, that his majesty should require this for the common defence; and with what alacrity and cheerfulness they ought, and are bound in duty, to contribute unto it; that foreign nations may observe the power and readiness of this kingdom, which will make them slow to contend with us either by sea or land, and that will be the best way to confirm unto us a firm and sure peace.—This is the substance of all that which I received in commandment from his majesty; there are many things else that concern the public, but your judgments are well versed in them. These are the particulars I had command to mention unto you, so I will trouble you no further, but leave them to your grave considerations.

The SPEECH of Thomas Lord Coventry, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of England, to all the Judges of Assize of England, by command from the king, in the Star-Chamber, Feb. 14, 1636.

Together with the King's Letter and Case, touching Ship-Money, and the Judges Opinions thereupon.

My lords the Judges; the Term being now at an end, and the Assizes at hand, his majesty hath commaunded, That according to the custom in former times, so now in this place you should receive some Directions for the execution of Justice in all parts of the kingdom whereto you resort. This, as it may justly be, is a great comfort to his majesty's subjects, to see his majesty's care herein; which as it is a testimony of their own happiness, in receiving justice from the king himself, the Fountain of Justice, so it may as justly add strength and encouragement to you when you go your circuits, not only to be armed with your own authority by commission, but with your prince's instructions.

In the doing of justice, you will find things of several natures and degrees: In some places before you, Communicative Justice heareth sway, as in that which concerns meum et tuum: In other, Distributive Justice, as in premium et pœnam; some concern one and a few; others concern the multitude; others concern the king and all the king's people. In some pleas things are brought before you that are ad nocumentum of this or that particular town; some ad nocumentum totius regni. Some things are brought before you that are contra pacem regis, and others contra coronam et dignitatem regis; and in this variety of business, as there are many of a lesser and lower degree, yet not to be omitted, so you have 'Graviora Legis,' which you ought to pitch your mark; 'hæc oportet fieri, illa non omitti.'

In that Justice which you are to do between party and party, his majesty doth require you, as in all his Courts here, so in your Circuits to administer impartial justice, and repress vexatious and wrauling suits, not worthy the dignity of your own persons, and the court where you sit; for those actions, as they empty the spleen on the one side, so they never fail to empty the purse on both sides.

But besides the doing of justice between man and man, there is much more expected from your lordships; for the public business of the country is of much more importance than the trial of a Nisi Prius, and fitting you should esteem them so: and therefore it is his majesty's command, That those services which concern himself and the public, may be timely thought of, and not poster'd off to the end of the Assize.

Now before all things, the Advancement of Religion and Piety towards God, the peace of the Church, and the execution of those Laws that tend to those ends, ought to have the first place. As oft as I have had occasion to speak to you here, I have seldom spared to give you a Charge of the Laws against Recusants; and I must reiterate it now: for if you convict them not in the country, there is likely to be little reformation, or profit to his majesty; and whatsoever they be that will not be found in the Church, it behoveth you that you take order they be found in the Exchequer.

In the next place, that you proceed roundly against capital and felonious offenders, especially Robbers on the Highways, who now march in troops after a high hand. As a good Judge ought in court to shew severity to those in the jail, also the ablest and activest men in the county ought to do their utmost endeavours for the apprehending of those offenders as are abroad; that when you are there or here in the term, the service may proceed in a good way, and you be made a terror to malefactors, as some of your predecessors have been; for if your care be not great, malefactors will abound; therefore you must shew a severe and constant way of justice when they are found, and it will soon abate their pride, wherewith they now bear up themselves; and fit it is with an unanimous consent you agree of one course; for if there be a remissness in any one circuit, it leaveth a way to malefactors to overthrow all reformation, and justice is thereby discouraged.

In the next place, care must be had of those laws which concern Luxury and Idleness, the suppression and punishing of Vagabonds, the ordering and employing of Houses of Correction, the suppressing of Ale-houses and Tippling-houses, and binding out of Apprentices. If these were well and constantly observed, they would save many able bodies that die miserably at the gallows, and cut off a multitude of enormities that pester the commonwealth, and lessen the number of thieves and robbers; and therefore your lordships should do well to have a special care of the execution of those laws. And this giveth me occasion to put you in mind of those printed Orders published by his majesty in the year 1630, wherein at first there was a direction given for an Account to be made by the sheriff and justices of the peace: this same was orderly kept in divers places, in others not so well. It was afterwards advised by yourselves, that the way of Account should be changed, and that you should receive it at the Assizes, and present it to the Council-Board; yet it is my part to tell you, that it hath not so appeared by the account that is come to the Council-Table, and it is expected a better be given by you the next Term.

Now in respect the public service dependeth much upon the Justices of the peace in the county, it will be necessary that you cast your eye upon them, that they give due attendance at the Assizes: it is their duty to do it, and yours to enforce it upon them. And Assize last-eth but a few days, but the Instructions that they may receive from you in that short time, may be of great use for the county for the whole year; Also that you examine whether they give due attendance at the Quarter-Sessions. Although there is an express article in their Oath that they should give it; I hear many neglect it; Therefore it is a thing very fitting, and well worthy your labour, that at the beginning of every Assize, you trust not to the clerk of the peace his Information, but that yourselves do cast an eye upon his Book, and command him to return the names of such Justices of peace as you find by his Book were absent at the Quarter Sessions. Fit it will be that you let them know, that to prefer a riding, or bowling, or hunting-match, before their attendance at Quarter-Sessions, is little less than perjury; and if your admonition will not serve the turn, a remedy shall be taken. In the third place, it is necessary for you to inquire how they attend the monthly meetings, or other times of public service; for this I am sure of, they are all within one commission, and have the same oath, and the same attendance is imposed upon all; and why the greatest number exempt themselves, and leave the public service upon a few, I know not; but if I may know the particular men (of which I hope I shall henceforward by your lordships) I shall rid them out of Commission, and put others in their places.

My Lords, I have but one particular more, and that is of great importance; whereof by special direction and command from his majesty, I am to speak unto you at this time. All of you are the witnesses of his majesty's proceedings, though the candour and clearness of his own heart exceedeth your testimony, and your testimony is not only fit to be declared in this place, but in all the places of this realm. His majesty hath now the third time sent forth Writs* to require the Aid of his subjects for the guarding of the dominion of the Sea, and safety of the kingdom. This his majesty did upon great deliberation and advice, and upon important and weighty reasons. In the first year when the Writs were directed to the ports and maritime places, they received little or no opposition; but in the second year, when they went generally throughout the kingdom, though by some well obeyed) have been refused by some, not only in some inland counties, but in some of the Maritime places; and actions have been brought against some that have been employed in the execution of these writs. I suppose that no man will expect that Arcana Regni, the private reasons of a prince, should either upon this or other occasions be made public; but so many reasons as were fit to be opened, were formerly declared by me in this place to you the Judges of this realm.

The First was, That the whole kingdom is concerned in point of safety; admitting there were no other counsel or attempt against us, but only to interrupt us in the Dominion of the Seas, our most secure and safe defence, better either than castles or forts; which if it be commanded by others, it lays us open to much peril and danger.

Secondly, The whole kingdom is concerned in point of honour: for it is one of the most ancient and honourable rights of the crown of England, even the Dominion of the Sea. And all records do shew, how the kings and people of England have ever been careful that this honour should never perish: and certainly the whole kingdom is concerned in point of trade and profit; for the traffic does not only enrich the maritime parts, but the inland towns, and if trading fail, the inland places will find it in the fall of the prices of wool, lead, and other staple commodities. This experience sheweth daily, when upon every stop of the vent of cloth, there come such outcries by the weaver, the fuller, the spinner, and wool-growers themselves; and the authority of the law sheweth the same: 43, in the Book of Assize, which your lordships know better than I, it appears that certain men went into the country, and cast out a fame, that for that year no wool should be transported beyond the seas; presently upon this the price of wool fell, and those men were called in question, and were adjudged in a fine for it. Now if a rumour did so much abate the trade of the heart of the kingdom, what would the loss of the dominion of the sea do, which exposeth us, and all our trade, to the mercy of our neighbours? Therefore since the whole kingdom is concerned in point of honour, safety, and profit, what reason is there but that all should contribute to the maintenance of it? This, or to the like effect, I did formerly declare to you the judges by his majesty's command; and his majesty received satisfaction, in that you made a full declaration thereof in your circuits: and this I may say, for the most part, the subjects have shewed themselves most dutiful and obedient in this service of his majesty: and this year the sum imposed upon the county of York being 12,000*l.* is brought in already by the sheriff, and so is most part of Lancashire, and other shires; but when his majesty heard of some refusals, though he had cause to be sensible of it, yet he was far from being transported with passion, but thought good to resort to the Advice of you his Judges, who are sworn to give him faithful and true counsel in that which pertaineth to the law; and this his majesty, as well for the direction of his own course, as for the satisfaction of his subjects, required you to deliver your Opinions herein, to which you returned an Answer under your hands. And because the command which you received from the king, is expressed in a princely Letter under his own signature, I shall not take upon me to repeat it, you shall hear it read.

Which being delivered by my Lord-Keeper to one of the Clerks in Court, was read in hac verba:

THE KING'S LETTER TO THE JUDGES.

‘ you well. Taking into our princely consideration, that the honour and safety of this our realm of England, the preservation whereof is only intrusted to our care, was, and is now more nearly concerned than in former times, as well by divers counsels and attempts to take from us the Dominion of the Sea, of which we are sole lord and rightful owner; the loss whereof would be of greatest danger and peril to this kingdom, and other our dominions: We, for avoiding these and the like dangers, well weighing with ourselves, that where the good and safety of the kingdom in general is concerned, and the whole kingdom in danger, there the Charge and Defence ought to be borne by all the realm in general; did, for prevention of so public a mischief, resolve with ourselves to have a Royal Navy provided, that might be of force and power, with Almighty God’s blessing and assistance, to protect and defend this our realm and our subjects therein, from all such perils and dangers: and for that purpose we issued forth Writs under our great seal of England, and directed to all our sheriffs of all our several counties of England and Wales, commanding thereby all our said subjects, in every city, town and village, to provide such a number of Ships, well-furnished, as might serve for this our royal purpose; and which might be done with the greatest equality that could be. In performance whereof, though generally throughout all the counties of this our realm, we have found in our subjects great cheerfulness and alacrity, which we graciously interpret as a testimony, as well of their dutiful affections unto us, and to our service, as the respect they have to the public, which well becometh every good subject; nevertheless finding that some few, haply out of ignorance what the laws and customs of this our realm are, or out of a desire to be eased and freed in their particulars, (how general soever the Charge ought to be) have not yet paid and contributed the several Rates and Assessments that were set upon them, and foreseeing, in our princely wisdom, that from hence divers suits and actions are not unlikely to be commenced and prosecuted in our several courts at Westminster: We, desirous to avoid such inconveniences, and out of our princely love and affection to all our subjects, being willing to prevent such errors as any of our loving subjects may happen to run into, have thought fit in a case of this nature to advise with our Judges, who we doubt not are all well studied and informed in the right of our sovereignty. And because the Trials in our several courts, by the formality in pleading, will require a long protraction, we have thought it expedient, by this our Letter directed to you all, to require your Judgments in the case, as it is set down in the inclosed Paper, which will not only gain time, but also be of more authority to over-rule any prejudicate opinions of others in the point.

This being thus read, the Lord Keeper commanded the Case inclosed to be read, being as followeth :

‘ C. R. When the good and safety of the kingdom in general is concerned, and the whole kingdom is in danger; Whether may not the king, by Writ under the Great Seal of England, command all the subjects of this kingdom, at their charge, to provide and furnish such number of Ships, with men, victuals and munition, and for such time as he shall think fit, for the defence and safeguard of the kingdom from such danger and peril; and by law compel the doing thereof, in case of refusal or refractoriness? And whether, in such a case, is not the king sole judge, both of the danger, and when and how the same is to be prevented and avoided.’

THE JUDGES’ ANSWER.

‘ May it please your most excellent majesty; We have, according to your majesty’s command, every man by himself, and all of us together, taken into consideration the Case and Question, signed by your majesty, and inclosed in your royal Letter: and we are of Opinion, That when the good and safety of the kingdom in general is concerned, and the whole kingdom in danger, your majesty may, by Writ, under the Great Seal of England, command all the subjects of this your kingdom, at their charge, to provide and furnish such number of Ships, with men, munition, and victuals, and for such time as your majesty shall think fit, for the defence and safeguard of the kingdom from such danger and peril: and that by law your majesty may compel the doing thereof, in case of refusal or refractoriness. And we are also of opinion, That in such case, your majesty is the sole judge, both of the danger, and when and how the same is to be prevented and avoided.—

† The influence and effect of this stated Opinion may be delivered in these words of the lord Clarendon. “ It is notoriously known, that pressure was born with much more cheerfulness before the Judgment for the king, than ever it was afterward; men before pleasing themselves with doing somewhat for the king’s service, as a testimony of their affection, which they were not bound to do. But when they heard this demanded in a court of law as a Right, and found it by sworn Judges of the law adjudged so, upon such grounds and reasons as every stander-by was able to swear was not law, and so had lost the pleasure and delight of

The said Case, with the Judges' Opinions thereunto, (formerly in private delivered to his majesty) being thus publicly made known by my Lord Keeper, who, withal, caused their several Names to be read, as they were in order subscribed; (all the Judges being present save only Judge Crooke) the Lord Keeper spake as followeth:

My lords; This being the uniform Resolution of all the Judges of England, with one voice, and set under their own hands; I say, this being so resolved, as they do here express upon every man's particular studying the Case, and upon a general conference amongst themselves, it is of very great authority: for the very lives and lands of the king's Subjects are to be determined by these reverend Judges; much more a charge of this nature, which God knows cannot be burdensome to any, but is of singular use and consequence, and for the safety of the whole kingdom. The command from his majesty is, that I should publish this your Opinion in this place, and give order, That it should be entered in this Court, in the High Court of Chancery, and in the courts of King's-Bench, Common-Pleas, and Exchequer; for this is a thing not fit to be kept in a corner: and his further command is, that you the Judges do declare and publish this general Resolution of all the Judges of England, through all parts of the kingdom, that all men may take notice thereof, and that those his subjects which have been in an error, may inform themselves, or be reformed. You have great cause to declare it with joy, and you can hardly do it with honour enough to the king, that in so high a point of his sovereignty, he hath been pleased to descend, and to communicate with you his Judges; which sheweth, that justice and sovereignty, in his majesty, do kiss each other. His further pleasure is, That you let all know it is not his purpose by this resolution to stop, or check, the actions or suits which any have brought, or shall bring, concerning this; for it is his majesty's command, that all such as proceed in any action about the same have equal and meet justice, and that they be suffered to proceed in course of law, so as you call the king's learned being kind and dutiful to the king; and instead of giving were required to pay; and by a logic that left no man any thing which he might call his own: they no more looked upon it as the Case of one man, but the Case of the kingdom; nor as an Imposition laid upon them by the king, but by the Judges, which they thought themselves bound in conscience, to the public justice, not to submit to. The damage and mischief cannot be expressed, that the crown and state sustained by the deserved reproach and infamy that attended the Judges by being made use of in this and like arts of power, there being no possibility to preserve the dignity, reverence and estimation of the laws themselves, but by the integrity and innocency of the Judge."

counsel unto their proceedings, that they may not be surprized.

Now, my lords, I have little more to say, but this I am sure of, that if any contrary opinion shall yet remain amongst men, it must proceed from those that are sons of the law, (Felices essent artes, &c.) and you the judges of the realm have been accounted the fathers of the law; then, in good faith, it will ill become the son to dispute against the father. Having thus delivered unto you what I received in command from his majesty, as his majesty doth, so do I, leave it to your judgments.

The KING versus JOHN HAMPDEN in the Case of SHIP-MONEY.

Trin. 13 Car. I. in Scacc.

By Writ. Of the Term of the Holy Trinity, in the 13th year of king Charles.

" Memorandum; that the Writ* of our lord the king under the seal of the Exchequer, by the consent of the barons here, issued out in these words:

" ss. Charles by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, king, Defender of the Faith, &c. To the sheriff of Bucks greeting. Whereas several and divers sums of money, specified in the Schedule to this Writ annexed, by virtue of our Writ under our seal of England, bearing date the 4th day of August in the 11th year of our reign, were assessed and charged upon several persons in the said Schedule named, for and towards the providing of a Ship of War together with the rigging and other things thereunto belonging, in the said Writ particularly mentioned; which said several sums of money being so assessed and charged, and unpaid and not satisfied, the Names of the said several persons, together with the several sums of money charged upon them, were certified into the Court of our Chancery by our Writ of Certiorari, bearing date the 9th day of March in the 12th year of our reign, issuing under our great seal aforesaid: and by our Writ of Mittimus under the said seal, bearing date the 5th day of the month of May instant, were sent into our Exchequer for further process thereupon to be had, as by the tenor of the said Writ, bearing date the 4th day of August in the 11th year of our reign, and by the Writ of Certiorari, and Certificates thereupon made, sent into our said Exchequer, and there of record, remaining in the custody of our remembrancer, more fully doth appear: We command you, that you do not, by reason of any liberty, omit entering thereupon; and by good and lawful men of your bailiwick, make known to the several persons aforesaid, named and specified in the said Schedule, that they appear before the Barons of the Exchequer at Westminster on

By the Roll.

Memorandum of the same year of the king in the Record Roll of this Easter, and by the baron Fenshaw, and the tenor of the aforesaid Schedule in the aforesaid Writ mentioned as touching John Hampden, followeth in these words, viz. A Schedule of the Names of certain persons in the county of Bucks, and of certain Sums of Money upon them assessed, and charged for and towards the providing of a Ship of War, together with the rigging and other things thereunto belonging; by the virtue of a certain writ under the great seal of England, bearing date the 4th day of August in the 11th year of Charles our now lord the king, and certified into the court of Chancery of our said lord the king to be unpaid, by virtue of a Writ of Certiorari, issuing out under the seal aforesaid, bearing date the 9th of March in the 12th year of his reign; and by Writ of Mittimus under the said seal sent into the Exchequer of our said now lord the king, for further process thereupon to be made, as by the tenor of the aforesaid Writ, bearing date the 4th day of August in the abovesaid 11th year of our said now lord the king, and by the Writ of Certiorari, and the Certificates thereupon made sent into the said Exchequer, and there of record remaining in the custody of the remembrancer of our lord the king, more fully doth appear: ss. Stoake Mandivile, ss. J. Hampden esq. 14. At which day Anthony Chester, bart. sheriff of the county aforesaid, as touching the aforesaid John Hampden, returned, that he by Nicholas Aris, Robert Alexander, Richard Harrison, and William Heyborne, good and lawful men of his bailiwick, made known to the aforesaid John Hampden amongst other things, that he appear before the barons within written, at the day and place within contained; to shew and propose, if he hath or knoweth of any thing to say for himself, why he ought not to be charged with the aforesaid sum upon him assessed, and not paid, in the said Schedule specified, and to satisfy the same, as it is further commanded him. And now, that is to say, from the day of the Holy Trinity, upon three weeks the aforesaid John Hampden in the aforesaid Schedule named, here cometh in his proper person, and prayeth Oyer of the Writ of Scire Facias aforesaid, the Return of the same, and the Schedule unto the same an-nexed, and they are read unto him. He likewise prayeth Oyer of the aforesaid Writ, bearing date the 4th day of August in the 11th year of Charles our said now lord the king in the Writ of Scire Facias mentioned, and it is read unto him in these words.

ss. Charles by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, king, Defender of the Faith, &c. To the sheriff of our county of Bucks, the bailiff and burgesses of the borough and parish of Buckingham, the mayor, bailiff and burgesses of the borough of Chipping Wiccombe alias Wiccombe, and the good men in the said boroughs, parish, and their said members; and in the towns of Agmondesham, Wendover, and Great Marlowe, and in all other boroughs, villages, hamlets, and other places in the said county of Bucks, greeting. Because we are giren to understand, that certain thieves, pirates, and sea-robbers, as well Turks, enemies of Christianity, as others confederated together, wickedly take away and despoil the ships, goods, and merchandizes, not only of our subjects, but also of the subjects of our allies upon the sea, which of old used to be defended by the English nation; and at their pleasure have carried away the men therein, enslaving them in a most wretched captivity: And whereas we see them daily preparing Shipping further to annoy our subjects, and to aggrieve the kingdom, unless a more speedy remedy be applied, and their endeavours more vigorously obviated; Considering also the dangers which every where in these times of war hang over us; so that it behoves us and our subjects to hasten the Defence of the sea and kingdom with all possible expedition: We being willing by the help of God, in the highest degree to provide for the Defence of the kingdom, the Protection of the sea, the security of our subjects, the safe convoy of shipping and merchandize coming to our kingdom of England, and going from the said kingdom to foreign parts: And since we and our progenitors, kings of England, have hitherto been Lords of the Sea aforesaid; and it would in the highest manner concern us, if this royal honour should in our days be lost, or any ways diminished; since also this burden of Defence which touches all, ought to be borne by all, as hath been accustomed to be done by the law and custom of the kingdom of England: We firmly enjoin and command you the aforesaid sheriff, bailiffs, burgesses, mayor, good men, and all others whomsoever above mentioned, in the boroughs, towns, villages, hamlets and places aforesaid, and their members, in the faith and allegiance whereby you are bound to us, and as you love us and our honour, as also under the forfeiture of all things you can possibly forfeit to us, that you cause to be fitted out one ship of war of the burden of 450 tons, with men, as well skillful officers as able and experienced mariners, a hundred and fourscore at least; as also with a sufficient quantity of cannon, muskets, gunpowder, pikes and spears, and other arms necessary for war, with double tackling; as also with competent victuals for so many men, until the 1st day of March now next ensuing; and from thence for 26 weeks at your costs, as well in victuals, as the men's wages, and other things necessary for war by that time, on account of defending the sea at our command in company with the admiral; to whom we shall before the aforesaid 1st day of March, commit the custody of the sea, to be and remain where be on our behalf shall appoint; and that you cause the same to be brought into the port of Portsmouth before the said 1st day of March, so that they may be there that day at farthest; thence to proceed with our ships, and the ships of other loyal subjects for the Protection of the Sea, the Defence of you and yours, to repel and vanquish all those whosever they are, that endeavour to molest and annoy on the sea our merchants and other loyal subjects aforesaid, coming into our dominions on account of traffic, or returning thence to their own country. We have also appointed you the sheriff of our county of Bucks, the bailiff and mayor of the boroughs and parish aforesaid, or any two or more of you, of whom our will is, that you the aforesaid sheriff of our county of Bucks be one, within 30 days after the receipt of this Writ, to assess as much of the Charges aforesaid upon the aforesaid boroughs of Buckingham and Chipping Wiccombe alias Wiccombe with their members, as ought severally to be laid on or assessed. And if such Assessment within the aforesaid 30 days shall not happen to be made by you, two or more of you; then we have appointed you the aforesaid sheriff of our county of Bucks, to make such assessment upon the aforesaid boroughs, and parish, and members, as you shall see reasonable to be done. And our will is, that of your so doing, you the aforesaid sheriff of Bucks wholly certify under your seal the mayor and bailiffs aforesaid. We have also appointed you the aforesaid bailiff of the borough and parish of Buckingham, to assess every man in the said borough and parish, and in the members thereof, and the land-tenants in the same, not having the ship aforesaid, or any share thereof, or not serving therein, to contribute to the expences about provision of the necessary premises; and to assess and lay upon the aforesaid borough and parish with the members thereof, so as aforesaid, that is to say, every one of them according to their estate, goods, and employment, and the portions on them assessed, by distresses, or other due ways and means to levy, and collectors in that behalf to nominate and appoint; and all those whom you shall find rebellious and refractory in the premises to imprison, there to remain till for their delivery we shall further think fit to direct. We have also appointed you the aforesaid mayor of the borough of Chipping Wiccombe alias Wiccombe, to assess every man in the same borough, and in the members thereof, and the land-tenants in the same, not having the ship aforesaid, or any share thereof, or not serving therein, to contribute to the expences about provision of the necessary premises; and to assess and lay upon the aforesaid borough, with the members thereof, so as aforesaid, that is to say, every one of them according to their estate and goods, or employment, and the portions on them assessed, by distresses, or other due ways and means to levy, and collectors in that behalf to nominate and appoint; and all those whom you shall find rebellious and refractory in the premises to imprison, there to remain till for their delivery we shall further think fit to order and direct. And moreover, we have appointed you the aforesaid sheriff of our county of Bucks to assess every man in the aforesaid towns of Agmondesham, Wendover, and Great Marlow, and in the members thereof, and in all the other towns, villages, boroughs, hamlets, and other places in the aforesaid county of Bucks, and the land-tenants in the same, not having the ship aforesaid, or any share thereof, or not serving in the same, to contribute to the expences about the provision of the necessary premises, and to assess and lay upon the said towns, villages, burroughs, hamlets and places, with the members thereof, so as aforesaid, that is to say, every one of them according to their estate and goods, or employment; and the portions on them assessed by distresses or other due ways and means to levy, and collectors in that behalf to nominate and appoint; and all those whom you shall find rebellious and refractory in the premises to imprison, there to remain till for their delivery we shall further think fit to order and direct. And further, we command you all, that you diligently apply yourselves to the premises, and effectually do and execute the same, as you shall answer the contrary at your peril. But our will and pleasure is, not that under colour of our mandate aforesaid, you cause to be levied from the said persons more than shall suffice for the necessary expences of the premises; or that any one who shall levy any money of the contributors to the charges aforesaid, detain the same or any part thereof in his own possession, or presume to appropriate it to other uses under any pretence or colour whatsoever. It being our will, that if more shall be collected than is sufficient, that the same be paid back again to those who shall have so paid the same, according to every man's respective share and proportion. Witness myself at Westminster the 4th day of August in the 11th year of our reign.

He prayeth also Oyer of the aforesaid writ Scire facius above mentioned, and it is in like manner read unto him.

zs. Charles, by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. To those who were sheriffs of our county of Bucks between the 4th day of August, in the 11th year of our reign, and the 1st day of March then next ensuing, to those who were bailiffs of the burrough and parish of Buckingham, and the mayor and bailiffs of the burrough of Chipping-Wiccombe alias Wiccombe, in the said county of Bucks, within the time aforesaid, greeting. Whereas by our Writ made under our great seal of England, bearing date the aforesaid 4th day of August in the 11th year abovesaid, for the defence of the kingdom, the protection of the sea, the security of our subjects, and the safe convoy of the ships and merchandize coming to our kingdom and passing thence to foreign parts; we commanded the sheriff of our county of Bucks, the bailiff of the burrough and parish of Buckingham, as also the burgesses of the said burrough, the mayor and bailiffs of Chipping-Wiccombe alias Wiccombe, as also the burgesses of the said burrough, and the good men in the said burroughs and parish, and in the said burroughs and parish and members of the same, and in the towns of Agmondesham, Wendover, and Great Marlow, and in all other places, towns, burroughs, villages, hamlets, and other places in the said county of Bucks, that you should cause to be fitted out one ship of war of the burden of 450 tuns, with men, as well skilful officers as able and experienced mariners, 180 at least, as also with a sufficient quantity of caunons, muskets, pikes and spears, gunpowder, and other arms necessary for war, with double tackling, as also with competent victuals for so many men, at a certain day in the said writ contained, and from thence for 96 weeks at the costs of the men and land-tenants of the burroughs, parish, towns, villages, hamlets, and other places above mentioned in the said county of Bucks, as well in victuals, as the men's wages, and other things necessary for war, by that time, for defending the sea; and that you should cause the same to be brought into the port of Portsmouth within the time in the said writ limited. And whereas by the said Writ, we appointed the Sheriff of our county of Bucks aforesaid, the bailiff of the burrough and parish of Buckingham aforesaid, and the mayor of the burrough of Chipping-Wiccombe alias Wiccombe aforesaid, or any two or more of them, of whom our will was that the Sheriff of our said county of Bucks should be one, to assess as much of the costs aforesaid, upon the aforesaid burrough and parish of Buckingham, and upon the aforesaid burrough of Chipping-Wiccombe alias Wiccombe with their members as ought severally to be laid on, or assessed. And whereas we appointed the bailiff of the burrough and parish of Buckingham, and the mayor of the burrough of Chipping-Wiccombe alias Wiccombe, severally and respectively to assess every man in the said several burroughs and parish, and the members thereof, and the land-tenants in the same, not having the ship aforesaid or any share thereof, or not serving therein, to contribute to the expences about the provision of the necessary premises: And upon the aforesaid burrough and parish of Buckingham, and upon the aforesaid burrough of Chipping-Wiccombe alias Wiccombe, so as aforesaid, then to be severally and distinctly laid, that is to say, every one of them according to their estate and goods, or employment, and the portions upon them assessed by distresses, or other due ways and means to levy, and collectors in that behalf to nominate and appoint, in manner and form as in the said writ was commanded. And whereas by our said writ we moreover appointed the sheriff of our said county of Bucks to assess every man in the aforesaid towns of Agmondesham, Wendover, Great Marlow, and in the members thereof, and in all the other towns, villages, boroughs, hamlets, and other places in the aforesaid county of Bucks, and the land-tenants in the same, to contribute to the expences about the provision of the necessary premises, and the other things to do and execute in manner and form as by the said writ was commanded. And because some men and land-tenants in the said county, burroughs, parish, towns, villages, hamlets, and other places, by several taxations, and sums of money, by you upon them respectively laid and assessed towards the contribution of the burden aforesaid, according to the exigency of the writ aforesaid, have not yet paid and satisfied the same, but have refused, and yet gainsay to pay the same, as we are informed. And whereas our late will was to be certified as well of the names of the men and land tenants who had been assessed towards the contribution of the expences abovesaid, and had not paid the money so assessed, as also of the several portions or sums of money laid upon them. You nevertheless in contempt of us, have sent nothing upon the return of our writ limited. We therefore command you, the late sheriff of our county of Bucks, as we heretofore have commanded you, that you certify to us, as well of the names of the men, and land tenants, in the aforesaid county, by virtue of our said writ by you respectively assessed, as the sums of money on them so assessed, which they have not yet paid, nor satisfied, but refuse to pay the same; as also of the several portions and sums of money, by you the aforesaid late sheriff of our county of Bucks upon them assessed, reduced into writing, with all things touching the same, into our Chancery, distinctly and openly under your seals, without delay, or at farthest before the 26th day of April next ensuing, wheresoever you shall then be, together with this writ. And we command you the aforesaid late bailiff of the burrough and parish of Buckingham, and the mayor of the burrough of Chipping-Wiccombe, alias Wiccombe, as we heretofore have commanded you, that you severally certify us, as well of the names of the aforesaid men and land tenants in the burrough and parish of Buckingham, and burrough of Chipping-Wiccombe alias Wiccombe, by virtue of our said writ first above mentioned by you respectively assessed, as the sums of ‘ money on them so assessed, which they have ‘ not yet paid, nor satisfied, but refuse to pay ‘ the same; as also of the several portions and ‘ sums of money by you upon them respect‘ ively assessed, reduced in like manner into ‘ writing, with all things touching the same,

 ‘ into our Chancery aforesaid, distinctly and ‘ openly without delay, or at farthest before ‘ the 26th day of April next ensuing, where-‘ soever you shall then be, together with this ‘ writ. Witness myself at Westminster, the ‘ 9th day of March, in the 12th year of our ‘ reign. ERNE. At which day, Peter Temple
 ‘ and Heneage Proby returned the aforesaid ‘ writ, by indorsement thus, sc. The execution ‘ of this Writ appears in certain Schedules to ‘ this Writ annexed. The tenor of which Sched‘ ules as to the aforesaid John Hampden re‘ turned by the aforesaid Peter Temple follows
 ‘ in these words. sc. Bucks. sc. I Peter Temple

 ‘ providing of the ship; by virtue, and according ‘ to the exigency of the Writ of our said lord the ‘ king, issued out of his Chancery, and there ‘ inrolled of record, directed amongst others to ‘ the sheriff of the said county of Bucks, bear‘ ing date the 4th day of August, in the 11th ‘ year aforesaid, have not paid, but have re‘ fused to pay the same to Heneage Proby be‘ ing sheriff of the said county of Bucks, next
 ‘ after the going out of sir Peter Temple knight ‘ and baronet, from the office of sheriff of the ‘ said county, or to the hands of the collector
 ‘ in that behalf appointed by virtue of the Writ
 ‘ last mentioned. And further, the aforesaid
 ‘ John Hampden in like manner prayeth Oyer
 ‘ of the aforesaid Writ of Mitimus, of which ‘ mention is made in the Writ of Sciri Facias, ‘ aforesaid, and it is read unto him in these ‘ words: sc. Charles by the grace of God, of ‘ England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, king, ‘ defender of the faith, &c. To the treasurer
 ‘ and barons of his Exchequer, greeting: By ‘ the tenor of a certain Writ of ours made ‘ under our great seal of England, bearing date
 ‘ the 4th day of August, in the 11th year of our ‘ reign, inrolled in the rolls of our Chancery;
 ‘ by which we commanded the sheriff of our ‘ county of Bucks, the bailiff and burgesses of ‘ the borough and parish of Buckingham, the ‘ mayor or bailiff and burgesses of the borough ‘ of Chipping Wiccombe alias Wiccombe, and ‘ the good men in the said boroughs, parish, and ‘ the members thereof, and in the towns of Ag‘ mondesham, Wendover, and Great Marlow;
 ‘ and in all other boroughs, towns, villages, ‘ hamlets, and other places in the said county of ‘ Bucks; that for the defence of the kingdom,
 ‘ the protection of the sea, the security of the ‘ subjects, and safe convoy of the ships and ‘ merchandize coming to our kingdom of Eng‘ land, and thence going to foreign parts, they ‘ should fit out one ship of war of the burden of ‘ 350 tuns, with men, as well skillful officers as ‘ able and experienced mariners, a hundred and ‘ fourscore at least; as also with a sufficient ‘ quantity of cannoes, muskets, gunpowder,
 ‘ pikes and spears, with other arms necessary ‘ for war, and with double tackling; as also ‘ with competent victuals for so many men
 ‘ at a certain day, and from thence for ‘ twenty-six weeks at the costs of the men and ‘ land-tenants of the boroughs, parish, towns, ‘ villages, hamlets, and other places above
 ‘ mentioned in the said county of Bucks,
 ‘ as well in victuals as the men’s wages, and

on account of the defence of the sea under our command, in company of the admiral to be and remain; and that they should cause the same to be brought into the port of Portsmouth about the time limited in the said writ; and that they should respectively assess every man in the said borough and parish of Buckingham, and borough of Chipping-Wiccombe alias Wiccombe, and in the rest of the boroughs, towns, villages, hamlets, and other places in the said county of Bucks, and the members thereof, and the land-tenants in the same, to contribute to the expences about the provision of the necessary premisses, and other things to do and execute in manner and form as was commanded by the said writ: We send to you being present the inclosed writ; for that the safety of our kingdom of England, and our people thereof were in danger, which we have taken care to have issued out of our Chancery amongst other writs, to make such provision and assessment through every county, city, borough, town, village, hamlets and places of our kingdom of England, and of Wales, and the members thereof, out of our Chancery aforesaid lately issuing, and there in like manner inrolled. And also a certain other Writ of ours to certify us into our Chancery, as well of the names of the men and land-tenants in the aforesaid borough and parish of Buckingham, and borough of Chipping-Wiccombe alias Wiccombe, and in the rest of the boroughs, towns, villages, hamlets, and places of the said county of Bucks, who by our command aforesaid were assessed to contribute towards the provision of the premisses, and have not paid the sums of money upon them so assessed; as also of the several portions and sums of money so charged and laid upon the said men and land-tenants; as likewise certain certificates by virtue of the said writ reduced in writing, and sent into our Chancery. We also send you being present the inclosed, commanding you, that having inspected the writs and certificates aforesaid, you further cause to be done thereupon for the levying, collecting, and receiving all and singular the aforesaid sums of money of the aforesaid contribution as yet unpaid, as by right, and according to the law and custom of our kingdom of England hath been used to be done. Witness myself at Westminster the 5th day of May in the 13th year of our reign. EYNS. As in the said Writs and Schedules thereunto annexed, certified into the Exchequer of our said lord the king, and there in the custody of the remembrancer of our said lord the king remaining of record more fully is contained. Which being read, heard, and by him understood, the said John Hampden complaineth, that by colour of the several Writs, their Returns and Schedules to them annexed, he hath been grievously vexed and disquieted, and that unjustly; because he saith, that the aforesaid several Writs above mentioned, their Returns and Schedules to them annexed, and the matter in them contained, are not sufficient in the law to charge the said John Hampden on or with the payment of the aforesaid sum of 20 shillings on him in the Schedule aforesaid, in the manner and form aforesaid taxed and assessed, or any parcel thereof; to which he hath no necessity, or is obliged by the law of the land to make answer: Whereupon by reason of the insufficiency of the aforesaid several Writs above-mentioned, their Returns, the Schedules to them annexed, and the matter in the said Writs and Schedules contained, he the said John Hampden prayeth Judgment, If our said now lord the king ought or is willing further to assess or charge him with the aforesaid 20s. or any parcel thereof. ROB. HOLBORNE.

And John Banks knight, Attorney-General of our now lord the king who sueth for our said lord the king, being present here in court, the same day in his proper person, saith, that the aforesaid several Writs, and their Returns, and the Schedules aforesaid to the same annexed, and the matter in the same contained, are sufficient in the law to charge the aforesaid John Hampden with the aforesaid 20s. upon him assessed in the form, and for the cause aforesaid; which said matter, he the said Attorney-General of our said lord the king, for and in behalf of our said lord the king, is ready to verify; and which matter the aforesaid John Hampden doth not deny, nor any wise make Answer thereunto, but wholly refuseth to admit the verification thereof, and therefore prayeth judgment; and that the aforesaid John Hampden be charged with the said 20s. and satisfy the same.

The First Day's ARGUMENT of MR. ST. JOHN,* on behalf of MR. HAMPDEN, before all the Judges in the Exchequer Chamber, in the Great Case of SHIP-MONEY.

May it please your lordship; Pasch' xiiij Car' a Sciri Facias issued to the sheriff of Bucks,

* “Mr. Saint John, who was in a firm and entire conjunction with the other two, was a lawyer of Lincolns-Inn, known to be of parts and industry, but not taken notice of for practice in Westminster-Hall, till he argued at the Exchequer-Chamber the case of Ship-money on the behalf of Mr. Hampden; which gave him much reputation, and called him into all courts, and to all causes, where the king's prerogative was most contested. He was a man reserved, and of a dark and clouded countenance, very proud, and conversing with very few, and those, men of his own humour and inclinations. He had been questioned, committed, and brought into the Star Chamber, many years before, with other persons of great name and reputation (which first brought his name upon the stage) for communicating some paper among themselves, which some men at that time had a mind to have extended to a design of sedition; but it being quickly evident reciting, That whereas several sums of money mentioned in a Schedule to that Writ annexed, by a writ under the great seal of England, dated 4 Augusti 11 Car^s sessed upon several persons for providing of a ship of war, were not paid: and that upon a Certiorari dated 9 Martij 13 Caroli, these sums and the several persons upon whom they were assessed, were certified into the Chancery, and from thence by Mittimus dated 5 Maij, were sent into the Exchequer, that process might be issued against these defaulters: thereupon the sheriff is commanded, 'Quod sciri faceret' to those several persons to appear in the Exchequer Octab^r Trinitat^r 13 Caroli, to shew cause why they should not pay those sums assessed upon them.

The Sheriff returns, 'Quod sciri fecit' John Hampden, esq. who was assessed at 20*l*. and he hath not paid it. Mr. Hampden hath appeared and demanded Oyer of the Scir' Fac^r of the Schedule of the writ dated 4 Augusti, the Certiorari and the Mittimus, and of their several Returns, and hath thereupon demurred in law.

The Writ dated 4 Augusti 11 Car^s because it is the ground of the issuing forth the Sci fa^r, and so by necessary consequence, is that which first occasioned any process against him, it will be the subject from whence will be fetched all that shall be said either for or against my client. I will endeavour by breaking it into parts, more clearly to present it to your lordships view.

The thing commanded is, that this county should provide a Ship of war of 450 tons, with 120 men, guns, gunpowder, double tackling, victuals, and all other things necessary, and to bring her to Portsmouth by the 1st of March following, and from that time to provide her of victuals, mariners wages, and all other necessaries for 26 weeks. For effecting this, there is power given to assess each person within the county 'secundum statum et facultates,' and to bring in these asses by distress, 'et quos re- belles invenirent' to imprison their persons.

My lords, if the Writ had staid here, and gone no further, the command though full in word, it had been void in law, because as yet it appears not for what end this ship was to be provided. 40 Ass. Plow. A Commission to seize mens goods notoriously suspected of felony, before conviction, adjudged void, because there-that the prosecution would not be attended with success, they were all shortly after discharged; but he never forgave the court the first assault, and contracted an implacable displeasure against the church purely from the company he kept. He was of an intimate trust with the earl of Bedford, to whom he was in some sort allied (being a natural son of the house of Bullingbrook) and by him brought into all matters where himself was to be concerned. It was generally believed, that these three persons, with the other three lords mentioned before, were of the most intimate and entire trust with each other, and made the engine which moved all the rest."

fore the command, without cause shewn, and that sufficient in law too, would be void.

In the second place therefore they are set down to be these: 'Pro defensione Regni, tuitione Maris, securitate Subditorum, et salva conductione Nayum,' both outward and inward, the Sea being infested with pirates, and more shipping being daily prepared 'ad Regnum gravandum;' these are the ends.

In the third place, the legality of it, that every man 'secundum statum et facultates' should be hereunto assessed, is thus enforced. First, from Custom and continued use, in these words; That the Sea 'per gentem Anglicanam ab olim defendi consuevit.' And secondly, this Use proved to be from a common ground of equity; 'Onus defensionis, quod omnes tant, per omnes debet supportari.' And the Rule of Equity backed by the Common Law in these words, 'Prout per legem et consuetudinem regni Angliæ fieri consuevit.' The argument stands thus; All have benefit by defence of the realm, and therefore by law the Charge ought to be borne by all.

Then it is further inferred, that every man, even by his allegiance, is bound to contribute to this Charge, the command being 'in fide et legiancia quibus nobis tenemini.' Of these parts the Writ consists, which all being put together, in brief declare the scope and end of the issuing forth thereof to be the Defence and Safety of the kingdom; a thing so necessary, that it must needs be legal: for it is too near and too narrow a conceit of the wisdom and policy of the law to think, that whilst the care thereof should be confined only to the preservation of the general members of the body politic from the wrongs and pressures that might be offered from others to the fellow-members, that in the mean time it will leave the whole to the violence and will of enemies: so that whilst each subject, considered as a part of the whole, hath a known and sure estate in Lands, and real property in his Goods, not to be impeached by any whatsoever within the realm; yet considered all together as they make the 'Unum Compositum,' they should have in them only 'Præcariam Possessionem,' or Tenancy at Will in regard of Foreigners. My lords, this cannot be; for the law is so careful herein, that even afar off it foresees and prevents all dangers in this kind; and that is the reason that an alien, though a friend, hath not capacity to purchase any land in the realm. And if the law be so quick-sighted, as that to prevent but possibility of danger, it keeps such strangers from having any land within the realm, which desire to come by it peaceably and for valuable considerations; by this we may easily see the great care it hath to prevent apparent dangers, which usually proceed from open force and violence. Which further appears by the greatness of the punishment which the law inflicts upon offenders in this kind, which is High-Treason, of all other the greatest. 13 Eliz. Dyer 298. Story * conspired beyond sea with a foreign state to invade the realm; and though nothing was attempted, yet it was adjudged High-Treason. And 21 Ed. 3, fo. 23. and 45 Ed. 3, 24. a man killed a captain that was going with 20 men at arms to the king in his wars, and it was adjudged to be High-Treason. And so by some opinions in print it is, to burn or sink any of the king's Ships. By the greatness of the punishment for the breach of the negative part of the Law, we might understand the peremptoriness and force of the affirmative part. So that, my lords, in this case the question is not de re, for by the law the safety of the realm is to be provided for; 'Salus Populi suprema lex.' Neither is the question de personis, either in respect of the Persons who are to bear the Charge of it, or of the persons whom the Law hath intrusted with the care and power of this common Defence.

For the first, that is, the Persons that are to bear this Charge, that in the writ, 'Quod omnes tangit per omnes debet supportari.' The reasons of the Writ are weighty, and agreeable to the rule both of the Civil and Common Law, 'Qui sentit commodum, sentire debet et onus.' So that I conceive the burden lies upon all. In respect of our bona natura, our Lives and Persons be equally as dear to one as another: In respect of our bona fortuna, by secundum statum et facultates; because the greater the state and means of livelihood, the greater the benefit by the Defence. The law in this case of Defence against the invasion of living enemies, being the same with that against our soil and ground by the inundations and out-rages of the sea and fresh water; for by the law, as appears by the Commission of Sewers, as well before the Statute of 28 Hen. 8, as since to the repairing of a bank or causey, river, or other sewer, all are chargeable that have 'Defensionem, Commodum, vel Salvationem qualitercunque.' All that have Defence must be assessed, the Assess must be equally distributed, and therefore laid upon every man within the level, 'Pro rata portionis tenoræ suæ, seu pro quantitate communis pasturæ vel piscariæ'; the more land, common, or benefit of fishing each man hath, according to the proportion thereof the Assess must be. So that, my lords, in the second place, the question will not be, Whether my Client by law be exempted from the Charge of the Defence of the realm; for which other his majesty's subjects he ought to help to bear the common burden, and more or less may be laid upon him proportionably to his estate and means of livelihood.

Neither, Thirdly, is there any question to be made but the law hath intrusted the person of his royal majesty, with the care of this Defence. The Defence and Protection which we have in our bodies, lands, and goods, against any within the realm, we know it is from him; for all jurisdiction legal, both ecclesiastical and civil, which defends us in them, is wholly in his majesty. The same it is in case of foreign defence, even by the Sus Gentium, as appears in the text, by the peoples desiring that they might be like other nations, by having a king that might go in and out before them, and fight their battles. That the king, and that legally, calleth the kingdom 'Regnum nostrum,' and every city and great town 'Civitatem et Villam nostrum.' Quoad 'proprietatem' it cannot be, because they are the several land-owners; it must be so therefore principally in this respect, 'Quoad protectionem et defensionem.' Neither hath the law invested the crown with this height of sovereignty only as a honorarium, for the greater splendor of it, but likewise as a duty of the crown, or pars ministerii, for the good and safety of the realm, which in many of the ancient Commissions of Sewers, before the statute of 28 Hen. 8, is thus expressed, 'The king 'ratione regis dignitatis et per juramentum est strictus ad providendum salvationem regni undiqueque;' so that both in honour, and by his oath he is bound to provide for the safety of the realm, and that circumquaque.

My lords, by the Law the king is paterfamilias, which by the Law of Economics is, not only to keep peace at home, but to protect his wife and children, and whole family from abroad. It is his vigilancy and watchfulness that discovers who are our friends, and who are our foes; and that after such discovery first warns us of them; for he only hath power to make war and peace.

Neither hath the law only entrusted the care of Defence to his majesty, but it hath likewise, secondly, put the Armas Potestas and means of Defence wholly into his hands: for when the enemy is by him discovered and declared, it is not in the power of the Subject to order the way and means of Defence, either by sea or by land, according as they shall think fit; for no man without commission or special Licence from his majesty, can set forth any ships to sea for that purpose; neither can any man without such commission or licence, unless upon sudden coming of enemies, erect a fort, castle, or bulwark, though upon his own ground: neither, but upon some such emergent cause is it lawful for any subject, without special commission, to arm or draw together any troops or companies of soldiers, or to make any general collections of money of any of his majesty's subjects, though with their consent.

Neither, in the third place, is his majesty armed only with his primitive prerogative of Generalissimo and Commander in Chief, that none can advance towards the enemy, until he gives the signal, nor in other manner than according to his direction: but also with all other powers requisite for the full execution of all things incident to so high a place, as well in times of danger as of actual war. The sheriff of each county, who is but his majesty's deputy, he hath the posse comitatus; and therefore it must needs follow, that the posse regni is in himself.

My lords, not to burn day-light longer, it must needs be granted that in this business of Defence, the suprema potestas, is inherent in his majesty, as part of his crown and kingly dignity. So that as the care and provision of the Law of England extends, in the first place, to foreign defence; and, secondly, lays the burden upon all; and, for ought I have to say against it, it maketh the quantity of each man's estate the rule whereby this burden is to be equally proportioned upon each person: So likewise hath it, in the third place, made his majesty sole judge of dangers from foreigners, and when and how the same are to be prevented; and, to come nearer, hath given him power by Writ under the great seal of England, to command the inhabitants of each county to provide Shipping for the Defence of the kingdom, and may by law compel the doing thereof.

So, my lords, as I still conceive, the question will not be de persona, in whom the 'Supremia Potestas' of giving the authorities or powers to the Sheriff, which are mentioned in this writ, doth lie, for that is in the king: But the question is only de modo, by what medium or method this supreme power, which is in his majesty, doth infuse and let out itself into this particular; and whether or no in this case such of them have been used, as have rightly accommodated and applied this power unto this Writ in the intended way of Defence: for the law of England, for the applying of that Supreme Power which it hath settled in his majesty to the particular causes and occasions, hath set down a method and known rules, which are necessarily to be observed.

In his majesty there is a twofold power, voluntas or potestas interna or naturalis, and externa or legalis, which by all the Judges of England, 2 Ric. 3, fo. 11, is expressed 'per voluntatem regis in camera,' and 'voluntatem regis per legem.'

My lords, the forms and rules of law are not observed in this case; the supreme power not working per medium, it remains still in himself as 'voluntas Regis interna,' and operates not to the good and relief of the subject that standeth in need. To instance: his majesty is the Fountain of bounty; but a grant of lands without letters patent transfers no estate out of the king, nor by letters patent, but by such words as the law hath prescribed. His majesty is the Fountain of Justice; and though all justice which is done within the realm flows from this fountain, yet it must run in certain and known channels. An Assize in the King's-Bench, or an Appeal of Death in the Common-Pleas, are 'curam non iudicis,' though the Writ be by his majesty's command; but so of the several jurisdictions of every court. The justice whereby all felons and traitors are put to death, proceeds from his majesty; but if a Writ of execution of a traitor or a felon be awarded by his majesty without Appeal or Indictment preceding, an Appeal of Death will lie by the heir against the executioner. If the process be legal and in a right court, yet I conceive that his majesty alone, without assistance of the Judges of the court, cannot give Judgment. I know that king John, Henry 3, and other kings, have sat in the King's-Bench and in the Exchequer, but, for ought appears, they were assisted by their judges: Thus I ground upon the Book, Case 2 Ric. 3, fo. 10, 11, where the party is to make fine and ransom at the king's will and pleasure. This Fine by the opinion of the Judges of England, must be set by the Judges before whom the party was convicted, and cannot be set by the king. The words of the Book are thus: 'In Terminis et non per legem per se in Camera sua, nec aliter curam se, nisi per Justiciarios suos, et hoc est voluntas regis, scilicet per justiciarios suos et per legem suam,' to do it.

And as, without the assistance of his Judges, who are his settled counsel at law, his majesty applies not his laws and justice in many cases; neither is this sufficient to do it without the assistance of his Great Council in parliament. If an erroneous Judgment was given before the statute of 27 Eliz. in the King's-bench, the king could not relieve his grieved subject any way but by Writ of Error in parliament: neither can he out of parliament alter the old laws, or make new, or make any Naturalizations or Legitimations, nor do some other things; and yet is the parliament his majesty's Court too, as well as other his Courts of Justice: it is his majesty that gives life and being to it, for he only summons, continues and dissolves it, and he by his la volunté enlargens all the actions in it; and, after the dissolution of it, by supporting his courts of justice, he keeps them still alive, by putting them in execution. And although in the Writ of Waste, and in some other writs, it is called 'Commune Concilium Regni,' in respect that the whole kingdom is representatively there; and, secondly, that the whole kingdom have access thither in all things that concern them, other courts affording relief but in special cases; and, thirdly, in respect that the whole kingdom is interested in, and receives benefit by the laws and things there passed: Yet it is 'Concilium Regni' no otherwise than the Common Law is 'Lex Terræ,' that is 'per modum Regis,' whose it is, if I may so term it, in a great part, even in point of interest, as he is the head of the Commonwealth, and whose it is wholly in trust for the good of the whole body of the realm; for he alone is trusted with the execution of it. The parliament is the king's court, and therefore in the Summons the king calls it 'parliamentum nostrum.' So the Returns of the knights and burgesses, 'Quod sint ad Parliamentum Domini Regis.' Fleta, lib. 2, cap. 2. 'Habet Rex curiam suam in concilio suo in parliamentis suis;' and therefore the pleadings there anciently were usually wont to begin for the most part, 'Queritur Domino Regi;' of Petitions by private persons, 'Supplicavit Domino Regi,' though for relief against others, Inquisitions and Verdire fac' returnable there sometimes 'Curam Domino Rege et Concilio suo,' as appears by infinite Precedents in the Parliament Pleas of Edw. the 1st and Edw. the and's time, both in the Tower, and many Cases adjourned into the King's-Bench.

The Patents passed by authority of parliament, and likewise the acts of parliament, had anciently so much of the king's name and style in them, that as it appears in the Prince's Case in the 8th report, it was a hard matter, otherwise than by circumstances, to know whether they had any thing of the parliament in them or not. And from those times even until now, the alteration is nothing in substance, for the acts for the most part are thus: 'It is enacted by our sovereign lord the king, with the assent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons.' The king both then and still is pars agens, the rest are but consentientes.

My Lords, to apply all to the Case in question: by the Cases before cited it appears, that what was done in parliament by the law phrase and dialect, is said to be done by the king; for as the Civilians say of the senate, that it is 'Pars corporis Cæsaris,' so we of the Parliament, that it is 'Pars corporis Regis.' The maxim of Justinian, 'Quod principi placet legis vim habet,' is agreed by Bracton and all the civilians. And yet both he and many of them say, that those must pass the Senate, and though done in the senate, yet they be placita principis. So it is, although when we speak at vulgus, we say Fines are said to be set by the king's court; yet the law, when it saith that they be done and set, saith they be done and set by the king. By the same reason therefore, though when we speak at vulgus, we say such a thing is done by the parliament, yet in the legal account these are done by the king: the Medium, or way of doing of them, is with the assistance or consent of his great Council in parliament.

The second thing which I observe is this: By the case before cited it appears, that without the assistance in parliament, his majesty cannot in many cases communicate either his justice or his power unto his subjects.—Hence, thirdly, it necessarily follows, as I conceive, that the kingly dignity doth most appear and manifest itself there; which was the opinion of all the Judges of England, declared in a parliament 34 Hen. 8, as appears by Crompton's Jurisdict. fo. 10, who by the king's commandment meeting together about point of Privilege of Parliament, the king afterwards in declaring of their Opinions, doth it in part of the Case in these words: 'Further, We be informed by our Judges, that we at no time stand so highly in our estate royal, as in time of parliament, wherein we as Head, and you as Members, are conjoined and knit together in one body politic.' Which Declaration of it shews likewise that it was the king's own opinion, that he at no time stood so highly in his estate, as in the time of parliament.

It appears not by the Record, that this Writ, which giveth power to sell and alter the property of the Defendant's Goods, issued from his majesty sitting in his estate royal in parliament, and therefore cannot be intended by your lordships and the court so to do. If therefore it hath issued from his majesty in the Chancery, otherwise than in parliament, where he stands in the height of sovereignty and perfection, that he hath not so much as a poss necesse; the question is, Whether it be erroneously issued, yea or no?

My Lords, I have now put the case, which although in this particular case it concerns the Defendant only; yet in consequence, as it appears, it concerns both his majesty and the whole state, and that in matters of the greatest and highest nature possible. His majesty is concerned in the way and manner of execution of the highest and greatest trust which the law hath reposed in him, the Safety and Preservation of the Kingdom; the Subject is concerned in that, wherein he is most tender, in the Property of what he hath.

My Lords, the greatness and weight of the Case puts me in this dilemma: not to argue it, were to deny that full submission to the command of some of your lordships that are sitting in the Court, neither should I do my client that service which he expects. If I proceed, the Case is too weighty and too great for me to argue. But I know the safest way is obedience, and that the Court cannot expect much from me. Having therefore already put the case, I will go on in the next place to state it, and afterwards to argue it.

The Question being concerning the Validity of the command in the Writs, which extends so far as to the altering of the Property of the Subjects Goods without their consent; and yet this being for a thing so necessary as the Defence of the kingdom both at land and sea; for the ends of issuing forth of the Writ are, 'Pro defensione regni, tuitione maris, securitate subditorum, salva conductione navium,' both outward and inward. In the stating of this great question, I will in the first place endeavour to present your lordships those known and undoubted ways and means, whereby the law hath provided for the Defence of the realm both at land and sea, without the way in the Writ.

The first whereof is by Tenure of Land. The services which hereby grow due are of two sorts; Service in Kind, which tends immediately to action in times of war, some whereof are for land-service, and some for sea-service. The second are such as supply his majesty for that purpose.

The second way is, those many Prerogatives which the law hath settled in the Crown, and made peculiar unto it for the Defence of the kingdom in general.

The third is, the particular Supplies of Money for the Defence of the Sea alone in times of danger, both ordinary and extraordinary, the thing principally intended in the Writ. These, my lords, will be the materials, whereupon afterwards I shall state the Question.

In that of Tenure, I shall begin with the service, and those which tend immediately to action in times of War. The king of this realm, as they are the head of the Commonwealth in general, so are they the head and root from whence all Tenures spring; for as our Books agree, all the lands within the realm are held mediately or immediately of the crown. As therefore the law hath appropriated the Defence of the kingdom to the kings thereof, so hath it, as one of the principal ways for effecting thereof, trusted them with the reservation of such Tenures, as might serve for that purpose.

Amongst which, intending first to speak of Land-Service, I will begin with the Tenures of Knights-Service. Every man that holds by this service, from a whole Knight's Fee to any part thereof, ought to find a man completely armed for the war. Neither doth the finding of arms satisfy this Tenure: for he that holds by a whole Knight's Fee, ought to be 40 days in the service; and he that holds by a moiety of a Knight's fee 20 days; and so in proportion. In the Books of the Knights Fee, of Hen. 2, Edw. 1, and Hen. 6th's times, in the Exchequer, it appears, that there were many thousand Knights Fees held of the crown. And in the Red Book it is said, that it was 'in ore omnium,' that in the Conqueror's time there were thirty thousand held of him: some since have computed them to threescore thousand, which perhaps may be with the addition of those that were held of common persons, which are not of those upon which I shall insist.

But it may be objected, that in respect these Services are reserved by the king, that therefore they were not instituted only for the Defence of the realm, but may be exacted for foreign wars, or other-where for his majesty's peculiar service, as he shall think fit: which may be inferred both from the name which our old Books and Deeds style this Service by, when due to the crown, that is, 'forinsecum servitium;' and, secondly, from the use thereof, it having been performed in Normandy, Gascoyne, Thoulouse, and Ireland, as appears by the Red Book, and many cases put together in the Institutes, in the Chapter of Escuage.

To the first Objection of the Name, the Answer is clear; for antiently, when those that held immediately of the crown by this service, did infeoff others of the land so held, desiring to free themselves of the burden of this service, besides the service which they reserved to themselves, they likewise commonly in the conveyance, made provision for their own acquittal against the king, and the feoffee took the whole burden thereof upon himself: and therefore in the Book of Knights Fees of Hen. 2's time, in so many hundred certificates of those that held immediately of the king, William London of Wilts certifies this; 'Quod nullum militem habeo feofatum, sed deo defendere feodum meum per servitium corporis mei.' Of this nature are three or four others. All the rest after certifies, by how many knights fees he holds: them likewise he certifies that 'Defendit,' &c. of the king, by such and such 'Milites Feo-

'fatos.' And in these deeds of Feoffment, after the reservation to the feoffor, was this clause: 'et faciend' inde,' sometimes 'Forinsecum servitium,' sometimes 'Regale servitium.' Bract. lib. 2. fol. 36, 37, and Fleta, lib. 3. cap. 14. saith, that it is called, 'Regale servitium, quia est servitium Domini Regis;' and by them 'Regale servitium,' and 'servitium Domini Regis,' are all one and the same thing. To that therefore I shall need to give no further answer. By the same Authors it is called 'Forinsecum, quia capitur foris sive extra servitium, quod fit domino capitali;' and that is the meaning of the word; and that it is called 'Forinsecum,' in regard the Service is to be done Foris, that is, out of the kingdom; is cleared to your lordships by these Cases, P. 49 Hen. 3. Com. 31. Ed. 1, Rot. 32. Dors. Com. Hill. 33 Ed. 1, Rot. 52. Dors. Cornage, which we know is to wind a horn within the realm, in all those three cases is called 'servitium Forinsecum Domini Regis Cornagij;' and Castleguard in the county of Northumberland, at the castle of Bamburgh, called 'Forinsecum servitium Domini Regis.'

To the second part of this Objection, that this service hath been often performed beyond sea; for the present I shall give Answer thereto but in part, by telling your lordships without making proof thereof, that Escuage, which is all the penalty that lies upon the Tenant for his default cannot be assessed but in parliament; which, if it be so, proves that the king cannot command this service, otherwise than for the good and defence of the realm, in regard that if it be otherwise, no Escuage can be assessed without consent in parliament; which by intendment, according to the good the kingdom is likely to receive by the service, will proportionably lessen or increase the Escuage.

My Lords, That this Service was instituted for the Defence of the realm, appears by the care the law hath always taken for the increase and preservation of these services; so that if the lord purchase part of the land, yet the whole service remains: which being entire, and to be done by the body of a man, in that of being a steward or bailiff, or other private service, makes an extinguishment of the whole. The Authorities in point are many; the Statute of Mortmain 7 Ed. 1, the mischief by conveying lands to houses of religion is there expressed to be, 'Quod servitia quæ ex hujusmodi feodis debentur, et quæ ad defensionem regni ab initio provisæ fuerunt, indebite subtrahantur.' And besides the declaration that they are for the Defence of the realm, that Statute likewise promises for the increase of them; for if the lord enters not within a year and a day after the Feoffment, the king is to enter; and as the words of the Statute are 'alios inde feofavimus per certa servitia nobis inde ad defensionem Regni nostri facienda,' the words are observable, 'per servitia nobis inde facienda;' for though the service be to be done to the king, it is to be done 'ad defensionem regni.' This explains the Charter of Hen. 1, inrolled in the Red Book in the Exchequer, and cited in Mat. Paris, in the first leaf of Hen. 1's reign; where the king fees Knights-Service Lands from all Gelds and taxes; that being eased of this burden, 'apti et parati sint ad servitium meum, et ad defensionem regni mei.' In the Black Book in the Exchequer, fo. 3. Scutage is thus defined, 'ut invenciente in regnum hostium machinatione,' it is then due: see Bracton in his second book fol. 36 and 37, that they are so, 'Propter exercitum et Patriæ tuitionem,' and to be performed 'certis temporibus cum casu et necessitate evenerit.' Bract. fol. 162. 'Les fees de chatre fuerunt purveans ad defence de nostre realme.' The Books are express, the 35 Hen. 6, 41. 8 R. fol. 105. Talbot's case, 6 Rep. fol. 2. Bruerton's case, Institut. pl. 103. Co. Preface to the ninth Report.

For the further clearing of what is said already, and what I am to add, it is observable, that these Services are not created 'ex provisione hominum,' but 'ex provisione legis;' for as it is in 33 Hen. 6, 7, and sixth Rep. fol. 7. Wheeler's Case, if the king grants land without reserving any service at all, or 'absque aliquo inderreddendo,' the Patentee shall hold the land by Knights-Service in capite. The Book of 24 Ed. 3, 65. Stamford Prerog. fol. 10. Institut. pl. 73, it is said the first kings of this realm had all the land of it in their own hands; which appears likewise by this, that all the lands within the kingdom are held medietely or immediately of the crown. In the transferring these lands to the several inhabitants, we see, by the cases before cited, that the care and provision of the law was, that all should by tenure of the crown be made liable to the defence of the kingdom. I shall briefly therefore show how the kings of this realm have executed the trust for the Defence of both land and sea.

And first, a little further to prosecute the Land-Service, because the Tenure by Knights-Service ties the tenant only to forty days service, and that for the Defence of the realm only in general; they therefore reserved divers other tenures for particular and certain services; as Grand-Serjeanties, some whereof, as in the Institutes, fol. 106. is observed, were for service of honour in times of peace; and some for military service, of which last sort, as appears in the Book of Serjeanties in the Exchequer, and many rolls of them in the Tally-Office, were very many; some whereof were to carry the king's banner, some to summons the tenants 'ad exercitum,' some to be of the vanguard, some of the rear; some to serve in Wales, some in Scotland, some 'infra quatuor maria,' some 'infra Cinque Portus Anglicæ.' Of these are Services of all sorts necessary for an army; and in respect of the multitude of these military Serjeanties over others, as forgetting them. Brit. fol. 164. in his definition of Grand-Serjeanty, saith, that they are 'Pur defence del royaume;' and Fleta lib. 3. cap. 16. 'Magna Serjeantia Regem tan-

'tum respiciunt et Patriæ defensionem.' Besides the Grand-Serjeanties, of this nature likewise are the Tenure of Cornage, to give warning of the enemies coming into the kingdom, and the Tenures by Castle-Guard: these by Littleton were 11,000, to defend the Castles when the enemy enters the realm, within forts and bulwarks of the realm. Mr. Camden, p. 515, observes, there were 1,115 in Henry 5's time, whereof a great part, and especially such as were upon the sea-coasts and frontiers of Scotland and Wales, the places of greatest danger, were the king's. And besides these Grand-Serjeanties that were to be performed by the bodies of men, there are Petty-Serjeanties for finding of Armour of all sorts for the war.

My Lords, That the former kings did execute this power of Tenures for the Defence of the realm, according to the trust the law reposed in them, appears further in this, that in the places of greatest danger there ever were most of them. All along the sea-coasts of Kent and Sussex, nearest of all others to France, are the Cinque-Ports, which for their Sea-Service have all the jurisdiction within themselves, that the inhabitants, for weakening these parts, might not be compelled to travel out of them for any matters of justice, and divers other privileges; both to invite the people to live there, and to encourage them to the Defence of those parts. And Dover Castle, the Key of the Kingdom, as of greatest consequence, so hath it 200 Tenures by Castle-Guard, wanting very few, besides divers Tenures for the repairing of the Castle; which appears by the Record called the Quire of Dover, remaining in the Exchequer; which that it is a Record, and determines the service of the Cinque-Ports, as Domesday-Book doth the Tenures of the ancient demeane, appears in Comm' 27 Edw. 1, Rot. 35, and by another Record added to that Quire of Dover, 30 Edw. 4, it likewise appears, that in the time of war the king is to maintain in that Castle, 1,000 foot, and 100 horse. Next, to come to the borders of Scotland, there we find the franchisement of the bishopric of Durham, instituted likewise for that purpose for the defence of those parts; which William the Conqueror, as Malm. fo. 157, observes, first made a County Palatine; and Walter bishop thereof, 'Ducem pariter et Episcopum,' 'ut refraneret Rebellionem gentis gladii,' 'reformaret mores cloquio.' And besides this, in all the counties of Cumberland, Northumberland, and Westmoreland, are more such Tenures for the Defence of the realm, than in any of the Inland Counties, and to be likewise most proper for bodies. Com. p. 31 F. w. 1, Rot. 32. It is there found by Inquisition returned into the Exchequer out of parliament, that every lord of a town within the county of Northumberland, held by Cornage when the Scots entered the realm. Mr. Camden in his Britannia, p. 794 and 799, mentioning the great number of Petty-Baronies and Castles all along those marches, which Brit. fol.

37, and Instit. fol. 73, say were instituted for the Defence of the realm; observes here likewise the policy of the law, and likewise in the many Serjeanties there, in advancing of the king's army, to be of the vanguard, and in the retreat in the rear, those people best knowing the ways and passages of the country.

Whence, my Lords, when we come to the Marches of Wales, there we find another County Palatine, I mean that of Chester, and the care of Chester and his barons to oppose the Welsh invasions upon these Marches; besides the like services, as upon the borders of Scotland, there were likewise many Lords Marchers of several baronies, who had administration of all justice within themselves, 'secundum legem Marchie;' and for their service to be done against the Welsh, they had two special Privileges, that is, the third penny of all the Spoils in the war, as was adjudged in parliament, the 20 Edw. 1, Banc. Regis Rot. 123, in that great Case between the earls of Gloucester and Hereford, and in the Parliament Book, 20 Edw. 1. And, secondly, all the Prisoners that they took in the wars, 'per consuetudinem Marchie,' belonged to the takers of them. Trin. 25 Ed. 1, Rot. 28, Co. Roger de Kownwell, 'in paribus Montgomerii, in guerra Wallie,' 23 Ed. 1, had taken three Welsh prisoners; and because, by the king's command, they were released of their imprisonment, it is there adjudged, that the king should pay him 40*l.* in recompense thereof. And so it was adjudged, Com' Hill. 25 Edw. 1, Rot. 11, dors.

My Lords, His majesty is in the actual possession of these Military Services, by taking the profits of Wards, Marriages, Releases, Licences, Forfeitures for Alienations, and primer seisin, as fruits of them.—That the profits of Wards and Marriages are to be spent in wars, for the Defence of the realm, as well as for the bringing up the Ward, the Books are, 35 Hen. 6, 41, Brit. 162. That the king receives the profits, because he is not able to do the service. If the king's Ward was within age, when the tenants were summoned ad exercitum, he paid no Escuage, as is adjudged, M. 20, Edw. 1, Rot. 9, & 20, Comm' and M. 23 Edw. 1, Br. irrot. So it is for Reliefs and Licences; and Forfeitures of Alienation of the king's Tenant without his consent might not be altered; and for primer seisin, the king was to receive the profits till the Tenant, by his homage, had assured the king of his service; till summons always commanding him to be at the place of rendezvous, 'in fide et homagio quibus nobis tenemini.' All these things being but Fruits that fall from these military services.

My Lords, Now to come to the Sea-Service; the care and execution of this trust by Tenures, was extended likewise to the Defence of the sea. The town of Lewis in Sussex holds by this service, 'quod si rex ad mare custodiend' suos mittere voluisset, they paid so much money, 'et hos habebant qui in navibus arma custodiebant.' This, my lords, is in Doomsday-Book: In Colchester every house to pay

6*d.* per ann. 'ad victum soldior' regis, ad expeditionem terræ vel maris.' Warwick, 'Si rex per mare contra hostes ibat,' the town was to find four bountswains. Salisbury, then to pay so much money, 'ad pasendum buslecor' los domini regis,' which, as Florentius explains the word, be 'ministeros nauticos.' Gloucester, and other places such a weight of iron, 'ad claves navium regis.' Others, to find horses to carry armour and weapons to the ships. My lords, of this nature are many in that Book, which particularly to mention, to gain time, I will omit.

That the Tenures of this kind after the Conqueror's time, continued in use, and were well known, appears by the Register fo. 2, where amongst other services, is this of Shipping also instanced in these words: 'Quod clama't tenere de nobis per liberum servitium invenienti' nobis quinque naves per annual' servitium.' In the Itar-Roll of Essex, 13 Ed. 1, Rot. 7, it is presented that the town of Maldon, 'tenet per Serjeantiam invenienti' unam navem quando'cunque rex necesse habuerit ire vel mittere propter negotium regni.' And from the time they came to the place of their rendezvous, to stay in the service forty days, 'somp'tibus propriis.' And being there presented, that they made Default at the Welsh war, they plead they had no sunnams.

So, my Lords, in the Book of Serjeanties of Edward 1's time, in Kent, the town of Killingborne is to find one Ship; and in the county of Berks, Fulke Caudry holds the manor of Padworth, 'per serjeantiam invenienti' servi'entem,' to perform Sea-Service, Bract. 20, 8 Ed. 2, Rot. 40, William Dier, in the county of Sussex, to find a certain proportion of Cordage. Iter Cantie, 21 Edw. 1, Rot. 46, Solomon de Campis holds 'per serjeantiam tenendi caput domini regis,' when he is at sea, 'si necesse fuerit;' and so Rot. 30, another in the same Iter-Roll. The Cinque Ports and their members are to find 20 men, and a master, 'bene armatos et bene ariatos;' from the time that they come to their rendezvous, they are to continue in the service 15 days, at their own charge, and afterwards so long as the king pleaseth; but after the 15 days, the king is to pay the master 6*d.* a day, and the rest 3*d.* a day for their wages. This Service appears by the Record of the Quire of Dover before-mentioned, and the Patent Roll 7 Hen. 7, both which Records imply, that this Service of theirs cannot be exacted, otherwise than for the Defence of the Sea; for it cannot be demanded but once in a year, nor then neither, 'nisi necesse fuerit.' Parl. Pet. 1 Edw. 3, Rot. 4. the Barons of the Ports, in consideration of this Sea-Service, pray a confirmation of their Liberties, 'pro salvatione dicti Navigii et Regni;' and commonly when the Land-Service was summoned, these were likewise summoned to the same service at sea, as appears by the Close Rolls, 28 Edw. 1, m. 15. 31 Edw. 1, and 34 Edw. 1, m. 15, 16. In all which years the Land-Service was summoned for Scotland, and the summons both for the one and the other run in the same words, commanding them to be at the place, 'cum toto servitio vestro quod nobis debetis,' which shews it to be a Service by Tenure. That these services of theirs are for the Defence of the realm, and likewise that there are many other of the like nature besides these, which by a superficial reading of two or three Iter-Rolls, I have cited, appears by the Parliament-Roll, 13 Ed. 3., pars 1, M. 11, where it is declared in these words, That the Cinque Ports and other great towns and havens are franchised, 'pur estre et mure inter nous et aliens,' if it shall fall out that they shall endeavour, 'notre enter et assay et sunt tenus a ceo faire.' My Lords, a fuller Declaration than this there cannot be, that both the ports, and havens, and sea-towns, are bound to the service of Shipping, for the extraordinary Defence of the realm, as well as the ordinary.

I have now done with the Service in kind; and because these which immediately tend to action alone, were not sufficient to defend the realm; and this in the frame and first constitution of the Commonwealth being foreseen, and that the land, 'Fundus Regni,' the most visible and constant Supplies of our Wants, was best able to supply this likewise; therefore besides them, there were divers other Tenures created for that purpose. Those which I am next to speak of, are such as supply his majesty with Money for that purpose.

In the Black Book in the Exchequer, lib. 1. cap. 7, it is said, that in particular 'Regni statu ad stipendia et donativa Militum et alia necessaria et castellis,' and other lands 'in quibus agricultura non exercebatur pecunia numerata successebat.' It might from hence be colourably inferred, that in respect 'ex provisione Legis,' upon the king's passing of lands, a Tenure for Knights Service for the Defence of the realm was to be reserved; that in case upon such grants, Rents only, without any such Tenure, were reserved, yet that Money should be employed for Soldiers Wages, and other necessary affairs of the Commonwealth, 'ad stipendia Militum et alia necessaria.' But not to press this further, it is plain, that all men within the kingdom were not equally inheritable, either to the body or propriety of lands or goods, but that there are degrees and ranks, and each differing from other in all these. 1. Villains. 2. Freeholders, either by Knights Service, or Free Socage. 3. Tenants of ancient demesne, and that held by Burgage within cities and borough towns.

1. For the Villain, we know, that as to his lord he had freedom in neither; in respect of his body, he could not 'ire quo voluit;' but the lord at his will might imprison him, and in respect of his land and goods he might tax him 'de haut et de bass.'

2. The Freeholders, the greatest part of the realm, always had an absolute freedom in them both.

The third sort, and those are the Tenants in ancient Demesne and Burghers, they had an absolute freedom in their Persons, but qualified in the other of Property, not taxable at the will, as Villains, but for the Defence and other necessary affairs of the realm, they might be taxed without consent in parliament. My Lords, that these had a divided estate from other free tenants, is clear. And first, for Tenants in ancient Demesne: it is to be questioned whether such land be ancient Demesne, yea or no; the issue is in these words, Whether it be ancient Demesne or frank Fee. By this it appeareth they have not a frank and free estate, as the others have; and as all our Books agree, they have no Vote in parliament, for they have no voice in the election of knights, nor pay to the expences of the Knights that serve in parliament, nor Soldiers granted in parliament, Na. Brev. 79. and 14. It is often disputed in our Books, whether acts of parliament extend to them, unless they be especially named; neither can they sue at common-law for any thing that concerns the Freehold, but only by a Writ of Right close within themselves. And therefore Bracton, fo. 209, calls them 'Villanos Privilegiatos.' The same it is of Burgesses within cities and boroughs: and therefore the Statute of Meriton makes it a disparagement for the lord to marry his Ward, 'villanis et aliis sicut Burgensibus,' Na. Br. 7, and other books. No Assizes will lie for such Lands, but they are impleadable without original writ, by a Bill of fresh force; and as a chattel, they may devise their land. By the Statute 1 Ed. 2, 'de militibus,' for such land and ancient demesne, no man is compellable to take the Order of Knighthood. Much more might be brought in proof of this, which I omit.

My Lords, all our Books agree, the Tenants in ancient Demesne were to plow and manure the king's lands, being his demesne. In a Manuscript that I have seen, the Author saith, that he hath an ancient Manuscript which saith, 'That the corn, and other victuals, arising hereby, was to store the king's Garrisons and Castles; and considering the numbers of those Garrisons, there being above 1,000 of them in the king's hand at the Conquest, as appears by Doomsday-Book, and that those Manors for the most part are great, and the greatest part of the Socage-Tenures, till Henry 2^ds time, as appears by the Black Book, lib. 1. c. 23, were to find Victuals of all sorts, in kind, for the provision of the king's household, and were in his time turned into Rents.' Although this may seem probable, yet because I have not seen the manuscript, I will insist no more upon it.

That for which these, and the Tenures of Burgage in the king's cities and boroughs, were mentioned in the raising of Monies for the necessary affairs of the state; that these were anciently talliable without their consent in parliament, is so plain and frequent in the Exchequer Rolls, as that I intend to cite nothing in proof thereof; it will be admitted by them that argue on the other side. That which I shall endeavour vour to prove is, that these were not talliable at the king's will and pleasure, but only for the Defence and other necessities of state, Na. Br. fo. 15. 49 Ed. 3. 22. They be not talliable, 'de haut et bass,' as villains are; and therefore Bracton, f. 209. calls them 'villanos privilegia-tos,' lib. parl. fo. 112. 'talliare et rationabile' 'auxilium dare pro necessitate.' Na. Br. 14. 'talliabile pur grand cause.' Rot. Parl. 6 Edw. 3. Commissions to tax cities and boroughs, and ancient demesne, upon Petitions of the commons revoked, and Writs in due form to be sent; and for the time to come, the king shall not assess, but in such a manner, 'come ad' 'estre fait en temps de cœux Ancestors et come' 'il denera pur reason.' The occasion not requiring it, I shall say nothing of it, when these Taxes were disused. My Lords, I have now done with the Tenures, the first way whereby the law hath provided for the safety of this realm; which of themselves not enabling the kings intrusted therewithal sufficiently to do it, the law therefore, besides the honours, castles, manors, and other constant revenues of the crown, for the supportation of the ordinary charges thereof, hath appointed unto it divers Prerogatives, for the extraordinary, and for this of the Defence of the realm, as one of the chiefest of them; these Prerogatives then have an influence into the states of all the subjects in the realm, and are so many, that, to gain time, I will omit to mention any of them.

That which I will insist upon, will be to prove, that the things coming to the Crown by this Prerogative way, are to be employed for the defence, and other public affairs of the realm.

In his majesty there is a double capacity, natural and politic. All his Prerogatives are jure corone, and of all such things he is seised jure corone; and therefore, as in other corporations, such things are patrimonia et bona publica, to be employed for the common good, so likewise by the same reason here. The reason why the king hath Treasure Trove, and gold and silver Mines in the earth in the case of Mines, is declared to be, because the king is hereby to defend the kingdom: and in the Institute in the Title of Socage, fo. 28. 137. the reason of many of the rest: 'Quia thesaurus regis est fundamentum belli et firmitamentum pacis.' This I conceive to be the reason, that by the Statute 14 Ed. 3. cap. 1. Escheats, Wardships, Customs, and Profits arising of the realm of England should be declared to be spent for the safeguard of the realm, more than the profits of the king's manors and lands; and of the difference made in the Comm' M. 3. Rich. 2. London, between 'Rectas promissiones Regni,' which by the advice of the Lords of the Council were to be spent in the household, and the other profits of the crown to be spent 'Circa' 'salvationem et defensionem regni.' In the Parliament Roll, 6 Rich. N. 42. the commons petition that the king will live of his own revenues; and that Wards, Marriages, Releases, Escheats, Forfeitures, and other Profits of the Crown, may be kept to be spent upon the wars for the Defence of the kingdom: which sheweth, that there was always a difference made between the Profits arising of the king's Manors and Lands, and that which rose by the Prerogative, casual and accidental ways. My Lords, I have now done with these.

The third way the law hath provided for the Defence of the kingdom, is particular Supplies of Money for the Defence of the Sea alone in times of danger, both ordinary and extraordinary; for besides the Supplies of Money before-mentioned, which are to be employed for the good and defence of the realm in general, as in the other cases where the law putteth the king to any particular charge for the protection of the Subject, it always enables him thereunto, and yields him particular supplies of money for the maintenance of the charge; so here the Courts of Justice, for the preservation of us in our Rights, are supported at his charge; and that is the reason why he hath all Fines and Amerciaments, the goods of outlawed men in personal actions, Bract. lib. 3. cap. 13, fo. 129. and Fines for purchasing of Original Writs, 'et' 'pro licentia concordandi,' which, in supposition of law, are paid for not proceeding, and troubling the court without cause. The king's Justices who are maintained in their places at the king's charge, these are the 'vectigal' justiciar.' The Defence of the realm extends itself to many particulars of the Church, and of Religion: and therefore in the summons of parliament, the cause of the calling the parliament is always declared to be 'Pro defensione ecclesie Angliæ' in particular, as well as 'Totius Regni.' His majesty therefore hath the Temporalities of Bishopricks, sede vacante, a great prerogative, and that which patrons have not; with an addition of the First Fruits and Tenths of them, and all other Ecclesiastical Promotions and Benefices in Henry the 8th's time, and likewise the Tithes of all lands which lie not within any parish.

For Defence of the Land alone, besides those Military Services before-mentioned, the profits of Wards and Marriages, which, as I have read, no other Christian prince hath as a Fruit of them, are received for that purpose. So it is for the Sea, in Rot. Sco. 10 Ed. 3, m. 16, it is said that the king and his ancestors are 'Domini Maris Anglicani et defensores contra' 'hostium invasiones ante hoc tempus existentes.' For the supporting of this Charge therefore, they have not only had the Grand Customs of the Mark and Demy-Mark upon the Wool, Wool-Fells and Leather, and the Prisage; that is, one Tun of Wine before the mast, and another abaft the mast of every ship, which were even due by the Common Law, as appears by the Book of my lord Dyer, 1 Eliz. 165, and sir John Davies Reports, fo. 8, et 9, and implied by Mag. Char. cap. 30, that Merchants may trade 'per rectas et antiquas consuetudines;' but likewise divers others things were afterwards granted by act of parliament in addition to them. As first, the Petty-Customs began 31 Ed. 1, and were made perpetual by the Statute of 27 Ed. 3. cap. 26, and likewise divers Aids and Subsidies, which are an increase of Custom upon the Staple Commodities of Wool, Wool-Fells, &c. Leather and Tonnage and Wines, and Poundage, and increase upon all other things either imported or exported, either by Denizens or Aliens. That which in this kind was taken by his majesty in the 11th year of his reign, when this Writ issued forth, was 300,000*l.* and upwards. The Aids and Subsidies, and likewise the Tonnage and Poundage anciently granted upon particular occasions only, and afterwards to the late kings and queens for their lives by act of parliament, and now taken by his majesty, and likewise the new Imposition, altogether makes up the aforesaid sum of 300,000*l.* Of the legality thereof I intend not to speak, for in case his majesty may impose upon Merchandize what himself pleaseth, there will be less cause to tax the Inland counties; and in case he cannot do it, it will be strongly presumed, that he can much less tax them. The proving these two things herein will serve my turn: 1. That his majesty de facto takes them, and that this judicially appears to your lordships in the court; and, 2, that these and the ancient Customs, are for the Defence of the sea.

For the first, it was declared by his majesty in the last parliament, and annexed to the Petition of Right as part of it, that his majesty took them, and could not be without them; whereof he likewise desired the Judges to take notice, and that they might so do, it is inrolled both in this and other the courts of Westminster-hyll.

For the second, that the grant of Custom is principally for protection of Merchants at sea against the enemies of the realm, and pirates, the common enemies of all nations, sir John Davies Reports, fo. 9, and 12; and that those, and likewise the Impositions are for that purpose, was held by many of the Judges in the Argument of Ball's Case 7 Jac. in the Exchequer, in the Case of Impositions upon Currants, and likewise by the king's counsel, when the same case afterwards came to be debated in parliament, and was one of the main Reasons urged by them for the maintenance of that Judgment. That the Aids and Subsidies, and likewise Tonnage and Poundage, before they were granted for life, were not only for the Protection of Merchants, and the ordinary Defence of the sea, but also for the Defence thereof in times of extraordinary danger, and from Invasion from enemies, appears by the several Grants of them in the parliament Rolls. Rot. Parl. 1 Rich. 2. pars 2, M. 9, and 27, the kingdom being in point to be lost by the enemies of Spain and France, and divers others there mentioned, who made war against us both at land and sea, a Subsidy upon the grand Customs was granted, as the words are, 'pur le defence et rescous del kingdome;' this was for two years, and persons assigned to receive and expend the money. Comm' Mich. 3. Rich. 2, London: William Wallworth and John Philpot, citizens of London, appointed the treasurers of it, upon their account, shew the particulars how this Money was expended, 'circa salvationem et defensionem regni,' and were discharged. Rot. Parl. 3 Rich. 2, M. 16, and 17. The same cause continuing; Enemies intended to blot out the name of the English from under heaven, the Subsidy continued for a year longer. Rot. Parl. 5 Rich. 2, pars 2 M. 14, and 15. Tonnage and Poundage granted 'assint pre liti' 'apply sur safeguard del Mers,' and the king at the Petition of the Commons appoints Receivers. 6 Rich. 2, M. 13, the Commons complain, that notwithstanding the Grant of Tonnage and Poundage, the sea is not kept, and therefore persons named and assigned in parliament to receive the money, and to do it. 10 Rich. 2, M. 1. Tonnage and Poundage for a year. 11 Rich. 2, M. 6, and 12. Tonnage and Poundage and Subsidy for a year. 12 Rich. 3, M. 20. both for a year. 14 Rich. 2, M. 16, both for a year. 17 Rich. 2, M. 12, both for 3 years. 20 Rich. 2, M. 28, subsidy for 5 years, and Tonnage and Poundage for 3 years. 2 Hen. 4, M. 9, both for two years. 6 Hen. 4, M. 9, and 10, both for 2 years, upon condition to cease if the king before St. Hilary provided not sufficient army for the sea. 8 Hen. 4, M. 9, and 9 Hen. 4, M. 16, both for 2 years, for the common commodity and defence of the realm. 13 Hen. 4, M. 10, and 11, for 1 year, so as the same be confessed to proceed out of their own good will, and not out of duty. 5 Hen. 5, for 4 years, upon many conditions. 1 Hen. 6, M. 9, for 2 years. 3 Hen. 6, M. 17, Subsidy for 3 years, Tonnage and Poundage for 1 year. 4 Hen. 6, M. 22, 6 Hen. 6, M. 11, for 2 years Tonnage and Poundage; and 6*s.* 8*d.* upon every man within a parish-church that hath 20 nobles, and 6*s.* 8*d.* upon every Knights-Fee held immediately of the king. 8 Hen. 6, M. 15, Tonnage and Poundage to continue until the next parliament, 9 Hen. 6, M. 14, both, and for 2 years. 10 Hen. 6, M. 21, for 2 years. 23 Hen. 6, M. 16, for 4 years, and double upon strangers. 27 Hen. 6, M. 20, and 23, for 5 years. 37 Hen. 6, M. 8, and 12, Tonnage and Poundage first granted for life; and M. 41, assigned into the subjects hands for 3 years for the good of the seas.

My Lords, either by the Grant itself of them, or by the Declaration of the cause of the calling of the Parliament, it appears, that these were all granted upon extraordinary occasions: and when they come to be granted for life, as appears by the Rolls and printed Statutes of 19 Ed. 4, c. 13, they were not only granted for the ordinary defence of the realm, and principally of the sea; but likewise that the kings might always have in readiness a stock of money in their hands to withstand an invasion, as is declared by the very words of those statutes.

My Lords, his majesty is in possession of them, and was pleased by his Proclamation printed 1626, declaring the cause of the Dissolution of the last parliament, as appears p. 17, to declare that they were always granted to his progenitors, for the guarding of the Seas, and safety and defence of the realm; and p. 18, is graciously pleased in these words, to declare that he doth, and must still pursue those ends, and undergo that charge for which they were first granted to the crown; and p. 44, that he receives them for the guarding of the Seas, and Defence of the realm.

My Lords, I have now done with the Ways which I first propounded, whereby the law hath provided for the Defence of the Realm. I shall add this only, That by the Statute of Winchester, which was made in 13 Edw. 1, every man 'secundum statum et facultates,' for the words of the Statute are according to the quantity of his Lands and Goods, is to find horse and armour for the Defence of the realm; for that the Statute in this particular, extends not only to the keeping of the Sea, but likewise to the Defence against Forzeigners, is declared in the Parliament Roll of 3 Rich. 2, M. 36. and by the Statute of 5 Hen. 4, in the Parliament Roll M. 24, not printed, 'juxta quantitatum terrarum et bonorum,' against Invasions each man is to find Armour. And by the Statute 1 Ed. 3, cap. 5, these men upon sudden coming of strange enemies into the realm, may be compelled to march out of their own counties where they live: whether they may be compelled so to do without Wages, I shall have occasion afterwards to speak. How far the Statute of Winchester and 5 Hen. 4, for Arms upon the Statutes of 4 and 5 Phil. & Mar. cap. 2, and 1 Jac. c. 25. are in force, I shall not speak.

My Lords, I shall now proceed to the stating of the question. Bracton in the beginning of his Book saith, That 'in Rege necessaria sunt hæc duo, arma et leges quibus utrumque tempus Bellorum et Pacis recte possit gubernare.' Glanvill, in the beginning of his Book, saith, 'Reg' majestatem armis contra gentes sibi regnoque insurgentes oportet esse decorat.'—His majesty, as he is lord of sea and land, so by that which hath been said, it appears that he is armed for the Defence of both.

My Lords, the Reasons in the Writ, as they are weighty, so from these known Supplies, whereby the law hath provided for the Safety of the realm, they will all of them be confessed; and yet thereby receive Answer, that the law hath foreseen and provided the supplies accordingly without the way in the Writ.

First, The command in the Writ being 'In fide et legiancia quibus nobis tenemini,' it is thence inferred, that each Subject's allegiance binds him to contribute to the Defence of the realm. In the old Customs of Normandy, cap. 43. allegiance binds 'ad concilii et auxilii adjumentum.' This, though it be principally performed by the Parliament, both in Advices and Aids, yet besides these extraordinary, by that which hath been said, we see both by the Tenures in kind, and pecuniary Supplies, that, without the assistance thereof, our persons, hands, and goods, by his majesty's command alone, are made contributory thereunto, and that in a large proportion. Secondly, The Rule whereby this Contribution must be regulated, as in the Writ, 'secundum statum et facultates,' that likewise is satisfied, and that both for Sea and Land.

For Land, in case either the Statute of Winchester, or 5 Hen. 4, be on foot, then in words that of finding arms, 'juxta quantitatem terrarum et bonorum.' So, secondly, in respect of the Tenures, by Knights-Service, by the Wards, Marriages and Reliefs; these, I confess, concern the Tenant only; but those other Tenures in capite and Grand Serjeanty, these concern all others, in respect of the Licences of Alienation, and of the Wardships of Lands, held of other lords, and that all the Tenants are become hereby wardable. And, Thirdly, in respect of the Prerogatives before mentioned; for the greater the Subject's Estate is, the greater influence they have into it, and proportionably raise more profit out of it.

In respect of the Sea, this is so by the Customs, Aids, Subsidies, Tonnage and Poundage, before mentioned; for the charge of these is not born by the merchants alone, but by each subject within the kingdom, and that 'secundum statum et facultates suas.'

For, First, in respect of the Export: The greater the estate, the more Wool and Woolfells, and Leather, Lead, and other commodities; if that be done by the owner, he bears the immediate charge; if by the merchant, according to that proportion is his abatement in price to the owner. So it is for Goods imported; for the greater the estate and means of livelihood are, the more each person buys of these, and at a dearer rate. This is cleared by the Petition of the Commons in Parliament 22 Ed. 3, Rot. 22, M. 41, that the merchants had granted to the king 40s. upon a sack of wool, 'en charge del peuplé et nemy des merchants.' And by the Statute 36 Ed. 3, c. 11. that no Subsidy or Charge be granted to the king by the Merchants upon Wool, without assent in Parliament.

Hence likewise that other ground of Equity in the Writ, 'quod omnes tangit ab omnibus debet supportari,' receives Answer: For as all have benefit by the Defence, so is the 'compensatio publica,' we see it comes from all. The fuller Answer is the Parliament Summons of 23 Ed. 1, for Provision against the French, who intended 'Lingam Anglicanam omnino delere.' Rot. Claus. 23 Ed. 1, M. 14. 'Lex justissima provida et circumspicione sacrorum principum stabilita,' statuit 'Quod omnes tangit ab omnibus approbatur;' the Charge must be borne by all, so it must be approved by all.

If his majesty be intrusted with the Defence of the realm, as in the great Case between the earls of Hereford and Gloucester, it is said, that, 'incumbit domino regi salvatio populi sibi commisit' and that 'per jurament' est astrictus 'ad providendum salvacionem regni circumquaque,' because no man goeth to war at his own charge. We see by that which is already said, that the law hath provided the 'Stipen-

'dia Ministerii;' which that they do bind his majesty to the defence and safety of the kingdom, not only in point of care and vigilancy, but even in point of charge too, I shall endeavour to prove to your lordships and the court.

Allegiance we owe as an Act of Reciprocity; for as it binds the subject to Tribute and Subjection, so therefore the king to the charge of Protection by the expence of these, 'Rex ad tutelam corporum et bonorum erectus.' The supplies he hath, for these purposes, tie him to the supportation of the Laws, and the execution of Justice. 20 Ed. 1, in the Case before mentioned between the earls of Gloucester and Hereford, it is said, that 'dominus rex est omnibus et singulis de regno suo justitiz debitor;' which that he is so, even in point of charge, appears in his majesty's supportation of the Courts of Justice, and the Salaries not only to your lordships, and other the inferior ministers of justice, and anciently to the Sheriffs, but likewise many other ways. 4 Hen. 7, c. 12, the king shall not let for any favour of charge, but that he shall see his laws fully executed. Parl. 23, Ed. 1. Rot. 12, Exchequer. A clerk that attended a committee of Grievances recovered Salary from the king, although the Commission was for the relief of that county. This I conceive to be the reason of the declaration in the Statute of 14 Ed. 3, c. 1. and other statutes, That aids, though granted in parliament, for Defence, shall not be brought into example; in that it might be conceived, that the commons were to bear that charge which principally belonged to the king. Pat. 48 Hen. 7, M. 8, it is recited, That whereas a late parliament 'in articulo necessitatis pro defensione regni contra hostilem adventum alienigenarum,' the commons granted him a large Subsidy, 'ultra quam retroactis temporibus facere consueverant;' now the king 'eorum indempnitati prospicere volens,' grants, that 'non cedat in prejudicium nec in posterum trabatur in consuetudinem.' In Wiseman's Case, in the second Report, fo. 15, it is resolved that a Covenant to stand seized to the use of queen Elizabeth, that she is the Head of the Commonwealth, and hath the care of repelling foreign hostility, is not good, because, saith the Book, the king is bound to do that ex officio. Com. 315. One reason why the king is to have Royal Mines, alledged by all that argued for the king, is, because he is at his own charge to provide for the Defence of the realm, which he cannot do without money. In the earl of Devon's Case, Co. 11, 91, 6 Institut. fo. 28, and 131. 'Thesaurus Regis' is called 'Nervus Belli.' For the practice, the proof of the particular charges the several kings have been at for Defences of all sorts, would be so tedious, that I will omit the citing of any thing in this kind. Sir John Davies reports, fo. 12, many authorities, and in the treatise 'De Regalibus, p. 81. 'Principes totam navigationem pro vectigalibus prestare coguntur.'

But because his majesty, in the foremen-tioned proclamation, p. 18, and 44, is graciously pleased to profess, that he holds himself obliged to undergo the charge of the Defence of the realm, and of the sea in particular, I shall spare any further proof in this.

If that in the Writ, that the Sea 'per gentem Anglicanam ab olim defendi consuevit,' be not answered by the Scottish Roll of 10 Ed. 3, before recited, which says, That the king and his ancestors 'Maris Anglicani defensores antehac constiterunt,' nor by what is now said, if it be admitted, yet that even the charge of this defence is borne 'per gentem Anglicanam,' is before proved.

The next, and one of the main things whereupon I shall state my question, is this. His majesty is in the actual possession, not only of the Service in kind, for the Defence of the land, by taking of the benefit of the Wardships, Marriages, Reliefs, Fines, and licenses of Alienations, and 'primer seisin,' and of the prerogatives beforementioned, but likewise of the services of the Cinque Ports, unless they be released since 7 Hen. 7, (for then their Services were summoned) and of the Tonnage and Poundage, and other duties for the Defence of the Sea: It appears not by any part of the Writ, nor by any thing in the record, that either the services of the Cinque Ports were summoned, or that any money at all of his majesty's was expended, either for this service, or at any other time for the defence of the sea. My lords, I desire to be understood, I do not affirm that none was expended; only this appears not to your lordships and the court: all that can be inferred from the Writ to this purpose is, that this ship for Bucks, is commanded to be at Portsmouth by such a day 'ad proficiendum exinde cum navibus dicti domini regis et navibus aliorum fidelium subditorum suorum.' By this it appears not to the Court, that though the Ships are the king's, that they are to be set forth at the king's charge; for the charge may be borne by the subject, for aught appears.

Neither, Secondly, doth it appear, how many these ships were, whereby the charge, in case it were borne by the king, might in any proportion appear to be answerable to the supply beforementioned. Those other ships, 'aliorum fidelium subditorum nostrrorum regis,' as in truth they were not those of the Cinque Ports, neither can they be so intended, unless it had been so expressed.

The Service of the Cinque Ports, and Tonnage and Poundage, and other Duties, are the ordinary settled and known ways by the law appointed for the defence of the seas; the way in the writ by seising and altering the property of the subjects goods without their consent, as in the writ, must needs be granted to be a way more unusual and extraordinary. Against the legality of it, I shall thus frame my argument by way of admission: first, that in case the service of the ports had been summoned, and the money by the forementioned ways raised had been expended upon the defence, and they had not been sufficient, that though in this case the writ had been legal; yet, as now it is, it is not. Rylie's Case in the 10th, Report, fol. 139, and Trin. 18 Ed. 2, Banc. Regis 174, adjudged, that so long as he that is bound by tenure, or prescription, is able to do it, the whole Level cannot be assessed to the repairing of a wall or bank. It is a maxim, 'Lex non facit salutem,' nor that we are to run to extraordinary, when the ordinary means will serve the turn; these rules are often put in our books, I intend to instance but in one or two cases.

The Common Law is the common reliever of persons wronged; that in Chancery is extraordinary, and therefore no man can sue there, when he may have remedy at the common law. The ordinary way of Trial for Life is by Indictment and a Jury; when therefore this may be done, and that the sheriff, with the Posse Comitatus, is able to keep the peace, it cannot be done by martial law, or by judgment of the king and peers in parliament without indictment, as was adjudged in the case of the earl of March, Trin. 28 Ed. 3, Banco Regis, Rot. 21. My lords, the reason of this maxim of law is, as I conceive, these actions extraordinary are done extra ordinem, and done only in times of necessity, when we are not tied to any rules of law, and therefore not to be brought into example, nor have any warrant but only that of necessity; nor any rule to guide them but what, pro hic et nunc, shall serve for the bringing of them about: the same power then that may once do them, in the omitting of the ordinary way, may, by the same rule, always do them, and so by consequence, how far such power is tied at any time, or in any thing, to any rules of law, I shall humbly submit to your lordships consideration. My lords, I have now done stating the question, those things whereupon I shall spend the rest of my time are these.

First, Admitting that the ordinary means abovementioned had been all used, and that they had not been sufficient; whether in this Case his majesty, without consent in parliament, may in this case of extraordinary Defence, alter the Property of the Subjects Goods for the doing thereof.

In the next place, I shall endeavour, to answer some Objections which may be made to the contrary.

In the third place, for qualifying of this, I shall admit, that in some cases the property of the Subjects Goods for the Defence of the realm, may be altered without consent in parliament; and shall shew what they are in particular, and compare them and the present occasion together.

In the fourth place, because of some Precedents of the matter of fact, and likewise of all authorities that may seem to prove a legality in this particular of Shipping for Defence of the Sea, whatever it be in the general, I shall therefore endeavour to answer to such of them as I have met withal.

For the first, that to the altering of the Property of the Subjects Goods, though for the Defence of the realm, a parliamentary assistance is necessary. In this it must be granted, in the first place, that the law ties no man, and much less the king, to impossibilities: and secondly, that the kingdom must be defended.

As therefore the law hath put this great trust upon his majesty, so when the Supplies which by the ways before-mentioned it hath put into his hands fail therein, it hath provided other ways for a new Supply.

The first thing that I shall present unto your lordships and this court, are the Aids and Subsidies granted in parliament. That amongst the 'Ardua Regni negotia' for which parliaments are called, this of the Defence not only is one of them, but even the chief, is cleared by this; That of all the rest none are named in particular in the summons, but only this: for all the summons of parliament shew the cause of the calling them to be, 'pro quibusdam arduis negotiis nos et defensionem Regni nostri Angliæ et Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ concernentibus;' and in the conclusion the party summoned to be there, 'Sicut honorem nostrum et salvationem et defensionem Regni et Ecclesiæ diligit.' And in all the ancient summons of parliament, when Aid was demanded, the particular cause of defence, and against what enemy in special, was mentioned.

My lords, to gain time, I will instance but one or two of each king's reign. Claus. 23 Ed. 1, M. 4. dors. that the French 'ad expugnandum Regn' nostr' classe maxima et bellatorum copiosa multitudine Regn' nostrum invadunt et linguam Anglicanum omnino proponunt,' &c. Claus. 3 Ed. 2, M. 3, dors. and 7 Ed. 2, M. 8. dors. that the Scots had entered, burnt and destroyed the Marches, and put them to a tribute. Claus. 1 Ed. 3, pars 2, M. 6, and 22 Ed. 3, M. 31, dors. that the Scots and French had invaded the realm. Claus. 7 Hen. 4, M. 29, dors. that the French were with a great fleet, Quasi in ore Thamesis, to invade the kingdom, and the king to go in person; after this king's reign, the summons was as now it is.

That these 'Ardua defensionem Regni concernent,' are the Aids and Means of Defence, and not the way and manner of doing it, as their counsel therein is clear. In the Parliament Roll, 6 Rich. 2. M. 9. This of the manner and way and prosecution of the war being given in charge to the commons to advise upon, they answer this, 'Nec doit, nec soluit appertaine al eux mes al roy.' Rot. Parl. 13 Ed. 3, pars 1, M. 11, the same being given in charge to the commons, they pray 'que ils ne sont charge al council doner al choses del queux ils n'ont pas conuzance.' And so Rot. Parl. 21 Ed. 3, M. 5, they excuse themselves, and say, that this belongs to the king and his council.

And that these 'Ardua circa defensionem,' were the Aids, is expressed in words in some of the Summons. Claus. 7 Ed. 2, M. 8, dors. the cause of the parliament to withstand the Scots, and that in 'tam arduis debetis extendere manus adjutrices oportuna auxil' faciendo.' Claus. 31 Ed. 3, M. 21, dors. that 'circa necess'

'sarium defensionem Regni quam ad dictum 'negotium expediend' auxilium necessar' nos 'habere oportet.' Claus. 5 Rich. 2, M. 2, dors. the king being to make a voyage 'pro defensione Regni,' which could not be done without borrowing great sums of money; therefore the parliament was called to advise about the assurance. So that, my lords, it is clear, that the law hath provided this parliamentary way for supplying of the king's wants for the extraordinary defence, and hath likewise put the power of using it into his majesty's own hands, for he may call parliaments when, and so often as he pleaseth.

My lords, as the parliament, first, are best qualified and fitted to make this supply; (for some of each rank, and that through all the parts of the kingdom, being there met, his majesty having declared the danger, they best know the states of all men within the realm, and are fittest, by comparing the danger and men's estates together, to proportion the aid accordingly;) and, secondly, are fittest for the preservation of that fundamental propriety which the subject hath in his lands and goods; because each subject's vote is included in whatsoever there is done: so that it cannot be done otherwise, I shall endeavour to prove to your lordships both by reason and authority.

My first reason is this, that the parliament by the law is appointed as the ordinary means of supply upon extraordinary occasions, when the ordinary supplies will not do it. If this in the writ therefore may without resorting to that be used, the same argument will hold as before, in resorting to the extraordinary by way of the ordinary, and the same inconveniency will follow.

My second reason is taken from the actions of former kings in this of the defence. The Aids demanded by them, and granted in parliament even for this purpose of the defence, and that in times of imminent danger, are so frequent, that I will spare the citing of any of them. It is rare in a subject, and more in a prince, to ask and take that of gift, which he may and ought to have of right.

The second way was Loans and Benevolences demanded by them, with promise of repayment both for the ordinary and extraordinary defence of the realm; and that as well of all the subjects equally, as of some few. Pat. 48 Hen. 3, M. 16, a commission to the earl of Leicester and others, 'contrahendi mutuum in nomine nostro de denariis et victualibus,' and other things 'in munitionem navium ponendis et nautarum stipendiis contra hostilem adventum alienigenar' in Regnum nostrum, et ad defensionem et tuitionem ejusd' Regni;' and promiseth repayment. Visis computis in the Exchequer, 26 Ed. 1, Rot. 100, the king borrows of the merchants 28,966*l.* 'pro defensione Regni,' and promiseth repayment, Hil. 31 Ed. 1, Rot. 4, and Trin. 31 Ed. 1, Rot. 41. divers sums borrowed 'pro defensione,' and repayment promised. Br. irrot. 34 Ed. 1, Rot. 82. 10,000*l.* paid by the king at one time for money borrowed, this I confess is 'Arduis Regni negotiis. Br. irrot. 11 Ed. 2, Rot. 1, the Scots having entered the kingdom, 'diversa homicidia, incendia, et depraedationes perpetrantes,' the king being in person to go against them, writes to his council to provide money; and they, 'diversas vias pro denariis providendis exquirentes,' resolve to borrow. P. 12 Ed. 2, Commun' for the same cause a loan upon all merchants strangers. Rot. Scot. 1 Ed. 3, M. 3, the Scots having entered the realm and taken divers castles, and threatened a conquest of England, and 'Quia crescit sumptuum multitudo in tantum quod thesaurus noster ad sustentationem exercituum nostrorum nequaquam sufficit,' he borrows. Claus. 14 Ed. 3, M. 8, the king had borrowed 3333*l.* 'pro salvatione et defensione regni, et vult promptam solutionem fieri prout decet;' and now assigns it to be paid out of the customs. Walsingham, p. 179. 44 Ed. 3, the king 'Sinistro usus concilio magnas summas pecuniarum,' of all sorts 'mutuo petiit, asseverans quod in defensionem ecclesiarum et regni illas expenderet;' but the people would not lend. Claus. 5 Rich. 2, M. 12, dors. the king 'pro defensione regni,' being to make a voyage to sea, desired to borrow money, and a parliament called to give assurance. 7 Hen. 4, Rot. Franc. money borrowed, 'pro defensione, volens promptam et securam solutionem fieri.' Rot. Parl. 11 H. 6, M. 13, 10,000*l.* borrowed 'pro defensione, and spent, and the parliament order the security. Rot. Parl. 15 Hen. 6, M. 3, 10,000*l.* borrowed 'pro defensione,' by the king. Stat. 11 Hen. 7, cap. 16, it appears that a Benevolence had been desired by Hen. 7, for the defence of the realm, and wherein he went in person. The known commission to Cardinal Wolsey for the Benevolence in March, 16 H. 8, it was to withstand 'Infestissimos hostes,' of France and Scotland, who intended to invade the realm; and that the king's coffers were now empty, and therefore they have power 'Communicandi et inducendi, persuadendi et praticandi cum subditis regis super amicabilem pecuniarum concessionein,' 2 pars. Pat. 37 Hen. 8, 'cum pro sustentatione ingentis oneris nostrarum copiarum, quas in presenti tam per mare quam per terram conficere, et in promptu habere cogimur ad resistend' propellend' hostem nostrum Francorum Regem, in defensionem tutelam et securitatem dilectorum subditorum nostrorum, quorum illi' damnus et interitum omnibus viis et modis molitur.' Statut' et ex consensu et scientia concilii nostri decrevimus aliquam opem de dictis subditis nostris petere, et eand' cum eorum benevolentia recipiend' pro eorum cujuslibet facultate ministrand' nihil dubitans quin sponte et liberaliter quisque pro sua portione et facultate largiturus sit, etoque magis et citius quod id totum consumat' et cedat in suam ipsorum defensionem;' and the power is given to levy it as a Benevolence only. By the Statute of 35 Hen. 8, c. 12, it appears that for the Defence Hen. 8, had borrowed divers sums of money.

The third way was by anticipating their rents. Trin. 29 Ed. 1, Rot. 58, in the Exchequer, Writs went to all the sheriffs of England, 'pro salvatione regni ejusq; incolarum salvatione, et inimicorum depressione;' that all the profits arising out of their counties, and the rents of all the king's tenants due at Michaelmas, be paid at Midsummer, and allowance promised in the next half year's rent; and that this 'ad tam ardua negotia necessaria, et in consuetudinem non trahatur.'

My lords, that not one or two, but so many kings, and of such power and wisdom as many of them were, and that in a matter of such consequence, and in times of necessity, should so far descend from their greatness, or so far prejudice their right, as to borrow that of the subject, which, without being beholden unto them, they might take of right, and bind themselves to repayment, and all without any salvo of their right, your lordships will conceive that it can hardly be imagined.

My third reason is taken from the uncertainty of the way intended by the writ; for the law delighting in certainty, to the end that the subject might be sure of somewhat that he might call his own, hath made all those things that the king challengeth as peculiar to himself from the subject, either certain in themselves, or else reducible to a certainty either by the judges, jury or parliament, or some other way than by his majesty himself, as indifferent between the king and his people. In this I intend not such things as are common to the king with the subject, of which nature are the aids for marrying the king's eldest daughter, or knighting his eldest son; for these are due to several common persons that are lords of a manor, as well as to the king, as appears by the statute of Westm' 1, 3 Ed. 1, cap. 35, M. 28, and are not due by any special prerogative, but by Tenure; and yet the common law for avoiding excess therein, calls it 'Rationabile auxilium;' and even this by the statute of Westm' 1, 3 Ed. 1, cap. 35, is put into certainty; and the cause of making the statute, as therein is expressed, is, because the people were grieved by paying more than was requisite; and thereby that which was reasonable, became an unreasonable aid. This statute was general, and named not the king in particular; but the statute 25 Ed. 3, cap. 11, is only in case of the king, and Na. Br. fo. 83, gives the reason of the making of that statute, because the king before did distrain for more than was fit, and therefore by reason of the excess, was restrained to a certainty as well as the subject. Neither are the taxes and talliages upon cities and boroughs, or ancient demesne against this, in respect of the baseness of their tenures beforementioned. And secondly, because the subject that is lord of such borough and manor of ancient demesne, hath them as well as the king, as appears by the case of New Salisbury, 33 Ed. 1, in the parliament book, and in the new parliament roll, 8 Ed. 2, for the borough of Cirencester, and Br. Trin. 33 Ed. 1, Rot.

32, and Na. Br. 97. These things which are peculiar to the king, either they be certain in themselves, as are treasure-trove, deodands, wrecks, and the like, where the king is to have the thing itself; and so if it be in money, as the demi-mark; when in a writ of right the tenant prayeth, that the seisin may be enquired, fines 'pro licentia concordandi,' it is the tenth part by the law comprized in the writ of covenant, and the post-fine one half so much more, and fines for purchasing original writs 2s. 8d. where the thing demanded is 40l. or 10s. where 100l. and so in proportion. Or else it is reducible to a certainty, as in all cases where the party is to be amerced, though he is 'miser cordia dom' regis,' yet the jury must find the amerciamento; and when he is to make fine and ransom 'ad voluntatem domini regis,' yet this fine must be set by the judges: when the tenant by knight-service makes default in the summons 'ad exercitum,' which is to pay escuage for the default; this cannot be set but in parliament, as I shall prove hereafter.

My lords, to apply all to the thing in question, there is a cause for raising money for the Defence of the realm, 'non deficitur in lege,' what will serve the turn. If his majesty, as in the writ, may without parliament lay 20s. upon the Defendant's goods, I shall humbly submit it to your lordships, why by the same reason of law it might not have been 20l. and so ad infinitum; whereby it would come to pass, that if the subject hath any thing at all, he is not beholden to the law for it, but it is left entirely in the mercy and goodness of the king.

My lords, I am now come to the second kind of Proofs, and that is by authorities. The cases which in the first place I will insist upon, will be to prove it by induction: for if I shall prove that his majesty without parliament cannot tax his people for setting forth of Land-Forces for defence, for making and maintaining of forts and castles for defence, for victuals for a defensive army, for maintenance of prisoners taken in a defensive war, for pledges and hostages given by foreign states for the keeping of peace; if it cannot be in all or any of these particulars, the five supports of a defensive war; I shall then offer it to your lordships, whether it can be done at all.

Before I proceed to these particulars, I shall observe thus much, my lords, in the general; that if those that hold by ancient demesne and burgage, which are but base tenure, cannot be taxed 'nisi sur grand cause,' and that have many privileges in point of ease and profit in consideration thereof, as they have; much less then can the tenants by Knights-Service and socage, that are free tenants, and have no privilege in support of the charge, be taxed. And as they are not taxable, but 'sur grand cause' in the general, so neither in particular for this of defence, as is proved by that of escuage; for if his majesty without consent in parliament, cannot tax his own tenants, nor proportion the fine according to his pleasure, when the tenant holds the land ad exercitum, for the defence of the kingdom, much less can he do it where there is no tenure for that purpose. That escuage cannot be set without parliament, is first the statute of Running Mead, 'Nullum Scutagium vel auxilium ponatur in regno nostro nisi per commune concilium regni nostri;' which though it be not printed, yet it is of record, and inrolled in the Red Book of the Exchequer, and cited in Mat. Paris, p. 348. And that as well before the confirmation of it, 9 Hen. 3, as since, it hath been by the judges reputed to be a statute and of force, appears by the book of 5 Hen. 3, Mordam. 53, where it is pleaded, and called by the name of Magna Charta, and allowed; and M. 19 Ed. 1, finiente 20. incipiente Banc. Regis Rot. 56. in the case of Ralph de Tunney, it is pleaded by the name of Magna Charta Johannis Regis de Running Mead, and allowed.

In the Book of Knights-Fees of Ed. 1's time, there is a writ cited, which went to the Sheriff of Hereford thus; 'Datum est nobis intelligi quod plures sunt qui tenent per servitium militarum de nobis, qui contradicunt solvere scutagia quae nobis sunt concessa per commune concilium regni nostri;' therefore he is commanded to levy them. Comm' M. 8 Ed. 2, Rot. dors. many processes issued for the levying of escuage granted in Ed. 1's time superseded, and quite released; the reason entered on the Roll is, 'Quia dictum servitium non fuit communiter factum;' that is, as I conceive, that it was not done 'per commune concilium regni.' The Books are express, 13 Hen. 4. Com. Banc. Na. Br. 83. Institut. § 97.

My lords, that those that held in socage or fee-farm, or not by so many Knights-Fees as they were distrained for, were always discharged, as appears by infinite precedents, I shall make no use of it, as the manner of entering these discharges upon the roll; it is observable, that he is distrained 'ac si teneret per servitium militare,' whereas he holds the lands in Socage, 'pro quibus servitium aliquod regi in exercitiis suis facere non debet,' and in some rolls that 'Ratione alicujus autoritatis,' he ought not to be distrained; therefore 'Quia Dominus Rex non vult illum in hac parte injuriari prout justum est,' the distresses are released. Amongst divers precedents for this, I shall cite but one or two, Br. Trin. 34 Ed. 1, Rot. 20. the abbot of Abington and John Arden, the iter-roll of Sussex, 7 Ed. 1, Rot. 107. of Gilbert Gifford. My lords, if the king might have raised money, and seized money for finding of Soldiers, or for their arms, this manner of entry, as I humbly conceive, would never have been suffered.

I am now come to the first particular that I have instanced; that is, the charging the Subject for finding of Soldiers to go out of their county for the Defence of the realm. My lords, in that I shall in the first place admit these three things.

1. That every man after the Statute of Winchester, 'secundum statum et facultates,' was to find all manner of arms, as well for the defence of the realm against foreigners, as for the peace; and that I have before proved by that of 3 Rich. 2, M. 16. and after by the statute 5 Hen. 4.

2. That upon sudden coming of strange enemies, these are compelled to travel out of their own counties, is the statute of 1 Ed. 3, c. 5. and so for appeasing of any notable rebellion, when the king for the doing thereof goes in person, as appears by the statute 11 Hen. 4, c. 1. and 18.

3. I shall admit, that so long as they remain at home, and go not out of their countries, they are to have no wages; and that the maritime shires, and those that border upon Scotland and Wales, were not to be at the king's charge, so long as they remained at home in their own counties for the preservation of them; but that they were in that case themselves to bear the charge against foreign invasion, as of making hue and cry, assisting the sheriff when he took the Posse Comitatus, and all other things concerning the keeping of the peace.

But that the Subjects are taxable either for Wages or Victuals, or otherwise for finding of soldiers out of their counties, though for Defence of the kingdom, or that any are compellable to do it at their own charge, I shall humbly deny. The statute 1 Ed. 3, says, That in this case it shall be done, as usually hath been done in times past, for the defence of the realm. My lords, I shall not deny, but that before Ed. 3's time commissions have issued out of the chancery for that purpose; against which matters of fact, not only to balance them, but even to weigh them down, it is as clear that whole armies, some of them of 30,000 at the least, over and above them that were summoned by their tenure, have been maintained at the king's charge, from the time that they have departed out of their counties, during the whole time of their service, and that not only with promises of payment, but that they were paid ex Thesauro Regis, out of the Exchequer; and many times upon failure of payment, victuals, wages, and other things, upon suit for them in the Exchequer, full payment has been made; of which sort in most kings reigns there are many cases.

My lords, this is the answer that I give to the commissions to the country, That de facto the king was at the charge usually for defensive war. By the statute 19 Hen. 8, cap. 1, those that have annuities of the king must attend him when the king in person goes for the defence of the realm, or against rebels: But there is a special Proviso, that they shall have wages of the king from the time they set out till they come to the king, allowing twenty miles a day, and afterwards as long as they shall remain in the service. Upon a rebellion in the North 28 Hen. 8, against which the king intended to go in person, privy-seals were sent to most of the gentry to attend the king with the best retinue that they could make, and likewise to bring the bills of their expence and payment promised, as appears by many of those privy-seals remaining in the palace-treasury. And besides the indentures themselves, whereof I have seen many, it appears by the statute 2 & 3 Ed. 6; cap. 2, that the retainer of soldiers at the king's charge, was as well for defensive as offensive wars; and also by the statute of 3 Hen. 8, cap. 5.

My lords, in the next place I shall endeavour the proof hereof by clear authorities. The statute of 25 Edw. 3. cap. 8, is, that none shall be compelled to find arms, but such as hold by such service, if it be not by grant in parliament. That this was not 'introducivum novæ legis,' appears by a petition whereupon the statute is made, that it is 'enconter le droit del roylme.' That the common law was so before the statute, and likewise in case of a defensive war, appears by the authorities following; P. 26 Ed. 1, Rot. 35. dors. the Scots entering the borders, a commission issued Reginaldo de Gray, to press soldiers in Lancashire; he certified by his letter inrolled there, 'que sans denieres prest,' he could not procure them to march out of those parts; and therefore order is taken in the Exchequer to send money. That the Scots had now invaded the kingdom, appears by Br. irrot' m. 26 Ed. 1, in Scaccar. where commissions are inrolled for many thousands to be levied for this war at the king's wages. Bra. Trin. 32 Ed. 1, Rot. 18, Communia. The wardens of the marches of Cumberland and Westmorland write to the barons of the Exchequer, that whereas the Scots lay near the marches with a great army, and that the people of these counties would not march out of their counties without wages and victuals, that they would provide for both. 2 Pars Pat. 10 Ed. 2, M. 26, and 9 Ed. 2, in parl. a grant to find one soldier for 60 days at the charge of the town against an invasion of the Scots. Now the king grants, 'Quod hujusmodi concessio non reddat in præjudicium, nec trahatur in exemplum in futuro.' At the time when this aid was granted, the Scots had entered the realm, and wasted the bishoprick of Durham, as appears in 14 Ed. 2, Banc' Reg. Rot. 60. Rot. Scot. 12 and 13 Ed. 2, M. 7, and 13. The same indemnity upon the like occasion of defence, when they found the soldiers 'ad rogatum Regis,' and the king commanded the chancellor to declare as much. Claus. 13 Ed. 3. M. 38, dors. pars 1, the abbot of Ramsey discharged 'pro custodia maritima' in the county of Norfolk, because he remained in his own county of Huntington, 'cum equis et armis,' for the defence thereof, with this, that therefore it was not rationi canonans to charge him farther. The same it is Rot. Fra. 21 Ed. 2, M. 1, Pars 1. Oxon. because they were prompti et parati at home to defend the county. But the practice, it seems, not agreeing with the right in the parliament, 20 Ed. 3, M. 12, the commons complain, that commissions had issued out of the Chancery to charge the people in this particular and otherwise, without consent in parliament, and pray, that they may disobey such commissions. The answer is, that the commons had heretofore promised to assist the king with their bodies and goods in the war with France, and likewise for the defence of the realm; and that the great lords, considering the necessity as well for defence as for the king's wars, agree thereunto, and yet promise that this which is done in 'cest necessite, ne suit troit en consequence n' ensample.' My lords, this is a full declaration of the right, even when for the defence, and yet some practise to the contrary. Before the making of the statute 25 Ed. 3, procured the Complaints in this particular, in the parliament 21 Ed. 3, M. 22 Ed. 3, Pat. 8 Hen. 3. 'Fulcasius de Brent inimicus publicus et excommunicatus,' that imprisoned the justices itinerant in Bedford-castle, and held the castle against the king; the king, 'propter graves et manifestos excessus quibus regnum multipliciter perturbavit,' besieged the castle; and whereas the clergy, de mera gratia, had granted the king aid for the doing thereof, 'Rex nolens gratiam sic nobis exhiberi tam ad debitum retorqueri,' declares as much by his letters patent. My lords, it is here declared that the king cannot de debito, or de jure, take any aid against the subjects wills for besieging of a castle, held against the king by a public enemy. Rot. Inquisition' 3 Ed. 1, Rot. 4. 'Kent' coram auditoribus querelarum post 'bellum Evesham et pacem proclamatum.' The castle of Tunbridge being held against the king, the hundred of Feversham was assessed at 15*l. per insultationem* of the castle: The jury presents this as a grievance, which the justices would never have received, nor suffered to be entered into the roll, if this assessment might have lawfully been made. My lords, this castle and hundred they were both in the same county, and being before the statute of Winchester, they are not compellable to besiege the castle; and if they were compellable to go in person and with arms, yet no assessment could be laid for the doing thereof. My lords, I shall only offer to your lordships consideration the Scottish roll of 20 Ed. 3, M. 6, the wardens of the marches of Scotland were to appoint 'Exploratores et vigiles,' which were to spy out and give notice of the enemy's intentions. By the commissions in Hen. 4, Hen. 5, and H. 6's times, they were 'explorandum defensione regni, et partium sumptibus incolarum.' But how? Only 'de assensu et voluntate sua, prout fieri consuevit.'

My lords, I am now come to that of Victuals. The statute 14 Ed. 3, c. 19, is; 'That for the Wars the Provision for them shall be done by merchants without commission or other power from the king, or any other power, that the people may not be compelled to sell against their wills.' That this was as well for defensive as offensive war, and that this was not 'introducivum novæ legis,' but was so at common law, is, by your lordship's favour, clear. Pat. 29 Ed. 1, M. 16, 19, 'ad reprimendam malitiam Scotorum,' and to repel them, Commissions to most counties to provide Victuals; and because they refuse to do it, the king then offers them security. Br. Trin. 8 Ed. 2, Rot.

99. Victuals bought 'juxta forum patrie pro munitione Marchiarum Scotiarum,' and there payment upon suit adjudged. Sometimes at Newcastle, sometimes at Carlisle, sometimes at Berwick, as the war required, were Store-Houses, where the Victuals were laid, and clerks of the stores to issue them out. That the king not only paid for the Victuals, but for the houses where they were laid, appears. Br. Trin. Ed. 3, about the end of the Roll, dors. the burgesses of Newcastle complain in parliament, that their houses had been taken up long time for the keeping of those Victuals; this was transmitted into the Exchequer by writ, which says, 'Volumus hiis pro domibus suis predictis sic occupatis, satisfacere, prout debet et prout justum fuerit, et prout temporibus progenitor nostrorum fieri consuevit.'

My lords, in the next place for the Defence. When those that served with horse 'ad vadia regis,' lost their horses in the service, the owners did not bear the loss, but they were always paid for by the king; and therefore when they were first entered into the service, the marshal, or else the wardens of the Marches, who had the command of them, did set down in a roll the horse of each man, and the mark and price of each horse, to the intent that the owner by this certificate might be assured of the full value to be paid him, in case the horse was lost. This appears Claas. 34 Ed. 1, M. 16, where the 'custodes Marchiarum Scotiarum,' assigned 'pro defensione Marchiarum,' were to do it. Br. irrot. in the 26 Ed. 1, Rot. 105, 106, the Scots having entered the realm, divers 'homicidia, incendia et alia facinora perpetrantes,' there the horses ad vadia, for Defence were to be appraised. 2 Pars Pat. 10 Ed. 2, the same; and the Scottish Roll of the 21 Ed. 3, M. 7, the same, prout jus est. That thereupon, since, the subject hath recovered of the king, are many cases. I will instance but in two or three. In 24 Ed. 1, Rot. 16, dors. Robert Heibam recovered 20 marks in the Exchequer, 'pro equo perditio in conflictu Dover inter homines regis et inimicos Franciarum;' at which time the French had assaulted Dover, and burnt the priory and a great part of the town. Br. Hil. 17 Ed. 2, 'pro restauratione trium eorum perditio at Carlisle. 9 Ed. 2, Com. P. 9 Ed. 2. Richard Waldegrave recovered for horses lost at Carlisle. Com. Hil. 2 Ed. 3, for wages 'pro restaurations eorum perditio' and burying of the dead when the Scots had entered the realm at Stanope-Park, for one troop 58,000*l.* allowed, 'habita inde deliberatione,' and adjudged.

For Castles, the ancient Forts and Bulwarks for Defence, the statute 14 Ed. 3, c. 13, says, That merchants without any commission or power from the king shall victual them, so that the people shall not be compelled to sell against their will. That this statute in this particular is not 'introdactivum novae legis,' is cleared by the Case Trin. 16 Ed. 1, Rot. 93. Wilts, in a little Roll, and in a great Roll of the same year, Rot. 19, when in Trin. by John Evesborne against John Flavell, 'Quia biada et garbas suas cepit,' the Defendant says, he was Constable of the king's Castle of the Devises, and that he had 'in praecipis Domini Regis, quod mur' faceret' to the castle 'de morturo stauro vel de biadiis;' and of these things, and that by virtue of this writ, he took an inquest to know where he might have best these provisions, 'ad minus nocumentum patriae;' and the jury found it, that the Defendant might take it 'ad minus nocumentum patriae;' of the Plaintiff; and that he came to the Plaintiff's house, and offered to buy 'pro denariis et ad usum regis;' and that because the Plaintiff refused to sell, they departed from his house; the issue joined, and found against the Defendant; 100 marks damages given the Plaintiff, and adjudged. There were always antiently visores operationum, and they upon oath certified, that they saw the king's money expended, which was demanded in the Exchequer. And for Victuals, as they were bought with the king's money, so when they grew stale, or the danger was passed, they were sold again to the king's use.

My Lords, that even in the time of war, when the Frontier Towns and Castles were besieged, and the Borders invaded, that even then the king did bear the Charges, appears by the allowances in the Exchequer, Trin. 27 Ed. 1, Rot. 47, 'pro tuitione Newcastle contra Scotos, qui hostiliter Regnum in partibus illis invaserunt.' M. 31 Ed. 1, Rot. 2, the Scots besieged Carlisle, 26 Ed. 1, and allowance now de exitibus Castrum which was the king's. And in the 27 Ed. 1, 75, 10,000*l.* allowed pro ingra and Trin. 32 Ed. 1, Rot. 11, 12. Visus comput. 28 Ed. 1, Rot. 71. 'prout justum, quia Scoti contra regem hostiliter insurgunt,' therefore 'de thesauro Regis,' Berwick is fortified; et Rot. 78, dors. it appears that the sheriff of Yorkshire had carried 10,000*l.* 'de thesauro Regis' to those parts. Br. M. 17 Ed. 2, 'propter frequentes egressus Scotorum in regno,' the Castle of Sandall at the king's charge is fortified prout justum, and allowance given. And Brevia Hil. that year the castle of Horney for the same cause was fortified, the Scots having entered 'circa praedictum Castrum' et apud Lancaster.' 3 et 4 Phil. et Mar. Dyer. 162. b. One in execution for debt in the Fleet, who, as the Book saith, was a man very necessary for the war; and it was moved by the king's attorney, 'per mandatum concilii,' if the prisoner might be licensed with a keeper by the queen to go to Berwick for the defence of it, or no; and it was held by all the Judges of the King's-Bench and Common Pleas, that the license was not good; and 4 et 5 the same Case cited accordingly to have been the opinion of all the Judges.

My Lords, for Prisoners taken in defensive Wars, and likewise for pledges and hostages for securing the peace, that the charge and maintenance, and the carrying them to the several places of their abode, have been always borne by the kings of this realm, the allowance thereof in the Exchequer are so frequent, that I intend to cite none of them, save that for the prisoners taken in the conflict at Dover before spoken of, which is Comm' 4 Ed. 2, Rot. 22. dors. neither do I find it at any time stood upon, save only 8 Ed. 2, among the Br. Trin. 8 Ed. 2. Rot. 88, dors. But the reason is, because that after the death of Ed. 1, in the commission of granting the Constableness of the Castle, no mention was made of the prisoners; and yet even in that Case, upon a Monstravit Regi, a writ of Privy Seal is awarded for allowance prout justum.

My Lords, in all these particulars of Soldiers, Victuals, Castles and Forts, Horses, Prisoners and Pledges in case of a defensive war, the main supports of them, the kings could not tax their subjects, but have borne the charge thereof themselves; I shall then offer it to your lordships to be so for the defence in general.

My Lords, the Allowances in the Exchequer in all the particulars before-mentioned are frequent. In the Case of Mines, the profits of silver mines, that they upon an account in the Exchequer were always answered unto the king, was one of the principal arguments for the king's right thereunto; and there fo. 320, it is held, That in all things that concern the Revenue of the crown, because they are there debated, the Record of the Exchequer shews not only the course of the court, but what the law is through the kingdom.

My Lords, that in cases of War and Embassies the Chequer made Allowances, and with what great consideration, appears by the statute 5 Rich. 2, c. 10, that they were not allowed by the court, till the party brought the great seal, or the privy seal for it. And if a Writ of Allowance came to the Exchequer before the court had examined the account, yet they never made Allowance until the court had examined it. Hill. 25 Ed. 1, Rot. 22. 'Licet breve de allocatione pendit de 1,000l. allocandis tamen ante allocationem factam oportet inquirend' si pecunia illa ad opus Regis devenit et quod ipsi doceant super hoc Curiam Regis.' And Trin. 25 Ed. 1, Rot. 47, the Allowances are never in gross, but by particulars.

My Lords, the next proof that I shall humbly offer unto your lordships, is in that of borrowing of Money by the king for the Defence of the realm; which as they have usually done it, so it is as clear, that not only upon Petitions, their own pleasure, and upon grace, but likewise upon suit they have been adjudged so to do in the ordinary courts of justice. Comm' Pasch. 31 Rot. 41, 149l. borrowed of Henry Thompson, 'pro defensione totius Regni,' was sued for, and repayment ordered. M. 10 Ed. 2, Rot. 160. 'Grandes pecunie summe' borrowed by the king for that purpose, and order for repayment. Br. 3 Ed. 2, Comm' Princip. Rot. 604l. My lords, in this particular I shall cite but this one case more, Comm' Pasch. 29 Ed. 1, Rot. 18. the king 'pro urgentissimis regni negotiis et defensione totius regni,' had seized divers sums of money in all the Abbies and Cathedrals, and other religious houses in the realm; 'et quo citius commode poterit' promised payment. In the parliament 29 Ed. 1, at Lincoln the king is petitioned for repayment of these monies, who promiseth repayment 'Ita quod regis conscientia super hoc exoneret,' and there, and Rot. 19. divers sums are adjudged to be paid.

My Lords, I shall thus humbly offer this unto your lordships, that if the king had conceived, that when himself wanted money for the defence, that he might have charged his subjects, he would never have made this answer of Repayment, 'ad exonerandum conscientiam' for then in equity and conscience the parliament should have taken care for the satisfaction of these debts, or should at leastwise have distributed part of the charge upon all his subjects; neither should the parties have had full satisfaction for all their debts, but should have borne part themselves. By the statute 35 Hen. 8, c. 12. the king for the Defence of the realm had divers great loans made to him. Now likewise there being great cause of new defence against France in Scotland in aid of the king, they release these Assurances given by the king, and likewise release to the king all suits and petitions concerning these moneys.

My Lords, I am now come to the other authorities for proof thereof, which is by acts of parliament. My Lords, before I come to the acts of parliament themselves, I shall humbly offer unto your lordships the Summons and Preparatives to them.

First, The 'ardua regni negotia' for which they are called, are principally 'defensionem concernentia;' that these are not the way and manner of Defence, and their advice therein, but the Supplies and Aids for this Defence, I have presented clear Proofs to your lordships before. That these Aids cannot be raised without their consents, is strongly inferred in this, that the knights of the shires are to have 'plenam et sufficientem autoritatem pro se et comitate comitatus præd' ad faciend' et consentiend'' to the things in 'negotiis ante dictis.' If this might be done without consent of the commons, this in the writ would be needless. But that this cannot be done without their consents, is cleared by the words following in the negative, 'Ita quod pro defectu potestatis hujusmodi dicta negotia infecta non remaneant quovismod.' This, my lords, is the constant form of modern, and all the antient Writs, and shews clearly that the commons without their consents in parliament, are not chargeable to a defensive war.

In the acts of parliament, I will begin with that of William the Conqueror, anno 4 of his reign; which besides that it is cited in the preface of the 8th Report, and Insit. fol. 75, and by Ingulphus fo. 519, and Mr. Selden in his Eadmerus, page 171, it is likewise upon Record, and enrolled in the Red Book in the Exchequer. The words are these, 'Volumus et

' firmiter præcipimus et concedimus quod omnes liberi homines totius monarchie regni nostri anglie, habeant et teneant terras suas et possessiones suas bene et in pace libere ab omni exactione in justa et ab omni tallagio. Ita quod nihil ab eis exigatur vel capiatur nisi servitium suum liberum quod de jure nobis facere debent et facere tenent' et concessum jure hæreditario in perpetuum per commune concilium totius regni nostri præd'.

My Lords, the words by reason of the disjunctive 'et ab omni tallagio' are plain, that the king shall not exact, nor take any thing of any freeman, but what his Tenure binds him unto. As in words, by reason of the generality of them, it extends to cases of the defence of the realm; that it doth so in intent, I shall endeavour thus to present it to your lordships.

The Military Services before mentioned for the Defence of the realm, they are by Bracton attributed to the Conqueror's Institution; for in his second Book fo. 36, speaking of them, he saith, 'Secundum quod in Conquesta fuit ad inventum.' Plowden, in the Argument of sir Thomas Tresham's Case, means, the Conqueror had to do it by reason of the many Attainers of those that took part with Harold, and after his death with Edgar Atheling. That he did it in a great part, appears by Matth. Paris fo. 8, that he put all the clergy that before held in Franke Almoigne sub servitute Militari to do service tempore hostilitatis, and by the county palatine of Durham and Chester in those places of danger. In the Book of Knights Fees in Hen. 2d's time, it appears by the Certificate, they had sometimes 'de veteri Feoffament' and sometimes 'de novo.' And by some of them it appears, that the tenures 'de novo Feoffament' were before king Stephen's time, and therefore it is probable that the Veteri might be those created by the Conqueror. The Provision for Soldiers pay by tenures was likewise of his Institution, as appears by that before cited out of the Black Book, lib. 1, cap. 37, that 'in primitivo regni statu post conquestum ad stipendia et donat' militum' out of the castles and other lands 'in quibus agricultura non exercebatur pecunia numerata successabat.' The policy and provision of the Conqueror for the Defence being by Tenures, when in this act of parliament he says, 'quod nihil ab iis exigatur vel capiatur, nisi servitium suum quod de jure nobis facere tenent,' I humbly conceive shews plainly, that the subject was not otherwise to be charged for the Defence, nor further than by their tenure. This, my lords, further appears by other parts of that act of parliament, where speaking of any thing of Charge that is to be done according to their tenures, as that all 'bene se tenant in equis et armis ad servitium suum integrum faciend'.' But in the next place speaking of the Defence it saith, that all within the realm 'sunt fratres conjurati pro viribus et facultatibus' to defend the kingdom and the peace, 'et ad iudicium rectum, et justitiam faciend'; the coupling of the Defence with that of the peace, and doing justice, shews the personal care that all by their oath of allegiance ought to bear to the common peace and good of the realm.

The next Statute that I shall present to your lordships, is that of Running Mead, 17 Johannis regis; the words are these, 'Nullum scutagium vel auxilium pona in regno nostro nisi per commune consilium regni nostri nisi ad corpus nostrum redimend', and to knight his eldest son, and to marry his eldest daughter. As in words these extend to the Defence; because all Supplies for that purpose from the subject, they are only in auxilium, or in subocatione expensor of the king, who as before is provided, is principally bound thereunto: so may the intent likewise be further gathered, first from this, that the word auxilium is joined with that of Scutage, which is for the Defence; and likewise from this, that particular satisfaction is made, by other parts of that statute, to those that had been disseised by R. 2, and king John, which were things done only for the increase of their revenue, without shew of the common defence. That both before 9 Hen. 3, and afterwards 20 Ed. 1, this was a Statute, and so accounted, I have before proved. And in the book 5 Hen. 3, it is called by the name of 'Magna Charta sans addition.' So 37 Hen. 3, in that solemn confirmation observed by Math. Paris, p. 115, this of Running Mead is confirmed by the name of Mag. Char. and 50 Hen. 3, p. 1220, which I note only to this purpose; that of speaking of Mag' Chart', this of Running Mead is intended as well as that of 9 Hen. 3, as part thereof, and bodied both together; yet that neither of them were observed either in king John's, or Hen. 3's time, our histories are full of it. And by the pope's bulls of 12 and 13 Hen. 3, the pope absolving the king from his oath in their confirmation, doth it because, as the words of the bulls are, 'Juramentum peccati vinculum esse non debet' neither till after 29 Edw. 1, as I shall hereafter prove, were they at all observed in the things concerning the king's prerogative.

The next that I shall cite, are the statutes of 25 Edw. 1, and the statute 'De Tallagio non concedendo.' That of the 25 Edw. 1, c. 5 & 6, the grievance is for aids, tasks and prizes taken through the realm, for the wars, shall not be brought into any custom for any thing before done, be it by roll or any other precedent that may be found; and further grants, that for no business from henceforth, he will take any such aids, tasks and prizes, but by common consent in the parliament of the realm, and for the common profit, saving the ancient aids and prizes due and accustomed. My lords, though by the copulative it is clear enough, that there must be a consent and common profit concurring, and although the saving of the ancient prizes and aids accustomed might well enough have been satisfied in the aid excepted in Running Mead, and the pricing of wines and purveyance; yet to out these and all other scruples, the statute 'De Tallagio,' &c. made afterwards for that purpose, is absolute and general: That no talliage or aid shall be taken by the king, nor that any of his officers shall take any corn, leather, cattle, or any other goods without the consent of the party.

My lords, to bring these statutes to the thing in question, that these things cannot be done though for the defence, the times of the making of them, and the circumstances concurring thereunto, I shall present unto your lordships.

That of the 25th of Edw. 1, by the date appears, was the 10th of Oct. 25 Edw. 1. My lords, the king, the 12th of Aug. before being at Odimere ready to go over into Flanders, the parliament being then summoned by his letters patents, Rot. Pat. 25 Edw. 1, m. 7, taking notice of the constables and marshals departure from the court in displeasure, and of the rumours of the people, that the king refused to seal articles sent him for the common profit, for the redress of divers grievances done to the people. For the Grievances he saith, that without those things he could not have defended the realm, and yet saith, that he is sorry for it, and prayeth that this may be his excuse, as that he hath done those things, neither to buy lands nor tenements, nor castles, but to defend himself and the whole realm; and that if he returned again, he would have all know, that he had an intent to amend all those things, to the honour of God, and content of his people; that if he dies in this service, his heirs shall make amends. Hereby it appears, that the grievances that procured this statute, were for the defence of the realm; therefore from hence it follows, that the aid and taxes there mentioned were for the defence. So likewise that the exception of the antient aids extends not to those of the defence, that being the thing wholly complained of. This declaration of the king was the 12th of August; the September after the king being at Winchelsea, those articles are sent unto him, to which he deferred for the present to give his assent unto them, because his council was not there, and so sails over into Flanders. This statute of the 25th of Edw. 1, is past, the king beyond the sea, the 'Teste Edvardo filio nostro;' at his return, as appears by Walsingham, p. 42, the king is desired to confirm these articles, which in Walsingham, p. 40, are the same word for word as the statute 'De Tallagio,' which the king then deferred: 27 Edw. 1, they desire it again, which the king doth with a 'Salvo jure coronæ nostræ' 'in fine adjecto, quod cum audissent comites 'cum displacencia ad propria discesserunt,' saith the Author, 'sed revocatis ipsi ad quind' 'Pasch' omnia sunt concessa.'

That the Statute 'De Tallagio' was after that of 25 Edw. 1, is plain in this, by the king's going over into Flanders without assenting unto any articles, in Sept. and 10 Oct. following, as appears by that statute 25 Edw. 1, itself, it was made; and likewise by the statute 'De Tallagio' itself, the king's releasing all rancour to the earl marshal and constable who had most offended him, and first presented these articles to the king. My lords, I shall add this only, as I conceive it will not be proved, that this king either before or after the making of this statute, or any of his successors since, ever claimed this absolute power over their subjects, as to lay aids and talliaiges upon them for the supportation of their own private estates, abstracted from the common defence or good of the kingdom. This king at this time, we see by his own declaration, was far from it. This last Statute fully satisfied those that desired it; for as Walsingham saith, 'Ad eorum votum' 'absolute omnia sunt concessa.' If therefore it extends not to that of defence, I shall humbly offer it by what construction of it our ancestors judgments and discretions will be freed from a great deal of censure, that were so well contented with it.

My lords, Mag. Chart. being confirmed at the same time when the statute 25 Edw. 1, was made, and both that and the statute 'De Tallagio' being only articles upon Mag. Chart. they were all of them, as I conceive, intended in the subsequent, and so often confirmation of Magna Charta.

My lords, the next is the statute of 14 Ed. 3, c. 1, that the people shall not be compelled to make any Aid, or to sustain any charge but in parliament. That this cannot be done for the defence, will, as I conceive, be enforced from the words; for a great subsidy having been granted as well for the war on this side the sea, that is for defence, as for the French wars, it is declared, that this shall not be drawn into example, and that out of parliament they shall not be compelled to sustain any charge; and then it is further enacted, that this subsidy and all the profits of wardships, escheats, and other profits of the realm, shall be spent for defence and safeguard of the realm, and the wars in Scotland and France, and not elsewhere; so that this statute, as I conceive, all put together, bears this sense, That the subsidies granted in parliament, and the wardships being a fruit of the tenures created for the defence of the realm, and other profits arising to the king by way of prerogative, are to be spent for the defence of the realm, and the king's other wars; but that no aid or charge for any of these can be laid upon the commons without consent in parliament. My lords, that the practice of the king, I mean Edw. 3, was contrary to these statutes, and that they were not kept, appears by the Parliament Roll, 15 Edw. 3, m. 9, the next year after, where the commons shew that their goods were seized, and their bodies imprisoned without any suit commenced against them.

My lords, the next which I shall cite are the statutes of 25 Edw. 3, and 1 Rich. 3, against Loans and Benevolences, which I shall humbly offer unto your lordships on this ground, 'Ad ea' 'quæ frequentius acciderint adparantar leges.' As for my part, I have seen general loans and benevolences, but they were for the defence; so I conceive, if they were otherwise, they were but few in respect of the others. The commons grievances therefore being by loans and benevolences of that nature, these statutes, I conceive, were made against them; for these not being within the words of any of the former statutes, that therefore the kings might with the more colour put them in practice, and on the other side being as equally dangerous to the subjects, because of the displeasure by denial, they procured the statutes. That Loans for the Defence were after 25 Edw. 3, counted unlawful, appears by Walsingham, p. 179, that 44 Edw. 3, the king 'Sinistro consilio magnas summas pecunias' of all sorts 'petiit, asserens, 'quod in defensionem ecclesie et regni illas expenderet,' but that the people would not lend.

My lords, the next which I shall cite is direct in words, which though it be not an act of parliament, yet the weight of the authority by putting of it will appear. In the second part of the Parliament Roll, 2 Rd. 2, m. 3, 4, 5, the king being beset with the enemies of France and Spain, and Scotland, who all three by land and sea invaded the realm; the privy-council not willing, in a thing so much concerning the realm, to take the whole charge of it upon themselves, nor desiring so soon to call a parliament, a parliament but a little before being dissolved; they therefore resolved to assemble a great council of most of the bishops, lords and other great men and sages of the realm, who meeting and finding the absolute necessity of a preparation for defence, and that the king wanted money to do it; what their full and final resolution in this case of extremity for defence was, I shall read the words of the Roll; they say, 'Pur conclusion final quilz ne poient cest mischiefe remedier sans charger les comm' del royaume, quel charge ne poient de fait ne grant sans parliament;' and therefore the necessity being urgent, the great men lend money for the present, with advice presently to call a parliament, as well to provide for the repayment of this Loan, as for further Supply. It is true, my lords, that this king was at this time within age, and it is likely that many of his council had been Edw. 3, his grandfather's privy-council, who well knew his prerogative, and extended it as far, by reason of his great wars, to the charging of his subjects, as any before him, or since his time. And that not only the privy-council, but likewise, as the record saith, almost all the prelates and others, dukes, earls, barons, bannerets, and other sages of the realm, which I conceive were the judges, should be so far from putting this in execution, that they declare in the negative upon full deliberation, that the commons cannot be charged herein but in parliament, themselves likewise thereby being to undergo a present charge, by lending to supply that necessity; the authority must needs be weighty: and upon second thoughts afterwards, the same was declared in full parliament by the Lord Chancellor, and so afterwards entered upon the Roll without any qualification at all, which adds farther to the authority thereof.

Ult. Feb. 3 Car. A commission issued to divers great lords; the end, as appears by the words, was for aiding the king's allies beyond sea, and for the defence and safety of the kingdom and people. They were, by the commission, to raise money by imposition or otherwise, which without extreme danger to the king, kingdom, and people, can admit no long delay, wherein form and circumstances are to be dispensed with rather than the substance lost. This, my lords, was a commission to tax the subjects in time of necessity for Defence. The last parliament, this commission as against the law was condemned by both houses, and cancelled in his majesty's presence.

Philip Comines in his 5th book, cap. 8, observing the same, above all other commends the policy of the English laws and government; and both he and Bodinus Reipublic. lib. 6, c. 11, and Pasquierus Advocate-General in the king of France his Chamber of Accounts in his second Book, c. 6 and 7, all shew this likewise to be the ancient law of France; and how the practice comes now to be otherwise, there, Pasquierus shews at large; and that the kings sometimes endeavouring to the contrary, found so much difficulty, that they afterwards, especially Charles the 5th, procured by the consent of the three estates these aids for defence to be granted for 3 or 4 years together: And that this consent of the people at the first, was afterwards that which gave the occasion to the king to take it without consent; and therefore he concludes, that France being 'Un Royaume de Consequence,' that they must not easily promise any thing, though but once; which they will not be willing to permit for ever.

My lords, I have now done with the Proof; in the next place I shall endeavour an Answer to some few Objections that are obvious, both from Reason and Authorities.

For those of Authorities, 13 Hen. 4, 14, 16, Gascoigne's Opinion that the king may charge his people without parliament, to a thing that is for the common profit of the people; the thing that he applies it to, is, that the king may grant Pontage and Murage, &c. My lords, that the king may grant both these, and Tolls upon erection of a new fair or market, or passage, I shall not deny. The Answer that I shall give to them is, first, That these Grants do charge venalia only, that is, goods carried to those places for merchandise; but that any tax may be laid 'secundum statum et facultates,' either upon the Hundred or County, I shall humbly deny it.

It is true, my lords, by the Conqueror's laws it appears, that cities and walled towns were for the Defence of the country, and therefore by those laws no Fair or Market might be kept but in 'civitate aut burgo muro walliat.' Therefore in Doomsday-Book in all such Cases it is found, that there are so many 'mansiones murales,' which by their tenure when need was, were bound 'ad murum reficiend.' That no other land that holds not by that service is liable, appears by the Parliament Roll. 1 Ric.

2, pars 2, m. 76, where all the cities and boroughs of England petition, that in this time of danger they not being able with their merchandise to do it, that others that had lands within the towns might be made contributaries, who before were at no part of the charge.

The Answer is, that all according to their Tenure, as they have antiently done, so shall they still; and if this might be done, there would have been no need of the statutes of 2 & 3 Phil. et Mar. c. 1, 23 Eliz. c. 4, for giving power to tax men 'secundum statum et facultates,' to repair Castles and Towns within 20 miles of Scotland.

For the Tolls and Pontages and Paveages, as there is a great deal of equity that those which receive benefit by bringing their goods to the market, and over the bridge, should contribute to the charges that make and maintain the market-places and the bridges; so neither are they compulsory, but voluntary charges: For as no man pays but he that receives the benefit, so none is compellable thereunto, but is left to his liberty. Neither is there any colour in respect of the town itself to whom the murage or paveage is granted, why they should not be charged, because the grant cannot be but at their own suits; for if it be not at the suit of tot burgensium, the Grant is void, and to be revoked.

It may be further objected, that as the law hath entrusted the way and manner of managing of Defence wholly and independently to his majesty, so likewise of Aids and Means, as the 'Causa sine qua non;' and therefore his majesty should not be dependent upon the parliament for them.

My lords, the near relation between his majesty and the parliament, that they are but one body, hath been presented unto your lordships, and that his majesty did exercise the summum imperium there. Bodin. lib. 1, cap. ult. says, 'quod ejus' esset potestas' tributa nova imponere cujus est legem terræ;' but that the legislative is not in his majesty, out of parliament, will be granted.

The Subjects interest being as nearly concerned in the Defence, as his majesty's is; as there is no cause to fear that they should not be willing to proportion the aid to the occasion; so neither can the law presume otherwise, which hath so high an opinion of the judgment and integrity of this court, that as it is in the Comm' 398, it is unlawful for any man to conceive any dishonourable thing of it.

My lords, my last Answer thereunto is, that by the law the king hath as independent a power to make a foreign war, as to make a defensive. It will, as I conceive, be granted, that in this case his majesty hath not power to tax the Subject; for then it would follow, that as well as to the conquering of the next adjacent realm, so of all Europe, the subject should be at the charge, and yet the land conquered be only his majesty's; and yet upon this ground, in respect of the equality of the powers, it might be done.—Neither, as I humbly conceive, doth this only answer the objection, but returns upon the other side; for his majesty has power to make an offensive war, which for the most part causeth a defensive; by this means it should be in his majesty's power to make a defensive war, and to tax the subject for the maintenance of it.

My lords, the last Objection whereto I shall endeavour an Answer, stands thus: The parliament is a great body, and moves slowly; and that the case may be such, that the cause may be lost before the parliamentary supplies come. My lords, how means of effecting so sudden and so great a surprize can be so secretly carried, I shall not examine it in reason, but shall humbly offer unto it these Answers:

That the service whereby the law hath provided for the Defence both for land and sea, they have both the same limitation of time with the parliamentary Supplies in the summons of the tenants by knight's-service ad exercitum, and of the Cinque-Ports; forty days warning is to be given, as is for the parliament. And so it is probable, for that of Mould, 13 E. 1, it was for others that held by sea-service. And antiently the summons ad exercitum to the ports, and for the parliament, went out together, or much about the same time, that the parliament might assess the escuage; and in case the tenures and other revenues were not able to maintain the war, that the parliament might provide for further supplies, as appears Hil. 28 Ed. 1, M. 15, 31 Ed. 1, and 44 Ed. 1, M. 15, et 16, 'et oportet neminem legibus esse sapientiores.'

The Tonnage and Poundage, when first granted for life, was, that the kings might always have money ready upon such sudden occasions. In the Parliament Roll, 4 Ric. 2, M. 42, the commons desire payment of Edward the 3d's Debts, that they might be encouraged to lend the king in aid of the realm, if a sudden cause of necessity should fall out. The Answer is, that it shall be done selon le petition. My lords, by this it appears, that this objection was not then taken to be of weight, many of the loans are in 'Causa necessitatis in Articulo.' The authorities that further answer this objection are great, and full in the point.

The first is that of the Parliament Roll of 2 Ric. 2, before cited; the business of defence could not stay so long as for a parliamentary Supply, yet agreed, that the commons without a parliament could not be charged; and therefore the same men that gave the judgment presently lend money for that purpose.

In the Statute 31 Hen. 8, for Proclamations, the cause of making the Statute is expressed in these words: Considering that sudden causes and occasions fortune many times, which do require speedy remedies; and that by abiding for a parliament, in the mean time might happen great prejudice might ensue to the realm; therefore the king's proclamation is by that act made equivalent to an act of parliament, but with a full exception of their lands, goods and chattels: which as it shews that before that, by the common law, the king could not, in cases of exigency that could not stay for a parliament, take or seize their goods, so they were careful still to preserve their rights.

My lords, after the statute of 31 Hen. 8, the Maxim of Justinian was verified in Hen. 8, as of the Roman emperors after the Lex Regia, whereby the people transferred their suffrage to the emperor, 'Quod Principi placet legis vim habet;' so all that time was that other as true on the subjects part here, as there in the Digest, 'Lege omnia de Regalis: quod meum est non est universitatis, et quod nostrum est sine facto nostro ad alienos transferri non potest.' The 7 Prædict. of Spain, titul' 1. particular' 2. gives something more to the king, for he may take from the subject, 'pro necessitate, reipublicæ dato primum tali causa dictæ rei bonæ lumbia ejusd' vel majoris pretii honorum virorum arbitrio;' he may in this case take, giving a pawn to the subject for the assurance of a future full satisfaction. Lynne in his 6th book, c. 35, Bodin in his 6th book, fo. 655, affirms, That when Hannibal had put Italy and Rome itself into so great a hazard, and that there was not money left in the common treasury, that yet the senate without their consent could not charge the people, but that 'unusquisque' of the senate 'mutuo dabat aliquid in usum publicum.'

My Lords, the last authority for the answering of this Objection, and the clearing of the whole business, is the Commission of the Loan. 3 Car. pars 4, Pat. Roll, the words are these: 'The great and mighty preparations both by sea and land did daily threaten the kingdom; that the safety and subsistence of the king and people, and the common cause of Christendom, were in apparent danger of suffering irreparably; that the king's treasure is exhausted, and the coffers empty: That the business of Supply cannot endure so long delay as the calling of a parliament, and enquiring into all means just in cases of such unavoidable danger; the king is now resolved to borrow of the Subject, to enable his majesty for their safeties, and promiseth repayment.'

My Lords, the borrowing of Money only is the thing required, that is for Defence, the king had no money left; the exigency such, that it would not stay for a parliament. This Commission afterwards in the parliament 3 Car. was questioned, and upon debate adjudged by both the houses of parliament to be void in law; by the Petition of Right presented so to the king, his majesty denies it not.

My Lords, from this Objection of sudden Danger, I come to the next, which is the third thing before offered unto your lordships, which is an admittance, that the danger sometimes may be such, that the Subject's goods sometimes without their consent may be taken from them; for Property being both introduced and maintained by human laws, all things by the law of nature being common, there are the same some times, like the Philistines being upon Sampson, wherein these words are too weak to hold us, 'Necessitas enim' (as Cicero saith) 'magnum humana imbecillitatis patrocinium omnem legem frangit;' at such times all property ceaseth, and all things are again resolved into the common principles of nature. These times, as sometimes they are only instanti, and concern but some few, as in cases of killing one other men's Lands, or with their Goods upon sudden assaults; so sometimes they are longer in continuance, and larger in extent, and concern the whole kingdom, as it is in times of war, 'Quando agitur pro aris et focus flagrant' 'Bello.' And as on the particulars before mentioned, which are but for a short time, and that concern some few only, the law hath no power for that time, nor maintains any property, so in the other case it loseth this power for a longer time, and over all. A dissent upon Disseisin in time of war, takes not away the entry of the Disseisee. Littl. Sec. 412, no plea after the six months bars the patron of his 'Quare impedit' upon a presentation in time of war. 43 Ed. 3, 'Quare impedit' 185, Na. Br. 31. And in a Writ of Right, where the seisin makes the title, the taking of explecs must be alledged to be done tempore pacis, the law allowing no estate in such times, but calls it an occupation in time of war. Littl. fo. 12. And as 'inter arma leges silent,' so that of Bract. lib. 3, fo. 240, that 'tempus guerraes tempus injuriæ,' is likewise true; for after the war is ended, the law, as not having cognizance of things then done, gives no remedy for wrongs in that time sustained, as the Case is adjudged in the roll of Kent. 7 Ed. 1. 'inter placita de querelis,' one Parleton 'de Petro Randal quod ipse die Mercurii ante festum Sti' Thomæ, 46 Hen. 3, came to the town of Cleve, and took of the Plaintiff's goods three oxen, four cows, and three heifers, and yet detains them; the Defendant alledgeth the pardon of Henry 3, of 'Omnes transgressiones fact' ratione turbationis tuac in regno existent,' and that it was 'tempus guerraes' when the goods were taken; the Plaintiff replies, that the king pardons only offences done to himself, 'et non transgressiones aliis illatas;' the Defendant rejoins, that 'tempus illud' was 'tempus guerraes,' et non 'tempus pacis,' and upon this the issue was joined; the Jury finds that when the Defendant took the goods, 'fuit tempus belli,' et non 'tempus pacis,' and therefore it was adjudged for the Defendant. 'Tempus belli,' when Property ceaseth, is not upon every intestine or defensive war, but only at such times when the course of justice is stopped, and the courts of justice shut up; and this is 'tempus belli' in the Institutes, Sec. 412, 39 Ed. 3, Banc. Regis Rot. 49, the Attainder of Treason of Thomas earl of Leicester reversed, error assigned, 'Quia tempora pacis maxime cum per totum tempus præd' cancellar' et al' curiæ Dom' Regis apertæ fuerunt, et in quibus jus cuiusque; habet prout fieri consuevit, nec prædictus dominus rex in tempore illorum curiis explicatis quib' tavit.' That there was a great army, but on both sides in this business when the earl was taken at Barrowe-bridge, our Histories are full; but yet it was not that 'tempus guerræ' intended by the law, because the courts of justice were open, and the king with banners displayed was not in person in the field.

My Lords, in these times of war I shall admit not only his majesty, but likewise every man that hath power in his hands, may take the Goods of any within the realm, pull down their houses, or burn their corn, to cut off victuals from the enemy, and do all other things that conduce to the safety of the kingdom, without respect had to any man's property. 12 Hen. 8, 4 Br. trans. 406, 8 Ed. 4, 23, that in such times a Subject may make a bulwark in other men's lands, and that the laws already established are silent in such times. And although in that foreseen and lingering War of Hannibal's, whereof I have before spoken, the Senate could not charge the people, yet when there was a 'Tumulitus Gallicus,' that is, when the Cisalpani their neighbours, on the sudden, as sometimes they did, assaulted the city; by the same Author the case was otherwise.

My Lords, besides this sudden and tumultuous war, which shuts the Courts of Justice, and brings his majesty in person into the field, and wherein Property ceaseth; the law takes notice likewise of other times of war, as when his majesty upon just cause known unto himself by proclamation proclaimeth war against any foreign state, and likewise the law taketh notice of the effects thereof; that is, that no subject of such prince or state is capable to prosecute any suit in any his majesty's courts; and likewise, that then it is lawful for any his majesty's subjects to seize and keep to their own use, the goods of the subjects of any such prince or state, as in the books are adjudged: 7 Ed. 4, 13, 13 Hen. 8, Br. Property, 38, 22 Ed. 3, 16. My Lords, it appears not by any thing in this Writ, that any war at all was proclaimed against any prince or state, or that if any of his majesty's Subjects had taken away the Goods of any prince's subjects in Christendom, but that the party might have recovered them before your lordships in any of his majesty's courts. So that the case in the first place is, Whether in time of peace his majesty may, without consent in parliament, alter the property of the subjects goods for the defence of the realm. The time that will serve the turn for the bringing in of the supplies and means of the defence, as to your lordships appears judicially by the writ, that is seven months within four days. For the writ went out Aug. 4, and commands the ship to be at Portsmouth, the place of rendezvous, the first of March following; and thereby it appears, that the necessity in respect of time was not such, but that a parliament might in that time have been called for the effecting of the supply.

Yet in the next place it is averred, that 'Salus regni periclitabatur,' and that was the cause of issuing forth the Writ; and this by the Demurrer if it should be confessed, yet this is but in general; how or in what manner 'periclitabatur non constat.' By the law the Defendant may have a protection when he is in Negotiis Regni; but when he will make use of it, it is not allowable in that generality, but he must shew in particular, in what town or castle, or other particular service he is in, that so the court may judge whether the cause be sufficient, yea or no; and yet that is his majesty's writ too, as well as that in question. The Books for it are 36 Hen. 6, 28, 39 Hen. 6, 1.

Yet in the next place, if your lordships shall give any heed to this General, as to the particular of Pirates infesting the coasts, and preparations further 'ad regnum gravand' mentioned in the writ, the Case then, as I conceive, is this.

In a time of peace, his majesty's vigilancy foresees a Danger likely to ensue; the Supplies for prevention of this danger will serve, if brought in seven months after within four days; yet whether in this their case without consents in parliament, his majesty may alter the property of the subjects goods?

The Second Days ARGUMENT of Mr. ST. JOHN.

My Lords, having done with the Defence in general, I shall now endeavour to prove, that this of the Sea hath no such peculiarity in it, but that it will fall within that of the Defence in general: wherein, in the first place, I will endeavour an Answer to some Objections both from Authority and Reason, that may seem to prove a Right: and secondly, to some Precedents concerning the Use and Practice.

Of the first rank, I shall begin with Denegelt. It may be said, that the Danes infesting the realm, that Ethelred, for the resisting of them first by his own authority, laid this upon the subject, and made it an annual charge. That after the Conquest they seldom infesting the coasts, the Conqueror took it not annually as at first, but at such times only as it is in the Black Book, lib. 1, cap. 11, when 'ab exteris gentibus bella vel opinioniones herrorum fuerunt.' And that after Henry the 2nd's time, the kingdom being altogether freed from the Danish invasions; although Danegelt lost the name and use, it never after his time being taken by hides of land as before; yet the succeeding kings, by the same authority, did lay taxes upon the Subjects for Defence of the Sea.

My Lords, for Answer hereunto, I shall in the first place observe this only by the way, that the best and certainest Authorities agree not what it was, I mean the Laws of Edward the Confessor, cap. 11, and the Black Book. For the Confessor's laws say, it was one shilling upon every hide of land, and the Black Book two shillings; by which it should seem it was little in use in Henry the 2nd's time, nor much known. That 11 cap. in the Confessor's Laws, where this is mentioned, was no part of the antient laws themselves, but something afterwards added, appears by the words themselves. First, it speaks of the Freedom which the Church, in the first institution of it, had; Freedom, we know, was not lost till after the Conquest; and likewise of the granting of it by William Rufus in parliament: and therefore it should seem to be inserted in those Laws afterwards out of the laws of Henry the 2nd; for this 11 cap. and that of Danegelt in Henry the 2nd's laws, are the same, de verbo in verbum, as appears in Hoveden fo. 344.

But admitting the thing, I shall endeavour Answers to each part of the Objection: as first, that the Danegelt was granted in parliament. Mr. Caubden's Brit. p. 142, observes, that the Danes first infested the coasts A. D. 800, and, as his words are, With such hurliburlies, as the like was never heard of: havoc was made of all, razing of cities, and burning of churches; and for their continual piracy, they had got the nick-name of Neccugii, that is, Pirates. The Danegelt first began in Ethelred's time, almost 200 years after the Danes first invasion, for he began his reign A. D. 978. That Provision was made for Sea-Defence in the interim, and before Ethelred's time, appears by the many Sea-Fights of Alfred and other kings. That this provision was usually in parliament, is probable from that of Ingulphus, Londona priat. fol. 488, where A. D. 833, which was 39 years after the Danes first Invasion, a Deed to the abbot of Crowland is dated thus, 'Coram Pontificibus Proceribus et Majoribus totius Angliæ in civitate London, ubi omnes congregati sumus pro consilio capiendo contra Danicos piratas littora Angliæ assidue infestantes.' If king Ethelred, by his own authority, might have imposed this, it is like some of his predecessors, the Case so necessarily requiring it, in almost 200 years space, would have done it before this time. That this of Danegelt was done in parliament, the words carry as much; for the words of the law are, 'Danegeldi redditio primitus statuta fuit,' a word most proper for the parliamentary authority. But fully by the laws of that king, Lætan Ethelred's laws, in Mr. Lambert's Saxon Laws, fo. 58, there 'ex sapient' suorum consilio,' peace is made with the Danes, and a certain sum of money granted to the army, as our Historians observe. The Danes, by composition, were to send away the whole Fleet, saving 45 ships, which were to remain to defend the kingdom against other enemies, and the king was to maintain them at his charge. That the Danegelt was paid to the Danes for this Defence, many of our Historians observe. My lords, that at the same parliament this was provided for, appears by the words of the law, 'Si quis igitur posthac navalis aspirat' in Angliæ prædam fecerit, hic nobis auxilium ferat ex ærcitus nosq; ei quamdiu in fide manserit quæ ad comitat' suppetens paramus omnia.' That this was a parliament, as the words shew it, so it is held in the Preface to the 9th Report, and Huntington fo. 205. If this was not the Danegelt, yet this is clear, that in that king's time then provision 'contra Navales apparatus' was made by parliament. 'Primum sta-tuærant Angl' infausto consilio quod ipsi Danis censum persolverent; regibus namq; nostris modo per servitia ex consuetudine quod Danis persolvebatur ex ineffabili terrore.' That Danegelt which after the Conquest was paid to the king, we see by that author, 'Primum statuerunt Angl'; statutum Angl' must needs be by parliament. If the Danegelt in such time of great danger was not imposed without parliament, it must strongly make against those that shall object it.

The Danes having quitted the realm, that the Danegelt was released by Edward the Confessor, as Ingulphus fo. 590, and Hoveden 253, and all our later historians. That of Ingulphus, my lords, alone, is without exceptions, who lived in those times; he was brought up in England in the Confessor's days, and therefore knew what he wrote; he afterwards went over into Normandy, and was the Conqueror's Secretary, came over with him to the Conquest, and at his own charge maintained twelve horses: he was so great at the court, that, as himself writes, fo. 514, 'quos voluit humiliavit, quos voluit exaltavit;' and pag. 518, a Charter of the Conqueror's to the Abbey of Crowland was made, 'ad petitionem Familiaris mei Ingulphi;' and therefore, in all likelihood, would not report this partially against the king.

My Lords, that we are not to put out our fires upon ringing of the Cur Feu Bell, we have no other law for it but disuse; and the testimony of Historians, that Henry 1 released it.

For that of the Black Book, that William the Conqueror retained it, 'Quando bella vel opinioniones bellorum fuerint,' as that Book is mistaken in the thing, saying it was 2s. every hide of land, being in truth but one; so it is possible he might mistake in the other too. That it was released in æternum is apparent. That many things were done de facto, to the infringing of the Liberty of the Subjects both in his time, and the times of Hen. 1, and Hen. 4, too, it is clear by Historians; and if it were not released before, yet that king Stephen released it, is, Huntington fo. 221. Hoveden fo. 276. 'Hoc Deo voluit,' say these Historians, 'sed nihil horum tenuit;' and as all our Historians agree, that after Hen. 2's time, in whose reign the Black Book was compiled, it was never paid; so it may be collected out of the Red Book, for all or most of the Aids and Escages in Hen. 2's time, and king John's time, are there mentioned. In 8 Hen. 2, it is said, 'quod Danegeldum assessum fuit;' but after that, neither in his time, nor in the time of king John, or of any other king, is any more mention of it. Sir Henry Spelman, in his Glossary, saith, that when it was taken in the Conqueror's time, and since, it was 'Consultis magnatibus et Parliamentar' decemum authoritat' diminut' sunt.'

My Lords, in the last place, if the succeeding kings, mutato nomine only, have in lieu thereof laid other Taxes upon the Subjects, they must hold proportion with that of Danegelt; that is, that they have been equally set upon all the Inland Towns throughout the kingdom, as that was, and 12d. upon every hide of land; and likewise in time, and that there was no intermission, but that in Rich. 1.'s time, and king John's, which were active, that then it was put in execution. Claus. 15, Joh' M. 3, dors. & 7. and Mat. Paris, p. 312, 313. The Pope had granted the crown of England to the French king, who was ready to invade the realm; great provision of Shipping was made, 'ad illibationes Regis et ad stipendia Regis:' so far was this king, in this time of necessity, from imposing any aid upon the subjects for the defence of the sea, as that he himself bore the charge.

My Lords, the next Authority that I shall insist upon, is, that in the terms of the law, fo. 114, in the Title of Hidage, the taxing by hides was used much in old times, and that chiefly in king Ethelred's days; who in the year 1096, when the Danes landed at Sandwich in Kent, taxed all the realm by Hides, and every 910 hides of land should find a ship.

My Lords, my first Answer to this is, 1. That this was done when there was a formidable enemy, and which soon after conquered the kingdom, was upon the shore, as by the Book appears; and therefore it is likely that the courts of justice were shut, and that the king was then in person in the field. 2. This was but actus unicus, and even by the Common Law, that easily admits of customs, not good; it is actus binus that hath any colour 'introducendi consuetudinem.' 3. It appears not by any thing in the Book, but that this might be done by parliament; many of the antient acts of parliament are statuit Rex: and whereas the Book saith, Taxing by Hidage was much used in old time, that these were by parliament, appears both by the use and authority express in the point in print, Domesday-Book in Berks, 'Quando geldum debatur,' Matth. Paris 780, many Corneagia et Hidagia, recited in parliament, that had been formerly given to that king in parliament. Bract. in his second book, fol. 37, is express in the point, that they cannot be taken but by Grant in parliament; his words are these: 'Sunt quedam communes prestationes que servitia non dicuntur, nec de consuetudine veniunt nisi cum necessitas intervenerit, sicut sunt Hidagia et Corneagia de necessitate et consensu totius regni introducta.' Rot. Parl. 8 Hen. 3. M. 4.

My Lords, the next Authority I shall insist on in the Case of the abbot of Robertsbridge in Kent; which, because prima facie it seems to be to the point, I will put it at large. M. 25 Ed. 1. finient. l. Bnc. Rot. 77. The Abbot brought a replevin against Adam de Bredland and others, for taking his cattel; the Defendants avow in these words, 'Dicunt enim occasione turbationis inter regem, et regem Francie suborta, assignatus fuit Willielmus de Leighbourne ex parte regis ad custodiam marie faciend' ratione cujususdi faciend' terra et tenementa hominum ejusdi comitatus agitata fuerunt ad custod' faciend'.' And the Abbot was assessed, 23 Ed. 1, at 7s. the 23 Ed. 1, at 13s. and 24 Ed. 1, at 15s. 'ad prœd' 'custod, faciend'; and because he refused to pay, that the Defendants being collectors for the town, distrained the Abbot. The Abbot, in bar of the Aowry, says, that for his land he was assessed to find a horse and man in 'subsidiium custod' prœd'; and that he found his horse and man accordingly, 'ad eand' custodiam faciend'; and therefore demands judgment, 'si una et ead' occasione custod' prœd', he ought to find the horse, 'et nihilominus prœd' pecuniam solvere.' The Defendants maintain their Aowry, and say, that the abbot had divers other lands within the town, that he was assessed for them, for the money, and that he was not assessed for those for the man and horse; thereon issue is joined, and day given, without any more thereupon that I have seen.

My Lords, besides the Authority of it in point, these two things may be further objected from this Case: The county was agisted ad Custodiam maris, and likewise to find forces. My lords, for the last, I have before admitted, and by the Statute of Winchester that may be done, for the service was to be performed in Kent, the same county where the land lay.

My Lords, because this Case primæ facie hath some shew of authority in point, I shall endeavour a full and clear Answer unto it. By the Case itself it appears, that these Sesses were in time of war: the words are, 'occasione turbationis inter Regem et Regem Francie'; neither was the war with France only at that time, but likewise with Scotland and Wales, and all the effects of war accompanied it. The French had landed in divers parts of the realm, and in particular, 23 Ed. 1, in this county of Kent, and had burnt the priory, and the greatest part of Dover; the Havens were shut up for a great part of that time; the Goods both of the French and Scottish nation were seized through the whole kingdom; the lands of all priors aliens were seized, and those that were upon the maritime parts removed, and natives put into their houses, and all strangers whatsoever, that landed within the kingdom, to be arrested. All these, if any of them should be denied, will be made good, not only by our histories, but likewise by the public records of the kingdom. So that my first Answer is, that these sesses were in the time of an actual defensive war from the two next and greatest states unto the realm.

My second Answer is, that it appears not at all, by any thing in this case, that these Sesses were made by any authority from the king; for the words are only in the general, that the county was agisted, and that the Abbot himself was agisted, but says not by whom, or whose authority. That it was not by the king's authority, appears by Leighbourne's commission appointed 'ad custodiam prœd' faciend', as the words of the case are; for by his commission whereby he was to do this, which is Rot. 23 Ed. 1, M. 8, he was so far from having any power to tax the county hereunto, that he is commanded for victuals, arms, or other things that he shall need in this business, that he shall pay those from whom he shall have any such thing; which likewise is entered in the Communia, 23 Ed. 1, Rot. 77. My lords, that there were parliaments in every one of these years, appears by the summons, and those in words not usual; for the great fleet of France being mentioned, and that the French did intend 'Linguan Anglicanam omnino delere,' they were now called 'ad tractand' ordinand' 'et faciend' nobiscum,' and the lords, 'et aliis 'Incolis Regni qualiter sit hujusmodi periculis 'obviand', as it is in the Close Roll, 23 Ed. 1, M. 4, dors. and 24 Ed. 1, M. 7, dors.

My lords, that accordingly order was taken 'cum Incolis;' and that the gentry and other inhabitants, by way of by-law or agreement amongst themselves, did make provision in this particular, I shall endeavour to prove to your lordships: that it hath been done at other times, and that such by-laws are good, appears, 14 Ed. 2, Banc. Regis, Rot. 60. The Scots entering Durham, a by-law was made by the inhabitants for the raising of money, and one that refused it was adjudged to pay it: besides Leighborne, who was admiral of all the English fleet, there were Custodes maris in each maritime county; these, as appears by Communia, 24 Ed. 1, Rot. 78. dors. were chosen by the commonalty of each county; and that these, together with the sheriff and inhabitants, did make orders for those things, appears by the Communia, 23 Ed. 1, Rot. 79, where writs are directed to the sheriff of Kent, and to the sheriff of other maritime counties, commanding them that 'circa maris custod' visis præ-sentibus milites et potentiores liberos homines 'de balliva tua evoces, et cum ipsis provida 'circumspectione deliberes,' how he should do it. This, I conceive, is expressed in point, and the practice grounded upon that in parliament, 'ad ordinand' cum incolis.'

My Lords, my third answer to this Case is, that these sesses were for land-service only, and not for shipping. And this appears, First, by the case itself; for the abbot, in bar of the avowry, says, that he was sessed to find a man and horse 'in subsidium custod' præd,' which must be for land service; and therefore demands judgment, 'si una ead' occasione custod' 'pred,' he ought both to find the horse and to pay the sess. This is not denied by the defendants; but they say that the abbot had other lands, and that this sess was for those other lands; so that it is admitted that the sess for the horse, which must be for land-service, and that for which they avow, were both for the same use; all the difference is, whether the sess were upon the same land or no.

My lords, if the sess, for which the defendants avow, had been for shipping, they might have admitted all that the abbot had said, in bar of their avowry; that is notwithstanding he found arms for land-service, that yet he might, for the same land, have been sessed again to the finding of shipping. Neither do I doubt, but that the parties, in the action, now before your lordships, do find arms, and yet they are sessed for shipping; and that it will be stood upon by the other side, that the finding of arms for land-service excuseth not for shipping.

But it may be said that the very words are, that the sesses were 'pro custod' maris.' My lords, by divers records it appears expressly, that the custody of the maritime part of the land is called 'custod' maris.' Claus. 23. Ed. 1. M. 4, dors. A writ directed 'Collectoribus 'pecuniæ ad custodiam maris,' in this county of Kent, commanding them, that in respect that the Cinque Ports were at the charge of shipping, 'quod quieti sint de custod' maris faciend', which must needs lie at land. Communia 24 Ed. 1, Rot. 79. A writ to 'William Bonell, et sociis suis ad custodiam Maris 'in Com' Suff' assignatis,' and yet all that they are to do in that office is for defence at land. So Trin. 31 Ed. 1, M. 20. Communia. This 'Custodia Maritima,' how it is to be done appears, Rot. Parl. 46 Ed. 1, M. 49, and by the statute 5 Hen. 4, cap. 3, it is to be done, as heretofore it hath been done, according to the statute of Winchester.

My fourth answer to this case is, that the plaintiff was a clergyman, and the clergy having denied in parliament to aid the king, as the laity did this year, at this time they stood in the king's disfavour; and in Hil. Term. 25 Ed. 1, Rot. 17, the king commanded all his courts of justice, that if any clergyman was plaintiff in any action; 'quod nullum ei fiat remedium.' And therefore Walsingham, in his Annalis Consilii of this year of 25 Ed. 1, says, that it was 'Clero Angliæ importabilis, quia de protectione regis est exclusus, et per regem nihilominus depre datum.'

But, my lords, if I should let all go that hath been said, yet, under your lordships favours, the case is of no authority at all: for, admitting that the sesses were for shipping, and that by the king's authority; yet had the plaintiff no reason to put himself upon the point of law when the matter of fact would help him: for the plaintiff says, that he had been sessed before for those lands; the other party says no, but that it was for other lands; and upon this the issue is joined.

Nay, my lords, if there be any authority at all in the case, under favour, it is strong the other way: for if the sesses were for shipping, the abbot says, that before he had found arms for the land service, and demands the judgment of the court, if therefore he ought to pay this sess too. The other party, if the law had been clear, might have demurred thereupon; so that the authority sways this way, that none for the same land are chargeable for arms at land and shipping too.

My lords, not only for the clearing of this case, but all other things that concern it, either in the mere right or matter of fact before the 29 Ed. 1, that before the parliament at Lincoln 29 Ed. 1, all things concerning the king's prerogative, and the subjects liberties, were altogether upon incertainties. The statute of Running Mead, Magna Charta, Charta de Foresta, had been confirmed at least eight times, from 17 Joh. unto 29 Ed. 1, and yet not only the practice, but likewise the judges, in the courts of justice, went clear contrary to the plain both words and meaning of them. By the second chapter of Magna Charta, a baron, 'pro Baronia integra,' was to pay but 100 marks for his relief; the practice and process of the Exchequer till 29 Ed. 1, was always for this relief 100*l.* Michaelis 28 Ed. 1, Rot. 34. Communia, after the death of John Gray, that held per Baroniam, the question was, whether he should pay 100*l.* as the record says, 'prout antehac onerari solebat,' or 100 marks, 'propter confirmationem secundum Magnam Chartam;' and this the court would not determine before they had consulted with the king; and yet the statute of Magna Charta had been confirmed by 25 Ed. 1, and likewise the same year, as appears by the statute De Articulis super chartas. Communia, M. 13. Ed. 1, Rot. 26. Philip Mermion died, and 100*l.* paid for his relief. It was now 29 Ed. 1, and in question, whether 100*l.* or 100 marks admittance, licet hactenus, they were always 100*l.* because the king had confirmed Magna Charta 29th of his reign, and by his writs had commanded his courts to inroll it, and would have it 'de cetero in omnibus suis Articulis observari.' My lords, of this kind there be many cases. The Charter of king John, and of the Forest, cap. 10, is Nullus 'de cetero amittat vitam vel membrum pro venatione nostra;' and yet against the plain letter and meaning, Communia Trin. 29 Ed. 1, R. 44, Adam Gower of Scarborough, as appears, had in this king's reign been beheaded pro venatione in the forest of Danby; and now an inquisition went out to find, what lands and goods he had; and then upon the return the question was, whether his land was forfeited, and should escheat upon such an attainer, and resolved that the land was not forfeited. Pasch. 22 Ed. 1, Rot. 48. The king's shepherd had put the king's sheep into a man's ground, who had distrained them; and for this process went out of the Exchequer to punish the man, who there pleads, that he knew not that they were the king's sheep. And there Rot. 51, dors. Lessee for life of a manor of the king's with an advowson excepted, the court declared, that he had forfeited the manor itself. By these cases it appears, that neither the practice nor the proceedings in the courts of justice in those times, in things between the king, and the subject, are so much to be relied upon, as the words of the law.

My lords, it may further be objected, that at common law, before the statute of Winchester, the king might compel the subject to find arms for the defence of the kingdom; and therefore, by the same reason, he may charge them to find ships for the defence of the sea.

and poundage, and the other duties at common law mentioned, hath a particular supply for that of shipping, but hath nothing in particular for the other of arms; and therefore that may with more reason be laid upon the subject than the other. And yet for one of the principal things in that statute of Winchester, that is, for watching and warding, the king before that statute had a particular and certain farm or sum of money of each county for the doing of it, which after that statute the county was discharged of, because by that statute the counties took the charge of doing of it upon themselves, as the cases are Comin. Hil. 20 Ed. 1, Rot. 10, and Br. Trin. 43 Ed. 1, Rot. 22, dors. 181. 'pro Com. Northumb' and 16*l.* pro Cumberland.'

My second answer is, that each subject, and that secundum statum et facultates, is already chargeable for that of slugging, as hath been before proved; and therefore if he be chargeable both in money and kind too, the charge is double in the one, and but single in the other. Neither could it hold proportion with these cases of watching and warding, where the counties were discharged of the money, when they took the thing in kind upon themselves. And therefore this objection cannot, as I conceive, be made, unless his majesty first quit all the before-mentioned duties laid upon merchandize.—My third answer is, that in that of arms there is only mutatio speciei, changing of money into arms; for they remain the subject's still in property, and are in his own custody; he may sell them, or employ them at his pleasure to his own use: but in this way of shipping there is ablatio rei, in respect of the victuals and mariners wages.—My fourth answer is, that that of arms is not only for the defence against foreigners, but in watching and warding, upon Hue and Cry, and otherwise to keep the peace within the realm, and for the execution of justice, by assisting the sheriff when he shall have occasion to use the Posse Comitatus, and otherwise, all which do fall in the other. And as the use of arms is more general, so are they for the more immediate defence of that element, wherein we have our usual and certain livelihood. And yet the ordering of these for three hundred years and upwards, was by authority of parliament.—Lastly, my lords, in respect of the victuals and mariners wages to be found for 26 weeks, the case in question, as I conceive, cannot be compared to that of arms, but rather to that of taxing the country for finding of soldiers to go out of their counties.

My lords, the next objection that I shall endeavour to give answer unto, is, that it is in his majesty's power, for the safety of the realm, to shut up the ports and havens of the kingdom, and thereby to make a general stoppage of all manner of foreign trade; and therefore as his majesty may anticipate gain, by barring men from the exercising of their callings, so by the same reason may he take something away.—My lords, my first answer is, that the law therein doth trust the king only with that, which being done, is most to his own loss, as in respect of the customs and other duties this of prohibiting foreign trade would be.—My second answer is, that this cannot be done but in time of war, and imminent danger, and that therefore this objection will not be seasonable till the other be put in execution. The last objection is, that in divers old charters of liberties and exemptions, the patentees are freed de Dunegello et Navigio, hereby is implied right.—My answer is, from the same charters it may as well be inferred, the subject is bound to make and repair the king's parks and houses, and to make up new bridges, and divers other things; these charters of exemption freeing them 'ab operationibus omnium regalium parcorum et pontium,' and from divers other things which by law the subject is bound unto.

My lords, for the precedents that, from matter of fact and charge, may be brought for proof of the use and matter of fact, as I do not profess to know them all, so if I did, yet time would not permit to give a particular answer to each of them; I shall therefore offer these general answers to them:

The most of them, or all of them, are for charging the sea-towns, and haven towns which have ships, and many great privileges, and are enfranchised for that purpose, as is declared in the Parliament-Roll of 13 Ed. 3, M. 11, before cited. These that are to find ships, besides the main prescription for wrecks and benefit of fishing, are discharged of arrays and defence at land, as appears not only by the Parliament-Roll, but by the Scotch Roll 10 Ed. 3, M. 28, dors. The town of Shoreham, in the county of Sussex, time out of mind had found ships, and therefore, being by the commissioners of array taxed to arms for the land-service, a Supersedeas for that cause awarded. Iter Sussex, 7 Ed. 1, Rot. 63, dors. William de Bruce, lord of Shoreham, upon his claim adjudged, that all the customs of merchants at Shoreham belonged to him. Rot. Pat. 26 Ed. 1, M. 16, the town of Yarmouth, 'pro servitio navium impenso et impendendo,' are discharged of all subsidies granted in parliament, 'pro corporibus navium, et attito: et communia Trin.' 31 Ed. 2, Rot. 30. The town of Baldsey, in the county of Sussex, for the same cause discharged by judgment of the court. Iter Kant. 21 Ed. 1, Rot. 44, dors. Certain land-holders within the Cinque-Ports have Tailage 'de quolibet homine applicante,' upon their lands. Petitions 1 Ed. 3, Rot. 9, Office de Pat. In consideration of the charge of providing ships, the town of Southampton petition, that their privileges of having customs within their ports be continued to them; that they had these, appears Hil. 13 Hen. 4, Banc Regis Rot. 39, where they are indicted for extortion, for taking more custom than was due. Rot. Parl' 45 Ed. 3, the commons pray, that the franchises of the sea towns and havens may be allowed them as heretofore, and that by default thereof the navy of England is much decayed, to the disassurance of all the realm, if need should be. That these that are not maritime towns ought not to be charged, which is the very case of the defendant, I shall cite to your lordships express precedents. Clause 13 Ed. 3, M. 14, par. 2, the town of Bodmin in Cornwall discharged of ships, because in 'dicta villa portus non est et longe a mari et distat,' and hath not used before-time to find shipping, and an inquisition awarded to inquire of these particulars; whereby it appears, that the inland counties had not so much as de facto been usually charged with ships. Rot. Fra. 21 Ed. 3, M. 17, those towns 'quæ naves non habent, et quæ aliis naves habentibus contributoria non existunt,' that they should be discharged; it appears thereby that some towns that are members of great sea towns, are contributory to shipping, and other inland towns are not contributory, 2 Pars Rot. 2 Rich. 2, M. 42, in which 51 Ed. 3, is recited, whereby it is likewise recited, that the burghesses of Beverly had, by their petition in parliament, complained, that their town is 'in loco arido et a mari,' that 'ad sinistrum procuracionem quorund' machinantium ipsos indebite pr' gravare ad contribuend' hominibus de villa de Kingston super Hull,' to the making of a barge 'per mandatum regis;' now they pray 'de omnibus et singulis hujusmodi oneribus insolitis,' to be discharged by their charter; and it appears they are discharged accordingly, and this now exemplified, 2 Rich. 2.

To those of 48 Hen. 3, both for taxes for soldiers and for shipping, I shall give a particular answer, that it was then 'tempus belli,' when the courts of justice were shut; for the commission went out after April, and in the Red Book fo. 241. 6, it was 'tempus belli' from 4 Sep. 48 Hen. 3, until the 10th of Sep. 49 Hen. 3, and that the courts of justice were shut up, appears 49 Hen. 3, Rot. 4. 'Comm' Scaccari' non fuer' Barones residentes in Scaccari' ad Pas. 48 Hen. 3, ad comm' Pas. 49 Hen. 3, 'propter turbationem nuper habitam,' there were no sheriffs in 'aliquibus comitatibus,' 48 Hen. 3, and those that were 'non poterint se facere quæ ad officium vic' pertinebant.'

To the commissions 30 Ed. 1, M. 9, in the Patent Roll, 'de puniendo homines' that refused, it is 'quia ad rogatam mittere non cesserint' so many ships. And if a by-law were good to bind them, as is before proved, as well as their own promise, it may be so; but I have never seen any legal proceedings against any of those that refused at that time, save only against the Cinque Ports that are summoned by their service. P. 33 Ed. 1, Banc. Regis Rot. 82, against Seaford, as a member of the ports; and the charge is, that 'per servitium tenentur invenire unam navem.'

For those of Ed. 3's time, his reign, for the most part, was a time of war; and that the offensive brought a defensive upon the kingdom, is plain. Walsingham saith, page 119, 131, that 10 Ed. 3, the French burnt Southampton. And Stowe, page 234, says, that Ed. 12. 3, they assaulted Southampton, and burnt part of Plymouth. 13 Ed. 3, they assaulted the isle of Wight. Rot. Parl' 13 Ed. 3, pars 1. M. 9, that they had done much mischief in the west-coasts, and conquered the isle of Guernsey. Rot. Sco. 10 Ed. 3, M. 5, dors. and M. 2, and all the ports of England were shut up.

My lords, in these years wherein most of these writs issued, the great danger appears; and yet that the charge laid upon the county was by-by-law and agreement, I shall cite to your lordships the Scottish Roll; 10 Ed. 3, M. 3. The French riding at anchor at the isle of Wight, the king sends divers privy-counsellors to Dover, and commanded all the officers, masters of ships, mariners and inhabitants, from the Thames mouth to the West, to come thither, ad tractand' with those lords of the council for the defence of the sea by ships; and in the record it is cited, that notwithstanding the king's former command, 'hactenus quicquid non facer' impress', the writs for shipping issued before and were not executed; and therefore now a commission, if so it might be done with consent. 20 Ed. 3, other writs went out, Rot. Franc. pars 2, M. 23, 20 Ed. 3, a writ to Yarmouth 'propter pericula maris' to stop up their haven, and Rot. Franc. pars 1, M. 19. that no fishermen go out to sea.—I shall endeavour a particular answer to this. Claus. 10. Ed. 3, M. 23, the writ says, that 'valida defensionis super mare solvi non solebant temporibus progenitorum' of the king. To this I shall give this answer, that these wages were demanded before their time of going to the service; and the record is, hujusmodi vadia have not been paid.

My lords, if this answer be not sufficient, my second is by denying the thing; for besides that of 15 Johan. in that time of necessity, the ships were to serve 'ad liberationes et ad stipendia regis;' and 46 Hen. 3. M. 4, both in Ed. 1, Ed. 2; and this king's time before the tenth year of his reign, wages for defence were frequently paid.—My lords, because I know not how far this will be stood upon, I shall spare the citing of any of them, and to this purpose shall cite to your lordships only this case. It is amongst the parliament petitions 1 Ed. 3, and transmitted into the Exchequer, Hil. 2 Ed. 3, dors. The fishermen upon the coasts of Yarmouth, 20 Ed. 2, were daily robbed and killed, and for rescous of them, those of Yarmouth were commanded to set out some ships to sea; and Adam Brillington, the king's clerk, sent with 300*l.* to set out this fleet, which the men of Yarmouth intended they should have as wages for the voyage; but the clerk would not let them have above 230*l.* and that as money borrowed of the king, and for this they gave their bond of repayment thereof. 1 Ed. 3, they complain in parliament, and pray that they may be discharged of the 230*l.* and that the bond may be cancelled; which is adjudged accordingly, and transmitted into the Exchequer for a trial, whether the service was done or not.—My last answer to these precedents is, that the matters of fact in these years, to the violation of the subjects rights, procured upon fresh suits, not only the before-mentioned statute of 14 Ed. 3, cap. 1, against any charge to be laid upon the subject without assent in parliament; but afterwards they complain in parliament, 15 Ed. 3, M. 9, that their goods were seized, and their bodies taken without any suit commenced against them, contrary to Magna Charta, and the statutes and ordinances made thereupon with so much discretion of their ancestors; and in particular in the Parliament-Roll of 22 Ed. 3, M. 4, for the guarding of the sea, and in 36 Ed. 3, M. 9, and 37 Ed. 3, M. 2, as before in 15 Ed. 3.

My lords, I now come to the last thing, which is the Proofs in the point, which I shall humbly offer to your lordships. The first authority that I shall offer unto your lordships is the Patent-Roll, 26 Ed. 1, M. 21, whereby I shall endeavour to prove to your lordships these two things:—The confession of that king and his council, that he was so far from having power to tax the people for the custody of the sea, as that he is bound to make satisfaction for any thing taken from the people for this purpose. The second, that the charges laid upon the people for the custody of the sea, were the principal grievances that occasioned the making of the statute of 25. Ed. 1, and the statute of 'Tallagio non concedendo.'

For the first that the king declares that he had a desire to redress the Grievances made to the people in his name, and instanceth what they were, 'veluti de rebus captis in ecclesiis, et de aliis rebus captis et asportatis tam de clericis quam de laicis, sive pro custodia maris vel alio modo quocunque;' whereby, my lords, there is an acknowledgment that it is grievance, and to be redressed, to lay any tax upon the subject for the defence of the sea.—Commissioners are there named throughout all England to enquire of these grievances; herein they are to proceed according to certain instructions from the king and the council, which are these three: First, Whether the things were taken without warrant; and if so, then the party that took the goods is to make satisfaction, and further to be punished for the trespass. Secondly, If there were no warrant allowed, then the officer was to make satisfaction. Thirdly, If all were done according to and in pursuance of the warrant, and no more; then what upon certificate thereof is, the words are 'et enferra tant que il se senera appais pur reason.' The king hereby promiseth, that whatsoever things were taken from the people by any command of his for the custody of the sea, that he will make reasonable satisfaction to the party for such things.

My lords, for the second thing, that is, that these grievances occasioned the making of these statutes, is clear from the words of the patent; for they were made 'post guerram inter regnum et regem Francie;' which, as appears by the Case of the Abbot of Robertsbridge, were from the 22d to the 25th of Edward the first, and by all our historians, and many records. It appears likewise, by those other words, that the king, before his going into Flanders, intended to have remedied those Grievances; he went over in Sep. 25 Ed. 1, and the statute 25 Ed. 1, was made the 10th of Oct. after. Hence likewise it follows, that the exception of the king's antient aids and prizes, mentioned in the statute of 25 Ed. 1, extends not to this of charging the people to the custody of the sea, that being one of the principal grievances that occasioned the making of it. That the same grievance caused the making of the statute De Tallagio, &c. I have before offered to your lordships.

My lords, the next authority which I shall present is the Communia Hil. 23 Ed. 1, Rot. 77. There the king commanded 30 galleys to be made by several great towns, every galley was to have 120 men a-piece; these were 'pro defensione regni et securitate maris.' My lords, the cases are many in the Exchequer, where the money for making these galleys was recovered against the king. I confess my lords, that the king had promised payment to those that made them, which I shall thus submit to your lordships: That in case the king might have commanded the making of them, at the charge of the towns, that then the king's promise was but nudum pactum, for promising of payment for that which by law they might have been forced to do, and so the payment rested only the king's grace and good pleasure. But, my lords, upon suits in his own time, and in the times of Ed. 2, and Ed. 3, the monies for making these galleys were received by several towns, M. 29 Ed. 1, Rot. 29, dors. for York, M. 31 Ed. 1, Rot. 77, Ipswich and Dunwich. P. 5 Ed. 3, Rot. 31, for him 'prout justum fuer' nothing having been paid before. Bract. M. 16 Ed. 2, Rot. 14, both for the galley made at Southampton, and the bringing her to Winchelsea, at their own charge, Præcept. P. 1 Ed. 3, all the money from Southampton not being paid, now ordered that it should be paid.

My lords, the next authority that I shall present to your lordships is the Parliament-Roll, 13 Ed. 3, pars 1, M. 9 & 11. The causes of calling the parliament are declared to be these: First, the keeping of the peace. Secondly, the defence of the marches. Thirdly, the safeguard of the sea; that the enemy might not enter the realm to destroy it. These were the three points for the commons to advise on, which are put into writing, and entered upon the roll. My lords, by the articles themselves propounded on the king's part, it appears, That the commons are not chargeable to the guarding of the sea; and they pray, that this advice of theirs may not be prejudicial to them to bind them thereunto, and that there are ships enough in England to do it, if the people were willing. M. 11. The commons afterwards in debating of these articles, when they came to this of the sea, notwithstanding the caution before, they are afraid, that if they should debate it, it might imply, that they are chargeable to do it; and therefore they protest against giving any advice therein, as a thing whereof they have no cognizance; and do further declare, that the Cinque Ports, and other great towns, that have franchises, are bound thereunto, that they should do it. And therefore the merchants, masters of ships, and mariners, throughout England, are summoned to be at the next parliament for advice about shipping.

My lords, the next authority is the Parliament-Roll, 22 Ed. 3, M. 21. The commons petition in these words, 'que le guard de la mere so face descries ras soit le guard fit man ad refait amant vis senois ut semble que meliur guard ne poit estre fait que le Roy ne fait ne qu'il demeritissent de la sur la guer et par de fair de c'est ter.' The commons having formerly granted the king divers Aids and Subsidies upon Wool, Wool-fells, and Leather and otherwise, for the guarding of the seas, they now grew weary of it, and desire, that the king himself from thenceforth should bear the whole burden, and charge him with his promise to that purpose.

My lords, this Petition, though in the name of the commons, yet the lords joined in it; for otherwise all acts of parliament of those times being made upon Petition and Answer, should be without the lords assent. Hence it appears, that the whole kingdom, at this time, was so far from thinking that the king could charge them, without their consents, to the guarding of the sea, as that they alledge, the king himself ought to bear the whole charge. Neither doth the king deny his promise, nor wholly deny the thing; for though he saith, it should be done as it hath been done before, yet it is with a qualification, because the sea cannot be better kept than he hath kept it, by reason of his being so often at sea in person, in going and returning from France, and diverting the enemy by his wars in France. If the king had given his absolute denial, yet here is the judgment of both houses of parliament express in the point.

Rot. Francia: 21 Ed. 3, pars 2 M. 9 & 11. The merchants had granted 2s. 8d. upon their goods till Michaelmas, for providing 120 great ships 'pro securâ conductione navium et marchandizarum, et pro defensione ceterarum maritimarum partium regni, et aliis periculis his guerrinis temporibus regno imminentibus.' This grant being made, the king alledging that this was not sufficient for the service, and to remove the causes of the stopping of the trade by reason of the wars; the king now lengthens out the same from Michaelmas to Easter following; and to satisfy the people, the king by his proclamation declares, that the 2s. 8d. shall cease at Easter, according to the grant; which, as it should seem, not satisfying the people, or the king continuing the taking thereof, the commons in parliament, 22 Ed. 3, M. 16, pray that it may cease, and that by procurement of no merchant, 'plais largent soit continue.' An imposition but for half a year, and that upon merchandize, and by consent of the merchants for the defence, yet taken off upon complaint. The Answer is, that it should cease.

My next authority is the Parliament-Roll 2 Ric. 2, pars 2 M. 5, before cited, where the great council and sages of the kingdom resolve, that the commons are not chargeable to the defence of the realm without parliament; which extends to this particular of the sea, for the present preparation, whereunto the commons are not chargeable, was for defence at sea; and therefore the money lent was to provide an army for the sea, 'en defence et salvation del dit Royalme et de la Navy et des costiers del mere.'

My lords, the next authority is the Parliament-Roll 2 Hen. 4, M. 22. Commissions to charge the people to make ships for the defence of the realm without consent of parliament, repealed by the king and the whole parliament for that very cause.

'Item pur ceo quere tarde divers Commissions fueront foist an divers cities burroughs et villages du royaume pur faire certaines Barges et Ballingers sans assent du Parliam' et ont mt' pr' nad estre fast devant ces hents' n' les Commons pray n' snr' le Roy que les ditz Commissions soient repeals et que ils ne soient forces ne fait a quore loir fuit respons' que le Roy vest que in les Commissions soient repeals in tout points mes pur le grand necessity que ad des tiels vessels pur defence du royaume in case que les quens sint priment le Roy vost communer de rest matter ouesque les Snrs' et puis apres le mre' al dits Commons pur intinsurer loir council et advise tiel party.' The first commission's repealed, because the commons were not chargeable without a parliament. And now the king will put it in a parliamentary way, by doing it with the assent of the lords and commons.

My lords, my next authority is the Parliament-Roll 9 Hen. 4. The cause of the calling the parliament is for the safeguard of the sea, and of the North Marches; and M. 17, great mischief shewn for default of keeping the sea; and M. 21, it is there enrolled by the king's command, that there was communication had between the king and the lords for the defence of the realm, and for resisting of the enemies, who made preparations on all sides; whereunto sufficient resistance cannot be provided, unless the king have in his parliament some notable aid graued unto him. My lords, the king hereby acknowledgeth, that he cannot without the parliament charge the people for the safe keeping of the sea, that being the principal part for the defence there intended, the same with the summons, that without the consent of the commons 'negotia præd' infecta remaneant,' and with the summons in the Close Roll 23 Ed. 1, before-mentioned, 'Quod omnes tangit per omnes debet supportari.'

My lords, the next authority is the Parliament-Roll 4 Hen. 4, M. 28. The lords spiritual and temporal, and the commons, grant the king a Subsidy upon the staple commodities, and Tonnage and Poundage, and likewise a Tenth and Fifteenth, with this protestation, 'Protestant que cest grant in temps auener ne soit point en exemple de charger les dits Surs' ne Commons du royaume de nul manner del Subsidy ne 10th ne 15th a les guerris desco-

'regates, ou safeguard del mere sans soit per le volents des Seig' et les Commons de realme et ceo a novel grant faire in pleine Parliament.' Rot. Parl' 6 Hen. 4, M. 12, and Rot. Parl' 1 Hen. 5, M. 17, the same protestation as before.

My lords, that the charge of the defence at sea, and that in a large proportion, by reason of the before-mentioned duties, is to be borne by his majesty, I conceive that it will not be denied; that in subsidium and aid of his majesty therein, the commons are not chargeable without their consent in full parliament. In these three records there are not only these protestations of the whole realm being made by the lords and commons, but likewise the king's consent by accepting the things granted, and that without any qualification of the protestations. Those protestations, that they are not chargeable to the guarding of the sea in a certain way, as are 10ths and 15ths, do much more fill in a way uncertain as here.

My lords, my next proof is from the practice of former kings in their frequent demands of aids from parliaments for the defence of the sea, as well before the statutes of tonnage and poundage, as then and since; moneys borrowed by former kings for ships and defence at sea, and indentures of retainer for that purpose at the king's charge; and not only so, but upon suit allowance in the Exchequer for victuals, mariners wages, anchors, prisoners taken in fights pro defensione, and also other things necessary for shipping when for defence of the realm. Whereupon the same argument may be made in this particular for the sea, as was before for the defence in general.

The first thing that I shall press, is that of the Cinque Ports. Their service is certain in respect of the time, but 15 days in a year; and in respect of the charge, but 20 men and a master; and the number of ships certain: besides that they are discharged of arms for the land-service, they have likewise divers other privileges for the doing hereof; they were free from all aids and subsidies granted in parliament, and are by privy seals discharged thereof. Hil. 2 Ed. 3, Comm' about the end of the roll; they are freed from all tolls, murage and pontage throughout the realm, which bringeth a greater charge upon the rest of the subjects.—My lords, I shall thus offer it unto your lordships: If they that have these privileges shall serve but 15 days in a year, how the others that have no privilege at all, should do it for 26 weeks, as in the writ?

Secondly, Their charge is certain in the number of men and ships; how the rest of the commons that are so far from having any privileges or recompence for it, as that they do contribute to this charge of the Cinque Ports, shall, as by the way in the writ, be altogether uncertain in the matter of charge, both in the number of men and ships, and of every other thing.—My lords, I shall press this further, that when the ports exceed their charge in the number of men or ships, allowance by the king is to be made unto them, as appears by the Quire of Dover, and Pat. Roll' of 7 Hen. 7, before cited, that after the 15 days they were to be at the king's charge; so in the Pat. Roll' 19 Hen. 3, m. 14, because they found 40 men in the ship, the king promised payment for all over and above the number of 20. Banc. Regis Trin. 33 Ed. 1, Rot. 22, allowance to service in Scotland; the Scots, as appears by Walsingham, p. 53, and elsewhere, having about that time burnt divers English towns and ships, and a school-house, with 200 scholars in it, Visus Comp. P. 33 Ed. 1, pro ingenti Ro. Scotland P. 34 Ed. 1, Rot. 37, Comu' la Composition.

My lords, if the ports who are bound to the defence at sea, when they have performed their service, be not compellable to any further charge, I shall humbly offer it to your lordships, whether those that be not bound at all, from the same reason, are chargeable at all.

My lords, I have now done, and shall not further press upon the patience of your lordships; I know that 'nullum tempus occurrit regi;' the disuse thereof, I shall press it no otherwise than that it is an interpretation of the Statute made against all Aids and Tailages in general; and of the complaints of the parliament of 15 Edw. 1, m. 9; 36 Edw. 3, m. 19, and 37 Edw. 3, m. 9, that those statutes had not been kept; and further, as it is an interpretation likewise of the before-mentioned declaration, petitions and protestations against this in particular; and as it is an execution of them, and putting them into practice: 'Praxis sanctorum,' as the divines say, 'est interpretatio præceptorum.'

The claims which anciently the subjects have made upon the crown, that none of the great officers of the kingdom could be chosen but in parliament, nor that the king had power to sell any of the antient crown-lands; the disuse shews, that those claims of their's were not legal. Br. in his fourth book, fol. 209, saith, that 'longa patientia trahitur ad consensum.' The non-claims therefore of so many kings and queens I shall present unto your lordships, as so many le voëts and declarations of their general consents, that without assent in parliament they could not have laid the like sses upon any of their subjects, as is now laid upon my client.

May it please your Lordships; May 22d last, issued a Sciri Facias out of the Exchequer to the sheriff of the county of Bucks, to warn Mr. Hampden to shew cause why the 20s. should not be charged on him towards the finding of a ship of war, with men, munition, and victuals, expressed in a writ dated 4 Aug 11 Car. And the sums and the names of the defaulters were certified into the Exchequer by a Mittimus, dated 5 May, 13 Car. to be there proceeded upon for the levying of the 20s. according to the law and custom of England: Mr. Hampden appeared, and desired that all the writs might be read unto him; they being read, he demurred, and Mr. Attorney joined with him in demurrer, and adjourned out of the Exchequer into this court, to have the advice of all the judges of England.

Before I enter into my Argument, because the true stating of the question in this and at other things doth exceedingly conduce to the clearing of the thing in question; I shall in the first place, observe the writ, dated 4th August 11 Car. the ground of this assess, which was directed into Bucks, and others into all the counties of England, and this was for raising aids for ships, for the defence of the kingdom, with a notable circumstance, 'quia salus regni periclitabatur;' which being expressed in the record, is confessed by the demurrer, and not only so, but testified by the king himself under the great seal in the Mittimus: and in all matters, especially in matters concerning the public safety, the king is 'Recordum superlativum et præexcellens,' as in the great Case of the earls of Gloucester and Hereford, 20 Edw. 1, so that the question is only this, Whether the king, in his judgment, finding the safety and preservation of the kingdom and people, necessarily and unavoidably to require the aid commanded by the Writ, may not command such aid by the Writ, for saving and preserving the kingdom and people?

Having stated the question, I shall now discard many things as impertinent to the question, not that I that am sworn counsel for the king, do agree in those things against the king; but that they are not now in question. It is not now in question, What may be imposed by the king upon the subject for Defence, at the charge, for conquest or conservation of foreign countries or territories beyond the seas. Neither is it in question, what may be laid by the king upon his subjects, for vindicating injuries done by foreign princes or states. Neither is it in question, whether arbitrary impositions or taxes may be laid at pleasure upon the subject for the mere increase of the revenue of the king's treasure. Neither, whether in ordinary and common defence, for preservation of the kingdom, though necessary, it may be thus imposed.

But the question is, 'Quando salus regni periclitabatur;' in truth, the question is, whether we can be charged 'pro salvatione regni et nostror'. Again, it is not in question, whether the subject hath a property in his goods, or can lose them without consent in parliament. I shall shew that his property shall remain unto him notwithstanding this assess; and the argument on the contrary savours more of malignity than reason, to say that by this the subject shall lose his property in his goods.

It was rightly admitted, that the law of property must give place to the law of nature, for the common defence; the levying of a debt or duty public or private, upon any subject, is so far from destroying the property, that it doth confirm it. He hath as good property that payeth debts to the king, as he that doth not.

We agreed de re, the kingdom is to be defended; no man in his five senses will deny that de personis, according to the equitable rule in the writ 'quod omnes tangit per omnes debet supportari;' we are in this as in the Conqueror's laws, 'sumus fratres conjurati ad regnum defendendum.' De persona whom the law hath intrusted with the defence of the kingdom, viz. the king, we are likewise agreed. The only difference is de modo, whether the right media be observed by the king? and whilst we are disputing whether he may do it, I am told he may do it in parliament; true, he that may do it every where, may do it in parliament. And I shall be sorry to hear there shall be no salvation for the people but in parliament.

And whilst this was the question, though a great deal of care was had, and though it was done with advantage and policy, yet the bulk and mass of what was said, shall appear to fall quite off as nothing to the purpose. There were multiplicity of particulars, and a pretty survey of the king's revenues, no ways concerning the case, and as much mistaken in it, as he that reckoned without his host. He hath done like a discreet gentleman, and went as near the question as his client would let him; he hath agreed cases more prejudicial than this, as thus: It was admitted, that if there be any actual war, though there be but light skirmishes, the king may do it; nay, if there be but a war denounced, though there be never a blow struck, surely then can it not be done when 'salus regni periclitabatur?' This is the true state of the question.

Before I go further, I am not ignorant, and therefore cannot but be with what disadvantage I come to argue this case, every man being a party interested that bears me; but I fear not but that I shall satisfy all parties, I have truth to conduct me, 'Et magna est veritas et prævalebit.'

The method whereby I may maintain the right of my master, and the crown, is this; I shall first ground it upon reason; every human proposition is of equal authority, only reason makes the difference.—I shall ground my reasons, First, upon the law of nature: Secondly, of state; and Thirdly, of public safety, necessity, and conveniency. Neither shall it be against the statute law, common law, or any of the hereditary rights and liberties of the subjects of England, but consonant to, and warranted by all. I shall not only prove it 'ex rationibus cogentibus,' or as lawyers say, 'ex visceribus cæcæ,' but 'de similibus ad similia.' I shall confirm it by a beadroll of examples and precedents of former ages, and compare them with this, and see if the case be altered.

First, I shall shew it from the foundation of the kingdom, to that which they call the Norman Conquest; from the Norman Conquest to the time of Magna Charta, made 9 Hen. 3, from Magna Charta to the statute 'De Tallagio non concedendo,' made 25 Ed. 1; from the statute 'De Tallagio non concedendo' to the first granting of Tonnage and Poundage; from Tonnage and Poundage to this very day, and that the Petition of Right doth no ways concern the dispute. I shall confute all precedents, objections, reasons, inconveniencies, authorities or records, of which a great number were cited, that these shall not be a syllable left; and in that, First, I will either shew that the record is mistaken, or impertinent and not to the question: Or, Secondly, Those that are pertinent, I will either agree them, or take the force of them away, that none of them shall be able to stand in the way of the king in this way of defence.

The fundamental reason is the exact rule of the law in the 10th Report cited by that learned gentleman Mr. St. John, 'salus populi suprema lex.' All other laws positive are subordinate to this law, and are to be regulated by it. We are not to talk of positive laws, till we have a kingdom to use them. Glanville saith, 'Regiam majestatem non solum armis oportet esse decoratum sed et legibus;' arms to defend us, laws to protect us. Bracton, fo. 1. In 'regibus duo sunt necessaria, arma et leges;' and gives the reason: If no arms, the kingdom would be left as a prey to the enemies. And truly it is a strange imposture, that the law should so provide, that the king by his writ can give us a remedy for white-acre and black-acre for a clod of earth, and not be able to give a writ to defend the kingdom when it is in imminent danger. Nay, positive laws are abrogated by reason, when the safety of the kingdom and people are in danger. As in Rome, in the night a man might not come over the walls, but if an enemy did approach the city, then it was lawful for him to do it.

In the next place, I take that ground which is taken in all laws; the common-wealth is to be preferred before all private estates. 13 H. 3, fo. 15, the opinion of Shelley. Rather than this shall suffer, the law will turn some prejudice to particular persons, who are but a part of the common-wealth, 21 Hen. 7, fo. 28, 8 Ed. 4, fo. 23, 29 Hen. 8, Dyer 36. If the enemy doth approach, for the defence of the kingdom one man may make bulwarks and forts on another man's soil, and shall not the king keep the outworks at sea, lest the enemy should land at our doors? Again, by the king's command, suburbs may be razed: In 1588 when three great land-armies, 20,000 foot and 1,000 horse, 30,000 foot and 1,000 horse, and 20,000 foot and 1,000 horse were raised. Now lest any army should land in other places, directions were given to keep them from landing; but if they could not keep them from landing, then that they should burn down houses, and come and destroy all whatsoever, that they might not have food and provision to stay there. Where is the law of property in this case, which is so much talked off? The public and private are so nearly connext that they can hardly be separated; the public loss falls immediately, and by consequence upon particular persons. Be a man in what condition he would be, if a public loss comes to the state, though it falls on his wedding-day, he shall suffer in it. It is impossible to save private fortunes if the public be lost, 'unaquaque amac' comm' bona totius, &c.' And another says very well, no man repines at that which is done for the good of the commonwealth. If a subject then can be enabled without parliament to make bulwarks and forts in another man's ground, shall not the king, that is pater patrie, do the like for the defence of the whole?

My third reason is to confirm, or rather mind your lordships, that the crown hath many powers and prerogatives over the estates of private persons. May not the king enter into another man's house, or at least out-houses, and dig for salt-petre, because it is for the defence? 11 Report fo. 81, Bowles case, and enter into his lands and dig royal mines?

There is proprietas domini belongs to the subject, but he hath not the power over all, without the property 'Ratione protectionis, jurisdictionis,' &c. Private interest must give place to a common good; the private prejudice that any man hath, is very well repaired by the public utility that comes to the kingdom. Fishermen may justify their going into the lands of others to fish, because it is pro bono publico. 8 E. 4, 18, 19. 29 H. 8, Dyer 36. 21 Hen. 7, 28. A man may pull down the house of another man, when the next house to it is on fire; 'Jam tua res agitur paries cum proximus ardet,' the private must suffer for the public cause. 22 Ed. 4, fo. 2. b. 26 Ed. 1, fo. 45. If two men are fighting, a man may part them, and put them into several houses, because it is for the good of the commonwealth. If a madman be abroad, he may be taken, whipped and imprisoned, lest he do violence to himself and others. 22 Ed. 4, fo. 45. A chirurgeon may cut off one member to save the rest, 22 Ass. Plowden 56. Necessity is the law of the time and action, and things are lawful by necessity, which otherwise are not; 'Quicquid necessitas cogit, defendit;' and the law of the time must regulate the law of the place in such public things. If a storm arise at sea, to cast out goods into the sea is lawful for the safety of the other goods; and they whose goods are not lost, shall be sharers with the others. If it be for safety of lives, all must be cast out, Duffield's and Mowse's case; but if the party hath taken more in than is fitting, and that be the cause of casting away the goods, and not the tempest, there the party hath his remedy. 48 Hen. 3, there was a sudden summons to be in arms both at sea and land; they plead, that there was not a just time of summons; the king tells them, that no man shall excuse himself for want of convenient time of summons; nay, they shall not alledge the time of harvest, &c. it being safer to be somewhat diminished in estate, than the public to suffer: 'Necessitas est lex temporis,' whatsoever is done for public safety is best; other laws are tributary, and must give way to the law of necessity: What talk we of formalities, when we are like to lose the kingdom, when the keeping of the laws would end the commonwealth.

But this needs not, for I shall shew that his majesty hath trod in the steps of all those kings who have worn the diadem, and swayed the scepter of this kingdom.

In the next place I shall shew divers exemptions à custodia maritima, not only ancient but late: I will put you one, that is, King's College in Cambridge, 21 Hen. 6. When these grants are made, it extends to the ordinary defence of the people, and not extraordinary; no more than if the king grants an exemption to a man that he shall not be of a jury, yet if there be no other, that shall not excuse him. Matth. Paris 838, he speaks of privileges granted to the archbishop of Canterbury, London, &c. All are granted in liberam elemosynum; they are bound to do nothing but to pray, and yet are not exempted from public defence, 'Nec adeo libertates et propter publicam utilitatem regni et per ea resisteret hostem.' I shall give Mr. St. John's Argument an answer by and bye; yet by the way, if tenures feod' Militari' did begin, as was alledged out of Britton, in the Conqueror's time, how was the kingdom defended before? If wards and marriages, and accidents thereupon, did not go to the foundation of the kingdom, what was before?

The king is as much lord of the sea as land, 'æque dominus maris et telluris.' Selden Mare Clausum, 6 Ric. 2, Doctor and Student, lib. 2, fo. 51. 5 Report fo. 108. It is observed by a great lawyer, of what consequence it is to have power at sea. The naval dominion of England is of great consequence and use; for it is called dotem regni. If therefore the kingdom of England consists of land and sea, I hope we shall not stand at half defence, to defend the land and leave the sea. Rot. Parl. 2 Rich. 2, M. 25. It is a great advantage to have defence at sea, else we should have hot war at our thresholds; while the sea is open, men may go to plough, and have the courts of justice open.

The kings of England of themselves, by their prerogative royal, in times of war, denounced, intended or suspected, for the preservation of the public safety, may seize the lands of prior aliens, 41 Ed. 3, fo. 10, 22 Ed. 4, 43, 44, 14 H. 4, 36. And can a king of England take the possessions of aliens, and cannot he enforce his natural born subjects to defend the land and sea? God forbid; nay, if we would parva componere magnis, we should find in cases of lesser consequence, if they have relation to the defence, he may do it. As the king may lay a charge upon the subject for walling a town, the reason is, because they have benefit by it in time of danger; and hath not all the kingdom safety by the navy at sea? 3 Ed. 3, Ass. 445, Westm. 1, cap. 3, 13 Hen. 4, fo. 14, 15. Sir

John Davies' Reports fo. 13, Littl. fo. 58. 33 Edward 1, 105. Parl. Book, Walsingham, 14 Edward 1, 60: 7 Edward 3, Pat. M. 2. And the king did not only command it, but took an account of it, if it was not done, and took it into his own hands, Trin. 27 Ed. 1, M. 14, ex thesaur murrage of Carlisle taken into the king's hands. Pat. 14 Edw. 1, pars 1, M. 14, and the surplussage paid into the Exchequer. And this agrees with the reason of all laws, where they have a benefit they must contribute to the charge, 10 Report, fo. 141, out of 44 Ed. 3, nay for lesser things, as for pavage and pontage, the king may impose that for a public good, and the king may distraint all the terr' tenents, and land owners, to make contribution 'secundum statum et facultates.'

The king may dispose of the preparation for defence, he may compel men to be knighted, because it was for defence. Rot. Claus. 19 Ed. 2, M. 16. Mat. Paris, fo. 12. 37 Westm. 465, no man is exempted from defence; judges are not exempted, yet judges are not to fight; yet when it comes to necessity, they are not exempted. Trin. 5 Ed. 4, Moyle 13 Hen. 4, fo. 23. clergymen compelled; nay a serjeant at common law sworn at common pleas, is compellable. Sir John Hulbert in Hen. 7's time was compelled to be a knight: 9 or 29 Hen. 6, Rolfe, a stout serjeant, pleaded that he was a serjeant at common law, and not bound to be a knight, but he is forced to it. But why talk we of these? there ought to be a commonwealth before there are laws, and private ought to give way to public.

Again, imminent dangers and perils to a state do dispense with ordinary proceedings in law; 'inter arma silent leges.' Nay, if there be but rumours of wars, laws are silent; we must look then to the kingdom, upon rumours and opinions of wars. Pasch. 15 Ed. 1, Banc. Regis Rot. 70, dors. the Scotch army they besieged Rippon, the people they promise a sum of money to them to depart, and give them in hostages, and that money should be levied among themselves; when the war was over they would not do it, but were compelled to it. In 14 Ed. 2, Banc. Regis Rot. 60, the Scots besiege Durham, but they must have ready money, they would not take hostages to depart; while this peril was on them, they met together and swore, that what should be agreed amongst themselves every man would stand to. It was ordered they should go into the houses of others, and take what money they could find for that purpose; they took from one man 60l.; oh, he was not satisfied, he had a property in his goods, he brought an action, and at Durham it was adjudged for him; but when by a writ of error it was brought to Westminster-hall into the King's-Bench, judgment was reversed. And in the time of queen Elizabeth, greater things were done upon lesser occasions.

The next thing is the ships taken from time to time, and the command of persons, watches, beacons, shutting up of the ports, which are the gates of the kingdom, 14 or 10 E. 4, Pasch.

m. 12, dors. 3 Hen. 5, 18. dors. A number of other things commanded by the king for safety; when the law considers what may happen, it is not material what doth happen; nay, if there be but a vulgaris opinio, it is enough; much more when the king, by his own judgment, foreseeeth it. 6 Report fo. 64, Clark's case, there they are compelled to build a hall at St. Albans for the judges to sit in, much more in this case. See Clegate's case for triumphs; and if for state, shall not the king command for safety of the kingdom? Hil. 12 Jac. Hawk's case, for paving of the way, he may take corn out of the sacks of those that come by.

Again it is a Droit Royal to meddle with war and peace, subjects have nothing to do with it. Rot. Parl. 13 Ed. 3, M. 5, 19 Ed. 4, fo. 160. or 6. Brian, chief justice, saith, That if all the subjects of England do war with the subjects of another kingdom, this is no war; but if the king denounce it, it is war. 22 Ed. 1, Rot. Vus. con. M. 16, or 10, they must have a power from the king: true, Henry 7, brought military discipline to the parliament to advance his own ends. Sometimes dangers are fit to be communicated to the people, and sometimes not. The king should best know what is done abroad, who hath his close council of war; he knows what is done abroad, what can the people tell of these things? and it is very fit that preparation be made before-hand. It is not good to find the kingdom without a navy, especially when such combustion is abroad. 18 Eliz. cap. 23. It is as much to prevent danger, as to remove it when it is in being. 1 Ed. 6, et 1 Mar. A desired provision to be made before-hand, and this hath been the practice of all times. Gervasius Tilburiens. Black Book Hen. 2d's time. Danegelt before the Conquest paid annually; but afterwards, when there was bellum or opiniones bellorum, 'Datum est nobis intelligere, auditio rumore, &c.' are frequent in the records; nay if there be but vulgaris opinio. Ay, but perhaps dangers will not come; but if they come unawares where are we then? In the case between the earls of Gloucester and Hereford, there was a great tumult between them about the marches of Wales: and this was contrary to the king's command, and exception was then taken; that there was no record to warrant the Sciri Facias [Na' que fuit pur salvatione del Royalme.] the king did affirm it, 'Et Dominus Rex in multis casibus est supra legem, &c. Dominus Rex est Recordum superlativum et præcellens.' It is treason for any subject to raise an army, unless a town be besieged. Henry the 7th was a wise king, and he had his spies abroad in times of peace to see how things went, and his army prepared; and the preparation of a navy does much more good than the spilling of blood. And so hath our navy these two years done a great deal of good to the kingdom, and honour to the king.

Now I come to the authorities: but first we shall observe what an authority shall be in this case. First, I conceive there may be, and are direct and full examples in point, for compelling the subjects, at their own charge to guard the sea and land, though they are not ruled in particular courts of justice; nay, under favour, they are stronger than any judgment: there were then no need of suits in the courts of justice; if men would pay, what need judgments? Secondly, I conceive, that though I find not direct authority in printed books, yet records are as good testimonies, and greater than reports, that are but extracts, and second authorities drawn out of them; and those that concern 'Jus Publicum,' come not into ordinary debate, but remain 'inter arcana Imperii,' and those will speak fully. Thirdly, I shall observe that our precedents are not only in open war and hostility, but upon opinions, rumours, relations, and informations of wars.

I shall shew this in all ages to queen Elizabeth's time; and if it be not so full in the years of king Stephen and Henry 4, who were usurpers, it is no wonder. If they had had right to the crown, as his majesty hath, they would not have used compliments, but 'Fide et legiantia quibus notis tenemini. Before the Conquest, I find that king Edgar had his tenants, who swore to co-operate with him, 'per terram et per mare.' King Ethelred he did command, that he that had 310 hides of land should find a ship, and those that had lesser, should find other arms, and at their own charge, for every ship eight oars, 'ut tempore 'Patris,' that was Canutus; and it was Tributum Classiale.

My lords, for Danegelt, if those kings that were called in by the people did lay this on the people, much more our natural-born king, which shews it to be an undoubted right; for it is not likely they would put that in practice which was not an undoubted right. In the Laws of the Confessor by Mr. Lambert, and the Black Book in the Exchequer, it was sometimes one, sometimes 2s. annually, in usus Maritim'; and still the charge lies on the subject; this shews an inherent right in the crown, and it was paid for several purposes, but still at the subjects charge. And to say it should not be so because of the word 'statutum (De Regibus Angliæ statutum)' cannot be, for in those times statutum, as in Cicero, was a constitution, there was no parliament then; and if it now doth alter from that way, truly petty circumstances, when the substance is observed, alter not the case. There must be a defence, and it was not certain; doth not the danger 'sus-cipere majus et minus?' and the king may say as Edward the first said, nay, I have heard him say, that he hath bought neither manors, lands nor castles with it.

After the Conquest, Danegelt is supposed to be released by the Conqueror, because he dreamed he saw the devil dancing upon the Danegelt; but the Black Book saith it was paid in the Conqueror's time. It was then quitted, till there was bellum or opinionibus bellorum; neither was it released by William Rufus, or Henry the 1st. King Stephen swore that he would release it at his coronation, but 'nihil horum tenuit;' nay, it was paid in Henry the 2d's time, 4 Hen. 2, l'ipse Roll; and though the name be altered, yet other things came in the room of it.

And now I will begin with Doomsday-Book, which began in the 14th of the Conqueror, and ended the twentieth year. There were divers towns and shires charged, and there we see what assistance they did give both for sea and land. In the Black Book fo. 56, he that waited on the king's revenue, 'liber non erit' for public things. And in king John's time, which was a troublesome time, 5 Johannis l'at. M. 17. and Johannis Claus. M. 9, they gave a fourth part of their revenues for defence; and there was a command for staying of all ships, and to repair to a certain place appointed.

And to come to those great things when king John was deposed by the pope; the king of France made preparation, and the king of England made preparation, and all ships were imbreivated because he would not put all upon land-forces: and so in 1588. Mat. Paris, fo. 312, it is said, the people were 'ad liberationes nostras;' but that voyage was to Poictou; if it were 'ad liberationes nostras;' yet the command of the persons and ships were the king's; and true, all mariners were to be paid, and no question immediately at the king's hand, but it was first raised and levied of the people.

Whereas for escuage and knight's-service, the summons was 'quod intersitis cum equis et armis, &c. exinde proficiend' nobiscum;' but this was only to come with their horses and arms, by reason of their tenures. And it further appears, that earls, barons, knights and freemen, and all that had arms were to come 'ad defendendum caput suum et regis, et quod 'nullus remaneat qui arma portare possit;' nay, those that had neither lands nor arms, yet arms must come, and if they had nothing to maintain themselves withal, they were to be 'ad solidatos nostros,' which shews all the rest were not at the king's charge. 5 Johannis Claus. M. 1. 'Quia ad arma jurat vel qui honorem possit;' if the king could command for land, he may for sea, for both are one kingdom. In Henry the 3d's time there are divers arrays. 14 Hen. 3, Claus. 7. dors. When the king went into France, there went a command to all the sheriffs of England to swear those that staid behind, as they were sworn in king John's time; all this shews they were bound to arms.

In the statute of the Conqueror, which they styled a statute, that there should be no tallage, taillage must not be understood of those kind of aids. That famous year of 48 Hen. 3, (and observe when) that year is not only after Magna Charta, but after it was confirmed by him, 20 H. 3, when he was of full age. 48 Ed. 3, Claus. M. dors. divers captains and others not able to maintain themselves, the king commands they should be paid. De Comm' Comitatus. 48 Ed. 3, M. 2, 'de pecunia levand' circa tuitionem maris,' the king commands there, that they should come out of their counties: the summons is two-fold; First, of escuage, which is 'secundum debitum.' Secondly, general for defence, 'cum necesse fuerit.' 48 Hen. 3, Claus. M. 3, pro militib' Sancti Johannis et M. 6, dors. 'quod omnes qui nobis et coronæ nostræ jure astringant, &c.' all freemen must do this service. 48 Hen. 3, Claus. M. 3, dors. 'Nullus excludatur sexus vel ordo.' 48 Hen. 3, Claus. M. 7, the citizens of London, and the men of Greenwich, were commanded to keep the Thames that none should enter per ora eorund'; the men of Greenwich plead, that they were distrained upon common summons for their service in Kent; and the king commanded they should be freed in Kent, and join in defence of the Thames. Claus. 48 Hen. 3, M. 11 dors. to excuse one who pretended he did attend at another place with all his strength; this shews that he ought to attend the defence: nay, 48 Hen. 3, M. 4, when they refused to come, the king commanded to seize their lands, and take the profits, and answer them into the Exchequer. 48 Hen. 3, Pat M 5, he commands them to attend, setting all things apart. 48 Hen. 3, Pat. m. 10 or 5, like writ to Ipswich, Dover, and 'per costera maris;' nay, when some went away when their 40 days were expired, the king tells them, that 'propter inopinatas causas,' they should stay. Pat. 48 Hen. 3, m. 4, one hundred marks by the abbot of St. Austin's for stipends for those at sea, for defence of the sea. M. 3, dors. when they would have gone away, they were commanded upon pain of forfeiture of all they had, to stay. Bract. lib. 5, fo. 336. 'Cum fuer' in exercitu cum 'domino rege,' &c. speaking there of law suits, what may be a good excuse for absence, saith, 'ex causa necessitatis reipublicæ causa, aut 'cum rege in armis.' In the time of Edward the first, statute of Winchester, finding of arms began not upon that statute; but how, and in what manner they ought to be rated, was there appointed. 23 Edw. 1, claus. m. 4, 'de contributione faciend'' to Yarmouth, a command to the collectors of money 'ad custod' maris;' and he that was in Gascoigne was discharged of grace, but not of right. Trin. 24 Edw. 1, Rot. 62, Inter B. pro rege; there a writ issued to such and such men to find ten horsemen; one affirmed, that he had some in Scotland, and some at Cobham in Kent; the king makes enquiry whether it were so or no, and finding he had not so many as he said, commanded that he should be distrained, not only for the contempt of the king, but for the danger the kingdom might lie in for want thereof. 24 Ed. 1, Rot. 78. It was recited, that the people have been at a great charge; and because winter came on, the king willing to spare them, watches and beacons were commanded to be set up and kept, and the people to depart, but to return again upon notice. Rot. Pat 25 Ed. 1, M. 5, Custody of the Maritine was with six ships; by which it appears that Custodia Maris, and Custodia Maritima, are terms convertible. The abbot of Robertsbridge's case, 25 Ed. 1, Rot. 70, the abbot brought a replevin against one in — that lies in the confines of Kent and Sussex. The officers did own, by reason of the war between France and England, the abbot was assessed three several years, at several sums, nay, the fourth time, and no hurt done; but now, if the writ goes out but two years together (ob inauditum) but what doth he plead, doth he deny the writ? no, he pleads he was assessed for other lands; he found a horse ad custodiam predictam, so that the horse was for the land service, and the money for the sea. I conclude as Selden, 'aut 'ad ipsum mare, aut ad tam litus quam mare.'

After the statute 'De Tallagio non concedendo,' Pat. 27 Ed. 1, M. 3, 'de navibus congregandis.' Pat. 31 Ed. 1, M. 20. 'Malefacientibus in Marchiis Angliæ' a commission went out that all shall be in arms against Scotland. In ancient times there was such a connection between France and Scotland, that we had always a double war, and therefore could not expect all forces in one place. In the time of Ed. 2, Pat. 2 Ed. 2, pars 9, M. 26, 'pro rege de navigio providendo vestris sumptibus faciend'.' I see with what policy Mr. St. John went, and what multiplicity of records he cited, and opened them with as much skill as ever I knew any man; but I desire to go in the path of naked truth. I shall make it appear to all the world, that the king hath done nothing but what his predecessors have done; and that there is not more testimony to prove Littleton's first case, that the heir at law shall have his patrimony, than there is to prove this the king's right. The Second Day's ARGUMENT of Sir EDWARD LITTLETON.

May it please your lordships; The last day I left off at the end of Richard the second: I do not love to repeat, yet in regard the records that are of weightiest evidence for the king to men of understanding, are perhaps not so clearly understood by every one that hears them, I shall sum up what hath been read. It hath appeared by the records that have been read, that the sea and the land have been guarded by the commons, when danger did appear to the king: if the danger was great, all the commons, no age, no sex, no order to be spared, all ecclesiastical persons bound to defend. If the danger were less, those parts nearest unto it to defend, no reason to trouble the whole kingdom, when a few will serve the turn: those that refused were compelled by imprisonment, seizure of goods and lands. The writs have expressed fully and significantly, that no wages ought to be paid by the king; that when there was apparent danger, it appeareth by some records, that one man should not serve for another; care taken by commission, that all equality should be used in making of contribution; and when complaint, as 25 Ed. 1, was made against it, it was remedied; yet it was not ratione contributionis, but violente extortionis,

This constant usage of former kings is of much more authority and weight, than scattered judgments here and there, or judicial proceedings in any court, and these are not wanting. Notwithstanding, I shall now proceed and come to the time, wherein so many great lords did die, and so much noble blood was spilt in civil war, from Henry 4 to Henry 7; 'Henricus Rosas Regna Jacobus.' There was not then such great cause to look to preparation for sea, for the war was then in the bowels of the land; and the sea and the land make but one kingdom, and the reasons are the same for both. And for Henry the fourth, when he was newly come to the crown, it appears Rot. Claus. 1 Hen. 4, pars 1, m. 12, dors. Writs are directed to the archbishops of Canterbury and York, and other bishops; and it recites, that the French had prepared a great navy which was seen on the coasts, and intended to invade the kingdom; and that abbots and priors should be arrayed, 'sine deliberatione, &c.' 'et juxta statum et possessionem, &c. et triand' Millenis centenis.' Rot. Viagii. begins 1 Hen. 4, to 11 Hen. 4, m. 20, 'de Proclamatione faciend' to go against the rebels of Wales, 'de arriatione faciend' in the same, and batons assigned to the custody of the marches called Battelfield; less reason for this place of any, for they say there were lords marches to defend it. m. 14, 28, 'de proclam' faciend', to go with the king in person against Henry Percy a rebel; and there was an array of men by the sea coasts to resist the enemies, &c. and in the same Roll, 'De Hominibus 'Congregandis,' divers other proclamations, 'De Hominibus Defensibil'. In the same Roll, 'De Militibus infra Comit' Lancastriæ 'arraind'; upon the instruction of the earl of Northumberland, to bring them to Pomfret, m. 10 et 27, again to go to the prince Henry the fifth. And in 1 Hen 4, this goes to Northumberland, Derby, Lancaster, by Robert duke of — to invade the kingdom. My lords, noblemen, valets, &c. 'et omnes ho- 'mines defensibiles,' between 16 and 60, that was juxta statum, upon warning of two days, which was in 'Defensione Regni nostri,' to go with the king, m. 20, 'De hominibus levand'is et congregandis;' and of this nature 4 Hen. 4, m. 11, dors. et 10. 5 Hen. 4, pat. m. 28, dors. pars 2. Principal men joined together to array and muster all over England. This hath appeared by the constant common law of the kingdom.

Before Parl' 5 Hen. 4, 24, the commons pray that the commissions of array should be considered, and the judges advised with, and a commission made for the future, 'ad ariand' 'et triand' qui de corpore sunt habiles,' &c. 'juxta statum et facultates, &c. et ad assidend' 'et proportionand', with power to distrain. 7 Hen. Fitz. Her. Pat. 3 Hen. 5, m. 17, dors. pars 2. 'de araiatione faciend', care is taken that all should be arrayed, and being arrayed, should continue so arrayed. Stat. 1, Ed. 1, it provides that they shall not go out of their counties but upon the sudden coming of strange enemies; and upon warning, they were not only to array them but to lead them to the sea-coasts out of their countries, when and where it should be necessary, 'cum 'aliquid periculum eveniat,' notwithstanding the statute, which is our case; nay, our case is much stronger: And 3 Hen. 4, is verbatim with the other. 6 Hen. 5, Pat. m. 8, dors. pars 101. 3 Hen. 5, 16, dors. this was upon the threatening of the king of Castile, to all the counties of England. 7 Hen. 5, unga regis, divers privy-seals to all the counties of England, to inform the king what able men of ancestry there were, 'ad defensionem nos in propriis 'personis suis ad defensionem regni,' and the return is 'pur defence de son roaime.' If these times be not worse, I leave it to any indifferent man's consideration. 37 Eliz. Watson Roll. A warrant to the lord chancellor to make lieutenants and deputy lieutenants, which are the old commissioners of array turned into English. And in 1588, when that great Armada came, all the realm was in arms, and at the subjects charge. 31 Eliz. cap.

14. 15, the subjects granted a subsidy, in consideration of the queen's charge. And the subjects were then at great charge, both for land and sea, and she took it by the power of her council-table. The city of London was desired to find ten ships, and of themselves they desired to find twenty; this was the affection of those times, they did not dispute but were ready to obey. 28 April 1558, a letter to sir Robert Wingfield, whereas divers towns in Suffolk were charged to set out a ship, and that divers were poor and could not, a command that the richer should do it. A letter to the earl of Hunting-ton, that York should contribute to a ship charged on Hull. A letter to other towns to contribute to Colchester; they refused, yet were compelled to do it for advancement of so necessary a service. The clergy in 1588 joined, and the archbishop was captain. And there were letters for demolishing of Suburbs. Statute 3 Jac. cap. 6, where the charge of the people in queen Elizabeth's time was remembered, Loudon was charged, and foreigners and strangers were charged also to contribute, for that the charge was common. In 1588, 3,000*l.* conduct money levied for the earl of Bath; they did not stay here till the tops of the ships were seen, but they made preparations in 1587. In 1599, great troops were assembled at London, for defence of the queen, when the tumult was about the earl of Essex; and in 1598, the charge being common, the charge ought to be born in common: Nay, the Inns of Court were charged with arms; upon the apprehending the earl of Essex, a letter went to the benchers of the Inner-Temple for that purpose, and all the gentlemen found arms. Amongst these letters great levies of horse and foot at the country's charge. And where she would not have their persons, she had their purses and power to extend accordingly. 1595, Amongst the papers of the lord Nottingham, the people set forth a ship at their charge; we have the letter only to shew they did it, and how much each man did contribute. In king James's time there was not much; the times were not only peaceable but pacificous, his Motto was 'Beati Pa-cifici.' 10th of July, 2 Car. A proclamation issued, that all people should make speedy repair to several places, and should continue during the danger. And for a binding authority, 12 Car. the resolution of all the judges under their hands, and inrolled in every court at Westminster: a man should have thought that that should have given satisfaction, it would have done so in former times. And truly, that the king hath done nothing more, but what the kings of this realm have done before, is most apparent to all those who will read our law-books. How often have the judges been assembled by the king's command, both in the outward and inward Star-Chamber, and there asked questions? 2 Rich. 3, fo. 10, 8 Hen. 8, 190. b. 101, the king was there, and reasoned there. Is this a new thing for judges to deliver their opinions? But his majesty hath been pleased likewise to give way, that it might be brought to a public debate in a judicial way; he hopes there are very few that oppose it, do it out of any averseness from the public service, but to satisfy themselves, and so to submit.

To answer Mr. St. John's argument; before I come to answer in particular to what was objected by this learned gentleman, who hath taken a great deal of pains, and made as much use of it as was possible for a cause of this nature to bear; I shall in the first place give a general answer.

I say, that the testimony by records given on the other side, whereof many are vouched, which I am glad to hear of; and that men look into a business of this nature. To make such a search is for the honour of the king, that there is, according to law, the freest access to the records, that ever was in England; and that great lord (Holland) doth know that the king commanded with his own mouth, that free access should be to the records in this business; and I appeal to the officers that keep the records, whether I did not only deliver that command from the king unto them, but desired them myself to shew to the other party whatever I had.—I say, these records, take them at the best, they are not of such weight in point of right, as the other are which are for the king; for if a king shall voluntarily, and in ease of his subjects, or special grace, do any thing, yet I conceive that is not of such weight, as when he produces a constant use of compulsive power from the crown, and obeyed by the people: for if any of the kings have spoken in gentle language, as king John when he was deposed from his crown; I conceive that will not be so much as gentle words used in the writa.

I shall answer particularly to all the records that have been cited: it doth much concern the king, that this argument be answered fully.—The first thing that was said, was, that to seize goods without suit or cause, is void in law; but this was not used as an argument, but an introduction. But in the next place, he comes to a high objection, that in his majesty there is voluntas interna and externa; his inward will which he doth declare in his chamber, and his legal will, and withal, that the king cannot judge himself, 2 Rich. 2, fo. 10, 11, which was grounded upon that book-case.—The king cannot judge in his own person, but hath left it to your lordships, that are sworn to do equal justice between him and his people; but to say, that the king cannot judge himself, I question. Can that be wanting in the fountain, that issues in the stream? That I utterly deny. Is it not said, Coram Rege in the King's-Bench, and in the Star-Chamber, Coram Conciliis nostris? This is a new doctrine; and shall not the king judge? Did not Ed. 4, sit in person in the King's-Bench, in a trial of Rape? and that famous justice Popham sat at the king's feet, and other judges at the king's side, and therefore called 'justicarii a latere regis'? Sure he forgot king James, who adjudged two causes in the Star-Chamber, that of Bellingham's and sir Tho. Lake's case. The book doth no way warrant his inference; the book doth say, the king shall not judge, but saith, that if a man be convicted before the judges, the king shall not set the fine, because he hear-eth not the case. This no way concerns our case.

That no law can be changed but by act of parliament, as a naturalization, and a legitimation; nay, no writ of error but in parliament, till by the statute of 27 Eliz. and that the parliament is Curia Regis, and cited 34 Hen. 8th, Crompton's jurisdiction; the king is at no time in such state-royal as in parliament: all that was made out of this, was, that this was a change of the law, viz. the writ for shipping. We believe it is so far from being a change of the law, as that it was the custom of all ages in former times. Now he says the parliament is the highest court, and the king is there at highest both for magnificence and power; but yet out of the parliament, the king is king of England. It doth not follow, because he may do it in parliament, that therefore he can do it no where else: and it is to prove a comparison, to say, that the king should have the ordering of war as a generalissimo over his subjects and vassals; all the generals have their power from him. Oh! but the king hath provision for war. This is but a cunning insinuation, to make a survey of the king's revenue, and to insinuate, with the people; and he begins with knight's-service, tenures, and these in dangerous places, as Doyer, Durham, Chester. 35 Hen. 6, Britt. that the king should not only have his wards lands to breed them up, but to maintain the wars in the mean time; and that knight's-service 37 Hen. 6, were instituted for ordinary defence as horsemen. And because the kings of England, out of their care to have men trained up had horsemen to follow them, that therefore they shall have no aid when the kingdom is in danger, is a strange inference; shall we have no footmen, no archers, no slingers to be used in war, no guard at sea, because he hath some tenures of horsemen? This doth not discharge the subject; this is but for forty days, and was insinuated to suppress the sudden incursion from Scotland. 19 Rich. 2, Guard. 105. pl' Tenure; they do restrain particularly escuage and knights-service to Scotland and Wales. 22 Ed. 1, for Gascoigne afterwards discharged, but not for Mr. St. John's reasons. Rot. Claus. 5 Ed. 2, m. 27, these were discharged of escuage, because the king was not there in person, and because it was extraordinary. Rot. Scot. 5 Ed. 1, m. 27, that record doth shew the kings of England did conceive that they were somewhat less than enemies that refused it; for foreign service I never meant to object it.

Then he saith, that escuage is to be assessed in parliament, though for the defence of the kingdom.—If that were the proper question, I could shew when escuage was not by parliament, for it was by another reason. It was altered by an act of parliament, 17 Johannis Statute de Rahnng Mead, Nullum Scutagium, for it was not so before. Also it concerneth the subject as well as the king. 9 Hen. 3, cap. 37. The true reason of assessing in parliament is this, other men were to have escuage as well as the king; now it is true that rule, No man shall be judge in his own case, but therefore not the king; that holds no proportion: and kings are said to do no wrong. The true reason why it was assessed in parliament, was because the lords would take too much. This is from the business, I pass it over.

That they should go towards the maintenance of the war, he cannot shew any authority worth the valuing, neither Bracton nor Britton hath any such thing; for 35 Hen. 6, the words are 'pur ceo,' &c. The argument will be but thus; Because the king out of his especial care, out of his own land, provided some tenures for that purpose, therefore he shall have nothing from the subject. The king did never give, nor could give other men's lands for those tenures; for it is most apparent, the Normans came not in by conquest. William was no conqueror; for after he came in, men did recover the lands which were their ancestors. That was the wisdom when Henry the 4th took the crown by conquest, when he would have altered the laws; No! take our laws, and take our lives. This is an argument no way conducing to the purpose, because he hath some horse by tenure, therefore neither foot, nor provision for sea-fight, nor trained bands, because provision is made by tenure. This is contrary to all reason and experience: What obligation hath the soakman and the plowman's tenures, what do they pay to defend them? No consideration for it; these are rather insinuations than arguments.—Then it was said, there were like tenures for sea, and he cited two or three; one to hold the king's head at sea, and some such like, as if two or three tenures were like to defend the sea. It was also said of the Cinque Ports, that they have many privileges allowed them for that purpose, 13 Ed. 3, Par' Roll. 11.—Is the Cinque Ports service a competent provision to defend a kingdom against hostility? I know no reason but the whole body should defend itself. 13 Ed. 3, m. 9, it appears expressly, that the commons made defence at their own charge. No man can be discharged of keeping a thing, that he did not keep; so because the subject is said to be discharged, is an argument that he was charged. That of the Cinque Ports is not for the defence of the kingdom, but for intercourse of merchants, not 'Quando salus regni periclitabatur.'

Then they object, that tenures in ancient demesne were talliable without consent, and their service for the king's provisions in their house. No reason that should excuse them from the general service; for though it be true, that the king's house employs such tenants, yet the kingdom must be supported by them and the rest of the subjects together.

Then he did object, there was another way of supply of extraordinary means, as mines in other men's lands; and here he remembered m. 3 Rich. 2, Prerogative Comm', difference taken between annual and casual revenues for Defence.

Then he objected, Rot. Parl' 6 Rich. 2, 11, 42, that the king would live of his own revenues, and that the mines, &c. should be for the defence of the kingdom. Onslowe, who argued the case, said, that the king was the most excellent person both at sea and land; therefore the royal fish at sea, and the gold and silver mines at land, were given to him, because he was able to give a stamp on money. And so 2 Rich. 2, they of London prayed that the king would not put them to charge, but live on his own, and so your authority vanissheth into smoke.

The king must live, forsooth, of his ordinary revenues. M. 3, Rich. 2, which expresseth, that the king at that time would do so; that the king, by advice for salvation of the kingdom, would use these things given unto him; that indeed was a reasonable thing for that time, but must it be now turned for a necessity? 6 Rich. 2, m. 42, pars 42, that good government be about the king; then they petition that he would live upon the revenues of the crown, and that all wardships, releases, marriages, &c. should be for the defence. The king is very willing to do and ordain in this case, as by the lords of the realm may be thought best for his honour and profit; this is not a granting of the thing, but a referring it to his lords, at best it is but a temporary desire! —But oh! he hath the old Customs, and Petty-Customs, Tonnage and Poundage; of the legality of taking of it he will not speak. If the king doth impose it on the merchants, he needeth not to take it of his other subjects. Duties to the king in this year, came to 500,000*l.* and that Tonnage and Poundage was granted for ordinary and extraordinary defence. 3 Rich. 2, 5 Rich. 2, 1 Mar. granted on condition, that by the statute of Winchester, they were bound to have arms, and no such statute for the sea.

I shall answer all this; but for Tonnage and Poundage, I shall refer it for a particular place. They say, the courts of justice are maintained by the king, the king hath a profit thereby, but the maintenance of them cometh out of the subject's purse; and the first-fruits were for the defence of the faith, that no heresy should creep into the church. Therefore, because the king is lord of the English sea, he must defend it at his own charge, and not command the body nor purse of his subjects towards it. A pretty argument! He saith, the king hath the old customs, which are the ancient inheritance of the crown, and so for petty customs, and that these must go for the defence of the sea. See a judgment in the Exchequer, in Edward 1st's time; search into the Fine Roll 3 Ed. 1, and see for what causes these old customs were. It was never said till he spake it, the old customs or lesser were for this purpose. And for this saying that the statute of Winchester, 13 Ed. 1, doth enjoin keeping of arms, and thereupon all defence comes, that statute was repealed by Philip and Mary, and set a-foot by king James, and again by him repealed. I shall shew before the 13 Ed. 1, many records for land-service long before: for that statute doth only set a form of arms, and is not the beginning of arms. So for the objection of the king's revenues, be it more or less.

Now I shall come to Tonnage and Poundage, the darling argument; which I affirm was never given nor taken, of itself simply, on extraordinary defence; I have seen all the grants of it: it may be when there have been wars abroad, and then the subjects in parliament have given Tonnage and Poundage with Tenths and Fifteenths, they have been all said to have been for the defence. Tonnage and Poundage hath been given and taken merely for an intercourse of merchants; and in that sense the king said, we do and must pursue those ends for which it was granted to the crown. I shall make that appear by reason, and out of the grants themselves and other authorities.

If Tonnage and Poundage were merely for the defence of the sea, how was the kingdom to be defended before in the time of the Saxons? At the first it was 6*d.* a year, then to 2*s.* and 3*s.* for tonnage and poundage; then 3*s.* upon a ton of wine, and 8*d.* a pack on merchandize, that was all for tonnage and poundage, the rest was for old customs. If this was for extraordinary, how was the kingdom defended when this was given for half a year? Truth, it was for defence of the kingdom, that is, with relation to the intercourse of merchandize; the recital 1 Jac. saith, it hath been taken time out of mind. Hath tonnage and poundage been given time out of mind? Then it was before Richard 1st's time: H. 6, he had it for life, the statute doth express it as plain as may be; time out of mind is beyond the memory of any man living. The very interpretation of the statute explains it to be for the safety of the sea, and intercourse of merchants. In all ages before the granting of tonnage and poundage, the kings, upon a general defence, have had other aids than this by their own power. Ordinary charge for an ordinary defence.—I could have given a legal answer, that it was not given unto the king; no act of parliament for it. Yea, but it is taken de facto. Shew your instruments then by which it was taken; that had been a general answer.

But I shall carry the king's honour along with his power and practice: Rot. Franc. 2 Rich. 2. 7 Hen. 4, m. 23, Rot. 11. Tonnage and Poundage granted to merchants to guard the sea for intercourse of merchandize; which sheweth plainly it was for that purpose. To put it without all manner of question, 6 Ric. 2, m. 8. Franc. Roll pars 2. Merchants and mariners had Custodia maris, and the king granted them 6*d.* a pound: doth any man think that he would trust the safety of his kingdom with merchant's and mariners? It was merely for the guard of the sea for merchandize; express exception in the very grant, that they should not be bound by this to help against invasion of enemies, unless a royal power come, 'regali potestate excepta'; therefore this was no extraordinary service. 7 Hen. 4, Rot. Parl. is in the same manner. And in the Close Roll, that the Custodes maris should put there a lawful power for the safeguard of the sea against the enemies of the king, except a royal power; then notice to the king, so it must be understood merely for intercourse of merchants. I can shew you a Book-case for this, 9 Hen. 6, 12. Quer. Case Title Custom. Bract. 26, he saith, That Aids and Subsidies are granted to the king, to the intent that the king, by his admiral, should guard the sea, to the end that merchandize may pass and repass; not a word of the defence of the kingdom. And in anno 11, the king was at great charge with his navy; cast up the accounts of the sea duties, and then it will appear there is not left to him a penny for the defence of the sea. Impositions and prize of wine was to furnish his house, and not for defence of the sea. Not only upon this, but there was an ancient writer that wrote the Doctor and Student, whose name was St. Jermaine, who wrote in Henry the 8th's time; he tells you, lib. 2, c. 15, fo. 153. The king, out of the old customs of the realm, as lord of the narrow seas, is bound twice in the year to scour the seas, but not against all outward enemies, but only to put away pirates and petty robbers. History of Tonnage and Poundage. 25 Ed. 3, Parl. Roll. m. 11, the commons did pray, that 6d. of the 2s. a sack of wool, and of a ton of wine granted, that the merchants might have safe conduct over the sea, if it would please the king: the merchants for that would make their own conduct. All the Rolls go in that manner. 3 R. 2, 2 Hen. 4, and they cannot shew that Tonnage and Poundage was ever granted for extraordinary defence, unless for some great defence.

Next he alleged that sea duties were borne by every man in the kingdom, and that secundum statum; 22 Ed. 3, m. 4, Parl. Roll, which says it was in charge of the people, 'et nemy des merchants.'—All men must bear proportionably their share in the charge of defence; what consequence is this? because the first or second year out of the subject's purse for their commodities, therefore their lands shall be discharged in cases of extraordinary defence.

Oh! say they, but this may be done by parliament.—By a may-be a man may answer any argument; but a may-be will never answer a bill. 23 Ed. 1, Rot. 3, dors. the writs were in October, the parliament at St. Martin's in winter. In that to the archbishop of Canterbury, the king doth but a little compliment with the clergy, and telleth them he knoweth what dangers were abroad; the business of shipping was done before the parliament, so the parliament might consider of it afterwards. That it was done afore, appears; this parliament was not held at the day, but the king doth prorogue it till after St. Andrew's day, because he was busy in preparing his shipping; so they came about shipping when it was gone to sea before, for the writ of summons was the 1st of October, the day of meeting after St. Martin's; that to the archbishop was the 31st of September; the ship writs Aug. 28, and Sept. 31, then the rest, the 3rd and 6th of October; but all long before the meeting of the parliament, and so all grounded upon (it may be.) And to say that the king, because he did a thing voluntarily, therefore he must be necessitated to it, I know not what argument it is. Henry 7, indeed, did bring things to parliament for the advancement of his own ends; did queen Elizabeth send any of her commands out of parliament? and yet the subjects gave her subsidies. 24 Ed. 1. Summons there for the clergy to come if the truce did no hold with France. I think it not fit at all times, when it standeth upon intelligence, to communicate it to the whole people. 26 Aug. Summons to parliament, divers writs in February and April before, no money granted in these parliaments; therefore to tell us it might be by parliament is a poor argument.—Walsingham saith, Allegiance bindeth the king to protection, as well as it doth the subject to tribute.

The subject hath a double protection from injury and wrong, in times of peace by his laws, and in times of war by his power: must this be done by the king's single person? No, it must be done by the bodies of his subjects at their charges. Indeed it is fit that particular soldiers should be paid.—Oh! but they tell us, that Fortescue, Chief Justice of the King's-Bench, to shew the law of England to be better than the law of France, saith, that nothing could be taken from the subjects but by parliament. That is in the ordinary way; doth he say, that no man shall contribute to defend himself in imminent danger? 'Ne verbum quidem.' 27 Ed. 1, m. 7. Pat. there the king saith he did not buy lands, manors, or castles with it, but did it to defend the whole realm; no more doth our king, but only to defend himself and the kingdom.

In 33 Ed. 1, rot. 10. It is objected that a clerk sued for his salary, and had it allowed him: and the king supports his courts by the fines. But they came from the subject. And may not the king give a salary when he pleaseth? 14 E. 3, c. 1, and this were prest to prove, that aids, though granted in parliament for defence, should not be brought into example. These were not to be spent for the safeguard of England, but Scotland and France; and so it comes not to our case. 48 Hen. 3. When the tenants came with greater charge than their service required, 'non trahatur in exemplum.' True, if tenants by knights service at that time did no greater service than they were bound in time of danger, it is but reason that it should not be drawn to be yearly, to make their tenures higher. Plowden fo. 315. Wiseman's case. A covenant to stand seized to the use of the queen, in consideration she is head of the commonwealth, held no good consideration to raise an use, because there wanteth quid pro quo; and the king, ex officio, is bound to do that.—Under my lord Coke's favour, it was not in the case. The case was upon divers good considerations, and he put this in by way of admittance. I can shew when this was declared to be no law.

Next, they alledge, the king is in possession of the service of the Cinque Ports, and of tonnage and poundage, and this appears not to be expended; and of other duties for the defence of the sea, and 'Lex non facit saltum.'—Tempus belli, I reserve for another place, for that is one of the three things considerable in this argument. That learned gentleman, Mr. St. John, did confess that (as necessity requires) when the safety of the kingdom is in danger, the subject is bound. If it were material to make it appear whether any thing were spent or not, it should have been pleaded at the Exchequer, if he would have taken any advantage upon it.

But admitting they had been all expended, yet the property of the subjects goods, saith he, cannot be altered out of parliament. He did agree the kingdom must be defended, and did yield, that for the manner of it, it did not belong to the people. 6 Ric. 2, 2 Ed. 1, men and money belong to the wars; the commons did acknowledge it belonged to the king for ordering in all times; the caution of former ages was to demand it in parliament.

We shall shew in all ages, the king did it without parliament. This is a pretty thing, that the king is to direct the war, and yet shall have neither men nor money without asking his subjects leave. And for that of property being taken away, in the opening of my argument I cleared it, I shall not trouble you with repetition of it.—Oh! but they tell us, the king hath borrowed money to spend in the wars, and promised to repay it, and that without a Salvo of his right; this is an argument they think worth consideration. 48 Hen. 3, 16 Pat. I know no law that barreth the king from borrowing of money, as he hath occasion. Is it not of necessity that the king must borrow, notwithstanding both ordinary and extraordinary? Must the king carry millions about him? His occasions may be such as he must borrow, and also fit it is that it should be paid again. Doth any man think, that if the king doth borrow 10,000*l.* of any particular man, he must not be repaid again? 48 H. 3, m. 15 or 16. Power is given to the earl of Leicester to resort to the city to borrow money. Great reason, because it is the chamber of the king.—But the king's money not coming in, he desireth to borrow so much of the city, and it shall be paid when the other money cometh in; the end was for the defence of the kingdom. But that therefore the king cannot command aid from his subjects, because he borrows of his subjects, is no good argument.

Then he saith, the law delights in certainties, as in the aids 'pur file marier,' and to make his eldest son a knight; these are certain, 25 Ed. 3. All defence is uncertain, till we know the offence; certainly he must be a wise man that can do it. How shall a man know how to defend, and not know what the defence will require? whether ten or twenty thousand? and must it not be proportionable to the offence? Is not this suscipere majus et minus? Where is the argument, that because aids, which were uncertain at common law, are made certain by act of parliament, therefore must this be certain, for which there is no act of parliament?—Oh! but the Taillage in ancient demesne and burgage, they are certain; and Mr. Hampden he was assessed at 20*s.* it might have been as well 20*l.* this is uncertain, it doth rest only in the king's mercy.

The writ taketh care they shall not assess unequally: if Mr. Hampden be too high assessed, Mr. Hampden might call the sheriff in question; but the sheriff of Bucks is rather to be fined for setting him at so low a rate as 20*s.* We know what house Mr. Hampden is of, and his estate too; for any thing I know it might have been 30*l.* well enough.—But to the legal part, some must be trusted with it, and who should be but the sheriff? and the parties not without remedy if over-rated. Then they come to authority by jurisdiction, and that they that have privileges are not talliable, 'nisi pur grand cause,' and that escuage must be set by parliament, which is by act of parliament; 17 Johannis, that it was called Magna Charta; and so it was in Matth. Paris, and confirmed by Hen. 3.—He speaketh of it as a thing of story, and these were for foreign wars, as so not to our case. Oh! but it was admitted every man was to keep arms. 13 Ed. 3, 11 H. 7, cap. 18, and whilst they are in their own counties, to be drawn out of their own charge; but not to be drawn out of their own counties without wages.

Henry the seventh, afraid of his own title, makes a law, that no man should be questioned for being with the king in arms: this was to take away the occasion of the people's talking, whether they went upon just ground.—That many armies have been paid by the king. 2 Ed. 6, cap. 2, 28 Hen. 8, the rebels in the North the king promiseth satisfaction. 11 Hen. 7, cap. 1, the duty of the subject is recited in it.—What argument is this? We shew in all ages where the king commanded his people to attend him or his lieutenant, and you tell us that he paid other armies. 19 Hen. 7, doth extend to wars without the kingdom, as well as within. 11 Hen. 7, this last did expire with his death, this doth appear plainly, this was by especial gift by the king. 4 Eliz. Dyer 211. Expressly it did not extend to the service of any other king but him.

25 Ed. 3, cap. 8. None constrained to find men at arms, but those that held by such service. This must be understood with relation to the tenure, they were not to come upon common summons for escuage; but when the whole kingdom was in danger, that they should not come, was no excuse.—Oh! 26 Ed. 1, Reygnod de Gray durst not levy men without pay.* The marginal note clears this, and so no part of our question; and it appears by Walsingham, fo. 74, 75, that the king was actually then in Scotland, where he fell from his horse, and lost two of his ribs.

In the next place they say, Trin. 31 Ed. 1, there is a refusal to go without pay. The wardens of the marches of Cumberland and Westmorland writ to the barons, that whereas the Scots lay near the marches with a great army, that the people would not march out of their counties without pay.—This is easily answered; there were the East marches, and the West marches of Scotland, several counties belonging to each: what reason had they to go out of their own marches, unless they had money for the keeping of them in their absence? Rot. Pat. 10, or 11 Ed. 2, pars 2, m. 26, for war of Scotland, 9 Ed. 2, the same discharged in the county of Norfolk. 13 Ed. 3, m. 38, the abbot of Ramsey, because he remained in his own county, discharged; it was no absolute discharge, but dum sic intendit. 21 Ed. 3, Rot. Franc. Some are discharged from the custody of the sea, because they were prompti at home; some for finding hobellers and archers, and this was by reason of a grant in parliament; and some were discharged, because of their stay at home to guard the coasts. This proveth the right of the personal service, and of the contribution.

Another objection is that of 21 Ed. 3, Rot. Franc. that they should not be kept continually in array, but suffer them to stay in their own counties; but they were to go as soon as there was any notice of an enemy.—This was for the wars of France, and not for the defence of the kingdom. Oh! but 20 Ed. 3, m. 6, Rot. Scot. there were ‘Exploratores et vigiles,’ which were ‘Incolarum,’ but how ‘de assensu et voluntate?’ But this was nothing, for it was with assent in the Northern parts, and had been done in former times against Scotland. Then the 100 Roll of Feversham, which I conceive rather maketh for us, than against us; for the castle of Tunbridge is to levy 15*l.* for the king, pro salvatione of the castle, and to levy it by distress. 14 Ed. 4, cap 19, the king could not compel the subject to sell victuals for wars, nor to provide for the castle in the town, 29 Ed. 1. That was for Scotland for payment of victuals, and who can command a purveyance but the king? and that of the castle, it was the victualling of his own castle, and subjects were bound to victual their castles, 8 Ed. 2, rot. 99, the marches provided for victuals, and particular men paid for victuals, but they do not shew from whence that money came. The next is horses for the king’s service marked, that if they were lost they might be satisfied for. 24 Ed. 1, Robert — lost a horse worth 20 marks, and received satisfaction in the Exchequer, somewhat also for wages, m. 26, Ed. 1, rot. 105, 106. That is only a Concordat how men should be paid, what the horsemen should have, and what the footmen; for Yorkshire, Northumberland, and Cumberland, were to have no wages from the king, but to go against Scotland: yea, that is another thing, ‘si contra Scotos,’ and that distinction, upon stating of the case, will go throughout 14 Ed. 3, 34. for castles. 24 Ed. 2, 72, 73, dors. John de Sandell. Berwick was taken from the Scots, and for furnishing of Berwick castle, the people are compelled to trust him. Oh! but the prisoners taken in the war, and hostages, were at the king’s charge. 8 Ed. 3, allowances in the Exchequer for it. 5 Ric. 2, cap. 11, examined in the Exchequer.—The king, if he hath a prisoner taken in the war, he is to have his ransom; shall not the king pay for his charge? 4 Ed. 2, Rot. 12. Roger de Salvage, a Scotch prisoner, the king bore his charges; so because the king payeth the charges of a prisoner for which he hath benefit by his ransom, therefore he is to defend the kingdom.

Dyer 162. A man in execution cannot be forced to go to war.

Our writ doth not desire to send men in execution to go to war, for there are enough besides them. Then they object the borrowing of money, and the king paid again for it, pro necessitatibus urgentissimis. The king may have occasion to borrow money, and reason he should pay it; nothing to the question.

But the case is, whether all the people, for their wives, and for their families safety, and for the safety of the whole kingdom, may not be compelled to contribute to it? The abbot of Gloucester gave money to maintain a daunt. the king took his money for the present, and paid it back again. This was ad exonerand conscientiam: that for things taken away without warrant, the minister should answer for it, not pay and repay, but shall hold themselves satisfied with reason. But they object, that 20 Ed. 1, a commission went out to inquire, ‘de rebus captis, sive pro custodia maris, &c.’ and the king saith, that ‘il fera taunt que se tenderont a payse pur reason.’ True, ‘se tenderont a payse, &c.’ which is not to be understood, that the king will pay or repay; but that they should hold themselves satisfied ‘pur reason,’ that is, he would give them reason why they should be satisfied.

The Third Day’s ARGUMENT of Sir EDWARD LITTLETON.

May it please your lordship; I shall go on where I left; only inform you of one Record. 1 Hen. 4. The writ that went for the array of the bishop of Canterbury, which doth recite, that whereas there was danger upon the sea, he and all his clergy should ‘manus apponere’ ‘adjutrices.’ I speak of this, because it was at so low a time as Hen. 4, and it was, ‘pro salut’ populi.’

Coia’ Pl’ 14 Jac. Between Weaver and Ward, command came from the king and council, that the Train-bands in London should be mustered for the training and making of them ready to defend the kingdom. One in the training hurt his companion, and he thereupon brought his action against him: and this was pleaded in bar, that he was mustered by pecial command; and this was adjudged a good justification, because it was for the preservation of the land: 28 Hen. 8, which recited that the king did pay them in Lincolnshire; but for the other, he saith, that he shall remember their pains.

I shall now go on. It was objected, that by the statute of William 1, the people should enjoy their lands freely, 'sine omni injusta exactione sive tallagio.' This was for money to be received for a general thing; but that it was not for this thing appeareth in one chapter, that knight-service tenures should do what belonged to it. The rest 'sunt fratres conjurati ad monarchiam Angliæ defendendæ': 14 Ed. 3, chap. 1: 25 Ed. 3: 1 Ed. 1, Walsingham 184. All these are set aside by the statute, and concern not our question. Ours is rateable and proportionable, according to old practice. And it is one thing to compel a particular man, and another thing to set an equal rate upon the whole kingdom.

Ult. Feb. 3 Car. A Commission of Loans for the Defence of the Kingdom. They mean the commission, which was a consideration to levy monies, by reason of the necessity of the times. It appeareth in the Journal Book to be for impositions, or otherwise to raise monies not concerning this question. It appears by that, that the king gave a gracious answer unto it; and that it was done for the present time only, a warrant for advice only. It was done to raise money in general; but no determination of right, and said, at your desires it shall be cancelled. Then there was a commission for Loans, 5 Feb. 2 Car. and this they say was for the defence of the kingdom. It appears it was for the defence of the Palatinate and Denmark; and for that a bishop was sentenced for his mistaking; Mr. Pym brought up the Articles against him.

I shall now come to an objection, worthy the making by Mr. St. John; and because it is a thing not truly understood, but taken at random, I shall crave your lordship's patience: and that is the statute De Tallagio non Concedendo, 25 Ed. 1, made after the king went into Flanders, and agreed upon here by the prince as viceroy, and afterwards sent into Flanders to be sealed by the king, as it is put in some books. The words are general: no Tallage to be taken without the consent of the lords in parliaments. For this I desire the liberty to inform you of the story of the times, to make a better answer. This is not all, in some Statute-Books it is not mentioned; in others, no king's reign mentioned. And in Ed. 1, no year of it, and now they would apply it to the 25 Ed. 1, and this they would ground upon the compelling of Aid, 23 & 24 Ed. 1. And the commission in 24 Ed. 1, did issue upon that, and consequently that this aid was the aid complained of, and then redressed.

Walsingham, a monk of St. Albans, they rely upon for this, that wrote some seven-score years after the thing was done. Sir Edward Coke saith, Chronicle Law is not much to be regarded. True, he saith, Chronicle histories may shew us the times, but if it tell us what the law is, we are not to believe them. No historian, that I ever knew yet, ever read the Records, and therefore no true history; for the most part they are taken up in Paul's, or the street.—To take something in consideration, by way of stating the case, upon the statute Confirmata. Char. and the other De Tallagio non Concedendo, that is, that no aid shall be levied but by consent in parliament.

The first statute is, that no such aid shall be levied, the nature of it, and the acts themselves rightly compared, there remains no scruple against the case. Three things for the true understanding thereof must be considered. First, What kind of aids had been in use before 25 Ed. 1, and for what they are taken. Secondly, How and what remedy was given by that statute. And, Thirdly, How far that statute De Tallagio non Concedendo is in force and authority in this case.

For the first, it appeareth in the common story, that in 21 Ed. 1, the king of France had seized all the duchy of Gascoigne, upon pretence that he did not appear at his parliament at Paris upon a summons. Thereupon the first took a course for the regaining of his duchy, and the war continued with various success, till 25 Ed. 1. And he had also war with Scotland and Wales. For though Wales was taken 12 Ed. 1, yet there was one Matlox who pretended himself to be of the blood of the prince, till 23 Ed. 1, and till that year they were not quieted. And he having all these wars against Flanders, Gascoigne, Scotland and Wales, some at one time, some at another, and most altogether, divers aids and supplies were taken upon these occasions of several natures; some were by voluntary grants of the people, some were by impositions and levies by the names of tallages or taxes to be paid to the king, some by assessment of lands, as the abbot of Robertsbri-ge, 25 Ed. 1. All this appeareth by the commission to enquire of extortion. And besides all these, some by prizes of goods and money taken from the possessors without any payment, rates, or taxes. Nay, there was then ransacking of the monasteries, and taking of the monies found there; Mr. St. John's case for money taken out of their treasury: and besides all these, there were some by way of ransom, as Mr. St. John rightly observed, and shewed his learning and industry, that the clergy upon their denial were put out of the king's protection: and they did ransom themselves by giving a fifth part of their goods. Pat. 25 Ed. 1, m. 11, pars 2. The people being thus grieved with such aid and prizes so extraordinarily taken for the maintenance of foreign war, obtained that it might be enacted, that such aid in a relative term may not be granted nor taken without their consent, by the statute of 25 Ed. 1, and Confirmata Char. Observe this one thing, the markets of England three years before had granted the king subsidium pro guerra, upon every sack of wool five marks; three marks upon woolfells; upon every pack of skins five marks: and this was granted of their own free-will, and this was to continue for two or three years: 22 Ed. 1, m. 2, Sine Roll. where it is there relicted. Next year, before Confirma' Charta, all the laity, except cities, boroughs, and ancient demesns, had granted to the king in subsidiu pro guerra, the 11th part of their goods, 24 Ed. 1, m. 2, Pat. pars 2. And the summer before Confirma' Chart' an 8th granted by all the laity, except the cities and boroughs; and they granted a fifth, and this was still for the war, 25 Ed. 1, m. 11, Pat. The application is this: Those many aids of these several kinds having been granted for the war, divers men of that time did doubt and fear, that however they meant it but for a certain time, yet being not so clearly expressed, it might bind them for the future; and that they so doubted, appeareth by Confirma' Char'. And inasmuch as divers of our realm are in fear, that the aid and taxes which they have given us before time towards our war and other business, of their own gifts and good-wills, might turn to a bondage to them and their heirs; and likewise for the prizes taken, we do grant for us and our heirs, that we shall draw no such aid, taxes, nor prizes, into a custom, for any thing done heretofore, be it by rule or any other precedent that may be found.

Then my lords, for no occasion such manner of aids, taxes, or prizes shall be taken but by common consent; but it endeth not so, saving the ancient aids and prizes due and accustomed. This being the state of the case, be pleased to observe the complaint of the people; this kind of aid, it is plain, was never meant there, when 'salus populi periclitabatur,' and may be levied notwithstanding the statute: for the act is only against such kind of aids as had been voluntarily granted by the people, some by merchants, and some by others, that they should not be taken against their wills hereafter, but by consent in parliament. Such is a relative, it is not general no aids, but no such aids.

Secondly, it refers to those that were voluntarily granted to the king for Scotland and Wales, and his other wars. And another reason why these aids that had been for the custody of the sea, could not be said to have come of their good-wills: for observe the abbot of Robertsbridge's case, it appears plainly it was done against their wills, for the custody of the sea, by virtue of the king's writ.

August before Confirma' Char' those that had given an 8th part, they did obtain expressly letters patents, that such their free gifts, hereafter might not be in servitutum, 25 Ed. 1, that is the very thing doubted in Confirma' Char'. Now those that had granted an 8th had no reason to do it, for they had a charter to free them, but the other had not: and therefore the statute might well say, some did tear. So upon the whole matter, there are no other aids but these voluntarily granted at that time, none in the body of the act but those granted with a good-will, for those foreign wars; and the forty shillings received by the king upon every sack of wool, with three marks granted 22 Ed. 1, was by the merchants only for the war in Gascoigne; and thereupon it was enacted, that the king should not take such things but by consent.

There is also in the statute Confirma' Char' an exception, that all antient aids due and accustomed were excepted; and therefore what kind was meant in the body of the act, the exception makes clear, antient aids excepted; this was an ancient aid; and therefore never meant there to introduce a new law, that no aid should be taken, but no such aid. No imposition should be taken; but the practice of all ages shews this hath been levied ever since, from time to time, which is an interpretation of the words of the law. This I do open, to make way to the statute De Tallagio non Concedendo. Thrice in the statute is this word (such) but that they should make use of that statute De Tallagio non Concedendo, of itself, without relation to that; whereas it will appear it is a mere extract out of this, and no statute itself: for debate of that; this De Tallagio is the same with that Confirma' Char', it is a plain extract of it, or some other thing at some other time. Sometime in some printed book, 'nulum Tallagium,' no aids shall be taken by the king: sometimes without notes of time when made, and at the best it is no more, but it is said it was made in the time of Ed. 1.

If we shall compare Confirma' Char' and the articles that were in this, we shall find it to be nothing but an extract out of that statute, and that it was no act of parliament. And to make it appear it was an extract taken out of it, observe the general heads, De Tallagio non Concedendo. First the charter against prizes. Secondly, Another against wool. Thirdly, A general confirmation of the laws and liberties. Fourthly, A pardon to divers lords there.—These are the things in which they would make it a statute of itself, all expressed in Confirma' Char' they do not differ in substance. A sixth head is the very year of the 25 Ed. 1, for the pardon of those lords was made 5 Nov. 25 Ed. 1, this same was sealed by the king word by word, proved by the statute-roll, the very same roll that hath Confirma' Char' the next fol. The monk did mistake this statute. No man will believe a monk, that wrote seven score years after, against a record.

I shall shew what was sent over into Flanders, and that was Confirma' Char. and did bear date the 10th of October, the king being then in Flanders, and was there sealed by the king himself. That it may appear, there is no manner of question of it, here is the very copy of the statute-roll; and the whole Confirma' Char' is recited verbatim, in witness, 10 October 25, of our reign: whereas Walsingham saith, that this very charter, word for word, was sealed in Flanders, under the great seal of England, 5 Nov. 25 of our reign, and sent back into England. For the statute-roll against that time, doth expressly say, that this was the charter that was sent over into Flanders, and hath the same teste, word for word: and this was sent back into England to confirm it further. The next thing that followeth upon the same date and roll, is the pardon of the earls; this was dated 5 Nov. after this Confirm' Char. was sealed.

They have not yet shewed that this statute De Tallagio non Concedendo was ever entered upon the roll; nay, it could not be entered: who would think that an extract of an act of parliament should be entered upon the roll? If they can quit Mr. Walsingham, they are wise men: they must carry the practice of all times. Where did any man see that this act of parliament was ever shewed to discharge men of the defence of the kingdom since 25 Ed. 1? Did no body know this mystery to plead, not to defend the sea and their land? Did no man hear of this till now? Shall this, against all the practice of the times ever since, take away such a flower of the crown, as to compel people to grant aid for the defence of themselves? A harsh construction!—If this should be true, it would destroy even acts of parliament: to what purpose is that statute made of the 25 Ed. 3, if that were totally taken away before? and if no aid, those aids 'Pur fille marrier, &c.' are taken away also. Nay, if this be an act of parliament, when was it made, before the 25 Ed. 1, or since? It appears not when: it is indiviguum vagum, I know not what, but in truth an extract. Nay, if this be an act of parliament under these words, no tallage is equivocal as well as aid; that is proper tallage that is laid upon villages. 25 Ed. 3, 100 Avowry. Entries 406. b. 8. Ed. 2, Execution 15 Ed. 3, 106 Avowry. A rent may be released by the name of Tuillage: no mention of this in all ages.

Then it was objected, that 25 Ed. 1, m. 7. pars. 2, expressed in the king's proclamation 12 Aug. before ever he was going into Flanders, that he was sorry for the aid demanded of his people.—Let him remember for what reason he did demand those aids which he was sorry for; they were aids granted not for the defence of the kingdom alone, but for the defence of the kingdom mixed with foreign defence by reason of wars with Gascoigne, Wales, Scotland, and elsewhere; for that it was for foreign wars. Upon this followed the commission, 26 Ed. 1, Pat. that went to all the kingdom, which makes for us.

There are three parts in that commission: 1. To observe if the officer did any thing without warrant, they should return it. 2. If done wrong, the king would answer it. And, 3. They should be satisfied with reason if the king did warrant it. The answer thereunto given was upon another construction made of the words of the record in the parliament 2 Ric. 2. The cause was this: the chancellor declaring the cause of calling the parliament, he doth shew, that the king, in the end of the last parliament had assigned some lords to be of his continual council for the year following; the number was seven that were assigned, and they were sworn to give good counsel for the aid of the kingdom. These counsellors treating of the peril of enemies from all parts, and the matter requiring dispatch, they durst not undertake the ordering of so perilous a thing, therefore ordered a grand council to be assembled. The grand council was assembled, to whom was shewn the great peril and mischief of the kingdom apart, by war, by land and sea; and that nothing was remaining in the treasury for the maintenance of war: For a final conclusion, that they might remedy this mischief, they say, that it cannot be done without parliament; this was the English of it, and in the mean time an army might be landed: And for the present supply of the charge of such an army, they lent the king great sums, which by great security and other things, he did engage himself to pay; Upon this the lords did advise how it might be done with the least charge to them all, and how the king's right of his crown, and other inheritance beyond the seas might be safe, and the king, kingdom, and themselves defended, to the confusion of all their enemies: To this purpose the treasurer was directed to be ready to shew what was expended the next parliament, to be bestowed for the marches of Scotland, Wales and Ireland; and said in that great council, they could not remedy that mischief without charging of the commons, which cannot be done, say they, without parliament.—It is plain, by the story of that time, and the words of the chancellor, that it was for the maintenance of the war in France, Scotland and Ireland. And though the defence of the kingdom be mentioned with these wars, yet the main supply was for these foreign wars.

In the next place, a little before in the parliament, the like aid for the like occasion was desired by the king, 2 Ric. 2, m. 24, 25, Parl. Roll. What did the commons say now? They ought not to bear such foreign charges. The king gave them a fair answer, admonished them, for Gascoigne concerned the kingdom of England, for that is as a Bulwark to the kingdom of England: Burbacon is an old Fort de Hors; for the aid demanded in that parliament was with this relation as consonant; both together concerned the defence of the kingdom, that they might be bulwarks for the kingdom of England.—In the next place, who spake these words? The lords, said they, could not remedy the mischief without a parliament. The lords assigned by the parliament, they must not do it; it is dependent upon the other part, the lords could not do it that way.

But shall we come home, and speak plain English? We know this was 2 Ric. 2, a young prince. It doth appear expressly, that these things were brought into the parliament for advice, which were fit for royal authority, for expence for wars, and for counsel, and for governing of this realm. It appears further, by the very chancellor's speech, that the council had been heretofore ordained for the guarding of the kingdom, 2 Rich. 2, Rot. Parl. This parliament taking notice of the king's tender age, they took much power unto themselves. There was to be a council for the governing of the kingdom in general; but the counsellors should be chosen to govern the state for two years, and these counsellors not to be removed from the king without the parliament; and more than that, his treasurer was to be governed by the parliament, and his counsellors chosen in parliament.

At the end of the Petition of Right, neither lords nor commons, jointly nor severally, can make a new law without his consent; and that your lordships, and none but you, are the interpreters of the law, wise king James did declare.

The next thing considerable is, tempus belli to defend it. It is when the condition of the time is such, that the current of justice and law is by such violence stopped, as judges do not sit, nor sheriffs dare execute their office, nor any court is open, especially the Chancery, which is Officina Justitiæ. It was said there was a time when the king might command this levy, to which they did agree: They did agree the king might command this levy when he hath proclaimed a war, though no stroke stricken, no danger, nor armies, nor opinion of any force coming; this doth put it into the king's power by their own consent. And by all reason, 19 Ed. 4. 6. Brian's Opinion. How many wars have been proclaimed in this latter age? No war denounced in 1588, though consulted of in Spain; and they did not think fit to denote a war, saith sir Walter Raleigh; those days are past. Now they begin by the sword, not by the trumpet or herald.

In the next place, they say, if the king be in the field with his banners displayed; this they say was tempus belli. Cannot the course of justice sit then, but there must be a peace? 39 Ed. 3, Rot. 10. Did not the court of justice sit then? Our ordinary printed books shew what causes of law then were. And in Henry 6's time, in all our civil wars, and in Henry the 7's time, they sat then. But the true time, to make it tempus belli, is to make a war against the king.

In the North, towards Scotland, when the enemy approaches, is it necessary that it must be a time of peace, because the court of justice sits at Westminster-hall? There may be then a strong war in the North and West, as ever was in England, when the court of justice sits here. That tempus belli may be in some places of the kingdom, and in some places not, appeareth 33 Ed. 3, and who shall discern if there be any danger?—They agreed in general, the king may do it, and that the power of discerning is in his majesty: I shall leave it in the king, till Mr. St. John finds a third person to do it. 13 Hen. 4, for the murage, they say that this doth only charge those things that are venalia, for men are not compelled to go to market. How shall they then live? True, it is not compulsory to go thither, but it is compulsory to pay the money.

1 Ric. 2, m. 176, pars 2. A petition from the city of London, to have all owners of lands to be rated with them in the danger of wars, not having lands in tenure to do it.—This doth make for us; that not only merchants, but every man in the lieu of tenure to do it. The lord St. Albans saith of Henry 7th, that kings may fall from their absolute power when they see cause, but not be compelled to do it. They say supplies are called those things, sine qua non the kingdom may not be defended: And because there is a way by parliament, therefore no other way.

They say, it will not be affirmed that the king hath the same power for an offensive, as defensive war; I affirm, nor defend nothing; the parliament is a great body, and the kingdom may be lost in the interim. Then they alledge there is forty days for essoinage, and the like for parliament. Many times things are impossible, and inconvenient to be done by parliament.

First, impossible; the necessity may be such that it will not brook the delay of a parliament. 48 Hen. 3, summons to the Cinque Ports. They come day and night to the king when any danger is. It hath been said, that there are seven months between the teste of the writ and the ships being at Portsmouth; in that time a parliament might have been summoned. The great one, and the true answer is, that this resteth still in the king's judgment. If the king hath intelligence that foreign states will set out the next spring a fleet, and for conveniency of his people sendeth seven months before-hand to raise this aid; hath the people any cause to complain of this? Mr. Hampden hath not paid the money yet, being two years after.

If they should have gone by parliament, see what rubs in this case might be. Forty days are spent before the parliament sits: Then when they meet in parliament there is a ceremony in choosing of a Speaker, solemnities in these take up time: Then the lords take things into consideration, then they must have conferences and disposes with both houses; before they agree, the kingdom may be lost: In the mean time, suppose this comes in some reasonable time, to make assessments first in the cities, then in the burroughs, then particular assemblies, then divisions; and after all this, there must be collectors appointed to levy the money; what a great deal of time is spent in all this, every man may see.

Our county, say they, is an inland county, and they cannot find a ship suddenly; and therefore the greater the king's mercy and favour to lend them his ships instead thereof. When all this is done, and ships provided, reasonable time must be allowed to sail from the North to Portsmouth; but this doth solely rest in the judgment of the king.

31 Hen. 8, cap. 8, an act of parliament not to take away any of their inheritance or lands. Here is no lands or goods taken away; only let them contribute to the defence of themselves, and all is done. Mr. Hampden hath had none of his goods touched. They say, for shipping it was done in king John's time at the subjects charge; but they do not meddle with land-service at that time. 15 Johan. 13, dors. Rot. Claus. king John had business beyond the sea. That this was rather for beyond sea, than the kingdom, appeareth thus: The writ saith, to have such ships as would carry eight or six horses, and that must needs be for some foreign service, and not for land-service at home. And it appeareth, Rot. Claus. m. 1, dors. the king was well landed at Rochel.

For the terms of the law, which concerns hidage and other things, Bract. 37, and some services introduced by common consent, I will not trouble you with it. To come to the case of the abbot of Robertsbridge, that arms was laid on by the statute of Winchester. That will not serve, arms was long before that time. They say the assess was in time of war; the French had burnt Dover, 23 Ed. 1, and that the assessment was not made by the king's authority: but it appears it was by the king's authority, by virtue of his writ, 25 Ed. 1, Lo. Treas. Rememb. Leybourne was admiral of all the kingdom; and was Custos Maris et Maritim' for some parts: but that it was for land-service, and not for sea-service. Custos Maris et Maritim' are terms convertible; he that doth one, defends the other. They have left no stone unturned to take away the force of this case. They tell us now, the clergy was put out of the king's protection this year, and so it appears in the Exchequer; but they have not shewed any such writ delivered into the common-pleas, only Spencer's word of mouth, that they should have no privilege there. Suppose it were so in other courts: 25 Ed. 1, it appears plainly, that the clergy came all to be in the king's protection, and gave ransoms: and this cause was not till Michaelmas after. And whereas it is said, this abbot's case did only concern the land-service, it proveth both the one and the other; money for the sea-service, horse and man for the land-service.—Oh! they say, 29 Ed. 1, Mag. Char. was not observed; and instanced John de Gray and Philip's case. Whatsoever was the practice of that time, is not material. And for that of the Charter of the Forest, they say, though it be there said, 'Nullus emitat vitam vel membrum pro venatione nostra,' yet one was beheaded.

But what is all this to the safe custody of the sea? Nay, they have not shewed your lordships, that there was any thing in that great charter for the custody of the sea. 51 Hen. 3. fol. 84, Britt. 117, Flet. et Fitz-Her. Lord Coke on Littleton. Perhaps question might be about this in the exchequer at this time, the case of Shoreham discharged of land-service, because they found shipping. That that were nearest danger most fit for that defence; as the king, in the tenth year of his reign, sent only to maritime towns. 2 Ric. m. 42. They say Beverly was discharged, because it was an inland town, therefore no inland town ought to pay. A writ directed to William Russel, admiral, commandeth only the sea coasts.

13 Ed. 3, m. 35, Rot. Claus. Part: 1, afterwards discharged, because of other service. And for that of Beverly, a complaint that they were to contribute to such a town to find a ship; they say they have privileges, but the special reason why it was freed, was for reverence the king did bear to St. John de Beverly. Mr. St. John knows it; 120 ships granted to the two admirals, North and West, for service beyond the sea. 31 Ed. 1, 'de inventiendo' horses, because of great business in his wars abroad, he bound them to make galleys for foreign service. True, the king at this time was in Scotland, and kept his Christmas there. Then come to 31 Ed. 1, as though he should do it by service of the Cinque Ports: Newcastle upon Tyne at their own charges: but when into Scotland at the king's pay, then they came to this. 10 Ed. 3, m. 6, Rot. Claus. sent for ships into North-Wales and South-Wales; the writ did say, that wages used not to be paid for such service; and did express in his writ, satisfaction should be given unto them, not of right, but de gratia: and reciteth that clause, that the people were bound unto it. 2 Ed. 3, 16 dors. That there should be three hundred pounds to relieve the fishermen, the king should not have it of the people of that town. They say all these records being matter of fact, did occasion the making of many statutes of redress. 14 Ed. 3, cap. 1, great aid for Scotland, France, and Gascoigne; 15 Ed. 3, m. 9, contrary to Mag. Char. 22 Ed. 3, m. 4, 36 Ed. 3, m. 9, no goods to be taken without consent: these are things comprehended within the Petition of Right. 37 Ed. 3, m. 2, speaketh only of the great aids. 23 Ed. 3. Galleys made; they say the king paid for them: that is, upon the king's own promise; but they say that is nudum pactum. Then they say, is the king's word nothing? 15 Ed. 3, m. 9, called a parliament, propounded as on the king's part; they are not liable to the defence of the sea. If the commons have nothing to do with the guard of sea, why is it propounded unto them?

20 Ed. 3. m.—That the guard of the sea henceforward be made at the charge of the king, as hath been promised, and there the people discharged. They do not affirm in their own case there was any right. 21 Ed. 1, rot. Franc. m. 9. 2s. on merchants wools, and 6d. poundage for a certain time, and to cease tam quam, &c. 22 Ed. 3, 2s. upon a sack of wool may cease. All these things were granted for foreign wars; and if the cause should cease, then the thing should cease. 2 Hen. 4, commission for building of galleys, the king would confer with the lords about it: then 19 Hen. 4, 17, 21. touching the guard of the sea, not bound unto it.

4 Hen. 4, 28 m. Tonnage and Poundage not to be taken without common consent. A protestation of the commons doth not bind the king, and concluded with nullum tempus occurrit regi.

The First Day's ARGUMENT of Mr. HOLBORNE, on the Behalf of Mr. HAMPDEN, before the Judges in the Exchequer-Chamber, in the great Case of SHIP-MONEY.

May it please your lordships; In obedience to your lordships commands, I am ready, though not as I desire, nor as the cause deserveth, to argue it; it being impossible for one in so short a time to be fitted to make a reply to the life of the cause of an argument, so long, so learned, and so full of records, wherein neither labour nor learning was wanting. I may say of him, as one said once, 'etiam hæc defensa fuisse.'

I shall now rather shew your lordships what I should do, than what I shall for the present. I shall proceed well, hoping the subject will excuse, and your lordships greater care supply, my defects, which have been without any default.

My lords, the case upon the records stands thus: In May last there issued out of the Exchequer a Writ of Scir' Fac' to the sheriff of Bucks, to warn my client to shew cause, why he should not pay 20s. assessed upon him by the late sheriff of that county, for the finding of a ship of war mentioned in the writ, 4 Aug. 11 Car. sent into that Inland country, and the 20s. certified into the Chancery to be unpaid, and sent over into the Exchequer by Mittimus, to be levied there. Mr. Hampden hath appeared, and demanded oyer of the writ 4 Aug. of the Mittimus, &c. and upon the reading of them all, hath demurred in law generally; and the king's counsel have joined in demurrer: and I humbly conceive judgment ought to be given for my client.

My lords, I shall proceed to the stating of the questions, which are three: the first, which is a chief one, is this; whether, upon the whole record, the case do appear for the king; that 4 Aug. 11 Car. being the day of the date of the writ, the king could charge the county of Bucks to find a ship at their costs and charges? By way of admittance, if he could, yet whether the king can give power to the sheriff to assess the county as in this case? By a further admittance, admit that the king have power to charge an assess, whether he can levy the money unpaid by this course of Certiorari and Mittimus, as he might do if it were his own proper debt? Of these three questions, whereof the two last remain untouched, and not argued by us, I chiefly intend to insist.

For the first question, though argued fully, yet I doubt, as yet, whether it standeth rightly stated; not but that I conceive Mr. Solicitor had good colour to state it, as he made it, partly by the record, yet somewhat out of our admittance, yet by admittance only, and so expressed. Again, another reason which I conceive, there was a necessity on the king's part, so to make it as Mr. Solicitor stated it, or else to waive the debate.

The first question is, whether or no, upon the whole record, the case so appeareth for the king, that 4 Aug. 11 Car. being the date of the writ, the king could by his writ charge the county of Bucks for the finding of a ship of war? This, on his majesty's part, hath been stated in these records, whether the king finding in his judgment the safety and preservation of the kingdom and people necessarily and unavoidably to require this aid commanded by this writ, might not command such an aid by the writ, for saving and preserving of the kingdom and people; wherein I confess there is not one word but hath its weight.

As to this question, thus made, I shall take three exceptions, which are things taken in to be granted, which I shall not argue if I can avoid them. That at least, in the king's judgment, the safety and preservation of the kingdom was endangered 4 Aug. that is, that the kingdom was in danger to be lost. If it be so that the kingdom was in such danger, and that the danger was so instant and unavoidable, that it necessarily required this aid by this writ; that is, it required a present charge of shipping presently, 4 Aug. 11 Car. to be forthwith commanded, and that occasion could not expect a parliamentary consideration and supply; these be things wherein we differ. And, lastly, for the truth of it, the certificate was sufficient in a legal way.

My lords, to find out whether the record doth warrant these three things of great importance. First, I shall seek for them in the writ 4 Aug. and next in the Mittimus; there is no colour elsewhere to look for them. To open the writ rightly will clear these differences, as I humbly conceive, without any great argument. And first, for the writ dated 4 Aug. 11 Car. I shall read the words, wherein the danger of the kingdom is expressed, and then explain what words give that sense that is taken out of them.

'Quia datum est nobis intelligi' quod prædone quidam pirati et maris grassatores tam nominis Christiani hostes Mahumetani quam alij congregati, naves et bona et mercimonia, non solum subditorum nost' verum etiam subditor' amicor' nost' in mari quod per gentem Anglicanam ab olim defendi consuevit nefarie diripientes, et spoliantes: ac ad libitum suum deportaverunt homines; in eisd' in captivitate miserimam mancipantes. Cumq; ipsos conspicimus navig' indies præparantes ad mercatores nost' ulterius molestand' et ad regni gravand' nisi citius remedium apponatur, eorumq; conatui viriliter obvietur. Et considerans etiam periculum quæ undique his guerrin' temporibus imminunt, ita quod nobis et subditis nostris defensionem maris et reg' omni festinatione quam poterimus accelerare convenit, nos volentes, defensionem reg' tuitione maris securitate subditor' nost' salva conductione navium, &c.' Here are the causes and occasions; all that comes after is not material to the stating of the question.

My lords, in the opening of this writ, it is true, there was mention of loss by merchants of some particular members of the kingdom. And this loss by 'prædones pirati quæsi Mahumetani et al'; and though 'alii' yet pirate still and no more; then it saith 'ipsi' still those pirates daily prepared ships, but not armed with men. What to do? To molest the merchants, and, 'ad gravandum reg'; as pirates still hitherto. I conceive there is not a word of danger from any empire, but from pirates; not a word of danger to the kingdom, but to merchants: however, all this is quod intellexerimus. The record goes on thus, 'Consideratis etiam periculis, &c. imminet.' This part, as I conceive, is not so positive, the dangers are but 'consideratis,' nor the danger to the body of the kingdom. No word of that; or if to the kingdom, yet nothing in point of safety only, but in point of molestation: none of all these appears. And besides, the clause is too general, not expressing any particular danger, from whom or how. However, be the danger to the one or to the other, be it to the kingdom or to the merchants, be it for trouble or for safety, hitherto I may say there is no mention of any such instant danger, as necessarily did require this instant command in the writ, not so much as in the king's judgment. For ought that appears, a parliament, even in the king's judgment, might have been called, and consideration taken for a defence. Here be all the premises upon which the conclusion must arise; and hitherto nothing material to make a danger to the safety of the kingdom, and so instant, that a supply nunc aut nunquam must come in.

Although the premises, I conceive, are only considerable, yet the conclusion will be but this, convenit accelerare; but it is fitting to hasten: but no such necessity, though it be 'convenit accelerare pro defensione reg.' If that were material, it cannot be construed, but with relation to the premises on which it is built. And whether in fear of trouble, or danger, or loss, non constat: and though it be 'cum omni festinatione,' yet it is 'qua poterimus;' and that is 'possimus quod jure poterimus;' that is, with all the haste that by law you can make: which way this is, your lordships have heard. Now, my lords, it appears on the record, that there was no such instant necessity, but that a parliament might have been time enough; for that it was observed between the test of the writ and the rendezvous, there were 200 and odd days, whereas a parliament requireth but 40; in the remainder of these 200 days, the parliament might have considered of the means of defence. But I leave it to your lordships to judge, notwithstanding those expences of time cunningly reckoned up to your lordships by Mr. Solicitor; and though it be true, that things are oftentimes long in deliberation, yet nature tells us they can be sooner. If there be a necessity, we know that will force.

I have but opened this writ 4 Aug. I am now come to the Mittimus: The only doubt which I conceive in the Mittimus is, that where the case stands but thus, in this writ is recited the tenor of the writ 4 Aug. and then the writ goes on, and saith, 'Quia salis reg' periclitabatur,' and that is all the clause in the record that gives colour to the case so to be made. And to the whole record we have demurred.—Here it hath been said, we have confessed all by the demurrer; and if that hold not, the king, who is the judge of the danger, hath said so, he hath certified so under the great seal: and on these depends the weight of both these processes:

To this I have many answers, but I shall select a few from many others, on which I shall rely. My first answer is this; here the words are, that 'Salus reg' periclitabatur.' These words in shew seem to be positive, but in substance but relative; and are rather but a comment on the writ, or an abstract in point of those dangers mentioned in the writ, for the clause was brought in on the return of the writ; and if we have the writ itself, the comment thereupon, or further explanation thereof, is not material. My second answer is; I doubt, I say no more, if the king put particular reasons into the writ 4 Aug. whether the law, I speak of legal course, doth permit any after writ to put in further clauses of the same nature with the former, to the same end. If the case be thus, then our demurrer will be no confession of any such danger.

In the next place, admit the words in the writ had been positive, and materially expressed; yet, according to our rules of law, it cannot make use of that sense they are now applied unto: For the best, the word 'salus,' being only proper to a physical and natural body, is applied here to a body politic. It is but a metaphor, which the law will not endure in writs, for it would bring in great mischiefs. In writs and in pleadings, metaphors are dangerous: We know not how to take issue upon it, and therefore it is not regularly allowed; but I leave it to your lordships judgments.

There are no words of the danger of the loss of the kingdom, that is, such instant danger; for apply the words to a natural body, as salus J. S. is in danger, it doth not presently imply, that he is in such instant danger of death. A doctor will say a patient hath not his health, yet no danger of death, it is the common speech; the same sense it must have in a body politic. If the words were good, and did imply a danger, yet not such a danger as may hazard the loss of the kingdom; for the words are only 'Salus reg' periclitabatur,' and the thing may be never in action, which twenty years hence may lose the kingdom. A man may say, that the safety of the kingdom is in danger. At the best, the words will not make the case as it is put.

Mr. Solicitor, out of his great care, searching into every hole where he thought we might peep out, doubting our demurrer would not be a confession sufficient, he takes in another help, which is this, that if this be so declared by the king's opinion, and under the great seal, that this alone had been sufficient. For this there hath been urged, the legal weight of the king's affirmation, and of a certificate under the great seal; and both be concluded in this case.

My Lords, before I answer to this matter, I profess, for my client and myself, that we make no doubt of the king's word, and believe there was danger, though not so apparent to us; but only loth to allow it as sufficient in a legal proceeding, lest what his majesty, in his own words deserves, by after princes might turn to a disadvantage.—That which we urge is, how far in form of law this may be allowed, we shall argue, and that briefly, for the case needeth no help. For this point I take it for leave, under your lordships favour, that in legal proceedings, and regularly, his majesty's opinion, and certificate in things of fact, is not binding. Yea, but they say, it is matters of state and government. For that, to ask the question, whether or no raising forces thus is left to his majesty, that stands and falls on the main cause.

My Lords, I do agree, in divers cases the king's affirmative shall be conclusive in matters of fact, that is, when it is not so triable elsewhere; as in a writ De Rege incensulto, to stay proceedings, when the king certifies matter of fact, the writ must be obeyed, but then, withal, the matter is triable elsewhere. But these cases will not match ours. As for that great case 20 Ed. 1, concerning the lords marchers, that the king was 'Recordum superlativum,' to say no more, it is but an allegation of the king's counsel.

My Lords, the reasons whereon I shall most rely, to avoid the sense of the writ, 'Salus reg' periclitabatur,' is thus, That though it doth now appear by the Mittimus, that 4 Aug. the kingdom was in danger of being lost, yet it is not sufficient in law, nor can our demurrer hurt us; because it must have so appeared in the writ, 4 Aug. itself; for the writ and declaration in law must ever contain precisely so much of matter as is necessarily true to warrant the demand.

In this to see the mischief, if a danger now declared makes the case, how shall the subject know by the writ, 4 Aug. whether to obey or no? The law binds not a man to divine: And if this subsequent declaration shall mend the case, then the subject shall be a wrong doer, ex parte facti, which is against the reason of our books. I shall remember the cases put by Mr. St. John to another purpose. A commission sent forth without cause expressed, that commission is not good; and it is not denied by Mr. Solicitor, that a cause must be set to make it good in law. And if your lordships be pleased to look on the precedents, as I know you will, which the king's side shall bring unto you, your lordships will find the danger turned from the first writ to the last. Nay, in the writ of this year I am told it is so, out of their opinion, fearing the writ 4 Aug. was not so good as they would have it. They put it into the Mittimus, which they knew could not do good; but they did it only to cavil.

But lastly, admit the king had said the kingdom was in such instant danger of loss, and that there was an instant necessity of the command this way, and that this could not have expected consideration in parliament; yet if the contrary appears in the record, then neither was the demurrer a confession, nor the certificate conclusive.—I could stand on many other things, as that the danger should be more particular, for so are all the old precedents. To say, 'salus regni' is in danger, is too general; as in a protection, they must alledge, in what place the party protected is employed. 2ndly, In the Mittimus it should not be that 'Salus reg' periclitabatur,' but how 'Salus reg' periclitabatur,' I believe it is meant so; but we must now look to rules of law. True it might have been in danger before, but not tunc; as in the case of indictment upon the statute of 3 Hen. 6, for an entry upon Whiteaker, 'exists tenement.' J. S. the laws will not take notice of the time, without saying, 'tunc exists,' at the time of the entry.

My lords, in the conclusion upon this discourse, it appears, I have so spared the case, that in the writ, dated 4 Aug. there appears no danger of the kingdom being then lost; and that in the Mittimus there are no express words of danger to the kingdom instant or unavoidable. If it were so, it cometh not time enough; for it should have been in the writ dated 4 Aug. And if there had been such expressing of such instant danger in the writ 4 Aug. and in the Mittimus, yet not material, if otherwise on record. And lastly, this certificate doth not conclude us.

Thus then to shew what the case is, and what it is not, I have put out of the consideration of the case, all considerations of such danger to the kingdom, as are unavoidable.—I have left nothing in the case but consideration of protecting merchants against pirates, but for ordinary defence of the sea. If the case doth fall thus, I humbly conceive, that in this place, I might, without further argument, with some confidence, venture my client's case upon your lordship's judgments, notwithstanding any thing objected on the king's part.

Then, by your lordship's command I shall proceed: having laid aside the Mittimus and 'Salus regni periclitabatur,' and taking the case only on the writ 4 Aug. which, as I take it, is nothing of danger to the kingdom, but for protecting merchants, and for common defence. The case stands thus: That though there be no actual invasion, no known or declared enemy; yet the king out of his judgment, 4 Aug. 11 Car. apprehendeth and foreseeth danger to the kingdom in point to be lost; and that the danger is so instant and unavoidable, that it requireth this aid. Whether the king out of parliament by his royal power can command this supply?

I have endeavoured not to mistake Mr. Solicitor; it were an injury to requite him so ill. In my argument I shall desire leave to hold his course, because the two main questions are both of one nature, though different in degree. Our question is, in case of common good against pirates. Upon the whole, my end is to shew, that by the fundamental policy of England, the king cannot out of parliament charge the subject, not for common good, unless in special cases, and of a different nature, or upon different reason; nor for a necessary defence, though in the king's judgment the danger be instant and unavoidable.

My lords, in the debate of these two questions, I have learned of Mr. Solicitor not to say all that I could, but so much as is necessary, and as he hath chalked out the way. I shall inquire of this power by arguments upon practice constant and allowed in time of good government, when the liberty of the subject was not trampled upon; and shew it by acts of parliament, reason, and authorities in both.

My Lords, I am now come close to the arguments on the main: before I begin, give me leave to profess that I am in a dilemma. The question will be, what the king can do in these cases, by his royal power? it much concerns him. And I have learned out of a speech of his late majesty, what it is to debate such questions. Not to argue it were to disobey the assignment of the court, and to desert my client and his cause. For my part, as your lordships see I have laboured to decline the main question, I should be glad it might so sleep.—I shall not offer it, if happily the case falls off in the penning of the writ, and not of the king's power. I doubt whether the way of argument shall do the crown a dis-service.—Out of my duty to his majesty, and service to your lordships, I humbly offer, whether your lordships may not think it fitting to determine the question upon the framing of the case, before it be further argued; and here I shall rest, or upon your command am ready to go on.

[Here the Lord Chief Justice Finch said, 'We do not use to judge of Cases by fractions.']

My Lords, since it is your command I shall obey, and go on, notwithstanding the bicornè argumentum, which on each side threateneth, I hope his majesty will excuse us, for arguing of that which cannot else be determined. And as he hath given way to an argument, I hope his goodness will excuse us, while we do our duty for our client. And if I err in my materials, or in the way of my arguing, it is from the defect of my wisdom, I cannot be wiser than God hath made me, and not out of any disaffection to the service.—My Lords, I hope neither his majesty nor your lordships will think it a point of a higher nature: yet thus far I assure your lordships, that if any matter or consideration of state come in my way, I shall tread as lightly as I can; yet I must crave liberty to pick out some to refer to your lordship's consideration, and shall forbear those things that are unfit.

[Here the Lord Chief Justice Finch said, 'Keep you within the bounds of duty, as befits one of your profession at the Bar at Westminster, and you shall have no interruption.']

My Lords, I shall be very wary and tender. I shall now open the division and parts of my argument.

My negative part is this, That the king cannot out of parliament charge the subject, not only for the guard of the sea against pirates; but also not for the ordinary defence of the kingdom, though the king judge the kingdom unavoidably in danger to be lost. And in this I must take in the defence; as well the defence at land as sea.

My positive part is this, The king regularly is to be at the charge for guarding the sea against pirates; and for the defence of land and sea against enemies, so far as he is able: and that the king hath provision for both, especially for the sea service.

In the prosecution of these two general parts, I shall not only propose my own considerations, but join them with Mr. St. John's as I can further infer them, or justify them against Mr. Solicitor's denial or evasion. And this course will necessarily bring in many of his arguments, which I would be glad to spare, if the cause would bear it, because your lordships should not think that I do nothing but repeat. In this way I shall humbly endeavour to clear each part, by giving a reply before I descend to other particulars. And where I conceive a new objection, which will not fall within any former answer, I will raise it, and endeavour to lay it. Into these general questions will fall many others of great consequence.

First, such as not being the main, I will not draw upon particular debates. Where there is any thing concerning state or reverence, I hope to admit such, and save my client's cause. Having thus unfolded my form of argument, I descend to my negative, that the king in none of these cases, without parliament, can charge the subject. I will prove it from reason, which is the master of all authorities, as Mr. Solicitor said. And from reason drawn from the fundamental policy of the frame of this English government, in the necessary attendance of the public advice in parliament upon the royal power. And secondly, from the absolute property the subject hath in his lands and goods. From these two things I shall draw my reason. For the political advice in parliament, I shall humbly decline all school-disputes. The spider may make poison out of that which the bee makes honey. I shall omit the consideration of some points.

I shall take my rise from the judgment of king James 1619, in his speech in parliament; wherein his majesty agrees, that the king in concerto, can do no more than the fundamental laws of the kingdom alloweth: and I assure myself his majesty desireth not more.

Before I enter into the argument further, Whether the law hath intrusted the king out of parliament in either of the cases put: I here profess for my client and myself, that while we speak of political advice, and how far a governor subject to error and will may use a regal power, we do always with thankfulness to God acknowledge our present happiness to be blessed with so just a prince; and we fetch it from our hearts. And were his majesty so immortal as he deserves, and sure that his successors may be heirs to his virtues as well as to his crowns, we should wish the royal power might be free from political advice, and unlimited.

[Here the Chief-Justice Finch said, 'This belongs not to the Bar to talk of future government; it is not agreeable to duty, to have you bandy what is the hopes of succeeding princes, when the king hath children of his own that are like to succeed him in his crowns and virtues.']

My lords, for that whereof I spake; I speak as looking far off many ages, five hundred years hence.—My lords, because I might run into further error, if I should not take your advice, I shall slip over much; and the sum of all is, First, An argument from the policy of England, in the necessary attendance in the particular advice in parliament. Secondly, It will be from the absolute property that the subject hath in his goods, taking that for granted, against the book of Cowel written in the time of king James, who under the word Parliament, speaking of the king's power out of parliament, saith, the power in parliaments is but a pious policy. But this was complained of, and by proclamation the book was denied. Your lordships also know of another book that was sentenced upon the same occasion. The use that I make of it is this: if the frame of English government stands in the royal power, and the subject hath property in his goods; then the adequate reason of both from these is, that therefore the king can without parliament charge the subject in his estate, though in pretence for common good, no more than a prince 500 years hence, if subject to error or will, may if he will, upon any occasion or no occasion, at what rate he will, charge the subject to the height. As to the advice political, if the king can do this alone, what is become of the policy for which the political advice was made attendant to the regal power? 'Ne respublica, &c.'

Secondly, If the subject hath a property in his goods, how is it in the power of any one alone to charge that? This reason I must not leave, for on this the case stands or falls; though there be many books and cases, yet all are from reason, but especially when these stand together. The reason seems so strong, that it ever holds in ordinary power. It holds 'pro bono publico et pro defensione,' he cannot make a charge in ordinary things; and Mr. Solicitor did not deny the force of this objection. The answer stands thus: Admit it be agreed, that by the policy of the kingdom the king cannot charge the subject, yet the king may, without advice in parliament, in cases extraordinary; where in his judgment, the safety of the kingdom is in instant danger, and that the business will not admit of the calling of a parliament. He fortified this part of his distinction, with strong reason; for in such cases property must yield, for 'salus populi suprema lex; et necessitas, lex temporis, et 'quod cogit defendit,' all are true; and to this some home cases were put: as for building of bulwarks upon another man's land, and burning of corn in 1588. And then foreseeing the incounter of a reply, he saith the subject must not say, that although the power be in the king, he will enlarge his power, for the king can do no wrong.

This prima facie hath a fair shew, and may go far; yet I hope to give it a full reply. By this distinction the whole frame of political advice, is, under favour, destroyed. I shall shew the contrary by reason and experience. For the distinction between danger, ordinary and extraordinary, where the king doth think a danger and a parliament cannot be called: that distinction, I say, must needs destroy the policy in the whole; for as I conceive, the end of that policy was but this; for else, what could it be? As it will ever be in the will and desire of a good prince to do all good for the subject, to whom this advice by parliament can do no hurt; so what case soever should happen many ages after for that posterity will look upon it, it should never be in the power of any governor to become subject to will or error, if he would so do to hurt the kingdom. That policy was not made so much for a good king, but looking what might happen many ages after.

If you allow such a prince power extraordinary, and make him judge of the occasion; then in substance, though provision be made, yet after his declaration we must make further provision. Yet may some say, here is a potestas and esse; because he may, so he will. True, it is unmannerly to say so of any ordinary man; but under favour, it is allowable to say he may, if he will: then if we leave him that liberty, in such cases he hath no restraint, but his will. But it is said, the law will not presume any such thing. The law doth not presume a will, but the law looks on things that may be, as well as on things that will be. True, the law-books say, the king can do no wrong; which proves, that it is possible for a governor in his inclination to incline to wrong, and therefore the law hath taken a care that he should do none; for he cannot make a disseisin nor discontinuance. There may be an inclination to eny; but the law, because he should do no wrong, hath made this act void: which is not a disability in the king, but a prerogative, to make him come the nearer to the divinity in the attribute.

I shall offer the judgments of several ages in England; they ever thought it a dangerous thing, when they thought any restraint fitting, to allow any exception whatsoever, though cause for it, lest the party, that was meant to be restrained, should be judge, and then go out when he would. Thomas of Beckett, he would not swear to the laws of Hen. 2, unless he might put in this expression, 'Salvo honore Dei.' The king never meant to violate any of these; but if that had been allowed, the clergy had been judges of that, therefore they would not be satisfied: at this day we have an experience of the opinion of kings themselves in this case.

I shall proceed to the practice of our kings. In all acts of parliament, where they had ever a desire to declare the king limited or restrained, if they did admit of any exception, they would have it in words so punctual, that they would not admit of any matter of evasion, for fear hereby his proceeding might be at large. In the Grand Charter of king John, 'Nullum scutagium imponatur,' there was a clause of exception; true, there was a reason to except how all (not as Ed. 1, would have done) saving the aid due and accustomed; but the 'faire fitz chevalier, &c.' and so was Mag. Char. though not in the roll, so careful they were to have no words that give any such light.

I come to the statute of 25 Ed. 1, against aid, saving the antient aid due and accustomed: no doubt but in these words there was no more saved than law must allow the king, and the parliament did so mean; yet when that same act came out, the subject was not satisfied, and therefore the statute De Tallagio non Concedendo was made to take away the exception in that act. The statute 28 Ed. 1, after the confirmation of two charters, and divers additions, there comes at last a 'salvo jure coronæ.' Your lordships will find in history how all this was satisfied. And 29 Ed. 1, at a parliament held at Lincoln, the king made a confirmation without a salvo, and yet none will deny the right of the crown; the lords did intend to preserve that. Thus your lordships see the opinion of this kingdom, from time to time, how careful they ever were in all their acts, to leave any way whereby that which they did intend for their good might be avoided. Now whether in this case there might not be an avoidance, I humbly leave it to your lordships' judgments. But before I go further, it may be demanded, how came in those savings into those acts, if the parliament did not like them, and if they were put in here was a trust? I shall give a double answer in the case; though a salvo, yet it will differ from our case: the king was not judge there, but your lordships are judges between the king and his people: but in this case the king is to be judge of the necessity.

But to give you the true answer, the exception never came in originally from both houses, but from the lords themselves; this may seem strange. It was the difference of those times and ours in making acts of parliament; those were not times of granting all, or denying all, but to answer some as to some part, and sometimes an exception. And this being read, the act drawn up upon the whole by the king's council; and this mischief was found out 5 Hen. 4, and from that time all petitions were wholly granted or denied. So your lordships see how these savings came in, not by the subjects, but by the penning of the acts by the king's council. The last example is in late times in the late parliament, in the Petition of Right now printed, which was long in debate in parliament against loans and billeting of soldiers. After the Petition had passed the lower house, that those things were against the law, there was a proposition in the upper house concerning the addition of a clause of saving. Upon the Journals it appears, that there were several conferences between both houses, where the reasons are mentioned, and do appear. And in the several conferences the commons did not yield, but the Petition passed absolutely; and the reason was, because to put in that Saving was to undo the Petition.

To conclude this, to shew the experience of such an exception, sine assensu, what it hath wrought in former ages, as that of Normandy, though foreign; yet to shew what such a thing did work there. It had the same privileges we claim, and much of their law came in here with William the Conqueror. Lewis the 11th taxed them high; they made complaint, he, on the complaint acknowledgeth it, and would tax them no more but on great occasions: what followed, those histories plainly declare.

Having, as I hope, taken off the bulk of that distinction, I shall further shew how it doth not stand with the practice of the common law. It is a fundamental rule in our law, rather a mischief than an inconvenience: for when nothing can be so absolute in government, but that there may be one case or other wherein there is no provision made, all the care men take is to chuse the least. Now his rule is rather a mischief than an inconvenience. Now mischief is that which perhaps may fall out never; or if it doth fall out, yet seldom; for if it were a thing that might commonly fall out, it were an inconvenience. On this fundamental rule, the law concerning lands and liberties is thus grounded. True, there might be a mischief for want of this power in a case extraordinary; but the mischief perhaps never, or seldom falleth out. But to allow the other, would be an inconvenience daily. I desire your lordships to cast your eye upon a learned writer, Comines, fol. 107, 131, 180, 181, where in the whole, putting them all together, speaking of the danger that might come to a state for want of power to raise supplies for resistance, gives a commendation of the government of England: true, he doth go so far, saith he, "it is hard in a defensive war, that any preparation which must be great and long about, can be so acted, but that princes may take a timely notice, to call together, and advise by parliament. In the Low-Countries, where they have wars, though they have an excise for ordinary, yet they do it not for extraordinary, without consent in parliament."

My lords, I go on: admit an enemy ready to land, no possibility for a parliament; see how the case will now stand. I shall leave it to your lordships consideration, whether there be an absolute necessity, infra et extra, to command, and then to shew there is a command, and by what law; and by that law that is more strong than the positive law of the kingdom; and doth work more in point of fear. I do put this by way of admittance. In that case there goeth out a writ, a Mandamus Rogantes; but it is in 'Articulis necessitatis et quatenus a mandamus rogantes,' not 'sub pena forisfact,' of all you can, but for your own preservation, and safety of the kingdom. These writs have gone forth in such times, when there hath been a near danger, and that hath served the turn; for that instinct of nature, that did make some part of the kingdom desire government for preservation, the same instinct of nature, doth infer to contribution for defence: nay, that is a stronger law than ours; for that law which ariseth from one's own breast, as it doth command, so it doth compel: there need no law without, when there is a judge within. Now in times of necessity, there is a law that doth compel; nay, there is a stronger penalty than our laws can imagine; for our laws can make but a penalty of all that you have; but how? To the king. But when there is a danger from an enemy there is not only a danger of losing all that one hath, but of losing lives and lands, and all that we have; and all into the hands of the enemy.

Put the case an enemy was landed, to shew what the powers are by our laws in that case for defence; when there is particular appearance of instant and apparent danger, in that case, particular property must yield much to necessity. These cases our books warrant, as building of bulwarks on another man's ground, and burning corn. In 1588, there was an actual danger, and then it was just to take corn or grass, or any thing to raise supplies. But where do any of our books say, that upon fear of danger, though in the king's case, a man can, without leave, make a bulwark in another man's land? I do not read. As your lordships may observe in this case, of apparent danger, the power of the king; observe withal the power of the subject, and out of what principle this doth grow; whether out of a form of law, or out of necessity. In these cases of instant danger, and actual invasion, it is not only in the power of the king, but a subject may do as much in divers cases. For if there be an actual war, the subject may, without any direction, do any act upon any man's land, and invade any property towards defence: it is the law of necessity that doth it. Nay, in that case, the subject may prejudice the king himself in point of property. If an enemy be landed, and a subject take away the horses of the king, he may justify it in any action; as in case of a castle or city, if they can justify there was a necessity, they may pull down the walls or blow up the city. In this case there is no manner of mischief if subjects' goods be taken by the king, or any man; and in that instant necessity be employed to the public good. Levis timor will not serve; for then a man cannot enter for fear of force, but for such a fear as ariseth from an actual and apparent danger; then there can be no loss to the subject in that case. Secondly, on the other side

I shall shew, what goods were taken for public use, were taken by way of loan, and satisfaction was made for them.

The Second Day's ARGUMENT OF Mr. HOLBORNE.

May it please your lordships; To remember the question whereupon I left off my argument the other day, whether the king of England can charge the subjects for finding of ships at their own costs, only upon the king's judgment of an instant danger. First, whether for defence of merchants against pirates. Secondly, for ordinary defence of the sea: and, thirdly, for defence extraordinary against an enemy, only out of the king's apprehension of an instant danger, which cannot, in his judgment, expect a supply elsewhere.

Not to repeat, yet in a word or two, I shall open my proceeding on this question; and the rather, for that I find some misapprehension, as if I had granted more than I meant, which is fit to clear.

The sum of all was but this, that the king could not charge the subject in any of these cases. The reasons I urged were but shortly thus: that the subjects of England having an absolute property in their goods and estates, and the policy of parliamentary advice being to prevent charge only, then on no occasion one might err by weakness, by evasion or will: that therefore the king could not charge in any of these cases, without parliament; for that so he might charge, if he would, as on occasion so on no occasion, as to 7l. so to 17l. That if this held in ordinary charges, you may not exert extraordinary occasions, though instant in the king's opinion; for so a king intending to do nothing by his policy without parliamentary assistance, he may, if he would so declare, charge at pleasure, on no necessary occasion, or beyond all proportion. This distinction I endeavoured to take off, shewing it did destroy the end of the policy.

That there was no necessity of such a distinction here, I shewed. There was one thing which I forgot, for destroying of the distinction from necessity, and leaving the king judge of the necessity; that in judgment so to do it, is all one as to leave it to him arbitrarily, if he will, which is that only which was intended to be prevented; if he will, was part of the Charge, if not the principal, in the lower house of parliament, against the Divine for his Sermon. I have seen the charge for holding the king had a power in case of necessity, and leaving the king judge, and so at liberty and pleasure if he will. This I do but touch here; for I must make use of it in the main; and under favour shall make the case somewhat like.

For the other two matters, that when danger is apparent, there was no need of positive laws, I urged it thus; not admitting any thing, wherein I desire not to be mistaken. Admit no writ of positive command, yet the subject will be then under a stronger law, which as it doth command, so it doth compel, that is the law of necessity, which is the strongest of all laws; with which the judgment carrieth an execution, and that this law commandeth under a greater penalty: for though not under pain of forfeiture to the king, which as to the cause of forfeiture, is but ad terrorem; yet under the true pain of forfeiture of all to the enemy, from whom we must look for no mercy.—Lastly that of an actual invasion, and necessity withal, that not by any positive law of the kingdom, but of the general law of necessity, which is above all laws, for the public good private good doth yield on all parts. Of these too last I have but touched here, to shew what I mean; I shall speak further of them both towards my conclusion, in my answers to Mr. Solicitor's objections.

I shall now proceed to make good out of our books of law, that the law doth not leave it in the power of the king (in respect of such a king as possibly may be) to lay any charge upon the subject but only in such cases where the law hath made such provision, that if he would he cannot miscarry.

In this place, because it is taken for a maxim, that the king can do no wrong; and therefore the law doth repose this trust in him, of charging without any danger at all: I shall shew, that the same law doth take notice how, and in what cases the king can, as much as in him lieth, do amiss; and where the law is sparing to leave the king any power to lay a charge on the subject, even in small things, when the quantum rests in his judgment. It is true, the law doth allow the king to command payment of monies in some cases; yet where the quantum or occasion is subject to a trial; the ground of all this is, that the law sees the king may incline to mistake, though as a king he can do no wrong.

This may seem a nicety, but under favour it is clear. This resteth in the distinction of a double capacity of a king, as a natural man; and to say in this respect he cannot err, is strange! human nature is not capable of that prerogative at the best; and they are subject to natural infirmities of the body, and must die: even so of the understanding and will. And so you see the law must take notice of possible mistake in government; and this possibility in another is no injury to a good prince, but sets off his merits with a greater lustre. This is not only true for smaller things, but even in the greatest. How many acts of parliament have we in print (of which your lordships are judges) declaring the king's mistakes in the acts themselves by way of complaint, and providing remedy for the future, yea, in their own times. To instance in one long since, cast your eyes upon the beginning of the acts of parliament of Edward 3d's time, where we find a statute for the government of the realm.

As the law saith, he may incline to mistake in his natural, so it hath taken care, that in his politic capacity he shall not. And therefore, lest possible errors of the natural body should reflect on the body politic, the law hath provided ancient means to prevent it, which was a writ of ad quod damnum. Na. Br. saith, that if any damage be to the king's subjects, the patent is in law naught: As if the king grants a fair, and there is an ad quod damnum brought, to enquire what fairs were kept by it; if found a damage, the patent is void: The books are full of such cases. It is true, that in some cases, the books do allow the king to lay a charge upon the subject, yet not in every case for public good; but only in some few, which indeed have been antient, and indeed of the very essence of necessary traffic and intercourse, between one part and another of the kingdom; as murage, to keep the commodities sold the safer; toll, for a fair or market, towards the maintaining of it: pontage and pavage, for the bettering of passages. And in all these cases the king may grant a sum of money to be paid; yet as it is in this common good, somebody must have the power to grant, and that can be none but the king. So if the king should grant on no occasion, or howsoever, which is enough for me, a sum too great, greater than the benefit the subject shall receive, it is void in law. If the subject hath not a quid pro quo, then no charge; 5 Report: and in this case there is a judge of the justness of the proportion, besides the king: And this is when a patent cometh to be questioned, if the toll be laid too high, then the same patent is wrought. Thus then you see how far it is that the law doth agree, that the king shall lay charges upon the subject, only out of common and ordinary necessity, there must be somebody to have power. But then there is a further remedy of a mistake.

Here, before I leave this, I will make a double use thereof. First to shew, that if the law doth not permit the king any absolute power in this trifle, shall the king do it in so great a matter where you shall have no judge but himself of the occasion and proportion?—I next observe, where the law permits the king to charge in any case arbitrarily, it is but where this power doth arise by original contract, and precedent consideration and agreement for land; and then not quatenus as a subject, but quatenus as a tenant, only as 'ratione tenuræ,' in respect of the particular signory and dependance, not in respect of the general signory of the kingdom.

My lords, it is true, at the common law the king had a power and liberty to charge, till he was restrained by statute, which was aids 'pur faire fitz chevalier, pur file marrier, pur ransome,' and taxing of antient boroughs: and these aids, too, were in respect of particular signory, 'quatenus tenentes.'

The next thing that I observe is, that the policy of the kingdom so little delights in these uncertainties, though it ariseth of contract and consideration, that in case of these aids, the law would not allow that inconvenience of leaving them to an arbitrary charge, but in some case settled a proportion. It is true, in case of ransom, because no man can tell the certainty of that, it is left at large.—This I further observe, by the common law, where the charge is in respect of the tenency; yet if the charge comes often, as the king pleaseth, there the law did not leave it to the king's judgment; as in escuage, which is a profit arising to the king in respect of the signory. Though the law allowed the said aids, 'pur fairo fitz chevalier,' and 'pur file marrier,' because they could happen but once; but escuage that might happen often, the law would not allow that to be uncertain; it must be assessed in parliament, as in the charter of king John, which was always held to be no more than the common law.

My lords, upon the whole, I desire your lordships to consider how unwilling the law is to leave the king a liberty to charge, even in the king's case, at common law; and how restrained by act of parliament, where the common law before did give liberty. Next observe that the law, in none of the said cases, nor I believe in any other, doth permit a power to lay an immediate charge upon the subject, but only in laying a charge to be paid in respect of the benefit which he hath received, which is fit to pay, and none are compelled to receive it or pay it; for if he will not have the benefit, he may refuse to pay it even in cases between king and subject. In the case of toll, pontage and pavage, it is not laid so on the subject, that he shall pay it whether he will or no; but as there is a benefit by the pontage, &c. which cannot be maintained without charge, it is therefore just that those that have the benefit should bear the charge. Lastly, I shall offer, that even in cases where the king doth lay a charge quatenus rex, it is not so left unto him, either for the occasion or proportion, as that if he will lay never so much, he may; for if it be unreasonable, the law doth make it void, as in case of toll, if unreasonable.

My inference is this: if the law be thus careful in small things, as penny matters, whether or no the law will make no provision in the main, but leave the subject to the absolute liberty of the king, to charge the subject when he will say the kingdom is in danger, and where there is no judge at all? I will conclude with book-cases, in the point, that the law doth not leave a power in the king to charge, though it be in the king's judgment pro bono publico; as in the case of granting an office. The king cannot at this day regularly create an office in itself with a fee, but in law it is void; though the office in itself hath a shew, nay, it may be pro bono publico. P. 11 Hen. 4, 15, 16, and in 14, a grant of an office of measurage with a fee void; and that very thing, 13 Hen. 4, was complained of in parliament, that it was against the law, because it was in charge of the people; to which the king answers, let the laws and statutes be performed. In the Roll, amongst the Adjudicates, the reason is expressed, 'quia sonat in prejudicium populi.' 16 Ric. 2, the king grants to one a rate upon every barge that passed the bridge, in consideration that the pa-tee had taken upon him the scouring of the river, in that case the patent was repealed. So in the case of rights to be kept for the benefit of seafaring-men, this was in charge of the people. This patent was complained of, and your lordships know the order upon it. I omit many cases, and conclude with that of Fortescue de Legibus Angliæ, cap. 25, speaking of and commending the policy of the government of England, he prefers it before that of France; and shews the good fruits and effects of it; and lays down this for one, That the king cannot charge without consent in parliament. And he was a man allowed for extraordinary judgment, who sheweth instructions for a prince for future government, being trusted more with the government of the prince than any other. I conclude these cases with this observation.—This denying of power of laying charge on the subject, is not only in the case where the king would raise benefit to himself, which a man may call 'tallagium vel auxilium;' but in cases of charge which lie on the subject, though not for the king's own benefit, though also it be in cases pro bono publico, as in the cases put before.

I shall now come from the books, by which I have shewed what is the common law, that by these grounds the king cannot charge the subject. I shall now offer the consideration of some things, which are acts of parliament, or have the force of acts of parliament.

I shall begin with that of William 1, for a Conqueror I shall not call him, for that name came in about Ed. 3, his time; for there being an Edward before, because they could not tell how to give him a distinction from the Confessor, they called him Edward 3, after the Conquest, by direction of sir Roger Owen, the great antiquary. That which I shall urge is, that which he granted anno 1, of his reign, that all freemen should hold their lands 'ab omni injusta exactione seu tallagio,' nothing to be demanded but that which was by tenure, as in Eadmerus by Selden. Now whether or no this be an act of parliament, I shall not dispute; yet in those times when a thing was granted between the king and the subject, though it had not all the formalities that now it hath, yet it was binding: however, this is called the Conqueror's laws, and I take it for a law.

Then it resteth to examine the words, whether the words will serve the purpose, to clear the subject in point of sess. It is said, they should be free 'ab omni injusta exactione seu tallagio, ita quod, &c.' By this all charges, but such as were by tenure, are called exactions. The rule is, 'ubi lex non distinguit nec nos debemus.' This is a grant, if not of right, yet of grace, and must be taken largely, 'favores amplificandi.' The subject could not have demanded of him, especially that of 40s, if it had not been the law of the land before.

I shall humbly leave it, whether this be not the law by which Edward the Confessor laid down the Danegelt; for the Danegelt was not only against pirates and sea-robbers, (they were indeed pirates and strong at sea) but also against all other enemies. These called the king of Man, Archipirata, that is, a powerful king at sea; and that these pirates were only strange enemies; and it was to raise men, not 'obviare eruptioni,' but 'irruptioni,' not so much to keep them within their own kingdom, as to keep them from falling on the land. And by the history of those times when this was raised, it was by reason of the Danes landing in Northumberland and Essex; and so upon that irruption of the Danes, Danegelt was raised. It is called by Camden, in his Brit' 'irruptione ho-tium;' and Lambert, in his Saxon laws: but let it be 'irruptione,' or 'eruptione,' or be it Danegelt, to keep them from coming out, or landing here, both of them were for the public service. When this had been so much complained of in Edward the Confessor's time, it is clear he damned it. And Ingulphus is an author without exception, and Tilburiensis not to be compared to him. Ingulphus was a great courtier and favourite of William the Conqueror's; and to think that he had not a better knowledge of what the Confessor did than Tilburiensis, who wrote many score years after, is childish. And it is strange that Ingulphus, who was so much bound to the Confessor, should carry a law down to Edward, so much to the prejudice of the Confessor if he had not been sure of it. Tilburiensis was urged, as if he spake, that it had been paid to the Conqueror; he wrote in Henry 2's time. And, my lords, observe that he was an officer in the Exchequer, and for the rules of the exchequer he teacheth them well; but for history against Ingulphus I leave him.

If this were laid down by Edward the Confessor, then I conceive, this law of William 1, was but the law of Edward the Confessor; and there was no ground for him to require a law to lay any charge but what was before. Tilburiensis makes this good, for he himself saith, that the Conqueror laid it down, and took it up again. If it were laid down, I would know by what law or particular direction it was laid down, if not by this; for nothing in all the laws of the Confessor can cause to lay it down but this; and thus far he standeth with Ingulphus.

I shall further shew these aids and tailages were meant here. It is a clear ground, that, 'exceptio format regulam in non exceptis,' an exception often doth enlarge the meaning of the word beyond the ordinary sense. As if I do grant to J. S. all my trees, here my apple-trees pass not; but if I grant all my trees except my pear-trees, there my apple-trees do pass, because this sheweth that meant all my fruit-trees. In the word trees I apply it, that here is a discharge of all taxes, except by tenure. Now I shall shew that tenures were for defence and service of the kingdom in the proper place, when I shall shew what provision and means the law hath allowed the king for defence.

My last observation is this, This was not a charter betwixen the king and his tenants, but betwixt the king and kingdom; and so something must be laid down that was due to the king. There are two kinds of aids, one from tenants, the other from the commons; one was by command from the king without any more, the other by act of parliament.

But here Mr. Solicitor hath taken that grounded argument, of which I have found a contrary sense, that is, 'Stamus fratres conjuncti ad reg' defendend'; wherefore these aids not possibly meant here; but this is contradictory. By inference to overthrow a thing express is against the law. The words are express, that there shall be no taillage; then by an inference to say, that the defence of the kingdom is not meant, is hard. True, all by their allegiance are bound to defend the kingdom, all are to fight for it. Acts of parliament tells us, where and how we do it, and when; but that we must give aid, is another thing.

It is one thing to supply with the body, another thing to give or pay money; and if there be any invasion, 'pro posse suo,' every man is bound to defence; but whether for every defence of the kingdom we must give an aid, is another thing. Acts of parliament will be the best expositors of things so long since; for as custom and use will make a common law, so likewise it will declare an antient act of parliament.

Now I shall come to that of king John, 'quod nullum scutagium vel auxilium ponatur.' The credit of this statute I shall first clear. It is not only in Matth. Paris verbatim, who wrote in Hen. 3's time; but the original was shewed under seal the last parliament by Mr. Selden, and these very words were read, 'nullum scutagium, &c.' And, my lords, though this be no where on the roll, yet that no ways lessens the authority of it. It is no part of the essence of a statute to be found on record; if all should be burned by mischance, what would become of the laws? Though the rolls are all burnt, yet the judges know what are acts, and what not, though they have nothing to make it good by, but their own manuscripts or printed books, or traditions. A man cannot plead against an act of parliament, nil tuel record; and that is the Judgment in the Case, in 8th Report, Prince's Case. The duchy of Cornwall stands supported by an act of parliament, not upon record. That which I shall shew to make this an act of parliament, appears out of the words: there are two things, Scutagium and Auxilium; and Scutagium riseth from the tenants, and Auxilium from the subject. To shew that Auxilium is laid down by this, it appears, that he could not assess scutage without parliament. I hope to shew that scutage was for the defence of the kingdom, and is such a provision, that no king hath a better, and such an one as will raise in England above 40,000 men.—Ay, but saith Mr. Solicitor, not assessed but by parliament, that is, not meant to bind the king, but the subject; the king can do no wrong. Doth any man think that the commons did come to the king to bind themselves, and leave the king at liberty?

I come now to argue from the exceptions, 'Exceptio format regulam in non exceptis.' This exception shews the latitude of the words to be a discharge of all aids, that there had not been care had of the particular aid, 'quatenus a tenentibus;' they were afraid, even those were swallowed up. True, I do not conceive that was a thing of necessity; but as the king may have it in if he would, so the subject had no reason to deny it him; for it was but just, and was never meant to be taken from him. Nay, the lords themselves had reason to take care themselves, that this was not discharged; for in all these cases the king hath no more than a common person, for he hath his aid 'pur file marrier,' and 'pur faire ransom,' and that appeareth, 21 Ed. 1. A release from a lord unto his tenant: so that there was reason that the king and lords should have care of this; yet they were afraid those words would be so strong against public aids, that they would take away private aids.

Last reason that this Auxilium must be said public; look in all the king's desires, when they did desire aids, still their introduction is for the defence of the kingdom; which is a cause of calling the parliament; which appeareth by speeches there on record. Nothing can be intended of these private aids for himself. I have done with the charter of king John.

I next come unto Mag. Char. 9 Hen. 3. For Magna Charta, I humbly conceive that this charter, at the first, when it was granted, was no more than verbatim the charter of king John, and originally had in it this very clause of Nullum Scutagium: my reason for it is this.—First, upon all histories, that after king John had granted a charter, the pope would have discharged him of it, as far as in him lay, but that still the lords and commons made claim. He died, Hen. 3, cometh in. A difference ariseth between the king and the French. Then it was proposed, that this charter should be confirmed; histories say, that at his coronation he gave his oath to confirm the charter of king John. Then in the 9th year of his reign, the lords demanded it; he was unwilling, because it was gotten per duress: But the king said, we are sworn to do it, and therefore must confirm it. And in Matt. Paris it is said expressly, that the lords did call for the charter of king John, and there it was read and confirmed verbatim. And Matt. Paris lived in the king's court, and was adco familiaris, that it is said, he eat with him at his table; and at that time he wrote this book, and sure he durst not have written it, had it not been true; but we find it not now upon record: how this might possibly slip, I shall tell you.

First, we have no original enrolment of Mag. Char', no Mag' Char' but that of king John's. If it be true, which histories say, that Hen. 3, did revoke his charter, it is possible these Rolls might perish in that time: the authority of the king at Oxford did enforce them to bring in their records; doubtless they would not leave the enrolments. The next step to look for it is 28 Ed. 1, confirmed there, and is exemplified; the original may be lost in so long a time: what became of all Parliament Rolle, till 4 Ed. 3? All perished by fire or some other mischance; things were afterwards put together, and upon the roll. This was not the original enrolment of 8 Hen. 1, and written in the roll where acts of later time are written, and with the same hand. If it were once in king John's time, it must be left out somewhere. Observe this one thing more, that is, as this of Scutagium and Auxilium doth concern the subjects in their lands, there is a clause also that concerneth the subjects in their persons, 'Nullus liber homo imprisonetur,' that might be taken for ordinary imprisonment; then there cometh a provision for the king that he should not do it, which is 'non super eum mittimus,' such words as that a man knoweth not what to make of them: but in the charter of king John, it is 'nec eum in carcerem mittimus.' In this great thing we see the mistake, and how the other happened, I cannot tell.

I now come to Ed. 1's time, wherein I hope to make good those acts of parliament that we have vouched; and here lieth a main endeavour. The first was of 25 Ed. 1, which is not denied to be an act, nor cannot. The other is De Tallagio non Concedendo, which is so full, that it cannot be evaded, and therefore is denied to be an act. First, for the act of 25 Ed. 1, which is against aids and tallages not to be taken without consent of the kingdom, I humbly conceive, that by these words Aids and Tallages used in former acts, that these were meant of things for a public defence of the kingdom, complained of, and not denied. I shall bring home the roll of the 25 Ed. 1, that the king doth not promise to pay them 'pur reason,' to have words for their money; but that they must have a reasonable satisfaction: I will shew that was the sense given upon the record.

First, for the practice of the times, that there were ship-writs went out, these writs went forth in a more terrible term than any I ever saw, 'sub pœna forisfacturæ vita et membror.' 24 Ed. 1, was the writ. I am sure that such a writ, by the common law, would not have been mentioned, that if they did it not, the king should hang them. This writ was the grievance upon the subject, and this act refers to that. True, there were other grievances, 4to. and 5to. but this was one; and that these aids, which were then for the defence of the kingdom, were included within the rest, appears. The king, in reading the articles, speaketh, that what was done was for defence; though true he had wars in Poitou, and in other places beyond the seas, yet as true that it was a war to be kept from hence by defence. That part was for defence cannot be denied; and yet no distinction to be made between a foreign war and defence, and both equally a grievance to the commons.

After this act of 25 Ed. 1, there cometh out a commission, and this was in pursuance of the promise that the king did make at his going into Flanders, and that was to inquire of those grievances in the articles, and among the rest there was 'de lanis et coriis' taken away 'pro defensione maris;' and to that the king saith there, 'pay pour reason.' There hath an answer been given unto this, and much stood upon, that the king should say upon this commission to inquire of grievance 'pro custod' 'maris,' if it were so 'il ferra taunt ils teneront 'appayer pur reason.' [Veu le Parol del Record.] That this should be no more, than that the king would give a reason why he did it, I question. As if he should send forth commissions, and afterwards dispute it, or if he did do it, whether lawful or not, that is not the way of sending out commissions. Suppose that the king should say he would give them a reason for it, this commission did go forth to enquire of those grievances. And if the king had not said he would have given any satisfaction, yet it is enough that it is inquired of as a grievance. It is a wrong upon the subject, princes may lay taxes, yet the subject doth not call for satisfaction. A princely word that it should be done.—But when the king doth say 'pais pur reason,' to think, that that is no more than that he would give some reason for it, is a very strange inference. In a bargain they use to say, you shall hold yourself content with reason, you shall not have your own demand, but he is satisfied one way or other; so here.

To begin with a record. 21 Ed. 1, Parliament Book. A petition of the commons, and they did desire restoration of all their monies. 25 Ed. 1, there were two 'de lanis et victualibus' within that commission; so the monies and the things taken were inquired upon by that commission, 26 Ed. 1, were for defence, and here 'Ordinatum est per concilium quod 'rex satisfaciat eis quam citius poterit.' Upon this petition they desired satisfaction. For goods taken upon the aforesaid commission, 26 ordered by parliament, that the king should satisfy them so soon as he can, so that they should hold themselves content, 'Ita quod se 'contentos haberent.' So that you see, not satisfaction by reason, to justify them, but the king should satisfy them one way or other. It is that they should have something for it, and not that they should have reason shewn them why they should have nothing.

But I rest not here, there is one parliament-roll remaining before 4 Ed. 3, and that was 8 Ed. 2. 'Pro priore et fratribus Sti Johannis 'Jerusalem.' It is there set forth, that Ed. 1, did command his treasurer and barons of his exchequer, to make satisfaction for wages taken in Scrutinio to the clergy and laity, 'velati pro 'lanis et coriis;' and that satisfaction should be part by money, and part by releasing of debts; so as thus the king had no meaning, 26 Ed. 1, to pay back money presently, but would give them satisfaction one way or other, by payment of debts, or releasing of debts, as was explained by that of Ed. 2. Another record P. 27. Ed. 2, Rot. 36. Satisfaction was there given for an eighth and a fifth.

Those things which were taken before 25 Ed. 1, complained of, and that confessed by Mr. Solicitor; so as I conceive, though it had been enough that there had been an inquiry of these things as upon a complaint, though there had been no more answer. If any answer make it better, it is no answer to say, that they should have satisfaction by words, but either in money or releasing debts; if none at all, confession had been enough.

I shall now come to talk of Mr. Solicitor's exceptions to the 25 Ed. 1, where he endeavoured to shew that this money for shipping could not be intended within the body of the act; and if it was, yet it was excepted in the saving of the act.

The objection stands thus. No aids were charged but such as were granted, and we do not shew that these were granted; and there is a word beyond that, (prizes) and how far that extends, I leave to your lordships judgments. But if in the body of the act, yet excepted in the saving all antient aids due and accustomed; for the saving such an aid due and accustomed surely was meant there.—In this answer lieth this question, whether these were the antient aids due, or not, by the common law? this will stand or fall on the body of the argument. I shall tell you what these aids were, and they cannot be these; there were other aids mentioned in the charter of king John, as 'pur 'faire fitz chevalier,' &c. That which takes off all, is, If these aids were part of the grievance, though for the defence, they cannot be meant in the saving, for that destroys the purpose of the act. And for that saving, it never came in by the commons, nor the lords; but the form being so, to grant in part, and as the king would grant it so they must take it: Histories do say they did not like it, and so they desired an absolute act. It was said, that aids and defences were meant of foreign ones: If the king and council were so wary as to put in such a saving as before was not in the act, it shews what care they had to have that they could not have. If by the laws they might have them for foreign defence and not at home; they that put in the saving would have put in a distinction. I shall leave the consideration of this act to your lordships, how far it shall extend to aids for the defence of the kingdom in that case.

I shall go on, and conclude with the statute De Tallagio non Concedendo. That act of the 25 Ed. 1, was indeed so well penned, that it gave Mr. Solicitor a very probable colour to make those plausible answers. The lords did desire a better act, not with these words, 'No such Aids;' for 'such' is a relative word, and those are dangerous words.

Next, if no more be meant by the saving than 'pur faire fitz chevalier,' &c. and yet to have left these in the general, and not in the particular, had left a way open to question what they had been. And in Walsingham it appears the lords were not contented with it, though it was signed and had passed the great seal. It is true, that at this time a pardon did pass to those lords; the words are so strong, that this was denied to be an act: and much said, and very colourable too, to that purpose. It is true, that this act is no where on record, that we find; but for that an answer hath been given before.—It is said, that is no act, but only penned as a charter; that exception was once made by the king's council on another occasion. Acts of parliament were then penned so; Mag. Charta, and Charta de Foresta, are but in form of Charters.—Yea, but we cannot tell when it was. How many acts of parliament are there which we know not when they were? Historians best tell that. It is hard to find it when the records are lost. But this will appear to be in the time of Ed. 1. There is the pardon to those earls in 25 Ed. 1. We know that the rolls of those times miscarried and were lost, and sure it must be after the statute of 25 Ed. 1.

But then there is an exception from the diversity of the penning; sometimes 'nullum' 'tallagium ponetur,' sometimes 'ponatur.' We know, upon the entering of the rolls, there have been divers mistakes in the entering of 'ponatur;' if it be with a dash, it may easily be mistaken, and so only vitium scriptoris, and nothing else.

Then let us enquire what it was if it be no act. It is said it is no act, but an extract out of 25 Ed. 1, and that he urged several ways upon several occasions. By the penning of it, it doth appear, that he that wrote it was a scholar, and not mistaken, to make a thing absolute that was relative; for nullum to make it tale, and to make that without a saving that had a saving, is a strange kind of saving. Yea, this cannot be an act; for at that time there was a pardon granted to several great lords.—If that be true, which history saith, when this act was published, the lords were not satisfied with it; and these were the lords to whom the pardon was granted that were not satisfied. And to make their pardon the stronger, they did weave it into the very body of the act: and for Walsingham, he is of great credit among the historians. They say further, that this is no act, for this takes away those three aids, 'pur faire Fitz chevalier, file marrier,' and 'pur corpus redimend.' This is not so, acts of parliament speak of it, and practice speaks of it; and therefore no law; and practice of ship writs ever since, and for defence of the kingdom. For the aids, that is a good act; yet those were not intended nor included within that act, and therefore that practice is not contrary, because it is not within the words of the act, nor in the meaning of the act.

For the aids therein questioned, the question was between the king and the commons, and not between the king and tenants; then that being the question, there must be a consideration according to the occasion and the doubt made. But to take thus 'nullum auxilium ponamus,' these are not aids put on the tenants, but fruits of a signory, as the duty riseth not from the king's command, but from the laws, and so not within these words 'nullum auxilium ponamus.' And so all the practice ever since will well stand with this act.

And to say shipping is not meant, because of the practice since, is nothing. Let me establish once the laws, and no matter for the practice. If the laws be once settled, we must reduce precedents to laws, and not laws to precedents.—And for the practice yet, still the subject makes a continual claim against them.

My Lords, to prove this is an act, Walsingham entered it in his time, who did not write very long after it. Though it hath been said that he was a monk, and what he wrote he took up in the street and market place; yet I will not think so of Walsingham, who was ever held an historian of very great credit. And no historian whatsoever durst set down any thing for an act of parliament, if he had not a sure warrant for it. It had been little less than forgery.

In the next place, it hath been said, histories are no good authorities in law. True, they shall not tell me what the law is, yet they are good to tell us of res gesta, whether or no there hath been such things done. He tells us, not that this was for shipping, or not for shipping, but tells us there was such a thing. I have searched after this act, and I have found in an antient manuscript in Hen. 4.'s time where it is, and it goes there under the name of Statutum de Tallagio non Concedendo; and I find it mentioned no where, but still find it mentioned as a statute. I have an abridgement of Hen. 8.'s time, and there it is put in as a statute. I will not urge positively, but probably, and that an act in Hen. 4.'s time. 15 Hen. 4, a complaint of laying taxes on the subject; the answer is, 'let the laws and statutes be observed.' this is that positive act that doth reach it more than any other.

But the main answer that I rely upon, is, that if they deny the truth of an historian for res gesta as this. If from time to time it hath been conceived an act, what more strong? what makes our common law, but general opinions and allowances? And should we doubt of many things, whereof we find the acts of parliament themselves, I am afraid we should shake many things done by the common law. That which I rely upon is, the judgment of the late parliament, to which your lordships will give all reverence. This, my lords, did not pass sub silentio, but was made a question, and something proposed on the king's part, whether an act or not? in the conclusion it came into the Petition of Right. The very statute mentioned in that Petition was this, De Tallagio non Concedendo, made in Ed. 1.'s time. How far this question passed at the committee, it is better known to your lordships, and is the thing whereon it is built. If this had not been an act, it had been dangerous to have put it into the upper house; but it being there read, your lordships know what was done upon it.

The Petition being thus debated in both houses, I shall leave it to your lordships consideration, how far you will make this question to go in this case. And his majesty did not deny the same, but both king and council agreed it is a law.

The Third Day's ARGUMENT of Mr. HÖLBORNE.

My Lords; As the other day, so now again with your lordships' favour, I shall be bold to sum up my last day's argument in a very few words; and by the way clear my meaning, wherein I was any whit obscure, as also add where I was defective, yet briefly in both.

My lords, the general question the other day, being concerning the king's power to lay a charge of money upon the subject; and my general ground against it being, but this, that though the laws did intrust the king in many great powers in government, and with the whole government, according to the laws; that yet by doing of acts, which charge or prejudice the subject in his estate, the law did see that it was possible that kings, as men, might err, and therefore did make provision, that their acts, if against law, should be void, as in case of a disseisin or discontinuance, or where they were to pass grants, that there should go before an ad quod damnun; and also, that if they were passed, and were to the prejudice of another, that regularly in that case, the law did make them naught, and that they were to be repealed.

And I shewed how this did hold, especially in laying charges upon the subject. I shewed that the law was not willing to leave the king power to charge in any case, notwithstanding where the occasion might be common, and did require, for the maintenance of traffick and commerce between them, so to hold them still as within one body. The law must leave in somebody a power to charge, which would be left in none but the king as supreme governor. The cases for this were the monies to be paid for murage, pontage, paveage, ferrage, and the like. That in those cases, though the king was trusted with a power to lay a charge; yet the law did not leave the charge arbitrarily in the king's breast, so, but that if it were unreasonable, the grant was naught, and the proportion was to receive trial by another, upon whose judgment it must stand or fall, which were either the judges or a jury; like to that case which I might have put, but did not, of a fine uncertain upon a copyhold. I also shewed, that in some cases the law did allow to demand arbitrarily upon some subjects, sums of money, yet that was not upon the subjects, quatenus subjects; but upon some subjects, quatenus tenentes, which did rise upon the jus rentulare, as to marry his daughter, to make his son a knight, or for ransom, or upon those who were little better than villains, the king's burgeses, whom the law did not so much regard; yet the policy of the kingdom, in those cases, did afterwards restrain the king to a certainty, by act of parliament.

Afterwards I went to the cases which were in point, that the king could not lay a charge upon the subject, though for a public good; and instanced in the case of the grant of the office of measurage, with a fee, adjudged void, 'quia sonat in oppressione populi:' 22 Ed. 3, Put. 31. The king granted to one Pawley, an office of almeage of worsted; and because in charge and burden of the people, and a new grant, adjudged void, and was repealed.

I begin with that of 4 Will. 1, which I now find more clearly to be an act of parliament, out of an ancient manuscript of the church of Litchfield, mentioned to this purpose in Eadmerus. Here I endeavoured to answer to Mr. Solicitor, when he said, that there was another law of the Conqueror's, which explained this; and shewed, that the charges for the public defence were not meant, because it is said in another place of the same law, 'quod omnes sunt fratres conjurati ad regnum defendendum.' To this my answer is, that they are so for their bodies, 'fratres conjurati,' to serve, but not to be charged. Yet I must confess it is 'pro viribus et facultatibus' to defend the realm; where 'pro facultatibus' may seem to imply, that they were bound to be subject to charges, 'secundum facultates.' Under favour, 'pro viribus et facultatibus,' are but words of like nature; viribus, that is facultates, natural powers, not substance; for it is not only that they should be 'Fratres conjurati ad regnum defendendum,' but also 'ad pacem dignitatem coronæ, &c. et ad judicium reg' et justitiam faciend.'

I went next to the charter of king John, which I observe to be but common law; it is inrolled, remaineth under seal, and is recited verbatim in Matth. Paris.

I went next to the acts of parliament, 25 Ed. 1, against aids and tallages; there I laboured to shew, that the act was made against aids and tallages, though for the public defence; and that was out of the Articles, whereupon the statute was made, and upon the king's answer to the Articles: next out of the commons, which was after the statute, to enquire of the grievance mentioned in the articles, to the end there might be satisfaction, which was promised upon the Articles; where, in the commons, the whole inquiry was de gravaminibus.—It is enough for me that this commission was grounded upon the former articles, and that here this very thing, 'pro defensione reg' was 'inter gravamina.' It had been strange, when the king had confessed upon the articles, that he would not legally justify them, and upon the commission, in pursuance of the articles, had called them Gravamina, and so to be inquired of, that now when they were found he would justify them in any point, and say, 'a pais pur reason,' give them a reason for what he did, as Mr. Solicitor saith.

Next I did conclude with the statute De Tallagio non Concedendo; and there my labour was to prove this to be a statute; and I am sorry I spent upon it so much time, if that had not been denied by Mr. Solicitor to be a statute. But now I understand, by the king's side, that this was no statute, but made and sealed at the same time with that of the 25th, and meant to be no more than that of the 25th.—This seemeth strange: for why should they be both at one time? Next, how came they so much to differ, if made at the same time? Why are there some things in the statute De Tallagio non Concedendo, which are not in the statute of the 25th?—But the Teste will clear all. First for the Teste of that of the 25th, it was Teste Ed' principe, and sealed by no more than the king: To this the archbishops and lords put their hands and seals. But, however, I am glad to hear it now confessed to be a statute; for then we have no more to do, but to see whether the charge of the defence were within the meaning of these words, wherein sure the words are general enough; and what reasons have been given, why by the expositions of these, charges of defence should be excepted, you have heard; and what my answers have been unto them, I leave to your lordships judgments.

It comes now to Ed. the 3d's time, 17 Ed. 3, Parl. Roll. Whereas commissions have been awarded to the people and shires, to prepare men at arms for Scotland and Gascoigne, or elsewhere, at the charges of the shires, contrary to law; the king hath not, before this time, given wages, whereby the people have been at great charge, and much impoverished. The king wills, that it be done so no more. Ay, but it was said, this was to Scotland and to Gascoigne; and that this was foreign war; and that was denied, though not admitted.—I answer, that in those times, Scotland held in fee of the seignory of England; and in those times the king of England was 'Dominus directus Scotiæ': and so Ed. 1, when he determined that quarrel between Bruce and Baliol, and gave judgment by writ, settled Baliol king of Scotland, and did justify it; and it is remaining in the rolls of Scotland, in Mr. Squire's office. When there was a treaty of peace between Baliol and Ed. the 1st, he refused to acknowledge the signory of England; and there the parliament resolves he should rather have a war than lose this. So see Selden upon Fortescue. War in Scotland, not foreign war, but like to that in Wales: and so was it ever since held, since the conquest, to be within the signory of England. By the statute of 12 Ed. 1, and by the statute of Hen. 8, it appeareth to be within the fee of England. War against one another, cannot be called a foreign war; as in the war to Scotland, Wales, and elsewhere, which is not meant of foreign parts; for then it would have been expressed where, as well as Gascoigne. And by the histories of those times, we shall find there were armies carried to no other place. Nay, to shew this elsewhere is meant in England, see the 1 Ed. 3. Parliament-roll before this parliament. The Scots invaded England, as appears by a writ of Ed. 3, where is mention of an invasion, and thereupon requires aid. If there be wars in Gascoigne, and if occasions to Scotland, and in England too where the Scots are, and this a defensive war. Further for the wars of Scotland, if that should be called a foreign war; if the king should go thither and make a war, yet by the rules of the king's council, if a war in foreign parts is but to prevent a war at home, this war is not foreign, but for defence.

Another act made on this occasion, that the king wills, 1 Ed. 3, c. 5, that no men henceforth shall be charged to arm themselves, otherwise than formerly in the kingdom of England; and not to be compelled to go out of their counties, unless upon the sudden coming of an enemy, and in case of necessity, and then to be done as in times past: this statute coming in the same year when the complaint was made for carrying men out of their counties at their own charges.

Here I observe that the subject shall not go out of his county, not only at sudden coming of enemies, but likewise on necessity, and both together. And when it is said, it shall be done as formerly, it as an allowance that they had formerly been paid. So then, if this be a stronger case, admit here an actual coming of enemies, nay, sudden, nay, here is a necessity, and the subject is to go out of his country, pro posse suo, yet he had his allowance.

Perhaps it may be asked, why should not the subject pay? Is not the kingdom in danger? are they not to defend it, posse suo? They are so in their counties; and if they go out, the law hath provided a supply. Parliament-roll, 13 Ed. 3, there was a time when there were known enemies, actual wars in France; they intended to divert the war by bringing it home to our own doors: the enemies threatened much, nay, did much hurt; yet did not Ed. 3, command these supplies this way, but called a parliament, and there consideration was had in parliament for supply, and that the kingdom has slips enough, if they were willing; and this was in way of Defence.

From all this I conceive that it is strongly inferred that he could not force them: and when the lords and commons did meet, to take consideration for the wars against France and Scotland, the commons laid the whole charge on the Cinque Ports, they disclaimed to have any thing to do with it. And for the land-service, they said, let those of every county reside there, but no charge on the subject in pursuance of this. Claus. 13 Ed. 3, m. 11, et 14. dors. The town of Bodmin doth shew the execution of this judgment; it being agreed, that the sea-towns, and bordering shores, should look unto it.

I shall agree that some inland towns are bound by use and tenure, but no otherwise, 4 Ed. 3. c. 1, that the people are not compelled to make any aid out of parliament; and that the aid granted shall not be drawn into example; and that the aid granted is for the defence of the sea. But it hath been said, that they are aids granted for foreign wars, for the wars in France. True, they were in part granted, some for the wars in France, and part also for defence on this side. And where there is no distinction, why not for the one, as well as the other? It must, under favour, be conceived, for either or both. And between this time of 14 Ed. 3, and 25 Ed. 3, your lordships have heard from Mr. St. John, some complaints in parliament, for charging the counties with Hobbellers, and going out of their counties, which are not really compleat, only for proportion in regard of their success, but also for the thing itself.

2 Ed. 3, m. 21. The commons pray to be discharged of the guard of the sea; and that the king would keep it at his own charge. This shews the judgment of both houses, and the weight of it is very great; for when there is any difficult point concerning the liberty of the subject, it is referred by the judges to the parliament, to be there decided: of that reverence is the parliament.

But it hath been said, this is rather a matter of prayer than right. Under favour, the matter shews that they claim in point of right: and it is to be supposed, that they would not make such an unreasonable request, as to lay that wholly on the king, if they of right ought to do it. And if words were put in a fair language, it was but a fit and humble language for so great a prince as Ed. the 3d was. But Ed. the 3d gave no relief; yet that doth shew the judgment of the two houses; and as there was no granting, so there was no express denial. A handsome prayer, and a handsome answer. 14 Ed. 3, Parliament-Roll, there it appears there was a charge of 2s. out all woulfells, and this for defence of the sea; and in the 15th taken away in the parliament.

I shall conclude this with the 25 of Ed. 3. No Hobbellers were to go out of their counties, unless by common consent. This statute is general for defence; there is no exception: if an enemy do invade, the parliament believes the kingdom is provided for. Yea, saith Mr. Solicitor, the subject is not charged to go out of the county, that is, upon summons, ad exercitum; for summons is twofold. First, a summons ad exercitum, and then a general summons. By the summons ad exercitum, only those were to go that did hold by tenure; and they say it is encounter droit, to be charged out of their counties. It is true, about this time there are some records of 16 and 18 Ed. 3, in the Exchequer, where charges are laid on the subject for hobbellers, and such things: but you shall find in the Exchequer that the money came thence, which was before the statute; these things were the grievances complained of. So the practice there will not expound the statute, for the contrary practice did beget the statute. But the last of these, in 24 Ed. 3, who was an active prince, and maintained wars, and so had great occasion for moneys, and so charged the people higher than they would endure; for which he did afterward repent, and desired to be prayed for, and therefore there were divers impositions on merchants; all which I pass over, only this out of the Roll, 50 Ed. 3, m. 24. 'Tis the lord Latimer's Case, a privy-counsellor and chamberlain to the king; there was a complaint in parliament against him for divers things, whereof one was for laying an imposition upon merchandize. In his justification he pleads the command of the king; and for that particular he was sentenced, imprisoned, fined and ransomed; so careful were they to revive that law. And that sentence of his, 2 Ric. 2, made the great lords so unwilling to talk of the defence without parliament.

And so I come to that of 2 Ric. 2, upon which I must insist, for that it is of great weight. It doth appear, as well by the consultation itself, as by history, that the realm was in great danger from several parts; as from France, Scotland, &c. and that the danger was so instant, that it could not stay for a parliamentary supply: therefore the council of the king were to consider of it; they know not what to advise; they meet together, they had no time to call a parliament; but the lords, both temporal and spiritual, and sages of the realm, considered what to do, when the safety of the kingdom laid so at the stake. The resolution of these lords and sages, who were, as I conceive, the judges, propter excellentiam, conclude that there was no way but by parliament, and all this was for defence, and against an instant danger, which could not expect summons of parliament. And the lords themselves rather lend money out of their own purses, than adventure that which Latimer did; which indeed was the ground which made them wary.

To this there were many answers, yet all will fall off. It is true, that it is no act of parliament; yet such a resolution, that had it been 300 years before, would have done much. The weight of this is thus: if this had been a parliament, there is little doubt what this resolution would have done: for the matter we have the resolution of the upper house; and how the commons would have resolved in a point of liberty, we may easily conceive. Here we have the judges opinions in point of the legal power of the king, what the king would do, as well as what he should do: and in things of this nature, the judges are the king's council. And as in the great council, (the parliament) they sit there for counsel in things that belong to matters of law, so at this time in this assembly, which was instead of a parliament, these were not left out, being best able to declare the rule; and this was about two years after Edward the third's death: he could not then have any other than the council of his grandfather; and of their resolution was that the king could not charge the subject out of parliament: and though it was no act of parliament, yet it had the honour to be so accounted, else it had never been entered upon the parliament-roll.

But it is said, by way of objection, that Richard the second was then an infant. True, he was so, but he had a brave man for his protector, John of Gaunt; and he had doubtless a select council, and they were as fearful as might be, that nothing should be done that might wrong the king in his prerogative. It is true, they had a power of doing things by parliament, yet that was no act to restrain the king, but an act of necessity: the king was an infant, and therefore it was requisite, that during his minority nothing should be done but in parliament, especially that concerned the kingdom; which was not a usurping of the regal power, but a provident care of the kingdom and him: and they do protest in that roll against incroachments upon the royal power; and to say that is good, which is to an ill intent, is a strange construction.

They say that this consultation was for foreign wars; for that Brest and Calais were in danger, and to be provided for: and for foreign wars it is agreed the kingdom could not be charged. To this I answer, admit a mixture of wars, yet every one looks home first: we have a care of ourselves first: but they would have made no such difference, if the debate had been for both. However, the lords conclude the king cannot charge without parliament.

But I cannot leave this objection, but shall give a particular answer; though Brest and Calais might be in danger, yet that was no part of this consultation; for it is said in that consultation, that in a former parliament, sufficient provision was made for them. True, they were in danger, but provided for in parliament before; and that which clears all, under favour, there is not a word in that consultation, but is merely for the defence, and no relation to a foreign war. I read this king's reign with the 8 and 9 Ric. 2, rot. 10, where is a consultation with John of Gaunt for foreign wars, and others mixed together. It appears the subject is not chargeable out of parliament.

And so I come to Henry the fourth's time. 2 Hen. 4, hath been urged, and an answer given to several commissions for Calais, and for the defence: there was then a complaint, and a desire that those commissions might be recalled. It is true, we find not this granted expressly; but as no grant, so no denial; and as we take it, it was granted. This time of Henry the fourth did yield many instances that the king cannot charge, though for the publick defence. I shall remember a record which the other day I vouched. Par. Roll. 13 Hen. 4, m. 43. It was upon an action of the case which we find in the books, 11 Hen. 4, which was pleaded in 13 Hen. 4. There was an office of mesuage erected and granted, and a fee granted in it; this was complained of in parliament: first, an action was begun at law 11, and in 13 Hen. 4, a complaint in parliament; and they complain that this was against the statute, that no taxes nor tallages should be laid upon the subject; and the answer is, let the statute be observed. This use I make of it; this doth not only shew the confession of the thing, that this ought not be laid, but that, this statute, De Tallagio non Concedendo, was to be a statute: and this statute was not for aids that come to the king in particular, but against any charge laid by the king upon the subject, though it be pro bono publico; and upon the record, the judgment was delivered so, because sonat in prejudicium populi.

I shall remember the grants of tonnage and poundage to Hen. 4, and the grants usually to him were temporary and upon occasion, and not for life, until afterwards; and in his time they were for the defence of the sea and kingdom: and it was granted upon condition, that it should be confessed it was granted of loan, and not of right. 9 Hen. 4, m. 16, and 11 Hen. 4, m. 45, and 13 Hen. 4, m. 10, which is the fullest; they make a protestation it shall not be drawn into example; yet all that time were imminent dangers.—But it was said, we cannot shew that purely, and simply, and solely, it was ever granted, but with a mixture of other things, as that of tenths and fifteenths.—But the parliament was so wary, that they did sever them, and lay the tenths and fifteenths by themselves, and tonnage and poundage by itself; for though they are the same acts, yet upon the matter they are several.

I am now come to Henry the 5th's time; and for him there is not much, but like Henry 4, Parliament Roll, 1 Hen. 5, m. 17, a grant of tonnage and poundage for the defence of the realm, and safe-guard of the sea, with a protestation that they should not be charged for the time to come. I think after this time we find no more protestations or grants upon condition. But that which I argue from these grants made in this manner, is, sure it was the opinion of the parliament, that they were not bound; and the king by his acceptance doth acknowledge so much: no landlord accepts that from the tenant as a gift, which he may command as a duty; and to take it on terms so advantageous for the subject, and not only give an acquittance for it, but put it on record as in point of right. But here is an affirmation of the commons; and though they cannot make a law, yet that which they do, and the king accepts, shall be of a strong proof. Again: It is true, you shall not charge the subject with tonnage and poundage without parliament; but shall not the subject be charged another way?

To what end would that protestation have served, that the king should do it another way? And it is all one, if the commons bear the charge of defence, whether they bear it by tonnage and poundage, or otherwise; for that which falls on the particular, falls on the other. To charge them thus, were as if the king should say, though I cannot charge you this way by tonnage and poundage, yet I will charge you another way.

In the time of Henry the 6th there is little.—I come next to the time of Edw. 4, wherein, though there is not much upon statute, yet there is a speech of his that shews much of this. 7 Ed. 4, Parl. Roll. 1, there was a speech made and cited. The king first protests, which was not immediately upon his coming to the crown, that he will live of his own, and not charge the commons but in cases extraordinary, and those burdens too should be secundum modum majorum; and that he hopes they will be as tender of, and kind to him as to his predecessors, saying that he would lay no charge upon them, but in extraordinary things.

This shews, that what was granted by the commons, though upon extraordinary occasion, was not out of duty, but out of tenderness; and this was a good while after his victory, and could not upon the matter be called a brokerage. And this falls not under the answer of Mr. Solicitor, that money was borrowed of the poor men, and reason that they should be paid again. —But those loans were by way of commission, and not to some poor men, but they did concern the general. And though Rich. 3, had reason to bring in good laws, because of the defect of his title, yet my lord of St. Albans called it a kind of brokerage to get the people's good will; yet, however, this must be a declaration of both houses of parliament; and it was not so much offered by Rich. 3, but because Edw. 4 had made many borrowings.

I come now to Henry the 7th's time. That which hath been pressed, is the 19 Hen. 7, c. 11. Provision that the king's servants that were to attend upon him in the wars out of the counties, should be paid; then if they were to have it, then à fortiori, they that were not to attend. This shews that the king is to be at the charge, and not the subject. The answer is, this extends to foreign wars, and then no reason, but that they should be paid; and so will not serve our turn. If there be such a difference between foreign and home wars, why do not the acts of parliament make a difference? the words are general, and extend to wars out of the realm and in the realm; and where the laws do not distinguish, neither, I hope, will your lordships.

Now I come to Hen. 8, who was as unwilling to beg, as powerful to command. 13 Hen. 8, cap. 20, the king desires for some necessity of government, and against an instant occasion, to have power to make a proclamation for government, and to do it under penalties: A law reasonable for that time, though it continued in Ed. 6's time. As he would have liberty, which he could not have without parliament, to lay these kind of penalties on men; so the parliament was as careful to give him no liberty to lay any charge upon their estates, lands, or goods. So as, though for the natural government they leave him a power to lay penalties upon others; yet to lay any thing upon their goods, that which is mem et tuum, he had no liberty; which is a declaration of the opinion of the parliament, that by the common law he could not do it.

But in the preamble of the act it is said, that there is some intimation of the power of the king, if he will; and upon that preamble indeed Cowel would have built the royal power of the king. But Cowel was mistaken, and had his reward. It is true, there is something in the act that speaketh of the regal power in necessity, but not absolute; and that too came in by the penning of it on the king's side. And 21 Hen. 8, your lordships know his power, and how he was not to be resisted in small things. If he could pull down those abbeyes, what could he not do? Therefore it was not for them to question with the king upon the penning of his preamble, but a dutifulness in them to conform themselves. And when there was provision enough made against that in the act afterwards, it had been a weakness of the house so to do.

Yea, the act was that the king could not charge the lands nor goods; but there is no such thing in our case. It is true, there is no immediate charge laid upon the lands or goods, but in substance and consequence there is a charge. It is all one to me in substance, where my life and benefit is the same in either way. And if I am taxed secundum statum et facultates, I must pay the money out of my estate; and in the penning of an act 'non litigatur de verbis sed de intentione.' And if I am charged and pay not, my goods are taken away and sold; so it is all one to me, as if it had been laid upon my goods.

For the times of E. 6, queen Mary and queen Elizabeth, and his late majesty king James, I shall put my observation of all these into one. I find not much upon the Parliament Rolls for these four; few statutes were made, yet in every one of these is offered one act of parliament, which is a stronger proof than any of those which have been urged, and such proof as doth only come home to the defence of the kingdom, in case of extraordinary defence, in case of necessity, and in case of invasion. All this ariseth out of the consideration of the penning of the statute of tonnage and poundage, in the beginning of every of their reigns. The act that I mention, is 1 Jac. where it is said to this effect, that there may be times of necessity where treasure is not to be wanting; and it is unfit the treasury should be unprovided at any time upon necessary occasions; and therefore they grant unto the king, tonnage and poundage. But how? not for quid pro quo, not merely for defence, but towards the defence of the kingdom. Then by the judgment of the parliament this being not granted formerly, but towards this defence, and towards his great charges; therefore, by that, the charge by the laws ought to lie upon the king.—Now, my lords, if the king were not bound to the defence of the kingdom, whether or no would he accept it on these terms; and whether it seems not more than probable, that in case of necessity the charge may not be laid on the subject. 1 Ed. 6, c. 13. Maria cap. 13, 1 Eliz. cap. 19, 1 Jac. cap. 33, are the several grants of tonnage and poundage.

I conclude this part with the times of his majesty that now is, which in the point of defence have been stronger and greater than before, both in point of laws, and in matter of example. I take my beginning in this upon that parliament 3 Car. upon the Petition of Right, and his majesty's Answer and Judgments to that are something home.

The Commission of Loans and Benevolence, the necessity of the time did require an instant supply; and it appears by the Commission, that there was a necessity which could not stay for a supply another way, and your lordships know what was done in this. This Commission was not to borrow of a few, but it was general, with an equal and proportionable weight; and this, as it appears, was for the defence of the kingdom. It hath been said, that mention is made of supply for the Palatinate, and to send aids to Denmark. True, it is so; but that of the Palatinate, and that of Denmark, do upon the matter concern us; for that war being upon our resolutions, there was a kind of engagement laid upon us.

In that Commission, there appears more than a possible danger to the kingdom; there was a necessity, yet this was laid down, it held not; and in pursuance thereof there was an Order, whereof we have a copy; it is in the Exchequer moved by the king's Attorney for staying the proceedings for money spent about Loans, which was by his majesty's gracious command, wherein his majesty did prevent the common desire.

The Petition goes on, that there were soldiers billeted in several parts, and there was a charge; and this was after a late foreign war, an enemy then known and declared; there was a necessity for instant defence, and to stand upon our guard; the enemy might in a short time have been upon our coasts: yet your lordships know what was said to that. And as the Petition looks back to those things that are taken off their hands, so it looks forward, and provides, that no such things should be taken hereafter by the power of the king alone, although upon matter of necessity. And all this was a Petition not of favour merely, but in point of right, according to our laws and statutes, which are the statute 25 Ed. 1, the statute De Tallagio non Concedendo, and Magna Charta, the ground of all. And to all these his majesty promiseth such things should be done no more. And they not content with this, his majesty gives this answer, 'Soit droit fait.'

I cannot leave this great strength thus, but bring it home to this very case. The substance of this Petition being for charging of the subject out of parliament by the royal power, when this Petition had passed the lower house, it came to the lords; and upon some motion, there was a proposition of a Saving to be put in the end of the Petition, saving the sovereign's power, which his majesty is entrusted with for the defence of the kingdom. All this your lordships know, that after several conferences, in the conclusion the Petition passed without any Saving.

My lords, upon what reason this Saving was left out, your lordships may see by the record, which your lordships and the rest of the house best know, and whether upon this reason or not.—That the laws the Petition went on, whether the Saving would stand with those laws.

My lords, it appears that the first Answer was, that the laws should be put in execution; yet in the close there is put in a saving of the prerogative: but this Answer did not satisfy; and therefore there was a general Answer, 'Soit droit fait.' But now what was granted by the last Answer more than by the former, only that the law was left more absolute?'

As to that commission of advice for consideration of means to raise supplies, and it was for defence, and a necessary defence, and that did not bear delays, that commission was laid down by his majesty; yet in that there was no more than this consideration, how supplies might instantly be raised, which could not endure delays by impositions or otherwise, that is still lawful ways. If there had been any to lay a charge on the subject by way of loan, then that commission had not been excepted against; yet his majesty was pleased to lay down this upon the desire of the house.

I conclude with that which I conceive to be the judgment of both houses in point. It is the judgment of both houses against the Sermon touched upon by Mr. St. John, which I shall press as far as it will be applicable to our case.—The Sermon was to shew the power of the king in case of necessity to lay a charge on the subject without a parliament. When this came into the lower house, this was the main and principal charge, I say not the sole charge. When it came into the upper house, there it was pressed against that divine by the king's counsel; and it appears by the journals of the upper house, that the crime was, that he should shew the king's power to charge the subject without parliament. It appears by the said journals, that the Doctor's excuse was, that he meant nothing but to shew what kings might do in extreme necessity of danger. And your lordships may read in his Sermon, that he speaks of necessity, not attending the slow motion of parliamentary advice; so that it is pinched on extreme necessity: but neither one excuse nor the other did serve his turn. The offence is acknowledged, submission made in both houses, and the Sermon called in by proclamation. Ay, but, saith Mr. Solicitor, this Sentence was for other matters. I say not, but that the Sentence was for this thing alone: there were other things, but they were only by the bye; only occasioned by this. Now how far this case comes to our case, I leave to your lordships judgments.

The Fourth Day's ARGUMENT of Mr. HOLBORNE.

May it please your lordships; I have thus far gone on in my proof from reason, books, cases and authorities, all being of highest nature, that is, by the laws of England; that the king cannot charge his subjects without their consent in parliament, though it be pro bono publico, or for case of necessity. It now remaineth that I offer, what either the practice hath ever been in the best times, and the contrary practice decayed from time to time.—In this I shall do a work of supererogation. It is not material what the practice is, if the laws be once settled. A law once made, over-ruleth all practice afterwards. And as a law is law before practice, so it is law against practice: yet because practice may be an expositor of law, especially where the words may seem general, I shall shew from age to age, that the subjects without their consent could not be charged.

From the practice of the kings themselves, even in all ages, that on extraordinary occasions they have resorted unto parliaments; and when they could not do good by that, they have made many borrowings, as appears by the Parliament-Rolls. What other courses they have taken, your lordships have heard upon the former argument. And when the king received these supplies, it came voluntarily, and with protestation, that those things should not be drawn into example.

I shall go now to the practice of the subjects part. First, I shall go as high as the Saxons time. That of Danegelt did begin by a common consent: and in the very laws in Mr. Lambert, it is said statutum est. Though it always did not signify a statute, yet when it was written by one that knew the laws, and writ of the laws, it must be so taken. Tilburiensis saith, as it was the act of the king, so it was the petition of the commons; 'Statutum est a re-gibus,' still the king. It is strange in that time of Ethelred, when Danegelt was so great and common as it was, the subject being easily drawn unto it, that the king should not ask it, when he might have it for asking. But this Danegelt being raised by Ethelred upon emergent occasions, as it was not like to be always, so the provision was not for all times. After him came in some of the Danish kings, and they continued the Danegelt. And what became of those that were the collectors of the Danegelt between Ethelred and the Confessor, doth appear in Huntingdon, and how the people did decry it in general; then it was laid down ut gravissimum, as appears in Ingulphus.

Edward the Confessor he laid it down. At the Conquest, still they go on with the Danegelt. It was part of the terms made by the people with several kings, that it should be belaid down: and king Stephen did promise to lay it down; though notwithstanding they did now and then take it up. In Hen. 2's time yet still more complaints, and that was left out of the charter of king John.—The use of all this is, That though there were a practice under pretence for defence of the kingdom, yet the people did decry it; it was not such a practice as could bring in a law.

When Danegelt was thus laid down for the time of king John, Hen. 3, and, Ed. 1, in which times practice for shipping will not be material, for in all those times the very shipping itself was decry'd, parli' 25 Ed. 1, there the very charges of the subjects for shipping were the complaint, the complaint is the thing I am upon. After the 25 Ed. 1, and the statute De Tallagio non Concedendo, the course of these proceedings did alter; for before in 24 he sent forth writs under a great penalty, and 29 Ed. 1, m. 10, he contracts for his ships, and they go at his charges. P. 76, Ed. 1, Rot. 35, Reginald de Grey, when the Scots entered the kingdom, he was commanded to bring sea-men out of their counties, and he durst not without money; and thereupon he had money out of the exchequer.

But the answer was, This was for Scotland. —For that no doubt this war was at home, for in the 26 the Scots had entered the kingdom. Br. Trin. 32 Ed. 1, Rot. 11.

I come now to Ed. 2's time; there is not much against us, but for us. This I shall observe, that the first writ that went out was 9 Ed. 2. It is true a Mandamus went out for shipping, and against an enemy, and for defence of the kingdom: but how? Not a 'Mandamus firmiter injungentes,' nor 'sub pœna foris-facturæ,' but a 'Mandamus rogantes,' and the means of compelling 'quatenus honorem nostrum et salvationem vestrum diligitis.' So you see how the course of the law altered in that time.

I come to Ed. 3, for I will but touch upon every time, and offer but one thing to shew the practice in it. As I find a statute in the beginning of his reign, concerning provision made for wars, so I find an execution, Rot. Scot. 1 Ed. m. 8, there went out two writs, and they were concerning raising of shipping, and in respect of the Scots entering that year. This is that I put it for, to shew that upon that occasion 1 Ed. 3, soldiers were paid, although for the wars in Scotland. It doth recite that the Scots had entered the land that year, and did make further preparation; and if they could not have their peace on their own terms, they would proceed. 'Consideratis etiam periculis,' for it was in articulo necessitatis; he giveth a command that there should be ships, but it is a 'mandamus rogantes,' nothing at all by compulsion or forfeiture in the writ, 'sicut honorem nostrum.' It appears by the writ, that he said, he sent money at that time for the victuals for the soldiers; and this very writ was 'pro salvatione regni,' and that we could not be safe without shipping: and this was in a pure and innocent time.

I will not say, that in all the actions of Ed. 3, he never broke this rule: your lordship know what wars he had, and what necessities, and what those necessities brought him to; but he was so far from justifying of himself as it appears by Daniel's History, that he sent to the archbishop of Canterbury, to pray for him, and desired the people not to think ill of him for laying those charges upon them in case of necessity. 12 Ed. 3, Rot' Alm'. Your lordships shall see upon that acknowledgment, how he began to alter his course. Parliament Roll, 13 Ed. 3, though he laid charges before now, he calls a parliament, and desires supplies for shipping that way; and that acknowledgment 12, will answer home that famous year of 10 Ed. 3.—Next, my lords, to shew the decrying of the people in this time of shipping itself in the rolls of 21 and 51 Ed. 1, there the people said they were not to bear the charge: so it was no practice, for the commons did decry it. That for Hobbellers, they were at the charge of the county before 25; but that they were complained of in parliament, wherein the statute of 25 Ed. 3, was made. But all that I aim at in this is, whatever the contrary practice was, to out-balance it by the contrary opinion, and claim of the kingdom; and the practice I hope shall not be able to make it law.

I come now to the time of Richard 2, for his time I shall remember but one, Tr. 7, Rich. 2, m. 15, 'de contribuendo ad custodiam maris,' there is a recital of Danegelt; and that the subsidies that the king had were not sufficient, and therefore commanded an aid, but to do it gratuit. I do observe, that all ship-writs do end in the time of Ed. 3, one or two perhaps may be after, and therefore I do end with the practice of those times; but from those times downwards to Hen. 8, this was offered, and not denied; That there are several records, how the kings of England, both at sea and land, did bear the charge of defence; and all the answer was that it doth not appear how the king doth raise the monies.

For the time of Hen. 4. 2 Hen. 4, Parliament-Roll; a complaint of the commons, of a commission for building of galleys for defence: And their complaint was, that it was done without consent of parliament, which ought not to be done; and this commission is repealed. This shews the decrying of the subject, and that the practice hath been, that the defence was at the charge of the king.

I have thus finished the negative part of the argument, that the subject is not compelled to find shipping for defence at their own charge.

Next for the positive part, that the charge both in cases ordinary and extraordinary lies on the king, and that by the common-law; and that the king hath provision and consideration for it.

My lords, for provisions regularly, whatsoever estate is in the king in the politic capacity, is in him as Rex, and not in him in his natural capacity; and what is in him so, is for the benefit of the kingdom: and that hath ever been the ground of the acts of resumption, and some of resumption made by Hen. 7, where lands were aliened by him, he made a resumption; and those many privileges that the king hath in him, are as Rex in his politic capacity. All which cases are put together in Calvin's case in the 4th report. And not only in England, but in all Christendom, all estates in princes are held for the benefit of the kingdom, as well as for themselves; and that is not denied by king James in his answer to Perron; he would have it absolutely to be to that purpose. All that is to the advantage and honour of the king, is for the benefit of the kingdom.

My lords, from the consideration of the interest of the kingdom in the estate of the prince, the parliaments have so often offered their service to the king: And the parliament in former times did require a hand in the naming of a treasurer; they called it antiquus mos. And it was 5 Ed. 3, in a parliament, but repealed 15 Ed. 3. And for ancient land of the crown, they were not devisable out for that reason: and that none should buy the land of the crown, for it was not alienable in that time.

My lords, in the form of our government, the king in the supposition of the laws had all these. By the books cited by Mr. St. John, all were in the crown, and being so, they were for the service of the kingdom; and that is the reason that all land is held immediately or mediately of the king. As a lord of a manor, when he hath a circuit of ground, he lets one part to one man to plow in knights-service, and part he keeps for himself. So the king when all was in him, he disposed of some for the service of the kingdom. Hence ariseth the tenures originally. As they kept in their hands palaces and demesne, so for public service they made distribution of certain lands for public defence; some by Knights-Service, some by Scutage, some by Cornage, and some for Castle-guard and Grand Serjeanty, all for the service of the kingdom; and tenures per baronagium, which was an eminent service, as appear by the books of the Knights Fee; Petty Serjeanty for meaner offices, and Grand Serjeanty for greater offices. Divers lands were given to find ships, as in Doomsday-book, besides the Cinque-Ports, which were to find a certain number; and so some inland towns did find ships, but how? As by tenure, not generally as subjects. And though Mr. St. John did urge one or two precedents by way of example, yet he said not there were no more.

Mr. Solicitor did give an answer, that all those came out of the estate, what was that charge to the public?—It is true, if the king had that for himself originally, he said well; but if it was in him originally pro regno as well as for himself, then it is otherwise.

But it hath been said, what are a few men, or one ship? But it appears in Doomsday-book, the king hath a great navy. There were 60,000 Knights Fees in the Conqueror's time: and though divers serjeanties are turned into rents, yet the revenue is the same. I shew it for this, that there was a provision made in the institution of our frame of government, but for the guarding of the sea more particularly.

The king for the guarding of the seas hath all the natural profits thereof; as all great fishes, whales, sturgeon, &c. and all other profits of the sea, if the king would take them; and so letters of marque; and though some of them are got into the subjects hands, yet originally they did belong to the king. So the old Customs by the common law, antiqua consuetudo: and so holdeth sir John Davies in the customs of Ireland. So Prizes and Impositions are for the defence of the sea. So Tonnage and Poundage, which was originally granted for ordinary, but oftentimes upon emergent occasions, it appears it was granted pro salvatione regni, and not granted amongst other things, but by itself. But in latter times, when it was settled upon the prince for life, then it was for extraordinary defence, and to have money in readiness for an instant occasion: for it is said, in the very grant to king James, that the king must not be without money; and therefore, towards his charges upon an instant he must have it. And though it was granted on particular occasions, yet that is enough that it was granted on great occasions; and this was granted out of their love to him. The words of the act 1 Jac. speak of a sudden invasion; now whether this is by sea or land, it is general.

My lords, I shall now upon the whole observe what I have made good, either upon those general statutes, that the king shall lay no charge, or rather by the books, that the king cannot charge for little things; or upon the practice of times, wherein every time the king hath been at the charge, and when it hath been on the subject they have decried it. How you, my lords, believe it in point of right, I leave it to your judgments.

My lords, I shall go on to the answer of Mr. Solicitor; I have made a reply to all his answers to our positive part. It remains I should offer an answer to his positive part. First, I shall give a general answer to his whole argument; for if the case be, as we conceive it is, that the point of salus regni is not now in question, the argument will fall off. How far salus regni is in the case notwithstanding, I shall argue over, and examine the nature of his proofs.

I am sure he had none from parliament, either act or declaration of both houses; what there is, is against him. The answer of the king, with the judgment of both houses, is a main thing in point of right. I did not receive any legal material record, but that of the abbot of Robertsbridge, nor any book-cases in point, where it is said the king shall charge, but the books 13 Ed. 4. I shall answer these first, practice next, and reasons last.

To begin with the case of the abbot of Robertsbridge, which was opened by both sides. It was 25 Ed. 1, the abbot had land agisted ad custodiam moris; and in an action brought, the abbot pleads that he had found a horse for the same land. Here is an argument, that the abbot doth admit that the king might agist ad custodiam moris: now if that admittance in this case should be, of any authority to alter your judgments, I shall leave it. The abbot's counsel did no more than a discreet counsel would have done. If an action be brought for words, and it appears the action will not lie, what then? If the abbot had a plea that he was agisted to find a horse, what reason had he to put himself on matter of law with the king? So the authority can be nothing against us; and at the best the case did rest there, and went no further.

For the book-case, 13 Ed. 4, where it is said, that the king can lay a charge, that book is with reference to toll; and such things are nothing to our main case; and that book will prove strongest against the king. The main case was concerning a new office of mesuagge erected with a fee: this was pro bono publico, yet an action brought; it began in 11 Ed. 4: Then cometh the parliament in 13, and this was complained of to be against the statutes, that provide that no taxes should be laid. The answer is, let the statute be observed.

To the case of toll, which for common necessity to maintain traffic, and because there must be a power in somebody, and without a fee not possible to maintain the charge, it is allowed it may be done by the king: but in our case here is no common necessity, here is a thing that may seldom or never happen. The ground of granting toll is this, because it is pro bono publico; yet if not for common necessity, the king could not do it.—Next, the toll is not so much a charge, it is quid pro quo: in the 5th Report it is said there, that it is no charge; for the benefit in the thing itself will quit the charge. Again, toll is but inter minimum, this of weight; and though an argument will hold a minori ad majus in the negative, because a man cannot do a less, therefore not a greater; but not in affirmatives, because he can lay those, therefore greater, non sequitur. Next, for toll; no man is forced to pay toll, because no man is compelled to come to the market; if he will come voluntary and receive the benefit, then there is reason he should pay it; but this is not our case. Lastly, the law doth allow in this necessity, in case of toll, to the king a power to grant, yet the law doth not leave the king absolute judge of the quantum: for if the toll be not proportionable to the benefit, the patent is to be avoided, as in case of a fine uncertain. Now, my lords, in our case here is no judge of the proportion but the king; so the argument is thus: If the law admit not the king to charge but in common necessity, then not in cases that may happen but seldom or never; if not in small things, then not in greater.

I come now to practice: and for practice, where there is no opinion, either for records or books to warrant it, it is something weak, especially when there is no urgent occasion. For the practice, I shall give this general answer: if I can satisfy your lordships by authorities of parliament, how the law standeth; the contrary practice, either before or after, is not material; and for that, I must leave it to your lordships.

Your lordships have heard us read the words of the acts of parliament, and explain our meaning thereon, and we have brought them home to our case. It will be hard to make an exception if the act be general.—For, my lords, the practice, it consists of two parts. First, arrays of men. Secondly, of shipping, and for shipping; 'de navibus congregandis,' or 'muniendis' and 'invenicndis.'

For practice of arrays, I shall lay them by, and give them a general answer: for there were very few, if any, that went from the beginning of Rich. 2, but only to see if they be armed, et prompti, and that is made by the statute of Winchester. It is one thing to see that they be armed and in readiness; and another thing, at whose charge they shall go: that appears not out of those arrays. There is no doubt but the subject, on the statute of Winchester, ought to be ready with arms, and in his county to make defence; and upon occasion he ought to go out of his county, but at whose charge, that is the question. And if those writs of array were the same with the commissions now to the lieutenant, yet I know not how; this is my argument in the case: and so your lordships see that a great number of the arrays falls off this way.—But if arrays had been, and at the subjects charge, yet against the statute; I leave it to your lordships to judge, how far practice shall be an argument.—But for shipping, for writs ‘de navibus congregandis,’ those are nothing; for the matter is, whether they shall be paid before they go, and many of the ship-writs are of that nature. No doubt but the king may command ‘ad congregandas naves,’ to use them upon occasion; but the matter is, at whose charge they shall be. And for all the writs that are to find ships, I hope those writs are not concluding.

My lords, for those writs that are sumptibus propriis; a writ, and no more, without execution, is not a practice sufficient to make a law, no more than a common evidence, when to prove right by usage. Now whether or no they have shewed a general execution, by obeying and doing it at their own charge, or money levied upon them, I leave it to your lordships; I see no proof. It may be, such writs might be; but that there was an execution of them at their own charge, or money levied on them, we see no such thing. And if writs were to find shipping in these times, it is like the monies were returned by the counties, and so the receipt might shew it, especially if inland counties, where nothing could be had from them but money.

But, my lords, to examine on those grounds, whereby a practice must make a law: if this charge be within the words of the law, no practice can take this out of the way of exception. The practice must either shew that was the common law, and so generalis consuetudo, or must declare the meaning of a statute by constant consent; which must be of those that could consent, and those which did not express a dissent.

We are now upon inquiry as on practice, though the king cannot generally lay a charge, yet whether he can do it in this case, to make an exception of law; it must be done by use and practice; as to make a law practice doth not make common law, but as it is a proof of common consent: for all laws are made two ways.

First, By express consent of parliament: or, secondly, by use, from time to time, whereby it doth appear this was excepted, and the use becometh a common law: so as still, if an use doth make a law, such use it must be as doth prove a tacit consent.—Next, as the use must bind the kingdom, so it must be general over all the kingdom; it is not enough to be at some times and seldom, but it must be semper eadem. And, lastly, it must be reasonable.

I shall examine on these rules, for these are undoubted rules to examine a law by, the writs of Hen. 3, Ed. 1, and Ed. 3. In all these times the practice, as to this, will not make a law; here will be no proof of a consent.—First, For Hen. 3, to 28 Ed. 1, here the subject, as before the complaints, which begot the charter of king John, was upon the charges imposed on the subjects; so afterwards, until the 25 Ed. 1, the law of the liberty of the subject was not settled: for though king John did grant his charter, yet the pope did dispense with him, and he broke it, and so it rested till 9 Hen. 3. So all this time the subjects of England were under power; and what in that time he might do by duress, was not by consent. Then, 9 Hen. 3, he made a charter, yet from time to time he broke it, though he desired to be excommunicated if he did it; and so it rested until 25 Ed. 1, and then with much ado was gotten a Confirmatio Chartarum: yet this satisfied not at all. Till 28 Ed. 1, Mag. Chart. not observed. I could shew divers cases point-blank against these.

The statute 28 Ed. 1, saith expressly, that this charter was not observed; and it was once a punishment for those that were the breakers thereof. Now when acts of parliament declare that the law of the liberty of England was not observed, I shall not need to shew any record how it was broken: so that all the practice in Hen. 3's time, though much, yet that will not serve the turn; for that government was more of force than law. But for that of Hen. 3's time, I shall give a further answer; the very courts of justice were shut up, then it was in flagrante bello.

And for Ed. 1's time, all the main ones considerable were immediately before the making of that statute; if rightly apprehended, they did particularly occasion that statute; so the subject did deny it, and it is a dissent.

After 28 Ed. 1, little considerable; and Ed. 1, when he made 28 Ed. 1, when the charters were confirmed, yet he had his salvo jure coronæ, which did not please the subject; and afterwards, notwithstanding he made some grants in parliament, yet sometimes he did revoke. Your lordships know what a great renunciation he made; but as some of our historians observe, when he had occasions for moneys he did grant, but otherwise did not; so that in all his time the subjects did not consent, but as much as they could, did dissent: and in the 23th, you see how the practice did alter for commanding of ships.

Next for Ed. 2, for his time, we see how he went. In the beginning of his reign he sends but a mandamus rogantes. In the end of his reign, whether his government was more of law than power, I leave to your lordships; that little practice that way, if it doth come home, is not sufficient to make a law, who was under will.

Next for Ed. 3, for him in his best times, you see how he went, he laid not the charge on the subject at the first; afterwards there is no age wherein there were so many complaints as in his time, from the first to the last; and not only in this of shipping, which, as often as it was, there was still complaint, but in impositions on merchants, whereupon lord Latimer was imprisoned: so that in point of charge, the subject did enforce him upon it in time of necessity. So that in those times the practice will not be any argument against us.

That of 10 Ed. 3, he confessed that he had laid too heavy charges on the subject, and did ask forgiveness; so here was no consent, but a several dissent by their several complaints. And if I take off these three kings reigns, I take off all the force of practice concerning shipping; for from that time afterwards you will find very little, for what cometh afterwards is but for matters of arrays.

The next thing is, that every practice that must bring in a law, must be constant and continual, so long together as may bring it into a custom.—Now out of what your lordships have heard, if you conceive in the times of those three kings, that they had one way and the subject another, then there is no constant practice to lay it on the subjects: And for Arrays, I conceive them to be no part of the case.—And for the next; if practice make a law, it must be general through the whole kingdom; for that is our case, we are in an inland county; and observe how few writs we have that went over the whole kingdom: Nay, have you any that proveth it indeed? That they went to some inland counties it is true, but that they went to all throughout the kingdom, you shew not.

Now if you will have a practice to bring in a law, you must not bring your practice by pieces; at one time in one part, and at another time in another part: for that in one part of the inland counties alone will not be justifiable, for that was to lay a charge on the one, for the maintenance of the whole; and that is against reason, and the reason of this writ. So to charge the whole kingdom, you must shew they went over the whole kingdom, and were obeyed by the whole kingdom; for obedience in some parts, will not bind all, so once or twice will not do it; for the writs that have been produced, many of them went to the sea towns only.

Next, my lords, admit that the practice had been constant from king John's time down to Hen. 3's, so to this day; under favour, as the case standeth, your lordships could not find such a practice as could now introduce a law. The custom, which must be of a manor, you must not shew the beginning of it, that within time of memory the thing was not so. True, if the time had been long, and I cannot shew when it hath not been, that is time out of mind.

To examine this upon the rule; it hath been said, that from the time of Hen. 2, Danegelt was taken: True, it was taken, de facto, but not de jure. The subject was not at that time charged both with Danegelt and shipping too. Then our course of charging the subject to find shipping, must begin since that time.

But peradventure it will be said, as sir Henry Spelman in his Glossary, that when Danegelt went down, this other came in. And peradventure it will be said, this is enough to shew this begun, though but in memory; then it is but to see upon what warrant of law this begun.—If Danegelt had not been legal, then this to come in instead of that which was not legal is not sufficient. Now for Danegelt it was not legal, and so fallit fundamentum: if it had been legal, yet not so pursued in the course as is legal, so that there is no ground for it on right or wrong. That Danegelt, when it went, it went over all the kingdom, and in a proportionable way to all; yet these writs for shipping were commonly to the sea-towns, and but sometimes to some inland towns. If Danegelt were on the land, and certain, this is on the person, and uncertain; this respects both lands and goods, the other not. There is no such assurance of equal charging in this, or in the other, if Danegelt had been legal; yet whether this coming in lieu of Danegelt, being of a far different nature, be legal, I leave it to your lordships judgments.

Next to examine it upon another reason, upon the reason of the practice. If the practice went over the whole kingdom from time to time, there was the more equality; but if the practice went over the kingdom but by degrees, sometimes to one part, sometimes to another, though over all the kingdom at times, yet this is not sufficient to make a law. For that act which is unreasonable in itself, and not agreeable to justice, will never make a law: for a law will never arise out of an act illegal. Now, my lords, when a charge is laid upon parts of the kingdom, which the whole should hear, it is unreasonable. I will not deny, but in manors, where you are to have a custom, sometimes on one piece, and sometimes on another; this may be good, though it goes not over the whole manor; because in this act there is nothing against justice, for here one man doth not bear the charge for the whole; but it is otherwise in our case.

My Lords, I shall go further; as for the inland towns, so for the sea-towns, we do not find a general practice of all sea-towns together, sometimes to one, sometimes to another; if any to all, yet not to all oftentimes.

My Lords, admitting arrays would be material in this case, as I conceive they will not; yet under favour they will be no precedent for the defending of the sea, the case doth differ.—For though the king be lord both of sea and land, and hath in them both the sole dominion; yet in the sea he hath the whole property, and in a manner all the considerable profit and privilege; the subject hath but the passage of the sea, and the minima to take fish, not considerable in point of benefit: But for the land, that is our own, and the land of the kingdom is the house of the kingdom. As for the charge of the land to find shipping, there will be a great deal of difference between sea-towns and inland towns: As those that live in sea-towns are in more danger from the sea, so they have more profit and privileges; and that is the reason that in the parliament 13 Ed. 3, the sea-towns should do it in regard to their profit and privileges.

And for the command to find ships, the positive law is to make those to find ships which are chargeable, as your sea-towns, and for inland towns to find arms; because both are not fitted alike, there is no reason that they should be charged alike. Upon this reason is the case of Beverly put before, 2 Ric. 2, where the complaint is, that they are charged for shipping, being a dry town; they say they were charged indebitè. 10 Ed. 3, Shoreham, they plead they never found arms but shipping, and a good discharge. And in Mat. Paris, upon wars with France, the sea-towns complain and desire help; so that the burden lies on them, if on any. My lords, I have gone over in a general way, as well as I can, and endeavoured to answer the practice; to have gone over all in particular would have required longer time than your lordships can spare.

The reasons now only rest to be examined; for if no full authority, nor sufficient practice, reason alone will not argue against a fundamental rule: for we are not now to examine on reason what is fit, and what not, but to see what is the truth.

The first is, that 'salus populi suprema lex.' the question is not, what we are to do by necessity, but what is the positive law of the land? The question must now be as before; what power is in the king, and did our forefathers in that time of peace and government leave in the crown, not in case of necessity and public danger; when, with them, 'salus populi' was 'suprema lex,' and upon that they did ground the rule of government? In this case, whether or no, in their consideration, they did conceive for the public good, to leave the power in the king or not, to lay a charge on the people; there the rule came in, 'salus reipublice suprema lex.' and that which they looked on most, was the benefit of the multitude. So that now, my lords, it is not to dispute, whether it be better or worse, but that it was. And to shew there was no such great necessity as can countervail the possibility of prejudice the other way: if there do come such a danger, then the subject is at that time under a law of preservation of life; and all which makes the subject as willing to obey, as to submit to government in the creation. This law is of an higher force than any positive law can be. But admit that this cease in this case, and all positive laws of property yield to the law of necessity; yet I admit nothing, though I might admit much, and not prejudice the case.

Though no positive law doth charge, yet in case of imminent danger, if I should say my private property is become public, it is no mischief, for so it is in some cases; for in this time of imminent danger, the king and subjects are under a law of absolute necessity, and public safety. In all human reason, when the danger is in proxima potentia, we may prevent it; thus if another man's house be on fire, mine may be pulled down to stop it: so that we may see by what grounds we do go in case of absolute necessity. If the king doth command any thing concerning the property of goods, in respect of danger, the execution may not be by any positive law merely, which in such cases do cease in furor belli; for those are acted by formalities, and inter arma silent leges. And in these cases, as the king may command my property, so may the subject command the property of another: the books are so, 8 Ed. 4. For hindering the landing of an enemy, bulwarks may be built on my land without consent. So the power is not only in the king in these cases of necessity, but in the subject: and the books say not that the power is only in the king, but I can do it, and the law of necessity is the warrant.

Then, my lords, it resteth considerable in this case, what shall be said to be a time of necessity. I speak still by way of admittance, for I grant nothing.—It must be in a danger now acting or in proxima potentia; as fire, though not burning, yet ready to burn: that is, there must be a war, furor belli. Note, That when the king makes proclamation of war, or the king is in the field; and that indeed was not Mr. St. John's meaning, it was taken farther than he meant it.

It must be in such a danger, when this power is of necessity to be used, as in case of fire; there must not only be fear of fire, for one house must be first actually on fire, before the house can be pulled down, but withal such a danger, that if this be not pulled down, the other will be lost: and as in case of an enemy, a subject, out of fear of an enemy, cannot build a bulwark on another man's land, but when he is a-coming. So that none of these cases will match ours. The property yieldeth not in fear of danger; but such a danger, as help must come in nunc aut nunquam. This time is not when the king will think there is occasion to exert this power, as in the case of 1588. Though the queen and state did command the burning of those goods and provisions, if an enemy landed; which was a lawful command, and justifiable to be done, so they did land; but could not command them to burn their corn before an enemy did come.

Your lordships know the king may command in case of danger the destruction of all suburbs, rather than an enemy should come in them. But if there be a fear only of wars, if the king should command it, how far that is justifiable, I leave it to your lordships judgments. All this difference appears out of the case of the Gravesend barges, Duffield's case, 12 Jac. If there be a storm, or a leak in a ship, that the danger be actual, it is justifiable for the master to throw out the goods; but if he sees a cloud arise, and out of fear of a storm he threw out the goods, I doubt on a jury which way this will go with the bargeman; but if a storm do come, or a leak spring in, in that case the bargeman may do it. So you see upon what law my property yieldeth. That position generally taken, as it is said, may be of a great deal of consequence; for it doth not rest there, solely upon yielding of the laws of property: for all positive laws do cease in that danger: then the positive laws of my liberty and person also do cease.

Now, whether or no you conceive all laws of liberty and person cease in this time of danger, when the danger was but conceived and not actual, that I leave to your lordships judgments. And if that rule be general, then why not the other? So we may see the difference from our case; for in that case there is no manner of loss to the subject, for he shall have allowance for his loss, or make suit to the parliament, and they can recompense him; for what is taken for the public good is but borrowed. As in case of shipping, if my goods be cast out to save the ship, every one of the ship is to bear a share; so in our case, either the king must do it, or the parliament: so there is no prejudice.

So upon the whole, my answer is, Admit the rule of 'Salus populi suprema lex;' yet the law of practice doth not yield, till there be an actual enemy, or flagrans bellum. It is not enough that there be but an apprehension.

There were divers other reasons urged, (but those two of 'Salus populi suprema lex;' and of private property must yield to public safety) were the two rationes cogentes; the other were but a pari et a simili; and all those I shall pass over which were only for convenience, as the granting of toll, or a corporation to make ordinance for the good of the corporation: all these will not come home in the manner. My lords, in all these cases 'a minore ad majus' non valet, negativum valet.'

But there are only two reasons urged, which require an answer: The trust that the laws put in the king in greater matters, viz. the shutting of the ports; and the Droit Royal of wars and peace. For the shutting of the ports, there is more difference in point of prejudice of the king than the subject. The king cannot shut the ports but to his own prejudice. Again, the shutting of the ports without cause of necessity, the king hath the loss as well as we; for by that he loseth his customs, and by shutting them he can gain nothing at all. And besides, there is no law at all that hinders him from that. But there is a law saith, that he shall not tax the subject without consent in parliament.

The next is the Droit Royal of wars and peace. It is one thing to say, the king can make war and peace; another thing to say, he can charge. In war and peace the king is equally charged with the subject, nay more; and for those things there are no great reasons, but that in the first form of government they might be well suffered. For that cause touching the king's power over coinage, there was a necessity to counterpoise the like thing in another state; in that case the king loseth, and we lose. The king may dispense with penal statutes, and make them as none. Doth any laws say he shall not do it? The reason differeth in that case; there is a common necessity that there should be a power in somebody, for acts of parliament are but leges temporis. It is one thing for the king to have power in point of favour, and another thing in point of charge; so in case of pardon there is no hurt if he doth pardon; God forbid that he should not have power to shew mercy.

My lords, there are in the case two points more which I shall move. Whether or no, admit the king could command the subjects to find ships, he can give power to the sheriffs to make the assessment as in the writ? The ground is upon this, that in all cases of politic charges the law takes an especial care to make an equality. In parliaments of old, they were always careful to make provision that way, as upon fifteenths and subsidies. And in Danegelt they went such a way, as there could be no inequality; they went by taxing of hides. Now if the law doth make this a legal way of charging, it allows the like way for assessment that is allowed in other cases, such a way as wherein there can be no inconvenience. Now how a sheriff hath that knowledge to lay it on men's estates and lands, I cannot tell.

My lords, not to leave a power in the king to lay an arbitrary charge, but in the sheriff to lay more or less on any man; though the law may trust the king, yet it is a question, whether it will trust the sheriff. Nay, I ask if the sheriff be an officer of law in this case; yet the king may command any man as well. Assessments are usually made by others, and not so much by the sheriff. So I do conceive that this is a thing that doth properly belong not to the sheriff, he is not an officer sworn, and it resteth not only in the sheriff, but the under-sheriff. So that if the law doth trust the king, yet whether or no this be the way to charge it, I leave it to your lordships judgments. If a hundred be charged, they have ways to lay it on themselves proportionably.

The next thing is this: Admit a levy may be well-made, whether the money thus paid may be brought into the Exchequer, by a Sci. Fa. I do think that this is the first writ that ever was of this kind, I do not find it regularly.

My lords, I think it is hard to find where there is a writ that commands and prescribes the manner of levy. It not only gives you power to levy, but sets the way of levying, by imposition, by distress, by selling; for my part, I know no case can match it.

The First Day's ARGUMENT of Sir JOHN BANKS, knt. his Majesty's Attorney-General, on behalf of His MAJESTY, before all the Judges in the Exchequer-Chamber, in the Great Case of SHIP-MONEY.

May it please your lordships; There was a Sci. Fa. brought against Mr. Hampden, and divers others, to shew cause why those sums of money assessed upon them by the sheriff of Bucks should not be paid and answered; it beareth teste the 23d May, 13 Car. and a Sciri Feci returned.

Mr. Hampden demandeth Oyer of the original writ 4th Aug. 11 Car. and of the Certiorari, and the Mittimus, and of their several returns. The writ 4th Aug. which went out to provide a ship of 450 tons, with victuals, men, ammunition, &c. that writ giveth power to the sheriff to make an assessment upon the county, and giveth power of distress and imprisonment in case of non-payment. He demandeth Oyer of the Certiorari, which consists of two parts; the one to certify the sums assessed, the other to certify the names of the defaulters. And the names of those that made defaults were returned, and Mr. Hampden amongst others. He doth demand Oyer of the Mittimus, which doth recite the tenor of the first writ.

Upon Oyer of all these, both of the writ 4th Aug. of the Certiorari, Mittimus and Sci. Fa. and their several returns, Mr. Hampden hath demurred in law.

The case that riseth upon the record is thus. The king is lord of the sea (for that is part of the record) the seas are infested by pirates and Turks, which commit depredations, and take goods and merchandizes, both of the king's subjects and others that traffic here, and carry them away into captivity. There is preparation of shipping and imminent danger, for so the writ reciteth: A danger that the king's dominion of the sea should be lost, or at least diminished. There was a further danger, that 'salus reg. periclitabatur,' whether in this case the king 'pro defensione reg' tuitione maris, 'securitate subditor' et salva conductione navium,' may command his subjects 'per totam Angliam,' by writ under the great seal, to provide ships at their own charge and cost; and this do, when the king in his own judgment conceiveth such a danger, as doth necessarily require that aid? That under favour is the question upon the Record.

There is in this Record, whereof your lordships are judges, four writs. First, That of 4th Aug. 11 Car. which goeth out of the Chancery, for setting forth this ship of 450 tons. Secondly, the Certiorari 9 Martij 12 Car. Thirdly, the Mittimus 5 Majj 13 Car. And fourthly, that of the 22 Majj 13 Car. which is the Sci. Fa.

The second and the fourth writ, which is the Certiorari and Sci. Fa. they are returnable, the first and the third writ, which is the writ 4th Aug. and the Mittimus, they have no returns; but they give command, and require execution shall be done, 'prout de jure, et secundum consuetudinem reg' Angliæ fieri consuevit.'

The first writ, which is the ground of this business, it standeth upon two parts: a preamble, and the body of the writ. The preamble that containeth; first, a direction; and secondly, the causes and motives of the issuing of this writ. The body containeth six parts. First, the direction that is to the sheriff of the county of Bucks, nec non unto the bailiffs and burgesses of the borough of Buckingham, and mayor and burgesses of Chipping-Wiccomb alias Wiccomb, and 'probis hominibus' of all the county. Secondly, the motives and reasons inducing this writ, which are nine in number. 1. 'Quia pirata et maris grassatores,' &c. That these commit spoils and depredations by sea, and take the goods of the king's subjects. 2. Because they carry the king's subjects into miserable captivity. 3. Because of the preparation of shipping that is made undique to infest the coasts. 4. 'Quia pericula imminet,' &c. 5. 'Quia pro defensione reg. tuitione maris,' &c. 6. 'Quia pro debellatione quorund' hostium 'satagent,' &c. 7. 'Quia progenitores nostri 'reges Angliæ dig' maris temporibus,' &c. 8. 'Quia onus defensionis,' &c. 9. The most prevalent, 'Quia hoc per legem et consuetudinem Angliæ,' &c. The body of the writ contains also several mandates to the sheriffs and head officers, 'quod fide et legiancia, &c. 'et sicut nos et honorem nostrum diligitis.' The mandates are six. 1. To provide a ship of 450 tons well manned and furnished with provision, and that was to be in readiness by the 1st of March, to continue for the space of 26 weeks, 'ad proficiscendum cum navibus nostris, ' &c. pro tuitione maris,' &c. 2. That the sheriffs and head officers meet within 30 days, and set down what shall be taxed upon the incorporate towns. 3. A command to the head officers of those incorporate towns, that within their bailiwick they make an assessment upon particular persons, and compel them to pay the same. 4. A power to the sheriffs to assess all the rest within the county, 'juxta statum et facultates.' 5. A command for the levying of these sums by distress, 'et quos rebelles inveneris' to imprison their persons. 6. That no part of this sum collected shall be converted to any private use; but if any money shall be remaining, it should be paid inter solvandos.

My lords, the reasons expressed in this writ might justly satisfy any man's judgment without further argument; but I shall clearly manifest there is no clause or practice by this writ, but is verified by many records, and is 'secundum legem et consuetudinem Angliæ.'

The question that is made, is of a high transcendent nature; it concerneth the king, both in his ordinary and absolute power. Whether the king in those cases, where he in his royal judgment shall conceive a necessity for the defence of the realm, may command ships in this kind; whether by his royal power he may do it, or must require the aid per commune concilium in the parliament. And I conceive his majesty may do it, not only by his kingly prerogative, but jure majestatis.

This power is not only 'inter prerogativa regis, sed inter jura summæ majestatis,' I find by many records, that these writs have issued out in all succession of times; in the times of the Saxons before the Conquest: but I never find that this power was judicially questioned in any court at Westminster before now. I find questions made touching assertions, whether they have been equal; touching the levying, whether within the warrant of the office; touching the discharging of some, by reason of a grant of exemption: but to question the main power, whether the king by his royal power might command this for the defence of himself and the kingdom, was never disputed before now. But his gracious majesty, who hath declared himself, that he will rule his people according to his laws, for the satisfaction of the people, and to clear his justice and judgment, does suffer these writs to go forth, to which Mr. Hampden hath demurred, and to be questioned in this legal way to be determined by your lordships, to which I hope you will give a clear end.

My position shall be thus: that the king, as he is king of England, 'pro defensione regni tuione maris,' &c. when his majesty in his royal judgment conceiveth it a time of such danger, as doth necessarily require the aid commanded in this writ, that he may command and compel his subjects 'per totam Angliam' to set forth ships with men and ammunition and double equipage; and this may be done, as well by the king's writ under the great seal, as by consent in parliament.

For the proof of this position, I shall reduce what I have to say to these heads. First, that this power is 'inter jura summæ majestatis,' innate in the person of an absolute king, and in the persons of the kings of England. That this power is so inherent in the king's person, it is not any ways derived from the people, but reserved unto the king when positive laws first began. And that in this case the king is sole judge of the danger, and how this danger is to be prevented and avoided: this is my first ground.

The second is this, that the regal power is not confined to the politic advice, that the king must be in cathedra sitting in parliament; but that it hath been always done, either 'per ipsum regem, aut per regem et concilium, aut per dominos suos, aut per regem,' when he shall please to call a consultation of merchants and portsmen experienced in the service.—My lords, I shall present unto your lordships, that this power is so inherent in the king, that during the time of parliament, and in those years when parliaments were sitting, these writs issued out by a regal power, without any aid or power from parliament; and that advice was not thought necessary in former times.

3. I shall also shew unto your lordships, that this power is implied out of the sovereign's titles given unto him by the common law of England.

4. And also I shall insist upon precedents; and herein I shall desire your lordships to take notice that these writs have not issue out at the first any sudden advice; but that there was a great search made: first, by my predecessor, Mr. Noy, a man of great learning and profound judgment; other searches made by the king's counsel and some others; and a great number of records were considered of maturely before these writs issued: so nothing was done upon the sudden; and we that are of the king's counsel did think it fit that most of these records should be cited in the first Argument, by Mr. Solicitor, to the end that the counsel at the bar might give an answer to them in their reply: many more have been added by Mr. Solicitor, and many more I shall cite which have not been remembered.

My Lords, in the vouching of these records, I shall observe eight things. (1.) That the records we insist upon, are not grounded upon any private custom, or upon any charter, or upon any covenants, but upon the laws of the land; and there is not in any of these records any recital that these writs went out upon any of these grounds. (2.) That in all ages before the Conquest, and in the time of William 1, that these writs have issued 'per ipsum regem, per regem et concilium,' and did not issue upon any advice of parliament. (3.) That these records and writs were sent out, not in case of Hannibal ad portas, or an enemy discovered, or sudden invasion; but upon case of rumours, and in that a danger might happen; so not in approaching of an enemy, but in case of preparation to provide against an enemy. (4.) That the king did command shipping to be set forth in those years wherein there were parliaments, and sitting parliaments, by his royal power, without advice of parliament. (5.) That when great subsidies and aids have been given unto the king by parliament 'pro defensione regni,' in the same year that writ went forth for the defence of the kingdom. (6.) That these aids have not been required only from the maritime parts, the ports, nor from the inland counties only, but 'per totam Angliam.' (7.) That many times when these writs issued, there have been no such causes declared, as hath been in this writ. I shall observe, that in many of these writs no cause at all is set forth in them, but only that they should repair to the place of rendezvous, and there receive further directions. (8.) I shall verify every clause of this writ by many precedents. A Mandamus, and not a Mandamus Rogantes, shipping at the charge of the county, and assessments made by the sheriffs, as commoners, and a penalty greater, not only distress and imprisonment, but extent of lands, seizing of goods, till the king was paid. These are the things I shall observe out of the precedents, when I shall come unto them.

My Lords, in the fifth place, when I have laid these foundations, I shall then dispel those mists that have been raised, remove those forces that have been mustered, and answer the objections of those gentlemen, that will not be satisfied by the king's writ under the great seal: And in the sixth give a particular answer to the acts of parliament that they have cited, to the records that they have insisted upon, and to the reasons and authorities they have alledged.

In the seventh place, I shall answer their exceptions that have been taken unto the several writs, records, and proceedings thereupon, that have been produced by us.

And in the eighth place, I shall collect some conclusions and reasons out of the premises, and cite unto your lordships some judicial records, that may satisfy your lordships in point of judgment. These are my materials, I shall proceed to the building.

My lords, my first ground was, that this power is innate in the person of an absolute king. All magistracy it is of nature, and obedience, and subjection. It is of nature. And before any municipal law was, people were governed by the law of nature, and practice did rule according to natural equity: this appeareth in the Reports of sir Ed. Coke, written by him, when he was chief justice, 7 Rep. fol. 13. I will not take occasion to discourse either of the law of nature, which doth teach us to love our country, and to defend it, to expose the hand to danger, rather than the head should suffer; nor of the law of God, which commandeth obedience and subjection to the ordinance of our superiors; nor of the law of nations, which doth agree, that there must be protection from the king, and obedience from the people; and without defence there can be no protection; and without aid of the people there can be no defence: nor of the imperial law, which saith, that in cases pro communi utilitate the king may statuere alone.

My lords, upon this subject I will confine myself to the law of the land, and insist upon such records, and such precedents, and such reasons, and such authorities, as I find both by records of former times, and also in our books.

First, In the original government of this nation, I do not find that it was a monarchy; I find the contrary, that there was a great number of petty regiments. And when Julius Cæsar invaded this realm, he writeth there were four kings in Kent; and Strabo saith the like, lib. 4, so those times will not be material. During the domination of the Romans, which continued 500 years, the Romans had their prefects here in England. No man will doubt but that they might command what they pleased, Notitia utriusq; Imperii. fol. 161, that in their times there were special officers, called Comites, &c. Officers appointed by sea, and other officers by land. Those that succeeded the Romans were the Saxons: and in their times, both by ancient grants, and by edicts of the princes of those times, it appears that this naval power was commanded by them for the defence of the realm.

First, To begin with king Ina, A. D. 725, king of the West-Saxons. This king in that year made a grant to the abbot of Glastonbury, 'Quod, &c. sint quieti ab omnibus regis exactionibus et operibus quod iudici solent,' except 'Expedit' arcium, et pontium constructionem sicut in antiquo, &c.' which shews that these expeditions were accustomed to be done. Wuldredus, who was king of Kent in the year 742, granted unto his churches 'quod 'sint liberi ab omnibus secularibus servitiis,' except 'expedit' pontium, &c.' so in that grant these expeditions were excepted. Ethelredus, king of the Mercians, anno 749, granted 'Monasteriis de, &c.' except ut supra. So as in those times these services were common, and were done by a 'dicto regis.' That the churches should be free from all services, except these three, expeditions of building castles, bridges and forts; 'a quibus nulli unquam laxari possunt.' Egbert, an. 840, commanded a great navy to be provided; and that for the defence of the realm, and safeguard of ships. Ethelwald, that was king of the West Saxons, anno 854, granted to the Church, that it should be free from all service temporal, except 'regalibus tributis.' In the time of king Alfred, who was the first monarch, and king of all England; one who was a privy-counsellor in his time, and wrote the story of that time, he, in the ninth page of his book, saith, 'Quod rex Alfrédus misit galleas longas nave et cymbas ædificari;' and agreeing with this, is the history of Asser Menevensis, Florentius Wigornensis, 316, and Huntingdon 351, wherein your lordships may see by the record, it was done 'ex precepto regis per totum regnum.' This king made a law, which is not remembered by Lambert in his Saxon laws, to this effect: that no man, by summons, by the horn or word of mouth, should sit still in matter of theft, bloodshed, or going to war, whensoever his expedition should require: and there he doth mention it to be upon pain of forfeiture of life.

King Edgar, who stiled himself Angliæ Basicus, he in the year 959 provided a great navy of 3,600 ships, as saith Wigornensis, and Matth. of Westminster; and he gave a command, that every year, at Easter, a navy of 3 or 4 000 should be set out, and divided into three parts, East, West, and North: the ships in those times were not so great as now they be. The same Edgar, in the year 973, granted to the abbey of Thornet all manner of immunities, and that it should be free from all services, except those three of building bridges, castles and forts. And the same king, in his charter to the church of Worcester, granteth them to be free 'ab omnibus exactionibus,' except 'constructionem pontium, arcium, &c.'

My lords, by all these several grants, and what hath been done by those kings, it doth appear that these three fundamental services were ever reserved unto the crown, saving the grants to two or three abbeyes, which had some particular exemption. In the year 1008, which was remembered by Mr. Solicitor, there was then a great navy provided by king Ethelred. The words are thus: 'Rex Ethelredus per totam Angliam ex 310 hides, navem unam, &c. preparare, fecerat, &c.' that was for every 310 hides of land to build one ship; and every eight hides of land to find a man and a corslet, and to meet at Sandwich for defence against the Danes. This appeareth in Huntingdon 360. Matth. of Westminster 387. Hoveden 426. and Malmesbury 100.—In this record these things are observable, 'rex paravit,' 'facit, et rex eos misit:' then 'per totam

'Angl.' all England was to be charged. By the Glossary of that learned and judicious antiquary, sir Henry Spelman, it appears that 'virgata terræ continet 24 acras, quatuor virgatae continent unam hidam, et quinq; hidas 'feod. militar.' Upon casting up of this, it doth appear, that there be in England 363,600 hides of land; and every 310 hides being to set out one ship, the whole number amounteth to divers thousands, 11,072; and every eight hides, to set forth a soldier, amounts to 45,450 men: but it is not the number, but the matter, that is done by the king's command, 'per totam Angliam.'

In the 30th year of king Ethelred, he made an edict, which Mr. Solicitor caused to be read in court, saying he had it out of an old book in Cambridge, 'Quod instantur tiel nonaber del 'naves per singulos annos.' I read it to this purpose, to shew that in the 30th year of his reign, there was a naval expedition to be always ready at Easter, and sheweth the penalty of such as did depart without licence.

King Canutus, Lambert fol. 117, 118, 'ex 'sapientum concilio, &c.' ordained a command amongst his temporal laws, cap. 10, 'quod 'praesidia fiant,' &c. commands ships to be provided; and fol. 118, a penalty upon all those that refused to pay 120s. which was a great sum in those days.

That which I observe out of these two were these: First, That they were made by the king, by the advice of his lords; that there were to be yearly preparations for shipping; and those that departed out of the service without licence, were to incur the forfeiture of all their estates. If these edicts were acts of parliament, they stand unrepealed; and if no acts, then they stand by command from the king's power.

My lords, I have shewed you the practice, as it was before the time of William the 1st: He did not abrogate the former laws, but was sworn to perform them. Nay, it was said that he did confirm 'antiquas leges et consuetudines Angliae.' So then, if these were the laws, and this the power that the antient kings of England had before his time, he did ratify and confirm it, but not diminish it. This power of commanding of shipping, for the defence of the realm, it is a principal part of the power royal. This kingdom, it is a monarchy, it consists of head and members, the king is the head of this politic body; it consists of clergy and laity: the head, it is furnished with entire power and jurisdiction, not only to administer justice in cases criminal and temporal unto his people, but likewise for defence of both; and he may command the power both of the one and the other. This power I find to be mentioned in the register of original writs, written before the conquest, 127 b. It reciteth, that 'Nos considerantes quod ratione regiae dignitatis maxime ad providendum salvationi regni nostri circumquaque; astringimur.' It appears by Stamford, in his Prerogat. cap. 1, that as the king is the most excellent and worthiest part of the commonwealth, so is he also the preserver, nourisher, and defender of his people. I find it in Fortescue, that they have cited; that a commonwealth without this head is but a trunk, as the natural body is a cadaver. I find it in Fitz. Her. Na. Br. fo. 73, or 173, that the king of right ought to save and defend the realm, as well against the sea as against the enemies, that it be not surrounded nor wasted.

How is this defence against the sea and enemies of the kingdom? Is the king bound to defend the kingdom by sea walls at his own charges?—No; the power of defence is a superintendent power in his majesty, to authorize sheriffs and commissioners to see it done, but by his power; yet at the charge of the people. Register 127 b. it appeareth there, where the king commandeth the people by his writs; the one directed to the sheriff, and the other to the commissioners, and in both will-th and commandeth, 'quod distringat A. B. et al.' to distrain the lands of all those that may receive damage to repair the sea-walls, as well as the Ter' Tenn'. This writ was before any statute concerning that, for the Register was before the Conquest; and the first statute that concerneth commissions of sewers, was made 6 H. 6. So it is by the power the king had at common law, and not upon any statute: And this was to the sheriff, as well as to commissioners; and that it was done at the charge of the country, and not at the king's charge, Pat. 33, Ed 1, m. 4, dors. agreeth, with the Register: The king doth there recite, 'Quod ratione dignitatis regis, &c. et per juramentum sumus astricti 'ad providendum salvationi regni,' and there he giveth power to commissioners to distrain the people to make defence against the sea, at their own charges. Pat. 2 Ed. 2, pars 2, m. 5, dors. in the case of Wiseman. Rep. 2, fol. 15, the king, ex officio, ought to govern his subjects in peace and tranquillity. 7 Rep. fol. 9, protection of the king is general over all the kingdom; there is reason why it should be thus: For the king of England, he hath an entire empire, he is an absolute monarch; nothing can be given unto an absolute prince, but is inherent in his person, as may appear by books, records, and acts of parliament: Bract. lib. 2, fol. 55, b. Sciendum, &c. 'Dominus rex super 'omnes qui ad coronam pertinent.' This appears likewise in the statute 24 Hen. 8. There it is declared that this realm of England is an empire, and hath been so accepted in the world. Stat. 25 Hen. 8, cap. 21, 1 Eliz. cap. 1, 1 Jac. cap. 1, the crown of England is affirmed to be an imperial crown; and acts of parliament are proofs of the highest nature. 16 Ric. 2, c. 5, that the king holdeth his empire immediately of the God of Heaven: And at his coronation, his crown is elevated as a signification thereof. This is likewise acknowledged in the Irish Reports, fol 60, 'Rex Angliae est absolutus monarcha in regno suo.' Fortescue saith, the king of England, as well as any other king or emperor, hath all the liberties within this kingdom 'in imperio suo.' The law of England makes the king of England, not as his subjects are, a natural body, but a body politic, freeth him from all imperfection and infirmity; he is immortal, and never dies; the king ever liveth, Com. 177, 11 Rep. fol. 7, 21 Ed. 4, and other records.

My lords, as he is an absolute monarch, so all these, 'Jura summæ majestatis,' are given unto his person by the common law.

First, He hath supreme dominion, both by sea and land, as is proved by the Mirror, the greatest part whereof was writ before the Conquest. Some things are added to it by H. Horne in the reign of Ed. 4. He holdeth, that all lands, and all jurisdiction, and all dominion, is derived from the crown: That whatsoever was not granted from the crown, remaineth in the person of the king. This Supremum Dominium is so inherent in the king's person, that if the king grants away his lands, 'absq; aliquo reddendo,' yet the tenure must still remain to the king; 8 Hen. 7, 12, 30 Hen. 8, 45 Dyer. This dominion is not only upon the land, but it is upon the sea. And so the king he hath not only a dominion at sea, but he is 'dominus maris Anglicani;' he is both owner of the sea, and of the soil under the sea. And so it was resolved lately, by my Lord Chief Baron, and the rest of the barons in the Exchequer, in the case of Suttou Marsh, Mich. 13 Car. That the soil of the land, so far as the sea floweth, is the king's, and the king is seized thereof, jure coronæ. Mirror 8, Bract. fol. 8, temps Edw. 1, Avowry, 46 Ed. 3, Com. 3, b. That not only the dominion of the sea, but the very soil belongeth unto the king.

In the next place he hath, besides his supremum dominium, a sovereign jurisdiction, and that extends both by sea and land.

First, For creation of all his great officers and judges; creation of the Admiralty, time out of mind. 20 Hen. 7, fol. 8, 12 Hen. 7, fol. 17, power to make justices could not be granted; and all these powers resumed in the statute, as inherent in the crown. 12 Hen. 7, fol. 17, there it is said by Fineux, that at the beginning all administration of justice was in one hand, that is, in the crown. And surely this jurisdiction did not begin in the time of Ric. 1, when those laws were renewed by him at his return from the Holy Land; but there were admirals in England, and the admiral law by sea long before. 27 Ed. 1, a famous record in the Tower, that the commissioners for the emperor, Spain and France, did appear before the king's commissioners, and did acknowledge the sovereignty of the king of England upon the sea did belong unto him time out of mind. And for further proof of this, it likewise appeareth in that learned book of Mr. Selden's called Mare Clausum.

My lords, the next inherent power of the crown are pardons of offences and condemned persons, and restitutions, which none can do but the king himself, 1 Hen. 4, fol. 5, 20, Hen. 7, 8.

The next is 'jus nummi percutiendi,' a setting of a royal stamp upon his coin, the advancing of the value of his coin, and the debasing of it. 21 Ed. 3, 6. That the king only can put a value upon it. 5 Rep. fol. 114. That the king, by his absolute prerogative, may make any foreign coin lawful money of England, by his proclamation, Davies Reports, fol. 20.

The next, 'jus summæ majestatis,' is that of concluding war and peace, which is absolutely inherent in the king's person, which he may do without calling his great council, 19 Ed. 3, 6, and 7 Report 25. That all the subjects of England cannot make a war, bellum indicere belongs not to the subject. And to make aliens and denizens, is a high prerogative.

My lords, this trust that the king hath for making of war and peace, and for the defence of the realm, both by sea and land, it is a great trust, inherent in the person of the king; no man ought to mistrust where the law doth trust.

There is an objection made, that if it should rest in the power of the king, he might do it when there was no ground for it, and without cause; and cause forces to be mustered, and ships provided where there is no imminent danger, in such a manner, as that it might be grievous unto the people. There are objections clearly against presumption of law; for where the law trusteth, we ought not to distrust. The king, as appeareth by all our books, is the fountain of justice and piety, and will do justice unto all his subjects, 1 Com. 240. All justice is derived from the king, 13 Ed. 4, 8. The king can do no wrong. Bract. lib. 3, cap. 9, 8, H. 6, 20. It is royal power, 'De aere correctione de luy m.' He is the sole judge, and we ought not to question him, Bracton, 'Rex non habet superiorem nisi Deus,' 11 Rep. f. 72. The king is the fountain of justice and common right: And the king, being God's lieutenant, cannot do wrong, 17 Ed. 3, 49. The king could not be made an instrument of covin and fraud, but the patent was void, Littleton's Comment. 99, the 5th Report, fol. 14. That religion, justice and verity, are the sure supporters of crowns and diadems, 24 Ed. 3, 42. Stamford's Pleas of the Crown, fol. 72. At the common law, the law doth not distrust where the king doth commit one, but that is upon just cause, and so we are not to doubt it. And therefore at the common law, West. 1, cap. 15, a man committed by the king was not replevable: Nay, if he was committed by his council that was his representative body, he was not replevable. Shall we then, when the law hath committed this power unto the king, who is the fountain of justice and equity, who is mistrusted by the law of the realm, and the commonwealth intrusts him; shall we think that succeeding kings will do that which is not fit to be done? I say, if the law trust him, we ought to trust him. At the common law, if the king commit a man per bouche, he is not replevable.

But for a further reason, those that are his delegates or judges, are not to be mistrusted.

That which a judge doth, as in his office, shall not be assigned for error. If it be so in the delegate power, much more in the primitive and fountain. 5 Mar. Dyer 163, the court of King's-bench did receive a record of nisi prius, the Postea returned of the clerk, and the death of the justice of assize assigned for error, and could not be received; and so, 1 Mar. Dyer 89, a writ of error to reverse a fine, proat in Dyer. That is the reason of the book, 7 Hen. 7, fol. 40, 10 Hen. 7, 28. Fitz. Her. Na. Br. 126, saith, he cannot assign for error, nor shall be admitted to alledge any thing contrary to the office of a judge; as to say, the judge did not give right judgment, or the clerk did not make right entries, m. 7, Ed. 1, B. Rs. and that is the reason why a man of non compos mentis in a fine, and suffering of a recovery, it shall not be assigned for error against the acts of a judge, 8 Rep. Dr. Bonner's case. Records by a judge, nor justice of peace, not traversable. Good my lords, then, if by the laws of this kingdom one shall not be admitted to receive an averment against any acts done by your lordships the judges, or against acts done by inferior judges; surely in this, where the king is absolute judge, it shall not be allowed to say, there was no cause of danger, or that is done by the king which ought not to be done. Bract. lib. 1, cap. 24, 'est in corona regis facere justitiam.' The king is so absolutely trusted with this defence, that a subject cannot make a fort or castle upon his own freehold without the king's license; that appears in the old Mag' Char' fo. 163. Inquiry made of those that do build forts and castles without the king's license, Rot' Parl' 45 Ed. 3, m. 34, 6 Hen. 4, 19, and a book of Long. 5 Ed. 4, fol. 129, that a subject cannot make a fort or castle without the king's license; not in his own ground.

My lords, the king hath so discharged this trust, that though there were no account unto the subject, yet these ships that have been commanded were 'ad proficiscend' cum navibus nostris.' The king hath been at greater charge with these ships going out, than any king of England ever was, as will appear by those vast sums of money the king hath spent in these years, besides what hath been contributed to it by the subjects.

My lords, I have done with my first position, that it is an inherent right in the person of the king of England; and that the king is the sole judge, both of the danger, and when and how it is to be avoided.

It hath been objected, That the king of England may do it, but how? It must be according to the institution of the laws of the realm: there must be a concurrent power, a politic advice in parliament, and so it may be done. But the king, either by his ordinary power or absolute, without the assistance of the great council, he cannot do it, as hath been objected. And therefore in the second place, I shall come to the second thing I did propose, that was, That the king, as he is king of England, that he alone, for this common defence of the realm, without the aid of parliament, may statuerre, &c. That the king, by the advice of his council when he pleases, may do it; that he may ordain several ways by the institution of the common laws, by his ordinance, by his proclamation, by his patents, by his writs, and in legal matters by his judges. That this may be done by him.

First, It is agreeable to reason; for kings were before parliaments, and then surely they might have done it. As justice doth flow from the crown originally, as it was in Moses, so it is in the king of England, only in the king's person. But afterwards the king did depute his deputies, and gave others power; this is no conceit of mine. 12 Hen. 7, fol. 17, b. per Fineaux, there was a time when there were no municipal laws, when positive laws were not established, when kings did rule their people according to natural equity; and then surely the king might ordain. No man will question it; since there have been positive laws and municipal laws, the kings of England they have ordained, as by those several records cited appears. It appears by the practice since the time of William 1, that the kings of England in all those writs that they have ordained, have prescribed the time for issuing of these writs, the numbers of the ships, the times of meeting, the manner of muition, and to stay for the defence quamdium nobis placeret. I have made a collection of what have gone out by the king himself, what per regem et concilium, and what by advice of his council, and with the advice of merchants and portsmen; but they are so infinite, and so many of them, that I will not trouble your lordships with the repetition of them.

These ordinances for the defence, they are suitable and agreeable to the ordinance that the king maketh in other cases, where the king alone doth ordain, as by his proclamation. Claus. 24 Ed. 3, pars 2, m. 2, dors. The king by his proclamation commanded all earls, barons, knights, esquires, and other men at arms, that none of them should depart into foreign parts. Fitz. Na. Br. fo. 85, he agreeth it; and saith the book, He that transgresseth this proclamation shall be fined for his disobedience. And this command may be under the great seal, signature, or privy-seal; for saith the book, The subject is to take notice of any of the king's seals; so in all ages he hath commanded no victuals shall be transported. Claus. 24 Ed. 3, m. 7, dors. 5, Dec. 4 Hen. 8, 11 Hen. 7, 23. The king granted a proclamation for a Justing; and if one of the two that be fighting be killed, it is no felony. 5 Report 114. The king by his absolute power may make any kind of money current by his proclamation. In the next place, the king may ordain by his patent alone. 40 Ed. 3, fol. 17, 18. The king did grant a privilege to the scholars of Oxford, that they should have the choice of the inns in Oxford, which was before there were any fair colleges in Oxford: saith the townsman, This is my freehold, the king cannot do it: say the judges, This is by the king's patent, and is in favour of learning, and therefore a good ordinance. So the justice in eyre may take up the principal inn in a town. Is there any thing more usual than for the king to give power to a corporation to make ordinance for a common good? 49 Ed. 3, 162. Shall it be so in the creature, and not in him that makes the creature? A case or two upon every one of them. The king may ordain by his writ, and that appears 9 Ed. 3, 16, a writ of Cessavit against the tenants of Northumberland. The tenants had been mightily oppressed by the Scots; they petitioned the king, and said, they were not able to pay their landlords their rents, by reason of those incursions upon them of the Scots, and desired stay of suit; and there it appeareth, that the king did ordain by his writ, that those suits upon those reasons should not proceed against the tenants for non-payment of their rents. Out of the same reason are the writs of protection.

Then the king and his council may ordain; for that I find, m. 4, Hen. 3, Fitz. Her. N. Br. Dower 179, a writ of Dower there brought by a French woman. The tenant of the writ pleaded, that there was an ordinance of the king and council, 'Quod nullus de potestate regis Franciæ respondeatur de Anglia antequam Angli respondit de jure suo in Francia;' that is, We Englishmen should not be compelled to answer any Frenchman or woman in a legal way, till the English were answered in France to their suits there. 39 Ed. 3, 7 per Thorp. The king and his lords may make an ordinance, which shall be as binding as a statute. Rot. Franc. 72 Ed. 3, m. 6. The king by the advice of his council did ordain 'quod omnes magnat. et al' qui habent terras et tenementa continue morat', &c.' Upon this ordinance I can shew above 40 writs that have gone out to the nobility, clergy, archbishops, and bishops, and to all the king's subjects too that had houses in the maritime parts. Rot. Franc. 22 Ed. 3, m. 16, and 50 Ed. 3, m. 47, dors. 24 Ed. 3, m. 6, that of 24 is to the inlands within 16 miles of the sea coasts. 40 Ed. 3, m. 37, the like writs awarded to most maritime counties, upon pain of seizure of their lands and goods. So likewise for provision for the army; the king and his council have ordained, both for markets to be kept within such a distance of the army, and wine to be sold there, and no where else. Rot. Sco. 10, 12 Ed. 2, m. 13, dors. So they have set down the number of the men of arms that every town should be charged with. Claus. 13 Ed. 3, pars 1, m. 14, dors. with a command that they should distrain the commonalty of that county for the wages of those men at arms.

My lords, if the king may at any time of danger, by his proclamation, by his patent, by his writ, by the advice of his council; surely in case of necessity it is much more lawful, for necessitas est lex temporis, where a defence by sea and land is required. § Ed. 4, 6. 14 Hen.

7, 29, jurors by law are to hold together till they give up their verdict, yet otherwise, if the house be like to fall upon their heads. 38 Hen. 7, 11, upon a Præcipe, the tenant may be excused, if he could not pass the waters.

My lords, I find that in legal matters the king and his judges make certain explanations upon the statute of Gloucester, as appears by Mag' Char.' And what was done then by the judges advice, hath the force of a law at this day. So as you see by the laws of England, as well in other cases, as in cases of defence, the law hath given the king of England this power to ordain for the good and safety thereof.

I find that in all ages, and in all times, the incidents to a defence, as well as this principal part, hath been given to the king himself, as he is king of England. First, For the Murage of Towns: That the king hath commanded the murage of towns to be done at the people's charge; the precedents are so many, I will mention none of them; and shall he not command for the defence of the wooden walls of the kingdom? Rot' Alm' 12 Ed. 3, pars 2, m. 10. The king commands by writ a place to be fortified towards the war; and every man having rent there to contribute, or to be compelled thereto by distress; that was commanded to be done by writ, Pat. 12 Ed. 3, pars 3, m. 5, it appeareth it was done. The king imposed a certain rate upon all goods and merchandize that came unto Kingston upon Hull, and commanded this should be employed to the walling of the town; this was 'de voluntate regis;' this appeareth Rot. Pat. 19 Ed. 3, pars 1, m. 12, there was the same command for other towns, as Dover, &c. The said roll, m. 22, Pat. 12, Ed. 3, pars 3, m. 14, dors. a writ for the repairing of the walls of Winchester at the subjects charge. Rot. ib. m. 15, the king by special grant gave power to the mayor and burghesses to assess the inhabitants towards the making of the wall, and the defence of the town. Claus. 1 Ric. 2, m. 12, Oxford was commanded by the king to be fortified at the inhabitants charge. Claus. 12 Ed. 3, pars 3, m. 32, the king commanded particular subjects to fortify their castles at their own charges in time of danger, Pat. 18, Ed. 3, m. 9, the king taketh the castles of the subjects into his own hands in time of danger, 'ad evitandum damna et pericula quæ nobis evenire possint.' Claus. 13 Ed. 3, pars 1, m. 36, dors. the king by advice of his council did ordain, that the town of Southampton, 'pro salvatione ejusd', should build a wall.

My lords, if the king may command the walling of a town at the charge of the inhabitants, he may likewise command the defence of the kingdom by sea; so for other incidents of defence, as for erecting beacons upon the sea-coasts. Rot. Vas. 11, 12 Ed. 3, m. 22, 'de communibus in singulis;' Claus. 1, Ric. 2, m. 4, dors. 'de ordinatione per regem et consilium pro vigiliis faciend'. So likewise the king in all ages hath commanded the inbarring of ships for the defence of the realm, and for all public service; this appeareth Claus. 14 Hen. 3, m. 17, dors. all ships arrested that could carry 16 horses. Rot. Sco. 10 Ed. 3, m. 2, dors. 'omnes naves pro defensione, &c.' Rot. Alm. 12 Ed. 3, m. 23, pars 1, and 12, for the imbaring of ships for the defence of the realm. So likewise the king commandeth and appointeth who shall be officers, who shall be admiral of the fleet, who shall be Custodes Maris, as appears Pat. Ed. 2, m. 7, dors. and in the same roll, m. 10, Pat. 15 Johannis m. 10, Pat. 48 Hen. 3, m. 5, Claus. 23 Ed. 3, m. 5, dors. and an infinite number more. Then that the county paid the charges of those who had Custod' Maritim', that appears, Rot. Fra. 21 Ed. 3, m. 31, dors. Claus. 13 Ed. 3, pars 1, m. 14, dors. The king when there was cause he moderated the expence. Claus. 25 Ed. 3, m. 16. The king did order how much, and how long the county should pay for wages; and commanded the stay of those that could have been gone before their time: and this appeareth Pat. 48 Hen. 3, m. 4. Claus. 48 Hen. 3, m. 2, 3, dors. Then it appeareth by many records, that this guard of the sea-coasts was to be according as the king should order and direct, sometimes per regem and sometimes per nos et concilium: and this appeareth Claus. 23 Ed. 1, m. 5, dors. Claus. 13 Ed. 3, pars 2, m. 14, dors. Pat. 29 Ed. 1, m. 1.

Sometime the king out of his royal power hath been pleased to give discharges to particular men, to be discharged from this Custod' Maritim'. This appeareth Claus. 23 Ed. 1, m. 5, dors. Portsmouth discharged, because their ships were in the king's service, Claus. 8 Ric. 2, m. A discharge for the abbot of St. Albans, Pat. 12 Ed. 3, pars 2, m. 8, Pat. 12, Ed. 3, pars 1, m. 14, discharges de Custod' Marit.

Then the power of punishing those that should neglect those commands hath been always in the king, and to be punished by his commissioners, or by his writs, and that in a high manner.

That there have been commands by distress, by imprisonment, by seizure of lands, goods, and forfeiture of all that they had, this appeareth, Pat. 48 Hen. 3, dors. Claus. 48 Hen. 3, m. 3, and a great number in the times of Ed. 2, and Ed. 3. The king hath so far-meddled in this business, that though it hath been the money of the country, yet the king hath appointed the pay-master, Claus. 48 Hen. 3, m. 20, Claus. 16 Ed. 2, m. 13. So all arrays for mustering of men between 16 and 60, have been in all ages, and by the king's command, to be in and continue in readiness so long as the king shall please, Rot. Alm. 12 Ed. 3, pars 2, m. 6, dors. So, my lords, it doth appear by these precedents that have been cited, by these records, and by these book-cases, that the kings of England have in all ages given command, and made ordinances by themselves, by their council, by their judges, and by their peers; and these ordinances have been obeyed.

My lords, I promise upon this lead to make it good, that in these times, and in these years, wherein there were parliaments, that though the parliaments did determine matters concerning the land forces, and the going of the king's army into Scotland, and yet sitting the parliament, the king hath commanded the setting forth of ships by his writ; this was ever left to the royal power. For the proof of this, there was, the 24 Ed. 1, a parliament, as appears in the printed books of that year; and in that year the king commanded ships by his writs at the charge of the subjects. Pat. 24 Ed. 1, m. 17. Command to take up a hundred ships; and in Pat. 24 Ed. 1, ex parte regis rem. Exchequer-Roll 22. Command pro Custod' marit'. Hil. 9 Ed. 2, a parliament holden at Lincoln, and yet in the same year writs went out to provide shipping, as appears by Rot. Pat. 9 Ed. 2, pars 2, m. 26, I find there was a parliament held 12 Ed. 2. This appeareth in the book of statutes, Rot. Scot. 11, and 12 Ed. 2, m. 8, the king recites certain inroads made upon the men in Northumberland; 'et quod de communi concilio,' held at York, 'ordinavimus, &c.' and assigns the earl of Pembroke, and bishop of Norwich, 'ad requirend' Norff' et Suff' 'juxta discretiones vestras subsidium facere' 'per naves, &c. per tempus trium vel quatuor mensium.' At this time there was a provision by parliament for the king's service by land, and for his armies to meet him at Newcastle; and for two reasons why Navale Subsidium should be necessary. First, to hinder the bringing of any victuals into Scotland. Secondly, for the free intercourse of trade. So as you see, in this year wherein a parliament was holden, this Navale Subsidium was commanded by the king's writ, without an act of parliament; though this writ was for Norfolk and Suffolk, yet the like was for Dorset, Somerset, &c. It appeareth likewise 10 and 11 Ed. 2, which were those great years of sending out of writs, that then parliaments were holden. And so it doth appear by the printed book of statutes; yet in that year of 10 Ed. 3. Claus. 10 Ed. 3, m. 37, dors. a writ directed to the mayor and bailiff of Bristol, with a command, that all ships of 40 tons et ultra, should be seized. 10 Ed. 3, m. 21, dors. command that the ships should be set forth for the preventing of danger, and that no foreigners ships come in to aid the Scots. M. 21, dors. the same roll; command to the city of London to set out ships at their own charge. Sco. 10 Ed. 3, m. 21, dors. Writs to the sheriff of Bucks to send horsemen and footmen to the county of Southampton: so there were men drawn out of their county, and the refusers there were called rebels. Rot. ib. writs 'De Navibus pro Defensione Regni.'

My lords, there was something more observable in this year of 10 Ed. 3, for some of the writs that went out bear teste 3 Octobris 10 Ed. 3, and mention a parliament; but did not go out by any ordinance of parliament; so that the awarding of these writs 10 Ed. 3, were sitting the parliament, and by the royal power: which is a strong argument, there needeth not aid of parliament for the king to command his forces. 11 Ed. 3, there was likewise a parliament, as appeareth in the printed books of statutes, yet writs dated 10 Januarii 11 Ed. 3, per ipsum regem, ships are commanded pro guerra super mare. Rot. Vas. 20 Ed. 3, m. 6, dors. proclamation to several counties, that all ships be in readiness. In the 12th year of Ed. 3, there was a parliament at Northampton, Claus. 12 Ed. 3, pars 2, m. 1, the same roll pars 2, m. 82, and yet the same year the king commanded shipping at the charge of the counties, as appeareth Rot. Parl. 12 Ed. 3, pars 1, m. 12. Claus. 12 Ed. 3, pars 3, m. 29. And in the 13th year of Ed. 3, there was likewise a parliament holden, as appeareth 12th Ed. 3, m. 9, 10, but printed statutes make no mention of a parliament then.

My lords, in this record these things are observable, cited, and made use of by the defendant's counsel; a strong record as any can be against them! In that parliament the king he did pray the advice of the commons in parliament touching his war with France, and the guarding of the sea-coasts; the commons they make answer, 'Prient les commous que ils ne conseil doner al choses de quel ne pass conuance, &c.' They say further, and they grant, that the maritime towns ought to make the guard upon the sea without wages, and the inland towns upon the land.

Two things are observable in this record. First, When the king doth descend so low as to pray the advice of his commons in parliament, and assistance for the guarding of the sea; the commons disclaimed it, and said, they have no connuzance, &c. and yet the defendant's counsel did press, that now the king should ask the advice of the commons in parliament; a thing disclaimed by the commons in parliament 15 Ed. 3, to have any cognizance of. Secondly, That by this record, the maritime parts ought to guard the sea at their own charges: This, though it was granted in their petition, it was not granted by the king; for it appeareth in the same year, Rot. Alm. 13 Ed. 3, m. 13, dors. that the king that year hearing of some preparations in France, commanded ships for three months. Claus. 13 Ed. 3, pars 1. m. 14, that in several counties men were distrained for not payment of wages for the archers and others that guarded the sea-coasts. It appeareth by these records, that both the guard of the sea, and the sea-coasts, was done juxta ordinationem nostram, order made by us and our council. Rot. Alm. 13 Ed. 3, m. 15. dors. the king appointed the archbishop of York, Hugh de Percy, et al., for that purpose, &c.

So, my lords, I have done with the second ground, that is, that the king is the sole judge of this without his parliament: That the commons in parliament have disclaimed to have any cognizance of it: That in the same year, when parliaments were holden, the same year these writs have issued without advice of parliament.

The third thing I did propose was those supreme titles, which the common law of England giveth unto the king, which may enforce this. Bract. lib. 2, cap. 24, saith, that the king he is Vicarius Dei; his power, as was agreed, is jure divino. God is the God of hosts, and the king is a model of God himself. 40 Ed. 3, fol. 18, the king is the chief guardian of the commonwealth. The sheriff hath Posses Comitatus under the king, the king's vicegerent in the county: And he hath this power, not only for the execution of legal process, but for the defence of the realm. 12 Hen. 7, fol. 7, this delegate power of the sheriff is as well for defence, as for the execution of process. Shall the sheriff do it, and not the king? 10 Hen. 3, fol. 1, B. Hen. 7, fol. 1, the king is the conservator of the law. 20 Hen. 7, fol. 4. 'Rex est Capitalis Justiciarius totius Angliæ;' he is not only to maintain justice in the courts of justice, but to protect and defend his people. Stamford's Prerogat. cap. 1. The king is the most worthy part of the body of the commonwealth, the preserver, nourisher, and defender of it: And by this they enjoy their laws, goods and lands, 11 Rep. fol. 70. b. Magdalen-College's case, 'Rex est Medicus Regni et Sponsus Republicæ.' It is the part of a good physician, as well to prevent diseases, as to cure them; and the office of a good king, as well to prevent danger, as to remedy it. Com. fol. 130. He is the soul that animates the body of the commonwealth; and we ought to move as he moves. 11 Rep. fol. 72. The king is the fountain of common right, therefore we have no reason to stain the fountain.

I am now come to my fourth proof, which is by precedents, wherein I shall be somewhat long.

The Second Day's ARGUMENT of Sir JOHN BANKS.

May it please your lordships; To remember I shewed by charters, aids, and a great number of precedents, that this royal power was in the king of England before the Conquest: And that though some were exempted from the setting forth of ships by grant unto some particular men, or some particular churches; yet these three fundamental services of expedition, repairing of castles, and making of bridges, were always exempted.

Then I shewed, by a great number of precedents, that not only the principal, but all other necessities that concern the defence of the realm, both by sea and land, hath been always commanded by the king's writ: for the fortifying of towns and castles, and the murrage of towns, the appointment of admirals of the fleet, and those that should be guardian by sea and land; the imbaring of ships, and arrays of men, the erection of beacons, and discharging of some upon just cause, and by punishing of those that were refractory: And all this was done by the king's command, per ipsum regem, or per regem et concilium, without any aid of parliament.

Likewise, I have made it appear to your lordships, that the king is the sole judge of this defence: That the king is not to be mistrusted in the execution of his office, as king; nor your lordships as judges, are not to be mistrusted. I have then shewn out of precedents, that in those years, wherein there have been parliaments, and sometimes sitting the parliaments, writs have issued per ipsum regem, and per regem et concilium.

I shall proceed to make good other particulars, which I have opened unto your lordships. First, That these precedents that have been shewed, and which I shall shew unto your lordships, have not been grounded upon any particular covenant or charter of custom, but upon the law of the land, and upon such reasons as are irreversible, and bind all the king's subjects, as well clergy as laity. For this I shall remember Claus. 48 Hen. 3, m. 3. The writs do recite, 'quod tum milites et liberi tenentes quam omnes alij, &c. ad defensionem regni teneantur.' Claus. 9 Ed. 3, m. 11, 'pro defensione regni omnes teneantur.' Scot. 10 Ed. 3, m. 12, 'quia consonans rationi, quod omnes tangit per omnes supportari debet.' And the same roll, m. 20. dors. 'ex legiantia ad defensionem contra hostiles ingressus inimicor' manus exponere adjutrices, &c.' Rot. Alm. 12 Ed. 3, m. 1, dors. 'omnes et singuli tenentur, &c.' 'Se et sua exponere,' the same roll, m. 12, dors. 'omnes et singuli ad defensionem regni astricti.' And I think every man will acknowledge himself to be bound out of his allegiance. Rot. Alm. 13 Ed. 3, m. 13, dors. 'ex legiantia ad defensionem regni et vestri et vestrorum.' Same roll, m. 17. And there be writs unto all the bishops of England, 'quod invenerint homines ad arma pro defensione.' Francke Almoigne Tenure was no plea against this service. Rot. Franc. 46 Ed. 3, m. 34. There was a writ directed to the bishop of Canterbury, for the arming and arraying all ecclesiastical persons within his province: The like to the bishop of York in the same roll. So it extends to all the king's subjects, as well to the clergy as the laity.

Nay, ports that were obliged to do particular service, yet in case of extraordinary defence, that there the writs went out, not only to perform the ordinary services, but services ultra debitum. The Cinque Ports, by their charter of Ed. 1, were to set forth 52 ships at their own charge for 15 days; yet we find by several writs, and in several kings reigns, that the Cinque Ports have been required to do further services. Arrests have been of these ships, 'Ultra servitium debitum.' Scot. Roll. 10 Ed. 3, m. 2, 3. dors. and 28. dors. there is a command, that all their ships of 40 tons should be arrested for the king's service. And so likewise, m. 22, that all the ships of the Cinque Ports, 'tam majores quam minores,' should be arrested. Rot. Alm. 13 Ed. 3, m. 13. 'Omnes naves que transire poterint,' arrested and brought to the Cinque Ports.

So then, to tell of particular rolls, that these and these towns were obliged to do these services; this, under favour, is no argument. For although they be obliged to do the service, yet upon other occasion, the king took all their ships, ultra servitium debitum. Claus. 16. Ed. 2, m. 13, dors. The king writeth to divers earls, barons and others in this manner, 'Quod sint tam citius quatenus poterint parati,' beyond your service, with horse and arms, and come to our town of Newcastle upon Tyne: so as this writ was directed to all the lords spiritual and temporal, and all the king's subjects; not only with their due service, but beyond their service to be at Newcastle. So your lordships see the motives, and grounds, and reasons of these writs are universal; they concern not a particular part and subject, but all the king's subjects; and they are 'Legiantia sua debita.' So that is the first thing I would observe to your lordships, that these writs and precedents are grounded upon the law of the land, and not upon particular custom.

The second thing is this: that all these writs have issued by the king's mandate, either by the king only, or by the king and his council, without advice in parliament; of which I have made a collection: and it is better for me to attend your lordships withal, than to cite them; because they are above 500, wherein I have distinguished what have been per regem, and which per regem et consilium, and where the advice of particular merchants and portmen were required, Scot. 11 Ed. 3, m. 2, dors. 19 Ed. 3, pars 1, m. 26, dors. And in these, the advice of particular men were called to assist the king and his council.

Now, my lords, if before time of William 1, and since, and for so many hundred years together, this hath been done; shall not these precedents make a rule? That precedents that are not against the law, nor contrary to the rules and reasons of the law, make a law, this appeareth by 4 Ed. 4, fol. 43. The lord-chancellor sent forth a writ of error. The judges took exceptions both to the matter, and the manner, saith the book, because it hath been always so; the precedents make a law. 33 Hen. 6, fol. 20, an absurd return made by a sheriff; yet because precedents to warrant it, a good return. 2 Ric. 2, fol. 7, where a duty was to be paid to a corporation of mayor and commonalty, the duty to be paid to the body, and an acquittance to be had from them; but because it had been used the mayor alone to give the acquittance, a good acquittance. 2 Rep. Haines's case; the king shall not part with his interest without the Great Seal; but yet a lease for years, under the seal of the Exchequer, is good by custom. 4 Rep' fol. 9, that the precedents of the court are good against the express words of a statute. Having so many precedents, I will not trouble you any longer, though I have reserved a special place for answering of objections; yet such objections as fall materially in the way, I shall give an answer to, though I reserve the answer to the main objection to the fifth place.

It hath been said, by Mr. Holborn, that here hath been a discontinuance of time; and that since the time of 50 Ed. 3, none of these writs have issued. Shall discontinuance of time take away the king's right? If there have been no use within the time of the memory of man; yet if there have been an inherent right in the crown of England, shall the crown lose it by discontinuance of time, contrary to the rule of the law? 10 Hen. 4, fol. 6. Where the king is the founder of a bishopric or abbey, and is by common right to have a Corody, though not used, and the king hath not demanded it in time of memory, yet the king shall not lose it. Fitz. Her. Na. Br. fol. 5. A writ of right brought by the king, where you must allege expleis et seisin, will not bind the king to allege a Seisin in him and his progenitors: for if once the king had a Seisin, protracts of time shall not discontinue it. 12 Hen. 7, fol. 20. The statute of Mortmain confineth the lord to enter within a year and a day; but it shall not bind the king, for he may do it any time. 35 Hen. 6, fol. 26. If a villein doth alien his lands, it barreth not the king. Plenary after six months, no plea against the king. 6 Rep. no discontinuance of time, if the king hath a right. 7 Ed. 4, 30. If an alien and another man purchase lands together, and the alien dies, the king shall not be prevented by survivorship: and in personal goods, you shall raise no prescription against the king. 35 Hen. 6, fol. 27. There is no man can pretend a title to the king's goods, for waifs, estrays, or wrecks; for no prescription can invade the king's profit.

But then they say the precedents are not in all times; for we have not shewn, nor cannot shew that in all times these writs have issued.—A strange objection in all times; My lords, it is a casual service. In all times, God be thanked, not that occasion or necessity of this defence. Will you have us shew you precedents for a casual service done at all times? 4 Rep. fol. 10. If a man hold to do service to his lord, to go with him into the war of the king, this is out of the statute of limitation; for it may happen not once in two or three hundred years: therefore the law doth not require we should have a Seisin, for this very reason, because it is casual. 33 Hen. Br. Fealty 15. That for homage and fealty, casual service, they are out of the statute of limitations: so as now, by the same reason that they would tie us to precedents where there was no occasion, by the same reason the tenants are to do homage, or go into the wars when there was no occasion. But besides, he is much mistaken; these precedents do not end with Ed. 3, 7 Ric. 2, m. 18. 13 Hen. 6, m. 10, 14 Hen. 6, pars 1, m. 14, a great number of ships commanded then in the king's service.

But it hath been said, that the people have always petitioned against it, and there hath been a decrying by the people; and they have petitioned in parliament against it. And these things, that must be made good by custom, must gather strength by a consent. And further, that when petitions have been preferred, the king hath not denied the petition expressly.

My lords, I shall shew, when I come to give a particular answer to those records and petitions that they have mentioned, that notwithstanding these petitions, this service hath been always continued: and for the answer that he speaketh of, that they have not been denied; these are the very words of the answer, 'Le roy se avisera.' We know whether this be an express denial or no. So though the king took time to advise of the petition of his commons, this is no argument, but that it is a mannerly kind of denial. Besides, in these very years of 10, 11 et 12 Ed. 3, the writs went out for the shipping business, by the royal power.

Then it hath been said, that we can make no precedents of these; for though writs have gone out, yet it doth not appear that these writs have been put in practice, or that any execution of them have been done.—But the service hath been done, as doth appear by the monuments of those times. Then it doth appear by other records, that the wages of mariners have been paid by the country. These very years, Rot. Claus. 20 Ed. 3, m. 6, 7, it doth appear that some particular men had particular discharges, either because they were in the king's service, or in Gascoigne, or lived on the sea-coasts; that they pleaded their discharges, and had them allowed for that reason, 26 Ed. 3, m. 14.

So as, my lords, upon this second ground, that these writs have gone forth thus constantly in several ages; that there being such a number of precedents, the discontinuance hath ever been when there was no occasion. That the precedents of the courts of justice make a law, and discontinuance cannot take away the king's title. This is the second thing I do insist upon, that these precedents make a law.

The third thing I shall observe upon these precedents is, That these writs have gone forth, not only in cases of an actual war, or in cases of an invasion, when the enemy's fleet hath been upon the sea; but by way of preparation before-hand, when the enemy meant to come; and in continging cases, when the king might conceive any danger might issue: but in these cases writs have issued out, will appear, Rot. Claus. 48 Hen. 3, m. 2. The writs are here in court. 'Cum necesse sit ad defensionem regni esse promptum, &c.' Claus. 23 Ed. 1, m. 3, there were several writs directed to divers earls, bishops and others, de Custod. Marit. The words are thus, 'Quia volumus quod partes marit' in-com' Essex, &c. contra inimicos diligenter custodiend. forsan si in partes illas venire contingent.' 24 Ed. 1. Remembrancer in the Exchequer; upon information given, that there were 1,000 men in Flanders made preparation to come unto Yarmouth to burn the town, writs sent forth by the treasurer and barons ex officio, to be in readiness in case there was an invasion. Pat. 9 Ed. 2, pars 4, m. 26, writs directed to all the port-towns between Southampton and Thames, to set forth ships, at their own charge, for the better defence of the kingdom; and against those that commit depredations upon the sea, as well to men of this kingdom, as to others coming to this kingdom. Rot. Scot. 11 & 12 Ed. 2, m. 8. The king, by several writs, directed to several commissioners in several counties, recited the provision made for his army at land at the last parliament, and saith, 'Nos considerantes ad expeditionem præd. tam ad impendend. Scotos, quam pro custodiend. maris, &c.' and so commandeth for that purpose, that ships should be sent out of several counties for these two causes; the one to hinder victuals from going into Scotland, the other for free intercourse of trade. It appeareth, 10 Ed. 3, that the ships of France were not upon our sea-coasts, but were in Britain in France; and yet the king, upon relation that they had an intention to invade the realm, did send forth for the providing of ships in most parts of the realm; this was only upon information, Rot. Scot. 10 Ed. 3, m. 30. Ut audivimus; m. 23. Ut intelleximus; m. 16, 22. Quod audit. m. 18, dors. 12. dors. 5. dors. 'in partibus trans-marinis.' So by these records, this preparation of shipping was only upon information. Franc. 26 Ed. 3, m. 5. 'Qui vulgaris opinio regnum nostrum Angliæ invadere,' therefore commandeth shipping by sea, and forces by land. Rot. Franc. 10 Ric. 2, m. 23, 24. 'Quia certi rumores quod Franc. infra breve tempus cum magnis armat' hoc regnum invadere, &c.' commands the custody of the sea and sea-coasts. So as it doth appear, by these records, that upon an information, or conjecture of the king, he may send forth these writs, and command his subjects to be in readiness, in case that danger might happen; better so, than to receive a blow, and then to make preparation for defence; we should buy that wit with repentance. 'Prudentissima ratio, quia timor belli, &c. præparavit.' And surely when the king sees those preparations abroad, those great armies in adjacent countries, 'qui nocere possunt,' great reason we should be in preparation.

This is not only consonant to precedents, wisdom of times, policy of state, 'Venienti occurrere morbo,' but to the reason of our common law. If a man be in fear, that another man lieth in wait for him to do him a mischief, shall he stay till he receive a wound? 17 Ed. 4, 4. In this case he may have a writ to bind him to the peace, 13 Hen. 7, fol. 17. If a man have a warranty for his land shall he stay till he be impleaded? No, a Warrantia Chartæ lieth till he be impleaded. If lord and tenant in ancient demesn, and the lord shall require more service of the tenant than he ought to perform; shall the tenant stay till there be a distress taken? No, he shall have his Monstraverunt, Fitz Herb. Nat. Br. 40 Ed. 3, fol. 45, 46, and this only upon verbal demand of service.—Shall then the common law of England secure the subject not to stay till a present danger, but he shall have his Warrantia Chartæ, and Monstraverunt before distress taken; and shall not the common law provide for the king, that he in his expectation of danger, may make his preparation against it? So surely these precedents are according to reason of law.

The next thing that I did observe out of these precedents was, that in these very years, wherein there have been aids granted to the crown 'pro defensione regni,' in those very years these writs have issued out by the royal power. Claus. 48 Hen. 3, m. 2, 3, dors. There was then a tenth given by the clergy 'pro defensione regni;' and yet in that year he did command the defence of the realm, both by sea and land; and that appeareth, Pat. 48 Hen. 3, m. 6, dors. and Claus. 48 Hen. 3, m. 30. In the 22 Ed. 1, the king had given him in parliament, 'pro subsidio guerræ,' a tenth of all moveable goods, which was to be collected in the 23d year, as appears, Pat. 22 Ed. 1, m. 2. My lords, this very year, when this was paid, he commanded a great number of shipping for the defence of the coasts, and that appeareth, Pat. 23, Ed. 1, m. 6. Writs were directed to divers counties, as Sussex, Southampton, Dorset, &c. commanding them to be aiding and assisting to William Thornton, in the taking of all the ships in those counties, Pat. 23 Ed. 1, m. 7, 'a Com' Radolpho de Salwico ad providend. de navibus, ita quod prompti sint quando cunq; mandamus.' So to be in readiness with all ships in those parts, that were of 40 tons. M. 8, some roll-writs directed to most of the sheriffs of England to be assisting to John de Barwicke, to the chusing and sending forth of Archers, 'ad proficiscendum cum fleta nostra.' So as they were not only brought out of their own counties, but all the counties of England, 'ad proficiscendum.' My lords, this 23d year, when this great aid of tenths, and part of all the moveables were granted, Pat. 23 Ed. 1, m. 7, the king writeth to all the archbishops, earls, and others, reciting, that he hath committed the custody of the sea to William de Stoaks, 'Ita quod idem Willielmus vos omnes,' naming the archbishops, bishops, earls, &c. 'prout necesse fuerit.' So as you see the greatest subject is not exempted from these commands, but should be 'auxiliantes, respondentes et intendentes.' Claus. 23 Ed. 1, m. 5, dors. The king commanded the bishops of London and Norwich, for the safeguard of the sea-coasts. Pat. 23 Ed. 1, m. 1. A command to all archbishops, bishops, abbots, earls, barons, knights, and others, commanding them to be aiding to Adam de G. 'Ita quod idem Adam compellere posset quoties necesse, &c.' So Claus. 23 Ed. 1, m. 5, dors. the like commands. So as, my lords, in those times, which was 23 Ed. 1, when there was an aid granted by parliament, it doth appear, those great defences, both by sea and land, were commanded.

My lords, 10 Ed. 3, in a parliament holden at Nottingham, there was a Fifteenth granted to the king for three years, and so it was recited in the Record. And it appeareth likewise, Pat. 12 Ed. 3, m. 2, pars 3, Claus. 12 Ed. 3, m. 28, pars 3, it appeareth, that a Tenth and Fifteenth were granted to the king in parliament; and this was 'tam pro defensione quam arduis negotiis.' 12 Ed. 3, The prelates, and lords and commons at a parliament holden at Westminster, gave the king 10,000 sacks of wool, said to be given 'pro defensione regni,' as appears Rot. Alm. 12 Ed. 3, pars 1, m. 1. In the same year there was granted likewise 'pro defensione regni medietatem lanarum,' the moiety of all their wool, m. 31, 32. In the same year the clergy, they gave the king in parliament, 'medietatem lanarum usq; vigint. mill. saccar.' as appeareth, Rot. Claus. 12 Ed. 3, pars 3, m. 13, Rot. Claus. 12 Ed. 3, pars 2, m. 1, dors. And in this year the king collected a Tenth and Fifteenth, that was granted to him by the laity in parliament for two years; as appeareth, Claus. 12 Ed. 3, m. 30. And besides all this, the clergy gave the king a Tenth, Claus. 12 Ed. 3, pars 3, m. 30. These I cite the more particularly, because no memory of them in the printed statutes. Were all these aids granted, 10, 11, 12 Ed. 3, 'pro defensione regni;' and shall the king in those very years send forth writs for the defence of the sea and kingdom? And may not the king do it now, when he seeth such great cause?

Now, my lords, in this 12th year, when all these great aids were granted, Rot. Alm. 12 Ed. 3, pars 1, m. 12, Walter de M. was appointed admiral of the fleet towards the north, and appointed commissioners 'ad assidendum villas bonis et catallis ad contribuendum, &c.' and commandeth all sheriffs and officers to be aiding and assisting. So in this Record it doth appear, that in these 10, 11 and 12 years, ships and forces were commanded. Claus. 12 Ed. 3, pars 1, m. 17, dors. Command by the king, that the men of Surrey and Sussex should have their goods seized, and persons imprisoned, if they refused to contribute towards the charge of shipping. Rot. Alm. 12 Ed. 3, pars 1, m. 2. A commission to William de B. and others, 'ad assidendum omnes homines juxta statum,' and to seize their goods and chattels, if they refused to contribute for the wages of mariners for the ships.

So as your lordships see by these records, though there be Aids, Tenths, Subsidies and Fifteenths, granted by the clergy and laity; yet in that very year, if an extraordinary occasion comes, though ships not upon the sea, the king hath commanded the defence of the sea and land at the charge of the counties. I have done with the fourth particular.

The fifth particular is this. This aid, and these contributions, they have not been required only from the maritime towns, but from the inland counties, 'per totam Angliam.' And this is materially to be insisted upon, because we are now in an inland county, in the county of Bucks.

My lords, That this was done before the Conquest, your lordships have heard. For Alfred, the first monarch, anno 827, 'jussit Cimbarum, &c. per totam Angliam.' Asser. Menevensis fol. 9, Wigor. Floren. 316, Huntington, 351. That king Ethelred did the like, anno 1008, 'per totam Angliam,' every 310 hides of land to find one ship. Floren. fol. 9, Math. of Westm. 387, Huntington, fol. 360. The decree or council which was held at H. about the 30th year of king Ethelred, was, that ships should be prepared against Easter. And those laws which are remembered in Lambert, were before the Conquest, cap. 10, fol. 106, 'Quod præsidii, &c.' So it was general and universal throughout the realm, concurring with those antient precedents and council, since the time of William the 1st. Claus. 48 Hen. 3, m. 2. For where a record is to be applied unto several purposes, I must mention that record again. It appeareth by that Record, that Bedfordshire, which is an inland county, was charged with the guard of the sea-coast, and paid for wages: Same Roll, m. 3, intus m. 2, dors. Rutland, Oxfordshire, Dorsetshire, inland counties charged for the same service. Pat. 48 Hen. 3, m. 7, Cambridgeshire and Huntingdonshire charged for the like service, and that they should do 'prout per concilium nostrum ordinatum fuerit.' 24 Ed. 1, king's remembrancer in the Exchequer, Rot. 77, 78, 79. Title 'de associando pro custodi. maris;' and writs went out for ships in divers counties; and amongst others to Bucks. Pat. 26 Ed. 1, m. 21. When there was a complaint that the subjects did suffer upon undue service, the commissions that are directed for enquiry thereof, are directed to all the counties of England, as well inland as maritime. Pat. 23 Ed. 1, m. 5. That men, to furnish a fleet, were drawn and commanded from the most parts of the kingdom. Rot. Scot. 10 Ed. 3, m. 14. Inland counties charged with shipping for the defence of the kingdom, as Cambridgeshire, Huntingdonshire, Nottinghamshire, and Derbyshire. Claus. 13 Ed. 3, pars 3, m. 14, dors. and there Oxfordshire is charged with Custod' Maritum. Rot. Scot. 12 Ed. 3, m. 12, dors. Bedfordshire, Bucks, your county, and Derbyshire charged there with the same defence. Claus. 1 Ric. 2, m. 18. There Cambridge and Huntingdon were to provide a barge at their own charge; and yet seafaring men there were none. Writs were then also directed to Nottingham and Derby; though they had no seamen, yet they had money and means to provide them. Rot. Franc. 7 Ric. 2, m. 18. The king sends his writs into most counties of England, as well inland as maritime, reciting that the king of France was gone with an army into Flanders, and that Calais was in danger; and commandeth all knights, esquires, and archers, and every of them, according to his estate and faculty, to be sufficiently arrayed and armed, and come to the port of Sandwich, 'ad proficiscend.' My lords, in this Record there was mentioned Bucks, Bedford, Huntington, Cambridge, Nottingham, Derby, Leicester, Rutland, Northampton, and Berks, all these inland counties. The words of the writ are, 'Quod omnes tenentur pro defensione regni, &c.'

Claus. 9 Ed. 3, m. 12, 'per omnes supportari.' Rot. Alm. 12 Ed. 3, m. 12, vel 20, quod, &c. All and every of our kingdom, out of their allegiance, to be ready to defend the realm. 13 Ed. 3, dors. a great number of ships.

By all which it doth appear, First, That the service was commanded from those inland counties. Secondly, That the same reasons which are given to bind the inland counties, are given to bind the maritime counties, Pat. 28 Ed. 1, M. 6, for the taking of ships in Sussex, Devon, Middlesex, and other counties. If so be the maritime counties be in danger, surely the inland counties cannot be in safety. We are in an inland county; and the entry of an enemy upon any part of it, concerns the safety of us all. And by the rule of the law, every one that is to receive a benefit, is to give a contribution. As the case of 16 Hen. 7, fol. 13, all feoffees, whose lands were liable to a statute, the one shall have contribution against another. If four or five cognizors in a cognizance, all shall have contribution one against another. 40 Ed. 3. Parceners, upon whom a warranty descendeth, they shall be equally charged. If a man bind himself and his heirs in an obligation, having lands partly by his father, and partly by his mother, and they descend to several heirs, both shall be equally charged, as it is 3 Rep. fol. 13, Herbert's case.—So I go upon these reasons, that it is consonant to reason of law, besides these precedents, that where a danger is to all, and all receive a benefit, all are to be equally charged.

My lords, to illustrate it by further reasons, that though the inland counties and maritime counties be charged, I find that the ports, by the charter of Ed. 1, were to find 52 ships. I find that when the necessity of the service did require it, then all their ships were seized in the king's service. I find likewise, that when there hath been a disability in the ports to perform the service, as now they are, for then the main part of the trade was in the port towns, but now it is gone from thence, and gone to London; and few ports have the trade, but London, Newcastle, Bristol, and Hull; and shall it not now be required of the inland counties, since there is a disability in the ports? Rot. Franc. 21 Ed. 1, m. 23. I find there, that Plymouth, and some of the port-towns, did bear more than London; for Plymouth found 4 ships, Dartmouth 6, Bristol 4, Newcastle 3, Norwich and Yarmouth 4, London 2, Hartle-Poole 2, Sandwich 2, Dover 2, Rye 2, Shoreham and Arundel 2, and other places found but one. It appeareth, Rot. Alm. 13 Ed. 3, m. 3, dors. that Yarmouth furnished, at their own costs, 4 ships, Kington 2, Boston 2, Lynn 2, Harwich 2, and Ipswich 2.

My lords, are these ports able to furnish the king with so many ships in these days to do their service? The wealth of one portman in those days, was worth the wealth of a whole town now.

Admit the maritime towns were bound to it: yet if there be a failing of their ability, that they cannot do it, shall it not elsewhere be required? That it is agreeable to the rule of the law, before any commissions of sewers, where particular men are bound to defend the sea-banks, yet before any statute, in case the man was not able, the service was required from the country: for by it they might have either gain or loss. This appeareth by the rules of the common law, before any statute, in case Register fol. 123. 'Quod distringat omnes, &c.' when one man was to maintain the banks against the sea; if not able to do it, the rest that had benefit by it, were to be distrained to do it, 5 Rep. fol. 99. 10 Hep. fol. 140, 141, the case of the Isle of Ely agreeable, that all that have 'salvationem et damnationem' shall contribute.—To this purpose are those two records mentioned by Mr. Solicitor, Rot. Parl' 7 Hen. 14, m. 18, that where there was a subsidy granted to the king for the defence of the realm, it was assigned to merchants, yet with a salvo, unless royal power came. Rot. Franc. 6 Ric. 2, m. 8, certain merchants had the custody of the sea, except 'regalem potestatem.'

So the conclusion is, if an extraordinary defence, there may be no cause to go into the inland counties; but if a royal power, or extraordinary danger, though not imminent, the king may require an extraordinary contribution; 'per totam Angliam,' from all his subjects.—But this hath been objected against, and some records vouched; that is, say they, we will shew you many precedents, wherein 'navale subsidium' hath been required from inland counties, and they have been discharged thereof, as Pat. 2, Ric. 2, pars 2, m. 42, dors. the town of Beverly petitioned, because they were to contribute, being an inland town, towards the finding of a ship with the town of Hull, and were discharged thereof.—This is truth, but not the whole truth: for the town of Beverly was discharged by reason of a charter of exemption granted unto them 'in honorem S. Johannis de Beverly,' the king's confessor; upon that charter they were discharged.

They have objected likewise the town of Bodmin, an inland town in Cornwall, was discharged 'a custod' maris.' For this, Claus. 19 Ed. 3, pars. 2, m. 14, was vouched for it, that the town was discharged of this contribution.—For answer to that, it will appear, that one Trussel was then admiral of the fleet, and was by his commission to be furnished from the ports at their own charge for three months. My lords, this appears, Rot. Claus. 13 Ed. 3, pars 1, m. 35, and so that town, an inland town, was to be discharged. My lords, likewise there were other discharges; upon this reason Norwich was discharged from finding of men for manning of ships, because the admiral's commission did not warrant it, Rot. Scot. 10 Ed. 3, m. 15, for it only extended to the ports; but yet Norwich was charged to find ships, Claus. 18 Ed. 3, pars 2, m. 14. So Colchester was discharged for finding of a ship, but it was because they were not within the words of the writ, as appeareth, Rot. Claus. 13 Ed. 3, pars 1, m. So to tell your lordships a story of a great number of land tenures discharged 'de custod' maris,' and not to give your lordships the reason, it is nothing to the purpose.

So, my lords, having verified these five points by the precedents, and justified them by these reasons, and answered these objections, I shall now come to the sixth matter upon this record; and that is, though no cause be declared in the writ, no danger manifest, nor against what enemies; that yet the king by his writs hath commanded shipping for defence of sea and land; and in the king's wisdom the danger hath been reserved in his breast, and not communicated to his people by his writs.

First, I find that ancient precedents have been so, that it hath been reserved to the king himself, and those that he did depute to take care thereof; this appeareth, Rot. Claus. 14 Joh. m. 2, the king directed his writs to Herbert, with a Mandamus to make ready all ships for our service, when we shall command; not a word of the cause declared, or an enemy proclaimed. The same Roll, m. 6, the king by writ, directed to several parts, causeth all ships that could carry six horses or more to be sent unto Portsmouth; and the like writs were directed to other ports. Rot. Pat. 15, Johan. m. 4, the king appoints a guardian upon the sea coasts, and commandeth all men that they should be intendentes; and other writs in the same Roll, directed into many counties with a Mandamus, Claus. 17, Johan. m. 7, dors. Writs for taking of ships, and bringing them into the Thames mouth, without shewing any cause: all this was done in the time of king John. In the time of Hen. 3, Rot. Pat. 13 Hen. 3, m. 5, a writ commanding the sheriff of Kent and Sussex to arrest all ships in those counties to be at Portsmouth, to be ready to go into that service we shall command. And it appeareth in the same Roll, that these ships were able to carry but six horses. So Rot. Claus. 14 Ed. 1, m.

33. To our bailiff of Portsmouth, and keeper of our navy, to make ready one good ship, and to be ready to go in our service, whither and when we shall command it. Rot. Claus. 23 Ed. 1, m. 5, dors. The king declares that he will have the sea coasts in Essex guarded against the enemy; and there commandeth them to be obedient to such an one, who had the custody. Rot. Pat. 23 Ed. 1, m. 2. The king writeth to all the archbishops, bishops, sheriffs, knights, and others, to be assisting unto William de S. who had the custody of the sea. So as by all these, it appeareth the king did give no account to his subjects, either of the service, or the time when. Rot. Scot. 10 Ed. 1, m. 18. The king commanded all ships to be arrested, and men and mariners to be sent to the admiral of the fleet, 'ad pronoscend.' The same Roll, m. 5, dors. a matter fit for the council, and not for the people to know. Same Roll, m. 20, that they should do 'prout nobis.' &c. the king oweth no account to his subjects of these things.

24 Ed. 1, m. 19. The king having commanded E. S. to take up 100 ships fit for his service, commandeth the sheriff of Northumberland and others to be assisting. Same Roll, m. 17. A command to the same effect, that all ships should be taken between Lynn and Berwick. It was so likewise in the time of Ed. 2, Pat. 9 Ed. 2, pars. 2, m. 26, ships taken up at the charges of the inhabitants, to defend the sea against malefactors and pirates. Rot. Claus. 12 Ed. 2, m. 11, dors. Writs directed to the mayor and bailiff of Sandwich, to make ready all ships within their port of 40 tons, 'Ita,' &c. that they be ready within three days warning to go, as we shall more fully declare; but the service that was to be done, not mentioned. So it appeared by other writs to other towns in the same Roll, 17 Ed. 2, m. 14, Pat. 14 Hen. 6, m. 14. 'Rex quia quibusd' arduis causis,' &c. doth assign John Hoxham to take up all barges of 10 men and upwards.—So in all these times of king John, Hen. 3, E. 1, E. 2, E. 3, and Hen. 6, writs have gone out generally; that the service hath been concealed; and for instruction, they were referred to the council.—It standeth with reason, for resolutions of war are not to be communicated; his majesty hath a separate council of war from the body of his privy council.

Now, my lords, for the objection that hath been made against the first writ of 4 Aug. 11 Car. that is, that the king hath not declared sufficient cause for the issuing of this writ: The king hath not communicated to J. S. and J. N. what the employment must be; he must satisfy the counsel at the bar, which he ought not to communicate to his privy council, but is reserved for his council of war.—This is a writ to command obedience from his subjects, and upon such reasons as may satisfy any reasonable man; and if fewer reasons, it had been the better agreeable to all former writs.—For the next matter out of the precedents, which is, that during the times of the sitting of parliaments, these writs have issued out by command from the king, I have made it good upon my former head.

The last thing I observe upon the precedents was this, that there was no clause, no particular in the writ of 4 Aug. 11 Car. but was warranted by many precedents: and that in this thing the king doth but 'jubere per legem.'

First, for the direction: It is, as in this writ, sometimes upon one, or 'probis hominibus' of such a county, sometimes the direction is to commissioners; sometimes one way, and sometimes another: and of this of the precedents themselves, when your lordships come to see them, I shall speak. They would have the king descend so low, as to give them a reason why he doth it: some reasons are expressed in the writ; as 'quia periculum imminens, quia pro defensione regni, tatione maris, securitate subditorum, salva conductione navium,' &c. My lords, all these are expressed in the record, 9 Ed. 3, m. 12, Scot. 10 Ed. 3, m. 20. Rot. Alm' 12 Ed. 3, m. 1, Rot. Alm' 13 Ed. 3, m. 15. I find in these writs the same matter, power of assessment, sometimes levies by distress and imprisonment; nay, seizure of lands and tene-ments, goods and chattels, that are expressed in former writs: and that it was at the charges of the counties, both inland and maritime, this appeareth, Rot. Scot. 8 Ed. 2, m. 9. 'De Nav-igio providend.' Pat. 9 Ed. 2, m. 26, pars. 2. 'De Navigio providendo pro Custod' Maris.' Many more of these, Scot. 10 Ed. 3. That the wages of the men that went in the ships, and guarded the coasts, were at the charge of the county: this appeareth 10 Ed. 3, m. 2, dors. 60. Men appointed and sent to Portsmouth, and they refuse to go without wages; but a command came from the king, and commanded the counties to pay them wages. 10 Ed. 3, m. 31, dors. And his predecessors not to bear any charge whatsoever, though 'pro defensione.' Rot. Alm' 12 Ed. 3, pars 1, m. 2. Those of Lynn, who refused to contribute towards the charge they were assessed by the commissioners, 'juxta quantitatem,' were compelled to contribute; so Rot. Claus. 12 Ed. 3, m. 8, the like 'pro custod' maritima.' I might be infinite in these particulars, but I will not trouble your lordships.

Here they have made some objections; though to answer the main objection, I am not yet come. They say, this power of assessing the people for sums uncertain, ought to be no more than escuage uncertain, and must be assessed in parliament: and this assessment for defence, ought not to be by commission, or the king's writ. First, for the authority, which is Littleton, he saith, fol. 90, 'Que communiter 'dit que escuage serea assesso pur parliam.'—I do not find by the Register, where these writs are; neither do I find them grounded upon any act of parliament. Some that are grounded upon acts of parliament, do recite them. But what if it be by act of parliament? A service that is to be done by the tenant to his lord; what if this be so, that it must be assessed in parliament? Your lordships know that the tenants must do according to the original duties of them. And if this be, that the lord shall not assess them but in parliament, is that an argument from a tenant to a lord in this case?—This is a service commanded not by tenure, but by a king from his subjects; this is suitable to the reason of law in other cases: for those ancient aids, which the law doth require for the making of his eldest son a knight, or 'pur file marrier;' are not those certain at the common law? Must there be an act of parliament to assess those aids? The books are otherwise.—But the king at the common law might require an aid uncertain, and might assess it as he pleased. Glanville lib. 9, cap. 8, Brit. fol. 57, cap. 27, Bract. lib. 4, cap. 16. So as at the common law they were uncertain. 11 Rep. fol. 68, D. It is said there, the statute of Westminster 1, cap. 15, which puts reasonable aid in certain, doth not bind the king; afortiori we must not bind him to a certainty for the defence of the realm. No man can tell what the preparation must be, or the charge thereof. If they can shew an act of parliament that limits the king for the defence of the realm, they say something.

But they say the sheriff is no proper officer, not sworn to execute this writ. This is as wide as the other: for, my lords, the sheriff is sworn to execute all writs that shall be delivered to him for the king's service. And surely this writ, if it come to him, he must at his peril execute it.—First, The direction of those writs have been many times as well to the sheriffs as the commissioners. Rot. Scot. Ed. 3, m. 13, Claus. 15 Ed. 3, m. 17. The king commandeth the sheriff of many counties to furnish men with arms, victuals, and other necessary provisions, both for sea and land. 23 Ed. 3, m. 5, dors. 24 Ed. 1, rot. 7, 9. Ex' Remem' Regis 11. The lands of the sheriffs and other officers were extended, because of their negligence in doing of their duties concerning those writs, 25 Ed. 1, Ex' Remem' Regis. A commission went out to enquire of the execution of the officers in the duty of their places.

Besides these writs at the common law, this is secured by the authority of the common law. Register 122, or 127. The writs that go out to the sheriff (for they go out to the sheriff as to commissioners) it is left to the discretion of the sheriff or commissioners, as occasion shall require, Register 191. Bre De Partitions, before any statute was made concerning the same, that writ went out generally to the sheriff; so that in all times and ages it hath ever been in these cases, where no certainty, left to the discretion of the sheriff and commissioners.

My lords, for the manner of the levying 'per distractiones,' and by imprisonment of those that do refuse: is this new? It hath been so in all the precedents that have been vouched, both by distress and imprisonment. For the distress: if the king makes a corporation, and gives them power to ordain for the common good of the corporation; and if they make an order for the payment of money, and that those that do not pay the same, shall be distrained; is not this adjudged a good ordinance? 5 Rep. fol. 64, Clark's Case, Trin. 7 Hen. 7, rot. 3. There is a benevolence granted to Ed. 4, for his voyage into France; one T. R. did deny payment, and he was distrained for his proportion.

They except to the penalty of the writ. The penalties of former writs have gone higher. Inter Commun' in the Exchequer, there was a Mandamus to assess those that were employed in the provision for shipping; and the Mandamus was, 'sicut nos et honorem nostrum et 'salvationem regni diligitis.' In that roll this is so often remembered, Rot. Scot. 10 Ed. 3, m. 11, dors. 'quod, &c.' their lands, goods, and chattels to remain seized in our hands. And m. 2, under pain of forfeiture of life: 11 Ed. 3, m. 2, to cast those in prison that did refuse. Rot. Claus. 12 Ed. 3, m. 18, dors. Writs directed to Henry Hussey, and others, to punish those that refused to contribute; and to imprison them, and to seize their lands and goods into the king's hands. Claus. 13

Ed. 3, pars 1, m. 36, dors. to seize into their hands the lands and tenements of the refusers. Rot. Franc. 21 Ed. 3, pars 1, m. 11, the king commands ships, under pain to lose life, and all their estate. Rot. Franc. 10 Rich. 2, m. 23, to imprison those that are contrary, under forfeiture of all they had. So as your lordships see Mr. Holborne was very far mistaken.

My lords, in the next place, they have laid hold on the distance of time: they say there were seven months between the Teste of the writ, and the time of the rendezvous; that the king in that time might have called a parliament, and there might have been an aid granted, and the service performed in a parliamentary way.—But they may remember the 40 days between the Teste and the return of the writ for summoning a parliament; then the time spent in presenting of a Speaker; the solemnity used before they begin their grand committee; their reading of a bill thrice; the debate about passing of it in both houses before it be granted; and after all this be done, and the parliament ended, a time for the levying of the money must be had; and when it is levied, time for the return of it; and when it is returned, time for the expending of the money: and the preparation will go slowly on till the money be returned. 48 Hen. 3, m. 4, dors. There was a command for guarding of the sea-coasts. Claus. 23 Ed. 1, m. 5, dors. The port of Yarmouth commanded to find ships for a certain time. Rot. Scot. 11, 12, 13 Ed. 2. They are put down in that roll, m. 8, that there was a command for a Navale Subsidium for three or four months.

So as, my lords, for the time of preparation and for the time of the continuance, it hath ever been referred to the wisdom of the king. My lords, for the Spanish invasion, that hath been so late in our memory, I find by the books that are kept in the council-chamber, that the preparations were in October 1587, against the coming of the Spanish fleet in 1588, which did not set forth till June; I find no parliament called that year. And by letters and orders from the council-board, those ships, and defence that was made, was ad sumptum of the subject.—So, my lords, by this that hath been said, it doth appear to your lordships, that there is not any clause in this writ, either for the direction, motives, mandates, or penalties, but are warranted by former precedents in a higher degree.

My lords, there are the precedents that I have collected, and reduced to these several heads. I shall now remember to your lordships divers others. And in the first place observe, that William 1, came not to abrogate any former law, but was sworn to observe 'Antiquas leges Anglicanas,' that appeareth in Lambert, fol. 125, prout. So every man by this law, that was but a confirmation of former laws, must provide 'pro viribus et facultatibus.'

I find by the grant that William 1, made to his abley of Battel of his own foundation, a charter to be free from Danegelt 'et omnibus auxiliis.' If they had not been freed, they had been subject. I find Pat. 7, Johan. m. 3, the king authorized Walter Scot and others, 'quod omnes naves, &c.' which they should find, to arrest, and command all to assist, as they love us and our peace in our realm. 14 Johan. m. 6, as your lordships have heard, all the ships were arrested, that could carry six horses, and to be at Portsmouth. M. 2, all the ships in the port were to go in his service, without expressing for what, and unlade. Claus. 12 Johan. m. 7, dors. commanded all ships to be brought into the Thames mouth. So here was not a laying down, but a continuance of it. So in Hen. 3's time, Claus. 14 Hen. 3, m. 12, dors. all shipstaken that could carry sixteen horses. Claus. 15 Hen. 3, m. 17, dors. Command for the furnishing of arms, men with victuals, and other provisions for forty days. And here was the like command to sheriffs in several counties. Claus. 26 Hen. 3, the king commandeth the men of Yarmouth to have their ships ready with men and arms; the same roll, to find ten ships to go to Ricardy. Pat. 48 Hen. 3, m. 3, dors. Writs to the several port-towns, that no ships should go beyond sea, but all to stay at home. M. 5, dors. Those that returned from guarding the sea-coasts without leave, were punished by seizure of goods and chattels. M. 4, same roll, dors. Provision to be made till further orders be had. So it was not confined to time, but occasion, as need should require. And there be divers others in the time of Hen. 3, upon other occasions, which I have remembered. In the time of Ed. 1, 21 Ed. 1, m. 23, it appeareth there, that all the port-towns were appointed by the king and his council, how many ships every one of them should set forth. Rot. Vas. 22 Ed. 1, m. 11, dors. The king of England in that writ stileth himself Dominus Regni Scotie, &c. and sends his writ to the king of Scotland, to let him know, the king of France had taken part of Gascoigne, an inheritance of the crown of England, that he should, 'in fide et homagio,' be at London with horse and arms, &c. This writ is very observable, the king of England is Superior Dominus Scotie. A part of Gascoigne was then lost. The king of Scotland was required by this writ, as well as requested, to give him aid for the recovery of those grounds taken from him in Gascoigne. My lords, this power is not confined only to England, but it reacheth, as (Great Lord, into Scotland. Also into Ireland, Vas. 22 Ed. 1, m. 5, dors. The king by his writ commandeth divers earls, and others in England and Ireland, to do the like, to send men to London with horse and arms. The same roll, m. 13, dors. All that claim to be of the liberty of the port so commanded. Pat. 23 Ed. 1, m. 1, 5, 7. All ships of 40 tons were to be furnished and provided for the king's service. Claus. 23 Ed. 1, m. 5, every man is compelled to contribute. The same roll, m. 4, those that did not inhabit maritime towns, yet if they had lands there, they must contribute, resident or not resident; within or without the liberty, all must contribute.

My lords, in that writ, which is Claus. 23 Ed. 1, m. 5, dors. I will observe these things: 1. A command to all bishops, abbots, lords spiritual and temporal, 'quod sint intendentes et respondeutes ad custodiam maris.' 2. In continent causes; 'causa, &c.' 3. The writ saith, 'quod omnes ad arma, &c. secundum statum, &c. ad trans-fretandum cum nobis;' and possession of goods and lands to be taken for the custody of the sea, as in former times they were accustomed: so it is to be done in this manner as in times past. 4. The writ was directed to several sheriffs, 'per corpora, bona, et terras,' to distrain.

Next, 24 Ed. 1, m. 15, The king commanded the archbishops, bishops, barons, and all the commonalty, to defend the maritime parts. Claus. 24 Ed. 1, m. 19, 'pro custodia maris.' There was another of Symon de Spencer, which I remembered before. 24 Ed. 1, rot. 76. Another of the like, Ext' Remem' Regis, Claus. 25 Ed. 1, m. 26, dors. The king moderateth the expences of the country when the danger ceaseth. Claus. 25 Ed. 1, m. 12. The king commandeth the sheriffs of several counties, and others, to bring all the ships to be ready for our service, when we command. M. 26, The like command. 'De custodia maris.' Pat. 31 Ed. 1, m. 20, power given to Thomas de R. to raise forces in Cumberland to resist the Scots; and those that did refuse, to seize their goods. In the time of Ed. 2, Claus. 2 Ed. 2, m. 21, the king commandeth divers towns to set out ships against the Scots; and after, by special writs, some of those were discharged. Rot. Pat. 9. Ed. 2, pars 2, m. 6, Pat. 16 Ed. 2, m. 11, a writ directed to sir Thomas Weston and others, to array all between 16 and 60, or to take their lands and goods, if they did refuse. Pars 1, m. 7, of the same roll, Claus. 20 Ed. 2, m. —, the king doth there declare that those that stay at home ought to contribute to set forth ships, and for the wages of the men employed. Claus. 20 Ed. 2, m. 6, writs directed to the scholars at Oxford, they were not exempted, but commanded to keep Southgate safely. Rot. Vasc. 18 Ed. 2, m. 18, The king writeth to the archbishop and others, commanding them to have horses and men in a readiness, as often as need shall require. For time of Ed. 3, Claus. 2 Ed. 3, m. 13, and m. 22, dors. to Southampton, and to several other towns for their shipping, above 40 tons. Pat. 3 Ed. 3, pars 2, m. 6, the king commandeth the sheriff of Cornwall to distrain knights and others, that abide not upon their lands in maritime parts, and to imprison. Those years of 10, 11, 12 and 13 of Ed. 3, having been remembered, 21 Ed. 3, The king, concerning the defence of the sea and sea-coasts, gave special rules to be observed, both for the number of the ships and the men, and the quality of their persons, and for the proportion of their wages; as appeareth, Pat. 21 Ed. 3, pars 1, m. 26, 27, where there was special order taken for the guarding of the sea and sea-coasts at the charge of the inhabitants. Rot. Franc. 21 Ed. 3, pars 1, m. 11, command to the sheriff of London to arrest all ships in London to be sent to Calais, to resist the enemies against us then about to come. Rot. Franc. 25 Ed. 3, m. 9, the king reciteth, that France made a preparation to invade the realm, and gave a power to some to raise forces; and commandeth the sheriffs to raise the Posse Comitatus, to assist the commissioners. Pat. 26 Ed. 3, pars 1, m. 7, the king, by his writs to several counties, commanded all men between 16 and 60 to be in readiness to resist the Scots. Rot. Franc. 25 Ed. 1, m. 31, commanding all officers and ministers to assist Andrew de Gulpho, in the raising of forces for shipping. So as in that roll likewise, your lordships see that the inland counties were commanded for shipping. Rot. Franc. 28 Ed. 3, m. 6, the king appointed Ro. Co. and Ro. A. to arrest all ships of 20 tons and upwards, between such a distance, and to bring them to Southampton. Rot. Scot. 29 Ed. 3, m. 13, several writs were directed to the bishops of Durham and Carlisle, and others, for the arraying of men. Rot. Franc. 40 Ed. 3, m. 37, the king sent forth divers writs, commanding 'quod, &c.' with all their forces, they should assist to the safe keeping of the sea-coasts, to resist the malice of the enemies. Rot. Franc. 50 Ed. 3, m. 47, dors. command to make proclamation, that all they have land upon the sea-coasts should repair thither with their families. So in all ages, and at all times, writs have issued both for the defence of the sea and land by the king's command. In the time of Rich. 2, Rot. Parl. 6 Rich. 2, m. 42, that was objected as a record against the king, but maketh clear for him: 'Que dit que le roy persons assemblez, en parliament, est desire de vivre del re- veneus del corone car escheats mariages et' 'furfietures sont par le defence nostra royales.' The king answers, 'Le Roy volet de faire in' 'ceo case come per de advise des seigniors, &c.'

Your lordships see they desire of the king, that he would live of his revenues, that the profits of escheats, wards, &c. might be kept for the defence of the realm. The king giveth them this answer, That he will do in this case by the advice of his lords, as shall be most for his honour and profit: So no reason to make any enforcement out of this record, that the profits of escheats, wards, &c. should go for the defence, because the king maketh no absolute denial unto it, saying, that he will do as he shall be advised by his lords. Rot. Franc. 7 Rich. 2, m. 18, that the lords beyond the seas be arrayed and armed according to their state and faculties. Pat. 8 Rich. 2, pars 2, m. 15, a command that all between 16 and 60 be in a readiness. Rot. Franc. 10 Rich. 2, m. 23, arrays through all England. And so in the time of Hen. 4, Rot. Parl. 5 Hen. 4, m. 24, for the arraying of all men throughout England, and those that were impotent, and could not go, to contribute unto it. 3 Hen. 5, m. 36, dors. Pat. 19 Hen. 6, m. 10, general commissions for the arresting of ships, without declaring the cause. Pat. 14 Hen. 6, assigned Job. de N. to arrest all ships in the port of Southampton, to do service as the king shall command, there was no cause declared. Pat. 28 Hen. 6, m. 2, 13, commissions to array, and those arrayed to keep in array, with diligent watches into several counties. 1 Hen. 7, par. 1, the king writeth to sir Fitz Hugh, to array archers and horsemen.

So that it appeareth by those precedents in all ages, that those defenses which have been made by sea and land, are not confined to port towns, and maritime places, but ‘per totam Angliam.’

In the next place, I shall give a particular answer to some objections that have been made, as have not fallen in my way; and to the acts of parliament, reasons, records and book-cases, urged by the other side.

The Third Day's ARGUMENT of Sir JOHN BANKS.

May it please your lordships; The matter that I did propose to insist upon this day, was the answering of the objections. I shall use no preamble, no repetition to introduce what I have to say: but in the answering the objections, I shall first give answer to the several acts of parliament insisted upon, then to the several records and reasons that have been urged on the other side. And in the last place, I shall answer the exceptions that have been taken to the writ, 4th Aug. 11 Car. Mitimus, and form of proceedings.

The first act they have insisted upon, is that of William 1, call it what you will, an act or a charter. The words of it are verbatim in Mat. Paris, ‘Volumus et concedimus, quod omnes liberi homines sint quieti ab omni tallagio,’ &c.—It doth no way trench upon the royal power: for as in the beginning of my argument, I opened to your lordships, that this power was inherent in the kings of England before the Conquest; here is only a concession that they shall be free ‘ab omni injusta exactione.’ Now this is no unjust exaction, for it is of common right. And then the other part of that law doth explain it; for it doth say, ‘Quod sumus fratres conjurati,’ &c. so for the defence of the realm. By the same law they would urge to take away the power, by the same law it is reserved.

The next thing they insisted upon, was the charter 17 Johan. or on Magna Charta, as they call it; which indeed is mentioned in Mat. Paris, and may be under the great seal. The words of that are, ‘Nullum scutagium vel auxilium nisi per commune concilium, nisi ad primum filium militem faciend’ et maritand’ fil’, &c.—This charter, as it was acknowledged by themselves, was granted at Running Mead, where the banners were displayed, when there was war or rebellion between the barons, commonalty, and the king. It was not assented unto, the king sitting in parliament: for parliaments are not called with arms, and in the field. It was, in truth, an enforced act from a distressed king. Shall this bind the crown? I shall remember the act of parliament made 15 Ed. 3, and there only were things that were in parliament enacted derogatory to the crown, as this is: That no peer should be questioned but in parliament: That no great officer be removed but in parliament: That no clergyman shall come before temporal judges. These were things that were much derogatory to the prerogative of the king: 15 Ed. 3, That king the same year, when he was better advised, did make a charter which is in print, for the recalling of this prejudicial act of parliament still in force. It appeareth by the parliament-rolls and printed books, where the king declareth it was drawn from him with an unwilling mind, and was prejudicial to the prerogative of his crown; and therefore by that charter it was repealed.

But, my lords, if that Charter 17 Johan. should be in force, why hath there been no confirmation of it in so many parliaments since? The statute of Magna Charta, 9 Hen. 3, hath been confirmed one and thirty times; why no confirmation of the charter 17 Johannis? And why have we not heard of it since that time? The reason for it is, that it trencheth too much upon the prerogative of the king and crown. But take the words as they are, what be they? ‘Nullum scutagium vel auxilium nisi per commune concilium reg. nostri.’ If these were an act, doth it extend to take any thing away that belongs of common right unto the crown? And that hath been the exposition of my lords the judges of acts of parliament: That aids due of common right, are not taken away by general words, ‘Commune, &c.’ And therefore these aids due of common right, as this is, are no way taken away.—Besides, for the statute of Magna Charta, it is made 3 Hen. 3, c. 29, ‘Nullus liber homo capiatur, aut imprisonetur nisi per legem,’ &c. The general words of this act of parliament do no ways impeach the royal power, for this royal power is ‘lex terræ.’ Besides, in these precedents, 14 Hen. 3, 15 Hen. 3, 26 Hen. 3, 48 Hen. 3, and all the succeeding kings remembered in all of them, that these writs went out to provide shipping at the charge of the inhabitants; so, surely, if they had been taken away by Magna Charta, the writs after Magna Charta would not have used it.

But then there hath been objected, the statute De Tallagio non Concedendo. If it be 25 Ed. 1, as it is printed, or 34 Ed. 1, or as the Petition of Right doth recite it ‘temp’ Ed. primi,’ be it when they will, under favour, there is nothing in that act doth take away the power: The words are thus, ‘Nullum tallagium vel auxilium sine voluntate episcoporum baronum burgensium,’ &c.’ Mr. Solicitor, in his argument, upon probable grounds, did make question whether this was an act of parliament yea or no: 1. In respect it was not inrolled amongst other acts of that time. 2. Because by the penning of it, it may seem rather to be an ab-tract. 3. Because when the other acts of those times were sent over to Ed. 1, to be sealed and confirmed, no such act was sent over.

My lords, I will not lay hold on this, but will admit with them that it is recited in the Petition of Right to be an act of parliament: so I will admit, yet to waive nothing that hath been said, but by way of admittance, I give this answer.

First, That it taketh away no aids that are due by the laws of the realm; yet the words are general: 'Nullum tallagium vel auxilium nisi assensu parliamenti, &c.' Here is not in this act of parliament so much as any exemption of an aid to knight the king's son, or to marry his daughter; yet in this the law is observed, that these aids are not taken away; and so it is declared, 25 Ed. 1, cap. 11, which doth reduce these aids unto certainty. So as your general words of 'nullum auxilium' will not do it, if this be an aid due by the laws of the land.

Then I say this is not properly an aid, but a contribution of king and people for the defence of the realm; it is 'ad proficiendum cum nobis nostris': then I say this power is 'inter jura summæ majestatis,' one of the highest prerogatives of the king, and shall never be taken away from the king: 17 Hen. 7, statute 'Quia emptores terrar' doth not extend to the king to take away his tenure. If you will have such a high prerogative taken away, you must shew it in the acts of parliament. Nay, my lords, I say that in the times of Ed. 1, this royal power is expressly reserved by act of parliament to the crown; and therefore in after-times never intended to be taken away.—First, I shall enforce it out of the statute of 25 Ed. 1, c. 5, 6,* that doth recite, that aids and taxes that have been given unto us towards our wars, and other business of our own grant and good will, howsoever they were made, might turn to a bondage, &c. We have granted that we shall not draw these taxes into a custom, &c. and do grant that for no business henceforth, we shall take such manner of aids, but by a common consent of the realm, &c. saving the ancient aids due and accustomed. This aid is not to be taken to be an aid, for this was never given the king of England, but taken by royal power: the statute of 25 Ed. 1, speaketh of such aids as have been given, and excepteth such aids as have been due and accustomed. And by the precedents shewn, it appeareth these have been due and accustomed. It hath been desired in 'fide legantium,' and with a Mandamus: 2 Ed. 1, cap. 1, this statute doth confirm the Great Charter, and the Charter of the Forests; but in the end of it in the Parliament-roll, that notwithstanding all these things before-mentioned, both the king and the council, and all they present at the making of this ordinance, will intend the prerogative of his crown to be saved unto him.

non Concedendo; the practice that hath been since the time of Ed. 1, in the time of Ed. 3, Ed. 3, Rich. 2, and the practice since, doth shew plainly, that it was never intended by the statute to take away this royal power. But then there was a thing materially objected, if the records would have warranted what had been said, and that was, Rot. Parl. 29 Ed. 1, and then it was said, That though there be a saving, 25 Ed. 1, and 28 Ed. 1, yet here is no saving in this act; so then if not for the act 29 Ed. 1, all was lost. My lords, to this I say, 'Nul tiel record.' And, therefore I shall desire, that this which they call an act, 29 Ed. 1, I may attend your lordships with. By this record it doth appear, that it is only a record of the perambulation of the forest, and no repealing of any former law; neither is any thing enacted by that law derogatory to the crown.

The next statute objected, is 1 Ed. 3, cap. 5. The words are these: That 'no man shall be charged to arm himself otherwise than in the time of the king's progenitors; and that none be compelled to go out of his shire, but where necessity requires, and the sudden coming of strange enemies within the realm.' So this statute is relative to what hath been formerly done: What hath been found done formerly, appeareth by the records of king John's and Ed. the first's time, that the subjects were to set forth shipping at their own charge: then those writs went out in king John's and Ed. the first's time, as hath been shewed. And then this statute alloweth in two cases, one where necessity requireth, the other upon coming of strange enemies; and this writ requireth no other, but where there is necessity, in the king's judgment.

The next statute is 1 Ed. 3, cap. 7, which was objected, where men at arms were conveyed into Scotland and Gascoigne without wages; the king saith, it shall be done so no more.—The statute mentioneth Scotland and Gascoigne, foreign wars, and so foreign to this business; for though Scotland was subject to the dominion of England, yet it was a divided kingdom. 8 Rich. 2. Continual claim. Com. 376. That a fine shall be paid by a stranger, because he was in Scotland at the time of the fine levied. Bract. 436. An abjuration into Scotland is good. 6 Rich. 2, Protection. 46. That Scotland is out of the realm; therefore this statute that speaketh of Gascoigne and Scotland, speaketh of foreign war, not of defence.

The next statute is 18 Ed. 3, cap. 7, men of arms, hobellers and archers, shall be at the king's charges; the statute speaketh likewise of going out of England. But be that is upon the defence at sea of the kingdom, it is no going out of England; for that see 6 Rich. 2, Protection, 40. The sending of men and ships for the defence of the coasts, is no going out of England.

The next statute is 25 Ed. 3, cap. 8, no man shall be compelled to find men of arms, hobellers or archers, otherwise than those that hold of such service, without consent.—My lords, this statute of 25 Ed. 3, doth not take away any former laws. These three former statutes of 1 Ed. 3, 18 Ed. 3, and 25 Ed. 3, are recited in the statute 4 Hen. 4, and it is enacted, they shall be firmly holden and kept in all points; so if these statutes must be kept firmly in all points, then the statute of 25 Ed. 3, doth not repeal any of these. Now that of 1 Ed. 3, cap. 15, reserveth a power to the crown where necessity requireth, and where sudden enemies come. 26 Ed. 3. Those ships were sent forth, and commanded for the defence of the realm, at the charge of the subjects, Rot. Franc. 26 Ed. 3, m. 4, 5, Rot. Franc. 28 Ed. 3, m. 6. So as clearly there is no part of this power impeached by this statute of 25 Ed. 3.

Then they have objected, Rot. Parl. 2 Rich. 2, m. 3, That upon a council of a great many earls, barons, and sages of the realm, assembled by the king's privy-council, it was there declared what danger the kingdom was then in, and that money was wanting; they declared they could not remedy these mischiefs without charging the commons, which could not be done but by a parliament.—This is no act of parliament; it is but a parley, or discourse, or communication between the lords and commons; it was 2 Rich. 2, in the non-age of a young prince, who did not assent; for there was no royal assent unto it; so no proof in this case.

The next record they objected was, Rot. Parl. 9 Rich. 2, m. 10, there was a tenth and a half, and a fifteenth and a half granted to the king, upon condition contained in the schedule; which is, that the king should assent that the great officers of the kingdom should be named by parliament; and servants appointed for dispende of the money. If the king doth accept of the subsidies and aid upon condition, doth this take away his royal power? There is no more done in this than was in the parliament 31 Jac. for there the officers and treasurer were appointed by the houses of parliament. But then further it doth appear, that this was granted, 'pro viagio Johannis regis de Castile, &c.' so that it was not granted for the custody of the sea, but for that voyage.

The next record they insisted upon was, Rot. Parl. 8 Hen. 4, m. 2, a tenth and a half, and a sixteenth and a half, granted with a protestation, that this should not be brought into example.—This is nothing, no more than the other. A parliament grants a subsidy, with condition it should be thus and thus employed; and the protestation can no ways prejudice the crown in this.

And 7 Ed. 4, Rot. Parl. m. 7, hath been objected; there the king's speech is entered upon the roll, that he will not charge his subjects but upon great and weighty occasions.—My lords, this is nothing but a gracious speech of the king to his subjects, that he would charge them but in such cases as should concern the defence of the realm.

The statute next objected was 1 Rich. 3, cap. 20, that the subjects from henceforth shall in no way be charged by any such exaction or imposition. This is no benevolence, but a legal due.

Next they object, the statute of Tonnage and Poundage granted to the crown for the defence of the realm.—First, In answer to this, I say, that there is no act for Tonnage and Poundage that is now in force, neither are any duties taken to the crown upon any act of parliament. Those acts for Tonnage and Poundage that have been granted, make for the crown. And therefore, if your lordships look the statute 1 Eliz. and 1 Jac. it was given towards the king's charges, for the defence of the realm and safeguard of the sea: It was given towards his charges, it was not intended of extraordinary defence. So my lords, these acts, when they were in force, did give this but towards the charges. It is so now; for this which is done, and those contributions levied, are but towards his charges: and that will appear upon account, that his majesty for these three or four years hath expended more upon the sea than any of his progenitors.—Besides an acknowledgment in these acts, that this defence could not be done without the intolerable expence of his majesty; these aids are of necessity, and are not to be lacking at any time.

My lords, in the next place, they insisted upon the Petition of Right, 3 Car.—It was never intended, that any power of the king, by his prerogative, should be taken away or lessened by it. I dare be bold to affirm, for I was of that parliament, and was present at the debate, that there was never a word spoken in that debate of taking away any power of the king for the shipping-business.—Besides, it is declared, assented unto, and denied by none, that there was no intention, by the Petition of Right, to take away the prerogative of the king. The king thereby did grant no new thing, but did only confirm the ancient and old liberties of the subject.

My lords, these were the acts of parliament that have been objected and insisted upon by the other side.

In the next place, for an answer to scandalous objections: It hath been said by Mr. Holborne, of these statutes of 25 Ed. 1, and 28 Ed. 1, that at the times of making these laws they were positive, no such Salvo was in them of the king's prerogative: that the acts before Hen. 4, were penned by the king's council, and those clauses of a Salvo crept in by the king's council.—These were bold and presumptuous assertions of the acts of parliament made in that time of Ed. 1, that there should be any clauses added by the king's council, that should not be added to the record. I have here the Parliament Record, that these exceptions are recorded as fully as any part of the rest of the record, and those laws confirmed since: therefore to make any such assertions against records, ought not to be done; he may object the same against Magna Charta, which is for the liberty of the subject.

In the next place they have objected out of the Parliament Books, 33 Ed. 1, that upon a petition made to the king, to have restitution of money taken, that the king did ordain the treasurer should give satisfaction. I shall desire it may be read, and you shall see, those moneys for which direction was given for satisfaction, were for goods taken for the king's use. Rot. Parl. 33 Ed. 1, fol. 105, dors. 'per scrutin' pro guerra, &c. Respons. per regem, 'Rex ordinavit per concilium quod satisfactio 'faci' tam cito quam poterit.' So this record was for moneys taken for the king's use, therefore reason satisfaction should be given, Perambulat' Forest' Rot. 20 Ed. 1, de Libertatibus Angl. 18 Febr. Lincoln. So here is no taking away of any former act of parliament; it refereth to what shall be futrely amended and revoked.

The next they objected was, Rot. Parl. 8 Ed. 2, m. 8. The fryars of St. John's at Jerusalem did petition to have satisfaction of 2,354*l.* taken by the king out of their treasury. Now, because this record was vouched two days together, I desire it may be read; and upon the reading it will appear, to be upon another purpose, 'Sur' le Roy, &c.' there was cause and reason why the king should make satisfaction.

The next record was, Pat. 26 Ed. 1, m. 21, and that was highly magnified by them: that there were several commissions went out to enquire of gravaminibus, of wools, and of other particulars, 'de custod' maris;' and in this it was affirmed, to it, as all the king's counsel took their notes, these clauses were omitted out of the writ that concerns the forfeiture of lands, goods and chattels, or seizures.—This commission maketh nothing to this purpose, for like commissions daily come, where there are taxes laid upon men heavier than ought to be. Then a commission to enquire of grievances in this kind, wherein an answer of any thing unjustly taken shall be restored, but not a word to impeach this royal power. And, my lords, for the penalties in the writ, 31 Ed. 1, m. 26, power to seize the lands and goods of the refusees, 20 Ed. 2, m. 10, under forfeiture of all their goods, 10 Ed. 3, m. 5, dors. Claus. 12 Ed. 3, m. 18, dors. that the penalties and commands were as high in this commission as before.

The next objection was, that the kings of England have always consulted with their parliament concerning the defence of the realm, and that the aids and subsidies for defence have been granted by parliament.—This is no argument to impeach this royal power; for if in time of war the king will consent to it, shall this take away his royal power? In the times of Edw. 8, and Rich. 2, did that take away the king's royal power, that he may not ordain standards of the money himself? He may by his royal power erect courts of justice: shall that take away this from his power, because the court of wards was erected by court of parliament?

Next they objected Rot. Alm. 12 Ed. 3, pars 3, m. 22, That Ed. 3, was so penitent for what he had done, that he sent to the archbishop of Canterbury to pray for him; and that the people would forgive him for laying those taxes upon them, which his war compelled him unto, and he would never do the like again.—You shall see, it was only to pray for him for his voyage into foreign parts, (and he caused the record to be read, beginning thus; 'De excusando regem versus populum,' and ending, 'de gravaminibus') dated at Berwick upon Tweed. Your lordships see nothing by this record, but the desire of a prayer; first, to pray for the king for his voyage beyond seas; the other, concerning the charges and impositions. Surely this contribution commanded in the shipping business, was none of these charges, tallages, or impositions. This his desire to the archbishop was not only in the 12th year of his reign, but the like in anno 25, 26, and 50; so surely those prayers of the archbishop were for other causes, and not for this, which was for the defence of the realm.

Next they do object Rot. Franc. 7, Rich. 2, m. 13. That the king assigned Tonnage and Poundage to Henry earl of Northumberland for guard of the seas.—My lords, it doth appear by the very record itself, that this was only for an ordinary defence, and not for an extraordinary defence.

Then they insisted upon the Parliament-Roll 13 Hen. 4, m: 43, the office of measuring of linen-cloth, a half-penny upon the buyer, and as much upon the seller, and other fees upon long-cloth: the parliament, 13 Hen. 4, declares it to be a void office, and that accordingly judgment was given, 13 Hen. 4. Out of this he would conclude, that therefore there should be no new office, and that an office granted with a fee is void in law.—For answer to this: First, The reason why that was a void grant, was this; it appeareth, 4 Ed. 1, that the office of mesurage of all woollen and linen-cloths, was one entire office. If the king will grant that to another man which did intrench upon the former office, a void patent; therefore a strange conclusion, that because this office was void, therefore no new office to be granted. 22 Hen. 6, fol. 9. The office of surveying the packing of all cloth, a good office. 27 Hen. 8, fol. 28. The king granted to one to be his surveyor, a good office. Fitz-Hersmith, because it had no fee, therefore it was a void office. And now at the bar it is said, because it hath a fee, it was a bad office. If this reason may hold, all antient offices may fall. 34 Hen. 6, office to be marshal of the King's-bench; 12 Hen. 7, 15, to be warden of the fleet. Nay, it taketh down all offices that have been erected for the public good, and upon just occasion, as the office of Subpenas in Chancery, Star-Chamber, &c. All those within time of memory must be shaken by this.

In the next place they object, that these contributions, they are in substance impositions; and that the king should not impose upon the subject by his charter, or by his writ; but it must be done by common consent in parliament.—Your lordships have observed in all my discourse, that I have not insisted any way upon any power of imposition, neither is it the question in the business: For no man's property is invaded, no seizure of any man's goods, unless they incur it for contempt; and by a wilful contempt, the subject may lose his property. Therefore, Dyer, fol. 16, and 13 Eliz. fol. 296, if the king will command his subject to come into the realm, and he will not, he shall forfeit for his contempt all his goods; or if he be attached to appear in the courts of justice, and not appear, he shall forfeit his goods, 34 Hen. 6, 49, 9 Hen. 7, 6. If a man will wilfully contemn the king's command by his writ, he may be distrained; this he incurreth not by an invasion of his property, but in respect of his contempt.

Then they alledged Rot. Parl. 50 Ed. 3, m. 24, the lord Latimer, he was sentenced for persuading the king to lay impositions on the people. My lords, I have looked upon the record, and there the case of the sentence is declared, that he himself laid the impositions, and did take upon him royal power; and therefore he was justly sentenced.

And for the sentence of Dr. Manwaring, it is nothing to this purpose. This writ denieth not the property to be in the subject, but saith, the subject hath the property; and therefore commandeth the sheriff to distrain him if he will not pay.—And for the commission 2 Car. for the borrowing of money for the Palatinate, this was for the recovery of the Palatinate, and not for the defence of the realm; and besides, it was called in by special order.

In the next place, they objected and shewed divers records, that the king hath paid the wages of divers mariners and soldiers. And I do agree it. Is that an argument that he may not command the mariners to be sent at the charges of the county to furnish the king's ships? This is against the records that I have remembered. So likewise they have cited 21 Ed. 3, rot. 77, Ex parte Remem' Regis The king commanded the constable of his castle of B. to build ships, and the king to pay for them. So he doth at this day; he hath built the Sovereign of the Seas, and paid for it.

They have objected Dr. Cowell's book, which was called in. I wish they had read the proclamation: there are three causes expressed. First, Because he had writ things derogatory to the crown. Secondly, For —. And Thirdly, speaking irreverently of the common law. Just like to the men who do not spare to wade into all the deep mysteries of princes, who are gods upon earth.

For their objection, that the king hath a revenue belonging to his crown, for the defraying of all ordinary and extraordinary charges, and for the guard of the sea, as Tenures by Knight-Service, Escuage, Wards, Marriages, antient Demesne, &c. Tonnage and Poundage, Service of the Ports, and Profits of the Sea. My lords, it is not for us that are lawyers to look into the secrets of the king's revenue; he hath high officers, as treasurer, and under-treasurer, that look to the secrets of his estate, and they know well whether his ordinary or extraordinary revenue do answer more than his annual expence. The story of Actæon might deter men from looking into the secrets of princes.

For his tenures, that Knight-Service tenure was originally instituted for the service of Scotland and Wales, 19 Rich. 2, Fitz-Her. Guard. 165, and Old Tenure, fo. 10. The duties of Tonnage and Poundage are not given now to the king by acts of parliament; and when they were given, it was for the great charges of this defence. And besides, those acts of Tonnage and Poundage only concern the ordinary defence: the sending forth of the 75 ships out of the Cinque-Ports, it was but for 15 days, at their own charges. And for the Profits of the Sea by sturgeons, whales, &c. is it a proper defence for a kingdom? And for the Service of the Ports, you may remember by the records shewed, they were several times commanded 'ultra servitium debitum.'

But then they have granted one case, and I think, but one; that the king may ordain a Toll in a fair or market, or grant pontage, or the like, because there is an 'ad quod damnum,' and thereupon shall be an inquiry, 'si patria gravetur.'—The king may grant a fair, without an 'ad quod damnum,' if in his judgment, &c.

Rot. Scot. 1 Ed. 3, m. 8, A writ directed to the treasurer to pay for the shipping at Yarmouth. My lords, it doth particularly appear in the record, that J. S. was admiral, and going into Scotland: so the defence was for a foreign war.—It hath been mightily insisted upon, that here needeth no command to furnish ships, by the king's writ; every man, by the instinct of nature, will do it, where there is a necessity; no need of a royal power to command it.—Surely this argument is made by the people, or to please the people: What will the consequence of it be, but the introducing of a democratical government, when every man shall be his own defender? The God of hosts chuse captains and leaders to go before his people, and command them. But to give the people this liberty, that every man shall do as he pleases, and make a defence by an instinct of nature, is a strange position.

But it hath been said in these cases, it is better to sustain a mischief than an inconvenience: by this inconvenience every man's property is taken away from him, as often as the king pleaseth, and in what proportion he pleaseth.—This, though a maxim in law, yet it goeth but to particulars: but the loss of a kingdom is both loss of liberty and estate; this is not to be reckoned among the mischiefs, for this mischief destroyeth both head and members. Therefore I do marvel to hear the rule of Mr. Holborne, Suffer a mischief rather than an inconvenience.

The next objection was the Parliament-Roll, 2 Hen. 4, m. 22, 'Pur faire des barges;' this was the petition of the commons, that the commissions granted to burroughs, cities, and towns, for building of barges, should be repealed. The king's answer for the present is, They should be repealed; but for the future, for case of necessity, he would advise with the lords.—It doth not appear that these were granted for the building of any ships for the defence of the realm.

These are the objections that have been made out of the acts of parliament, out of the records, and reasons they have insisted upon.—Now I come to their exceptions and objections against the writs and proceedings in this matter.

First, they say, there was no sufficient danger represented by the writ 4 Aug. 11 Car. They say a supply by the Mittimus comes too late; and that the words of the Mittimus are not a good affirmative, 'quia salus regni periclitabatur.' And it doth not appear there was any danger, 4 Aug. 11 Car.—For this I have given it an answer, that it was not necessary to represent the danger in the writ. The king has secret intelligence, he hath his spies abroad, his ambassadors beyond seas; he knows the danger, we know not; nay, he knows that which is not fit to be discovered, and those dangers by preparation perhaps diverted another way: it is not fit by a public writ to reveal the danger. But, my lords, for the satisfaction of his people, he hath expressed sufficient cause enough in the writ; 'Quia salus regni periclitabatur.' They say there was no danger represented at this time when the writ went out. That is mistaken, for the writ of Mittimus doth recite the writ 4 Aug. and that saith, 'quod quidem prædones, piratæ, &c.' which shews that danger was the cause of the issuing of these writs.

Then they except at this word, salus; it is a physical word, and signifieth health, and you must have no metaphors in writs. Surely the grammarians tell us, that salus is taken 'pro incolumitate,' as well for safety as for health. Metaphors are usual in writs; I dare be bold to speak, there are more metaphors in the Register than in any book: Register 61. Turba, &c.

Then they have left no stone unrolled in this case: now they say the king's testimony, by his writ, is insufficient for that. Under favour, the teste meipso is without exception; we are bound to give credit to it. 1 Eliz. fol. 105. 'Ne exeat regno;' the king affirms J. S. will go beyond the sea, saith the book, this avowment of the king in his writ is not traverseable, you shall not aver against it. The case remembered by Mr. Solicitor, was mistaken by Mr. Holborne in the answer, Hil. 20 Ed. 1, coram rege, Rot. 14. He saith, these words vouched in the record were but the saying of the king's counsel, and not the opinion of the court. Clear otherwise, for it was the saying of the judges; and then agreed, 'Quod dominus rex est superlativum record' et præexercellens.' Will your lordships give credit to the marshal of the king's host, to the certificate of the captain of a company, if the men be in the king's service, as 11 Hen. 7, fo. 5, to the certificate of a bishop, as in case of bastardy; to the certificate of a mayor and alderman, by the recorder, as 5 Ed. 4, 30, and will you not admit of the certificate of the king by his Mittimus?

The next exception was taken to the Scir' Fac' that this Scir' Fac' ought not to go forth for this debt; and gave two reasons for it. First, The writ of 4 Aug. doth direct a form of levying, which is by distress, or imprisoning those that are rebels. Secondly, It is no debt to the king, and therefore ought not to be levied by Scir' Fac'.—My lords, for this, this duty is a duty to the commonwealth; it is 'pro defensione regni, the-aurus publicus respicit regem;' whosoever shall detain any public duty, he may be questioned by the king, as the head of the body politic; for that it appeareth, 27 Ass. Pl. 17, it was declared that J. S. and J. D. had levied 100 marks on the county for the array of certain archers; which money did not come for the profit of the king. Out of which I observe two things.—First, This money that was for archers: the money was levied on the body of the county. Secondly, recovered by an indictment at the king's suit, 27 Ass. Pl. 17, 11 Hen. 4, fo. 2. The fees of the knights of the shire that serve in parliament, they are reckoned among public duties; therefore the goods of a stranger may be taken within the town to pay those fees, if the money be not paid; the distress may be sold, for it is for a public duty, 11 Hen. 4, 2. So are the books: Regist. 19, the king may command the sheriffs to levy these fees, as well within his liberty, as extra. Hil. 28 Ed. 3 rot. 57, coram rege. Juratores Hundredi de S. they make a presentment that J. S. and J. D. chief constables of E. paid wages to archers which went not beyond sea. So as by this record it appeareth, that these public duties are recoverable at the suit of the king, 'quia ad opus dominis regis.' Pat. 14 Ed. 1, m. 1, 14, the king commandeth an account to be taken of the murrage, and how the sums levied have been employed. P. 15 Ed. 1, coram rege 70, dors. Rippon was besieged, they gave hostages; promise made by the town that these hostages should be redeemed, they were not: complaint is made to the king, and it came to the King's bench; and these moneys being 700l. that was promised by the town for the bringing back those hostages, was ordered to be paid, because it was for the public service. So for other things that are 'pro communi utilitate, inter Communia.' Hil. 5. lib. 4, rot. 4, Aurum Reginae, due unto the queen, may be levied by process out of the Exchequer in the king's name, nothing more usual.—This Scir' Fac' is grounded upon the whole matter, the writ 4 Aug. the Certiorari, and Mittimus; and commandeth that the defendants shall shew cause why they should not pay the moneys assessed upon them for the public service.

My lords, I have done with the Objections. I shall come to the judicial records, 24 Ed. 1, 'Ad custodiam maris.' Berks, an inland county, refused to contribute the names of those that made default, were certified into the Exchequer; it appeareth by the records, that process went out of the Exchequer in the strictest manner, 'A capias in manus,' of their lands, tenements, goods and chattels; and that their bodies, with horse and armour, be sent to Portsmouth; for besides the doing of their service, the seizure of their lands and goods, 24 the same year, Exc. Remem. Thesaur. On the other side, J. de S. gives information to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and barons, in absence of the Lord Treasurer, of the preparation of men in Flanders (this being remembered before to another purpose). It appeareth that after consultation had, they did resolve to send forth two writs, one was to the town, the other to the T. H. Custos Maris, to call all for defence of the maritime, &c. Exc. Remem. Regis, 24 Ed. 1, Rot. 80. Henry Hussey was seized of the manor of W. in Berks, he was assessed to find a horse 'pro custod. marit.' He complained in the Exchequer, that he had not the whole manor, and yet he was assessed to find a whole horse; he did not come and say, I ought not to be taxed, but submitted to the power, and desired a manorly contribution. 28 Ed. 1, Rot. 72, the abbot of Robertsbridge's case, remembered on both sides, divers times: under favour, the joining of the issue in the record is a very full proof in the cause; he brought a replevin against J. S. for taking his goods in an inland town in Kent; he pleadeth the contestation between our king and the king of France, and Leighorne assigned keeper of the sea, that the plaintiff was assessed unto 7s. 7d. anno 22, to 13s. anno 23, to 15s. and the defendant being collector did distrain; the plaintiff did not say in bar of this, that he ought not to be taxed, but that he was assessed 'ad invenient', &c. for such lands: the defendant saith, the plaintiff holds other lands in the county, and for that land he was assessed. Now this doth admit the power of taxing. Hil. 16 Ed. 3, Rot. 23, coram rege: The jury of Suffolk did present that J. Russel, and others, 8 Ed. 3, were hobbellers, elected in the hundred of T. and staid at home. They plead, Not Guilty. The jury finds that J. Russel did perform the service, but J. S. did not perform it, therefore committed to prison, and paid a fine unto the king. By this record it appeareth, the money paid to the archers and hobbellers was at the county's charge. Methinks that the disclaimer that is by the commons, 13 Ed. 3, Rot. Par. 9, & 11, is in nature of a judgment in this case; for there they did disclaim they had no cognizance, and there likewise upon their own concession, that the maritime parts ought to defend at their own charges, as the inland parts, the inland counties. This concession, 13 Ed. 3, is a strong argument, Parl. 21 Ed. 3, rot. 20, when the commons did petition for a guard for the sea: The answer is, 'Sic guard fait,' and that was at the charge of the counties, as your lordships know. 20 Ed. 3, divers ordinances made, which ordinances made had the force of a law: The king and his council did ordain, 'Quod omnes illi, &c.' which have such a quantity of land should be assessed to find one archer; one hobbeller 10l. two hobbellers vigint. lib. unum hominem ad arma 25l. This appeareth Rot. Franc. 20 Ed. 3, pars 1, m. 17, in the counties of Bedford and Bucks. In the same year, another ordinance, that those that did reside with their families, 'cum toto posse,' within six miles of maritime parts, were excused from finding of men without.

My lords, upon the occasion of this service, there were divers refusals made, certificate by Mittimus of their names into the Exchequer; as in this case, J. T. and W. G. were certified for defaulters amongst others: upon this, the court of Exchequer award process against those men and others, which was a 'Capias in manus.' Seizure of their lands and goods; they came in, and pleaded, they resided 'infra sex leucas,' with their families and all their powers: issue joined; upon this, the jury impanelled, and it appeared, those that were found within six miles, judgment quod sine die; but for others, they were imprisoned and fined; for so much land as they had without the six miles, for that they were charged. If I should number to your lordships all the judgments in this kind, I might speak here till to-morrow morning. P. 22 Ed. 3, 'inter communia,' in the Exchequer; P. 25 Ed. 3, m. 27, P. 27, and 28 Ed. 3, and there is a number more in other years, as 29 and 30 Hen. 4. And, my lords, according to those judgments, Trin. 31 Ed. 3, rot. 3, the writ went forth for discharging of such as have resided upon their lands within six miles. 21 Ed. 1, Pipe-Roll; some discharged because they were in the king's service.—So as, my lords, out of these records thus much may be collected. First, they affirm the king's power in assessing and levying. And secondly, that they are grounded upon those ordinances made by the king and his council. Thirdly, the process went out of the Exchequer, and in the king's name. M. 22, Ed. 3, parl. coram Baro. Issue joined, whether J. S. had lands to the value of 20l. to find hobbellers; if he had, then he was to do it.

My lords, I have now done with the Judicial Precedents; I have cited some few, amongst many others. It is now time, after so long premises, to draw to a conclusion: wherein your lordships have heard: First, that the king of England, he is an absolute monarch; and that by the common law of England, all these 'jura summæ majestatis,' are inherent in his person. This 'Supremum Dominium' for all the land that any subject holdeth, it is derived from the crown; and, as Plowden patteth it, 12 and 13, that there is a tacit condition in law annexed to his grant, that his officers may do justice to execute process surely upon his grant. This tacit condition may be subject to a common defence. Supreme jurisdiction, both by sea and land, was never yet impeached, and from him lieth no appeal. And originally, by the institution of the laws of this realm, what was once in his hand, and was never granted from him, is still in him; he hath absolute power of concluding war and peace: All these are in him as he is an absolute monarch, and holdeth his kingdom under none but God himself. It hath appeared also, that a principal part of this kingly office consists in the defence of the realm; that as his jurisdiction is by sea and land, so is his defence. And this hath been made appear to your lordships, both by precedents before William the 1st, and since: 'pro communi utilitate,' and, in case of necessity, the kings of England may ordain, by their proclamation, writs or patents, by the advice of their council, or judges, in legal matters. That the king is the sole judge of this danger, both for the prevention of it, and for the avoiding of it. Therefore for us to distrust that he will command too great a power or aid, it is a presumption against the presumption of law.—It hath appeared likewise that all the incidents of defence are likewise inherent in his majesty. We cannot build a fort or castle on our own ground, without license from him. Your lordships have heard the precedents, particular and general; precedents which have universal reasons, 'quod omnes ex debito as-tricti sunt;' Writs awarded by the king's royal power, in times of parliament, when parliaments were sitting, and in those years when great aids and subsidies were granted to the king, many times no cause declared, nor the occasion discovered.—There is no act of parliament made to take away this power: And the judicial precedents which your lordships have heard, have affirmed this power.

My lords, if there were no law to compel to this duty, yet nature and the inviolate law of preservation ought to move us. These vapours that are exhaled from us, will again descend upon us in our safety, and in the honour of our nation. Therefore let us obey the king's command by his writ, and not dispute it. He is the first mover amongst these orbs of ours; and he is the circle of this circumference; and he is the center of us all, wherein we all, as the lines, should meet; he is the soul of this body, whose proper act is to command.—But I shall need to use no persuasions to your lordships to do justice in this cause: and therefore I shall humbly desire Judgment for the king.

In Easter Term last, there was a writ of Scir' Fac' went out of the Exchequer, directed to the sheriff of Bucks, reciting, That whereas divers several sums of money, specified in a schedule annexed to the writ, by virtue of the writ 4 Aug. 11 Car. were assessed upon the several persons in the schedule named, towards the providing of a ship of war mentioned in the writ, which sums being so assessed, and not paid, by writ of Certiorari 9 Martii 12 Car. under the great seal of England, the names of those several persons and sums assessed are certified into the Chancery, and by writ of Mitimus dated 5 Maii 18 Car. sent into the Exchequer, and there to be proceeded upon according to the course of the law. The sheriff of Bucks is commanded to warn the parties named to appear, and to shew cause why they should not be charged with those several sums assessed upon them.—Hereupon Mr. Hampden appeareth, and demandeth Oyer of the writ 4 Aug. of the Certiorari and Mitimus, and their several returns; they being all read unto him, he saith that these several writs, and the returns thereof, and the schedules thereunto annexed, do not contain any sufficient matter to charge him to pay the 20s. and thereupon demurred. Mr. Attorney General saith, that they do contain sufficient matter to charge him. And thereupon the demurrer is joined. The demurrer being joined, the record was read in the Exchequer; and the cause appearing to be of great weight, it was adjourned unto this place in the Exchequer Chamber, to have the advice of all the judges of England.

Upon this record, I am to deliver my opinion; and I take it there is sufficient matter to charge Mr. Hampden with this 20s. And so I give Judgment for the king.

Here have been twelve days spent in the arguing of this case at the bar: I will confine myself to two hours and less, though not tied unto any time. The way to be short, is shortly to find out the points.—But I must first observe, in what state this cause cometh in judgment before us. There is a rule in law, that if a man shall demur generally to the writ, he doth confess all other matters in fact that are alleged. The reasons of it are apparent: because matters of fact are to be tried by jury, and matters of law by the judges. So in this case all the danger alleged by the writ, is confessed: and the matter in law is that which we that are judges are to deliver our opinions upon.

It hath been objected, by Mr. Holborne, that we are tied to the writ 4 Aug. for that writ is the ground of all, and upon that doth all the rest depend. It is true, that if he had relied upon the writ, it had been so. But his demurrer is this: That the writ, and the rest of the proceedings with the schedules, do not contain matter sufficient: so that now they have not put to us the writ 4 Aug. alone, but all the rest, to give judgment upon. For the writ of Mitimus, it is confessed, that in that there is an expression, that 'salus regni periclitabatur,' which is not in the writ 4 Aug.—To this he hath taken exception, that 'salus regni periclitabatur,' the danger is at the present time of the Mitimus, and doth not say, 'periclitatur,' 4 Aug. 11 Car. and therefore this expression now in the Mitimus cannot make good the defect thereof in the writ of 4 Aug.—To this I answer, that the demurring to all, hath confessed all, and yet the matter in the writ is sufficient to express the danger.

Then he objected, that salus signifies health, and not safety; and that the physicians term it so.—But salus signifies safety as well as health.

So it is Englished in Cooper's dictionary, and so it is taken by poets and historians for safety.

The next objection was to the writ 4 Aug. That if there were a danger, it must be plainly expressed in the writ, &c. The words are 'datum est nobis intelligi,' &c. How cometh the king to understand it? the danger must be fully expressed.—For this I hold it more fit for a statesman than myself to give an answer to, that the king should discover his intelligence; whether it is fit to make known to all the world the danger the kingdom is in. But yet I find that in the said writ 4 Aug. there is expressed both danger by pirates on the sea, and that the dominion of the sea is like to be lost: and that these are dangers to the whole kingdom. For the Certiorari, I find it is directed to the shire, and the writ of Mittimus to the court of Exchequer; and therefore he could not take exception to these writs; whatsoever I shall take advantage of it must be contained in the writ 4 Aug.

In this writ, three things, as dangers, are expressed. 1. The danger by pirates. 2. The danger of losing the dominion of the narrow seas. And, 3. The great peril in this time of war.—For the pirates, I shall not meddle with them; they are but petty robbers, and still running away: the ports must defend themselves against these; the inland counties are in no danger of them.—I will not insist upon the dominion of the narrow seas, though that is considerable; for in the defence of that consists much the preservation of the kingdom. But I shall insist on the danger of the kingdom expressed in the writ 4 Aug. thus, 'Consideratis etiam periculis undiquaque,' &c. There is danger, there is peril round about us; and it is by reason that there are now times of war, we see danger on every side.

There are two things trouble this point. 1. The subject suspects that this is only a pretence, and that the kingdom is not really in danger. 2. That there being great sums of money raised upon this occasion, this, in the end, will be drawn to be annual and perpetual: but if they were satisfied that the kingdom were really in danger, likely they would be content to pay the money till the danger be over.

For my part, I answer to these objections, that it is an unworthy supposition. I must be satisfied, and I am, that the kingdom was in danger for two things: one reason is, because it is so expressed in the writ 4 Aug. It cannot be denied, but that the kingdom may be in danger. It hath been conquered, and so it may be again, therefore it is necessary it should be foreseen and prevented; and somebody must do it, and who better than the king, that hath the care and charge of the kingdom? he saith the kingdom is in danger, and hath so declared it by his writ; why I should not believe it, when the king hath declared it so by his writ, I know not.—My other reason that the kingdom is in danger is, that it is so de facto. It cannot be unknown to any man, that these three or four years last past, great navies have been at sea, and great forces on land. If we should have but an ordinary defence at sea by shipping, no man can tell or suppose but that those navies, being so great, may land where they will, and in as many places as they will; what spoil would they make before such time as any resistance could be made against them?

They objected here, that these navies at sea, they are engaged in war one with another; we are safe enough, we need not fear them. I answer, they are, I think, engaged in good earnest; but who knoweth how soon these wars may end? they may end by the mediation of friends, or the death of some one person. And when there is a great navy at sea, and forces at land, how easy is it to remember an old quarrel, or to pick a new one?

These things do persuade me that the kingdom is in danger, and a very great and just cause to make preparation for defence. And if every man would be so persuaded, they would not deny the payment of the money. An example of this nature hath happened in former times: in Henry 7th's time, it appeareth, by a record on the king's part, Pat. 1 Hen. 7, pars 3, duo; there were wars between the king of the Romans and the king of France; they were both friends to Hen. 7, they owed him no ill-will; yet by reason of these great wars, great forces at sea, and great forces at land, the king would not trust them, but sent forth his proclamation, to command that watch and ward be kept over the sea-coasts; and command was to all his subjects, that upon short warning they should be ready for defence of the kingdom. So this may well be an example for the course that is now taken, for defence of the kingdom.

I shall now come to those reasons, and to the records that have been objected on either side. I shall begin with the king's side, because that layeth a charge on the defendant.—It hath been objected, that some of them are not warranted by the record. First, say they, there is a ship commanded to be provided, and money must be levied: but in the end, when this great sum of money is collected, it must be disbursed, no man knows how. No such thing in the record.—To this I answer, the record saith, a ship must be provided, and the sheriff is to rate the county, 'secundum facultates,' towards the same; not a word of any money to be paid unto the king. It is a ship that the sheriff is to build, and to assess money towards it.

They have said besides, here is in the writ a command for the imprisonment of the party, and that his liberty, dearer to him than his life, and his goods, wherein he hath an absolute property, shall be taken away. These things, they say, are not warranted by the writ, nor by any thing in the record.—I answer it is not warranted by the proceedings in this case; for the Scir' Fac' is not to shew cause why the party's goods should not be sold, or he imprisoned, but why he should not be charged with the money assessed upon him.

They say, that the general defence of the sea lieth upon the king; because he hath wherewithal to do it. I would willingly disburden myself as much as I can of the objections: a general answer I shall give to these particulars.

They say, the king hath personal service, the service of tenants, by knights service, escuage, castle-guard, grand serjeanty, petty serjeanty. Is the king bound by these to the defence of the kingdom? He that doth look on their originals, will not say so; for these are tenures reserved upon the several grants made by the king; and no more reason is there that the king, by this, should be tied to defend the kingdom, than there is for the lords, that are subjects, and have the like tenure, that they should be bound to the defence of the sea.

They say, he hath besides these, wards, marriages, reliefs, fines, issues, amerancements, primer seisin, fines of alienation, respites of homage, all fruits of the tenures; which all must go towards the defence of the kingdom.

I answer these profits are casual; besides, if he be not bound in respect of the tenures, as aforesaid, he cannot be bound by the fruits of them.

It hath been objected, that the king hath the profit of the sea, as royal fishes, whales, &c. wrecks at sea, treasure trove, royal mines, &c.—I answer, these he hath by his prerogative, and not for the defence; neither are they fit for a subject to have.

You say, he hath particular service from the Cinque Ports and other places, as from Malden, Colchester, and other places; and besides, he hath all manner of customs, and in regard of these he is bound to provide for the defence of the sea. It is true, the king must, for an ordinary defence, use the means the law hath allowed him; but that is not now the question: it is for an extraordinary defence. The question now ariseth, if it were asked any man, whether, they do think in their conscience that the king is able of himself, out of these, to prepare a royal navy, without help from the subject? None are so senseless as to think it.

There be some other things, to which I shall give a general answer. It appeareth by many records, that the king hath paid wages to soldiers, and sometimes hath hired ships; and unless there had been a consideration, the king would not have done it.—To this I answer, it was for ordinary defence, and he is bound to do it; and if he engaged himself by promise to repay unto them their charges, I can say no more but this, that every honest man that makes a promise will perform it, and so is the king bound to perform his promise: for that which honesty binds others to the performance of, honour binds the king.

I shall come to those things to which a more particular answer is to be given. The charge lieth general upon the whole kingdom, which I shall divide into three parts. 1. The Ports. 2. The Maritime Counties. And, 3. The Inland Counties: And to these three I will apply the records. 1. For the Ports; they are of two kinds, the Cinque Ports, and the Ports at large. What services are due from the Cinque Ports, is expressed in Libr' Rubrico, in the Exchequer, that they were to find 52 ships, and 24 men in every ship, for fifteen days; which cometh to 1188 men. The ports at large are tied to no certain service; it will appear by most of these records which I shall apply, that the Cinque Ports have been charged with more than their due, and the ports at large equally with the Cinque Ports. Pat. 25 Joh. in. 6, the king sent his writ to the Cinque Ports, and thereby commandeth, 'quod omnes naves paratæ, &c. et homines;' he doth not here tie them to a number, but all must go. Claus. 17 Joh. m. 7. Here the king sent his writ Baronibus suis de Rye, a member of the Cinque Ports, 'Quod venire faciatis omnes naves apud Quinque Portus;' this was general, as the others; all the ships, not tied to the number of 52. Claus. 14 Hen. 3, m. 13. A writ went out to Portsmouth, being a port at large, to provide a galley, 'et eam muovere faciant cum hominibus, et quod prompti et parati sint ad proficiscend' cum necesse fuerit.' So here is a particular charge upon Portsmouth, not bound unto it, to provide a galley with all manner of munition. Claus. 25 Ed. 1, m. 5, dors. A writ went unto Guernsey, a port at large, to make a ship ready as often as need should require, 'de contributione faciend' pro navibus quoties opus fuerit.' Pat. 9 Ed. 2, pars 2, m. 26. A writ goeth forth, and that was directed, 'Ballivis et probis hominibus comit' Southampton,' to make 'provisionem navigii sumptibus propriis;' no promise from the king to pay this again. Claus. 20 Ed. 2, m. 7. A writ goeth to the sheriff of London, and that reciteth a charge formerly laid upon the city, and upon Kent, for finding of 12 ships; London to find 9 ships, and Kent 3, and forty men in every ship, 'ad sumptus illarum.' Claus. 20 Ed. 2, m. 8. A writ directed to the bailiff of Yarmouth, which is none of the Cinque Ports, and they were charged with two ships at their own costs. And the same command, in the same roll, for all ships of 50 tons to be ready. Rot. Scot. 10 Ed. 3, m. 12. That writ reciteth the general obligation that they are bound in to defend the kingdom, almost in the same words mentioned in this writ; it reciteth, that every man should be assessed 'juxta statum et facultates,' so there was a contribution; then cometh in the clause 'ultra illam pecuniam summam debet pro servitiis.' It is true, indeed, the king did pay towards this, but it is expressed to be of his mere grace and favour. 10 Ed. 3, m. 2, dors. A writ to Winchelsea, a member of the Cinque Ports, and that was, 'Quod omnes naves sint paratæ,' both of the ports 'et aliarum villarum;' and the reason is expressed, because without their help the king was not able to defend the kingdom; and appointed them, by that writ, that the ships should be ready victualled for thirteen weeks; whereas the ordinary time was but for fifteen days. Vas. 12 Ed. 3, m. 8.

There a writ goeth forth to the sheriff of Kent, and to the barons of the Cinque Ports, whereby they were all commanded to look to the custody of the sea-coasts; here are the maritime towns and port towns joined together. 25 Ed. 3, m. 22, dors. A writ to Southampton, 'ad congregandum naves.' In the same roll, m. 8, more writs to other towns. Pat. 12 Ed. 3, pars 4, m. 3. There was a command that all that dwell within the isle of Thanet, from 16 to 60, should be ready to defend the sea-coasts, and this was 'juxta statum et facultates.' Rot. Alm. 13 Ed. 3, m. 12, Yarmouth charged with 4 ships, and in each ship 24 men: whereas usually it was but 21 men in a ship, now I think they are come to six-score men in a ship. There are an infinite number of rolls to this purpose, to charge the port towns.

I come now to my second division, which is maritime towns. Pat. 48 Hen. 3, m. 4, dors. A writ went to the sheriffs of Norfolk, reciting, That ships and soldiers had staid there long, and that they were intending to depart, because their forty days were past: Command was, that they should stay, 'donec aliud inde mandatum fuerit.' Claus. 23 Ed. 1, m. 5, dors. There were writs directed to the sheriffs of Southampton, Dorset and Wilts, these three are all maritime counties; A command, that they should raise three thousand men to defend the coasts. Pat. 24 Ed. 1, m. 17. A writ directed to the sheriffs of Lincoln, York, and Northumberland, to assist certain commissioners to take up an hundred ships, with a competent number of men, these are to maritime counties: The like writs go to the sheriffs of Sussex and Southampton, and these for the preparation of ships, and to take them where-soever they are to be found. Rot. Pat. 25 Ed. 1, m. 6, writs went to Southampton, Devon, Cornwall, Dorset, and many other places that were maritime towns, for arresting of ships, and raising of men. But the rolls I might most insist upon, are only these; I'll but name them: Pat. 24 Ed. 1, m. 16, Ex parte Remem. Regis, et rot. 78, Claus. 25 Ed. 1, m. 26, Claus. 13 Ed. 3, m. 14, pars 1, dors. Scot. 10 Ed. 3, m. 22. By all which it appears, not only the port, but the maritime counties have contributed towards the charge of the defence of the kingdom. And the other side do hardly deny it, but that the maritime towns may be charged.—I will open it plain, that it is for their ease to bring in the inland counties. This cause is not of so great consequence, as is conceived; for if the port-towns and maritime towns may be charged, then it bringeth but in the inland counties. In England and Wales there are fifty-two counties, thirty-three of these are maritime counties; so the inland counties are but nineteen at the most, and they contribute but to a fourth part of the charge for the defence of the kingdom. And so much to my second division of maritime towns.

3. To the third division, which is of Inland Counties, that they have been charged; I shall make that appear, that the greater part of them have been charged formerly for this manner of defence. They objected, that the county of Bucks is an inland county, and that Mr. Hampden dwells there; and therefore no reason he should contribute to the defence; no inland county ever did it, say they. There may be two reasons, why, in former times, the writs for the most part went to the ports and maritime counties. 1. Because they have the benefit of the seas by exportation and importation of their goods. And, 2. Because they are continually in danger of pirates and robbers; and far nearer for a sudden defence, than the inland counties are. But this cannot be held for a sufficient reason, that they only that are near the danger should be put to defend the whole kingdom. I am sure the inland counties receive great pains and profits by the commodities from the port-towns; and they are the more in safety, the stronger the sea-coasts are kept: and therefore no reason but that they should contribute towards the charge of the defence of the sea. For all the writs, save one commission, have gone to be for the general defence of the kingdom; then no reason but inland counties should be charged. If they say they never did it, it is a strange prescription, that because they never did it, they never will do it. A man cannot excuse himself, that because he never paid, title to such a vicar, or such a parson, that therefore he will never pay it.

I shall go to the records that charge the inland counties. Claus. 48 Hen. 3, m. 2, a writ directed to the mayor and bailiff of Bedford, an inland county; it doth recite, that divers of that town were called to go with the king towards the sea-coasts, 'contra hostilem invasionem, et nunc necesse est, et causas fortium' 'ut levari fac' et expensas; and appoint at what rate they should levy it, the horsemen were to have eight pence per day, and the footmen four pence. Claus. 48 Hen. 3, m. 7. A writ directed to the sheriff of Huntingdon, whereby the men of that county were commanded to go to London and from thence to the sea-coasts, for the defence of the kingdom. Rot. Scot. lx. Remem. Regis 24 Ed. 1, m. 78, dors. A writ directed to the sheriffs of Berks, and this is to distrain men to make good the custody of the sea-coasts. Rot. 26 Ed. 1, m. 5. The like writs were directed to the sheriffs of Hertford, Essex, Nottingham, Derby, Huntingdon, Cambridge, &c. and almost to all the inland counties, 'pro custodia maritima,' all to come to London, and to go from thence to the sea-coasts, for the defence thereof. Claus. 13 Ed. 3, pars 1, m. 14, dors. A writ goeth out to Oxford, 'ad distringendum,' for wages, 'pro custodia maritima; one man was distrained, and he pleaded he had been charged in Wilts, and ought not to be charged in another county, and for this there went a Supersedes. Rot. Viagii 1 Hen. 4, m. 10. A writ was directed to the sheriffs of Nottingham and Derby, two inland counties, and this was to proclaim 'quod omnes homines, inter 16 & 60, parati sint, &c.'

to go with the king, within the kingdom, where he pleased. Clas. 1 Ric. 2, m. 18. Writs were directed to the mayor and bailiffs of Huntington and Cambridge. This roll is cited by the counsel for the defendant; and in part it maketh for the defendant, and in part against him. The effect of it is this: the writ is directed to the bailiff of Huntington, and this recites a former writ to provide barges, called Ballingers, with forty and fifty oars a-piece, like to a galley, at the charge of the most rich men, and this was 'ad custod. maris.' And the like writs went to the towns of Nottingham, Gloucester, and Warwick, and divers other places; these vessels were not devised then, I find them used before in Edward the third's time. In the Parliament Rolls, 2 Ed. 4, m. 22, the commons did complain that a commission was gone forth for the making of these barges. True, upon a petition of the commons, the king saith, he will advise with his lords: there is no more done; but upon this they cease. I have now done with the precedents on the king's side.

I shall now come to that which hath been said on the defendant's side for their discharge. And, first, for the acts and petitions in parliament, which are weighty and considerable.—First, for the statute De Tallagio non Concedendo, which was in the time of Edw. 1, it hath been doubted, whether this be a statute or no. I see no colour of doubt, but that this is a statute; it is printed amongst the statutes, and ever accounted for a statute: and in the Petition of Right, it is recited for a statute. And to say it is no statute, because the Parliament-Roll is wanting; if it should be disallowed, it would draw a great inconvenience with it: for private men might embezzle the records, and then if the records were wanting, the act of parliament should be void.

It is an act of parliament, no question; but the question is, whether the provision made by this writ, be within the meaning of this statute.—And I conceive it is not; for there are two words in this statute observable, Tallage and Aid. By 'no aid' here, will you take away the aid 'pur fils marrier, or 'pur faire fitz chavalier?' By 'no tallage,' will you have it so, the king shall demand no sum of money? Then if you will give it this large construction, you will take away all fines and amerancements that are due to the king, all lawful impositions; and surely this was not the intent and meaning of this statute: but it was only to take away all taxes and tallages that were unlawful. If they were lawful, this statute meddled not with them.—Now that no tallage is to be taken, it appears in the Parliament-Rolls, 13 Hen. 4, m. 42, where an office was granted by the king, with a fee, for the measuring of linnen-cloth, that the subject should pay him a certain sum of money for every piece measured; whereupon at the parliament, the commons complain, that this was an unjust imposition, and they desire that they might not be charged with this kind of tallage, which, as was apparent, was unjust, and so they had present relief against it.

The next act of parliament is 14 Edw. 3, the second parliament of that year, three parliaments being held that year. The commons grant the king a certain sum of money, for the great business he had as well on this side the sea, as beyond; but after a cessation of the troubles, then the king is to be at the charge of the future defence; thereupon the king granteth this shall not be had in exemplum, and that they shall not afterwards be taxed without parliament: and this is the strongest thing that I have heard objected.—It requireth a good answer; the words are plain, no charge no question; but this is a charge. I looked into the Petition of Right, and it is not there mentioned, nor amongst those acts of parliament that are in the margin; but the reason why it was omitted, I know not.—I observe in this act of parliament a subsequent clause, that will go far to the answer of this objection; for neither in the acts of parliament, nor in the Petition of Right, is there any mention made of the defence of the kingdom; if the king had been bound to defend the kingdom, could the parliament have accepted this as a kindness at his hands? 14 Edw. 3. This act was made, yet the aids continued, none of these writs found till 24 Ed. 3, Rot. Franc. 24. Ed. 3, m. 9, & 26, there went out commissions to array men, to the counties of Suffolk, Dorset and Somerset, for the defence of the maritime parts; within eleven years after the making of the statute, Rot. Franc. 26 Ed. 3, m. 5, the like writs to the earl of Huntington, 'Considerantes quod omnes incolæ tenuntur de jure ad defendend' in periculo;' and that they shall array the men in this county, and to bring them 'ad custodiend' mare;' and by this it is recommended for the erecting of beacons, which is the first direction of that nature; so here is a new charge, and within eleven years after the making of the statute. The same year likewise there went writs to the sheriffs of Nottingham, Derby, Salop, Berks, Middlesex, Bucks, Northampton, &c. So though these writs go almost into every county, and divers other writs of the like nature, as Rot. Franc. 28 Edw. 3, m. 34, yet as I said in no act of parliament extant, nor in any writ that ever went forth that I can find, there is any thing appears to charge the king with the defence of the kingdom, and in all of them, no distinction made between the port-towns, maritime-towns, counties, and inland-counties; but that all of them are generally chargeable. And for the rest of the acts of parliament, they all mentioned in the Petition of Right, and therefore I pass them over. There is in those acts, provision against loans and grievances; but this clause, for the defence of the kingdom, I find it mentioned in no act of parliament but this of 14 Ed. 3, before mentioned.

I will now come to the petitions in parliament: Rot. Parl. 18 Ed. 3, m. 9, 11. It was there declared to the commons, that the French had invironed the island of Guernsey, and all this was for default of a navy upon the sea; and therefore it was needful to consider how this might be regained. It was answered by the commons, That concerning the right and guard of the sea, they desire to give no advice, saying, they have no cognizance of things concerning the sea; but if there be occasion, the cinque-ports are to be charged: and said further, that in the marches of Scotland, they were to defend the kingdom against the Scots: but that this kind of defence should lie upon them, was never heard of.—I will give you an answer to your acts of parliament, and petitions of parliament, by putting of a case. I will admit you have an act of parliament as strong as you can make it, that the whole charge of the defence of the kingdom should lie upon the king, and not upon the subject, in case of any sudden invasion. Admit there was a greater power at sea, than the king was able to make defence against; then, I pray, whether should this not give way to the present necessity, or the kingdom should be lost? Is it not better to endure a mischief, than an inconvenience?

If you say, the acts of parliament should give way to necessity, then you have answered all you have objected:—This is not the only case of necessity. I shall put you another case, when acts of parliament must give way to necessity: that if a man be attainted of treason, he is disabled to inherit by act of parliament; but if the kingdom should descend to such a man, then the act of parliament should give way to it. And shall not the acts of parliament give way to necessity for defence of the kingdom? What though there have been petitions in parliament to have it decreed, that this kind of charge should not be laid upon the subject? Admit it had been so decreed in parliament, yet by the law of equity they ought to be charged; and in all reason they ought to be charged towards the defence of the kingdom; and that for three respects. 1. For the reason given in the writ, 'Quod omnes tangit per omnes debet supportari.' which is but equity. 2. The king is trusted with the defence of the kingdom, and therefore it is fit he should have means wherewith to do it.

But you say he may call a parliament, and they will give him means wherewith to do it. It is true, this thing in question, if it had been done by parliament, it had been done by the happiest means; but because he might have it by parliament, must he therefore have it no other ways? The question now is, Whether what is done, may be done without a parliament or no? What is done, is done by the great seal, which is the next authority to a parliament. What if an enemy had come before the parliament had met, or before they had granted any aid, should the safety of the kingdom depend upon such contingencies? God forbid. Will you have forces on both sides, and restrain the king to his power by parliament, which may be so dilatory, that the kingdom may be lost in the mean time?

3. Many inconveniences might happen both to the king and subject, if this should be suffered: if the king should be restrained of his royal power, it would turn to his contempt, both at home and abroad: and all this while the matter is not so great, it is but parting with a little money 'secundum statum et facultates.'—It is true, as Mr. Holborne hath said, That in former times they have been careful not to leave too much power to the king; but you would leave so little as would bring him in contempt both at home and abroad. The worst that comes to the subject, is but to yield their help to the king, in such times of danger, with a small part of their estate; and then it would make foreign nations that know of it afraid of us, which now by this occasion have encouragement to attempt that which otherwise they would not.

It hath been objected, That if the king may raise monies in this manner, many inconveniences would follow, and it would be a means to keep back parliaments.—To this objection I answer, It is no means to keep back a parliament; for there are many other causes of calling a parliament, besides for the defence of the kingdom: as, for making good laws, redressing of grievances, &c. The king may be engaged in a foreign war, and the subject must help him. But to call a parliament always is not necessary; for when the kingdom was in the greatest danger that ever it was, as in 1588, and the rebellion in the North, yet no parliament was called in either of these dangers.

Next they object, That if this course be admitted, the king may pretend a danger when there is none; or a great danger, when it is but small: and so may raise a great sum of money, and the subject shall have but little benefit thereby.—I shall give three answers to this objection: 1. If this power be in the king, and that power be just and equal, then it is not to be taken from him, because he may misemploy his power. If he misuse his power, the fault is his. 2. This objection cannot be made, unless you suppose injustice in the king: make what laws you will, if the king be unruly, he will break through them. 3. If it so falls out, that the writ going out upon this pretence, and that great sums of money are levied, and the monies employed to another use, it were a great inconvenience; but in this case there is no such fear, for the writ is expressly to make a ship; and if they would have taken any advantage upon that, the counsel ought to have pleaded it, and the judgment ought to appear there upon record. There appears no money in this case to be coming to his majesty's hands; but it is said in the writ, 'volumus autem,' &c. we will that no part of the money be converted to another use than to the building of a ship.

Then they object, That by the same reason the king commandeth his subjects to provide one ship now, he may command two ships the next year. To this I answer, If the danger be greater, the defence must be greater, and then the supply must be greater; and no man can suppose that the king will impose that on his subjects when there is no need.

I shall now come to the two last exceptions

First, That the power cannot be given to the sheriff by the writ 4 Aug. to tax every man 'secundum statum et facultates;' that this is too great a power to be committed to the sheriff. To that I answer, That I conveye the sheriff to be the fittest man, and most indifferent for that purpose; for if there were commissioners, or many men appointed for doing thereof, they might perchance be partial to their friends: And the sheriff having all the freeholders names, and the bailiffs for his ministers, that know the estates of most men; therefore out of all doubt he is the fittest person. For the exception to the Scir' Fac' it hath been objected, That the king cannot by that course levy moneys, because the king having no interest in the money, he cannot levy it by Scir' Fac'; neither doth it appear in the writ, to whom this money is to be paid. I confess this point, though not spoken to by the defendant, is of most difficulty. Though no person certain is named, to whom this money is to be paid, and the sheriff is only to levy it according to the writ, and the king providing a ship, I suppose that Scir' Fac' may issue for it; for if a common person claim any thing, or be wronged, or debarred from his right, he hath by the law a writ for his remedy: and shall not the king have the like remedy for this ship, being for the defence of the realm in general, for which he is intrusted, to prevent a wrong to be done to this common-wealth; But in this case, the Scir' Fac' is not for Mr. Hampden to shew cause, why he doth not pay the money to the sheriff, but why he doth not pay the money he was assessed towards the making of the ship; which for aught I know, when it hath done the service, is the subjects again, at whose cost it was provided, for they might either have hired a ship or bought a ship. In Fitz-Her. Na. Br. it is held, the king may, for the good of his people, send forth writs for removing common grievances, and for repairing of bridges, and the like: And why may not the king send forth writs, for so necessary a service as to defend the kingdom? Claus. 1 Rich. 2, m. 7, a writ went out to the mayor and bailiff of Oxford to repair the walls and ditches about the town; and why not as well to repair the wooden walls of the whole kingdom, as the walls and ditches of a town? The king hath charge and power over all, to see all done.

But it hath been said, When this money is gathered, we know not what becomes of it. I answer them with the common roll in Scacc' 24 et 25 Ed. 3, where a commission went forth to levy money for maritime defence, but what was done thereupon is not expressed. But at that time there was a cause adjudged in the exchequer, it is a Norfolk cause, where divers being commanded to go to the wars against the Scots, and had thereupon armour and wages allowed them; afterwards comes a counter-command to some of them not to go, and two men that had wages went not. Whereupon a writ went out against them, and the jury found the one guilty, and he was ordered to pay back the money; but the other going to the wars, afterwards, by a second direction, was quit: And the first gave security for the repayment of his wages, being 30s. and also for the armour.

It hath, lastly, been objected, That this taxation ought to be 'secundum legem et consuetudinem Angliæ;' and that ought not to be by writ, but by parliament.—To this I answer, That from king John's to Henry 4's time, there hath been an usage and custom to send forth writs of this nature, and since that time till now not the like command. About Henry 4's time, began our tonnage and poundage: so long as he had that, the defence was at his own charge. There is no act for taking this charge by writ away; it is become a general custom, and the general custom makes the law of England; and we are to examine and try new causes by the old law, and now compare this with what hath been done in former times.

I shall make an end: For my own part, I am persuaded in my conscience that there is imminent danger: I am satisfied in it, both by the king's writ, and that which is apparent to every one; and there is a necessity this danger should be prevented. I do conceive this writ to be grounded upon this danger of necessity; and that the danger appears sufficiently in the writ.—Therefore I conceive that the proceedings are legal, and that there is good and sufficient cause to charge Mr. Hampden, and that he ought to pay the 20s. assessed upon him.

The record hath been opened, therefore I shall spare that labour. I conceive the Case in question to be this: Whether the king, by his right of sovereignty, may charge the subject, in case of necessity, to contribute with him to the necessary defence of the kingdom, without the subject's consent in parliament? Mr. St. John, whom I take to be the mouth of the defendant's counsel, confesseth, That this question is not so much de re, of necessity, but de modo, if done without parliament.

This is one of the greatest cases that ever came in judgment before the judges of the law. The king's right and sovereignty, in a high point, is concerned, and the honour and safety of the kingdom, on the one side; and the liberty of the subject, in the property of his goods, on the other side.—This is the first cause that ever came to judgment of this kind, that I know of. Kings have not suffered their rights of sovereignty to be debated at the bar, as now it is; for these are Arcana Regni, not fit for public debate. The use of law was to have causes debated? as saith one, no man knows what metal the bell is of, until he hears it ring. This bell hath been rung very roundly and laboriously on both sides.

The subjects have objected, that they may bring actions against officers of the king for assessments by virtue of this writ. But for that I find no precedents, save only one, which is 25 Ed. 1, the abbot of Robertsbridge's case; and he was taxed double for this matter of defence of sea and land, in two several places: and therefore he brought his action to be discharged in one place. But in cases of this nature, they petitioned in parliament to the king for redress, as appears by many precedents.

In Bracton, who wrote after Hen. 3's time, and inclined to those times when the liberty of the subject was strongly maintained, he saith, 'totum regnum petatur, &c.' They used to petition the king; but now you have actions brought against the king's officers in the King's Bench, Common-Pleas, and here in this court; and it pleaseth the king to bring this Scir' Fac' to the end that the right of this cause may be tried by the judges of the law.—In 11 Rep. and Coke's Comment. on Littleton, fol. 10, it is said, That the laws and customs of the parliament are obscure: 'Lex est consuetudo parliamenti, querenda est ab omnibus, ignota a multis, et cognita a paucis.'—As Tully said of one that would define anima, and said it was musica harmonia, that was, a musician, 'Homo non multem recessit ab arte sua: I for my own part, will keep myself to my own art of the books of the law and statutes. And if I use the help of others, I hope you will pardon me for that.

I will briefly propound my order and method throughout the case. 1. I will remove some few impertinent discourses, which are not in the record, as being out of the ring of this bell. 2. I shall propound, that the sole care of defence, at sea and land, 'Jure Regio,' appertains to the king, and none other; and that he is the sole judge of this. 3. That the sole charge of defence, in ordinary cases, regularly and legally appertaineth to the king. 4. That the extraordinary charges of defence ought to be supplied by the parliament, and upon this rule, 'Quod omnes tangit ab omnibus debet supportari.' 5. If the defence be of necessity and the danger great, and so great as the king's revenue is not sufficient to supply the occasion, then the rule comes to be in use, 'Qui sentit commodum sentire debet et onus;' and if it be general, 'Quod omnes tangit, ab omnibus debet supportari.' 6. That in the defence, where all ought to join, the sea and land ought to assist and contribute the one to the other. 7. I say, there are some particular cases, in which this charge of defence cannot be imposed by parliament. 8. That the king solely is intrusted, by the law, to impose this charge upon the subject. And, 9. These being my generals, I shall come to my minor, and conclude that this charge is justly imposed by the king, without parliament.

As to the first impertinency, you speak of tonnage and poundage: is there any such grant on record? Shall we take notice of a thing that is not in rerum natura? I say, I wish it had been granted, for 'Qui admittit medium demit finem:' he that taketh away the ordinary means of preservation, is the author of ruin and destruction. You see it is taken, but you cannot tell by what right. If this were material, you wronged your client, you pleaded it not: and if it is not material, you wronged us, and your auditors, and yourselves, to talk of it.

You say, this Ship-Money hath been charged for these three years together; is this discourse within the record? If not, you speak without book. You say, the king hath imposed great sums of money upon merchandizes: but what is this to the business now in question?—Then you talk of a property the subject loseth thereby; but this rather to abuse the people without either colour or shadow. It was 'ad faciendum,' or rather 'inficiendum populum.' If you at the bar had not spoke it 'argumenti gratia,' it could not but have proceeded out of the depth of malice, or ignorance, or both. If one be found guilty of murder, and the judge knoweth the contrary, what shall be done? He ought to acquaint the king therewith; for it is the king's right of sovereignty to pardon, but the judge hath no such power. I say, the whole care appertaineth to the king only, and he is the sole judge both of the defence at sea and land. Fitz. Na. Br. fol. 113. 'Le roy de droit saver et defender son realme al bien vers la mere come vers les enemis.' Regist. fol. 127. 'Rex, &c. pro eo quod nos dignitatis nostrae regni ad providend' salvationem regni nostri circumquaq; sumus astricti.' Fortesque cap. 37. 'Omnes potestas regis deferre, &c. in defensione et tuitione regni.' I think no man can well oppose this.

But we will come to the third. The sole charge of the defence regularly and legally appertains to the king. Bract. fol. 1. 'In rege, qui recte regit, hæc duo sunt necessaria, arma et leges, &c.' with which words accords Justinian, in his Proæmium, from whence that is taken in Plowden, fol. 315, in the Case of Mines. One reason why he saith royal mines belong to the king, is, because he is the head, and the people his members. And he is to preserve the subject two ways: by arms to defend them against all hostility; and by law, to preserve them from injuries. 3 Rep. fol. 11. The body, lands, and goods of the king's debtor were liable to execution; 'qui thesaurus regis est pacis vinculum et bellorum nervi,' Rep. 11. The king's treasure is the ligament of peace, the preserver of the honour and safety of the realm, and the sinews of war; and is of high estimation in law, in respect of the necessity thereof; that the embezzling of treasure trove, though not in the king's chest, is treason. And treasure, and other valuable things, are so incident to the crown, that they cannot go from the crown. He hath on the land, wardships, escheats, amerciaments, &c. for the maintenance of his honour and dignities royal. For the sea he hath whales, &c. These do little towards an army to defend the sea. The reason why the king hath the customs, is for the protection of merchants upon the sea, against pirates and enemies of the realm. So I shall conclude this point, That the ordinary defence, both for care and charge, of sea and land, doth appertain to the king.

The next is this, which is my fourth head; That the extraordinary charge of defence regularly ought to be supplied by parliament, and cannot be done without it. Albeit subsidies be of gift and grant, yet this is of right and reason; the king is pater patriæ. If the son give to the father when he wants, it is his duty. 19 Hen. 6, the rector of Cheddington's case, whether the king may grant a discharge of a fifteenth? If the king may grant a discharge to one, so he may do to all. It is against-law the king should not have subsidies of his people, in case of necessity and danger; the same law that willeth the king should defend the people, tells us we should grant to the king aids for the defence. This is to be done in parliament regularly; and that this extraordinary charge cannot be imposed but in parliament, these are their objections. I come now to the statute De Tallagio non Concedendo, which without question is a statute, being in our printed books; and in the Petition of Right, 3 Car. it is recited as a statute, and established: the words of that are, 'Nullum Tallagium sine assensu Parliamenti.' And 14 Ed. 3, cap. 1, there the king expresses himself, he will not impose any charge or aid on the subjects, but in parliament. Fortescue reciteth this to be the law, 'No charge without parliament.' And Bodinus, lib. 1, fol. 97, saith, "That the statutes of England are as a buckler to defend the subject against the king, for laying any charge upon them but by parliament." And in his sixth book he magnifieth this kingdom for the due observing this law. Other kings, in this point, have no more power than the king of England, for that it is not in the power of any prince in the world, and his pleasure, to raise taxes on the people, no more than to take another man's goods from him. And yet, nevertheless, if the necessity and danger of the commonwealth be such, as it cannot stay for the calling of a parliament, the king in his wisdom and foresight may lay a charge without their consent; and this is by the law of jus gentium, the rule of law and reason holdeth 'quod omnes tangit ab omnibus debet supportari.'

And so I come to my fifth head, If the defence be of necessity, and the king's treasure doth not suffice to defray the charge, then, instead of the rule 'quod omnes tangit, &c.' this rule succeeds, 'qui sentit commodum, sentire debet et onus.' If the treasure of the king will not defray the charge, I do not conceive he is bound to sell or pawn his crown, or his lands, though some princes have been so courteous to do it, and paid it again.

You say at the bar, he must spend all, and more if he had it. I will put this case in the 10th Rep. One is bound at the common law by prescription to repair a wall against the sea, yet in case of necessity, in avoidance of public mischief, the prescription ceaseth; yet in this case, if reparation must be done, then cometh this rule, 'quando impotentia excusatur, tunc qui sentit commodum sentire debet et onus.' And if he be not able to do it, the charge being so extraordinary, shall he not have contribution? The law compelleth not impossibilities. So the king is bound to defend the kingdom by land and by sea: but if the defence be so great, and the danger tends to the subversion of the kingdom, and the king not able to make defence, the king and his subjects ought to contribute to this charge, in due proportion. 'Ubi est eadem ratio, ibi est eadem lex.' If the law shall make this provision for a small level of ground, à fortiori for the commonwealth, in the time of extraordinary danger and necessity.

Sixthly, In this joint charge of defence, the land ought to assist the sea: nay, it is not possible that any island should be defended without wooden walls of the navy at sea. Canutus the Dane entered the Thames mouth with an army, and afterwards went and landed in Dorsetshire: and again shipped his men, and entered the Severn: then he went into Worcestershire, then he sailed back again to other parts of the kingdom: so he that is master of the sea, may make great spoil upon the land at pleasure. The Netherlanders having a great navy, the Spaniards fortified strongly; as soon as the wind served they set sail, and were 80 miles off before the Spaniards could march with their forces to make resistance; the Netherlanders presently got a strong place, and afterwards sailed to another place, and took that also. These are no new examples, for islands to be masters of the sea. Our grand army in 1588, at Tilbury, what good had they done, if the Spaniards had been masters at sea? It is not possible for an island to be safe, without a navy at sea, as appeareth in sir Walter Raleigh's History of the World: and if the sea must defend the land, why should not the land be contributory for the defence of the sea and land? There are several precedents where writs have gone to inland counties, to charge them to go to the custody of the sea. Claus. 48 Hen. 3, 24 Ed. 1, 26 Ed. 3, &c. Writs have gone into Berks, Oxon, &c. inland counties, to command them to contribute towards the defence of the sea.

To the seventh, That in case of instant danger, the imposition cannot be by parliament, I will here consider the nature of the danger, as Mr. Solicitor readily pursues it; if it concerns the essence, subversion, destruction, and ruin of the kingdom, or the dishonour of the kingdom, 'Quando Hannibal ad portas,' for the senators then to sit down in their robes, is rather a charge to the commonwealth, than sought else. It is no time then to call a parliament, no well-advised man will think it fit; here are 'pericula visa,' the danger is certain, none will say it is fit to call a parliament.—This kingdom of England hath been four times conquered, and therefore we have reason to foresee the danger; first, by the Romans, then by the Saxons, then by the Danes, and last by the Normans.

The moralists do make three parts of Providence. 1. 'Memoria præteritorum.' 2. 'Percipientia præsentium.' And, 3. 'Providentia futurorum.' It much concerns the king, the head of the commonwealth, to be circumspect in the prevention of public danger; conjectures and probabilities are to be regarded. Now put the case upon a probable and violent presumption; a potent enemy is prepared and ready to come. Is it not fit there should be a defence prepared instantly? Besides, there may be just reason of state, why an enemy is not fit to be revealed in parliament; for if great preparations be, and very probably against us, then to discover them to be an enemy, is to give them occasion to become a challenger. No man can know the certain event of things. One may be a friend, in shew, to the kingdom, or a neuter, not yet openly discovered; yet we may be mistaken in our opinion of them. I leave this to your consideration, whether it be fit, or no, to discover our thoughts, in parliament, of an enemy?

The eighth thing is, That in these cases, of necessity and danger, the king, jure gentium, may charge the subject, without his consent in parliament, by his regal prerogative; for in the king there are two kinds of prerogatives, regale et legale, which concern his person, lands and goods.

Now for the prerogatives royal of a monarch, they may be resembled to a sphere; the primus motor is the king. It is observed, that every planet but one hath a little orb by itself, that moveth in its petty compass: So the center is the commonwealth, the king is the first mover. I will repeat some of these prerogatives, for they are by all laws, and by our laws.—The first regal prerogative is this, that containeth all the rest, That the king may give laws to his subjects: and this doth not detract from him, when he doth it in parliament. 2. To make peace and war, 19 Ed. 4, 6. 3. To create supreme magistrates. 4. That the last appeal be to the king. 5. To pardon offences. 6. To coin money. 7. To have allegiance, fealty, and homage. And, 8. To impose taxes, without common consent in parliament. These are the principal, and there are many more of them, and allowed by law. Comines, fol. 179, saith, 'That if the cloud be seen but afar off, the king, without the consent of the subjects, cannot tax them; but if the cloud be over-head, the king may call certain wise persons to him, and tax his subjects.' You say, That if the king doth move a war offensive, there's time enough to call a parliament; if defensive, the cloud is seen long before. But, oh, good sir! is this always true? Is not the cloud sometimes even over the head, before descried? If you read Comines, he will tell you, That in times of peace we ought to fortify. 'But in these cases, where the danger is imminent,' saith Bodinus, lib. 1, cap. 47, 'the king ought not to expect a parliament, but is to raise monies suddenly, and such impositions laid upon the subjects are just and necessary.' This is the opinion of those writers, who wrote not according to the law of any one kingdom, but according to the law of reason. I could vouch these two authors, concerning the right of sovereignty which they gave to kings, to impose charges on the subjects, without consent of parliament, in time of necessity.

But what if the king will levy money, upon pretence of defence, in time of danger, and dispose of it otherwise, and the danger not so apparent? I say, so pious and just a king will never pretend a danger, if it were not re vera. And if any man will think the king will charge himself and his subjects to no purpose, far be it from my thoughts to think so. This money, thus taxed, is employed accordingly, for the defence of the kingdom, together with the king's own money; which he would not do upon pretence.

Again, the king is pater patriæ, therefore, by the law of nature he is entrusted with the defence of the kingdom: and this power to tax his people, is but a consequence of that.

To say, in time of extraordinary danger and necessity, 'Boni viri sunt sibi leges,' I say, for every man to be his own judge, is for every man to do what he listeth. Mr. Holborne tells you, That if it rests in the king's power thus to tax the subjects, whereas Mr. Hampden is now taxed 20s. he may the next year be taxed at 20l. for, saith he, 'If the king may tax when he will, then he may what he will.' It is an ill consequence you make of it; you magnify parliaments, great reason we have for it; let us do so of kings: let none think dishonourably of kings; no question they will regard the laws of God; and to make such objections, is not handsomely handled.

Now we come to Precedents, and Acts of Parliament. For precedents, my brother Weston hath taken pains to repeat them, therefore I shall not.—Two precedents the defendant's counsel have much relied on, Rot. Parl. 2 Rich. 2, pars 1. I have here the Record; and in truth, it were a great ease to the judges, and to the cause, to avouch them truly. This of Richard 2, was in his minority; and no order being taken for the defence of the kingdom against the next summer, nothing was found in the king's Exchequer: a council was called, and for conclusion, they say, They cannot remedy this mischief without a parliament: whereupon a parliament was called; and in the mean time the king having monies lent him, he gave security to repay it.—Consider this, the king was at this time but an infant; it was in a very troublesome time, many of those that were parliament-men made default to attend, excusing themselves, that they had other business. This then that was done was but a resolution in troublesome times; this is no such binding business, that it should be made so much of.—And Rot. Parl. 2 Hen. 6, m. 22, a commission went forth for the providing of barges; and the commons petitioned to avoid this charge, and prayed that the commission might be repealed. And the king upon this calls in the commission. Shall this be a disclaimer of the king's right? He saith, he will speak with his lords. This is only a satisfactory answer. Besides, the king was but an usurper. Now to say this answer of the king's is a resolution in the case, is a great mistake.—He that will go through this load of precedents that have been vouched on both sides, he had need to have more time than Mr. Holborne, who spent four days.

You have alledged precedents both before the Conquest and since: that of the Danegelt, though it was a heavy yoke, yet it was necessary to be borne: whether it was granted by parliament or no, non constat. I say, it is a good precedent, and I hold it good without parliament.—Some distressed kings, as king John, Henry 2, and Richard 2, they did indeed do that by borrowing, which they might have took of right.

Now, to give an answer to the statutes of 25 Ed. 1, and 14 Ed. 3, and the Petition of Right of 3 Car. Admit, I say, there were an express act, That the king, were the realm in never so much danger, should not have aid from his subjects, but in parliament, it is a void act; will any man say such an act shall bind? This power is as inseparable from the crown, as the pronouncing of war and peace is: such an act is manifestly unreasonable, and not to be suffered; saith Doctor and Student, To follow the words of the law, were, in some cases, injustice, and against the good of the commonwealth; wherefore, in some cases, it is necessary to leave the words of the law, and to follow that which reason and justice requireth: and to that intent equity is ordained, which is no other but an exception of the law of God, or law of reason, from the general rules of the law of man: Which exception is tacitly understood, in every general law. This imposition without parliament appertains to the king originally, and to the successor ipso facto, if he be a sovereign in right of his sovereignty from the crown. You cannot have a king without these roval rights, no, not by act of parliament.

Again, these acts bind not, for that favourable construction, in case of the king, is to be had in all cases, Doctor and Student, fol. 27. It is not possible to make any general rule in law, but it shall fail in some particular case: if a law were made in a city, that no man, under pain of death, should open the gates of the city before sun-rising, yet if the citizens, before that hour, flying before their enemies, came to the gates of the city, and one, for saving the citizens, open the gates before the hour appointed, yet he offendeth not the law, for that case of necessity is excepted from the said general law by equity. So for the statute in Edward the third's time, not to give any relief to a sturdy beggar, upon pain of imprisonment; yet if one relieves him with clothes in the extremity of cold winter, to save his life, he shall be excused by the same statute. By such an exception of the law of reason and equity, as aforesaid, is this power reserved to the king.—Impossibilities are to be excepted out of all laws: 'Nemo tenetur ad impossibilia.' Poverty and impossibilities, as one answered, were more mighty goddesses than either force or love.

But now you will say, where is this danger? How doth this necessity appear? If you would find it, you need not to enquire for it either by sea or land; but in this very record, the writ sheweth, and the most favourable construction is to be had for the king; as in Plowden's Comment. 336, the Case of Mines of gold and copper.—Now all this while I have been in the general, and in a manner in propositions; I come now to application. Before I descend to it, I shall shew upon what part of the record I shall ground myself. Though in the Mittimus it be 'salus regni periclitabatur,' which is said to be metaphorical, for that it asketh no great answer; it is good enough, as in the writ of Oyer and Terminer, 'omnes qui habent damnationem vel salvationem,' are bound to contribute. Will you bind the king to the language of J.S.? May he not express himself in what legal manner he pleaseth?

You say, that this phrase of salus regni is too general: if it be alledged, and you demur upon it, you confess this for the most advantage for the king; as in the Case of Mines. It is not alledged in the Scir' Fac'; this might have been made a good question.—But without all these, I conceive the writ 4 Aug. containeth the causes for this great preparation, and expresseth them in particular. What if it were no more but this, lest we should lose the dominion of the seas? What is it to be called Dominus Maris, and not to maintain it, but to suffer this princely honour to perish, and others to become masters of it? What havoc and confusion would follow? And this is the true intention of the issuing forth of this writ.

Next, 'Consideratis etiam periculis, &c.' that is, the danger is so evident, and so great, in these warlike times, that of necessity defence must be made, both by sea and land.—Next is great oppression used at this time, 'Datum est nobis intelligi quod prædones, &c.' that the pirates do take and spoil our merchants, carry our men into captivity: what will you say to this? Let them take our men, and let us have a parliament, and we will bring them home again: the land was never without thieves, nor the seas without robbers.

Next, 'paratum periculum et preparans, &c.' Now these ships go for the defence of the sea against this danger, 'et vestrum et vestrorum.' The writ saith the whole kingdom is in danger, both by sea and land; and you have confessed this by your demurrer.—But you complain before you are hurt, because you have seven months liberty, a parliament might be called in that time: now in this time of imminent danger, it is no time to call a parliament.

Put the case the danger continueth for three years, and then ceaseth, and then the king ceaseth to lay a charge, and the danger begins again the next year; what! Shall not the king require aid as the danger increaseth?—And now to conclude, without repetition: it doth appear by this record, that the whole kingdom is in danger, both by sea and land, of ruin and destruction, dishonour and oppression; and that the danger is present, imminent and instant, and greater than the king can, without the aid of his subjects, well resist: whether must the king resort to parliaments? No. We see the danger is instant, and admits of no delay. Shall we go home, and sit together in careless security? Not so. But let us resort to our piobis and just king, whose prerogative and right of sovereignty is to defend the realm, and to maintain his subjects liberties. And so I give Judgment for the king.

THE ARGUMENT of Sir ROBERT BERKLEY, Knt. one of the Justices of the Court of King's-bench, Feb. 10, 13 Car. 1637, in the Exchequer-Chamber.

THE CASE.

In Aug. 11, of the king's reign, there issued out of the court of Chancery his majesty's writ, directed to the sheriff of the county of Bucks, and the head officers of villages and buroughs in that county, 'et probis hominibus,' that is, to all the king's good subjects, 'in omnibus villis, burgis, et aliis locis in com' Bucks.'—I may call this writ, a special writ, or a commission upon the case. It is not a sic volo; it beginneth with divers weighty reasons or causes, pro ratone, of the issuing of it; as, 1. His majesty had intelligence that certain pirates, 'et maris grassatores,' as well Mahometans as others, were congregati upon the sea, 'quod ab olim per gentem Anglicanam defendi consuevit;' and did daily rob and spoil the ships and the goods of the subjects of the king, and of his confederates, and did captivate the persons of those whom they took.—2. His majesty did conspicere, that those men did 'navigia indies preparare, ad mercatores ulterius molestandos, et ad regnum gravand' nisi citius remedium ponatur.'—3. His majesty did consider the perils, 'quæ undique illis guerrinis temporibus imminabant, ita quod regi et subditis suis defensionis maris et regni, omni festinatione, quâ poterit, conveniebat accelerare.'—4. His majesty's royal resolution was, 'Defensionis regni, tuitionis maris, securitati subditorum, et salvæ conductioni navium et mercandiarum providere.' 'Maxime pro eo quod' the king and his progenitors 'domini nostri predicti semper hactenus extiterunt, et plurimum tæderet regem, si honor iste regius suis temporibus dispereat, aut in aliquo minueretur.'—5. Lastly, his majesty called to mind a 'Regula juris et rationis; Onus istud defensionis quod omnes tangit, per omnes debet supportari, prout per legem et consuetudinem regni Angliæ fieri consuevit.'

Upon these solid reasons, as upon a firm foundation, the Mandamus of the writ was grounded, and followeth in the next place.

The Mandamus is, 1. That all they to whom the writ is directed, should among them, 'providere unam navem de guerra,' of such a burden, and with so many men, and other particulars, as are mentioned at large in the writ.—2. That this ship, so furnished, be ready at Portsmouth by the first of March then following, and from that time, for 26 weeks, to go with his majesty's and other subjects ships, and to attend the direction of those to whom his majesty should then commit the custody of the seas, for tuition of the sea, and defence of the realm.—3. That all this be performed, 'ad custagium' of themselves 'tam in victualibus quam hominum salariis, et aliis ad guerram necessariis.'

After the Mandamus, an Assignavimus, or commission to the sheriff and the head officers cometh, and then directions to them.

The commission to the sheriff is inter alia, That he shall make an assessment 'secundum facultates cujusque,' for contribution to the expence of the provisions aforesaid, shall appoint collectors, shall levy the money to be assessed (if it be denied) 'per districtiones aliosve modos debitos,' and shall 'carceri mancipare' those who shall be 'contrarii et rebelles.'—The directions to the sheriff begin with a clause of 'Nolumus.' The king forbids that the sheriff shall levy more than is necessary for the expences: that any money levied shall be appropriate to any other use, 'quovis quassito colore:' and then, lastly, in case that more be collected than shall be useful, the king commands that restitution be made of it.

After this bill, 9 Martii 12 of the king (which is above a year after the ship should have been ready at Portsmouth) a writ of Certiorari issued out of the Chancery, directed to the several sheriffs pro tempore of Buckinghamshire.—That Certiorari recites the writ of August 11. And for that the king was informed, that some had not paid the sums assessed upon them, but refused to do the same; the king commands the said sheriffs respectively to certify into the Chancery the names of such refusers, and the sums assessed upon them. The sheriffs accordingly make returns in a schedule annexed to the Certiorari. In one of the schedules there is, inter alia, 'Stoke Mandevile, Mr. John Hampden, 11.'

After this, by writ of Mittimus out of the Chancery, tested in May last, the tenure of the writ of Aug. 11, with these words, 'quod quidem brev' pro eo quod regn' nostr' Angliæ et popul' nost' ejusdem periclitabatur emanari curavimus inter alia brevia ad hujusmodi provisionem, et assessment' faciend' per singulos comitatibus Angliæ,' &c. And also this record of the writ of Certiorari, with the return of it, and schedule annexed, are sent into the court of Exchequer.—By that Mittimus the king commands the lord treasurer and barons, quod in- speculis those records, they should 'facere ultorius inde pro levatione, collectione et receptione' of the sums unpaid, 'prout de jure, et secundum legem et consuetudinem regni Angliæ fuerit faciend' et non aliter.'—By which (prout) but especially by the (non aliter) the king's honour and care of justice are singularly eminent; for the levying the money anew is not commanded, nay, it is forbidden, unless, 'Jus, Lex, et Consuetudo Angliæ.' do warrant it.

After this, and in the same month of May last, the barons awarded a writ of Scir' Fac' into Buckinghamshire, against those whose names are in the schedule aforesaid, thereby commanding the sheriff to warn them to appear in the Eschequer by a day, to shew cause, if they can, why they should not be charged with the payment of the sums of money assessed upon them and unpaid.—The Scir' Fac' is always a judicial writ; and certainly the barons have proceeded very judicially and gravely, in awarding of it. In weighty cases, especially, if they be not of common impression, proceeding lento pede is truly judicial.—Upon that Scir' Fac' Mr. Hampden is returned garnished.—He appearing, and having heard the several writs and records before-mentioned, without taking the common or any other protestation, hath demurred generally.—The words of his demurrer are, That materia contenta in the same records, 'minus sufficiens in lege existit ad ipsum onerandum.'—He doth not say, that materia is minus vera; but, acknowledging the matter contained in the writ to be true, he putteth the cause de bono et malo, upon sufficiency or insufficiency, in point of the law, for charging him.—Mr. Attorney for the king hath joined in demurrer.—Upon this demurrer, one main or grand question, and some other inferior questions, have been started.

Because I have time little enough for the grand question, I will not trouble you with arguing, or so much as singling out the other inferior questions. My brother Weston hath spoken to some of them, I concur with him.

The grand question is shortly this: Whether, as this case is, or in this special case, (as it is upon the pleading) the charges imposed by the king upon his subjects, for provision of shipping, without common consent in parliament, be good in law, yea or no?

This is a question of extraordinary weight, of infinite consequence, the greatest that ever came before judges of ordinary courts of justice.—'Qui ad pauca respicit, facile pronunciat'; but he that will determine in this question, must 'respicere ad multa, etque magna et ardua.'—Upon the debate of this question at the bar; elaborate, learned and strong arguments have been made on either side. And truly, for my part, I have laid the question to my heart. All the arguments which have been made in it, I have been present at, and specially heeded. All the records which have been brought to the judges, on either side, I have read over as seriously as I could. I have likewise considered of the reasons and authorities in law, pertinent to this case. And upon my pains, deliberation and study, I have concluded with myself, and in mine own understanding am satisfied, and think I shall satisfy others, that as this case standeth, upon the records in the pleading, or in this special case; the charge imposed is good in law, and consequently that Judgment ought to be given against Mr. Hampden, quod oneretur.

For my clear delivery and expression of myself, I divide all that I shall say into these four heads.—I. I will state the case, and will settle the proper question of it, as the pleadings are. (The true stating and settling of a case conduceth much to the right answer of it.)—II. I will consider the policy and fundamental rules of the common law, applicable unto that which upon stating the case shall appear to be the proper question.—III. I will consider the acts of parliament, the answer to petitions in parliament, and the several Magna Charta's of the liberties of England, which concern the king's proceeding in this case.—IV. I will answer the material objections, which have been made on the other side.

Upon my First General Head.—I hope that none doth imagine, that it either is, or can be drawn by consequence, to be any part of the question in this case, whether the king may at all times, and upon all occasions, impose charges upon his subjects in general, without common consent in parliament? If that were made the question, it is questionless, That he may not.—The people of the kingdom are subjects, not slaves, freemen, not villains, to be taxed de alto et basso.

Though the king of England hath a monarchical power, and hath 'jura summe majestatis,' and hath an absolute trust settled in his crown and person, for government of his subjects; yet his government is to be 'secundum leges regni.'—It is one of the questions in the 'juramentum regis,' at his coronation, (see the old Magna Charta, fol. 164.) 'Concedis justas leges et consuetudines regni esse tuendas? And the king is to answer, Concedo.—By those laws the subjects are not tenants at the king's will, of what they have.—They have in their lands 'Feodum simplex,' which by Littleton's description is, 'hæreditas legitima, vel pura.—They have in their goods a property, a peculiar interest, a 'meum et tuum.' They have a birthright in the laws of the kingdom. No new laws can be put upon them; none of their laws can be altered or abrogated without common consent in parliament.

Thus much I speak to avoid misapprehensions and misreports upon that which I shall say in this case; not as if there were cause of saying so much upon any thing challenged on the king's side. We have in print his majesty's own most gracious Declaration, that it is his maxim, that the people's liberties strengthen the king's prerogative, and that the king's prerogative is to defend the people's liberties.

Secondly, Though Mr. Hampden's counsel have spent all their powder in citing a multitude of records, beginning with one in king

John's time, and so downwards, to prove, That the king's ministers have paid, that the barons have been by writs commanded sometimes to pay, sometimes to make allowances, out of the king's moneys or dues,—in cases of foreign auxiliary, and voluntary wars: in cases of particular or ordinary defence of the realm, as upon rebellion of subjects, or inroads by enemies, into parts, marches, or maritime; such enemies I mean, as are not greatly formidable, as are apt to run away when they hear of any force coming against them: in cases of setting forth ships, for scouring the seas from petty pirates, so that merchants may have safe passage: in cases where victuals, or other provisions, were taken from particular persons, by way of purveyance, for soldiers, or for the king's army: in cases of borrowing of money by the king's officers, for war, or ordinary or extraordinary defence: in cases of taking money or goods against the owner's consent, by warrant for the king's use, for war, or other manner of defence: in cases where particular men's ships, horses, or armour, were lost in the wars: in cases where private men's houses were used in the king's service: lastly, in cases of general and extraordinary defence, where the king had sufficient aids for that purpose granted to him in parliament. Although I confess it be true, that the king in all these cited cases, must pay of his own, without imposing upon the subject; yet I say that those cases come not close to our case: for every of those cases hath a manifest, particular, and just reason; but none of these reasons are applicable to the case now in question, as is easy to demonstrate, if a man would enter into every of these particulars; which I forbear, for saving of time.—And these records being taken away, the multitude of the vouchers on Mr. Hampden's side will be greatly abated.

Thirdly, The case of the ancient tribute called Danegelt, of which Mr. Hampden's counsel hath spoken, though it come nearer than any of the former mentioned cases, yet it much differs from the charge imposed in our case.

It hath been said on Mr. Hampden's side.

1. That Danegelt was not imposed, but by common assent of parliament. 2. That after it was so imposed, it was released by Edward the Confessor. 3. That it hath been now so long uncollected, that it is scarce known what it was.

To the first I answer, That the proof urged that it was created by parliament, is at the best but a conjecture. It hath been said, that the words of Leges Edw. Confessoris, c. 12, are in one place, 'statutum est Danegeldum annuatim reddi, &c.' and in another place, 'Danegeldi redditio primitus instituta est, &c.' And statutum is a proper word for an act of parliament, a statute. But in my understanding it is apparent, that it had not creation by common assent in parliament, but only by regal authority; or at the most by the king, with his great lords assents, which in those, and after times, was frequent. My reasons are, 1st. In Tilburienensis, or the Black Book of the Exchequer, l. 1, c. 28, the words are express, 'A regibus Anglicis statutum est, &c.' no mention of any others who joined in that statutum. 2dly, It appears by the said Leges Edw. Confess. c. 12, that at the beginning of Danegelt, 'omnis ecclesie libera erat;' the reason given, 'quia magis confidebant ecclesie orationibus, quam armorum defensionibus:' and yet in the addition to the said Leges, it appears that William Rufus imposed that tribute upon the church also, and that without common assent. For the words are, 'Danegeldum concessum est ei a baronibus, non lege statutum neque firmatum;' and certainly those barons by whom it was concessum, were not all the baronage, for it is plain, that the bishops and mired abbots did not consent. 3dly, In that clause where 'statutum est' is used, in Leges Edw. Confess. the Danegelt is said to be 12d. 'ex unaque hida;' and afterwards it doth appear that it was made 4s. by William Rufus, 'ex unaque hida, ecclesie non excepta;' which increase was most unjust, if no more but 12d. was limited by common assent at first.

To the second, I answer, with sir Henry Spelman's distinction, there were two kinds of Danegelt; one, 'ad pacandos Danos;' another, 'ad arcendos Danos,' and other pirates. It may be, that the Confessor released that 'ad pacandos,' for the Danes troubled not this kingdom in his time, they had enough to do then at home, and so there was no cause of collection of any taxes 'ad pacandos Danos;' and though it was de facto exacted by the Danish kings before Edward the Confessor, viz. Canute, Harold Harefoot, and Hardicnute, it was unjustly taken by them, the cause of grant of it ceasing in their time of sovereignty here; and that might be the cause of the Confessor's dream, that he saw the devil dancing upon the money collected in his time for Danegelt: which supposition of a vision occasioned him to release it, as it is written. But certainly the Danegelt 'ad arcendos,' &c. was not released by Edward the confessor: for it appears in Tilburienensis, before cited, that 'Danegeldum sub indigenis regibus solvebatur usque ad tempus Willielmi primi;' if 'sub indigenis regibus,' then under the Confessor.—Again, it appears in Leges H. 1, c. 16, that Danegelt was in that king's time a duty to the king: for the words are, 'Danegeldum si ad terminum non reddatur recta emendetur;' ergo, not released by his predecessor Edward the Confessor. I further find in Ranulphus Cestrensis, that 'Stephanus rex, regnum iniens, Danegeldum, i. e. 2s. ad hidam, quos antecessores sui singulis annis accipiebant, in æternum condonavit;' which 'condonavit' shews that he as a king de facto, had a right to it, ergo, not formerly released. But for the validity of such a release by k. Stephen, a manifest usurper, tending to the diminution of the crown, especially if it were of a tribute granted to the crown by act of parliament, see 9. E. 4. f. 2.

To the third I answer, That it is true, it is obscure what the Danegelt was; you have heard by what has been cited, mention of 1s. 2s. and 4s. to be the sum of it; and truly, I think, it was more or less, according to the occasion of the money for the defence: the tribute 'ad pacandos Danos,' I believe at first was but 12*d.* out of every hide, yet afterwards increased by the three successive kings, Danes themselves, for I find it was at first but about 10,000*l.* per ann. it after was raised to 30,000*l.* then to 40,000*l.* and lastly to near 50,000*l.* which huge sum was in these times a burden insupportable to the people. But however, the uncertainty of the sum, especially if you understand that which was collected, 'ad arcendos Danos,' is a clear proof, that it was not created by act of parliament, for then the sum thereby certain could not be mounted.—All historians do agree, that the original time of Danegelt was in k. Ethelred's reign. I observe, that k. Ethelred shewed himself weak and improvident, in that he looked not to raise means for defence of his realm against the Danes in time; but when the Danes were masters, then he began to provide against them. And for that cause divers of our historians write, that he was called by a nick-name, Ethelred the Unready. But, on the other side, we the subjects of England, who enjoy ourselves and what we have in peace, through his majesty's royal care and providence, have cause to yield to our sovereign k. Charles, the honourable name of Charles the Ready, or Charles the Provident.

But, to return, the differences between the ancient Danegelt and the charge in our case are apparent and many; for the Danegelt was,

1. Annual: ours is due only in case of necessity. 2. It was collected out of hides of land, and thence called Hidge: ours is collected out of personal as well as real estates. 3. It was a tribute of money: ours a provision of shipping and armour in kind. 4. It was against pirates: ours is for common defence of sea and land. 5. It was not general: clergy and clergymen were originally exempt: ours is general, upon all without exception.

Leges the words of the authorities under written, from whence many observations and good conclusions may be drawn touching Danegelt.

Leges Edw. Confess. c. 12. 'Danegeldi reddidit, propter piratas primitus instituta est, patriam enim infestantes vestationi ejus pro posse suo insistebant; ad quorum insolentiam reprimendam statutum est Danegeldum annuatim reddi sc. 12 denarios ex unaquaque hida totius patriæ, ad conducendum eos qui piratarum irruptioni resistendo obviarent. De hoc quoque Danegeldo libera erat omnis ecclesia, quia magis confidebant ecclesiæ orationibus, quam armorum defensionibus.—Hanc libertatem tenuit Anglorum ecclesia, usque ad tempus Willielmi junioris. Danegeldum concessum est ei baronibus, non lege statutum, neque firmatum; sed habuit necessitatis

'causa ex unaquaque hida 4 solidos, ecclesia non excepta.'

The Black Book of the Exchequer, written in king Henry 2's time, in that part which is Tilburiensis's work, or the Magister ad Discipulus, it is lib. c. 28, not, c. 11, as it is misprinted in learned sir Henry Spelman's Glossary.—'Ad Danos arcendos, a regibus Anglicis statutum est, ut de singulis hidis jure quodam perpetuo duo solidi argentei solverentur in usus virorum fortium, qui perlustrantes maritima impetum hostium reprimere.—Qui igitur principaliter pro Danis institutus est hic redditus, Danegeldum dicitur, hic sub indigenis regibus solvebatur usque ad tempora regis Willielmi primi. Ipso namq; regnante, tam Dan' quam cæter' terræ marisq; prædon' hostiles cohibetur incursum. Cum ergo diu solvisset terra, sub ejusdem regis imperio, noluit hoc ut annuatim solveretur, quod fuerat urgente necessitate bellicæ tempestatis exitum, nec tamen omnino propter inopinatos casus dimitti.—Raro igitur temporibus ejus vel successorum ipsius solum est, hoc est cum ab exteris gentibus bella vel opiniones bellorum insurgant.—Verum quocunq; tempore solvatur ab ipso, liberi sunt qui assident ad Scaccarium, ut dicitur, et vicecomites, &c.

Leges H. 1, c. 16. 'Danegeldum, i. e. 12*d.* ex unaquaq; hida per annum, si ad terminum non reddatur, wita emendetur.'

Fourthly, I affirm, with some clearness, under favour, That the charge now demanded is not within the ancient acceptation or signification of the words, Aids, Mises, Prizes, Taxes, or Talliages, which it is to be agreed cannot be exacted by the king, without consent in parliament. Neither is it within the compass of the word Subsidy, which may not be levied, but upon grant of it in parliament. Aids, if you take the word in a general sense, they were of two kinds: 1. Such as were aids and services too, as 'pur faire fitz chevalier, pur file marier.' That kind of aid, common persons, who had seigniories, had right unto, as well as the king. No colour of comprehending this kind of aids, within the word, Aids, pertinent to this question.—To the 2*d* kind of aids, were sums of money from the subject to the king, by way of help, 'ad agendo regis;' as for making of castles, building of bridges, helps for voluntary or auxiliary wars, or for the king to do his pleasure with, and the like.—See Parl. Roll 11 Hen. 4, n. 45, 20,000 marks granted to the king by the name of an Aid, 'ent a fair son pleasure.' And Rot. Parl. 25 Ed. 3, n. 12, where the application of the word Aid to such a purpose, is distinguished from other payment to the king.—Mises were presentations in kind of a benevolence, upon a king's first coming to his crown; such are yielded at this day in Wales, to a prince of Wales.—Prises are taking of part of the subjects goods from them to the king's use, without pay; hence prisage of wines at this day.

'Taxes et Tallages, in Quinzim. B. 9, 34 H. 8, Nota par exposition de ceux del Escheq;

'que tax et tallage n'est auter, mes dismes, quinzin, ou auter subsidie, grant' per parliament. Et le quinzin est des layes, et le disme est de clergie et est d'estre levy de leur terr' et le disme et le quinzin de lais est del biens, sc. decimam partem honorum in civitatibus et burgis, et 15 partem bonorum dcs laics in priam que fuit levy in aucuns temps sur leur biens, viz. del aids sur leur terres que fuit vald troubles, mes ers cest levy, secundum ratum terrarum suarum per verges de ter' et auter quantites, issuit que ore, tout science leur certenty in chun vill et pais par tout le realme mes il est encore levy in aucuns lieux sur lors biens, mes in plusieurs lieux, sur lors ters.—Subsidies quid chun comust, sc. certaine some sur le pound del rat' de terr' ou biens, come app' in les Acts de Parliament de grant del subsidie.'

Fifthly, It cannot be said, that the present case is to be stated so, as unless the charge commanded be obeyed, an assured infallible ruin and subversion of this kingdom will happen, and that instantly. In such a case, 'quid non' is lawful; and happy he who by doing any exploit, can save the ship from sinking, the body from falling.

Sixthly, It is to be observed, That the principal command in the shipping-writ, is not to levy money, it is to provide a ship; which ship being to be provided at the charge of a multitude, in regard the thing cannot be done any manner of way, but by the means of that which is 'mensura rerum,' namely, money, therefore the instructions in the shipping-writ are not only apt, but necessary; that an assessment be made, whereby proportionable sums of money may be collected, for the provision of the thing commanded: And thereupon it may be said, that the sum assessed upon every one, and in our case upon Mr. Hampden, is not a debt termini, but is rather a duty to be performed, as a means conducing to the principal end: The refusal of performance of which duty, is a refusal to obey the principal thing commanded; 'Qui negat medium, destruit finem.' And the principal thing commanded, being of a kind concerning the commonwealth; the king, who is the head, the sovereign of the commonwealth, and who hath as incident to his regal office, power of coercion, is by law to exercise such his power of coercion, to enforce such as refuse to join with others in performance of that which is commanded for the commonwealth.—And this being the true state and way of the proceedings, in the present case; it is apparent, that though the Scir' Fac' against Mr. Hampden be in the king's name, yet it is not to have execution as for the king's money, or as for a debt due to the king from Mr. Hampden: But as is manifest, if the whole contexture of the writ of Scir' Fac' be observed, it is nothing else, but to bring on a declaratory payment. That Mr. Hampden ought onerari to the payment of the 20s. assessed upon him. So that, with his 20s., together with the other money of Buckinghamshire-men, assessed also upon every of them particularly, the ship commanded from the county of Buckingham may be provided.

Seventhly, and lastly, Having declared of what nature our case is not, I come now to tell you what the state of it is. The true state of our question must be made out of the whole record, or pleading of the case, the matter of fact wherein the defendant hath confessed, (as I noted in the beginning.) In the Writ of Aug. 11 Car. and in the Writ of Mitimus, there are causes expressed, of the issuing of the Writ of Aug. 11, or the Shipping-Writ; those causes are several, but not to be severed, all of them are to be laid together into the balance.

1. 'Pirata congregati,' upon the English seas.—2. 'Pirata navigium indies preparantes, ad mercatores ulterius molestandos, et ad regnum gravandum.'—3. 'Pericula' are 'Undique regno Angliae, in his guerrinis temporibus.'—Those 'pericula' do 'imminere regno, nisi citius remedium ponatur;' where the word 'citius' is a comparative word, relative to slow ways of remedy, amongst which parliaments is one.—5. 'Regi et subditis convent, omni qua poterint festinatione accelerare, ad regni defensionem, maris tuitionem, et securitatem subditorum.'

Out of all those positions it appears, That there is in the case real and manifest peril; not 'panicus terror,' fear without cause; 'Tempora' are 'de facto guerrina,' there is 'de facto' 'navium congregatio.'

Again, we must observe, That in this case, 1. The command is, 'ad proficiscendum cum navibus regis.' So the king himself is to join with the subject in the common defence: Here is not a 'quod tibi fieri non vis.' Here is rather a contributio, than a tributio.—2. The ships and arms to be provided are to continue the subjects own in property: The king doth not assume the property of them to himself; he only commands them to be made and used for the common defence. This appears by the words ('ad proficiscendum cum navibus nostris.') So the writ sets a distinction between 'naves nostrae,' (that is, the king's) and the ships to be provided. See the like of this, m. 28 & 29 Ed. 1, Communia, with the King's Remembrancer, for galleys commanded upon the like occasion; and P. 5, E. 2, and P. 13, E. 2, with the King's Remembrancer, 'inter brevia directa baronibus.'—3. The subjects are commanded, in this case, to be at the expences, 'tam in victualibus, quam hominum salariis ad guerram necessariis.' This I shall prove clearly anon, to be consonant to law, and warranted by many precedents, in the like cases.—4. All the counties of the kingdom, that is, all the kingdom in general, is charged, not any spared; the clergy, the king himself, are to join in the provisions.—5. The final end and scope of all this preparation is 'Defensio regni, tutio maris, retentio domini maris, securitas subditorum, salus reipublicae.'

But Mr. Holborne hath objected, That 'salus reipublicae periclitabatur' is not to be taken as part of this case, because it is not in the writ of Aug. 11 Car. but is inserted into the Mittimus, above two years after; and he saith, That Mr. Hampden could not know 11 Car. that at that time 'salus reipublicæ periclitabatur;' and therefore he is not to be blamed for refusing to pay his assessment, which was before the Mittimus, and grounded only upon the writ of Aug. 11 Car.

He further observed, That in the subsequent shipping-writ, that clause is expressly now put out. To this I answer. 1. It is true, that 'salus regni' is not in express terms, or in those identical words in the writ of Aug. 11, but it is expressed in that writ in words equipollent. 2. If it were not contained in that writ in words equipollent, yet it enforces the words in that writ in matter pursuant, or not new, or different from it; and so is out of the rules of departure, wherein if it were, it were a good exception in strictness of pleading. 3. That clause in the Mittimus by way of declaration or signification to the barons, what the reason was, that moved the king to issue the first writ; and the barons are to take notice of it, as well as of the clause in the Mittimus, whereby the king signifieth to them, that he had sent the like writs as that of Aug. 11 to all the counties of England: And this is a declaration of that meaning which the king had in the beginning. By Dowman's Case, Co. 9. after assessment executed, or a fine levied, a declaration may be made, to what use that fine or assessment was.

In a word, the state of our Case is thus; 'Doninium maris, et salus reipublicæ periclitabatur, convenit regi et subditis, omnia que poterint festinatione accelerare ad defensionem regni, tuitionem maris, et securitatem.'

Now whether to set the commonwealth free and in safety from this peril of ruin and destruction, the king may not, of his own royal authority, and without common assent in parliament, impose a charge upon his subjects in general, to provide such shipping, as is necessary, in his royal judgment, to join with his majesty's own ships, and to attend them for such time as his majesty in his royal wisdom shall think fit, and also to enjoin them to be themselves at the expences, 'tam in victualibus quam hominum salariis, et aliis ad guerram necessariis?'

I would be loth to irritate any, differing in opinion from me, with provoking or odious terms; but I cannot more fully express myself, (and so I desire it may be taken as an expression, and not as a comparison) than in saying, That it is a dangerous tenet, a kind of judaizing opinion, to hold, That the weal public must be exposed to peril of utter ruin and subversion, rather than such a charge as this, which may secure the commonwealth, may be imposed by the king upon the subject, without common consent in parliament. So that the security of the commonwealth, for the very subsistence of it, must stay and expect until a parliament provide for it; in which interim of time, it is possible, nay, apparently probable, yea, in a manner to be presumed, that all may be, yea, will be brought to a final period of destruction and desolation.

All know, that the Jews were so strict, that they would not use means for defence of themselves, and their country, upon their Sabbath. Their enemies took the advantage, and ruined their state.

The SECOND General Head.—I now come to my Second general head, wherein I proposed to consider of the fundamental policy, and maxims, and rules of law, for the government of this realm, and of the reasons of law pertinent to our case, which are very many. I will briefly and severally point at those which make impression in me.—1. It is plain, that as originally, even before the Romans time, the frame of this kingdom was a monarchical state, so for divers hundreds of years past, upon the Romans desertion of it, and after the heptarchy ended, it was, and continued, and still continueth monarchical. And our gracious sovereign is a monarch, and the rights of free monarchy appertain unto him; and yet still with this, that he must 'leges ad consuetudines regni servare, et præcipue leges et consuetudines et libertates a glorioso rege Edwardo,' (that is, Edward the Confessor) 'clero populo-que concessas;' as appears in the old Magna Chart. fol. 164, tit. 'juramentum regis quando coronatur.' 2. Where Mr. Holborne supposed a fundamental policy in the creation of the frame of this kingdom, that in case the monarch of England should be inclined to exact from his subjects at his pleasure, he should be restrained, for that he could have nothing from them, but upon a common consent in parliament.

He is utterly mistaken herein.—I agree the parliament to be a most ancient and supreme court, where the king and peers, as judges, are in person, and the whole body of the commons representatively. There peers and commons may, in a fitting way, 'parler leur ment,' and shew the estate of every part of the kingdom; and amongst other things, make known their grievances (if there be any) to their sovereign, and humbly petition him for redress.

But the former fancied policy I utterly deny. The law knows no such king-yoking policy. The law is of it-self an old and trusty servant of the king's; it is his instrument or means which he useth to govern his people by.—I never read nor heard, that Lex was Rex; but it is common and most true, that Rex is Lex, for he is 'lex loquens,' a living, a speaking, an acting law; and because the king is 'lex loquens,' therefore it is said, that 'rex censetur habere omnia jura in scrinio pectoris sui.'

There are two maxims of the law of England, which plainly disprove Mr. Holborne's supposed policy. The first is, 'That the king is a person trusted with the state of the commonwealth.' The second of these maxims is, 'That the king cannot do wrong.' Upon these two maxims, the 'jura summæ majestatis' are grounded, with which none but the king himself (not his high court of parliament without leave) hath to meddle, as, namely, war and peace, value of coin, parliament at pleasure, power to dispense with penal laws, and divers others; amongst which I range these also, of regal power to command provision (in case of necessity) of means from the subjects, to be adjoined to the king's own means for the defence of the commonwealth, for the preservation of the 'salus reip.' Otherwise I do not understand how the king's majesty may be said to have the majestical right, and power of a free monarch.

It is agreed, that the king is, by his regal office, bound to defend his people against foreign enemies; our books are so, F. Na. fol. 118, 'Est a intendre que le roy doit de droit; saver et defendre son realme com' vers le meere, com' vers enemies.'—Juramentum Regis, cited before, 'servabis ecclesiæ Dei, clero, et populo, pacem ex integro secundum vires tuas;' if 'ex integro,' then against all disturbers of the general peace amongst them, most chiefly, in my judgment, against dangerous foreigners.

Bracton and Glanvill, in the front of their books, published, That the king must have arms as well as laws; arms and strength against foreign enemies, laws for doing justice at home. Certainly if he must have these two necessities, he must be enabled with means for them, and that of himself, not dependent 'ex aliorum arbitrio;' for it is 'regula juris, lex est, quando quis aliquid alicui concedit, concedit, et id sine quo res ipsa esse non potest.'

3. Though I have gone already very high, I shall go yet to a higher contemplation of the fundamental policy of our laws: which is this, That the king of mere right ought to have, and the people of mere duty are bound to yield unto the king, supply for the defence of the kingdom.—And when the parliament itself doth grant supply in that case, it is not merely a benevolence of the people, but therein they do an act of justice and duty to the king.—I know the most solemn form of parliament, and of the humble expression of the commons, of their hearty affection, and good will to their king, in tendering to him their bills of subsidies or fifteenths.

Rot. Parl. 9 Hen. 4, n. 7. There is a notable record of the very right of the commons, in the form of grant by parliament of supply to the king: Archbishop Arundel, then Lord Chancellor, in his speech to the houses, took for his theme 'Regem honorificate,' it being then a time of instant necessity.—The commons, in their grievances, complained of the default of safeguard of the sea, towards which they had granted a subsidy before; 'Et pour tant,' (Note this for the reason, it was not spoken simply, as Mr. St. John urges) but 'pur tant que ils ne sont obliges a cel guerre susteyner, mes sont discharg' de re exant;' and they petitioned, That accordingly it would please the king to discharge the commons, but the king did not discharge them, quod nota. After this, the Record goeth, that there was a conference between the king and lords, of the state of the realm, and of the defence of it. And in that conference, the king asking the lords advice, they answered, That a tenth and half a tenth was necessary from the boroughs, and a fifteenth and half from the rest of the people. This conference and advice being reported to the house of commons, the record is, 'Ils fuer grandement disturbe en dis' ceo des'tre en grand derogation de leur liberties.' The disturbance was so great, that the king himself took pains to pacify them. Upon this Record it appears, and I confess, that the commons offering up of the bill of fifteenths, and so of subsidies, to the king in parliament, is a most material form, and serves to make good and happy expressions of love and unity between the head and members, the king and his subjects. But still I say, that it is the king's right to have supply; that supply is a duty, not merely a benevolence from the people, in case of necessary defence of the kingdom.—And this is not my single opinion.

19 H. 6, 64 B. Hody Ch. Baron, 'Le roye est inherite,' that is, hath right of inheritance to have fifteenths in his court of parliament: for the same law which wills that the king defend his people, wills also, that the people grant to him of their goods, in aid of their defence.—Besides, I prove mine opinion, if any man deny it, unanswerably, out of the very writ of summons of parliament: in it, 'Ardua et urgentia negotia, regem statum, et defensionem regni Angliæ et ecclesiæ concernentia,' are mentioned to be the cause of parliament.

Now I pray you observe.—In the writ of summons to the peers of the kingdom, the words are, 'Super dictis negotiis tractaturi verumq; concilii impensuri;' but in the writ to the commons, the words are, 'Ita quod milites pro se et communitate comitatus prædicti, ac dicti civis et burgenses pro se et communitate civitatum et burgorum plenam potestatem habeant' (what to do?) 'ad faciendum et consentiendum his quæ tunc ibidem de communal concilio regni nostri contigerint ordinari super negotiis antedictis.'—So the words are, 'facere et consentire,' to matters agreed on concerning the defence of the kingdom; there are no other matters mentioned in the writ for summons of their representative body: no such words as are in the peers writs are in theirs: yet I cannot say, and so I desire to be concerned, but that according to the Record of 9 Hen. 4, the commons may also humbly offer their advice to the king; they may shew their grievances, and the state of the commons: but it is plain, that the principal duty belonging to the commons is, 'facere et consentire,' otherwise there would have been in their writ, as well as in the peers, 'super dictis negotiis tractaturi, verumque consilium impensuri.'—Upon this I put the case, and argue thus: the kingdom wants present provision, necessary for present defence, to be in readiness; this provision, the case so falling out, must be so speedily made, as that it would be dangerous, in regard of what may happen, to stay for an assent in parliament. Well, in this case there is a duty from the subject, and a necessity that the thing must be done, but the necessary form for the subjects assent in parliament cannot be pursued; I demand what must be done, or what may be done in this case, without breach of law?—Is the duty lost for want of time to observe the form? For my part, I understand not any reason that the duty, in such case, should be lost; but I should agree, that were not this a duty, in termini, which is to come from the subject, in such a case, but only a mere benevolence, then that such benevolence could not by law be exacted without the essential part of it, viz. the subjects assent in parliament.

4. I confess, that by the fundamental law of England, the parliament is 'commune concilium regis et regni,' that it is the greatest, the most honourable and supreme court in the kingdom; that no man ought to think any dishonourable thing of it: yet give me leave to say, that it is but a Concilium; to say so is no dishonour to it: the king may call it, prorogue it, dissolve it, at his pleasure; and whatsoever the king doth therein, is always to be taken for just and necessary.—We must consider, that it is a great body, moves slowly; sudden dispatches cannot be expected in it.—Besides, though the parliament cannot err, parliament-men may de facto: every particular member of the house hath his free voice; some of them may chance to make scruples, where there is no cause; it is possible that some of them may have sinister ends; these things breed delays, so they may disturbances. (I would to God, the late woful experience of this kingdom had not verified these speculations.) Yea, there have been, in former times, censures of parliaments themselves: the good parliament, temp. Ed. 3, 'parliamentum in-doctorum,' temp. Hen. 4, and in the same king's time, if we believe my lord Coke, 11, fo. 113. Brangwit, id est, the White-Crow act. These matters are considerable in such cases as ours is.—Wherein apparently 'Mora trahit periculum,' and to follow the rule, 'Festina lente,' is most dangerous.

5. The point of 'restitutio domini maris' (which is in the case) is not of an ordinary consideration; for, besides the antient inheritance and right which the crown of England hath in it, it is obvious to every judgment, that in the continuance or not continuance of it to the crown, not only the bono esse, but even the esse itself of the commonwealth doth consist; and therefore it behoveth the subjects accelerare to the tuition of it: slowness is an argument of stupidity, or want of that sensibleness of the diminution of that right which every subject ought of right, and hath a concerning reason, to propose to himself.

Notable are the words in the Scotch rolls, 10 Ed. 3, numb. 3. In a writ by the king to a great part of all the kingdom; 'Considerato, quod progenitores nostri reges Angliæ domini maris et transmarini passagii, tunc præteritis

'temporibus extiterunt, et plurimum nos tæderet, si honor noster regius nostris temporibus in aliquo læderetur. Quodque omnes homines de regno pro defensione ejusdem, contra hostium invasiones, tenentur exponere se et sua.'

—The writ wherein these words are, was a command or charge laid upon the subject, without any warrant of parliament for it.—It was a writ directed to all earls, barons, knights, and others, 'ab ore aquæ Thamesis versus partes occidentales,' which included divers inland counties.—It issued upon occasion of David de Bruce's having a great navy afloat, and therewith having entered Jersey and Guernsey. The writ is a command to those to whom it is directed, 'Tantis et tam gravibus periculis imminentibus debite ponderatis,' to treat with the archbishop of Canterbury, and other great men assigned by the king, 'super defensione regni et populi.' The writ concludes thus, 'Scire vos volumus, quod si rebelles aut difficiles fueritis in præmissis in tanto et tam grandi necessitatis articulo,' the king will repute those 'rebelles, aut difficiles, tanquam suos et regni inimicos.'

6. Not to speak of necessity in general, which is of itself a relaxation of laws, and serves for a dispensation, even by the equity of the law itself: in our case there is a necessity in point of government.—I shall put you a case, where an express clause in an act of parliament hath been doomed void, because it was against a matter of necessity in point of government. 2 H. 6, 6, The earl of Northumberland's case. Nota, 28 Ed. 3, and 42 Ed. 3. penal acts were made, that none should exercise the office of sheriff above a year, although that he have a non obstante; that clause of 'although' is void, and a non obstante may be of that non obstante: no reason can be for this, but because it takes a necessary part of government out of the king's hands.

7. 'Salus reipublicæ,' by all laws, is 'suprema lex, et summè necessaria.' It is, where it interposeth, 'lex legis.' It takes away particular interests, before itself give place for that cause.

8 Ed. 4, 36 Hen. 8. Dyer. A bulwark for defence may be built upon another man's ground, 'invito domino.'—No dowry or thirding to a woman of a castle of defence; it may indanger 'salus reipublicæ,' by dividing such a piece.—An alien merchant takes a lease for years, of a house for his trade: this is a good lease, so long as he tradeth, and there is no enmity between his king and ours; but when he ceaseth trading, or if war happen, the king shall have the interest of the lease. The reason, it is possible, that 'salus reipublicæ' may be concerned, if the alien's interest in it should continue.

8. If there were not 'salus reipublicæ' in our case, yet there is in it at least 'bonum publicum' intended. I will put a case, where subjects are bound without their assent, for the 'bonum publicum' sake. 44 Ed. 3, 19. Chamberlain of London's case, Coke 5, f. 63. Inhabitants of a town, without any custom, may make ordinances or by-laws of any thing, pro bono publico; and in such case; those who are absent, and so unconsenting, are bound, the 'bonum publicum' is the cause.

9. Prevention of further general mischief, which may ensue, trencheth, even by construction of law itself, upon other men's rights. For that cause, pulling down a house which is on fire, to save other men's houses, is lawful. Highley's case, Co. 10, 139. One is bound by prescription, to make or repair walls, damms, or such like against waters: this man is not able to do it; a small breach happens, which either must speedily be made up, or a general mischief will happen. In this case by exposition of the statute of sewers, and by an equity out of the statute of laws, grounded upon 'salus pop.' all those who are within the level are to be taxed, and to contribute for present; the ability of him, whose the right of the burden is, non expectata.

10. I find a writ in the register 'de reparatione faciendâ,' which is cited in Bowles's Case, Coke 11, f. 82, b. whereby, if two joint-tenants be of a house, the one shall have a writ of 'de reparatione faciendâ' against the other; and the words of the writ are, 'ad reparationem et sustentationem ejusdem domus tenetur;' where the word 'tenetur' is observable. Every man hath an interest in the commonwealth, but the king's interest is incomparably beyond other men's; therefore the king may, by a like reason of law, call upon his subjects to join in contribution with him, towards the reparation and sustentation of the fabrick of the commonwealth.

11. In the great and common vouchee's case, 13 H. 4, 14, in the debate of this cause of the new-erected office of the measuring of cloths in London, which was brought to parliament; it is a memorable saying of Gascoigne the chief justice, 'The king may charge the people of his realm without special assent of the commons, to a thing which may be profit to the common people.' This saying is cited and allowed in the Case of Monopolies, Coke 11, f. 86, b. and so it is very commonly, upon arguments concerning such questions.

12. I observe, that though the precedents of writs and execution of them, for assessing the subject by the king's command, without warrant of parliament, are very many in several kings reigns; yet there is not any precedent of any civil action brought for any thing done in former ages, upon such commands of the king as is in our case, but only that one of the abbot of Robertsbridge's case, which hath been often cited; and in the pleading thereof it is acknowledged, that the assisting of men's lands and tenements to contribute 'ad custodiam maris' by the king's commands, without tax by consent in parliament, was good in law. And I note, that that case happened and was in agitation, and gave fair cause of demurrer, in an opportune time in demurring, if the law had been otherwise; for it happened at that very time, when the statute De Tallagio non Concedendo was made, or in hampering. If only one action brought heretofore, una hirundo, it were not to be regarded, though it had been against the king's power; but when that one is assertive of the regal power, it is to be respected more than as a single, I mean, as a singularis probatio of it.

Lastly, I observe, that upon grievances, or complaints in parliament, which have been almost infinite, and upon all occasions in former times, no one record hath been, or I think can be cited, that in case when charges have been imposed without common assent, for the necessary defence of the kingdom in an instant article of necessity, any king hath ever answered, or assented, that such charge hath been against the laws or liberties of the subject.—Neither the reclamation of the subject alone on his side, nor the single commanding rescripts of the sovereign alone on his side, are of authority to preserve the law; but if there be a concurrence of king and subject, that is it whereby a judge may ground his resolution.

As for that one of 2 R. 2, which cometh nearest in that kind, but hath not the king's acknowledgment; I note, that it was upon a deliberation, before the charge imposed: and truly I think that if the charge in that case had been first imposed and collected, upon complaint against it afterwards, it would never have been adjudged for unjust. Many things are questioned, and sometimes denied to be lawful before they are done, which facta valent, which being done, are good and valid in law. If a question be made of that which of itself is lawful, the very making the question makes it questionable, and may draw on an opinion that it is not lawful.

Rot. Parl. 4 H. 4, num. 28, et Rot. Parl. 6 H. 4, num. 9, you shall find, that the commons having considered of the wars of Scotland, the rebellion of Wales, the safeguard of the sea, et especialment the defence of the realm, they granted a subsidy, but with protestation that it should not be an example to charge the commons hereafter with any manner of subsidies for the wars of Scotland or Wales, or the safeguard of the sea, or the marines of Calais or Ireland, without consent in parliament. I observe, that there is not a word in this protestation, that the subjects should not be charged without consent in parliament for the defence of the realm, though there were a little before an express mention of it, and that with an especialment. On the other side, there is a cloud of precedents of imbarcking of private men's ships, in case of necessity of defence of the realm, and safeguard of the seas, command of making galleys and ballingers sumptibus propriis.

Arraying and apprelling of soldiers, and victualling and conducting them in this case of necessary defence, 'proprios sumptibus,' of several towns and counties, as well inland as maritime; the express words of the king's commands in such cases, by his writs directed to the respective sheriffs and head officers, are, That they should 'levari facere expensas de comitatibus,' sometimes 'comitatuum,' sometimes 'villarum,' as the case was: wherein note the words, 'levare facere;' and in what manner the sheriffs levies are, viz. assessment by himself; and collection by himself and ministers, I think few are ignorant.—Amongst which kinds of writs, some of 48 Henry 3, are remarkable for these words in them, 'Cumque adhuc necesse sit propter casus fortuitos ad securitatem et defensionem regni, defensionem habere promptum, contra alienigenarum adventum, &c. Inter alia sic Rot. Claus. 48 H. 3, m. 2. A writ to the town of Bedford. So still the pressure is according to the occasion, instant provision raised whereby a promptitude may be, not staying a provision by parliament, which cunctation might be opposite to promptitude. Also the French Roll, 21 Ed. 3, pars 2, m. 9, Co. 11, shews, that whereas a subsidy out of the woolls had been granted to endure for a certain time only, yet the king, 'necessitate compulsus, de consilio prelatorum, magnatum, et aliorum de concilio suo,' (not 'per commune concilium') did ordain 'quod subsidium predictum levetur usque' a further time.

Close Roll, 1 R. 2, m. 18, many writs were directed to the bailiffs of the several towns of Cambridge, Huntingdon, Nottingham, Derby, Lincoln, Gloucester, Worcester, St. Edmundsbury, and Thetford, reciting a former command of the king to these several towns, to provide several ballingers, 'ad castas validiorum et magis divitum hominum' of those towns. Now by those writs the king declared to them, that videbatur to the king and his council, that they who had 10*l.* and upwards in goods, should contribute, and not others; and commands those bailiffs to compel men of that ability to contribute, 'per distinctionem si necesse foret, et aliis viis et modis, quibus melius viderint expedire.'

I spare iterations; I conclude my second general head with my subscription again proved by my judgment, by what I have said before: That when the good and safety of the kingdom in general is concerned, and the whole kingdom in danger, the king may, by writ under the great seal, command all the subjects of the kingdom at their charges to provide and furnish ships for the defence and safeguard of the kingdom, and may by law compel the doing thereof. And that in such case the king is the sole judge of the danger, and when and how the same is to be prevented. And how many more have subscribed to this tenet it is not unknown; the records of the general courts of justice of the kingdom, manifest to such as will look into them.

The THIRD General Head.—I have done with my second general head, and come now to my third; which is, to consider the acts of parliament, answers to petitions in parliament, Magna Charta laws, which concern the king's proceedings in this case.

1. St. Edward's laws have Danegelt mentioned in them; see cap. 12, but not another syllable pertinent to this case, saving that the church and people are free, have liberties and customs belonging to them of right, which is not by any denied.

2. I find that there was a Magna Charta Libertatum Regni made by Henry 1, the Benu-Clerke, in which is this clause, That 'Milites possiderent terras domnicarum suarum quietas ab omnibus geldis' ('guelde' signifieth a sum of money.) And yet amongst the laws of his time, as appearth by Leges Hen. 1, c. 16, this is one which I cited before, 'Danegeldum, i. e. 12*d.* de unaqueque hida per annum, si ad terminum non reddatur wita emendetur' (which signifieth an amerciament.)

3. The Magna Charta of king John, made at Running-mead, hath been cited by Mr. Hampden's counsel, and urged to be an act of parliament; the words inferred out of it are, 'Nullum scutagium vel auxilium capiat in regno nostro, nisi ad corpus nostrum redimendum, et primogenitum filium militem faciendum, et ad primogenitam filiam nostram semel maritandam; et ad hoc non fiat nisi rationabiliter auxilium,' &c.—The words pitched upon are 'nullum auxilium' a general negative; I have touched before the signification of the words, 'Aid, auxilium;' I will answer the words farther anon, together with other statutes, which have as general and further negative words.—Observe, But there is no question but Running-mead Mag. Ch. was no statute, nor ever was taken for one, saving in those parts wherein it and Mag. Ch. of 9 Hen. 3, do concur: to give but one reason, tell me when, after king John's time, were 25 barons appointed, according to that which is contained in Running-mead Magna Charta. If there were any great matter in 'nullum auxilium,' it is observable that those words are not in Magna Charta of 9 H. 3, and that is the Magna Charta which hath the frequent confirmations. In Confirmatio Chartarum 25 Ed. 1, there is mention of that Magna Charta of Henry 3, by name, and none of that king John's Magna Charta. Certainly there were some 'iniqua' in the Magna Charta of king John; the barons did in that king's time 'iniquum petere ut æquum ferrent,' otherwise that Magna Charta would have been also confirmed, as well as his successor Henry 3.—And I pray you note, that after the 'nullum auxilium' there follows on, 'nisi ad corpus nostrum redimendum;' If for that, then certainly much more for the redeeming of the whole body of the commonwealth, which is our case.

4. The Magna Charta of 9 H. 3. which is the often-confirmed Magna Charta, though it allow all the liberties of the subjects then claimed, hath no special words pertinent to our question, which is a matter observable; for charges for the defence of the kingdom commanded by the king out of parliament, were frequent both a and before that time. In it there are only general words of 'habent libertates suas;' out of which words 'suas' I do observe, First, A right of the subject in his liberties, they are 'suæ.' Secondly, Those liberties which the subjects must 'habere,' must be 'sua,' that is, such liberties as are fit for a subject, as are compatible with the relation between a king and a subject. The words are not omnes libertates, all manner of liberties, but 'sua,' that is, liberties proper for them, or such liberties as they are, in good construction, capable of. And indeed 'Quicquid recipitur, ad modum recipientis recipitur.'

14 H. 7, f. 11. The abbot of St. Bartholomew's had a charter from king Henry 2, that he should be as free in his lands, as the king was in his crown; yet these general words pass for no more than a subject is capable of; he must notwithstanding those swelling words, pay fines for alienation without licence, admit the king's valet to a corody, and such like. But in that Magna Charta of 9 Hen. 3, cap. 20, there is this clause, 'Et si nos adduxerimus vel miserimus eum in exercitum, &c.' which proves the king's right, even by that statute, to dispose of the bodies of his subjects for his army. Also cap. 30, there is a clause, that 'omnes mercatores' shall have safe conduct, and liberty 'ad emendum vel vendendum, sine omnibus malis tolnetis, per antiquas et rectas consuetudines, praterquam tempore belli;' which shews, that in 'tempore guerræ mala tolnetia' might be set up, they were not then 'mala tolnetia.' 'Dominus opus habet,' made them 'tolerabilia et toleranda;' in our case, we have 'tempora guerrina.'

5. Confirmatio Chartarum, which was 25 Ed. 1, is the next statute whereof there is any colour for Mr. Hampden; the words thereof are, 'Que pur nul besoigne tielx maners de aydes, mises, ne prises, ne prenderomer fors que de com' assent de tout le realme, saves les anc' aydes et prises dues et acoustomes.' But this statute hath not been stood upon, because of the 'saves les anc' aydes, &c.' That which is saved or excepted is clearly out of the body of the law.

6. But then comes the statute De Tallagio non Concedendo; which of what time it was, non constat. It was between 25 and 34 Ed. 1. I do agree that to be a statute or an act of parliament: The recital in the Petition of Right, 3 Car. binds up my judgment to affirm otherwise. The words of that statute are general, without any saving or exception, 'Nullum tallagium vel auxilium, per nos vel hæredes nostros in regno nostro ponatur seu levetur sine voluntate et assensu archiepiscoporum, episcoporum, comitum, baronum, militum, burgensium et aliorum liberorum communiæ de regno nostro.' These words indeed are general: but for a true and just exposition of them, the occasion of the hard pressing to have that general statute is to be considered. King Ed. 1, had right to dukedoms and earldoms in France, and great wars he had with the French king about them. Great troubles also he had out of Wales and Scotland. He was in Flanders about auxiliary wars against the French king, both at the making of Confirmatio Chartarum, and of Tallagio non Concedendo.

He had a little before, in the 22d of his reign, caused scrutinies to be made throughout the kingdom, to raise moneys for supply of his great and pressing occasions for these wars, which in truth did not immediately concern the defence of his kingdom; for if he would have let those wars alone, he might have had quiet enough for his kingdom of England. Upon the said scrutiny search was made, where and in those treasuries or hands monies were, whereby the king might be furnished; and indeed, the king's ministers took the moneys they found upon the scrutiny as borrowed for the king, though it were against the owner's wills to lend them; And amongst others, for the most part, they lighted upon the treasurers of religious houses, many of which had coffers well stored. The religious men being thereupon oppressed themselves, incensed the great men against the king; and by that means, and the palpableness of the injury, the great lords, especially the then constable and marshal of England, Bohun and Bigott, stood out against the king with a great deal of stiffness; and at last the king being in a streight, and to pacify one extremity with yielding to another, passed the act De Tallagio non Concedendo, without the exception or the saving of the antient aids which was in Confirmatio Chartarum. But it is plain, that these general words were never meant, either on the king's, or on the great lords and other subjects sides, to be absolutely general for all cases: for notwithstanding those words, the aids 'pur faire fitz chevalier et pur file marier,' continued, and so did the king's power to array and send soldiers, 'sumptibus villarum et comitatuum,' into remote parts of the kingdom, out of their proper counties, for the defence of the realm, as appeareth in the continual practice in that king's and his successors times; as, if I had time, I could make good by a long succession of precedents, appearing upon records. See a notable apology or remonstrance publicly made by king Ed. 1, m. 25, enrolled, concerning his proceedings at that time in this business, whereby that is made good, which I have before alledged. But besides this answer, I shall give a further answer to this and the other statutes, when I shall have perused all of them.

7. The next statute urged is 14 Ed. 3, in the second parliament of that year; in which statute there is a recital of a grant in the same parliament, of the ninth part of the goods of the commons for two years; the king willing to provide for the indemnity of the commons, willeth and granteth to the same prelates, &c. (wherein note the word the same) that the said grant which is so chargeable, shall not be another time had in example, nor that they (which must be construed the same prelates, &c.) be from henceforth charged, nor grieved, to make up any aid, or to sustain any charge, if it be not by common assent, and that in parliament: And that all the profits rising of the said aid, and of all wards, marriages, customs and other profits rising out of the realm of England, shall be spent upon the maintenance of the realm, and of the wars in Scotland, and France, and in no place elsewhere, during the said wars.

Note, that the general clause which is urged to be in this statute, cometh in the middle part of the statute, and is coupled with other matter, which was but temporary; and therefore in my judgment that general clause was meant to be but temporary, viz. during the continuance of the wars which were then on foot; and was never meant to be a perpetual discharge for ever of all manner of charges and aids, as appeareth for that, notwithstanding that clause, king Ed. 3, did shortly afterwards, and during all his reign, as frequently charge the subjects for defence of the kingdom, as ever he had done before: He had also his aids 'pur faire fitz chevalier et pur file marier,' after that; which if the words were to be expounded generally and perpetually, neither he nor his successors could have had. And it is worth the observation, that this statute is never mentioned in the Petition of Right, as Tallagio non Concedendo, and 25 Ed. 3, by names are: and yet if this had been a perpetual statute, there was as great reason to have mentioned it as any other statute.

8. The next statute urged is the Petition of Right, 3d of the king's reign.—This petition reciteth the statute De Tallagio non Concedendo, and the statute of 25 Ed. 3, against loans and other things: Then cometh the petition itself, which is an humble prayer to his majesty, by his subjects, that no man hereafter be compelled to make or yield any gift, loan, benevolence, tax, or such like charge, without common consent by act of parliament: And his majesty's gracious answer in parliament is, 'Soit droit fait comme est desire.' After this, his majesty, that knows his own heart and sincere meaning best, in his second speeches to both houses, amongst other things, saith, and that most justly and truly, "That it must needs be conceived that he had granted no new, but only confirmed the antient liberties."

I observe, there is no express clause in any of those statutes which I have before cited, that no charge shall be imposed without common consent, no not for necessary defence of the kingdom: And if such a clause had been offered to have been express, besides that I doubt of what validity it had been, I certainly believe, that neither king Ed. 1, nor king Ed. 3, nor our sovereign, would ever have yielded to so dishonourable and unjust an expression.—But all these several statutes being general, and having no particular expressions, I conceive that according to all rules of law for exposition of statutes, those three statutes, De Tallagio non Concedendo, 25 Ed. 3, and the Petition of Right, must have a reasonable intendment, and that by a common and just equity, for exposition of those three statutes, aids and charges, for so necessary a purpose as the defence of the kingdom; and 'salus reipublicæ' will be clean out of the law, as fully as if they had been precisely excepted: and if other exposition be made according to the letter only, it might truly be said of such a literal exposition, That litera occidit, that laws made for the good of the commonwealth, will prove the bane and ruin of it.

I will give you a taste of some expositions of statutes, with restrictions of the generality of the words of them, though they be general negatives. The cases I could put are very many, but I will cite only a few, and those such as are applicable to the reason of our case.

Dyer 361. The statute of Gloucester saith, That tenants for lives or years, 'nullum facient vastum;' yet a waste, whereby the land leased 'melioratur,' is no waste within that statute.—The statute of Westminster the second saith, That tenant in tail shall not 'per factum, vel feoffamentum,' do any act to the prejudice of his issue: Yet 43 Ed. 3, Octavian Lambert's case is, tenant in tail of lands whereto a stranger hath title of entry; to gain a release of this title, and for defence of his estate, by his deed granteth a rent charge out of the lands intailed; this grant bindeth his issue, so that he shall hold the land charged, notwithstanding the general words of the statute.—There was a statute made 14 Ed. 3. That for every sack of wool carried out of the realm, the merchant shall find surety to bring into the kingdom bullion, that is, silver to the value of 2 marks, and to take for it 2 marks in coin. 36 Ed. 3, an act was made, That whereas the commons had granted a great subsidy out of their wools to the king for three years; the king granted, that after those three years, nothing shall be taken of the commons, but the ancient custom of 1 mark for a sack of wool. And 45 Ed. 3, another act was made, That no imposition or charge shall be put upon wools, others than the subsidy and custom granted to the king, sans parliament.—Upon long debate adjudged, That notwithstanding these two latter general statutes, yet the finding of sureties for bringing in of bullion, enjoined by 14 Ed. 3, was not taken away by either of those two latter statutes. And in that case, besides the former rule of equity put by me for exposition of general statutes, another reason is given, applicable also to our case, namely, That every statute shall be taken the most beneficially for the king.

Pasch. 13 Jac. In the Star-Chamber, whereas the statute of 1 Rich. 3, c. 2, saith, That the subjects shall not be charged, by any charge, executions or impositions, called a Benevolence, nor by such like charge; yet one Mr. Oliver St. John, a Wiltshire gentleman, being brought to the bar, protenus, for writing a letter to the mayor of Marlborough, against a course then holden, for trying what money rich and able men would give unto king James, of their voluntary free will; it was resolved by the whole court of Star-Chamber, with the then chief-justice's advice, that a commission to treat what men would give voluntarily to the king, was not within the statute of 1 R. 3, though the words were general; and Mr. St. John was grievously censured for his inveighing by his letter against the awarding of the commission.

I conclude this matter with an answer by Mr. Solicitor, aptly given to Mr. St. John, who urged this clause out of the laws of king W. 1, c. 55. 'Volumus ut omnes liberi homines regni nostri habeant terras suas, bene et in pace, liberi ab omni exactione injusta et ab omni tallagio, ita quod nihil ab eis capiatur vel exigatur nisi servitium suum liberum, quod de jure nobis facere debent, et prout statutum est et a nobis eis datum et concessum jure hereditario per communi concilium totius regni.'

You see here are general words referring to a general act of parliament; yet afterwards, c. 59, are these words, 'Statuimus ut omnes liberi homines totius regni sint fratres conjurati ad monarchiam nostram et ad regnum nostrum, pro viribus suis et facultatibus, contra inimicos pro posse suo defendendum et viriliter servandum.' This latter clause shews the intention of the act of parliament formerly set down, that notwithstanding the general words of the act, it extendeth not to cases of common defence of the kingdom, or where 'Salus monarchiæ regis' or 'reipublicæ periclitatur.'

I have now done with the general negative statutes, strongly urged; and I think I have exempted the question of our case from the purview or intention of those statutes. But besides those statutes, Mr. Hampden's counsel hath urged some statutes that no soldiers, or men at arms, should be enforced to go out of their proper counties, without wages from the king. I will not let those, because urged, though pertinent in the generality only of the people's liberties, pass unexamined.

The statute of Winchester 13 Edw. 1, c. 6, was cited for that purpose. The words are, 'Every man shall have in his house harness to keep the peace, after the antient assize.' And sheweth what the antient assize was. And then there is a clause for fresh suits after felons, from country to country; and indeed, in case of fresh suit after a felon, none is bound to go out of his county. But as to the point of going without wages out of the counties for defence of the kingdom, not a word in my book in that statute.

Then cometh 1 Ed. 3, c. 5, the second parliament; the words are, the king wills that no man be charged to arm himself, otherwise than he was wont, in the time of former kings of England; and that no man be compelled to go out of his county, but where necessity requireth, and sudden coming of strong enemies into the realm; and then it shall be done as hath been used in times past, for the defence of the realm.—Nota. That before this statute, the use was for men to go in such case, 'propriis sumptibus,' as appeareth by many precedents.

In the same year, 1 Ed. 3, c. 7, the commons complained of commissions to prepare men at arms, and to convey them to the king into Scotland, Gascoine, or elsewhere, at the charge of the shires; and that the king hath not before this time given any wages to the preparers and conveyers, nor soldiers, whereby the commons have been at great charge. To this the king's answer is, The king wills that shall be so done no more.—Nota. But note by the very complaint, that neither the complaint nor answer are applicable to case of necessity, for safeguard of the kingdom.

Then 18 Ed. 3, c. 7, That men of arms chosen to go in the king's service out of England, shall be at the king's wages, from that day that they depart out of the counties where they were chosen, till they return. This statute extendeth not to case of necessary defence. Besides, the provision is against going out of England, which is not in our case.

Then 25 Ed. 3, 8. No man shall be constrained to find men of arms, other than those that hold by such services, if it be not by common assent and grant in parliament.—This extendeth not to defence of the kingdom. Besides, it is a provision for particular men specially required. Likewise it is only against finding the bodies of men of arms. But pressing of soldiers or men of arms, to serve in all manner of wars, hath been always so frequent, both in old, late and modern times, that it were a needless labour to prove that which every man knoweth.

All these statutes of 1, 18, and 25 Ed. 3, are confirmed by parliament, 4 H. 4, c. 13, and yet Rot. Parl. 5 H. 4, numb. 24, (which is observable for the time, being presently after 4 Hen. 4,) it appeareth, that there had been commissions directed to gentlemen of the country for arraying, arming and conducting of soldiers to the coasts of the sea, and elsewhere, in divers counties; and that there were many forfeitures and clauses comprised in those commissions: the observation of which was perilous to the commissioners.—The commission were brought into the commons house, and by them entertained as grievances. The commons upon deliberation, did obliterate certain clauses in those commissions, and prayed the king, that from thenceforth no commissions of arrayage should issue otherwise than was contained in an amended copy, which they humbly offered ready drawn. And that copy was agreed to by the king in parliament, after conference with the judges, and advice with the lords thereupon; and the tenor of the said copy was enrolled. And in the precedent thereof appearing in the Parliament-Roll, and being as for the county of Bucks, fifteen gentlemen of the country are made commissioners: amongst them I find the name of Hampden, I believe an ancestor of Mr. Hampden, the party in our great cause.

But to return; in that commission there is a recital of invasion and burnings, which had been by enemies: and that to resist them if they should again invade, 'ac pro salvatione et defensione regni et ligeorum,' the king assigneth commissioners 'ad araiandum et triandum omnes homines ad arma, et ad armari faciendum omnes illos qui de corpore sunt potentes, qui de suo proprio non habent, unde

'seipos armare possint, viz. quilibet eorum 'juxta statum et facultates suas, et ad distrin- gendum omnes illos qui in terris et bonis sunt 'potentes, et pro debilitate corporis impotentes, 'ad inveniendum armatos pro illis qui non sunt 'habiles,' (where, by the way, I note, that in case of common defence, the people, not the king, are to be at the costs.) And the commission directs further, That the commissioners shall train and divide the soldiers, and shall 'conducere eos tam ad costeram maris, quam 'alia loca, ubi et quoties necesse fuerit,' (here is sending out of the county of Bucks, I am sure) and shall muster them; and that the armed men, shall be armed with their own proper arms, and not with the arms of others, upon pain of forfeiture of them, (note the clause of forfeiture) 'et ad arrestandum et capiendum 'omnes qui fuerint rebelles seu contrarii, et 'prisonæ committendum, ibidem moraturi quo- 'usq; pro eorum punitione aliter duxerimus or- 'dinandum' (here is power of imprisonment.) That the commission commands likewise the commissioners to array themselves, 'et insuper' to make beacons, whereby 'gentes patriæ de ad- 'ventu inimicorum poterint congruis tempo- 'ribus præmunire;' and a further clause, that the commissioners shall 'ducere' the soldiers 'cum periculum advenerit, ad costeram maris 'et alia loca, in defensionem regni et patriæ; 'ita quod pro defectu armationis et ductionis 'damna patriæ non adveniat ullo modo.'—The commission I have taken, and now repeat at large, because offered by the commons themselves in parliament, instantly after the confirma- tion of Edw. the third's laws, 1, 18, and 25 of his reign before-mentioned, and all by the judges advice.

All powers of command imply the duty of obedience. I say no more, but as arms and travelling by land are necessary for the defence of land, so ships and sailing, ordnance and tackling, and the necessaries mentioned in the shipping-writ, are most requisite for defence at sea. And thus I have passed all the acts of parliament cited or pertinent to our case; I confess they are leges ligantes, and I think that in my answers to them, I have not broken the bonds of them, with the which I acknowledge both my conscience as a judge, and my estate as a subject obliged.

The FOURTH General Head.—I come now, in the last place, to my Fourth General Head, which is, to answer the objections made by the counsel on Mr. Hampden's side.—The ob- jections were of three sorts; some grounded upon reasons of law; some upon authorities and inferences upon records; some upon mis- chiefs and inconveniences pretended.

Object. 1.—2 R. 3, f. 10 & 11, was objected; where, upon the distinctions of 'potestas in cu- 'ria, et potestas in camera,' concerning the as- sessing of fines, it is said that 'justiciarii regis 'per eorum discretionem assideb' finem, et non 'dominus rex per se in camera sua, nec aliter 'coram se, nisi per justiciarios suos; et hæc est 'voluntas regis, viz. per justiciarios suos et

'legem suam unum est dicere.' And it was said, that in the present case, the king hath not proceeded 'per justiciarios,' but 'per se' or 'in camera.'

Ans.—I answer, That in our case there is not any thing done in 'Cameta,' the shipping- writ issueth out of the court of Chancery; besides, we are not now in the case of assessing a fine. It is true that, if a presentment, in- dictment, or information, be depending in the king's court, and so far proceeded in, as that judgment of a fine is to be given, this is not to be assessed by the king 'in camera, but by the king's justices 'in curia.' Howsoever, if we go to distinctions, there is 'potentia absoluta,' and 'potestas ordinaria.' I hope none will deny, but that the king hath 'potestatem ab- 'solutam,' in many cases. Stat. Westm. 1. It appears a man may be committed 'per spe- 'ciale præceptum domini regis,' and is not in that caseailable.—20 Hen. 7. The king is Capitalis Justiciarius Angliæ.

I put you the case of Hil. 2 E. 3, p. 6. One having money of the king's wherewith to pay soldiers, misused it, and committed many out- rages in Lancashire; a writ issued to the sher- riff of Lancaster to attach him; being by vir- tue thereof attached, and brought to the King's Bench, he was there discharged: the reason given by Scroope the chief justice was, because the attachment being grounded upon a sugges- tion, was against the law: no such writ ought to have issued, unless there had been some in- dictment, presentment, or information depend- ing. But I doubt not, if the king had by his absolute power made a special precept in his chamber for commitment of this man, he could not have been discharged.—The truth is, the objection upon the distinction of 'curia et ca- 'mera,' is not rightly applied to this case; it might as well have been urged against a com- mission of sewers issued at common law, out of the chancery. The matter is, what the law is concerning the king's power, for provision towards necessary defence.

Object. 2.—It hath been said, that divers payments and promises of payments have been made by the king in all ages, upon occasions of his wars and provisions for the defence of the realm and sea: and many records have been vouched to that purpose.

Ans.—I answer, First, It is true: but more payments have been made by the sub- jects also in the same cases; as will appear, if we go to vie by records: multitudes have, to that purpose, been cited on the king's side. Secondly, In some cases, as of borrowing, pur- veyance, or the like, payment by the king, was of right; but in the cases merely for necessary defence, his payment, or promise of payment, was of courtesy and grace, and is not binding in precedent, no more than in the case of mines royal. It appears by many precedents, cited in the case of mines common, That many sub- jects, owners of land, wherein were mines of silver, shared with the king: some had a twentieth, some a greater, some a lesser part, and this was objected against the king's sole interest, which notwithstanding was adjudged; and the answer made to those records was, That it was of the king's courtesy and grace, not of right: one may do with his own what he pleaseth.—But I will put you at large one of the records, which hath been cited, and let it be considered for whom it maketh. 23 Ed. 1, rot. 77, Ex parte Rememorator' Regis. There writs issued to divers mayors and bailiffs to make galleys, ordained by the king, and 'concilium suum.' It doth not say, 'commune concilium,' to be made 'pro defensione regni et securitate maris;' and in the record there is a clause, 'custom quod ad hoc posueritis, cum illud sciverimus, robis in exitibus ballivæ vestræ allocari faciemus.' But note, that here is a command they shall first lay out the money: and note, that there is this further clause in the same writs, 'Volumus autem quod bordas et meremium, quæ ad hoc competunt, ubicunque ea invenire contigerent, et cujuscunque fuerint in villa prædicta vel extra pro galeis illis faciendis, capiat.' I pray you note that clause, for the express words of Magna Charta are, 'nos non capiemus boscum alicujus ad castra, vel ad alia agenda nostra, sine voluntate ejus cujus boscus fuerit:' and yet it is commanded, that they should take 'boscum alienum' in this case, and I think warrantably; for the words in Magna Charta are, 'ad agenda nostra,' but the making the galleys commanded, was not 'agendum regis' within, but 'agendum regni,' without the meaning of Magna Charta.

Obj. 3.—Disusage, or no precedent for many years of this course now attempted, hath been objected.

Ans.—I answer, as it is said 11 H. 4, 7, et 38, upon that objection against the force of the statute of 14 Ed. 3, about the king's presentations to lapsed churches, that an act of parliament disused may be put in use, and so that law disused may be put in use, especially in the king's case, for 'nullum tempus, &c.'—Also, the thing hath been done, though not this particular way, supplies have been made otherways; sometimes by collection of moneys, and means without warrant of parliament; sometimes by liberal provisions and grants in parliament, in late king's reigns by benevolences, before Richard 3's time, in the manner commanded, and after treated.

Obj. 4.—The several means and incomes, which the crown hath, have been distributed; as that it hath tenures and escuage for wars, customs and tenures for defence at sea, fines in the hanaper for the charge of his justice; and thereupon it hath been said, there is no cause, if these incomes were well employed, to raise moneys through new ways.

Ans.—Utinam those great means and incomes could serve the turn. My brother Weston made a computation what the five ports service cometh to, and thereby it falleth short to be to any purpose. As for escuage, it is attendance out of the realm but for forty days, and that in case of mean tenures, if the tenants proper lords attend the king, for therein every one is to defend his own seignior for that time. Alas! What is that for a kingdom? Besides, are we sure the occasion of defence will press but for forty days? Again, what if the mean lords themselves go not in person?—But since I have occasion of speech of escuage, I must put you in mind of two sorts of escuage, by the law. The first is that before touched, and is commonly called 'forinsecum servitium.' And it is only for Wales, Scotland, and other the king's foreign territories. The second is of another kind, and is applicable to this case, in regard of charging the subjects, without their parliament-consent. It hath not been called for these many ages; but in the Black-Book of Tilburiensis, l. 1, c. 26, you shall find concerning it in these words: 'Fit iuterdum, ut in imminente vel insurgente in regnum hostium machinatione, decernat rex de singulis feodis militum summam aliquam solvi, marcham scilicet vel libram unam, unde militibus stipendia, vel donativa succedant: mavult enim princeps stipendiarios quam domesticos, bellicis apponere casibus. Hæc itaque summa, quæ nomine scutorum solvitur scutagium nuncupatur; ab hac autem quieti sunt ad scaccarium residentes.'

Obj. 5.—This is a general charge; it appears by the Mittimus, that every county in the realm hath the like writs, amongst which many, as this of Bucks, are merely inland counties, they have no places to make ships in, no means to convey their ships (if they could make any) to the sea: they have no mariners, nor tacklings, &c. and so an impossibility, or at least, an improper charge is put upon them: the Cinque-Ports, the maritime towns and counties are furnished, and are aptest to be put to this service.

Ans.—I answer several ways.—The inland counties may provide all those things which they have not of their own, with their money; 'Pecuniæ omnia obediunt, nummus' is 'mensura rerum.' Also there is great reason they should join, by the rule of 'qui sentit commodum, &c.' I am sure if defence be not made, they may 'sentire incommodum.' So by the rule, 'quod omnes tangit, &c.'

11 H. 7, Sir Wm. Herbert's Case.—The reason in law of charging heirs in gavel-kind, and of contribution to charges upon land, equally liable, cometh to this case. Also the whole realm is but one body; the division of it into counties, was by king Alfred. The king may make a county de novo, by taking out of another; may make two counties of one, or one of two, if he please. Then take the whole as one body, the several members center in it; if one member suffer, every member of the same body suffereth with it. But methinks there is more reason to excuse, than to charge the ports and maritime parts; in this case they stand between the enemy and the inland parts, they are the next door to danger; and it is fit they should not be let blood, but should keep it all, to serve themselves and the inlands, and not have means taken from them, whereby they may be disabled.

Besides, I refer myself to the several precedents, single and at large, cited by my brother Weston; by which it appears, that the inland places have heretofore been charged with provisions of galleys, ballingers, &c. for the seas. By the commission of sewers, it appears, that this course agrees with proceedings in like case, by the common law. F. Nat. Register. All who are within the level of an inundation, rich or poor, without respect of persons, are to be proportionably assessed, upon that commission. —P. 15 Ed. 2, rot. 70, in bk. w. The Case of Rippon, in Yorkshire, is notable upon this reason; by it, it appears, that the law was, that all that had salvation by the plaintiffs being hostages to the Scots, were by law compellable to bear their ratable shares, to raise monies for the plaintiffs' ransom.

23 Ed. 1. cl. rot. 1, memb. 4, dors. In a writ to the archbishop of Canterbury, the words and matter are notable also to this point: 'Sicut lex justissima, provida circumspectione sacrorum principum stabilita, hortatur, et statuit ut quod omnes tangit ab omnibus approbetur: sic et innuit evidenter, ut in communibus periculis per remedia provisiva communitur obvietur.' As to the objection out of the Records, 'per remedia provisiva communitur,' that should be by parliament; I think the contrary is apparent out of the writ: for the writ requires the archbishop, with the clergy of his diocese (not province) by their proctors, inasmuch as the king of France, 'Classe maxima et bellatorum copiosa multitudine congregatis, proponens linguam Anglicanam omnino de terra Anglicana delere,' to come, by a short day ensuing, to Westminster, 'tunc ibidem ad tractanda, ordinanda et facienda nobiscum, et cum ceteris prelatiis et aliis incolis regni qualiter sit periculis hujusmodi obvianandum.' Note, here is no mention of 'proceres;' and besides, clergymen have no capacity of knights or burgesses places in parliament, therefore this was not a treaty appointed or intended in parliament; which is further enforced upon the words ('ad tractand', &c. 'nobiscum et ceteris prelatiis et aliis incolis regni'). If a treaty in parliament should have been, it had been readier to have expressed 'in parliament,' or in 'communi concilio,' and not to have used the other improper expression.— Besides, I do not find that any parliament was holden at that time, nor at any time between 21 Ed. 1, and 24 Ed. 1, whatsoever was said by Mr. St. John to the contrary. But if this treaty had been, or were intended to have been in parliament, it is not concluding; for it could not be but in parliament, as hath been urged.

Object. 6.—This way draweth to many ill consequences; for it stirs murmuring and grudging of the people, by reason of the burthens upon them.

Ans.—The consequence would be worse, if the kingdom should be lost, (which I cannot mention without a quod absit) and de malis minimum. Besides, popular grudgings are many, if 'not most times causeless; they are not to hinder doing of right.

Object. 7.—This is to become an annual charge upon the people; there is cause of thinking so, because since 11 Car. we have had every year new shipping-writs.

Ans.—If the necessity continues, the charge must continue. The same reason serves for the continuance as was for the beginning of it. Yet I deny that of itself it may be annual.— 'Cessante causa, cessare debet effectus;' but 'continuante causa, continuandus effectus.' This must be left to his majesty's justice, which God forbid that any should think he will abuse.

Object 8.—It hath been agreed, that if there were 'flagrans bellum,' if we had ('quod absit') 'a Hannibal ad portas,' then this course without provision in parliament, were not against the law. But it hath been said, that we have neither 'flagrans bellum,' nor a Hannibal, in our case.

Ans.—Let us consider what the reason is, why it is not against the law in case of 'flagrans bellum,' or 'Hannibal ad portas.' It can be no other but to avoid a further mischief. The same reason holdeth in our case, wherein there is apparently an 'initium malorum;' and in such times as we now live in, or 'rebus sic stantibus,' no man of understanding, but must acknowledge that security is dangerous.

Object. 9.—Tonnage and Poundage, which was used in former kings' times to be granted by parliament, for a provision of a stock, for those purposes for which the shipping-writ now issueth, is taken de facto by the king's majesty, though it be not yet granted him.

Ans.—Read the words of the statute 1 Jac. et ult. at large. In them observe, 1st. a confession by the commons, That Tonnage and Poundage hath been paid to the kings of England time out of mind: I say, it is so confessed; I do not say, that in truth it was so. 2dly. Observe the word 'towards.' 3dly. A confession that the Tonnage and Poundage are not sufficient for those purposes, for which it was commonly granted. The occasions are now for vaster expences than were requisite at that time; and what Tonnage and Poundage will not now suffice to perform, must be raised some other way. Also it is to be known, for an answer to the objection against the taking of it, as if it were not taken de jure, that Tonnage and Poundage hath been always taken, with a continuando upon the change of a king, before such time as a grant came of it by parliament; upon the demise of the king, the payment or taking it never ceased, or was discontinued, until it came to be due by grant of parliament.

Object. 10.—It appears that a parliament might have been holden; there are about six months between the teste of the shipping-writ, and the 1st of March ensuing.

Ans.—This receiveth an answer in itself; for if the king had been pleased to have called a parliament, to have had provisions granted, and by or before the 1st of March 11 Car. provision had been granted, yet the thing commanded by the shipping-writ in August, to be ready in March, could have but begun in March to have been then prepared, and so a whole year apparently lost; in which time, God knows what might have become of this state.

Object. 11.—But what if the king surmise only, that there is such danger as must be prevented, when in truth there is no such matter?

Ans.—Hath not the king a conscience? The law believeth his affirmation, and for that cause they are not traversable, as appeared by my lord Dyer upon the Ne creas regno. ‘Rex est recordum superexcellens.’ Teste meipso, is his language; it is against the duty of a subject to contest with him. Again, it is a rule of law, ‘Cuilibet in arte sua credendum est;’ it is the king’s proper art, to have intelligence of foreign intentions, to foresee public dangers, to conclude and put in execution what is necessary for the preservation of his estate and people.

Also Mr. Hampden, by his demurrer in this case, hath confessed all the matters in fact, which moved the king to issue this writ, and are mentioned in the writ.

Object. 12.—26 E. 1, Pat. Roll. m. 21, hath been urged: there it appeareth that the king, desirous to amend ‘gravamina populo nomine suo facta,’ sent commissioners to hear and determine what takings had been from the subjects made in the king’s name, but without his warrant; and to punish it presently, and to do right to the parties: but as for that which should be found to have been taken by the king’s warrant; ‘Le roi voit que soit certifie, et il eut ferra tant que ils se tiend’r apais per reason.’

Ans.—Note the distinction in this case between the repayment and satisfaction by the parties for that which was taken without warrant, and the repayment, if it were taken by warrant of the king. For in case that which was taken by colour of the king’s warrant was against the law, it was as tortious to the subject, as that which was taken without the king’s warrant; and in all justice, the subject ought to have been restored to his right, with as much expedition in one case as the other. Also, as hath been already answered, the words are not ‘they shall be paid’ but ‘le roi ferra tant que ils se tiend’r apais per reason;’ that is, as I conceive it, The king will give them a reasonable answer.

Object. 13.—Upon the words ‘requirimus et rogamus,’ in writs to the bailiffs of diverse towns, when they were sent unto to array and send men at the expences of the towns, it hath been urged, ergo the thing required is a matter of good-will, and not of right; in which case it would rather have been a Mandamus, or a Præcipimus, than a Rogamus.

Ans.—Note the Requirimus precedes. Also the word Rogamus signifies as properly a commandment, as a prayer. Linwood. ‘Also the words are, ‘effectuose requirimus et rogamus,’ Also, ‘Cum princeps orat, precibus præcepta colorat.’

But since those writs are urged, let them be read; and it will appear, that in the matter of them, pertinent to this question, they make directly for the king. Eid. for that purpose, Rot. Sco. 12 E. 2, m. 7, dorso, but chiefly Rot. Sco. of the same year, m. 13, dors. In the writ to London there, the king reciting that the Scots ‘fines regni Angliæ cum ingenti armatorum multitudine ingressi,’ had taken the castles of the king, and of his subjects, and did still hold them, and had besieged more castles; and that the king, by the counsel of the prelates, earls, barons, and the peers of the realm, had ordained (not a word of the commons) to be at York such a day, with an army; and they had promised to be there with him ‘sumptibus suis cum toto posse suo; nos considerantes quod pro tanta necessitate, fideles et subditos nostros, ut in præmissis manus apponant adjuvantes decet requirere et rogare, ac de vobis specialiter confidentes, vos effectuose requirimus et rogamus quatenus ad præmissa consterationem debitam habentes,’ they should instantly array 500 footmen, and send them to the king, ‘sumptibus suis.’ Note, All this done without warrant of parliament; and more court-like words, certainly, were of purpose used in such a time as that was, of instant necessity, ‘ad faciendum populum,’ than either needed, or might have been used, if it had been so thought convenient.

Object. 14.—Out of Pas. 26 Ed. 1, rot. 35, Commun’ ex parte Rememoratoris Regis. Reginal Gray being commanded by the king to levy and conduct to the king 1,000 men out of Bromfield and Yale; he, by his letter to the king, answered, that he durst not chuse 1,000 men there, without warrant; and that he would not mewer, that is, move, in those parts without pay.

Ans.—His writing that he durst not, is not to the right, but in his judgment it was not safe, or might be dangerous. Also, he durst not without warrant, it may be, he thought the king’s letter, without his great or privy-seals, no sufficient warrant. Also, it appears in the record, that the king had sent him word before, that the treasurer should ordain payment; but it seems pay came not; and then it is likely soldiers would not stir without money: They commonly cry Guelit, and if they have it not, are apt to disband.

Object. 15.—Repayments commanded by the king ‘ut conscientia regis exoneretur’ ergo, the king could not take of right in these cases.

Ans.—The record is 29 Ed. 1, commun’ ex parte Rememorator’ Regis; there is a command for repayment, ‘Quia pro urgentissimis negotiis et pro utilitate et defensione totius regni;’ the king had received of the abbes and convent of Canonleighe 612*l*, and had promised repayment; note those words; And also, for that the abess had petitioned the king in parliament for repayment. So here was a promise originally for repayment also in this case; a very great sum of money it was which was taken from one single corporation, more than was proportionable for them; and therefore just and conscionable, that repayment should be: this great sum was taken upon a scrutiny, 22 Ed. 1, in places where it was thought that money might be had. And upon that the foresaid sum was borrowed (unwillingly, God knows, as to the lender). of this abess, and of divers other religious. The like scrutiny was made, temp. E. 2, and the like course for repayment, as appears Rot. Parl. 8 E. 2. And indeed, it had been before those times, and so continued, a usual thing, for our kings to look into the treasure of the religious, when they had occasion of money; and sometimes to take their silver-plate, and rich offerings, for supply of instant wants. And the religious would not fail to press upon the king's conscience, until they had restitution.

Object. 16.—12 E. 3, Ro. Alman. m. 22, dors. A letter to the archbishop to move all the people to pray and give alms for the king.

Ans.—I say no more, but will read what the record is itself loquitur. 'Pater, &c. Cum 'populus regni, variis oneribus, tallagijs, et impositionibus hactenus gravetur, quod dolentes 'referimus, sed,' note this but, 'inevitabili necessitate compulsi, de eisdem oneribus ipsum 'relaxare non valemus' so no wrong confessed; necessity excused it, and continuance of a wrong cannot be justified. The king desires the archbishop to move the people, 'ut tantam necessitatem humiliter, benigne, patienter et charitative sustineant:' note those adverbs, especially 'humiliter.' And they would have a good opinion of the king, and would pray and give indulgences, to the end he might prosper in his wars for recovery of his right in France. (Note, 'to the end, &c.')

Object. 17.—Out of the Parl. Roll 13 E. 3, m. 9, & 11. The remembrances of the parliament. One of the points to be considered and proposed by the king, was for course to be taken for a navy at sea, and for recovery of Jersey, which the French then had conquered.

Ans.—In this proposition the words of the king are, 'Et per tant serr' les comons discharges del guard del mere;' by which words it is evident, the king conceived, that the commons were by law charged with the guard of the sea.—It is true, the commons answer, They pray 'in drt. del guard del mere,' that they be not charged to give counsel, it being a thing whereof they have no cognizance; but they give their advice, that they think the barons of the ports should do it, and therein they confess, that the guarding of the land belongs to the commons, 'sans gages demander ou prender.' They could not deny but that the sea must be guarded. They put not the charge of that guard upon the king, but would place it upon the ports. Of what strength or power the ports were in those times, I know not; but in our present age, it is apparent, they are not by many degrees, near able to defend the seas, which must notwithstanding be defended, and that defence can fall upon none but the whole realm.

Object. 18.—Upon the Parl. 15 Pas. 2 R. 2, pars 1, where the speech of Scroope, then chancellor, is set down; he therein declared the cause of the summons of that parliament, whereby it appeareth, that a little before there had been a parliament at Gloucester, and no provision for common defence was there agreed on; that after the departure of that parliament the king had assigned some prelates and lords to be of his continual council, for the year following; the said council treating and having before their eyes, the great mischiefs and perils with which the realm was on all parts environed, and the summer approaching, and no ordinance made in parliament for salvation of the realm, and resistance of the enemies. And the said council durst not take upon themselves alone the ordinance of so perilous and high an act; but it was advised by them, after Christmas to assemble a great council of all the great lords of the realm, prelates and others; and upon a second warning there came well near all the prelates, as well abbots as others, the earls, barons, bannerets, and other sages* of the realm; and then there the great perils and mischiefs to the realm being disclosed, by reason of the great apparent wars by land and sea, whereof no ordinance was provided; and moreover, it being declared before them, by the officers of the king, and treasurers of the war, as to the state of the king, and of the realm, that nothing remained in the treasury for the war; it was said, in the same council, 'Pur conclusion final, que ils ne poient cet mischiefe remedier, sans charger le comon del realme, 'que charge ne puit estre fait ne grant sans 'parliament; et per tant per assent de eux le 'parliament ore este somon' et in le meane 'temps que suffic' army ser' ordeine al mere in 'defence, et salvation del realme et del navie, 'et del coasts del mere a quel costages tous les 'seignors apprompterant volontairement al roy, 'divers grand sommes del money. Et issint 'font bon gents de Loudon, et d'autres vills, as 'quod le roy per assent fuit in dit grand council, aurit envoy pur ce cause. Et ad done 'eux son royall grt. pur repayment.' It hath been said, that the present question is fully answered.

Ans.—I confess that this Record hath a great shew of proof, that though there be an apparent and instant time of danger to the very 'salus reipublicæ,' yet no charge upon the commons may be made, or granted, without parliament. And indeed, this is the strongest proof upon any record, that hath been urged on

* Sages here are sage men, not Judges, as was objected.

Mr. Hampden's side. But I think it will receive an answer with indifferent affections, if these things be observed. 1. That this consultation and drawing in question of the using of means, was before any charge actually imposed: Which now I insist not upon, because I have formerly touched upon it.—2. The king was then in minority, the law was not then clear and settled concerning an infant king's power. You see it was debated, and not resolved, until the time of Ed. 6. Vide the case of the duchy of Lancaster. Plow. Com.—3. The example of Latimer was then fresh; and the lords, it may be, were over-wary, upon his precedent, though it could not parallel with theirs, if they had undertaken, upon so urgent occasions, to have charged the commons, without their consent in parliament.—4. Note the words of the Record, That the lords, appointed counsellors, could not advise or find any means; and it is certain, that no counsellors, none but the king himself, could command so high a matter. The king then was not there; he was at that time scarce out of his nurse's care.—5. The people at that time were wavering, and full of discontent; they had withdrawn themselves from parliament.—Alice Peers had a little before played her pranks; and the young king was not fortunate in his then governing servants.—Lastly, The thing necessary, viz. Security of the kingdom, was done by another way, viz. by lending of money, as in the Record: But put the case it had not been done one way or other, then of necessity the people must have been charged, though without, yea, though against their consent; for the kingdom must not be lost, an ultimum refugium must be found out, rather than so fatal and final a mischief and misery must be endured.

Object. 19.—Rot. Parl. 2 H. 4, n. 22. Concerning barges and ballingers, commanded to be made without assent of parliament. The commons petition saith, That this had not been done 'avant ceux heurs,' and prayed that the commissions might be repealed. The king's answer was, That the commissions should be repealed.

Ans.—It is plain that those commissions, before that time, ceased of themselves; for they were made in Richard 2's time, and died with him. All commissions from the king are but authorities which end with that king from whom they issue. Also note, that the said Henry 4's answer in parliament goeth further, viz. But for the great necessity which the king hath of such vessels for defence of the realm, in case the wars should hold, the king would commune with the lords of this matter, and after shew to the commons for their advice. Which words are notable to this question. It cannot be denied, but this answer to the commons' said petition in parliament is, in effect, a 'Roy soi avisera.'—I note that Rot. Parl. 1, R. 2, m. 52, there is a gratification by the king, in confirming of franchises to those cities and towns, 'que sont ore' (that is, now in this time of parliament) charged with the making of ballingers in defence of the realm. Here in this parliament just occasions were given to the commons to have complained of this charge, with the making of ballingers, charged upon them before the parliament, if it had been a wrong; but they complained not of it, for aught appears; and the king's gratification is no proof that it was as by way of recompence for a wrong; but it is plainly an argument of the king's grace to them, by way of encouragement of them in their services for the commonwealth. The like appears, m. 3, 2, Cheqr. K. Rem. 'inter brevia directa baronibus.'—Also it is to be known, that in all king's times, some matters have been preferred in parliament, from the commons to the king, as grievances, which in themselves have not been wrongs, or against the law: We find in our books, there may be 'damnum absque injuria.'

Object. 20.—Parl. 7 Ed. 4, n. 7. In the beginning of the parliament, the king himself spake to the commons, and, amongst other things, promised the commons, he would live of his own.

Ans.—The king's speech stayeth not there, but goeth further, the words are these: 'I purpose to live of mine own, and not to charge my subjects but in great and urgent causes, concerning more the weal of themselves, and the defence of them and the realm, than mine own pleasures; as heretofore by the commons of this land hath been done, and borne, to my progenitors, in time of need.' Which words are remarkable: not a syllable in them of doing this only by common assent in parliament, but relatively, as heretofore, &c. which how it hath been de facto, you have heard; namely, sometimes in parliament, and sometimes out of parliament.

The last material objection to be answered by my memory, is the authority of Fortescue in his De Laudibus Legum Angliæ, where he saith, cap. 13, 'That the king of England is Rex potè litice regens; and regulariter, to do what he please.' This needs no answer, it is agreed. But he farther saith, cap. 9, That the king may not 'populi substantias proprias subtrahere, reclamantibus eis vel iniuriis'; that he may not 'Tallagia et cætera onera eis imponere ipsis inconsultis'; That he may not 'subjectum populum renitentem onerare impositionibus peregrinis.'—I answer, that 'tis most true 'regulariter, et regula non facit jus, et nulla regula quin fallit.'—Cases of necessity, cases of 'bonum publicum,' cases of 'salus reipublicæ,' are not to be comprised within ordinary rules. I have spoken so much hereof already, that now I will say no more, but conclude, that in cases of necessity, 'pro salute reip.' every subject must (even by rules of law) bestir himself; must contribute his best abilities: must set to both his helping hands.—Rich men must expose their treasures. Able men of body must put on arms. Great counsellors must give their best advice. Women must not be idle. Old men and clergymen (if they have no other powers) must attend their prayers. And Judges must press and enforce the laws upon the subjects to compel them to contribute.

And so I have done at this time: and what I have said, I have spoken to the best of my understanding, and in discharge of my conscience in a case of 'salus reipublicæ.'—And it being high time now for me to give over, I conclude upon all my reasons and authorities cited, That as this case is upon the pleading of it, the charge of 20s. imposed on Mr. Hampden, towards the provision of a ship, commanded by the writ of 4 Aug. 11 Car. regis, is consonant to law, and consequently, that Judgment ought to be given against him, Quod oneretur.

This is a cause of great consequence, and is one of the greatest that ever came in question in this kingdom, and the records are infinite that have been cited on both sides; but by reason of want of health, and disability of body, I have not been able to peruse the records as I intended, and to have prepared myself, in which I am to argue; and therefore I would desire time until this day seven-night, to peruse the records and compare my notes, wherein, as you may see, I have taken great pains, [producing his Notes to the Court] that I may be the better prepared to deliver my opinion in this weighty matter: and then, God willing, I will not fail.

[But it was answered by the Court, That in regard certain days have been peremptorily appointed at first for their Arguments, it could not be altered now, nor could they give him any further time.]

Whereupon he said, 'Seeing I may not have any further time, I must therefore deliver my Opinion in brief, according as I have conceived it in my conscience to be, which is as followeth, viz.

'That the king, pro bono publico, may charge his subjects, for the safety and defence of the kingdom, notwithstanding any act of parliament; and that it is warrantable by Gascoigne, 13 Ed. 4, 14, and moreover, that a statute derogatory from the prerogative doth not bind the king; and the king may dispense with any law in cases of necessity, 2 Hen. 7, 11.—And so concluded for the king.

A few Notes of the ARGUMENT of Sir THOMAS TREVOR, Knt. one of the Barons of his Majesty's Court of Exchequer, in the great Case of SHIP-MONEY.

After he had opened the record he said, the question upon it was, Whether Mr. Hampden should be charged with the 20s. imposed upon him, as this case is? This case, by reason of the weightiness of it, is adjourned from the Exchequer hither to be argued, and the advice of all the judges is required herein; many days have been spent in the arguing of this case, as it well deserves; six days by the defendant, and six days on the king's side.

It is some labour, in a case of this extent, to contract myself, according to my conscience and best knowledge: I shall seriously ponder the weight of this case, and digest it, as by the law is warrantable, and so grounding my judgment accordingly. And the judgment which I shall give, in fine, is, That Mr. Hampden ought to be charged with this 20s. and is to give satisfaction for the same. My lord Coke saith of a short case in his 11th Report, that though it be as short a case as ever was argued, yet the weightiest in any court for consequence: so it may be affirmed of this question, for the sum is but 20s. but the weight thereof is of far greater extent: it concerneth the whole kingdom.

Mr. Hampden hath demurred, and thereby hath granted all matters of fact to be true. The defendant's counsel have taken much pains for their client; and, without flattery, so have the king's counsel.—I acknowledge the laying of a charge upon the people by parliament is a safe way, if time and occasion will permit. Anno 1588, when the Invincible Armada, so termed, came into England, the provident care for the prevention thereof was out of parliament. Alas! it is not parliaments can keep us safe. Was not that detestable Gunpowder Treason, 3 Jac. devised to have been executed in the parliament time? the wisdom of the parliament did not discover this utter ruin and destruction, that had like to have happened to the king and kingdom, and to the overthrow of religion; but it was the great mercy of God that did it.

This kingdom hath been always monarchical: A democratical government was never in this kingdom. In the time of the Britons, 500 years before the birth of our Saviour, when Brute came from Troy into Britain (as one writes) it had a politic and regal government; this is confirmed by the Letter from the Pope to King Lucius. And our king hath as much power and prerogative belonging to him, as any prince in Christendom hath. It is the king's prerogative to appoint the beginning and ending of parliaments. So great a body can move but slowly. A great part of the seven months would be spent, or the parliament ended; and then we were but to begin to rig and trim our ships, to provide powder, shot, cables, &c. many of these, perhaps, to be had in foreign parts; masters and gunners, &c. to be got: ready money must be had for the providing of all these; this will require convenient time before this can be done. What hazard may the kingdom run all this while? what policy is there to make state affairs known to the people? They may thank themselves, they would not make a ship for the service, and then they might have had it for their own use afterwards. When the kingdom is in danger, the king may command a supply for prevention thereof; and who can tell better than the king how to prevent the danger? 'Necessitas non habet legem.' The king then must not forbear. The common law doth regard the common good above particular; as in pontage, murage and paveage.

The provision of shipping hath prevented us from danger hitherto, and I hope it will still. It hath increased the honour of the kingdom. It is known not only to ourselves, but to other princes, that our ships are of far greater burthen, strength, and better furnished, than ever was before. All which redoundeth to the king and kingdom's honour. The ship, called the Sovereign of the Sea, may be termed, the Sovereign of all Ships.

To conclude: the sum assessed for this business, I wish it may be paid by all cheerfully, for it is for a general good, for the safety of the whole kingdom: the subjects are not prejudiced by it, either in their dignities, or properties in their goods: the king's prerogatives protect the peoples liberties, and the subjects liberty the king's prerogative: it is proper for kings to command and subjects to obey. We that are the judges of the kingdom have paid it, and therefore it is fit our opinions concur with our actions in this case. And so my advice is, that Judgment ought to be given that Mr. Hampden ought to be charged with the 20s. assessed on him.

THE ARGUMENT OF SIR GEORGE CROOKE, kt. one of the Justices of his Majesty's Court of King's-Bench at Westminster, in the Exchequer-Chamber, in the great Case of SHIP-MONEY.

This case of Mr. Hampden's stands upon record, and what judgment may be upon this record is the question. I find no party in this case but Mr. Hampden. A Scir' Fac' is brought against him, to shew cause why he should not be charged with the 20s. assessed upon him, towards the finding of a ship. The occasion of that was the writ of 4 Aug. which is the foundation of all; and that is directed to the sheriff of Bucks, as to other sheriffs, to prepare a ship of such a burthen, for the reasons mentioned in the writ, 'Quia prædones, &c.' because the kingdom is infested with pirates, &c. 'Quod datum est nobis intelligi, &c.' for that they do seek to draw men into captivity; and also lest we should lose the dominion of the sea; and for these reasons these writs are sent forth. For the time that they were to continue abroad, it is twenty-six weeks, so long the payment of the men to be at their charge; 'et quos rebelles, &c.' and if any do rebel, that they should be imprisoned. And so the record setteth forth further, that upon this writ a Certiorari went forth, and Mr. Hampden was certified not to have paid it.—Now upon all Mr. Hampden hath demanded Oyer of all the writs, and hath demurred.

I must confess, this cause is a very great cause, and the greatest cause that ever came in question before any judges. And for my own part, I am sorry it should come in question in this place, more requisite it was to have it debated in a public assembly of the whole state; for on the one side, it concerns the king in his prerogative and power royal; and on the other side, the subject, in his lands, goods, and liberty, in all that he hath, besides his life.

For my own part, I am sorry that I am enforced to dissent from my brothers that have argued before me a fitter course it were for me to have argued with them privately, who have argued so learnedly: and well. I have studied all that I could to have concurred with them; but speaking, according to my own heart, (for we are to give judgment upon our oaths) in respect of my reason and conscience, I cannot concur with them; it makes me at a stand with myself, because of the arguments of so many learned men before me, and to suspect my judgment, whether it be erroneous or no. Yet I must set down my own reasons, and upon them leave them to my lords that come after me to judge on.

Judgment is of the Lord; the hearts of men, and also their judgments, are in the hands of God; and when judgment is once past, we have done. For my own part, I know in this case we cannot do so well as we should, but to satisfy ourselves in our consciences and our understandings; and in this case we are to give counsel to the king according to our oaths, whether this charge be legal or not. If legal, the subject ought not to complain: if not legal, then not in the king's power thus to charge the subject.—The king's counsel have maintained this writ to be good; and the judges that have argued, in their judgments have maintained it. Then the king is advised by his judges, Whether this be legal or no? If legal, it is well; if not, then the burden lies upon us. For the king doth nothing but what he is advised.—The case hath been excellently, learnedly, and well argued on both sides; for that which was pressed by counsel on either side, did not much move, for they argue as counsel: and we are to give judgment upon our oaths, on what they have said.

But the judges opinions already delivered do much trouble me. When I have been of counsel, I have argued one way, and have thought myself very clear; when I have come as a judge, and argued, I have thought clear otherwise of the case. I desire to give judgment in this case according to God's direction, and my own conscience, and that is the best. And so I do not doubt but all my brothers have gone according to their conscience, which makes me suspect myself. But every man standeth or falleth to his own master. I desire God to guide me to a true judgment; and though, for the reasons aforesaid, I doubt myself, yet I am not of the same opinion with my brothers: but according to my conscience, I think that Judgment ought to be given for the Defendant; for which my argument shall stand upon these points.

1. I hold that this writ is not allowable by the common law, but is a writ absolutely against the common law. 2. Admit it was good at common law, yet it is against divers statutes. 3. I hold, that no necessity, nor no pretence of danger, can give this cause for the writ: for if the writ be against the common law, no pretence of danger can warrant it. 4. There is no warranty by prerogative of the crown, nor power royal, for this writ. 5. That this writ is the first writ that ever was devised in this kind, and first put in practice, either in inland counties or maritime parts. 6. That there is not any one precedent, nor any one record judicial, or judgment in point of law, for the writ; if not, then I hold it not fit to be maintained.

I come now to the writ itself. 1. I hold the motives of this writ to be insufficient to warrant the same. 2. The commands of the writ are merely against the law; because the commands of the writ are, to charge the subject to find a ship with men, munition, &c. against the words of the common and statute law. 3. If they were, yet the assessments of the writ are not warrantable by the law, and so no assessment: and if no good writ, then the Scir' Fac' will not lie. 4. I come to the Certiorari: and whether it be well-grounded, or no, is the question. And I hold, it doth not well issue, as this case is.

1. For the point of law. We that are judges are bound, according to the law, not according to our own imaginations, both to judge according to the law, and the law of this land, either of the common law or of the statute-law: and I see no book, nor know of any authority that doth maintain this writ; but contrariwise, there are books and authorities in law, that say, this writ ought not to be maintained. It is a rule in Littleton, that 'That which was never done before, cannot now be done.' I say, there cannot be produced an example of the like writ, I mean the writ 4 Aug. 11 Car. that ever went unto the whole kingdom, to make ships, &c. nor unto all the maritime counties, at one time; but it is the first precedent, either for inland counties, or maritime parts; and if no precedent before, then not by the law to be maintained.

2. It is against the common law of the land, which gives a man a freedom and property in his goods and estate, that it cannot be taken from him, but by his consent in specie, as in parliament, or by his particular assent: for the law puts a difference between a freeman and bondman. A bondman's goods may be taken without his consent; but not so of a freeman.

Then thus stands the case, and the question ariseth, Whether this writ to command the subjects in any inland county, to prepare a ship, and provide men, munition, &c. went out by their consent? And whether allowable or no, if without their consent, for this is a charge upon the subject. And I say, no common charge upon the subject ought to be but by a common consent, or in a parliamentary course. Mr. Lambert saith, that in the Conqueror's time the king could charge the subject with no unjust taxation, nor tallage, 'sed per commune

'concilium.' And that was a law not given by the Conqueror, but allowed by him, as to be the law of the kingdom.

In the Charta in king John's time, it is plain, the liberty of the subject is there confirmed; 'Nullum scutagium, nullum auxilium nisi per commune concilium.' It appeareth plainly by the books, that this cannot be done but by consent in parliament. Fortescue chief justice setteth down what the law of England is in that kind, as instructions for the young prince. Saith he, 'The king governeth his people by power, not only royal but also politic.' If this power over them were royal only, then he might change the laws of his realm, and charge his subjects with tallage, and other burdens, without their consent. Thus the king can change no laws, nor yet charge them with strange impositions against their wills. He setteth down, as the head is the chief of the body, so the king is the head of his people: He cannot take any thing from them, without their ordinary consent; the common consent it is in parliament. Cap. 3, an express clause there, hoc individuo. Shew me any book of law against this, that the king shall take no man's goods, but he shall pay for it, though it be for his own provision; or lay any burden upon his subjects, but he must do it by their consent in parliament. If this be the privilege of the subject, then it is express, the subjects ought not to have this charge imposed upon them, but by their common consent. Though it be said, a statute is the act of the king, the lords and the commons only give their consents; I say, it is the act and grant of the commons, as well as of the lords; for what consent is given there, is given by every man of the kingdom, by the power of the voice which they gave in choosing the knights of the shires and burgesses. There is a book case 13 Hen. 4, fol. 14, expressly, That no man shall be charged without his consent in parliament. Gascoigne, chief justice, gave it as a rule. Coke's Reports, Clark's case, No man to be charged in Sr. Albans, but with their consent.—In the Chamberlain of London's case, to put a small sum upon a merchandize, &c. when it is for the good and benefit of the people, is a thing to be allowed through a common ordinance to be good, so they have no loss by it; as in case of murage, pontage, pavage, and tolls of markets: Taxes upon the people for these are allowed, because they are matters for use of the people, and are not as a matter of charge imposed upon the people.

Fitz. Herb. Na. Br. The king hath the government of the whole kingdom, both in time of war and peace. None will deny but that he may command, that no man can doubt of; and therefore in that kind, in point of inundation, the king, by his writ, commandeth, That that shall be stopped, and be done by those that have benefit or loss by the inundation; and those only are to be charged, as come unto Kent: If an inundation be in Kent marshes, shall the county of Middlesex be charged therewith? No; but those that have profit by it, or have loss by it. Vid. the 10th Report.

Then here standeth the case; if that be so, the question is not now, Whether a common charge may be levied upon the subject, without consent: No question but a common charge may, if occasion, and every man ought to obey it.

But the question is, Whether, upon the allegations in this writ, there shall be a charge to impose money upon them in the mean time, without their assent? I say not, but by a parliamentary course: in that kind the common law doth not allow it. A notable case in 14 E. 2, Banc. R. rot. 60. Heb and Lever's case in Durham. An action of trespass was brought against Lever for taking away the chest of Heb's, with goods and money in it, he pleaded not guilty; the jury gave a special verdict, That the defendant took the money; but it was upon this occasion: The Scots had invaded Durham, and burnt divers houses about Durham; upon which the inhabitants of Durham assembled together to consult about their defence; and took an oath to obey the ordinance to be made by consent amongst them; whereof the plaintiff was one that swore, and gave his consent. Whereupon they made an order to give the Scots a sum of money to depart, but they would not be gone without ready money; whereupon they made a second ordinance, That every man's house should be searched, and where they found money, to take it: Thereupon the defendant took the money out of the plaintiff's house. The judges asked the jury, if this last order was done with the plaintiff's consent. They said it was done by reason of the occasion. Thereupon judgment was given for the plaintiff: That because it was not with his consent, that therefore they ought not to be charged. It came into the King's Bench, and they seeing of this special verdict, the judges of the King's Bench reversed the judgment; for why? What was done, was done by his own consent and proper act, because of his consent upon his oath; and therefore (said the judges) he had means to help himself against the commonality of Durham, and they to pay him again to his proportionable part. This proveth, That no man ought to part with his goods, but with his consent.

That of Rich. 2, which is not a statute, yet doth shew, that the law was at that time, as it is the same at this day. Advice was taken in a great assembly how to charge the commons: And it was answered, That they could not be charged, but by common consent in parliament. And it was the declaration of Scroope in the parliament-house, That without consent in parliament, the commons ought not to be charged; because the commons have a consent in parting with their goods. It is said in Doctor and Student, That the subject hath such a property in his goods, that no man shall meddle with them, but by his consent; which is the reason they recover damages when they meddle with their goods, not by their consent.

Another reason why the common law looketh into it is, because of the inconveniences that might insue, if this should be allowed. To charge one ship, by the same reason there might be ten ships charged. We have a pious king, and though he will not do it, yet the law looketh into this inconvenience. That of Danegelt began in the year 991. The first composition was 10,000*l*; the second 16,000*l*; the next 24,000*l*; the next 36,000*l*; and in 10 or 11 years, by five several risings, it came to 48,000*l*. And so, for aught that I do know, this may come to forty hundred thousand pounds. Therefore the law looketh to make certain the charges. The first double subsidy that ever was, was 31 Eliz. and the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, it did make his heart to quake to move for a double subsidy, one subsidy being granted so lately. The reason of it was, because the Spanish invasion was foreseen.—After the Spanish invasion was past, then came the second grant of a double subsidy; and he said, he hoped not to live to see a subsidy granted again. 33 and 39 Eliz. it came to three subsidies, and four subsidies, but if there had been ten subsidies, what was done, was done by parliament; and the law alloweth it because of the greater inconvenience. Then it is in the judgment of the parliament for the appointing of those subsidies, as the occasion requires.

The statutes of Tonnage and Poundage, as appears by all the statutes made in Rich. 2, and continued till Hen. 4, 5, 6, 7, and so downwards to king James's time, are to the end the king might have money in his coffers for the defence of the realm, and for the safe-guard of the sea, that he might not, upon a sudden occasion, be unprovided; because it is reason and fitting that kings should ever have money ready against any occasion. But now it is not granted, yet it is taken, the same profit is made still; and I do not doubt but the king doth employ it for the defence of the kingdom, and safeguard of the sea. The difference between a charge and defence is much; for the first there is no law to compel the subject unto it, but by parliament: for the second, which is the defence, every man's person is bound in defence, 'exponere se et vitam ipsam,' upon peril thereof; but he is not bound to any charge without his consent. So in this kind I hold, as the law standeth, that no charge ought to be imposed, but by their common consent; for you will make it all one to take away the property of the goods, which you do quodam modo, though not in specie. Power is given to distrain the goods, and to sell them; and every man is liable to the discretion of the sheriff.

But admit this charge might be imposed by the common law, yet I do conceive it is prohibited by the statute; for I hold, as now my brethren the judges have held, that the statute De Tallagio non Concedendo, is a statute, notwithstanding what hath been argued at the bar to the contrary. It is apparent in our printed books; and in one of our books, the express time is mentioned when it should be made, viz. 25 Ed. 1, then it is said to begin. Tallage is an ancient aid, and so is, 'pur file marier,' and 'pur faire fitz chevalier;' but no tallage without a common consent in parliament; so I agree with my brothers, that it is a statute.

Next this statute of 25 Ed. 1, which is said to be no statute, the kingdom of England hath ever held it for a buckler for them, that no charge (without common consent) should be laid upon them. And the reason wherefore this statute was made, was in respect of the great taxes imposed on the subject without consent, in time of war.

The next statute is 14 Ed. 3, cap. 1. A great subsidy was then granted. What was then done? The king doth grant for him and his heirs not to put them to any charge hereafter, unless it be by common consent in parliament.—Oh! but this is but for that king himself alone!—I answer, it is perpetual. If the king doth grant for him and his heirs, it doth go to all his posterity, and is a good act of parliament; so that is the second act of parliament in the negative, that no charge shall be laid on the subject, but by common consent in parliament.

That which is stood upon by my brothers, is 21 Ed. 3. That statute was made to grant a subsidy upon every sack of wool; and also taxes upon merchants goods transported, 6*d.* in the pound. This statute thus made, the king afterwards, because few of the sacks of wool were carried over before Michaelmas, sent forth a proclamation, that 6*d.* in the pound should continue till Easter, and no longer: but half a year after this was complained of to the king, and the king (by proclamation out of parliament) did take away the 6*d.* in the pound. 23 Ed. 3, in the February then next following, an express act of parliament (this subsidy so granted) to continue till Michaelmas, and by proclamation to continue till Easter.—They confirm all till Easter, and no further continuance of it to be.—By this appeareth, that for so small a thing as 6*d.* in the pound for such a time as from Michaelmas to Easter, that it was a charge not to be borne but by consent in parliament.

4 Hen. 4, m. 28. A subsidy granted, that this should not be drawn into example to charge the people, but by common consent, and that in parliament.—13 Hen. 4, m. 10. There it is said, where a subsidy is granted, it shall not be granted henceforward for defence of the kingdom, or safeguard of the sea, but in parliament.—Then came a parliament. What did they complain of? The patent of the office of Alnerage, though it was but a small charge, yet they set down that this was contrary to the law, that no taxes, nor no aid should be imposed on the people, without consent in parliament: the commons were then very zealous in small matters.

2 Hen. 4, m. 22. Hoc individuo. At that time a commission went forth to divers towns in the kingdom, to provide, &c. When there came a parliament, 2 Hen. 4, they complain of those commissions that enforced them to do that which by the law they ought not to do; and prayed those commissions might be repealed: the answer is absolute, 'Let it be done.' 'Soit fait.'

The next is 1 Ric. 3. True, the king was an usurper. Benevolences were granted; but that was no charge, as ours is, and therein the commons claimed their liberties.—Lastly; the concluding law is that of 3 Car. the Petition of Right, that no person shall be taxed without consent of parliament: and when the king was informed of the former statutes how they were; thereupon this statute 3 Car. was made, which reciteth the statute De Tallagio, and divers other statutes; and it was referred to my lords the judges (most whereof are here) whether this law doth give more than formerly from the king. And we were all of opinion, that this law did give no more than what was formerly, and was only but a reviving of the ancient privileges of the subject; it added no more, but only revived what was formerly granted.

I do conclude, that no charge can be imposed upon the commons, without their consent in parliament. We that are judges, must go according to the intention and meaning of those laws. The meaning of the laws in this kind was, that no manner of charge, aid, or tax should be laid upon the subject, but by consent in parliament. The judges are to expound them according to their intention. But they say, the practice hath been otherwise. We say not now what de facto, but what de jure was done; and we, as judges, must not allow de facto, 'sed quid de jure factum fuerit.'

To answer the great objection, it is for the defence of the kingdom: here is such a necessity and danger, as will not admit the delay of a parliament.—I hold, for my part, that no necessity nor danger can allow a charge, which is a breach of the laws. I hold it absolutely, that for a general charge of money upon the people, it cannot be upon any pretence of danger or necessity. Mens persons may be used in the case of necessity or danger; for every man is bound to defend the kingdom, but no necessity can procure this charge without a parliament. The law provideth a remedy, in case of necessity and danger; for then the king may command his subjects, without parliament, to defend the kingdom. How? By all men of arms whatsoever, for the land; and by all ships whatsoever, for the sea, which he may take from all parts of the kingdom and join them with his own navy; which hath been the practice of all former kings: in their necessity they have taken ships from all parts of the kingdom. 10 Ed. 3, m. 2, Scot. 10 Ed. 3, m. 16, when there was a great navy of Scots and French appeared, and intended to come and invade the kingdom, the king appointed two admirals, one towards the North, the other towards the West, and to meet together at what place he pleased; and m. 16, sent into North-Wales and South-Wales to maintain one ship, either of them.

upon their own coasts of the sea, for the defence of the kingdom. And in Rot. Alm. 12 Ed. 3, writs went for the arresting of ships in all parts of the kingdom. Rot. Viag. 1 H. 4, m. 12, writs issued to all archbishops and bishops, shewing imminent danger, that they should be ready in arms, to come and assist 'ad custodiendum mare,' whithersoever he should appoint them. But in that time, when the danger was such, yet no ships appointed to be prepared throughout the land. And 5 Hen. 4, that all the men of all parts should come together in such a place: this was only an arraying of men to be in readiness. 3 H. 5, to the same purpose. And 1 Hen. 7, which was much stood upon, of a rumour of wars between the king of the Romans and the French king, which might, perhaps, in the end tend to an invasion of this kingdom, there was an arraying of men, from 16 to 60, and gathering of ships, and taking order for watch and ward upon the sea-coasts, but no command to make ships. 4 Hen. 8, pars 2, there the king by proclamation saith, that 'the enemy is ready to enter, ships are furnished with men of war to invade the kingdom.' What then? What was done then? It is no more, but that every county in England have men in readiness to assist, from 16 to 60, to defend the kingdom, and to have good watches and wards upon the sea-coasts.

But, I pray you, in all these times of Hen. 8, Hen. 7, Hen. 5, Hen. 4, were there ever any writs went forth for ships into any county? It doth not appear that any county was to prepare or make any ships; but only men in arms: so the law makes provision, in time of danger, by help of their persons, and with ships, not with a pecuniary charge; for that cannot hold for any, nor can be done without parliament. And if new ships must be made, it must be made by parliament. If so be the writs be to make ships, then let the sheriffs make them, and shew for their discharge upon record, that they are made and prepared. But to appoint by writs ships to be made, and by their directions appoint the sheriffs to levy money to pay off some of the ships, was never yet done, this being a precedent of the first impression. The law did always account the parliament able to provide and to give sufficient aid, and most fit to consult de arduis regni; and there is a consent of and grant of the commons to what is done, they are actors in it.

By the old law of Alfred, parliaments were to be held twice a year; and by express statute made 4 Edw. 3, 14, an express law was made, that every year a parliament should be held, especially if need required. And by another statute, for avoiding of grievances that daily happened, a parliament should be held once a year. Then it is to be conceived, a parliament may be called, and things may be charged that way.—And for the objection, that a parliament is not the speediest way to prevent the danger; the imagination of man cannot invent a danger, but course may be taken for defence, till a parliament be had. So, for my part, I hold this point of necessity, or danger, cannot be held a sufficient ground for this writ.

The next thing is this; yet, but this is maintained by prerogative and royal power. I say for that, by my oath I am bound to maintain all the true prerogatives of the king; and we that are servants to the king must maintain his prerogatives, and, to the best of our skill, not suffer them to be diminished. But I hold there is no such prerogative in this kind.

The prerogative is, that which the law presumeth, 'That the king can do no wrong,' and so it is in Bracton, 'Rex potest facere quod de jure potest facere.' 11 Rep. Magdalen-College Case, 246. Plowden's Comment. The king can do no wrong, nor any act to wrong the subject. Bracton, 'Hoc non potest agere quod non potest agere juste.' Therefore if this charge be against the law, so much to the prejudice of the subjects, as I conceive it to be, the king will never do it; for it is done by misinformation that it hath been usually done, and may be justly done. 21 Edw. 3, a patent is made, which is a wrong to the subject: the king, de jure regis, ought to revoke the patent; for the law hath that honourable conceit of the king, 'That he can do no wrong.' A king, therefore, to have a royal power or prerogative to do that by his writs, to command any thing to be done that is against the express laws of the kingdom, to the infringing of the liberties of his subjects, is not admitted by the law: the royal power is to be taken away; for as it is before said by Fortescue, he can change no law, nor charge his people, but by common consent in parliament. So, for my part, I hold that this same charge upon the subjects, by his royal authority, it is not allowable.

The king, we know, is a most just and pious king, that he will do nothing against his laws; if he did know it to be against law, he would never desire it. When a judge of the land was called in question, in queen Elizabeth's time, about denying some bias, delivering his opinion against the same, he said, it was against his oath, and against the law, to advise her majesty to it. With which she rested satisfied. If the judges say, by law the king may do this, he may do it: if they say no, but by act of parliament, he will never do it.—But it is said, the king taketh the course, 'more majorem.' There is not any precedent especially maintained, by any judicial record, that warranteth this course: and if there were any precedents, we are to judge according to the law, and not according to precedents; not to judge what hath been done, but what of right hath been done. 11 Rep. Magdalen-College Case, though there be many precedents, that maintaineth not a right; the question is still, Whether a right or not?

But admit that precedents could make it to be lawful, yet I hold there is not any one precedent to maintain this case.

For, first, I say there is no one precedent goeth to inland counties all over England, before now. I say, to maritime counties to prepare, as my brother Berkley confessed, that he knew none for any inland counties, but 1 Ric. 2, 11, 52, their writs went out to divers inland towns, but not to counties, to make ships; and besides these, were not any to inland counties.—To this I say, those writs that went out at that time were done by conveyance in parliament: for an order was made in parliament, that all that had any charters, the ancient cities, boroughs, and towns, that had any charters of liberties, should there be examined; and appoints how, and by whom; and have their liberties confirmed without fine, if they would produce ships for the defence of the kingdom. But yet in this record not one inland county or maritime county is charged, nor no inland town, but those that would have their liberties confirmed.

Now to look upon the precedents of king John's time, 6 Joh. 9 Joh. 14 Joh. &c. here be the six precedents in court; and I have looked into every precedent on the king's side, to satisfy myself; and all those precedents are only for arresting of ships, that they should not go forth of the realm; and 15 Johan. all ships to be ready as the king shall have occasion.—Then we come to Hen. 3d's time: 13 Hen. 3, m. 5, 13, &c. there are six of these records, I have read them all; they are no more, but only to port-towns, to arrest ships, and the rest to have men at arms, in readiness upon the sea-coasts, add that but for forty days.

Then for the precedents of Edw. 1's time, all of them being examined, not any one of them go to the counties. 13 Ed. 1, 77, divers ships are appointed to be made, but it is ad sumptum regis, and only unto sea-towns; the record shews, that by the barons of the exchequer they have an allowance for it. 23 Ed. 1, m. 5, same roll, a writ to the sheriff of Norfolk, to compel them to maintain their sea-coasts. 14 Ed. 1, a writ 'ad congregandas centum 'naves paratas,' and armed men to be put in them. So to command in that kind the king may, and we must obey; he commands ships ready made, not to make them. Afterwards, 14 Ed. 1, rot. 17, several writs to the archbishops and bishops, to attend with their arms in readiness, to maintain the coasts. 14 Ed. 1, rot. 78, a writ to the county of Berks, a thing much stood on; it is only for matter of array, if it be well looked into, and no matter of making or finding of ships; and divers other writs in this king's reign, for maintaining of armies in their proper counties: and no man can deny but that every man in his proper county is to go to defend the kingdom. And also for having of all ships of above 40 tons in readiness: but to make new ones, in any inland county, is not warranted by any precedent, that I can see; though I have looked over all the records that have been brought unto me; no, not in maritime counties, to make ships.

For the precedents of Ed. 2's time, 9 Ed. 2, &c. to put them all together, they are only to congregate ships to be in readiness, but not to make new ships.—To come to Ed. 3's time. 7

Ed. 3, m. 9, command is to assist the admiral with their ships, as occasion shall require. 10 Ed. 3, 11, a precept to port-towns only, to bring their ships to Portsmouth, for 13 weeks, furnished with victuals, &c. 2 Ed. 3, 16, not to depart without licence. 10 Ed. 3, 12 Ed. 3, Rot. Alm. writs only to port-towns, 'ad custodiend' mare.' 12 Ed. 3, m. 12, a command to Henry Hussey, &c. 'ad congregand. ho- mines,' and to attend on the sea-coasts. But these were the causes of making the law, 14 Ed. 3, that there should be no further charge laid on the subject: so that all before that statute do not prove our case. 15 Ed. 3, a custody of the ports commanded, and warrants to arrest ships. 16 Ed. 3, command to the earl of Dover, &c. to prepare ships against an enemy that intends to come to subvert the kingdom, and to set up beacons; which is the first original of beacons that I observe. All these precedents in Ed. 3's time, were but to keep men and ships in readiness, and to bring them to the sea-coasts. 46 Ed. 3, m. 3, that the French made great preparation, whereupon they are commanded all to array, both clergy and laity, to guard the sea-coasts. And in those times, when there was more likelihood of danger than now, no writs came out then, but only to array men, and keep them in readiness. 50 Ed. 3, to array men in Norfolk to defend the coasts. 29 Ed. 3, command to the bishop of Durham, and into Cumberland and Northumberland, to have their men in readiness. A number of these precedents in that king's reign.—For Rich. 2's time, it doth not appear by any one record there is any thing for ships, but only for the custody of the sea.—And for Hen. 4, Hen. 5, Hen. 6's time until 2 Eliz. they are all concerning matters of arms, not to make ships. And when the rebellion in the North was in the queen's time, then by writs men were commanded to be in readiness, for defence of the kingdom.

The next thing we come to is the writ itself. For my part, I hold it to be illegal; mark the recital of the writ, it is no more but 'quod datum est nobis intelli,' &c. not a plain affirmation, as apparence of it. Then the motives are, because the pirates do infest the seas: Such motives as never were in any writ before. All former writs were not to provide great navies in respect of pirates; there is no such great danger of them. 15 Ed. 1, it is there set down, when pirates infested the seas, they took order that there should be only 10 ships to scour the coasts. 16 Ed. 3, &c. Command that men should be arrayed, lest the enemy should invade the kingdom; but no mention made of pirates, for they will be removed with a few ships. Mark the times when great pirates were upon the sea, they would be glad to sculk away when the king's navy came towards them. Now that this should bring the king's navy to sea, is against the law of the land, and are not motives sufficient to induce a charge of this kind.

ences to an inland county; whereas there was never any inland county charged in that kind before, as coast-towns that have been heretofore charged with soldiers, and had none, were discharged. When Bodmin in Cornwall was charged with finding of a ship, they shewed they never had ship nor mariners there, and that divers of them were imprisoned for not finding such a ship; whereupon commission issued to the admiral to examine the truth thereof: And because it was found they had no mariners, they were discharged. But Mr. Solicitor answered, this was done by the admiral, beyond his commission; but 15 Ed. 3, the same year, there was a writ awarded to Chichester in the county of Sussex, to find a ship, and they complained they had not any ships used to arrive there, nor mariners therein inhabiting; and thereupon they were discharged, upon a writ out of the Chancery: So I say, inland counties that are not wont to have ships, the law doth not appoint them to do that which they cannot do, nor will not expect from them that which is impossible.

The pursuance of this writ is against law; it appoints them to provide a ship, hire men, and provide victuals and wages for them, 26 weeks, &c. I say, this is against law plainly, and against divers statutes, and no law doth warrant it; for soldiers, which are the king's servants, ought to have their pay from the king, the general rendezvous. 15 Julian. m. 3, ships commanded to be at the ports upon the king's pay. Tenants by knights service, after forty days, were to be at the king's charge. 17 Ed. 1, 16 Ed. 3, it appeareth there, the king, upon the invasion of the Scots, many men being lost, appointed soldiers, and their wages paid, and what to Durham, and what to Newcastle, &c. 31 Ed. 1, in the Exchequer, writs went out to levy men to resist the Scots, and they would not stir without their wages. 16 Ed. 3, to pay soldiers wages. 2 Ed. 3, rot. 16, there it is set down in parliament what soldiers have received for their wages. 26 stat. 18 Ed. 3, cap. 7, soldiers are not to go out of their counties without pay. 10 Ed. 3, the men of Bucks stood upon it, and would not go out of their county to the coasts of Southampton without wages. Rot. Alm. 12 Ed. 3, m. 12. A writ to compel all men to make munition for ships, for the town; and thereupon H. and B. they were commanded to maintain the men of the same town. Claus. 13 Ed. 3, m. 14, men of arms for the defence of the sea-coasts complained their wages were not paid them: ordered, the town from whence they came should pay them. The statute of 11 H. 7, cap. 1, provides, that soldiers that go out of their own counties to attend the king in his war, shall have their wages from the time they go from their houses, to be paid by the king's own officers.

I hold that this assessment is not lawful and allowable; then if the assessment thus made falls to the ground, the power to the sheriff to assess doth; and he may do it as he lists, put more upon one than another, therefore an as-essment in that kind is not legal. Then the clause, 'Si rebelles fuerint, &c.' to imprison them, then to give power of imprisonment to the sheriff: Clauses have been in former writs, in cases of arrays, to distrain, if they refuse to pay; never in case of levying money, to imprison for it; it is clearly against Magna Charta to be imprisoned, unless he be indicted, or by due process of law.

The next thing is the last clause of the writ, 'If more be gathered than shall be needful, to be returned amongst those that have paid it.' That sheweth the ship must be done: we are now upon the record, and by this record it doth not appear that a ship is made. It appear Mr. Hampden was assessed 20s. towards the making of a ship. It is said, If the money be paid, others can provide ships. This is not according to law, to command a ship of war of 450 tons, and to turn it into money; for if a ship were made by a county, the county should have it again, but in this case it is otherwise; this Scir' Fac' is brought to have the money.

For the Certiorari, it is directed to a sheriff out of office 'que del residue de ceo,' and ought not so to be, for all writs are directed to the present sheriff; so for the old sheriffs to shew cause what they have done, and the new sheriffs to make their return, he is the immediate officer of the court. Admit the Scir' Fac' should go forth, it would do something, 'one rare, &c.' to whom, or how, nothing here; but 'Scir' Fac' quare onerari non debet; but to whom 'onerari,' it doth not appear.

Besides, if the sheriff levy money in that kind and bestow it on a ship, it is well. If not so bestowed, then those that received the money are accountable to those of whom they had it. In Ed. 3's time, soldiers received money to go to service in war, yet staid at home, but were compelled to repay it to the county where they received their wages. Also two high constables having received money for soldiers, were indicted for not employing it accordingly, and adjudged to restore it to the county where they received it, and to find sureties. So it doth not appear that this ship was builded, there is no preparation for a ship; the sum assessed is not legal; then the writ is not legal, because it varieth from all the precedents formerly; it varieth in the time, of 26 weeks, before that but for 13 weeks; in the manner, for soldiers wages to inland counties, which was never before. I say, it varieth from all the precedents in that kind. And so I hold this particular writ is not sufficient, nor warranted by the law, and that Judgment in this case ought to be given for Mr. Hampden.

THE ARGUMENT OF SIR GEORGE CROOKE, knight, one of the Justices of his Majesty's Court of King's-Bench at Westminster, in the great Case of SHIP-MONEY, as it was presented to the King's Majesty.

The Case is this upon the Record.—The king by writ under the great seal, dated 4 Aug.

anno 11 of his reign, directed to the sheriff of the county of Bucks, and to all the men in that county, commandeth them in these words:

Motives of this Writ, which are five.—‘ Quia datum est nobis intelligi, quod prædones quidam pirati ac maris grassatores tam nominis Christiani hostes Mahumitani quam alii congregati naves et bona et mercimonia non solum subditorum nostrorum, verum etiam subditorum amicorum nostrorum in mari quod per gentem Anglicanam ab olim defendi consuevit nefarie diripientes et spoliantes et ad libitum suum deportare hominesque in eisdem in captivitat’ miserrimam mancipantes. 2. Cumque ipsos conspicimus nãvigium in dies preparantes ad mercatores nostros ulterius molestand’ et ad regnum gravand’ nisi citius remedium apponatur eorumque conatui viriliter obviatur. 3. Consideratis etiam periculis quã undique his guerrinis temporibus imminent, ita quod nobis et subditis nostris defensionem regni omni festinatione qua poterimus accelerare convenit. 4. Nos volentes defensione regni, tuitione maris, securitate subditorum nostrorum salva conductione navium et merchandizatum ad regn’ nostrum Angliã venient’ et de eodem regio ad partes externas transeunt’ (auxiliante Deo) maxime providere; cum nos et progenitores nostri reges Angliã domini maris prædicti semper hactenus extiterunt, et plurimum nos tæderet si honor iste regius nostris temporibus deperat aut in aliquo minuatur. 5. Cumque onus istud defensionis quod omnes tangit per omnes debet supportari prout per legem et consuetudinem regni Angliã fieri consuevit.

Charges of this Writ, which are three.—‘ Vobis præfat’ vicecom’ balliv’ burgensibus majoribusque probis hominib’ et omnib’ aliis, quibuscunque supra mentionat’ in burgis villis, villatis, hamlettis et locis supradictis eorumque membris. 1. In fide et legiantia vestra quibus nobis tenemini. 2. Et sicut nos et bonorem nostrum diligitis. 3. Nec non subforisfactur’ omnium quã nobis forisfacere poteritis firmiter injungend’ mandamus.

Commands of the Writ, which are five.—‘ 1. Quod unam navem de guerra, portagii 450 doliorum. 2. Cum hominib’ tam magistris peritis quam marinariis valentioribus et expertis, ceatum et octoginta ad minus. 3. Ac tormentis tam majoribus quam minoribus pulverere tormentario ac hastis et telis aliisque armaturis pro hello sufficientibus. 4. Et cum duplici esquipamento, nec non victualibus usque ad primum diem Martii jam proxim’ sequen’ ad tot homines competen’. 5. Et abinde in viginti et sex septimanas ad custagiam vestra, tam in victualibus quam hominum salariis et aliis ad guerram necessariis per tempus illud super defensionem maris in obsequio nostro, in comitiva custodis maris, cui custodiam maris ante prædict’ primum diem Martii committeremus et prout ipse ex parte nostra dictaverit moratur parari, et ad portum de Portsmouth circa decimum primum diem Martii duci facias. Ita quod sint ib’ in eod’ die

Clauses of the Assess.—‘ 1. Assignavimus autem te præfat’ vicecom’ Bucks ad assidend’ omn’ hom’ in villis de Agmondesham, Wenderover et Marlow Magna et in omnibus aliis villis villat’ burgis hamlettis et aliis locis in com’ Bucks præd’ et terræ tentes in iisd’ navem vel partem navis præd’ non habentes vel in ead’ non deservientes ad contribuend’ expensis circa provisionem præmissorum necessar’. 2. Et saper’ præd’ vill’ burg’ hamlett’ et locor’ membris eorumq’ sic ut præfertur ad assidend’ et ponend’ viz. quolib’ eorum iuxta statum suum et facultates suas. 3. Et portiones super ipsos assessat’ per distinctiones aliasve modos debitos levand’. 4. Et collectores in hac parte nominand’ et constituend’. 5. Ac omnes eos quos rebelles et contrarios inveneris in præmissis in carcere mancipand’ in eod’ moratur’ quousque pro eor’ deliberatione ulterius duxerimus ordinand’.

Preclose of the Writ for the Ease of the Subject.—‘ Et ulterius mandamus quod circa præmissa diligenter intendajis et faciatis et exequemini cum effectu sub periculo incumbente. Volumus autem quod non colore præd’ mandati nostri. 1. Plus de iisd’ hominibus levari fac’: quam ad præmiss’ sufficien’ ad expensas necessar’. 2. Aut quod quisquam qui pecuniam de contributibus ad præd’ custag’ faciend’ levaverit ead’ vel partem inde penes se detineat. 3. Vel ad alios usus quovis quæsiti colore appropriare præsumat. 4. Volentes quod si plusquam sufficiat collectum fuerit hoc inter solventes pro ratu portionis ipsis contingen’ exsolvatur.’

By virtue of this Writ, Mr. Hampden is assessed to 20s. for his lands in Stoake Mandevile in that county, which, not being paid, is certified amongst others into the Chancery, upon a writ of Certiorari, dated 9 Mar. 12 Car. by a schedule thereunto annexed. And by a writ of Mittimus, teste 5 Mar. 13 Car. this writ of 4 Aug. 11 Car. and the writ of Certiorari, and the schedule annexed, is sent into the Exchequer, with a command there to do, for the levying of sums so assessed and unpaid, ‘ prout de jure et secundum legem regni nostri Angliã fuerit faciend’; whereupon a Sci’ Fa’ issued out of the Exchequer, reciting the said writ, to warn Mr. Hampden amongst others, to shew cause why he should not be charged with this money. Upon this he being summoned, appeared, and demandeth the hearing of those writs and schedule, which being read unto him, thereupon he demurreth in law. And whether judgment upon this whole Record be to be given against John Hampden, that he is to be charged or no, that is the question; for he is the only party in this case. And there is no cause why any man should say that the question is, Whether judgment should be given for the king, or the defendant? for as this case is, the king is no party to the Record, but only it is a judicial process out of the Exchequer, grounded upon the former Record, for the defendant to shew cause why he should not be charged: which hath been very elaborately argued by the defendant's counsel, who demurred, that he should not be charged; and by the king's counsel, very learnedly and elaborately argued, that he should be charged.

This case is a case of great weight, and the greatest case of weight that ever we read, argued by judges in this place; and therefore, adjourned into this place for advice of all the judges: For of their side it is alledged, That it concerneth the king in his prerogative and power royal: and on the other side, That it concerneth all the king's subjects in their liberties, their persons, and their estates; for which it hath made some of us to wish and move among ourselves, that it might have been by his majesty's favour, heard and determined in another place by his majesty, and his great council of his realm, where all convenience and inconvenience might have been considered of, provided for, and prevented for present and future times, and not to be argued only by us, who are accounted his majesty's counsel at law; wherein if any thing be done amiss, the fault must light upon us, as misadvising the king therein. But seeing it hath pleased his majesty, that the same should be argued and determined in this place, whose pleasure we must obey, I must give my best advice upon my oath to the best of my skill; wherein I hope not to trench upon his majesty's prerogatives, which we are all bound by our oaths, to the best of our skills, to maintain, and not to suffer them to be diminished; nor upon his royal power; but truly to deliver what I conceive the law to be, concerning the case in question.

Wherein I must confess I have been much distracted, having heard so learned arguments on both sides at the bar, and so many records and precedents cited on either side; but they did not so much move me, for the counsel have on either side proposed such reasons, as they thought convenient for the maintaining of their opinions, and perhaps with a prejudicate opinion; as I myself by my own experience when I was at the bar, have argued confidently, and as I then thought the laws to be on that side for whom I argued. But after being on the bench, and indifferently weighing all reasons and authorities, have been of a contrary opinion; and so the law hath been adjudged contrary to that opinion which I first confidently conceived.

But that which hath moved me most, and maketh me distrust my own judgment in this case is, that my brothers that have argued before me, who have argued upon their oaths, and I presume have seen the records and precedents cited on either side, have all argued one way; with whose opinions I should willingly have concurred, if I could have satisfied my own judgment with their reasons; but not being satisfied, I have learned that I must not come with a multitude against mine own conscience, for I must stand or fall with my own master. And therefore I shall shew reasons, and leave myself to the judgment of my lords and others my brethren. And whatsoever shall be adjudged I must submit unto, and so do with all others, and do now declare my opinion to be, that as this case is, judgment ought to be given for the defendant. My reasons and grounds that I shall insist upon are these:

1. That the command by this writ of 4 Aug. 11 Car. for to have ships at the charge of the inhabitants of the county being the ground of this suit, and cause of this charge, is illegal and contrary to the common laws, not being by authority of parliament. 2. That if at the common laws it had been lawful, yet now this writ is illegal, being expressly contrary to divers statutes prohibiting a general charge to be laid upon the commons in general, without consent in parliament. 3. That it is not to be maintained by any prerogative or power royal, nor allegation of necessity or danger. 4. Admitting it were legal to lay such a charge upon maritime ports, yet to charge any inland county, as the county of Bucks is, with making ships, and furnishing them with masters, mariners and soldiers at their charge, which are far remote from the seas, is illegal, and not warranted by any former precedent. 5. I shall examine the precedents and records cited to warrant this writ, which have been all the principal grounds of the arguments to maintain the same. And I conceive there is the chief groundwork being in my notes, but I forgot it.

But before I proceed to the argument, I desire to remove two difficulties: First, That, by the demurrer the danger of the kingdom is confessed, and so it is to be allowed for a case of necessity. To this I answer, That the demurrer confesseth not matters in fact, but where the matter is legally set down; but if it be not a legal proceeding, then the demurrer is no confessing of the matter of fact. This appeareth in the book-case, 5 Hen. 7, fol. 1, and Coke lib. 5, fol. 96, in Burton's case, That a demurrer is no confessing of matters of fact, but where the matter precedent is sufficiently pleaded or laid down; and so it is held in all our books.

The Second difficulty is, That this case is so resolved by all our opinions under our hands, that this writ was legal; which was much pressed by Mr. Solicitor. To this I answer, That it is true that I have set down my opinion under my hand unto two cases, to the first voluntarily in Dec. 1635, which was thus: 'I am of opinion that where the good and safety of the kingdom in general is concerned, and the whole kingdom is in danger, of which his majesty is the only judge, there the charge of 'defence ought to be borne by all in general.' This I hold to be agreeable to law and reason; this opinion I do still and shall always maintain; for where the kingdom is in danger, the king may command every person of his kingdom with all his force to come and defend it at all times and in all places of his kingdom where he pleaseth; and the king is the sole judge of the danger, and of war and peace; and if any do not perform his commands therein, he is fineable and punishable in a deep manner.

The second was in Feb. 1636, which is thus, 'That when the good and safety of the kingdom in general is concerned, and the whole kingdom in danger, his majesty may by writ under the great seal of England command all his subjects of this kingdom at their charges to provide and furnish such number of ships with men, victuals and ammunition, and for such time as his majesty shall think fit, for the defence and safeguard of the kingdom from such danger. And that his majesty may compel the doing thereof, in case of refusal and refractoriness. And that in this case his majesty is sole judge of the danger, and when and how the same is to be prevented and avoided.'

To this opinion, I confess, I then with the rest of the judges subscribed my hand; but I then dissented to that opinion, and then signified my opinion to be, that such a charge could not be laid by any such writ, but by parliament: and so absolutely in that point one other did agree with me, and dissented from that opinion; and four others, in some other particulars, from that which was subscribed. But the greater part seeming absolutely to be resolved upon that opinion, some of them affirming that they had seen divers records and precedents of such writs, satisfying them to be of that judgment; I was pressed to subscribe with them, for that the major part must involve the rest, as it was said to be usual in cases of difference, and for that the lesser number must submit to the major, although they varied in opinion; as it is in our court, if three judges agree in opinion against one, or two where there are five judges, judgment is to be entered per curiam, if the major part agree, and the other are to submit to it: and in cases of conference, and certificate of their opinions, if the greater part did agree and subscribe, the rest were to submit their opinions. And thus by more ancient judges than myself was affirmed to be the continual practice: And that it was not fit, especially in a case of this nature so much concerning the service of the king, for some to subscribe, and some to forbear their subscriptions: And that although we did subscribe, it did not bind us, but that in point of judgment, if the case came in question judicially before us, we should give our judgments as we should see cause after the arguments on both sides, and we were not bound by this sudden resolution.

Hereupon I consented to subscribe; but I then said, that in the mean time the king might be misinformed, by our certificate under our hands, conceiving us all to agree together and to give him this advice under our hands, and not know there was any dis-assented or was doubtful: but it was then said, the king should be truly informed thereof; and thereupon we that dis-assent, did subscribe our hands with such protestations as aforesaid, only for conformity, although contrary to the opinion I then conceived.

But this being before arguments heard on either side, or any precedents seen, I hold that none is bound by that opinion. And if I had been of that opinion absolutely, now having heard all the arguments on both sides, and the reasons of the king's counsel to maintain this writ, and why the defendant is to be charged; and the arguments of the defendant's counsel against the writ, and their reasons why the defendant should not be charged to pay the money assessed him; and having duly considered of records and precedents cited and shewed unto me, especially those of the king's side, I am now of an absolute opinion that this writ is illegal, and declare my opinion to be contrary to that which is subscribed by us all. And if I had been of the same opinion that was subscribed, yet upon better advisement being absolutely settled in my judgment and conscience in a contrary opinion, I think it no shame to declare that I do retract that opinion, for humanum est errare, rather than to argue against my own conscience. And therefore none having, as I conceive, removed those difficulties, I shall proceed to my argument, and shew the reasons of my opinion, and leave the same to my lords and brothers. Not one precedent nor record in any precedent time, that hath been produced or shewed unto me, that doth maintain any writ, to lay such a charge upon any county inland or maritime.

I have examined this particular writ, and the several parts thereof; and do conceive it is illegal, and not sufficient to ground this charge upon the defendant.

1. The motives of this writ are not sufficient to cause such a writ to be sent forth.
2. The command of the writ to prepare a ship at the charge of the inhabitants, which mentions victuals and men, is against the common laws and statutes of this kingdom.
3. That to lay a charge of finding victuals, and wages of soldiers and mariners, is illegal, and contrary to the common laws and divers statutes.
4. The power of assessment given to the sheriff alone, and to distrain for this, is illegal, and not warranted by any precedent.
5. The power of imprisoning is illegal, and contrary to divers statutes, and not warranted by the precedents.
6. That the preclose of the writ, and the practice of it, is contrary to itself, and oppositum in objecto.
7. If this writ were legal, yet the manner of the assessment by the sheriff as it is certified, is not warranted by this writ; consequently the sum cannot be demanded of the defendant by virtue of this writ.
8. That the Certiorari and Sci' Fac' issued not legally, and consequently no judgment can be given against the defendant thereupon.

For the first point, that this writ, 4 Aug. 11 Car. is against the common law, my reasons are these:

1. Because this is the first writ since the Conquest that went out to any inland county to prepare a ship with men and ammunition, for aught appeareth by any record that hath been shewn. And where there was never any precedent, by the rules of Mr. Littleton, fol. 23, the law is conceived not to allow any such writ. And sir Edw. Coke in his Comment upon Littleton, fol. 81, saith, That where there is no example, it is a great intendment the laws will not bear it.—So I conceive here, there never having been a precedent before of any such writ to the sheriffs and inhabitants of a county, to prepare a ship with men and ammunition upon any occasion whatsoever, that it is against the common law to award such a writ.

2. For that the common law of England setteth a freedom in the subjects in respect of their persons, and giveth them a true property in their goods and estates; so that without their consent, or implicitly by an ordinance which they consented unto by a common assent in parliament, it cannot be taken from them, nor their estates charged; and for this purpose the law distinguisheth between bondmen, whose estates are at their lords will and disposition, and freemen, whose property none may invade, charge, or unjustly take away but by their own free consent, and therefore not warranted by law; which is proved by these authorities.

Coke in his Reports, lib. 8, fol. 92, in Francis' Case, sets down this rule, 'Quod nostrum est, sine facto seu defectu nostro amitti, seu in alien' transferri non potest.'

Mr. Lambert, fol. 24, setteth down the laws of England which were confirmed by William the Conqueror, hath these words: 'Inter alia volumus et concedimus, quod omnes monarchæ regn' sui præd' habeant et teneant terras suas et possessiones suas bene et in pace, liberas ab omni exactione injusta et ab omni tallagio' (not mentioning their injuncta) 'ita quod nihil ab eis exigatur præter servitium suum juste debitum.' Hereby it appears there is an absolute freedom from all tallage.

17 of king John, in Mat. Paris, fol. 246, the king doth grant and confirm unto his barons and commons, inter al' these liberties following: 'Nullum scutagium vel auxilium ponamus in regno nostro nisi per commune concilium regni nostri, nisi ad redimend' corpus nostrum, filium nostrum primogenitum militem faciend' vel ad primogenitam filiam maritand'.' By this it appears what was then conceived to be amongst others their liberties, and then confirmed; which was, that no aid should be laid upon them but by parliament, for the parliament was then called Commune Concilium.

That the law is so, appeareth by the treatise written by Fortescue, who had been Chief Justice of England in king Henry 4's time, and after Chancellor of England, when he wrote the book, intitled, De Laudibus Legum Angliæ. fol. 25, cap. 9, he saith thus; That the king of England cannot alter nor change the laws of England at his pleasure, for 'principatu regali sed et politico ipse populo suo dominatur.' If his power were loyal only, then he might change the laws, 'Tallagio quoq; et cætera onera es imponere ipsis inconsultis;' but adds, that the king of England 'sine subditor' assensu leges mutare non potest, nec subjectum populum renitentem onerari impositionibus peregrinis.' And cap. 13, fol. 31, he compares the king and subjects of England to the head and body natural: 'Ut non potest corpus physicum nervos suos comutare neq; membris suis proprios vires et propria sanguinis alimenta denegare sua, nec rex qui caput corporis politici mutare potest leges corporis illius, nec ejusd' populi substantias proprie subtrahere, reclamantibus eis aut invitis.' Thus he in this place; but in fol. 84, cap. 36, he seemeth to say, 'In hoc tu' dividuo, rex Angliæ neq; per se nec ministr' suos tallagia, subsidia, aut quævis onera al' imponit, leges suas, aut leges eor' mutat, ut nova condidit sine concessione vel assensu totius regni sui in parlamento suo express'. Which words seem so general, that in no case he can do it.

So it appeareth by the book case, 13 Hen. 4. fol. 14, That the grant of the king, which toucheth to the charge and prejudice of his people in general, is not good, unless it be by parliament. But it is agreed there, that grants of tolls, of fairs, of pontage, pickage, murage, ferrying, or such like, which are for the profit, good, and ease of the people, and profit of them that will take benefit thereof, and not compulsory to any to pay; but to them that will take the benefit, and being very small and reasonable sums, the law doth give allowance to them: but if they were great sums, that tend to the charge of the people, the law will judge them void.

This appeareth in sir Ed. Coke's Reports, lib. 5, fol. 63, in the Case of the Chamberlains of London, that an ordinance made by the common-council of London, where they have a custom by their common-council to make reasonable ordinances to bind all within the city, concerning cloths to be brought to Blackwell-hall, there to be viewed, measured and searched before they were sold, and a penny upon a broad-cloth appointed for the officer that did that service; that such a charge was reasonable; for that it was for the public benefit of the city, and the commonwealth; and a pecuniary penalty laid for not performance of that ordinance was allowed.

Ibid. fol. 64, in Clark's case it is resolved, that an ordinance made by the assent of the plaintiff himself, and other burgesses of the town of St. Albans, for a small tax upon the inhabitants of the town, towards the erection of the courts, and other necessaries, for the term to be kept there, was allowed to be good, and did bind the plaintiff, being by the plaintiff's own consent, and for the public good of the town.

Also Coke, lib. 11, fol. 86, in Darcie's case, setteth this out of Fitz-Her. Na. B. fol. 124, that every grant of the king hath this consideration in it, tacit or express, 'Quod patria per donationes illius, magis solito non oneretur.' And as by grant the king cannot charge his people, so neither can he by writ lay any charge upon his people, but by their consent, or where they have apparent benefit thereby. And that is the reason of the writ in the Reg. 127, and Fitz-Her. Na. B. 113. Where by breach of the sea-walls any inundation is of the country, the king, who is pater patrie, and taketh care for the good and safety of his people, sendeth out his commission to enquire by whose default any such breach happened, and to cause all that had lands or commons to be contributory to the making up of the sea-walls; and this is done by a jury: but this charge cannot be laid upon a county or town in general, but upon particular men that have loss or benefit, or may have loss or benefit thereby: and this is done by inquiry of a jury, before the sheriffs, or commissioners appointed. So it is at this day, upon commissions of sewers, as appeareth by Coke, lib. 10, fol. 142, in the case of the isle of Ely. The taxation by the commissioners of sewers must be upon every particular man that hath or may have loss or benefit by such inundations, and making up of the walls; and cannot be laid upon any remote parts, which are out of the level of such loss or benefit; and it must be certain and particular upon persons: certain, by reason of loss or profit, and cannot be laid in general upon a town; but in those cases there is a particular loss or benefit, and in particular places, and but in petty charge. And then where the law alloweth that which in reason is to be done, that may be done without a special statute: for, 'De minimis non curat lex.' But in this case there is a general charge through the whole kingdom, which the law doth not permit, without common consent in parliament.

But it hath been alledged, that this charge hath been imposed for the public safety, and defence of the kingdom: and may not this be done when every one hath advantage by it? To this I say, when imminent danger and cause of defence is, there must be defence made by every man (when the king shall command) with his person: in such a case every man, as it is said in the precedents, is bound per se et sua to defend the kingdom. And I think no man will be unwise but that he will exponere se et sua or the defence of the kingdom, when there is danger; for otherwise, he is in danger to look o se et sua: but to lay a charge in general upon the kingdom, either for making or preparing of ships, or money in lieu thereof, is not to be done but by parliament, where the charge is to be borne in general by all the subjects.

To prove further, that no man may have his goods taken from him but by his consent, appeareth by a record, Mich. 14 Ed. 2, rot. 60, in the King's bench, in a writ of error brought upon a judgment given at Durham; where in an action of trespass, by William Heyborne, against William Keylowe, for entering his house, and breaking his chest, and taking away 70*l.* in money, the defendant pleaded Not Guilty; the jury found a special verdict, that the Scots having entered the bishopric of Durham with an army, and making great burning and spoils, the commonalty of Durham met together at Durham, wherof the plaintiff was one, and agreed to send some to compound with the Scots for money to depart, and were all sworn to perform what composition should be made, and to perform what ordinance they should make in that behalf: and thereupon they compounded with the Scots for 1,600 marks. But because that was to be paid immediately, they all consented that William Keylowe the defendant, and others, should go into every man's house, to search what ready moneys were there, and to take it for the making up of that sum; and that it should be repaid by the commonalty of Durham; and thereupon the defendant did enter into the plaintiff's house, and did break open the chest, and took the 70*l.* which was paid accordingly towards the fine. The jury was demanded, whether the plaintiff was present, and did consent to the taking of the money? They said no: whereupon the plaintiff had judgment to recover the said 70*l.* and damages, for that otherwise he had no remedy for his money; and the defendant was committed in execution for that sum. And thereupon the defendant, Keylowe, brought a writ of error in the King's bench, and assigned his error in point of judgment; and there the judgment was reversed, and the reasons set down in the record were, first, because the plaintiff, Heyborne, had his sufficient remedy against the commonalty of Durham for his money: secondly, because he himself had agreed to this ordinance, and was sworn to perform it; and that the defendant did nothing but what the plaintiff had assented to by his oath, and therefore is accounted to do nothing but by his consent, and as servant unto him, therefore he was therein no trespasser: and therefore the judgment given in Durham was reversed, because he had assented to that ordinance, though afterwards he was unwilling; yet having once consented, his goods were lawfully taken. By which it appeareth, that if he had not particularly consented, such an ordinance would not have been good to bind him; although this was in a case of great danger, and for defence.

2 Ric. 2, pars 1. The Parliament-Roll proveth this directly; although it be no act of parliament, yet the record is much to be regarded, for it sheweth what the law was then conceived to be: for Scroop, the lord chancellor, then shewed to all lords and commons assembled in parliament, that all the lords and sages had met together since the last parliament, and having conferred of the great danger the kingdom was in, and how money might be raised in case of imminent danger, which could not stay the delay of a parliament, and the king's coffers had not sufficient therein; the record is, they all agreed, moneys sufficient could not be had without laying a charge upon the commonalty, which, say they, cannot be done without a parliament; and the lords themselves, for the time, did supply the said necessity with money they lent: which record proveth directly, that this charge without an act of parliament is illegal.

So upon these reasons I conclude, that this writ, compulsorily to charge the subjects against their wills, is not warranted by any book, and therefore illegal.—If this writ should be allowed, great inconveniences would ensue, which the law will always avoid, and not permit any inconveniences.

1. If any such charge may be laid upon the counties by writ, without assent in parliament, then no man knoweth what his charge may be; for they may be charged as often as the king pleaseth, and with making of as many ships, and of what burdens, and with what charge of ammunition, men and victuals, as shall be set down. Wherein I doubt not, but if the law were so, the king being a very pious and a just king, would use his power very moderately; but judges in their judgments are not to look to present times only, but also to all future times, what may follow upon their judgments.—That this inconveniency may be, appeareth by the Daneget, first appointed in times of necessity, to redeem them from the cruelty of the Danes, which often changed, and still increased: for A. D. 991, when it began, it was but 10,000*l*; in 994, it was increased to 16,000*l*; and in 1002, it was increased to 24,000*l*; and in 1007, it was increased to 36,000*l*; and in 1012, to 48,000*l*. So if this writ be well awarded, it may be at pleasure what bounds it shall have. Also there was never but one single subsidy and two fifteenths used to be granted in parliament, until 31 Eliz. and then a double subsidy, and four fifteenths were granted: sir Walter Mildmay, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, moving for it, and saying, ‘his heart did quake to move it, not knowing the inconvenience that should grow upon it;’ he shewed great reasons for his moving it, it being about the time of the Spanish invasion, and so it was granted. Afterwards, 35 Eliz. treble subsidies and fifteenths were granted. And 43 Eliz. four subsidies and eight fifteenths were granted; and yet these were not accounted grievous, neither would it have been, if it had been ten subsidies because in parliament, and convenient times and means appointed for the levying of them. Tonnage and poundage were granted to this end in 13 Rich. 2, and have continued ever since by several grants until this king’s time, wherein it was unhappily questioned in parliament: but the end thereof was, that the kings might have money in their purses against times of need, for extraordinary occasions, especially for the defence of the realm, and guarding of the sea, as it is especially declared by the statute 1 Jac. and former statutes, and for other necessary uses, as the king pleased.

Object. But it is said, that tonnage and poundage is not now granted to the king, and therefore the king is enforced to these extraordinary courses.

Though it be not granted, yet I think it is taken; and I doubt not but to the same intent, and for the same purposes employed for which it was first granted; which was, for the defence of the kingdom, and guard of the sea. Therefore in case of danger and necessity, every subject, for the defence of the kingdom, is bound for ‘legianciæ debito,’ as some records say, and ‘legianciæ suæ vinculo astricti,’ as others speak; ‘se et sua totis viribus et potestate exponere,’ &c. And in such a case, the king may demand the persons of his subjects, and arrest their ships to wait on his to defend the seas; yet with this also, when they go out of their counties, to be at the king’s charges: but to command the subject by writ, to build new ships, or to prepare ships at their charges, or to lay a common charge on the subjects in general, for matter of defence, or avoidance of danger, is not warrantable by the common law.

2. Another inconveniency is, That it is left in the power of the sheriff to charge any man’s estate at his pleasure, taxing some, and sparing others, as his affections lead him; and sometimes, by colour thereof, levying more than he need, and enriching himself; which power the law never alloweth him, although it were in lesser matters: as to make an assessment for breach of sea walls; but to do it by a jury, and not by himself alone. So for these reasons, I conclude, this writ is against the common law, and so illegal.—I conceive, if the common law were doubtful in this, whether such a charge might be imposed by writ; yet now it is made clear by divers express statutes, That the king is not to lay any charge upon his subjects, but by their consent in parliament; and that is, by many acts of parliament in force, and not repealed: and there is no doubt but that the king by parliament may bind them and their successors, every king by oath being bound to perform the statutes of his realm.

The statute of 25 Ed. 1, cap. 5, which is in these words: ‘Forasmuch as divers people of our realms are in fear, that the aids and taxes which they have given us before-time towards our wars, and other businesses of their own grant and good-will, however they were made, might turn to a bondage of them, and their heirs; because they might be at other time found on the Roll; and likewise for the prizes taken throughout our realm by our ministers; we have granted for us and our heirs, That we shall not draw any such aids, taxes or prizes into a custom, for any thing that hath been done heretofore, by any roll, or any other precedent that may be found.’—Ibid. cap. 6. ‘Moreover, we have granted for us and our heirs, as well to archbishops, bishops, priors, and other folk of the holy church; as also to earls, barons, and all the commonalty of the land; that for no business from henceforth

'we shall take any aids, taxes, nor prizes, but by the common assent of the realm, and for the common profit thereof, (saving the ancient aids and prizes due and accustomed)' which are the express words of that statute. Now, what those ancient aids were, is well known, that they were 'ad redimendum corpus, ad filium primogenitum militem faciendi' et ad 'filium primogenitum maritandum': Which aid concerns not the subject in general, but particular men were liable thereunto by their tenures. So this saving need not to have been; for the body of the act extended not to them, but to the general aid of the kingdom.

However, if this salvo, as it hath been objected, would preserve this aid now in question, yet the statute made afterwards, De Tallagio non Concedendo, being without any salvo, takes it away: which statute, Rastal in his Abridgment, fol. 441, in his title of Taxes, abridgeth in this manner: 'Anno 25 Ed. 1, it is ordained, that the taxes taken, shall not be taken in custom; nor but by the assent of this realm, except the ancient aids and taxes: and there the tax of 40s. upon the sack of wool is released.—Ibid. 'That no taillage, by us or our heirs in our realm, be put or levied, without the assent of the archbishops, bishops, earls, barons, knights, burgesses, and other free commons of our realm; that nothing be taken from henceforth, in the name, or by reason of Male tout' of a sack of wool. Statute De Tallagio non Concedendo.'

Object.—Mr. Solicitor laboured much to prove, that there was no such statute, De Tallagio non Concedendo: 1. For that it was not to be found on the Rolls of Parliament. 2. For that it was not set down when it was made. 3. That it was but an abstract out of Confirmation Chartarum Libertatum. Mr. Attorney said, he would not deny it to be a statute, neither would he affirm it; but that yet it did not extend to take away the aid demanded, by prerogative or power royal for the defence of the kingdom.

Respons.—To this I answer, This was never doubted to be a statute until this argument; and that it is a statute, appeareth, 1. For that it is printed in the Book of Statutes, for a statute. 2. It is recited in the Petition of Right, to be a statute. To that it is not found on the Rolls, I answer, That many statutes that are known statutes are not found on the Rolls, as Mag' Char' is not. And as touching the time, I conceive it to be made 24 Ed. 1, cap. 1, for so it is set down in the great Book of Statutes, printed 1618, to be the first statute therein made, viz. in these words: 'No Taillage nor Aid shall be taken or levied by us or our heirs, in our realm, without the good will and assent of the archbishops, bishops, earls, barons, knights, burgesses, and other freemen of the land.—And that it is a statute, all my brothers have agreed.

The only doubt then is, whether this statute extendeth to aid for the defence of the kingdom; which I think it doth; for it is the promise words of it, That no Taillage or Aid shall be imposed but by grant in parliament, which extends to all manner of aids: and by this law the subjects of England have defended themselves ever since, as with a buckler, as saith Bodinus, fol. 97, whereby it appeareth, that notice was taken of this law in foreign parts, and so held still to be a statute in force.

The next statute is 14 Ed. 3, cap. 1, which recites the grant of the great subsidy of the ninth fleece, the ninth lamb, &c. formerly granted; whereupon these words follow: 'We, willing to provide for the indemnity of the said prelates, earls, barons, and others the commonalty of the realm, and also of the citizens, burgesses, and merchants aforesaid, will and grant for us and our heirs, to the same prelates, earls, barons, and commons, citizens, burgesses, and merchants, that the same grant shall not be had forth in example, nor fall to their prejudice in time to come, nor that they be from henceforth charged or granted to make any aid, or sustain any charge, if it be not by the common assent of the said prelates, earls, barons, and other great men and commons of the said realm of England, and that in the parliament; and that all the profit arising of the said aid, and of wards, marriages, customs, and escheats, and other profits, arising of our said realm of England; shall be set and dispended upon the maintenance of the safe-guard of this realm of England, and of our war in Scotland, France, and Gascoigne, and in no place elsewhere during our war.'—By this statute it appeareth that it is expressly provided, that the subjects should not be from thenceforth charged nor grieved to make any aid, nor sustain any charge but by common assent, and that in parliament; which is as express as may be, and exclusive to any charge otherwise; which I conceive was made against the appointment of making, or preparing and sending out of ships at the charge of the towns wherein they were, or sending men out of their own counties at the charge of the county.

Object.—Now whereas it is alleged by my brother Weston, and my brother Berkley, That this was but a temporary statute, and ended when the war ended, which appeareth by the last clause for employment of those profits towards those wars; I conceive it appeareth to be an absolute and perpetual statute, for it is granted for him and his heirs in perpetuity. And also it appeareth by Plowden in his Comment, fol. 457, in sir Thomas Worth's case, where a grant is by the name of the king, which is in his politic capacity; this extendeth against him, his heirs, and successors, although they be not named. Also the intendment of this law appeareth to be for the security of the subjects, from thenceforth for all future ages. And then the office of judges, as appears by sir Edward Coke's Reports, lib. 5, fol. 7, and Plowden's Comment in Aston and Stud's case, is to construe statutes according to the true intent of the makers thereof, which was in this statute, that it should be a perpetual security for the subjects. And to little purpose it had been, to make a statute to continue but during the time of the war, or during the king's life.

Object.—Also where it is alledged that the statute of 14 Ed. 3, is not mentioned in the Petition of Right, which is some argument that it was not conceived to be a continuing statute.

Respons.—To that I answer, That in the Petition of Right it is said, That by the statute there recited, and other the good statutes of this realm, the subjects shall not be compelled to pay any taxes, taillage, aid, nor other like charge not set by parliament; in which this statute is as well intended as other statutes, and as far as if it had been expressly recited. Also it appeareth by all the books of statutes, that this statute is granted as a statute continuing, whereas others expired, are set down as expired.

21 Ed. 3, pars 2, m. 11. A subsidy being granted by parliament, viz. 40s. on every sack of wool transported before Michaelmas following, and 6d. on every 20s. of merchandize, for the safe-guarding of the merchants and defence of the coast, &c. After Michaelmas, viz. 31 Octob. 21 Ed. 3, by writ the collectors were commanded to continue the collection of those subsidies until Easter. But 26 Nov. 21 Ed. 3, the king by writ commanded the stay of the 6d. in the 20s. and to continue the collection of the subsidies upon the sacks of wool until Easter.

22 Ed. 3, Rot. Parl. m. 16. The parliament being holden in Lent, the commons complain of the continuance of this collection of the subsidies upon the sacks of wool longer than the parliament had granted it, and provided that it should not be continued longer than Easter, at the procurement of any person. By this it appeareth, that the parliament being careful that the time for levying of a subsidy granted, should not be enlarged by any power, much less would they admit of a writ to lay a charge without grant by parliament.

25 Ed. 3, m. 1. It was enacted that no man should be compelled to find men at arms, other than such as hold by such service, except it be by common assent in parliament. By this it appeareth, that if men be not compellable to find a man at arms, unless it be by common assent in parliament; much less is any bound to be contributory to the preparing of a ship with 180 men at arms, and victuals, and wages of soldiery for 26 weeks, unless it be by common assent in parliament.

Rot. Parl. 21 Hen. 4, num. 22. An act of parliament, as I count it, in the very point, is in these words: 'For that of late, divers commissions were made to divers cities and boroughs within the realm, to make barges and berringers, without assent of parliament, and otherwise than hath been done before these; however the commons do pray the king that these commissions may be repealed, and that they may not be of any force or effect.' To which it is answered, 'That the king willeth 'that the said commissions be repealed;' which is an absolute and perfect statute.

But then there are added these words: 'But for the great necessity he hath of such vessels for the defence of the realm in case that the war shall happen, he will treat with his lords of this matter, and afterwards will shew it to the commons to have their counsel and advice in this point.' So by the record it appeareth that the commons did conceive that no cities, boroughs, nor towns, without consent in parliament, were to be charged with the making of such vessels; to which the king agreeth. And from that day to this, until the making of these writs, in no age, although the kingdom hath been many times in danger of invasion, and hath been invaded, there do not appear any records that ever I have seen of writs directed to any towns or cities at their charges, to make or prepare any ships or vessels whatsoever.

Object.—And whereas it hath been objected, and especially insisted upon by my brother Berkeley, that this latter part, that the king will treat with his lords concerning them, and after confer with the commons, is a gentle denial of that act; as the experience is at this day. 'Let Royse avisera' is a denial of an act.

Respons.—Hereupon I answer, It is an absolute act, for it is an absolute assent to the petition. And that which came after was but a plausible excuse, for that such commissions had gone out; and this farther consultation never appeared to be made, nor ever any such writ or commission for such vessels to be made went out since, until this writ.

13 Hen. 4, m. 10. A grant is of a subsidy of wools, woolfels, hides, and other things there mentioned, and of Tonnage and Poundage for one year, for the defence of the marches of Calais, &c. and for the defence of the realm, and the safe-guard of the sea. And therein is this express Proviso, 'Provided that this grant of a subsidy of wools, &c. and Tonnage and Poundage, in time to come, shall not be taken in example to charge the lords and commons of this realm with any manner of subsidy for the safeguard of Calais, &c. nor for the defence of the realm, nor the safe-guard of the seas; unless it be by the will of the lords and commons of the realm, and that by a new grant to be made, and that in full parliament to come.' By this appeareth that it was then provided, that no charge should be laid on the lords or commons, no not for the defence of the realm, but by grant in full parliament.

13 Hen. 4, m. 43. A petition was in parliament reciting, that there was an office granted of Aluager within London and the suburbs of the same, with fees to that appertaining, where any such office never was, nor any such fees appertaining thereunto; and that by colour thereof, they levy one half-penny of the buyer and a half-penny of the seller, and upon sale of every hundred ells of canvass a penny of the seller, and a penny of the buyer, wrongfully against the statutes in the times of your highness's progenitors made to the contrary, by which it is ordained that no tallage nor aid shall be granted nor levied without assent and consent of the lords and commons of your realm, as by the statutes is fully declared; wherefore they prayed that such letters patents made thereof shall be void and holden for none. And this was granted; whereby it appeareth that it is declared then in parliament, that those statutes were and did continue; that no tallage or aid shall be levied without grant in parliament.

1 Ric. 2, c. 1. It is enacted in these words: 'Our sovereign lord the king remembering how the commons of this realm, by new and unlawful inventions, and inordinate covetize, have, against the laws of this realm, been put to great servitude and importunate charges and exactions, and especially by a new impost, called a Benevolence, whereby divers subjects of this land, against their wills and liberties, have paid great sums of money, &c. It is enacted and ordained, that the subjects and commons of this realm from henceforth shall in no wise be charged by such charges or impositions called a benevolence, or such like charge: and that such exactions called a benevolence, before that time taken, shall be taken for no example to make any such, or any like charge, from any of his subjects of this realm hereafter, but shall be damned and nullified for ever.' By this it appeareth that it is expressly provided that the subjects shall not be charged by way of benevolence, which is in nature of a free gift, nor such like charge; that is, no charge of money shall be laid upon the subjects upon any pretence whatsoever, be it for defence in time of danger or guarding of the sea.

The last and concluding statute is the Petition of Right, made in the third year of his majesty's reign, reciting, that it was enacted by a statute made in the time of Edward 1, commonly called Statutum de Tallagio non Concedendo, that no tallage or aid shall be laid or levied by the king or his heirs in this realm, without the good-will and assent of the archbishops, bishops, earls, barons, knights, and others the freemen of the commonalty of this realm. And by a statute of 25 Ed. 3, That none shall be compelled to make any loans to the king, because such loans were against reason, and franchise of the land. And by another statute, that none shall be charged by any impositions called a benevolence. By which statutes, and other the good statutes of this realm, your subjects have inherited the freedom that they shall not be compelled to contribute to any taxes, tallage, aid, or other like charge not set by parliament.—And then they pray, that none hereafter be compelled to make or yield any gift, loan, benevolence, tax, or such like charge, without common consent by act of parliament. And after five other things there mentioned, the conclusion is; 'all which they pray as their rights and liberties.' Unto which the king answers, 'Let right be done as is desired.' Which is a full and perfect statute, shewing in this point the liberty of the kingdom prayed, and allowed; which was not done without the advice of the judges, whereof I was one, whose opinions were then demanded, and resolved that the same did not give any new liberty, but declared what the liberty of the subject was in this amongst others, that they should not be compelled to be contributory to any tax, tallage or aid, nor any like charge not set by parliament. All which statutes, those of 25 Edw. 1, 34 Edw. 1, and 14 Ed. 3, being in the negative and in force, I conclude that these writs to lay such a charge is against the law, and so the assessment by colour thereof unlawful.

Object.—Now whereas the precedent arguments have been that the kingdom being in danger, therefore these writs went forth for the making of ships, because there could not be so suddenly any parliament called, and the parliament is a slow body, and the kingdom may be lost whilst there is a consultation, and the danger is conceived to be very great, because that the writ 4 Aug. so mentions, that the pirates provided a great navy to infest the kingdom, and it is fit with speed to provide a remedy: and that the writ of Mittimus mentioneth, That 'salus reipublicæ periclitabatur:' and we must believe these suggestions to be true, for the king's certificate by this writ is 'recordum superlativum,' as Mr. Solicitor and my brother Berkley termed it, and must leave it upon the king's conscience if it be not true, to lay such a charge upon an untrue suggestion. And the defendant also by his demurrer hath confessed all the suggestions in the writ to be true; therefore it must be concluded the kingdom was in great danger, and present remedy must be had by making of these ships, and must be commanded by these writs, and not to stay for a parliament; and my brother Crawley said, it may be if a parliament were called, they will not yield to the going forth of such writs, although the kingdom was never so much in danger. And this charge in respect of the making of the defence is not within the intention of these statutes; and if it had been expressly mentioned within a statute, that such a charge should not be imposed, it had been a void statute, and contrary to the laws, that the kingdom should not be defended.

Respons. 1.—To all these I answer, That the matter now in question is upon the writ 4 Aug. Whether that be legal or not; and the suggestions therein be sufficient or not for the writ of Mittimus, mentioning that 'salus reipublicæ periclitabatur' at the day of the issuing of the writ 4 Aug. which is a year and an half after the first writ, doth not help it; and this not notified to the sheriff and inhabitants of the county to make them the more careful, and in a greater contempt if a ship were not provided, but it is only a notification to the barons of the Exchequer, that the same was the reason that the same issued forth.

Respons. 2.—The suggestions are not absolute, that any such danger was, or such navy was prepared by pirates; but only mentioneth, 'quia datum nobis intelligi,' that the pirates had done such mischief.

Respons. 3.—If such suggestions had been absolutely set down, yet we are not always bound absolutely to believe them; because many times untrue suggestions are put into writs and patents; and yet it doth not lie upon the king's conscience, neither doth the law impute any fact to the king, that any such be: for the law doth always conceive honourably of the king, that he cannot, nor will not, signify any untruth under the Great Seal; but he is abused therein, and the law imputeth it to them that so misinformed the king, and thrust in such suggestions into the Writ or Patent. And therefore all patents grounded upon untrue suggestions, are accounted void.

Respons. 4.—That the demurrer confesseth nothing but that which is legally and well set down; but if it be illegal the demurrer confesseth it not, but is well offered for that cause.

Respons. 5.—If the kingdom were in danger, yet a charge must not be laid in general upon the subjects, without their consent in parliament: for either the danger is near, and then the present provision must be made by men's persons, and the present ships of the kingdom, which the king may command from all parts of the kingdom, as need shall require; but cannot command money out of men's purses, by distraining of their goods, or imprisoning of their persons. But if the danger be further off, by reason of any foreign combinations, (as it is conceived it may be here) that provision must be made of ships by all the kingdom for defence; then, as Philip Commines, fol. 170, saith, That cloud is seen afar off, before that the tempest falls, especially by a foreign war; and such invasions cannot happen so soon, but that the king may call his sages together, and by consent make provision for such defence.

So I say here, If there be time to make ships, or prepare ships at the charge of the counties; then is there time enough for his majesty, if he pleases to call his parliament, to charge his commons, by consent in parliament, and to have a subsidiary aid, as always hath been done in such cases. And they are not so long coming or meeting, but they will make provision for defence, it being for all their safeties: For it appeareth by Coke, lib. 9, fol. 1, in his epistle, that king Alfred made a law, That a parliament should be held twice every year, and oftner, if need required, in times of peace: So that it was then conceived, that it was necessary to have parliaments to redress inconveniences.—Also by a statute made 4 Ed. 3, cap. 14, it is enacted, a parliament shall be held once every year, and oftner if need be. And also by a statute made 36 Ed. 3, cap. 10, it is enacted, for the redress of mischiefs and grievances that daily happen, a parliament shall be holden every year, as another time was ordained by a statute, which, I think, referreth to 4 Ed. 3. Also it appeareth by the speed that was in the parliament held in the third year of his majesty's reign, when five subsidies were granted, two of them to be paid within few days after the session of parliament ended; and therefore might, as this case is, be ordered and provided for by parliament within 7 months, as the time was between the teste of the writ, and the time prefixed for ships to be prepaired and sent.

Object.—And whereas it is objected, That perhaps the parliament would not have consented, and so the kingdom might have been lost.

Respons.—It is answered, That it is not to be presumed, that the parliament would deay to do that which is fit for the safety and defence of the kingdom, their own estates and lives being in danger, if the kingdom were not sufficiently defended: For it is a rule, 'Nihil iniquum est presumend' in lege.' So of the high court of parliament, That they would not deny that which is fitting. But I confess, I think that if it had been moved in parliament, they would never have consented to these writs, such never having been awarded before since the Conquest. And if they had consented, they would have taken a course how the same should have been made with the most conveniency, and not to leave it to a sheriff to tax them how he would.

Object.—To that which hath been said, That this charge is not within the statute, and that a statute to inhibit such a charge, for defence were void,

Respons.—I answer, that it is true, That if a statute were, that the king should not defend the kingdom, it were void, being against law and reason. But a statute that money shall not be charged or leyyed, nor that men shall be charged to make or prepare ships at their own charges, without common consent in parliament, I conceive were a good law, and agreeable to law and reason. And the king may by parliament, restrain himself from laying such a charge, but by consent in parliament. And then the king being a just and pious king, as ever governed the kingdom, which we that serve in his courts of justice have daily experience of, would not assent unto, or suffer any such charge, if he were truly informed the imposing of this charge were against any one law of his kingdom, as this is against so many; but would say, as it is said of the statute made 35 Ed. 1. That the pope should not be permitted to present to benefices; That he was bound by his oath to see that, and other laws in force, and not repealed, to be performed: That he would not suffer such charges to be laid, contrary to the laws and statutes of his realm: And would do as the late famous queen Eliz. did, when having required a charge upon divers of her subjects, by particular letters from the lords of her council, of several sums of money for present help towards her wars in Ireland, hearing that one of her judges, being convented before her lords for the payment of it, thereby discouraging others to pay it, answered it was against the laws, that the same should be imposed, there being an express statute against it, which he being a judge, was bound by his oath to signify; he being, as much as in him was, to be a conservator of the queen's oath in that behalf. The queen, I say, was very angry that such an imposition had been laid against law, and commanded it should be stopped from farther gathering; and to some that had paid their moneys, the same was restored. And therefore the principal and only fault in the charging of his subjects by these writs, if they be unlawful, as I conceive they are, is in those that devised them, and informed him that they were lawful, and such as his progenitors had from time to time used to send forth; and in his judges who have affirmed it to be lawful: Therefore upon this point I conclude, That this charge, by this writ, is illegal; and is no sufficient cause to charge the defendant.

Object.—Whereas it hath been much urged and argued by Mr. Solicitor, and Mr. Attorney, That this writ is warranted by the king's prerogative and power-royal to send forth such writs for defence and safety of the kingdom in time of danger.

To this I answer, That I do not conceive there is any such prerogative; for if it were a prerogative, I should not offer to speak against it: for it is part of our oaths, that are judges, to maintain the king's prerogative to the best of our skill, and not to suffer the same to be diminished. But if it be as I have argued, That is against the common law, and against so many statutes, that the subjects should be inforced to sustain, or to contribute to any charge, without the special consent, or common assent a parliament, then there is no such prerogative; for whatsoever is done to the hurt or wrong of the subjects, and against the laws of the land, the law imputeth that honour and justice to the king, whose throne is established by justice, that it is accounted not done by the king, but by some untrue and unjust informations. This appeareth by the authorities of our books; for Bracton, lib. 3, fol. 107, who is an ancient writer in our law, said 'Nihil aliud potest rex in terris, cum sit Dei minister et vicarius, quam de jure potest;' and there a little later, 'Itaq; potestas juris sua est, et non injuria, cum sit author juris, non debet inde injuriæ nasci occasio, unde jura nascuntur.' Edw. Coke in the 11th book of his Reports, the case of Magdalen College, where the question was, whether queen Elizabeth having taken a long lease of a college, being conceived to be against the statute 13 Eliz. it was sought to be maintained by her prerogative, but reliev'd it could not, it being against a statute, which she was bound, though not named, and there fol. 72, it is said, 'hoc solum rex non potest facere, quod non potest injuste agere.' Cowden's Comment. fol. 246, 247, in the lord Arkeley's case it is said, That the prerogative the king cannot do wrong, and his prerogative cannot be any warrant to do any wrong to any. Plowden's Comment. fol. 487, in Mitchell's case, it is said by justice Harper, although a common law doth allow many prerogatives to the king, yet it doth not allow any, that he shall hurt or wrong any by his prerogative. 21 Ed. 3, fol. 47, the earl of Kent's case, it is said, That if the king, under his great seal, do make any grant to the hurt of any other, he shall repeal and avoid it, jure regis; for the king is accounted to be abused by untrue suggestions, when he is drawn to do any wrong to the hurt of any other; much more I say, when he is drawn to do any thing to the hurt of his subjects in general. Sir Ed. Coke, lib. 11, fol. 86, in Darcie's case, it is said, That every grant of the king hath this condition annexed unto it, 'tacite aut expresse, ita quod patria per donationem illam magis solito non oneretur, seu gravetur.' The book called Doctor and Student, fol. 8, setting down, That the law doth vest the absolute property of every man's goods in him, and that they cannot be taken from him but by his consent, saith, That is the reason that if they be taken from him, the party shall answer the full value thereof in damages. And sure I conceive, that the party that doth this wrong to another, shall besides the damages to the party, be imprisoned, and pay a fine to the king; which, in the King's Bench, is the tenth part of as much as he payeth to the party. So then, if the king will punish the wrong of taking of goods, without consent, between party and party; much more will he not by any prerogative take away any man's goods, without his consent, particular or general.

So I conclude, that I conceive, that there is not any such prerogative to award such writs to command men to sustain such charge, as to be contributory to it; and to be distrained and imprisoned for not payment thereof.—Also I conceive, That this is not an act of royal power; for if it be illegal to impose such a charge, then it is not accounted as a matter of royal power, but as a matter done upon an untrue suggestion, and a matter of wrong done: and wrong is not imputed to the king, for he can do no wrong; but it is imputed to them that advised him to this course.

Royal power, I account, is to be used in cases of necessity, and imminent danger, when ordinary courses will not avail; for it is a rule, 'Non occurrendum est ad extraordinaria, quando fieri potest per ordinaria;' as in cases of rebellion, sudden invasion, and some other cases, where martial law may be used, and may not stay for legal proceedings. But in a time of peace, and no extreme necessity, legal courses must be used, and not royal power. Therefore, whereas in the statute of 31 Hen. 8, cap. 8, which was made upon the suppression of abbeys, when rebellions were begun to be stirred, it is recited, That sudden occasions happening, which do require speedy remedies, and for lack of a statute, the king was enforced to use royal power; it was enacted for the reasons therein mentioned, That the king, by the advice of his counsel therein named, two bishops, two chief justices, and divers others, or the major part of them, by his proclamation, may make ordinance for punishing of offences, and lay penalties, which should have the force of a law, with a promise that thereby no man's life, lands or goods, should be touched or impeached, so that therein royal power was fortified by a statute: yet that statute took care that no man's life, lands or goods, should be taken or prejudiced; and that statute was thought inconvenient, and therefore the same by a statute of 1 Ed. 6, was repealed.—So Bracton, lib. 2, cap. 24, fol. 55. And the same is cited in Coke, lib. 7, fol. 11, in Calvin's Case, 'Regis corona est facere justitiam et judicium, et tenere pacem, sine quibus corona consistere non potest, nec tenere.'—Coke, lib. 7, fol. 5, in Calvin's Case, cited out of Fortescue, 'Rex ad tutelam corporum et bonorum erectus est;' which being so, he cannot take away mens goods, or charge them without their consent, by any prerogative or royal power.

Also there can be no such necessity, or danger conceived, that may cause these writs to be awarded to all counties of England, to prepare ships at such a charge, and with such men and ammunition, without consent in parliament; for the laws have provided means for defence in times of danger, without taking this course: for that the king hath power to command all, or any persons of his kingdom, to attend with arms at the sea-coasts, to defend the coasts, or any other parts of the kingdom; and also by his officers, to make stay or arrest, all or any the ships of merchants, and others having ships; or as many as he pleaseth to go with his navy, to any parts of his kingdom, for defence thereof; and to attend those to whom he appointed the guard of the seas, or the sea-coasts, at such times and places as they should appoint. And this has been always taken and conceived to be sufficient for defence, against any prince whatsoever; and yet the same was in times, when the navy of England was not so strong, as now by the blessing of God and the good providence of his majesty it is.—That this course was then so taken, appeareth by divers records, viz. 23 Ed. 1, m. 4, the Record reciteth, That the French king had prepared a great navy upon the sea, and purposed to invade the kingdom, 'et linguam Anglicanam de terra delere;' and thereupon the king commanded all the ships, and men with arms, to be in readiness to defend the kingdom.

Rot. Scot. 10 Ed. 3, m. 16, reciteth, That certain galleys in parts beyond the seas, were prepared with provisions of men, and arms, and other necessaries of war, and ready to invade the land: Command was, that divers ships should be in readiness to defend the same; and the ships of the ports of Ireland to be sent into England to help to defend the kingdom.

Scot. 10 Ed. 3, m. 24. A writ was to the bailiff of South Wales, (reciting, That the Scots and divers others confederating together, prepare themselves to arms and ships in a great number, and intend to invade the kingdom) to command them to have one ship ready upon the sea to defend their coasts. The like writ was then to North Wales.

Alm' 12 Ed. 3, m. 10. A writ to the mayor of London: 'Quia hostes nostri in galleis cum multitudine non modica congregati in diversis partibus regni hostiliter ingressi sunt, et civitatem predictam celeriter si possunt invadere proponunt.' The king commandeth them to shut up the city towards the water, and to put all their men in arms ready to defend, &c.

Alm' 13 Ed. 3, m. 13. A writ to the bailiff of Great Yarmouth: 'Quia pro certe didicimus quod hostes nostri Franci et adhaerentes eisdem galleas et naves guerrinas in copia multitudine in partibus exteris congregarunt, et iis homines ad arma parari faciunt, et proponunt se movere versus regnum nostrum et navigium regni nostri et portus prope mare situat pro viribus destruere, et id regnum invadere, &c.' command the same town to prepare four ships with 140 men, &c.—At the same time writs went forth to twenty other towns upon the sea-coasts. Franc. 26 Ed. 3, m. 5. Writ to the earl of Huntingdon and others, 'Quia adversarii nostri Francie nos et regnum nostrum invadere machinantes, magnum navigium preparari fecerunt et armari, dum ad regnum nostrum Angliae subito attrahend' sed ad nos et dominium nostrum et totam nationem Anglicanam pro viribus subvertend' &c.' commanding them to guard all the sea-coasts of Kent, and to array all men to be ready with arms to defend the sea-coasts.

5 Hen. 4, m. 28. A commission is to Thomas Morley and others: 'Quod cum inimici nostri Francie Britan' Scot' et al' sibi adherentes inter se obligati magna potentia armat' super mare in estat. prox' futur' ordinaverunt regnum nostr' Angliae invadere, &c.' commanding them to array men with arms to defend, &c.

4 Hen. 3, par. 2. The king by proclamation to the county of Kent, sheweth, that it is come to his knowledge of certain, that his ancient enemy, the French king, hath prepared and put in readiness a great and strong navy, furnished with men of war, to invade the kingdom of England; the king appoints the lord of Abergavenny and others, to put men in array, and to be ready to defend that county.

Anno 1588, when the great invasion was by the navy, termed The Invincible Navy, which was foreseen long before, this course of preparing ships by every county of the kingdom was not appointed; yet in all these times, when there appeared so great danger of invasion, there never went any such writ into any of the counties of England, to provide ships: But the navy of England, and army of England, was always accounted sufficient for the defence of the kingdom.

So I conclude this point, that I conceive this course cannot be taken by any prerogative or royal power, nor any allegation of necessity or danger.

For the fourth point, I conceive, that if it were legal to lay such charge upon maritime parts; yet to charge any inland county with making of ships, and furnishing them with more

'defence ought to be borne by all in general.' This I hold to be agreeable to law and reason; this opinion I do still and shall always maintain; for where the kingdom is in danger, the king may command every person of his kingdom with all his force to come and defend it at all times and in all places of his kingdom where he pleaseth; and the king is the sole judge of the danger, and of war and peace; and if any do not perform his commands therein, he is fineable and punishable in a deep manner.

The second was in Feb. 1636, which is thus, 'That when the good and safety of the kingdom in general is concerned, and the whole kingdom in danger, his majesty may by writ under the great seal of England command all his subjects of this kingdom at their charges to provide and furnish such number of ships with men, victuals and ammunition, and for such time as his majesty shall think fit, for the defence and safeguard of the kingdom from such danger. And that his majesty may compel the doing thereof, in case of refusal and refractoriness. And that in this case his majesty is sole judge of the danger, and when and how the same is to be prevented and avoided.'

To this opinion, I confess, I then with the rest of the judges subscribed my hand; but I then dissented to that opinion, and then signified my opinion to be, that such a charge could not be laid by any such writ, but by parliament: and so absolutely in that point one other did agree with me, and discussed from that opinion; and four others, in some other particulars, from that which was subscribed. But the greater part seeming absolutely to be resolved upon that opinion, some of them affirming that they had seen divers records and precedents of such writs, satisfying them to be of that judgment; I was pressed to subscribe with them, for that the major part must involve the rest, as it was said to be usual in cases of difference, and for that the lesser number must submit to the major, although they varied in opinion; as it is in our court, if three judges agree in opinion against one, or two where there are five judges, judgment is to be entered per curiam, if the major part agree, and the other are to submit to it: and in cases of conference, and certificate of their opinions, if the greater part did agree and subscribe, the rest were to submit their opinions. And thus by more ancient judges than myself was affirmed to be the continual practice: And that it was not fit, especially in a case of this nature so much concerning the service of the king, for some to subscribe, and some to forbear their subscriptions: And that although we did subscribe, it did not bind us, but that in point of judgment, if the case came in question judicially before us, we should give our judgments as we should see cause after the arguments on both sides, and we were not bound by this sudden resolution.

Hereupon I consented to subscribe; but I then said, that in the mean time the king might be misinformed, by our certificate under our hands, conceiving us all to agree together and to give him this advice under our hands, and not know there was any dis-assented or was doubtful: but it was then said, the king should be truly informed thereof; and thereupon we that dis-assent, did subscribe our hands with such protestations as aforesaid, only for conformity, although contrary to the opinion I then conceived.

But this being before arguments heard on either side, or any precedents seen, I hold that none is bound by that opinion. And if I had been of that opinion absolutely, now having heard all the arguments on both sides, and the reasons of the king's counsel to maintain this writ, and why the defendant is to be charged; and the arguments of the defendant's counsel against the writ, and their reasons why the defendant should not be charged to pay the money assessed him; and having duly considered of records and precedents cited and shewed unto me, especially those of the king's side, I am now of an absolute opinion that this writ is illegal, and declare my opinion to be contrary to that which is subscribed by us all. And if I had been of the same opinion that was subscribed, yet upon better advisement being absolutely settled in my judgment and conscience in a contrary opinion, I think it no shame to declare that I do retract that opinion, for humanum est errare, rather than to argue against my own conscience. And therefore none having, as I conceive, removed those difficulties, I shall proceed to my argument, and shew the reasons of my opinion, and leave the same to my lords and brothers. Not one precedent nor record in any precedent time, that hath been produced or shewed unto me, that doth maintain any writ, to lay such a charge upon any county inland or maritime.

I have examined this particular writ, and the several parts thereof; and do conceive it is illegal, and not sufficient to ground this charge upon the defendant.

1. The motives of this writ are not sufficient to cause such a writ to be sent forth. 2. The command of the writ to prepare a ship at the charge of the inhabitants, which mentions victuals and men, is against the common laws and statutes of this kingdom. 3. That to lay a charge of finding victuals, and wages of soldiers and mariners, is illegal, and contrary to the common laws and divers statutes. 4. The power of assessment given to the sheriff alone, and to distrain for this, is illegal, and not warranted by any precedent. 5. The power of imprisoning is illegal, and contrary to divers statutes, and not warranted by the precedents. 6. That the preclose of the writ, and the practice of it, is contrary to itself, and oppositum in objecto. 7. If this writ were legal, yet the manner of the assessment by the sheriff as it is certified, is not warranted by this writ; consequently the sum cannot be demanded of the defendant by virtue of this writ. 8. That the Certiorari and Sci' Fac' issued not legally, and consequently no judgment can be given against the defendant thereupon.

until I had perused all these records sent me by the king's counsel, and satisfied my judgment therein.

But now I answer, that if there were any such precedent (as I shall shew there was not one shewed to me) to prove this writ to be usual, yet it were not material; for now we are not to argue what hath been done de facto, for many things have been done, which were never allowed; but our question is, what hath been done, and may be, de jure. And then, as it is said in Coke, lib. 4, fol. 13, in Witton's Case, it is said 'Multitudo errantium non parit errori patrociniūm;' and lib. 4, fol. 94, in Slade's Case; multitude of precedents, unless they be confirmed by judicial proceedings, in courts of record, are not to be regarded; and none of these were ever confirmed by judicial record, but complained of.

But to give a more clear answer unto them, I say that in my opinion, upon view and serious reading of all the records that have been sent me on the king's part; for I have read them all over verbatim, and I presume they sent all they conceived to be material, and I have taken notes of every one of them, and diligently considered of them, I conceive that there is not any precedent or record of any such writ sent to any sheriff of any inland county to command the making of ships at the charge of the county; but this is the first precedent that ever was since the Conquest that is produced in this kind.

But it is true, that before 25 Ed. 1, there have been some writs to maritime towns and ports, and other towns, as London, &c. where they have had ships and mariners, to provide and prepare ships, and to send them to such places as the king pleased to appoint, upon any just cause of fear of any danger, for the defence of the sea and kingdom: and great reason, that they having ships and masters of ships and mariners, should be at the king's command, to bring all or as many as he pleaseth for the defence of the sea and kingdom, being those that had the most benefit of the seas, and likely to have the greatest loss if the sea and coast were not daily guarded; and those were appointed most commonly to be at the king's charge, but sometimes upon necessity they were appointed to be at the charges of the towns and ports adjoining: which I think was the true cause of the complaint in parliament in 25 Ed. 1, and of the making that statute for the staying of that course: for there is no record of any such writs afterwards in Edward 1's time, after that statute to maritime towns, to prepare or send ships at the charge of the towns.

But in the time of Ed. 3, then the war being between him and the French king in annis 10, 11, 12, et 13 of that king, where the most writs awarded to maritime towns, to send ships at their charges sufficiently furnished; and those I think were the principal cause of the making of the statute of 14 Ed. 3, cap. 1. And after that statute no such writs, nor any commissions for that purpose were awarded to any maritime towns, or inland towns, for the making of ships, but one; which record was much pressed by Mr. Attorney, and afterwards by my brother Weston, and my brother Berkeley, to prove, that this course was, and might be practised after the statute of 14 Ed. 3, for sending forth such writs, and allowed: but that record is fully satisfied, for it was grounded upon an ordinance of parliament in 1 Rich. 2, m. 52, that all ancient cities, burroughs, and towns, that would then, should have their charters confirmed without any charge of fine, save only to make a ship of war for defence of the realm: so this was not compulsory to any, but voluntary to those that would have their liberties confirmed. And afterwards, in 1 Hen. 4, commissions were awarded for making such vessels of war; but those issuing forth without any ordinance of parliament, were complained of in parliament 2 Hen. 4, and no such writs issued forth in any age, to any maritime towns, to make ships, or prepare ships at their own charge for the king's service, until these late writs.

This general answer I give to all the records; and now I shall take a short view of all the records that have been cited and sent to me, and leave them to the judgment of my lords and others, if any of them prove these writs usual and legal.

6 Joh. m. 1. 3 Joh. m. 3, 14 Joh. m. 2, 17 Joh. m. 7. Three of these are to arrest and make stay of ships, that they should not go out of the kingdom, but to be ready for the king's service; and the other was to bring ships of particular towns to the mouth of the Thames, for the king's service.

19 Joh. m. 4. A commission to guard the seas to Joh. de Marshal, and to the sheriff of the county of Lincoln, and to all others to attend his commands.

15 Joh. Writ to the barons of the cinqueports, and divers other towns, to have their ships ready for the king's service.

14 Hen. 3, m. 14, 14 Hen. 3, m. 5. A writ to the bailiff of Portsmouth, to prepare one galley. A commission to the sheriff of Rochester, and another to the sheriff of Kent, to cause all men to be in arms in that county, and to assess them what arms they should find.

43 Hen. 3, m. 4. A writ to the sheriff of Norfolk, commanding him to cause them appointed to attend all the coasts in that county, who having served 40 days intended to depart, that they should stay eight days longer by reason of the danger, and longer, if need required. The like were sent to the sheriffs of Suffolk and Essex.

48 Hen. 3, m. 2. A writ to the mayor of Bedford, commanding him to provide for the expences of them that were sent from thence for the guarding of the seas; yet it is but for eight days more after the date of the writ.

48 Hen. 3, m. 3. A writ to the men of Essex, Norfolk, and Suffolk, appointed to attend for the guarding of the sea-coasts, reciting, that the king had appointed T. de M. 'Custod' 'maris et part' maritim' within their counties, commanding them to assist him, and to perform therein what he required.

48 Hen. 3, m. 7. A writ to the sheriff of Cambridge and Huntingdon, to command all men of those counties, able to bear arms, to come to the king to London.

25 Ed. 1, m. 5. A writ to those of Essex, Norfolk, and Suffolk, reciting, that such persons were appointed 'ad custod' maritim' in those parts, commanding them to attend them. Another to the sheriffs of Norfolk and Suffolk, reciting, that certain constables were appointed to assess men at arms, sufficient for the guarding of the sea-coasts, commanding them to distrain and compel them assessed to go.

24 Ed. 1, m. 17. Writs to the sheriffs of Lincoln, York, and Northumberland, reciting, that he had commanded 'A. de B. ad congregand' 'et capiend' centum naves,' between Leigh and Berwick, 'et ad homines potentes in eis' pouend', commanding them to assist him therein.

24 Ed. 1, rot. 69. A writ out of the Exchequer to Adam de Guerdo 'et aliis gardianis' of the sea-coasts in the county of Southampton, to distrain the abbot of Reading, to find horses, which he was assessed at for that service.

24 Ed. 1, m. 16. Writs to all archbishops, bishops, earls, &c. in the counties of Somerset, Devon, and Cornwall, to attend with their horsemen and footmen, for defence of the sea-coasts in those parts, when they shall be required by the guardian of those coasts.

24 Ed. 1, m. 71. A writ out of the Exchequer, directed to all archbishops, bishops, earls, &c. in the county of Norfolk, reciting, that Peter de Rutlin was appointed 'ad custodiend' 'partium maritimar' illarum,' commanding them to assist him.

24 Ed. 1, rot. 78. A writ out of the Exchequer to the sheriff of Berks, reciting, that the king was informed by Adam de Griden, guardian of the sea-coasts in the county of Southampton, that those men in the county of Berks, who were assigned to come to the defending of the sea-coasts in those parts, came not as they were warned, commanding to distrain them, and compel them to come and to do the service.—The like writs were then awarded to the sheriffs of Wilts and Southampton, &c.

24 Ed. 1, rot. 81. A writ to the bailiffs of Great Yarmouth, reciting, that the king was informed, that certain in Flanders and France, in a great multitude, appareled like fishermen, intended to invade their town, warning them to gather their ships together, and all their arms, to defend themselves against such an attempt.

24 Ed. 1, inter com'. A writ to all sheriffs and bailiffs, &c. reciting, that he had appointed some therein named, 'ad congregand' numerum 'navium et galliarum majorum, &c,' commanding the sheriffs in their several counties to be assisting to them therein.

24 Ed. 1, m. 9. A writ of Supersedeas to the guardian of the seas in the county of Southampton, to discharge Hugh de Plessis to find arms for his lands in that county, for guarding of the seas, because he was in service with the king.

Nota, All these Records are for arrays, and congregating ships, but none to make or prepare ships at the charges of the counties.

24 Ed. 1, m. 26. A writ to the sheriff of Essex to discharge for the winter time those that stay at the sea-coast, with their arms to defend the coast; but commanding them to be in a readiness when they should be again commanded. The like writs were then awarded to divers sheriffs of maritime counties to the same purpose.

25 Ed. 1, m. 12. A writ to the sheriff of Lancaster, reciting, that whereas the king had formerly commanded him to go to all the ports and towns where ships were, commanding the bailiffs of the ports to have all the ships of burden of 40 tons at Winchelsea, by such a day; now commandeth the sheriff to see them made ready, and sent thither accordingly.

Ibid. m. 13. The like writs directed to the sheriffs of Lincoln, York, Northumberland, and Cumberland.

Ibid. m. 14. The like writs directed to nineteen other ports and towns in other counties.

21 Ed. 1, m. 20. A commission to send away men at arms in the county of Westmorland.

21 Ed. 1, rot. 77. In the exchequer, shewed by the defendant's counsel, writs went to several maritime towns upon the sea-coasts, and other towns where ships were usually made, to make ships and galleys; and that the king will allow and pay for them, when he knoweth the charge thereof.

Pat. 9 Ed. 2, part 2. A writ to all men in the towns upon the sea-coasts, and ports of the sea, between Southampton and Falmouth, reciting, that the king had appointed John de Norton to make provision for a navy in those towns and ports, at their charges, he commandeth them to perform what he in that behalf shall require.

Claus. 20 Ed. 2, m. 8. A writ to the bailiff of Yarmouth, reciting, that whereas the king had commanded all the ships of the burden of fifty tons, from the Thames mouth towards the West parts, to be at Portsmouth such a day, &c. and they had sent two ships: that the masters and mariners complained, that they could not serve without wages, and therefore appointed them to send them wages.

20 Ed. 2, m. 10. A writ to the bailiffs of Yarmouth, commanding them to send all their ships of the burden of thirty tons and above, to Orewell in Suffolk, with double tacking, victuals, and other things necessary for one month.

The like writs at the same time to other towns, to the number of four and thirty.

20 Ed. 2, m. 10. A writ to the mayor of London, to provide three ships with men and ammunition to go with nine ships of Kent to guard the sea-coasts.

15 Ed. 2, m. 15. A writ to the sheriff of Norfolk, commanding him to warn all barons, bannerets, knights, and others of that county, to attend the king at Coventry, at such a day to go with the king.

15 Ed. 2, m. 15. Writs to the sheriffs of Norfolk and Suffolk, commanding them to arrest all barons, bannerets, knights and esquires, who were commanded to attend the king at Coventry, such a day therein named, and came not, to be before the king and his council to answer it.

The record saith, like writs were then awarded to divers sheriffs of other counties.

16 Ed. 2, m. 13. A commission to array all persons between the ages of sixteen and sixty, with arms convenient, to come to the king, when they shall be required.

19 Ed. 2, m. 6. A writ to the archbishop of Canterbury, commanding him to array all his servants and families, to be ready to defend the kingdom, if any invasion should be.

The like writs at that time to all the bishops.

2 Ed. 3, m. 92. A writ to the mayor and bailiff of Southampton, commanding them to cause all their ships of the burden of forty tons, and above, to be furnished with men of arms, and victuals, ready to defend the land, if any invasion shall happen.

Scot. 7 Ed. 3, m. 19. A commission to Hugh Courtney, to guard the seas in the counties of Devon and Cornwall, and commanding all others to assist him.

10 Ed. 3, m. 25. The like commission to Hugh Courtney, for guarding the seas in the same counties.

Ibid. A writ to Bartholomew de Insula, for custody of the sea-coast in the county of Southampton; and therein is a command to John Tichborne, and others for the county of Southampton, and to Will. de Parshire, and others for the county of Berks; and to Joh. Mareditt, and others, for the county of Wilts, to array men with arms, and to have them in readiness to defend the coasts of Southampton.

Scot. 10 Ed. 3, m. 2. A writ to Will. Clinton, guardian of the Cinque-ports and others, to survey all the ships of the Cinque-ports, and other ports from the mouth of the Thames to Portsmouth, and to cause them to be furnished with arms and victuals for 13 weeks, from the time they shall go from Portsmouth.

Scot. 10 Ed. 3, m. 2. A writ to the mayor of Winchelsea, to cause ships appointed for that town to be furnished with men and arms, and victuals, and other necessaries for 13 weeks.

Scot. 10 Ed. 3, m. 16. A writ to the admiral of the fleet from the mouth of the Thames to the west parts, to keep upon the seas the ships of the Cinque-ports, and other ships arrested to defend the kingdom against attempt of any invasion.—The like writ was then to the admiral of the fleet, from the mouth of the Thames to the north parts, with the like command to hold the ships together upon the sea.

Scot. 10 Edw. 3, 16. A writ commanding the ships of the ports of Ireland to be sent hither to guard the seas here.

10 Ed. 3, m. 12. A writ to the bailiff of Yarmouth, to cause the men of that town to contribute to the charges of the ships and men, and victuals, sent from thence for the defence of the kingdom.

Scot. 10 Edw. 3, m. 22. A writ to all the bailiffs of liberties, and men of South-Wales, to have one ship riding upon the seas for defence of those parts.—The like to the men of North-Wales.

Scot. 10 Edw. 3, m. 21. A writ to the arrayers of men for the county of Berks, to compel them of that county, assigned and assessed for the keeping of the sea-coast in the county of Southampton, to go to Portsmouth by a day therein appointed.

Alm' 12 Ed. 3, m. 12. A commission reciting, that the king had appointed all the ships from the mouth of the Thames northwards, to be arrested, and to cause them to be furnished with ammunition, men and victuals, and to be brought to Yarmouth; and that the men of Lynn refused to contribute to the expence of the charge of the men sent in the ship from that town, and the furnishing of that ship; and therefore commands the commissioners therein named, to assess them that refuse to contribute and distrain them.

Alm' 12 Edw. 3, m. 13. The like to compel the men of Bardesey to contribute for the expences of the men of that town.

Claus. 12 Edw. 3, m. 17. The like to compel the men of the counties of Surrey and Sussex, to contribute to the expences of the men of those counties, that did attend for the guarding of the sea-coasts in those parts.

Vasc. 12 Edw. 3, m. 8. A writ to all archbishops, bishops, &c. and to the sheriff of Kent, and the barons of the Cinque-Ports, and all others in that county, commanding them to be assisting to J. de Cobham, to whom the custody of the sea in those parts is committed; and to defend those coasts against any foreign invasion that shall happen.

Alm' 12 Edw. 3, m. 10. A writ to the mayor of London, reciting the danger of invasion, and commanding to shut up the gates at the water-side, if the enemies approach.

Alm' 13 Edw. 3, m. 12. A writ to the bailiff of Yarmouth, reciting that he had by his writ commanded four ships of war of that town to be made ready with men, ammunition, and victuals for three months, at the charges of the town, to be brought to Orewell, and that they failed to come at the day, to the great peril of the land; therefore commandeth the bailiff to compel them at another day therein prefixed, to be at the same place.—There it is set down, that the like writs were awarded to the bailiffs of seventeen other towns, for sending their ships, being charged some of them for one ship, and some for two ships.

Claus. 13 Edw. 3, m. 38. A Supersedeas for the abbot of Ramsey, for being charged with arms for guarding the coasts in Norfolk, for his lands in Norfolk, because he was by command attending with all his forces in the county of Huntingdon, for the safety of these parts.

Claus. 13 Edw. 3, m. 14. A writ of supersedeas to the arrayers of arms in the county of Oxon, to discharge John Mauditt to serve there, because he served in Wilts.

Claus. 13 Ed. 3, m. 14. A writ to the arrayers of arms in the county of Wilts, which is only concerning the payment of soldiers wages, who then attended to guard the sea-coasts.

These being all the records shewed me, it appeareth that there were no writs issuing out in those times to any sheriffs of inland counties, or maritime counties, to make or prepare ships upon any occasion whatsoever, but only to maritime towns, to send their ships, or prepare their ships, at their own charges.

The records shewed me since 14 Ed. 3, do not shew any writs to be awarded to any maritime town to prepare ships at the charge of the towns, except the records of 1 Rich. 2, and 1 Hen. 4, which I have before answered; and they since that time shewed unto me, except such as I have mentioned in my argument, are these:

Scot. 10 Edw. 3, m. 14. A commission to Nicholas de Cartlope, to array men to resist the Scots.

Ibid. A writ to the mayor of York, to array all their men to be ready when they shall be required.

20 Edw. 3, m. 15. A commission concerning the arrays of men in the counties of Derby and Nottingham, and to punish them that come not when they are warned.

Rot' Franc' 21 Ed. 3, m. 31. A writ to the arrayers of men in the county of Southampton, to discharge the abbot of Battel, for finding arms for defence of the sea-coasts there.

Franc' 25 Ed. 3, m. 20. A commission to John Bodingham, for the custody of the port and maritime parts in Cornwall, and to array all men to be in readiness. There is set down, that the like commission is to others in several other counties.

Franc' 26 Edw. 3, m. 5. A commission to the earl of Huntingdon and others, to have the custody of the ports in Kent, and to array men, and to set up beacons; which is the first I observe of this kind.

Franc' 46 Ed. 3, m. 34. The like commission then to several other persons, to array men in several counties, as Warwick, Oxon, Berks, and Bucks.

A writ to the archbishop of Canterbury, reciting the danger of invasion by the French, to hurt the church and kingdom, commanding him to array all his clergy in his diocess, and to be ready to go with the king's forces, &c.—

The like writs to all other bishops in the kingdom.

Franc' 50 Edw. 3, m. 47. A writ to the arrayers of men in the county of Norfolk, and to the sheriff of Norfolk, commanding them to command all great men, and others that have mansions upon or near the sea-coasts, to resort to them with all their families, for the defence of the coasts.—The like to the arrayers and sheriffs of ten other maritime counties.

Scot. 29 Ed. 3, m. 13. A commission to the bishop of Durham and others, to array men in Durham, Cumberland, and Northumberland, to resist the Scots.

Franc' 40 Edw. 3, m. 31. A writ to William Zouch and others, to remove with all their families to their houses upon the sea-coasts.

Nota, That all the records are for arraying men, and none for preparing ships.

1 Rich. 2, m. 7. A writ to the bailiffs of Scarborough, because their town was upon the coasts of the sea, and in danger of invasion, carefully to look to the custody thereof.

Eod' rot' m. 12. A writ to the mayor and bailiffs of Oxford, to repair the walls of the town, and to compel those that had lands there, to contribute to the expences thereof.

This record hath been much urged by Mr. Solicitor and Mr. Attorney, that if the king have such a power to command the walls of a town to be repaired, much more to command ships to be made, which are the walls of the sea, and consequently the walls of the kingdom.

But this is clearly answered; for that it is but a private town, and that which hath been formerly so walled, and for defence and safety of the town; and none were to be charged but those that had benefit thereby; and so it proveth nothing to the case in question.

Eod' rot' m. 42. One writ to the sheriff of Kent, and another to the sheriff of Essex, commanding them to perform an ordinance made by the king and his council, for setting up of beacons, and keeping watch about them.

Scot. 7 Ric. 2, m. 8. A writ to the archbishop of Canterbury to command all his clergy, between sixteen and sixty, to be arrayed and put in arms, both horse and foot, according to their qualities, to defend the kingdom.

Franc' 11 Ric. 2, m. 13. A writ to serjeants at arms, to arrest all ships of war in the ports of Plymouth, or Dartmouth, and other ports, in the county of Cornwall; and to bring them to Hunkshooke, to go with the king's majesty's ships.

In the same roll, divers other writs to divers other sheriffs at arms, to arrest the ships in divers other ports.

Scot. 21 Rich. 2, m. 3. A commission to the duke of Albemarle, to array men in the West-Marches, towards Scotland, to resist the Scots.

Rot. Viagii, 1 Hen. 4, m. 11. A writ to the sheriffs of Derby and Nottingham, reciting, That the king certainly understood that the Scots intended with a great power to invade the kingdom; commanding them to proclaim in all parts in their counties, That all men between sixteen and sixty, should put themselves into arms, competent according to their degrees and qualities, to be ready upon two days warning at any time, to defend the kingdom. The like writs were then directed to the sheriffs of Lincoln, York and Lancaster.

Claus. 1 Hen. 4, m. 12. A writ to the archbishop of Canterbury: 'Satis informati estis qualiter inimici mei Franciæ et alii sibi ad-hærentes, cum magna classe navium, cum magna multitudine armator' super mare congregator' diversas villas per coeterum regn' mei invadere, et nos et regnum meum dec' trueret, et ecclesiam Anglicanam subvertere intendunt et proponunt; thereupon commands, That the clergy in that diocess be arrayed and armed, and to be ready to go against the enemy.—The like writs to all other bishops in England.

Nota, Although this great danger be mentioned, yet no command to prepare ships.

Pat. 5 Hen. 4, part 2, m. 28. A commission to Thomas de Morley, and others, and to the sheriffs of Norfolk and Suffolk, and to the bailiffs of Great Yarmouth, reciting, 'Quod cum inimici Franciæ, Scotiæ, et alii sibi ad-hærentes se obligat' magna potentia armat' super mare in æstat' proxim' futur' ordinaver' et intendunt reg' invadere,' &c. Command to survey the town of Yarmouth, and fortify it.

Nota, Here also, though such great danger and distance of time, yet no writs issued to any counties to prepare ships.

Pat. 3 Hen. 5, part 2, m. 37. A commission to array all men at arms in the West Riding in Yorkshire, to be ready to defend those parts.—The like commissions to others, in nineteen other several counties.

Pat. 13 Hen. 6, m. 10, Pat. 39 Hen. 6, m. 11. Pat. 39 Hen. 6, m. 12. Pat. 39 Hen. 6, m. 1. Commissions for arraying of men for the defence of the kingdom, if invasion shall be; and for repressing of rebels.

Pat. 10 Ed. 4, m. 12. Commissions to Geo. duke of Clarence, et al' to array men for defence.

Pat. 10 Ed. 4, m. 13. A commission to John lord Howard, to be captain of all the forces.

Pat. 49 Hen. 6, m. 29. A commission to marquess Mountague, to array and put in arms all men beyond Trent.

Pat. 1 Hen. 7, part 1. A commission to Richard Fitz-Hugh, and others, and to the sheriff of Yorkshire, to array and cause to be armed, all able persons, abbots and others, to be ready to defend the kingdom.

1 Hen. 7, part 1. A writ to the sheriffs of Norfolk and Suffolk, to proclaim in all parts in those counties, for that there was likely to be open war between Charles king of France and the king of the Romans, and great navies are prepared on either side; commands. That watch and ward be kept, and beacons kept to give warning; and that every man be ready, if need be, to come and defend the kingdom.

4 Hen. 8, part 2. A writ to the sheriff of Kent, commanding him to proclaim in that county, That the king being certainly informed, that the French king had prepared a great and strong navy, furnished with men of war, to invade the kingdom; therefore commandeth all men between the age of sixteen and sixty, to put themselves in arms, to be ready to defend the kingdom at an hour's warning.

11 Eliz. Commissioners went to take a view of all the horses in England fit for service, and to survey all the arms, to have them all put in readiness, as necessity should require.

Now it appeareth upon view and examination of all these Records, most of them being cited by Mr. Solicitor and Mr. Attorney, in their several arguments, there are none of them to prove the sending of any such writs to inland or maritime counties to prepare ships; although there have been many times great danger; nor yet any writs to maritime towns, after the statute of 14 Ed. 3, to charge them to find any ships at their charges.—So then I conclude this point, That I conceive this writ is not warranted by any former precedent.

Now I come to examine the point of this writ, Whether the same be legal and warranted by any former precedent: and I conceive it is not.

1. The motives mentioned in the writ are, 'Quia datum est nobis intelligi,' which is no certain information: 'Quod quidam prædones et maris grassatores,' did take the king's subjects, merchants, and others, and carried them into miserable captivity. 'Cumque ipsos concipimus navig' indies præparantes ad mercatores nostros molestand' et reg' most' gravandum.'—All these, and those following, I conceive are not sufficient motives, and were never in any precedent before to have a royal navy prepared. For the former precedents are, that great princes in open time of hostility had provided great navies with ammunition and soldiers, with intent to invade the kingdom, as appeareth by the former precedents: and against such provisions it was necessary to provide the royal navy, the king's ships, and all the ships of the kingdom, to be gathered together to withstand them. But to make such preparations against pirates, it was never put in any writ before; for when pirates infested the seas, they came as it were by stealth, to rob and to do mischief; and they never dared appear but when they may do mischief, and escape away by their swiftness. But against them, the usual course hath been, that the admiral or his deputy with some few ships have secured the coast, and not to employ the whole navy. And this appeareth by a record, 25 Ed. 1, m. 9, William Leighbourn the admiral was appointed upon such an occasion with ten ships to lie upon the seas, for the safeguard of the merchants: and the usual practice hath been, when they bover upon the sea, by sending a few ships of war to scatter them, and make them fly away. And there is no fear of the loss of the dominion of the sea, by any act pirates can do; either is it convenient that every county of the kingdom should provide ships against them.

2. The command of this writ is to provide a ship of 450 tons at the charges of the county, furnished with masters and mariners; which is impossible for them to do for the reasons before alledged, and therefore is illegal, and notarrantable by any former precedent.

3. The command of this writ to find wages or soldiery for 26 weeks after they came to Portsmouth, when they are out of their county, and in the king's service, is illegal; being against the course of precedents in divers times, and against divers express statutes, and this appeareth by divers records.

15 Johan. In the writs of summons of the tenants by knights service, it is expressly mentioned, that after forty days service, for so many days they were to do service by their tenure, they should be satisfied ad denarios regis.

Pasch. 26 Edw. 1. Amongst the writs of the exchequer it is there set down, that the footmen of Cheshire being 1000, who were appointed to go for the defence of the borders of Scotland, would not stir out of their counties without wages; and there it is set down, that one herein named was sent down with money to pay the said footmen.

Mich. 26 Ed. 1, inter Bria' irrot' in the exchequer, by reason of the invasion of the Scots, many thousands of soldiers were taken from divers parts of the kingdom ad vadia regis. And here it is mentioned, that clerks were sent down with money to pay the soldiers of several counties their wages.

30 Edw. 1. In the exchequer in account, the wages for land soldiers for several counties, and the wages for mariners, are set down, what the wages that were paid came to by the day, and by the week, both by sea and by land.

Trin' 31 Ed. 1, inter Brevia in the exchequer, the wardens of the marches of Scotland signified to the barons, that the men of Cumberland and Westmoreland, appointed for the defence of the marches, would not stir out of their counties without wages; whereupon order was given for wages for them.

19 Edw. 2. Commissions went out to pay soldiers, who served out of the several counties, for defence against Scotland.

Hil' 2 Edw. 3, rot. 16. In the exchequer; it was ordered in parliament, That whereas some soldiers had received of some of the king's officers, money for their wages, they were fain to give bonds for repayment, and that those bonds should be all-redelivered.

1 Edw. 3, cap. 5. That no man shall be compelled to go out of his county, but where necessity required by sudden coming of strange enemies into the county; and then shall be done, as hath been done in times past: which, I conceive, is to be at the king's wages, when any are out of their counties.

But to clear all doubts, the express statute of 18 Edw. 3, cap. 7, is, That no men of arms, hobbellers and archers, chosen to go in the king's service out of England, shall be in the king's wages from the time they go out of the counties where they were chosen, until they come again.

19 Hen. 7, cap. 1. Those that had any grants of lands from the king; and 11 Hen. 7, cap. 1, those that had any offices of the grant of the king, are to serve the king in his wars: but in both it is appointed, they shall have wages from the time they shall come from their houses, until they return.

2 & 3 Edw. 6, cap. 2. It is narrated, That no captain receiving soldiers serving by sea or land, shall receive any wages for more soldiers, or more time than they shall serve; and shall enter the days of their entering into wages, upon pain, &c.

All which records and statutes do prove, that the soldiers should be at the king's wages; therefore the command for soldiers wages for twenty-six weeks, when they go from Portsmouth, is illegal, and expressly against these statutes: and so the assessment being entire, as well for the wages, as the other charges, I hold it to be clearly illegal, and not to be demanded.

4. That the command of this writ to the sheriff, to assess men at his own discretion, is not legal, nor warranted by the precedents: for the precedents are commonly, that assessments for contribution, for making or setting out of ships, have been by commissioners, which by presumption had knowledge of such matters, as commonly sheriffs have not. Also, this leaveth to the sheriff too great a power to value men's estates, as to inhaunce whom he will, and to favour whom he will.

5. That the power to the sheriff and mayors of towns, &c. to imprison, especially as it is used, is illegal, and expressly against divers statutes, for it is provided by Mag' Char' cap. 29, 'Quod nullus capiatur vel imprisonetur, nec super eum mittimus, nisi per iudicium parium suorum, vel per legem terra.'

Also, 5 Edw. 3, cap. 9, That no man shall be attached, or his goods seized, contrary to the form of Mag' Chart'.—Also, by the statute made 37 Edw. 3, cap. 18, it is recited, That by that Great Charter, none should be taken or imprisoned, but by due process of law; yet by colour of this writ, the sheriff may imprison any person, yea, any peer of the realm: for although peers are not to be arrested upon ordinary process between party and party, as it is resolved in the countess of Rutland's Case, in Coke lib. 6, fol. 32, yet upon contempt, and upon process of contempt, which is always for the king, any peer may be imprisoned, as it is resolved by all the lords, and all the judges, in the Star-Chamber, in the earl of Lincoln's case: and so the sheriff, by colour of this writ, may arrest any peer, as for a contempt in not paying. But by the book-case, 2 Edw. 3, fol. 2, it is resolved, That a writ to imprison one upon suggestion, before he be indicted, or without due process of law, was illegal. So for this clause, I hold this writ to be illegal.

6. The last clause of this writ is, That by colour of this writ, no more should be gathered than will be sufficient for the necessary expence of the premises, and that none who shall levy any money towards these contributions, shall detain the same with them, or employ the same to other uses; and if more than did suffice were collected, it should be repaid amongst those that paid, after a rateable proportion. But as the course is taken, it is not to be performed: for no ship, nor tackling, nor ammunition, nor men, nor wages, nor victuals being provided, it is not to be known, whether more be gathered, or less than would suffice: and there being money gathered, it is of necessity either detained with the collector, or the sheriff, or employed to other uses than are appointed by the writ; so the writ is not performed: and the money assessed and collected, is not duly paid nor collected; and the money assessed and unpaid, cannot be duly demanded.

7. Admitting the writs were legal, and the commands therein legal, yet the assessment, as is certified, is not sufficient to charge the defendant; for it is not certified, that any ships with ammunition, and men, were prepared: and this is a year after the time it should have been prepared and sent to Portsmouth. And if it were not prepared, there is no cause to charge the defendant; and that not appearing to be done, it shall be conceived not to be done.—For if one be charged, in consideration of a thing to be done, before a certain time to pay a sum of money, if the thing be not performed according to the time, none can be charged for not payment of the money after the time is past: for it is in nature of a condition precedent, to have a duty or sum of money to be paid after the condition performed; and there, he that will have the duty, must shew that the condition is performed.—This appeareth in the case of 15 Hen. 7, and Coke, lib. 7, fol. 9, Ughtred's case. And therefore, if the ships be not prepared according to the writ, nor money employed for preparing a ship for and in the name of the county: then every one that paid any money, either voluntarily as in obedience to the writ, or compulsorily upon distress, may demand their money again of the sheriff, or of them that received it: for as they paid their money, so it must be disposed of, and cannot be disposed of otherwise by any command whatsoever, although it be under the great-seal: for the command being under the great-seal, to prepare and furnish a ship to such a purpose as in the writ is mentioned, and they paying it to that purpose, it cannot be otherwise disposed, although it be more for their advantage; for private men having interest therein, that cannot be taken from them, nor dispensed withal. Therefore, in Coke, lib. 7, fol. 37, in the Case of Penal Laws, it is resolved, That if the penalty appointed to be forfeited upon a penal statute, be given to the poor of the parish where the offence is committed, the king cannot dispense with the penalty for that offence, because the poor have an interest therein; but if the penalty be given part to the king, and part to the poor, the king may dispense with his own part, but not with the part of the poor.

Object.—And where it hath been said, That it is by way of accommodation, because the country cannot well know how to provide to content, and perhaps with more charge, Respons.—To this it is answered, They must do it at their peril, if the writ be legal; and then if it be done, they shall have the benefit thereof. For as my brothers Weston and Berkeley have both agreed, if the ship were made when the service was done, the county for which it was made shall have the benefit of the ship, ammunition, and victuals, and of the service of the men, being made more exact against another time; and the ship may with some easy charge serve again, and nothing lost, but the expence of the victuals; and the kingdom shall be so much the more strengthened by having so many ships made or prepared: and they may have account of their money how it was bestowed; and if any surplussage be gathered, to have it restored. And that the law is so, that if the money be received of the county, and not employed accordingly, the party so receiving it, and detaining it, or misemploying it, is to pay a fine to the king for the same, and is accountable for the money, appears by two records.

The one in Hill. 16 Edw. 3, rot. 23, B. R. where two soldiers were indicted, for that they taking 3*l.* a-piece towards their arms, and the bringing of them to the place where they were appointed to serve the king in England in his wars, they went not, but tarried still in their houses, and retained the armour and the money which they had received for that purpose. They thereupon being convicted, pleaded Not Guilty; and the one was found to go in the service according to the appointment, so he was discharged: and the other was found, that he received the money, and went not to do the service, nor restored the arms nor money; and thereupon he was committed to the prison, and paid to the king a fine, and found sureties to pay the money to the hundred from whom he had received it.—The other was Hill. 20 Ed. 3, rot. 37, B. R. There two high-constables were indicted, for that they, 5 Edw. 3, had received 6 marks of the towns in their hundreds, to set forth soldiers, and had not set them forth, but detained the money; which they denying, it was found that they had received the money for that purpose, and had disbursed 10*l.* 6*d.* thereof towards the setting forth of soldiers, but had retained 38*l.* 6*d.* and not disbursed it: thereupon they were fined and imprisoned, and afterwards enlarged upon sureties to pay the money they had retained undisbursed, at the next time the king commanded soldiers from those parts. By both which records, being for offences done so long before, it appeareth, that those that have received money of the country to prepare ships, and not employed it accordingly, are answerable to the king and his successors, to pay a fine for mis-employment of it, and are chargeable to those of the county of whom they received it for payment thereof.

8. For the last point, I conceive, that this Certiorari directed to the two that were late sheriffs at the time of the assessment, and not to the sheriff that was at the time of the Certiorari awarded, who is the only immediate officer to return the writs, is not legal; for it is the first that hath been seen of that kind: for all writs are directed to some immediate sheriff, requiring him to demand of the former sheriffs, what they did upon the former writ; and they are to return to him what hath been done, and he to return the same to the court, whereunto he is an immediate officer; and the former are not any officers. So the Sci' Fa' thereupon grounded, I conceive is not good: Also the Sci' Fa' to warn Mr. Hampden 'ad ostendendum' 'si quid pro se habeat, et quare de prædict' vigint' solid' onerar' non debet,' not shewing to whom, is uncertain, and is insufficient. Thereupon I conclude upon the whole matter, that no Judgment can be given to charge the Defendant.*

In Easter Term there issued forth a Sci' Fac' and this doth rehearse divers sums of money assessed upon divers persons in the county of Bucks, for providing a ship of 450 tons, with men, ammunition, &c. to attend the king's navy for defence of the kingdom. And afterwards upon a Certiorari out of Chancery, directed to the sheriff, to certify those assessments, and the names of those that made default of payment, Mr. Hampden was returned to be assessed at 20s. and hath made default. Upon this return the king by Mittimus out of the Chancery sent the writ, the Certiorari, and the return, to the barons of the Exchequer, to do as the court shall think fit. Thereupon a Sci' Fa' went forth to the sheriff to summon Mr. Hampden to shew cause why he should not pay the 20s. assessed upon him: He was returned warned, and appears and demands Oyer of the several writs and their returns, and of the Sci' Fa': and upon all this he demurreth in law, and Mr. Attorney hath joined in demurrer with him. And my Lord Chief Baron and the rest of the barons have adjourned this hither, to desire the advice of all their brothers of the law; and indeed it requires advice, for it is as great a case as ever came to be advised on before judges.

* An abridgment of these Judgments of Croke, in the handwriting of Archbishop Sancroft, is among Tanner's MSS. in the Bodleian Library.

I say it is a great case; it concerns the king in his royal prerogative, and the subject in his interest, in his land and goods, and liberty of his person. They that have spoken already, and they that shall speak after me, shall hardly escape the censure of the people, of some that have some understanding, of some peradventure that have less, and of some that have none at all, but speak according to their opinions, affections, or wills. 'Falices essent artifices, si per solos artifices judicaretur? we should be happy to be judged by them that are learned; but when it is by them that understand not, then it is turned into calumny and reproach.

Some have taxed them that have gone, or will go with the king, as though they were fearful, and went about to captivate the liberty of the people, and take away their goods. Some are taxed on the other side, if on the contrary, that they are given to popularity: so as I may say as the Psalmist, 'Domine, me posuisti in lubrico loco;' for it is impossible to escape their tongues, and between those two decks of censure I am like to fall. And however I may fall with my sentence, with God's grace I shall make no shipwreck of my conscience.

I am trusted by the king to display his justice equally to all, and sworn to dispense his just prerogative, as well as the subject's liberty; and if we do otherwise than as judges, we do as false men. If any man offend contrary to his oath, he doth forfeit his lands, goods and tenements. I shall not therefore for any respect do against my own conscience; but descend to give judgment, not regarding the watry mouths of others.

The king's counsel, and the counsel at the bar, have spoken so largely to this business, and it is spoken to by my brothers so fully, that I can hardly say any thing but what hath been said before; so I will select some few things, to satisfy my own conscience, though I cannot satisfy any man's else; which I will do as plainly as I can, and as I ought to do. And if there had not been a variety of contestation, I should have spoken very little; but now necessity requireth that I must enlarge myself a little more.

1. I will state the question, and in it put many things objected out of doors. The question is, whether the king of England, when he perceiveth danger to be imminent to the kingdom, and a necessity of defence, may not by his writ send to all counties as well inland as maritime, to require them, at the charge of the county, for a convenient time to provide shipping, with men and ammunition, &c. but no money to come to his purse, but the ships to go to defend the kingdom. The question stands not, whether the king may draw it to be a perpetual charge upon the subject, which under favour he cannot; for this goeth upon a fear of danger, which continueth but for a time, and therefore this cannot be perpetual; for when the occasion ceaseth, the taxes must likewise cease. There is a case to this purpose, 39 Hen. 6, fol. 39, Protection. Brooke. A protection granted to one for three years, and the question was, whether a good protection: the rule is, the king may grant a protection for one year, and at the year's end, renew it for another year if the occasion require it, and so for a third year; yet he cannot at the beginning give a protection for three years together. So in this case, though the king may, upon an emergent occasion, command ships, yet by reason of that occasion he cannot make it perpetual, for the occasion may cease.

2. In this case, I will not exempt the king's majesty himself, to bear a part of the burden; the head and body must go together, he must join with his subjects in the defence of the kingdom.

3. The question is not, whether for a foreign war he may command this charge; it must be only in defence of the kingdom in case of imminent danger.

4. It is not whether the king may lay this to draw a sum of money into his own purse, for the king sends to have no money; but to provide a ship: and if the sheriff accordingly provides a ship, there is an end of the business; all this is out of the case.

As Catlyn chief-justice compared a fine to Janus Bifrons having two faces, the one looking backwards, the other forwards; so may I of my argument: I shall first look backwards, and tell you quid fecimus, what we have done; and then forwards, and tell you quid faciemus, what we shall do.—The quid fecimus rests in the advice we have given to his majesty in the case, and the opinion of the judges subscribed with their hands delivered over to his majesty, (which was read at large by him.) The advice we gave consists of four assertions.

1. That when the kingdom is in danger, all the kingdom is to join in the charge of defence.

—2. What shall be adjudged a danger, and what not, his majesty is the sole judge thereof, and of the means how to prevent and avoid it.

—3. That in case of danger he hath power to send to inland counties, as well as to maritime, to assist to defend against invasion. 4. That the king hath a power of compulsion, to punish those who refuse to contribute to this charge.

This opinion being jointly and severally delivered by us, declared by my lord keeper in the Star-Chamber, in the presence of us the judges, before the lords of the council, with an intimation as if it were the full consent of all the lords of the council before hand, and there commanded to be enrolled in all the courts at Westminster; yet we so delivered our opinions, that if better reason was shown to alter them, we might recede from them; for we had better recurrere, than male currere.

Now to the second point, quid faciemus, whether to stand to this opinion or not, and then whether this book or record will warrant it, and how far it differeth from what we have done, I shall speak my conscience. I am an old man and ready for my grave, my tongue and my heart shall go together. I am of the same opinion I was then; and conceive what we then delivered was according to law; with all modesty submitting to those that have been or shall be of a contrary opinion, for the grounds of law and nature support it.

1. 'Salus populi est suprema lex. Qui sentit commodum, sentire debet et onus. Quod omnes tangit, ab omnibus debet supportari.' What do these rules intimate else, but that when a danger is imminent, the charge must lie upon the whole kingdom, and the burden must be borne by all? And that is not denied by them that were of counsel on the other side. It must not be every kind of fear and rashness that must draw this kind of burden upon the subjects; but such a danger as the king in his understanding perceiveth doth require a speedy defence.

2. That the king is sole judge of this danger, and how to prevent and avoid it, is not to be literally understood, for we are his judges deputed, but our judgment flows from him. Judgment is settled in the king, he is the fountain of justice, from whence all other proceeds. Bracton saith 'Rex vicarius Dei est in terra sua.' We are judges comulative, not primitive; so he is the supreme judge. In the parliament the king is the sole judge, the rest are but advisers. 22 Ed. 3, fol. 3. Here it is that the old fashion of penning of statutes was 'Rex statuit.' 7 Hen. 7. Afterwards it came to be with the advice of the lords and commons. Trin. 6 Hen. 6, rot. 41, Banc. Reg. There was a prior brought a writ of annuity against one in Ireland, there was judgment in the Common-Pleas; then at length a writ of error in parliament; the judgment affirmed; afterwards a writ of error in the King's-Bench here, and both judgments reversed. And in the entry of the judgment the record saith, 'Nos cum assensu et ad requisition' communitat' do reverse the judgment. Where note, the king is the man that is the sole judge thereof. (By the way observe, out of this record, the power of the king's-Bench in England; for upon this record it appears a writ of error was brought in the King's-bench in England to reverse a writ of error in parliament in Ireland.) This sheweth the king in parliament is the sole judge, the rest but advisers. So, as I said before, he is the only supreme judge of the danger himself, and of the way of prevention, whether by his council or by his parliament.

The third assertion is, that the king without parliament, in case of imminent danger, hath power to send to inland and maritime counties to provide ships. And I think he may do so by the fundamental laws, common laws, and statute laws, and by the precedents.

First of all, for the common laws, (here I leave the divines to talk of the king's power, who under favour take more liberty than is fitting to say in a pulpit; for he that will have the statute De Tallagio non Concedendo, if it be a statute, to bind the king, such a man is not Cæsar's friend, but speaks without his book) Bracton saith, that by the general law of monarchy, the subject's goods are at the king's pleasure: but a king ruling by politic advice, is to rule according to his fundamental laws, which yet in England take not away, but preserve those 'jura supremæ majestatis,' as to pardon all offences, to stamp money, and infinite others more declared in parliament, 1 Jac. which court is that 'tres haule court,' of which none ought to think dishonourably. I leave divines to talk their pleasure: We are to judge according to the fundamental laws and customs of the realm. There is a book which Mr. Attorney remembered well, that the king of England hath more power than any other king. If the king must by the law defend the kingdom, he must lay a charge to provide for the same. The common law owns the king as sovereign and head of the kingdom, that should defend and protect it. 1 Sam. 8, 19, 20. They would have a king to be adjudged by, as other nations had, and to go in and out before them; that was the fashion of kings before, to judge their people by laws, and to defend them with arms. It is an incident quality inherent in the king. It standeth with nature and reason, that the king should have the charge of the defence. If this inherent quality should be taken away, how can he defend his people? If he be no more than a common person, he cannot be a king, unless he take the defence and protection of his people upon him. Mr. Attorney shewed learnedly, the king is a monarch and sovereign, the people his subjects: he is the head of the body, and therefore may command it. Fitz. Herb. Na. Br. and Stamford Prerogative, that the king protects the bodies and lands of his subjects: he is Vicarius Dei, appointed to protect the kingdom; so there is a tie of allegiance that binds every man. Stamford, cap. 2, of Prerogative, the king by law is the protector of the body, lands, and goods of his subjects: so he hath a liberty and prerogative for this end, (not for his own profit) in the bodies, lands, and goods of his subjects, in time of danger. 11 Hen. 7. Every man in his own person is bound to serve the king for the defence of the realm; and gives a reason, and that is the reason of protections, because they are bound to it; therefore they should have no harm done unto them. The king himself cannot free any man from his allegiance, without act of parliament; neither can the subject free himself, as in Dr. Storie's case. So you see the king's majesty hath interest pro bono publico, in the person.

He hath also an interest in our estates, if it be pro bono publico; as in the case of L. it was adjudged he has power to come over mens lands. Now what prerogative hath the king concerning that? and yet, according to Popham, the two chief justices and chief baron agreed, that where a man hath an inheritance in lands and woods, the king cannot cut his woods for his private use, unless it be pro bono publico; nor dig gravel in another man's lands: but yet in case where it is pro bono publico, he may do it, and make balwarks on their grounds for defence of the kingdom.—So for pontage and murage, the king cannot compel the subject to make the walls of his own house, or a bridge for his own private use; but where it is commanded to be done, where the subject hath a benefit, there it is good: so here is the difference of the case, where the king commands for his private use, or pro bono publico.

My brother Croke saith, the king may press ships for his service, in the defence of the kingdom, but not command inland counties to furnish ships: yet there is a precedent in Oxford to the contrary.—By the fundamental laws of the kingdom, he is the defender of his subjects, of their bodies, lands, and goods; and where it is pro bono publico, they are to pay towards it. If there had not been objections that dazzled me, I should have done before this.—The case of the abbot of Robertsbridge is an allowance of this charge, a double charge of lands there in two several places. I remember in a parliament, where I learned a great deal of good, 1 Jac. the king, without consent in parliament, laid an imposition on merchandize, but was in case of necessity, pro bono publico.

Now to answer objections, and those were many, my brother Croke did double and redouble them. Brother, we sit one next another, ancient judges, though different in opinion. I speak out of my conscience, as you have spoke out of yours; so, though there be variety of opinions, yet conscience is the same.

First, saith he, the fundamental laws of the kingdom have settled a property in the goods in the subject, that, without their consents, this cannot be taken from them.—This doth not trench upon the property of the subject, if you take the case right: If this be a lawful prerogative in the king to lay this charge, then how can it be said, that the subject's property is invaded? For if the property ab initio be in the king, then the law annexed this to the lands and goods of the subject in the beginning, and made them liable to it by a secret tacit condition. If a man do enter for a condition broken, this is no divesting of the property out of the subject. If goods be given to one till such a thing happen, or upon such a condition, there is a property in the donee, yet it is clogged with a limitation and condition; and when the one or the other happens, the property may be reduced or transferred, as in all assessments and rates, goods are liable to the payment thereof: so for the payment of those things necessary for the defence of the kingdom without their consent; for if legal, what needs this condition? I would wish no man to clamour, that this is to divest the subject of the property in his goods; for it is nothing but what is for the defence of the kingdom.

The next authorities objected by my brother Croke, are the laws of William the Conqueror, and Charter of king John, then the statutes, then Fortescue; and therefrom he saith very much, that the king of England cannot lay taxes upon his subjects, without their consent in parliament. And where he speaks of taxes and charges that cannot be imposed without consent, some other places of the author do shew, that it is where the king imposeth it for

The next is 13 Hen. 4, the charges of la. upon a cloth for measuring, adjudged void. I conceive it was not adjudged void upon that point. True, in parliament it was complained of as a grievance to the subject; but every petition in parliament doth not argue a right: it may be it was ad damnum, yet absque injuria; that case differs much from this, for there was a charge to a private benefit, and no regard to the public, which perhaps the law will not allow, but where there is a quid pro quo; nor of the case of dice, cards, monopolies, those cases nothing like this: so a commission of sewers may lay a charge for the repair of a bank; when the lands are overflowed, and the owners be not able, the neighbourhood must be taxed; so in case of a bridge.

Then the statute of 2 Rich. 2, was objected; nothing must come to the king's purse, nor to the king's coffer, but it must be for the defence of the kingdom.—This was no lawful charge, because the intention was to fill the king's coffers, which were empty, and that could not be done but by parliament; so it is not in our case, no money is to come to the king's private use.—That of Hen. 4, for repealing of commissions that were awarded to provide barringers, the record saith only that the king's answer to the complaint was, 'Le roy se avisera. avec ses signores.'

Then he cometh to the statute of tonnage and poundage only for ordinary defence of the kingdom.—Why there should be any difference between an inland county and a maritime I know not, since to the common defence all are equally engaged as one intire body; and the inland counties have the benefit by sending their wools by sea, and yet they must not help to the defence of the sea. As in the natural body one member helps another, so when the maritime counties are not sufficient to make defence (as in case of extraordinary defence they cannot be) the inland county must contribute. Besides, the king may unite an inland county to a maritime, and make them but one county; is not he lord of the land as well as of the sea? What was the law before the division of counties? Surely it was equal in charging the whole kingdom; for I see no reason but an inland county should be chargeable by law, as well as a maritime. In antient times, things done upon the sea, were tried upon the land in the King's Bench, as by many records appeareth. One is of a Norman robber upon the sea.

Object.—But if this be so, the law suffereth a greater inconveniency, viz. that the king may by his writ charge what and when he pleaseth.

Respons.—This the law trusteth the king's goodness with, that he will not require it of his subjects but when there is occasion; and he may do it, so long as he continues it no longer than there is occasion.

Object.—But were not Dr. Cowel and Dr. Manwaring sentenced in parliament for such tenets?

member in the parliament, and was in the lower house when Cowel was sentenced. I will tell you what Dr. Cowel did: he wrote a book, and under the words Prerogative, Subsidies, and Kings, he inferred as if the king might make laws without consent in parliament; and wrote against the common law, which the king is sworn to maintain: thereupon he was sentenced, and his sentence was just, and I gave my voice for it. The other was Dr. Manwaring, he preached two Sermons that the king was not bound to observe his laws, that the right and liberty of the subject are at the king's will and pleasure without parliament, and that this doth bind the conscience of the subjects, and that they are bound to pay Loan-Money upon pain of eternal damnation; and that they that did refuse to pay the Loan-Money, did offend against the laws of God, and were guilty of disloyalty and disobedience; and that the authority of parliaments was not necessary to the granting of any subsidy. For this he was sentenced, and made his submission. That was for raising of money for his own use, but this is to require his subjects to provide ships for the defence of the kingdom.

Object.—The next objection was Coinage, that by that tenure great profits arise to the king for defence.

Respons.—Shall the defence of the kingdom be laid only upon those who have their maintenance out of the public revenue? What will the king have left to maintain himself, his queen, his children, intelligences abroad? Will you strip him of all? It is true, I hold that the king, with the subjects, must join together in the defence of the kingdom. If the king be rich, you should have pleaded that the king had sufficient in his purse.

Object.—Then it is objected, that there is no apparent danger, and that this charge is not allowable neither by the common law, statute law, or custom.

I say, it is due by the common law; but will you have danger so apparent, as Hannibal ad portas? Will you suffer an enemy to come in before you prepare to resist? If once he gets in, you will hardly get him out. Is not that as much to be commended, that doth prevent a danger before it cometh, as when it comes? Is not the care to prevent fire from a house before the fire takes hold of it, as great as when it is on fire to quench it? Therefore the king, like a good physician, seeing a disease growing, before it gets too much strength prevents it.

Object.—In six weeks time, a parliament may be called.

Respons.—Though it may be, yet after they meet, a long time they spend in consultation before they can do any thing: which would be too mischievous in a sudden invasion: and therefore king Ed. 3, in his 10th, 11th, and 12th years, whilst the parliament was sitting, sent forth his writs for aid.

Object.—It was alledged by Mr. Holborne, that the law of nature teacheth every man to defend himself.

Respons.—What, I pray you, will you then have done, on a sudden invasion, when forces must be raised in Cornwall, some in other parts of the kingdom as remote, and all must meet together? If the king must expect such an actual invasion, before such time as he sends forth his writs to have them all in readiness, how poorly would the kingdom be defended at that time? Our forces would be scattered, and cannot be brought together, which thus divided cannot withstand a foreign power.

Object.—The last objection was, that the king, at his pleasure, may draw when he pleaseth this charge upon the subjects, if he say he is of opinion that there is danger.

Why may not the law allow this, and trust the king's judgment here as well as in the case of a Ne exeat regno, in which if the king commands his subjects to stay at home, for such and such a cause, the case is not traversable? Fitz-Her. Na. B. 165, 85, 7 Hen. 7, saith, if the king doth rectify an act of parliament, you cannot speak against the king's certificate under the great seal; 'Null tiel record' is no plea.—Again, God Almighty bless the king; it is against presumption of law, that the king, whose heart is in the hand of the Lord, should tell a lye. God gives wisdom to govern aright. Lying lips do not become a prince. Truth to God Almighty he owes. The law says, the king may nescire verum, but not dicere falsum. The king may not know a truth, but cannot speak falsely. Next juramento strictus, he is bound to administer justice, and not to grieve his subjects. Is he so unwise to charge them and himself without cause, with providing of ships? What benefit comes to him by it? Surely to tell a lye will be no advantage to him; he were a king of wickedness to lay a charge on the subject to no purpose; thus he shall charge himself and his subjects about nothing. Does any man think he will put a burden upon his subjects without cause? We have a good king, and our imaginations ought to be good of him.

The fourth assertion is, that the king hath power to compel them to the contributing to this charge. This power of the king is a special prerogative, and if good at common law, it taketh away the statute, when it is pro bono publico, to defend the kingdom.

The general words of a statute shall never be construed to extend to it: the charter of king John shall never take away the king's prerogative, neither the statute De Tallagio non Concedendo, which I agree to be a statute, and so my lord Coke allows it to be. Now this power of the king, of which I argue, is a special prerogative in point of government; it is a proprium to a sceptre quarto modo, therefore the general words of a statute shall never be construed to extend unto it; as if the king hath a special interest in land by the prerogative, it doth not pass away without precise words, as the books are infinite in it. If the king grants away land by his letters patents, parcel of a forest, without special words, this shall remain subject to the forest-laws still: so many cases may be put, when general words of a statute extend not to a particular prerogative. If general words of the statute should take away these aids, why do they not take away the aids of 'pur faire fitz chevalier, et pur file marier.' since that general words may include them as well as this? But you all grant that these aids are not taken away, and by the same reason I conceive this remains.

My brother Crawley held that special words in an act of parliament could not take away his prerogative, because it would have been an act against reason. I will tell you what I have heard adjudged in this case. In the parliament held 1 Jac. there were two things expressly moved: One, That there might be no wardship or tenure of the king: The other, that the king might not allow surveyors. To these questions, after long disputes, it was answered by the whole parliament, that such an act of parliament to top the prerogative of tenures would be void, because it is inherent in the crown, for every man holds immediately or mediately of the king. And 2 Hen. 7, an act of parliament to restrain the king's non obstante to dispense with penal laws, as not to pardon murder, is void; his person and royal prerogative cannot be restrained by parliament. Thus I have done with the former and larger part of my argument.

Now I come to see if the record will maintain that which we have here, and I think it will bear it both for matter and form. First, let us see whether there be substance enough, to shew that there is danger sufficient for this prerogative to require aid and assistance; and I think there is sufficient, the French king, the Spaniard, the Low Countries, all up in arms; who knows what danger this kingdom may be in? and if the king say it is in danger, it is not traversable; if the king had said no more but this, pro defensione regni, without any more saying, it had been sufficient. It also recites that there were predones, pirates, that took away both men and ships; and that foreign provision was making to take away the dominion of the sea; and that all this was 'ad gravandum regnum nostrum:' and therefore commands a ship to be provided 'ad defensionem regni.' Here the danger is general, and therefore the defence must be general.—An indifferent and equal assessment is first to be made, and then the overplus of the provision to be restored according to the writ; for until the money be had, how can the provision be made; Though it has been said, let the ships be first built, and then make the assessment; that cannot be, for with what shall the provision be made? The money must do it.

For matter of precedents, as Danegelt, &c. I do not much stand upon, because I had not time to peruse them, but conclude on my former reasons.

My Lord Chief Justice asked him what his advice was; he answered,

My advice is upon the whole matter, that the barons finding the other process of court and Sci' Fa' to be according to the Exchequer, (for that I leave to them) Judgment shall be given that Mr. Hampden shall be charged with the 20s. with this limitation and condition, that none of it comes to the king's purse, for if it do, my opinion is against it.

—The king by his Writ 4 Aug. informs us that there were gathered 'piratæ ac maris grassatores,' and that they were gathered together in hostile manner to hinder our merchants from bringing their goods into our ports; and reciteth, that there are wars abroad, and that considering these perils and dangers, and that the defence of the kingdom consists in the defence of the sea, which at all times belonged to this kingdom, and that the charge of defence is to be borne by all; and the king is loth that in his time such an honour as the dominion of the sea should fall away or be diminished, and not be defended, hath therefore sent a Writ to the sheriff of Bucks (as to other counties) to provide a Ship of such a burden against the 1st of March, and to come to Portsmouth, and there to remain for 26 weeks, and to do as shall be directed them for the defence of this kingdom. And the Writ directed, that all that are inhabitants shall be assessed for the providing of this ship with men and ammunition.—By force of this writ, Mr. Hampden being assessed at 20s. there went forth a Certiorari a year and a half after, directed to the sheriff of the county of Bucks, to certify what sums they had assessed by virtue of the said Writ 4 Aug. and there are two several certificates returned into Chancery; one, that Mr. Hampden was assessed at 20s. the other, that he hath not paid it. 5 Maii 13 Car. the king, by mittimus out of Chancery, recites that when he awarded the Writ 4 Aug. 'Salus regni periclitabatur,' and that it was for the defence of the kingdom and security of his subjects; and doth send this Writ 4 Aug. the Certiorari, and Mittimus, to the barons of the exchequer, and commands the barons to do that which appertains to justice to be done. Whereupon a Sci' Fa' is awarded; whereunto Mr. Hampden hath appeared, and demanded Oyer of the Sci' Fa' Mittimus, Certiorari, and the Writ 4 Aug. and hath demurred generally; and Mr. Attorney hath joined in demurrer: and how this Sci' Fa' lieth, is the question.

And I am of opinion that this Sci' Fa' doth not lie, and that Judgment in this case ought to be given against the king. For the better understanding of the court, I shall observe in the method of my proceedings,

1. Whether a charge of this nature may, by the king, be imposed, by original writ only under the great seal; without a parliament. Wherein I hold it cannot be proved by any authority or reason, unless in time of actual war and invasion. 2. I will answer those objections only made formerly by them that have argued, that these statutes do not extend to this kind of prerogative, and that this prerogative is not taken away by any of these statutes. 3. I will answer the precedents, both by precedents of equal nature, and by some reasons, whereupon I will conclude, that this prerogative and power, which is monarchical, is included and taken from the king, and that must be done by parliament. 4. I will answer some objections that now have been raised, and were before made by Mr. Solicitor. 5. I will just open the writ, that it neither containeth matter sufficient in the writ itself, nor is there matter to warrant any such levy as is pretended; neither is the same lawful, nor can it be mended by Mittimus, nor can be commanded by those sheriffs that are no sheriffs in this case upon the matter.

Now, as my brother Jones hath taken a great deal of pains and time, I will not be drawn from my own order by what he hath said; but answer him in his argument.

1. I say, that this power of assessing of money, being a great charge, cannot by the law at this day, unless in time of actual war, be imposed upon the people by act of parliament.—The acts of parliament that have been mentioned, the first was Mag' Char', which is an antient and great statute; it cometh unto us with an insperimus from Ed. 1, confirmed thirty times; the words are, 'Dedimus et concedimus has libertates subscriptas in perpetuum. Nullus liber homo capiatur vel imprisonetur, aut discessietur de libero tenemento suo vel libertatibus, &c. aut aliquo modo distringatur, aut in carcerem mittatur, nisi per legale iudicium parium suorum, vel per legem terre.' King William the Conqueror made these laws, and swore men to those laws. And then king Edward, in the last chapter, commands them to be kept, and he will keep them so long as concerned him and all his people for ever. And for this they granted him a fifteenth part of all their goods, and it is a statute here to this day, Stamford, fol. 172, to be tried per partes, as the barons at this day have for their trial the privilege of this statute.

The next statute is 25 Ed. 3, chap. 5, reciting, 'And forasmuch as divers persons, &c. we have granted for us and our heirs, that we shall not draw such aid and pride into custom for any thing done heretofore, by any other rule or precedent that may be found.' So there is now not only for taxes for war, but for any other business whatsoever, 'forsque de comune consent de tous la realm,' saving the antient aid and prizes due and accustomed. And this saving is nothing, for this statute extends to no particular; for if any extend to aid by tenure, all England is not bound to this, but some few. The statutes extend to such aids as the whole kingdom is subject unto; none will say that all the kingdom holds of the king 'pur fils marier, &c.'

The statute of 34 Ed. 1, concerning certain liberties granted by the king to his commons, this is printed anno 1533, 25 Hen. 8. No. tailage to be taken or levied to us, our heirs or successors, without the good-will and assent of the archbishops, bishops, barons, and other burgesses and freemen of the realm. This statute hath been quarrelled withal, but the words are very effectual.

The statute of 14 Ed. 3, agreed to be perpetual by my brother Jones, for my part, I can see no reason why it should be so. The statute reciteth, that whereas the barons and commons of the realm have granted of their good free-will the king an aid towards his wars as well on this side the sea as beyond, of the ninth sheep, the ninth sheaf, &c. and the ninth part of all their goods, we will and grant for us and our heirs, that the same so charged shall not be brought into example to make any aids, he doth not say such aids, but by consent in parliament. No man can say against these words, they are so full and absolute. The statute 25 Ed. 3, enacts, that none shall be compelled to find hobbellers; 'Si il ne soit per commune consent in parliament.' The reason given in the parliament-roll, is very observable; 'Car ceo est incouunter le droyt del royaume.' These words are in the roll, yet left out in the printed statutes, but the reason I know not. This statute of 25 Ed. 3, is confirmed by the statute 4 Hen. 4.

The statute 1 Rich. 2, a very good statute, though in a young king's time, enacted and done by the lords and commons: There have been many inventions to charge the subject. Now Hen. 4, invented many benevolences, and that is recited, that whereas divers inventions, &c. (all the world I think is full of inventions) it is enacted from henceforth, that the subject shall no ways be charged with any such like charge. They gave it the name of benevolence, but indeed they were impositions, and great charges were collected with that name.

I conclude with that statute of this king, the Petition of Right, which reciteth the statute De Tallagio. Very many particular things are mentioned there, men are not to be compelled to lend money without common assent in parliament; which is a confirmation of these statutes. I have done with the statutes:

For the authority of the year-books; I will confirm those two authorities cited by my brother Crooke, though my brother Jones slight the authority, 19 Hen. 4, the principal case being then a grant of an office of measuring of cloth and put in practice, and being granted out of parliament condemned to be void; for the king cannot grant any common charge on his people but in parliament. And though my brother Jones said, that perhaps such a charge was damnum, yet not injuria; surely had not there been more in it, it had not been damned as illegal.

The other authority is that of Fortescue;

though my brother Jones, in that book, doth omit that which is material; for that man he was sworn chief justice of England, and afterwards made chancellor, who saith expressly in his 9th chapter, that the king of England cannot alter any law; That he governeth his people, not only by royal, but by politic power, and can lay no charge upon them but by parliament. The king can change no law, nor make land gavel-kind which is not, nor make land divisible which is not; which he might do if it were to be done by power royal. And Fortescue concludeth with this excellent saying, fol. 26. 6. 'Rejoice therefore, sovereign prince, and be glad; for the law of your realm admitteth to you and to your people no small comfort and security, &c. Prerogative strengtheneth the subjects liberty, and their liberty strengtheneth the king's prerogative.' Cap. 38, is full and strong against the king, which my brother Jones was pleased to omit. The king may by his officers take necessities for his house, nevertheless he is bound to pay for them; for by the law he ought not to take away any of the subjects goods without making satisfaction for the same; neither can he lay any tailage, subsidy or other burthen, or make new laws, or alter old, without express agreement of his people in parliament.

I have done with the positive part of my argument. I will not trouble you long; I will answer some objections now made, and heretofore made against these statutes.

First, For the statute De Tallagio non Concedendo. True, it is very probable that it was no statute, but an extract out of the statutes of 25 Ed. 1, which is upon record, the other not being to be found upon the roll. It was averred una voce, it was a statute, though not without probability it was no statute, as it was learnedly observed by Mr. Solicitor, in respect of the king's absence beyond the seas. Only I collect this out of his argument that he thought that that statute did reach very far against the king, which he could answer no way, but to take it away; therefore he thought it a statute of some force.—Next, my brother Berkley would have the statute of 14 Ed. 3, to be but a temporary statute, and but during the continuance of the wars. The first part of the statute is absolute, but the latter part is but a temporary statute, and but during the continuance of those wars. But it must (the former part thereof) needs be perpetual, for it is granted for the king and his heirs.

The next objection is by my brother Jones and my brother Crawley, That this power royal is part of the prerogative appertaining to his person, and inherent to the crown, a proprium quarto modo, so inseparable, that an act of parliament cannot take it away.

I confess there are some inseparable prerogatives belonging to the crown, such as the parliament cannot sever from it. And I will prove to you out of books, cases and statutes, that the king cannot release his tenure in capite. It was endeavoured that a law should be made that the court of wards should be shut up, it was resolved it had been a void law; such is the care for the defence of the kingdom, which belongeth inseparably to the crown, as head and supreme protector of the kingdom: So that if an act of parliament should enact that he should not defend the kingdom, or that the king should have no aid from his subjects to defend the kingdom, these acts would not bind, because they would be against natural reason. But in our case here, there is no such thing; for there is no act that restrains the king to lay any charge at all, but only ties him to one means, by which he would come by it, to wit, by parliament. If before the statute a man alien land held of the king without licence, the king shall seize the land, and have it forfeited to him and his heirs for ever. Now by that statute the prerogative is restored to a reasonable fine only; this was as inherent in his person as any thing could be, and yet it is restrained by parliament.

Before Mag. Char. the king might take any man's goods for his provision, and cut any man's woods down, to build or repair his castles: yet since that statute it is enacted, 'Nullus vicecomes nec ballivus noster capiet equos, &c. nisi reddat liberationem. Nec capiemus boscum alien' ad castra vel ad alia agenda nostra, nisi per voluntatem illius cujus boscum ille fuerit.' And to this day this statute is of force, that the king cannot take these things, nor use his prerogative.—The prerogative of 'Nullum tempus occurrit regi,' is a great one; yet in some case of lapse of the churches, this prerogative is taken away by the statute of 25 Ed. 3, cap. 1, where the king granteth for him and his heirs, not to present but in his own time: and this being pleaded 11 Hen. 4, fol. 7, is adjudged against the king, notwithstanding the rule of 'Nullum tempus occurrit regi.'

The statute of 7 Hen. 8, c. 3, concerning restraint of informations, and that of 21 Jac. whereby the king excludeth himself to make a title to any land, whereof he had not been in possession within 60 years before this time, he was tied to no time, but unlimited; yet this great prerogative is thus bound. 30 Ed. 3, cap. 10, parliaments to be holden every year one, or oftner if need be, because of divers mischances that may happen. It is to be acknowledged as a gracious favour from his majesty to his subjects, that he would admit of this case to be argued in any ordinary court of justice, and not refer it to the parliament, to which place all such weighty causes are most fit to be referred. I am satisfied in my conscience he would do nothing in this case, if he were justly informed, or may be informed he ought not to do it by law.

The laws of England mutari non poterunt, without consent of counsel gathered together: 'Si inusitatum emerserit,' saith Fortescue (as the case of ours is) it is referred to the next parliament; 'si aliquid inconsumetum,' then it is to be put to the parliament.

2 Ed. 3, fol. 7. There ariseth a new question concerning the statute of Winchester, about recovery by actions against the county where robberies were committed; there the case in respect of the difficulty was referred to the parliament, and there the sheriff was warranted to have his money.—You shall see a notable case in the Register fol. 224, among the writs, of two that were at York, and served by a clerk in the Chancery there to appear at Rome; and because of this contempt they were committed to prison, and a writ came to bail them, returnable coram nobis in parlamento: so matters of difficulty were adjourned into parliament.

Westminster 2 cap. 28. 'In nova causa fax novum remedium in parlamento.' To resolve cases of difficulty, statutes have enacted that there should be two parliaments every year, viz. 4 Ed. 3, c. 4, which was a great confirmation of the liberties of this realm. Littleton 110, 180, parliaments ought to be frequent. I know not how it comes about, that this kingdom which hath thus long flourished by parliaments, should now forget her frequent kind of government by parliament, whether by reason of something past, or some disaster now fallen out, that this which is the antient way (I do not say that parliaments is the government, but kings have governed by them) is so much out of use now-a-days.—I do not prescribe power to the parliament to govern the realm, but the public have been governed by the parliament. There was seen too much of the ambitious humour of some in the last parliament, that stirred up nothing but confusion and discontentment, as we now feel it to our great prejudice.

Now I come to precedents. First, that of Danegelt hath been objected; of which there were two kinds, as sir Henry Spelman in his Glossary observes; the one ad pacandum, the other ad coercendum Danos; great sums of money they had to go home again, from 12,000*l.* to 48,000*l.* per annum; and it was raised in three years: it was continued until king Stephen's time; at which time it is said it was released. For my part, I see not but that it might now be put in use as formerly, had it not been for those statutes of Ed. 1, and Ed. 3, before-mentioned: for it was not laid down when the danger ceased, but was continued and taken up by princes when they had a mind to it, as by William the Conqueror, and William Rufus; but since these statutes it was never taken (and here he read the words of the statutes.) So if these statutes took that away, why do they not bind in our case? Which is a full answer, in my opinion, to that and all other precedents before these statutes: there have been shewed 200 on each side; but I say, it had been better they had never made use of them. So to all the precedents made before the statute De Tallagio non Concedendo, I give this general answer, to be of no force.

For the precedents in Hen. 3's time, which were many; yet in those commissions for preparing of galleys, after they were made they were at the king's cost: This may be done at this time.—And with the statute of 14 Ed. 3, I answer those precedents of the 10, 11, 12 Ed. 3, and by the way observe the times that were then, that statutes were forced to be made to remedy those evils; and surely those were the burdens and unreasonable taxes which the king, in the 13th year of his reign, confessed he had oppressed his subjects with, and desired they might be forgotten, because he was urged to it by his necessities, and not for any ill end of his own, (and so he caused the record itself to be read openly before all the judges.)

2 Hen. 4, 2 Rich. 2. A general assembly called and resolved, That money could not be raised but by parliament. Since this time, all the precedents that have been vouched were for arraying men, and putting them in readiness.

28 Hen. 8. There were some forced upon their own charges to go to suppress some rebels in Lincolnshire, but afterwards were recompensed for their charges; saith the Record, Our pleasure is to send a messenger, and on a bill of charges he shall satisfy them. I do agree, and there are many statutes that men should be arrayed, as the statute of Winchester, which are only preparations to make men ready.

Now for that which hath been urged by Mr. Attorney excellently well, that the king by the law of the land, hath a prerogative in the lands and goods of his subjects; so that in some cases, the sheriff may for him break open a man's house, and the like, because otherwise he cannot execute justice.—True, the king hath such a prerogative, and fit it should be used; for otherwise justice could not be administered, as it is in many cases, the sheriff, though a verdict by default, hath power by prerogative of the king to break into the house, and give possession; for otherwise justice could not be administered, if all laws were contemned: for which contempt the king may use his power.—Again, the king of his own charge maintains his courts of justice, and is bound so to do, 39 Hen. 6, 34 Hen. 6. And in lieu of these charges the law gives him those fines and other duties; so there is upon the matter a quid pro quo: but where there is an interest in a subject, he cannot take it away without his consent, as he may do it in murage and pontage, and the like; for there is a particular benefit to the subject. So I think I am almost at an end of answering the first and second part of the precedents; the ancient time was one way, and the modern time another way.

In Ed. 4, Ric. 3, Hen. 7's times, they are all for wages of the mariners, certain allowances they had; what a week, what a day is set down.—But you say, here in this case appears no money to be paid by the subject, but only for a ship to be provided by the sheriff, and not any money to come into the king's purse.—I must conclude this part with what is agreed by all, that if this writ had been to levy money, it had been void.—As I do take it, the writ is to prepare a ship of such a burden; so the ship is the matter: then give me leave to say this, and I say, as it appears plainly by the record, there was no ship prepared at all; then if no ship, no writ can be had against him for disobedience. It is known to all the world, it is not ships, but Ship-Money: Ship-Money is in every man's mouth. It hath a name of preparing ships, but the end of it is to prepare money, as in Yorkshire 12,000l.—If the provision of a ship had been expressly alledged, it might have been traversed, and therefore Mr. Hampden's counsel could do nothing but demur; and by demurring, they confessed nothing but what is materially and sufficiently alledged, so that it might have been denied by a traverse.—But you will object, that I did subscribe to a contrary opinion, and set my hand unto it.—To this, for my own part, I must say, and I can truly say it, 1. My private opinion was ever against it. I did subscribe, but it was but for conformity; for it is known to all, when a great number meet together, the judgment is that which the greater number saith: besides these words to which we subscribed are no wise pursued.

2. Our opinions were very suddenly required; for the king's letter bears date Feb. 2, and our opinions upon it bear date Feb. 7, following; and it was in a case wherein we never heard any argument: and we usually do, and God forbid but we may dissent from our private opinions upon a better reason heard. But I am of the same opinion now that I was then.—But it will be said, we might have done it more advisedly. No man of us but sometimes delivers his opinion, and yet after we have heard an argument, have changed our opinions, and gone contrary to our former judgment.

3. If after any arguments heard I had been of the same opinion that was delivered, yet this writ doth not pursue the direction thereof; for though we agreed, that the king might charge in case of a general danger, yet this was, and is intended, not a danger of pirates, but an imminent necessity, and apparent danger, which could not be avoided. For I do agree in the time of war, when there is an enemy in the field, the king may take goods from the subject; such a danger, and such a necessity, ought to be in this case, as in case of a fire like to consume all without speedy help, such a danger as tends to the overthrow of the kingdom. Give me leave to say, that kings of England have exercised great power in taking this to themselves. 17 Hen. 8, in the Cardinal's time, it was counted lawful to send forth commissions throughout England, to take a sixth part of the subjects goods; whereupon many upon refusal were sent to prison; the lord Cobham among the rest sent to prison from Huntingdon to London: at length Norfolk and Suffolk grew to such a heat for taking away their goods in that undue manner, that the king was forced to call a great council, who suppressed those kind of writs; and the king laid the fault upon the cardinal; and the cardinal said it was the advice of the king's council, and they denied it; so he bore the shame.—So in the time of queen Elizabeth, who was a gracious and a glorious queen, yet in the end of her reign, whether through covetousness, or by reason of the wars that came upon her, I know not by what counsel, she desired benevolence; the statute of 2 Ric. 2, was pressed, yet it went so far, that by commission and direction money was gathered in every inn of court; and I myself, for my part, paid 20s. But when the queen was informed by her judges, that this kind of proceeding was against law, she gave directions to pay all such sums, as were collected, back; and so I (as all the rest of our house, and as I think of other houses too) had my 20s. repaid me again: and privy counsellors were sent down to all parts, to tell them that it was for the defence of the realm, and it should be repaid them again.

Now for the exceptions to the writ itself, I must answer my brother Berkley, that no allegation afterwards (if the writ be not good) will help it. The writ is said to contain matter sufficient, 'Quia datum est nobis intelligi quod quidam piratæ naves et bona subditorum nostrorum' &c. and lead our men into miserable captivity, and provide ships, mariners, &c. 'ad gravandum regnum nostrum.' Now here is nothing for the defence of the realm, no 'cognoscimus hostium adventus;' as the writs did anciently run. Again, pirates are to be withstood with ordinary defence, which appertaineth to the king himself; but for extraordinary defence against invasion, when the kingdom is like to be overthrown, there indeed the whole kingdom is to contribute to the defence. And our resolution was, when such a danger was apparent, the whole kingdom in danger, then the defence to be extraordinary.

But you object, that though there be no danger set forth in the writ, yet in the mittimus it is sufficient, 'Quod salus regni periclitabatur.'—The writ issued 4 Aug. 11 Car. the mittimus came not out till near two years after: now the counsel perceiving the first writ was not sufficient, they politely add to the mittimus this clause of 'salus regni periclitabatur:' so this coming so long after, cannot make that which was not legal ab initio, to become good by matter ex post factum; this could not be helped by any subsequent matter, as in case of a fine, &c.—This was much stood upon by my brother Berkley; but I shall answer him with two cases not to be denied: the first, Vernon's Case in the 4th Report. A man conveys land to the use of himself for life, the remainder to L. S. for life, the remainder to his wife for her jointure, though in this case I. S. die before her husband, so that now it falls out to be as advantageous to the wife, as if it had been limited her immediately after the death of the husband: yet it is resolved, because it is not so limited in the beginning, no good jointure to bar her of her claim to her dower.—Also in Chenie's Case, 5 Report. A will uncertain (and so not good) shall not be holpen by an after-averment subsequent to alter the estate: so it is in our case, if the writ were not legal when it first issued, no subsequent matter shall make it good.

The writ commands the sheriff 'et quos rebelles invenerit' to imprison, and to distrain all such as refuse to pay. This is directly against the statute of Mag' Char' none ought to be distrained or imprisoned, but by the lawful judgment of his peers, and according to the laws of the land; it was never contained in any writ before, nor can any such writ be maintained.—Besides, the words of the writ are to rate every man 'secundum statum et facultates,' shall the sheriff be a judge and party? If the assessment be done according to the writ, he must be judge and party: never such a writ before. All sheriffs must pay nothing themselves, or every sheriff must assess himself, 8 Hen. 6, Dyer 320. So, for the reasons aforesaid, I hold the writ to be against law.

Again, no ship was prepared: if it had been prepared, it had been their own goods; if not, it might have been pleaded that there was never a ship; and then the sheriffs might have been punished for not obeying the king's commands.—It hath been said, he hath confessed all matters contained in the writ; whereas in a demurrer he confesseth no matter of fact, but what is sufficiently set down, 30 Eliz. Coke 23, resolves the same.

But to the writ of Sci' Fa' I conceive it not legal; no such writ can go forth to two sheriffs of one county, they being neither of them sheriff at this time; for it went out after they were out of their sheriff-wick: therefore some return should have been made by inquisition. I never did see or hear of any writ that went to two sheriffs of one county, as it was to Bucks; and so two sheriffs made two several returns. Again, this money cannot be levied by Sci' Fa', because the writ directs other means, either to distrain or to imprison; therefore not by Sci' Fa', for it is contrary to the words of the writ. And seeing the sheriff hath not followed that direction, he must answer the contempt.

But here to answer my brother Trevor; I do agree in some cases of a certificate, or presentment, that a bridge was out of repair, or a high-way stopt, there shall go a Sci' Fa' upon that; but that tells to whom the money shall be paid. But here the writ doth not demand the money to be paid to the king for not preparing a ship; that must be by office or inquisition on record, if a legal certificate, as it is 2 Ed. 3, fol. 2. The king commands the sheriff of Leicester to summon I. S. &c. to come and meet him with aid, to go into Scotland; he spent the money to a great value: there went a writ out of the exchequer to attach this man: yet after long debates it was held fit, the king must be informed by matter of record.

I agree, that the king, as he is lord of the sea, may lay impositions; but then he ought to defend the merchants goods from pirates. That famous Case of Mich' 4 Jac. in which case I was of counsel, of an Imposition of 5s. a tun on currants, one Bates stood out, and would not pay it; adjudged that that Imposition was lawful, for the king may lay an Imposition; for he hath the rule of the sea, and hath power to hinder merchants to traffic; and if they traffic, he secures their goods.—To conclude with that which my brother Berkley said, that the subjects of England are free men not slaves, free men not villains. Here is no apparent necessity of any invasion; therefore by law, they cannot be thus compelled to part with their interest in their goods. If there were any apparent necessity, they were without limit or stint. Thus have I, with as much perspicuity as those imperfections which attend my age, would give me leave, set you forth my reasons; and without any farther protestation I conclude, both for matter and form, that you are Not to give Judgment for the King.

The OPINION of Sir JOHN DENHAM, knt. one of the Barons of his Majesty's Court of Exchequer, in the great Case of SHIP-MONEY, presented in Writing.

May it please your Lordship; I had provided myself to have made a short argument, and to have delivered my opinion, with my reasons: but by reason of want of rest the last night, (my old disease being upon me) my sickness and weakness are greatly increased, inasmuch that I cannot attend the business, as I desired. And if my Opinion be required, it is for the Plaintiff.

Serjeant's-inn, Fleet-street, May 26, 1638.

My Lords; Understanding that some misconstruction was taken by some, of the declaration of my opinion, which I desired your lordship upon the last Saturday to deliver in my name; for further satisfaction therein I have sent again, although I was most desirous to have passed my vote in silence in this work of weight, by reason I heard not the four last arguments: yet I delivered my opinion for the plaintiff, which I took to be Mr. Hampden, by reason it appeareth by the Record that he coming in upon process, 'Queritur de colore præmissorum graviter vexatum et hoc minus juste;' which satisfied me that he was plaintiff; and therefore I now declare my Opinion for Mr. Hampden who did demur.

I shall only deliver these two reasons for the maintaining of my opinion. The 1st is, that the king's majesty is 'sola et suprema justitia regni,' and the rule of the law is and hath always been, that his majesty can do no wrong; and thereupon ariseth another rule of our law, which I gave for my second reason.

The king's majesty being of a corporate capacity, can neither take any lands or goods from any of his subjects, but by and upon a judgment on record, (according to our daily experience in the exchequer) there must precede some judgment in that or some other court of record, whereby his majesty may be intitled either to the lands or goods of a subject, as namely where seizure of goods is made for his majesty either upon outlawries, attainders, or matters of the like nature; as in cases of seizures in the court of Exchequer, where seizures are given by statutes; yet without a judgment in that court upon a trial for the king, the goods are not to be recovered to the use of the king as forfeited.

Upon consideration whereof, and comparing the same with his majesty's royal writ, I find no judgment thereupon had nor given; which were the chiefest reasons of my Opinion for Mr. Hampden.

My Lords; There have appeared unto us upon this Record many several arguments, and excellently made; it comes now to my course, to express my own opinion. It appeareth upon this record, that Pasch. 13 Car. a Sci' Fa' issued out of the Exchequer to the sheriff of Bucks, reciting, Whereas several sums of money mentioned in a schedule to that writ annexed, by virtue of the Writ 4 Aug. assessed upon several persons for providing of a ship, were not paid, whereby he was commanded, 'quod scire faceret,' to those several persons in the schedule annexed named, to appear in the Exchequer, Octab' Trin' 13 Car. to shew cause why they should not pay those sums of money assessed upon them. Thereupon a Certiorari 9 Mar. 13 Car. was directed to the sheriffs of Bucks, to certify the sums, and the several persons upon whom they were assessed, and of the warning given unto them to pay the same: The Certiorari being returned, and in court in April 13 Car. Then on 5 May there came a writ of Mittimus out of the Chancery, by which the said former writs were sent to the barons of the Exchequer; which Mittimus recites the Writ 4 Aug. and not the Record itself; and the barons are commanded, that they should thereupon proceed, as by the Mittimus is required. Upon these Records, thus certified, there issued out of the court of Exchequer a Sci' Fa' that is now in debate, which was awarded against the parties mentioned in the schedule; and Mr. Hampden being returned, hath appeared, and demandeth Oyer of the Writ 4 Aug. 11 Car. of the Certiorari 9 Mar. 13 Car. and of the Mittimus 5 Maii 13 Car. Upon Oyer of these, and reading them unto him, as was demanded, Mr. Hampden hath demurred in law, alledging, That the writs, and every of them, and the returns of them, and the matters therein contained are not sufficient to charge him with the sum of 20s. on him charged: and thereupon demandeth judgment, if the king will be pleased any further to proceed upon this writ. To this demurrer, thus tendered by Mr. Hampden, Mr. Attorney hath joined, alleging, That the writs mentioned, and all of them, and the matters therein contained, are good and sufficient in law to charge the defendant with the sum of 20s. and demandeth judgment thereupon for the king; and that the defendant Hampden should be charged with the sum of 20s. and thereupon make satisfaction; but to whom is not expressed upon the record. This demurrer being thus warily joined on both sides, there have been several arguments thereupon at the bar and bench, excellently, no doubt, argued, and very fully. There hath been introduced and pressed to the court (whereof there have been several notes delivered) a number of records appertaining to the question; so far forth, that in one of the arguments at the bar, there were excellently well remembered, at the least above 300 records, and great authorities.

Upon this record, the demurrer being thus joined, my purpose is, after my meanness, (not being able to give an account of every particular) to make a summary collection of what I shall say, and with that shortness and brevity that appertains to be (the weight of the cause not deserted) upon the duty of my place, and upon my oath, which I have learned and hold to be 'ligamentum fidei inter Deum et animum,' to declare unto this court what I do conceive to be just upon the question arising upon the records, wherein my meaning is to retain myself unto the parts of the record. Judgment is not here to be given, but a judicial advice; and according to the number of voices here, judgment must be given in the exchequer, without respect to any of our particular opinions who sit in this court. I shall do my best endeavour to open unto you such questions, as do appear to me upon the record to be aptly and fitly debated before us.

The state of the question out of the record will appear to be this, That 4 Aug. 11 Car. there issued out of chancery a Writ, not returnable unto the sheriff of Bucks: This Writ was 'inter breva irretornabilia,' according to the stile in that court, and in the court of exchequer. By this Writ 4 Aug. which I do conceive to be the original main ground of this record, it appears what was the occasion and ground that writ was awarded. It was touching and in respect of certain grievous incursions by the pirates upon the seas, who commit depredations, and take the goods and merchandize, both of the king's subjects and others that traffic here, and carry them into captivity; and this is said to be to the great damage of the kingdom.—That the times were dangerous, and hostile times, 'tempora hostilia;' and therefore, it was fit there should be a convenient remedy provided by the kingdom for defence thereof; and thereupon, in that writ, two several mandates or commands are imposed.

The first was a command and direction to the sheriff of the county of Bucks, and to the mayor of Buckingham, and to the bailiffs and burgesses of Chipping-Wiccombe, and parishes of the county of Bucks, 'et pro omnib' hominib' of those towns, and all others dwelling in that county; these are the persons who are charged. And by that writ, 4 Aug. they were charged with this particular, that they should before the 1st of March then following at their own costs, prepare and provide a ship of war of 450 tons, furnished and fitted with men, ammunition, and victuals, to be brought to Portsmouth at their charge, at or before the said 1st day of March; and from thence, to be maintained at their own proper costs and charges, for the space of 26 weeks then next following, to attend such noble persons, to whom the king should be pleased to commit the custody of the sea, and to pursue their directions.

The Second sort of those two mandates descends from the persons to whom the writ was directed unto some few, and that is upon the matter to the sheriff of Bucks, and to the mayor of Buckingham, and the bailiffs and burgesses of Chipping-Wiccombe: to these is given and limited a power by the writ, distributively, as therein is appointed, respectively to tax and assess the whole county, 'secundum statum et facultates.' And those that they should find to be rebels, they should distraint them, or by any due means commit them to prison, there to remain until his majesty sends forth an order for their deliverance. This I do conceive to be the end of those two mandates mentioned and comprised in the Writ 4 Aug. 11 Car.

After this Writ 4 Aug. 11 Car. almost a year and an half, then cometh the Certiorari out of chancery, dated 9 Mar. 12 Car. directed to the sheriff of Bucks, who, with the other referees, should certify unto the king the names of such persons as were assessed, and what they were assessed, and who have performed the assessment, and who not. That writ was returnable 26 April then next following. And therein Mr. Hampden appears as a defendant to the Sci' Fa'; therein was he certified to have been taxed to the sum of 20s. for his lands in the town of Stoke Mandeville, and that he did refuse to pay it, and did not pay it unto him, nor any of the collectors that were appointed.—This being returned into chancery, and no order there made, or any rule, that the sum imposed on Mr. Hampden should be paid, 5 Maii then following, in the same term cometh a Mittimus, reciting the effect of those writs, which is directed to the lord treasurer and barons of the Exchequer; herein the tenor of the writ (and not the writ itself) is certified into the Exchequer: and withal it certifieth the rest of the record, together with the schedules annexed to those writs; and by that it is commended to the court that they should proceed to do for the further receipt and collection of the sums behind, as by the law and custom of the kingdom of England should be required.—And upon this certificate here cometh a writ of Sci' Fa' directed to the sheriff of Bucks, to give notice to the persons that were defaulters, that they should appear and shew cause, if they could say any thing, why they should not be charged therewith according to the laws and customs of the realm; and the writ is so returned: and upon that return Mr. Hampden appears upon the day in person, and after Oyer of the proceeding, hath demurred.

Upon this record, this being the case, and the demurrer thereupon joined, we are to see what is the law and custom of England upon the matter extant in the record; for I intend not to expatiate beyond the record, but to stick close to it, as it is in the case now depending in court, upon this record: and therein I shall confine myself to some few general heads, I shall not be long in any thing.

The first thing is, Whether these two powers and mandates mentioned in the Writ 4 Aug. 11 Car. (the original ground of this suit) the one for preparation of a ship and furniture, and of the residue therein mentioned; and the other, for taxation at the pleasure of the sheriffs, and other persons to whom it is referred, and that expressed upon the motives of the Writ 4 Aug. whether, I say, that these same mandates were and are good in law, according to the law and custom of the kingdom of England, upon the matter of this record; that is the first question: if that do fail, then the Sci' Fa' is at an end. If there be no legal charge imposed upon the country, then he ought to be discharged.

The second question is upon the principal head; admitting these were legal in themselves, according to the tenor of the writ, to see then how it is reduced by the record. Therein I shall offer to consideration, whether on this certificate on the Writ 9 Mar. out of Chancery, after the time so past for execution of the first writ which is irreturnable, that upon that it be so legal, and according to the course of law conveyed over by the record to be a sufficient ground and warrant of the Sci' Fa' here brought, is the second question.

The third question: this writ of Sci' Fa' being issued out, and the defendant having appeared, and demurred in law, whether hereupon there be such matter therein, that they may charge the defendant with the sum imposed upon him, so that the king may have a judgment and execution upon it: that I conceive to be the last question.

This case is a case of very great weight, and doth nearly concern every one of us to have an especial eye unto it. It is an usual question in our books, whereof we have much view.—However it be in the record, to which we are now tied, it concerns the prerogative of the king, and the estate of the subject. In my conscience I think, for the act that was done was a gracious, honourable, and royal act, and proceeding upon just cause, that there should be a present remedy for avoiding the inconvenience that did appear, no doubt for our good. Herein, though it be known to every one that knoweth me, but especially to myself, if I partake of the rule that every man is bound unto, nosce teipsum, I know withal, that no man is more bound, nor oweth a more tender care to preserve the king's prerogative, and to do that which may advance the same, as we are all bound to do by the great oath that we have taken upon our promotion: and in that particular, I profess none more bound than myself.—Upon this I have been told, and I have, truly looked into the records, so far forth as my meanness will give leave; and according to what I understand of the law and the custom of the kingdom of England, to be upon this record, I must needs say, though I do confess for my own particular unwillingly, that upon this record Judgment ought to be given for the Defendant, 'Quod Johannes Hampden sit 'quietus, &c.' however with submission to the greater vote of my brothers.

For first, I do conceive, that this charge, thus commanded, and thus taxed, is not warranted by the laws and customs of the kingdom of England: and shall therefore offer to the consideration of the court, the several discussions upon the writ.

First, For the Writ 4 Aug. 11 Car. directed to the sheriff of Bucks, to the mayor and burgeses of Buckingham, and bailiffs and burgeses of Chipping-Wicombe, 'et probis hominibus com' Bucks;' hereby are they charged upon their allegiance, that they should, before March 1st following, prepare at their own costs and charges, 'per probos homines,' throughout all the county, a ship of war well furnished, and that the same ship of war they shall maintain at their own costs and charges, for the space of 26 weeks, to attend the king's navy, for the custody of the sea, as the king shall appoint and direct.

This first point I take is not warrantable by the law and custom of England; in respect, being a matter of so great a charge, and by them, being an inland county, impossible to be performed to prepare a ship before that time, being no maritime county, but an inland county: this I do take in itself, that this is not a charge to be imposed upon a county, by the name of 'probos homines,' or of the particular men there named, except it were by their own consent and approbation. And with their consent I agree, a charge upon 'probos homines,' so they receive nothing to their own uses, is good enough; whereof I find one excellent record, 24 Ed. 1. A writ that issued out of the Exchequer, and whereof there is the record remaining to this day inrolled and certified to be a true copy: there it is directed in case of necessity, when the king is absent beyond the sea, upon information of the discovery of a present and instant invasion of the enemies in Flanders and France, under colour of coming as fishermen to surprize the town of Yarmouth, and all the parts of the coasts thereabouts; the lord treasurer that then was (the king being beyond the sea) the under-treasurer who had the custody of the sea, and the barons of the doubt of it, in the judgment of our predecessor himself, was good law, and the writ legally executed upon the instant necessity appearing. But Fortescue speaks not so much of the necessity, as hath been observed: therefore it is not good to conclude upon some general words in him, that in no case of necessity the charge can be laid; for the scope of the whole book, considered well, will not warrant it: the intent of it is not against cases of extremity. You see not in the case, but that therein the regal course must be observed, according to the law and custom of the kingdom of England.—But when I do consider of the first charge of preparing a ship at their own charges, and of the consideration of the next charge in the same writ for taxation, I do not see, nor I cannot perceive, how the same do agree, but that the one is repugnant unto the other; for that the former part commands the charge to be generally by all; and by this last power it is limited to be done by a particular person, and that to be done at his will, and as he shall think fit; whereby the sheriff, mayor, and bailiff, thus employed, are excluded from the charge; for they can do no act upon themselves. It should have been done ‘per sacramentum proborum hominum,’ considering these two different powers. I hold the law so to be clear in this point. It appears not upon this record that they were assenting unto it, or agreed upon any ordinance herein.

Now the power of the preparation, upon the whole it is on the sheriff himself, mayor, bailiffs, ‘probos homines’ and all; but when you come to the latter ipso facto, by the laws and customs of the realm, a great part of the former charge is removed directly from those that were chargeable: power of taxation is appointed, to whom? to the sheriff, and how can he tax himself? he and all his estate within the county of Bucks under the first charge, and all discharged by the power of taxation limited in the second clause: and therein I take it, that this same is not legal according to the customs and laws of England, the one doth not agree with the other. If you ask me the reason of it, my brother Hutton hath given it. The charge is upon the sheriff, and ‘tis not possible for the sheriff to tax himself, he cannot find himself inter rebelles, he cannot commit himself to prison, there to remain till such time as the king’s majesty shall deliver him; that he cannot do. So for the other referees of Buckingham and Chipping Wiccombe, exempted likewise; if they can do this, then clearly the former charge, imposed by the first and said to be done by them all, is out of doors.

Now it cannot be done, according to the law of England, upon the sheriff or upon his land. The point I think is very evident in our books. 18 II. n. 8. If a defendant that is sheriff be to be summoned, and he return that he cannot do it, justice II— said that return was not good, for that he might summon himself. 8 Ed. 3.

another may be prejudiced, he cannot do it, as to impannel a jury upon a writ, where he is a party, which may prove a prejudice to another; for if he do, it is not lawfully done, as it is in Dyer, fol. 8, 9. Of the sheriff in a common recovery. So upon these authorities, for the first question, I hold it manifest, that this act which the sheriff is charged to do, is afterwards by this second power discharged: these two powers do not cohere, and therefore are not warranted by the laws and customs of the realm of England.

Concerning the first question my opinion is clear, that there is a material and legal exception appearing on the self-same writ. My reason is, the sheriff is the great officer of the county; but when he must do it, I take it legally, he ought to do it according to the duty of his place by the law of England; that I do not take to be at his will and pleasure to lay one thing upon one, and another thing upon another; for my part, I conceive this must be done ‘per sacramentum;’ he is not to be judge in case of uncertainties, when a division of charge and taxes is to be made; where things are put in certainty in any of the king’s courts, there he may execute, as take a man’s goods, imprison, &c. but in case of uncertainty, the law hath annexed to his office a way and means how to reduce the thing to a certainty, and that is, ‘per sacramentum proborum hominum;’ as in the case of parceners, if they have a mind to make partition of their inheritance, they may do it by agreement between them if they will, or by making of lots by a third person, and the elder shall chuse; but if she herself make the partition, she shall not both divide and chuse; that alters the case for execution, when it is in propria persona. But admit they cannot agree, the judgment of the law is, that the sheriff shall go in his proper person into the ground; shall he at his discretion make the partition as he pleaseth? No: The Judgment is, the sheriff shall go in person unto the land, and that there ‘per sacramentum, per inquisitionem,’ to be taken by chosen jurors, they must consider of it; upon such a thing so done ‘per sacramentum,’ then indeed it is in the sheriff’s power, he may now chuse whether he will prefer the elder or the younger. But for our case, that this should be done by a sheriff, by his discretion, whilst the interest of several persons is concerned, is as it were to make a rape. I do not find that in any book of law, I must confess. In that act, which is done by the law, there can be no error or partiality; so in Fitz. Na’ Br’ in his writ De Onerando pro rata Portione, see what there is to be done: it goeth to the sheriff, he is trusted with the doing of this, but he is trusted by legal means; what shall he there do? where 90 acres of land held of the king in chief, they are sold to several hands, there must be a writ De Oneranda pro Rata for discharging of the rent; but this must be done ‘per sacramentum,’ not by the sole power of the she-diff. Hereof I find a notable precedent; it is true, it is not in our books of law, but in an historian; yet he doth set it down in that manner, that a man may trust him so far. Matth. Paris saith, and sheweth us that 17 Hen. 3, eight years after the making of Mag' Char' authorized by parliament, that the king himself in his parliament was pleased (according to the institutions of parliament) to require 'concilium et auxilium,' for the king's wars; where, by the way, let me observe, that 'auxilia' from the subject granted the king in parliament are not merely voluntary, but duties, to give monies for supply of necessities of state; and in that I agree with the opinion of my predecessor, Ho. Chief Baron, 19 Hen. 6. The king is bound to defend the kingdom. The same law that binds him to the defence of the whole realm, gives the king a right of inheritance to claim subsidies for the defence thereof. But to return to Mat. Paris: It appeareth there that the king in parliament did demand aid of his subjects, 'concilium et auxilium,' their counsel as they were bound, their help as they were able. It is said, that they made choice of the earl of Chester to give their answer; who at first held it not fit to do it, alledging their estates were but weak, that by the laws of the kingdom they that had been there in person, they for their escuage might not be troubled. The prelates they were more courteous in their answer, they desired time to assemble themselves together, many being far distant: thereupon was a time assigned, till Mens' Pasch'. In the mean time they all considered, the lords on the one side, and the lords spiritual on the other side; and being demanded a fifteenth of their goods, they answered, so as they might have their ancient laws established to them, for which they had been so much troubled, they would willingly assent unto it. The king consented unto it, and thereupon Magua Char' was there confirmed upon grant of a fifteenth to his majesty. But when they came afterwards, they did all agree, that for necessity, and for the king's charges in his wars which did require a speedy supply, they were contented to yield to him a fourth part of their goods, to be levied in this manner, that is, (for so it is mentioned expressly in Matth. Paris, and the form is there set down de verbo in verbum.) I have it here to read it: that every sheriff within his county should return a juror in every town: that to four gentlemen of good value, and accounted principal men in every town, power is given, that they shall do (as a jury, to set forth upon their oaths) assessments reasonable according to their estate and power; and because it appeared then there, (the very exception now taken) that the assessors could not tax themselves, though they had power to tax the residue, therefore a power was given to two others of every town, and they should be sworn, and upon their oaths tax the four former assessors. This tells unto me, what the ancient and usual manner was of taxes and assesses by the custom of England. The manner was not at the voluntary pleasure of the great officer of the county; but they that did tax others, should be taxed by others. And this opinion is directly in Matth. Paris, that the laws of England were so. And therefore for my own part, for the sheriff to tax at his discretion, I know no law for it.

Stat. 1 Ed. 3. By the true record, according to the manuscript of the Exchequer Book here, in French it is chap. 7, and so it appeareth in the Tower there inrolled: it is expressly there upon a complaint made, that they held themselves aggrieved with an assessment; their grief was, that whereas aid was granted to the crown, more than formerly was used, &c. and taxes not rightly laid upon them by the sheriff and commissioners: this grievance thus complained of in parliament, and the manner of their taxing disliked, the king saith that from thenceforth, the taxations and assessments should be made as in ancient manner, and not otherwise. Here is an express negative, no taxes to be done but by jury; which excludes in my opinion this same tax thus done, that is, by his own power and discretion is not warrantable by the law of the land. And herein give me leave, as I think in my conscience, and as I think the truth is, if this inconveniency had not tended to a grievance in very many particulars, we should never have heard of this question; but by this means it cometh in question, both the one and the other: for the act itself, it is a gracious and a royal act. It is requisite and necessary, as the state and condition, if it so appears upon this record, of the kingdom may be in, that there be a supply according to the necessity: for the king is lord of the sea; as it was argued at bar, in a cause brought before us the barons of the Exchequer, where we did unanimously agree, and adjudge that the king was, and is in my conscience, rightly true lord of the very propriety and ownership of the seas. The occasion upon which this grew a question was as I conceive, upon the writing of two books: the one called Mare Liberum, that no ownership of the sea should belong to the king; whereas it is the sea of our sovereign, and defence by sea, under Almighty God, that is our protection; and if we should suffer any else to have an interest in it, it would hazard the whole kingdom. But in answer to this book, Mr. Selden hath wrote very learnedly a notable book called Mare Clausum, approved of by his majesty, and inrolled in the Exchequer by command from his majesty, there to remain. But since there is another book written, which I had at my argument, by one Pontanus, directed to the great chancellor of the king of Denmark; and he undertaketh therein to make an answer to every particular chapter in Mr. Selden's book; and truly, as I think in my opinion though weak, Mr. Selden hath a judgment in law against him upon a nil dicit.

Of how great consequence the dominion of the sea is to this kingdom, who knows not? So that without question, the tax was very fit to be done, if the power given to the sheriff had been as warrantable. But this same second power, to free himself and lay it upon the residue, is not good, nor warrantable by the law. Thus much for the first question concerning the powers contained in the writ 4 Aug. which doth not resort to the rule and custom of the kingdom of England.

In the next place, let us see whether the writ mentions causes sufficient for the issuing of it. For the incursions of pirates I conceive it no just cause: but the expressions in the writ, as 'quia datum est vobis intelligi, ut informatur, vulgaris opinio est et rumor est, &c.' If the king undertake it upon this, he is not to shew how he discovereth it. I am satisfied in my opinion, upon view of the precedents, it is sufficient if the king do alledge, 'quia datum est nobis intelligi,' or 'quia intelleximus, &c.' it is enough, for it is so in these precedents, 'quod vulgaris opinio, &c.' All these, or any of these containing such a matter that the kingdom is in danger, I agree the same doth conclude the party, and that the king is the sole judge of it. The case is not traversable, the writ must be obeyed, agreeing with the laws and customs of England.—That this may be done by the king's writ, excellent and strong arguments have been made. That this imperial power belongeth to the crown, I heartily acknowledge it; his power declareth it so; reason it should be so: not voluntary at his pleasure, but it is according to his palatial capacity, not excluding his natural impartiality. 'Quia rex,' he doth it not; but 'Quia rex Angliæ' he doth it: so I find it in Fortescue.

The grounds premised in this writ, that the kingdom was in present danger; truth in my conscience it was so, and if that had not been done so, England had heard of it before this day. Therefore there must be an expression of the kingdom to be then instantly in danger, or such a preparation in such a convenient time, or else it will be in a great danger; but that must be expressed, for I hold the law to be so. Doctor and Student saith, it is the old custom of the land, the king shall defend the sea: it is true, against whom? Against pirates and petty robbers, but not against a sudden invasion at his own charge. These 'prædonæ' who were spoken of in the laws of king Edward, when Danegelt was given, they were of that condition that they endangered the whole kingdom. They did occasion the tax of Danegelt, to raise from twelve to forty-eight thousand pounds; and William Rufus raised it to 4s. a hide, imposed upon a just ground to repel the Danes, being common enemies; and this was continued until Hen. 2's time, but since taken away by several statutes, as 25 Edw. 1, &c. That same Danegelt which was heretofore imposed on the kingdom by the terror of the Danes, continued still, though the name be altered; it is mentioned in the Red Book in the Exchequer to be used in Hen. 1's time; but after the time of Hen. 2, I hold that it is taken away by the statutes before-mentioned of Edw. 1, &c. and therefore if for private danger this assessment be imposed, it is not according to the laws and customs of this realm.

I am over-troublesome, and I fear shall hardly hold out; give me leave to proceed to the second consideration. And admitting those charges in the first writ to be legal, the next consideration to be had is, whether the Certiorari and the Mittimus do legally revive the first writ, it being a writ irreturnable, and not executed according to the tenure of it within the time limited and prefixed to be done.—This Certiorari issued long after the first writ, dated a year and half after. And in my opinion this cannot be; for the nature of a writ not returnable, is to command a positive thing to be done within such a time; if it be not done accordingly, there is an end of the force of that writ: so that here in our case, the power given to the sheriff being not executed in due time by him, but done out of time, cannot be renewed now; for otherwise you will make a man an offender by a relation, which being a fiction in law, cannot so operate, nor be made penal to him for non-performance: and though afterwards by the Mittimus these words 'salus regni perich-tabatur' come in, yet will they not revive or make good the commands of the first writ. If the first writ had been returnable, and a return made, and a default according to the return, the writ had been still continued, and must have been referred by another court, and the party presented by a jury upon default; and upon presentation and indictment, the king shall have his remedy: but not being so, it is but a suggestion, upon which a Sci' Fa' cannot issue, as in Butler and Baker's case, report 8, and being not returnable, is but dead in law; and being certified upon the second writ, it is not good, it cannot be to relate to make him a wrong doer; to that purpose is the case cited, 26 Ed. 3, Leicestershire Case, reciting; whereas one sir John de Lamston, that he had delivered certain monies to Robert de, &c. and that he had wasted such a manor, and taken away goods to the value of 2,000*l.* and thereupon it was commanded he should be attached by his body, he appeared at this day, and because, &c. he was discharged of it; and according to that I find it, 7 Edw. 3, thore it was suggested to be made in one king's time; and whereas it was not, and there abated, then the question, whether the king may do it or no? He giveth the answer, that where it concerneth the king in his own right, there he may do it; but when the title came to the king from another party, there it was otherwise.

Upon this I do conceive this Brav' irreturn' falleth short of making him punishable, as if it had been a writ returnable; let the writ 4 Aug. be never so good, the writ thereupon is not legally issued.

The next thing is upon the Sci' Fa'; the question upon this record is, Whether this doth appertain to the king? and I conceive, it doth not appertain to the king: My reason is this, because in the very writ 4 Aug. it is expressly provided, that it shall be employed to no other use, but the preparation of the ship therein mentioned, and by no means to any other purpose. It doth not now appear, who were collectors therein appointed to receive the money, whereby to become chargeable over to the king. It doth not appear upon this record, that any ship was provided, or that any fault was in them that were employed, or of surplussage in the collectors hands: though it was a worthy and gracious act in his majesty, yet this is not so legally executed, as the king may have a writ of Sci' Fa'. If judgment be for the king, it must be with this limitation, that it must not go to the proper coffer of the king, as my brother Jones observed. And in my conscience, if it were paid to him, he would be a loser by it. You see what the writ is, you should be charged upon 'onerare et satisfacere' one ship; non constat there was any ship, or any collector, or any act concerning it: This money was pre-ordained only to prepare a ship, and to be employed merely upon that, and for no other purpose; and this appeareth not at all, whether any ship was made, yea or no: now how shall we give judgment? The Sci' Fa' is, That Mr. Hampden should shew cause why he should not satisfy the sum imposed upon him; but whom he should satisfy, or to whom the money should be paid, non constat, as was well opened upon the demurrer; for it is not 'Si dominus rex valet aut debeat onerare' the defendant, but that the defendant 'oneretur et inde satisfac' : Nothing is put into the record to bring this to the king: therefore 'quod oneretur' cannot be executed at all; and according to the books of 39 Edw. 3, and 40 Edw. 3, if judgment be to be given, and it cannot be executed, there it shall not be given at all: So the judgment required on this demurrer, is upon the matter 'oneretur,' and shall by no colour come to the king. God knows it belongs to him, and that deservedly; but in a legal course non constat; therefore to give judgment, 'quod oneretur,' and not know to whom (for to the king it cannot) would be wrong; for this reason I cannot see how judgment can be given, 'quod oneretur.'

But hereupon another thing troubleth me very much, and which, in my opinion, makes it clear, that execution cannot be made upon this Sci' Fa'; and that is the Mittimus to us in the Exchequer, which by recordum ipsum is not certified, but only the tenor of the record. I do conceive the law to be so upon this difference, as it is taken in a case excellently well argued, 33 Hen. 6, where it is said, if the record be in any other court, whence execution may be awarded, and the tenor of that record is by Mittimus sent into another court, where execution may be likewise awarded; in such a case a Sci' Fa' cannot issue upon such a record; for this is but an extract of a record. So if a man should sue out execution upon a judgment given before the justices of assize, what will you do with this? And if he have no goods within the precinct, you must remove this. How do you remove it? Not by certifying the tenor of the record, but ipsum recordum: But if the record itself be certified into the Chancery, and sent by Mittimus into the Common Pleas, that is good, and we are judges of the record: No other court can give judgment upon the record, but we.

Here is sent unto us the tenor of the writ, and not the record itself that I can find; and so two executions may be upon one judgment. 37 Hen. 6. A transcript or tenor of a recognizance came out of the Chancery into the Common-Pleas, to have executed, et non allocatur: and so it is Dyer 4, & 5, & 29, of the queen, there was a transcript there of a recognizance, to the intent that they might have a Sci' Fa' upon it, and held clearly by the court, that upon the tenor of a record no Sci' Fa' could lie. So all this appearing upon the very first branch of the record, that this was merely a tenor of the record, and not recordum ipsum, I do not know how upon this record there can be execution. Thus have I done with the several discussions of the writ and record, which upon my reasons before alledged, I conceive it not sufficient in law to charge Mr. Hampden.

I come now to the great question concerning the danger of the kingdom, and our certificate to his majesty. Give me leave, according to our former resolution made in answer to his majesty's question proposed, to speak of what we did certify: and in my conscience truly, and I hold it real, that when any part of the kingdom is in danger, actually in danger, or in expectancy of danger, and the same expressed by his writ; I agree, the king may charge the subjects without parliament, towards the defence thereof; for 'necessitas est lex temporis,' in vain to call for help when the enemy is loaded. Clearly I hold the king to be the sole judge of the danger: And the danger being certified by his majesty, I hold it not traversable; and in such a case he may charge the subject without parliament, so that the very cause be effectually expressed upon the records, that the kingdom was in danger. But if a parliamentary advice may be called, and the danger not so imminent, then regularly no such charge can be laid out of parliament: legally and rightly, I hold, things done by the advice of parliament it were the best way: But if it be so, the necessity will not admit the delay of a parliament, when the enemy is in view, and expectant; that is such a danger as we did certify to the king in our opinion to be the time when he might so charge the subject. In Edw. 3's time writs issued, sitting the parliament. To say, that there cannot be incursions, but that they may be known within seven months time, wherein a parliament might be had, is a great hazard to the kingdom. It is possible the danger may be discovered before it comes; but it is possible it may come unexpected. In 1588, when that great invasion was, at which time if the queen should not have used her royal power, without calling a parliament, perhaps the kingdom might have been lost by delays; and yet then great expectation was of a parliament. So William 1, (not William the Conqueror, for he did not conquer the kingdom, he conquered the king of the kingdom) his coming was sudden, he landed at Hastings; and was not the king advised of this at York? Did he not then make all haste by post, raised a sudden army, and had him battle? And William the Conqueror had the victory, not of the kingdom, but against the king. Lambert saith, That he came not in per conquestum, but per acquisitionem. After he was crowned, and received by the Londoners, he sent forth commissions to all the counties of England, to enquire, per sacramentum, what the antient laws of England were, and of the state of the kingdom; and certificates being made thereof, that of Danevelt was certified to be a tribute enforced. I say in times of necessity, the king may command this aid by his writ under the great seal, when the danger is instant; nay, the expectation of it is not traversable.

Object.—Then upon every certificate that the king makes, that he is of opinion that the danger is instant or expectant, this charge may come to be annual.

Solut.—No: we need not fear, that the king will require it but upon just occasion, the law presumes it; and legally it cannot be laid upon the subject, but in such cases of necessity, as aforesaid. By the charters of William 1, king John, Henry 3, no charge without parliament: by the statute of 10 Edw. 3, none is forced to go out of his county, except it be in case of necessity. 14 Edw. 3, I hold to be a general statute, and it doth bind, but doth not bind in case of necessity; for they are not to be understood to be binding in all cases. The charter of king John, as it is inrolled, not as it is printed, according to Mag' Char', saving two clauses that are not now in Mag' Char', hath this exemption in it to the subject of these, and these immunities; no tax nor taillage, but by parliament; but he excepts three cases; 1 Nisi ad redimendum corpus nostrum. 2 Pur faire fitz chevalier. 3 Pur fille marier. These prerogatives of the king are not bound up by the parliaments; the very commons themselves did agree to these three cases. As for the statute De Tallagio non Concedendo, I hold it to be a good statute, and much for the liberty of the subject. But if you come to a case of necessity, they will not stand in force. There is one omission in the printed statute, 25 Edw. 3, which is in the records at the Tower, as it was observed by my brother Hutton, 'Car ceo est encounter le droit del royaume.' How this comes to pass, I know not. I caused it to be searched, and I find these words only in the articles upon the roll, where they do complain for the finding of hobbellers, and are aggrieved for it, and give this as a reason, 'Car ceo est encounter le droit del royaume: And the answer which the king gave unto it, was a royal answer to the thing proposed; but those words are left out of it. But if it were the right of the subject, 'le droit del royaume,' as Littleton saith, that cannot die.

And certainly, in case of necessity there is a right belonging to the king to prevent danger; for legally, when the safety of the kingdom is in danger, in danger apparent, in that case the king hath a power of prerogative to compel aid. And if an act of parliament should be made to restrain such a charge on the subjects in case of necessity, it would be Felo de se, and so void; for it would destroy that regale jus. So this great question of imposing this charge, I am of opinion it may be done without parliament, as it was in 1588, so long as the present and apparent danger continueth. And I am of opinion, (as I was when we gave in our certificates to his majesty) that the king is the sole judge of the danger, and how to provide against it.

But however, I do conceive upon this record, upon which I am to give judgment, that the mandates in the writ 4 Aug. are not good in law, nor according to the laws and customs of the kingdom of England, nor well grounded upon the certificate; and that the information afterwards in the Mittimus cannot make a former writ good, which was first defective: And the sheriffs who were, their return is not effectual, upon which judgment may be given.

I cannot see how judgment can be given quod oneretur, and not tell to whom, and nothing visible to whom we may find it: And therefore, in my Opinion, judgment is to be given for Mr. Hampden.

THE ARGUMENT OF SIR JOHN FINCH, Kt. Lord Chief-Justice of the Court of Common-Pleas, in the Exchequer-Chamber, in the great Case of SHIP-MONEY. *

A writ under the great seal of England, dated 4 Aug. 11 Car. when to the sheriff of Bucks (sir Peter Temple) commanding a ship of 450 tons and 180 men to be ready furnished with all ammunition and tackling at Portsmouth for 26 weeks, to go with other of his majesty's ships, and of the subjects, to defend the dominion of the sea, the realm being in danger; and to charge and assess all his majesty's subjects, and all the inhabitants within the said county, and all occupiers, tenants, and tenants there that have not part in the ship, nor serve in the same, to contribute for, and towards the preparation and setting forth of the ship according to their abilities.

The record of Certiorari saith, that Stoke Mandevile is within the said county, and was assessed at a reasonable rate; and that the sum of 20s. was assessed upon the lands of John Hampden, esq.; as by a schedule of 9 Mar. 12 Car. annexed to the Certiorari, may appear.

* Lord Clarendon says, "Undoubtedly my lord Finch's Speech in the exchequer-chamber, made Ship-Money much more abhorred, and formidable, than all the commitments by the council-table, and all the distresses taken by the sheriffs in England: the major part of me (besides the common unconcernedness in other mens sufferings) looking upon those proceedings with a kind of applause to themselves, to see other men punished, for not doing as they had done; which delight was quickly determined, when they found their own interest, by the unnecessary logic of that Argument, no less concluded than Mr. Hampden's."

Whereupon a Mittimus 5 Maii 13 Car. with this Certiorari and Schedule, was directed to the barons of the Exchequer, to do there for the sum unpaid, 'prout de jure et per legem et consuetudinem regni nostri Angliæ fuer' 'faciend'.

A Sci' Fa' upon this went forth of the exchequer, to warn Mr. Hampden to shew cause why he should not pay the 20s. Upon the return of which Mr. Hampden appeared, and demanded Oyer of the writ, Certiorari, Schedule, Mittimus, and Sci' Fa'; and upon hearing of them read, he demurred, and Mr. Attorney joined in the demurrer; then my lord chief-baron, and the court of exchequer, adjourned it to the court of Exchequer-Chamber, desiring the advice of all his majesty's judges: and look what advice we or the greatest number of us give, that court ought and must give judgment accordingly.

In the debating of this case, there hath been great variety of opinions among the judges, a thing usual and frequent in all great cases and consultations; which shews commonly the difficulty of the thing, and argueth a caudor and clearness in the judges, between whom combination and conspiracy would be most odious. All that have gone before me, have in one thing agreed, that it is the greatest case that ever came in any of our memories, or the memory of any man.

As the sun arising in the horizon shews not the figure so clear, as when it is beholden in the meridian; so by mixing many impertinences with the case in judgment, it hath been apprehended to be of a far tenderer consequence than indeed it is: yet tender and weighty it is. If equally weighed, in the one balance we may put the regal power, or rather the regality itself; in the other the privileges and liberties of the subject, in his person and estate.

To look upon either of these, or both, through the multiplying glass of affection, is to behold neither of them truly; neither can they be so truly discerned, much less to multiply by the glass of fancy: and therefore justice needs to hold the beam straight.

I cannot fear myself, when vulgar censure hath exercised itself upon every one that hath delivered himself upon this matter: yet I will not say, 'Domine, posuisti me in lubrico loco;' for we that do sit here, do move in a sphere, and should be like the primum mobile, according to whom all others are to steer their course; and judges themselves must move steadily upon their right poles, as I hope this court will. What judge soever he be that is elevated by popular applause, or animated by the contrary, to accumulate honour, is fitter to live 'in facie Romuli quam in politia Angliæ.' Nor will I lose time in remembering the first oath of a judge, who should expel all by-respects, and speak his conscience. I hope none of us forget the duty we owe to God, to the king, and to the commonwealth, and to ourselves. I shall endeavour to satisfy my conscience in all that I can say: And they forget their duty to the first, and humanity towards us, that say or think the contrary of any one of us. Some of us have fortunes and posterities, and therein have given hostages to the commonwealth, and have as much interest in this case as Mr. Hampden. Those that want those blessings, want those temptations that make them dream of, or hunt for honour or riches, to perpetuate their names and families; to them nothing can be more precious than the balm of integrity, which will preserve their names and memories. It cannot be presumed, but we will speak our consciences; since we well know shortly, as the Psalmist says, 'Corruption shall say, I am thy father, and the worm, I am thy mother.'

In handling this case, no man can think I shall do other than right: and herein I am rather troubled for a method than for matter, rather how to dispose of what I find, than to find what to dispose. I shall endeavour shortly and clearly (considering the time I have to spend, and the weightiness of the matters I am to speak of) to deliver my opinion with the reasons of it; and my endeavour shall be rather to contract than omit.—I have, with the best care I could, taken notes of all that hath been said for or against Mr. Hampden; and have according to the measure of my understanding, weighed and pondered all that hath been spoken, both at the bar, and by my brothers, and bestowed many hours in meditation about them, which the time of rest and repose might have challenged.

Before I enter into the case, I shall speak of the steps and degrees by which this cause has come to judgment; whereby it will clearly appear, with what clemency, wisdom, justice and goodness, his majesty hath proceeded in this business.

The first writ went out to the port-towns and maritime parts of the land, 20 Oct. 10 regis, upon advice taken between his majesty and his council. Before then, of these writs I can say nothing; for I was commanded at that time to attend another service, about another employment, the forest of Deane: But it is well known, the resolution taken by his majesty therein, was grounded, and relied upon the judgment and learning of Mr. Noy, Attorney General, a man of great learning, and one that had great insight into records, by whom the matter was first prepared, collected and digested, and afterwards imparted to some of his majesty's learned counsel, and afterwards to some other eminent persons of the commonwealth, of no less judgment and knowledge in the laws of this realm. And upon consultation with my Lord Chief-Baron, and his majesty's barons of the Exchequer, his majesty commanded those writs to be sent forth: against the legality of which, nothing hath been truly alledged. It is true they are not in judgment properly before

Primo Octob. anno 10, of his majesty's reign, his majesty was pleased to command me to serve in the place that now I do; and those records, writs, commissions, and other precedents, were brought to me, as they had been formerly to my Lord Chief Justice, and my Lord Chief Baron; and we three did confer together, and did deliver our opinions in writing, under our hands, upon view and diligent perusal of a multitude of antient records, writs, and other precedents of Ed. 1, Ed. 2, Ed. 3, their times, and other records of other king's reigns; which opinions were in these words, 'That the dominion of the sea belongeth to the king; and that he is sole lord and proprietor of the same. In which respect his excellent majesty these regalities and royal powers is to defend against all hostile actions, intrusions, and invasions, as well for the good of his subjects, as strangers, importing and exporting their commodities, and for the defence of the kingdom: And for the better performing whereof, the Cinque-Ports have been required to prepare such a number of ships of divers burdens, and men of arms, and at such times, at their own charges, from time to time, as the same writs and the present occasion required. And for the time, and place, and residence of their attendance, his majesty was the sole appointer and only judge; and this was the constant use in the reigns of those kings; and this was agreeable to the common law of the kingdom.'

And 15 Nov. 1634, before the next summer, his majesty finding the danger to grow general, and conceiving, that there was little reason these maritime parts should bear the whole charge, for that the whole realm was interested therein; afterwards he required our opinions, viz. my Lord Chief Justice, my Lord Chief Baron, and myself, June 1635: After conference together, we delivered our opinions. And we upon consultation conceiving the reason of the precedents before, and the rule of the law, and reason requiring, that when the whole kingdom was in danger that the defence that concerned the whole kingdom should be borne by all the subjects of the kingdom; this was first verbally delivered to his majesty, and afterwards we put in writing under our hands, in these words: 'Whereas the charge of defending the sea had been imposed upon the Cinque-Ports; so where the whole kingdom is in danger; the whole charge ought to be maintained by all the subjects of the realm.' And amongst other writs, those to the sheriff of Bucks went forth at the time aforesaid. After which, his majesty finding some question made of the legality of it, he called all his judges, not singly, nor any one in a corner, but because he would have every one of them truly informed, required them to advise together, and every one of them by themselves to give his opinion; according to which, we severally, and every man by himself, and all of us together, delivered our opinions general is concerned, and the whole kingdom in danger, of which your majesty is the sole judge, your majesty may, by writ under the great seal of England, command all the subjects of this your kingdom, at their own charge, to provide such a number of ships, with men, ammunition, and victuals, and for such a time as your majesty shall think fit, for the defence and safeguard of the kingdom, from such danger and peril: And that, by the law your majesty may compel the doing thereof in case of refusal.' In which this clause 'his majesty is the sole judge,' was only put in by ten of us; my brother Hutton having not seen nor weighed the precedents, took time to advise, and gave no opinion, till conference between us: And my brother Crooke had the same reason, being not acquainted with those writs, but yet subscribed his opinion singly by himself, Dec. 1635, viz. 'That where the good and safety of the kingdom is in danger, of which his majesty is the sole judge, his majesty may command all his subjects at their charge, to provide and furnish such ships to sea, with men and ammunition, as shall be necessary for the defence thereof.' And this I hold to be agreeable to law and reason; and though I perceived nothing of this his opinion in his argument, yet he still holdeth it.

Wherein I observe, 1. That the king is sole judge of the danger, and whether it be imminent. 2. Not only that the king may in such danger command his subjects to defend the kingdom in case of necessity, but that the charge of the defence ought to be borne by all the realm in general. Which opinion was more independent than the rest, for that our opinion before it had relation to the precedent of maritime parts: but this was, that the subject might be charged absolutely; and this was delivered by him readily, cheerfully, and without hesitation; he will not deny it.—I speak not of this as of a thing whereby he ought to have been concluded, but that all the world should know, that his majesty's regal and legal power go hand in hand together, and that his princely love and affection to his subjects are such, that he is willing to prevent all mistakes: And I speak it also to this end, that when judges singly deliver their opinions to the king, not examining the reasons that moved them to it; we ought to see very good and pregnant reasons to vary from that opinion, though it be not binding.

This his majesty required for his own private satisfaction; and this I dare boldly say was so delivered by us, that no one judge knew the opinion of the rest. When his majesty found slackness in some of his subjects in contributing to this charge, and thinking that it proceeded rather from misunderstanding of the law, than for want of duty, as desirous, out of his princely love, to avoid all mistakes, he did upon 2 Feb. 1636, send a letter to all his majesty's judges and barons of the Exchequer, thereby requiring our several opinions: about which we all can-ferred, and the particulars, wherein our opinions were required, had been considered of before, or else we were much to blame; for we had time enough to think upon it. And though our answers were returned the 7th of the same month, yet we had it in our consideration from June 1635, which was 15 months before the answer returned; so there was no surprize. I will spare to name our opinion then delivered; for it hath been repeated before. When we came to the debate and voting of this, we brake the writ into several parts.

1. When the good and safety of the kingdom in general is concerned, and the whole kingdom is in danger, Whether it ought not to be defended at the charge of the whole kingdom? And agreed it was, una voce, nullo contradicente, that it ought. 2. Whether the charge of the defence might not be commanded by the king? Which was also agreed, that it might. 3. Whether the king was not the sole judge, both of the danger, and when and how it was to be prevented? Wherein my brothers Hutton and Crooke did agree it likewise, that he was sole judge of the danger. What their opinions are now, and wherein they differ, with their good leave I shall examine, and their reasons and differences; (though indeed of the king's being the sole judge, in their arguments, my brother Crooke spake nothing of his opinion therein, nor my brother Hutton nothing against it.) But we delivered not our opinion upon the bye; nor was it so required of his majesty.

It was then also declared by all of us, that we did not deliver our opinions as binding, nor were they so required by his majesty; of all which I dare boldly say, his majesty was truly informed. And this was also soon after published by his command, and seconded by my Lord Keeper and Lord Privy-Seal, the first of them using many arguments and sound collections, delivered it in charge to his majesty's judges, to deliver it in their circuits, which might have satisfied any that did not respect their own private benefit. And Mr. Hampden, I think, of all both the least cause to complain, being assessed but 20s. a contemptible sum, in respect of his annual revenues, to bring this case to judgment: yet his majesty's clemency appears to be great herein, in that he would not debar any to question the lawfulness of it, though he hath permitted arcana imperii, nay, imperium ipsum, (I would to God I could not say even too licentiously) to be debated at this bar; yet I speak it not by way of reprehension, but admonition to the counsel, who are to be commended, in that they have done their duty faithfully for their client: yet I may say, such a raveling and diving into the king's revenue, and secret estate of princes, and what succeeding kings may be, or may do, it doth not well become these present times: it would not have been endured in the best preceding times. It was not well done to doubt succeeding posterity, that promise as much as any of their predecessors have done for the good of the commonwealth. It is not well to clog the case with so many precedents, impossible to be thoroughly observed; but our example, I hope, shall be a bar hereafter, and our care shall be to prevent it, being a great hindrance of justice, and cause of great expence to the subjects long attendance about their causes here; which may prove a greater charge than in providing ships for the realm.

I come to the case now, as it stands in judgment before us; wherein my method shall be,

I. To examine what the case is.—II. I will give my opinion of the case, with the reasons thereof.—III. I will answer the objections made against it.—IV. I will speak to the legality and form of the writ 4 Aug. the Certiorari, the Mittimus, and Sci' Fa' out of the Exchequer. And to all these, with what brevity I can, I will speak according to the weight of the case, where variety of opinions gives just cause to balance them: the case must arise out of the Record, and must stand or fall upon that.

I. For the case itself; and therein, 1. I will shew what danger there is, that is the ground of the charge. 2. What things there are to maintain it: as for other things, they tend to the destruction of the case.

1. I am of opinion, that the danger of the whole kingdom ought to be expressed clearly; for else the ground-work faileth; for if no danger, no reason of the charge. And I am of opinion, that in the writ 4 Aug. it ought to be expressed; and not in the Mittimus; though as my brother Jones observed, the Mittimus comes time enough to Mr. Hampden to give him notice, yet he was not liable to the charge, but by the writ 4 Aug. (1.) It is objected, the danger is not clearly expressed; for it is not upon words of certainty, but by way of uncertainty, 'Quod datum est nobis intelligi.' (2.) For the causes of the writ, that it hath not relation to the danger of the kingdom, but to defend the sea-coasts against pirates, &c. And they are not worthy of a royal navy, as brother Crooke also observed.—But I hold first, that the danger is sufficiently expressed, 'Certum est sicut res habet; datum nobis est intelligi.' A thing very ordinary with us; and in all former writs Ex relatione, &c. 'Quod vulgaris opinio est, &c.' Although my lord chief baron paralleled this to the Case of Patents, 'ex certa scientia, &c.' which is nothing alike: for there before the king pass away land, he may be informed if he may do it: but I hold, as this case is, the danger will not permit it to be examined, whether there be just cause of fears; for then it might receive delay, which is dangerous, and the kingdom be lost whilst we are disputing. And then for the phrase itself, 'Datum est nobis intelligi.' It is sufficient that the king knows there is a danger; add therefore, if it had been only 'intelligimus,' none can deny but it had been sufficient. And what difference is there between 'intelligimus' and 'datum est nobis intelligi?' That sets forth the knowledge of the danger, and this shews the means whereby he doth know it: 'Ut datum est nobis intelligi.' This goes farther than 'ex auditu, rumor est, &c.' Therefore unless the king should go out of the kingdom to see the danger, can it be otherwise expressed?

(3.) I hold, that the danger itself, with the motives in the writ, are sufficient.—The motives are, great depredations of the subjects goods, and lives: but it is not upon this I rest, for this hath relation to pirates leading many Christians into captivity. These are good motives, and (as one of my brothers said well) though these have relation to pirates, yet bellum piraticum points at as much terror as Hannibal ad portas.—I shall not rely much upon that, that the enemies of Christendom and of this nation did prepare 'ad mercatores nostros ulterius molestand,' nor 'ad regnum gravand' nisi citius 'remedium apponatur, &c.' But this 'Consideratis periculis quæ undique his guerrinis 'temporibus imminetibus ita quod nobis et 'subditis nostris defensionem maris et regni 'nostri omni festinatione qua poterimus convenit, &c.' shews otherwise than for the pirate, this defence was requisite. Therefore the next clause is 'Nos volentes defensionem 'regni, tuitionem maris, securitatem subditorum nostrorum, &c.' And therefore that 'salva conductione navium et merchandizarum 'quæ ad regnum nostrum Angliæ venerint, et 'de eodem regno ad partes externas transeunt, ' &c.' takes not away the former works, nor limits them.—As for the clause in the Mittimus, I stand not upon it, nor that 'Salus 'regni et populi nostri Angliæ periclitabatur, ' &c.'

(4.) Admit there had been no preamble nor expression of danger, I hold the command itself is sufficient for setting forth the danger, which is, that the ship be with other his majesty's ships, and the ships of other his majesty's subjects at Portsmouth the 1st day of March next following; the words of the record be, 'Exinde cum navibus nostris et navibus aliorum fidelium subditorum nostrorum protectione maris et defensione nostrorum et vestrorum, &c.' And particularly to express the danger is not necessary; for the king, the sole arbiter both of peace and war, best knows it; and it was the practice in former times: and so no wisdom for the king to express the danger in particular, when arms usually go before heralds; nor is it the use of princes to compliment, to tell the enemy they will, or intend to invade their lands. And therefore I hold, though it might be more clear, yet satis est quod sufficit: I in my own conscience am satisfied that the danger is certain enough expressed in the writ. And so I have done with the first particular, the danger, which was the ground of this writ.

(2.) As to the second particular, what is alleged to be for the preventing of that danger; my brother Hutton, and my brother Crook, would have it to be raising of money, by reason of that clause in the writ, for the distribution of the surpluseage. But the record is, 'ad asidendum omnes homines et ad contribuendum navem vel partem navis non habentes, ' &c.' which shews it cannot be for money, neither is there any colour of money; for it is to find a ship; and if they have not of their own, they must build, or buy one with their money. But there is a great deal of difference between payment of money and finding of a ship. As if my brother Crooke be required to find a light horse and arms, he must buy one, or hire with his money, if he hath none: but yet the charge is not for money, but that he finds a light horse.—But my brother Crooke's objection is, if any surpluseage remain, it shall be divided; and so the sheriff is to detain no part of it, but employ it for the public good, and not convert it to his own proper benefit. To this I answer, that this shews the equality of the charges which is fittest to be by payment of money.—My brother Crooke hath farther objected, that an inland county cannot build a ship: a great trouble for the county of Bucks, so far from the sea, to build a ship. To this I answer, that those of Buckinghamshire may hire a ship, if they cannot build one; and the words are but parare, not for the building but preparing a ship; and it is not meant that they should build it there, but that they should contribute to the building of a ship in a most fit and convenient place.

II. I shall now give my opinion of the case, with the reasons thereof. The king knowing and declaring the whole kingdom to be in danger, and necessarily requiring his subjects to defend and provide for this danger at sea, he may thereupon command all his subjects to prepare ships to join with his navy royal against the enemies of the whole realm, to defend the whole realm: and it is clear in the case, and it was the meaning of us all, that the king must join in the charge, it being far from us to excuse the king from his ratable part.

My reasons that the king may thus charge his subjects to join with him in the defence of the kingdom, are these.—1. The defence of the kingdom must be at the charge of the whole kingdom in general. 2. The power of laying this charge is, by the policy and fundamental laws of this kingdom, solely invested in the king. 3. The law that hath given this power to the king to do these things, hath given him means to put these things in execution.

And as to all these I shall ground myself upon authorities in law, and precedents in all ages.

1. That the defence of the kingdom must be at the charge of the kingdom, I shall prove, (1.) From the law of nature, which is, that every thing in nature ought to defend itself. (2.) From the rule of reason: for 'Quod 'omnes tangit, ab omnibus supportari debet.' (3.) From the true use of all that we enjoy, which must be abused, if not employed to and for the good also of those that come after us:

and necessary it is for our posterity to have all sure and safe. A good patient will spare some blood to preserve his own health; and a good husband will spare some of his best ground for ditches and fences to preserve the rest; and he is an ill husband that finds not safety in that he doth. (4.) From the law of property: as every one hath a particular property in his own goods, so every one hath a property in general in another man's goods, for the common good. For the commonwealth hath a property in every man's goods, not only in time of war, but also in time of necessity in time of peace. Therefore if any man take away my goods without my consent, I have my action, and recover damage. Doctor and Student saith, Both a trespass of lands and goods is punishable by indictment, and trespass, at the king's suit as well as at the subject's: and this is by reason of the public interest the king hath in every subject's goods for the common good.—Now the rule and maxim before so clearly and fully put and agreed by all, is, that in case of necessity that is apparent, the subject ought to defend the kingdom. And my brother Crooke agrees in case of danger, so it be eminent, all men are bound in their persons and estates to defend the kingdom? and he says then they must exponere se et sua: I think he means a man that takes a journey may carry his money with him, se et sua: or else he means the king cannot command their money without their consent: of which I will speak in its proper place.

2. I come now to the second part of my general head, which is the power of laying this charge. By the fundamental laws and policy of this kingdom, the sole interest and property of the sea, &c. is in the king. I will not speak of this monarchy, this is rather fit for civilians, historians, or the pen of a divine, than a judge at Westminster-hall: nor will I speak of the division of monarchies: the poets say that Saturn was the first founder of kingdoms. Only this I will say, that for the excellency of the government of this kingdom, through God's blessing, none are more happy than we. Look and see in other nations, and tell me if you can find out any place where they can and do enjoy those mercies of peace and plenty which we do; so as we may justly say, 'O fortunatos nimium bona sua norunt Britannos!' Nor will I perplex myself with the original of the nation and monarchy; some stories are fabulous, others doubtful, not any so clear as to set it forth certainly, though they speak truly what is sufficient for us to know; nor is he the poorest, 'Qui non potest numerare pecus,' nor he one of the worst gentlemen that cannot shew the original of his pedigree. The excellency of this monarchy is, that it is sufficient it is a monarchy; and that it is most true what Fortescue saith of our laws. I agree that Fortescue was a lord chief justice in Hen. 6's time, but not chancellor of England. Sea and land make but one kingdom, and the king is sponsus regni; Magdalen College Case, sir Joh. Davies' Reports, stat. 24 Hen. 8, 1 Eliz. and 1 Jac. The soil of the sea belongs to the king, who is lord and sole proprietor of them; and good reason why he should, as is well maintained by Mr. Selden, that worthy and learned author of Mare Clausum; and I hope shall be by his majesty maintained, with the sovereignty of the sea: and without a navy this authority can do but little good.—The king holds this diadem of God only, all others hold their lands of him, and he of none but of God: but this is but to light a candle for others. From hence only I will observe, that none other can share with him in his absolute power.

A parliament is an honourable court; and I confess it an excellent means of charging the subject, and defending the kingdom; but yet it is not the only means. An honour the last parliament was pleased to bestow on me, which never any shall with more respect remember than myself, when they were pleased to chuse me for their Speaker. And as my brother Hutton said, I conceive it a fit way to charge the subject; and I wish that some, for their private humour, had not sowed the tares of discontent in that field of the commonwealth, then might we have expected and found good fruit. But now the best way to redeem this lost privilege (for which we may give those thanks only) is to give all opportune appearance of obedience and dutifulness to his majesty's command. The two houses of parliament without the king cannot make a law, nor without his royal assent declare it: he is not bound to call it but when he pleaseth, nor to continue it but at his pleasure. Certainly there was a king before a parliament, for how else could there be an assembly of king, lords and commons? And then what sovereignty was there in the kingdom but this? His power then was limited by the positive law; then it cannot be denied but originally the king had the sovereignty of the whole kingdom both by sea and land, who hath a power of charging the whole kingdom.

3. The law that hath given that power, hath given means to the king by this authority to put it in execution. It is a very true rule, the law commands nothing to be done, but it permits the ways and means how it may be done; else the law should be imperfect, lame and unjust: therefore the law that hath given the interest and sovereignty of defending and governing the kingdom to the king, doth also give the king power to charge his subjects for the necessary defence and good thereof. And as the king is bound to defend, so the subjects are bound to obey, and to come out of their own country, if occasion be, and to provide horse and arms in foreign war; and such are compellable now to find guns instead of bows and arrows, so ammunition, as powder, shot, &c. Then if sea and land be but one entire kingdom, and the king lord of both, the subject is bound as well to the defence of the sea as of the land; and then all are bound to provide ships, men, ammunition, victuals, and necessaries for that defence. And for us islanders, it is most necessary for us to defend ourselves at sea: therefore it was the great argument in 1588, whether it was best to fight with the royal and invincible navy or Armada of Spain at sea, or suffer them to land; and it was resolved clearly, that it was better to fight with them at sea, though we lost the battle and our ships, than to suffer them to land.—But then there was Hannibal ad portas. To this I shall answer afterwards. But here the maritime towns shall not help the inland, nor the inland the maritime, but each of them bear their own charge, and defend themselves. But of this I shall likewise speak hereafter; yet undoubtedly it is reasonable that both should join to defend the kingdom in case of necessity.

Now I shall endeavour to prove this clearly by authority in law, and precedents in all ages. And, (1.) It is a great authority in law, that there is no express authority against it: though there have been some books cited by my brother Hutton and my brother Crooke, (which I shall answer in their due place, amongst other objections) yet there is not one authority or opinion, much less resolution or judgment, in necessary time of danger, that says, the king may not charge the subjects for defence of the kingdom. (2.) All these authorities that prove the king is trusted with the defence of the kingdom, and in divers cases give him aid, taxes, subsidies, &c. prove that the subject is bound in case of danger and necessity, to pay them to the king for defence of the kingdom. (3.) All the authorities of murage, pontage, salt-petre, &c. shew that for the good of the public the king is interested in the estates of the subject, and may charge them much more, if for the well-being, than where the being itself of the commonwealth is at stake and in danger. (4.) The authority of commanding the persons of the subjects to come out of their own countries proves it. The power of commanding the person of the subject into foreign parts is in the king; much more the state of men should be at his command, in case of necessary defence of the kingdom. (5.) All the commissions of arraying men in Ed. 1, Ed. 2, Ed. 3, Ed. 4, Hen. 7, and Hen. 8's times, &c. are grounded upon the same reason, and went out for the necessary defence of the kingdom. These writs are not to command the person, but a ship only, 'juxta facultates suas,' which are answerable in reason to the antient precedents.

From authorities I come to precedents; though they be not judgments, yet they shew the practice of the law: and what better book have we in the law than the book of precedents, or what is there of more authority than that, for we have not the twelve tables for our common laws? The common law is but the common usage of the land; and therefore the precedents alledged by the king's counsel are of good authority to prove the laws in this case: wherein I shall not name the particulars, they have been well remembered by Mr. Attorney and

Mr. Solicitor: but I will mention the substance of them.

The first sort of precedents were before the Conquest, in the times of Edgar, Alfred, Etheldred, &c. the use was to defend the kingdom at the charge of the whole kingdom, by the edict of the king. A strong inference from the precedent of the grant to the clergy and church of divers privileges, with these exceptions of Pontium, &c. in the times of Edgar, Alfred, and Etheldred, &c.

The council of Enoch in Edgar's time, about 606, mentioned by the learned antiquary sir Henry Spelman, fo. 510. And after these follows 'ha sunt constitutiones, &c.' fo. 543, in which are excellent things, good for church and common-wealth, cap. 23. Navales Expeditiones, if it be no act of parliament, yet nothing is more like an act of parliament: take the phrase of those times, and certainly it was either an act of parliament, or a proof of the king's power, that without parliament, he might charge the subject for the defence of the kingdom in case of danger. And the word expedition is used for war, and sometimes for an army, as Cassiodorus giving the reason of the name says. In the third place, it shews the practice of the kings of England to charge their subjects for the defence of the kingdom in case of danger.—Now if this charge of Danegels be not taken away by any of the acts of parliament, it remains still, saith my brother Hutton. And so I think it doth, or something in lieu of it; for it is not taken away by any act of parliament.

In these precedents, observe, (1.) That they are all upon the same common reason that this is. (2.) These writs are not limited for their number or time; so they prove the power was in the king to charge his subjects. (3.) In these precedents, some were to inland counties, as Bucks, Huntingdon, Bedford, Leicester, Oxford, Berks, &c. And though they went not generally to all counties at one time, yet they went to them as occasion was. And if the danger had required it, the king might, if he pleased, have sent to all as well as to some.

But because there was never any time, when all the ammunition in the kingdom was drawn at one time to one place, may it not therefore be done? the commanding sometimes of one, sometimes of another, is an argument they may be all commanded as occasion requires. I do not build my opinion upon confused notions, but on matters digested; on precedents of weight, the chiefest in respect of time: and after the making of Magna Charta, 9 Hen. 3, 13 H. 3, m. 48, 18 Hen. 3, m. 7, 13 Ed. 3, m. 77, 23 Ed. 3, m. 4, 28 Ed. 1, m. 93, and many others in Ed. 1's time, there is proving contribution towards the maintenance of the sea-coasts from inland towns, as 25 Ed. 1, m. 13, the abbot of Robertbridge's case is a full precedent, notwithstanding all that hath been said against it. So 9 Ed. 2, pars 1, 30 Ed. 2, m. 7, 2 Ed. 3, Scot. Roll. 7 Ed. 3, m. 9, 10 Ed. 3, m. 16, 17, 11 Ed. 3, 12 Ed. 3, 14, 15, 16, 18 Ed. 3, 46 Ed.

3, m. 34, 25 Ed. 3, Rot. Franc. m. 9, 25 Ed. 3, 1 Rd. 2, 1 Hen. 4. Yet Hen. 4 had as much reason to please the people as any king of England. So in Hen. 5's time, though busied in the glorious conquests of France, or rather recovery of France; God forbid we should see such times. So in the times of Ed. 4, Hen. 6, Hen. 7, and Hen. 8, by way of offensive war, writs and commissions to their subjects to contribute toward it. So in queen Eliz.'s time, commissions towards the maintenance of the kingdom. 11 Eliz. 41 Eliz. a commission to the earl of Nottingham. In 1588, letters from the lords of the council, which letters had the queen's writs in them.

But my brother Crooke answered all these with this rule of law, 'Judicandum est legibus non exemplis.' To this I answer, that examples and precedents are good law; they are authorities out of the law, and what of more certainty? Digest of writs, these are inter oracula legis, precedents drawn up by clerks; though they pass sometimes sub silentio, yet are they good authorities in the law. The abbot of Robertsbridge's case is a precedent of great authority. But it is alleged, no precedent goes to inland counties. I answer, in truth the precedents are quite otherwise; for ordinary defence they go to maritime counties only, but when the danger is general, to inland counties also, and after another manner. For this I refer you to my brother Weston's argument: These could not be so frequent; for first, such danger was but seldom: Secondly, We had then double hostility, one from France by sea, another from Scotland by land. Examine the precedents therefore.

Another observation that my brother Crooke made, is this, that we are compellable by our persons and arms, but not with any sum of money. I answer with my brother Jones, that bona corporis are above bona fortuna; but this power of liberty to command the persons of his subjects, he agrees is in the king; then I say, more reason that their estates should be in his power in this case of defence. Besides, the precedents warrant the quite contrary, and wages have been paid the soldiers by the subject in this case.

III. The third thing I shall do in this case, is the answering of all the objections which have been made against it, which were three.

1. That this writ was against the common law. 2. That it was against the statute law. 3. That many inconveniences will grow thereby.

1. It is against the common law, because it is without precedent: this is the first of this kind since the Conquest; and where there is no precedent, the law will not bear it; Littleton, fol. 32. Lord Coke's comment upon it: and they put divers cases to the same purpose. I answer, that there are precedents for it, and the law is so, that the king may charge his subjects towards the defence of the kingdom in this case.

2. The second objection is, that it is against the freedom of the subject, who hath a true property in his goods, which cannot be taken away without his actual or implied consent. Lambert, fol. 294. Mag. Char. 17 king John, Mat. Paris, fol. 242. Fortescue, fol. 9, cap. 48, &c. 13 Hen. 4, the Chamberlain of London's case, Reg' fol. 127, Fitz-herb. Na. Br. &c. I answer, that the authority of Lambert rehearsing the laws of the Conqueror, is, 'Volumus et concedimus ut omnes liberi homines totius monarchie regni nostri habeant et teneant terras suas et possessiones suas bene et in pace, liberas ab omni exactione injusta, et ab omni tallagio, ita quod nihil exigatur vel capiat nisi per commune concilium,' &c. (It cannot be construed that they should not be charged, but that they should be free from all unjust taxes. The king is not concluded by the subsequent words 'omne tallagium;' this cannot be so general, but the king may impose just charges towards the necessary defence of the whole kingdom. For this is meant, as by the word tailage plainly appeareth. 'Tallagium' is derived from a French word, and is indeed a cutting word, and therefore 'injusta exactio;' which shews that for the most part it is taken in the worst sense, and as my brother Crooke said it, the manner of expounding it must be from the law. But my brother Crooke quite left out these words following that declare and expound the former, viz. 'Statuimus et firmiter precipimus ut omnes liberi homines totius regni præd' sint fratres conjurati ad monarchiam nostram pro viribus suis et facultatibus contra inimicos pro posse suo defendend' et viriliter servand'' &c. whereby it is apparent, (1.) That the kingdom is to be defended by the whole kingdom 'pro facultatibus' with their goods, as well as 'viribus' with their persons. (2.) It comes after the chapter of tenure and services, by which they are bound to defend, 'terras et honores suos,' &c. which shews that he meant not to discharge any from the general charge of defending the kingdom in case of necessity.

The next objection is the charter of king John, 'Nullum tallagium imponatur nisi per commune concilium.'

I answer, the words are concerning the defence of his own person, and not the kingdom; and therefore it is excepted, 'nisi ad redimendum corpus nostrum;' and in the original act these words are left out. Scutage, murage, and other aids there mentioned, shews that only those were meant, that were of private benefit. They were not to be imposed by the king upon any subject, without parliament, but not to bar himself from laying such as were for the public good.

The next authority that was objected, was Fortescue, which was most pressed and insisted on by my brother Crooke. Before I come to the words themselves, note (1.) The time when he wrote that book, it was after all the acts of parliament that took away the royal power; yet it did not mention them, so as must needs relate to the common law. It was writ when the civil wars were between the two houses of York and Lancaster, and he himself was in exile; no time then to displease the people. (2.) It shews the difference between kingdoms, when a monarch rules, that challengeth all power over his subjects, and a monarch that governs according to the positive laws. The words that seemed to be against this charge are, fol. 9, cap. 26, 'Rex Angliæ politice imperans 'genti suæ nec legem ipse sine subditorum assensu mutare poterit, nec subjectum populum 'renitentem onerare impositionibus peregrinis.' cap. 13, fol. 32, 'Rex caput corporis politici 'mutare non potest leges corporis illius nec 'ejusd' populi substantias proprias subtrahere 'reclamantibus eis aut iniuriis.' And cap. 36, fol. 84, which my brother Crooke says is the express authority in hoc individuo; the words are, 'Rex regni Angliæ ibidem per se aut ministros 'tallagia subsidia aut quovis onera alia imponit 'legibus suis aut leges eorum mutat vel novas 'condit sine concessione vel assensu totius regni sui in parlamento suo expresso,' &c.

From them all, I take the true meaning of him to be; and I hold, (1.) That the kingdom ought to be governed by the positive laws of the land; and that the king cannot change or make new laws without a parliament. (2.) That the subject hath an absolute property in his goods and estate, and that the king cannot take them to his own use. (3.) That for his own use he cannot lay any burden upon his subjects, without the subject's consent in parliament. (4.) That for the benefit of trade, the king may lay fitting impositions, and may command that which is for the necessary defence of the kingdom; which is no command of charge, but command of employing. (5.) I answer therefore to the great objection, that the liberty of the subject is lost, and the property is drowned which they have in their estates.

First, I say, all private property must give way to the public; and therefore a trespass to private men may be punished by indictment, because it is an offence of the public weal: and though every man hath a property in his goods, yet he must not use them in detriment of the commonwealth. A man may give his grass or corn away in the field, or when it is in his barn: but if he will cut it unusually, or burn or destroy his corn, or if he throw his goods into the sea, that they may perish, these are crimes punishable by the common law: so is transporting of goods, commodities, against the public good: therefore the directions of the statutes, for the restraint hereof, are from the common law. And the reason of this is, because the public property must take place: and if in petty business it may be, then much more in time of public, and great necessity and danger. And it is rather an averment of the subjects' property, that in case of necessity only they may be taken away, than contrary to it.—My brother Hutton and my brother Crooke agree, that all are bound in case of necessity exponere se et sua, to defend the kingdom; and may not the king command a part, with more reason than all?

majesty hath meant to make a private personal profit of it.—What he hath done is well known; and I dare confidently say, all hath been spent, without any account to himself, and that his majesty hath been at great charge besides towards the same: and I heard it from his own royal mouth, he spake it to me, and my lord Brampton can testify as much, that he said, it never entered into his thoughts to make such use of it; and therefore said, he was bound in conscience to convert it to the use it was received for, and none other; and that he would sooner eat the money, than convert it to his use. Therefore, he that thinks the king made a revenue of it, doth highly slander his majesty. But let kings be as David was, men after God's own heart, yet they will not want a Shimei to rail on them.

But though (blessed be God) his majesty is so gracious and loving to his subjects, and so just, that we need not fear he will charge them but upon urgent necessity; yet we know not what succeeding ages will do.—It is not well to blast succeeding ages; and if they should hereafter charge unreasonably without cause, yet this judgment warrants no such thing. Again, it is no argument to condemn the true use of a thing, because it may be abused. And again, the law reposes as great trust in the king as this. The king may pardon all offences; but if he should, then none should be safe. The king may make peace and war at his pleasure: but yet should he make peace, when peace would ruin us; or war, when war would undo us; it would be worse than this. Therefore it cannot be suspected, that the king will do any thing against law and the public good of the kingdom: therefore the law says, the king can do no wrong; for he is sponsus regni, as in Magdalen College case.

Then they object Clark's, and the chamberlain of London's case. These cases are nothing against this, but rather for it.—The record of 14 Ric. 2, rot. 60, B. R. Lever's case, in an action of trespass, for taking away his goods, without his consent, had judgment to recover in Durham.—But the case was this: one Lever of Durham brought his action against another for entering into his house, and taking away his goods and 60*l.* in money; the defendant pleaded Not Guilty, and the jury upon a special verdict found that the defendant took away his money, but upon this occasion: the Scots had invaded the realm, and were in Durham, and could not be gone without a certain sum of money: whereupon the inhabitants assembled, and amongst the rest, the plaintiff was one; and they made an order to abide the ordinance of the greater part, which was to give the Scots the money desired; and because the money was to be paid presently, ready down, therefore they made another order, to search in all men's houses, and take away what money they found; and according to which the defendant searched the plaintiff's house, and took away 60*l.* and because it was without consent the plaintiff had judgment in Durham: but upon the special verdict it was reversed in the King's-Bench, because it was with his consent. Indeed the reasons were, 1st, because he had sufficient remedy against the commonalty of Durham, and 2dly, because he did it as a servant.

But I answer, 1st, Though the ordinance was good by consent, yet it followed not that it was void without consent; the question is there only, whether good by consent. 2dly, It follows not but that all men without consent are bound to contribute towards a general charge for necessary defence.

Another objection made by my brother Crooke was 2 Ric. 2, pars 1, where all the lords and sages met together after parliament, and it was agreed by them, that they could not charge the commons without parliament; that this was a declaration of the law in parliament, and almost equivalent to an act of parliament. I answer, (1.) that this was no act, but a declaration in parliament of the law, and indeed no declaration, but a relation by the chancellor. (2.) If it had been a declaration, yet it had not been binding without the king. (3.) It is no precedent of a good look, it was when the king was young, and the parliament had the regency: counsellors, treasurers, and all his officers about his person, were chosen by the parliament; and therefore, no wonder if they endeavoured to please the parliament. (4.) It is a precedent that they, i. e. the lords, could not charge the commons by themselves.—Again, the case was not for the defence of the realm, but for wars in France, Scotland, and Ireland; these were the many wars. Though subjects may be charged for necessary defence of the kingdom, yet if foreign wars be together with them, it is otherwise. And therefore in the parliament before, they said such charge belong not to them; and therefore they hold, they ought not to bear it; and so that rule of Gascoigne; 24 Hen. 4, fol. 4. That no man shall be charged without parliament, where bulwarks were built, &c. it proves not, though it implies, that if it had concerned the kingdom, it had been otherwise.

3. The next general objection was the great inconvenience that would hereupon ensue; if such a charge might be, then none knows what his charge will be, for the king may command it as often as he pleases, an example hereof they put in Danegelt, that in eleven years they grew from twelve to forty-eight thousand pounds: therefore the law hath provided against that uncertainty, and limited it to a parliament.

I answer to this, (1.) That if danger increase, so must the charge; again, the king may command all persons when there is necessity, and as often as he pleases he may do it. Is not this as great an inconvenience as in this case, and yet that abates not the writ? My brother Crooke shewed how subsidies increased, and yet no inconvenience in that he conceived; and indeed this shews the provision of charge must be according to the danger. Besides, no abuse of any thing must take away the true and lawful use thereof. But we cannot suspect that there will be such abuse. 'Ubi confidit Deus et lex, et nos etiam confidemus.' God and the law hath trusted his majesty, and we should not distrust him. In time of imminent danger, tempore belli, any thing, and by any man may be done, murder cannot be punished: yet, says my brother Crooke, the king cannot charge his subjects in any case without parliament; no, not when the kingdom is actually invaded by the enemy. But truly I think, as he was the first, so he will be the last of that opinion, especially having delivered his opinion, that the king is sole judge of the danger before, as indeed he is; and that the king is sole judge of the danger, not any have denied it, and therefore else it should be no danger, but when every one shall say, you shall judge that the kingdom is in danger.

(2.) There hath been, and may be, as great danger when the enemy is not discerned, as when in arms and on the land. In the time of war when the course of law is stopped, when judges have no power or place, when the courts of justice can send out no process, in this case the king may charge his subjects, you grant. Mark what you grant; when there is such a confusion as no law, then the king may do it. 'Dato uno absurdo, infinita sequuntur.' Then there may be a time of war in one part of the kingdom, and the courts of justice may sit; as in 14 Hen. 3, Rich. 2, and Hen. 7's time, wars were in some parts of the land, yet the judges sat in Westminster-Hall.

(1.) Now, whether a danger be to all the kingdom, or to a part, they are alike perilous, and all ought to be charged. (2.) The king may charge the subjects for the defence of the land. Now the land and the sea make but one intire kingdom, and there is but one lord of both, and the king is bound to defend both. (3.) Expectancy of danger, I hold, is sufficient ground for the king to charge his subjects; for if we stay till the danger comes, it will be then too late, it may be. And (4.) His averment of the danger is not traversable, it must be binding when he perceives and says there is a danger; as in 1588, the enemy had been upon us, if it had not been foreseen, and provided for, before it came.

But I will not determine the danger now. Do not we see our potent neighbours, and our great enemies heretofore, were they not prepared for war; and was there not another navy floated upon the sea? and was not the dominion of the sea threatened to be taken away? As long as this danger remains, I shall bless God for such a king as will provide for the defence of the kingdom timely, and rejoice to see such a navy as other nations must veil to; and we are not in case of safety without it, and should lose our glory besides.

The next objection of my brother Crooke was, that there is a means provided by parliament, which will not withhold aid for the defence of the kingdom, and it were a sin to deny it in case of necessity. And in Ed. 1's time,

Ed. 2's time, and 4 Ed. 3's, a parliament was to be held every year for the defence of the kingdom, 'et propter ardua regni.'

I answer, that might well be, but then, in the time of Ed. 1, Ed. 2, Ed. 3, there were pleas in parliament, but those are now laid aside; and that the subjects ought to give the king subsidies; I will not say that, inferring they will not do it, nor am I apt to believe it; but I hold parliaments are the excellent means to raise aid for the defence of the kingdom, and yet they are not the only means, for then the parliament, and not the king, should be the only judge, and have the defence of the realm; or else it should give the king a charge of defence, without power or means.—The objection of the king's revenues, tenures and prerogative, they have been unfitly remembered, and they have been fully answered.

The statute of tonnage and poundage given to the king, for and towards the defence of the sea, and the other acts of parliament, that restrain the king's power, so that he cannot now charge the subject without his consent in parliament, I shall answer in the next place; and before I come to the particular acts, I will shew what in my opinion, they may do.

1. Acts of parliament may take away flowers and ornaments of the crown, but not the crown itself; they cannot bar a succession, nor can they be attained by them, and acts that bar them of possession are void. 2. No act of parliament can bar a king of his regality, as that no lands should hold of him; or bar him of the allegiance of his subjects; or the relative on his part, as trust and power to defend his people: therefore acts of parliament to take away his royal power in the defence of his kingdom, are void (as my Lord Chief Baron said;) they are void acts of parliament, to bind the king not to command the subjects, their persons and goods, and I say their money too: for no acts of parliament make any difference. Now to the particular statute objected.

(1.) 25 Ed. 1, Chap. 5. Confirmatio Chartarum, the words are these, 'aids or taxes, granted to the king, shall not be taken for a custom or precedent.' and cap. 6. 'Moreover, we have granted for us and our heirs, that for no business from henceforth, we shall take such manner of aids, taxes, nor prizes, due and accustomed.' And cap. 7, a release of toll upon every sack of wool: 'And grant, that we will not take such things without their common assent and good liking, saving to us and our heirs, the customs granted by the commons aforesaid.'

As to the other statute, De Tallagio non Concedendo, cap. 1. 'Nullum tallagium imponetur nisi per commune concilium regni nostri.' cap. 2, 3, 4, 5, &c.—First, These words must have relation to the aids before, and there be divers aids; as some by tallage, some by way of prize upon goods, and ransom of his majesty's person, &c. the king thereupon makes this grant, which hath relation to such aids as were granted voluntarily.

Secondly, ancient aids are there reserved, as redeeming the king's body, 'pur faire fitz chevalier, et pur marier son file eigne:' and so all other ancient aids, which are to be understood with an 'ad redimendum corpus, &c.'

And to the statute De Tallagio non Concedendo, in some books it is not in print, but mentioned in Mag' Char' Rastal, and the Petition of Right 3 Car. 1628, to be in 24 or 25 Edw. 1. And therefore I answer, It is not in the parliament-roll, and there is variance about it; and therefore it is but an abstract, and no substantial statute.—But since it hath passed for a statute, and possibly may be one, I agree with all the rest of my brothers, that it is a statute: And then I answer, (1.) That 'nullum tallagium imponetur, &c.' that is, no unlawful tallage shall be imposed upon the subject without his consent; or else the aids 'pur faire fitz chevalier et pur file marier,' had not been excepted. (2.) No aids shall be imposed but by contribution of the king and people; and here the king is taxed as well as they. (3.) An act of parliament can by no means take it away, much less by those general words.

Obj.—In 14 Ed. 3, cap. 1. No man from henceforth shall be chargeable, but by common consent in parliament.

To this I answer, That though it be but temporary in some parts, yet it is binding only secundum subjectum materiam: And the words are general, as in the other statute De Tallagio, &c. besides, the practice in that king's time, and after, best interprets it.

Obj.—25 Ed. 3, cap. 8. No finding of men at arms, unless by consent, much less finding of ships.

Ans.—This takes not away any former law; and therefore the precedents following. 4 Hen. 4, shew that it does not reach to this case.

Obj.—2 Hen. 4, m. 2, which is absolute in the point, saith my brother Crooke, where a commission went forth for the defence of the sea, whereof complaint was made in parliament with desire that it might be repealed, and it was done.

Ans.—I am of the contrary opinion: for the petition was that it might be released; and the answer was but this, that it should, but the king would treat with the council about it; and it was but a repeal of his commission then only.

Obj.—1 Ric. 3, cap. 2, where the king grants, that he would not hereafter charge them by benevolence, or any such charge, but that they should be dampned by the law, by no such charge or imposition, i. e. by no such charge of money.

Ans.—That statute was only against benevolences, and made by a king that had reason, as we all know, to please the people for his own ends.

Obj. 2.—The statute of Tonnage and Poundage, granted for the defence of the sea, the words are, That no tallage or aid shall be without act of parliament. 2. That the king hath means to defend the kingdom, with a protestation not to draw it into example, 4 Hen. 4, 13 Hen. 4, Parl. roll, m. 10.

Ans. I will not argue whether Tonnage and Poundage was before this act of parliament, nor that time out of mind they were granted to the king: But my answer is, They are only for the ordinary defence of the sea. And the protestation of 4 Hen. 4, is a protestation of the commons only: and this charge is not taken away thereby, and Tonnage and Poundage is for and towards the defence of the sea: so all the acts are, and so I agree. But for extraordinary, and but solely in case of danger of the whole kingdom, that they should not be granted cannot be collected out of these grants.

The last Objection is the Petition of Right 3 Car. That no charge shall be imposed upon the subject, but by parliament.

Ans.—I was then Speaker of the lower house, and I have reason to remember what then was made. And I say, 1. There is no mention of this case. 2. There was no new thing granted, but only the antient liberties confirmed, taking notice of the commons protestation, not to bind the king from his antient rights. 3. Look upon the prayer, what is desired: and the main scope was, (1.) Generally against loans, and this could not be included in these words. (2.) Imprisonment without shewing cause. (3.) Billeting of soldiers. And (4.) mariners lying within the land.

IV. I have now done with my third general head, I come to the last, touching the form and legality of the writ.

First, For the legality of the writ, and the objections touching the necessity, I have answered before; the main objection is to the body of the writ.

It is said, [1.] The command to charge the sheriff to levy and assess money according to his discretion, is not legal; for that the sheriff should make it per sacramentum, by the oaths of a jury, as in the writs of partition, distribution pro rata, &c. This assessment is not warranted by the precedents, (say my Lord Chief Baron and my brother Crooke) they do it not upon their knowledge but presumption of mens estates; and from thence they speak against the too vast power given to the sheriff, to enhance it as he pleases. [2.] The inconvenience is great hereby; for by this means there is a great inequality in the assessment.

I answer, first, to the assessment per sacramentum. No reason why it should be here; for it is not done in the commissions to levy subsidies, much less should it be done here for a matter of great haste: And besides, the sheriff is trusted with more; for he hath the trust of the whole county, and takes an oath to execute his office justly, whereof this is one part.—As to what they say, that there is no precedent for it. (1.) I say, That there is no precedent that it hath been done by jury, but always by the sheriff, or such whom the king was pleased to trust; and since one must be trusted, none more fit than he. (2.) By example, we see, he speeds all, and is most ready for it. (3.) I say, the writ leads not the assessment, it commands the ship to be provided; so if that be done, there is no necessity of assessment: and if the towns and counties say they will provide a ship, and do it, then no assessment is requisite; but if they do it not, then the sheriff is to levy it, that the defence may be seasonable: so that the clause of the assessment shews the manner of it. When a multitude is to join, none more fit than he to do it; and no way better, than to write to him to do it according to mens abilities. (4.) The clause of the assessment is not only to the sheriff, but to the head officer of the town and borough; and though the discretion of the clause be to the sheriff, yet it appears not, that it is limited to him only.

And whereas it was said, That the sheriff cannot assess himself, and the precedents warrant not this assessment by the sheriff: I answer, all the precedents are not against it, but commonly it is not so; and yet there have been a multitude of precedents thus. As to the inequality of it, Mr. Hampden had the least cause of any man in England to complain, considering how he was rated.

Again, all that the writ commands, is but an assessment 'juxta facultates suas, ita quod omnes, &c.' and if the sheriff do otherwise, and wrong the subjects, he is answerable. By divers antient precedents it appears, where the sheriffs have been faulty this way, they have been punished; and sir Walter Norton's case, now depending in the Star-Chamber, concerns this, for an abuse in levying this charge, when high sheriff of Lincolnshire.

Truly, I think, as my lord chief baron said, if there had not been an inequality by the abuse of the assesses, the charge had not been complained of; yet the like inequalities is in subsidies: And this is no just cause of exception against it, but of accusation against the sheriff who is to answer it. And I can say truly, his majesty hath been very careful to prevent and remedy the abuses therein, and hath often sat daily in the Council-Chamber to give his advice herein himself; and upon his command reformation hath been in divers parts; and it hath been given in command to all his judges in their circuits, to endeavour the same in all parts: And I myself, by this command, have rectified rates in this kind, that have been unequal. And I doubt not, if the necessity of danger shall still require it, or again, hereafter it may be done with all equity.

The second objection is, That the sheriff cannot tax himself, for then he should be judge and party in one case; nor can he commit himself: and if he be omitted out of the assessment, then it cannot be equal, nor cannot be according to the writ, that commands all should be assessed according to their abilities rateably. I answer, This prima facie carries some shew with it; but examine causes of less consequence, and it is easily answered. The justices of peace, in levying subsidies, make rates for themselves. The commissioners of sewers tax their own lands; and so if by jurors it were done, it would be the like. There must be either new assessors appointed, or they themselves must do it: That would bring delay, and this requires haste and expedition; and therefore the sheriff is fittest for this business. Authorities in law there are divers herein, as the writs for the levying expences for knights of the shire, direction is to the sheriff to do it, who assesses himself, and yet he is to execute it: So in a writ of recovery 'de bonis habitantium,' the sheriff is chargeable with his part; yet he is to execute it. If a fine be laid upon the whole county, he levies it, yet is chargeable with his part towards it.

Obj.—The writ is directed 'probi hominibus,' and these cannot be charged in an inland county.

Ans.—What difference there is 'inter probos homines,' between inland counties and maritime counties, I know not. 21 Ed. 3, a writ whereby they were charged in case of necessity; as to Yarmouth it was 'probi hominibus, &c.' True, a grant by the king 'probi hominibus' generally is void. 1 Hen. 6, Dyer Phil & Mar. 7 Edw. 4, 14. But a commission or writ to assess them good enough. 'Probi homines,' that they know not, nor see not, it is not material, for that would make them sole judges of the danger, when as the king only is, and this not traversable neither.

Obj.—The writ commands an inland county to find a ship and mariners, which is impossible; and 'lex non cogit ad impossibilia;' and for this my brother Croke puts the common cases, that a general return, 49 Ed. 3, 6, and impossibilities are void; a covenant for impossible things is void, but a bond may be good.

I answer now to the point of impossibility. And possibly the ship may be built in an inland county, though to carry it to Portsmouth is impossible; but it is possible to provide a ship and mariners, as the writ commands, which may very well be done with money.

Obj.—But we have none but trained soldiers, no mariners; our country consists in tillage, and our men are trained up to the plough and husbandry.

I answer, We have the like occasion of ploughs and husbandry in Kent, and we have in many places no maritime towns; some lie 20 miles from the sea, and yet we are justly charged to find a ship. Precedents we have as well as you in Oxon and Bucks, or else none should be charged but port towns, and in particular no law or statute to exempt them. Until Alfred's time, there was no distinction of maritime or inland counties, for then all England was but one maritime county.

Then they objected, the payment of soldiers wages for 26 weeks, to be in the king's service, is against many precedents: as 16 Ed. 2, 10 Edw. 3, and entirely for wages to be paid by the county is against all the precedents; and tenants by knights service after 40 days, are to be paid by the king. And other precedents my brother Croke cited, when divers refused to go out of their own county till paid, and order taken for their pay by the king. And whereas the county had given bond for payment of soldiers wages, they were cancelled, and order made in parliament, that soldiers should be at the king's pay, 2 Edw. 3, 16. 18 Edw. 3, cap. 7.

These are easily answered, for these precedents prove no more than payment of wages de facto, and so the king may pay it where it is not due; and for their refusal, I have nothing to do with that now: but 10 Edw. 3, m. 2, there is mention made of Berkshire men, commanded to carry their soldiers forth of their county at their own costs; and when the soldiers refused to go thence, no charge or payment; for soldiers used to be paid by their county, as in that case; and they were forced to go, and did go, and stay there three years: so 13 Edw. 3, m. 8.

Obj.—1 Ed. 3, m. 14. None compelled to go out of their county without wages paid. 18 Ed. 3, m. 6, 7, that none should go out of their counties: And not only those that had offices and patents to serve the king, but all with this proviso, that the king should pay them their wages.

Ans.—1 Ed. 3. It is clear, and hath in it the exception in case of necessity, and to be done as in times past.

18 Ed. 3. It is expressed in the act, when they go to the king's wars out of the kingdom: so 19 Hen. 7, &c. These are all but declarative to the common law, Corbet's case; the reason is, because the allegiance of the subject is not natural, but local. But that the king shall give wages within his kingdom, there is no act of parliament for it. Now it was resolved in the Exchequer, that the sea and land made but one entire kingdom, and so no going out of the kingdom here; and consequently the payment of the soldiers wages within the kingdom is not against law.

The last objection is, that the writ is illegal, because contrary to Mag' Char', 'nullus liber homo imprisonetur.'

Ans.—As touching the objection of the nobility, that they are privileged from imprisonment, it might well have been spared; and I know not wherefore it was spoken of, unless to make them think they were more interested than the rest of his majesty's subjects in the case.

Obj.—But yet, I say, noblemen may be imprisoned upon contempt, as my brother Croke knows well; and it was resolved in the earl of Lincoln's case, in the Star-Chamber. It is true, that upon ordinary process, they are not to be brought to trial or imprisoned.

Now I answer, there is no imprisonment in question, but the assessment only, why he should not pay the money assessed, or shew cause to the contrary.

Secondly, Were the writ illegal for form and circumstance, yet this makes not the command itself illegal for substance.

The exceptions to the Certiorari are these:

1. The direction of it to two sheriffs, one out of his office, when as the sheriff in being ought only to return it.

Ans.—Of this there is little doubt; nothing more frequent than for a Certiorari to issue out of the Chancery to two parties, as to the executors, or the judge that took the fine, and is removed. And so upon commission to take a fine by ‘dedimus potestatem’; in this case the writ is ‘inter brevia irretorabili’; and this must remain with the old sheriff, and are never delivered over by the jury to the new sheriff. In Hobart’s case, in the King’s-Bench, being convicted of heresy before sir Julius Cæsar judge of the Admiralty, certificate to him after Master of the Rolls, and directed to him: so in the case of my lord Paget.

Obj.—The writ is without return, saith my Lord Chief Baron; and the Certiorari, which is a year and a half after, cannot renew it.

I answer, That shall not be the determining of it only; for the time limited expiring, shall not deprive one of his just debt.

It is not sufficient, because it appears not, that Mr. Hampden was tenant or ter-tenant, or that Stoke Mandeville is within the county of Bucks.

2. It appears not that there was any ammunition or ship prepared.

I answer, It doth sufficiently appear, that Mr. Hampden was ter-tenant, for the Certiorari was to the sheriff, who certifies that he was tenant; for it was in pursuance of the writ: the words are, ‘Virtute brevis domini regis huic ‘schedul’ annexat. certifico quod virtute et secundum exigentiam ipsius, &c.’ ‘Assessavi’, Anglicè ‘have assessed’, ‘super separales homines et terræ tenentes com’ Bucks præd’ quorum nomina subscribuntur, &c.’ It relates to the place there, tenants in the county of Bucks, and makes Mr. Hampden one. And thus the business of knighthood was done, and in no other manner.

Then it appears not that the ship was prepared. To this I answer, 1st, That the ship was done according to the command of the writ. 2dly. It was prepared. 3dly, If none had been prepared, the fault was in them, for that they paid not in their money. For the exceptions to this Mittimus I say nothing, because I told you the case rests not upon these words, ‘Salus regni periclitabatur’, which is only to bring it to issue.

Then they except against the Sci’ Fa’, 1st, That the king is not intitled to bring the Sci’ Fa’. So there is no cui oneretur, to whom he should pay the money, for whose good or benefit Mr. Hampden should satisfy the money assessed. I answer, the king is interested in all actions for public good, and shall recover accordingly, as in case of Highways, Postage, Murage, &c. much more when it is for the general defence of the realm. In a quare impedit between two common persons; though the king be neither plaintiff nor defendant, the king shall recover therein. Many times in case of a common informer, the king recovers the one moiety, though no party; so it was in the case of knighthood, though suit was depending. Again, all writs in the kingdom are the king’s writs, though no fine, much more here for the defence of the realm. And it is usual for the king’s attorney to compel men to perform charitable uses; and the king may question any one for them, in the case of Aurum Reginæ, by process out of the Exchequer.

Again, where it is said, ‘Quare ipse de præd’ ‘summa specificat’ onerari et inde satisfac’ debeat, prout ulterius tibi præcept’, &c. for though the writ be in the king’s name, yet it is but for the performance of the work and charge; and though it appears not, who were collectors or assessors, yet it appears it was done. Upon public service, process goes forth in the king’s name; but then it is not so fit it should be expressed in particular for the king, when it is for the general good only. Was not this objection made by my brother Denham? though none more cheerfully did subscribe to his majesty’s letter, neither was the Sci’ Fa’ without his advice, being the aptest course, and better than trespass: but the objection that he made was, That the king cannot do any wrong, nor take without record, as in seizure upon outlawry, attainder, or the like; and in this case there is no Record upon the writ 4 Aug. no judgment, &c.

I answer, This Sci’ Fac’ is not annexed to the writ, and is a new action, that Mr. Hampden oneretur et inde satisfaciet, and after that judgment upon the writ, and upon his saying nothing, why revocetur, there shall be a good Record whereupon he shall be charged. S Eliz. Dyer 156. Ignoramus is sufficient title for the king, and ground for a ‘Melius inquirendum’.

No Sci’ Fa’ lies upon the tenor of a writ, say they: 39 Hen. 6, fol. 34, 21 Eliz. Dyer fol. 205. I answer, a Sci’ Fa’ upon a recognizance will not lie in Chancery, but upon the Record there; yet in debate, an action of debt lies upon the tenor of the Record. 39 Hen. 6, the doubt was because the party might be subject to a double execution, one upon the Record there, and the other upon the tenor of the Record in another court. 33 Edw. 3. Title Tenure by Transcript 8 Hen. 5, Fitz-Her’ Error Sci’ Fa’ Reg’ fol. 51. The Record was before the justices of the King’s-Bench, the tenure was of the Treasury to the barons of the Exchequer; and it is the usual order, if a recognizance be forfeited, to certify the tenor of a recognizance; so of a fine of amerciament, &c. to certify the transcript thereof. So the transcript was sent from Ireland of an act of parliament; a Sci’ Fa’ thereupon went against a baron in England: so in debt, upon the transcript of a Record from Ireland, a Sci’ Fa’ here went forth.

Objected it was in the last place by my Lord Chief Baron, that judgment in this case would be fruitless, and none should take benefit thereby; upon this Record he put several cases, wherein judgment in such a case ought to pass,

I answer my Lord Chief Baron with a judgment of his own, in case of knighthood, resolved here in this court; the case was this, The king by writ Jan. 1, of his reign, commanded the sheriff of Berkshire, that all that had 40*l.* should be in the Chancery 31 January following, to take upon them the order of knighthood. Sir John Daysel, sheriff of Berkshire, made his return, (as the sheriff of Bucks here) all that are not knights under the name of Illorum, and sets down their names. A Mittimus thereupon went out of the Chancery, reciting the substance of the former writ, 'Vobis Mittimus præsentibus, &c.' with a clause to enquire after such as were not returned, and to fine them. And upon this a writ of distringas to the sheriff. My Lord Chief Baron and my brother Denham know what judgment was given; when I observed, 1st, Not the Record, but the tenor of the Record, was sent into the Exchequer, yet returnable in the Chancery. 2dly, For the returning of the names of the defaulters as here. 3dly, Upon the distringas thereupon was had execution, much more than here, upon the Sci' Fa'. 4thly, There was no more judgment of Record to warrant than here in this.

Now I come to conclude. I have been somewhat too bold, in taking more time than is usual, but I did it to satisfy my own heart, according to which I must give my judgment. What I have omitted I refer to the rest of my brothers that went before me, and to my lord chief justice that comes after me. The reasons I shewed whereupon I conceive by the common law, and the fundamental policy of the kingdom, that the king may charge his subjects for the defence of the kingdom, and that the king may charge his subjects towards the defence thereof when it is in danger; and I hold that the king is sole judge of the danger; and ought to direct the means of defence. And therefore this writ of Sci' Fa', and all the proceedings in this case, are well grounded according to law.

My Opinion therefore is, That Mr. Hampden shall be charged with 20*s.* assessed, and that my Lord Chief Baron ought to give Judgment accordingly.

Quarto Aug. 11 Car. a writ issued out of the Chancery, being directed to all counties of the realm of England, both inland and maritime; and among the rest it was directed to the sheriff of Bucks, for the making and building of a ship of 450 tons, and to provide a certain number of men with ammunition and victuals, to be brought to Portsmouth, and from thence to be employed in his majesty's service, for defence of the realm, and of the sea. Mr. Hampden, in the county of Bucks, was assessed at 20*s.* for his manor of Stoke Mandeville, who refused to pay the same; whereupon a Certiorari issued to the sheriff of Bucks, to return the defaulters; amongst whom Mr. Hampden was returned to make default of payment of the 20*s.* assessed upon him. Whereupon it was by Mittimus sent into the Exchequer, and a Sci' Fa' thereupon issued out of the Exchequer against Mr. Hampden, to shew cause why he made default of payment of the said 20*s.* Whereupon Mr. Hampden appeared in person, and demanded oyer of the writs, and returns thereof, and demurred in law, with whom Mr. Attorney joined in demurrer.

Now three points have been debated already at large in this matter, viz. 1. Whether the king may command this general charge of his subjects by law, or no, without their consent in parliament? 2. Whether this kind of assessment be warrantable by law, or no? and, 3. Whether the Sci' Fa' did well issue or not? In all these matters, so much hath been already spoken, that if I should not say what hath been already spoken, I should say little to purpose. I will not be long; for if I had intended it, my lord Finch hath prevented me in it; for he hath taken from me very much that I should have said, and insisted upon.

That which this case resteth upon, in my opinion, the vote of the court hath passed already by the greater number of voices, that mine will do nothing which way soever I go: yet being to deliver my opinion, I shall shew my reasons; and that I shall do without any other defence. Concerning the first point, Whether his majesty may impose that general charge upon his subjects by law or no? I am of opinion, that whensoever the whole kingdom is in danger, his majesty may command all his subjects to join with him in this case for the defence of the kingdom. My brother Finch hath insisted so fully upon this matter, that I shall need to say but little: but yet something I must say, as well as my brothers that have spoken before me, to discharge my conscience: and for that which I shall say, my intent is to insist upon some few of the principal statutes, which have been already recited.

For this point, in my opinion, will rest upon the several statutes and acts of parliament that concern this case; and I take these statutes to be merely declarations in affirmance of the common law. And I shall begin with the statute 1 Edw. 3, cap. 5, and I shall not go far from the intent of the statute; I shall scarce make use of any precedents, though many have been used, but only so far as they may seem to expound and declare the true meaning of those statutes.

And whereas it is objected from the statute 1 Edw. 3, That no man shall be compelled to go out of his county wherein he liveth, except in case of invasion, and necessity requireth, and then it shall be done as in times past: I answer, That this is merely declarative, and spoken in affirmance of the common law, and this use is declared by this statute to be the ancient law of the realm. Now what that use was, will be a very great question in this case.

Indeed it hath been much insisted upon, both by Mr. Hampden's counsel and my brother Croke, that the subjects going forth of the shire shall be at the king's charge, which they have affirmed by divers statutes: but that which will go far in this case, as my brother Berkley well observed, is out of the precedents of Ed. 1, Ed. 2, and H. 3rd's times; and in them you shall find it to be for foreign wars, or else for ordinary defence, as for pillaging of boroughs or private towns by pirates, when the subjects have not given their aids in such cases. And there is no doubt but the king hath paid the charge in such a case, for the defence of the realm; but the subjects gave the king subsidies to do it withal.

But the question is, What the subject in this case, 'secundum legem Angliæ,' may be compelled to, in case of necessity, for defence of the kingdom? I answer, They may be compelled to this charge, 'sumptibus propriis,' for the soldiers wages; but to go out of the realm, or their shire, must be at the king's pay, according to the common law of England: but in times of sudden defence, there is no time to stand upon wages. It appears both in Fitz-Herb. Na. Br. fol. 28, and also in my lord Coke in Calvin's case, the king may command his subjects upon their allegiance, to go with him, as well in wars without the realm, as in his wars within, and with him, and without him, in the king's service. By the statute of 18 Ed. 3, and 11 Ed. 3, men of arms, as hobbellers, archers, &c. are to go in the king's service, as in England, so out of England, was the matter of these laws. And my lord Finch said, This was the very common law of England; so that it is clear, these two statutes are declaratory laws in affirmance of the common law. In 7 Hen. 4, title Tenure 44, there it is said, a man is not to go with the king in his wars, out of the realm, without wages. And so 7 Hen. 4, title Tenure 73, the subjects of England are not to go with the king beyond the seas, without their wages: but in the realm they are at his command, and there is no wages to be given. So it is in going out of England, when they are at the king's charges; but within, at their own. And if the going out of the county be at their own charges, I know not but that should put an end to the case, that the defence of the realm must be at the subjects' charge.

It is of dangerous consequence for judges, in their judgments, to rely too much upon precedents, that perhaps went forth through the necessity of the present times. But that is not our case here; we are here directed to know what was used in times past, in this case, before the making of this statute: So that in this case we take the usage not to declare or prove a law, but that use is declared by this statute to be a law. Now therefore, we must know what the use was: now that the use was, that the subjects of this realm ought to be charged in time of common danger, appears by a multitude of precedents applied rightly to the statute of Edw. 3, which do declare the law upon the statute. And to shew what the use was, I shall rely chiefly upon those precedents that are most judicial. First, that of 25 Edw. 1, Term Mich' Rot. 72, Banc' Regis, in the abbot of Robertsbridge's case; compare that and this together, and I know not what more can be answered, than that this use for the subject to maintain their peace, was an usage, law, and custom of the realm. 10 Ed. 3, m. 2, fo. 18, the king by his writ sent a command to send to Portsmouth one hundred foot and twenty horsemen to guard the sea-coasts. They refused to do that service, and would not go without wages. The king sent answer in these very words, 'That no wages were due, for it was a public danger.' And so 25 Ed. 3, cap. 8, it is generally assented to by parliament.

But there we have a general law in the first statute 1 Ed. 3, which was grounded merely on the common law, and so was the statute 25 Ed. 3, and the rest to the same purpose, because it was against the right of the realm. And this statute of 25 Edw. 3, was merely grounded upon the petition of the commons; then certainly this finding of arms was intended by that statute to be against the right of the realm. Besides all this, to keep ourselves to that which is legal and authentic, so the parliament roll 13 Ed. 3, m. 9, and 11, it is there apparent, that it is not against the right of the land to charge the subject; then how comes it to be against the right of the realm 25 Edw. 3, for then there was no statute?

Now to bring it down to our times. In 26 Ed. 3, m. 44, every maritime town was charged to keep a petty watch, there being some imminent danger; therefore they pray, not to be discharged, but that it might be reduced to a lesser charge, being it was but petty watch to guard the sea-coast; much less then is there cause for the subject to seek to be discharged when the enemy is approaching. 5 Ed. 3, there was a commission issued out, to distrain every one 'secundum potestatem,' in matters of array; here is now the judgment of the whole house of parliament, that men according to their abilities are to be charged to join in charge with the king, to defend the realm 'sumptibus propriis.' Thus much for defence upon the land; now for defence upon the sea. In the statute 18 Ed. 3, cap. 7, that they who serve the king out of the kingdom, serve for wages; but in case of necessity, without the realm, in times past, by no precedents, saith my brother Croke, can it be proved it was done before.—I answer, that the sea is within the kingdom; see 2 Ed. 3, cap. 10, protect. 46, Bract' lib. 2, fol. 365, there the sea is made part of the kingdom. Doctor and Student, cap. 51. It is the ancient custom of England, that the king is lord of the narrow seas. But that which I most rely upon is, from the statutes of 1 and 18 Ed. 3, for they both meet in one, which is according to the common law; for all the difference thereof is, the subject to go out of his own county whether to defend the land or the sea.

In the statute of 1 Ed. 3, it is objected, that there is no precedent for inland counties. But I answer, if not for inland counties, yet there is for maritime, as in 14 Ed. 3, Term. Mich. But I rely not upon precedents for either, but only upon those precedents that went out to the ports and maritime towns: for it was well observed by the king's counsel, that they were not grounded upon any precedents or charters, but only upon ancient customs. But if the precedents to the maritime towns were directed in case of necessity, then I see no reason but that it may be done now; which was indeed intended by the statute of 1 Ed. 3, as the precedents do plainly declare; and they were then more common than writs of this nature issuing for in this case, and the commons were then bound to land-service, and the mariners to sea-service; and they were compelled to it at their own charge, merely upon their allegiance, both in Bedford, Bucks, Lincoln, with many other counties. If then they may be compelled to go out of their own proper counties, to defend that part of the realm that they live near unto, why may they not also be compelled to go to defend the sea-coast? The sea-men were willing to bear some part of the charge for the defence of the sea, because the inland counties did bear their charge of the land-service and of the ports; And if they may be compelled in the inland counties to defend their inland counties, and the sea-men to defend the sea-coast; then I know no reason but that they may be compelled all in general to bear a public charge in case of necessity.

I am still upon the statute 1 Ed. 3, wherein I find Mr. Selden, in his Mare Clausum, says it was an ancient use to charge the inland and maritime counties in case of necessity; and therefore in my understanding, I hold it to be 'secundum legem Angliæ.' But here my brother Crooke objects, there is no statute or precedent to shew that any inland counties were charged. I answer, that statutes and precedents do not extend to our case, for this was in use many years before the making of any statute. See the statutes of 1 Ed. 1, and 1 Ed. 3. They cannot cross one another, for then could not the statute of Ed. 1, be confirmed by the statute of Ed. 3.

Again, concerning the statute of finding of men and arms, it is true, it is merely the common law of England, and that merely without common consent in parliament, as my brother Berkeley saith, that the statute of 9 Hen. 3, and 25 Ed. 3, cap. 11, are the great charters rather than statutes; and in king John's time it was not taken for a statute, but only for a declaration. And so it was taken in the time of Hen. 4.

But now if concerning the charging of the county, the said statutes were nothing but according to the common law of England, I cannot see how they should cross another now; for there is no difference, but only in such things as are given as a benevolence to the king, as in 1 Ed. 3, cap. 5, 6.

As for the statute De Tallagio non Concedo,

we deny it not; but the difference is in the occasion of the statute of 14 Ed. 3. There was a pretty case put by Mr. Holborne about the office of alnage, where there was but a fee to be paid out of it, and held a tallage: but there is great difference between the tallage and this service, which every subject is bound to do by his allegiance to his sovereign lord, Fitz' Her'. Na. Br. 103. The king may impose this charge upon the subject in case of necessity, pro boho publico; and it is nothing but what every subject owes to the commonwealth in a time of common danger. And after king Edward the Confessor, it was ordered by several statutes, let every one have their own goods and lands free from tallage, and let nothing be taken from them. But in this case of necessity in common danger is another thing, the king may then compel his subjects to this charge; and I may add the reasons strongly insisted upon by the king's counsel. My lord Coke said, it could never be the meaning of the great charter of the liberty of the subjects by this statute to take away the power of the king's prerogative, and so to exempt themselves from this charge of defence: for there is a difference between a tallage upon the people, and a service in a case of necessity, which they may be compelled unto. My brother Jones cited a most excellent case 4 Jac. upon the opinion of Coke and Popham, that the tallage-statute taketh not away: and shall it take away this royal power of the king, so inherent in the crown, the protection and preservation of his kingdom?

From this statute 1 Ed. 3, Mr. St. John raised this objection. Here is seven months from the date of the writ, to the time the ship was to be brought to Portsmouth, in which time there might have been a parliament, and therefore it ought to have been done in a parliamentary way. But this will not admit the calling of a parliament; but if the danger is not sudden, you must have it in a parliamentary way.—My lord Finch gave a full answer to this: there must be a preparation before the enemy come, else the defence is too late; there is a necessity to prevent a necessity, and who shall give warning in such a case but the king? Saith Littleton, who gives warning? Not the tenant by castle-guard, but the lord; and so consequently in this case our sovereign lord the king: and therefore in such a case the subject is bound by his allegiance to the king, to assist in case of public danger. My lord Coke tells us the reason of the warning: he saith, there must in that case be a preparation before hand, lest your defence come too late: enemies are more easily kept out than overcome when they are got in.—By the statute of 8 Ed. 4, there bulwarks may be made in another man's ground; but this preparation cannot be without warning, and none can give the warning but the king, and the subjects are to be at his command, and none other; for there must be a preparation of the subjects in the realm, to meet the enemy before he enter the land. No subjects can take upon them to build bulwarks, &c. It is an assuming of the royal power, for it must be done 'juxta præceptum domini regis.'

Now I come to the second part, whether this assessment be warranted by law or not. The writ was dated 4 Aug. to prepare a ship against the 1st of March. Therefore we see it is not against the great laws concerning the subjects liberty, because it is no taillage but a service: for howsoever it must be granted, it must be a general danger that causeth a general defence; and there must be matter in the body of the record to satisfy therein; there must be, I say, a public danger, and then it is 'secundum legem et consuetudinem regni Angliæ,' as appears 20 Ed. 3, m. 21. And also in Doctor and Student, cited before, that when necessity doth require, the king may compel his subjects to this public service and charge. Though the king be the sole judge, and his certificate is not traversable and cannot be denied, yet there must be matter apparent within the record to satisfy the conscience of the court, or else we cannot be judges of the case at all. If the danger be general, then the defence must be general; but if ordinary danger as robbing of merchants by pirates, &c. it must be at the king's charge. And we do see by the petitions of the commons in many parliaments, that they never conceived themselves subject to the charge of ordinary defence.—Now upon all that which hath been observed by my brothers, there is enough in the record to satisfy them fully (as if the king were not sole judge) that it was a public danger, being 'pro defensione regni et tuitione maris, &c.' It did issue to all the king's subjects, as a general charge, and not to the county of Bucks alone: therefore I may conclude, when the whole kingdom is in danger, the king may compel his subjects to assist in such public danger.

Then for the assessment; many exceptions have been taken to it, and to the record and Sci' Fa': I had provided myself to have given a full answer thereunto, but my lord Finch hath prevented me, and hath cited the very authorities, that I myself did rely upon. But for the assessment itself to the sheriff, I do not say that I do find he hath like power in any other case of law: commissions of sewers may be directed to the sheriff, but not to give power to assess men's goods. I answer, that this is in case of necessity: for the very main case is but a case of necessity, the ordinary and usual way is 'per sacramentum.' My lord Finch gave an excellent answer to that, and warranted it by law, that the sheriff hath no such unlimited power granted him; he is not made judge of the estates of men, but only to pursue the direction of the writ, to assess them as he is commanded, and not 'secundum discretio-nem suam;' but as my lord Coke 5 Rep. 99, saith, he must do it 'secundum legem et secundum arbitrium;' that is to say, according to law and reason. But it is impossible, in such a case of necessity, to put it into such an equality to make it without exception; but in as much as in him lieth, he ought to order it proportionably, his power is unlimited; for by his discretion he is to discern between right and wrong, between substance and shadow; and he must go within the bounds of law and right. In the chamberlain of London's case, they might rate and assess in bono publico, as in making a high-way to a church, and the like, wherein the subject is brought to no distress or inconvenience, so as the greater part, in such a case as this, shall ever bind the lesser, it being pro bono publico. Yet this assessment cannot make a law a debt or a duty, but is only a means to bring this duty to a certainty, and so make it a duty, so that he be rated in an equal proportion. Hath the sheriff rated Mr. Hampden disproportionably, according to his estate and degree? If he hath, let him tell. If the sheriff hath followed his own will, and done corruptly, then he hath done contrary to the intent of the writ; it turneth upon the sheriff himself: and a great offence it is for a public minister of justice to abuse himself in such a place of justice. The sheriff returns, he hath assessed 20s. which is no great sum; and also confesseth upon the record, that it is an equal assessment. When Mr. Hampden appeared upon the Sci' Fa' he demanded Oyer of the writs, and so demurred in law: which upon the matter, being a general demurrer, is a confession.—And as for the Sci' Fa', my lord Finch hath handled it fully, and hath cited the same books and authorities that I intended to have cited; and so hath prevented me in that. And also in Bodmin's case in Cornwall, and upon the exception super tenorem recordi in 9 Hen. 6, fol. 23. And the reason why he should not have execution super tenorem recordi is, because otherwise the subject might be charged double. And divers cases were put upon suing forth execution upon the tenor of the record; and yet no execution can go out of the chancery at the first, because it is not returnable by the sheriff, but it is sent out of the chancery, by Mittimus into the Exchequer, 24 Hen. 6, 4 Hen. 6. But it is true, it doth concern every one to be satisfied in the truth of the case; for if the sheriff should not assess 'per sacramentum,' it might be made another way.—And as for the Certiorari, my lord Finch hath likewise cited the same books and authorities, which I also intended; therefore I forbear to insist upon that.

There is another exception to the record, 'quod oneretur,' and not know to whom it should be, no money demanded to the king by the first writ, no, nor by the second writ; therefore can give no judgment 'quod satisfacet domino regi:' then if judgment shall not be given for the king, then for whom? non constat, it doth not appear to whom it is due, for any thing I can see in this record.—Truly for my own part, of all the exceptions that I have heard, none sticketh with me but this exception: for I do not know any precedent, that a judgment was given, and not say to whom.

This scruple, I confess, still remaineth with me. I must needs say, that in my opinion, I do rather incline, as far as I am well satisfied, that this is a good exception, according and upon those reasons which my Lord Chief Baron gave; and yet I am not so far satisfied, that it is law.—I must rather incline as my opinion inclines, than go against the inclination of my own opinion: as I have gone through all the rest with the warrant of my own conscience, I cannot go upon any string in a thing of the least weight, but I must deliver my opinion as it inclines; and therefore, upon those reasons that I have heard, and upon consideration taken with myself, I do rather incline to the opinion of my Lord Chief Baron, and upon his reasons, which I think was in that with the lesser number: but for my opinion in all other points, I agree with the general vote of the court.

Upon the 12th of June, 14 Car. Mr. Attorney moved the Court of Exchequer for Judgment against Mr. Hampden; and after he had opened the Record he said, "Your lordship and the court, in respect of the greatness of the cause, did adjourn it into the Exchequer Chamber, that your lordship and the court might receive advice of all the Judges; whose Advice and Opinions your lordship hath already received, and the plurality of their voices is, that Judgment should be given against Mr. Hampden, and accordingly I do pray Judgment."

To which my Lord Chief Baron answered: "It is very true, it was referred from hence to the Exchequer-Chamber, to receive the advice of all the judges of the land. We do not take them to assist only by way of advice, but for a judicial direction: for admitting we four were of one opinion, and the rest of the judges of another, (though the cause properly depend in this court) yet we must apply ourselves to their resolution, and our four voices are involved in theirs; and therefore accordingly, secundum legem, &c. oneretur Johannes Hampden."

The Copy of the ORDER, as it was drawn upon the Motion of Mr. Attorney-General, and now remains entered in the Exchequer.

Termin' Sta' Trin' anno

Remem' Regis. 14 Car. 12 die Junii.

Bucks.—Whereas several sums of money by virtue of the king's majesty's writ under the Great Seal of England, bearing date the 4th day of August in the 11th year of his majesty's reign, were assessed and charged upon several persons, for and towards the provision of a Ship of War, together with the furniture and other things thereunto belonging, in the said writ particularly mentioned; which said several Sums of Money, so assessed and charged, and not being satisfied and paid, the names of the said several persons, together with the several sums charged upon them, were returned into the Chancery, whereby his majesty's writ of Certiorari, bearing date the 9th day of March, in the 12th year of his majesty's reign, certified into his court of Chancery, and by his majesty's writ of Mittimus, under the same seal, bearing date the 5th day of May in the 13th year of his majesty's reign, were sent into the court of Exchequer for further process to be had thereupon, as by the said several writs may appear: and whereas process of Sci' Fa' was, the 20th day of May, in the said 15th year of his majesty's reign, awarded to the sheriff of the county of Bucks, directing to garnish the several persons, in a schedule to the said Sci' Fa' annexed contained, to shew cause the octaves of the Holy Trinity then ensuing, why they should not be charged, and satisfy the said sums of money assessed upon them; in which schedule it was contained, amongst divers others, that John Hampden, esq. was assessed at 20s. as by the said Sci' Fa' and schedules thereunto annexed may also more fully appear: whereupon the said John Hampden, esq. being garnished by sir Anthony Chester, baronet, then sheriff of the said county of Bucks, appeared, and demanded Oyer of all the aforesaid writs; which being read unto him, he thereupon demurred in law. And thereupon sir John Banks, knight, his majesty's attorney-general, joined in the said demurrer: and the record thereof being made up, it pleased the barons of this court (the same matter being a matter of great consequence and weight) to adjourn the arguing of the same matter into the Exchequer-Chamber, and to desire the assistance and judgment of all the judges of England, touching the same. Now upon the motion of his majesty's attorney-general this day, informing this court, that seeing the said matter hath been so solemnly debated and argued, as well by the counsel of the said defendant, and by some of his majesty's learned counsel, and also by all the judges of England, and by the barons of the Exchequer, and that the major part of the said judges and barons have delivered their opinions and judgments that the said John Hampden ought to be charged with, and to satisfy the said sum of 20s. and therefore the said Mr. Attorney moved the court, that judgment might be entered accordingly: it is thereupon ordered by this court, that judgment shall be forthwith entered, that the aforesaid John Hampden ought to be charged with, and satisfy the aforesaid sum of 20s.

A Copy of the JUDGMENT (in English), as it is entered upon record, in pursuance of the said motion, and according to the major votes.*

And because the barons here will advise themselves of and upon the premises, before they give Judgment thereupon, a day is given to the aforesaid John Hampden, in the same state as now here upon the octave of St. Michael, that the said barons in the mean while of the said premises may advise, and with the justices of both benches may thereupon deliberate: for the said barons here, not yet thereupon, &c. And upon this it is agreed between the Barons here, as well with consent of the said attorney-general of our said lord the king, as of the said attorney of the aforesaid J. Hampden, and the counsel learned in the law of the said J. Hampden, that some persons learned in the law as well of counsel, and on the behalf of our said lord the king, as of counsel and on the behalf of the said J. Hampden, of the aforesaid matter in law and the other premises, in the Chamber of this Exchequer, commonly called the Exchequer-Chamber, before the said barons, together sitting with the aforesaid justices of both benches, should in the mean time be heard publicly to argue: at which said octave of St. Michael, came the aforesaid J. Hampden here as before. And because the barons here further will advise themselves of and upon the premises, before they give Judgment thereupon, a day is further given to the aforesaid J. Hampden in the same state as now here, until the octave of St. Hilary, that some persons learned in the law, as well of counsel and on the behalf of our said lord the king, as of counsel and on the behalf of the said J. Hampden, of the aforesaid matter in law, and the other premises, in the Chamber of this Exchequer, commonly called the Exchequer-Chamber, before the said barons together sitting with the aforesaid justices of both benches, should in the mean time be heard publicly to argue, and the said barons with the said justices deliberate thereupon; so that no person learned in the law, either of the counsel of our said lord the king, or of the counsel of the said J. Hampden, is yet heard, and the barons here thereupon are not advised, &c. And afterwards in the time between the aforesaid octave of St. Michael, and the aforesaid octave of St. Hilary, as well the Attorney and Solicitor of our said lord the king, as two learned in the law of the counsel of the aforesaid J. Hampden in the premises, being on the part of the said J. Hampden, twelve several days in the aforesaid Exchequer-Chamber, before the barons of this Exchequer, sitting with them then there the aforesaid justices of both benches, were openly and singly heard to argue at large, and particularly of the said matter in law, and other the premises (the aforesaid record being recited) and what thereupon they could or would say. And the aforesaid attorney, and solicitor-general, divers and very many records, writs, commissions and precedents, as well of this Exchequer, as of the court of Chancery, the court of King's-bench and Common Pleas, the matter in law, and other premises in the several writs, returns, and schedules aforesaid contained, on the part of our said lord the king, to prove, confirm and maintain, then and there produced, shewed and expounded. And on the aforesaid octave of St. Hilary, the said J. Hampden came here as before; and because the barons here further will advise themselves of and upon the premises before they give judgment thereupon, a day is further given to the aforesaid J. Hampden, in the same state as now here, until from the day of Easter, on fifteen days, that the said barons in the mean while, with the aforesaid justices of both benches, may further thereupon deliberate, for that the said barons have not yet thereupon, &c. At which day, the said J. Hampden came here as before; and because the barons here further will advise themselves of and upon the premises, before they give judgment thereupon, a day is further given to the aforesaid J. Hampden, in the same state as now here, until upon the morrow of the Holy Trinity, that the said barons in the mean while, with the aforesaid justices of both benches, may further thereupon deliberate, for that the said barons have not yet thereupon, &c. At which day the aforesaid J. Hampden came here as before; and upon this, the premises being seen, and by the barons here plainly understood, and mature deliberation thereupon being had with the aforesaid justices of both benches, and after the arguments, as well by the said justices; as by the aforesaid barons singly, in the aforesaid Exchequer-Chamber, publicly thereupon made, it appeareth thereupon to the barons, by advice of the justices aforesaid, that the several writs aforesaid, and their returns, and the schedules aforesaid to the same annexed, and the matter therein contained, are sufficient in the law to charge the aforesaid J. Hampden with the aforesaid 20s. assessed upon him in the form and for the cause aforesaid: it is therefore agreed by the said barons, that the aforesaid J. Hampden be charged with the said 20s. and thereof make satisfaction, &c."

THIS Judgment in the Case of Ship-Money gave much offence to the nation, and occasioned great heart-burnings in the house of commons.* It was particularly taken notice

* "And here I cannot but again take the liberty to say, that the circumstances, and proceedings in those new extraordinary cases, stratagems, and impositions, were very unpolitic, and even destructive to the services intended. And if the business of Ship-Money, being an imposition by the state, under the notion of necessity, upon a prospect of danger, which private persons could not modestly think themselves qualified to discern, had been managed in the same extraordinary way as the Royal Loan (which was the imposing the Five Subsidies after the second parliament spoken of before) was; men would much easier have submitted to it; as it is notoriously known, that pressure was born with much more cheerfulness before the Judgment for the king, than ever it was after; men before pleasing themselves with doing somewhat for the king's service, as a testimony of their affection, which they were not bound to do; many really believing the necessity, and therefore thinking the of in Mr. Waller's Speech in that house, April 22, 1640, which was as follows :

Mr. Speaker ; I will use no preface, as they do who prepare men for something in which they have a particular interest. I will only propose what I conceive fit for the house to consider ; and shall be no more concerned in the event than they that shall hear me.—Two things I observe in his majesty's demands. First, the supply. Secondly, our speedy dispatch thereof.

Touching the first : his majesty's occasions for money are but too evident. For to say nothing how we are neglected abroad, and disburthen reasonable ; others observing, that the advantage to the king was of importance, when the damage to them was not considerable ; and all assuring themselves, that when they should be weary, or unwilling to continue the payment, they might resort to the law for relief, and find it. But when they heard this demanded in a court of law, as a right, and found it, by sworn judges of the law, adjudged so, upon such grounds and reasons as every stander-by was able to swear was not law, and so had lost the pleasure and delight of being kind, and dutiful to the king ; and, instead of giving, were required to pay, and by a logic that left no man any thing which he might call his own, they no more looked upon it as the case of one man, but the case of the kingdom, nor as an imposition laid upon them by the king, but by the judges ; which they thought themselves bound in conscience to the public justice not to submit to. It was an observation long ago by Thucydides, " That men are much more passionate for injustice, than for violence ; because, says he, the one coming as from an equal, seems rapine ; when the other proceeding from one stronger, is but the effect of necessity. So, when Ship-Money was transacted at the council-board, they looked upon it as a work of that power they were all obliged to trust, and an effect of that foresight they were naturally to rely upon. Imminent necessity, and public safety, were convincing persuasions ; and it might not seem of apparent ill consequence to them, that upon an emergent occasion the regal power should fill up an hiatus, or supply an impotency in the law. But when they saw in a court of law (that law, that gave them title to, and possession of all that they had) reason of state urged as elements of law, judges as sharp-sighted as secretaries of state, and in the mysteries of state ; judgment of law grounded upon matter of fact, of which there was neither enquiry, nor proof ; and no reason given for the payment of the 20s. in question, but what included the estates of all the standers by, they had no reason to hope that doctrine, or the promoters of it, would be contained within any bounds ; and it is no wonder that they who had so little reason to be pleased with their own condition, were no less solicitous for, or apprehensive of, the inconveniencies that might attend any alteration." Clarendon.

tracted at home ; the calling of the parliament, and our sitting here (an effect which no light cause could have in those times produced) is enough to make any reasonable man believe, that the Exchequer abounds not so much in money, as the state does in occasions to use it : and I hope we shall all appear willing to disprove those who have thought to dissuade his majesty from this way of parliaments, as uncertain ; and to let him see it is as ready, and more for the advancement of his affairs, than any new or pretended old way whatever.

For the speedy dispatch required, which was the second thing, not only his majesty, but res ipsa loquitur ; the occasion seems to importune no less ; necessity is come upon us like an armed man.—Yet the use of parliaments heretofore (as appears by the writs that call us hither) was to advise with his majesty, of all things concerning the church and commonwealth. And it hath ever been the custom of parliaments, by good and wholesome laws, to refresh the commonwealth in general, yea and to descend into remedies of particular grievances, before any mention made of a supply. Look back upon the best parliaments, and still you shall find, that the last acts are for the free gifts of subsidies on the people's part, and general pardons on the king's part. Even the wisest kings have first acquainted the parliaments with their designs, and the reasons thereof : and then demanded the assistance both of their counsel and purses. But physicians, though they be called of the latest, must not stomach it, or talk what they might have been, but apply themselves roundly to the cure. Let us not stand too nicely upon circumstances, nor too rigidly postpone the matter of supply, to the healing of our lighter wounds. Let us do what possibly may be done with reason and honesty on our parts, to comply with his majesty's desires and to prevent the imminent ill which threaten us.

But consider, Mr. Speaker, that they who think themselves already undone can never apprehend themselves in danger : And they that have nothing left can never give freely. Nor shall we ever discharge the trust of those that sent us hither, or make them believe that they contribute to their own defence and safety, unless his majesty be pleased, first to restore them to the property of their goods and lawful liberties, whereof they esteem themselves now out of possession. One need not tell you that the property of goods is the mother of courage, and the nurse of industry ; makes us valiant in war, and good husbands in peace. The experience I have of former parliaments, and my present observation of the care the country has had to chuse persons of worth and courage, makes me think this house like the Spartans, whose forward valour required some softer music to allay and quiet their spirits, too much moved with the sound of martial instruments. It is not the fear of imprisonment, or if need be, of death itself, that keeps a true-hearted Englishman from the care to leave this part of his inheritance as entirely to posterity, as he received it from his ancestors.

This therefore let us first do, and the more speedily, that we may come to the matter of supply; let us give new force to the many laws which have been hitherto made for the maintaining of our rights and privileges, and endeavour to restore this nation to its fundamental and vital liberties, the property of our goods, and the freedom of our persons: no way doubting, but we shall find his majesty as gracious and ready, as any of his royal progenitors have been, to grant our just desires therein. For not only the people do think but the wisest do know, that what we have suffered in this long vacancy of parliaments, has suffered from his ministers: that the person of no king was ever better beloved of his people, and that no people were ever more unsatisfied with the ways of the levying monies, are two truths which may serve, one to demonstrate the other: for such is their aversion to the present courses, that neither the admiration they have of his majesty's native inclinations to justice and clemency, nor the pretended consent of the judges, could make them willingly submit themselves to the late tax of Ship-money: And such is the natural love and just esteem of his majesty's goodness, that no late pressure could provoke them, nor any example invite them, to disloyalty or disobedience.

But what is it then, that hath bred this misunderstanding betwixt the king and his people? How is it, that having so good a king we have so much to complain of? Why, we are told of the son of Solomon, that he was a prince of a tender heart; and yet we see, by the advice of violent counsellors, how rough an answer he gave to his people. 'That his finger should be as heavy as his father's loins,' was not his own, but the voice of some persons about him, that wanted the gravity and moderation requisite for the counsellors of a young king. I love not to press allegories too far; but the resemblance of Job's story with ours holds so well, that I cannot but observe it to you. It pleased God to give his enemy leave to afflict him more than once or twice, and to take all he had from him; and yet he was not provoked to rebel so much as with his tongue; though he had no very good example of one that lay very near him, and felt not half that which he suffered. I hope his majesty will imitate God in the benignant parts too: and as he was severe to Job only while he discoursed with another concerning him, but when he vouchsafed to speak himself to him, began to rebuke those who had mistaken and mis-judged his case, and to restore the patient man to his former prosperity; so now, that his majesty hath admitted us to his presence, and spoken face to face with us, I doubt not but we shall see fairer days, and be as rich in the possession of our own as ever we were.

I wonder at those that seem to doubt the success of this parliament, or that the misunderstanding between the king and his people should last any longer, now they are so happily met. His majesty's wants are not so great but that we may find means to supply him; nor our desires so unreasonable, or so incompatible with government, but that his majesty may well satisfy them. For our late experience, I hope, will teach us what rocks to shun and how necessary the use of moderation is: and for his majesty, he has had experience enough, how that prospers which is gotten without the concurrent good-will of his people: Never more money taken from the subject; never more went into the exchequer. If you look upon what has been paid, it is more than ever the people of England were wont to pay in such a time: If we look upon what has been effected therewith, it shews as if never king had been worse supplied. So that we seem to have endeavoured the filling a sieve with water. Whosoever gave advice for these courses, has made good the saying of the wise man; 'qui conturbat domum suam, possidebit ventum.' By new ways they think to accomplish wonders; but in truth they grasp the wind, and are at the same time cruel to us, and to the king too. For if the commonwealth flourish, then he that hath the sovereignty can never want, nor do amiss; so as he govern not according to the interest of others, but go the shortest and the safest ways to his own, and the common good.

The kings of this nation have always governed by parliaments; and if we look upon the success of things since parliaments were laid by, it resembles that of the Grecians,

'Ex illo fluere et retro sublata referri

especially on the subject's part. For though the king hath gotten little, they have lost all.—But his majesty shall hear the truth from us, and we shall make appear the errors of those divines, who would persuade us, that a monarch must be absolute, and that he may do all things ad libitum; receding not only from their text (though that be a wandering too) but from the way their own profession might teach them, 'state super vias antiquas,' and 'remove not the ancient bounds and land-marks which our fathers have set.' If to be absolute were to be restrained by no laws, then can no king in Christendom be so; for they all stand obliged to the laws Christian, and we ask no more: for to this pillar are our privileges fixed, our kings at their coronation taking a sacred oath not to infringe them.

I am sorry these men take no more care to gain our belief of things, which they tell us for our soul's health; while we know them so manifestly in the wrong, in that which concerns the liberties and privileges of the subjects of England: but they gain preferment, and then 'tis no matter, though they neither believe themselves, nor are believed by others. But since they are so ready to let loose the conscience of their kings, we are the more careful to provide for our protection against this pulpit law, by declaring and reinforcing the municipal laws of this kingdom.

It is worth observing, how new this opinion is, or rather this way of ruling, even among themselves. For Mr. Hooker, who sure was no refractory man, (as they term it) thinks that the first government was arbitrary, 'till it was found, that to live by one man's will, became 'the cause of all men's misery' (these are his words): concluding, that this was the original of inventing laws. And if we look farther back, our histories will tell us, that the prelates of this kingdom have often been the mediators between the king and his subjects, to present and to pray redress of their grievances; and had reciprocally then as much love and reverence from the people.

But these preachers, more active than their predecessors, and wiser than the laws, have found out a better form of government. The king must be a more absolute monarch than any of his predecessors; and to them he must owe it, though in the mean time they hazard the hearts of his people, and involve him in a thousand difficulties; for suppose this form of government were inconvenient, and yet this is but a supposition; for these 500 years, it hath not only maintained us in safety, but made us victorious over other nations: but, I say, suppose they have another idea of one more convenient, we all know how dangerous innovations are, though to the better: and what hazard those princes must run, that enterprize the change of a long established government. Now, of all our kings that have gone before, and of all that are to succeed in this happy race, why should so pious and so good a king be exposed to this trouble and hazard? besides that, kings so diverted can never do any great matter abroad.

But while these men have thus bent their wits against the laws of their country, whether they have neglected their own province, and what tares are grown up in the field which they should have tilled, I leave to a second consideration; not but that religion ought to be the first thing in our purposes and desires; but that which is first in dignity, is not always to precede in order of time, for well-being purports a being. And the first impediment which men naturally endeavour to remove, is the want of these things, without which they cannot subsist. God first assigned to Adam maintenance of life, and gave him a title to the rest of the creatures, before he appointed a law to observe. And let me tell you, if our adversaries have any such design, as there is nothing more easy than to impose religion on a people deprived of their liberties; so there is nothing more hard than to do the same upon freemen.

And therefore, Mr. Speaker, I conclude with this motion, that there may be an order presently made, that the first thing this house will consider of, shall be the restoring this nation in general to its fundamental and vital liberties, the property of our goods, and freedom of our persons; and that then we will further consider of the supply desired.—And thus we shall discharge the trust reposed in us by those that sent us hither: his majesty will see, that we make more than ordinary haste to satisfy his demands; and we shall let all those know, that seek to hasten the matter of supply, that they will so far delay it, as they give interruption to the former.

AFTERWARDS the House of Commons took the affair directly under consideration, in calling those Judges to an account, who had given their Opinions for the Ship-Money; at which time Lord Falkland delivered himself in the following manner:

Mr. Speaker; The constitution of this commonwealth hath established, or rather endeavoured to establish to us the security of our goods, and the security of those laws which would secure us and our goods, by appointing for us Judges, so settled, so sworn, that there can be no oppression, but they of necessity must be necessary; since if they neither deny nor delay us justice, which neither for the great nor little seal they ought to do, the greatest person in this kingdom cannot continue the least violence upon the meanest. But this security hath been almost our ruin; for it hath been turned, or rather turned itself into a battery against us: and those persons who should have been as dogs to defend the sheep, have been as wolves to worry them.

These Judges, to instance not them only, but their greatest crime, have delivered an opinion, and judgment in an extra-judicial manner, that is, such as came not within their cognizance, they being judges, and neither philosophers, nor politicians. In which when that is so absolute and evident, the law of the land ceases; and of general reason and equity, by which particular laws at first were framed, returns to his throne and government, where salus populi becomes not only suprema, but sola lex; at which, and to which end, whatsoever should dispense with the king, to make use of any money, dispenses with us to make use of his, and one another's. In this judgment they contradicted both many and learned acts and declarations of parliaments; and those in this very case, in this very reign: so that for them they needed to have consulted with no other record, but with their memories. 2. They have contradicted apparent evidences, by supposing mighty and imminent dangers, in the most serene, quiet, and halcyon days that could possibly be imagined, a few contemptible pirates being our most formidable enemies, and there being neither prince nor state, with whom we had not either alliance or amity, or both. 3. They contradicted the writ itself, by supposing that supposed danger to be so sudden, that it would not stay for a parliament, which required but forty days stay, and the writ being in no such haste, but being content to stay seven times over.

It seemed generally strange, that they saw not the law which all men else saw but themselves. Yet though this begot the more general wonder, three other particulars begot the more general indignation. When they had allowed to the king, the sole power in necessity, the sole judgment of necessity, and by that enabled him to take both from us, what he would, when he would, and how he would, they yet continued to persuade us, that they had left us our liberties and our properties. And, which I confess moved most, that by the transformation of us from the state of free subjects (a good phrase under Dr. Heylin's favour) unto that of villains; they disable us by legal and voluntary supplies to express our affections to his majesty, and by that to cherish his to us, that is, by parliaments.

The cause of all the miseries we have suffered, and the cause of all the jealousies we have had, that we should yet suffer, is, That a most excellent prince hath been most infinitely abused by his judges telling him, that, By policy he might do what he pleased.

We must now be forced to think of abolishing of our grievances, and of taking away this judgment and these judges together, and of regulating their successors by their exemplary punishment.

Hereupon the Opinions of the Judges, the Ship-Writs, and the Judgment against Mr. Hampden being read openly in the house on Monday, Dec. 7, 1640, after long debate these four several votes were agreed to by the house, nem. con.

1. That the charge imposed upon the subjects for the providing and furnishing of ships, and the assessment for raising of money for that purpose, commonly called Ship-Money, are against the laws of the realm, the subjects right of property, and contrary to former resolutions in parliament, and to the Petition of Right.

2. That the extrajudicial Opinions of the judges, published in the Star-Chamber, and inrolled in the Courts at Westminster, in hæc verba:

THE CASE.

THEIR OPINIONS.

'May it please your most excellent majesty, We have according to your majesty's command, severally, and every man by himself, and all of us together, taken into serious consideration the case and questions signified by your majesty, and inclosed in your letter: And we are of opinion, that when the good 'and safety of the kingdom in general is concerned, and the whole kingdom in danger, your majesty may by writ under the great seal of England, command all the subjects of this your kingdom, at their charge to provide and furnish such number of Ships, with men, victual, and munition, and for such time as your majesty shall think fit for the defence and safeguard of the kingdom from such danger and peril; and that by law your majesty may compel the doing thereof in case of refusal or refractoriness. And we are also of opinion, that in such case your majesty is the sole judge both of the danger, and when and how the same is to be prevented and avoided.'

In the whole, and in every part of them, are against the laws of the realm, the right of property and the liberty of the subjects, and contrary to former resolutions in parliament, and to the Petition of Right.

3. That the Writ following in hæc verba, viz. 'Charles by the grace of God, king of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c. To our right trusty and well-beloved counsellor, Thomas lord Coventry, keeper of our great seal of England, greeting. These are to will, and require you, that for the safeguard of the seas, and defence of the realm, you issue forth, or cause to be issued forth of our high court of chancery these ensuing writs in the form following, with duplicates of them, under our great seal of England, unto the counties, cities, towns, and places hereafter ensuing, and for so doing this shall be your warrant.' And the other Writs commonly called the Ship-Writs, are against the laws of the realm, the right of property, and the liberty of the subjects, and contrary to former resolutions in parliament, and to the Petition of Right.

4. That the Judgment in the Exchequer in Mr. Hampden's case, a transcript whereof followeth in hæc verba: (viz. 'Quod separalia brevia prædicta et retina eorumdem, ac schedul. prædict. eisdem annexat. ac materia in eisdem content. sufficien. in lege exist. ad præf. Joh. Hampden de prædictis viginti solidis super ipsius in forma et ex causa præd. assessis, onerand. Ideo consideratum est per eosdem barones, quod præd. Johannes Hampden de eisdem viginti solidis oneretur, et inde satisfaciatur.') in the matter and substance thereof, and in that it was conceived that Mr. Hampden was any way chargeable, is against the laws of the realm, the right of property, the liberty of the subjects, and contrary to former resolutions in parliament, and to the Petition of Right.

These votes were afterwards transmitted by the house of commons to the lords, and delivered by Mr. St. John (afterwards his majesty's solicitor-general) at a Conference of both houses of parliament, held 16 Car. 1640.

Mr. St. John addressed himself to the lords as follows:

My lords; The knights, citizens, and bur-geses of the commons house have entrusted me with a message to your lordships of a general and very high concernment; so general, that the whole body of the kingdom, both peers and people, are interested in it; of so high a consequence, as that there is nothing that can concern us nearer.—It is one of the grándia regni; so great, as that I shall not need to present it to your lordships in a magnifying glass; it will appear too big in its own dimensions. It is not that Ship-money hath been levied upon us; but it is that right whereby Ship-money is claimed, which, if it be true, is such as that makes the payment of Ship-money the gift and earnest penny of all we have. It is not that our persons have been imprisoned for payment of Ship-money, but that our persons, and (as it is conceived) our lives too, are, upon the same grounds of law, delivered up to bare will and pleasure. It is that our birth-right, our ancestral right, our condition of continuing free subjects, is lost; that of late there hath been an endeavour to reduce us to the state of villainage, nay to a lower. It is true, the lord might tax his villain de haute et de basse, might take all his lands and goods; the villain had no property against the lord, the villain he could not ire quo voluit, he had no liberty of person, the lord might imprison him at his pleasure: but the villain's life was his own, and not his lord's, the law secured him that. But, my lords, as the law stands now declared, it is disputable whether it doth so much for us.

My lords, the subject of this message, is to present the sense of the commons to your lordships; that the laws of the realm instituted at first, and freely assented unto, and chosen by their ancestors for the preservation of themselves and us their descendants, in our persons, lives and estates, have been of late entrusted unto such hands, as have endeavoured to force upon them a contrary end to that for which they were ordained; from defensive to turn them to offensive; and instead of protecting us, to make the laws the instrument of taking from us all we have. Those carriages which have produced this sense of the commons, I am commanded at this present to declare to your lordships. They are certain extra-judicial opinions delivered by the judges at several times; the one in November 1635, the other a year after, in February 1636. The Ship-Writs, that have issued to all the counties of England for these many years last past without intermission: the principal thing in these writs which I am to present to your lordships, is not the charge and burden which hath been thereby imposed upon the subjects, though that be great, but the declarations in them of the law, and of the right whereby this burden may be imposed.—The last is, the Judgment in Master Hampden's case in the exchequer upon these Ship-Writs.

My lords, the two last, that is, the Ship-Writ and the Judgment, because they are very long, I am only to open them without reading, and to deliver them to your lordship; the other two,

I am to read them, and then to deliver to your lordships.

The first OPINION in November 1635, was read as followeth:

I am of opinion, that as where the benefit doth more particularly redound to the good of the ports or maritime parts, as in case of piracy or depredations upon the seas, there the charge hath been, and may be lawfully imposed upon them according to precedents of former times; so where the good and safety of the kingdom in general is concerned, and the whole kingdom in danger, (of which his majesty is the only judge) there the charge of the defence ought to be born by all the realm. This I hold agreeable both to law and reason.

My lords, these opinions were delivered by the judges severally and apart, they were procured by the solicitation of my lord Finch. The judges, as he severally procured their hands, were by him enjoined secrecy: accordingly these opinions walked in the dark for a year and upwards. Afterwards the procurer of them, my lord Finch, liked them so well, as that he presumed to deliver them to his majesty. By his procurement, a letter was directed from his majesty to the judges, for the delivery of their opinions in these and some other additionals. The former that hath been read is more modest; it is only that his majesty is the sole judge of the danger, and that the inland as well as the maritime towns are chargeable to the defence of the kingdom.—It is not declared in these, that this charge may be imposed by his majesty alone; for the expression is only, that the charge may lawfully be imposed; say not by whom.—In the other opinions they proceed a malo ad pejus, and speak plain English, which followeth in hæc verba:

THE CASE.

C. R. When the good, and the ease and safety of the kingdom in general is concerned, and the whole kingdom in danger, whether may not the king, by writ under the great seal of England, command all the subjects in this kingdom, at their charge, to provide and furnish such number of ships with men, victuals and ammunition, and for such time as he should think fit, for the defence and safeguard of the kingdom from such danger and peril; and by law compel the doing thereof, in case of refusal or refractoriness? and whether in such case, is not the king the sole judge, both of the danger, and when and how the same is to be prevented and avoided?

THE JUDGES ANSWER.

May it please your excellent majesty, we have, according to your majesty's command, severally, and every man by himself, and all of us together, taken into serious consideration the case and questions signed by your majesty, and inclosed in your royal letter; and we are of opinion, that when the good and safety of the kingdom in general is concerned, and the whole kingdom is in danger, your majesty may by writ under the great seal of England, command all the subjects of this your kingdom at their charge to provide and furnish such number of ships, with men, victuals and ammunition, and for such time as your majesty shall think fit, for the defence and safeguard of the kingdom from such danger and peril; and that by law your majesty may compel the doing thereof, in case of refusal or refractoriness: and we are also of opinion, that in such case your majesty is the sole judge, both of the danger, and when and how the same is to be prevented and avoided.

These Opinions were subscribed by all the Judges in Serjeants-Inn-Hall; they were afterwards published in the Star-Chamber, that the subjects might take notice of them; and that they might never be forgotten, they are enrolled in all the courts of Westminster-Hall, in 'perpetuum rei memoriam.' Your lordships will be pleased to give me leave to repeat them in their plain and legal sense, which I conceive to be thus: That his majesty, as often as himself pleaseth, may declare that the kingdom is in danger; that so often, for prevention of such danger, his majesty, by his writ under the great seal of England, may alter the property of the subjects goods, without their consent in parliament, and that in such proportion as his majesty shall think fit; and besides, the altering of the property of their goods, for the prevention of such danger, may deprive them of the liberty of their persons, and of their lives, and that in such manner as himself shall please.

1. The first of these, viz. That his majesty may declare the danger as often as he pleaseth, is made good in these words, That the king is the sole judge of the danger, and when the same is to be prevented and avoided. 2. The second, that so often he may alter the property of the subjects goods, without consent in parliament, in these words, That his majesty may, by writ under the seal of England, command and compel all the subjects of the realm, at their charge, to provide and furnish ships. 3. That this may be in what proportion his majesty shall please, in these words; that his majesty may command them to provide and furnish such number of ships, with men, victuals, and ammunition, and for such time as his majesty shall think fit. 4. The last, viz. that which concerns our persons, in these two clauses: 1. That his majesty in case of refractoriness may compel the doing of it. This compulsion in case of refractoriness includes the person as well as the estate; nay, it sounds more in the personality than otherwise. For the other, viz. whether this personal compulsion may extend so far as to life, I humbly leave it to your lordships consideration, upon the other clause; that is, that his majesty is the sole judge of such danger, and when and how the same is to be prevented: whether the words, 'how it is to be prevented,' in this case of personal compulsion, doth not leave the manner of it wholly in his majesty's breast.

My lords, if these Opinions extend only to Ship-Money, it is enough; his majesty takes what he will, and when he will. If all be taken to day, and afterwards by descent or my own labour I got a new stock or livelihood, that is no more mine than the former, so that there is no property left unto the subject, though the Opinions go no further. But, my lords, Ship-Money is not the whole extent of them; Ship-Money, by these Opinions, is not due by any peculiarity in Ship-Money: but Ship-Money is therefore due, because his majesty is the sole judge of the danger of the kingdom, and when and how the same is to be prevented; because his majesty, for the defence of the kingdom, may at his will and pleasure charge the people. This is the ground, and upon the same reason the compulsion may be as well for the making and maintaining castles, forts and bulwarks, making of bridges, for transporting his armies, for provision of wages and victuals, for soldiers, for horses and carriages: it may be multiplied in infinitum.—It may be done when the good and safety of the kingdom is concerned; this extends to all things, and at all times: 'Quia jacet in terra, non habet unde codet.'

If these opinions be law, I humbly leave it to your lordships considerations, whether the government be not 'imperium legibus solutum.' The next thing I shall offer to your lordships is the Ship-Writs: a transcript of one of them directed to the sheriff of Dorsetshire, I shall deliver; all the rest being of the same form. Because the writ is long, I shall open it briefly; it is to this effect. There is a declaration in it, that 'salus regni periclitabatur.' That the safety of the kingdom was in danger. Therefore the inhabitants of the several counties are commanded, for the defence of the kingdom, for the custody of the seas, for the safeguard of the merchants from piracy inward and outward, that they should provide a ship of war, furnished with guns, gunpowder, double tackle, and all other necessaries; and this ship thus furnished at a day set, to be brought to Portsmouth, to be provided for 26 weeks of mariners wages, victuals and other necessaries: and for the doing of this, authority is given to the sheriffs of the several counties, to assess every one of the inhabitants 'secundum statum et facultates suas,' according to their estates and means; and further power given him, by distraining and selling of the distress, to levy these monies; 'si contrarios invenerit,' then to imprison their persons: And further declares, that all this may be done, 'secundum legem et consuetudinem regni.' The sense I conceive is briefly thus: That by the laws of the kingdom, when his majesty shall declare that the kingdom is in danger, he may alter the property of the subjects goods, and imprison their persons; nay, that not only his majesty, but the sheriffs may imprison their persons. By the law the lord might imprison his villain, but could not transfer that power to the bailiff, or to any other; it was personal. That the execution of this power over the persons of the subjects hath gone no farther than their imprisonment, whether therein we be not beholden to his majesty's grace and goodness, and nothing at all to the opinions of the judges, I leave it to your lordships considerations.

The last thing is, the Judgment in the Exchequer, in the 13th year of his now majesty's reign, against Mr. Hampden. The Record is very long: I shall briefly open it to your lordships. Quarto Aug. 11 Car. there issued Ship-Writs to the several counties; amongst the rest to the county of Bucks. The sheriff assessed the inhabitants; some of them made default, and did not pay. Upon a Certiorari out of the Chancery, directed to the sheriff, he certifies the persons that made default, together with the sums assessed upon them. From the Chancery, by Mittinus, these certificates were sent into the Exchequer, to the intent processes might issue against the defaulters. A Scire Facias issued to the sheriff of Bucks, who thereupon, amongst other returns, returns that Mr. Hampden had been assessed 20*l.* for some lands in Stoke-Mandeville in that county, which he had not paid. Mr. Hampden appeared, and upon his appearance demands Oyer of the Ship-Writs, and the other proceedings. After his hearing thereof, and understanding the contents, he demurs in law, that is, demands the Judgment and Opinion of the Judges, whether this writ was sufficient in law, and to force him to pay the said 20*l.*

This being a great and general case, the Barons of the Exchequer desired the assistance of the rest of the Judges, who did join accordingly. The case came to be argued; there were four arguments, two on Mr. Hampden's side, and two on the other side: The first was in Michaelmas Term, after All-Hallowtide; and all the four arguments were speeded before Christmas day, two of them in the term; and no longer time could be procured for the rest, but the short vacation between Michaelmas Term and Christmas. It was a case of so little concernment, that whereas in Westminster-Hall term after term is usually given to argue any demurrer, this must be argued betwixt All-Hallowtide and Christmas throughout. After the arguments, the counsel on both sides were commanded to bring before the Judges the records and authorities cited: They were brought; and for the ease of the Judges, many of them on Mr. Hampden's part were abbreviated on the back sides: those abbreviations were commanded to be expounded. Afterwards the case came to argument at the bench; there the case was judged, and by the greater part of the Judges Judgment was given against Mr. Hampden. When the Judges had delivered their opinions, it was the Barons part to give Judgment; the Judgment was, 'Quod separalia brevia prædict' et return' eorundem ac schedulæ prædict' eidem annex' ac materia in eisdem content' sufficien' in lege existunt ad præfatum Johannem Hampden de prædict, viginti solidis super ipsum in forma et ex causa prædict. assessis onerand' Ideo consideratum est per eosdem baron' quod prædictus Johannes Hampden de eisdem viginti solidis oneratum exiude satisfiat.'

My lords, this Judgment is a full and plenary execution of the former opinions of the Judges, and of the Ship-Writs, for so much as it concerns our propriety: It was given in Mr. Hampden's case only, but binds all the subjects; for so binding it is, as that an honourable person, now in my eye, in a case depending in the King's-Bench, was denied any argument or debate concerning the right of Ship-Money, for no other reason but that it had been by the former Judgment adjudged already in the Exchequer. My lords, these extra-judicial Opinions of the Judges, these Ship-Writs, and this Judgment, are those carriages which have introduced this sense of the commons, That the fundamental laws of the realm concerning our property and our persons are shaken.

My lords, the commons have taken the extra-judicial Opinions published and enrolled, and the rest, severally into consideration; they have been read openly in the house; and after long debate, and long rather in consideration of the greatness of the matter than of the difficulty of it, they came to vote; four several Votes passed upon them; the Votes passed without so much as one negative voice to any of them. The Votes were in substance, That they were against the laws of the realm, the right of the property, the liberties of the subject, contrary to the former resolutions of the parliament, and to the Petition of Right. The extra-judicial Opinions enrolled, they voted in the whole, and every part of them, to be contrary to all these; for they did conceive, that in these opinions there was not any one clause that was agreeable to the law, but that throughout they were contrary to the laws.

My lords, the things which the commons took into their consideration, before they proceeded to their Votes, were the proceedings in the parliament held 3 Car. when the Petition of Right was framed. The commons went no higher; the reasons inducing them thereto were, because in that parliament all those three had been debated, property of goods, liberty of persons, and security of our lives. Two of them, that is, property of goods and liberty of persons, by the occasion of the Commissions for the Loan, and the instruction wherewith these commissions were accompanied; that concerning our lives, by occasion of the commissions that had issued for the executing of Martial Law. They conceive, that if any thing concerning these had passed both houses and his majesty, or the judgment of both houses without his majesty, it would be in vain to look further, that it would be actum egere: Nay, my lords, they had farther consideration, that if those were already settled in that parliament, it would not only be derogatory to the jurisdiction of parliament, but dangerous to look higher, as that they would infer a defect in those proceedings, and cast an aspersion upon that parliament. I am commanded now to present to your lordships consideration those things which satisfy the commons, which are these three:

1. The Commissions for the Loans, with the instructions. 2. A Commission called The Commission of Excise. 3. An addition of saving, which was desired by your lordships to have been added to the Petition of Right, at the time of the framing of it.

The case upon the Commission for the Loans standeth thus: 13 Octob. 2 Car. divers Commissions were directed to sundry commissioners, to the number of 60 or 70 lords and gentlemen, in the several counties issued, whereby a compulsory aid, by way of Loan, was required of the subject: The causes and grounds of this command are in the commissions expressed to be these: The king found the crown engaged in a war, by the advice of both houses in parliament; that not only the king and the subject, but also his allies beyond sea were in danger. The parts beyond sea, where our cloth is vented, and from whence we have most of our provision for shipping, were endangered; his majesty's treasures were exhausted, and his coffers empty. A parliament had been summoned, but no supply. Unavoidable necessity both at home and abroad multiplied the enemies. Great and mighty preparations, both at sea and land, threatened the kingdom daily.

Not only the king's honour, but the safety and very subsistence of the king and people, and of the true religion abroad, are in apparent danger of suffering irreparably, unless not only a speedy, but also a present stop be made; which cannot admit so long delay as the calling of a parliament. The king assured on the royal word of a king, that not one penny should be bestowed, but upon those public services only wherein every one of them, and the whole body of the kingdom, their wives, children, and posterity, have their personal and common interests. The commissioners diligence commanded, as they tendered the king's honour and safety of the realm. Here 'salus regni periclitabatur,' the whole kingdom was in danger, as in the judges opinions, and as in the ship-writs, and judgments in the Exchequer. Nay, my lords, further, the safety and very subsistence of the king, people, and true religion, were in danger of suffering irreparably; the dangerous instance, not a speedy, but present stop must be made; the supply could not stay for a parliament; at this time his majesty's coffers were exhausted; the king found the crown engaged in this war, before the access of it to himself, and that by advice in parliament; all this expressed, only lending of monies for prevention required; but it was a compulsory thing, and became compulsory, by the instructions to bind over to the board, and imprisonment for refusal. These commissions were, in the parliament 3 Car. first resolved in the commons house to be against the law, afterwards by your lordships, and consented unto by his majesty; and are declared to be so in the Petition of Right; and the imprisonment of the subjects for refusal, declared in the Petition of Right to be against law.

My lords; The next is the Commission called, The Commission of Excise. This was dated ultimo Feb. it was dated after the summons to that parliament: This commission issued to 33 lords, and others of his majesty's privy-council; the commissioners are thereby commanded to raise monies by impositions, or otherwise; as in their judgments they shall find to be most convenient.

The causes wherefore these monies are to be raised, are expressed to be these: The defence and safety of the king and people, which without extremest hazard of the king, kingdom, and people, and of the king's friends and allies beyond seas, cannot admit any longer delay; inevitable necessity, wherein form and circumstance must rather be dispensed withal, than the substance lost. The commissioners not to fail therein, as they tendered his majesty's honour, and the safety of the kingdom and people. Here 'salus regni periclitabatur,' the whole kingdom declared to be in danger, in greater and nearer than in the opinion of the Ship-Writs, or Judgment in the Chequer.

In the parliament 3 Car. this Commission was adjudged by the commons to be against the laws of this realm, and contrary to the Judgment given in the Petition of Right; and after a conference with your lordships, desired his majesty, that it might be cancelled. The then Lord-Keeper shortly after brought it cancelled to your lordships in the house, and there said, it was cancelled in his majesty's presence: You sent it cancelled to the commons to be viewed, who afterwards sent it back to your lordships.

My lords, The last is the addition of saving, desired to be added to the Petition of Right, which was in these words:

'We humbly present this Petition unto your majesty, not only with a care of preserving our own liberties, but with due regard to leave entire the sovereign power, wherewith your majesty is trusted, for the protection, safety, and happiness of your people.' Your lordships desire of this addition to the Petition of Right, was taken into consideration by the commons; and after debate, it was thought fit by them to be rejected. A conference was had with your lordships, and Mr. Noy appointed by the commons to declare the reasons of their resolution. Your lordships not receiving satisfaction at that conference, whether this addition should be rejected or not; it was again debated in the commons house, they ventured upon the same bottom again: It was thereupon resolved to be rejected; the reasons of their rejection were these in sum:

First, They confess, that if these words were taken as a bare proposition only, without any further reference to the Petition of Right, that it was a true proposition. That is, that the law hath trusted the king with sovereign power for the protection, safety, and happiness of the people. But if it should be added to the Petition of Right, as was desired, then was it not true, but would make the Petition of Right facto de se, and wholly destructive to itself in all the parts of it; that it would proceed 'a bene di'visis ad mala conjuncta:' for then the Petition of Right, as they resolved, would have this sense. Whereas in the Petition of Right it is said, That no aid, tax, tallage, or other charge whatsoever, may be imposed upon the people without their free consent in parliament; it would have this construction. It is true, it cannot be done by the king's ordinary power, but it may be done by that sovereign power wherewith the law hath entrusted his majesty for the protection, safety, and happiness of the people. So likewise for imprisonment, that they ought not to be imprisoned without due process of law. It is true ordinarily, but the king may imprison by his sovereign power, wherewith the law hath intrusted him for the protection, safety, and happiness of the people.

So that, for that martial law, that the subjects lives ought not to be taken away, unless by due process of law. It is true ordinarily, but the king may do it by his sovereign power, wherewith the law hath intrusted him for the protection, safety, and happiness of the people.
Whereby they conceived that it would not only make the Petition of Right to be wholly destructive of itself, but likewise this Petition of Right would leave the subjects in a far worse condition than it found them; for it would necessarily infer, that which is against the law, viz. That the king, by his sovereign power, when he pleased to declare that it was for the good of the people, might do all this.

Your lordships, at a conference of both houses, engaged on the part of the commons by serjeant Glanville and sir Henry Martin, received satisfaction from these reasons, and consented to the leaving out this addition; and accordingly the Petition of Right passed, and is printed without it.

My lords, these were the things I was commanded to present unto your lordships; other things there were, as the sentence against bishop Mainwaring: but these weighed so much with the commons, as that they conceived they needed no more. My lords, These precedents of that parliament, and these opinions of the judges, the Ship-Writs, and the judgments in the Exchequer; they are like the two buckets of a well, if one go up the other must go down:
'non bene conveniunt.' My lords, we have not cited these precedents out of diffidence that your lordships had forgotten them, but because others have; or that we distrust your lordships justice, if you had forgotten them:
for before these were your lordships concurred in opinion with your worthy ancestors, that first gave them. Their noble blood runs in your veins. It is now to confirm your own judgment as well as theirs; in your lordships breasts, there are the same magazines and fountains of honour and justice as were then; these judgments and proceedings were the actions of both houses; the danger by the violation is equal. The commons see nothing in the judges opinions or judgment, why they should recede from their former judgments; they hope the same from your lordships. Besides, my lords, that the case is now much varied from what it was then; not only in the matter, but as it concerns the honour and jurisdiction of this great judicatory, the parliament.

The breach of privileges in the members is tenderly resented, because that without this freedom they cannot advise and consult concerning the ardua regni. But when they have done all, to have their judgments and their acts of parl. overthrown by the judges afterwards, this makes parliaments to be nothing; this sets up the judges above the parliament, this puts us out of hope of redress; if they may overthrow the proceedings of that parliament of 3 Car.
they may by the same reason overthrow the actions of this, and of all future parliaments.

My lords, this was not the practice of their predecessors, though but in private causes; if difficulty of law arose, they always consulted this oracle, and thence received their answer how to give judgment. Judgments in the highest court of Westminster-Hall, I mean in the King's-bench, where the proceedings are coram rege, are here reversable by writ of error. In causes of great and general concernment, they ever adjourned them hither, as things too high for them.—*Quia consulta patrum, qui leges
'juraque servat,'* doth well; they have taken that in their hands they had not to do withal; and how they have handled the matter, your lordships have heard.

The judges, as is declared in the Parliament
Roll of Rich. 2, are the executors of the statutes, and of the judgments and ordinances of parliament; they have here made themselves the executioners of them; they have endeavoured the destruction of the fundamentals of our laws and liberties. Holland in the Low-Countries lies under the sea, the superficies of the land is lower than the superficies of the sea:
it is capital therefore for any man to cut the banks, because they defend the country. Besides our own, even foreign authors, as Com-mines, observe, that the statute De Tallagio, and other old laws, are the sea-walls and banks which keep the commons from the inundation of the prerogative. These pioneers, they have not only undermined these banks, but they have levelled them even with the ground. If one that was known to be hostis patrie had done this, though the damage be the same, yet the guilt is less. But the conservatores riparum, the overseers intrusted with the defence of these banks, for them to destroy them, the breach of trust aggravates, nay, alters the nature of the offence. Breach of trust, though in a private person, and in the least things, is odious amongst all men; much more in a public person, and in things of great and public concernment, because great trust binds the party trusted to greatest care and fidelity. It is treason in the constable of Dover castle to deliver the keys to the known enemies of the kingdom; because that castle is the key of the kingdom; whereas if the house-keeper of a private person delivered possession to his adversary, it is a crime scarce punishable by law.

The judges under his majesty are the persons trusted with the laws; and in them, with the lives, liberties, and estates of the whole kingdom: this trust of all we have is primarily in his majesty, and from him delegated to his judges.—His majesty, at his coronation, is bound by his oath to execute justice to his people, according to the laws; thereby to assure the people of the faithful performance of this great trust. His majesty again, as he trusts the judges with the performance of this part of the oath, so doth he likewise exact another oath of them, for their due execution of justice to the people, according to the laws: hereby the judges stand entrusted with this part of his majesty's oath. If therefore the judges shall do wittingly against law, they do not only break their oaths, and therein the common faith and trust of the whole kingdom, but do as much as in them lies smear and blemish the sacred person of his majesty with the odious and hateful sin of perjury.

My lords, The heinousness of this offence is most legible in the severe punishments which former ages have inflicted upon those judges who have broken any part of their oaths wittingly, though in things not so dangerous to the subject as in this case in question. Sir Thomas Wayland, chief justice of the Common Pleas, Edw. 1, was attainted of felony for taking bribes, and his lands and goods forfeited, as appears in the Pleas of Parliament, 18 Edw. 1, and he was banished the kingdom as unworthy to live in that state, against which he had so much offended. Sir William Thorpe, chief justice of the King's-Bench, in Edw. 3's time, having of five persons received five several bribes, which in all amounted to 100*l.* was for this alone adjudged to be hanged, and all his lands and goods forfeited. The reason of this judgment is entered in the roll, in these words; 'Quia prædict' Willielmus Thorpe, qui sacramentum domini regis erga populum suum habuit ad custodiendum, fregit malitiose, false et rebelliter, quantum in ipso fuit; because that he, as much as in him lay, had broken the king's oath made unto the people, which the king had intrusted him withal.

There is this notable declaration in that judgment; that is, that this judgment was not to be drawn into example against any other officers who should break their oaths, but only against those 'qui prædictum sacramentum fecerunt et fregerunt, et habent leges Angliæ ad custodiendum;' that is, only to the judges oaths, who have the laws entrusted to them. This judgment was given 24 Ed. 3. The next year in the parliament 25 Ed. 3, it was debated in parliament, whether this judgment was legal; et nullo contradicente, it was declared to be just and according to the law; and that the same judgment may be given in time to come upon the like occasion. This case is in point, that it is death for any judge wittingly to break his oath, or any part of it. This oath of Thorpe is entered in the roll, and is the same verbatim with the judges oath in 18 Ed. 3, and the same which the judges now take.

Your lordships will give me leave to observe the differences between that and the case in question.

First, that of Thorpe was only a selling of the law by retail to those five persons; for he had only five several bribes of those five persons the passage of the law to the rest of the subjects, for aught appears, was free and open.—But these Opinions are a conveyance of the law by wholesale, and that not to, but from the subject.

In that of Thorpe, as to those five persons, it was not an absolute denial of justice; it was not a damming up, but a streightening only of the channel. For whereas the judge out judicium reddere, that is, the law being a birth-right and inheritance of the subject, he judge, when the parties in suit demand judgment, should reclare, freely restore this right unto them; now he doth not dare, but venire, with the hazard only of perverting justice for the party that buys the judgment may have a good and honest cause. But these Opinions, besides that they have cost the subject very dear, dearer than any; nay, I think I may truly say, than all the unjust judgments that ever yet have been given: witness the many hundred thousand pounds which under colour of them have been levied upon the subject, amounting to 700,000*l.* and upwards in money paid unto the treasurer of the navy besides what the subjects have been forced to pay to sheriffs, bailiffs, and others, which altogether, as is conceived, amounts not to much less than a million; besides the infinite vexation of the subjects by suits in law, binding them over to attendance at the council-board, taking of them from their necessary employments in making of assesses and collections, and imprisonment of their persons: I say, my lords, besides what is past, to make our miseries complete, they have as much as in them lies made them endless; for by these opinions they have put upon themselves and their successors an impossibility of ever doing us right again, and an incapacity upon us of demanding it so long as they continue.

My lords, In that sore famine in the land of Egypt, when the inhabitants were reduced to the next door to death, for there they say, 'Why should we die for bread?' First, they gave their money; next, their flocks and cattle; and last of all, their persons and their lands, for bread; and all became Pharaoh's. But by this lex regia, there is a transaction made, not only of our persons, but of our bread likewise, wherewith our persons should be sustained. That was for bread, this is of our bread. For, my lords, since these opinions (if we have any thing at all) we are not at all beholden to the law for it, but are wholly cast upon the mercy and goodness of the king.—Again, There the Egyptians themselves sold themselves and all they had to the king; if ours had been so done, if it had been done by our own free consent in parliament, we had the less cause to complain: but it was done against our wills, and by those who were trusted, and that upon oath, with the preservation of those things for us.

My lords, The laws are our forts and bulwarks of defence. If the captain of a castle, only through fear and cowardice, and not from any compliance with the enemy, surrender it; this is treason, as was adjudged in the parliament, 1 Ric. 2, in the two cases of Grymes and Weston, and in the case of the lord Gray, on surrendering of Berwick Castle to the Scots in Edw. 3d's time, though good defence had been made by him, and that he lost his eldest son in maintenance of the siege; and yet the loss of a castle only loseth not a kingdom, but the place and adjacent parts, without trouble to the whole. But by these opinions, there is a surrender made of all legal defence of property; that which hath been preached is now judged, that there is no metum et tunc between the king and the people, besides that which concerns our persons.

My lords, The law, it is the temple, the sanctuary whither the subject is to run for shelter and refuge. Hereby it is become 'templum sine numine,' as was the temple built by the Roman emperor, who, after he had built it, put no gods into it. We have the letter of the law still, but not the sense. We have the fabric of the temple still; but the gods, the 'dii tuales,' are gone.

But, my lords, this is not all the case, that is, that the law now ceaseth to aid and defend us in our rights, for then possession alone were a good title, if there were no law to take it away; 'occupanti concederetur, et melior esset possidentis conditio.' But this, though too bad, is not the worst; for besides that which is privative in these opinions, there is somewhat positive: for now the law doth not only not defend us, but the law itself is made the instrument of taking all away. For whensoever his majesty or his successors shall be pleased to say, That the good and safety of the kingdom is concerned, and that the whole kingdom is in danger, then when and how the same is to be prevented, makes our persons and all we have liable to bare will and pleasure. By this means, the sanctuary is turned into a shambles: the forts are not slighted, that so they might neither do us good or hurt; but they are held against us by those who ought to have held them for us; the mouth of our own cannon is turned upon ourselves.

My lords, in these expressions there is no reflection upon his majesty: It is only that those judges would have forced upon the law an unnatural and contrary motion; his majesty's carriage in the business clears his justice.—The first Opinion of the judges under their hands was procured by my lord Finch's solicitation only, and by him brought to his majesty. These Opinions procured the letter from his majesty for the Opinions enrolled, wherein, as likewise in the case in the Exchequer, the judges were left free, as was acknowledged by two of the judges in the exchequer-chamber, who argued against those Opinions, with this protestation, that if there were any miscarriages in that business, it must fall wholly upon themselves; that the king was blameless.

My lords, we know his majesty's justice is the fairest, the richest diamond in his crown; the dust which these men would have blown and forced upon it, is fallen short; and with your lordships helping hands, it will, we hope, be cast upon their own faces, a fitter place for it than the other. My lords, the oaths of the judges, as they bind them to the due administration of justice to the subjects, according to the laws, so as they be of the king's council by their oaths, they are bound lawfully to counsel him; that is, when their opinions are demanded, they are to deliver them according to the law.

I shall therefore put your lordships in mind of the memorable proceedings against those judges who have broken this part of their oath, in that notable parliament held the eleventh of Richard the Second. In this parliament, judgment of high treason was given against 18 several persons,* and all (save one of them) of eminent rank; three privy counsellors; the archbishop of York, the duke of Ireland, the earl of Suffolk; the bishop of Exeter the king's confessor; five knights, some whereof had been servants to Edward the 3rd, and all, save one, servants to the then king; and some of them of noble descent; six judges, Lockton the king's serjeant at law, Blake of the king's counsel at law, and Uske, the under sheriff of Middlesex. Of these eighteen, eight were executed; that is, sir Robert Tresilian the chief justice, five knights, Blake of the king's counsel at law, and Uske the under sheriff. Three, that is, the archbishop of York, duke of Ireland, and earl of Suffolk, fled. The rest had their lives pardoned, but were banished; their lands and goods forfeited, and little pensions allowed them during their lives. It was made felony for any one to procure their pardons, and they to be dealt with as traitors, if they returned from their banishment: and of those 18 persons all save three were impeached by the commons.

The offences which procured these exemplary punishments, although their proceedings be long, and comprehended all that was done in this parliament, I'll briefly open them to your lordships. During the minority of that king, by ill counsel of some near his person there were miscarriages in government. In the tenth year of his reign, and the twentieth of his age, a parliament was holden: in that parliament, in aid of good government, and of due execution of the laws, a commission was awarded to 11 several peers, and others of greatest wisdom and fidelity. The commissioners had power in all things concerning the household, courts of justice, and the revenues; in a word, in all things concerning the good of the realm; with full power finally to determine and put in execution such determination for the honour of the king, the better governance of the peace and laws of the realm, and relief of the people.—This commission was to endure one year; at the year's end the king would be of full age.

My lords, the endeavouring to overthrow this commission issued by authority of parliament for the welfare of the realm, upon pretence that it trenched upon the royal power, tended to the disherison of the king, and derogation of the crown, together with the destruction of the commissioners who procured it, and put the same in execution, upon pretence that they and some others had in parliament forced the royal assent. My lords, the conspiring to overthrow this commission and the procurers of it, is the case in brief: for although there be divers other articles against many of them, yet this was the ground-work of all; and this singly and alone is declared in all the proceedings in parliament to be treason. Of these 18 persons condemned, 5 of them were plotters, viz. the archbishop, duke of Ireland, earl of Suffolk, Tresilian the chief justice, and sir Nicholas Braubtre: these insinuated into the king, That this commission was in diminution of his kingly power, that the procurers of it had extorted his royal assent; and that this was treason: Thereupon Blake one of the king's counsel at law was advised withal, who declared his opinion, that it was treason: he was commanded to prepare an indictment of treason against the commissioners, and some of the procurers of it, who had been active therein.

The indictment was drawn by him, which is entered in the roll, and is to this effect: That they had traiterously conspired amongst themselves in the parliament, to make this commission by authority of parliament against the regality of the king, to his disherison, and derogation of the crown; that they compelled the king's consent, and that they confederated and bound themselves to maintain one another in so doing.—It was intended that they should be tried upon this indictment in Middlesex or in London. Uske the under-sheriff of Middlesex was acquainted with the business, who was to prepare things for the effecting of this design, some of the parties to be indicted not being peers: which he performing accordingly, was therefore executed.

The five plotters, that the king might the more confide in their counsels, (for so are the words of the record) and that under the colour of law they might cover their malice from the king and the kingdom, before the trial was to be had, they advise the king to demand the opinion of some of the judges, that is of the two chief justices, and chief baron, the judges of the Common Pleas, six in number, and of Locton the king's serjeant. Blake of the king's counsel at law was commanded to draw up these questions for the judges opinions, who did it accordingly. For the drawing up of these questions, and the indictment, Blake was condemned and executed.

The question being drawn into writing, the judges were sent for to Nottingham Castle; where, in the king's presence, they were commanded upon their allegiance to deliver their opinions.—1. The first question was, Whether the commission was in derogation of the crown? They answered, It was. 2. The second question was, Whether the persuading and urging the king's consent in parliament thereto was treason? They answered, That it was. Though there were some other questions asked, all concerning parliamentary proceedings, yet these were the main, and those for which they were condemned; as appears by the replication of the commons to the judges answer, and by the words of the judgment, viz. That they knew that this commission was awarded in parliament, that it was for the public good; that they knew of the traitorous intents to destroy the procurers of this commission; that they knew the law, and that it was not treason; and had delivered their opinions thereby under colour of law, to cover their treasonable intent; and therefore judgment of treason was given against them, and against Locton the king's serjeant at law, who had subscribed the opinions with the judges.—Sir Simon Burley, one of the five knights that were executed, was condemned only for conspiring the death of the procurers of this commission: and although there be other articles against the rest, yet this alone is adjudged treason in the several judgments against every one of the eighteen.

1. My lords, it is observable in all these judgments, that they are adjudged traitors, as well against the person of the king as against the commonwealth. 2. It is there declared upon great advice taken, that in treasons which concern the king and kingdom, they are not bound to proceed according to the rules of the common law and inferior courts, but according to the course of parliaments, so as may be for the common good. 3. Judgment was given in parliament, and execution awarded, and afterwards a bill of confirmation passed, in respect of their lands, to give them from a day past; and for declaration that this should be no precedent to inferior courts to adjudge the same cases treason, save only in parliament.

These judgments were not huddled up in haste, but they were given upon long and mature deliberation. These judgments were the whole work of that parliament; and the proceedings against the five plotters were begun the fourteenth of November, and the judgments were not given till the thirteenth of February following, which was a quarter of a year. And it is declared in the roll, that they spent a long time, and took great pains to examine the evidences, the better thereby to satisfy their own consciences and the world.

I insist the more upon this, to take away all blemish from these proceedings. It is true, my lords, these judgments were afterwards in the parliament of 31 Rich. 2, revoked and made void. But, my lords, that parliament of 21 Rich. 2, of revocation, was held by force, as it is declared in the Parliament Rolls of 1 Hen. 4, n. 21, 22, that it was held 'viris armatis, et sagittariis immensis.' The knights of parliament were not elected by the commons, 'proat mos exigit, sed per regiam voluntatem.' And so the lords, 'summoniri fecit rex dominos sibi adherentes.'

My lords, by these precedents it doth appear, that this parliament of revocation was no free parliament, if at all it deserves the name of a parliament. But to put all out of doubt, in the parliament of 1 Hen. 4, n. 48, these judgments of revocation are declared to be contra, 'iniqua, et omni juri et rationi repugnantia,' erroneous, wicked, and contrary to all right and reason. In the parliament of 1 Hen. 4, in print, these attainders are confirmed: So that these judgments of attainder have the authority of two acts of parliament, both of them of force at this day.

Your lordships will give me leave to observe the differences and agreements between the offences of those and of the present judges, and as well in the way and manner of procurement, as in the matter of them. For the manner of procurement, those judges in Rich. 2's time were in the king's presence: and as it is in the Parliament Roll of 1 Hen. 4, n. 18, they were 'violenter attracti,' violently drawn to deliver their opinions, and that 'metu mortis et cruciatu corporis,' for the fear of death and tortures of their bodies: and at their trials severally they say, That in part violence had been offered to their persons, because they had differed in the delivery of their opinions. My lords, this was such a miscarriage in the judges, these circumstances considered as might 'cadere in virum fortem et constantem.' But, my lords, fear or cowardice is no plea for delivering up of the forts and bulwarks of the kingdom.

But in the present business there is none of all this; it came from within; there is no outward force. In those of Rich. 2, it was 'actus unicus,' once done at Nottingham castle: if the judges had been put to it the second time, perhaps the rest, as well as some of them, had repented, and would not have done it over again; for Belknap, the chief justice of the Common-Pleas, the same day declared his sorrow, and said, That now there remained nothing but a horse, a hurdle, and a halter; and Fulthorp, another of them, the next day declared his grief for what he had done. But here, after the opinion in November 1685, a year after, viz. 1636, they proceed 'a pessimo ad pejus pessimo;' for that was with additions: most of them declared their opinions in their circuits, and a year after confirmed it again by the judgment in the exchequer. Here it was done year after year in cold blood: One murderous blow, whereupon death follows, is felony; but to multiply wounds upon the dead body, and to come again in cool blood to do it, it shews the height of malice. In these two things they agree.

1. That which the judges did in Rich. 2's time, they did against their own knowledge; they knew the commission was done by act of parliament; so here these knew the Petition of Right damned the Commissioners of Loans, a stronger case than that; they subscribed many of them, knew that the Commission of Excise was damned in parliament; they knew the other proceedings in parliament, and if they had forgotten them, they were afterwards put in mind of them; they needed not to have consulted with books and journals of parliaments, saving only with their own memoria.

2. They agree in this, That their opinions tended to the subversion of the laws and statutes of the kingdom: for in that of Rich. 2, the pretence was, the endeavoring to overthrow parliaments and parliamentary proceedings; the conspiracy of the death of the procurers was only an aggravation. It was not treason to conspire the death of a privy counsellor, or to kill a judge, unless he be upon the bench; and in that case it is treason, because of the malice, not of the person, but to the law: so that there the treason lay in this, not that they conspired barely against their persons, but with reference to their proceedings in parliament; and thereby to overthrow the acts of parliament, wherein these persons had been principal actors. But in this again they disagree; for in that case there was only a conspiracy; no death followed to the procurers of the commission, nor was the commission overthrown; all that was done was only this, That a warrant was directed to the lord mayor of London, for apprehending their persons to bring them to trial, which yet was not done. But here (after the opinions delivered) judgment was afterwards given by them in the exchequer, and execution awarded thereupon, for so much as concerns our property:

And likewise in the King's Bench, where the judges after the Judgments in the Exchequer refused to hear any more debate of the matter; and so for the liberty of our persons, by keeping divers of the subjects in prison, term after term, for not paying Ship-money, and other things depending upon those opinions, when they had been brought before them upon their Habeas Corpus. In that of Rich. 2, it was for overthrowing but one act of parliament, which was likewise introductive of a new law; for the commission had no rise from the common law: for in truth it was derogatory to the crown: It had only the strength of the parliament to support it, which was sufficient; it was for the common good. But here the endeavour was at once, not to blow up one act of parliament, but all; and these not introductive, but declaratory of the common law; as was the Petition of Right, the statutes there mentioned, and the resolutions. That of Rich. 2, was but the blowing up of the upper deck; this of the common law, and the statutes too, and the old foundations, and the structures built upon them, all together. If that of Rich. 2, it was only to overthrow a temporary act of parliament, that was to continue no longer than one year: but this, to make an eternal devastation; for (folies quoties) to the world's end, as his majesty or his successors shall say that the kingdom is in danger, may these opinions be put in execution; and likewise they are enrolled in all the courts of Westminster-Hall, 'in perpetuam rei memoriam.'

This sin against the Holy Ghost is therefore unpardonable, because it takes from the party repentance, the means of pardon. To put us therefore into a case of desperation, some of them have publicly, and upon the bench, declared, That this prerogative is so inherent in the crown, as that it cannot be taken away by act of parliament.—As they have put an impossibility upon themselves, so would they put an impossibility upon his majesty, your lordships, and the whole parliament, for ever righting us again.

My lords, 'contraria juxta se posita magis elucescunt.' I have presented your lordships, with the obliquity of the ill Judges in Rich. 2's time: give me leave to present your lordships with one example of a contrary nature; and that was in queen Elizabeth's time in the 29th year of her majesty's reign: She erects a new office in the Common-Plens, for the making of Supersedeas in exigents that issued there; she grants it to Richard Cavendish, her servant, sends to have him admitted: but the judges delay the doing of it, for this reason, because the prothonotaries and philazers claimed the making of those writs. The queen sends a sharp letter, and commands them forthwith to admit him: yet the judges forbear. The queen sends a sharper letter, commanding them to shew the reasons of their contempt and disobedience to the then Lord Keeper and the earl of Leicester, no mean men in those days: the judges deliver their reasons why they had refused, that it was because others claimed the making of those writs.—The queen sends a fourth peremptory message for their admitting him, with this reason, That if the others were put out, they were rich and able men; and that her courts of justice were open, where they might demand their rights.—This was not to take away the right, but to put them to their action.—The Judges humbly returned this Answer, That the queen had taken her oath for the execution of justice according to the law; that they did not doubt, but that when her majesty was informed that it was against law, she would do what befitted her: for their parts, they had taken an oath to God, to her, and the commonwealth; and if they should do it without process of law before them, and only upon her command put the other out of possession, though the right remained to them, it were a breach of their oaths; and therefore if the fear of God were not sufficient, they told her the punishment that was inflicted upon their predecessors for breach of their oaths, (citing these of Thorpe in Rich. 2's time) that they might be sufficient warning to them. The queen hearing of these reasons was satisfied; and the Judges heard no more of the business.* —These Judges have had examples of both kinds before them; they might have chosen the good, and refused the bad.

My Lords, besides these judgments and opinions, the commons will in due time bring up these judges with their other judgments, 'contra cum causis;' for your lordships will easily conceive, that they who have done this, have done more: the principal of them, I mean my Lord Keeper, stands accused before your lordships of High Treason: he is not here: Justice goes 'pede lento, sed certo;' it will overtake him at the last.

The next step that is making after him are the Articles of his Impeachment, which, with your lordship's patience, are now ready to be opened and delivered to your lordships.

Mr. Hyde† spake afterwards in the following manner:

My Lords: There cannot be a greater instance of a sick and languishing commonwealth than the business of this day. Good God! how have the guilty these late years been punished, when the Judges themselves have been such delinquents! 'Tis no marvel that an irregular, extravagant, arbitrary power, like a torrent, hath broke in upon us, when our banks and our bulwarks, the laws, were in the custody of such persons. Men who had lost their innocence could not preserve their courage; nor could we look that they who had so visibly undone us themselves, should have the virtue or credit to rescue us from the oppression of other men. It was said by one who always spoke excellently, that the twelve Judges were like the twelve lions under the throne of Solomon: 'Under the throne in obedience, but yet lions.' Your lordships shall this day hear of six, who (be they what they will be else) were no lions, who upon vulgar fears delivered up the precious forts they were trusted with, almost without assault; and in a tame easy trance of flattery and servitude, lost and forfeited (shamefully forfeited) that reputation, awe, and reverence, which the wisdom, courage, and gravity of their venerable predecessors had contracted and fastened to the places they now hold; and even rendered that study and profession, which in all ages hath been, and I hope now shall be, of an honourable estimation, so contemptible and vile, that had not this blessed day come, all men would have had that quarrel to the law itself, which Marcus had to the Greek tongue; who thought it a mockery to learn that language, the masters whereof lived in bondage under others. And I appeal to these unhappy gentlemen themselves, with what a strange negligence, scorn, and indignation, the faces of all men, even of the meanest, have been directed towards them, since (to call it no worse) that fatal declension of their understandings, in those judgments of which they stand here charged before your lordships.—But, my lords, the work of this day is the greatest instance of a growing and thriving commonwealth too; and is as the dawning of a fair and lasting day of happiness to this kingdom.

* This remains under the hand of Anderson, the Lord Chief Justice, in his Reports, vol. 1, p. 152—158.

It is in your lordships power (and I am sure it is in your lordships will) to restore the dejected broken people of this island to their former joy and security, the successors of these men to their own privilege and veneration: 'Et sepultas prope leges revocare.'—So these Judges enter themselves, and harden their hearts by more particular trespasses upon the law; by impositions and taxes upon the merchants in trade; by burdens and pressures upon the gentry in knighthood; before they could arrive at that universal destruction of the king by Ship-Money, which promised reward and security for all their former services, by doing the work of a parliament to his majesty in supplies; and seemed to delude justice, in leaving none to judge them, by making the whole kingdom party to their oppression.—My lords, the commons assembled in parliament hope that your lordships will call these Judges speedily before you to answer these Articles laid to their charge, that the nation may be satisfied in your lordship's justice upon them, as their crimes merit.

Then Mr. Pierpoint delivered in the following Articles against sir Robert Berkley, one of the Justices of the King's-Bench:

ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT of Sir ROBERT BERKLEY, knt. one of the Justices of the Court of King's-Bench, by the Commons in this present Parliament assembled, in their own name, and in the name of all the Commons of England, in maintenance of their Accusation, whereby he standeth charged with High Treason, and other great Misdemeanours.

Imprimis, That the said sir Robert Berkley, then being one of the justices of the said court of King's-Bench, hath traitorously and wickedly endeavoured to subvert the fundamental laws and established government of the realm of England; and instead thereof, to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical government against law, which he hath declared by traitorous and wicked words, opinions, judgments, practices, and actions appearing in the several Articles ensuing.

2. Whereas by the statute made in the 25th year of the reign of Henry 8, prices of victuals are appointed to be rated in such manner, as in the said statute is declared; but it is manifest by the said statute, Corn is none of the victuals thereby intended: nevertheless some ill-affected persons endeavouring to bring a charge upon the subjects contrary to law, did surmise, that the prices of Corn might be rated, and set according to the direction of that statute; and thereupon great gain might be raised to his maesty by licences and dispensations for selling Corn at other prices: and a command from his majesty being procured to the Judges, and sent to them by William Noy, esq. his majesty's then Attorney General, to deliver their Opinions touching the question, Whether Corn was such victuals as was intended to have the price rated within the said statute: In answer to which, the said sir Robert Berkley then being one of his majesty's justices of the court of King's-Bench, in furtherance of the said unlawful charge endeavoured to be imposed as aforesaid, the 30th day of November, in the 8th year of his now majesty's reign, did deliver his Opinion, That Corn was such victuals as was intended to have the price rated within the said statute; which said Opinion was contrary to law, and to the plain sense and meaning of the said statute, and contrary to his own knowledge, and was given and delivered by him, with a purpose and intention that the said unlawful charge might be imposed upon the subject.

3. That an information being preferred in the court of Star-Chamber by the said William Noy, his majesty's then Attorney-General, against John Overman, and fifteen other soap-makers, defendants, charging them with several pretended offences, contrary to divers letters patents and proclamations touching the making and uttering Soap and using the trade of soap-makers, and other offences in the said information mentioned; whereunto the defendants did plead, and demur as to part, and answer to other parts of the said information: and the said plea and demurrer being over-ruled, for that the particulars therein insisted upon would appear more full after answer and proof; therefore the defendants were ordered to answer without prejudice, and were to be admitted to such exceptions to the said informations, and advantages of the matter of the plea and demurrer upon the hearing as shall be material; and accordingly the defendants did put in their Answers, and set forth several acts of parliament, letters patents, charters, customs, and acts of common-council of the city of London, and other matters materially conducing to their defence; and, in conclusion, pleaded Not Guilty. The said sir Robert Berkley then being one of the justices of the court of King's-Bench, upon the 30th day of March, in the eighth year of his majesty's reign, upon an order of reference to him and others, by the said court of Star-Chamber, to consider of the impertinency of the said Answers, did certify the said court of Star-Chamber, That the whole Answers, excepting the four words and ten last lines, should be expunged; leaving thereby no more substance of the said Answers than the plea of Not Guilty. And after, upon a reference to him and others, by order of the said court, of the impertinency of the Interrogatories, and Depositions of witnesses taken on the defendants part in the same case, sir Robert Berkley, upon the second day of May, in the eighth year of his now majesty's reign, certified, That nine-and-thirty of the said Interrogatories, and the Depositions upon them taken, should be suppressed, with the Answers, except as aforesaid, and Depositions: although the same did contain the said defendants most material defence, yet were they expunged and suppressed, according to the said certificates; both which said certificates were contrary to law and justice, and contrary to his the said Robert Berkley's own knowledge, and contrary to the said former order, whereby the advantages were saved to the defendants, as aforesaid: and by reason thereof the said John Overman and the said other fifteen defendants were sentenced in the said court of Star-Chamber to be committed prisoners to the Fleet, and disabled from using their trade of soap-makers; and one of them fined in 1500*l.*, two of them in 1000*l.* a-piece, four of them in 1000 marks a-piece; which fines were estreated into the Exchequer without any mitigation: and the said defendants, according to the said Sentence, were imprisoned, and deprived of their trade and livelihood, tending to the utter ruin of the said defendants, and to the overthrow of free trade, and contrary to the liberty of the subject.

4. That he the said sir Robert Berkley, then being one of the justices of the King's-Bench, and having taken an oath for the due administration of justice, according to the laws and statutes of this realm, to his majesty's liege people, on or about the last of December subscribed an Opinion, in hæc verba: 'I am of opinion, that as where the benefit doth more particularly redound to the good of the ports or maritime parts, (as in case of piracy or depredations upon the seas) there the charge hath been, and may be lawfully imposed upon them, according to precedents of former times; so where the safety and good of the kingdom in general is concerned, and the whole kingdom in danger, (of which his majesty is the only judge) there the charge of the defence ought to be borne by all the realm in general: this I hold agreeable both to law and reason.'

5. That he the said sir Robert Berkley, then being one of the justices of the court of King's-Bench, and duly sworn as aforesaid, in Feb. 1636 subscribed an extra-judicial Opinion, in answer to Questions in a letter from his majesty, in hæc verba:

'C. R. When the good and safety of the kingdom in general is concerned, and the whole kingdom in danger; whether may not the king, by writ under the great seal of England, command all the subjects of this kingdom at their charge to provide and furnish such number of ships with men, victuals and munition, and for such time as he shall think fit, for the defence and safeguard of the kingdom from such danger and peril? and by law compel the doing thereof in case of refusal or refractoriness? And whether in such case, is not the king sole judge both of the danger, and when and how the same is to be prevented and avoided?'

C. R. 'May it please your most excellent majesty, we have, according to your majesty's 'command, severally every man by himself, and all of us together, taken into serious consideration the case and question signed by your majesty, and inclosed in your royal letter: and we are of opinion, that when the good and safety of the kingdom in general is concerned, and the whole kingdom in danger, your majesty may, by writ under the great seal of England, command all your subjects of this your kingdom, at their charge to provide and furnish such number of ships with men, victuals, and munition, and for such time as your majesty shall think fit for the defence and safeguard of the kingdom from such danger and peril; and that by law your majesty may compel the doing thereof in case of refusal and refractoriness: and we are also of opinion, that in such case your majesty is the sole judge, both of danger, and when and how the same is to be prevented and avoided. John Bramston, John Finch, Humphry Davenport, John Denham, Richard Hutton, William Jones, George Crooke, Thomas Trevor, George Vernon, Robert Berkley, Francis Crawley, Richard Weston.'

6. That he the said sir Robert Berkley, then being one of the justices of the court of King's-Bench, and duly sworn as aforesaid, did on the deliver his opinion in the Exchequer-Chamber against John Hampden, esq. in the case of Ship-Money. That he the said John Hampden, upon the matter and substance of the case, was chargeable with the money then in question; a copy of which proceeding and judgment the commons of this present parliament have delivered to your lordships.

7. That he the said sir Robert Berkley, then being one of the justices of the court of King's-Bench, and one of the justices of Assize for the county of York, did, at the assizes held at York in Lent 1636, deliver his charge to the grand-jury, 'That it was a lawful and inseparable flower of the crown for the king to command, not only the maritime counties, but also those that were inland, to find ships for the defence of the kingdom.' And then likewise falsely and maliciously affirmed, That it was not his single Judgment, but the Judgment of all his brethren, witnessed by their subscriptions. And then also said, That there was a rumour, that some of his brethren that had subscribed were of a contrary judgment; but it was a base and unworthy thing, for any to give his hand contrary to his heart; and then wished for his own part, that his hand might rot from his arm, that was guilty of any such crime; when as he knew that Mr. Justice Hutton and Mr. Justice Crooke, who had subscribed, were of a contrary opinion, and was present when they were persuaded to subscribe; and did subscribe for conformity, only because the major number of the judges had subscribed. And he the said sir Robert Berkley then also said, That in some cases the Judges were above an act of parliament; which said false malicious words were uttered, as aforesaid, with intent and purpose to countenance and maintain the said unjust opinions, and to terrify his majesty's subjects that should refuse to pay Ship-Money, or seek any remedy by law against the said unjust and illegal taxation.

8. That whereas Richard Chambers merchant, having cotinued a suit for trespass, and false imprisonment, against sir Edw. Bromfield kn't. for imprisoning him the said Chambers for refusing to pay Ship-Money, in the time that the said sir E. Bromfield was lord mayor of the city of London; in which suit the said sir E. Bromfield did make a special justification: the said sir R. Berkley, then being one of the justices of the court of King's-bench, in Trinity term last, then sitting on the Bench in the said court, upon debate of the said case between the said Chambers and sir E. Bromfield, said openly in the court, 'That there was a rule of law, and a rule of government;' and that 'many things which might not be done by the rule of law, might be done by the rule of government:' and would not suffer the point of legality of Ship-Money to be argued by Chambers's counsel. All which opinions, declarations, words, and speeches, contained in the 3rd, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th, articles, are destructive to the fundamental laws of this realm, the subjects right of property, and contrary to former resolutions in parliament, and to the Petition of Right; which resolution in parliament, and Petition of Right, were well known to him, and resolved and enacted when he was the king's serjeant at law, and attendant in the lords house of parliament.

9. That the said sir R. Berkley, then being one of the Judges of the court of King's-bench, and being in commission of the peace, and duly sworn to execute the office of a justice of the peace in the county of Hertford, on or about the 7th of January 1638, at which time the general sessions of the peace for the said county were there holden; the said sir R. Berkley, then and there sitting on the bench, did revile and threaten the grand-jury returned to serve at the said sessions, for presenting the removal of the communion-table in All-Saints Church in Hertford aforesaid, out of the place where it anciently and usually stood, and setting it altar-ways, against the laws of this realm in that case made and provided, as an innovation in matters concerning the church; the said grand-jury having delivered to them in charge at the said sessions, by Mr. Serj. Atkins, a justice of the peace for the said county of Hertford, that by the oath they had taken, they were bound to present all innovations concerning church-matters. And he the said sir Robert Berkley compelled the foreman of the jury to tell him who gave him any such information; and thereby knowing it to be one Henry Brown, one of the said grand-jury, he asked the said Brown, how he durst meddle with church-matters? Who affirming, that in the said charge from Mr. serjeant Atkins the said jury was charged so to do, he the said sir Robert Berkley told the said

Brown, he should therefore find sories for his good behaviour; and that he the said sir R. Berkley would set a great fine on his head, to make him an example to others: and thereupon the said Brown offered sufficient bail; but he the said sir R. Berkley being incensed against him, refused the said bail, and committed the said Brown to prison, where he lay in irons till the next morning; and used to the said Brown, and the rest of the jurors, many other reviling and terrifying speeches; and said, he knew no law for the said presentment; and told the said Brown, that he had sinned in the said presentment: and he compelled the said grand-jurors to say, they were sorry for what they had done in that presentment, and did bid them to trample the said presentment under their feet; and caused Brown to tear the said presentment in his sight. And he the said sir R. Berkley, when as John Howland and Ralph Pemberton, late mayors of St. Albans, came to desire his opinion on several indictments against John Brown, parson of St. Albans, and Anthony Smith, vicar of St. Peter's in St. Albans, at the quarter-sessions held at the said town of St. Albans, on the 21th of June 1639, for the removal of the Communion Table out of the usual place, and not administering the Sacrament according to law in that case provided; he the said sir R. Berkley then told them, that such an indictment was before him at Hertford, and that he quashed the same, and imprisoned the promoters: by which threatening and reviling speeches, unjust actions and declarations, he so terrified the jurors in those parts, that they durst not present any innovations in church-matters, to their great grief, and trouble of their consciences.

And whereas several indictments were preferred against Matthew Brook, parson of Yarmouth, by John Ingram and John Carter, for refusing several times to administer the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper to them without any lawful cause, at the assizes held at Norwich in the year 1633; he the said sir R. Berkley, then being one of the judges of the assize, proceeded then to the trial on the said indictments; where the matter in issue being, that the said Brook refused to administer the said Sacrament, because the said Ingram and Carter, would not receive tickets with their surnames before their Christian-names; which was a course never used amongst them, but by the said Brook: and the said sir R. Berkley did then much discourage the said Ingram's counsel, and over-rule the cause for matter of law, so as the jury never went from the bar, but there found for the said Brook: and the said sir R. Berkley bound the said Ingram to the good behaviour for the prosecuting the said indictments, and ordered him to pay costs to the said Brook for wrongfully indicting him. And whereas the said Carter, not expecting the trial at the same assizes he preferred his indictment, was then absent; whereupon the said sir R. Berkley did cause to be entered upon the said indictment a Vacat; 'quia non 'sufficiens in lege,' and ordered an attachment against the said Carter: which said proceedings against the said Ingram and Carter, by the said sir R. Berkley, were contrary to law and justice, and to his own knowledge.

10. That the said sir R. Berkley, being one of the justices of the court of King's-bench, and duly sworn as aforesaid, in Trinity Term 1637, deferred to discharge or bail Alexander Jennings prisoner in the Fleet, (brought by Habeas Corpus to the bar of the said court; the return of his commitment being, that he was committed by two several warrants from the lords of the council, dated the 5th of November 1636, the first being only read in court, expressing no cause; the other, for not paying messengers fees,) until he should bring a certificate that he had paid his assessment for Ship-Money in the county of Bucks, but remitted him. And in Michaelmas term after, the said Jennings being brought by another Habeas Corpus before him as aforesaid, and the same returned; yet he, the said sir R. Berkley, refused to discharge or bail him, but remitted him. And in Easter-term, after several rules were given for his majesty's counsel to shew cause why the said Jennings should not be bailed, a fourth rule was made for the said Jennings to let his majesty's attorney-general have notice thereof, and notice was given accordingly; and the said Jennings by another Habeas Corpus being brought to the bar in Trinity term after, and the same return made, with this addition, of a new commitment of the 4th of May, suggesting the said Jennings had used divers scandalous words in derogation and disparagement of his majesty's government: He the said Jennings after several rules, in the end of the said Trinity term, was again remitted to prison. And he the said sir R. Berkley did, on the 5th of June last, defer to grant his majesty's writs of Habeas Corpus for William Pargiter and Samuel Danvers esquires, prisoners in the Gate-House, and in the Fleet: and afterwards having granted the said writ of Habeas Corpus, the said Pargiter and Danvers were on the 18th of June last brought to the bar of the said court, where the returns of their commitments were several warrants from the lords of the council not expressing any cause: yet he the said sir Robert Berkley, then sitting in the said court, deferred to bail the said Pargiter and Danvers, and the 18th of June last made a rule for a new return to be received, which was returned the 25th of June last in hæc verba:

'Whereas his majesty finding that his subjects of Scotland have in rebellious and hostile manner assembled themselves together, and intend not only to shake off their obedience unto his majesty, but also as enemies to invade and infest this his kingdom of England, to the danger of his royal person, &c.

'For prevention whereof his majesty hath by the advice of his council-board, given special commandment to all the Lord-Lieutenants of the counties of this realm, to assemble the militia at the places appointed for their ren-

'devous in their several and respective counties, there to be conducted and drawn together into a body for this service. And whereas his majesty, according to the laws and statutes of this realm, and the constant custom of his predecessors kings and queens of this realm, hath power for the defence of this kingdom and resisting the force of the enemies thereof, to grant forth commissions under his great seal to such fit persons as he shall make choice of, to array and arm the subjects of this kingdom, and to compel those who are of able bodies and able estates, to arm themselves; and such as should not be of able bodies, but of ability in estate, to assess them according to their estates to contribute towards the charge of arraying others, being able of body and not able in estate to arm themselves; and such persons as should be contrariant to commit to prison, there to remain until the king should take further order therein: And whereas the earl of Exeter, by virtue of his majesty's commission to him directed for the arraying and arming of a certain number of persons in the county of Northampton, hath assessed William Pargiter, being a man unfit of body for that service, but being of estate and ability to contribute amongst others to pay the sum of 3s. towards the arraying and arming of others of able bodies, and wanting ability to array and arm themselves: And whereas we have received information from the said earl, that the said William Pargiter hath not only in a wilful disobedient manner refused to pay the said money assessed upon him towards so important a service, to the disturbance and hindrance of the necessary defence of this kingdom; but also by his ill example hath misled many others; and, as we have just cause to believe, hath practised to seduce others from that ready obedience which they owe, and would otherwise have yielded to his majesty's just command for the public defence of his person and kingdom, which we purpose with all convenient speed to enquire further of and examine: These are therefore to will and require you to take into your custody the persons of the said William Pargiter and Samuel Danvers, and them safely to keep prisoners till further order from this board, or until by due course of law they shall be delivered.'

Yet he the said sir R. Berkley being desired to bail the said Pargiter and Danvers, remitted them, where they remained prisoners till the 9th of November last, or thereabouts; although the said Jennings, Pargiter and Danvers, on all and every the said returns, were clearly bailable by law; and the counsel of the said Jennings, Pargiter and Danvers, offered in court very sufficient bail. And he the said sir R. Berkley, being one of the justices of the court of King's-Bench, denied to grant his majesty's writs of Habeas Corpus to very many others his majesty's subjects; and when he had granted the said writs of Habeas Corpus to very many others his majesty's subjects, and on the return no cause appeared, or such only as was clearly bailed by law; yet he remanded them, where they remained prisoners very long: which said deferring to grant the said writs of Habeas Corpus, and refusals and delays to discharge prisoners, or to suffer them to be bailed, contained in this article, are destructive to the fundamental laws of this realm, and contrary to former resolutions in parliament, and to the Petition of Right; which said resolutions and Petition of Right were well known to him the said sir R. Berkley, and were resolved on and enacted when he was the king's serjeant at law, and attendant in the lords house of parliament.

11. That whereas there was a cause depending in the Court-Christian at Norwich, between Samuel Booty clerk and Collard for 2s. in the pound, for tithes for rents and houses in Norwich, and the said Collard moved by his counsel in the court of King's-Bench for a prohibition to stay proceedings in the Court-Christian at Norwich, and delivered into the said court of King's-Bench his suggestions, that the said cause in the said Court-Christian was only for tithes for rents of houses in Norwich, which was determinable by the common-law only; yet he the said sir R. Berkley, being one of the justices of the said court of King's-Bench, and sitting in the said court, deferred to grant a prohibition to the said Court-Christian in the said cause, although the counsel did move in the said court many several times, and several terms, for a prohibition. And he the said sir R. Berkley deferred to grant his majesty's writ of prohibition to several other courts, on the motions of divers others of his majesty's subjects, where the same by the laws of this realm ought to have been granted, contrary to the laws of this realm and his own knowledge.

All which words, opinions, and actions, were so spoken and done by him the said sir R. Berkley traitorously and wickedly, to alienate the hearts of his majesty's liege people from his majesty, and to set a division betwixt them, and to subvert the fundamental laws and established government of his majesty's realm of England: For which they do impeach him the said sir R. Berkley, one of the Justices of the court of King's-Bench, of High-Treason against our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity, and of the misdemeanors above-mentioned.—And the said Commons by protestation, saving to themselves only the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any other Accusation or Impeachment against the said sir R. Berkley, and also of replying to the Answer that he the said sir R. Berkley shall make to the said Articles, or any of them, or of offering proof of the premises, or any other Impeachments or Accusations that shall be exhibited by them, as the case shall, according to the course of parliaments, require; do pray that the said sir R. Berkley, one of the justices of the court of King's-Bench, may be put to answer to all and every the premises; and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, judgments and executions may be upon every of them had and used, as is agreeable to law and justice.

At the presenting these Articles, Mr. Pierpoint delivered himself as follows:

My lords; I am commanded to present your lordships these Articles, with which the knights, citizens, and burgeses of the Commons house of parliament, in their own name and in the name of all the commons of England, impeach sir R. Berkley, kt. one of the justices of his majesty's court of King's-Bench, in maintenance of their Accusation of High-Treason, and other great misdemeanors; the Articles they desire may be read.

Whereupon the Articles were read by Mr. Francis Newport, a member of the house of commons.

Then Mr. Pierpoint proceeded and said,

The high-treason is in the first article, in his endeavours to subvert the fundamental laws of this realm, and to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical government, which hath been lately adjudged treason in the cause of the earl of Strafford. The other articles prove the first by his opinions, certificates, judgments, by his denials of the benefit of our laws, which have been read by your lordships. No fundamental law to the subjects is left; our goods, our lands, our bodies, the peace of a good conscience, are by him given up to arbitrary tyrannical government. Nothing hath been omitted to make a judge know the laws, to make him just, or fright him from being evil: We have inns of court peculiar to that study, judges from thence only chosen; seldom any but what have been 20 years there; honours and revenues are given to judges, encouragement to do well; this judge had these: judges are sworn according to law to serve the king, and his people: according to law to counsel the king; and for not so doing, to be at his will for body, lands, and goods. This judge took that oath; the laws (the judges study) impose the greatest punishment upon unjust judges; they shew that these punishments have been inflicted, and more could not be done to persuade or fright a judge.

His offences shew in him great ambition, yet he was most timorous of displeasing the great in power; he did not only forbear doing what he was sworn to do, but was most acute against our laws, and in opposing and punishing any that did maintain them. To have only received bribes, (though they blind the eyes, and though the desire to get money increaseth with age) that heinous crime in a judge had been, in comparison with his offences, a tolerable vice; for from such a judge justice is also to be had for money. Ambition is violent, and must whilst covetousness is making a bargain.

The words of his Opinion and Judgment are for the king's power. It is pleasing to the nature of man, that others should obey his will, and well-framed dispositions of princes may easily be persuaded their power is unlimited, when they are also put in mind, that therefore they have more cause to do well, and for doing well are more renowned: for in the most oppressive designs, (which we have suffered under) the pretences of his majesty have ever been the good of his subjects; his is the sin, that is to judge by the laws, and knows the laws are to the contrary, yet puts and confirms such thoughts in his prince. He that incites another to arbitrary government, when his self-ends are thereby compassed, hates him for taking that power he persuaded him unto. The Writs, those monsters of necessity, to provide Ships to avoid imminent danger, that could not stay 40 days for the calling of a parliament, were therefore to go out in September, to have ships ready in March. This hath been adjudged by your lordships to be destructive to the fundamental laws of this realm, and to the subjects right of property and liberty, &c. that I shall say but this concerning them; that this judge published them to be inseparable flowers of the crown; and that we have lived to see for five years together imminent danger, and thus to be prevented.

This judge did advise to such a government, as future kings here might exercise the highest tyranny, and the subjects want the benefit of restraints, known to the most slavish eastern nations; where, if their prince do unjustly, he hath hatred for it, and the dangers that follow that. This judge will have that hatred to go to our good laws: No such bondage, as when the laws of freedom are mis-interpreted by judges to make men slaves.—What can be considered of in a judge of law, to give his opinion and advice to his prince, how the laws (the mutual covenants of kings and subjects) are to be broken, but that his intentions are to have his prince do ill, by making his evil servants to study, and to be pleased with their wicked designs; because they see means to put them in execution, by making them to persuade their prince, because in imminent danger his subjects goods are at his will, that there is such danger when there is not, and that they have only some by-ends of their own?

This judge will have the law to be what to him seems reason: the reason limited to him to judge of, is what the common law saith is so, what a statute hath so enacted. For him to judge this or that is law, else a mischief shall follow, because the law in such a thing is imperfect, therefore he will make a law to supply it; or because that the law written in such particulars is against his reason, therefore his reasons to be law; then must follow, as often as a judge's reason changes, or judges change, our laws change also. Our liberties are in our laws, which a subject may read, or hear read; this is his, this he may do and be safe: and that thus the judge ought to give judgment, and then he is free. The excessive growth of courts of reason and conscience came from great and cunning persons; and though not the most sudden, yet the most dangerous, and sure ways to eat out our laws, our liberties. Unlimited power must be in some to make and repeal laws, to fit the dispositions of times and persons: Nature placeth this in common consent only; and where all cannot conveniently meet, instructeth them to give their consents to some they know or believe so well of, as to be bound to what they agree on. His majesty, your lordships, and the commons, are thus met in parliament; and so long as we are often reduced to this main foundation, our king and we shall prosper.

This judge will not allow us our knowledge, or any reason; he will have our minds, our souls, slaves. A grand-jury-man gave his fellows true information; they present an innovation in church, are threatened and reviled for it; he that told this truth is charged, I shall use this judge's own words, to sin in that, and that he made others forswear themselves; this judge sent him to the common goal, where he is laid in irons; and all this, because he and they durst meddle with church matters. He is forced to tear the presentment in pieces in open court. Our laws provide for the peace of our consciences, many acts of parliament are for it, and the trust by those acts set to juries: this judge well knew all this: your lordships have heard what he did to the jury at Hertford; he would have us know no more divinity than to obey what the chief of the clergy directed, no more law than what he said was so. Judges in former times, except only such as were examples of punishment, as of injustice in cases of great and public concernment, forbear proceedings till the next parliament. This necessitated the calling of parliaments. This judge had as many such causes before him, as ever any had; yet he never desired the resolution of parliament in any one; for the ways he went, the necessity was never to have a parliament; he would pull up that root of our safeties and liberties, which whilst ye enjoy, the malice and injustice of all other courts and persons can never ruin; and when near to ruin, (as most near of late) this only sure remedy will help us; nothing can ruin a parliament, but itself. The evils which we have suffered under, they were committed by the judges: or by them ought to have been, and might have been prevented.

This judge assisted in causing the miseries we suffered in the Star-Chamber, and at the council-table: he denied the known rights, which he ought to have granted us, to stop our grievances in the ecclesiastical courts: he was the causer of our sufferings in other courts. The best lovers of their laws and liberties, the most honest, suffer most by an unjust judge; they most oppose his vices; dishonest persons find such a judge to fit their purposes; the judge finds them for his; the bond of iniquity confederates them. He that will do no wrong, will suffer none which he can help: The man that knows himself born free, will do his utmost to live so, and to leave freedom to his posterity: were he in slavery, when by outward gesture thought to be most delighted, were his mind then known, there would be found vexation, and his busy thoughts employed to redeem himself and his posterity from thralldom. But to say, could this judge intend to make himself and his own posterity slaves? What he did was through error of judgment only. No, my lords; what his aims and endeavours were, is apparent. To consider man in the general, we shall find in every age he will be a slave to some few, that many may be slaves to him, he looks to himself only; this he would do, or forbear doing, to be great, to be rich, had he children or kindred, or had he none. This highly unjust judge, by continuing sins, maintained his actions to preserve himself; he knows, to be found guilty in one of his offences, the penalty of the law for it, therefore covers the offences committed with inventing and acting other. For a judge to be unjust, more hurts the public than any other; he is not suspected. What a judge doth, is looked on as a thing that ought to be done. The most pernicious great man, that by cunning hath got to himself the heart and tongue of his prince, his ill acts have died with him, if not taken up by others, and then they walk in darkness; no man will justify what he doth, by saying such a favourite did it: But the unjust judgments of this judge, were given in noon-day, were done in the face of the whole kingdom, in the hearing of such as might carry the news to all parts of the realm, and was therefore done; his unjust judgments were our records. We have seen wicked great men most craftily politic; they hated our laws, yet not meeting with active judges moulded to their purposes, they and their acts have died, the realm flourished; but of late, others less politic, meeting with most unjust judges, every way as ill as they could wish them to be, then did the kingdom faint, under the load of its misery did long struggle: Now it is rising, I assure myself your lordships will assist to take off the burden.

If the designs of some would not have such a man to be at liberty, a warrant from some lords of the council would soon have laid him in prison, and given no cause; had he moved this judge to be discharged or bailed, he could have obtained neither. If their ways would not have endured that man to live, a judge reviling the prisoner, and the counsel that moved for his discharge or bail, joined with the hate of some great man, might soon have moved a gaoler for unwholesome rooms and lodging, and ill diet for his prisoner, and they may soon take life away. Offenders in prisons are looked after to be safe only; such as are brought in by power against law, are abused. Had a great man desired the estates of others, the breach of a proclamation might readily have been charged against them in Star-Chamber; but they, it may be, could have answered and cleared themselves, and proved their answer by testimonies: had they been referred to this judge, he would have expunged the one, suppressed the other. Then followed fines to the value of their estates, or more; then imprisonment of course, till they paid such fines; your lordships have heard what this judge did to the Soap-boilers. The countryman followed the plough, and to his thinking he was assured of his right, property, and liberty, which gave him ability to do it. He believed his neighbour, his landlord, his king, could not take his goods from him without his consent. He knew the usual payments by law; and in extraordinary causes thought to have that care to chuse such for the knights of his shire, or for his burghesses, as might be mindful of the cause of payment, and of his estate. This countryman hath heard the opinions and judgment of this judge, hath seen his goods taken from him without his, or his knights of the shire, or burghesses consent or advice. These have made him, his wife and children, to join in tears, to wish they had never been born; they have made them think on many ways to keep safe that estate which was yet left them, have made them desire to sell all their goods, and hide the money: but then he remembers this judge, how that he shall be carried to prison, and remain there, if he pay not what it pleases others to assess him. Then they think idle persons (the drones and moths of the commonwealth) to be a wise people, whilst the countrymen expect, and can think of nothing but being beggars. Where public and enormous offences have been committed, eminent and notorious punishments must be: such will make your lordships proceedings highly esteemed; else there will be so many offenders, and none without danger can be punished.

This judge subverting our laws, took away the hearts of many; he subscribes for the king's power, but so as he put him on taking his subjects goods; and of all other, such ways be most dangerous: for we know his majesty is not the last that suffers, and is not the king worth many thousands? The place of this judge was to have given and preserved to the king the hearts of his subjects; the due execution of the laws had done this; and when such notice is taken of a prince, none will conspire against him, who cannot feign to themselves safety before or after any fact committed; foreign enemies will not invade his kingdoms. Thus hath his majesty now got our hearts, and will for ever have them. This judge is to answer for what his majesty, and for what we have suffered.

I am commanded by the house of commons to desire of your lordships, that the proceedings against sir Robert Berkley, kt. one of the justices of his majesty's court of King's-bench, may be put in as speedy a way of trial, as the course of parliament will allow.

At the same time Mr. Hollis made a Speech in behalf of sir Randolph Crew, formerly Lord Chief Justice of the King's-bench, but removed for giving his Opinion against Loan-Money.

My lords; these gentlemen have presented unto your lordships the sad object of justice perverted, liberty oppressed, of judgment turned into wormwood, the laws, which should be the bars of our gates to protect us, keep us, and all that is ours in safety, made weak and impotent, to betray us unto the hands of violence; instead of props to support us, become broken reeds to deceive us, and run into our sides when we lean upon them; even so many snares to entrap and entangle us. And all this by the perfidiousness of those who are intrusted with our laws, who call themselves the guardians and the interpreters of the law; but by their accursed glosses have confounded the text, and made it speak another language, and another sense, than ever our ancestors the law-makers intended.

Our ancestors made laws to keep themselves, and their posterity after them, in the possession of their estates: these judges could make the law itself rob us, and despoil us of our estates. Were we invaded or prosecuted at any time for pretended crimes, or rather because we were free from crimes? And did we put ourselves upon a legal defence, and shelter ourselves under the buckler of the law, use those lawful weapons which justice, and truth, and the common right of the subject did put into our hands, would this avail us? No: these judges would make the law wrest our weapons from us, disarm us, take away all our defence, expunge our answers, even bind us hand and foot, and so expose us naked and bound to the mercilessness of our oppressors. Were our persons forced, and imprisoned by an act of power, would the law relieve us when we appealed unto it? No; it would join hands with violence, and add bitterness to our sorrow. These judges would not hear us when we did cry; no importunity could get a Habeas Corpus: nay, our cries would displease them, and they would beat us for crying; and over-do the unjust judge in the gospel, with whom yet importunity could prevail.

My lords, the commons of England finding themselves in this lamentable condition, by the wickedness of these judges, it is no wonder that we complain of them. It is no wonder if the knights, citizens, and burgeses assembled in parliament, have sent up some of their members to stand upon mount Ebal to curse these judges; to denounce a curse upon them who have removed our land-marks, have taken away the bound-stones of the propriety of the subject, have left us no neum et tum; but he that had most might had most right, and the law was sure to be of his side.—It hath been the part of these gentlemen who have spoken before me, to pray for justice upon those men who would not do justice to others. My lords, I come upon another errand, and yet for justice too; for there is justice upon mount Gerizim, as well as upon mount Ebal. It is a great point of justice to give a blessing, a reward where it is due, as punishment where punishment is due: for reward and punishment, premium et pœna, be the two legs that justice walks on; and reward is her right leg, the more noble and the most glorious supporture of that sacred and divine body, that which God himself, the foundation of justice, doth more delight in.—‘Tardior ad pœnas Deus est, ad pœmia velox.’

Punishment is as good as physic in the consequence, reward as wholesome and nourishing food in the essease, the one we do, because we must do it as necessary; the other, because we love to do it, as being pleasing and delightful.

Your lordships, then, I doubt not, will as willingly join with the commons in doing good to a good judge, as in publishing of the bad.—My lords, We honour them, and reckon them martyrs for the commonwealth, who suffer any thing by defending the common right of the subject, when they will not part with their own goods contrary to law; when indeed their private interest goes along with it, or rather before it; and the public concernment seems to come but in a second place. Such were those many whom these judges have oppressed; yet these men we magnify, and judge worthy of praise and reward. But what honour, then, is he worthy of, who merely for the public hath suffered himself to be divested and deprived of his particular? such a judge as would lose his place, rather than to do that which his conscience told him was prejudicial to the commonwealth? Is not he worthy of double honour?

And this did that worthy reverend judge, the Chief Judge of England at that time, sir Randal Crew. Because he would not, by subscribing, countenance the Loan in the first year of the king, contrary to his oath and conscience, he drew upon himself the displeasure of some great persons about his majesty, who put on that project, which was afterwards condemned by the Petition of Right, in the parliament of tertio, as unjust and unlawful; and by that means he lost his place of Chief-Justice of the King's-bench; and hath these 14 years, by keeping his innocence, lost the profit of that office, which upon a just calculation, in so long a revolution of time, amounts to 26,000*l*, or thereabout. He kept his innocence when others let theirs go; when himself and the commonwealth were alike deserted: which raises his merit to a higher pitch. For to be honest when every body else is honest, when honesty is in fashion, and is trump, as I may say, is nothing so meritorious; but to stand alone in the breach, to own honesty when others dare not do it, cannot be sufficiently applauded, nor sufficiently rewarded. And that did this good old man do; in a time of general desertion he preserved himself pure and untainted.—‘Temporibusque malis ausus is esse bonis.’

My lords, the house of commons are therefore suitors unto your lordships, to join with them in the representation of this good man's case unto his majesty, and humbly to beseech his majesty to be so good and gracious unto him, as to give him such honour (the quality of this case considered) as may be a noble mark of sovereign grace and favour, to remain to him and his posterity; and may be in some measure a proportionable compensation for the great loss he hath with so much patience and resolution sustained.

After the Conference the Lords came to the following Resolutions :

Die Mercur. 20 die Jan. 1640.

It was resolved by the lords upon the question, nem. con. 1. That the Ship-Writs, the extra-judicial Opinions of the Judges therein, both first and last, and the Judgment given in Mr. Hampden's Case, and the proceedings thereupon in the Exchequer-Chamber, are all illegal, and contrary to the laws and statutes of this realm, contrary to the rights and properties of the subjects of this realm, contrary to former judgments in parliaments, and contrary to the Petition of Right.

2. That the extra-judicial Opinions enrolled in the Exchequer-Chamber, and in other Courts concerning Ship-Money, and all the proceedings thereupon, are illegal in part and in whole, and contrary to the laws and statutes of this realm, and contrary to the rights and properties of the subjects of this realm, and contrary to former judgments in parliaments, and contrary to the Petition of Right.

Die Veneris, 26 die Februarii, 1640.

Upon the report of the right honourable the lords committees appointed to consider of the way of vacating of the Judgment in the Exchequer concerning Ship-Money, it was ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in the high court of parliament assembled, That the lord keeper or the master of the rolls, the two lord chief justices, and the lord chief baron, and likewise the chief clerk of the Star-chamber, shall bring into the upper house of parliament the record in the Exchequer of the Judgment in Mr. Hampden's Case concerning Ship-Money; and also the several rolls in each several court of King's-Bench, Common-Pleas, Exchequer, Star-Chamber, and Chancery, wherein the Judges extra-judicial Opinions in the cases made touching Ship-Money be entered; and that a Vacat shall be made in the upper house of parliament of the said several records: and likewise the Judgment of parliament touching the illegality of the said Judgments in the Exchequer, and the proceedings thereupon; and touching the illegality of the extra-judicial Opinions of the Judges in the said several courts concerning Ship-Money, be annexed and apostiled unto the same. And that a copy of the Judgment of the parliament concerning the illegality of the said Judgment in the Exchequer, and the said extra-judicial Opinions of the said Judges concerning Ship-Money, be delivered to the several Judges of Assize; and that they be required to publish the same at the Assizes in each several county within their circuits, and to take care that the same be entered and enrolled by the several clerks of Assizes: and if any entry be made by any Custos Rotulorum, or clerk of Assize, of the said Judgment in the Exchequer, or of the said extra-judicial Opinions of the Judges, that several Vacats be made thereof, 'per judicium in parlamento:' and that an act of parliament be prepared against the said

Judgment and extra-judicial Opinions, and against the proceedings touching Ship-Money.

Memorandum quod vicesimo septimo die Febr. 1640 Annoque regni regis domini nostri Caroli Angliæ decimo sexto;

Vacatur istud recordum et judicium inde habitum per considerationem et judicium dominorum spiritualium et temporalium in curia parliam. et irrotulamentum ejusdem cancellatur.

Memorand' quod vicesimo septimo die Febr. præd.

Istud irrotul. et omnia et singula in eodem contenta et expressa vacantur per judicium dominorum spiritualium et temporalium in curia parliament.

And that all the rolls be rased cross with a pen, and subscribed with the Clerk of the Parliament's hand. All which was accordingly done in open court.

After this it was Resolved upon the question, nem. con. That the Resolutions of the Judges touching the Shipping-Money, and the Judgment given against Mr. Hampden in the Exchequer, and all the proceedings thereupon, are against the Great Charter, and therefore void in law.

That Vacats and cancellations shall be made of the Resolutions of the Judges touching the Shipping-Money; and of the enrolments thereof in the several courts, and of the warrants for Ship-Writs, and proceedings therein; and the Judgment given against Mr. Hampden, and proceedings thereupon; and that entries be made of those Vacats upon the several rolls, according to the form read in the house.

The same session an Act of Parliament passed for that purpose, viz. That the charge imposed upon the subject for providing and furnishing of ships, commonly called Ship-Money, and the extra-judicial Opinions of the justices and barons, and the writs, and every of them, and the agreement or opinion of the greater part of the justices and barons, and the Judgment given against John Hampden, esq. for the payment of Ship-Money, were and are contrary to, and against the laws and statutes of the realm, the right of property, the liberty of the subjects, former resolutions of parliament, and the Petition of Right made in the third year of his majesty that now is.

That all and every the particulars prayed and desired in the Petition of Right, shall from henceforth be put in execution, and shall be firmly and strictly holden and observed, as if the same Petition they are prayed and expressed; and that all and every the records and remembrances of all and every the said Judgments against the said John Hampden, and all and every the proceedings whatsoever upon or by colour of any of the said writs called Ship-Writs, and all and every the dependants on every of them, shall be adjudged to all intents, constructions and purposes, to be utterly void; and that all and every the said Judgments ment, inrolment, entries, proceedings, and dependants of what kind soever shall be vacated and cancelled, in such manner and form as records use to be that are vacated.

Afterwards Articles were exhibited against the other Judges. Those against Mr. Justice Crawley were delivered by Mr. Waller, July 6, 1611, who spoke as follows.

My Lords; I am commanded by the house of commons to present you with these Articles against Mr. Justice Crawley, which when your lordships shall have pleased to hear read, I shall take leave, according to custom, to say something of what I have collected from the sense of that house, concerning the crimes therein contained.

Then the Charge was read, containing his extra judicial Opinions subscribed, and Judgment given for Ship-Money: and after a declaration in his Charge at an Assize, That Ship-Money was so inherent a right in the crown, that it would not be in the power of a parliament to take it away.

My Lords; Not only my wants, but my affections, render me less fit for this employment; for though it has not been my happiness to have the law a part of my breeding, there is no man honours that profession more, or has a greater reverence towards the grave judges, the oracles thereof. Out of parliament, all our courts of justice are governed or directed by them; and when a parliament is called, if your lordships were not assisted by them, and the house of commons by other gentlemen of that robe, experience tells us, it might run a hazard of being styled Parliamentum indoctorum. But as all professions are obnoxious to the malice of the professors, and by them most easily betrayed; so, my lords, these articles have told you, how these brothers of the coil are become fratres in malo; how these sons of the law have torn out the bowels of their mother: but the judge, whose charge you last heard, in one expression of his, excels no less his fellows, than they have done the worst of their predecessors, in this conspiracy against the commonwealth. Of the judgment for Ship-Money, and those extra-judicial opinions preceding the same, (wherein they are jointly concerned) you have already: how unjust and pernicious a proceeding that was, in so public a cause, has been sufficiently expressed to your lordships: but this man adding despair to our misery, tells us from the bench, That Ship-Money was a right so inherent in the crown, that it would not be in the power of any act of parliament to take it away. Herein, my lords, he did not only give as deep a wound to the commonwealth as any of the rest, but dipped his dart in such a poison, that, so far as in him lay, it might never receive a cure. As by those abortive opinions, subscribing to the subversion of our property, before he heard what could be said for it, he prevented his own; so by this declaration of his, he endeavours to prevent the judgment of your lordships too, and to confine the power of a parliament, the only place where this mischief might be redressed. Sure he is more wise and learned, than to believe himself in this opinion, or not to know how ridiculous it would appear to a parliament, and how dangerous to himself: and therefore, no doubt, but by saying no parliament could abolish this judgment, his meaning was, That this judgment had abolished parliaments.

This imposition of Ship-Money springing from a pretended necessity, was it not enough that it was now grown annual, but he must entail it upon the state for ever; making necessity inherent to the crown, and slavery to the subject? Necessity, which, dissolving all law, is so much more prejudicial to his majesty than to any of us, by how much the law has invested the royal state with a greater power and ample fortune: For so undoubted a truth it has ever been, that kings as well as subjects are involved in the confusion which necessity produces, that the heathen thought their gods also obliged by the same: 'Pareamus necessitati, quam nec homines nec dii superant.' This judge then having in his charge at the assize declared the dissolution of the law, by this supposed necessity; with what conscience could he, at the same assize, proceed to condemn and punish men, unless, perhaps, he meant the law was still in force for our destruction, and not for our preservation? that it should have power to kill, and none to protect us? A thing no less horrid, than if the sun should burn without lighting us, or the earth serve only to bury, and not to feed and nourish us. But, my lords, to demonstrate that it was a supposititious, imposed necessity, and such as they could remove when they pleased; at the last convention in parliament, a price was set upon it, for twelve subsidies you may reverse this sentence. It may be said, that so much money would have removed the present necessity; for twelve subsidies you shall never suffer necessity again, you shall for ever abolish that judgment. Here this mystery is revealed, this vizard of necessity is pulled off; and now it appears, that this parliament of judges hath very frankly and bountifully presented his majesty with twelve subsidies, to be levied on your lordships and the commons. Certainly there is no privilege, which more properly belongs to us, than to open the purse of a subject; and yet these judges, who are neither capable of sitting amongst us in the house of commons, nor with your lordships otherwise than your assistants, have not only assumed to themselves the privilege of parliament, but presumed at once to make a present to the crown of all that either your lordships or the commons of England do or shall hereafter possess.

And because this man has had the boldness to put the power of parliament in balance with the opinion of the judges, I shall intreat your lordships to observe, by way of comparison, the solemn and safe proceeding of the one, with the precipitate dispatch of the other. In parliament (as your lordships know well) no new law can pass, or old be abrogated, till it ha been thrice read with your lordships, thrice in the commons house, then it receives the royal assent; so that it is like gold seven times purified: Whereas these judges, by this one resolution of theirs, would persuade his majesty, that by naming necessity, he might at once dissolve (at least suspend) the Great Charter, thirty-two times confirmed by his royal progenitors, the Petition of Right, and all other laws provided for the maintenance of the right and property of the subject. A strange force, my lords, in the sound of this word necessity, that like a charm it should silence the laws, while we are despoiled of all we have; for that but a part of our goods was taken, was owing to the grace and goodness of the king: for so much as concerns these judges, we have no more left than they perhaps may deserve to have, when your lordships shall have passed judgment upon them for this neglect of their oaths, and betraying that public trust, which, for the conservation of our laws, was reposed in them.

Now, for the cruelty and unmercifulness of this judgment, you may please to remember, that in the old law they are forbid to see the a kid in his mother's milk; of which the received interpretation is, That we should not use that to the destruction of any creature, which was intended for its preservation. Now, my lords, God and nature have given us the sea, as our best guard against our enemies; and our ships, as our greatest glory above other nations: And how barbarously would these men have let in the sea upon us at once, to wash away our liberties; and to overwhelm, if not our land, all the property we have therein, making the supply of our navy a pretence for the ruin of our nation! For observe, I beseech you, the fruit and consequence of this judgment, how this money has prospered, how contrary an effect it has had to the end for which they pretended to take it. On every county a ship is annually imposed; and who would not expect, but our seas by this time should be covered by the number of our ships? Alas! my lords, the daily complaints of the decay of our navy tell us, how ill Ship-Money has maintained the sovereignty of the sea; and by the many petitions which we receive from the wives of those miserable captives at Algiers (being between four and five thousand of our countrymen) it does too evidently appear, that to make us slaves at home is not the way to keep us from being made slaves abroad. So far has this judgment been from relieving the present, or preventing the future necessity, that as it changed our real property into a shadow of a property, so of a feigned it is made a real necessity.

A little before the approach of the Gauls to Rome, while the Romans had yet no apprehension of that danger, there was heard a voice in the air, louder than ordinary, The Gauls are come; which cry, after they had sacked the city and besieged the capitol, was held so ominous, that Livy * relates it as a prodigy. This anticipation of necessity seems to have been no less ominous to us: These Judges, like ill-boding birds, have called necessity upon the state, in a time which, I dare say, they thought themselves in greatest security. But if it seem superstitious to take this as an omen, sure I am we may look on it as a cause of the unfeigned necessity we now suffer: For what regret and discontent had this Judgment bred among us? And as when the noise and tumult in a private house grows so loud as to be heard in the streets, it calls in the next dwellers, either kindly to appease, or to make their own use of domestic strife; so in all likelihood, our known discontentments at home have been a concurrent cause to invite our neighbours to visit us, so much to the expence and trouble of both these kingdoms.

And here, my Lords, I cannot but take notice of the most sad effect of this Oppression, the ill influence it has had upon the ancient reputation and valour of the English nation: And no wonder; for if it be true, that oppression makes a wise man mad, it may well suspend the courage of the valiant. The same happened to the Romans, when, for renown in arms, they most excelled the rest of the world; the story is but short. It was in the time of the Decemviri (and I think the chief troublers of our state may make up that number.) The Decemviri, my lords, had subverted the Laws, suspended the Courts of Justice, and (which was the greatest Grievance both to the nobility and people) had, for some time, omitted to assemble the Senate, which was their Parliament: This, says the Historian, did not only deject the Romans, and make them despair of their liberty, but caused them to be less valued by their neighbours. The Sabines take the advantage, and invade them; and now the Decemviri are forced to call a long-desired Senate, whereof the people were so glad, that 'Hostibus belloque gratiam habuerunt.' This Assembly breaks up in discontent, nevertheless the war proceeds; Forces are raised, led by some of the Decemviri; and with the Sabines they meet in the field. I know your lordships expect the event: My Author's words of his countrymen are these: 'Ne quid ductu aut auspicio decemvirorum prospere gereretur, vinci se patiebantur?' they chose rather to suffer a present diminution of their honour, than by victory to confirm the tyranny of their new masters. At their return from their unfortunate Expedition, after some distempers and expostulations of the people, another Senate, that is, a second parliament, is called; and there the Decemviri are questioned, deprived of their authority, imprisoned, banished, and some lose their lives: And soon after this vindication of their Liberties, the Romans, by their better success, made it appear to the world, that liberty and courage dwell always in the same breast, and are never to be divorced. No doubt, my lords, but your justice shall have the like effect upon this dispirited people. It is not the restitution of our ancient laws alone, but the restoration of our ancient courage, which is expected from your lordships. I need not say any thing to move your just indignation, that this man should so cheaply give away that which your noble ancestors, with so much courage and industry, had so long maintained. You have often been told how careful they were, though with the hazard of their lives and fortunes, to derive those Rights and Liberties as entire to posterity as they received them from their fathers; what they did with labour, you may do with ease; what they did with danger, you may do securely. The foundation of our laws is not shaken with the engine of War; they are only blasted with the breath of these men, and by your breath they may be restored.

What Judgment your predecessors have given, and what punishments their predecessors have suffered for offences of this nature, your lordships have already been so well informed, I shall not trouble you with a repetition of those precedents. Only, my lords, something I shall take leave to observe of the person with whose charge I have presented you, that you may the less doubt of the wilfulness of this offence.—His education in the Inns of Court, his constant practice as a Counsellor, and experience as a Judge, considered with the mischief he has done, makes it appear that this progress of his through the law has been like that of a diligent spy through a country into which he meant to conduct an enemy.

To let you see he did not offend for company, there is one crime so peculiar to himself, and of such malignity, that it makes him at once incapable of your lordships favour, and his own subsistence incompatible with the right and property of the Subject. For if you leave him in a capacity of interpreting the laws; has he not declared his Opinion, That your Votes and Resolutions against Ship-Money are void, and that it is not in the power of parliament to abolish that Judgment? To him, my lords, that has thus played with the power of parliament, we may well apply what was once said to a goat browsing on a vine:

‘ Rode, caper, vitem, tamen hinc cum stabis
ad aras,
‘ In tua quod fundi cornua possit, erit.’

He has cropt and infringed the Privileges of a banished parliament; but now it is returned, he may find it has power enough to make a sacrifice of him, to the better establishment of our laws: and in truth, what other satisfaction can he make his injured country, than to confirm, by his example, those Rights and Liberties which he had ruined by his opinion? For the Proofs, my lords, they are so manifest, that they will give you little trouble in the disquisition; his crimes are already upon record; the delinquent and the witness is the same; having from several seats of judicature proclaimed himself an enemy to our laws and nation, ‘ ex ore suo judicabitur.’ To which purpose I am commanded by the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the house of commons, to desire your lordships, that a speedy proceeding may be had against Mr. Justice Crawley, as the course of parliament will permit.

Vobis etiam mittimus præsentibus interclaus', mandantes, quod inspectis brevibus et certificat' præd', ulterius inde pro levatione, collectione, et receptione omnium et singularum præd' denar' summar' de præd' contributionibus adhuc non solut', fieri fac', prout de jure et secundum legem et consuetudinem regni nostr' Angliæ fuerit faciend'. Teste meipso apud Westm' quinto die Maii, anno regni nostri tertio decimo. EYRE. Sicut in eisdem brevibus, et schedul' eisd' annex' in Scaccar' dicti dom' regis certificat', et ibidem in custod' Memorator' ejusd' dom' regis de record' remanen' plenius continetur. Quibus lectis, auditis, et per ipsum intellectis, idem Johannes queritur, se colore separal' brev', return' eorund', et schedul' eisd' annexat', graviter vexat' fore et inquietat', et hoc minus juste; quia dicit, quod præd' separal' breviam superius mentionat', return' eorund', et schedul' eisdem annexat', materia in eisd' content', minus sufficien' in lege existant ad onerand' ipsum Johannem Hampden de aut cum solutione præd' summ' vigint' solid' super ipsum in schedul' præd', modo et forma præd', taxat' et assessat', aut alicujus inde parcell', ad que ipse necesse non habet, nec per legem terr' tenetur respondere. Unde ob insufficien' præd' separal' brevium superius mentionat', return' eorund', schedul' eisdem annex', ac materia in eisdem brevibus ac schedul' content', ipse idem Johannes Hampden petit judicium, si dictus dominus rex nunc ipsum de præd' vigint' solid', aut aliqua inde parcell', ulterius impetere, seu onerare debeat aut velit.

ROBERT HOLBORNE.

Et Johannes Banks mil' Attorn' dom' regis nunc general', qui pro eodem domino rege sequitur, præsens hic in cur' ad eund' diem in propria persona sua, dicit, quod præd' separal' breviam, et return' eorund', ac schedul' præd' eisdem annex', materia; in eisdem content', sufficien' in lege existunt ad præd' Johan' Hampden de præd' vigint' solid' super ipsum in forma et ex causa præd' assessat' onerand': quam quidem materiam ipse dictus Attornat' dicti dom' regis general', pro eodem dom' rege paratus est verificare; quamq' materiam præd' Johannes Hampden non didicit, nec ad eam aliquammodo respondit, sed verificationem illam admittere omnino recusat: pro eodem dom' rege idcirco petit judicium, et quod præd' Johannes Hampden de eisd' vigint' solid' oneretur, et inde satisfaciatur, &c.

Ideo considerat' est per eosd' barones, quod præd' Johannes Hampden de eisd' vinct' solid' oneretur, et exinde satisfaciatur, &c.

148. The Trial of JOHN LILBURN and JOHN WHARTON, for Printing and Publishing Seditious Books. In the Star-Chamber: 13 CHARLES I. A. D. 1637. [Written by John Lilburn.]

BEFORE the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury; the Lord-Keeper, lord Coventry; the Lord-Treasurer, bishop of London; the lord Privy-Seal, earl of Manchester; the Earl-Marshal, earl of Arundel; the earl of Salisbury; the earl of Dorset; lord Cottington; lord Newburgh; Lord Chief-Justice Bramston; sir Henry Vane; Mr. Secretary Cooke; Mr. Secretary Windebank; Judge Jones, and others.

Upon Tuesday the 11th or 12th Dec. 1637, I was treacherously and Judasly betrayed (by one that I supposed to be my friend) into the hands of the pursuivant, with four of his assistants, as I was walking in Soperlane with one

John Chilburne, servant to old Mr. John Wharton, in Bow-lane, a hot-presser. And about twelve of the clock the next day, I was committed to the Gate-house, by sir John Lamb, the prelate of Canterbury's chancellor, with others, without any examination at all, for sending of factious and scandalous Books out of Holland into England. And having not been at the foresaid prison above three days, I was removed, by a warrant from the Lords of the Council, to the Fleet, where I now remain. And after my being there some time, I drew a Petition to the Lords of the Council for my liberty; and their Answer to it was, that I should be examined before sir John Banks, the king's Attorney: The copy of which Examination thus follows.

Upon Tuesday the 14th Jan. 1637, I was had to sir John Banks the Attorney-General's chamber, (now Lord Chief-Justice of the Court of Pleas) and was referred to be examined by Mr. Cockshey his chief clerk; and at our first coming together, he did kindly intreat me, and made me sit down by him, and put on my hat, and began with me after this manner; Mr. Lilburn, what is your Christian name? I said John.—Did you live in London before you went into Holland? Yes, that I did.—Where? Near London-stone.—With whom there? With Mr. Thomas Hewson.—What trade is he? A dealer in cloth, I told him.—How long did you serve him? About five years.—How came you to part? After this manner: I perceiving my master had an intention to leave off his trade, I often moved him that I might have my liberty, to provide for myself, and at the last he condescended unto it: and so I went into the country, to have the consent of my friends; and after that went into Holland.—Where were you there? At Rotterdam.—And from thence you went to Amsterdam? Yes, I was at Amsterdam.—What books did you see in Holland? Great store of books, for in every bookseller's shop as I came in, there were great store of books.—I know that, but I ask you, if you did see Dr. Bastwick's Answer to my master's Information, and a Book called his Litany? Yes, I saw them there; and if you please to go thither, you may buy an hundred of them at the booksellers, if you have a mind to them.—Have you seen the "Unbishopsing of Timothy and Titus," the "Looking-glass," and a "Breviat of the Bishop's late Proceedings"? Yes, I have, and those also you may have there, if you please to send for them.—Who printed all those books? I do not know.—Who was at the charges of printing them? Of that I am ignorant.—But did you not send over some of these books? I sent not any of them over.—Do you know one Hargust there? Yes, I did see such a man.—Where did you see him? I met with him one day accidentally at Amsterdam.—How oft did you see him there? Twice upon one day.—But did not he send over books? If he did, it is nothing to me, for his doings are unknown to me.—But he wrote a letter, by your directions, did he not? What he writ over I know no more than you.—But did you see him no where else there? Yes, I saw him at Rotterdam.—What conference had you with him? Very little: but why do you ask me all these questions? these are beside the matter of my imprisonment; I pray come to the thing for which I am accused, and imprisoned.—No, these are not beside the business, but do belong to the thing for which you are imprisoned.

But do you know of any that sent over any books? What other men did, doth not belong to me to know or search into; sufficient it is for me to look well to my own occasions.—Well, here is the Examination of one Edmund

Chillington, do you know such a one? Yes.—How long have you been acquainted with him? A little before I went away, but how long, I do not certainly know.—Do you know one John Wharton? No.—Do you not? he is a hot-presser.—I know him, but I do not well remember his other name.—How long have you been acquainted with him, and how came you acquainted? I cannot well tell you.—How long do you think? I do not know.—What speeches had you with Chillington since you came to town? I am not bound to tell you: but sir (as I said before) why do you ask me all these questions? these are nothing pertinent to my imprisonment, for I am not imprisoned for knowing and talking with such and such men, but for sending over Books; and therefore I am not willing to answer you to any more of these questions, because I see you go about by this Examination to ensnare me: for seeing the things for which I am imprisoned cannot be proved against me, you will get other matter out of my examination: and therefore if you will not ask me about the thing laid to my charge, I shall answer no more: but if you will ask of that, I shall then answer you, and do answer that for the thing for which I am imprisoned, which is for sending over books, I am clear, for I sent none; and of any other matter that you have to accuse me of, I know it is warrantable by the law of God, and I think by the law of the land, that I may stand upon my just defence, and not answer to your interrogatories; and that my accusers ought to be brought face to face, to justify what they accuse me of. And this is all the answer that for the present I am willing to make: and if you ask me of any more things, I shall answer you with silence.—At this he was exceeding angry, and said, there would be a course taken with me to make me answer. I told him, I did not regard what course they would take with me; only this I desire you to take notice of, that I do not refuse to answer out of any contempt, but only because I am ignorant of what belongs to an Examination, (for this is the first time that ever I was examined;) and therefore I am unwilling to answer to any impertinent questions, for fear that with my answer I may do myself hurt.—This is not the way to get liberty: I had thought you would have answered punctually, that so you might have been dispatched as shortly as might be. I have answered punctually to the thing for which I am imprisoned and more I am not bound to answer, and for my liberty I must wait God's time.—You had better answer, for I have two Examinations wherein you are accused. Of what am I accused?—Chillington hath accused you for printing ten or twelve thousand of books in Holland, and that they stand you in about 80*l*. and that you had a chamber at Mr. John Foot's at Delft, where he thinks the books were kept, and that you would have printed the "Unmasking of the Mystery of Iniquity," if you could have got a true copy of it. I do not believe that Chillington said any such things; and if he did, I know and am sure, that they are all of them lies.—You received money of Mr. Wharton since you came to town, did you not? What if I did?—It was for books? I do not say so.—For what sort of books was it? I do not say it was for any, and I have already answered you all that for the present I have to answer; and if that will give you content, well and good; if not, do what you please.—If you will not answer no more (here I told him, if I had thought he would have insisted upon such impertinent questions, I would not have given him so many answers) we have power to send you to the place from whence you came. You may do your pleasure, said I.—So he called in anger for my keeper, and gave him a strict charge to look well to me. I said, they should not fear my running away. And so I was sent down to sir John Banks himself. And after he had read over what his man had writ, he called me in, and said, I perceive you are unwilling to confess the truth.

Lilburn. No, sir, I have spoken the truth. Sir John Banks. This is your Examination is it not? What your man hath writ, I do not know.—Come near, and see that I read it right. Sir, I do not own it for my Examination, for your man hath writ what it pleased him, and hath not writ my answer; for my answer was to him, and so it is to you, that for the thing for which I am imprisoned (which is for sending over Books) I am clear, for I did not send any, and for any other matter that is laid to my charge, I know it is warrantable by the law of God, and I think by the law of the land, for me to stand upon my just defence, and that my accusers ought to be brought face to face, to justify what they accuse me of: and this is all that I have to say for the present.—You must set your hand to this your Examination. I beseech you, sir, pardon me, I will set my hand to nothing but what I have now said.—So he took the pen and writ, ‘The examined is unwilling to answer to any thing but that for which he is imprisoned.’ Now you will set your hand to it; I am not willing, in regard I do not own that which your man hath writ; but if it please you to lend me the pen, I will write my answer, and set my hand to it. So he gave me the pen, and I began to write thus: ‘The Answer of me, John Lilburn, is,’ and here he took the pen from me, and said he could not stay, that was sufficient. Then one of my keepers asked him if they might have me back again? And he said yea; for he had no order for my enlargement.

And about ten or twelve days after, I was had forth to Grays-Inn again; and when I came there, I was had to the Star-Chamber office; and being there, as the order is, I must enter my appearance, they told me. I said, To what? For I was never served with any subpoena; neither was there any bill preferred against me, that I did hear of. One of the clerks told me, I must first be examined, and then sir John would make the bill. It seems they had no grounded matter against me for to write a bill, and therefore they went about to make me betray my own innocency, that so they might ground the bill upon my own words: and at the entrance of my appearance, the clerk and I had a deal of discourse, (the particulars whereof for brevity sake I now omit;) but in the conclusion he demanded money of me, for entering of my appearance: and I told him I was but a young man, and a prisoner, and money was not very plentiful with me, and therefore I would not part with any money upon such terms. Well (said he) if you will not pay your fee, I will dash out your name again. Do what you please (said I) I care not if you do; so he made complaint to Mr. Goad, the master of the office, that I refused to enter my appearance. And then I was brought before him, and he demanded of me what my business was? I told him, I had no business with him, but I was a prisoner in the Fleet, and was sent for, but to whom and to what end I do not know, and therefore if he had nothing to say to me, I had no business with him. And then one of the clerks said, I was to be examined. Then Mr. Goad said, tender him the book: so I looked another way, as though I did not give ear to what he said; and then he bid me pull off my glove, and lay my hand upon the book. What to do, sir? said I. You must swear, said he. To what? ‘That you shall make true answer to all things that are asked you.’ Must I so, sir? but before I swear, I will know to what I must swear. As soon as you have sworn, you shall, but not before.—To that I answered, sir, I am but a young man, and do not well know what belongs to the nature of an oath, and therefore before I swear, I will be better advised.—Saith he, how old are you? About 20 years old, I told him.—You have received the Sacrament, have you not? Yes, that I have.—And you have heard the ministers deliver God’s word, have you not? I have heard sermons. Well then, you know the holy Evangelists? Yes, that I do.—But, sir, though I have received the Sacrament, and have heard sermons, yet it doth not therefore follow that I am bound to take an oath, which I doubt of the lawfulness of.—Look you here, said he (and with that he opened the book), we desire you to swear by no foreign thing, but to swear by the holy Evangelists.—Sir, I do not doubt or question that; I question how lawful it is for me to swear to I do not know what.—So some of the clerks began to reason with me, and told me every one took that oath: and would I be wiser than all other men? I told them, it made no matter to me what other men do; but before I swear, I will know better grounds and reasons than other men’s practices, to convince me of the lawfulness of such an oath, to swear I do not know to what.—So Mr. Goad bid them hold their peace, he was not to convince any man’s conscience of the lawfulness of it, but only to offer and tender it. Will you take it or no, saith he? Sir, I will be better advised first: Whereupon there was a messenger sent to sir John Banks, to certify him, that I would not take the Star-Chamber oath; and also to know of him what should be done with me. So I looked I should be committed close prisoner, or worse. And about an hour after came Mr. Cockshay, sir John's chief clerk; What, said he, Mr. Lilburn, it seems you will not take your Oath, to make true answer? I told him, I would be better advised before I took such an oath. Well then, saith he, you must go from whence you came.

Upon Friday the 9th of February, in the morning, one of the officers of the Fleet came to my chamber, and bid me get up and make me ready to go to the Star-Chamber-Bar forthwith. I having no time to fit myself, made me ready in all haste to go. And being at the bar, sir John Banks laid a verbal accusation against me; which was, that I refused to answer, and also to enter my appearance, and that I refused to take the Star-Chamber oath: and then was read the affidavit of one Edmond Chillington, button-seller, made against Mr. John Wharton and myself: the sum of which was, that he and I had printed at Rotterdam, in Holland, Dr. Bastwick's answer, and his Litany, and divers other scandalous Books. And then after I obtained leave to speak, I said, My noble lords, as for that affidavit, it is a most false lye and untrue.

Lord-Keeper. Why will you not answer?

Lilburn. My honourable lord, I have answered fully before sir John Banks to all things that belong to me to answer unto: and for other things, which concern other men, I have nothing to do with them.—But why do you refuse to take the Star-Chamber oath? Most noble lord, I refused upon this ground, because that when I was examined, though I had fully answered all things that belonged to me to answer unto, and had cleared myself of the thing for which I am imprisoned, which was for sending Books out of Holland, yet that would not satisfy and give content, but other things were put unto me, concerning other men, to insnare me, and get further matter against me; which I perceiving refused, being not bound to answer to such things as do not belong unto me. And withal I perceived the oath to be an oath of inquiry; and for the lawfulness of which oath, I have no warrant; and upon these grounds I did and do still refuse the oath.—Upon this some of the king's counsel and some of the lords spoke; Would I condemn and contradict the laws of the land, and be wiser than all other men to refuse that which is the oath of the court, administered unto all that come there?

Lord Keeper. Well; tender him the book.—I standing against the prelate of Canterbury's back, he looked over his shoulder at me, and bid me pull off my glove, and lay my hand upon the book. Unto whom I replied, Sir, I will not swear; and then directing my speech unto the lords, I said, Most honourable and noble lords, with all reverence and submission unto your honours, submitting my body unto your lordships pleasure, and whatsoever you please to inflict upon it, yet must I refuse the oath.

My Lords, said the Arch Prelate, (in a deriding manner) do you hear him? he saith, with all reverence and submission he refuseth the oath.

Well, come, come, (said my Lord Keeper), submit yourself unto the court.

Lilburn. Most noble lords, with all willingness, I submit my body unto your honours pleasure; but for any other submission, most honourable lords, I am conscious unto myself, that I have done nothing that doth deserve a convention before this illustrious assembly; and therefore for me to submit is to submit I do not know wherefore.

Earl of Dorset. My lords, this is one of their private spirits; do you hear him, how he stands in his own justification? Well, my lords, said the great prelate, this fellow (meaning me) hath been one of the notorious dispersers of libellous Books that is in the kingdom; and that is the father of them all (pointing to old Mr. Wharton).

Lilburn. Sir, I know you are not able to prove, and to make that good which you have said.—I have testimony of it, said he. Then, said I, produce them in the face of the open court, that we may see what they have to accuse me of; and I am ready here to answer for myself, and to make my just defence.—With this he was silent, and said not one word more to me; and then they asked my fellow soldier, old Mr. Wharton, whether he would take the Oath; which he refused, and began to tell them of the Bishop's cruelty towards him; and that they had had him in five several prisons within these two years, for refusing the Oath.—And then there was silence; after which was read how the court had proceeded against some that had harboured Jesuits and Seminary-priests (those traitors) who refused to be examined upon oath; and in regard that we refused likewise to be examined upon oath, it was fit, they said, that we should be proceeded against, as they were. So they were the precedent by which we were censured, though their cause and ours be much unlike, in regard theirs were little better than treason; but our crime was so far from treason that it was neither against the glory of God, the honour of the king, the laws of the land, nor the good of the commonwealth: but rather for the maintaining of the honour of them all, as all those that read the books without partial affections and prejudicate hearts can witness and declare; and if the books had had any treason, or any thing against the law of the land in them, yet we were but supposedly guilty; for the things were never fully proved against us. Indeed there were two Oaths read in court, which they said were sworn against us by one man, but he was never brought face to face, and in both his oaths he hath forsworn himself, as in many particulars thereof we are both able to make good.—In the conclusion, my Lord Keeper stood up, and said, My Lords, I hold it fit, that they should be both for their contempt committed close prisoners till Tuesday next; and if they do not conform themselves betwixt this and then to take the Oath, and yield to be examined before Mr. Goad, then that they shall be brought hither again, and censured, and made an example. Unto which they all agreed; and so we were committed close prisoners, and no friends admitted to come unto us.

‘ Upon Information this day to this honourable court, by sir John Banks, knight, his majesty’s Attorney General, That John Lilburn and John Wharton, who are now at the bar of this court, were the 24th of January last ordered to be examined upon Interrogatories touching their unlawful printing, publishing, and dispersing of libellous and seditious Books, contrary to the decree of this Court, which was verified by affidavit: and being brought up to the office to appear and be examined accordingly, the said Lilburn refused to appear, and both of them denied to take an Oath to make answer to Interrogatories, as appears by Certificate of Mr. Goad: it was humbly prayed: that their appearance may be recorded, the being now present in court, and that they may now have their oaths tendered unto them; which if they shall refuse to take, that then this court will proceed to a censure against them for their high contempt therein, as hath been used in like cases, which the court held fit: and hath therefore ordered, That their appearance shall be recorded, as is desired. And for that the said Delinquents do now again most contemptuously refuse to take their Oaths now tendered to them in open court, their lordships have further ordered, That the said Lilburn and Wharton shall be remanded to the prison of the Fleet, there to remain close prisoners until they conform themselves in obedience to take their oaths, and be examined; and that unless they do take their oaths, and yield to be examined by Monday night next, their lordships will, on the last sitting of this term, proceed to censure against them for their contempts therein, as is desired.’

And upon Monday after we were had to Gray’s-Inn, and I being the first there, Mr. Goad said to me, according to the lords order upon Friday last, I have sent for you to tender the Oath unto you.—Sir, I beseech you, let me hear the lords order. So he caused it to be read unto me, and then tendered me the book. Well, sir, said I, I am of the same mind I was; and withal I understand, that this Oath is one and the same with the High Commission Oath, which Oath I know to be both against the law of God, and the law of the land; and therefore in brief I dare not take the oath, though I suffer death for the refusal of it. Well, said he, I did not send for you to dispute with you about the lawfulness of it, but only according to my place to tender it unto you.—Sir, I dare not take it, though I lose my life for the refusal of it. So he said, he had no more to say to me; and I took my leave of him, and came away. And after that, came the old man, Mr. Wharton, and it was tendered unto him, which he refused to take: and, as he hath told me, he declared unto him how the bishops had him eight times in prison for the refusal of it, and he had suffered the bishops merciless cruelty for many years together, and he would now never take it as long as he lived; and withal told him, that if there were a cart ready at the door to carry him to Tyburn, he would be hanged, before ever he would take it. And this was that day’s business.

Upon the next morning, Feb. 13, about seven a-clock, we were had to the Star-Chamber Bar again, to receive our Censure; and stood at the bar about two hours before sir John Banks came: but at last he began his accusation against us, that we did still continue in our former stubbornness. And also there was another Affidavit of the foresaid Edmund Chillington’s read against us; the sum of which was, that I had confessed to him, that I had printed Dr. Bastwick’s “Answer to sir John Banks’s Information,” and his “Litany,” and another Book, “An Answer unto certain Objections;” and another Book of his called, “The Vanity and Impiety of the old Litany;” and that I had divers other books of Dr. Bastwick’s a-printing. And that Mr. John Wharton had been at the charges of printing a Book called, “A Breviate of the Bishops late Proceedings;” and another Book, called “Sixteen new Queries;” and divers other factious Books: and that one James Ouldham, a turner in Westminster-hall, had dispersed divers of these Books. Then I said after this manner: Most noble lords, I beseech your honours, that you would be pleased to give me leave to speak for myself, and to make my just defence; and I shall labour so to order my speeches, that I shall not give your honours any just distaste; and withal shall do it with as much brevity as I can. So having obtained my desire, I began and said, My lords, it seems there were divers Books sent out of Holland, which came to the hands of one Edmund Chillington, who made this Affidavit against us; and, as I understand, he delivered divers of these Books unto one John Chilburne, servant to this old man Mr. Wharton; and his master being in prison, he dispersed divers of them for the foresaid Chillington’s use; whereupon the Books were taken in his custody: he being found dispersing of them, goes to one Smith, a taylor, in Bridewell, (as I am informed) and desires him to get his peace made with the bishops. Whereupon he covenants with some of the bishops creatures to betray me into their hands, being newly come out of Holland, which, (as he said) did send over these Books. So, my lords, he having purchased his own liberty, lays the plot for betraying me, and I was taken by a pursuivant and four others of his assistants, walking in the streets with the foresaid John Chilburne, who had laid and contrived the plot before (as I am able to make good); and the next morning I was committed by sir John Lamb to the Gate-house. Now, my lords, I do protest before your honours on the word of a Christian, that I did not send over these Books, neither did I know the ship that brought them, nor any that belongs to the ship, nor to my knowledge did never see with my eyes, either the ship, or any that belongs unto it.—And being at the Gate-house, I was removed (by six of your honours) to the Fleet, at which time the said Chillington was removed from Bridewell to Newgate; and being kept close there, he, by their threats and persuasions, and the procuring of his own liberty, goes and accuses me for printing ten or twelve thousand Books in Holland. And at my examination before sir John Banks, I cleared myself of that; and upon Friday last he made an Affidavit against me, in which he hath most falsely sworn himself, and to-day he hath made another, which is also a most false untruth: and withal, my lords, he is known to be a notorious lying fellow, and hath accused me for the purchasing of his own liberty, which he hath got. And therefore, I beseech your honours, to take it into your serious consideration, whether I am to be censured upon such a fellow's Affidavit or no.

Then said the Lord-Keeper, Thou art a mad fellow, seeing things are thus, that thou wilt not take thine Oath, and answer truly.

My honourable lord, I have declared unto you the real truth; but for the oath, it is an oath of inquiry, and of the same nature as the High-Commission Oath; which oath I know to be unlawful; and withal I find no warrant in the Word of God for an oath of inquiry, and it ought to be the director of me in all things that I do: and therefore, my lords, at no hand, I dare not take the oath. (When I named the Word of God, the court began to laugh, as though they had had nothing to do with it.) My lords (said Mr. Goad) he told me yesterday, he durst not take the oath, though he suffered death for the refusal of it. And with that my Lord Privy-Seal spoke: Will you (said he) take your oath, that that which you have said is true? My lord (said I) I am but a young man, and do not well know what belongs to the nature of an oath, (but that which I have said, is a real truth) but thus much; by God's appointment, I know an oath ought to be the end of all controversy and strife, Heb. 6, 16. and if it might be so in this my present cause, I would safely take my oath, that what I have said is true. So they spoke to the old man, my fellow-partner, and asked him whether he would take the oath? So he desired them to give him leave to speak; and he began to thunder it out against the Bishops, and told them, they required three oaths of the king's subjects; namely, the oath of Churchwardenship, and the oath of Canonical Obedience, and the oath ex officio; which (said he) are all against the law of the land, and by which they deceive and perjure thousands of the king's subjects in a year. And withal, my lords, (said he) there is a maxim in divinity, that we should prefer the glory of God, and the good of our king and country, before our own lives. But the Lords wondering to hear the old man begin to talk after this manner, commanded him to hold his peace, and to answer them, whether he would take the oath or no? To which he replied, and desired them to let him talk a little, and he would tell them by and bye. At which all the court burst out a-laughing; but they would not let him go on, but commanded silence (which if they would have let him proceed, he would have so peppered the Bishops, as they were never in their lives in an open court of judicature.) So they asked us again, whether we would take the oath? Which we both again refused; and withal I told them, that for the reasons before I durst not take it. Then they said, they would proceed to censure. I bid them do as they pleased, for I knew myself innocent of the thing for which I was imprisoned and accused; but yet, notwithstanding, did submit my body to their honours pleasure. So they censured us 500*l.* a-piece; and then stood up judge Jones, and said, It was fit, that I being a young man, for example sake, should have some corporal punishment inflicted upon me. So my Censure was to be whipt, but neither time nor place allotted. And for the old man, in regard of his age, being 85 years old, they would spare his corporal punishment, though (said they) he deserves it as well as the other (meaning me,) yet he should stand upon the pillory: but I could not understand or perceive by my censure, that I was to stand upon the pillory. And when I came from the bar, I spoke in an audible voice, and said, My lords, I beseech God to bless your honours, and to discover and make known unto you the wickedness and cruelty of the prelates.

'Whereas, upon Information to this Court the ninth of this instant February, by sir John Banks knight, his majesty's Attorney General, that John Lilburn and John Wharton, then present at the bar, were the 24th of January last ordered to be examined upon Interrogatories touching their unlawful printing, importing, publishing, and dispersing of libellous and seditious Books, contrary to the Decree of this court, which was verified by Affidavit; and being brought up to the office to appear and be examined, the said Lilburn refused to appear, and both of them denied to take an oath to make some answer to interrogatories, as appeared by the certificate of Mr. Goad, deputy-clerk of this court: the court did on that day order, that their appearances should be recorded, they being present in court as aforesaid; and that in respect the said delinquents did then again contemptuously refuse to take their oaths tendered to them in open court, they should be remanded to the prison of the Fleet, there to remain close prisoners, until they conformed themselves in obedience to take their oaths and be examined; and that unless they did take their oaths, and yield to be examined by Monday-night next then next following, and now last past, their lordships would on this sitting-day proceed to a censure against them for their contempts therein. Now this day the said Lilburn and Wharton being again brought to the bar, his majesty's said attorney informed this honourable court, that they still continued in their former obstinacy, and contemptuously refused to take their oaths, to make true answer to the interrogatories, although they had been sent for, and their oaths assented to be given unto them by Mr. Goad, deputy clerk of this court, who now certified the same in court: and therefore his majesty's said Attorney humbly pleaded on his majesty's behalf, that their lordships would now proceed to censure against the said delinquents, for their great contempts and disobedience therein. Whereupon their lordships endeavoured, by fair persuasions, to draw them to conformity and obedience, and withal offered, that if they yet would submit and take their oaths, their lordships would accept thereof, and not proceed to censure against them. But such was the insufferable disobedience and contempt of the said delinquents, that they still persisted in their former obstinacy, and wilfully refused to take their oaths. In respect whereof the whole court did with unanimous consent, declare and adjudge the said Lilburn and Wharton guilty of a very high contempt and offence, of dangerous consequence and evil example, and worthy to undergo very sharp, severe, and exemplary censure, which might deter others from the like presumptuous boldness in refusing to take a legal oath; without which, many great and exorbitant offences, to the prejudice and danger of his majesty, his kingdoms, and loving subjects, might go away undiscovered, and unpunished. And therefore their lordships have now ordered, adjudged, and decreed, That the said Lilburn and Wharton shall be remanded to the Fleet, there to remain until they conform themselves in obedience to the orders of this court, and that they shall pay 500*l.* a-piece for their several fines to his majesty's use; and before their enlargements out of the Fleet, become bound with good sureties for their good behaviour. And to the end that others may be the more deterred from daring to offend in the like kind hereafter, the court hath further ordered and decreed, That the said John Lilburn shall be whipt through the streets, from the prison of the Fleet unto the pillory,* to be erected in such time, and place, as this court shall hold fit and direct; and that both he and the said Wharton shall be both of them set in the said pillory, and from thence be returned to the Fleet, there to remain according to this decree.

After our Censure, we had the liberty of the prison for a few days; but the old man, my fellow-partner, went to the warden of the Fleet, and told him the sum of that which he intended in the Star-Chamber, to have spoken against the Bishops, if the lords would have let him. He told the warden, how the Bishops were the greatest tyrants that ever were since Adam's creation; and that they were more cruel than the Cannibals, those men-eaters; for, said he, they presently devour men, and put an end to their pain, but the Bishops do it by degrees, and are many years in exercising their cruelty and tyranny upon those that stand out against them; and therefore are worse than the very Cannibals, &c.

This came to the Lords of the Council's ears, whereupon we were the next Monday after brought both together, and locked up close prisoners in one chamber, without any order or warrant at all, but only Warden Ingram's bare command and pleasure. But the old man, about three weeks after, made a Petition to the Lords of the Council, that he might have some liberty; and being very weak, more likely to die than to live, he had his liberty granted until the Term: but I do still remain close prisoner.

Upon Wednesday the 18th of April, 1638, I was cruelly whipped through the streets to Westminster,* and at the last came to the Pillory, where I was unloosed from the cart, and having put on some of my clothes, went to the tavern, where I staid a pretty while waiting for my surgeon, who was not yet come to dress me; where were many of my friends, who exceedingly rejoiced to see my courage, that the Lord had enabled me to undergo my punishment so willingly.

I having a desire to retire into a private room from the multitude of people that were about me, which made me like to faint; I had not been there long, but Mr. Lightbourne, the tipstaff of the Star-Chamber, came unto me, saying, the lords sent him to me; to know if I would acknowledge myself to be in a fault, and then he knew what to say unto me. To whom I replied, Have their honours caused me to be whipped from the Fleet to Westminster, and do they now send to know if I will acknowledge a fault? They should have done this before I had been whipped; for now, seeing I have undergone the greatest part of my punishment, I hope the Lord will assist me to get through it all: and beside, if I would have done this at the first, I needed not to have come to this: but as I told the Lords when I was before them at the bar, so I desire you to tell them again, that I am not conscious to myself of doing any thing that deserves a submission; but yet I do willingly submit to their lordships' pleasures in my censure. He told me, if I would confess my fault, it would save me standing in the Pillory: otherwise, I must undergo the burthen of it.

* The pillory was placed between Westminster-Hall Gate and the Star-Chamber.

* And as the cart drew him along, he repeated several texts of Scripture, and talked enthusiastically to the people.

Well, said I, I regard not a little outward disgrace for the cause of my God; I have found already that sweetness in him, in whom I have believed, that through his strength, I am able to undergo any thing that shall be inflicted on me: but methinks that I had very hard measure, that I should be condemned and thus punished upon two Oaths, in which the party has most falsely forsworn himself; and because I would not take an oath to betray mine own innocence. Why, Paul found more mercy from the heathen Roman Governors, for they would not put him to an oath to accuse himself, but suffered him to make the best defence he could for himself: neither would they condemn him, before his accusers and he were brought face to face, to justify, and fully to prove their accusation: but the Lords have not dealt so with me, for my accusers and I were never brought face to face, to justify their accusation against me. It is true, two false oaths were sworn against me, and I was thereupon condemned; and because I would not accuse myself. And so he went away, and I prepared myself for the Pillory, to which I went with a joyful courage; and when I was upon it, I made obeisance to the lords, some of them, as I suppose, looking out at the Star-Chamber window towards me. And so I put my neck into the hole, which being a great deal too low for me, it was very painful to me, in regard of continuance of the time that I stood on the pillory, which was about two hours; my back being also very sore, and the sun shining so exceeding hot, and the Tipstaff-man not suffering me to keep on my hat to defend my head from the heat of the sun, so that I stood there in great pain: yet through the strength of my God I underwent it with courage, to the very last minute; and lifting up my heart and spirit unto my God, I began to speak after this manner:

“My Christian Brethren; To all you that love the Lord Jesus Christ, and desire that he should reign and rule in your hearts and lives, to you especially, and to as many as hear me this day, I direct my speech. I stand here in the place of ignominy and shame; yet to me it is not so, but I own and embrace it, as the welcome Cross of Christ, and as a badge of my Christian Profession: I have been already whipped from the Fleet to this place, by virtue of a Censure from the honourable Lords of the Star-Chamber; the cause of my Censure I shall declare unto you as briefly as I can.

“The Lord, by his special hand of Providence, so ordered it, that not long ago I was in Holland, where I was like to have settled myself in the course of trading, that might have brought me in a pretty large portion of earthly things, (after which my heart did too much run): but the Lord having a better portion in store for me, and more durable riches to bestow upon my soul, by the same hand of Providence, brought me back again, and cast me into easy affliction, that thereby I might be weaned from the world, and see the vanity and emptiness of all things therein. And he hath now pitched my soul upon such an object of beauty, amiableness, and excellency, as is as permanent and durable, as eternity itself; namely, the personal excellency of the Lord Jesus Christ, the sweetness of whose presence no affliction can ever be able to wrest out of my soul.

“Now, while I was in Holland, it seems there were divers Books of that noble and renowned Dr. John Bastwick sent into England, which came into the hands of one Edmund Chillington; for the sending over of which I was taken and apprehended, the plot being before laid by one John Chilburne (whom I supposed, and took to be my friend), servant to my old fellow-soldier, Mr. John Wharton, living in Bow-lane, after this manner. I walking in the street with the said John Chilburne, was taken by the pursuivant and his men; the said John, as I verily believe, having given direction to them where to stand, and he himself was the third man that laid hands on me to hold me.

“Now, at my censure before the Lords, I there declared upon the word of a Christian, that I sent not over those Books, neither did I know the ship that brought them, nor any of the men that belonged to the ship, nor to my knowledge did I ever see either ship, or any appertaining to it in all my days. Besides this, I was accused at my examination before the king's Attorney, at his chamber, by the said Edmund Chillington, button-seller, living in Cannon-street, near Abchurch-lane, and late prisoner in Bridewell and Newgate, for printing 10 or 12,000 Books in Holland; and that I would have printed the ‘Unmasking the Mystery of Iniquity,’ if I could have gotten a true copy of it; and that I had a chamber in Mr. John Foot's house at Delft, where he thinks the books were kept.

“Now, here I declare before you all, upon the word of a suffering Christian, that he might as well have accused me of printing 100,000 books, and the one been as true as the other. And for the printing the ‘Unmasking the Mystery of Iniquity,’ upon the word of an honest man, I never saw, nor to my knowledge heard of the book, till I came back again into England. And for my having a chamber at Mr. John Foot's house at Delft, where he thinks the books were kept; I was so far from having a chamber there, as I never lay in his house but twice or thrice at the most: and upon the last Friday of the last term, I was brought to the Star-Chamber Bar, where before me was read the said Edmund Chillington's Affidavit, upon oath against Mr. John Wharton and myself; the sum of which oath was, That he and I had printed, at Rotterdam in Holland, Dr. Bastwick's ‘Answer,’ and his ‘Litany,’ with divers other scandalous books.—Now, here again I speak it in the presence of God, and all you that hear me, that Mr. Wharton and I never joined together in printing either these, or any other books whatsoever; neither did I receive any money from him toward the printing any.

“Withal, in his first oath, he peremptorily

swore, that we had printed them at Rotterdam: unto which I likewise say, That he hath in this particular forswore himself: for mine own part, I never in all my days either printed, or caused to be printed, either for myself, or for Mr. Wharton, any books at Rotterdam; neither did I come into any printing-house there, all the time that I was in the city.

“ And then upon the Tuesday after, he swore against both of us again. The sum of which oaths was, that I had confessed to him (which is most false) that I had printed Dr. Bastwick's Answer to sir John Banks's 'Information,' and his 'Litany;' and another book, called, 'Certain Answers to certain Objections:' and another book, called, 'The Vanity and Impiety of the Old Litany.' And that I had divers other books of the said Dr. Bastwick's in printing, and that Mr. Wharton had been at the charges of printing a Book, called, 'A Breviate of the Bishops late Proceedings;' and another book, called, 'Sixteen New Querics;' and in this his oath hath sworn they were printed at Rotterdam, or somewhere else in Holland; and that one James Oldham, a turner, keeping shop at Westminster-hall gate, dispersed divers of these books. Now, in this oath he hath again forsworn himself in a high degree; for whereas he took his oath that I had printed the book, called, 'The Vanity and Impiety of the Old Litany;' I here speak it before you all, that I never in all my days did see one of them in print: but I must confess, I have seen and read it in written hand, before the Doctor was censured. And as for other books, for which he saith I have divers in printing; to that I answer, that for my own particular, I never read nor saw any of the Doctor's Books, but the forenamed four in English; and one little thing more of about two sheets of paper, which is annexed to the 'Vanity of the Old Litany.' And as for his Latin books, I never saw any but two; namely, his 'Flagellum,' for which he was first censured in the High-Commission court, and his 'Apologeticus,' which were both in print long before I knew the Doctor. But it is true, there is a second edition of his 'Flagellum,' but that was at the press above two years ago; namely, anno 1634, and some of this impression was in England before I came out of Holland.

“ And these are the main things for which I was censured and condemned, being two oaths in which the said Chillington hath palpably forsworn himself; and if he had not forsworn himself, yet by the law (as I am given to understand) I might have excepted against him, being a guilty person himself, and a prisoner, and did that which he did against me for purchasing his own liberty, which he hath by such Judasly means got and obtained; who is also known to be a lying fellow, as I told the lords I was able to prove and make good.

“ But besides all this, there was an inquisition Oath tendered unto me (which I refused to take) on four several days; the sum of which oath is thus much: 'You shall swear that you 'shall make true answer to all things that shall be asked of you: so help you God.' Now this oath I refused as a sinful and unlawful oath: it being the High-Commission oath, with which the prelates ever have, and still do, so butcherly torment, afflict and undo, the dear saints and servants of God. It is an oath against the law of the land (as Mr. Nicholas Fuller in his Argument doth prove): And also it is expressly against the Petition of Right, an act of parliament enacted in the 3d and 4th year of our king. Again, it is absolutely against the law of God; for that law requires no man to accuse himself; but if any thing be laid to his charge, there must come two or three witnesses at least to prove it. It is also against the practice of Christ himself, who, in all his examinations before the high priest, would not accuse himself, but upon their demands, returned this answer, 'Why ask you me? Go to them that heard me.'

“ Withal, this Oath is against the very law of nature; for nature is always a preserver of itself, and not a destroyer: But if a man takes this wicked oath, he destroys and undoes himself, as daily experience doth witness. Nay, it is worse than the law of the heathen Romans, as we may read, Acts xxv. 16. For when Paul stood before the pagan governors, and the Jews required judgment against him, the governor replied, 'It is not the manner of the Romans to condemn any man, before he and his accusers be brought face to face, to justify their accusation.' But for my own part, if I had been proceeded against by a Bill, I would have answered and justified all that they could have proved against me; and by the strength of my God, would have sealed whatsoever I have done with my blood: for I am privy to mine own actions, and my conscience bears me witness, that I have laboured, ever since the Lord in mercy made the riches of his grace known to my soul, to keep a good conscience, and to walk inoffensively both towards God and man. But as for that Oath that was put upon me, I did refuse to take it as a sinful and unlawful oath, and by the strength of my God enabling me, I will never take it, though I be pulled in pieces by wild horses, as the ancient Christians were by the bloody tyrants in the Primitive Church; neither shall I think that man a faithful subject of Christ's kingdom, that shall at any time hereafter take it, seeing the wickedness of it hath been so apparently laid open by so many, for the refusal whereof many do suffer cruel persecution to this day.

“ Thus have I, as briefly as I could, declared unto you, the whole cause of my standing here this day; I being upon these grounds censured by the Lords at the Star-Chamber on the last court-day of the last term, to pay 500*l.* to the king, and to receive the punishment, which with rejoicing I have undergone, unto whose censure I do with willingness and cheerfulness submit myself. But seeing I now stand here at this present, I intend, the Lord assisting me with his power, and guiding me by his spirit, to declare my mind unto you. I have nothing to say to any man's person, and therefore will not meddle with that; only the things that I have to say, in the first place are concerning the Bishops and their calling: They challenge their callings to be Jure Divino; and for the oppugning of which, those three renowned living martyrs of the Lord, Dr. Bastwick, Mr. Burton, and Mr. Prynne, did suffer in this place, (See No. 115) and they have sufficiently proved, that their calling is not from God: which men I love and honour, and do persuade myself that their souls are dear and precious in the sight of God, though they were so cruelly and butcherly dealt with by the prelates. And as for Mr. Burton and Mr. Prynne, they are worthy and learned men, but yet did not in many things write so fully as the Doctor did, who hath sufficiently and plentifully set forth the wickedness, both of the Prelates themselves, and of their callings (as you may read in his Books), that they are not Jure Divino; which noble and reverend doctor I love with all my soul: and as he is a man that stands for the truth and glory of God, my very life and heart-blood I will lay down for his honour, and the maintaining of his cause for which he suffered, it being God's cause. As for the Bishops, they used in former times to challenge their jurisdiction, callings and power from the king; but they have now openly, in the High-Commission-Court, renounced that, as was heard by many, at the Censure of that noble Doctor: and as you may fully read in his 'Apologeticus;' and in his 'Answer to sir John Banks's Information.' Now I will here maintain it before them all, that their calling is so far from being Jure Divino (as they say they are) that they are rather Jure Diabólico; which if I am not able to prove, let me be hanged up at the hall-gate. But, my brethren, for your better satisfaction, read the 9th and 13th chapters of the Revelation, and there you shall see, that there came locusts out of the Bottomless Pit, part of whom they are, and they are there lively described. Also you shall there find, that the Beast (which is the Pope, or Roman State and Government) hath given to him by the Dragon (the Devil) his power, seat, and great authority. So that the Pope's authority comes from the Devil; and the prelates, and their creatures, in their printed Books, do challenge their authority, jurisdiction and power (that they exercise over all sorts of people) is from Rome.

"And for proving the Church of England to be a true Church, their best and strongest argument is, that the Bishops are lineally descended from his Holiness (or Impiousness) of Rome, as you may read in Pocklington's book, called 'Sunday no Sabbath.' So that by their own confession they stand by that same power and authority, that they have received from the pope. So that their calling is not from God, but from the devil. For the pope cannot give a better authority or calling to them than he himself hath; but his authority and calling is from the devil, therefore the prelate's calling and authority is from the devil also, Revel. ix. 3. 'And there came out of the smoke, locusts upon the earth, and unto them was given power, as the scorpions of the earth have power to hurt and undo men,' as the prelates daily do: and also, Revel. xiii. 2. 'And the Beast which I saw' (saith St. John) 'was like unto a leopard, and his feet were as the feet of a bear, and his mouth as the mouth of a lion; and the dragon,' (that is to say, the devil) 'gave him his power, his seat and great authority:' and verse 15, 16, 17. And whether the Prelates, as well as the pope, do not daily the same things, let every man that hath but common reason judge.

"For do not their daily practices and cruel burthens imposed on all sorts of people, high and low, rich and poor, witness that their descent is from the Beast, part of his state and kingdom: so also Revel. xvi. 13, 14, all which places do declare, that their power and authority being from the pope (as they themselves confess) therefore it must originally come from the devil. For their power and callings must of necessity proceed either from God, or else from the devil; but it proceeds not from God, as the Scriptures sufficiently declare; therefore their calling and power proceeds from the devil, as both Scripture and their own daily practices do demonstrate and prove. And as for that last place cited, Rev. xvi. 13, 14, if you please to read the second and third parts of Dr. Bastwick's Litany, you shall find, he there proves, that the Prelates practices do every way suit with, and make good that portion of Scripture to the utmost. For in their sermons that they preach before his majesty, how do they incense the king and nobles against the people of God, labouring to make them odious in his sight, and stirring him up to execute vengeance upon them, though they be the most harmless generation of all others?

"And as for all these officers that are under them, and made by them, for mine own particular, I cannot see but that their callings are as unlawful as the Bishops themselves; and in particular, for the callings of the ministers, I do not, nor will not speak against their persons, for I know some of them to be very able men, and men of excellent gifts and qualifications; and I persuade myself, their souls are very dear and precious in the sight of God.

"Yet notwithstanding, this proves not their callings to be ever the better, as it is in civil government: If the king (whom God hath made a lawful magistrate) make a wicked man an officer, he is as true an officer, and as well to be obeyed, coming in the king's name, as the best man in the world coming with the same authority; for in such a case, he that is a wicked man, hath his calling from as good authority as the godliest man hath; and therefore his calling is as good as the other's. But on the other side, if he that hath no authority make officers, though the men themselves be ever so good and holy, yet their holiness makes their calling never a whit the truer; but still is a false calling, in regard his authority was not good nor lawful that made them. And even so the ministers, be they ever so holy men, yet they have one and the same calling with the wickedest that is amongst them; their holiness proves not their callings to be ever the truer, seeing their authority that made them ministers is false: and therefore they have more to answer for than any of the rest, by how much the more God hath bestowed greater gifts upon them than upon others, and yet they detain the truth in unrighteousness from God's people, and do not make known to them, as they ought, the whole will and counsel of God.

“And again, the greater is their sin, if their callings be unlawful (as I verily believe they are), in that they still hold them, and do not willingly lay down and renounce them; or they do but deceive the people, and highly dishonour God, and sin against their own souls, while they preach unto the people by virtue of an Antichristian and unlawful calling. And the more godly and able the minister is, that still preaches by virtue of this calling, the more hurt he doth; for the people that have such a minister will not be persuaded of the truth of things, though one speak, and inform them in the name of the Lord; but will be ready to reply, our minister that preaches still by virtue of this calling, is so holy a man, that were not his calling right and good, I do assure myself he would no longer preach by virtue thereof. And thus the holiness of the minister is a cloak to cover the unlawfulness of his calling, and make the people continue rebels against Christ, his sceptre and kingdom, which is an aggravation of his sin: for by this means the people are kept off from receiving the whole truth into their souls, and rest in being but almost Christians, or but Christians in part. But, O my brethren, it becomes all you that fear God, and tender the salvation of your own souls, to look about you, and to shake off that long security and formality in religion that you have lain in: for God, of all things, cannot endure lukewarmness, Rev. iii. 16, and search out diligently the truth of things, and try them in the balance of the sanctuary. I beseech you take things no more upon trust, as hitherto you have done, but take pains to search and find out those spiritual and hidden truths that God hath enwrapped in his sacred Book, and find out a bottom for your own souls: for if you will have the comforts of them, you must bestow some labour for the getting of them, and you must search diligently before you find them, Prov. ii. Labour also to withdraw your necks from under that spiritual and Antichristian bondage (under which you have for a long time subjected your souls), lest the Lord cause his plague, and the fierceness of his wrath, to seize both upon your bodies and souls; seeing you are now warned of the danger of these things.

“For he himself hath said, Rev. xiv. 9, 10, 11. ‘That if any man worship the Beast and his Image, and receive his mark in his forehead, or in his hand; the same shall drink of the wine of his wrath, which is poured out without mixture, into the cup of his indignation, and he shall be tormented with fire and brimstone, in the presence of the holy Angels, and in the presence of the Lamb: and the smoke of their torment ascended up forever and ever, and they have no rest, day nor night, who worship the Beast and his Image, and whosoever receive the mark of his name.’ Therefore as you love your own souls, and look for that immortal crown of happiness in the world to come, look that you withdraw yourselves from that Antichristian power and slavery that you are now under, even as God himself hath commanded and enjoined you, in Rev. xviii. 4, ‘Come out of her, my people, that you be not partakers of her sins, and that you receive not of her plagues; for her sins have reached unto heaven, and God hath remembered her iniquities.’ Here is the voice of God himself, commanding all his chosen ones, though they have lived under this Antichristian slavish power and state a long time, yet at last to withdraw their obedience and subjection from it. My brethren, we are all at this present, in a very dangerous and fearful condition, under the idolatrous and spiritual bondage of the prelates, in regard we have turned traitors unto our God, in seeing his almighty great name, and his heavenly truth, trodden under foot, and so highly dishonoured by them; and yet we not only let them alone in holding our peace, but most slavishly and wickedly subject ourselves unto them, fearing the face of a piece of dirt, more than the Almighty great God of heaven and earth, who is able to cast both body and soul into everlasting damnation.

“Oh repent, I beseech you therefore repent, for that great dishonour you have suffered to be done unto God by your fearfulness and cowardliness; and for the time to come put on courageous resolutions like valiant soldiers of Jesus Christ, and fight manfully in this spiritual battle, in which battle some of his soldiers have already lost part of their blood; and withal, study this Book of the Revelation, and there you shall find the mystery of iniquity fully unfolded and explained; and also you shall see what great spiritual battles have been fought betwixt the Lamb and his servants, and the Dragon, the Devil, and his vassals; and some are to fight.

“Therefore gird on your spiritual armour, spoken of, Ephes. 6, that you may quit yourselves like good and faithful soldiers, and fear no colours, the victory and conquest is ours already; for we are sure to have it, I do not speak of any bodily and temporal battle, but only of a spiritual one, and be not discouraged and knocked off from the study of it, because of the obscurity and darkness of it; for the Lord hath promised his enlightening Spirit unto all his people that are labourous and studious to know him a-right, and also he hath promised a blessing, and pronounced a blessedness unto all that read and labour to keep the things contained in this Book, Rev. 1, 3. My Christian Brethren, in the bowels of Jesus Christ, I beseech you, do not contemn the things that are delivered to you, in regard of the meanness and weakness of me the instrument, being but one of the meanest and unworthiest of the servants of Jesus Christ, for the Lord many times doth great things by weak means, that his power may be more seen: for we are too ready to cast our eye upon the means and instrument, not looking up unto that Almighty power that is in God, who is able to do the greatest things by the weakest means, and therefore 'out of the mouths of babes and sucklings he hath ordained strength,' Psal. viii. 2. And he hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise, and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty, and base things of the world, and things which are despised, hath God chosen; yea, things which are not, to bring to nought the things that are, 1 Cor. i. 27, 28. And he gives the reason wherefore he is pleased so to do; 'That no flesh should glory in his presence.'—So you see God is not tied to any instrument and means to effect his own glory, but he by the least instrument is able to bring to pass the greatest things.

"It is true, I am a young man, and no Scholar, according to that which the world counts scholarship, yet I have obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful, and he, by a Divine Providence, hath brought me hither this day; and I speak to you in the name of the Lord, being assisted with the spirit and power of the God of heaven and earth: and I speak not the words of rashness or inconsiderateness, but the words of soberness, and mature deliberation; for I did consult with my God, before I came hither, and desired him that he would direct and enable me to speak that, which might be for his glory and the good of his people. And as I am a soldier, fighting under the banner of the great and mighty Captain the Lord Jesus Christ; and as I look for that Crown of immortality, which one day I know shall be set upon my temples, being in the condition that I am in, I dare not hold my peace, but speak unto you with boldness in the might and strength of my God, the things which the Lord in mercy hath made known unto my soul, come life, come death."

[When I was hereabout, there came a fat lawyer, I do not know his name, and commanded me to hold my peace, and leave my preaching. To whom I replied and said, Sir, I will not hold my peace, but speak my mind freely, though I be hanged at Tyburn for my pains. It seems he himself was galled and touched, as the Lawyers were in Christ's time, when he spake against the Scribes and Pharisees, which made them say, 'Master, in saying thus thou revilest us also.' So he went his way, and, I think, complained to the lords, but I went on with my speech, and said:]

"My Brethren, be not discouraged at the ways of God for the affliction and cross that doth accompany them, for it is sweet and comfortable drawing in the yoke of Christ for all that, and I have found it so by experience; for my soul is filled so full of spiritual and heavenly joy, that with my tongue I am not able to express it, neither are any capable, I think, to partake of so great a degree of consolation, but only those upon whom the Lord's gracious afflicting hand is. And for mine own part, I stand this day in the place of an evil doer, but my conscience witnesseth that I am not so." [And hereabout I put my hand into my pocket, and pulled out three of worthy Dr. Barwick's Books, and threw them among the people, and said,] "There is part of the Books for which I suffer, take them among you, and read them, and see if you find any thing in them against the law of God, the law of the land, the glory of God, the honour of the king or state.

"I am the son of a gentleman, and my friends are of rank and quality in the country where they live, which is 200 miles from this place, and I am in my present condition deserted of them all; for I know, not one of them dare meddle with me in my present estate, being I am stung by the Scorpions, (the Prelates) and for any thing that I know, it may be I shall never have a favourable countenance from any of them again: and withal, am a young man, and likely to have lived well, and in plenty, according to the fashion of the world; yet notwithstanding, for the cause of Christ, and to do him service, I have and do bid adieu to father, friends, and riches, pleasures, ease, contented life and blood, and lay all down at the foot-stool of Jesus Christ, being willing to part with all, rather than I will dishonour him, or in the least measure part with the peace of a good conscience, and that sweetness and joy which I have found in him. For in naked Christ is the quintessence of sweetness, and I am so far from thinking my affliction and punishment, which I have this day endured, and shall endure and groan under, a disgrace, that I receive it as the welcome Cross of Christ, do think myself this day more honoured by my sufferings, than if a crown of gold had been set upon my head: for I have in some part been made conformable to my Lord and Master, and have in some measure drank of the same cup, which he himself drank of, while he was in this sinful world. For he shed his most precious blood for the salvation of my poor soul, that so I might be reconciled to his Father; therefore am I willing to undergo any thing for his sake, and that inward joy and consolation which he carries me high above all my pains and torments. And you, (my brethren) if you be willing to have Christ, you must own him, and take him upon his own terms, and know that Christ and the Cross is inseparable; for he that will live godly in Christ Jesus, must suffer persecution and affliction; it is the lot and portion of all his chosen ones, through many afflictions and trials we must enter into glory; and the Apostle saith, 'That if ye be without affliction, whereof all are partakers, then are ye bastards, and not 'sons.' And therefore, if you will have Christ, sit down and reckon before ever you make profession of him, what he will cost you; lest when you come to the trial, you dishonour him; and if you be not willing and contented withal, and let all go for his sake, you are not worthy of him. If parents, husbands, wife or children, lands or livings, riches or honours, pleasure or ease, life or blood, stand in the way, you must be willing to part with all these, and to entertain Christ naked and alone, though you have nothing but the Cross, or else you are not worthy of him; Math. 10, 37, 38.

"Oh, my brethren, there is such sweetness and contentedness in enjoying the Lord Jesus alone, that it is able, where it is felt, to make a man go through all difficulties, and endure all hardships that may possibly come upon him. Therefore, if he call you to it, do not deny him, nor his truth in the least manner; for he hath said, 'He that denies him before men, him will 'he deny before his Father, which is in Heaven.' And now is the time that we must shew ourselves good soldiers of Jesus Christ, for his truth, his cause and glory lies at stake in a high degree; therefore put on courageous resolutions, and withdraw your necks and souls from all false power and worship, and fight with courage and boldness in this spiritual battle, in which battle, the Lord before your eyes hath raised up some valiant champions that fought up to the ears in blood: therefore be courageous soldiers, and fight it out bravely, that your God may be glorified by you, and let him only have the service, both of your inward and outward man, and stand to his cause, and love your own souls, and fear not the face of any mortal man; for God hath promised to be with you, and uphold you, that they shall not prevail against you, Isa. xli. 10, 11. But alas, how few are there that dare shew any courage for God and his cause, though his glory lies at the stake, but think themselves happy and well, and count themselves wise men, if they can sleep in a whole skin; when Christ hath said, 'He that will save his life shall lose it; and he that will lose his life for his sake, shall find it. 'What shall it profit a man, if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?'

"Therefore it is better for a man to be willing and contented to let all go for the enjoying of Christ, and doing him service, than to sit down and sleep in a whole skin, though in so doing he gain all the world, and see him dishonoured, his glory and truth trodden under foot, and the blood of his servants shed and spilt.—Yes, without doubt, it is; but many are in these times, so far from suffering valiantly for Christ, that they rather dissuade men from it, and count it a point of singularity and pride, and self-ends, for a man to put himself forward to do God service; asking, what calling and warrant any private man hath thereunto, seeing it belongs to the ministers to speak of these things? Yes, so it doth; but alas, they are so cowardly and fearful, that they dare not speak.—And therefore it belongs also to thee, or me, or any other man, if thou be'st a soldier of Jesus Christ, whatsoever by place or calling thy rank or degree be, be it higher or lower, yet if he call for thy service, thou art bound, though others stand still, to maintain his power and glory to the utmost of thy power and strength, yea, to the shedding the last drop of thy blood; for he hath not loved his life unto the death for thy sake, but shed his precious blood for the redemption of thy soul. Hath he done this for thee; and dar'st thou see him dishonoured, and his glory lie at the stake, and not speak in his behalf, or do him the best service thou canst?—If out of a base and cowardly spirit thus thou doest, let me tell thee here, and that truly to thy face, thou hast a Dalilah in thy heart, which thou lovest more than God, and that thou shalt one day certainly find by woful experience. Alas, if men should hold their peace in such times as these, the Lord would cause the very stones to speak, to convince man of his cowardly baseness."

Having proceeded in a manner thus far by the strength of my God, with boldness and courage in my speech, the Warden of the Fleet came with the fat Lawyer, and commanded me to hold my peace. To whom I replied, I would speak and declare my cause and mind, though I were to be hanged at the gate for my speaking. And he caused proclamation to be made upon the pillory, for bringing to him the Books: so then he commanded me to be gagged, and if I spake any more, that then I should be whipt again upon the pillory.—So I remained about an hour and a half gagged, being intercepted of much matter, which by God's assistance I intended to have spoken; but yet with their cruelty I was nothing at all daunted, for I was full of comfort and courage, being mightily strengthened with the power of the Almighty, which made me with clearfulness triumph over all my sufferings, not shewing one sad countenance or discontented heart.

And when I was to come down, having taken out my head out of the Pillory, I looked about me upon the people, and said, 'I am more than a conqueror through him that hath loved me.' Vivat Rex! Let the king live for ever; and so I came down and was had back again to the Tavern, where I, together with Mr. Wharton, staid a while, till one went to the Warden to know what should be done with me, who gave order we should be carried back again to the Fleet.—After I came back to the prison, none were suffered to come to me, but the surgeon to dress me.—[Here Lilburn gives an account of his cruel whipping, &c. but as it is afterwards mentioned in the depositions before the lords, it is here omitted.]—The rest that I intended by the strength of my God to have spoken (if I had not been prevented by the gag), I now forbear to set down, in regard I bear I am to come into the field again to fight a second battle, unto which time I reserve it: if the Lord so order it that I may have liberty to speak, I doubt not but by the might and power of my God, in whom I rest and trust, valiantly to display the weapons of a good soldier of Jesus Christ, come life, come death: and in the mean time, to what I have here said and written, I set-to my name, by me, John Lilburn, being written with part of mine own blood.

JOHN LILBURN.

PRESENT; Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, Lord-Keeper, Lord-Treasurer, Lord-Privy-Seal, Earl-Marshal, Earl of Salisbury, Lord Cottington, Lord Newburgh, Mr. Secretary Cooke, Mr. Secretary Windebank.

Whereas John Lilburn, prisoner in the Fleet, by sentence in the Star-Chamber, did this day suffer condign punishment for his several Offences, by whipping at a cart, and standing in the pillory; and as their lordships were this day informed, during the time that his body was under the said execution, audaciously and wickedly did not only utter sundry scandalous speeches, but likewise scattered divers copies of seditious Books among the people, that beheld the said execution; for which very thing, among other offences of like nature, he hath been censured in the said Court by the aforesaid Sentence: It is therefore, by their lordships ordered, That the said John Lilburn should be laid alone, with irons on his hands and legs, in the Wards of the Fleet, where the basest and meanest sort of prisoners are used to be put; and that the Warden of the Fleet take special care to hinder the resort of any persons whatsoever unto him. And particularly, that he be not supplied with money from any friend, and that he take special notice of all letters, writings, and books brought unto him, and seize and deliver the same unto their lordships; and take notice from time to time, who they be that resort unto the said prison to visit the said Lilburn, or to speak with him, and inform the Board thereof. And it was lastly ordered, that all persons that shall be hereafter produced to receive corporal punishment according to sentence of that court, or by order of the Board, shall have their garments searched before they be brought forth, and neither writing, nor other thing suffered to be about them; and their hands likewise to be bound, during the time they are under punishment. Whereof, together with the other premises, the said Warden of the Fleet is hereby required to take notice, and to have special care, that this their lordships order be accordingly observed.

Examined per DUDLEY CARLETON.

And on the said 18th of April, it was further ordered by the said Court of Star-Chamber,

That his majesty's Attorney and Solicitor-General should be hereby prayed and required, to take strict examination of John Lilburn prisoner in the Fleet, touching the Demeanour and Speeches of him the said Lilburn, during the time of his whipping and standing in the Pillory this day, according to the Sentence of his majesty's Court of Star-Chamber; particularly, whether the said Lilburn did at that time utter any speeches tending to Seditiion, or to the dishonour of the said Court of Star-Chamber, or any member of the said Court? and whether he did throw about and disperse at the same time any seditious Pamphlets and Books, either of that sort for which he was formerly censured, or any other of like nature? What the Speeches were, and who heard them? What the said Books were, and whence and of whom the said Lilburn had them? And what other material circumstances they should think fit to examine, either the said Lilburn upon, or any other person by whom they shall think good to inform themselves for the better finding out the truth: and thereupon to make certificate to the board what they find, together with their opinions.

The 3rd of November, 1640, being the first day the late dissolved parliament sate, I according to law and justice preferred my Petition and Complaint to them; who upon the reading of my Petition, immediately ordered me my liberty [being, as I remember, the first prisoner in England set at liberty by them] to follow my Petition, and according to the legal custom of parliaments make it good by proof, before a select Committee appointed by them to that purpose, Mr. Francis Rouse having the Chair; before whom many particular days one after another I appeared with my Counsel and my Witnesses, and fully proved all my Petition. Upon the report of all which by Mr. Rouse the Chairman, the House of Commons upon the 4th of May, 1641, [being the very same day that the king himself caused me to be arraigned for High Treason at the bar of the house of peers] voted and resolved upon the question, "That the Sentence of the Star-Chamber given against John Lilburn is illegal, and against the Liberty of the subject; and also bloody, cruel, wicked, barbarous, and tyrannical.

"Resolved upon the question, That reparation ought to be given to Mr. Lilburn for his imprisonment, sufferings, and losses sustained by that illegal sentence."

"Ordered, That the committee shall prepare this case of Mr. Lilburn to be transmitted to the lords, with those other of Dr. Bastwick, Dr. Leighton, Mr. Burton, and Mr. Prynne.

After which Votes (being in a full, free, unravished, or unforced, legal, and unquestionable Parliament, after a full, open, free, and fair hearing, and examining of all my aforesaid sufferings and complaints) troubles and the wars came on, and being in my own conscience fully satisfied of the justness of the Parliament's^e then cause, in the height of zeal, accompanied with judgment and conscience, 'upon the principles I have largely laid down 'in the 26, 27, 75, 76th pages of my book of 'the 8th of June, 1649, intitled England's 'legal, fundamental, &c.' I took up arms for them, and fought heartily and faithfully in their quarrel, (for maintaining of which I had like to have been hanged at Oxford, while during my imprisonment there, I lost 5 or 600*l.* out of my estate at London,) till the present earl of Manchester had like to have hanged me, for being a little too quick in taking in Tickell Castle which spoiled a soldier of me ever since. After which, in the year 1645, I followed the House of Commons close, to transmit my foresaid Votes to the Lords, as appears by the following Petition :

" To the Honourable the House of Commons now assembled in the High-Court of Parliament. The humble PETITION of JOHN LILBURN, Lieut. Col."

" In all humility sheweth; That your Petitioner having suffered abundance of inhuman, barbarous cruelty, by virtue of an illegal Decree made against him, in the Star-Chamber, 1637, as by the copy of his Petition hereunto annexed, formerly presented to this honourable house, and by your own Votes made the 4th of May, 1641, (upon the examination of the Petition) will appear: Which Votes are as followeth; First, That the Sentence of the Star-Chamber given against him is illegal, against the Liberty of the Subject, and also bloody, wicked, cruel, barbarous, and tyrannical. Secondly, That reparation ought to be given to him for his imprisonment, sufferings and losses, sustained by that illegal Sentence. And then also it was ordered, That care should be taken to draw up his Case, and transmit it to the lords: but by reason of multitude of business in this honourable house, there hath been no further proceedings in it since. And these distractions coming on, your Petitioner took command under the right hon. Robert lord Brook, with whose regiment he adventured his life free and resolutely, both at Kenton Field, and Brentford, where he was taken prisoner and carried away to Oxford: where, within a short time after his coming, the king sent to the Castle to your petitioner, the now earl of Kingston, the lord Dunsmore, the lord Maltravers, and the lord Andover, to woo your Petitioner with large proffers of the honour and glory of court-preference, to forsake the Parliament's party, and to engage on his party. Upon the slighting and contemning of which, your petitioner was within few days after laid in irons, and kept an exceeding close prisoner, and forced several times to march into Oxford in irons, to Judge Heath, before whom he was arraigned for High-Treason, for drawing his sword in the cause of the Commonwealth, and suffered multitude of miseries, in his almost twelve month captivity there: in which time he lost above 600*l.* in his estate that he left behind him at London, (as he is clearly able to make appear). And immediately after his coming from thence, he took command in the earl of Manchester's army, his commission as Major of foot bearing date the 7th Oct. 1643, which lasted till the 16th May, 1644, at which time he was authorised by commission as lieut. col. to command a Regiment of Dragoons; in which services having been in many engagements, he hopes it will easily appear, that he hath not only behaved himself honestly and faithfully, but also valiantly and stoutly, in the midst of many discouragements, God crowning some of his endeavours with success; and especially at the taking of Tickell-Castle, and sir Francis Wortley's garrison, at which place your petitioner was shot through his arm. The premises considered, he humbly beseecheth this Honourable Assembly to perfect that justice, which you happily began for your petitioner, and to give him reparation for his large and tedious imprisonment, and heavy sufferings by the Star-Chamber Decree; he having waited four years with patience for that end, though he lost by his imprisonment all that he had, and was deprived of a profitable calling, being then in the way of a factor in the Low Countries; and also to take off the king's fine, and to consider his service with the earl of Manchester, where he faithfully adventured his life, spent a great deal of his own money, and lost at Newark, when prince Rupert raised the siege, almost 100*l.* being stripped from the crown of his head to the sole of the foot, besides his former losses at Kenton and Brentford: and that you will be pleased, for his present subsistence, to appoint the payment of so much of his present arrears, as you in your great wisdoms shall think fit, to supply his urgent and pressing necessities, there being now due to them 600*l.* and upwards. And that Col. King may be commanded to account with the petitioner, which formerly he hath refused to do (though commanded by his general), and to give him debentures for what is due by the state in his service, and to pay him what he hath received for the petitioner, and detained from him. And he shall pray, &c. JOHN LILBURN."

* Where, (I very well remember,) sir Arthur Haslerig was one of my zealous and forward Judges; and when Warden James Ingram came to the bar of the Court of Wards, and brought Mr. Herne the counsellor to plead for the Lords, and in excuse of himself, who stiffly insisted in a high manner upon the orders and decrees of Star-Chamber, upon which I very well remember sir Arthur, with a great deal of indignation, said unto Herne, 'I value not 'a Decree of the lords in Star-Chamber a rush, 'if it be not expressly according to the tenor of 'their Commission, the law: and I further tell 'you, it is a ridiculous thing, Sir, to summon 'Parliaments to meet together to make laws, 'if the lords Decrees in Star-Chamber against 'law should be binding. And therefore, al- 'though you have proved for your client Mr. 'Ingram, that the lords in open court (the 'court sitting) commanded him on the pillory 'to gag Mr. Lilburn, for speaking against them, 'yet I tell you by law that Order ought to 'have been in writing according to the custom 'of the court, which you confess it was not, 'and therefore Mr. Ingram must smart for his 'executing of orders on Mr. Lilburn made 'illegally.'

The annexed PETITION thus followeth :

"To the House of Commons now assembled in the High Court of Parliament; The humble Petition of JOHN LILBURN, prisoner in the Fleet:

"In all humility sheweth; That in December next will be three years, your Petitioner, upon supposal of sending over certain Books of Dr. Bastwick's, from Holland into England, was by Dr. Lanb's warrant without any Examination at all sent to the Gatehouse prison, and from thence within three days removed to the Fleet, where he abiding prisoner, in Candlemas-Term following, was proceeded against in the honourable court of Star-Chamber: where your Petitioner appearing (and entering of his name, for want of money his name was struck out again), and he refusing to take an Oath to answer to all things that should be demanded of him (for that your petitioner conceived that oath to be dangerous and illegal) without any interrogatory tendered him, for his refusing the said oath, he was prosecuted and censured in the said court most heavily, being fined 500*l.* to the king, and sent prisoner to the Fleet. And in Easter Term following, was whipped from the Fleet to Westminster, with a three-fold knotted cord, receiving at least 200 stripes; and then at Westminster, he was set on the pillory the space of two hours, and (over and above the censure of the court) at the warden of the Fleet's command, was gagged about an hour and a half; after which most cruel sufferings, was again returned to the Fleet close prisoner. When through his said sufferings, the next morning he being sick of an extreme fever, could not have admittance for his surgeon to let him blood, or dress his sores, till the afternoon of the said day; though the surgeon, in pity to the prisoner, went to Westminster to the warden himself; and your petitioner hath been close prisoner in the Fleet ever since, where in a most cruel manner he hath been put into iron fetters, both hands and legs, which caused a most dangerous sickness that continued six months; and after some small recovery, was again laid in irons, which caused at least five months sickness, more dangerous than the former. During which time of sickness, they most inhumanly denied his friends to come and see him, until they would give them money for their admittance, and they have denied many to come at all; and have beaten and kicked, and otherwise most shamefully abused, such his friends as came to see him in his great distress, and to bring him food and necessaries to sustain his life, and also have kept his servant from him, and his food. So that if he had not been relieved by stealth of his fellow prisoners, he had been kept from any food at all, for above the space of 10 days together; and the prisoners that out of pity have relieved him, have been most cruelly punished, and the keepers have not forborn to confess themselves, that they should have starved him long ago, had not the prisoners relieved him. And besides all this, they have most cruelly beaten and wounded him, to the hazard of his limbs, and danger of his life, had he not been rescued and saved by the prisoners of the same house. In which most miserable condition, your poor petitioner hath continued a prisoner for the space of about two years and a half, and is like still to continue in the same, under the merciless hands of the warden of the Fleet, who hath denied lawful liberty to his prisoner, for that he hath said, he must observe the man that has so great a sway in the kingdom, intimating the Archbishop.—All which his deplored condition and lamentable miseries, he most humbly presenteth to this most Honourable Assembly, beseeching them to be pleased to cast an eye of compassion towards him, and to afford him such relief from the Censure and hard imprisonment, as may seem good to your wisdoms, who otherwise is like to perish under the hands of merciless men. And your Petitioner shall ever pray, as in duty he is bound, to the Lord to bless and prosper this Honourable Assembly. JOHN LILBURN."

At the debate of which, there was not a little opposition by some, who, as I conceive, thought I was not capable of enjoying justice, although to my knowledge I never did an act in all my life that put me out of the protection of the law, or that tended to the disfranchising me of being a denizen and a freeman of England; and therefore ought to enjoy as great a privilege in the enjoyment of the benefit of the law of England, as any free denizen of England whatsoever, by what name or title soever he be called. The issue of which debate, so much as I have under the Clerk's hand, thus followeth:

"Die Lunæ, 10 Nov. 1645.

"Ordered, &c. That the Vote formerly passed in this house, concerning the proceedings against lieut. col. Lilburn in the Star-Chamber, be forthwith transmitted to the lords."

"Ordered, &c. That it be referred to the Committee of Accounts to cast up and state the accounts of lieut. col. Lilburn, and to certify what is due to him, to this house.

"H. ELSYNCE, Cler. Parl. D. Com."

After passing these Votes I found quick dispatch to the Lords; and upon the 1st of Dec. 1645, by special decree, they took off the Fine set upon me by the Star-Chamber; and afterwards at their open bar judicially, upon the 13th of Feb. 1645, appointed me a solemn hearing de novo of the whole matter; and as signed Mr. John Bradshaw and Mr. John Cook for my counsel.

Lieut. Col. JOHN LILBURN'S Sufferings, as they were represented and proved before the right honourable the House of Peers, in Parliament assembled, the 13th day of February, 1615.

Mr. Bradshaw and Mr. Crook being assigned for Counsel with the said Mr. Lilburn; Mr. Bradshaw having succinctly, and so truly opened the Case, as if he had been an eyewitness of his client's sufferings, acquainted their lordships, that the same had received a full and solemn hearing before a committee of the honourable house of commons: upon whose report it was by that honourable house, May 4, 1641, resolved upon the question, 'That the Sentence of the Star-Chamber given against John Lilburn is illegal, and against the Liberty of the Subject; and also bloody, wicked, cruel, barbarous, and tyrannical;' and likewise further resolved upon the question, 'That reparation ought to be given to Mr. Lilburn, for his imprisonment, sufferings and losses, sustained by that illegal Sentence.' And now, my lords, they have transmitted them to your lordships, by whose noble favour and justice we are now before your honours to lay open the illegality of that Sentence, and all the proceedings thereupon, and to crave your lordships justice for reparations, proportionable to our client's sufferings.

And in the first place he presented an Order, whereby Mr. Lilburn was first illegally attached, and committed to the prison of the Gatehouse, which was read in these words:

'Sexto Dec. a. d. 1637. Emanavit attach direct. Wragge, et Flamsteed, pro corp^{is}, capt. Johannis Lilburn de civitate London, ad immediate admittend, &c. Signat. per Lambe, Gwynn, et Aylett. Ex directione Baker cler. cappellani Lond. Exam. Edwardus Latham, Regi. Regi Deput.'

The English of which thus followeth:

'The 6th Dec. 1637. There issued an attachment directed to Wragge and Flamsteed, for the taking of the body of John Lilburn, of the city of London, and to bring immediately, &c. Signed by Lambe, Gwynn, and Aylett. By direction of the court, Baker, clerk chaplain. Examined by Edward Latham, Deputy of the Register.'

Which Order being read, Mr. Bradshaw observed, that the original imprisonment itself was illegal, because they never convicted Mr. Lilburn to speak for himself, nor examined him upon any crime. But, my lords, it is no marvel that such kind of injustice as this proceeded from those high commissioners, because it was their usual practice to be attachers, judges, gaolers and executioners themselves, without regard of any legal way of proceedings. He then desired their lordships, that the Sentence against Mr. Lilburn in the Star-Chamber might also be read, which was accordingly done, viz.

'In Cam. Stel. coram Canc. ibidem 13 die Feb. anno decimo tertio Car. reg. Lord Coventry, Lord-Keeper, &c.

'Whereas upon information to this Court, the 9th of Feb., by sir John Banks kn^t. his majesty's Attorney-General, that John Lilburn and John Wharton, then present at the bar, were the 24th of Jan. last, ordered to be examined upon interrogatories, touching their unlawful printing, importing, publishing and dispersing of libellous and seditious Books, contrary to the decree of this court, which was verified by Affidavit; and being brought up to the office to appear and be examined, the said Lilburn refused to appear; and both of them denied to take an Oath to make true answer to Interrogatories, as appeared by the Certificate of Mr. Goad, deputy-clerk of this court: the court did on that day order, That their appearances should then be recorded, they being present in court as aforesaid; and that in respect the said delinquents did then again contemptuously refuse to take their oaths, tendered unto them in open court, they should be remanded to the prison of the Fleet, there to remain close prisoners, until they conform themselves in obedience to take their oaths, and be examined; and that unless they did take their oaths, and yield to be examined by Monday, night then next following, and now last past, their lordships would on the sitting day proceed to a Censure against them for their contempts therein.

'Now this day the said Lilburn and Wharton being again brought unto the bar, his majesty's said Attorney informed this Honourable Court, that they still continued in their former obstinacy, and contemptuously refused to take their Oaths, to make true answer to the Interrogatories, although they had been sent for, and their Oaths offered to be given unto them by Mr. Goad, deputy-clerk of this court, who now certified the same in court. And therefore his majesty's said Attorney humbly prayed on his majesty's behalf, That their lordships would now proceed to Censure against the said delinquents for their great contempts and disobedience therein. Whereupon their lordships endeavoured by fair persuasions to draw them to conformity and obedience; and when offered, that if yet they would submit and take their Oaths, their lordships would accept thereof, and not proceed to censure against them. But such was the insufferable disobedience and contempt of the said delinquents, that they still persisted in their former obstinacy, and wilfully refused to take their oaths. In respect whereof the whole Court did, with an unanimous consent, declare and adjudge the said Lilburn and Wharton guilty of a very big contempt, and offence of dangerous consequence and evil example, and worthy to undergo a very sharp, exemplary and severe Censure, which may deter others from the like presumptuous boldness, in refusing to take a legal Oath; * without which, many great and exorbitant offences to the prejudice and danger of his majesty, his kingdoms, and loving subjects, might go away undiscovered and unpunished. And therefore their lordships have now ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the said Lilburn and Wharton shall be remanded to the Fleet, there to remain until they conform themselves in obedience to the orders of this court, and that they shall pay 500*l.* a-piece for their several fines to his majesty's use; and before their enlargements out of the Fleet, become bound with good sureties for their good behaviour. And to the end that others may be more deterred from daring to offend in the like kind hereafter, the court hath further ordered and decreed, That the said John Lilburn shall be whipped through the street, from the prison of the Fleet unto the pillory, to be erected at such time and in such place as this court shall hold fit and direct; and that both he and the said Wharton shall be both then set in the said pillory, and from thence be returned to the Fleet, there to remain according to this decree.

JOHN ARTHUR, Dep.*

At the concluding of which, Mr. Bradshaw observed, that this Sentence was felo de se, guilty of its own death; the ground whereof being, because Mr. Lilburn refused to take an Oath, to answer all such questions as should be demanded of him, it being contrary to the laws of God, nature, and the kingdom, for any man to be his own accuser: the execution of which cruel and bloody Sentence was proved by several Witnesses of quality and good repute upon oath at their lordships bar, the substance of whose testimony was:

In the first place, Mr. Thomas Smith, merchant, upon his oath declared to their lordships, That he saw Mr. Lilburn tied to a cart at Fleet-bridge, being stripped from the waist upward, and whipped from thence to Westminster; and that so near as he was able to judge, every two, three or four steps he had a lash, with a whip that he was sure had two or three cords tied full of knots; and for the number he did not judge them so few as 500, and he thought that if he should say 500 and 500, he should not say amiss: but 500 he was confident was the least. And that he saw him set upon the pillory, &c. the officers being very cruel towards him, or any that spoke unto him.

The next witness was Mrs. Mary Dorman; the substance of whose testimony upon oath was, that she saw Mr. Lilburn whipped from Fleet-bridge to Westminster, in such a barbarous and cruel manner, that she was not able to express it, and that she did believe that both his shoulders were swelled almost as big as a penny-loaf, with the bruises of the knotted cords; and that she did see him set upon the pillory immediately, above the space of two hours, bare-headed, the sun shining very hot, and he took occasion to declare the unjustness of his Sentence, upon which the warden of the Fleet caused him to be gagged above an hour, and did it with such cruelty, that he made his mouth to bleed.

* The sum of which was, 'You shall swear to make true answer to all things that are asked you, so help you God.'

Mr. Higgs, his surgeon, testified upon oath to this effect; That he did not see his patient Mr. Lilburn whipped, but being desired to perform the office of a surgeon to him, he that day dressed his back, which was one of the miserablest that ever he did see; for the wales in his back, made by his cruel whipping, were bigger than tobacco-pipes, and that he saw him set in the pillory, and gagged.

And Mr. Thomas Hawes upon oath testified to this effect; That he did see Mr. Lilburn set upon the pillory, above (as he judged) the space of two hours, the sun shining very hot, and they would not suffer him to have any cover upon his head: and he taking occasion to speak of the bishops cruelty towards him, and how unjustly they had caused him to be dealt with, the warden of the Fleet caused him to be gagged in such a cruel manner, as if he would have torn his jaws in pieces, insomuch that the blood came out of his mouth.

In the next place, a second Sentence made in the Inner Star-Chamber was read, which thus followeth:

At the Inner Star-Chamber, the 18th of April, A. D. 1638.

Present Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, Lord-Keeper, Lord-Treasurer, &c.

Whereas John Lilburn, prisoner in the Fleet by Sentence in the Star-Chamber, did this day suffer condign punishment for his several offences, by whipping at a cart, and standing in the pillory; and as their lordships were this day informed, during the time that his body was under the said execution, audaciously and wickedly did not only utter sundry scandalous Speeches, but likewise scattered divers copies of seditious Books amongst the people that beheld the said execution; for which very thing, amongst other offences of like nature, he hath been censured in the said court, by the aforesaid Sentence: it is therefore by their lordships ordered, that the said John Lilburn should be laid alone with irons on his hands and legs, in the wards of the Fleet, where the basest and meanest sort of prisoners are used to be put; and that the warden of the Fleet take special care to hinder the resort of any persons whatsoever unto him; and particularly, that he be not supplied with money from any friend; and that he take special notice of all letters, writings, and books brought unto him, and seize and

‘ deliver the same unto their lordships, and take notice from time to time who they be that resort unto the said prison, to visit the said Lilburn, or to speak with him, and inform the board thereof. And it was lastly ordered, that all persons that shall be hereafter produced to receive corporal punishment, according to sentence of that court, or by order of the board, shall have their garments searched before they be brought forth, and neither writing nor other thing suffered to be about them; and their hands likewise to be bound during the time they are under punishment. Whereof, together with the other premises, the said warden of the Fleet is hereby required to take notice, and to have especial care, that this their lordships order be accordingly observed

And the execution of this latter Sentence in a most barbarous and inhuman manner, was punctually proved by sufficient witnesses, as followeth; viz. Mr. Higgs his surgeon again testified, That that night Mr. Lilburn suffered, he was had back to the Fleet, and he repairing to Dr. Grant, to crave his advice, he advised him to let his patient bleed, to prevent a fever; and he accordingly came the next morning to the Fleet to let his patient bleed, and dress his sores, but he found him locked up close in a room, and was by the officers of the Fleet denied access unto him. Whereupon he immediately went to the warden, being then at Westminster, who denied him access to the said Mr. Lilburn, till the afternoon that he came home: which was a great act of cruelty, and much to the danger of Mr. Lilburn’s health, and welfare: and the next day they removed him down to the common gaol, where they laid him in irons, and several times wounded him, to the extreme hazard of his life, and several times denied me access to him in his extremity.

Dr. Hubbard, Justice of the Peace, made oath to this effect: That when Mr. Lilburn was prisoner in the Fleet, he was desired as a physician to visit him: and going so to do, he was again and again denied access to him: but upon much importunity to the warden, he was admitted to him, whom he found in an extreme violent fever, lying in irons upon both hands and legs, to the extreme hazard of his life.

Mrs. Mary Dorman further declared, That after Mr. Lilburn had suffered, she went often to visit him, who was laid in irons, and his friends denied access to him; and that the Officers of the Fleet strongly endeavoured to starve him: so that many times his friends were forced to bring his meat to the poor men’s bag, and give them money to convey it to him through a hole in a wall betwixt them and him. Mr. Thomas Hawes further declared, that after Mr. Lilburn suffered, he often went to visit him, and was beat by the Gaolers, and was in danger to have lost his life for so doing; and that they so strongly laboured to starve Mr. Lilburn, that they were forced to convey his diet to him by the poor men that begged at the grate: but the Gaolers finding out that Mr. Lilburn got his diet that way, they dealt so cruelly with the poor men, that Mr. Lilburn was deprived of that way of relief, and then his friends got the son of one Archer that was prisoner in the next room to him, for accusing the deputy of Ireland for murdering one Esmond, to convey his victuals to him: which was done by stealth, through a hole where a board was pulled up in his floor, when the rest of the prisoners were at the chapel at service; and, my lords, divers times the conveying of his meat to him, cost him and his friends, upon the prisoners, &c. more than the meat itself.

Robert Ellis, some time a fellow-prisoner with Mr. Lilburn in the Fleet, upon oath declared before their lordships, that the officers of the Fleet, after they brought Mr. Lilburn into the common wards, used him very barbarously and cruelly, laying him for a long time in irons, keeping his friends from him, and his victuals, and several times had like to have slain, and murdered him, and he verily believes had effected it, if he had not helped him; for which they took his bed from him, and put him off the charity, and kept him five weeks in a dungeon, and had like to have murdered him, and afterwards removed him to the King’s-Bench, that so they might the more easily have their wills of Mr. Lilburn, &c.

Their Lordships being satisfied of the injustice and illegality of the proceedings, Mr. Bradshaw said, That he conceived no man’s sufferings in the kingdom had been so great as his client’s were: for a gentleman to be so cruelly tortured and whipped, pilloried, gugged, close imprisoned, ironed, beat and wounded, and that contrary to law, is a cruelty unheard of, and therefore hoped that for such unparalleled sufferings, and oppressions, the fair hand of their lordships honourable justice would give and reach him forth unparalleled damages; and though many of his Judges that did him injustice be dead, yet he hoped the hand of justice of their honours, joined with the honourable house of commons, will be so long, as to reach their living and surviving estates, and out of them, &c. make him speedy, large and unparalleled reparations.

Mr. Cook then spoke in the behalf of Mr. Lilburn (and afterwards printed his Argument), and said the punishment inflicted upon him may be reduced to four heads:

(1.) Imprisonment, whereby a man is buried alive, loses the comfort and benefit of his five senses, and is made ‘Corpus immobile legs,’ the unmoveable subject of the law, or as a dead carcase. It is true, that in itself it is the easiest of all corporal punishments: but the continuance of it, makes it such a lingering consumption, that it is better to be upon the rack an hour, than to be imprisoned a year: as it is better to be once wet to the skin, than to be subject to a perpetual dropping: especially for an active spirit, there is no such torment as to deprive him of liberty; for active Theseus was condemned only to sit still: there is no end of such a misery, as the heathen persecuting tyrant said, 'Nondum tibi redii in gratiam'; to put a man out of his pain, was always counted a favour. But Mr. Lilburn's imprisonment was aggravated by three steps or gradations. 1. A close imprisonment, not the dearest friend to come to him; we do not find that any of the primitive Christians were used so by the tyrants, for then that heavy charge might be answered in the scripture, 'I was in prison and ye visited me not;' extraordinary matters of state and high concernments always excepted; but the surgeon was not permitted some time to come to Mr. Lilburn to dress him, nor the physician when he was in a fever; a cruelty unheard of amongst the Turks: for they are careful of their slaves in their sickness, and fatten them, that they may endure their blows; but it is too probable that those which were Mr. Lilburn's malicious enemies, did too much thirst after his blood. 2. The keepers were ordered to take care that no money be conveyed to him, which argues that they had a desire to starve him: the Prophet saith, 'It is better to die by the sword, than famine,' which is the greatest of all torments; for all punishments may be undergone by patience, but only hunger: which the more any man thinks by patience to overcome, the more violent it is. Undoubtedly, had it not been for the pity of some poor resolute fellow-prisoners, Mr. Lilburn had been starved to death; far worse than any of the four Roman punishments, which were lapidatio, combustio, decollatio, strangulatio, stoning, burning, beheading, and strangling. How severely, yet most justly, did the same judges several times punish the intent to poison or destroy another man? The going about to murder, nay, the giving of the lye, because it is preparatory to murder, by provoking quarrels, was censurable in that court; à multo fortiori, much more from the stronger, then in this case used, where there was so much cruelty inflicted, that death might probably have ensued, had not God by his extraordinary mercy supported him in those sad afflictions, those unjust judges for transgressing not only the bonds of humanity, but all the rules of their own ordinary justice, ought to make Mr. Lilburn answerable satisfaction. 3. This Imprisonment was for about three years, until he petitioned the parliament. Many times the first motions of anger are not in a man's own power; because he would not accuse himself as they desired, they might have in a passion committed him, and the sun might have gone down upon their wrath; nay, the moon might have made her peragrations, or the summer season might have melted their frozen consciences, or the winter cold have allayed the heat of their malice, or the sun might have made his revolution, but their malice continued three years, and had not he been delivered by the justice of the parliament, in probability might have continued for ever.

(2.) Whipping, a most painful and shameful punishment; flagellations and scourgings being for slaves and incorrigible rogues, and hedge-robbers. In 11 Elizabeth one Cartwright brought a slave from Russia, and would scourge him cruelly, for which he was questioned; and it was resolved, that England was too pure an air for slaves to breathe in; and it was often resolved in the Star-Chamber, that no gentleman was to be whipped for any offence whatsoever: it being well known that John Lilburn's ancestors have been ancient gentlemen; and that which these Judges could not be ignorant of, especially the Earl-Marshall, who is presumed to know all the ancient gentry in the kingdom. But the like whipping was never read of amongst the Assyrians, Persians, Grecians, or Romans. For, 1. It was from the Fleet to Westminster (above a mile distance) a great concourse and confluence of people looking upon him, as if he had been some miserable slave. 2. He received every two or three steps a blow, 500 strokes at the least for one Mr. Smith, a merchant, that went along with him, testified that so far as he was able to judge, he received 500 or 1000, but of the first he was most certain; and this was with a treble-corded whip, with at least twenty knots upon it.

Amongst the Romans no malefactor had ever above 40 stripes, and every stroke stood for three stripes, for the whip was of three thongs: and but one knot at the end of every thong. St. Paul received thirty-nine stripes which was but thirteen blows. Not long since in Orleans, a priest was sentenced to be whipped for fornication, having abused a poor maid, telling her that their popish St. Francis would come and lie with her such a night, a which time he personated and feigned himself to be St. Francis, and was taken in bed with her; and it was earnestly pressed by the king's Advocates, that he might receive 14 blows with a three-corded whip, which is constantly used for such castigations, because it was an abominable wickedness: but the Judges would not suffer him to have above 13 blows, because ampliandi sunt favores, favours are to be enlarged. And in doubtful matters it must always be presumed for clemency and gentleness; according to which account, Mr. Lilburn received 10,000 stripes: for in every blow there was 20 stripes, by reason of the 20 knots, which being multiplied is 10,000, and in every stripe there was shame and pain, compression of the flesh, bruising and effusion of blood.

(3.) The Pillory, a punishment something painful, but exceeding shameful, and most terrible to a generous nature, to stand two hours in open view of all men, as if he had been unworthy to tread upon the earth, the sun shining very hot upon him, and not suffered to keep on his hat; and this immediately after his cruel whipping, that so they might put him to all torture and pain that they could, argues abundance of wrath and malice. This punishment of standing upon the pillory, was first invented for Mountebanks and Cheats, that having gotten upon banks and forms, to wrong and abuse the people, were exalted in the same kind, to stand conspicuous to the view and open shame of the people; but for a gentleman to be so served, was never heard of, unless by that cruel court.

(4.) Gagging, an unmanly and barbarous cruelty, to be exercised upon beasts, not men, for man differs from brutes both ratione et oratione, in reason and speech; a punishment never heard of in any age; cutting out of tongues, and perforation, in cases of blasphemy have been heard of, but never in a matter of such a nature; and this to continue for above an hour, till the blood gushed out of his mouth, as if they would have plucked his jaws in pieces, and all this for nothing; O insufferable torments!

So that by his Imprisonment he was made a stock, a dead trunk, or picture of a man, that hath eyes and sees not, hands and handles not, &c. By Whipping they endeavoured to make him a rogue, or a slave; by the third punishment of the Pillory, to make him a cheater, guilty of forgery and perjury; and by Gagging, to make him a beast, and so upon the whole matter to deprive him of his reasonable soul, such cruelties that were never invented but by tygers and wolves in human shapes 'ferocitas luporum, in humana figura.' But then the persons that were so cruel and tyrannical aggravates the offence. 1. This cruelty was commanded to be executed by an eminent court of justice, professing christianity, 'Pessima est injustitia quæ fit sub colore justitiæ: it is the greatest injustice to oppress and do injury, under a pretence of justice. How often was it resolved in that court, that for a justice of peace or constable to commit a riot, was ten times more severely punishable than in a common person, because it is to use, or rather abuse that sword of authority, to commit or countenance an unlawful action, which was ordained and put into their hands to suppress it.

2. The eminency of the persons augments the offence, 'qualitas personæ auget peccatum;' for a gentleman to act against the rule of the law and gentility, is more reprehensible than in vulgar persons. It was called the Court of Star-Chamber, from the eminency of the persons, which were Judges: stars of the greater magnitudes, as being the highest court of ordinary justice; but Mr. Lilburn's Judges, instead of putting on the garment of justice, were clothed from head to feet, and their conscience oiled and moistened, with cruelty and injustice mixed with the most poisoned malice that ever entered into the hearts of any judges. And though some of them be dead, yet Justice lives though the party be dead: whatsoever becomes of them, their estates ought to make satisfaction according to their own rules, 'qui non luet in corpore, solvit in bursa;' he that suffers not in his body, must suffer in his purse.

A principal actor in this bloody tragedy, was the Lord-Keeper Coventry, not less eminent in cruelty than in place, judge of the highest seat of mercy, the Chancery, which abated the edge of the law, when it is too keen; for the chief Judge of mercy to degenerate into a savage cruelty, not heard of amongst the Barbarians, how heinous is it? Not to speak any thing of the decapitated archbishop, that monster of cruelty, and subtlety, whose estate we fear is dead with him, and therefore little can be expected from it.

The bishop of London, then Lord-Treasurer, was a principal sentencer of Mr. Lilburn: by their own canons, no bishop ought to have a hand in blood, because they pretend to be mild shepherds, but cruelty was their genius.

The earl of Arundel was of an imbittered spirit against Mr. Lilburn, nothing but corporal punishment would allay the heat of his malice; who being Earl-Marshal, could not be ignorant that John Lilburn was a gentleman: for him that by his place was to protect all gentlemen from injuries, and should scorn to be active in the inflicting such corporal, ignominious, cruel punishments upon a gentleman, is a transcend-ent transgression against the laws of state and honour. It hath been censurable in that court, to speak contemptuous words of a gentleman: and how often had he ordered satisfaction, for saying such a one is no gentleman? And yet the same court and persons not only to say a gentleman is a rogue, but so to use him, as Mr. Lilburn was, is the greatest scandal to the public justice of the kingdom, that hath been heard of.

The Judges assistants, that are called the 'Fathers of the Law,' and are said to carry law in their breasts, for them to begin and promote such an unjust and illegal Sentence, for them that are set as centinels to watch over and preserve the people's liberties, to betray a poor gentleman into the hands of merciless men, was an offence of an exceeding high nature: for had they declared the illegality of those proceedings, and protested against it, as by virtue of their places (in duty) they ought to have done, it might have prevented the sentence. If the proceeding had been regular by Informations, and Examinations, or ore tenus, as it was not, unless there had been some direct proof or speaking circumstance of very probable presumption, that Mr. Lilburn had been guilty of some high crime; it had been a grievous thing in them to have assisted in so cruel punishments. But when the pretence was no other, but concerning some of Dr. Bastwick's, Mr. Burton's or Mr. Prynne's Books, which they knew could not be any breach of the peace, and that in the Star-Chamber, where there was no information, as in Mr. Lilburn's case, to administer an Oath, was all one with the High-Commission, and directly contrary to the Petition of Right, in 3 Car. and Justice Jones had no reason for inflicting the corporal punishment.

But because Mr. Lilburn was a young man, therefore it was fit he should be punished: Is not this to turn Justice into wormwood? Such judges have ever been the most dangerous pests to a state and kingdom, and in former times, for less offence, most severely punished in their persons and estates. The lord Cottington thirsted exceedingly after the blood of this poor gentleman, and the high-commissioners had their hands as deep as any of the rest, in regard that by their warrant he was first committed: the most unjust and tyrannical that ever was heard of, to command a poor gentleman to be sent to prison, without convening him before them, or asking him whether he was guilty of any misdemeanor: a mere usurpation of authority, taking the sword of justice into their own hands, not caring to destroy a poor gentleman, so as they might curry favour with the prelates their grand patrons; those high-commissioners making themselves judges, gaolers, and executioners, and what not, to destroy the innocent.

It is considerable what punishment the Gaolers and Executioners of this cruel Sentence have deserved: for however if a writ be directed to a sheriff, commanding him to take the body of one who is a peer of the realm, or a privileged person, the officer is excused by his warrant; yet when punishments are clearly against the law of God, nature, and nations, which prohibit all such cruelties and inhumanities; to make them bleed for the blood of Mr. Lilburn, would be an honourable piece of justice, and a precedent of much safety to the subjects in after-times, and officers would not dare to be so unmercifully cruel; as the sheriffs smarted for the Ship-Money, though they had process from the Exchequer.

Mr. Lilburn's sufferings are beyond expression, and no honest heart but is feelingly sensible of every blow that was given him; in his Imprisonment, Whipping, Pillory, Gagging, Beatings, Hunger-bitings, and the Irons laid upon him, every true-hearted Englishman, that stands for the laws and liberties of the subject, was so used, and abused; for it might have been any such man's case, as well as his. His estate quite exhausted by their cruelties, his trade lost, whereby he gained his livelihood, being before that time in a hopeful way of a merchant, and well known to be very industrious in his calling; a man active for the public, and by his merits hath procured the title of lieutenant-colonel in the present wars: what damages the parliament will be pleased to adjudge and order him, he humbly submits to their great wisdoms and honourable justice: certainly not any of them would have suffered so much for ten thousand pounds.

It is the Lord's great mercy that he is yet alive, having conflicted with, and gone through such a sea of punishments and miseries. True it is, that in point of reparations, there is no proportion between money and such corporal punishments, to a generous spirit: yet as there was never more indignity and a greater dishonour to the justice of the kingdom, than by this wicked Sentence, and the cruel execution thereof; thereby proclaiming it to all the world that an English gentleman must be made a slave, to satisfy the malicious and virulent humours of a tyrannical court of justice:

So it will be a very great honour and reparation to the Public Justice of this land, to give and adjudge Mr. Lilburn exemplary and proportionable damages, to be levied out of the estates of his unjust and malicious Judges, through whose injustice he not only suffered such cruelties for three years, that not one of them would have suffered the like, nor received one of his stripes for many thousands; but lost his trade and livelihood.

The judicial law was blood for blood, an eye for an eye, tooth for tooth, &c. Daniel's accusers were cast into the den of lions, with their wives and children, though Daniel had no hurt by a miracle of mercy; by the equity and morality whereof, Mr. Lilburn ought to have good and proportionable reparation out of the estates of his unjust judges and tormentors who sought for his blood: but that God preserved him by his extraordinary love and favour.

That all drooping spirits may cheer up and be encouraged, that Justice will run down like a mighty stream, when it shall be executed upon the greatest offenders: as now there is good hopes that Mr. Lilburn shall by ordinance of parliament have speedily good damages, answerable to his great sufferings, ordered an adjudged him, to be raised out of the estate of his unjust judges, that may be paid unto him without further expence, who hath been at such extraordinary charges about the same, that so his reparation may be not only just, but seasonable, by which he shall be obliged to venture his life, and all that is dear to him, as formerly he hath done, for his honourable judges in parliament assembled.

Whereupon the Lords made the following Order:

' Die Veneris, 13 Feb. 1645.

' Whereas the cause of John Lilburn, gentleman, came this day to a hearing at the bar by his counsel, being transmitted from the house of commons, concerning a Sentence pronounced against him in the Star-Chamber, 15 Feb. anno 13 Car. reg. and after an examination of the whole proceedings, and a due consideration of the said Sentence; it is this day adjudged, ordered, and determined by the lords in parliament assembled, That the said Sentence, and all proceedings thereupon, shall forthwith be for ever totally vacated, obliterated, and taken off the file in all courts where they are yet remaining, as illegal, and most unjust, against the liberty of the subject, and law of the land, and Magna Charta, and unfit to continue upon record: And that the said Lilburn shall be for ever absolutely freed, and totally discharged from the said Sentence, and all proceedings thereupon, as fully and amply, as though never as such thing had been. And that all estate and process in the court of Exchequer, for levying of any Fine, (if any such be) shall be ‘wholly cancelled and made void; any thing to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding.’

‘JOH. BROWNE, Cl. Parl.’

But not assigning me any reparations in that Decree (the doing of which the house of commons left unto them, and the lords according to former custom looked upon to be their right in law to do), I prayed their assigning me particular reparations according to law and justice, out of the estate of my unjust judges, that had done me so much wrong; upon which new address to them, they did upon the 5th of March, 1645, order and decree, and assigned to be paid unto the said JOHN Lilburn, the sum of 2,000*l.* for his reparations, which for many reasons (as their being aiding in the wars to the king, &c.), they fixed upon the estates real and personal of Francis lord Cottington, sir Francis Windebank, and James Ingram, late Deputy-Warden of the Fleet; and afterwards by another Decree for the present levying thereof, out of their lands, at eight years purchase (as they were before the wars), with the allowance of interest at 8*l.* per cent. per ann. in case of obstruction; for all or any part of it: and to this purpose caused an Ordinance to be drawn up, which fully passed their house the 15, 20, and 27th of April, 1646, and afterwards transmitted it to the house of commons, where by reason of my bloody adversary old sir Henry Vane’s interests, and of my imprisonment by Manchester’s means in the Tower of London, it lay asleep till the 1st of August, 1648, at which time 7 or 8,000 of my true friends in London, signed and caused to be delivered a Petition to the House of Commons for my liberty, and the passing of the said Ordinance. Whereupon the house made this Order:

‘Die Martis, 1 Augusti 1648. Sir John Maynard, sir Peter Wentworth, lord Carre, col. Boswel, col. Ludlow, Mr. Holland, Mr. Copley.

‘It is referred to this committee, or any five of them, to consider how colonel John Lilburn may have such satisfaction and allowance for his sufferings and losses, as was formerly intended him by this house.

‘HENRY ELSYNGE, Cl. Parl. Dom. Com.’

Upon which Order I got the Committee to meet, and preferred a Petition to them. Upon which Petition, the Parliament having disposed of all that part of the lord Cottington’s Estate that I should have had, unto the lord Say, and also compounded with sir Francis Windebank’s heir; the said committee were pleased to fix it entirely upon the Lord-Keeper’s estate, as the principal guilty man; of which, when the young lord Coventry his son and heir, heard thereof in France, he came posting to England as in amaze, fearing what such a precedent might bring upon him, if his father’s Estate (then dead) should be compelled to make me satisfaction; he being so capital in injustice, that if that course should be taken, his estate left him by his father (if it were trebled) would not satisfy for his father’s palpable injustice committed in his life-time. And Manchester being in the said-Bryers with his father, being as unjust as the other, and having a brother, viz. George Montague, and other considerable interests in the house of commons, so plied their friends there, that they put a stop to the second reading of the aforesaid Ordinance. Which I first fully understood by the Speaker’s means, then my great pretended friend, who one day began to reason with a member of the house (and my special friend) about the unreasonableness to fix my reparations upon the Estate of the deceased lord Coventry; nay, or to give me any reparations at all out of the estates of those persons that did me wrong, for fear the precedents in time might reach to themselves: ‘For sir,’ said the Speaker, as the member told me, ‘if my son and heir should be liable in law, to make satisfaction to all those men (out of that estate I should leave him) that I have in the eye of the law wronged (by signing Warrants, Orders, and Decrees, by the command of my superiors) he would soon be a beggar, although I should leave him 5 or 6,000*l.* per annum;’ and therefore desired the said member’s concurrence with him. And for the clamorous importunity (as they called it) of me and my friends, to give me reparations; but yet to do it in such a way, that the precedent might not in future make themselves smart for their injustice to particular men. Of which, when the said member told me, he said, they were resolved to make the commonwealth my pay-master out of the public Treasury, and colour over the justness of it with this pretence, ‘That Cottington’s estate, &c. formerly assigned me, they had since disposed of for the commonwealth’s use to the lord Say; and therefore now it would be no injustice to the commonwealth (although in the Star-Chamber it never wronged me) to pay me my reparation.’ And so finding I was like to be baffled, I delivered the under-written to every individual member of the honourable house of commons.

‘The Humble REMEMBRANCE of Lieutenant Colonel John Lilburn, Sept. 4, 1648.

‘Honoured sir; Vouchsafe to take notice, and seriously to consider, That the first week this present parliament sat, which is now almost full 8 years ago, I presented an humble Petition to the house of commons, for justice and right against the cruel Judges of the High-Commission-Court, and the Star-Chamber; and I had the honour (the same day it was presented) to be one of the first prisoners in England that was set at liberty by this parliament, and also received a speedy, full, fair, and candid proceeding, in the hearing and examining my tyrannical sufferings: But by reason of multiplicity of public business, and other great obstructions, I have not as yet been able to attain to the full end of my legal and just expectation and right, viz. reparations for my long, sad, and tormenting sufferings, by the foresaid unjust and unrighteous Judges.—Be pleased also favourably to take notice, That upon the 1st August last, there was an humble Petition presented to the honourable house of commons, subscribed by many thousands of honest citizens, &c. humbly to desire you to put me in full possession of all your by-past just Votes about my foresaid sufferings. Upon reading and debating of which Petition, as in answer to that particular of it, your house were pleased to make this ensuing order :

‘Die Martis, 1 Augusti, 1648. Lord Carre, Sir John Maynard, Sir Peter Wentworth, Col. Boswel, Col. Ludlow, Mr. Copley, Mr. Holland.

‘It is referred to this Committee, or any five of them, to consider how Colonel John Lilburn may have satisfaction and allowance for his sufferings and losses, as was formerly intended him by his house.

Unto which said Committee at their first sitting, I presented a Petition; the Copy of which thus followeth :

‘To the Honourable the Committee of the House of Commons, appointed to consider of Lieut. Col. Lilburn’s Business, in reference to the Star-Chamber; The Humble PETITION of Lieut. Col. JOHN LILBURN.

‘Sheweth; That besides your Petitioner’s sufferings by reason of his banishment into the Low-Countries, he was first committed by Dr. Lamb, Gwyn, Aylet, 1637, and afterwards had three years imprisonment, in the common gaol of the Fleet, being whipped from Fleet-Bridge to Westminster, and enduring the cruel torment of above 500 stripes with knotted cords. Afterwards being set in the pillory for the space of two hours, and by James Ingram, deputy-warden of the Fleet, gagged, tearing his jaws almost in pieces, without order; which Sentence was given by lord-keeper Coventry, earl of Manchester, lord-privy-seal, lord Newburgh, sir Henry Vane, sen. lord chief-justice Bramston, and judge Jones. And after the barbarous execution of this Sentence, being April 18, 1638, the said lord Coventry, archbishop of Canterbury, bishop of London, earl of Manchester, earl of Arundel, earl of Salisbury, lord Cottington, lord Newburgh, secretary Cook, and Windebank, passed another Sentence, in effect for the starving of your petitioner, and for the tormenting of him with irons upon hands and legs both night and day; and by keeping him close in the common gaol of the Fleet, from the speech of any of his friends: All which was executed with the greatest cruelty that could be for the space of almost 3 years together, to the apparent hazard of his life, both by starving him (which was with all art and industry several ways attempted); and also by several assaults made upon him by the said Warden’s man (instigated thereunto by the said Deputy-Warden, to the maiming and wounding him, whereby to this day he is totally deprived of the use of two of his fingers): All which, with much more, too tedious to be here inserted, was fully proved by sufficient Witnesses, before a Committee of your house, whereof Mr. Francis Rouse had the chair; upon whose Report made, May 4, 1641, your house voted, ‘that the Sentence in the Star-Chamber given against the said John Lilburn, and all the proceedings thereupon, was illegal, and against the Liberty of the subject, and also, bloody, wicked, cruel, barbarous, and tyrannical; and that he ought to have good reparations therefore.’ Which Votes, by reason of multiplicity of business in your house, cost your Petitioner some years of importunate and chargeable attendance to get them transmitted to the Lords; which was obtained in February, 1645, the 19th day of which month, your Petitioner’s whole cause was effectually opened at the lords bar, by his learned counsel, Mr. John Bradshaw and Mr. John Cook; and there every particular again proved upon oath, by testimony of people of very good quality, whereupon they concurred in all things with the house of commons, saving in the matter of Reparation; but upon the delivery of a true Narrative, (which your petitioner with his own hands in the same month delivered unto every individual lord) they made a further Decree, that your Petitioner should have 2,000*l.* reparations out of the estates of the said lord Cottington, sir Francis Windebank, and James Ingraffi, for the reasons alledged in an Ordinance which they passed in April, 1646, and transmitted to your house; where it hath lain dormant ever since, and is now referred to the consideration of this honourable Committee.

‘Now, forasmuch as by the judicial laws of God, which are the pure laws of right reason, he that wilfully hurteth his neighbour is bound to the performance of these five things: 1. If it be a blemish or wound, like for like, or to redeem it with money, thereby to satisfy him for his wound. 2. For his pain and torment. 3. For the healing. 4. For his loss of time in his calling. 5. For the shame and disgrace.’ All which are to be considered according to the quality of the person damnified: Which reparations are to be paid out of the best of the goods of him that damnified him, and that without delay.

‘And as the law of God, so the laws of this nation do abhor, and have severely punished, above all persons, Judges, many unies with the loss of their lives and estates, who under colour of law have violated their oaths, and destroyed the lives, liberties and properties of the people, whom by law they should have preserved: as may be instanced by the 44 Judges and Justices hanged in one year by king Alfred; divers of them for less crimes than hath been done in the case of your Petitioner; as may be read in the Law-Book called, ‘The Mirror of Justice,’ p 239, 240, 241, &c. translated and reprinted this very parliament: And by Justice Thorp, in Edw.

3's time, who was condemned to death for the violation of his oath, for taking small sums of money in causes depending before him; as appears in the third Part of Coke's Institutes, fol. 155, 156. And by the Lord Chief Justice Tresilian, &c. who in fullparliament in Rich. 2's time, was attached as a Traitor in the forenoon, and had his throat cut at Tyburn in the afternoon, because he had given it under his hand, that the king might create unto himself, at his pleasure, another rule to walk by, than the law of the land prescribes him; as appears by the Parliament Records in the Tower, by many of your own Declarations, and also by the Chronicles of England.

Now, for as much as your Petitioner's sufferings have been unparalleled, and his prejudice sustained thereby altogether unrepairable, having lost his limbs, &c. And forasmuch as by the law of God, nature, and nations, reparations for hurts and damages received, ought to be satisfied as far as may be in all persons, though done by accident, and not intentionally, and though through ignorance: much more when the persons offending did it knowingly, and on purpose, in the face, nay, in spite of the fundamental laws of the land, which they were sworn to preserve: And for that the reparations in the said ordinance assigned do scarce amount to what your Petitioner spent in his three years sad captivity, and his now almost eight years chargeable attendance, in suing for it, besides the loss of a rich and profitable trade for eleven years together, and his wounds, torments, smart and disgrace, sustained by his said tyrannical sentences.

He therefore humbly prayeth the favour and justice of this honourable Committee for some considerable augmentation of his said Reparations; and the rather, because his fellow-sufferer, Dr. Bastwick, had 4,000*l.* Reparations allotted him, whose sufferings, he submissively conceive, was nothing nigh so great, in torment, pain, and shame, as your Petitioner's. And forasmuch as the now lord Coventry, son and heir to the aforesaid lord Coventry, hath walked in his father's steps, in enmity to the laws, liberties, and freedom of the nation: By being in arms at the beginning of the wars against the parliament, and made his peace with the earl of Essex for a small matter, and hath since deserted the kingdom, living in France privately, receiving the profits of a vast estate which his father left him: And forasmuch as his said father (the late lord Coventry) was the activist man in infringing the laws and liberties of the nation; although a lawyer and judge, sitting on the supreme seat of justice; and a person, as is groundedly conceived, who got a great estate by corruption, and particularly a man that principally passed, as chief judge of the court, both the aforesaid sentences against your Petitioner: And in regard the estates of the said lord Cottington, and sir Francis Windesbank, by subsequent orders of both houses upon urgent occasions, are much entangled and altered from the condition they were in in 1646, when the lords ordered your Petitioner 2,000 marks out of them; and for that the estate of James Ingram cannot be found, nor at present come by: Your Petitioner, therefore, most humbly prayeth, that the greatest part, if not all your Petitioner's Reparations, may be fixed upon the said now lord Coventry's estate, to be immediately paid your Petitioner; or else that his rents, and the profits of his woods and goods, may be seized in the respective counties where they lie, for the satisfying thereof; that your Petitioner may no longer run the hazard of ruin to him and his, by tedious delays, having already contracted the debts of many hundred pounds, occasioned by the chargeable prosecution hereof. And that if you shall think fit to conjoin any other with him, that it may be principally the judges of the law; who ought to have been pilots and guides unto the rest of the judges of that court, who were lords, and persons not knowing the law. And your Petitioner shall ever pray, &c.

JOHN LILBURN.

After the reading of which, they entered into a serious debate of the whole business, and thereupon passed several Votes to be heads of an Ordinance, to be drawn up and reported to the house, by the right hon. the lord Carr, chairman to the said committee; who accordingly reported the Proceedings and Votes of the said committee to your house, who approved of the said Votes, and ordered an Ordinance to be presented to the house consonant thereto, which was accordingly done by the lord Carr; which Ordinance hath been once read in your house: The copy of which thus follows:

An Ordinance of the Lords and Commons assembled in parliament, for the raising of 3,000*l.* out of the real estate of the late Thomas lord Coventry, late Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of England, for and towards the reparation and damages of John Lilburn, gent. which he sustained by virtue, and colour of two Sentences given and made against him, in the late Court of Star-Chamber, the one the 13th Feb. 1637, the other the 18th April, 1638.

Whereas the cause of John Lilburn gent. concerning two Sentences pronounced against him in the late court of Star-Chamber, 13th of February, 13 Car. regis, and 18th of April, 14 Car. regis, were voted the 4th of May 1641, by the house of commons, to be illegal, and against the liberty of the subject, and also bloody, wicked, cruel, barbarous, and tyrannical, which were transmitted from the said house of commons unto the house of lords; who thereupon, by an order or decree, by them made 13th of Feb. 1645, adjudged and declared the said proceedings of the said Star-Chamber, against the said John Lilburn, to be illegal and most unjust, and against the liberty of the subject, and Magna Charta, and unfit to continue upon record, &c. And by another order or decree, made by them the said lords the 5th of March 1645, they assigned to be paid unto the said John Lilburn the sum of 2,000*l.* for his reparations; and the said house of peers then fixed that sum upon the estates real and personal of Francis lord Cottington, sir Francis Windebank, and James Ingram*, late deputy-warden of the Fleet: and afterwards for the present levying thereof, with allowance of interest, in case of obstructions, while the same should be in levying, and of such parts as should not be forthwith levied; the said house of peers did cause an ordinance to be drawn up, and passed the same in their house, the 27th of April 1646, and afterwards transmitted the same to the house of commons for their concurrence; with whom it yet dependeth. And forasmuch as since that transmission, all, or the greatest, of the estates of the said lord Cottington, and sir Francis Windebank, is since by both houses disposed of to other uses; and the estate of the said James Ingram is so small and weak, and so entangled with former incumbrances, that it can afford little or no part unto the said John Lilburn of the said reparations: And for that the said late lord Coventry was the principal judge, and chief actor, in giving of both the said illegal Sentences in the said court of Star-Chamber; and for the barbarous inflicting of punishments thereupon. Therefore, and for satisfaction of the said 2,000*l.* and for the increase of reparation unto the said John Lilburn for his extraordinary wrongs, sufferings, and losses thereby sustained, and the long time hitherto elapsed without any satisfaction; the lords and commons assembled in parliament do ordain, and be it hereby ordained by the said lords and commons, and by authority of the same; That the said John Lilburn shall receive the sum of 3,000*l.* out of all, or any the manors, messuages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, whereof he, the said late Thomas lord Coventry, or any other person or persons to or for his use, or in trust for him, was or were seized in fee-simple, or fee-tail, or otherwise, at the time of the said sentences or decrees, or of either of them, in the said late court of Star-Chamber, or since within the kingdom of England, or dominion of Wales, any order or ordinance heretofore made by either or both houses of parliament for the employment of the estate of the said late Thomas lord Coven-try to the contrary hereof, in any wise notwithstanding. And for the more speedy levying of the said sum of 3,000*l.* it is further ordered and ordained, that the several and respective sheriffs, of the several and respective counties within England and Wales, wherein any of the said lands, tenements, or hereditaments do lie, shall forthwith upon sight, and by virtue of this ordinance, cause an inquisition to be made and taken, by the oaths of 12 or more lawful men, where the same lands do lie, and what the same are and do contain, and of the clear yearly value thereof, over and above all charges and reprises: and after such inquisition so made and taken, the several and respective sheriffs shall deliver unto the said John Lilburn true copies in parchment of the same inquisitions by them taken, and shall then also deliver unto the said John Lilburn the said lands, tenements, and hereditaments, which shall be so comprised or mentioned in the said inquisitions, to have and to hold, to him the said John Lilburn, and his assigns, without impeachment of waste: and until he shall have received out of the issues and profits thereof (to be estimated according to the yearly values contained in the said inquisitions) the said sum of 3,000*l.*; together with all reasonable charges and expences to be sustained from henceforth for obtaining the said sum of 3,000*l.* And all and every the said several and respective sheriffs, and all other person and persons whatsoever, that shall any ways act or assist in obedience to this ordinance, according to the true intent and meaning thereof, shall be therefore defended and kept harmless, by the authority of both houses of parliament.

Be pleased to take further notice that after the foresaid Ordinance was once read, it came to a debate in your house for to be read the second time, which was carried in the negative by a majority of voices; and I cannot but apprehend that there were divers in the house unsatisfied in the ordinance itself, in regard the house was divided upon the debate and vote, which I cannot but apprehend must flow from one of these two considerations: First, either because that the whole reparations is fixed upon the lord Coventry's estate singly, who had many co-partners in the sentences, and who also it may be supposed hath expiated his crime by his death. Or else, secondly, because in some men's thoughts, some of my late actions are, or have been so evil in themselves, that they may seem to them to over-balance the merits of all my ancient sufferings.

* But the lord Roberts, the lord Wharton, &c. told me several times, if their estates had not been under sequestration by ordinance of parliament, they would never have gone about to fix my reparations by ordinance, (which they must needs then do, to take off the sequestration) but have issued out a decree and extent under the Great Seal, immediately to have put me in present possession of my 2,000*l.* which they said was their right by law to do.

However, on my presenting my Reasons to the house for reading it, my Ordinance was called for to be read the second time, which Elysinge the clerk pretended he had laid ready upon the table before him; but what betwixt his knavery, old Henry Vane's, the Speaker's, and young Montague's, my Ordinance was stolen, and could never after be found: so that I was sent to out of the house to get another fair copy writ over presently; which being long in doing, my friends went away, not expecting it would any more be meddled with that day, so that when most of them were gone, my adversaries took the advantage to call for it, and in a thin house read it the second time, and upon debate threw it out of doors; and at present to stop my mouth, voted me 300*l.* ready money (as they pretended) out of sir Charles Kemisse's Composition, to enable me for present subsistence, and to follow my business; and also made this further Order:

'Die Martis, Sept. 5, 1648. Ordered by the commons assembled in parliament, that the sum of 3,000*l.* be allowed and paid unto lieutenant. col. John Lilburn, for reparation of his damages sustained by colour of the Sentences given against him in the late court of Star-Chamber, where lord Carr had the chair, with the addition of sir John Danvers, and colonel Rigby, to consider of, and present to this house an Ordinance for settling of lands to him and his heirs, to the value of 3,000*l.* at 12 years purchase, out of the estates of new delinquents in the insurrections, not yet sequestered.

'H. ELSYNGE, Cler. Parl. Com. Dom.'

Of which when I fully understood, I was troubled, but knew not how to help myself; and having already met with so many difficulties, and received so many baffles as I had done, I thought it was better (being almost wearied out with struggling) to take half a loaf, than to go away without any bread at all. So after many petitions and letters to the sequestrators, &c. the committee caused an Ordinance to be drawn up.

But when my Ordinance came to the lords, they disabled me to cut down any more timber trees than what were already felled, which I judged fitter for me to content myself with, than to struggle any longer to get it pass, as the house of commons had sent it up. So the lords in two or three days dispatched it, and sent it down to the house of commons for their concurrence, according to those abridgments they had made in it: and taking my opportunity to speak to those in the house of commons I had interest in, I intreated them to dispute it no more, but pass it as the lords had gelded it; and accordingly they did; the Copy of which thus followeth:

'Die Jovis, 21 Dec. 1648. An Ordinance of the lords and commons assembled in parliament, for raising of 3,000*l.* out of the sequestered estates and compositions of sir Henry Gibb, knight; and sir Henry Bellingham, knight and baronet; and Thomas Bowes, esq., lying and being within the county of Durham; to be paid unto lieutenant. col. John Lilburn, by the Committee of Sequestrations of the said county, for an towards the Reparation and Damages of the said John Lilburn, which he sustained by virtue and colour of two unjust Sentences, or Decrees, given and made against him in the late Court of Star-Chamber, the one the 13th Feb. 1637, the other the 18th April, 1638.

'Whereas the cause of lieutenant. col. John Lilburn, concerning two Sentences pronounced against him in the late court of Star-Chamber, the 13th Feb. decimo 13 Car. regis, and the 18th April, 14 Car. regis, (which were voted the 4th of May, 1641, by the house of commons, to be illegal, and against the liberty of the subject, and also bloody, wicked, cruel, barbarous and tyrannically) were transmitted from the said house of commons unto the house of lords; in which the house of peers concurred in judgment; and the 13th Feb. 1645, declared the said proceedings of the said Star-Chamber, against the said John Lilburn, to be illegal, most unjust, and against the liberty of the subject, and law of the land, and Magna Charta, and unfit to continue upon record, &c. The said lords and commons taking into their serious consideration, the extraordinary sufferings and barbarous tyranny, that by colour of the said unjust decrees were inflicted upon the said lieutenant. col. John Lilburn; and the long time hitherto elapsed without any satisfaction, do concern it most just, equitable and reasonable, to repair him in some considerable manner: and therefore, in pursuance of two orders of the house of commons, one of the 22d Aug. 1648, and the other of the 5th Sept. 1648, have ordained; and be it hereby ordained by the lords and commons assembled in parliament, and by the authority of the same; That the said John Lilburn shall have and receive the sum of 3,000*l.* to be paid unto him or his assigns, by the committee of sequestrations for the county of Durham, out of the first profits of the sequestered estates, both lands and goods of sir Henry Gibb, knight; sir Henry Bellingham, knight and baronet; and Thomas Bowes, esq. lying and being in the county of Durham, having been active in the late Northern insurrections, and aiding and assisting to the most wicked invasion of duke Hamilton. And the said committee are hereby authorized to sell all such woods (except timber-trees now standing) as may conveniently be spared, and now standing upon the said lands (or already felled, or any of them. And if the said sir Henry Gibb, sir Henry Bellingham, and Thomas Bowes, or any of them shall compound for their estate, so much of the said 3,000*l.* as then shall remain unsatisfied shall be paid unto the said John Lilburn, or his assigns, out of their, or the first of their compositions. And this ordinance or copy thereof, attested under the hand or hands of the clerk, or clerks, of one or both houses of parliament, shall be a sufficient warrant to the said committee of sequestrations in the said county of Durham to pay the said 3,000*l.* as is before expressed, unto the said John Lilburn or his assigns; and likewise to indemnity and save harmless, all and every person or persons, that shall any way act in the performance of the true intent and meaning of this Ordinance.

'JOH. BROWN, Cler. Parliamentar.

However, lieutenant. col. Lilburne, after great trouble and much expence, got but little of the money ordered him.

' BEFORE this time, that is to say, upon Thursday next after the Octaves of the Holy Trinity in the said term, before our sovereign lord the king at Westminster, upon the oath of twelve Jurors, it is presented, That whereas the court of our lord the king of Common Pleas is, and from the time to the contrary of which there is no memory of man, hath been an antient court of record of our said now lord the king and his progenitors and ancestors, kings and queens of England, for the administration of justice to the subjects of this kingdom of England, and others in Common Pleas, moved and arising through all the kingdom of England: And whereas it is against the crown and dignity of the king's majesty, and against the law and custom of this kingdom of England, for any person or persons to disturb the court aforesaid, or any Justices of the said court, the said court being open, and the Judges of the said court being present, and judicially sitting: And whereas Richard Hutton knight is, and for divers years now last past hath been, and yet is one of the Justices of our said now lord the king of this court: nevertheless one Thomas Harrison of Creeke in the county of Northampton, clerk, not having God before his eyes, but by the instigation of the Devil moved and seduced, maliciously with himself imagining, and in his mind compassing by what means he might, the aforesaid Richard Hutton knight, there and then, and yet being one of the Justices of our said now lord the king of the Common Pleas aforesaid, many ways to defame and scandalize, and contriving and maliciously intending, as much as was in his power, to bring the said Richard Hutton into scandal, ignominy, contempt, and vile character, and the said Richard Hutton of his life and goods and chattels, lands and tenements, wickedly and maliciously to deprive; as also the displeasure and indignation of our said now lord the king against the said Richard Hutton to stir up and provoke, and using his utmost endeavour to make the said Richard Hutton be held and esteemed a Traitor as well by our said lord the king and the peers of this kingdom of England, as by all the loyal subjects of our said lord the king: And the aforesaid court of our said now lord the king of Common Pleas, and the justices of our said lord the king of the said court in the said court being present, and judicially sitting to

Mr. Serjeant Heath. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury do hear, that by reading of the record, that there is an Indictment preferred on the behalf of the king against Thomas Harrison who is now at the bar, and that it is for a notable and insolent Contempt in this hall against justice Hutton and the laws of this kingdom. The Indictment sets it out thus: That the court of Common Pleas is an ancient court, and that it is against the crown and dignity of the king, and the Courts of Justice, that when the said courts were sitting, they or any of the ministers of the said court shall be disturbed. It is further said, that Mr. Justice Hutton is, and for many years last past hath been one of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas; and that the Defendant who is now at the bar (Mr. Har-risson, a clerk) being moved with malice against the person of Mr. Justice Hutton, and intending to bring Mr. Justice Hutton into the king’s high displeasure, and to hazard the losing of his life and his estate, and the forfeiture of his goods, and to disturb the peace of the king, and the court of justice sitting, did falsely and maliciously the 4th of May last in Westminster-hall in the city of Westminster, the court being sitting, this court and the court of Chancery, and the court of Common Pleas, this defendant, boldly, audaciously, and maliciously, did rush to the bar of the said court of Common Pleas, Mr. Justice Hutton and Mr. Justice Crawley then and there sitting, there attending to the service of the said court, there with a loud voice spake to Mr. Justice Hutton sitting as a judge: ‘I do accuse Mr. Justice Hutton of high treason.’ This offence being committed in this manner and in this place, and with such a boldness, is laid to be of a high nature, and to the contempt of the crown, and dignity of all the courts of justice, where the king is wholly interested. Whether this offence may be punished, that is the force and intent of this Indictment. My lords, to this the Defendant hath pleaded Not Guilty: we that be of the king’s counsel shall make it appear, that Justice Hutton with High-Treason. He charged him first with denying the king's Supremacy, next with moving the people to Sedition; and these be the points on which he charged him with High-Treason, as aforesaid. Farther, he was asked why he charged him with the first, and how he doth deny the king's Supremacy: He answers, For that by common fame upon Saturday last in the Exchequer-Chamber he did deliver his opinion, that the king had no lawful power to levy the Ship-Money. Being asked whether he heard the Argument; he answered, He heard it not, but received it from the common report of others. Being further asked why he charged him with stirring up the people to Sedition; he answered, That was because by the report of divers near to the place where this Examinant dwells, the people go on more and more in their stubbornness, refusing the paying of Ship-Money; the which is contrary to the opinion of all the Orthodox divines of this kingdom; and in that Mr. Justice Hutton riding that circuit, hath given the people such an encouragement to their disobedience. Being farther asked, whether any other person did know of this his intent; he answered, that there were two other persons with him, but they did not know any thing of his intentions, till they heard it spoken at the bar. Being asked why he made choice of this public way; the reason he saith was, because he delivered his opinion publicly, therefore he thought that to be the best way; and if it had been done in a private way, he thought it fit to acquaint him with it in a private way.

THOMAS HARRISON.

Mr. Attorney. May it please your lordship, and you of the jury, the prisoner at the bar, Mr. Harrison, stands indicted of a very foul and horrible offence, of a forged accusation framed and contrived out of his own brain. It should seem it was out of some rotten and inveterate malice, a thing for which there is no colour nor appearance of truth, and he confesseth it was upon the ground of common fame. Now you know what common fame is, a mendax: he charged this reverend judge, as you have heard, that he did deny the king's Supremacy; and the reason was, because he heard by common fame, that the Judge had delivered his opinion, that the king had no power to levy Ship-Money. Secondly, because he stirreth up the king's subjects to Sedition; and he giveth that for a reason, in that the people of Northampton do go on in the denial of the payment of Ship-Money.

My lord, it is a heavy thing to accuse any man of Treason, whereby he shall forfeit his lands and goods, and lose his life: and surely by the old law, this false Accuser should undergo the same punishment as he should, that is accused, if found guilty.

My lord, the place of a Judge is a place of great honour and trust: of Honour, for they be reckoned in the old statutes among the magnates regni. 2 Ric. 2, &c. And these people that be the authors and publishers of these base Scandals, they are reckoned to be the sowers of discord, and are subverters of the peace of the commonwealth. And surely if Mr. Harrison had looked upon these Statutes, he would have been better advised: Of Trust, for he is trusted with the administration of equal justice between the king and his subjects, and the lives, fortunes, and estates of men. Therefore being a place of so great honour and trust, the scandal is the greater; and offences and crimes against them have been punished not with ordinary punishment.

25 Ed. 3, 1 pr. It is declared to be Treason to kill a Judge in execution of his office. Our books say, That if one draw a weapon upon a Judge sitting in judicature, though he strike him not, he shall be imprisoned during life, and forfeit his goods and lands, and lose his right hand.—Though the offence be not done to the Judge, yet being in the judges presence (the courts sitting), as if one strike a juror, or any other person in Westminster-hall, sitting in the courts, it hath been punished with the loss of hand, goods, and lands during life; this appeareth, 19 Ed. 3. Judgment, 174, 22 Ed. 3, 13 Mich. 6 Ed. 3. Coram rege, rot. 55. Stamford's Pleas of the Crown, 38.

The Offence of Mr. Harrison is not for accusing Judge Hurton, or any other, of Treason, for God forbid but that should be lawful where there is just cause; but to do it without any colour of ground, and to forge a false accusation out of his own brain, and to act in such an insolent and mad way against a reverend judge, sitting in the seat of judgment, this is the offence.

37 Hen. 6, 3. If one call another Traitor, an appeal lieth before the constable and marshal; and if the appellant be killed in battle, it is justifiable.

30 lib. Ass. One called Justice Seaton Traitor, and answered well in damages, as appeareth more at large in the Record than in the Printed Book.

Mich. 5 Car. in Banco Regis, Nich. Jeoffes was indicted and fined in the King's-Bench, for writing a Petition, wherein he said the lord chief justice Coke was a Traitor.

Treasons are declared by the statute 25 Ed. 3, and then this gentleman may expound a Text, he cannot expound Statutes, for this is proper for the judges of the realm. He is not to judge what is treason, and what not: 'Tractent fabrilis fabri;' let him keep himself within the compass of his own profession.

This Offence is 'contra Coronam et Dignitates,' and the scandals against the king's Judges and Ministers trench upon the king himself; and therefore his royal majesty, detesting this odious and foul fact in the prisoner at the bar, hath commanded us his counsel to give Evidence. The person of the party accused is best known to your lordships to be a most grave, honest, learned, and reverend Judge, and I presume, free from any thought of Treason.

Mich' 33. 34 Ed. 1. In this court, rot. 75, there was Roger de Heigham gave Judgment against one De Bruce in the Exchequer-Chamber. This De Bruce was of a noble family: He asked this Roger, whether he would avow the Judgment, and he told him Yes. Now, says De Bruce, thou hast thy will, which of long time thou hast sought: The Judge asked him what was that? He said, My shame and loss, and this I will think on. For this offence, in a kind of implicit way taxing the Judge of injustice, he was indicted, and confessed the Indictment, as Mr. Harrison doth: The judgment was, That he should be committed, and there to remain during the king's pleasure, besides a great fine. The Record saith, 'Et quia sicut ratione officii sui faciuntur, ipsi regi attribuntur, sic dedecus et contemptus ministris suis fact. eidem domino regi inferuntur, considerat' tum est quod predictus Willielmus de Bruce districtus in corpore, capite nudo, toga deposita eat à Banco domini regis ubi placita tenebantur in Aula Westmonasterii per medium Aulæ predictæ cum curia plena fuerit, usque ad Scac. ubi deliquit et ibidem veniam petat à præfato Rogero, &c. Et postea committatur Turri London. ibidem moretur ad voluntatem regis.'

My Lords, This Offence, which was offered to the person of a most reverend, learned, and honest Judge, by the rules of our Books, is a scandal done to the king himself, if there be no colour nor ground why he should take upon him to make this bold and impudent assertion. I doubt not but you will maintain the honour of a Judge, and punish this Delinquent according to his demerits. His offence contained in the Indictment, is confessed in his Examination, and by himself ore tenus; therefore you of the Jury need not depart from the bar.

Whereupon the Jury immediately gave in a Verdict, that he was guilty of the Indictment.

Mr. Attorney General. Now, my lord, I desire Judgment.

Upon which the Court pronounced the following Sentence: 'That he should pay a Fine to the king of 5000*l.* and be imprisoned during the king's pleasure, and should have a Paper upon his head, shewing his Offence, and go therewith to all the courts of Westminster, and make his Submission in every court in Westminster-Hall, and in the Exchequer: For it is an offence to every court.'

Afterwards Justice Hutton brought an action for these Words against Harrison, in which he recovered 10,000*l.* Damages.

*Another Account of the above TRIAL from TANNER'S MSS. in the

The following Account of the above Case, in the hand-writing of Archbishop Sancroft, is taken from a volume among Tanner's MSS. in the Bodleian Library at Oxford.

PROCEEDINGS UPON THE INFORMATION AGAINST THOMAS HARRISON, CLERK, AT THE KING'S-BENCH BAR. 4 JUDII, 1638.

Upon the Indictment it was declared, that the Common-Pleas is an antient court, that it is against the crown and laws of this kingdom to disturb the court, the Judges judicially sitting; that, notwithstanding, Thomas Harrison, clerk, did wickedly and maliciously defame sir Richard Hutton, knight, one of the Judges of that Court, and then judicially sitting there, seeking to deprive him of his life, goods, and chattels, and to procure the high displeasure of the king, and cause him to be accounted Traitor both by our sovereign lord the king, his peers, and all his subjects. That upon the 4th day of May, anno 14 R. the said Thomas Harrison did by force and arms violently rush to the bar of the said court of Common Pleas, and there accused the said sir Richard Hutton of High-Treason, openly, publicly, and with a high voice pronouncing these words: "I do accuse Mr. Justice Hutton of High-Treason;" to the manifest scandal of all the courts of justice, and to the grievous scandal and damage of the said sir Richard Hutton.

Mr. Attorney declared, that Mr. Harrison had committed a notable and insolent contempt, to the disturbance of the court of Common-Pleas, an antient and a high court, for the administration of justice between subject and subject, with a wicked and malicious intent to bring Mr. Justice Hutton into the king's high displeasure, and into danger of his life and estates, an offence of a high nature against the crown, and against the dignity of all courts of justice.

His Examination was here read, wherein he did confess the words. The points of treason wherewith he did charge Justice Hutton, were two: 1. For denying the King's Supremacy. 2. For seducing the king's subjects to Sedition. The ground of his first Charge was, that he had heard by common fame, that Mr. Justice Hutton did as a Judge deliver his opinion, that the king could not lawfully levy the Ship-Money. The ground of his second Charge was, that by report near his dwelling, and upon his own knowledge the people of the county of Northampton do deny to pay the Ship-Money, being moved thereunto by some treasonable words, which Judge Hutton did deliver in his Charge at the Assizes there against the lawful levying thereof, which is contrary to the orthodox opinion of all the loyal and well-learned preachers of this kingdom. Being asked by the Lord Chief Justice at his examination, why he made choice of so public a place to charge the Judge, he answered, because the Judge had committed a public treason.

Mr. Solicitor told the lords, that Mr. Harrison being demanded in prison, why he took no other ministers with him, when he spoke the words, he boastingly replied, he did it, that they might take an example of courage.

Mr. Attorney informed the court, that Mr. Harrison had forged a most wicked and malicious slander against Mr. Justice Hutton, wherein was neither colour, nor evidence. That by the old law, false accusers were to suffer the same punishment that the party accused should have suffered, if he had been found guilty; so hateful was this offence to our forefathers. But Mr. Harrison's offence was much aggravated, if we consider the person against whom it was committed, the high place of honour and trust wherein he is, his majesty having given him the trust of lie and member, of the persons and estates, of his subjects. Therefore a scandal against a person in such high honour and trust must needs deserve a most exemplary punishment; and then to do it in so barbarous and uncivil a way. But Mr. Harrison was much out of his trade to meddle with the laws of the kingdom, 'Tractent facta brilia fabri,' he may expound the scripture, but the common law hath given him no power to expound statutes, and acts of parliament. This offence doth concern the king himself. For that scandals cast upon the king's ministers are cast upon the king's justice. I shall now only desire your lordships to hold in mind, that this scandal was cast upon a most reverend and most learned, most honest and sage judge, and accordingly give your censures.

Mr. Harrison spake thus in his own defence. The reason why I pleaded Not Guilty, was not because I meant to deny the speaking of the words, but because no man can be guilty, that goeth about to defend the king. I confess that Judges are to be honoured and revered as sacred persons, but this is to be granted only so long as they hold themselves within the tenor of judges. They are then to be accounted but as other subjects. Indeed, I do not understand the common laws, nor do I go about to expound them; therefore, the charge of interpretation is laid a little too deeply. The oath of Supremacy I have divers times taken, and find myself bound to maintain it. And where any of the king's subjects have laboured to overthrow his royalty and supremacy, it is high time for any loyal subject to strike in, and to appeal the offender. Our usual phrase for the king's Supremacy is in all cases over all persons, and this is a case of Ship-Money.

Mr. Attorney. We shall not need to learn of you what the king's Supremacy is.

Mr. Harrison. A divine understands the Supremacy as well as a lawyer, and a great divine as well as a great lawyer.

L. C. J. Then we must observe, that the denying of Ship-Money is against the king's Supremacy.

Mr. Harrison. As a loyal subject, I did labour the defence of his majesty; and in the point of sedition, I find there is treason committed in that. For the people of the country where I live, do now refuse to pay the Ship-Money, upon Justice Hutton's Charge in that circuit. Our duties are to tell the people their duties. We find that the king may do it. The reason why I did so publicly charge the Judge, was, because there are such delays and such windings in the proceedings of all courts, and matters carried by favour and affection, that I thought a private insinuation would do little good, and besides the offence being openly committed, I conceived it not amiss to make a public and open accusation.

Mr. Attorney. This is a scandal to all the courts of justice.

L. C. J. Mr. Harrison, if you have any thing to say in your own defence, you shall be heard: but this raving must not be suffered.

Mr. Harrison. I am not ignorant that somebody* in this place is not a favourer, but rather a disfavoured, of my opinion, and that in the person of a Judge. As for Mr. Justice Hutton, though he be a man in great account, yet all his actions have not been approvable. Concerning the Judges arguing in the matter of Ship-Money, it was the king's gracious clemency, to have his power manifested by strength of arguments, and to that end was pleased to permit counsel on the adverse party, who urge arguments against it, and that the Judges shall be moderators. And the analogy holds very aptly, between this kind of arguing, and the public disputations upon points of divinity in the schools, where we have a moderator, whose office is, if the opponent urge any argument weakly, to urge it home, yet in the end he must determine for the truth. So here the Judges being moderators may urge arguments against the king, but yet in the end to conclude for the king's prerogative. And as neither king nor God will suffer any divine to conclude in heresy, so neither doth his majesty give his Judges leave to conclude in Sedition, nor have the Judges power to make or pronounce laws against the king's prerogative, but are our moderators in the case of arguing.

Judge Bartlett. As we are moderators of cases, so we are moderators of persons too, and therefore will moderate your lavish liberty of speech. You have slandered one Judge already, and in all our apprehensions you have flown in the face of two more.

Mr. Harrison. If I had not had leave to speak, I had been silent: nor do I think, I have committed any offence against justice or reason. For I say still we are not to question the king's actions; they are only between God and his own conscience, 'Sufficit regi, quod

'Deus est.' And although the outward action might seem not to be altogether without some rashness, yet there was some matter in it of moment, and which every loyal subject ought to maintain. This thesis I will stand to, that whatsoever the king in his conscience thinketh he may require, we ought to yield.

L. C. J. Do you not think that the king may govern his people by the common laws?

Mr. Harrison. Yes, and by something else too.

Judge Bartlett. What do you think of this then, if the king shall be persuaded in his conscience, that he must present another man to your living; would you not maintain your right by law?

Mr. Harrison. No, with all my heart I would submit unto his majesty.

L. C. J. But you mistake my brother Bartlett's question; he meaneth thus, that if the king should be persuaded that he had right and title to your parsonage, and did desire that the title should be tried, whether in this case would you stand to a trial?

Mr. Harrison. I will answer your lordship. There is a difference between a demand that concerns some petty right, or the title of this or that particular matter, and a demand, which concerns the great royalty of the king; you unking him, if you deny his royalty.

Mr. Attorney. This Defence is a very impudent justification, which you may be questioned for in another place: as they are bold and audacious assertions, so they proceed from a distempered brain. For the matter of Ship-Money, or whatever else concerneth his majesty's royal prerogative, we, that are the king's counsel, have and will upon all occasions be ready to speak and do as becomes the duty of our places, and we shall not crave the aid of Mr. Harrison. I must let your lordships know that he protests a detestation of the fact, and will that your lordships give a severe Censure.

Verdict. Then the Jury without going from the bar presently found him Guilty.

Whereupon the Lord Chief Justice asked him what he could say for himself that judgment should not pass against him. He answered, If I have offended his majesty in this, I do submit to his majesty and crave his pardon.

L. C. J. Your if will be very ill taken by his majesty, nor can this be taken for a submission.

Mr. Harrison. That I spake the words, I confess, but whether well or not, let every loyal subject judge.

Mr. Attorney. My lords, this concerns Mr. Justice Hutton no more than your lordships. Therefore I crave judgment and such a censure as may become the heinousness of the offence. No damages, but a large fine.

THE CENSURE. 1. Fine 5,000*l.* 2. Imprisonment during the king's pleasure. 3. To submit visá voce in the Exchequer-Chamber. 4. To be carried from thence to all the courts in Westminster with a Paper upon his head containing his offence. 5. And to be left open to Mr. Justice Hutton to take his remedy against him by his action.

And, in pursuance of the leave given to Justice Hutton in the 5th Article, he did in Trin. 14 Car. R. 1638, bring a special action of the case in the Common-Pleas against Mr. Harrison; sir Robert Heath one of the king's serjeants, and Mr. Lance the prince's Attorney, being of counsel for the Plaintiff. Mr. Bear and Mr. Maynard for the Defendant. The Declaration itself is upon record. The Witnesses to prove the words were Mr. William Smithson, Mr. Clove and Mr. Turner, all Clerks of the Common-Pleas. To the Declaration the Defendant Thomas Harrison pleaded Not Guilty. Whereupon issue was joined, Term. Mich. 14 Car. R. And a Jury of Middlesex consisting of knights and esquires, at the King's-Bench bar found for the Plaintiff Mr. Justice Hutton, and assessed damages to 10,000*l.* and the Defendant Harrison brought a writ of error.

150. The Trial* of THOMAS Earl of STRAFFORD,† Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, for High Treason: 16 CHARLES I. A. D. 1640.‡

November 11, 1640.

THIS day a Message from the Commons to the Lords was delivered by Mr. Pym to this effect:

“ My Lords; The knights, citizens, and burgeses, now assembled for the Commons in parliament, have received information of diverse traitorous designs and practices of a great peer of this house; and, by virtue of a command from them, I do here, in the name of the Commons now assembled in parliament, and in the name of all the Commons of England, accuse Thomas earl of Strafford, Lord Lieutenant of

* “ An erasure was made in the Lords Journals, by order of that house, after the Restoration of Charles 2, of all the Proceedings against the Earl of Strafford this time. This extraordinary act was taken into consideration in a succeeding reign, and another order was made by the lords relating to it. This order is entered in the Journals just where the first erasure begins, and is in these words:—“ Die Martis Julii 5to. 1698. The earl of Rochester reported from the lords committees, appointed to inspect the Journals of this house, in the year 1640 and 1641, relating to vacating or obliterating divers proceedings therein, pursuant to the act for reversing the earl of Strafford's attainder, as follows, viz. Upon perusal of the Journal of this house, in relation to the proceedings upon the Impeachment from the house of commons, it appears plainly, that, by the former orders made by this house, relating to the cancelling and obliterating the proceedings of the earl of Strafford, according to the act of parliament made for reversing of the said earl's attainder, it could not be intended that any other proceedings should be obliterated than those relating especially to the said act of attainder; it is therefore ordered and declared, by the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That whatsoever stands crossed upon the Journals relating to the proceedings on the Impeachment of the said earl, ought not, or shall be looked on as obliterated; and that the several orders for obliterating and vacating any proceedings concerning the earl of Strafford must be taken to be intended only to the act of attainder.”—Which report being agreed to by the house, it was ordered, “ That there be a note, or memorandum, of the aforesaid Order in the margin of the Journals, where any such proceedings have been obliterated.”—But an authentic copy of all the proceedings was afterwards interleaved in the original Journal by an order of the house, 15th Feb. 1768, and has since appeared in the printed editions of that work.” 2 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 738.

† 1 Clar. Hist. 118, 152, &c. 1 May's Hist. of the Parliament, b. 1, c. 8. See the larger Trial, which being an entire volume in Rushworth's Collection, is purposely omitted, and this inserted in the stead thereof.

‡ Whitlock, whom Hume follows and quotes, says: “ The time of the parliament's meeting drawing near, it was considered at York, whether the Earl of Strafford should repair to the house, or continue in the North with the army. The king was earnest for his going up to the parliament, as one, of whose service he should have great occasion, and placed much confidence in his faithfulness and abilities. The Earl humbly desired the king, to excuse his going to the parliament, alledging, ‘ That he should not be able to do his majesty any service there; but should rather be a means to hinder his affairs; in regard he foresaw that the great envy, and ill-will of the parliament, and of the Scots, would be bent against him; whereas, if he kept out of sight, he would not be so much in their mind as he should be, by shewing himself in parliament; and if they should fall upon him, he being at a distance, whatsoever they should conclude against him, he might the better avoid, and retire from any danger, having the liberty of being out of their hands, and to go over to Ireland, or to some other place, where he might be most serviceable to his majesty, but if he should put himself into their power, by coming up to the parliament, it was evident that the house of commons, and the Scots, with all their party, especially being provoked by his coming amongst them, would presently fall upon him, and procure his destruction.’ The king, notwith-

Ireland, of High Treason. And they have commanded me further to desire your lordships, that he may be sequestered from Parliament, and forthwith committed to prison. They have further commanded me to let your lordships know, that they will, within a few days, resort to your lordships, with the particular Articles and Grounds of his Accusation; and they do further desire that your lordships will think upon some convenient and fit way, that the passage between Ireland and England, for his majesty's subjects of both kingdoms, may be free, notwithstanding any restraint to the contrary."

After this, the Commons withdrew; and the Lord Keeper reported the effect of it to the house. And, after their lordships had considered of the Message, they resolved to give this Answer for the present, by the Lord Keeper: viz.

"That the lords do let them know, that they have been made acquainted with the Charge of High Treason, which the Commons have made standing these reasons, continued very earnest for Strafford's coming up to the parliament; for which he laid his commands upon him: and told him, 'That as he was king of England, he was able to secure him from any danger; and that the parliament should not touch one hair of his head.' The Earl thanked his majesty, but replied, 'That if there should fall out a difference between his majesty and his parliament, concerning him, that it would be a great disturbance to his majesty's affairs; and that he had rather suffer himself, than that the king's affairs should in any measure suffer, by reason of his particular.' The king remained unalterable in his resolution concerning Strafford's coming up to the parliament, saying, 'That he could not want his advice in the great transactions, which were like to be in this parliament,' and in obedience to his commands, the Earl came up to London." Memorials, p. 36, fol. ed. 1682. See also 2 Strafford's Letters, 416. It is impossible to consider this, and the subsequent conduct of king Charles towards Strafford, without perceiving that either the head or heart of the king was very much in fault in these transactions. Mr. Seward, from Baillie's Journal, has introduced into his "Anecdotes," the following interesting account of the commencement of this Impeachment against Strafford:

'All things go here as we could wish. The lieutenant of Ireland, lord Strafford, came but on Monday to town, late; on Tuesday rested: and on Wednesday came to parliament; but ere night he was caged. Intolerable pride and oppression call to heaven for vengeance. The lower house closed their doors; the Speaker kept the keys till his accusation was concluded. Thereafter Mr. Pym went up with a number at his back to the higher house, and, in a pretty short speech, did, in the name of the commons of all England accuse Thomas lord Strafford of High Treason, and required his person to be arrested till probation might against the Earl of Strafford; and their lordships do not doubt but that the Commons did take great consideration in it before they came hither; and their lordships will take it into their consideration, and will send them a further Answer, by messengers of their own."

Whereupon the Commons went to their own house; and the earl of Strafford, coming into the house, was commanded to withdraw. Then their lordships, falling into a serious debate of the Message, concluded, and ordered, "That the Earl of Strafford, for this Accusation of High Treason by the Commons, shall be presently committed to the safe custody of the Gentleman Usher of this house; and to be sequestered from coming to this house of parliament, until he hath cleared himself of this Accusation."

The Earl of Strafford being called to the bar as a delinquent, kneeling, the Lord Keeper, by direction of the house, signified to him as followeth:

'be made: so Mr. Pym and his back were removed. The lords began to consult on that strange and unpremeditated motion. The word goes in haste to the lord lieutenant, where he was with the king: with speed he comes to the house of peers, and calls rudely at the door. James Maxwell, keeper of the black rod, opens. His lordship, with a proud glooming countenance, makes towards his place at the board head, but at once many bid him void the house. So he is forced in confusion to go to the door till he is called. After consultation he stands, but is told to kneel, and on his knees, to hear the sentence. Being on his knees, he is delivered to the black rod to be prisoner, till he is cleared of the crimes he is charged with. He offered to speak, but was commanded to be gone without a word. In the outer room, James Maxwell required of him, as prisoner, to deliver him his sword. When he had got it, with a loud voice he told his man to carry the lord lieutenant's sword. This done, he makes through a number of people towards his coach, all gazing, no man capping to him, before whom that morning the greatest in England would have stood discovered; all crying, What is the matter? He said, A small matter, I warrant you. They replied, Yes indeed, high treason is a small matter! Coming to the place where he expected his coach, it was not there; so he behoved to return the same way through a world of gazing people. When at last he had found his coach, and was entering it, James Maxwell told him, my lord, you are my prisoner, and must go in my coach; so he behoved to do. For some days too many went to see him; but since, the parliament has commanded his keepers to be stricter. Poursuivants are dispatched to Ireland, to open all ports, and to proclaim, that all who had grievances might come over.' Baillie gives a not incurious or uninteresting account of this Trial.

“ My lord of Strafford ; The House of Commons, in their name, and in the name of the whole Commons of the kingdom of England, have this day accused your lordship, to the lords spiritual and temporal in this high court of parliament assembled, of High Treason. The Articles they will within few days produce. In the mean time, they have desired of my lords, and the lords have accordingly resolved, That your lordship shall be committed to safe custody to the gentleman usher, and sequestered from this house, until your lordship have cleared yourself of the Accusation that shall be laid against you.”

After this, he offering to speak, was not permitted, but immediately sent away. And so the earl of Strafford went out of the house to the gentleman usher. Afterwards, the lords thought it fit to send a Message to the Commons, to let them know how far they had proceeded for the present; and their lordships did agree, that the two Lords Chief Justices should deliver a Message to the Commons, to this effect: “ That the lords of the high court of parliament have taken into consideration the Charge of High Treason, which the Commons have made against the earl of Strafford; and do let them know that their lordships have committed him to safe custody; and have sequestered him from coming to the house; and do desire that the Articles and Accusation against him may be brought in speedily; and further to let them know, that their lordships will take it into consideration how to free and open the passage between Ireland and England, notwithstanding any restraint; and to that purpose will move his majesty in it.”

November 25. A Conference took place between both Houses; and the Lord Keeper reported the effect of it; viz. “ That the House of Commons have delivered their Articles of High Treason against the Earl of Strafford, consisting of divers Charges; and that the Commons desired, 1. That the Earl may be called to answer the said Articles. 2. That they may be made acquainted with the Earl's Answer. 3. That they may be made acquainted with the Depositions. 4. They required further, they might add to their Accusation, as occasion should serve. After this, the Articles were read publicly, in hæc verba:

ARTICLES of the Commons assembled in Parliament against THOMAS EARL OF STRAFFORD, in maintenance of the ACCUSATION, whereby he stands charged of High Treason.

I. That he the said Thomas Earl of Strafford hath traitorously endeavoured to subvert the fundamental laws and government of the realms of England and Ireland, and, instead thereof, to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical government against law; which he hath declared by traitorous words, counsels, and actions; and by giving his majesty advice, by force of arms to compel his loyal subjects to submit thereunto.

II. That he hath traitorously assumed to himself regal power over the lives, liberties, persons, lands, and goods of his majesty's subjects in England and Ireland; and hath exercised the same tyrannically, to the subversion and undoing of many, both of peers, and others of his majesty's liege people.

III. That the better to enrich and enable himself to go through with his traitorous designs, he hath detained a great part of his majesty's revenue, without giving legal account; and hath taken great sums out of the Exchequer, converting them to his own use, when his majesty wanted money, for his own urgent occasions, and his army had been a long time unpaid.

IV. That he hath traitorously abused the power and authority of his government, to the increasing, countenancing, and encouraging of papists; that so he might settle a mutual dependence and confidence betwixt himself and that party, and, by their help, prosecute and accomplish his malicious and tyrannical designs.

V. That he hath maliciously endeavoured to stir up enmity and hostility between his majesty's subjects of England and those of Scotland.

VI. That he hath traitorously broke the great trust reposed in him by his majesty, of lieutenant general of his army, by wilful betraying divers of his majesty's subjects to death, his army to a dishonourable defeat by the Scots at Newborne, and the town of Newcastle into their hands; to the end, that by the effusion of blood, by dishonour, and so great a loss as that of Newcastle, his majesty's realm of England might be engaged in a national and irreconcilable quarrel with the Scots.

VII. That to preserve himself from being questioned for those, and other his traitorous courses, he laboured to subvert the right of parliaments, and the antient course of parliamentary proceedings; and, by false and malicious slanders, to incense his majesty against parliaments. By which words, counsels, and actions, he hath traitorously, and contrary to his allegiance, laboured to alienate the hearts of the king's liege people from his majesty, to set a division between them, and to ruin and destroy his majesty's kingdoms: for which they impeach him of High Treason against our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity.

VIII. And he the said earl of Strafford was lord deputy of Ireland, and lieutenant general of the army of his most excellent majesty, for his kingdoms both of England and Ireland, and the lord president of the north, during the time that all and every the crimes and offences before set forth were done and committed; and he the said earl was lieutenant general of all his majesty's army in the north parts of England, during the time that the crimes and offences in the fifth and sixth articles set forth were done and committed.

IX. That the said Commons, by protestations saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any other Accusation or Impeachment against the said Earl; and also of replying to the Answers that he the said Earl shall make unto the said Articles, or to any of them, and of offering proofs; also of the premises or any of them; or any other Impeachment or Accusation that shall be exhibited by them, as the cause shall, according to the course of parliament, require: do pray that the said earl may be put to answer for all and every of the premises, that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments may be upon every of them had and used, as is agreeable to law and justice.

ARTICLES of the Commons assembled in Parliament against THOMAS EARL OF STRAFFORD, in maintenance of their ACCUSATION, whereby he stands charged with High-Treason.

Whereas the said Commons have already exhibited Articles against the said Earl, in hec verba, now the said Commons do further impeach the said Earl as followeth: (that is to say)

I. That the said earl of Strafford, the 21st day of March, in the eighth year of his majesty's reign, was President of the king's council in the northern parts of England.

That the said earl being President of the said council, on the 21st of March a Commission under the great seal of England, with certain schedules of instructions thereunto annexed, was directed to the said earl, and others the commissioners therein named, whereby, among other things, power and authority is limited to the said earl, and others the commissioners therein named, to hear and determine all offences and misdemeanours, suits, debates, controversies and demands, causes, things and matters whatsoever therein contained, and within certain precincts in the said northern parts therein specified, and in such inanner as by the said schedule is limited and appointed.

That, amongst other things in the said Instructions, it is directed, that the said President, and others therein appointed, shall hear and determine according to the course of proceedings in the Court of Star-Chamber, divers offences, deceits and falsities, therein mentioned, whether the same be provided for by acts of parliament or not; so that the Fines imposed be not less than by the act or acts of parliament provided against those offences is appointed.

That also, amongst other things in the said Instructions, it is directed, that the said President, and others therein appointed, have power to examine, hear, and determine, according to the course of proceedings in the Court of Chancery, all manner of Complaints for any matter within the said precincts; as well concerning lands, tenements, and hereditaments, either free-hold, customary, or copy-hold, as leases, and other things therein mentioned; and to stay proceedings in the court of Common Law by Injunction, or otherwise, by all ways and means, as is used in the Court of Chancery.

And although the former Presidents of the said Council had never put in practice such Instructions, nor had they any such Instructions;

yet the said Earl, in the month of May, in the said 8th year, and divers years following, did put in practice, exercise and use, and caused to be used and put in practice the said Commission and Instructions; and did direct and exercise an exorbitant and unlawful power and jurisdiction over the Persons and Estates of his majesty's subjects in those parts, and did disherit divers of his majesty's subjects, in those parts, of their inheritances, sequestered their possessions, and did fine, ransom, punish and imprison them; and caused them to be fined, ransomed, punished, and imprisoned, to their ruin and destruction; and namely, sir Coniers Darcy, sir John Bourcher, and divers others, against the laws, and in subversion of the same. And the said commission and instructions were procured and issued by advice of the said Earl.

And he the said Earl, to the intent that such illegal and unjust power might be exercised with the greater licence and will, did advise, counsel, and procure further Directions, in and by the said Instructions to be given, that no Prohibition be granted at all, but in cases where the said Council shall exceed the limits of the said Instructions: And that if any Writ of Habeas Corpus be granted, the party be not discharged till the party perform the Decree and Order of the said council.

And the said Earl, in the 13th year of his majesty's reign, did procure a new Commission to himself, and others therein appointed, with the said Instructions, and other unlawful Additions.

That the said Commission and Instructions were procured by the solicitation and advice of the said earl of Strafford.

II. That shortly after the obtaining of the said Commission, dated the 21st of March, in the 8th year of his majesty's reign, to wit, the last day of August then next following, he the said Earl (to bring his majesty's liege people into a dislike of his majesty, and of his government, and to terrify the Justices of the Peace from executing of the laws; he the said Earl being then President, as aforesaid, and a Justice of Peace) did publicly, at the Assizes held for the county of York, in the city of York, and upon the said last day of August, declare and publish before the people there attending for the administration of justice according to law, (and in the presence of Justices sitting) that some of the Justices were all for law, and nothing would please them but law; but they should find that the King's Little-finger should be heavier than the Loins of the Law.

III. That the realm of Ireland having been time out of mind annexed to the Imperial Crown of this his majesty's realm of England, and governed by the same laws; the said Earl being Lord-Deputy of that realm, to bring his majesty's liege subjects of that kingdom likewise into dislike of his majesty's government, and intending the subversion of the fundamental laws and settled government of that realm, and the destruction of his majesty's liege people there did upon the 30th day of September, in the 9th year of his now majesty's reign, in the city of Dublin (the chief city of that realm, where his majesty's privy-council and courts of justice do ordinarily reside, and whither the nobility and gentry of that realm do usually resort for justice), in a public speech, before divers of the nobility and gentry of that kingdom, and before the mayor, aldermen, and recorder, and many citizens of Dublin, and other his majesty's liege people, declare and publish, That Ireland was a conquered nation, and that the king might do with them what he pleased. And speaking of the Charters of former kings of England made to that city, he further then said, That their Charters were nothing worth, and did bind the king no further than he pleased.

iv. That Richard earl of Cork having sued out process in course of law, for recovery of his possessions, from which he was put by colour of an Order made by the said earl of Strafford, and the Council-Table of the said realm of Ireland, upon a Paper-Petition, without legal proceeding, did the 20th day of February, in the 11th year of his now majesty's reign, threaten the said Earl (being then a peer of the said realm) to imprison him, unless he would surcease his suit; and said, That he would have neither law nor lawyers dispute or question his Orders. And the 20th day of March, in the said 11th year, the said earl of Strafford, speaking of an Order of the said Council-Table of that realm, made in the time of king James, which concerned a Lease which the said earl of Cork claimed in certain rectories or tythes, which the said earl of Cork alledged to be of no force, said, That he would make the said Earl and all Ireland know, that so long as he had the government there, any Act of State there made, or to be made, shall be as binding to the subjects of that kingdom, as an Act of Parliament: And did question the said earl of Cork, in the Castle-Chamber there, upon pretence of breach of the said Order of Council-Table: and did sundry other times, and upon sundry other occasions, by his words and speeches, arrogate to himself a power above the fundamental laws and established government of that kingdom; and scorned the said laws and established government.

v. That according to such his Declarations and Speeches, the said Earl of Strafford did use and exercise a power above, and against, and to the subversion of the said fundamental laws and established government of the said realm of Ireland; extending such his power to the goods, freeholds, inheritances, liberties, and lives of his majesty's subjects of the said realm: and namely, the said earl of Strafford, the 19th day of December, 1635, in the time of full peace, did in the said realm of Ireland give, and procure to be given, against the lord Mountnorris, (then and yet a peer of the said realm of Ireland, and then Vice-Treasurer and Receiver-General of the realm of Ireland, and Treasurer at War, and one of the Principal Secretaries of State, and Keeper of the Privy-Signet of the said kingdom) a Sentence of Death by a Council of War, called together by the said earl of Strafford, without any warrant or authority of law, or offence deserving any such punishment. And he the said Earl did also at Dublin, within the said realm of Ireland, in the month of March, in the 14th year of his majesty's reign, without any legal or due proceedings or trial, give, and cause to be given, a Sentence of Death against one other of his majesty's subjects, whose name is yet unknown; and caused him to be put to death in execution of the same Sentence.

vi. That the said earl of Strafford, without any legal proceedings, and upon a Paper-Petition of Richard Rolston, did cause the said lord Mountnorris to be disseized, and put out of possession of his freehold and inheritance of his manor of Tymore in the county of Armagh, in the kingdom of Ireland, the said lord Mountnorris having been 18 years before in quiet possession thereof.

vii. That the said Earl of Strafford, in the Term of Holy Trinity, in the 13th year of his now majesty's reign, did cause a Case, commonly called 'The Case of Tenures upon defective Titles,' to be made and drawn up without any jury or trial, or other legal process, and without the consent of parties; and did then procure the Judges of the said realm of Ireland to deliver their Opinions and Resolutions to that case; and by colour of such opinion did, without any legal proceedings, cause Thomas lord Dillon, a peer of the said realm of Ireland, to be put out of the possession of divers lands and tenements, being his freehold, in the counties of Mayo and Roscommon, in the said kingdom: And divers other of his majesty's subjects to be put out of possession, and disseized of their freehold, by colour of the same resolution, without legal proceedings; whereby many hundreds of his majesty's subjects were undone, and their families utterly ruined.

viii. That the said Earl of Strafford, upon a Petition of sir John Gifford knt. the 1st day of February, in the said 13th year of his majesty's reign, without any legal process, made a Decree or Order against Adam viscount Loftus of Ely, a peer of the said realm of Ireland, and lord chancellor of Ireland; did cause the said viscount to be imprisoned, and kept close prisoner, on pretence of disobedience to the said decree or order.

And the said Earl, without any authority, and contrary to his commission, required, and commanded the said Lord Viscount to yield up unto him the Great Seal of the realm of Ireland, which was then in his custody by his majesty's command, and imprisoned the said Chancellor for not obeying such his command.

And without any legal proceeding did, in the same 13th year, imprison George earl of Kildare, a peer of Ireland, against law, thereby to enforce him to submit his title to the manor and lordship of Castleleigh in the Queen's county, (being of great yearly value) to the said Earl of Strafford's will and pleasure, and kept him a year prisoner for the said cause; two months whereof he kept him close prisoner, and refused to enlarge him, notwithstanding his majesty's Letters for his enlargement, to the said earl of Strafford directed.

And upon a Petition exhibited in October, 1635, by Thomas Hibbotts, against dame Mary Hibbotts widow, to him the said earl of Strafford; the said Earl of Strafford recommended the said Petition to the Council-Table of Ireland, where the most part of the Council gave their vote and opinion for the said lady: but the said Earl finding fault herewith caused an Order to be entered against the said lady, and threatened her, that if she refused to submit thereunto, he would imprison her, and fine her 500*l.*: that if she continued obstinate, he would continue her imprisonment, and double her fine every month. By means whereof she was enforced to relinquish her estate in the lands questioned in the said Petition, which shortly after were conveyed to sir Robert Meredith, to the use of the said Earl of Strafford.

And the said Earl in like manner did imprison divers others of his majesty's subjects, upon pretence of disobedience to his Orders, Decrees, and other illegal commands by him made for pretended debts, titles of lands, and other causes, in an arbitrary and extra-judicial course, upon Paper Petitions to him preferred, and no cause legally depending.

ix. That the said Earl of Strafford the 16th day of February, in the 12th year of his majesty's reign, assuming to himself a power above and against law, took upon him, by a General Warrant under his hand, to give power to the lord bishop of Downe and Connor, his chancellor or chancellors, and their several officers thereto to be appointed, to attach and arrest the bodies of all such of the meaner and poorer sort, who, after citation should either refuse to appear before them, or appearing should omit or deny to perform or undergo all lawful Decrees, Sentences, and orders, issued, imposed, or given out against them, and them to commit, and keep in the next gaol until they should either perform such Sentences, or put in sufficient bail to shew some reason before the Council-Table of such their contempt and neglect. And the said Earl, the day and year last mentioned, signed and issued a warrant to that effect; and made the like warrants to several other bishops, and their chancellors, in the said realm of Ireland, to the same effect.

x. That the said Earl of Strafford, being Lord-Lieutenant or Deputy of Ireland, procured the Customs of the Merchandizes exported out and imported into that realm to be farmed to his own use.—And in the 9th year of his now majesty's reign, he having then interest in the said customs, (to advance his own gain and lucre) did cause and procure the native commodities of Ireland to be rated in the Book of Rates for the Customs (according to which the customs were usually gathered) at far greater values and prices than in truth they were worth; that is to say, every hide at 20*s.*, which in truth was worth but 5*s.*; every stone of wool at 13*s.* 4*d.*, though the same were really worth but 5*s.*, at the utmost 9*s.*: by which means the Custom, which before was but a twentieth part of the true value of the commodity, was enhanced sometimes a fifth part, and sometimes to a fourth, and sometimes to a third part of the true value, to the great oppression of the subjects, and decay of merchandise.

xi. That the said Earl, in the 9th year of his majesty's reign, did by his own will and pleasure, and for his own lucre, restrain the exportation of the commodities of that kingdom without his licence; as namely, pipe-staves, and other commodities; and then raised great sums of money for Licences of exportation of those commodities, and dispensation of the said restraints imposed on them: by which means the pipe-staves were raised from 4*l.* 10*s.* or 5*l.* per 1000, to 10*l.* and sometimes 11*l.* per 1000. And other commodities were enhanced in the like proportion, and by the same means, by him the said Earl.

xii. That the said Earl, being Lord Deputy of Ireland, on the 9th day of January, in the 13th year of his now majesty's reign, did then, under colour to regulate the importation of Tobacco into the said realm of Ireland, issue a Proclamation in his majesty's name, prohibiting the importation of Tobacco, without licence of him and his council there, from and after the 1st day of May, 1638. After which restraint, the said Earl, notwithstanding the said restraint, caused divers great quantities of Tobacco to be imported to his own use, and freighted divers ships with Tobacco, which he imported to his own use: and that if any ship brought Tobacco into any port there, the said Earl and his agents used to buy the same to his own use, at their own price; and if that the owners refused to let him have the same at under-values, then they were not permitted to vent the same there. By which undue means the said Earl having gotten the whole trade of Tobacco into his own hands, he sold it at great and excessive prices, such as he list to impose for his own profit.

And the more to assure the said monopoly of Tobacco, he the said Earl, on the 23rd day of February in the 13th year aforesaid, did issue another Proclamation, commanding that none should put to sale any Tobacco by wholesale from and after the last day of May then next following, but what should be made up into rolls, and the same sealed with two seals by himself appointed, one at each end of the roll. And such as was not sealed to be seized, appointing 6*d.* the pound for a reward to such persons as should seize the same; and the person in whose custody the unsealed Tobacco should be found, to be committed to gaol: which last Proclamation was coloured by a pretence for the restraining of the sale of unwholesome tobacco, but it was truly to advance the said Monopoly.

Which Proclamation the said Earl did rigorously put in execution, by seizing the goods, fining, imprisoning, whipping, and putting the offenders against the same Proclamation on the pillory; as namely, Barnaby Hubbard, Edward Cavena, John Tumen, and divers others; and made the officers of state, and justices of peace, and other officers to serve him in the compassing and executing these unjust and undue courses. By which cruelties, and unjust Monopolies, the said Earl raised 100,000*l.* per annum gain to himself. And yet the said Earl, though he enhanced the Customs where it concerned the merchants in general, yet drew down the impost formerly taken on Tobacco from 6*d.* the pound to 3*d.* the pound; it being for his own profit so to do.

And the said Earl, by the same and other rigorous and undue means, raised several other Monopolies and unlawful exactions for his own gain, viz. on starch, iron pots, glasses, tobaccopipes, and several other commodities.

xiii. That Flax being one of the principal and native commodities of that kingdom of Ireland, the said Earl having gotten great quantities thereof into his hand, and growing on his own lands, did issue out several Proclamations, viz. the one dated the 31st of May, in the 12th of his majesty's reign; and the other dated the 31st of January, in the same year; thereby prescribing and enjoining the working of Flax into yarn and thread, and the ordering of the same in such ways, wherein the natives of that kingdom were unpractised and unskilful. Which Proclamations so issued, were by his commands and warrants to his majesty's justices of peace, and other officers, and by other rigorous means, put in execution: and the Flax wrought or ordered in other manner than as the said proclamation prescribed, was seized and employed to the use of him and his agents: and thereby the said earl endeavoured to gain, and did gain in effect, the sole sale of that native commodity.

xiv. That the said Earl, by proclamation dated the 16th of October, in the 14th year of his majesty's reign, did impose upon the owners, masters, pursers, and boatswains of every ship, a new and unlawful oath, viz. That they, or two or more of them, immediately after the arrival of any ship within any port or creek in the said kingdom of Ireland, should give in a true invoice of the outward bulk of wares and merchandizes first laden aboard them, together with the several marks and number of goods, and the qualities and condition of the said goods as far as to them should be known; the names of the several merchants proprietors of the said goods, and the place from whence they were fraught, and whither they were bound to discharge; which Proclamation was accordingly put in execution, and sundry persons enforced to take the said unlawful oath.

xv. That the said Earl traitorously and wickedly devised and contrived, by force of arms, and in a warlike manner, to subdue the subjects of the said realm of Ireland, and to bring them under his tyrannical power and will; and in pursuance of his wicked and traitorous purposes aforesaid, the said Earl in the 8th year of his majesty's reign, did by his own authority, without any warrant or colour of law, tax and impose great sums of money upon the towns of Baltimore, Baudenbridge, Talowg, and divers other towns and places in the said realm of Ireland; and did cause the same to be levied upon the inhabitants of those towns by troops of soldiers, with force and arms, in warlike manner. And on the 9th of March, in the 12th year of his now majesty's reign, traitorously did give authority unto Robert Savile, a serjeant at arms, and to the captains of the companies of soldiers in several parts of that realm, to send such numbers of soldiers to lie on the lands and houses of such as would not conform to his orders, until they should render obedience to his said orders and warrants; and after such submission, and not before, the said soldiers to return to their garrisons: And did also issue the like warrants unto divers others, which warrants were in warlike manner, with force and arms, put in execution accordingly; and by such warlike means did force divers of his majesty's subjects of that realm to submit themselves to his unlawful commands.

And in the said 12th year of his majesty's reign, the said Earl did traitorously cause certain troops of horse and foot, armed in warlike manner and in warlike array, with force and arms, to expel Richard Butler from the possession of the manor of Castle-Cumber, in the territory of Idough, in the said realm of Ireland; and did likewise, and in like warlike manner, expel divers of his majesty's subjects from their houses, families, and possessions; as namely, Edward Obrenman, Owen Oberman, John Brenman, Patrick Oberman, sir Cyprian Horsefield; and divers others, to the number of about an 100 families; and took and imprisoned them and their wives, and carried them prisoners to Dublin, and there detained, until they did yield up, surrender or release their respective estates and rights.

And the said Earl in like warlike manner hath, during his government of the said kingdom of Ireland, subdued divers others of his majesty's subjects there to his will; and thereby, and by the means aforesaid, hath levied war within the said realm against his majesty and his liege people of that kingdom.

xvi. That the Earl, the 22nd of Feb. in the 7th year of his majesty's reign, intending to oppress the said subjects of Ireland, did make a Proposition, and obtained from his majesty an allowance thereof, That no complaint of injustice or oppression done in Ireland, should be received in England against any, unless it appeared that the party made first his address to him the said Earl: and the said Earl having by such usurped, tyrannical, and exorbitant power, expressed in the former Articles, destroyed and oppressed the peers, and other subjects of that kingdom of Ireland, in their lives, consciences, lands, liberties and estates; the said Earl, to the intent the better to maintain and strengthen his said power, and to bring the people into a disaffection of his majesty, as aforesaid, did use his majesty's name in the execution of the said power.

And to prevent the subjects of that realm of all means of complaints to his majesty, and of redress against him and his agents, did issue a Proclamation, bearing date the 17th day of September, in the 11th year of his majesty's reign, thereby commanding all the nobility, undertakers, and others who held estates and offices in the said kingdom, (except such as were employed in his majesty's service, or attending in England by his special command) to make their personal residence in the said kingdom of Ireland, and not to depart thence without licence of himself.

And the said Earl hath since issued other Proclamations to the same purpose, by means whereof the subjects of the said realm are restrained from seeking Relief against the oppressions of the said Earl, without his licence; which Proclamations the said Earl hath by several rigorous ways, as by fine, imprisonment, and otherwise, put in execution on his majesty's subjects; as namely, one ——— Parry, and others, who came over only to complain of the exorbitances and oppressions of the said Earl.

xvii. That the said Earl having, by such means as aforesaid, subverted the government and laws of the kingdom of Ireland, did, in March, in the 16th year of his majesty's reign, in scandal of his majesty's government of all his kingdoms, and in further execution of his wicked purposes aforesaid, speaking of the Army in Ireland, declare, That his majesty was so well pleased with the Army of Ireland, and the consequences thereof, that his majesty would certainly make the same a pattern for all his three kingdoms.

xviii. That the said Earl, for the better effecting of his traitorous designs and wicked purposes, did endeavour to draw a Dependency upon himself of the Papists in both kingdoms of England and Ireland; and to that end, during the time of his government in Ireland, he restored divers Fryeries and Mass-houses (which had been formerly suppressed by the precedent Deputies of that kingdom; two of which houses are in the city of Dublin, and had been assigned to the use of the University there) to the pretended owners thereof, who have since employed the same to the exercise of the popish religion.

And in the months of May and June last the said Earl did raise an Army in the said realm, consisting of 8,000 foot, all of which, except 1,000, or thereabouts, were Papists; and the said 1,000 were drawn out of the old Army there, consisting of 2,000 foot, and in their places there were a 1,000 Papists, or thereabouts, put into the said old Army by the said Earl.

And the more to engage and tie the said new Army of Papists to himself, and to encourage them, and to discourage and weary out the said old Army; the said Earl did so provide, that the said new Army of Papists were duly paid, and had all necessaries provided for them, and permitted the exercise of their religion; but the said old Army were for the space of one whole year and upwards unpaid.

And the said Earl being appointed a Commissioner within eleven several counties of the northern parts of England, for compounding with Recusants for their Forfeitures due to his majesty, which commission beareth date the 8th of July, in the 5th year of his majesty's reign that now is; and being also receiver of the Composition-Money thereby arising, and of other debts, duties, and penalties, by reason of recusancy within the said counties, for his majesty's use, by letters patents dated the 9th day of the same July; he, to engage the said Recusants to him, did compound with them at low and under rates, and provided that they should be discharged of all proceedings against them in all his majesty's courts, both temporal and ecclesiastical, in manifest breach of, and contrary to, the laws and statutes of this realm, in that behalf established.

xix. That the said Earl having taxed and levied the said Impositions, and raised the said Monopolies, and committed the said other Oppressions in his majesty's name, and as by his majesty's royal command; he the said Earl, in May, the 15th year of his majesty's reign, did of his own authority contrive and frame a new and unusual oath, by the purport whereof, among many other things, the party taking the said oath was to swear, That he should not prester against any his majesty's royal commands, but submit himself in all due obedience thereunto. Which Oath he so contrived, to enforce the same on the subjects of the Scottish nation inhabiting in Ireland; and out of a hatred to the said nation, and to put them to a discontent with his majesty and his government there; and compelled divers of his majesty's said subjects there to take the said oath against their wills; and of such as refused to take the said oath, some he grievously fined and imprisoned, and others he destroyed and exiled; and namely, the 10th Oct., A. D. 1639, he fined Henry Steward and his wife, who refused to take the said Oath, 5,000*l.* a-piece, and their two daughters and James Gray 3,000*l.* a-piece, and imprisoned them for not paying the said Fines: the said Henry Steward, his wife and daughters, and James Gray, being the king's liege people of the Scottish nation. And divers others he used in like manner. And the said Earl upon that occasion did declare, That the said Oath did not only oblige them in point of allegiance to his majesty, and acknowledgment of his supremacy only, but to the ceremonies and government of the church established, and to be established by his majesty's royal authority; and said, that the refusers to obey he would prosecute to the blood.

xx. That the said Earl hath in the 15th and 16th years of his majesty's reign, and divers years past, laboured and endeavoured to breed in his majesty an ill opinion of his subjects, namely, of those of the Scottish nation; and divers and sundry times, and especially since the Pacification made by his majesty with his said subjects of Scotland in summer, in the 15th year of his majesty's reign, he the said Earl did labour and endeavour to persuade, incite, and provoke his majesty to an offensive war against his said subjects of the Scottish nation. And the said Earl, by his counsels, actions, and endeavours, hath been and is a principal and chief incendiary of the war and discord between his majesty and his subjects of England, and the said subjects of Scotland; and hath declared and advised his majesty, that the demands made by the Scots, in their parliament, were a sufficient cause of war against them.

The said Earl having formerly expressed the height and rancour of his mind towards his majesty's subjects of the Scottish nation, viz. the 10th day of October, in the 15th year of his majesty's reign, he said, That the nation of the Scots were rebels and traitors; and he being then about to come to England, he then farther said, That if it pleased his master, meaning his majesty, to send him back again, he would root out of the said kingdom, meaning the said kingdom of Ireland, the Scottish nation both root and branch, some lords and others, who had taken the said oath in the precedent article, only excepted: And the said Earl hath caused divers of the ships and goods of the scots to be stayed, seized, and molested, to the intent to set on the said war.

xxi. That the said Earl, shortly after his Speeches mentioned in the last precedent Articles, to wit, in the 15th year of his majesty's reign, came into this realm of England, and was made Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and continued his Government of that kingdom by a deputy: at his arrival here, finding that his majesty with much wisdom and goodness had composed the Troubles in the North, and had a Pacification with his subjects of Scotland, he laboured by all means to procure his majesty to break that Pacification, incensing his majesty against his subjects of that kingdom, and the proceedings of the parliament there.—And having incited his majesty to an offensive war against his subjects of Scotland by sea and land; and the pretext thereof to raise forces for the maintenance of that war; he counselled his majesty to call a parliament in England: yet the said Earl intended, that if the said proceedings of that parliament, should not be such as would stand with the said Earl of Strafford's mischievous designs, he would then procure his majesty to break the same, and by ways of force and power to raise monies upon the subjects of this kingdom.—And for the encouragement of his majesty to hearken to his advice, he did before his majesty and his privy-council, then sitting in council, make large declaration, That he would serve his majesty in any other way, in case the parliament should not supply him.

xxii. That in the month of March, before the beginning of the last parliament, the said

Earl went into Ireland, and procured the parliament of that kingdom to declare their assistance in a War against the Scots, and gave directions for the raising of an Army there, consisting of 8,000 foot, and 1,000 horse, being for the most part papists. And confederating with one sir George Radcliffe, did, together with him the said sir George, traitorously conspire to employ the said army for the ruin and destruction of the kingdom of England, and of his majesty's subjects, and of altering and subverting of the fundamental laws and established government of this kingdom.

And shortly after the said Earl returned into England, and to sundry persons declared his opinion to be, That his majesty should first try the parliament here; and if that did not supply him according to his occasions, he might use then his Prerogative as he pleased, to levy what he needed; and that he should be acquitted both of God and man, if he took some other courses to supply himself, though it were against the wills of his subjects.

xxiii. That upon the 13th day of April last the Parliament of England met, and the Commons House (then being the representative body of all the commons in the kingdom) did, according to the trust reposed in them, enter into debate and consideration of the great Grievances of this kingdom, both in respect of Religion and the public Liberty of the kingdom; and his majesty referring chiefly to the said earl of Strafford and the archbishop of Canterbury the ordering and disposing of all matters concerning the parliament; he the said Earl, with the assistance of the said Archbishop, did procure his majesty by sundry Speeches and Messages, to urge the said Commons House to enter into some Resolution for his majesty's Supply for maintenance of his war against his subjects of Scotland, before any course taken for the relief of the great and pressing Grievances wherewith this kingdom was then afflicted. Whereupon a demand was then made from his majesty of twelve Subsidies, for the release of Ship-money only. And while the said Commons then assembled (with expression of great affection to his majesty and his service) were in debate and consideration concerning some Supply, before any resolution by them made; he the said Earl, with the help and assistance of the said Archbishop, did procure his majesty to dissolve the said Parliament upon the 5th day of May last. And upon the same day the said Earl did treacherously, falsely, and maliciously endeavour to incense his majesty against his loving and faithful subjects, who had been members of the said house of commons, by telling his majesty they had denied to supply him: And afterwards, upon the same day, did traitorously and wickedly counsel and advise his majesty to this effect, viz. That having tried the affections of his people, he was loose and absolved from all rules of government, and that he was to do every thing that power would admit; and that his majesty had tried all ways, and was refused, and should be acquitted towards God and man; and that

xxiv. That in the said month of May, he, the said Earl, falsely, traitorously, and maliciously published and declared before others of his majesty's privy-council, that the Parliament of England had forsaken the king, and that in denying to supply the king, they had given him advantage to supply himself by other ways. And several other times he did maliciously, wickedly, and falsely publish and declare, That seeing the parliament had refused to supply his majesty in the ordinary and usual way, the king might provide for the kingdom in such ways as he should hold fit; and that he was not to suffer himself to be mastered by the frowardness and undutifulness of the people. And having so maliciously slandered the said late house of commons, he did, with the help and advice of the said archbishop of Canterbury, and the lord Finch, late Lord-Keeper of the great-seal of England, cause to be printed and published in his majesty's name a false and scandalous Book, entitled, 'His majesty's Declaration of the causes that moved him to dissolve the last Parliament,' full of bitter and malicious invectives, and false and scandalous aspersions against the said house of commons.

xxv. That not long after the dissolution of the said last Parliament (viz. in the months of May and June) he, the said Earl, did advise the king to go on vigorously in levying the Ship-Money, and did procure the sheriffs of several Counties to be sent for, for not levying the Ship-Money, divers of which were threatened by him to be sued in the Star-Chamber; and afterwards, by his advice, they were sued in the Star-Chamber for not levying the same; and divers of his majesty's loving subjects were sent for and imprisoned, by his advice, for that and other illegal payments.

And a great Loan of 100,000*l.* was demanded of the city of London; and the lord mayor, and sheriffs, and aldermen of the said city were often sent for, by his advice, to the Council-Table, to give an account of their proceedings in raising of Ship-Money, and furthering of that Loan; and were required to certify the names of such inhabitants of the said city as were fit to lend: which they with much humility refusing to do, he the said Earl did use these and the like speeches, viz. That they deserved to be put to fine and ransom; and that no good would be done with them till an example were made of them, and that they were laid by the heels, and some of the aldermen hanged up.

xxvi. That the said Earl by his wicked counsels having brought his majesty into excessive Charge, without any just cause, he did in the month of July last (for the support of the said great Charges) counsel and approve two dangerous and wicked projects, viz. To seize upon the Bullion and the money in the Mint. And to imbase his majesty's Coin with the mixtures of brass.—And accordingly he procured

130,000*l.* which was then in the Mint, and belonged to divers merchants, strangers, and others, to be seized on and stayed to his majesty's use. And when divers merchants of London, owners of the said bullion and moneys, came to his house to let him understand the great mischief that course would produce here and in other parts, and what prejudice it would be to the kingdom, by discrediting the Mint, and hindering the importation of Bullion; he, the said Earl, told them that the city of London dealt undutifully and unthankfully with his majesty; and that they were more ready to help the rebels than to help his majesty; and that if any hurt came to them, they may thank themselves; and that it was the course of other princes to make use of such monies to serve their occasions.

And when in the same month of July the officers of his majesty's Mint came to him, and gave him divers reasons against the imbasing the said money, he told them, That the French king did use to send commissaries of horse with commission to search into men's estates, and to peruse their accounts, that so they may know what to levy of them by force, which they did accordingly levy. And turning to the lord Cottington, then present, said, That this was a point worthy of his lordship's consideration: Meaning, this course of the French king to raise Monies by force was a point worthy of his lordship's consideration.

xxvii. That in or about the month of August last, he was made Lieutenant-General of all his majesty's forces in the North, prepared against the Scots; and being at York, did then in the month of September, by his own authority, and without any lawful warrant, impose a Tax on his majesty's subjects in the county of York of 8*d.* per diem for maintenance of every soldier of the trained-bands of that county, which sums of money he caused to be levied by force. And to the end to compel his majesty's subjects out of fear and terror to yield to the payment of the same, he did declare, That he would commit them that refused the payment thereof, and the soldiers should be satisfied out of their estates; and they that refused it were in very little better condition than of high-treason.

xxviii. That in the months of September and October last, he the said Earl being certified of the Scottish army coming into the kingdom, and he the said Earl being Lieutenant-General of his majesty's army, he did not provide for the defence of the town of Newcastle, as he ought to have done, but suffered the same to be lost, that so he might the more incense the English against the Scots.

And for the same wicked purpose, and out of a malicious desire to engage the kingdoms of England and Scotland in a national and bloody war, he did write to the lord Conway, the general of the horse, and under the said Earl's command, That he should fight with the Scottish army at the passage over the Tye, whatsoever should follow; notwithstanding that the said lord

Conway had formerly by letters informed the said Earl, that his majesty's Army, then under his command, was not of force sufficient to encounter the Scots: by which advice of his he did, contrary to the duty of his place, betray his majesty's army, then under his command, to apparent danger and loss.

All and every which words, counsels, and actions of the said Earl of Strafford were spoken, given, and done by him, the said Earl, traitorously, and contrary to his allegiance to our sovereign lord the king, and with an intention and endeavour to alienate and withdraw the hearts and affections of the king's liege people of all his realms from his majesty, and to set division between them, and to ruin and destroy his majesty, and his majesty's said kingdoms; for which they do further impeach him the said Thomas Earl of Strafford of High-Treason against our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity. And he, the said Earl of Strafford, was lord deputy of Ireland, or lord lieutenant of Ireland, and lieutenant-general of the army there under his most excellent majesty, and a sworn privy-counsellor to his majesty for his kingdoms both of England and Ireland, and lord president of the North, during the time that all and every the crimes and offences, before set forth, were done and committed; and he, the said Earl, was lieutenant-general of his majesty's army in the North parts of England during the time that the crimes and offences, in the 27th and 28th Articles set forth, were done and committed.

ANSWER to the Twenty-eight Special ARTICLES.

To the First Article, he saith, He conceives that the Commission and Instructions differ not from those formerly granted, but refers to them; and that such Alterations and Additions as were made, were (for aught he knoweth) rather for the explanation, than for the enlarging of the jurisdiction: the care whereof was left to the Secretary of that Council, and to the king's learned counsel, to be passed for the good of the king's service, and the public welfare of that province. For the legality of the proceedings, divers eminent lawyers were joined with the President, who, for the legal parts, was by them to be directed. He did not advise or procure the Enlargement of the Commission and Instructions, and he believeth nothing hath been practised since, that was not in former times contained in former commissions, under general words. He believeth sir Conyers Darcy was lawfully fined for Misdemeanors, as a Justice of Peace; and hath heard, he being in Ireland, that sir John Bourcher was fined for some great abuse at the king's being at York, going into Scotland to be crowned: to the Proceedings he refers himself. He denies that he hath done any thing by that Commission or Instructions, other than he conceived he might by virtue thereof lawfully do.

To the Second Article, He denieth the speaking of those Words: but saith, That 30*l.*, 40*l.*, or more, being returned as Issues out of the Exchequer, against some that had compounded for Knighthood for 10*l.* or 30*l.*, so as the Issues far exceeded the Composition, and yet would next time have been increased; the said Earl upon this occasion said, That now they might see, that the Little-finger of the Law was heavier than the King's Loins; which he spake to nourish good affections in them towards his majesty, and not to threaten or terrify any, as the Article supposed.

To the Third Article, he saith, Ireland is not governed by the same laws that this kingdom is, unless it be meant by the common laws; their customs, statutes, execution of martial laws, proceedings at council-board very much differ: the words in the Article were not spoke to any such intent. He saith, It might be fit enough for him to remember them of the great obligation they had to the king and his progenitors, that suffered them, being a conquered nation, to enjoy freedom and laws, as their own people of this kingdom: and it might be, that upon some such occasion he said to those of Dublin, That some of their Charters were void and nothing worth, and did not bind his majesty farther than he pleased; which he believes to be true, having been formerly so informed by his majesty's learned counsel upon sundry occasions.

To the Fourth, he saith, That the legal and ordinary proceedings at Council-Table are, and time out of mind have been, by Petition, Answers, Examination of Witnesses, as in other courts of justice concerning British Plantations, the Church, and cases hence recommended by the king for the time being, and in Appeals from other courts there; and the Council-Board have always punished Contempts to Orders there made, to Proclamations, and Acts of State, by Fine and Imprisonment. He saith, That it might be, he told the earl of Cork, that he would imprison him if he disobeyed the Orders of the Council-Table, and that he would not have lawyers dispute or question those Orders, and that they should bind; but remembereth not the comparison of acts of parliament: and he hath been so far from scorning the laws, that he hath endeavoured to maintain them. The Suit against the Earl in the Castle-Chamber was concerning the possessions of the college of Youghall, worth 6 or 700*l.* which he hath endeavoured to get, by causing of unlawful oaths to be taken, and very undue means: the matter proceeded to Examination and Publication of Witnesses; and after, upon the earl of Cork's humble suit, and payment of 15,000*l.* to his majesty, and his acknowledgment of his Misdemeanors, obtained a Pardon, and the Bill and Proceedings were taken off the file: and he remembers not any suit for breach of any Order made at Council-Table.

To the Fifth, he saith, The Deputies and Generals of the Army have always executed martial law, which is necessary there; and the Army, and the members thereof, have been long time governed by printed Orders, according to which, divers, by sentence of the council of war, have formerly been put to death, as well in the time of peace as war. The lord Mountnorris being a captain of a company in the Army, for mutinous words against the said Earl, general of that army, and upon two of those ancient Orders, was proceeded against by a Council of War, being the principal officers of the army, about twenty in number, and by them, upon clear Evidence, sentenced to death: wherein the said Earl was no judge, but laboured so effectually with his majesty, that he obtained the lord Mountnorris's pardon; who by that Sentence suffered no personal hurt or damage, save about two days imprisonment. And as to the other persons, he can make no Answer thereunto, no particulars being described.

To the Sixth, he saith, The Suit had depended many years in Chancery; and the Plaintiff complaining of that delay, the said Earl upon a Petition, (as in such cases hath been usual) calling to him the then Master of the Rolls, the now Lord Chancellor, and the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, upon the Proofs in the Chancery, decreed for the Plaintiff; to which he refers himself: and it may be the lord Mountnorris was thereupon put out of his possession.

To the Seventh, he saith, His majesty being intitled to divers lands, upon an Inquisition found, Proclamation was made, That such as claimed by patent should come in by a day, and have their patents allowed, as if they had been found in the Inquisition; and accordingly divers were allowed. The lord Dillon produced his patent, which being questionable, he consented, and desired that a Case might be drawn; which was drawn by counsel, and argued, and the Judges delivered their opinions: but the lord Dillon nor any other were bound thereby, or put out of possession; but might have traversed the office, or otherwise legally have proceeded, that case or opinion notwithstanding.

To the Eighth, he saith, That upon sir John Gifford's Petition to the king, his majesty referred it to the deputy and council of Ireland, where the matter proceeded legally to a Decree against the lord Loftus; and upon his Appeal, that Decree by his majesty and his council of England was confirmed: to which Decree and Order he refers himself, believing the lord Loftus was committed for disobeying that Decree, and for continuance in contempt committed close prisoner. He saith, That the lord Loftus having committed divers Contempts, the Council by warrant required him to appear at the Board, and to bring the great seal with him; which order he disobeyed, and was shortly after committed, and the great seal was delivered up by his majesty's express command, and not otherwise. And an Information was exhibited in the Star-Chamber, for grievous Oppressions done by the lord Loftus as Chancellor; whereof he was so far from justifying, as that he submitted, desiring to be an object of his majesty's mercy, and not of his justice.

The Earl of Kildare, for not performing of an Award made by king James, and of an Award made in pursuance thereof by the said Earl of Strafford, upon a reference from his majesty, was by the Deputy and Council committed: and a Letter being unduly obtained, he did not thereupon enlarge him: but upon another letter, and submission to the orders, as by the king was directed, he was enlarged.

The lady Hibbotts, and one Hoy her son, having upon a Petition, Answer, Examination of Witnesses, and other Proceedings at Council-Board, been found to have committed foul abuses by fraud and circumvention, to have made a bargain with the petitioner Hibbotts, for lands of a great value, for a small sum of money; was ordered to deliver up the writing, no assurances being perfected, or money paid; and it is like he threatened her with commitment if she obeyed not that order; but denieth that the lands were after sold to sir Robert Meredith to his use, or that, by any order by himself made, any one hath been imprisoned concerning frecholds, but for debts and personal things, as some have been used by all his predecessors in like causes.

To the Ninth, he saith, Warrants to such effects have been usually granted to the bishops in Ireland, in the times of all former deputies; but the Earl not satisfied with the conveniency thereof, refused to give any such Warrants in general to the Bishops as had been formerly done: but being informed that divers in the diocese of Downe gave not fitting obedience, he granted a Warrant to that bishop, whereto he referreth, which was the only warrant he granted of that nature; and hearing of some Complaints of the execution thereof, he recalled it.

To the Tenth, he saith, The Lord Treasurer Portland offered the Farm of the Customs for 13,000*l.* per annum, in some particular species, but the earl of Strafford advanced the same Customs to 15,500*l.* per annum, and 8,000*l.* Fine; and by his majesty's command became a Farmer at those Rates proposed, without addition to those Rates, as by the printed books 7 Car. regis may appear. He dissuaded the advance of Rates lately proposed by sir Abraham Dawes, so as it was declined: The Rates of Hides and Wool are moderate, consideration being had of their true value, and of the places whereto they are to be transported, and of the statute made in the time of queen Elizabeth, and there in force, prohibiting the exportation of Wool, unless they pay to the crown 5*s.* the stone. The Trade and Shipping of that kingdom are exceedingly increased.

To the Eleventh, he saith, Pipe-staves were prohibited in king James's time, and not exported but by licence from the Lord Treasurer of England, or lord deputy of Ireland, who had 6*s.* 8*d.* per 1000, and his secretary 3*s.* 4*d.* for the Licence: but to restrain that destruction of timber, by command of his majesty and advice of his council for his revenue in Ireland, first 30*s.* then 5*l.* was charged. The money was paid to his majesty, who hath thereby about 1,500*l.* per annum; and his lordship lost about 4 or 500*l.* per annum, which his predecessors had for such Licences. This is paid by the transporter, not by the natives, whose commodity nevertheless appears by the Article to be very much increased.

To the Twelfth, he saith, The Subsidies there are an inheritance in the crown by act of parliament; 6*d.* was paid for subsidy, and 1*s.* 6*d.* for impost upon every pound of Tobacco, and farmed at 10 or 20*l.* per annum. The Commons in parliament, 10 Car. regis, finding the revenue to be short of the expence of that kingdom 24,000*l.* per annum, petitioned those Grants might be applied to increase his majesty's Revenue, without calling upon the subject but upon urgent occasions. Hereupon, upon the advice of the Committee of the Revenue, and in consideration of a Proclamation made in England, several Proclamations were made, and this settled in a way, till it could be confirmed by parliament; for which purpose a Bill is transmitted, according to the desire of the commons, and the impost of Tobacco is lett to contractors for 11 years, at 5,000*l.* per annum for the first five years, and 10,000*l.* per annum for the other six years. And the Earl hath lent money to forward the business, and by his majesty's allowance is a partner; but hath not as yet, in two years last past, had any Accounts thereof, or made benefit thereby. He knoweth of no Whipping, or other Punishment. The Farms of the Customs are better than formerly 2,000*l.* per annum, five 8th parts whereof is yearly paid unto his majesty: the prices of Tobacco exceed not 2*s.* or 2*s.* 4*d.* the pound; the settling of that Revenue is according to the Petition of the Commons; he hath not raised or countenanced any Monopolies, but opposed the same.

To the Thirteenth, he saith, He endeavoured to advance the manufacture of Linen rather than of Woollen-Cloth, which might prejudice that trade here: he bought Flax-seed in the Low-Countries, and sold it at the same rate to such as desired it; they making their cloths not above a foot broad, and winding eight or ten threads from several bottoms together; the contrary was twined: their flax, formerly not above a foot, became a yard in length: and that soil is fit to bear it, and the people love such easy works. He hath set up many looms, made much cloth, and sold it to the loss of some thousands of pounds; but when the state saw the natives would not change their old courses for new and better, the Proclamation was declined. What he did was for the public good, and had nothing from them that was not fully paid for.

To the Fourteenth, he saith, He refers to the Oath and Proclamation, which was set forth by the said Earl and Council of State there, at the instance of the Farmers of the Customs, to prevent the defrauding of the king's Duties, whereof his majesty had five eight parts. He never heard any complaint of the Oath, or of any that refused to take it; and conceived it to be lawful, divers of the Council approving it, being learned judges of the law, to whose judgment for the legality he submitted, as well in that, as to other matters of the like nature.

To the Fifteenth, He denieth what is in the Article objected; but saith, That about the year 1626, certain agents authorized in Ireland were sent into England, and offered and agreed to pay to his majesty 120,000*l.* in six years, towards the maintenance of his Army; and a like payment of 20,000*l.* per annum, was after agreed, and continued for three years longer. The Assessments were made, and it was shortly after, by them and the lord Faulkland, then Deputy, agreed in Ireland, that the money should not be charged upon record, but levied by captains, by Paper-assignments, upon Warrants from the Lord Deputy: and this course was held four years in the lord Faulkland's time, and the four years wherein the lord Loftus and the earl of Cork were lords justices there; and it held for the remaining year only, after the earl of Strafford came thither. But the earl of Cork having spared those towns, for the benefit of himself and tenants, during the time of his being justice; the earl of Strafford reduced the assessment to what it was made by the lord Faulkland, and gave way to sir William St. Lieger, lord president of Munster, should take the same arrearages, in satisfaction of a debt due unto him by his majesty: and he is confident no force was used in levying the same. It hath been usual to lay soldiers to levy that contribution, to send soldiers to apprehend contemners of Orders made at Council-Board, and the like; and when outlaws and rebels have been in the woods, no soldiers have in his time been laid, but by the advice of the council there. Touching the Castle-Cumber, it is a parcel of the territory of Idough, whereto the king was intitled by inquisition, and the possession established in a legal way, when the said Earl was in England; and no soldiers were sent, but only 12, at the intreaty of Mr. Wanesford, for the security of his houses and plantations against rebels that then were out, and burned and spoiled houses thereabouts: and neither Richard Butler's, nor any other family, were thence expelled by the said earl from their estates.

To the Sixteenth, he saith, There was such a Proposition, which was just, to prevent clamorous complaints here, which there might be redressed; but conceives, that by the laws there, and the Articles known since, (by the name of the Articles of Grace, made about 14 years since) none ought to depart that kingdom without Licence. Thereupon, by the advice of the State, the Proclamations were set forth, but not with such intent as in the article.—He denied licence only to three, the earl of Cork, the lord Mountnorris, and sir Frederic Hamilton: to the two former, in regard of criminal suits then against them in the Castle-Chamber; to the other, by special command from his majesty. But so soon as sir Frederic said he would complain of the Earl, he made suit to his majesty that sir Frederic might come over; which was granted. He conceives such restraint to be necessary, and if that be not continued, it will prove of evil consequence to that kingdom.—Parry was questioned at the Council-Board for Misdemeanors, and, to avoid Sentence, secretly went out of the kingdom; and at his return, for that and other offences, was fined and imprisoned; to the Sentence thereof he refers, and knows of no other that were imprisoned, as by the Article is charged.

To the Seventeenth, he saith, It is like he might say, (for the better encouragement of the Officers and Soldiers of the old Irish Army, in discharge of their several duties) that his majesty was so well satisfied in the way and pains they took in using and practising of their arms, that, in that point, he would set them as a pattern to be imitated: and conceives it would not be ill if they were so; they being, in the opinion of those that have seen them exercise, very able and expert soldiers. He spake not other words, or to other purpose.

To the Eighteenth, he saith, When the earl of Cork was one of the Lords Justices, he seized some houses in Dublin, pretending they belonged to Jesuits and Friars, without legal proceedings; which upon suits prosecuted at Council-Board, were, according to justice, restored to the owners: but how since employed, the Earl of Strafford knoweth not, but endeavour'd the utmost he could to maintain that seizure. Touching the 8,000 men, he saith, They were raised according to the king's warrant, and that the said Earl left the care thereof to the earl of Ormond and others; and what number are Protestants, what papists, he knoweth not, but believeth such a body cannot be there raised, without many papists: the greatest number of the captains and officers are Protestants, chosen by the said Earl. The thousand men were drawn out of the old, to make officers for the new Army; and believeth the thousand put to the old Army are Protestants, in regard, by his express order, no Papist is to be admitted there a common soldier. He never preferred any captain, lieutenant, or ensign, to be of that Army that was a Papist, and conceives they are duly paid; and believes those newly raised exercise religion no otherwise than was practised before the Earl's coming thither. He was a Commissioner to compound with the Recusants for their Forfeitures, and endeavour'd to be inform'd of the utmost value of their Estates: in four years he brought that Revenue from 2,300*l.* to between 11 and 12,000*l.* per annum, more than ever was raised formerly in so short a time; by which faithful dealings for his majesty, he procur'd the hard opinion of the Recusants throughout the kingdom: That out of those Compositions he hath paid near 100,000*l.* into the Exchequer; and they had no other Privileges than what were exercised in the Commission, and in former like Commissions, and as are in the present commission to the Lord Treasurer, and others.

To the Nineteenth, he saith, The last summer was twelve months, when the English and Scotch lay in the fields near Berwick, the Earl and Council of Ireland having a general notion thereof, were in fear that the Scots in Ulster (being almost 100,000 in number) might be drawn to side with the Covenanters; and advising how to secure that kingdom; the principal of the nation of Scotland, living in Ireland, came to Dublin, and petitioned, that they might have an Oath whereby they might give testimony of future obedience to his majesty. Whereupon an Oath was by the advice of the Council of State framed, and cheerfully taken by those Scotch gentlemen, and generally by all the nation in Ireland, as the Earl conceives, to their advantage, and the satisfaction of others. He believes that some were sentenced for refusing it, but none were otherwise exiled. The Earl, in his Vote, said, That he would endeavour that all of that nation should take that Oath, or leave the kingdom. All which was done by his majesty's direction and approbation: And it was not contrived to the intent of the Article charged, but to prevent their adhering to the Covenanters then in open arms, and not concerning the ceremony or government of the Church.

To the Twentieth he saith, That in the year 1638, the Earl was in Ireland, when preparations were made for war, and summons sent to the nobility of this kingdom. In the year 1639, a General was appointed, and an Army drawn to the field, and encamped near Berwick; whereby it appears he was not acquainted that the Article of Pacification had been broken on both sides, and so distemper'd, that it was held fit an army in England should be raised to suppress the Covenanters, if the business could not with honour and safety be otherwise compos'd. The said Earl humbly advised his majesty to call a Parliament and use many motives thereunto. After the Parliament was called, and before the sitting thereof, ten of the lords, and other of the Council for foreign affairs being assembled, his majesty then present, an honourable person related the Covenanters demands. It was then voted by all, That they were such as might be in honour and safety be condescended unto by his majesty; and if they could not be otherwise reduced, his majesty must be constrained to bring them to it by force. The like Resolution was voted after at the Council-Table by twenty of the council. Whereupon his majesty appointed a Council of War; and it was held necessary to borrow 200,000*l.* upon good security, till the Supplies by the Parliament might come in. He never said the Scotch nation were Rebels, but was ever persuaded that many of them were most loyal subjects.—Those that raised arms, when they were at such a distance from his majesty, he might say they were no less than Rebels and Traitors. By Warrant from the Lord Admiral he caused divers ships and goods to be seized, but not with an intent to set on the war; but, as much as in him lay, to bring all to fair accommodations without expence of blood.

To the Twenty-first, he saith, The Pacification was broken before he came over, as in the Answer to the former Article: he moved his majesty for a parliament in England, but not with such intent as in the Article, but out of a desire to have settled a right understanding between the king and his people. It may be said, (though he remembereth it not) That if the parliament would not supply his majesty, he would serve his majesty in any other lawful way; being well assured that his majesty would not employ him, nor any man else, in any other kind.

To the Twenty-second, he saith, According to his majesty's Instructions, he did set forth to the Parliament of Ireland the State of the Affairs, as they then stood; and they freely gave four Subsidies, as an acknowledgment of his goodness and happy government, as by the act and remonstrance appears in print. He by his majesty's direction, then gave order for the raising of 8,000 men, who still remain in the king's pay, and were sent into Ulster to secure those parts, or to land in Scotland, to divert the earl of Argyle, in case he joined with the Covenanters army against the king. But it was mentioned in the king's Letter, 2 Martii 1639, he had purposely given out, That they should join with the king's army at Berwick, to colour other designs: But the true cause of their levying was made known to be as aforesaid unto the earl of Ormond, sir John Burlace, and the marquis of Hamilton, and the earl of Northumberland, at the time of the writing the Letter. And he denies the Words charged in the Articles, or any other words to such intent and purpose.

To the Twenty-third, he saith, The matters of the Parliament were no otherwise referred to him than to the rest of the Council: That coming sick from Ireland about ten days after the Parliament were set; and after the Treaty with the earl of Dunfermline and lord Lowden, Scotch Commissioners, was broken off, and the army preparing, and the parliament not supplying monies as his majesty desired, his majesty advised what might move them to prefer his supply. In debate whereof, he humbly advised his majesty, by a Message to the house, to lay down Ship-money and promise never to demand it, and give way to reverse the Judgment by a Writ of Error in parliament, and to promise a Redress of Grievances when they should be prepared. And secondly, That they would presently agree upon such Supply as should maintain his Army for reducing the Scots to their obedience, wherein their safety and his honour was concerned. His majesty assented conditionally, that he might have twelve subsidies: The Earl besought him that it might not pass as a condition, but to relinquish Ship-Money, and put himself upon their affections; and drew up the Message in writing, and delivered it to Mr. Secretary Vane, to deliver to the House of Commons. He desired to know if his majesty would not take less than twelve. His majesty answered, He feared less would not serve his occasions. The earl of Strafford besought his majesty to accept of eight. So his majesty assented, and desired Mr. Secretary to signify so much, as occasion should be offered: But whether he did so or not, the said Earl knoweth not. The House of Commons being in debate two days, and not resolving, his majesty about the 5th of May last called a Council at 7 o'clock in the morning: The said Earl being sick, came late, and was told, as he remembereth, by the earl of Berkshire, the king had declared his resolution to dissolve the parliament. The earl of Strafford besought his majesty to hear the advice of his Council, and first of those that were members of the house of commons, by whom the rest might the better be guided. Mr. Secretary Windebank said, He feared the house would first be answered of their Grievances, and voted for a breach of the parliament. Mr. Secretary Vane, in opposite terms, said, That there was no hope that they would give the king a penny, and therefore absolutely voted for a breach. And the earl of Strafford conceiving his majesty's pleasure to have accepted eight subsidies had been delivered to the house of commons by Mr. Secretary Vane, did in his turn deliver his Vote for breach of the parliament, which otherwise he would not have done, it being contrary to what he resolved when he came thither; and the like opinion was delivered by the rest of the lords, being about twenty, except two or three at the most. The Parliament being dissolved, his majesty desired Advice of his Council how Money might be raised, affirming that the Scotch army was ready to enter into the kingdom: The said Earl, in presence of others in the Council, delivered his opinion, That in a case of absolute and unavoidable necessity, which neither would nor could be prevented by ordinary remedies provided by the laws, nor all his majesty's other means sufficient to defend the commonwealth, himself, or their lives and estates from an enemy, without force of arms, either actually eutered, or daily expected to invade the realm; he conceived that his majesty was absolved from ordinary rules, and might use (in a moderate way, as the necessity of the cause would permit) all ways and means for defence of himself and kingdom; for that he conceived in such extremity, 'Salus Populi' was 'Suprema Lex,' provided it were not colourable, nor any thing demanded employed to other use, nor drawn into example, when law and justice might take place: and that when peace was settled, reparation was to be given to particular men, otherwise it would be unjust. This was not officiously declared, but in council, forced by the duty of the oath of a counsellor, which is, That he shall in all things to be moved, treated, and debated in council, faithfully and truly declare his mind and opinion according to his heart and conscience: Which Oath the said Earl took, and humbly prays their lordships consideration thereof. He denies the Words in the Article, or any words to the intent thereby expressed.

To the Twenty-fourth, he saith, He delivered his opinion with such cautions and restrictions, as in the Answer to the precedent Article; and is well assured his discourse at all times hath been without ill intentions to either of the houses of parliament, which he ever did and shall speak of with all reverence. He denies that he knew of the publishing or printing of the Book, or who caused it to be printed or published; for at that time he was sick in his bed, more like to die than to live.

To the Twenty-fifth, he saith, Ship-Money was levied, and adjudged to be due, before his coming over. Sheriffs were then called up as before, and not otherwise. If any were sued in Star-Chamber, it was without any particular endeavour of his. It appearing at the Board that the mayor and sheriffs of London had been slow in collecting Ship-Money, he saith, They were but ministerial, and ought to exact, and not dispute the king's writs; and that if through their remissness the king should be less able to provide for the public safety, when any foreign army was ready to enter the kingdom, they might deserve to be fined and ransomed: which he spake more to hasten them, than of purpose to advise any such prosecution. But denies the other Words, being, under favour, such expressions as he is not accustomed unto.

To the Twenty-sixth, he saith, He advised not either of those Projects, being then sick in bed: But it being debated at the Council-Table whether it were better for the king to raise Gold and Silver, or coin base Money, he, for the reasons then given, delivered his opinion for the latter. Sundry merchants adventurers coming to his house, desired him to move his majesty, then at Oatlands, to release the bullion, or money: He told them he knew of no such thing, and would not meddle with it; nor would his health permit him to go abroad: and said, That if by their denying the king in such a public danger the loan of 100,000*l.* upon good security, the king were constrained, for the preservation of the land, to stay the bullion, they might thank themselves; and the city receiving so great a benefit by residing amongst them, they made but an unthankful acknowledgment in such a strait, to refuse the loan of that sum. The officers of the Mint came to the Council-Board, and the Earl then shewed a Letter he received from the earl of Leicester, wherein was related That the cardinal had appointed commissioners to go into the merchants houses at Paris, to peruse their shop-books and accounts, and cuss every man according to his ability, towards the payment of the king's army; and then said, That it was but just for us here in England to bless God for being under a king which could not think upon such a pressing upon the people. But the Words in the Article, or words to any such intent, he did not speak; and cannot suffici-

To the Twenty-seventh, he saith, He persuaded the gentry of that county to allow the Trained-Bands a month's pay; which they yielded, and his majesty graciously accepted. It was by Council of War, his majesty being present, thought fit the Trained-Bands should return, save the two regiments under the command of sir William Pennyman and sir Thomas Danby: It was assented unto by his majesty, and the great council of peers then assembled, That those spared should contribute; and the said Earl was commanded by them to see it done. Which was done accordingly by Warrants from him, and from his Deputy-Lieutenants, which was much less charge to the counties than otherwise. And denies the other particular in the Article mentioned.

To the Twenty-eighth, he saith, He was lieutenant general to the earl of Northumberland, about the 24th of August, of 10 or 12,000 foot, and 2,000 horse, being at Newcastle, under the command of the lord Conway and sir Jacob Astley, and the rest of the army at York. The said Earl went from London on the 26th of August, notwithstanding his extreme weakness, and came to York. And having received a Letter from sir Jacob Astley that Newcastle was fortified, and that they must be infamous beasts to lose it, and that it was fully secured; and being acquainted with several Dispatches sent by Mr. Secretary Vane, by his majesty's directions, to the lord Conway, general of the horse, to oppose the passage of the Scots over the river Tyne, the one dated 22 Aug., the other 23 Aug., another 24 Aug., another 26 Aug., the substance of which Letters are particularly mentioned in the Answer to this Article: and to the same Letters the said Earl referreth himself.

The said Earl, upon sight of this and sir Jacob Astley's letter, had reason to believe that all fitting preparation was made; and then understanding that if the Scottish Army should pass the river, not only Newcastle, altogether unfortified on the south part, would be lost, but the said army of 11,000 foot and 2,000 horse endangered; and hearing that the Scottish army was distressed for want of victuals, and knowing the advantage that was in opposing the passage of such a river: Hereupon the said Earl, by a Letter dated the 27th of August, advised the lord Conway, with all the horse, and at least 8,000 foot, and all the cannon, to march and fight with them upon the passage of the river: At which time the said Earl had no charge of the army. But the truth is, the lord Conway having not with him all the horse, and not above 1,500 foot, and only some part of the cannon, was in a posture to fight for the passage before the said letter of advice came, which he received not half an hour before the fight began, and proceeded according to his own judgment, and his majesty's said general direction. And afterwards, that is, about the 30th of August, and not before, the said Earl took upon him the charge of the Army at Darlington, and brought it to York to be supplied with necessaries that they wanted, and purposed to have staid where they were quartered. But hearing from many hands that there was a purpose to question him in parliament, and his majesty having given him liberty of staying there, or coming away, he left the charge of the army with the lord Conway, and other officers, as his majesty had directed, and came to London on Monday the 9th; and the 11th of November was put under restraint, and so hath ever since remained. And saith, That the town of Newcastle was no way under his cure. And as to other matters, whereto by law he ought to answer, and hath not answered, he saith, He is not guilty of them, or any of them, in such manner and form as in the said Article is expressed; and humbly prayeth a convenient time for making his Proofs, and to justify and maintain his actions in Ireland by sight of his majesty's Warrants, Records, and witnesses in that kingdom; and that if any mistake be in his Answer, it may be amended.

And this the said Earl hopeth, that, upon equal construction of his words and actions, he shall appear free from any great and heinous offences wherewith he is charged: And howsoever it shall please God to dispose of him, he shall ever pray, that by their lordships great wisdom and prudence, the affections of his majesty, and duty of his subjects, may this parliament be so surely knit together, as may by God's blessing lastingly tend to the prosperity and flourishing estate both of king and people.

THE TRIAL.*

The place appointed for the Trial was the great Hall in Westminster, where there was a

* "Much time," says lord Clarendon, "was spent in consideration of the manner of the trial; for they could find no precedent would fit their case: Whether it should be in the house of peers? which room was thought too little, for the accusers, witnesses, judges, and spectators: Who should prosecute? Whether members chosen of the commons, or the king's council? Whether the bishops, which were 24 in number, and like to be too tender-hearted in matter of blood, and so either to convert many or increase a dissenting party too much, should have voices in the trial! Whether those who had been created peers since the accusation was carried up, should be admitted to be judges? And lastly, Whether the commoners who were to be present at the trial, should sit uncovered? and, whether any members of the house of commons should be examined at the trial on the behalf of the Earl? who had sent a list of names, and desired an order to that purpose.—After much debate it was agreed, that the Trial should be in Westminster-hall, where seats should be built, for the reception of the whole House of Commons, which together with the Speaker should be present:

throne erected for the king, on each side thereof a cabinet enclosed about with boards, and before with a terras. Before that were the seats for the Lords of the upper house, and sacks of wool for the Judges; before them, ten stages of seats, extending farther than the midst of the Hall, for the gentlemen of the house of commons: at the end of all was a desk closed about, and set apart for the Lord Lieutenant and his counsel.

Monday morning about seven of the clock he came from the Tower, accompanied with six barges, wherein were 100 soldiers of the Tower, all with partizans, for his guard, and 50 pair of oars. At his landing at Westminster, there he was attended with 200 of the Trained-Bands; and went guarded by them, into the Hall. The entries at White-hall, King-street, and Westminster, were guarded by the constables and watchmen, from four of the clock in the morning, to keep away all base and idle persons.

The king, queen, and prince, came to the house about nine of the clock, but kept themselves private within their closets, only the Prince came out once or twice to the Cloth of State; so that the king saw and heard all that passed, but was seen of none. Some give the Reason of this, from the received practice of England in such cases: others say, that the lords did intreat the king either to be absent, or to be there privately, lest pretensions might be made hereafter, that his being there was either to threaten, or some otherwise to interrupt the course of justice: a third sort, That the king was not willing to be accessory to the Process till it came to his part, but rather chose to be present, that he might note and understand what violence, rigour, or injustice happened.

for they then foresaw, that they might be put to another kind of proceeding than that they pretended; and, though with much ado, they consented to sit uncovered, lest such a little circumstance might disturb the whole design.—For the prosecution, they had no mind to trust the king's council; who neither knew their secret evidence, nor being informed, were like to apply and press it so vigorously as the business would require: and therefore, they appointed that Committee which had prepared the Charge, to give in the Evidence, and in the name of all the Commons of England, to prosecute the Impeachment.—For the Bishops; after many bitter invectives; and remembering the faults of particular persons; and the canons which seemed to involve the whole body; with sharpness and threats: They took the case to be so clear upon an old canon (the only one they acknowledged for Orthodox) that 'Clericus non debet interesse sanguini,' that they were content 'to refer that to the house of peers, as proper only for their determination.' And this they did, not upon any confidence they had in the matter itself, whatever law, or reason, or canon they preterred; or in the lords,

When the Lieutenant entered the Hall, the porter of the Hall (whose office it is) asked

Mr. Maxwell, whether the axe should be carried before him or no? Who did answer, That the major part of whom, when any difference of opinion was, always dissented from their designs: but that they had a trick of doing their business by intimation; and had a sure friend amongst the bishops, who had promised them seasonably to free them of that trouble.—They would not trust their lordships own inclinations with the other point, of the new barons, which they knew would be controverted; but in plain terms demanded, 'that no peers, created since the day upon which the earl of Strafford was impeached of High Treason, because they were involved as Commoners in the making that accusation, should sit as judges at his trial.'

"For the Earl's demand, 'of an order to examine some members on his behalf, upon matters of fact, at his trial,' after a long debate, they left it only in the power of the persons themselves who were nominated, to be examined if they would, not without some smart animadversions, that they should take heed what they did, and refused to enjoin them; though the same had been done at their desire, for the lords of the council: but that was against the Earl, and so the less to be considered.

"The Lords, in the absence of the Lord Keeper, who was very sick, made choice of the earl of Arundel to preside and govern the Court; being a person notoriously disaffected to the earl of Strafford. And for the great business of the Bishops, they were saved the labour of giving any rule, which it may be would have troubled them, by the bishop of Lincoln's standing up, and moving, on the behalf of himself, and his brethren, 'that they might be excused from being present at the Trial, being ecclesiastical persons, and so not to have their hands in blood; and such other reasons, as, when they are examined, will not be found of very great weight.'—The example of the Bishops, prevailed with some lords, who had been created since the Accusation, to quit their right of judging; and amongst them, the lord Littleton, who had been made a baron upon the desire of the earl of Strafford, for that only reason, that he professed, 'If he were a peer, he would, and indeed he could, do him notable service,' was the first who quitted his right to judge, because he had been a commoner when the Accusation was first brought up: but they who insisted upon their right, as the lord Seymour, and others, and demanded the judgment of the house, were no more disturbed, but exercised the same power to the end, as any of the other lords did; and so, no doubt, might the Bishops too, if they would: for, though there might be some reason for their absence, when the Trial was according to law, before and by his peers only; yet, when that Judgment was waved, and a Bill of Attainder brought against him, their votes in that Bill were as necessary and essential, as of any other of the lords. And it may be, their unseasonable, voluntary, unjust quitting it then, made

"On Monday, the 22nd of March, the Earl of Strafford was brought to the bar in Westminster-hall; the lords sitting in the middle of the Hall in their robes; and the commoners, and some strangers of quality, with the Scottish commissioners, and the committee of Ireland, on either side; there being a close box made at one end, at a very convenient distance for hearing, in which the king and queen sat, un-taken notice of: his majesty, out of kindness and curiosity, desiring to hear all that could be alleged: of which, I believe, he afterwards repented himself; when his having been present at the trial, was alleged and urged to him, as an argument for the passing the Bill of Attainder."

The following are Mr. Laing's reflections upon this transaction: "While the treaty was thus protracted, the fate of Strafford was determined in parliament. An endeavour to subvert the fundamental laws was a species of constructive treason till then unknown, and was established on facts which were either indifferent in themselves, or insufficient separately to constitute such crime. Whether from the novelty of the accusation, or from the defective nature of the evidence, a bill of attainder was necessary to reach his devoted head. Charles, who, according to the ordinary dispensation of justice, might have remained a silent spectator of his fate, was reduced, by the bill of attainder, to the cruel alternative of becoming accessory to the death of a favourite minister, endeared by his services, or of involving himself in a rupture with parliament, and in a civil war, while he was unprepared for the event. As a constitutional precedent, the attainder of Strafford is surrounded with difficulties. Were an act, declaratory of treason, to be restrained, on the one hand, within the limits of the established law, a statesman, secure from the stroke of justice, might conspire, with impunity, to subvert the fundamental laws of the constitution, which implies no treasonable design against the crown; yet, on the other hand, an act declaratory of new crimes might ultimately recoil on the people themselves; and a servile parliament might indulge the ambition or the resentment of a minister, by the attainder of every opponent whom he hated or feared. The evidence against Strafford was defective, however, as it indicated rather his advice and opinion, than a concerted design to render Charles independent of parliament: but, as mercy is not the attribute of collective bodies, he suffered, without legal evidence, from the violence of his accusers, and the secret conviction or the fears of his judges. The apprehensions of his escape if the trial were interrupted, seem to have first suggested the bill for preventing the dissolution of parliament without its own consent."

the king had expressly forbidden it: nor was it the custom of England to use that ceremony, but only when the party accused was to be put upon his jury. Those of the upper house did sit with their heads covered, those of the lower house uncovered. The Bishops upon the Saturday before did voluntarily decline the giving of their suffrages in matters criminal, and of that nature, according to the provision of the Canon Law, and practice of the kingdom to this day; and therefore would not be present: yet withal they gave in a Protestation, that their absence should not prejudice them of that or any other privilege competent to them as the lords spiritual in parliament; which was accepted.

The earl of Arundel, as Lord High Steward of England, sat apart by himself, and at the Lieutenant's entry commanded the house to proceed. Mr. Pym being Speaker of the Committee for his accusation, gave in the same Articles which were presented at his last being before the Upper House; which being read, his Replies were subjoined and read also, the very same which were presented before in the Upper House. Some give the reason of this, because the Lower House had not heard those Accusations in public before; others, that the formality of the process required no less: however, that day was spent in that exercise.

The Queen went from the house about eleven of the clock; the King and Prince staid till the meeting was dissolved, which was after two. The Lieutenant was sent to the Tower by his guard, and appointed to return upon Tuesday at nine of the clock in the morning. The crowd of people was neither great nor troublesome; all of them saluted him, and he them, with great humility and courtesy, both at his entrance and at his return: therefore let fame pretend what it please about the malice and discontent of the multitude, 'That if he pass the Stroke of Justice, they will tear him in pieces;' yet I see there is more in rumour than in sight and appearance; and in this report, as in all others of this nature, more is thrust upon the vulgar (who seem as well fearful of punishment, as exempt from it, for all their great number) than they do justly deserve.

On Tuesday in the morning he came accompanied as before to Westminster; and having staid in the Exchequer-Chamber till nine of the clock, the king, queen, and prince came as before upon the first day.

Then Master Pym being called for, aggravated the Charge, which was given the day before, by a very ample Speech. It is impossible to call to mind all the hyperboles, the flashes, and superlative expressions that he used; the main points were, That it was Treason far beyond the reach of words, that he the Lieutenant, a native subject and a peer of England, the prime governor of Ireland, the commander of his majesty's forces, and a Protestant in religion, should have in such an impious and gross manner recompensed his majesty's favours, abused his goodness, and drawn all his dominions into hazard and peril of their religion, lives, goods, and privileges: That one of these faults alone had been enough, and too much, for the fulfilling of the exorbitancy and wickedness of any one man; and that no punishment could be thought upon, sufficient to expiate crimes of such a transcendent nature.

The Lieutenant, with no less moderation and wisdom than the other with heat and passion, spake to his own defence; and that with such a measure of eloquence and liveliness, that his very enemies were affected with it, and do marvellously report of it. He modestly recounted his services done to the king and crown of England, his endeavours for advancement as well of the honour as commodity of both kingdoms in general, but in particular that of Ireland; how he had engreathed and advanced the king's revenues there, restored the Church's maintenance, suppressed the Outlaws, established obedience to royal authority, and impeded the tyranny and usurpation of greater ones over the Commons. And for the effecting of all these actions, he mentioned himself the most weak and meanest instrument, with a wonderful prudence, in a middle way, betwixt the affectation of baseness, or dejectedness, and arrogance.

Master Pym, after the close of his Speech, told him that there were three new Articles adjoined (by an after-search) to his Charge; and desired that he might presently reply to the same.

Whereunto the Lieutenant answered, It was very strange, that after the close of the process, and when matters were come to be scanned, and examined by proof, that any new charge should be given in; yet, lest he should seem to decline the maintenance of his own innocency, and the just defence of his honour, he was most willing to hear them, and have them alledged, provided that a convenient time might be assigned him to make his Replies against them, as he had done to the other given in before.

But Master Pym excepted against this, and told him, that the house did conceive it to be dangerous to grant any farther prorogation.

Upon this, the Lords of the Upper House (who did not think it fit as yet to voice any particular in the audience of the house of commons) did retire themselves, and after a pretty time of stay they returned and declared, that they had found the Lieutenant's suit to be equitable, in desiring of further time for answering: yet seeing the Articles themselves, neither for number nor weight, seemed to be of that importance, but that he might furnish out a present Answer, they thought it fitting to grant no delay.

The Lieutenant then, entreating them to pass by and pardon the weaknesses of his extemporary Answers, desired to hear the Articles read, which were these:

'First, That he had within these two years withdrawn 40,000*l.* sterling from the Exche‘quer in Ireland, and employed it to his own private uses.’

‘Secondly, That in the beginning of his government, the Garrisons in Ireland had been maintained by the English Treasury.’

‘Thirdly, That he had advanced popish and infamous persons, as the bishop of Waterford and others, to the prime rooms in the church of Ireland.’

To the First he answered, That 30,000*l.* were set apart for the king’s late service, at his own most special and most peremptory commands; for which he produced the king’s own Letter, already approved as his acquittance at the Exchequer board in Ireland.

To the Second, That at the beginning of that Charge against him, as ever before his time, the Garrisons had been burdenson to the kingdom of England; but that he had so improved it, and settled the king’s Revenue there, that the like is not to be heard in all the times that are by-past: for which, if the best endeavours of a subject may justly expect any reward from his king and country, he craved leave to think that he rather deserved many thanks, than the least punishment.

To the Third, He appealed to all the Clergy in Ireland, if ever he had taken upon him any particular meddling in advancing their Churchmen, or whether he had done any thing concerning such affairs, but upon the special advice and desire of the best and wisest of their number. For his part, when he befriended the bishop of Waterford, he conceived of him as a man of integrity and learning, fit for such an employment; nor was there then the least suspicion of those monstrous Impieties, wherewith he was afterwards charged; that he had now justly suffered for the same, and that he hoped they would not lay a necessity upon him to prophesy and divine of the future conditions and deportments of men. For others of the Church, suspected of Popery, he knew none such, but should answer to the particulars so far as they concerned him, when they should happen to be alledged.

After this the House dissolved for that night, the king’s majesty and the prince having staid all the time: and the Lord Lieutenant was appointed to come thither again on Wednesday morning; at which time they are to proceed to the first Article, to give an oath to the Witnesses, and to examine all the Proofs whereon the process was builded.

It will be a very hard matter for him to expect every man’s testimony, and to give his Answers, either for full satisfaction or diminution of all objections; which way of proceeding will spend at least a fortnight, if not a greater space of time; yet it is thought the Lower House are impatient of delays. The expectations are exceeding various and different about the event of this great action: some think it will be impossible to escape the many and great Accusations laid to his Charge; others, and that the greater number too, are of opinion that he will be in no hazard of his life, and that it will not be possible to bring him into the compass of treason (‘quod tam misere cupio ut non credam.’) His adverse party is so great, and so far interested both in point of safety and honour against him, that ‘flectere si nequeunt superos,’ &c. nothing will be left unessayed, that may accelerate his ruin.

He hath all this time carried himself courageously, to the admiration, and withal so moderately, that it is to the great satisfaction of his very enemies: so that he seems neither dejected with fear, nor to affect boldness with confidence, but to carry himself with that constancy and resolution, which his innocency and brave parts do promise.

The Irish Commissioners here, have hitherto abstained from giving in any Remonstrance against the Lieutenant, and do still plead to have an immediate dependance from the king, and not from the parliament of England. There was a report that the parliament of Ireland had sent a Protestation against the act made the last year, for the king’s Supply in his Expedition against the Scots, as a thing which was violently in part, and in part surreptitiously obtained from them: but I have learned this to be an untruth. I had almost forgotten one passage of Mr. Pym, who in the aggravation of the Lieutenant’s Faults, had this expression, That he was like the Whore in the Proverbs, ‘He wiped his mouth, and with a brazen face said he had done no evil.’

To this the noble lord replied, That he wished his innocency might not be taken for impudence; that he hoped shortly to clear himself of all those foul aspersions which his malicious enemies had cast upon him; and he was very confident that he should give the honourable houses full satisfaction concerning his life hitherto, and thought of nothing more hereafter than to retire himself from all public employments.

Mr. Pym gave at this a great shout, and desired the house to take notice what an injury he had done to the honourable house of commons, in calling them his ‘malicious enemies.’

Whereupon the Lieutenant falling down upon his knees, humbly besought them that they would not mistake him; and withal gave a large panegyric of their most just and moderate proceedings, protesting that if he himself had been one of the house of commons, (as he had the honour once to be) he would not have advised them to have done otherwise against his dearest friend: but withal told them, that he might justly say he had his own un-friends, which he hoped in time to make known. Nor did he all this time speak one bitter word against Mr. Pym, though justly incensed; which hath infinitely advanced his reputation.

I have been a daily bearer of these Proceedings against this great personage now upon the stage, therefore do presume I can give a reasonable account thereof. The Book of his Charge is extant in print; so it shall be needful for me only to name the Articles, as they were canvasssed, and those designed by the house of Commons to be his Accusers: which were these that follow:

The Names of his Accusers.

Pym, Glyn, Maynard, Whitlock, lord Digby, St. John, Palmers, sir Walter Earle, Stroud, Selden, Hampden, &c.

One of these began the Speech; the rest, after their colleague hath done, follow in their turn: so that he bath all of them to wrestle against, and yet sufficiently able for them all; though by his agitation his spirits are much exhausted.

Mr. Glyn, after a large flourish, on Wednesday, told the lords, That the lord Strafford was impeached, not with simple, but accumulative Treason: for though, in each particular Article, such a monstrous crime could not be deprehended: yet when all was conceived in the mass, and under one view, he should be undoubtedly found the most wicked and exorbitant traitor that ever was arraigned at the bar. He added, That his Charge was for intending to subvert and change the fundamental laws, liberties, and privileges of both kingdoms, and to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical form of government. This, he said, could not appear but by the fruits, which were either in expression or action. The expressions were four:

First, That before several Witnesses he had said at York, 'That the king's little-finger should be heavier to them than the loins of the law.'

To this the Lieutenant replied, That having spoken sufficiently before to his justification in general, he would moreover add these few words, by their favours: That it did strike him to the heart to be attached of such a wicked crime, by such honourable persons; yea, that it wounded him deeper, in regard that such persons who were the companions of his youth, and with whom he had spent the best of his days, should now rise up in judgment against him: yet he thanked God for it, it was not guilt, but grief, that so much troubled him. He added, That it was a wonder how he had gotten strength sufficient in such infirmity of body, and such anguish of mind, to collect his thoughts, and say any thing at all for himself; but the Almighty God, who knows him to be innocent, had furnished him with some abilities to give testimony to the truth, and to a good conscience: He therefore intreated, that if either in judgment or in memory he should at any time fail, it might be imputed to his great weakness. And although the gentlemen his Accusers should seem more ready in their Accusations than himself in his Defence, yet that might not prejudice his cause; who, in very unequal terms, had to do with learned and eloquent lawyers, bred up a long time and inured to such judiciary pleadings, and whose rhetoric, he doubted not, might present many things to their view in a multiplying-glass. He told them farther, That for these many years he had been weary of public service, and that now it was his resolution, after he had vindicated his honour, to retire himself, and enjoy his much longed-for privacy: and yet he could not but tell them so much, that it had been his hearty wish and desire, rather voluntarily to have resigned his places of honour, like a ripe fruit fallen from the tree, than to be violently pulled from thence, as a fruitless and unprofitable withered branch.

To the Charge of Treason he said, That under favour he conceived, that although all the Articles contained in his Impeachment were verified against him, yet they would not all amount to Treason; neither simple nor accumulative: For (said he) I do not understand by what interpretation of law the diversion of justice can be called a subversion of the same; or the exceeding of a commission, the usurpation of a new power. To the particular he replied, That his words were clearly inverted, for that his expression was, 'That the little-finger of the law (if not supported by the regal power, in granting Pardons for Penalties of the same) was heavier than the king's loins.' That this was his expression, he verified, 1. By the Occasion: for he spake the words a long time since, to some men who had lain imprisoned at York, and were then by the king's favour set at liberty; whom he incited to thankfulness (by this expression) towards his majesty. 2. By Witnesses produced by him. In the Examination of their witnesses he convinced one of them of untruth, by interrogating him where he was when the Speech was heard, and how far distant from him: when the man replied, that he was 12 yards from him; he answered, that it was impossible for him to hear a man three yards off, by reason of a deafness that had held him 14 years: which being found true, the Witness was rejected.

Another Witness (sir David Foulis*) was brought against him; against whom he expected, as his known and professed enemy: it was told him, that he himself did not use to admit of exceptions against Witnesses, and therefore was to expect the same measure.

He replied, That Master Pym might one day perhaps be attached, for persuading the house of commons to commit the same crime that was laid upon him as a charge of Treason. But for all this, the Witness was received, because in matter of Treason a man's enemy may witness against him 'pro domino nostro rege': though I suppose, the king's advice was never asked for the present. This was all that was done for that time.

On Thursday he was charged with the second Expression: 'That he said Ireland was a conquered kingdom, and that the king might prescribe them what law he pleased.'

This they aggravated as a prime Note of his tyrannical will and affection, that would permit no law to bound the subject, but what himself, and such as he, might draw up by sinister informations from a gracious and well-meaning prince; and if this were admitted, the whole power and liberty of the Republic would be utterly lost.

* See his Case No 143, vol. ii. p. 586; and note the part taken against him by Lord Strafford on that occasion.

To this he replied, That neither was the Expression in those words, nor in that sense spoken or meant by him. The first part of it (said he) cannot be denied: to the second, that he had said only, 'That the king was the law-giver,' which he hoped none could deny without incurring the crime of Treason; and that 'the king's Sentence was a law in matters not determined by acts of parliament,' which all but disloyal subjects would grant. And that it had ever been his endeavour to have the Liberty of the Subject and the Royal Prerogative follow both in one channel; if either of them crossed other, we could expect nothing but a subversion of the Commonwealth, either by tyranny or rebellion: That the prerogative was like the first, the liberty of the subject like the second Table; either both or neither can be preserved. That in his duty he stood obliged first to the king, as God's Anointed; then in the second place to his country, if it did not cross the regal power. And therefore hoped, that what he had spoken was so far from being treason, that he thought a thousand such expressions would not make up one felony.

March 26.

On Friday the two other Expressions were followed: That he said, 'He would not suffer his Ordinances to be disputed by lawyers, before inferior judicatories, and that he would make an Act of State equivalent to an Act of Parliament.'

To the first he said, That he had often said (more than once) that he would not suffer his Ordinance to be contemned; because, in him, his master's honour was wounded.—To the second, He thought a proportionable obedience was due to Acts of State, as well as to Acts of Parliament; otherwise they were made in vain, if that both did not bind in one kind.

The Lord Cork, (though his mortal enemy) was now examined, and admitted as a witness; whom in his Deposition he convinced of two shameful oversights: for Cork had declared upon his oath, that the Lieutenant had caused to be interlined an Ordinance against himself, and had caused some words to be scraped out; which words were notwithstanding still found to be in the Sentence, by an authentic Copy under the hand of sir Paul Davison, clerk to the Council-Board of Ireland.—Then Cork alleged, That he had advanced a groom of his to be a Preacher; who by a testimony from the University of Dublin he verified to have been a Master of Arts ten or twelve years before his advancement: adding withal, that my lord of Cork was an excellent scholar, who was able to breed such grooms.

Upon Saturday, having done with his Expressions, they canvassed the first Article about his actions: Against the lives of the king's subjects, both in the Case of the lord Mountnorris, and also of another of the king's subjects, both of whom he had sentenced to death by Martial Law, contrary to all law, and to the manifest subversion of the privileges of subjects, Magna Charta, and the Petition of Right.

To the lord Mountnorris's Case he replied 1. That though that Sentence had been unjustly given and rigorously prosecuted against him, yet the greatest crime that he could be charged withal, would but amount to manslaughter, or felony at the most. 2. That he hoped, though this were true, to obtain a pardon from his gracious master the king's majesty, as well as Conway and sir Jacob Astley had lately done, for exercising martial law in the northern army.

Then he replied to all the parts of the Charge, which were four:

1. That he had exercised Martial Law in time of peace.

To this he answered, 1. That all armies have been, and must be, governed ever by martial law. 2. That there is a standing Army in Ireland, and therefore the case is all one in time of peace or war; and that the army might be undone, if they should not use Martial law, but were to expect remedy for the settling of a mutiny, or assurance of obedience, from the common law. 3. That it had ever been the practice of the Deputies, particularly of Wilmot, Falkland, Chichester, yea Cork himself: and therefore was no new thing brought in by him. This he proved, both by the production of the military Ordinances, and by divers Witnesses who knew Sentences given in that kind by them. 4. That he had a particular Warrant in his Commission for this power. 5. That in the lord Mountnorris's Case, he was commanded to exercise the same by the king's particular Letter: both which he caused to be read.

The second Charge was, That he was both Party and Judge in the lord Mountnorris's Cause.

To this he replied, That he had sitten a Judgment, because he was one sine quo non, the Judgment could not proceed without him: but that he was not judge, but party, appeared, 1. Because he sat uncovered all the time. 2. Because he refused to give his own opinion. 3. Because he did not give his suffrage one way or other. 4. Because he removed his brother sir George from having a hand in the process, in regard of interest of blood.

The third Charge was, That he proceeded summarily in the matter of the lord Mountnorris.

He replied, 1. That he was not Judge in it, and that the Council of War was to be answerable in the justification of their own proceedings. 2. That after a long reasoning he had heard them say, that no delay could safely be granted in Martial Courts.

The fourth Charge was, That he had not heard the Exceptions made by Mountnorris against his Witnesses.

To this he answered, as before, That he was not judge in the case, and that he remembers no exceptions made against any witnesses. To which he added, That as he had been regulated in his proceedings, so he had been moderate in the execution of that Sentence: for though the lord Mountnorris justly deserved to die, yet he had obtained him the king's Pardon, for the saving of his life; and protested, that he intended nothing by that Sentence, but in some measure to repair his own honour, and to give Mountnorris fair reproof, who was known to be of an exorbitant and licentious tongue and spirit. Adding, that if the House of Commons would go on the same way with him, and assure him that the issue of his Charge should be nothing else but to admonish him for the time to come, he would thank them heartily for it, and study amendment in all pretended oversights. And whereas Mountnorris complained that he had jeeringly told him when the Sentence was passed and pronounced against him, That ere he lost his head, himself would lose his hand; he answered, That he had been thought to be very insolent and haughty, yet he was never so impertinent to use this expression: If any fault were, it was for undervaluing himself, in saying, That ere a hair of Mountnorris's should perish, he would lose his hand. And truly (said he), if Mountnorris would say so to me now, even in the worst sense that can be conceived, That ere I died he would lose his hand, I would take it very kindly from him.

For the other man, he avouched that he himself had voiced to hang him, both because he was an arrant thief, and also had fled from his colours, which by the common law (and to this effect he cited a Statute 20 Hen. 6, and 7 Hen. 7.) is felony. He concluded, That seeing he was not accessory to the Sentence against Mountnorris, had not sat there as Judge, had a power to keep Martial Courts by his commission, had not exercised the same till a new command came from his majesty, had done no more than ever was practised in Ireland before his time, and had at last obtained Mountnorris's Pardon; he hoped there was nothing accusable in him, but his too remiss and too moderate proceedings.

Master Glyn bitterly replied, That he knew the time when the Earl of Strafford was no less active and stirring to enlarge the Liberty of the Subject, and advance the Petition of Right, than now he is for extending his own arbitrary and tyrannical government.

To this he replied, without the least semblance of passion, That if at any time he had done the least service to the house of commons, he thought his whole life well spent; nor could they ever so graciously reward him, as to give commission to that gentleman to express so much before that honourable assembly: but withal, if ever any such thing was done by him, he intreated it might now be remembered, and might now serve to overbalance some slight and mean oversights committed by him; which he hoped should never make him guilty of Treason, unless it were treason for a man to have no more wit and prudence than God and nature had bestowed upon him.—And so much for Saturday.

March 29, 1641.

Upon Monday he was charged with the sixth Article: That he had used a tyrannical Government, not only over the lives (as appeared by the last), but also over the lands and goods of the king's subjects, as appeared by this Article; wherein he was charged to have disposed the lord Mountnorris of a tenure of lands, by a summary process before himself, contrary to all law: and therefore had failed, 1. Against the act of 7 Hen. 6, which provides all matters to be determined by the ordinary judges. 2. Against the Cautions sent to Ireland by king James, expressly forbidding such power hereafter to be exercised. 3. Against the king's late Proclamation. 4. Against the practice of all Deputies before that time.

Withal they added, That it was a tyranny that could not be expressed, to exercise this power over the persons of the peers of the land, and their goods.

To this he replied, That for his part, in matter of Justice (under favour he spoke it) he thought there was no distinction to be made betwixt a Peer of the land and one of the Commons, except they did think that either fear or faction should do something, which had no place in him.—To the Particulars:

1. That the act of Hen. 6, answered itself sufficiently, both because it excepted the Court of Requests (and that his proceedings were nothing else in Ireland), and also makes an express reservation of the king's prerogative; which he said was his strength, because he derived his Commission from the king, and that the act was the most express warrant in the world for him.

2. That he had not failed against the Cautions given by king James, 1. Because they were not charged upon him. 2. Because they were never observed, nor could be by the Deputies to whom they were given; which he proved both by witnesses and writings. 3. Because the Caution made rather for him than against him, in that it contained the word 'hereafter;' which manifestly implied that the power had been sometimes before exercised in Ireland, and not only by himself; and therefore thanked them for that testimony and hint. 4. That though the Cautions had been given to him, yet he had received an express command from the king his master to put that power in use: causing the king's Letter, for that purpose, to be read; and professing withal, That he was tender to exercise that power, till the king (induced by the humble Remonstrance of the meaner sort of people) had most peremptorily, and upon most just reasons, commanded him.

3. That he could not obey the king's Proclamation five years before it came out; and that he wished from his heart, that they would but respect the king's commands and commissions with that tenderness of affection and obedience, as he did his Proclamations.

4. He proved it to be the constant practice of all Deputies that went before him.

It was objected, That other Deputies had indeed upon suits of equity determined themselves, as to matters of debt, but never of land.

He replied, 1. That the same authority reacheth as well to the one as to the other. 2. That neither he nor they had ever given Sentence, or determined any thing concerning matters of inheritance; but only concerning violent intrusion, which fell directly within a suit of equity. To which he added, 1. The Equity of that Court; that it proceeds upon the same grounds and evidences as that of the Common Pleas, and that he had the assistance of two of the learned Judges in deciding the controversy. 2. The Profit of that Court, which dispatcheth the poor in a day or two; whereas the common law would keep them so many years, which they are not able to sustain. 3. The Necessity of that Court in that kingdom, which ever hath been governed by that way, and therefore impossible to debar the natives from it, without great inconvenience; for it would utterly undo them, and none is prejudiced by it but the lawyers. And therefore seeing that he had done nothing but what was customary, necessary, and equitable, being commanded to it, and the sentence just; he hoped rather for thanks from the state, than a charge for his ill deportment. Withal, he shewed with what extortion and violence the lord Mountnorris had taken seizure of that piece of land, and made the playing of his game to be very foul. And at last he added, That he had done no more in Ireland, than the Court of Request in England usually doth, and that the Chancery Court in Ireland doth the same daily; and the last Chancellor was never charged (said he) for such proceedings, though this his power and authority was less than mine: but the difference of the person and his authority (it seemeth) differeth the matter.—And this was the business on Monday.

March 30.

On Tuesday they passed by the 7th Article, and the two first parts of the 8th, and insisted on that part about the lady Hibbot's Land, That he had violently thrust her from her possession by this summary way of Justice, and afterwards purchased the Land to his own use, by borrowing the name of sir Robert Meredith. In this probation, the testimony of the gentleman's own son was used, of the lord Cork, and the lord Mountnorris, all his back-friends, or professed enemies: and yet they prove very little, but what they took upon hearsays. Their prime allegation was, 1. That though the major part of the Council Board had voted for the lady, yet the Lord Lieutenant had given Decrees against her. 2. That all was done to his own behoof.

To the First, He produced the Sentence under the hand of the Clerk of the Council Board, subscribed by the major part. To the Second, He attested that he had no under dealing with Meredith; for the lady had got her own lands back from the said sir Robert Meredith. He also declared, at length, with what fraud and deceit the lady had come to her lands, and upon what reasons they were restored.

After this Article they fell upon the 9th, about the giving of Commission to the bishop of Downe and Connor, for apprehending all such persons, and presenting them before the Council Board, as contemned the Ecclesiastical Ordinances. This was aggravated as a point mainly against the Liberty of the Subject. To this he replied:

1. He produced the primate of Ireland's testimony under his hand, (he being himself sick) that the same course had been used in Ireland before; and that bishop Montgomery, his predecessor in the bishopric of Meathe, had had the same.

2. He shewed the equity that such assistance should be given to churchmen, who otherwise, because of Papists and Schismatics, either to God or the king, would have no respect or obedience given them in that kingdom.

3. He proved by two witnesses, that such warrants were in use before his time.

4. He said, he had never granted any but that one, and had presently, within some few months, called the same in again. What (said he) was the bishop of Downe's carriage in it, he had no reason to answer for: but he presumed the bishop could give a satisfactory Answer for himself, when he should be called in question. And so he concluded, that a matter so just, so necessary, so customary and practical before, he hoped should not be charged upon him as an introduction of a new and tyrannical form of government; and therefore submitted himself to the mercy of God, and the equity of his peers in his trial.—This was the work on Tuesday.

The ability of this brave gentleman ravished his hearers with admiration, though he be infinitely spent both in body and mind by the continued and almost uninterrupted agitation.

March 31.

After the 9th Article was passed against the Commission issued in favour of the bishop of Downe and Connor, upon Wednesday Mr. Glyn proceeded to the 10th Article. The Charge was, That the Earl of Strafford having established an arbitrary and tyrannical government over the lives, lands, and liberties of the king's subjects, his next desire was to make intrusion upon the crown itself; that by applying to his own use the public revenues, he might be the more enabled to accomplish his disloyal and traitorous intentions. To which end, having by a new Book of Rates, enhanced the Customs, he had gotten by advantage of his Lease above 26,000*l.* yearly. This (they added) was a crime of a higher nature than those contained in the preceding Articles, because it those there was some colour or pretext of Justice, here none; those in particulars, this in general; those against the subject only, this against the king himself.

For the Proof of the Charge, they produced the lease of the duke of Buckingham. Which was read and compared with that lease to the duchess of Buckingham, (which the Lieutenant hath now by assignment) and some differences shewn, arising to the sum of 2,000*l.* in the duke's Lease; only the moiety of concealed and forfeited goods were due to him, but the whole goods to the duchess in her Lease. Again, the king's ships of Prizes did not pay custom in the duke's Lease; in the duchess's they did. Again, the Impost of the Wines (then belonging to the earl of Carlisle) was not in the duke's Lease; in the duchess's it was. Lastly, Whereas the earl of Strafford paid but 14,000*l.* per annum for the Custom; it was worth to him, as was apparent by the Books of the Exchequer, 40,000*l.*

Witnesses were examined.

1. Sir James Hay, who deposed, That the earl of Carlisle had an advantage of 1,600*l.* per ann. by his Lease of Wines.

2. The lord Ranelagh; who deposed, That by the inspection of the Books of Accounts, he had found the Customs to be anno 1636, 36,000*l.* anno 1637, 39,000*l.* anno 1638, 54,000*l.* anno 1639, 59,000*l.*

With the Proof they concluded the Charge, That notwithstanding the Lord Strafford pretended a great measure of zeal and honesty in his majesty's service, yet it is evident he had abused the trust put upon him; and by withdrawing so great sums of money from the crown, had weakened the king, prejudiced the subjects of the protection they were to expect from him, and had been the cause that the extraordinary way of Impost and Monopolies had been undertaken for supplying of the royal necessity. And that this act, therefore, ought to be enough to make the Charge and Impenachment of High-Treason laid against him.

The Lieutenant's Reply was, That he conceived he had given full satisfaction to all hitherto brought against him about that pretended arbitrary government: nor would he spend time in vain repetitions: For the present Article, though in all its parts it were granted to be true, yet he could not perceive by what interpretation of law it could imply the least act of Treason; and when it should be directly charged upon him as a point of Misdemeanour, Oppression, or Felony, he made no doubt but he should be very able to clear himself abundantly in that point also; yet, lest any prejudice might stick to his honour by these bold assertions, he was content to step so far out of the way, as to give answer:

1. That it concerned him nothing what particulars in the Lease had passed betwixt the King and the Duchess of Buckingham, or whether she had obtained a more easy condition than the duke her husband, especially seeing that same was granted some years before his coming to that government: yet this much he could say, That the duchess had paid 30,000*l.* Fine; and therefore no marvel her yearly rent was the less.

2. For the Book of Rates (wherein the chief matter of Oppression and Grievance seemed to rest), the same was there established by the deputy Falkland, anno 1628, three years before his going into Ireland; and therefore it was exceeding strange in his apprehension, how that could rise up in judgment against him.

3. That he had his interests in the Customs by assignation of a Lease from the duchess, which was given her before his government: nor did he ever hear it alleged as a crime of Treason, for a man to make a good bargain for himself.

4. That not of his own accord, but at the king's special command, he had undergone that Charge, in hopes that, upon the inquiry into the worth thereof, the Customs might be improved for the benefit of the crown, and the true value thereof discovered. This he proved by the lord Cottington and sir Arthur Ingram.

5. That when a new Book of Rates was recommended to him by the Council-Board of England, in the time of his Lease, he so far preferred a fear he had that the trade of Ireland might thereby be discouraged before his own commodity, as he presumed, in all humility, to refuse the said Book of Rates, and tendered his reasons thereof to the kingdom and council-board of England.

6. That he never understood that the Customs could arise to those great sums alleged: but though they should, yet his advantage was but small. For, first dividing the 14,000*l.* he paid to the king; then five parts of eight, which was yearly given in upon oath (and that procured first by himself) at the Exchequer-Board; the other three parts divided amongst four of them, which were equal sharers in the Lease, would not amount to any great sum of money. And therefore except it were treason for him to have improved the King's Revente, encouraged the Trade, and refused the new Book of Rates, he could, in his own weak judgment, discern none there; nor could he think it a crime for him to take an assignation of a lease granted before his time, and to insist on the Book of Rates used before his coming over, And therefore was confident the Lords would rather take his Accusation as an exercise of rhetoric in the gentlemen his adversaries, than as a thing spoken in good earnest by them.

The same day the 11th Article, concerning Tobacco, was charged on him by the same man, Mr. Glyn, after this manner: That for the farther advancement of his tyrannical and avaricious designs, he had of himself established a Monopoly for the restraint of Tobacco in that kingdom: where they offered five Particulars to the Proof; 1. That he had restrained the Importation of Tobacco. 2. That in the mean time he had brought in a great quantity himself, and sold the same at exorbitant prices. 3. That of Tobacco already imported, he had forbidden any to be sold but what was first sealed, by his officers. 4. That upon a pretended disobedience he had punished a great number of people by seizures, imprisonments, fining, whipping, pillory, and such-like cruel and inhuman usages. 5. That by these means he had gained 100,000*l.* yearly.

For Proof hereof, 1. The Proclamation for restraining Tobacco was read. 2. The Proclamation about the sealing of the same. 3. Some Witnesses, who declared that Ships had been restrained from landing Tobacco. 4. Others, who had known some Tobacco seized on as forfeited. 5. The Remonstrance of the house of commons in Ireland, declaring that the Earl had sold 500 tun of Tobacco, which, sold at 2*s.* 6*d.* per pound, amounts to 100,000*l.*

They concluded the Charge, That he had sucked up the blood, and eaten up the king's liege people; and had, by this one point of Oppression, raised greater sums to himself than all the king's Revenue in that kingdom extended unto. And therefore was liable to the crime of Treason, for troubling the peace, and bereaving the people of their goods, who were intrusted to his care and government.

The Lieutenant's Reply was, That his most secret thoughts were conscious of nothing but a sincere intention and endeavour to promote and advance the welfare of that kingdom: and withal, he conceived (by their leaves) that nothing in that Charge could have the least reference to Treason; yet, as he said before, for removing of all prejudice, he was contented to answer: 1. That long before his coming to Ireland the same restraint had been of Tobacco, and the same impost of 18*d.* per pound enjoined by king James. 2. That at that time the tradesmen for this commodity paid but 20*l.* a year to the crown for the impost, but now 400*l.* 3. That the Parliament in Ireland, 1628, had petitioned to have this Impost settled by an Act of State for ever afterwards, as a part of the revenue of the crown. 4. That he had express command from the king for issuing those Proclamations: and therefore could not imagine more danger in them, than in others for Monopolies in England, in the worst sense. 5. That the Proclamations were not put forth by himself alone, but by the whole Council-Board of Ireland. 6. That for the Contract of Tobacco, he was so tender of it, that it was sent over hither, and seen and approved of by the Council-Board of England before it was condescended to in Ireland.

For the Proclamations, he told them it was his own opinion, (and if he failed in it, he humbly craved pardon, and hoped that it should not be Treason to have no more judgment than God had bestowed on him), that the king was endued by God with a power to make temporary laws, and cause the same to be promulgated for the good of his people, upon sudden emergent occasions; to which laws obedience is due, till they be abrogated by ensuing parliaments. That he restrained no man from importing Tobacco, who was willing to pay the appointed impost. That for his part, he had never trafficked in all his time in that kind, nor had any part with the contractors: And if any Tobacco was seized on, it was upon contempt of the Proclamations. And if any person were censured to the pillory or whipping, it was for known perjury, the ordinary and usual punishment in such a case. Concerning the Tobacco imported, (he said) no consideration was taken of the prices given for the Tobacco beyond seas, of the king's Revenue of 4,000*l.* of the merchants pains and danger in bringing the same home. For his part, if any advantage were made, surely it was not his; nor could he annul every contract or lease made by the king. And therefore, seeing his interest was none, he had done nothing but at the king's directions, and at the advice of the Council-Board; seeing the same Impost was in king James's time, and petitioned for by themselves in Ireland, he hoped his carriage in the business should be so far from a crime of treason, that it should rather be thought no crime at all.—So much for Wednesday.

Upon Thursday he was charged with the 12th Article, concerning Flax, by master Maynard, on this manner: That the Flax being the native and principal commodity of that kingdom, was by him (the Lieutenant) restrained, and the subjects put to that which was unknown, yea, impossible, for the Irish to make the same into Yarn. Here they complained of three things: 1. That by Proclamation he had restrained selling of Flax. 2. That he had ordered the making of yarn of such and such lengths and number of threads. 3. That the native Irish being unacquainted with such customs, upon pretended disobedience, had all their Flax and Yarn seized on to his use; whereby a great many families were reduced to such penury, that they died by great numbers in the fields for want of food.

For Proof hereof, they brought, 1. The Proclamation about the Restraint. 2. The Warrant for seizing the forfeited goods. 3. The Execution of the Warrant proved by sir John Clotworthy, and lord Ranelagh. 4. The Remonstrance from the house of commons in Ireland, That upon the rigorous course and execution of this Warrant many persons died for want of food. They concluded the Charge therefore, Though the Article did not individually imply treason, yet it did make very much for the accumulation of Treason.

The Lieutenant's Reply was, That, as before, he would, and must ever repeat it, that nothing was in the Charge that contained treason. To the matter itself he answered, 1. That the Proclamations issued forth were grounded not only upon convenience, but upon necessity; because that, except some way had been taken for ordering of Yarn, the merchants had absolutely given over the linen-trade in that kingdom. 2. That the Council-Board was as liable to the charge as himself, amongst whom were at that time the primates of Ireland, the archbishop of Dublin, chancellor Loftus, and the lord Mountnorris, all subscribers to the proclamation, men, to them, of known integrity and judgment. 3. That nothing was more common than for the Council-Board of Ireland to give orders for reducing the natives to the English Customs, and to fine them for drawing their horses by the tails, during their corn, and such like; and he conceived that to be a thing of the same nature. 4. That the special thing inducing him to it was, because he perceived the trade of Wool to increase much in that kingdom. He dissuaded by all means the making of Woollen-Cloth, because of the infinite detriment that might happen thereby to the kingdom of England; and therefore thought this the best way to encourage the wear of linen-cloth. For the Warrant to seize upon the goods, he affirmed the same to be necessary, because there should be no contempt to Proclamations: But that any part thereof did accrue to him, he flatly denied. If any rigour was used in the execution, he said, not he, but his officers were to answer for it: for this might happen in the most just and necessary commands; nor was there ever any complaint presented to him of any such matter. For his part, he had lost 3,000*l.* in the manufacture, established by himself for the encouragement of others.

To that, That persons died by that means, he replied, That it was more than ever he heard, or could think possible; yea, that he was cleared by the Allegation itself, which saith, that the same happened since his coming from Ireland.

To the Remonstrance of Ireland, he conceived, That a Charge was but a slender proof of a Charge; and that especially upon Interrogatories, not upon Oath, seeing that privilege was not due to the house of commons neither here nor there; that he might say it in truth and modesty, he deserved much better of that people, and might take up that in the Gospel, 'For which of all my good deeds,' &c. yet he hoped to be better understood shortly both here and there. And for his part, though his pursuit had been very hot, yet God was his witness, he never intended to take the least impression of revenge for those discontentments and affronts which had been eagerly put upon him; or to carry any thing hence with him from that bar, where so many foul aspersions had been unjustly thrown upon him, but only gratuitas cicatrices.

The same day a fresh man (master Palmer) entered the lists against him; who having passed by, for want of Proof, the 13th, 14th, and part of the 15th Articles, insisted only upon the second part, for giving Warrant to serjeant Savil for seizing and laying soldiers upon the subjects. He charged thus: That the lord Strafford, having by a tyrannical power inverted the ordinary course of justice, and giving immediate Sentence upon the lands and goods of the king's subjects, under pretence of disobedience, had used a military way for redressing of the contempt, and laid soldiers upon the lands and goods of the king's subjects, to their utter ruin, this Article (he said) of itself did contain an individual Treason; so that if there were no more than this; it were more than sufficient to convince him of his Impeachment.

Here he offered two things: 1. The proof of the point. 2. By what Statute this act of tyranny directly, and by itself, implied Treason. For the first, serjeant Savil was called, who produced the copy of the Warrant upon which he had settled the Soldiers.

At this the Lieutenant rose, and humbly intreated the lords no evidence should be received against him upon an Article of such importance, but what might be thought authentic; and such a one, under favour, he conceived that copy not to be: 1. Because no transcript, but the original only, can make faith before the King's-Bench in a matter of Debt; therefore far be it from them to receive a most slender testimony in matter of life and death, before the supreme judicatory of the kingdom. 2. If Copies be at any time received, they are such as are given in upon oath to have been compared with the Originals, which are upon record: such an one was not that copy.

It was replied by Master Glyn, (for all of them spake as occasion served) That the house had but the day before admitted Copies as Evidences; much more should they do this, when it was produced by the officer himself, who best knew it, having executed the same.

To this the Lieutenant answered, That all other Copies ought to be received upon oath, to have been compared with the original, as right reason requireth; but that this was not so: and for the officer himself producing it, That was the best argument he could use, why it should not be admitted. For, said he, master Savil may be charged with Treason, for ceasing men of war upon the king's subjects; he hath nothing for his defence, but a pretended warrant from me. Now, what he swears to my prejudice, is to his own advantage; nor can a man, by any equity in the world, be admitted to testify against another in suam justificationem.

The point seemed exceeding weighty, and in effect was the ground-work of the whole Article; which not proved, nothing could evince him to have been accessory to the consequence. The Upper House therefore adjourned themselves, and went up to their own court; and after a very hot contestation between the Factions, and above an hour's stay, they returned, and declared that the lords, after mature deliberation, had resolved that the Copy should not be admitted, and desired them to proceed to other Proofs: which after a little pause they did.

First, the lord Ranelagh affirms, that he heard of such a Warrant, and knew sometimes three, sometimes five soldiers billeted by it. 2. Master Clare declares the very same. 3. Another deposes, he hath seen such a Warrant under the deputy's hand and seal. And so much for the Proof.

For the Statute, they alledged one of Ed. 3,

6. That whosoever should carry about with them English enemies, Irish rebels, or hooded-men, and cess them upon the subject, should be punished as a traitor. Another of Hen. 6, 7. That whosoever should cess men of war in his majesty's dominions, should be thought to make war against the king, and punished as a traitor. They concluded, It was evident the lord Strafford had incurred the penalty and breach of both the Statutes, and therefore desired the lords should give out judgment against him as a Traitor.

The Lord Lieutenant's Reply was, That in all the course of his life he had intended nothing more than the preservation of the lives, goods, and welfare of the king's subjects; and that he dared profess, that under no deputy, more than under himself, had there been a more free and uninterrupted course of justice.

To the Charge he answered, 1. That the Customs of Ireland differed exceedingly from the Customs of England, as was clear by Cook's Book; and therefore thought cessing of men might seem strange here, yet not so there. 2. That even in England he had known Soldiers pressed upon men by the Presidents of York and Wales, in case of known and open contempts; and that both in point of outlawry and rebellion, and also even for sums of debt between party and party, there is nothing more ordinary than these cessings to this day in Scotland, whereby the chief house of the owner is seized upon. 3. That to this day there hath been nothing more ordinary in Ireland, than for the governors to appoint soldiers to put all manner of Sentences in execution; which he proved plainly to have been done frequently, and familiarly exercised in Grandison's, Falkland's, Chichester's, Wilmot's, Cork's, Evers's, and all preceding deputies times; and had even for Outlawries, for the king's Debts in the Exchequer, of Collection, of Contribution-Money; and, which comes home to the point, for petit sums of money between party and party: so that he marvelled, qua fronte, or with what boldness it could be called an Arbitrary Government lately brought in by him. To this the lord Dillon, sir Adam Loftus, and sir Arthur Teringham, deposed; the last of whom told, that in Falkland's time he knew 90 soldiers cess upon a man for refusing to pay 16s. sterling. 4. That in his Instructions for executing his Commissions, he hath express Warrant for the same, as were in the Instructions to the lord Falkland before him; both of which were produced and read. 5. That although these Precedents were not, yet it were not possible to govern the kingdom of Ireland otherwise, which had been from all times accustomed to such summary proceedings. 6. That no testimony brought against him can prove that ever he gave warrant to that effect; and for the deeds of the Serjeant at Arms, he did not conceive himself to be answerable for it.

As for the Acts of Parliament, he had reserved them to the dispute of his lawyers; but was content to say thus much for the present: 1. That it is a ground in the Civil Law, that where the king is not mentioned, there he cannot be included: but, with all deference to his sacred person he it spoken, he conceived himself to be in his master the king's place, for so his Commission did run, in that kingdom of Ireland. 2. The words of the Statute are not applicable to him; for God knows, he never went about in person to lay soldiers upon any of the king's subjects. 3. That the king's own soldiers, requiring in a customary way obedience to his orders, could in no construction be called 'Irish Rebels,' 'English Enemies,' or 'hooded-men.' 4. That the use and custom of the law was the best interpreter thereof; and for that he had already spoken enough. 5. That it savoured more of prejudice than equity, to start out such an old Statute against him, and none others, though culpable of the same fact, to the overthrow and ruin of him and his posterity. 6. That, under favour, he conceived, for any Irish custom, or upon any Irish Statute, he was to be judged by the parts of Ireland. 7. That Statute, of what force soever, was repealed. 1st, By the 10th of Hen. 7, where it is expressly declared, nothing shall be reputed Treason hereafter, but what is so declared by the present statute; now, not a word there of any such Treason. 2dly, By the 11th of queen Eliz. where expressly power is given to the Deputy of Ireland to cess and lay soldiers, although the same be reputed treason in any other.

To the Statute of Henry 6, he replied, That a slender Answer might serve: He hoped that no man would think him so inconsiderate, to war against the king of Britain and Ireland, by the cessing of five soldiers; that he had been charged by many for taking arms for the king, but to that time never for taking arms against him; and that he heartily wished, that no man in all his majesty's dominions had more practice, with rebels, and rebellious designs against the king than himself.—So much for Thursday.

At the close he desired the intermission of a day, that he might recollect his spirits and strength against the next quarrel; and with some difficulty obtained rest till Saturday.

April 3.

Upon Saturday Mr. Palmer proceeded to the Sixteenth Article, and charged thus: That the lord Strafford having established a tyrannical and independent authority, by giving summary Decrees and Sentences, had deprived the subject of all just remedy; for in that kingdom there was none supreme to himself, to whom they might appeal: and lest their just Grievances might be made known to his majesty, he had obtained a restraint, that no complaint should be made of injustice or oppression done there, till the first address had been made to himself, and that no person should come out of that kingdom but upon licence obtained from himself.

For Proof of this, 1. The Instructions were read, whereby that restraint was permitted,

2. The Proclamation, That all noblemen, gentlemen, undertakers, officers or other subjects that should resort into that kingdom, should not come from thence without a licence from him. 3. That he had restrained the earl of Desmond, because of a suit in law depending between the Earl and himself, till publication of the same was passed. 4. That the lord Roch being informed against before the Star-Chamber, he would not license him to come into this kingdom, till the Sentence was passed against him. 5. That one Marchatee having pretended a mind to travel, was denied a Licence. 6. That the whole Committee for the Parliament was restrained this last year by deputy Wansford, which they said might be interpreted to be his fact, both because they had such intelligence the one from the other, as also by the Proclamation issued by him before. 7. That one Parry, servant to chancellor Loftus, was fined 500*l.* at his return, for departing Ireland without licence. 8. That the Irish Remonstrance complained of this, as the greatest innovation and thralldom put upon them since the time of the Conquest.

They concluded the Charge, That by this means having taken off that intelligence which should be between the king and his people, and having deprived them of that remedy which in reason they might expect from so just and so gracious a prince, he had taken upon him a royal and independent power, and had faulted highly both against king and state.

The Lieutenant's reply was, That he hoped to make it clear, that he had done nothing in that particular, but what was usual, necessary, and just; and that he should be very well able (by the grace of God) not only of that, but of all other his public actions, to give a reasonable account, though not free from much weakness yet certainly from all malice and treason.

To the Particulars: 1. For Instructions laid upon him, he was not so much chargeable as those of the Council of England, whereof there was a great many present who could witness their commands; but lest any thing should seem unjustly enjoined by them, or embraced by him, he desired that the reasons of their Instructions might be read: which were, 'That it were injustice to complain of injuries, of oppression done in that kingdom, till first the deputy's judgment was informed, and trial made of his integrity: That it would much discourage the ministers of state there, and expend the monies of that kingdom, if upon every trifling business complaints should be admitted in England: and that if justice were there denied by the deputy, it should be lawful for any man to come over.' 2. For the Proclamation, that the same was builded upon the Statute of that kingdom, the 25th Hen. 6, which contained the same restraint verbatim. 3. That anno 1628, the Agents for the Irish nation had petitioned for the same from the king. 4. That the Deputy Falkland had set forth the same Proclamation. 5. That he had the king's express warrant for it, anno 1634, which was read. 6. That he had received the Warrant in January, yet the Proclamation issued not out till September after. 7. That the whole Council-Board of Ireland had not only condescended, but also pressed him to it. 8. The necessity of the kingdom required the same; for if the gentlemen had the Ports open to go to Spain, and their scholars to Doway, Rheims or St. Omers, it were likely that at their return they would put fire both in Church and State, and produce very sad events, by practising to distemper both. 9. He conceived the the king, as great master of the family, might restrain whom he pleased from departing his kingdom without his privity: and here it was not lawful for any to go from England without licence; how much more necessary was this from Ireland!

To the Proofs he answered, 1st, For Desmond, he granted he was restrained indeed, but not for any suit of law betwixt them, but because at that time he stood charged with Treason before the Council in Ireland, for practising against the life of one sir Valentine Cooke. 2. For the lord Bloch, he had oftentimes marvelled with what reason the man at that time could seek a Licence, seeing he was a prisoner for debt in the castle of Dublin; and if he had granted a licence to him, then it had been a far more just charge of Treason than now. 3. For Marchatee, he was afraid of his going to Spain; and if he had intended to go for England, and complain of himself, he would not have refused him liberty, as he never did to any. 4. That the Committee of Irish was not restrained by him, and therefore did not concern him at all. 5. That for Parry, he was fined indeed; but that it is expressly said in his Sentence, that it was not for coming over without licence, (as is suggested) but for sundry Contempts against the Council-Board in Ireland. 5. That he had replied in the last Article, a Remonstrance was no Proof at all. He concluded, that he hoped the least suspicion of Treason could not accrue to him from the Article: for Oppression or Misdemeanour, when it was laid to his Charge, he made no doubt but he should be able to answer it.

The same day a new man was hurried out against him (Mr. Whitlock); who having passed over the 17th and 18th Articles, rested on the 19th, about the Oath administered to the Scots in Ireland, and charged thus: .

That it was the height of his tyranny, not only to domineer over the bodies, but also over the consciences of men; to which purpose, he had enjoined an Oath to the Scots in Ireland: and because some out of tenderness of conscience did refuse to take the same, he had fined them in great sums of money, banished a great number from that kingdom, called all that nation Traitors and Rebels; and said, If ever he returned home from England, he would root them out both stock and branch.

For Proof of this, 1. Sir Jammy Mountgomery was produced; who declared at large how that oath was contrived. 2. Sir Robert Maxwell of Otchardon, who spoke to the same purpose. 3. Sir John Clotworthy, who declared, that a great number had fled the kingdom for fear of that oath. 4. One Mr. Samuel, who deposed, that upon the 10th Oct. 1638, he heard the Deputy say these words, 'That if he returned, he would root them out stock and branch.'—They concluded, That this was a point of the most tyrannical and arbitrary government that before this time was ever heard of, not only to lord it over the fortunes, but also over the souls of men: and that it rested only in the parliament, which hath the legislative power, to enjoin oaths. And that therefore this was one of the chief points he had done against the privileges and liberty of the subject.

The Lieutenant replied, That every new Article acquainted him with a new Treason; that if he had done any thing in all his life acceptable to the king and country, he conceived it to be this.

To these Particulars; 1. He desired the lords would call to mind the condition of those times; no man (pointing to my Lord Steward) knows better than your lordship, who had then the chiefest place in his majesty's service. I would be very sorry to rub (said he) old sores, especially seeing I hope things are in a fair way to a firm peace, and I wish that I may not be deceived, that is, that it may be so; only thus much I may say, we had then greater fears and apprehensions in Ireland, lest the Scots in the kingdom (who were above 100,000 souls) might have joined with their countrymen at home, for the disturbance of our peace: mean time we detected a Treason of betraying of the Castle of Knockfergus to a great man in that kingdom, (whose name I now spare) by one Freeman, who upon the discovery was executed. The Council-Board therefore in Ireland resolved to prescribe the Scots an oath, whereby they might declare their discontent at their countrymen's proceedings, and oblige themselves to the king's service: But while we were about this, they of their own accord came to Dublin to petition for it, and took it with a wonderful alacrity and heartiness; so that it is a marvellous falsehood for any man to say it was invented, or violently enjoined by me.

2. About the same time the same Oath, verbum verbo, was by the Council of England prescribed to the Scots at London, and elsewhere; which was no small encouragement to us in Ireland.

3. I had (said he) which I never shewed, because I had no need before this time, a special Warrant from the king, all written with his own hand, to that effect: and when the king commands a matter not contrary to law, truly I (said he) do conceive it both contrary to law and conscience not to yield him all due obedience. For the Proof brought against him, there was nothing seemed to be of any moment but the Words.

For the first Words, 'That he had called all the nation Rebels and Traitors,' he said there was no Proof at all, nor indeed could there be any: for if I had said it, (quoth he) I had been perfectly out of my wits; and, he thanked God, such irrational speeches used not to escape him. He honoured that kingdom very much, because it was the native soil of our dread sovereign, his gracious master; and because he knew a part, yea, (he hoped) the greatest part of them had been, and ever will be, as loyal and dutiful to the king as any other of his subjects: and of those too who had subscribed that unhappy combination. He knew a great many had done it against their hearts and wills, and would be ever ready upon occasion to remonstrate the same, by adhering to the king's service. So that this Accusation was nothing but a wresting and perverting his words and meaning, of purpose to make him odious, and irritate a whole nation against him.

For the other Words, they were proved only by one Witness, which could make no sufficient faith; and that witness too he would evince, if not of perjury, yet of a notable mistake; for he had sworn positively that he had spoken these words the 10th of October, whereas he was come out of Ireland into England the 12th of Sept. before, and was at London the 21st.

For those that had fled the kingdom because of that Oath, he knew none such; and if they did, they fled into Scotland; which might sufficiently argue their intentions and resolutions. For his part, if they were not willing to give that testimony of their loyalty to their prince, although he had known of their departure, he would have been very loth to have kept them against their wills, but should have been gladly rid of them, and have made them a bridge to be gone, rather than stay.

April 5.

Upon Monday, Master Whitlock proceeded to the 20th Article, and told him, That because the matter was intervenient, et communitis nature, they had resolved to join the five next Articles together, because all of them tended to one point or period; that is, to shew what had design he had, to have subdued the kingdoms both of England and Scotland by force of arms, and to reduce them to that Arbitrary Government he had lately introduced into Ireland.

The Lieutenant intreated that they would proceed according to the Order prescribed by the house, which was Article by Article: he said, five Articles were many, the matter weighty, his memory treacherous, his judgment weak.

It was bitterly replied by Master Glyn, That it did not become the prisoner at the bar to prescribe them in what way they should give in their Evidences.

The Lieutenant modestly answered, That if he stood in his place, he would perhaps crave the like favour, unless his abilities did furnish him with more strength than he could find in himself: for his part, he was contented they should proceed any way, always provided they would grant him a competent time for replying.

Then Whitlock went on, and told the lords, That something in those Articles concerned the Scottish, something the English nation. That which concerned the Scottish he reduced to five Heads :

1. That the Deputy had said at the Council-Board, 'That the Scots Demands contained sufficient matter to persuade to an offensive war.'

2. 'That the same Demands did strike at the root and life of monarchical government, and were only to be answered by the sword.'

3. That he caused some Scottish goods and ships to be seized on in Ireland.

4. That he had engaged the Irish parliament, by their Declaration, in that war against the Scots.

5. That by all possible means he had put bad thoughts and suspicions into his majesty against his Scottish subjects, and laboured to make a national quarrel between them and England; which, if the king's piety and the prudence of better-affected statesmen had not prevented, could not have been soddered up again without much blood.

Concerning England, his Speeches were either before or after the Parliament :

1. Before his creature and bosom-friend sir George Ratcliff, he had said to sir Robert King, when he was doubting how the king might have Monies to pay his Armies, 'That the king had 400,000*l.* in his purse, 30,000 men in the field, and his sword by his side; and if he wanted money afterwards, who would pity him?'

2. That his brother sir George Wentworth had said to sir Robert Barington, upon the dissolution of the last Parliament, 'That seeing the English would not grant Supply to the king, it seems they were weary of their peace, and desired to be conquered a second time.'

3. That he himself, upon a discourse with the primate of Ireland, had said, 'That he was much of the mind of those English Divines, who maintained it lawful for a king, having tried the affection and benevolence of his people, and then denied their help, upon an inevitable necessity and present danger of the kingdom, that he might use his Prerogative for his own Supply, and the Defence of his subjects.'

4. To the lord Conway, in a discourse, he had said, 'That if the Parliament' (meaning the last Parliament) 'should not grant a competent Supply, that then the king was acquitted before God and man, and might use the authority put into his hands.'

5. That he did say at the Council Board, 'If the Parliament should deny to help the king, he would take any other way he could for his majesty's service and assistance.'

His Expressions after the Parliament were two :

1. 'That the Parliament had forsaken the king, and that the king should not suffer himself to be over mastered by the frowardness, obstinacy, and stubbornness of his people.'

2. 'That if his majesty pleased to employ Forces, he had some in Ireland that might serve to reduce this kingdom.'

The Proofs for the Scots Particulars were these :

1. The lord Traquair, who was indeed very favourable to the Lord Lieutenant, and spake nothing to his disadvantage but what was screwed from him : with much difficulty he told them, That when he gave in the Demands, he heard him say, 'That it was high time for the king to put himself into a posture of war;' but that first all the council of England said the same as well as he. 2ndly, That it was a double supposition: 1. That the Demands were truly given in. 2. That there was no other remedy left but arms, to reduce them.

2. The earl of Morton's testimony (being sick himself) was produced, and it was one and the same with the Article.

3. Sir Henry Vane was examined, who declared, That he had heard the Lieutenant to advise the king to an Offensive War, when his own judgment was for a Defensive.

4. The Testimony of the earl of Northumberland was produced, which was the very same with sir Henry Vane's.

5. The Treasurer of England deposed the same with Traquair.

6. One Beane from Ireland told, That he had known ships seized on there; but by whose procurement or warrant, he knew not.

To the Articles about England :

1. Sir Robert King and the lord Ranelagh deposed the same, That sir Robert King and the lord Ranelagh had heard sir George Ratcliff speak those words in the Article.

2. Sir Robert Barington, of sir George Wentworth.

3. The Primate's Testimony (who is sick) was the same with the Article.

4. The lord Conway deposed the same with the Article.

5. Sir Henry Vane deposed, he had heard those words spoken at the Council Board.

For the Words spoken after the Parliament :

To the first, sir Tho. Jernyne, lord Newburg, earl of Bristol, earl of Holland, were examined. Bristol did mince the matter, but Hollaud's testimony was express, because of the exceeding great love he carried to the man.

For the last, which were the most dangerous Speeches, (about reducing of this kingdom) there was only sir Henry Vane's testimony;*

* "The ruin that last act brought to the king was irreparable; for, besides that it served their turn (which no question they had discovered before) to prove those Words against the earl of Stafford, which sir Harry Vane so punctually remembered; and besides, that it was matter of horror to the counsellors, to find that they might be arraigned for every rash, every inconsiderate, every imperious expression or word they had used there; and so made them more who declared only thus, That he had heard either those words, or the like.

Here some of the Lieutenant's friends shewed themselves :

1. The lord Savil, who desired of sir Henry Vane to know whether he said ' their,' or ' this,' or ' that kingdom;' and withal said, It was very hard to condemn a man for Treason upon such petit circumstances.

2. The earl of Southampton desired to know, whether sir Henry Vane would swear those words positively or not. Sir Henry Vane said, engaged to servile applications: it banished for ever all future freedom from that board, and those persons, from whom his majesty was to expect advice in his greatest streights; all men satisfying themselves, ' that they were no more ' obliged to deliver their opinions there freely, ' when they might be impeached in another ' place, for so doing;' and the evincing this so useful doctrine, was without doubt more the design of those grand managers, than any hope they had, of receiving further information thereby, than they had before.—And for my part I must ask leave of those noble lords, who after the king's consent gave themselves liberty to be examined, to say, that if they had well considered the oath they had taken when they were admitted to that society, which was ' to keep secret all matters ' committed and revealed to them, or that ' should be treated of secretly in council,' they would not have believed, that the king himself could have dispensed with that part of their oath. It is true, there is another clause in their oath, that allows them with the king's consent to reveal a matter of council; but that is, only what shall touch another counsellor; which they are not to do without the leave of the king, or the council." Lord Clarendon.

The noble historian relates in a lively manner, the scene which took place in the House of Commons on young sir Harry Vane's disclosure of his having purloined his father's Papers; (see p. 1457) and assigns the following causes of old sir H. Vane's enmity against Stafford: " Sir H. Vane had not far to look back to the time that the Earl had with great earnestness opposed his being made Secretary, and prevailed for above a month's delay; which, though it was done with great reason and justice by the Earl, on the behalf of an old fellow servant, and his very good friend sir John Coke (who was to be, and afterwards was, removed to let him in) yet the justice to the one, lessened not the sense of unkindness to the other: after which, or about the same time (which it may be made the other to be the more virulently remembered) being to be made earl of Stafford, he would needs in that patent have a new creation of a barony, and was made baron of Itaby, a house belonging to sir Henry Vane, and an honour he made account should belong to himself, which was an act of the most unnecessary provocation (though he contemned the man with marvellous scorn) that I have known, and I believe was the chief occasion of the loss of his head."

Positively either them or the like. The Earl replied, That under favour ' those or the like' could not be positive.

3. The earl of Clare desired to know what could be meant by ' this' kingdom; for his part (he said), he thought it meant of the kingdom of Scotland, to which the word ' this' might very well be relative, that kingdom being only mentioned in the preceding discourse: and that he was the more ready to be of that opinion, because he could not see by what grammatical construction it could be gathered from his words, that he meant to reduce England, which neither then was, neither is now (God be thanked) out of the way of obedience, nor upon rebellious courses.

They at last concluded the Charge, That the Words were so monstrous, that to aggravate them was to allay them; and therefore they would simply leave them to the Judgment of the Lords.

The Lieutenant's Reply was,

That though the heaping up of those Articles had put him to a great confusion, yet he would endeavour to bring his Answer into the best method he could; and first he would reply to the Proof, then add something in general for himself, in what a hard taking and lamentable condition he was, to have his private discourses, his most intimate and bosom friends, searched and sifted to the least circumstance, that he might seem guilty of that which, by God's assistance, he should never be.

To the lord Traquair's and the deputy's Depositions, he thought their Proofs did not much stick upon him. For upon the Suppositions, 1. That the Demands were true; 2. That they were not justifiable; 3. That no other course could prevail: He could not see what other advice he could possibly give the king, than to put himself into a posture of war, especially seeing then there were frequent reports of the Scots invading or entering into England; nor was he of any other mind than all the rest of the Council-Board.

For that of Morton's, he doth not positively remember the Words, but if the Demands were read, perhaps they would imply nothing less; and if so, how otherwise to be answered but by the sword, and other means being first essayed, which is ever to be supposed?

For sir Henry Vane's and Northumberland's Testimony, about persuading of an offensive war, he said, He remembered it very well, and thought it as free for him to give his opinion for an offensive, as they for a defensive War; Opinionous, said he, if they be attended with obstinacy or pertinacy, may make an heretic, but that they ever made a traitor, he never heard it till now: nor, under favour, should I be an heretic either (said he); for as I was then, so am I now, most willing to acknowledge my weakness, and correct my errors, whereof no man hath more, or is more sensible of them, than I myself; yet, if that opinion of mine had been followed, it might perhaps have spared us some Money, said he, and some reputation too, of which we have been prodigal enough.

For the last, about the Ships, it proves nothing: but he would willingly confess, that some ships were there detained, and that by himself and his own direction, as Vice-Admiral of Cannought, but it was at the command of the Lord Admiral the earl of Northumberland; and produced his Letter to that purpose.

To the English Proof: He marvelled much how sir George Ratcliff's words could be put upon him; Sir George, though alleged to be his bosom-friend, yet, had thoughts of his own, and he, the earl, might have other thoughts in his bosom, and use other expressions than sir George Ratcliff: No man, said he, can commit Treason by his Attorney; and should I, by my friend sir George, as by a proxy?

For his Brother, he never knew him before so rash; but that was nothing to him, except they could prove a nearer identity than nature had instituted, and that his brother's Words and his were all one: yet withal he conceived, that his brother's words might be very well understood of the Scots conquering England, but not at all of the Irish; and so he wished with all his heart, that he had not spoken something which is like a prophecy.

To the Primate's Testimony (with all reverence to his integrity be it spoken), he is but one witness, and in law can prove nothing: Add to this (said he), that it was a private discourse between him and me, and perhaps spoken by me tentandi gratia; and how far this should be laid to a man's charge, let your lordships judge.

Yea, this seems to me against humanity itself, and will make the society of men so dangerous and loathsome to us, that our dwelling-houses will be turned to cells, and our towns to desarts: That which God and nature, our Tongues, have bestowed upon us, for the greater comfort of venting our own conceptions, or craving the advice of wiser and learned men, should become snares and burdens to us, by a curious and needless fear; yet if my Words be taken, said he, with all that went before and followed after, I see no danger in it.

To the lord Conway I may reply the same, with this Addition, That it is a very natural motion for a man to preserve himself; every creature hath this privilege, and shall we deny it to monarchy, provided this be done in a lawful, though in an extraordinary way? This grain of salt must be added to season all my discourse.

To that of sir Henry Vane, of offering my Service to the king, I thank him for the Testimony, and think he hath done me much honour thereby; but if he or any body else do suspect that his majesty will employ me in unlawful enterprizes, I shall think them more liable to the charge of Treason than myself.

To the subsequent Testimonies, I shall not need to wrestle about them much, only the last of sir Henry Vane's pinches, and lies sore upon me; but to that which the earl of Clare, and I thank him for it, hath said already, give me leave to add this, That the Testimony of one man is not a sufficient Witness, nor can a man be accused, much less condemned, of Treason upon this; and for that read the Stat. Hen. 7, 12, and of Edw. 6, 5.

Now, my lords, (said he) to give you further satisfaction, I shall desire all the Lords of the Council which were then present, only to the number of eight, may be examined whether they heard these Words or not; for the Archbishop and sir Francis Windebank, they cannot be had; sir Henry Vane gives the Testimony, I deny it; four only remain.

1. The earl of Northumberland's Testimony, which was read, had declared expressly, that he had never heard those Words, nor any like them, from the lord Strafford, but he spake with great honour and regard to the kingdom of England.

2. The marquis Hamilton, who declared upon his oath, that he had never heard such words, but that he had heard the Lieutenant often say, that the king was to rule his royal power candide et caste; that it would never be well for this kingdom till the prerogative of the Crown and the Privilege of the Subject went in one place together; and that Parliaments were the happiest way to keep a correspondence between the king and people.

The very same was delivered by the Lord Treasurer, and the lord Cottington.

Now, my lords, you may marvel how these Words rested only on the ears of sir Henry Vane: but, my lords, (said he) that I may remove all scruple from you, I will make it evident, that there was not the least intention that the Irish Army should set a foot in England; and then, I hope, you will conceive that I had no meaning to reduce this kingdom.

This be made clear by the Testimony of Northumberland, the Oaths of marquis Hamilton, lord Cottington, Lord Treasurer, sir Thomas Lucas, who only were privy to that matter.

For other of my Words, my lords, (said he) I desire you would not take them by halves; if so, who should be free from treason; Certainly, if such a precedent take footing, Westminster-hall shall be more troubled with treason than with common-law; look therefore to the antecedents and consequents of my Speeches, and you shall find the state of the question clearly altered: the antecedents were upon an absolute or inevitable necessity, upon a present invasion, when the Remedy of a parliament cannot be expected; the consequents, for the Defence of the kingdom, which accounts afterward to the parliament. The qualifications too in a lawful, convenient, and ordinary way, so far as the present necessity can permit. Add but these, and which of you are not of my mind? Is the king endowed with no power from the Lord? Is he not 'publicus inspector regni'? Stands it not him in hand to do something on present necessities?

And that these were his words, he often proved, over and over again, by the marquis, by the Lord Treasurer, Cottington, sir Tho. Jermyn.

My lords, what I have kept to the last (said he) is this, and I would intreat you seriously to think of it: If a man's table, his bed, his house, his brother, his friends (and that too after they have given an oath of secrecy) are to be racked to find out Treason against him, who never knew what it meant, what earthly man shall pass free from treason? Let my misfortune, my lords, be your advertisement: your wise ancestors were glad to put bands and limits to this lion, Treason; if you give him the large scope of Words to range into, he will at last pull you or yours all to pieces.

But, my lords, I did never think till now, that matter of Opinion should be objected as matter of Treason.

For, 1. Opinions are free, and men may argue both Pro and Con, in all faculties, without any stain of reputation; otherwise all consultations would be vain.

2. I may be of another Judgment than I declare myself, to be, of opinion, perhaps, to gain better arguments for the maintenance of my own grounds.

3. Many, and myself oftentimes, have pronounced my Opinion; yet upon hearing better Judgments, have presently changed it.

4. We use to strain our Opinions too high sometimes, that we may meet in a just moderation with those whom we conceive in the other extremity to be too low.

5. It is expressly commanded by the Stat. Hen. 6, 9. That though a man should say, 'the king is not lawful heir to the crown, and may be deposed,' yet he is not to be charged with Treason, but only with Felony; and I hope, my lords, those Words are of a more transcendent and superlative nature, than any alleged by me to be spoken. But, my lords, (said he) lay it to your hearts, it must come to you; you and your posterity are they whom God and nature, birth and education have fitted to beautify the royal throne, and to sustain the weighty affairs of the kingdom; if to give your Opinions in political agitations should be accounted Treason, who will be willing to serve the king, or what a dilemma are you in? If, being sworn counsellors, you speak not your minds freely, you are convict of Perjury; if you do, perhaps of Treason. What detriment, what incommodity shall fall to king and kingdom, if this be permitted! which of you hereafter will adventure, yea dare adventure so much as to help by your Advice, unless you be weary of your lives, your estates, your posterity, yea your very honour? Let me never live longer than to see this confusion—yea, I may say it, this inhumanity in England. For my part (my lords), I here confess myself, I ever have, and ever shall speak my opinion freely in any thing that may concern the honour and safety, either of my gracious king or my dear country, though the sword be two-edged; fearing rather Him that killeth the soul, than him whose power reaches only to the body.

Nor do I see how I am culpable of Treason, unless it be treason for not being infallible; and if it be so, my lords, you have this rag of mortality before you, loaden with many infirmities; though you pull this into shreds, yet there is no great loss; yea, there may be a great gain, if by the same I may seem to have dared too far, to give a testimony to the world of an innocent conscience towards God, and a resolute loyalty towards my prince (which have ever been my only pole-stars in the whole course of my life): and if by spilling of mine, there be not a way found how to trace out the blood of the nobility (which I hope your lordships will look to), there is no disadvantage at all suffered by the loss of me. (You have his very words as near as I could recollect.)

Tuesday was a day of rest.

April 7.

Upon Wednesday Whitlock charged thus: That the preceding Articles were of so high a consequence, and of so transcendent a nature, that nothing wanted to make up the perfect measure of the most horrid treason and monstrous attempt that ever by a native was intended against his king and country, by putting these designed projects into execution; which had undoubtedly happened to the ruin and subversion both of Church and State, had not the clemency and goodness of the prince, and the piety and carefulness of the well-affected peers, timously foreseen and prevented the same: that still the principles of tyranny and oppression had lodged within his bosom, and therefore had burst forth into these Expressions and Advices contained in the following Articles; where first in the Twenty-Fifth they charged him with three things:

1. That he had advised the king to a rigorous and unlawful exaction of Ship-Money.

2. That he had given counsel, That if the Sheriffs should deny their best endeavours and assistances to that effect, they should be sent for, and be fined and imprisoned by the Star-Chamber.

3. That when the aldermen of London had in all humility represented the causes why the Ship-Money could not be collected amongst them, and had given in the Reasons why they refused to give in a list of their Names, within their city, who were able to afford the Loan-Money; he in a contemptuous and tyrannical manner, in the face of the Council-Board, had said to the king: 'Sir, these men, because of their obstinacy and frowardness, deserved very well to be fined, ransomed, and laid by the heels; and it will never go well with your service, until some of them be hanged up for examples to others.'

The Proofs were these:

1. The bishop of London Lord Treasurer, who declared, That he remembered the Words very well, that the Lord-Lieutenant had advised the king to cause the Ship-Money to be gathered in; but he remembered withal, that both himself and all the Council had done the like; and that it was upon a present necessity, and defect of Money for entertaining the Army, which (the condition of the times considered) they all conceived was by any means to be kept on foot.

2. Alderman Wiseman declared, that upon an humble Remonstrance made to the Council-Board, the City would take it ill, if a Tax-Roll should be delivered of their estates who were thought able for the Loan-Money; the lord Strafford said, They ought to be fined, ransomed, and laid by the heels: but for words of hanging them up, he heard not at all.

3. The earl of Berkshire declared, That the lord Strafford had said, That upon the refusal of such a Service enjoined by the king's peremptory command, it was his opinion they might be fined.

4. Alderman Garway attested the preceding Words; and withal added, that the Lord Lieutenant, to his best remembrance, had said, 'It were well for the king's service if some of them were hanged up.'

They closed the Charge, That by such undutiful Expressions he had injured the propriety of the Subject, and had put such discontent upon the City, that they were the less willing upon any occasion to concur for the advantage of the king's service.

The Lieutenant replied,

1. That though all the Charge were in the most strict and rigid way or sense verified against him, yet he could not conceive by what interpretation of law it could be reached home to High-Treason: and to that common objection (that the Treason was not individual, but accumulative), he replied, That under favour, he thought, talking in that manner were as much as to say, no Treason at all. Because, 1. That neither in Statute Law, Common Law, nor Practice, there was ever till this time heard of such a matter as accumulative Treason, or a Treason by way of consequence; but that it is a word newly coined to attend a charge newly invented, such an one as never was before. 2. That Treason was a thing of a simple and specific nature, and therefore could not be so by accumulation: but either must be so in some or either of the Articles, or else could not be so at all. 3. He did conceive that it was against the first principles of nature, and false, that an heap or accumulation should be, and not be, of homogeneous things; and therefore that which in its first being is not treasonable, can never confer to make up an accumulative reason. Cumulus, an Heap of Grain, so called, because every, or at least some of the individuals, are grain; if otherways, an heap may be, but not an heap of grain. Just so, perhaps, these Articles may make up an heap of felonies, oppressions, errors, misdemeanors, and such like (and to the thing itself I shall give an answer, when under that name they shall be charged against me); but they can no ways confer to the making up of Treason, unless some, at the least, be Treason in the individual.

2. That the Testimonies brought against him were all of them single, not two one way; and therefore could not make faith in matter of debt, much less in matter of life and death; yea, that it was against the statute expressly, to impeach a man of High Treason under the evidence of two famous Witnesses, much less to adjudge and convince him upon attestation of one.

3. To the Lord Treasurer's Testimony, he did with all his heart condescend unto it; but upon these grounds only, That there was a present necessity of money; that all the Council-Board had so voiced with him, yea, before himself, and he always thought it presumption in a man not to follow the wiser and more judicious: and that there was then a Sentence of the Star-Chamber for the right of paying Ship-Money. For his part, he would never be more prudent than his teachers, nor give judgment against the Judges. And therefore he thought it not far amiss to advise the king for the collecting of that, which by law was his own, in such a present and urgent necessity. And although his opinion (and it was no more) had been amiss, he hoped that though in case of Religion, being attended with stubbornness and pertinacy, it might come home to Heresy, yet in his case opinion could not reach so far as Treason; unless it be Treason for a man to speak his judgment freely, when he is upon his oath to do the same.

4. For the Words about fining, he had already acknowledged them in his general Answers to be true; but with these qualifications, that it was his Opinion only; that it was upon the refusal (as he conceived) of a just service that he had spoken them, by no means to prejudice the citizens, but to make them the more quick and active in the king's service; that no ill consequence happened upon them; that they were words might have been spared indeed, but innocently, though suddenly spoken, which he hoped might proceed from a man of such a hasty and incircumspect humour as himself, (made so both by nature and his much infirmity of body) without any mind at all to treason; and that if all choleric expressions of that nature should be accounted treasonable, there would be more suits of that kind fly up and down Westminter-Hall than common-law.

5. To those Words attested by the Alderman, he positively denied them; and hoped they should never rise up against him in judgment, because the testimony was single, and not positive, but only to his best remembrance; and that it was exceeding strange that no man, neither of the council or any other alderman, were so quick to observe them, but only alderman Garway; which he thought sufficient to nullify that single testimony, except he could demonstrate himself to have some rare and singular faculty of hearing.

In the close he desired the Lords, from his misfortune, to provide for their own safety, and seriously to consider what a way was chalked out to ruin them both in their lives and estates, if for every Opinion given in Council, or Words suddenly or hastily spoken, they (who are born to wield the great affairs of the kingdom) should be arraigned and sentenced as traitors.

Then they went to the 26th Article and charged thus:

That the lord Strafford, having by his wicked Advices exhausted the king's Treasury, did also counsel him. 1. To imbase the Coin by an alloy of Copper-money. 2. To seize upon all the Bullion in the Mint. 3. That in discourse with some of the Aldermen about that business, he had said, The city was more ready to countenance and relieve the rebels than the king; and that the king of France did use to manage such businesses, not by entreaties or requests, but by sending forth his commissaries to take account of mens estates, accompanied with troops of horses.

The Proofs were:

1. Sir Thomas Edwards, who declared, That in discourse with the lord Strafford, having remonstrated unto him that their goods were seized on beyond seas, because of the money taken out of the Mint, he told him, 'That if the Londoners suffered it, it was deservedly, because they had refused the king a small Loan of Money upon good security; and that he thought them more ready to help the rebels than the king.'

2. Mr. Palmer declared that he spake something about the king of France; but whether with relation to England, or not, he did not remember.

3. Sir William Parkis attested in the same words; and withal, that the lord Cottington was then present, and could declare the whole business.

4. Sir Ralph Freeman declared, that in a discourse with the lord Strafford he had said, that the servants in the Mint-House would refuse to work the Copper-Money; and he replied, 'That then it were well to send those Servants to the House of Correction.'

They closed the Charge, That by such unedifying Counsel and Words, he had given more than sufficient proof of his design and purpose to subdue this kingdom, and subvert the fundamental law and privileges of the same.

The Lieutenant's Reply:

1. That he expected some Proofs about the two first particulars, but did hear of none; and that it was no small disadvantage to him to be charged with a great many odious crimes by a Book, printed and flying from hand to hand through the whole kingdom, yet when they came to prove, there should be no such thing laid against him.

2. About the Speeches: He ingenuously confessed, that some such thing might perhaps have escaped the door of his lips, when he saw their backwardness to his majesty's service; and as the times were then conditioned, he did not think it much amiss to call that Faction by the name of Rebels; but he thought he had abundantly satisfied for that oversight (if it was any) at York: For having understood these, that the city of London were willing to make a Loan of money, he there, before the great council of the peers, expressed himself to this sense, 'That the Londoners had sufficiently made up all their delays hitherto by their act; that the king was obliged to their forwardness; and that he himself should be as ready to serve them as any poor gentleman in England.' About the other Words, he said, That being in conference with some of the Londoners, there came at that time to his hands a Letter from the earl of Leicester, then at Paris, wherein were the Gazettes inclosed, reporting that the Cardinal had given some such Order, as to levy Money by forces. This he said, he only told the lord Cottington standing by, without the least application or intention concerning the English affairs. Cottington being examined upon this, declared the same in the same manner.

3. To sir Ralph Freeman, he said, That his testimony did not concern the Charge at all; nor did he think any thing amiss in it, though he had said it: If the servants of the Mint refused to work according to directions, they did deserve the House of Correction; nor was it reasonable to say, the king might use that house for the correction of his servants, as well as any man in the city for theirs.

4. He said that there was no great likelihood that he had committed real acts of Treason, when his adverse party was content to trifle away so much time about Words; neither was there any treason in them, though they had been fully verified: and therefore in that (as in all other Articles) he reserved a power for his counsel to dispute in matter of law.

They went to the 27th Article, and charged thus: That immediately after his appointment to be Lord-Lieutenant of the Army here in England, he shewed what principles of Arbitrary Government lurked within his bosom; for by his own immediate authority, without and against law, he had laid an impost of money upon the king's subjects. Where they mention three Particulars:

1. That he had imposed 8d. per diem upon the county of York, for entertaining the Trained Bands there one whole month.—2. That he had sent out Warrants for collecting the same, and threatened to imprison such as should refuse to pay.—3. That he said, That it was a crime nigh to the crime of High-Treason, not to pay the same.—4. They added, That in his general Replies he had brought two things for his Defence: 1. That this money was freely and voluntarily offered by those in Yorkshire. 2. That the Great Council of the peers had notice of the same.

To the first they answered, That a Petition was indeed preferred by the Yorkshire men, and a month's pay offered; but that the lord Strafford had refused to present the same, upon this exception only, Because in the same they had petitioned for a Parliament: whereby he evidently declared what little inclination he had to that way.

To the second, They appealed to all the lords present, whether any such order did pass before the countil of the peers at York.

The Proofs were; 1. A Warrant issued by col. Pennyman for this money, and another by sir Edward Osborne.—2. Sir John Burrows, who declared that he was Clerk to the Great Council, but did remember of no Order; and withal added, that it might have passed at that time when he attended at Rippon.—3. Mr. Dunston, who declared that he had known that money allevied by some musqueteers.—4. By sir William Ingram, who declared that he had heard the Lieutenant say, 'That to refuse the same, came nigh to the crime of High-Treason.'

They concluded the Charge, That by these Particulars it was more than evident what unhappy purpose and traitorous designs he had to subdue this kingdom, and subvert the fundamental laws and privileges.

The Earl replied, First, to the Petition, That it was true, a Petition was drawn up by the Yorkshire Gentlemen; and as true, that he had refused to present the same, because of that clause about the parliament. But the matter was thus: At his majesty's coming to York, it was thought necessary for the Defence of that Country, to keep the Trained-Bands on foot, because the enemy was upon the Borders; and therefore the king directed him to write to all the freeholders in Yorkshire, to see what they would do for their own defence.

The time and place were designed by the king; but the night before the meeting, a small number convened, and in a private and factious way did draw up that Petition. Upon the morrow, at their appointed Dyet, in presence of the whole number, the Petition was presented to him; where he did advise them to leave out that Clause, and that because he knew the king, out of his own gracious disposition, had intended to call a Parliament, which he desired should rather be freely done, than upon the constraint and importunity of Petitions: Moreover, it would seem a mercenary thing in them, at one and the same time to offer a Benevolence, and withal to petition for his favour. Upon this Remonstrance, they were all willing to recal the Petition, and directed him by word of mouth to offer unto the king the month's pay in their names; which he did accordingly in the presence of forty of them, to their no small advantage.

This he proved by sir William Pennyman, sir Paul Neale, sir George Wentworth, sir William Savile, sir Thomas Danby, who all of them declared as much in ample terms; and withal added, That nothing was done upon better grounds of necessity and obedience than the offer of that Money, and that they never had heard any man grudge against it to this time.

For the Second, about the Council of Peers, he alledged, that he never made mention of any Order of theirs; but he remembered very well it was twice propounded before them, that the king had approved it at that time a just and necessary act, and none of the Council had contradicted it; which he conceived as a tacit approbation, and an order in equivalence.—But though that had not been, yet there was nothing done in the business, but at the special desires of the gentlemen themselves, and for their necessary defence and protection; yea, though he had done it by himself alone, yet he conceived he had so much power by his commission (causing the commission to that effect to be read.) That albeit he should mistake his commission, and do some inferior act beyond it, (because military proceedings are not always warranted by the common law) yet it should not be imputed as an act of treason to him. (And to this effect he read a Statute 7 Hen. 2.)

To the Proofs: 1. Col. Pennyman's Warrant, or sir Edward Osborne's, it nothing concerned him; and he doubted not but these worthy gentlemen could justify their own act, and that he had enough to do to answer his own misdemeanours.—2. For sir John Burrowes, he was at Rippon when the proposition was made.—3. That as the Warrant, so neither the execution, troubled him at all.—4. For sir William Ingram, he was but a single testimony, and that such an one too, as he could produce an Evidence to testify he had mistaken himself in his testimony upon oath, if it were not to disadvantage the gentleman.

He concluded, That he had done nothing in that business but upon the Petition of that county, the king's special command, the connivance at least of the Great Council, and upon a present necessity, for the defence and safety of the county.—And so much for Wednesday.

April 8.

Upon Thursday the Committee for the Charge declared that they had done with all the Articles, and were content to wave the last, for reasons best known to themselves: only sir Walter Earle added, That he had some observations to bring forth upon the 22d Article, which he conceived might do much to prove the earl of Strafford's designs for landing the Irish forces in England.* And they were,

* "The seven last Articles," says Whitlock, Memorials, p. 40, "upon the which Whitlock was appointed to manage the Evidence, were matters of very high nature; and some of them, particularly the 24th Article, relating to the design of bringing over the Army in Ireland into Scotland, and so to England to reduce this kingdom. Whitlock having spoken with sir Henry Vane the elder, and with the other witnesses to the 24th Article, and finding that their testimony would not make good the matter of that Article, thought it not honourable for the House of Commons to proceed upon an Article whereof they could not make a clear Proof, and thereupon proposed it to the Committee to omit that Article in his proceedings. The Committee were of the same opinion, but upon sir Walter Earle's undertaking to manage

1. That in his commission he had power to land them in Wales, or in any part of England, or in Scotland; which were altogether superfluous, unless there had been some purpose for the same. 2. That within two days before the date of the Commission, letters were sent to the lord Bridgewater and Pembroke from sir Francis Windebank, to assist the earl of Worcester in levying forces for the king's service; and these might be supposed to have intended a joining with the Irish. 3. That the lord Ranelagh, at the raising of the Irish Army, did fear such a design as this. 4. That the town of Ayre in Scotland, where the lord Strafford pretended he would land those forces, was fortified with a bulwark, a garrison, and block-house, which would prohibit landing there; and the earl of Argyle's Bounds were divided thence by the sea, and that the bar or entry into the town was very dangerous and shallow.

The Proofs were only the reading of the Commission granted to the lord Strafford.

The Lieutenant replied, 1. That his Commission was the same verbatim with Northumberland's for England, and that it was drawn up by the Council-Board here, and sent over unto him; so no more design in him than in the gentlemen of the English army, nor no larger than that was put upon him. 2. That this was the first time he heard of any such it, they left that Article to him, upon which Whitlock, after he had enforced the Evidence upon the 23rd Article, sate down: and sir Walter Earle, with much gravity and confidence, began to aggravate the matters in the 24th Article, and the dangerous consequence and high crime in it, and called forth the Witnesses to prove the particulars which he had at length opened. Some of the Witnesses were not in England; those of them who came in being sworn, spake little, to the purpose, and did not prove the matter at all of that Article, upon which the knight was very blank and out of countenance. But the earl of Strafford, who lost no advantage of his Defence, rising up from his seat made a low obeysance (as he was used to do) to the Lords, and spake to this effect: 'My lords; I am a poor gentleman, a prisoner at the bar, against whom several persons learned in the laws, and of great ability for pleading, and strength of reason, and other noble persons of great parts and eloquence, have enforced the particular matters of my Charge; and I had well hoped they had been drawing towards an end. But now, my lords, a new and great pleader sets upon me, tired out before, and this noble knight hath laid a heavy burden indeed upon my shoulders: he hath opened more heinous crimes against me than all those gentlemen who have gone before. The learned gentleman who urged the matters of the last Article against me, when he came to this 24th Article, sate down and seemed to decline it, and yet he left nothing material which was not urged home by him: But this noble knight goes beyond

Letters, nor did they concern him more than any of the house. 3. That he was not bound to purge the lord Ranelagh from all his fears, and that he had his own fears too, which God forbid should be evidence of Treason against any man whatsoever! 4. That it seemed the gentleman had better information from that kingdom than himself; yet he would not be confident to say, at Ayre there was never such a thing as a block-house or garrison. But to remove all scruples, (for indeed the road or landing-place is not there safe) he declared that it was his intention to have landed some miles above Ayre, and made only his magazine of that town.—To the earl of Argyle's Bounds, he hoped the gentleman knew they came not on foot out of Ireland, but had ships to wait and transport themselves, and that one of his prime houses (Rosneth) was within some few miles of the same Frith.

The lord Digby finding sir Walter Earle on ground, did handsomely bring him off, and told the lords, That all their Proofs for that Article were not yet ready, and that this was a superfluous only of the Charge; and that in such a business as the plotting of Treason, they must be content sometimes with dark probabilities.

Then Mr. Glyn desired the Lieutenant to resume his Defence, that they might give a repre-

'all, and, indeed, beyond the Article itself, ob'serving things not contained in it, and impos'sible to be: and could he have proved this,
'it had been truly a miracle. But I humbly 'beg your lordships pardon, I am not willing 'to spend any of your time impertinently; I 'shall only say this, that where nothing is 'proved against me, I know your lordships 'great wisdom and justice will expect no de'fence from me.' After the Earl was sate down, the lord Digby stood up, and in a very witty rhetorical speech took off sir Walter Earle, desired their lordships to pass by a mistake, that this Article was not intended for prosecution, as might appear by the gentleman's declining of it who managed the former. He moved that this 24th Article might be omitted, and their lordships not to receive any further trouble in the urging of it or defence to it, and that they would be pleased to look upon what that noble knight had said but as a superfluation. After the lord Digby had spoken, Whitlock presently rose up, and (after the lord had done smiling) he proceeded with the 25th Article. The queen was present at the trial; enquired who that knight was whom the lord Digby relieved? And being told his name was sir Walter Earle, she said, 'that water-dog did 'bark but not bite, but the rest did bite close.'
The earl of Strafford speaking of the Committee who managed the Evidence against him, and particularly of the lawyers, said to a private friend, that Glynne and Maynard used him like advocates, but Palmer and Whitlock used him like gentlemen, and yet left out nothing material to be urged against him."

tion of their Charge, and so close the process so far as concerned the Matter of Fact.

He replied, That in this case all slackness is speed enough; the matter touched him narrowly, even in his life and estate, yea, in that which he esteemed above them both, his honour and posterity; and therefore he confessed he had no desire to ride post in such a business. That he knew the Gentlemen of the Bar, if they were in his case, would think the time little enough, except their more able judgments could sooner dispatch the matter in hand; and therefore he humbly intreated, that that day might be granted to him for strengthening himself, and recollecting his thoughts and spirits, and to-morrow he would be ready with his last Replies for himself: which, after a little ceremony and contestation, was condescended unto by the house of commons.

April 9.

Upon Friday morning, about eight o'clock, the Lieutenant of the Tower and my lord's chamber-groom came to the Hall, and gave information to the house upon oath, That the lord Strafford was taken with an exceeding great pain, and fit of the stone, and could not upon any condition stir out of his bed.

Mr. Glyn replied, That it was a token of his wilfulness, not his weakness, that he had not sent a doctor to testify the same.

The Lord Steward made answer, That a doctor could not be had, perhaps, so soon in a morning; nor was it possible for any physician to give a certain judgment concerning a man's disability by the stone, because there is no outward symptoms that appear.

Mr. Glyn excepted, That if he did not appear upon Saturday morning, he should lose the privilege to speak in his own Defence afterwards, and they permitted to proceed.

The Lord Steward replied, That the lords had appointed four of their number to go to the Tower, and learn the just cause of his stay; and if by any means he were able, he should be obliged to come then; if not, humanity and common equity would excuse him.

In the afternoon it was reported that he was dead; of which there can be no better reason given than the humour and genius of the times, that daily with nothing oftener than untruths and calumnies: and certainly there are many men of shallow understandings and weak affections, who either will not, or cannot understand the gentleman's worth; but out of fearful and needless apprehensions are so desirous to hear of his ruin any way, that their busy tongues will dare to anticipate the stroke of justice.

Mr. Glyn proffers new Proofs concerning the two-and-twentieth Article.

April 10.*

Upon Saturday morning, he presented him-

* This day an affair of the utmost consequence to the Earl of Strafford, since it cost him his life, came before the Commons. Preparatory to it, the doors of the house were ordered self at the bar, where he expected nothing but repetitions of Charges and Defences; but mean while Mr. Glyn proffers some new Proofs concerning the 22d Article, which the noble lord refused, alleging the process was closed. Mr. Glyn answered, The process is not closed, as long as the business stands unrepealed; and to be shut, the key brought up, and none to go out without leave: then Mr. Glyn reported from the committee in the Earl of Strafford's Cause, That they had some further evidence to corroborate the latter part of the 23rd Article against him: thereupon sir Henry Vane, the younger, and Mr. Pym, were enjoined by the house to declare their whole knowledge concerning the matters contained in that Article against the Earl, and how and by what means they came by it. When they had done this, a Paper was produced by Mr. Pym, and so much of it read by him as concerned the Earl of Strafford, but afterwards he was ordered to read it all. Notice being then given that a Message from the lords waited at the door, they were ordered to be called in; but all the members to keep their seats, and none to stir out without leave.—The further Examination of this business is left short in the Journals; it is only said there, That the Treasurer, sir Henry Vane, was enjoined by the house to answer, Whether he did take any Notes to the effect of those Notes, already read, at what time, and upon what occasion? The Answer is omitted; and this is all which is said, therein, at this time.—In a marginal note of the printed Journals, we are told, 'That this Paper was a Copy of Notes, taken at a Giunto of the privy council, for the Scots affairs, about the 5th of May last.' Commons Journals, vol. 2, p. 118.

April 12. Heads of a Conference to be desired with the lords were argued in the house. "1st, A Narrative of the Evidence mentioned on Saturday last, to which two members of this house were ready to depose. 2ndly, That the house having taken it into consideration, did conceive it very material; but, in regard of the danger and distractions of the present times, and that much time may be spent in the debate touching the admitting of this Evidence, they resolve to come to a general reply, setting aside that evidence for this time, &c. 3rdly, That upon occasion of discovery of this Evidence, a Paper was read in the house whereby it did appear, that at the same time the dangerous words were spoken by the earl of Strafford, touching the bringing the Irish army into England, other words were then spoken by two others, then present, decyphered by these letters, L. Arch. T. Coll. (by which we conceive is meant the lord archbishop of Canterbury and lord Cottington) very full of pernicious counsels to the king, and slander to the commons assembled in the last parliament, as would appear by the Paper, if their lordships would please to have it read, which the committee is commanded to read, and leave it to their consideration: and to desire their lordships will take some course that that it did not become a prisoner at the bar to prescribe a method of proceeding to the house of commons in England.

It was answered by the Lord Lieutenant, That he thought it stood him in hand as nearly to maintain his life, as it did any to pursue him for it; yet he was willing they should bring in new Proofs, provided that he might have time to make new Replies, and withal use some new Witnesses in some Articles that concern his justification.

The lord Newark, upon these motions, desired the house might be adjourned: after two hours stay, and a hot conflict among the Lords, they returned, and the Lord Steward commanded the Order to be read, which consisted of two Articles:

1. "That as it was granted unto them to bring in Proofs concerning the 22d Article, so it was to the lord Strafford to make his Replies, and use his Witness concerning the same.

2. "That if they went to no more Articles, it may be duly examined by whom these words were spoken, that there might be some further proceedings to prevent the dangers that may ensue thereupon; and that these counsels may be looked into, and searched to the bottom."

The Conference being held, as was desired, Mr. Glynn reported to the house, 'That the Lord Steward did speak for the rest of the lords; and told them, that the lords had agreed this house may proceed as formerly was intended, before the offer of further Evidence was proposed: the lord Strafford to recollect his Evidence first, and, that being done, the members of the house of commons to state theirs. All this to be ended to-morrow morning; of which they would give the earl of Strafford notice.'

Mr. Whitlock informs us, That the next day, April 13, the Earl being brought to Westminster, and both houses being met, the Notes were openly read: the title of them was, "No Danger of a War with Scotland, if offensive, not defensive." Then followed the Opinions interlocutory.

K. C. [King Charles.] 'How can we undertake an offensive war, if we have no more money?'

L. L. Ir. [Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Earl of Strafford.] 'Borrow of the city 100,000l.; go on vigorously to levy Ship Money; your majesty having tried the affection of your people, you are absolved and loose from all rule of government, and to do what power will admit. Your majesty having tried all ways, and being refused, shall be acquitted before God and man: and you have an army in Ireland, that you may employ to reduce this kingdom to obedience: for I am confident the Scots cannot hold out five months.'

L. Arch. [Laud.] 'You have tried all ways, and have always been denied, it is now lawful to take it by force.'

L. Cot. [Cottington.] 'Leagues abroad there may be made for the defence of the king-no more should the lord Strafford; but if they did, that he might pitch upon any one Article as he pleased."

The House of Commons presently declined all other Articles, and conceived the Order expressly for them, restraining him from all other Articles, except that only.

He conceived the Order was for him, and said, That seeing they had picked out their Article, it was against all common equity to tie up his hands, and not admit of a common rule for them both. They replied, That when the Article was canvassed, they reserved Witnesses till another time. He answered, That he had done the same upon every Article. They replied, That the house had refused his Reservation. He answered, Nor had they passed an order for theirs.

Upon this new contestation the House rose again, and was adjourned. It is supposed that the House of Commons had the better ground, because they had particularly named their Wit-dom: the lower house are weary of the king and church: all ways shall be just to raise money by, in this inevitable necessity, and are to be used, being lawful.'

L. Arch. 'For an offensive, not any defensive war.'

L. L. Ir. 'The town is full of lords, put the Commission of Array on foot, and if any of them stir we will make them smart.'

Mr. Whitlock proceeds to tell us, "That the foregoing Paper, of so great consequence, was missing at the Committee; and, by the Earl's Answer, it was supposed he had seen it, and that it was conveyed to him (Mr. W.) by some of the Committee: that he, being in the Chair, and having the charge and custody of all the Papers, was suspected more than others to have acted this piece of treachery." He adds, "That great inquiry and search was made for the Paper, but it could not then be found. He told them when it was missing; and that amongst such a multitude of Papers as he had in his custody, it was not easy to see that he had them all again, when they were brought forth, or any of them called for: that he never shewed this Paper to any but the Committee, and knew not who had it, or what was become of it; nor did convey it, or know of any that had conveyed it away. But this would not serve; the house was acquainted with the missing of the Paper, and they ordered, 'That every one of the Committee should make a solemn protestation in the house, that they did not convey it away, nor knew what was become of it.' All of them made this protestation, and the lord Digby with more earnestness and deeper imprecations than any of the rest; yet afterwards, at the Battle of Naseby, the King's Cabinet being taken, among the papers in it was a copy of these Notes, under the lord Digby's hand; whereby Whitlock was cleared, and the conveyer of the Paper to the king, and from him to the Earl of Strafford, was fully discovered." See 2 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 744.

nesses in their Reservation, the lord Strafford not so; they pressed but one Article, he many. But such was the pleasure of the Lords, that though the matter did not deserve to be much stood upon, yet after two hours vehement agitation of the business in the Upper House, they returned, and the Order was in favour to this effect:

1. That both of them should wave their new Proofs, and go immediately to that which follows. 2. If they would not do so, the Lords conceived themselves common Judges to both, and therefore would not deny Strafford the liberty of pitching upon what Article he pleased, as they had done. 3. That both of them should name their Witnesses at the bar instantly.

The Commons were much grieved at this, yet desired him to nominate his Witnesses, if he would make any benefit of the Order. He answered, That he would nominate after them, because they were first in Order. They replied, That he knew their Article, they not his. He said, He was to bring Proofs about the 2d, 5th, 13th, and the 15th Articles, and did desire them that they would now proceed to nomination.

But they told him, they could not embrace the Order without advice of the whole house. Then on a sudden a mighty noise followed of the whole house, 'Withdraw! Withdraw!' and was in so uncouth and tumultuous a confusion, that it produced both admiration and fear in the beholders, wherein we might easily feel the pulse of a distempered state. Both the Houses break up, not appointing so much as the next Dyet; each man's countenance spake anger and discontent, and nothing sounded in our ears all Sunday, but terrors and affrightments of a present division and breach between the two houses: That the house of commons would declare him a Traitor, and all such Lords too as were his adherents; that he should be no more heard in public, that (though parties, and not his peers) they would vote in his Sentence: That a Bill of Attainder should presently be drawn up against him, and that nothing should content them but present Execution.

April 12.

Big words flew up and down all Monday. That whole day was spent in a Conference betwixt the houses, without any meeting in the Hall; but the Lords (who had learned, as it seems, to foresee their own ruin by his misfortune, and now conceive that Monarchy and Nobility are of such identity, that one and the same is the diminution of both) kept fast to their Conclusion, and would not pass from their Order, notwithstanding all the many dangers represented: so that the House of Commons were constrained at last to give way, and embrace the first part of the Order, by waving Witnesses on both sides.

This hath been no small discouragement to his enemies; for a more real demonstration of his party amongst the Lords could not have been shewn.

Upon Monday, some of the lords went so high in their heat, as to tell the house of commons, That it was an unnatural motion, for the head to be governed by the tail; That they hated Rebellion as bad as Treason; That the same blood that ennobled their ancestors, did move also in their veins, and therefore they would never suffer themselves to be suppressed by a popular faction.

After a great deal of storm, all was (as well as might be) soderred up again, and Tuesday appointed to be the day for the Lieutenant to resume his Defences, and they their Charge, without any more Proof to be used on either side.

April 13.

Upon Tuesday, the Lord Steward at the entry told them, the Lords had ordered that both their testimonies should be waved, that they should proceed immediately to what followed, so that that day might put an end to what concerned the matter of fact.

The Lord Lieutenant replied, That in all humility and obedience he would submit himself to that, or any other their Decrees whatsoever, though it should reach as far home unto him as his own life; but withal humbly begged, That if hereafter he should be troubled (for they were to speak last) with new matter, or with supplemental Proof, he might have leave to speak something in his own Defence.

The Lord Steward answered, It was all the reason in the world.

The Lieutenant went on thus:

My Lords; This day I stand before you charged with High-Treason: the burden is heavy, yet far the more, in that it hath borrowed the atrociousness of the house of commons; if they were not interested, I might express a no less easy, than I do a safe issue and good success to the business: But let neither my weakness plead my innocence, nor their power my guilt. If your lordships will conceive of my Defences, as they are in themselves, without reference to either, (and I shall endeavour so to present them) I hope to go away from hence as clearly justified, as I am now in the testimony of a good conscience by myself. My Lords, I have all along my Charge watched to see that poisoned arrow of Treason, that some men would fain have to be feathered in my heart, and that deadly Cup of Wine, that hath so intoxicated some petty mis-alleged errors, as to put them in the elevation of High-Treason; but in truth it hath not been my quickness to discern any such monster yet within my breast, though now, perhaps, by a sinister information, sticking to my clothes. They tell me of a twofold Treason, one against the Statute, another by the Common-Law; this direct, that consecutive; this individual, that accumulative; this in itself, that by way of construction.

For the first, I must, and do acknowledge, that if I had the least suspicion of my own guilt, I would spare your lordships the pains; cast the first stone at myself, and pass sentence of condemnation against myself: and whether it be so or not, I refer myself to your Lordships Judgment and Declaration. You, and only you, (under the favour and protection of my gracious master) are my Judges: under favour, none of the Commons are my Peers, nor can they be my Judges. I shall ever celebrate the providence and wisdom of your noble ancestors, who have put the Keys of Life and Death (so far as concerns you and your posterity) into your own hands, not into the hands of your inferiors; none but your own selves know the rate of your noble blood, none but yourselves must hold the balance in dispensing the same.

I shall proceed in repeating my Defences, as they are reducible to these two main points of Treason: and for Treason against the Statute, (which is the only Treason in effect) nothing is alledged for that, but the 15th, 22d, and 27th. Articles. [Here he brought the Sum of all his Replies made to these three Articles before, and almost in the same words as before; only that testimony of sir Henry Vane's, because it seemed pressing, he stood upon it, and alledged five Reasons for the nullifying thereof.]

1. That it was but a single Testimony, and would not make faith in a matter of Debt, much less in a matter of Life and Death; yea, that it was expressly against the Statute to impeach, much less to condemn, him upon High-Treason, under the testimony of two famous Witnesses.

2. That he was dubious in it, and expressed it with an 'As I do remember,' and 'such or such like words.'

3. That all the Council of Eight, except himself, disclaim the Words; as if by a singular providence they had taken hold of his ears only.

4. That at the time the king had levied no Forces in Ireland, and therefore he could not be possibly so impudent as to say to the king, 'That he had an Army there, which he might employ for the reducing this kingdom.'

5. That he had proved by Witnesses beyond all exceptions (marquis Hamilton, the Lord Treasurer, the earl of Northumberland, lord Cottington, sir William Pennyman and sir Arthur Terringham), that there was never the least intention to land those forces in England.

[He went on:]

So much for the Articles that concern Individual Treason.

To make up the Constructive Treason, or Treason by way of Accumulation, many Articles are brought against me, as if in a heap of Felonies or Misdemeanors, for in their conceit they reach no higher, some prolific seed, apt to produce what is treasonable, could lurk. Here I am charged to have designed the ruin and overthrow both of Religion and State. The first seemeth rather to have been used to make me odious than guilty, for there is not the least Proof alledged concerning my confederacy with the Popish Faction, nor could there be any indeed; never a servant in authority beneath the king my master was ever more hated and maligned by those men than myself, and that for an impartial and strict executing of the laws against them.

Here your Lordships may observe, that the greater number of the Witnesses used against me, either from Ireland or from Yorkshire, were men of that Religion: But for my own Resolution (I thank God,) I am ready every hour of the day to seal my dissatisfaction to the Church of Rome with my dearest blood.

But, my Lords, give me leave here to pour forth the grief of my soul before you: these Proceedings against me seem to be exceeding rigorous, and to have more of prejudice than equity, that upon a supposed charge of my hypocrisy or errors in Religion, I should be made so monstrously odious to three kingdoms; a great many thousand eyes have seen my accusations, whose ears shall never hear, that when it came to the upshot I was never accused of them. Is this fair dealing amongst Christians? But I have lost nothing by that: Popular applause was ever nothing in my conceit; the uprightness and integrity of a good conscience was, and ever shall be, my continual feast; and if I can be justified in your lordships judgments from this grand imputation, (as I hope I now am, seeing these gentlemen have thrown down the bucklers) I shall account myself justified by the whole kingdom, because by you, who are the epitome, the better part, yea, the very soul and life of the kingdom.

As for my design against the State, I dare plead as much innocency here, as in matter of my Religion; I have ever admired the wisdom of our ancestors, who have so fixed the pillars of this monarchy, that each of them keep a due proportion and measure with the other; and have so handsomely tied up the nerves and sinews of the state, that the straining of any one may bring danger and sorrow to the whole æconomy. The Prerogative of the Crown, and the Propriety of the Subject, have such mutual relations, this takes protection from that, that foundation and nourishment from this; And as on the lute, if any one string be too high or too lowly wound up, you have lost the harmony; so here the excess of Prerogative is oppression; of pretended Liberty in the subject, disorder and anarchy. The Prerogative must be used as God doth his omnipotency, upon extraordinary occasions; the laws (answerable to that 'Potentia ligata in Creaturis') must have place at other times. And yet there must be a Prerogative, if there must be extraordinary occasions; the propriety of the subjects is ever to be maintained, if it go in equal pace with this; They are fellows and companions, that are and ever must be inseparable in a well-governed kingdom; and no way so fitting, so natural to nourish and entertain both, as the frequent use of parliaments; by those a commerce and acquaintance is kept betwixt the king and subject. These thoughts have gone along with me these 14 years of my public employments, and shall, God willing, to my grave: God, his majesty, and my own conscience, yea, and all those who have been most accessory to my inward thoughts and opinions, can bear me witness that I ever did inculcate this, That the happiness of a kingdom consists in a just poize of the king's Prerogative and the Subject's Liberty: and that things would never go well, till they went hand in hand together.

I thank God for it, by my master's favour, and the providence of my ancestors, I have an estate, which so interesteth me in the Commonwealth, that I have no great mind to be a slave but a subject; nor could I wish the cards to be shuffled over again, upon hopes to fall upon a better set; nor did I ever nourish such base mercenary thoughts, as to become a pander to the tyranny and ambition of the greatest man living. No; I have, and ever shall aim at a fair, but a bounded liberty; remembering always that I am a freeman, yet a subject; that I have a right, but under a monarch. But it hath been my misfortune now, when I am grey-headed, to be charged by the mistakers of the times, who are now so lightly bent, that all appears to them to be in the extreme for monarchy, which is not for themselves. Hence it is, that designs, words, yea intentions, are brought out for real demonstrations of my misdemeanours; such a multiplying-glass is a prejudicate opinion.

The Articles contain Expressions and Actions; my Expressions either in Ireland or England, my Actions either before or after these late stirs.

[In this order he went through the whole Charge, from the first Article to the last, in an excellent method, and repeated all the sums and heads of what was spoken by him before; only added in the 28th Article, If that one Article had been proved against him, it contained more weighty matter than all the Charge besides; and it had not only been Treason in him but also villainy, to have betrayed the trust of his majesty's Army. Yet because the gentlemen had been sparing, by reason of the times, to insist upon that Article, though it might concern him much, he resolved to keep the same method, and not utter the least expression that might seem to disturb the happy agreement intended, though he wished the same might deceive his expectation: Only thus much he admired, how himself, being an incendiary against the Scots in the 23rd Article, is now become their confederate in the 28th Article; or how he could be charged for betraying Newcastle, and for fighting with Scots at Newborne too, seeing fighting with them was no possible means for betraying the town, but to hinder their passage thither.

That he never advised war farther than, in his poor judgment, concerned the very life of the king's authority, and the safety and honour of his kingdoms. Nor saw he what advantage could be made by a war in Scotland, where nothing could be gained but many hard blows. For his part, he honoured the nation, but he wished they might be ever under their own climate, and had no desire they should be too well acquainted with the better soil of England; But he thought that Article had been added in jest, or as a supernumerary; and he very little suspected to be reckoned a confederate with the Scots, and wished, as he hoped it was, that every Englishman were as free from that imputation as himself; closing his Defence with this speech.]

My lords, You see what may be alledged for this constructive, rather destructive Treason. For my part, I have not the judgment to conceive that such a treason is agreeable either with the fundamental grounds of reason or law: not of reason, for how can that be treason in the lump or mass, which is not so in any of the parts? Or how can that make a thing treasonable, which in itself is not so? Not of law, since neither statute, common-law, nor practice, hath from the beginning of this government ever mentioned such a thing; and where, my lords, hath this fire, without the least appearance of any smoke, lien hid so many hundred years, and now breaks forth into a violent flame to destroy me and my posterity from the earth? My lords, do we not live by laws, and must we be punished by laws before they be made? Far better were it to live by no laws at all, but to be governed by those characters of discretion and virtue that nature hath stamped in us, than to put this necessity of divination upon a man, and to accuse him of the breach of law, before it be a law at all. If a waterman upon the Thames split his boat by grating upon an anchor, and the same have a buoy appending to it, he is to charge his own inobservance; but if it hath none, the owner of the anchor is to pay the loss.

My lords, If this crime, which they call Arbitrary Treason, had been marked by any discerner of the law, the ignorance thereof should be no excuse for me; but if it be no law at all, how can it in rigour or strictness itself condemn me? Beware you do not awake these sleeping lions, by the searching out some neglected moth-eaten records; they may one day tear you and your posterity in pieces: it was your ancestors care to chain them up within the barricadoes of statutes; be not you ambitious to be more skilful and curious than your forefathers in the art of killing.

My lords, It is my present misfortune, for ever yours; and it is not the smallest part of my grief, that not the crime of Treason, but my other sins, (which are exceeding many) have presented me before this bar; and except your lordships wisdoms provide for it, it may be, the shedding of my blood may make way for the tracing of yours: you, your estates, your posterities, lie at the stake. If such learned gentlemen as these, whose tongues are well acquainted with such proceedings, shall be started out against you; if your friends, your counsel denied access unto you; if your professed enemies admitted to witness against you; if every word, intention or circumstance of yours, be sifted and alledged as treasonable, not because of a statute, but because of a consequence, or construction of lawyers pieced up in a high rhetorical strain and a number of supposed probabilities; I leave it to your lordships consideration, to foresee what may be the issue of such dangerous and recent Precedents.

These Gentlemen tell me they speak in defence of the Commonwealth, against my Arbitrary Laws; give me leave to say it, I speak in defence of the Commonwealth, against their Arbitrary Treason: for if this latitude be admitted, what prejudice shall follow to king and country, if you and your posterity be by the same disenabled from the greatest affairs of the kingdom? For my poor self, were it not for your lordships interest, and the interest of a Saint in Heaven, who hath left me here two pledges on earth, [At this his breath stopp'd, and he shed tears abundantly in mentioning his Wife, which moved his very enemies to compassion.] * I should never take the pains to keep up this ruinous cottage of mine; it is loaden with such infirmities, that in truth I have no great pleasure to carry it about with me any longer: nor could I ever leave it in a better time than this, when I hope the better part of the world would perhaps think, that by this my misfortune I had given a testimony of my integrity to God, my king, and country. I thank God, I count not the afflictions of this present life comparable to that glory, which is to be revealed in the time to come.

My Lords! my Lords! my Lords! Something more I had to say, but my voice and spirits fail me: only I do in all humility and submission cast myself down before your lordships feet, and desire that I might be a Pharos to keep you from shipwreck; do not put such rocks in your own way, which no prudence, no circumspection, can eschew or satisfy, but by your utter ruin. And whether your Judgments in my case, I wish it were not the case of you all, be either for life or death, it shall be righteous in my eyes, and received with a Te Deum laudamus: (and then he lifted up his eyes, and said) In te, Domine, confido, ne confundar in aeternum! †

* Principal Baillie, writing in his Journal, of this hesitation, says, "Some took this for a true defect in his memory; others, and for the most part, for a notable part of his rhetoric; some that true grief and remembrance had stopp'd his mouth: for they say that his first lady the earl of Clare's sister being with child, and finding one of his whore's letters, brought it to him, and chiding him therefore, he struck her on the breast, whereof shortly she died."

† "Certainly never any man acted such a part, on such a theatre, with more wisdom, constancy and eloquence, with greater reason, judgment, and temper, and with a better grace in all his words and gestures, than this great and excellent person did; and he moved the hearts of all his auditors, some few excepted,

This he spake with an inimitable life and grace. You have his very words as near as I can remember, only with so much loss and detriment as hath perished by transcribing the Copy from his own mouth. But you desire impartiality, and indeed you have it, and with some grains too of allowance; for I was so afraid of my own affection to the gentleman, that I rather bowed to the other extremity, and therefore have set down his Defences rather to his disadvantage by my rude pen, than in the native colour, to his eternal glory, and the confusion of his enemies.

The repetition of the Charge did not spend much time; they proceeded orderly Article by Article, in the very same words and matter as before; only there was some remarkable flashes that passed from Mr. Glyn, who was the man, in the time of their handling.

He told them, That he should represent the Lord Strafford as cunning in his Replies, as he had been crafty in his actions; that he waved all that was material, and insisted only upon secondary Proofs; that it was more than evident throughout all his Charge, how he had endeavoured to bring in an arbitrary and tyrannical form of government over the lives, lands and liberties of the king's subjects; yea, had exercised a tyranny over their consciences too, by the oath administered in Ireland: And though his malicious designs had taken no effect, yet no thanks to him, but to the goodness of the king, and the vigilancy of the peers. Had they pleased, it had been too late to have punished him; for no rule of law had been left whereby to censure him, after the death and expiration of the laws. And if the intention of Guido Faux might be thought Treason, though the house was not blown up, then this intention of his may admit the same censure.

He closed; That throughout all his Defences he had pretended either Warrants from the king, or else the king's Prerogative: and what was this else but to draw up a cloud, and exhale the vapour for the eclipsing of the bright sun, by the jealousies or repinings of his subjects, if the strength of his piety and justice should not dispel all these mists, and send them down to their original? That the very standing and falling of these three kingdoms stood upon this Process; all of which do conceive their safety so far interested in his just punishment, that no settling of their peace or quiet could be expected without this: That they hoped the law should never protect him, who had gone about to subvert all law: nor the nobility (who had the same blood moving in their veins), by submitting themselves to his base tyranny, lose that privilege and liberty, which their ancestors had bought with their dearest lives. Though there was no Statute for this treason, was it the less monstrous? For there were none for many hundreds of years that durst ever venture upon such inspleces, to occasion such a Statute. And were not the fundamental grounds and rules of government sufficient to rise up in judgment against him, without the making a particular statute? This, he said, he left to the dispute of the law; and concluded, that seeing they had found out the Jonah, who these many years had tossed and hazarded the Ship of the Commonwealth with continual storms and tempests, there could be no calms expected, but by casting him out into the seas; which, in all justice, they must, and do expect from their hands, who are intrusted by the body of the kingdom to do the same. The Aggravation of the Offence, he said, he had left to Mr. Pym, who here spake that Speech which is now in print.

It was a sport to see how Mr. Pym in his Speech was fearfully out, and constrained to pull out his Papers and read with a great deal of confusion and disorder, before he could recollect himself; which failing of his memory was no small advantage to the Lieutenant: because, by this means, the house perceived it was a premeditated flash, not grounded upon the Lieutenant's last Answer, but resolved on before, whatsoever he should say for his own justification. But the Lieutenant was not suffered to reply a word, either to Glyn or Pym, because the last word must be theirs. And so with Tuesday ended the matter of fact.

On Thursday the dispute in law is expected.

April 14.

Upon Wednesday we were big with expectation for the Matter of Law, having done before with Matter of Fact; but it seems the House of Commons had perceived a great defection of their party, and a great increase of the lord Strafford's friends in both the houses, occasioned by his insinuating, honest, and witty Defences, and therefore resolved of no more hearing in public: therefore it was thought upon by his accusers to draw up a Bill of Attainder* and present the same to the lords; whereby, First, the Matter of Fact should be declared to have been sufficiently proved; and then in the Matter of Law, that he had incurred the censure of treason, for intending to subvert the fundamental laws of the kingdom: for though (said they) he cannot be charged by the letter of the statute of 25 Edw. 3rd, yet he is within the compass of the Salvo, whereby it is provided, that the king and parliament hath power to determine what is treasonable, and what not; and that they were confident the lords would justify and approve of this Bill of theirs, and give Judgment accordingly.

The motion was stoutly opposed by three great lawyers, (all members of the house) Selden, Holborne and Bridgeman, who made it manifest, that the salvo of 25 Edw. 3, was repealed, and that no man could now be convicted of treason, but by the letter of that statute: But being put to voice, it was carried for the Bill, and a Committee appointed for to draw it up.

This gave occasion of much talk abroad, and they who were otherwise the lord Strafford's enemies could not find equity enough in the Bill of Attainder. Some could not conceive what difference imaginable was betwixt the Bill and the Charge presented before; for in the Charge he was accused of Treason, and the Bill (though they had not the legislative power) seemed nothing but an affirmation of the same. Others (who would have the Bill understood of a definitive Sentence, because it was consecutive to the Proofs) were not satisfied, but that it was against all practice, that the Commons should give Sentence upon the death of a peer; and that it was against common equity too, that the complainers should be admitted to be Judges, and that the party accusant should give the Judgment. A third sort gave it out, That this was no Sentence against the lord Strafford, but only a passing of a new act of parliament, about a matter not hitherto declared treasonable: But yet these doubted, that by declaring the matter of fact to be approved, and applying the Censure to it, in reference to the lord Strafford, it would ever be thought a Sentence against him, to blemish his own fame, and the blood of his posterity. Moreover, that if they were about to make a new act, it were strange to punish a man for the breach of such a Statute as was not yet extant in rerum natura; which should in reason refer only to future obedience: And (what is more strange) though there were a new statute, yet by what authority can the parliament declare any individual or accumulative act to be treasonable, which was not so before? for it must be Treason by virtue of a statute, or else no treason at all. Now there is none can be brought, except the 25th of Ed. 3, whereof the letter of that Statute cannot, by their own confession, nor was not so much as once alleged against the lord Strafford: And for the salvo or proviso (which they mainly insisted on), the same stands repealed by two posterior acts of parliament.

You have the mutterings of all sorts of people.

The Lords fearing the Proceedings, as a beaten path trodden out to the ruin of their own lives and estates, told the house of commons in their conference upon Thursday, April 15, That they would go on the same way they did already; and, according to the Order of the house, give full audience to the lord Strafford's counsel in matter of law, and that they themselves, as competent Judges, would by themselves only give Sentence in the Cause; nor was there any other course suitable to the practice and Statutes of the kingdom, the safety of the nobility, or to equity or common justice.

It was replied by them of the Lower House, That they were resolved to go on with their bill; and if the same should be rejected by the lords, they feared a rupture and division might follow, to the utter ruin and desolation of the whole kingdom; that no content would be given to the subject, (and this was a strong argument indeed, yet better beseeeming partiality and violence, than the pretended justice and piety of the times) unless the man who had so much intruded upon their right, and discontented the people, might be punished as a Traitor; and for the practice of the kingdom, that no man had ever found such a favourable hearing; and that the process against Essex, Norfolk, Somerset, were all of them closed up in one day.

* This Bill of Attainder was brought in by Arthur Haslerig. Lord Clarendon gives a very long and particular account of it in his 1st volume, p. 178 to p. 183, fol. edit.

April 16.

Upon Friday, the Lords gave Answer, That they could expect nothing from the House of Commons, but what should tend to the peace and preservation of the kingdom: nor was there a more forceable way than to preserve the laws and customs thereof, lest innovation, so much complained of by them, might unhappily be found among themselves: That the subjects should have all that justice could afford, but that an act of injustice would never give satisfaction to the world, nor safety to themselves; the eyes of all foreign states being fixed upon the business now in agitation, and the wisdom of our nation either to be much advanced or depressed by their judgments in this case: That the process against Norfolk and Essex (for Somerset was convict only of Felony, and had not so much animadversion to save himself by his book) were for direct and formal Treasons, comprised in one or two individual acts; but this against the lord Strafford only arbitrary and accumulative, to be pickt out of 28 Articles; And therefore that it was impossible to have a full examination of them all to give Sentence against him. And those noblemen were charged with some actual breach of statutes, formerly made; but here a new statute was to be made, or else he to be found guiltless. They concluded, that they had given order for his appearance on Saturday, and that in the great Hall at Westminster, where the House of Commons might if they pleased be present.

After some deliberation with the house, the Conferrers answered, That since the lords had so resolved, they would not deny to be there present, and to hear what his counsel could say for him; but to reply any more in public, they neither could nor would, because of the bill already past: only if the lords should take any scruple in the matter of law, they would be ready to give them satisfaction by a private conference. (So they willingly declined to do what indeed they could not possibly do, that is, to give public satisfaction in the matter of law.)

April 17.

Upon Saturday, they convened in the great Hall; but they that were of the Committee for the great Charge did not stand at the bar, as before, but sat promiscuously with the rest of their fellows: so that a mouth was not opened in the behalf of the House of Commons all that day. After they were sat, the Lord Steward told the Lieutenant, That the lords had resolved to give him a fair hearing in the Matter of Law, and therefore desired that the counsel might keep that distance, moderation and respect to the Judicatory that was sitting, and not at all to meddle with the Matter of Fact.

The Lieutenant replied, That in all humility he did acknowledge that favour from the lords; and that it was such an one too, as he could not but expect from such honourable peers and just persons in whose integrity and goodness (under that which he had placed above) he had reposed his chiefest confidence; for his Counsel, they knew much better than himself what concerned the point of discretion and reverence; and that he doubted not but that they would give all satisfaction and obedience.

Then his Counsel were called to the bar, Mr. Lane, the Prince's Attorney; Mr. Gardiner, Recorder of London; Mr. Loe, and Mr. Lightfoot.

Mr. Lane spake, and much to this sense and purpose:

My Lords, there is a heavy Charge lieth on me and my fellows, nothing less than to defend the life, the estate, the reputation, yea the posterity of this honourable person at the bar; if therefore we shall be more pressing, we hope your lordships will interpret this our forwardness to be for honour and conscience-sake, in a matter that concerneth both so nearly: But it shall be our endeavour to carry ourselves with our best respects to your lordships, and with all content and satisfaction to the honourable House of Commons. And because your lordships mentioned the Matter of Fact, one thing I dare be bold to say, That all the time of this noble lord's Defences, he did not so much as crave any one of our Opinions; yea, or acquainted us with any thing that tended that way. And for the Matter of Law, those Statutes cited by himself were none of our stock, but taken up at his own adventure: nor do I speak this to derogate from the pertinency of those Statutes (for they shall be the subject of my discourse), but that the nobleman be not disappointed of your right conceptions, and his own due praise.

My Lords, it is your pleasure we meddle not with Matter of Fact, and indeed we need not meddle at all with it, because we hope it is already done, and that sufficiently to our hands; yet the Matter of Law doth so naturally rise out of the Matter of Fact, that of necessity (under your lordships favour) we must somewhat grate on this, if we speak on that; nor do I conceive it possible for us to speak advantageously enough for the lord Strafford's just Defence, unless the whole Matter of Fact be determined, either as proved or not proved, or at least some states of questions agreed upon, where we may fix and settle our arguments. And therefore it is, my Lords, that I have chosen not at all to touch the Matter of Law (until your lordships shall be pleased to chaik me out a way), unless it be to clear your judgments in one statute only, viz. 25 Ed. 3. Because when the same was alledged by the lord Strafford in his own Defence, that not being convicted of the letter thereof, he could not be convicted of Treason; I remember the salvo of that statute was much insisted upon by those from the House of Commons, as much conducing to their own ends. My Lords, I will first speak of the Statute itself, and then of its salvo, or provision. The statute is, 'That if any man shall intend the death of the king, his queen, their children; kill the Chancellor, or Judge upon the bench; imbase the king's coin, or counterfeit the broad-seal, &c. he shall be convicted and punished as a traitor.' That the lord Strafford comes within the letter of this Statute, is not so much as once alledged, nor indeed can it be with any reason: All that can be said is, That by relation, or by argument à minori ad majus, he may be drawn thither; yet that this cannot be, I humbly offer these considerations: 1. This is a Declarative Law, and such are not to be taken by way of consequence, equity, or construction, but by the letter only; otherwise they should imply a contradiction to themselves, and be no more declarative laws, but laws of construction, or constitutive. 2. This is a penal law, and such (if our grounds, hitherto unquestioned, hold good) can admit of no constructions or inferences; for penalties are to persuade the keeping of known laws, not of laws conjectural, ambiguous, and by consequence, which perhaps the most learned may not in their disputes question; much less the subject (who is not obliged to interpret the Statute) doubt of in the point of obedience; yea, rather without any doubt, he is to obey the letter of the statute, and conceive (and that truly) that he is not liable to the penalty. 3. We have a notable law, 13 Eliz. cap. 2, whereby it is declared, that the bringing in of Bulls from Rome to stir up the subject to mutiny and rebellion shall be punished as Treason. Now if by interpretation, or by consequence, this sense might have been thrust upon the preceding statutes, the making of this had been superfluous; yea, the persons then charged with that crime might have been impeached of treason, even before the making of this act.

Anno 21 Ed. 3. We have a Statute declaring, That for a servant to kill his master, is an act of Treason: And in the 23rd year of the same king, a process of Treason was framed against a man for killing his father, grounded upon the same argument, a minori ad majus: But it was found (and the Sentence is yet in the Records), that although in the 21st of Edward the 3rd, that argument might have been admitted; yet in the 27th it could not, by reason of the declarative law intervening in the 25th year: And this Case comes very home to the point in law.

My Lords, I will not demand what kind of Offence it may be, for a man to subvert the Fundamental Laws of a kingdom; the crime doubtless is unnatural and monstrous, and the punishment must keep the same proportion:

only I presume to offer these few things to your lordships considerations:

1st. That one or more acts of injustice, whether maliciously or ignorantly done, can in no sense of law be called the subversion of the Fundamental Laws; if so, as many judges (perhaps) so many traitors. It is very incident to man's nature to err; nor doth the lord Strafford plead his innocency in over-sights, but in treason.

2dly. I do remember the case of John de la Pool, duke of Suffolk: this man, in the 28th of Henry 6, was charged by the house of commons with Articles of Treason, and those too very like to these against my lord Strafford. 1. That he had given the king bad Advices. 2. That he had embased his Coin. 3. That he had cessed Men of War. 4. That he had given out summary Decrees. 5. That he had imposed Taxes. 6. That he had corrupted the Fountain of Justice. 7. That he had persuaded the king to unnecessary war, and to the giving over of Anjou in France, ovum ovo.—And for all these, though he was charged with High-Treason, for wronging the Right of the Subject, and subverting the fundamental laws of the kingdom; yet, after a long agitation, the matter was found by the lords of parliament, not to imply Treason, but only felony. Add to this another, who in the 23rd of Henry the 8th was charged for subverting the English laws, and yet no Treason charged upon him. Add to both the Charge of Richard Larks, pleaded at the Common-Pleas, who was charged with Treason for subverting the law, but convicted only of Felony: by which you may see, my lords, what to this time hath been subverting the laws.

3dly. It is very considerable, that the lord Strafford is not charged to have subverted, but only to have intended to subvert the Fundamental Laws: and this I conceive, if there were no more, might keep him free from that Statute of the 25 Edw. 3. For although, as touching the king, his queen and children, intention is reasonable: yet in all other things there mentioned, there must be action beside intention; for it is not said, If a man do intend to kill a chancellor, it shall be Treason; but only, if he do kill him; and if he doth actually counterfeit the Broad-Seal. And although a man should prepare a furnace, make ready his stamp, melt his bullion; yet if he gives not the king's impression upon the coin, all his intentions, yea, his preparations will not serve to make up a Treason.

And this (under favour) may serve to answer the Case of Guido Faux, lately objected; unless it be alledged, that the lord Strafford had as real an intention against the king's life as Faux had: For though the intention in that case be Treason by the statute, yet in all other things there is no treason without the action; so immense and vast a difference both is, and ought to be, betwixt a project against the royal blood, and all things else of a lower and under nature.

You see therefore, my lords, that the body of the statute cannot stick against the lord Strafford, neither in letter, nor in consequence; this is not, that must not be; All that can be said is, That this fact may be Treason by the common-law. For my part, I profess my ignorance, who ever thought the common law might declare, but never make a Treason; that is, it might be presupposed that there is a statute whereupon to build a declaration: and therefore to say there is no statute for it, is to say it is no Treason at all. The statute ever makes the Treason; and to be declared to be Treason, either by common law, or by parliament, are but two different ways of proceedings, and must both resolve into one principle: yea, which comes home to the point, in the 21st of Edw. 3, to kill a man employed in the king's war, was Treason; and the 23d, to kill the king's messenger, was treason by declaration of the common law, but always by reason of the statute: yet none of these are now treasons, but felonies only, by reason of the intervening statute, the 25th of Edw. 3. Such hath ever been thought the force of its letter and declaration; and so I will leave it, and speak a word or two of the salvo, which is this: that because all particulars could not be then defined, therefore what the parliament should declare to be treasonable in time to come, should be punished as Treason.

And according to this reservation, in the 8th of R. 2d, one who was charged before the King's-Bench was afterwards referred to the parliament; and there, though the fact was not contained in the body of the statute, yet because of the Proviso afore-mentioned it was adjudged Treason.

In the 11th of the same king, the duke of Ireland and Nevil archbishop of York were impeached of High-Treason by Gloucester, Arundel, and Warwick; and notwithstanding the Statute, were convicted thereof by the salvo. But in the 21st of the same Richard the 2d, the tide turned, and the king had such a hand with the parliament, that the Sentence was recalled, and those three noblemen themselves adjudged traitors. Again, in the 1st of Henry 4, his successor, that revocation of the 21st of R. 2d, was repealed, and the Sentence of the 11th of his reign established. Such were the tossings to and fro of treason; and all because of that uncertain Proviso.

Therefore it was, that in the same parliament the 1st of Henry 4th, a Petition was preferred by the nobility to have Treason limited with some Statute; because they knew not what to speak, or what to do, for fear thereof. And in the 10th chapter an Act was made upon this Petition, that the salvo should be holden repealed in all times to come, and nothing esteemed treason but what was literally contained in the Statute of the 25th of Edward 3: And therefore it is said in the Records, that there was great joy at the making of this act, in that the drawn sword hanging over every man's head, by this slender thread of a consequence, or illation, was moved by that act. Add to this, That in the 1st of queen Mary, the first chapter, the same is repeated, 'That no man shall be punished in life or estate as a traitor, but for the crime contained in the Statute 25 Ed. 3, without the least mention of a pretended salvo.'

The earl of Northumberland's Case comes nigh to the point: he was charged with Treason, the 1st of Henry 4; and if the statute of the 5th of Henry 4, the first chapter, whereby this Proviso is repealed, had not intervened, no doubt he had been condemned of Treason: but he was only convict of Felony, and that because he could not be drawn within the letter of the statute of the 25th of Edw. 3. And I dare confidently say it, That since that Act was made, the 1st of Henry 4, the first chapter, whereby the Proviso is repealed, no man hath ever been declared a Traitor, either by king or parliament, except it were upon that, or some other statute, literally and declaratively taken. These two things I do offer to your lordships considerations; That the lord Strafford cannot be impeached of Treason by the statute of the 25th Edw. 3, and that the salvo contained in the same stands repealed almost 200 years ago: and this is all I conceive to be necessary for that statute which was alleged by the lord Strafford in his defence for Matter of Fact.

Then the Recorder spake some few words to this purpose; That what was spoken upon the Statute, was because it seemed inseparable from the Matter of Fact, that they could proceed no farther, till a state were afforded them; that to do otherwise; they conceived might be very prejudicial unto my lord Strafford. 1. In that they should suppose that to be done, which is not proved to be. 2. That the Matter of Law ariseth so naturally from the Matter of Fact, that it will be impossible to separate one from the other. 3. That it is the course of all judicatories, first to settle the Verdict, and upon that to fix the Arguments, otherwise he could conceive no possible way of proceeding; and therefore, in the lord Strafford's name, he most humbly intreated, that the Lords would either wholly determine the Matter of Fact (not whether it was Treason or no, for then all other proceedings in the law were unnecessary, but whether done or not done) or else to give them some states of the question whereunto they might confine themselves.

Upon this motion the house was adjourned for that day, nor hath it met since; for the House of Commons are returned to their old bias, and will hear of nothing but the Bill of Attainder; but the lords seem to be more resolute than before, because they find that they have no authority to declare a Treason in a fact already past, the Salvo of the 25th of Edw. the 3rd being repealed; withal, that if the Bill of Attainder should proceed, the king hath as great power to hinder that at the last blow, as any other statute: but I hope the lords will disburden him of that envy.

All they which stand obliged to the lord Strafford, in blood, affection or deserving; and all who have been interested with him in the king's service, and many too, who both hate his person, and dislike his proceedings; will doubtless look upon it, and tender their own safety, all of them in likelihood being subject to the charge of Treason, if ever they chance to be called to do the king's service in any place of importance.

I cannot express how much the voice of the multitude is now altered from what it was lately, nothing now talked of what should be done, but only of what must be done: so that if the lord Strafford dies, his very enemies will confess, that it is done more for necessity, than for justice; and rather for the satisfaction of rancorous apprehensions, than for any guiltiness in the cause.

April 29.

Thursday last, viz. April 29, was designed for the agitation of the long intermitted business concerning the Lieutenant; and the way was this: The lords did meet at the great Hall at Westminster about nine of the clock, not in their robes, nor did the Lord Steward sit upon his sack, but with the rest promiscuously; nor did the committee for the house of commons stand at the bar, but sat with the rest of their fellows; and the earl of Strafford sat behind the place where he used to sit before; the reason of these changes was, because the dyet was appointed not for a meeting, but for a Conference; so curious are we (and that is all) about formalities. The king, queen, and prince were there, according to their custom: not a man spake a word in the house all the time, but only Mr. St. John, the king's Solicitor, one of the Committee; whose drift and purpose was to furnish the Lords with Reasons, why the House of Commons had proceeded with a Bill of Attainder: and withal, to reply to what the lord Strafford had spoken, either by himself or his counsel, in matter of law.

The Speech, containing a learned Argument on the Law of Treason, is here inserted from 8 Rushworth, 675.

MR. ST. JOHN'S ARGUMENT OF LAW;
CONCERNING THE BILL OF ATTAINDER,
April 29th, 1641.

My Lords; The knights, citizens, and burgeses of the Commons House of Parliament, have passed a Bill, for the attainting of Thomas earl of Strafford of High Treason. The Bill hath been transmitted from them to your lordships; it concerns not him alone, but your lordships and the commons too, though in different respects.—It concerns his lordship the highest that can be in the Penal part; so it doth, on the other side, as highly concern your lordships and the Commons, in that which ought to be the tenderest, the Judicatory within that, that judge not them who judge him, and in that which is most sacred amongst men, the Public Justice of the kingdom.

The King is to be accounted unto, for the loss of the meanest member, much more of one so near the Head. The Commons are concerned in their account for what is done, your lordships in that which is to be done. The business therefore of the present Conference, is to acquaint your lordships with those things, that satisfied the Commons in passing of this Bill; such of them as have come within my capacity, and that I can remember, I am commanded from the Commons at this time, to present unto your lordships.

My Lords, in judgment of greatest moment, there are but two ways for satisfying those, that are to give them; either the lex lata, the law already established, or else the use of the same power for making new laws, whereby the old at first received life.—In the first consideration of the settled laws, in the degrees of Punishment, the positive law, received by general consent, and for the common good, is sufficient, to satisfy the conscience of the Judge, in giving Judgment according to them.—In several countries, there is not the same measure of punishment, for one and the same offence; wilful murder in Ireland it is Treason, and so is the wilful burning of a house, or a stack of corn: in the Isle of Man it is Felony to steal a hen, but not to steal a horse; and yet the judge in Ireland, hath as just a ground to give Judgment of High-Treason in those cases there, as here to give Judgment only of Felony; and in the Isle of Man of Felony for the hen, as here of Petty-Larceny.

My Lords, in the other consideration of using the Supreme Power, the same law gives power to the parliament to make new laws, that enables the inferior court, to judge according to the old. The rule that guides the conscience of the inferior court is from without, the prescripts of the parliament, and of the common-law; in the other, the rule is from within, that salus populi be concerned, that there be no wilful oppression of any of the fellow-members, that no more blood be taken than what is necessary for the cure, the laws and customs of the realm as well enable the exercise of this, as of the ordinary and judicial power.

My Lords, what hath been said, is because that this proceeding of the Commons by way of Bill, implies the use of the mere legislative power, in respect new laws are for the most part past by bill.

This, my Lords, though just and legal, and therefore not wholly excluded; yet it was not the only ground that put the Commons upon the Bill, they did not intend to make a new Treason, and to condemn my lord of Strafford for it; they had in it other considerations likewise, which were to this effect.

1. The Commons knew, that in all former ages, if doubts of law arose of great and general concernments, the Parliament was usually consulted withal for resolution, which is the reason that many acts of parliament are only declarative of the old law, not introductive of a new, as the Great Charter of our Liberties; the Statute of 25 Ed. 3, of Treasons; the Statute of the Prerogative, and of late the Petition of Right; if the law were doubtful in this case, they perceived the Parliament (where the old way is altered, and new laws made) the fittest judge to clear this doubt.

2. My Lords, they proceeded this way, to obviate those scruples and delays, which through disuse of proceedings of this nature, might have risen in the manner and way of proceeding, since the Statute of the 1 Hen. 4, c. 17, and more fully in the Roll, No. 144. The proceedings of parliament have usually been upon an Indictment first found, though in cases of Treason particularly mentioned in the Statute of 25 Edw. 3, which had not been done in this case; doubts likewise might rise, for Treasons, not particularly mentioned in the Statute of 25 Edw. 3, whether the Declaratory power of parliament be taken away, in what manner they were to be made, and by whom, they find not any Attainers of Treason in parliament, for near this 200 years, but by this way of Bill; and again, they know that whatsoever could be done any other way, it might be done by this.

3. In respect of the Proofs and Depositions, that have been made against him; for first, although they knew not, but that the whole Evidence which hath been given at the bar, in every part of it, is sufficiently comprehended within the charge, yet if therein they should be mistaken, if it should prove otherwise, use may justly be made of such Evidence in this way of Bill; wherein so as Evidence be given in, it is no way requisite that there should have been any Articles or Charge at all; and so in the case of double testimony upon the Statute of the 1st Edw. 6, whether one direct Witness, with others, to circumstances, had been single or double testimony? And although single testimony might be sufficient to satisfy private consciences, yet how far it would have been satisfactory in a judicial way, (where forms of law are more to be stood upon) was not so clear; whereas in their way of Bill, private satisfaction to each man's conscience is sufficient, although no Evidence had been given in at all.

My Lords, The proceeding by way of Bill, it was not to decline your lordships justice in the judicial way, in these exigents of the state and kingdom; it was to husband time, by silencing those doubts, they conceived it the speediest and surest way. My lords, these are in effect, the things the Commons took into their consideration, in respect of the manner and way of Proceeding against the Earl.

In the next place, I am to declare unto your lordships, the things they took into their considerations, in respect of the matter and merits of the Cause, and they are comprehended within these six heads.

1. That there is a Treason within the statute of 25 Edw. 3, by Levying of War upon the matter of the 15th Article.

2. If not by actual levying of war, yet by advising, and declaring his intention of war, and that by Savil's Warrant, and advice of bringing over the Irish Army upon the matter in the 23rd Article; then intending of a War, if not within the clause of levying of a War, in the statute of 25th Edw. 3, yet within the first Treason, of compassing the death of the king.

3. If either of these two single acts is within the statute of 25 Edw. 3, yet upon putting altogether, which hath been proved against him, that there is a Treason within the first clause, of compassing the death of the king. 'Et si non prosumt singula juncta juvant.'

4. That he hath sessed, and laid soldiers upon the subjects of Ireland, against their will, and at their charge, within the Irish statute of the 18th of Hen. 6, that both person and thing are within the statute; That the statute remains in force to this day, that the parliament here hath cognizance of it, and that even in the ordinary way of judicature, that if there be a Treason and a Traitor, that the want of jurisdiction in the judicial way, may justly be supplied by Bill.

5. That his endeavouring to subvert the fundamental laws and government of the realms of England and Ireland; and instead thereof, to introduce a tyrannical government against law, is Treason by the common-law; that Treasons at the common-law are not taken away by the statute of 25 Edw. 3, 1 Hen. 4, &c. nor any of them.

6. That as this Case stands, it is just and necessary to resort to the supreme power in parliament, in case all the rest should fail.

Of these six, five of them are Treason, within the compass of the laws already established, three within the statute of 25th Edw. 3, and one within the Irish statute, the other by the common law of England.—If but any one of these six considerations hold, the commons conceive, that upon the whole matter, they had good cause to pass the Bill.

My Lords, For the first, of Levying War, I shall make bold to read the case to your lordships before I speak to it, it is thus. The Earl did by warrant under his hand and seal, give authority to Robert Savil, a serjeant at arms, and his deputies, to sess such numbers of soldiers, horse and foot, of the army in Ireland, together with an officer, as the serjeant should think fit, upon his majesty's subjects of Ireland, against their will; this warrant was granted by the Earl to the end, to compel the subjects of Ireland to submit to the unlawful summons and orders made by the Earl upon paper petitions, exhibited to him in case of private interest between party and party; this warrant was executed by Savil and his deputies, by sessing of soldiers, both horse and foot, upon divers of the subjects of Ireland against their wills, in warlike manner, and at divers times the soldiers continued upon the parties, upon whom they were sessed, and wasted their goods, until such time as they had submitted themselves unto those summons and orders.

My Lords, This is a Levying War within the statute of 25th Edw. 3. The words of the statute are, 'If any man do levy war against our lord the king in his realm, this is declared Treason.'

I shall endeavour in this to make clear to your lordships, 1. What shall be a levying of war, in respect of the motive or cause of it. 2. What shall be said a levying of war, in respect of the action or thing done. 3. And in the third place, I shall apply them to the present case.

It will be granted in this levying of war, that forces may be raised, and likewise used in warlike manner, and yet no levying of war within the statute, that is, when the forces are raised and employed upon private ends, either of revenge or interest.

Before this statute in Edward the 1st's time, the title of a Castle was in difference between the earls of Hereford and Gloucester, for the maintaining of the possession on the one side, and gaining of it on the other; forces were raised on either side of many hundred men; they marched with banners displayed, one against another. In the parliament, in the 20th year of Edward 1, this was adjudged only Trespass, and either of the earls fined 1,000 marks apiece.

After the Statute in Hilary Term, in the 15th of Edw. 3, in the King's-Bench Rot. Nicholas Huntercome in warlike manner with 40 men, armed amongst other weapons, with guns, (so antique, as appears by that Record, they were) did much spoil in the manor of the Abbey of Dorchester in the county of Oxford, this was accounted no Treason, and so it hath been held by the Judges, That if one or more Township, upon pretence of saving their commons, do in a forcible and warlike manner throw in inclosures, this is only a Riot, no Treason.

The words of the Statute 25 Edw. 3, clear this point, that if any man ride armed openly or secretly with men at arms, against any other, to kill and rob, or to detain him until he hath made fine and ransom for his deliverance, this is declared not to be Treason, but Felony or Trespass, as the case shall require: all the printed Statutes which have it covertly or secret, are misprinted, for the words in the Parliament Roll, as appears in the 17th, are, Discoveriment ou secretment, open or secretly.

So that, my lords, in this of Levying War, the act is not so much to be considered, but as in all other Treasons and Felonies, quo animo, with what intent and purpose? My Lords, If the end be considerable in levying war, it may be said, that it cannot be a war, unless against the king, for the words of the statute are, 'If any man levy war against the king.'

That these words extend further than to the person of the king, appears by the words of the Statute, which in the beginning declares it to be Treason, to compass and imagine the death of the king, and after other treasons, this is to be declared to be treason, to levy war against the king; If levying of war extend no further than to the person of the king, these words of the statute are to no purpose, for then the first treason of compassing the king's death, had fully included it before, because that he which levies war against the person of the king, doth necessarily compass his death.*

* "But does he so? Where is the truth, or the logic, of this necessity? In our Law writers, and Treason trials, I grant. They have passed this construction upon the statute: yet not till they add to it the words 'his person,' and make moral reflections on the deaths of Richard 2, and Edward 2. Let them consider on the other hand, the case of Henry 6; he was twice imprisoned for the express purpose of preserving his life, and was very carefully preserved alive for years; nor is it yet known how he came by his death. The Resolution of the Judges on the Earl of Essex's Trial in the year 1600, carries this necessity farther still. It is there declared to be the consequence of 'every rebellion,' and not confined to war against the king's person; and this is as just a conclusion as the other.—Examine the words of this Law as in Edward 3rd's reign, as if it were the law of Poland, and make out the conclusion there; not under the prejudices and habits of thinking, to which our minds are accustomed.—I believe the Statute had in view a case of War and Rebellion, which might not be directed against the king's life: and this opinion will be found most agreeable to the state of that age, by those who will take the pains to examine its history attentively, and the condition of this and the neighbouring kingdoms. There is a great authority in our law on my side in this point. Chief Justice Brooke, who compiled most of his Abridgement in the reigns of Hen. 8, and his son, when Treasons were readily strained to any construction, doubts about the case of a design to deprive the king of his crown, whether it is within the statute of Treasons. Because, he says, one may deprive, &c. without designing the death; therefore, he adds, a statute was had for this Case under Hen. 8, and Ed. 6. See Bro. Abr. Treason pl. 24. What need have we of more? The doubt of a Judge under a Tudor prince, upon such a point and against the crown, may afford a satisfactory clearance of the doubt to subjects of a Brunswick prince. The argument upon the two cases of Levying War and depriving of the crown, is the same. And this learned Judge did certainly not encourage the separation of the king's authority from his person, in this branch of the Law of Treason.—It would be equally just to take the converse of the above argument, and to say, the levying war must be clear of design against the king's life, because if it were otherwise, there was no need to provide for it by the first clause of compassing, &c. Many of the arguments in the State Trials lead to this inference, unknown to their authors. It is the consequence of lord Bacon's statement of the Judges' Opinion, in his Treasons of the Earl of Essex, and in many other examples.—Again, the inconsistency of the doctrine will further appear, from the following view of it. If it be

It is a war against the king, when intended for alteration of the laws or government in any part of them, or to destroy any of the great officers of the kingdom. This is a levying war against the king :

1. Because the king doth protect and maintain the Laws in every part of them, and the great officers, to whose care he hath, in his own stead, delegated the execution of them.

2. Because they are the king's laws, he is the fountain from whence, in their several channels, they are derived to the subject ; all our Indictments run thus, trespasses laid to be done, ' contra pacem domini regis, ' the king's peace, for exorbitant offences, though not intended against the king's person, against the king, his crown and dignity.

My lords, this construction is made good, by divers Authorities of great weight, ever since the Statute of 25th of Edw. 3, downwards.

In Rd. 2's time, sir Tho. Talbot conspired the death of the dukes of Gloucester and Lancaster, and some other of the peers ; for the effecting of it, he had caused several people in the county of Chester, to be armed in warlike manner in assemblies in the parliament, held in the 17th R. 2, No. 20. sir Thomas Talbot being accused of High Treason for this : It is there declared, insomuch as one of them was Lord High Steward of England, and the other High Constable, that this was done in destruction of the estates of the realm, and of the laws of the kingdom, and therefore adjudged Treason, and the Judgment sent down into the King's Bench, as appears, Easter term, in the 17th R. 2, in the King's Bench rot. 16. These two lords had appeared in the 11 R. 2, in maintenance of the act of parliament made in the year before, one of them was of the Commissioners appointed by Parliament, and one of the Appellors of those who would have overthrown it.

The duke of Lancaster likewise was one of the lords, that was to have been indicted of Treason, for endeavouring the maintenance of it ; and therefore conspiring of their deaths is said to be in destruction of their laws ; This there is declared to be Treason, that concerned the person of the king and common-wealth.

In that great Insurrection of the villains, and meaner people, in Rd. 2's time, they took an oath, ' Quod regi et communibus fidelitatem levying war against the king, to assume royal authority by force, it cannot be restrained to any particular branch of the prerogative. It must be treason so to assume any one of them. Of these there is none more clearly ascertained, than the administration of justice. This proceeds from the Crown as the Fountain of Justice, from whence all Courts are to derive their institution. Therefore, to erect such tribunal, and to maintain it with force, (any force sufficient for the purpose, according to Foster) is levying war against the king, by ' doing that ' which the king ought to do in government as ' king.' Luders on the Law of Treason, in Levying War, p. 77.

' servarent, ' to be true to the king and commons, and that they would take nothing but what they paid for, punished all theft with death ; here is no intendment against the person of the king ; The intent was, to establish the laws of Villanage and Servitude, to burn all the Records, to kill the Judges : This in the Parliament of the 5th Rd. 2, No. 31, 32, the first part, is declared to be Treason against the king, and against the law.

In the 11th R. 2, in parliament, the raising of Forces against the Commissioners, appointed by act of Parliament the year before, adjudged Treason by all the judges.

The statute 1 Mary cap. 12, enacts, That if 12 or more shall endeavour by force, to alter any of the laws or statutes of the kingdom, he shall from such a time there limited, be adjudged only as a Felon. This act was to continue but to the next parliament, it is expired, it shews by the words only, that the offence was higher before the making it.

My lords, In queen Elizabeth's time, Grant, and divers apprentices of London, to the number of 200, rose, and assembled at Tower-hill, carried a cloak upon a pole instead of a banner, their intent was to deliver divers Apprentices out of prison, that had been committed upon a Sentence in the Star-Chamber for riots, to kill the lord mayor of London, and for setting prizes on Victuals. In Trinity term, 37 Eliz. divers of the Judges were consulted withal, and resolved, That this was a levying of war against the queen, being intended against the government and officers of the queen, and therefore Grant and others were executed as Traitors.

Afterwards, in that queen's time, divers of the county of Oxford consulted, to go together from house to house in that county, and thence to London and other parts, to excite them to take up arms, for the throwing in of all inclosures throughout England. Nothing was done, nor no assembly. Yet the statute of 13 Eliz. c. 1, during the queen's life, made it Treason, to intend, or advise to levy war against the queen.

In Easter term 39 Eliz. all the Judges of England met about the case, it was resolved by them, that this was a war intended against the queen ; they agreed, That if it had been of one township or more, upon private interest, and claim of right of Common, it had not been Treason, but this was to throw in all Inclosures through the kingdom, whereunto these parties should pretend no claim. That it was against the law, in regard that the Statute of Merton gave power of Inclosures in many cases : upon this resolution Bradshaw and Burton were executed at Aynestow-hill in Oxfordshire, the place where they intended the first rendezvous.

So that my lords, if the end of it be to overthrow any of the Statutes, any part of the law and settled government, or any of the great officers intrusted with the execution of them, this is a war against the king.

My lords, It will be further considerable, what shall be accounted a Levying of War, is respect of the actions and things done; there is a design to alter some part of the laws, and present government, for the effecting thereof, people be provided of arms, gathered together into troops, but afterwards march not with banners displayed, nor do bellum percutere, whether the army themselves, and gathering together upon this design, be a war, or such prosecution of the design with force, as makes it treason within the statute?

1. If this be not a war, in respect that it necessarily occasions hostile preparations on the other side.

2. From the words of the statute, shall levy war, and be thereof probably attainted of open deed, by people of their condition; although the bare conspiring be not an open deed, yet whether the arming and drawing of men together, be not an open declaration of war?

In sir Thomas Talbot's Case before cited, in the 17th R. 2, the acts of force are expressed in the Parliament Roll; That he caused divers of the people of the county of Chester, to be armed in a warlike manner in assemblies, here is no marching, no banners displayed.

In the 8th Hen. 8, William Bell and Thomas Lacy in Com. Banc. conspired with Thomas Chydney, called the 'Hermit of the queen of 'Faries,' to overthrow the laws and customs of the realm; and for the effecting of it, they with 200 more, met together, and concluded upon a course of raising greater forces in the county of Kent, and the adjacent shires; This adjudged Treason; these were open acts.

My Lords, For the Application of both these, to the Case in question:

1. In respect of the end of it: here was a War against the king, it was to subvert the laws; this being the design for the effecting of it, he assumed to his own person an arbitrary power over the lives, liberties, and estates of his majesty's subjects, and determined Causes upon Paper-Petitions, at his own will and pleasure; Obedience must be forced by the army, this is declared by the Warrant.

My lords, If it be said that the Warrant expresseth not any intent of subverting the laws; It expresseth fully one of the principal means, whereby this was to be done, that is, obedience to his arbitrary orders upon Paper-Petitions; This was done in reference to the main design.

In the Cases of the town of Cambridge and sir William Cogan, they have formerly been cited to your lordships upon other occasions, the things in themselves were not Treason, they were not a levying of war. In that of Cambridge, the town met together, and in a forcible manner broke up the University-Treasury, and took out of it the Records, and Evidences of the Liberties of the University over the town. In the other, they of Bridgewater marched to the Hospital, and compelled the master of the Hospital to deliver unto them certain Evidences, that concerned the town, and forced him to enter into a bond of 200*l*.

These, if done upon these private ends alone, had not been a Treason, as appears by the very words of the statute of 25 Edw. 3, before-mentioned, of marching openly or secretly.

But my lords, these of Cambridge and Bridgewater, they were of the conspiracy with the Villains, as appears in the Parliament-Roll of 1 Rich. 2, n. 311, and 32, where the towus of Cambridge and Bridgewater are expressly excepted out of the general Pardon made to the Villains; this being done in reference to that design of the Villains, of altering the laws; this was that which made it Treason.

If the design went no further, than the enforcing obedience to these Paper Orders made by himself, it was sufficient it was to subvert one fundamental part of the law; nay, in effect the whole law; what use of law, if he might order and determine of men's estates at his own pleasure? This was against the law notoriously declared in Ireland.

In the close Roll in the Tower, in the 26th of Ed. 1, a Writ went to the Justices in Ireland, that kingdom at that time was governed by Justices, declaring, That upon Petitions they were not to determine any Titles between party and party, upon any pretence of profit whatsoever to the king.

In 28 Hen. 6, c. 2. Suits in equity not before the Deputy, but in Chancery; suits at common-law, not before him, but in cases of life in the King's-Bench; for title of lands or goods in the proper courts of the king's-Bench, or Common-Pleas.

This declared in the Instructions for Ireland, in the latter end of king James's time, and by the Proclamation in his majesty's time; my lord took notice of them; called the commissioners narrow-hearted commissioners.

The law said, He should not thus proceed in the subversion of it, he saith he will, and will enforce obedience by the army, this is as much, in respect of the end, as to endeavour the overthrow of the Statutes of Labourers, of Victuals, or of Merton for Inclosures; here is a Warrant against the king, in respect of the end*.

* "The same arbitrary confusion of right and wrong, encouraged the parliamentary leaders in Charles the 1st's time, to charge lord Strafford with having subverted the laws, and thereby committed High-Treason. It was the Article which they laboured the most, and perhaps they judged rightly; because, by being general and indistinct, it was capable of embracing any offence that malice and faction could find no other name for. They could not have attempted this with effect, if the Law of Treason had been properly defined; or if the minds of men, the learned as well as the vulgar, had not been obscured or perverted by the doctrines which had been long current, on the supposed authority of adjudged Cases. It is curious, but lamentable too, to find St. John, with whom the maintenance of this Article lay, urging them all and relying upon them, to prove lord Strafford guilty. Thus did the in-

2. In respect of the Actions, whether there be either a Levying of War, or an open deed, or both.

My lords, There was an army in Ireland at that time, of 2,000 horse and foot; by this Warrant there is a full designation of this whole army, and an assignment of it over to Saville for this purpose. The Warrant gives him power from time to time, to take as many soldiers, horse and foot, with an officer throughout the whole army, as himself shall please; here is the terror and awe of the whole army to enforce obedience. My lords, If the Earl had armed 2,000 horse and foot, and formed them into companies to this end, your lordships would have conceived, that this had been a war. It is as much as in the case of sir Thomas Talbot, who armed them in assemblies.

This is the same with a breach of trust added to it.

That Army which was first raised, and afterwards committed to his trust, for the defence of the people, is now destined by him to their destruction. This assignation of the army by his warrant, under his hand and seal, is an open act. My lords, Here is not only an open act done, but a levying of war, soldiers, both horse and foot, with an officer in warlike man-justice of crown prosecutions meet with a retaliation here, in the injustice of a popular prosecution. So fared it, too, with Laud. Such men as he cannot complain, when they receive the same measure as they mete. Mr. St. John seems not more unjust than his predecessors, and to have as good reason as they, when he concludes, 'This is as much, in respect of the end, as to endeavour the overthrow of the Statutes of Labourers, of Vic-tuals, or of Merton for Inclosures.'—Judge Jenkins, who was imprisoned by the Parliament for his enmity to them, employed his hours of confinement in collecting together the various acts of Law-Tyranny which they had practised. He chiefly drew his points of constructive treason from St. John's Argument, published by their authority, and retorted them upon his enemies, in order to prove them, by their own oracle, guilty of High-Treason.—Some of the Articles against Cardinal Waisey contain this Charge of subverting the laws, enforced in the same loose manner, but though there are 44 of them altogether, they do not strain the point to the conclusion of High-Treason against him. These Articles were the acts of the Privy-Council, and probably drawn by sir Thomas More the Chancellor. Of the same kind are the Articles (of High-Treason as they are called) against Seymour lord Dudley, which exhibit a curious mixture. At the end of 22 Charges of Schemes of Ambition, as like Adultery as Treason, there is an ergo he aspired to the dignity royal. The Articles of Accusation against his brother the Protector, though more treasonable in their nature, are not called by that name." Luders on the Law of Treason in Levying War, 83.

Your lordships observe a great difference, where six men go upon a design alone, and when sent from an army of 600, all engaged in the same service, so many were sent as were sufficient to execute the command, if upon a poor man fewer, more upon a rich; if the six had not been able, the whole army must make it good. The reason that the Sheriff directed alone, or but with one bailiff to do execution, is, because he hath the command of the law, the king's writ, and the posse comitatus in case of resistance. Here is the Warrant of a General of an Army; Here is the posse exercitus, the Power of the Army, under the awe of the whole Army six may force more, than sixty without it; and although never above six in one place, yet in several parts of the kingdom at the same time, might be above sixty; for sassing of Soldiers was frequent, it was the ordinary course for execution of his orders.

The Lord-Lieutenant of a county in England hath a design to alter the laws and government; nay, admit the design goes not so high, he only declares thus much, he will order the freeholders and estates of the inhabitants of the county, at his own will and pleasure, and doth accordingly proceed upon Paper-Petitions; foreseeing there will be disobedience, he grants out Warrants under his hand and seal, to the deputy-lieutenants and captains of the Trained-Bands, that upon refusal, they will take such number of the Trained-Bands through the county, with officers, as they shall think good, and lay them upon the lands and houses of the refusers, soldiers in a warlike manner are frequently sessed upon them accordingly; your lordships do conceive, that this is a levying of war within the statute.

The Case in question goes further in these two respects: That it is more against the declared law in Ireland, not only against the Common-law, but likewise against the Statute of 28 Hen. 6, against the Acts of the Commissioners; against Proclamations in pursuance of the law; against that himself took notice of narrow-hearted commissioners.—In this, that here was an Army, the soldiers by profession, acts of hostility from them of greater terror, than from freeholders of the same county.—My lords, I have now done with the first of Levying of War.

The Second is the Machination, the advising of a War. The case in this, rests upon a Warrant to Saville, and the advice in the 23d Article. The Warrant shews a resolution of employing the old Army of Ireland, to the oppression of his majesty's subjects, and the laws. In the 23d Article, having told his majesty, that he was loosed and absolved from rules of government, and might do every thing which power might admit; he proceeded further in speech to his majesty in these words; 'You have an Army in Ireland, you may employ to reduce this kingdom.'

My lords, Both being put together, there is a Machination, a practice, an advice to Levy War, and by force to oppress and destroy his majesty's subjects.

It hath been said, the Statute of 25 Edw. 3, is a penal law, and cannot be taken by equity and construction, there must be an actual war; the Statute makes it Treason to counterfeit the king's Coin, the conspiring, the raising of Furnaces is no Treason, unless he doth Nummum percutere, actually coin.

My Lords, This is only said, not proved; the law is otherwise, 19 Hen. 6, fol. 49, there adjudged, That the conspiring and aiding to counterfeit Coin was Treason, and Justice Stamford, fol. 331, and 41, is of opinion, that this, or the conspiring to counterfeit the Great Seal, is Treason. The Statute is, If any shall counterfeit the Great Seal, conspiring to do it by the Book is Treason; if a man take the Broad Seal from one patent, and put it to another, here is no counterfeiting, it is tantamount, and therefore Treason, as is adjudged in 2 H. 4, fol. 25, and by the opinion of Stamford. If Machination or Plotting a war be not within that clause of the Statute of Levying of War, yet it is within the first, of compassing the death of the king, as that which necessarily tends to the destruction both of king and people, upon whose safety and protection he is to engage himself. That this is Treason, hath been adjudged, both after the Statutes of 1 Hen. 4, c. 10, and 1 queen Mary; so much insisted upon on the other side. In the 3d year of king Hen. 4, one Balshal coming from London, found one Bernard at plough, in the parish of Oley, in the county of Hertford, Bernard asked Balshal what news? he told him, that the news was, That king Richard the 2nd was alive in Scotland (which was false, for he was dead), and that by Midsummer next, he would come into England; Bernard asked him, What were best to be done? Balshal answered, Get men, and go to king Richard. In Michaelmas Term, in the 3d year of Hen. 4, in the King's Bench rot. 4, this advice of War adjudged Treason.

In Queen Mary's time, sir Nicholas Throckmorton * conspired with sir Thomas Wyatt, to levy war within this realm for alteration in Religion, he joined not with him in the execution. This conspiracy alone declared to be Treason by all the Judges; this was after the Statute of queen Mary, so much insisted upon. That Parliament ended in October, this Opinion was delivered the Easter term following, and is reported by justice Dyer, fol. 98. It is true, sir Thomas Wyatt afterwards did levy war; sir Nicholas Throckmorton he only conspired. This adjudged Treason.

One Story † in queen Elizabeth's time practised with foreigners, to levy War within this kingdom, nothing done in pursuance of the practice. The intent, without any adhering to enemies of the queen, or other cause, adjudged Treason, and he executed thereupon. It is true, my lords, that year 13 Eliz. by act of parliament it is made Treason, to intend the levying of war; this Case was adjudged before the parliament: The case was adjudged in Hillary term; the parliament begun not till the April following. This, my lords, is a Case judged in point, that the practising to levy War, though nothing be done in execution of it, is Treason.

Object.—It may be objected, That in these Cases, the conspiring being against the whole kingdom, included the queen, and was a compassing her destruction, as well as of the kingdoms, here the advice was to the king.

Ans.—The Answer is first, That the Warrant was unknown to his majesty, that was a Machination of War against the people and laws, wherein his majesty's person was engaged for protection.

Secondly, That the Advice was to his majesty, aggravates the offence, it was an attempt which was the offence; it was an attempt not only upon the kingdom, but upon the Sacred Person and his Office too; himself was hæsis patriæ, he would have made the father of it so to: Nothing more unnatural nor more dangerous, than to offer the king poison to drink; telling him that it is a cordial is a passing of his death: the poison was repelled, there was an antidote within; the malice of the giver beyond expression. The persuading of Foreigners to invade the kingdom, hold no proportion with this Machination of War; against the law of kingdom, is against the king, they cannot be severed.

My Lords, If no actual War within the Statute, if the counselling of war, if neither of these single acts be Treason within the statute, The Commons, in the next place, have taken it into consideration, what the addition of his other words, counsels, and actions do operate in the case, and have conceived, that with this addition, all being put together, that he is brought within the statute of 25 E. 3.

The words of the Statute are, 'If any man shall compass, or imagine the death of the king;' the words are not, 'If any man shall plot, or counsel the death of the king;' No, my lords, they go further than to such things as are intended immediately, directly, and determinatively against the life and person of the king, they are of a larger extent; to compass, is to do by circuit, to consult or practice another thing directly, which being done, may necessarily produce this effect.

However it be in the other Treasons within this Statute, yet in this, by the very words, there is room left for constructions, for necessary inferences and consequences.

What hath been the judgment and practice of former times, concerning these words, of compassing the king's death, will appear to your lordships, by some Cases of Attainders upon these words.

One Owen, in king James's time, in the 13th year of his reign, at Sandwich in Kent, spake these words, 'That king James being excommunicated by the Pope, may be killed by any ‘man, which killing is no murder? Being asked by those he spake to, how he durst maintain so bloody an assertion? Answered, ‘That the matter was not so heinous as was supposed; for the king, who is the lesser, is concluded by the Pope, who is the greater; and, as a malefactor, being condemned before a temporal judge, may be delivered over to be executed; so the king, standing convicted by the Pope’s Sentence of Excommunication, may justly be slaughtered without fault; for, the killing of the king is the execution of the Pope’s supreme Sentence, as the other is the execution of the law.’ For this Judgment of High Treason was given against him, and execution done.

* See vol. 1. p. 869. † Ibid. p. 861.

My Lords, there is no clear intent appearing, that Owen desired the thing should be done, only Arguments that it might be done, this is a compassing, there is a clear endeavour to corrupt the judgment, to take off the bonds of conscience, the greatest security of the king’s life, ‘God forbid,’ saith one of better judgment than he, ‘that I should stretch out my hand against the Lord’s anointed.’ No, saith he, the Lord deth not forbid it, you may, for these reasons, lawfully kill the king.

He that denies the Title to the Crown, and plots the means of setting it upon another’s head, may do this without any direct, or immediate desiring the death of him that wears it; yet this is Treason, as was adjudged in the 10th of Hen. 7, in these of Burton, and in the duke of Norfolk’s case, 13 Eliz.

This is a compassing of his Death; for there can no more be two kings in one kingdom, then two suns in the firmament: He that conceives a title, counts it worth venturing for, though it cost him his life: he that is in possession thinks it as well worth the keeping. John Sparhawk, in king Henry the 4th’s time, meeting two men upon the way, amongst other talk, said, That the king was not rightful king, but the earl of March; and that the pope would grant indulgences to all, that could assist the Earl’s Title, and that within half a year there would be no Liveries nor Cognizances of the king; that the king had not kept promise with the people, but had laid Taxes upon them.

In Easter-Term, in the 3rd year of Henry the 4th, in the King’s Bench, rot. 12, this adjudged Treason, this denying the Title with motives, though not impliedly of action against it, adjudged Treason; this is a compassing the king’s death.

How this was a compassing of the king’s Death, is declared in the Reasons of the Judgment; that the words were spoken with an intent, to withdraw the affections of the people from the king, and to excite them against him, that in the end they might rise up against him in mortem et destructionem of the king.

My Lords, in this Judgment, and others, which I shall cite to your lordships, it appears, that it is a compassing the king’s death by words, to endeavour to draw the people’s hearts from the king, to set discord between the king and them, whereby the people should leave the king, should rise up against him, to the death and destruction of the king.

The Cases that I shall cite, prove not only that it is Treason, but what is sufficient Evidence to make this good.

Upon a Commission held the 18th Ed. 4, in Kent, before the marquis of Dorset, and others, an Indictment was preferred against John Awater, of High Treason, in the form before-mentioned, for Words, which are entered in the Indictment sub hac forma: That he had been servant to the earl of Warwick; that though he were dead, the earl of Oxford was alive, and should have the government of part of that country; That Edward, whom you call king of England, was a false man, and had, by art and subtilty, slain the earl of Warwick, and the duke of Clarence his brother, without any cause, who before had been both of them attainted of High-Treason.

My Lords, This Indictment was returned into the King’s Bench in Trinity-term, in the 18th Edw. the 4th; and, in Easter-term, the 22d of Edw. the 4th, he was outlawed, by the stay of the outlawry, so long as it seems the Judges had well advised before whether it were treason or not.

At the same session Thomas Heber was indicted of Treason for these words, ‘That the last Parliament was the most simple and insufficient Parliament that ever had been in England; That the king was gone to live in Kent, because that for the present he had not the love of the citizens of London, nor should he have it for the future: That if the bishop of Bath and Wells were dead, the archbishop of Canterbury being cardinal of England, would immediately lose his head.’ This Indictment was returned into the King’s Bench in Trinity-term, in the 18th of Edw. 4th: afterwards there came a privy-seal to the Judge to respite the Proceedings, which, as it should seem, was to the intent the Judges might advise of the Case, for afterwards he is outlawed of High-Treason upon this Indictment.

These words are thought sufficient evidence, to prove these several Indictments, that they were spoken to withdraw the people’s Affections from the king to excite them against him, to cause risings against him by the people, in mortem et destructionem of the king.

Your lordships are pleased to consider, That in all these Cases, the Treason was for words only, words by private persons, and in a more private manner, but once spoken, and no more, only amongst the people, to excite them against the king.

My Lords, here are Words, Counsels, more than Words and Actions too, not only to disaffect the people to the king, but the king likewise towards the people; not once, but often; not in private, but in places most public; not by a private person, but by a counsellor of state, a lord lieutenant, a lord-president, a lord-deputy of Ireland.

1. To his majesty that the parliament had denied to supply him; a slander upon all the commons of England, in their affections to the king and kingdom, in refusing to yield timely supply for the necessities of the king and kingdom.

2. From thence, that the king was loose, and absolved from rules of government, and was to do every thing, that power would admit. My lords, more cannot be said, they cannot be aggravated; whatever I should say would be in diminution.

3. Thence you have an Army in Ireland, you may employ to reduce this kingdom.

To counsel a king, not to love his people, is very unnatural, it goes higher to hate them, to malice them in his heart, the highest expressions of malice to destroy them by war. These coals they were cast upon his majesty, they were blown, they could not kindle in that breast.

Thence, my lords, having done the utmost to the King, he goes to the People. At York, the country being met together for Justice, at the open Assizes upon the bench, he tells them, speaking of the Justices of the Peace, that they were all for law, nothing but law, but they should find that the king's little finger should be heavier than the loines of the law, as they shall find. My lords, Who speaks this to the people, a privy-counsellor? this must be either to traduce his majesty to the people, as spoken from him, or from himself, who was Lord-Lieutenant of the county, and President, intrusted with the forces and justice of those parts, that he would employ both this way. Add, my lords, to his Words there the exercising of an arbitrary and vast jurisdiction, before he had so much as instructions, or colour of warrant.

Thence we carry him into Ireland; there he represented, by his place, the Sacred Person of his majesty.

1. There at Dublin, the principal city of that kingdom, whither the subjects of that country came for justice in an Assembly of Peers, and others of greatest rank, upon occasion of a Speech of the Recorder of that city, touching their franchises and regal rights; he tells them, That Ireland was a conquered nation, and that the king might do with them what he pleased.

2. Not long after, in the Parliament 10 Car. in the chair of state, in full parliament again, That they were a conquered nation; and that they were to expect laws as from a conqueror, before the king might do with them what he would, now they were to expect it that he would put this power of a Conqueror in execution:—The circumstances are very considerable; in full parliament; from himself in Cathedra, to the representative body of the whole kingdom.

The occasion adds much, when they desired the benefit of the laws, and that their causes and suits might be determined according to law, and not by himself, at his will and pleasure, upon Paper Petitions.

3. Upon like occasion, of pressing the laws and statutes, that he would make an act of Council-Board in that kingdom, as binding as an act of parliament.

4. He made his words good by his actions, assumed and exercised a boundless and lawless jurisdiction over the lives, persons and estates of his majesty's subjects, procured judgment of death against a peer of that realm; commanded another to be hanged, this was accordingly executed, both in times of high peace, without any process or colour of law.

5. By force, of a long time, he seized the Yarn and Flax of the subjects, to the starving and undoing of many thousands; besides the Tobacco business, and many monopolies and unlawful taxes; forced a new Oath not to dispute his majesty's royal commands; determined men's estates at his own will and pleasure, upon Paper-Petitions to himself; forced obedience to these, not only by fines and imprisonment, but likewise by the army; sessed soldiers upon the refusers in an hostile manner.

6. Was an Incendiary of the war between the two kingdoms of England and Scotland.

My lords, We shall leave it to your lordships judgments, whether these Words, Counsels, and Actions, would not have been a sufficient Evidence, to have proved an Indictment drawn up against him, as those before mentioned, and many others are? That they were spoken and done to the intent, to draw the king's heart from the people, and the affections of the people from the king; that they might leave the king, and afterwards rise up against him, to the destruction of the king: If so, here is a compassing of the king's death, within the words of the Statute of 25 Edw. 3, and that warranted by many former judgments.

My Lords, I have now done with the three Treasons within the Statute of 25 Edw. 3. I proceed unto the fourth, upon the Statute of 18 Hen. 6, c. 3, in Ireland, and I shall make hold to read the words to your lordships: 'That no lord, nor any other of what condition soever he be, shall bring, or lead Hoblers, Kernes, or Hooded men, nor any other people, nor horses, to lie on-horseback, or on foot, upon the king's subjects, without their good wills and consent, but upon their own costs, and without hurt doing to the commons; and if any so do, he shall be adjudged as a Traitor.'

1. The Argument that hath been made concerning the Person, that it extends not to the king, and therefore not to him, weighs nothing with your lordships, 'Rex non habet in regno parem'; from the greatness of his Office, to argue himself into the same impossibility with his sacred majesty, of being incapable of High-Treason, it is an Offence, no Treason; The words in the Statute, 'No lord, nor any other, of what condition soever he be,' include every subject.

In Trinity Term, in 33 Hen. 8, in the King's-Bench, Leonard lord Gray*, having immediately before been Lord Deputy of Ireland, is attainted of High-Treason, and Judgment given against him, for letting divers Rebels out of the castle of Dublin, and discharging Irish Hostages and Pledges, that had been given for securing the peace; for not punishing one that said, That the king was an Heretic: I have read the whole Record, there is not one thing laid to his charge, but was done by him as Lord Lieutenant; He had the same plea with my Lord of Strafford; That these things were no adhering to the king's enemies, but were done for reasons of state, that he was not within those words of the Statute of 25 Edw. 3, himself being Lord Lieutenant there.

Object.—It hath been said, That the Soldiers sessed upon the subjects by him, were not such persons as are intended by that statute, Hoblers, Kernes, and Hooded men, those rascally people.

Ans.—My Lords, they were the names given to the soldiery of those times, Hoblers, Horsemen; the other the Foot. But the words of the Statute go further, Nor any other people, neither horse nor foot. His lordship sessed upon them both horse and foot.

Object.—The Statute extends only to those, that lead or bring; Savil led them; my Lord only gave the Warrant.

Ans.—To this I shall only say thus, 'plus peccat author, quam actor,' by the rule of the law 'agentes et consentientes pari plectuntur pena'; if consent, much more a command to do it, makes the commander a Traitor; If there be any treason within this statute, my lord of Strafford is guilty.

It hath been therefore said, That this Statute, like Goliah's sword, hath been wrapt up in a cloth and laid behind the door, that it hath never been put in execution.

My Lords; if the Clerk of the Crown in Ireland, had certified your lordships upon search of the Judgments of Attainders in Ireland, he could not find that any man had been attainted upon this statute, your lordships had had some ground to believe it; Yet it is only my lord of Strafford's affirmation; besides, your lordships know, that an act of parliament binds until it be repealed.

It hath been therefore said; That this Statute is repealed by the statute of 8 Ed. 4, cap. 1, and 10 Hen. 7, c. 22, because by these two statutes, the English statutes are brought into Ireland.

The Argument (if I mistook it not) stood thus; That the Statute of 1 Hen. 4, c. 10, saith, That in no time to come, Treason shall be adjudged otherwise, then it was ordained by the statute of 25 Ed. 3, that the reason mentioned in 18 Hen. 6, in the Irish statute, is not contained in 25 Edw. 3, and therefore contrary to the statute of 1 Hen. 4, it must needs be void.

If this were law, then all the Statutes that made any new Treason after 1 Hen. 4, were void in the very fabrick, and at the time when they were made; hence likewise it would follow, that the parliament now, upon what occasion soever, hath no power to make any thing Treason, not declared to be so in the statute 25 Ed. 3. This, your lordships easily see, would make much for the lord of Strafford's advantage, but why the law should be so, your lordships have only as yet heard an affirmation of it; no reason.

But some touch was given, that the Statute of 10 Hen. 7, in words, make all the Irish statutes void, which are contrary to the English. The Answer to this is a denial that there are any such words in the Statute. The Statute declares, That the English Statutes shall be effectual, and confirmed in Ireland, and that all the statutes made before time to the contrary, shall be revoked.

This repeals only the Irish Statutes of 10 Hen. 4, and 29 Hen. 6, which say, that the English Statutes shall not be in force in Ireland, unless particularly received in parliament, it makes all the Irish Statutes void, which say, that the English Statutes shall not be in force there.—It is usual when a Statute says, that such a thing shall be done, or not done, to add further, that all Statutes to the contrary shall be void. No likelihood that this Statute intended to take away any statute of Treason, but when in the chapter next before this, Murder there is made Treason, as if done upon the king's person.

That this Statute of 18 Hen. 6, remains on foot, and not repealed either by the Statute of 8 Edw. 4, or this of 10 Hen. 7, appears expressly by two several acts of parliament, made at the same parliament of 10 Hen. 7.

By an act of parliament of Henry 6th's time in Ireland, it was made Treason for any man whatsoever, to procure a Privy-Seal, or any other command whatsoever, for apprehending any person in Ireland for Treason done without that kingdom, and to put any such command in execution, divers had been attainted of Treason for executing such commands: There is a Treason, so made, by act of parliament, in Henry 6th's time. In the 3rd chapter of this Parliament of 10 Hen. 7, an act is passed for no other end than to repeal this Statute of Hen. 6, of Treason.

If this Statute of Hen. 6, of Treason, had been formerly repealed by the Statute of 8 Ed. 4, or then by the 22nd chapter of this Parliament of 10 Hen. 7, by bringing in the English Statutes, the law-makers were much mistaken now to make a particular act of parliament to repeal it, it being likewise so unreasonable an act as it was.

In the 8th chapter of this Parliament of 10 Hen. 7, it is enacted, That the statutes of Kilkenny and all other statutes made in Ireland (two only excepted, whereof this of 18 Hen. 6, is none) for the common-weal, shall be enquired of, and executed: My lord of Strafford saith, that the bringing in of the English Statute hath repealed this Statute; the act of parliament made the same time, saith no; it saith, that all the Irish Statutes, excepting two, whereof this is none, shall still be in force.

Object.—Oh, but however it was in 10 Hen

7, yet it appears by Judgment in Parliament afterwards, that this Statute of 18 H. 6, is repealed, and that is by the parliament of 11 Eliz. c. 7, that by this parliament it is enacted, That if any man, without licence from the Lord Deputy, lay any soldiers upon the king's subjects, if he be a peer of the realm, he shall forfeit 100*l.* if under the degree of a peer, 100 marks.—This Statute, as is alledged, declares the penalty of laying soldiers on the subjects to be only 100*l.* and therefore it is not Treason.

Ans*w.*—My lords, if the offence for which this penalty of 100*l.* is laid upon the offenders, be for laying Soldiers, or leading them to do any act offensive or invasive upon the king's people, the argument hath some force; but that the offence is not for laying soldiers upon the true subjects, that this is not the Offence intended in the Statute, will appear to your lordships ex absurdo, from the words of it. The words are, 'That if any man shall assemble the people of the county together, to conclude of peace or war, or shall carry those people to do any acts offensive or invasive, then he shall forfeit 100*l.*'

If concluding of war, and carrying the people to acts invasive, be against the king's subjects, this is High-Treason, which are the words of the Statute of 25 E. 3, for if any subject shall assemble the people, and conclude a war, and accordingly shall lead them to invade the subject, this is a levying of War within the words of the statute; and then the statutes of the 25 E. 3, 1 H. 4, 1 of Q. Mary, which the earl of Strafford, in his Answers, desires to be tryed by, are as well repealed, in this point, as the Statute of the 18th Hen. 6, he might then, without fear of Treason, have done what he pleased with the Irish army; for all the statutes of levying of War by this statute of 11 Eliz. were taken out of his way.

In Ireland a subject gathers Forces, concludes a war against the king's people, actually invades them, bloodshed, burning of houses, depredations, ensue; two of those, that is, murder and burning of houses, are Treason; and there the other Felony by the construction, the punishment of Treason and Felony is turned only into a fine of 100*l.*; from loss of life, lands, and all his goods, only to loss of part of his goods.

The third absurdity, a War is concluded, three several inroads are made upon the subject; in the first 100*l.* damage; in the second, 5,000*l.* damage; in the third, 10,000*l.* damage, is done to the subjects; the penalty for the last inroad is, no more than for the first, only 100*l.* This statute, by this construction, tells any man, how to get his living without long labour.

Two parts of the 100*l.* is given to the king, a third part unto the Informer; Here is no damage to the subject, that is robbed and destroyed.

My Lords, The Statute will free itself and the makers from those absurdities. The meaning of the Statute is, That if any captain shall, of his own head, conclude of peace or war against the king's enemies, or rebels, or shall, upon his own head, invade them without warrant from the king, or lord deputy of Ireland, that then he shall forfeit 100*l.*

The Offence is not for laying of soldiers upon the king's people, but making war against the Irish Rebels without Warrant; the offence is not in the matter, but in the manner, for doing a thing lawful but without mission. 1. This will appear by the general scope of the Statute, all the parts being put together. 2. By particular Clauses in the Statute. 3. By the Condition of that Kingdom, at the time of the making of that Statute.

For the 1st, The Preamble recites, That in time of declination of justice, under pretext of defending the country and themselves, diverse great men arrogated to themselves regal authority, under the names of Captains; that they acquired to themselves that government, which belonged to the Crown; for preventing of this, it is enacted, That no man dwelling within the Shire-grounds, shall thenceforth assume, or take to himself the authority or name of a Captain, within these Shire-grounds, without letters-patents from the Crown, nor shall, under colour of his Captainship, make any demand of the people of any exaction, nor as a Captain, assemble the people of the Shire-grounds; nor as a Captain shall lead those people to do any acts offensive or invasive, without Warrant under the Great Seal of England, or of the Lord Deputy, upon penalty, that if he do any thing contrary to that act, that then the offender shall forfeit a hundred pounds.

My Lords, The Rebels had been out; the Courts of Justice scarce sate; for defence of the country divers usurped the place of Captains, concluded of war against the Rebels, and invaded them without Warrant: invading the Rebels without authority, is a crime.

This appears further by particular clauses in the statute, none shall exercise any Captainship within the Shire-grounds, nor assemble the men of the Shire-grounds, to conclude war, or lead them to any invasion.

That that had antiently been so continued to this time, that is the Irish, and the English pale, they within the Shire-grounds were within the English pale; and ad fidem et legem Angliæ. The Irish without the pale were enemies always, either in open act of hostility, or upon leagues and hostages given for securing the peace; and therefore as here in England we had our Marches upon the frontiers in Scotland and Wales, so were there marches between the Irish and English Pale, where the inhabitants held their lands by this tenure, to defend the country against the Irish, as appears in the close Roll of the Tower, in the 20th. Edw. 3, membrana 15, on the backside, and in an Irish parliament, held the 42nd Edw. 3, it is declared, That the English pale was almost destroyed by the Irish enemies, and that there was no way to prevent the danger, but only, that the owners reside upon their lands for defence, and that absence should be a forfeiture. This act of parliament in a great council here was affirmed, as appears in the close Roll, the 22nd Edw. 3, membrana 20 dorso.

Afterwards, as appears in the Statute 28 Hen. 6, in Ireland, this hostility continued between the English marches and the Irish enemies, who by reason there was no difference between the English Marches and them in their apparel, did daily (not being known to the English) destroy the English within the pale: Therefore it is enacted, that every English-man shall have the hair of his upper lip for distinction sake. This hostility continued until the 10th Hen. 7, as appears by the Statute of 10 H. 7, and 17th, so successively downwards, till the making of this very Statute of 11 Eliz. as appears fully in the 9th chap.

Nay, immediately before, and at the time of the making of this Statute, there was not only enmity between those of the Shire-ground, that is, the English and Irish pale, but open war, and acts of hostility, as appears by history of no less authority than that Statute itself; for in the first Chapter of that Statute, is the Attainder of Shane Oneale, who had made open war, was slain in open war; it is there declared, That he had gotten by force, all the North of Ireland, for 120 miles in length, and about 100 in breadth; that he had mastered divers places within the English pale; when the flame of this war by his death, immediately before this Statute, was spent, yet the firebrands were not all quenched, for the Rebellion continued by John Fitz-Gerard, called the White Knight, and Thomas Gueverford, this appears by the Statute of the 13th queen Eliz. in Ireland, but two years after this of the 11th queen Eliz. where they are attainted of High Treason, for levying of war this 11th year, wherein this Statute was made.

So that my lords, immediately before, and at the time of the making of this Statute, there being war between those of the shire-grounds, mentioned in this Statute, and the Irish, the concluding of war, and acts offensive and invasive there mentioned, can be intended against no others, but the Irish enemies.

Again, The words of the Statute are, 'No Captain shall assemble the people of the shire-grounds,' to conclude of peace or war; is to presume, that those of the shire-grounds will conclude of war against themselves. Nor (with the Statute) 'Shall carry those of the shire-grounds to do any acts invasive; by the construction which is made on the other side, they must be carried to fight against themselves.

Lastly, The words are, That as Captain, none shall assume the name, or authority of a Captain; or as a Captain shall gather the people together; or as a Captain lead them; the offence is not in the matter, but in the manner; if the acts offensive were against the king's good subjects, those that were under command were punishable, as well as the commanders; but in respect the soldiers knew the service to be good in itself, being against the enemies, and that it was not for them to dispute the authority of their commanders, the penalty of 100*l.* is laid only upon him, that as Captain, shall assume this power without warrant, the people commanded are not within this statute.

My Lords, The logic whereupon this Argument is framed, stands thus, because the statute of the 11th queen Eliz. inflicts a penalty of 100*l.* and no more, upon any man, that as a Captain without warrant, and upon his own head, shall conclude of, or make war against the king's enemies: Therefore the Statute of the 18th Hen. 6 is repealed, which makes it Treason to lay soldiers upon, or to levy war against the king's good people.

But, my lords, Observation hath been made upon other words of this Statute, that is, that without Licence of the Deputy, these things cannot be done; this shews that the Deputy is within none of the statutes.

My Lords, This Argument stands upon the same reason with the former, because he hath the ordering of the Army of Ireland, for the defence of the people, and may give warrant to the officers of the army, upon eminent occasions of invasion, to resist or prosecute the enemy, because of the danger that else might ensue forthwith, by staying for a warrant from his majesty out of England.

My Lords, The statute of the 10th Hen. 7, c. 17, touched upon for this purpose, clears the business in both points; for there is declared, That none ought to make War upon the Irish rebels, and enemies, without Warrant from the Lieutenant, the forfeiture 100*l.* so here the Statute is the same with this, and might as well have been cited, for repealing the Statute of the 18th Hen. 6, as this of the 11th queen Eliz. But if this had been insisted upon, it would have expounded the other two clear against him.

Object.—My Lords, it hath been further said, although the Statute be in force, and there be a Treason within it, yet the parliament hath no jurisdiction, the treasons are committed in Ireland, therefore not triable here.

Ans. —My Lords, sir John Parrot,* his predecessor, 24 Edw. was tryed in the King's Bench for Treason done in Ireland, when he was deputy; and Oruche in the 34 queen Eliz. adjudged here for Treason done in Ireland.

Object.—But it will be said, these Trials were after the Statute of the 34th Hen. 8, which enacts, that Treasons beyond sea may be tried in England.

Ans. —My Lords, his predecessor my lord Gray was tried, and adjudged here in the King's Bench: that was in Trinity Term, in the 38rd Hen. 8th, this was before the making of that Statute.

Object.—To this again will we say, That it was for Treason by the laws and statutes of England; that this is not for any thing that is

* See vol. 1, p. 1315. † Ibid. p. 459.

Treason by the law of England, but an Irish statute.

So that the question is only, Whether your lordships here in parliament, have cognizance of an offence, made Treason by an Irish statute, in the ordinary way of judicature, without bill? for so is the present question.

For the clearing of this, I shall propound two things to your lordships consideration. Whether the rule for expounding the Irish Statute and Customs, be one and the same in England as in Ireland? That being admitted, Whether the parliament in England have cognizance or jurisdiction of things there done, in respect of the place, because the king's writ runs not there?

For the first, in respect of the place, the parliament here hath cognizance there. And secondly, If the rules for expounding the Irish statutes and customs, be the same here as there, this exception (as I humbly conceive) must fall away.

In England there is the Common Law, the Statutes, the Acts of Parliament, and Customs, peculiar to certain places, differing from the common law; If any question arise concerning either a custom or an act of parliament, the common law of England, the first, the primitive and the general law, that is the rule and expositor of them, and of their several extents; it is so here, it is so in Ireland, the common law of England, is the common law of Ireland likewise; the same here and there in all the parts of it.

It was introduced into Ireland by king John, and afterwards by king Henry 3, by act of parliament held in England, as appears by the Patent Rolls of the 50th Hen. 3, the first Membrana, the words are, 'Quia pro communi utilitate terræ Hiberniæ et unitate terrarum regis, rex vult, et de communi concilio regis visum est, quod omnes leges et consuetudines quæ in regno Angliæ tenentur, in Hibernia teneantur, et eadem terra eisdem legibus subjaceat, et per eandem regatur, sicut dominus Johannes rex cum ultimo esset in Hibernia statuit et fieri mandavit, quia, &c. Rex vult quod omnia brevia de communi jure quæ currunt in Anglia, similiter currant in Hibernia, sub novo sigillo regis mandatum est archiepiscopis, &c. quod pro pace et tranquillitate ejusdem terræ, per eandem leges eos regi et deduci permittant, et eas in omnibus sequantur in cuius, &c. Teste rege apud Woodstock, decimo nono die Septembris.'

Here is an union of both kingdoms, and that by act of parliament, and the same laws to be used here as there, in omnibus.

My Lords, That nothing might be left here for an exception, that is, That in Treasons, Felonies, and other capital offences concerning life, the Irish laws are not the same as here, therefore it is enacted by a parliament held in England, in the 14th Edw. 2, (it is not in print neither, but in the Parliament Book) That the Laws concerning life and member shall be the same in Ireland, as in England.

And that no exception might yet remain; in a parliament held in England, the 5th Edw. 3, it is enacted, 'Quod una et eadem lex fiat tam Hibernicis quam Anglicis.' This act is enrolled in the Patent Rolls of the 5th Edw. 3, Parl. membr. 25. The Irish therefore receiving their Laws from hence, they send their Students at Law to the Inns of Court in England, where they receive their degree, and of them, and of the common lawyers of this kingdom, are the Judges made.

The Petitions have been many from Ireland, to send from hence some judges, more learned in the laws, than those they had there. It hath been frequent in cases of difficulty there, to send sometimes to the parliament, sometimes to the king, by advice from the Judges here, to send them resolutions of their doubts. Amongst many, I'll cite your lordships only one, because it is in a case of Treason upon an Irish statute, and therefore full to this point.

By a Statute there made the 5th Ed. 4, there is a provision made for such as upon suggestions are committed to prison for Treason, that the party committed, if he can procure 24 compurgators, shall be bailed and let out of prison.

Two citizens of Dublin were by a grand jury presented to have committed Treason, they desired benefit of this statute, that they might be let out of prison, upon tender of their compurgators: the words of the Statute of the 5th Ed. 4, in Ireland, being obscure, the Judges there being not satisfied what to do, sent the Case over to the queen, desired the opinion of the Judges here, which was done accordingly. The Judges here sent over their opinion, which I have out of the Book of Justice Anderson, one of the Judges consulted withal. The Judges delivered their opinion upon an Irish Statute, in case of Treason.

If it be objected, That in this Case, the Judges here did not judge upon the party; their opinions were only ad informandam conscientiam, of the Judges in Ireland, that the Judgment belonged to the Judges there. My lords, (with submission) this and the other Authorities, prove, that for which they were cited, that is, that no absurdity, no failure of justice would ensue, if this great judicatory should judge of Treason, so made by an Irish statute.

The Common Law rules of judging upon an Irish Statute; the Pleas of the Crown for things of life and death, are the same here and there, this is all that yet hath been offered.

For the second point, That England hath no power of judicature, for things done in Ireland. My lords, the constant practice of all ages proves the contrary. Writs of Error in Pleas of the Crown, as well as in civil causes, have in all king's reigns been brought here, even in the inferior courts of Westminster-hall upon Judgment given in the courts of Ireland, the practice is so frequent, and so well known, as that I shall cite none of them to your lordships, no precedent will, I believe, be produced to your lordships, that ever the case was remanded back again into Ireland, because the question arose upon an Irish Statute, or Custom.

Object.—But it will be said, that Writs of Error, are only upon failure of justice in Ireland, and that suits cannot originally be commenced here for things done in Ireland, because the king's Writ runs not in Ireland.

Ans.—This might be a good Plea in the King's Bench, and inferior courts at Westminster-hall; the question is, Whether it be so in Parliament? the king's Writ runs not within the county palatine of Chester and Durham, nor within the Five Ports; neither did it in Wales, before the Union of Henry the 8th's time, after the laws of England were brought into Wales, in king Edward the 1st's time, suits were not originally commenced at Westminster-hall for things done in them; yet this never excluded the Parliament suits; for life, lands, and goods within these jurisdictions, are determinable in parliament, as well as in any other parts of the realm.

Ireland, as appears by the statute of the 30th Hen. 3, before mentioned, is united to the crown of England. By the Statute of the 28th Hen. 6, in Ireland, it is declared, in these words, That Ireland is the proper dominion of England, and united to the crown of England, which crown of England is of itself, and by itself, wholly and entirely endowed with all power and authority sufficient to yield to the subjects of the same full and plenary remedy, in all debates and suits whatsoever.

By the Statute of the 23 Hen. 8th, ch. 1, when the kings of England first assumed the title of King of Ireland, it is there enacted, That Ireland still is to be held as a crown annexed and united to the Crown of England.

So that by the same reason, from this that the king's writs run not in Ireland, it might as well be held, that the Parliament cannot originally hold plea of things done within the county-palatine of Chester and Durham, nor within the five ports and Wales; Ireland is a part of the realm of England, as appears by those statutes, as well as any of them.

This is made good by constant practice in all the Parliament Rolls, from the first to the last; there are Receivers and Tryers of Petitions appointed for Ireland; for the Irish to come so far with their Petitions for justice, and the Parliament not to have cognizance, when from time to time they had in the beginning of the parliament, appointed Receivers and Tryers of them, is a thing not to be presumed.

An Appeal in Ireland, brought by William lord Vesey, against John Fitz-Thomas, for treasonable Words there spoken, before any judgment given in case there, was removed into the Parliament in England, and there the defendant acquitted, as appears in the Parliament Pleas of the 22d Edw. 1.

The Suits for lands, offices, and goods originally begun here are many, and if question grew upon matter in fact, a Jury usually ordered to try it, and the Verdict returned into the Parliament; as in the Case of one Ballyben in the Parliament of the 35th Edw. 1. If a doubt arose upon a matter tryable by Record, a writ went to the officers, in whose custody the Record remained, to certify the record, as was in the Case of Robert Bagott the same parliament of the 35th Ed. 1, where the Writ went to the Treasurer, and barons of the Exchequer.

Sometimes they gave Judgment here in Parliament, and commanded the Judges there in Ireland to do execution, as in the great Case of Partition, between the Copartners of the Earl Marshal in the Parliament of the 33d Ed. 1, where the Writ was awarded to the Treasurer of Ireland.

My lords, The Laws of Ireland were introduced by the Parliament of England, as appears by three acts of the parliament before cited. It is of higher jurisdiction dare leges, than to judge by them. The parliaments of England do bind in Ireland, if Ireland be particularly mentioned, as is resolved in the Book Case of the 1st Hen. 7. Cook's 7th Report Calvin's Case; and by the Judges in the Trinity-term, in the 33d queen Eliz. The statute of the 8th Ed. the 4th, ch. 1, in Ireland, recites, That it was doubted amongst Judges, whether all the English statutes, though not naming Ireland, were in force there? if named, no doubt.

From king Henry the 3d, his time downwards, to the 8th queen Eliz., by which Statute it is made Felony to carry sheep from Ireland beyond seas, in almost all these king's reigns, there be statutes made concerning Ireland. The exercising of the legislative power there, over their lives and estates, is higher than of the judicial in question: Until the 29th Edw. 3, erroneous judgments given in Ireland, were determinable no where but in England: no, not in the parliament of Ireland, as it appears in the close Rolls in the Tower, in the 29th Edw. 3, memb. 12, power to examine and reverse erroneous Judgments in the parliaments of Ireland is granted from hence. Writs of Error lie in the parliament here upon erroneous judgments, after that time, given in the parliaments of Ireland, as appears in the Parliament Rolls, of the 8th Hen. 6, no. 70, in the Case of the Prior of Lenthian. It is true, the Case is not determined there, for it is the last thing that came into the parliament, and could not be determined for want of time, but no exception at all is taken to the jurisdiction.

The acts of parliament made in Ireland, have been confirmed in the parliaments of England, as appears by the close Rolls in the Tower, in the 42d Edw. 3, memb. 20, dors, where the parliament in Ireland, for the preservation of the country from Irish, who had almost destroyed it, made an act, That all the land owners, that were English, should remain upon their lands, or else they were to be forfeited, this was here confirmed.

In the Parliament of the 4th Hen. 5, ch. 6, acts of parliament in Ireland are confirmed, and some privileges of the peers in the parliaments there are regulated.

Power to repeal Irish statutes, power to confirm them, cannot be by the parliament here, if it hath not cognizance of their parliaments.

unless it be said, that the parliament may do it knows not what.

Guernsey and Jersey are under the king's subjection, but are not parcels of the crown of England, but of the duchy of Normandy, they are not governed by the laws of England, as Ireland is, and yet parliaments in England have usually held plea of and determined all Causes concerning Lands or Goods. In the Parliament, in the 33 Edw. 1, there be 'Placita de insula Jersey.' And so in the Parliament, in the 14 Edw. 2, and so for Normandy and Gascoigne, and always as long as any part of France was in subjection to the crown of England, there were at the beginning of the parliaments, Receivers and Tryers of Petitions, for those parts, appointed.—I believe your lordships will have no case shewed of any Plea, to the jurisdiction of the parliaments of England, in any things done in any parts wheresoever in subjection to the crown of England.

The last thing I shall offer to your lordships, is, the Case of 19 Eliz. in my lord Dyer, 306, and judge Crompton's Book, of the jurisdiction of Courts, fol. 23. The opinion of both these Books is, That an Irish peer is not tryable here, it is true, a Scotch or French nobleman is tryable here, as a common person; the law takes notice of their nobility, because those countries are not governed by the laws of England; but Ireland being governed by the same laws, the peers there are tryable according to the law of England only, per pares.—By the same reason, the earl of Strafford, not being a peer of Ireland, is not tryable by the peers of Ireland; so that if he be not tryable here, he is tryable no where.—My lords, In case there be a Treason and a Traitor within the statute, and that he be not tryable here for it, in the ordinary way of judicature, if that jurisdiction fail, this by way of Bill doth not: Attainders of Treason in parliament, are as legal, as usual by act of parliament, as by judgment.

I have now done with the Statutes 25 Edw. 3, and 18 Hen. 6. My lord of Strafford hath offended against both the kingdoms, and is guilty of High Treason by the laws of both.

My Lords, In the Fifth place, I am come to the Treasons at the Common-Law, the endeavouring to subvert the fundamental Laws and Government of the kingdom, and to introduce an Arbitrary and Tyrannical government. In this I shall not at all labour to prove, That the endeavouring by words, counsels and actions, to subvert the laws, is Treason at the common-law, if there be any common-law Treason at all left; nothing is treason, if this be not, to make a kingdom, no kingdom; take the polity and government away, England's but a piece of earth, wherein so many men have their commorancy and abode, without ranks or distinction of men, without property in any thing further than possession; no law to punish the murdering, or robbing one another.

That of 33 Hen. 8, of introducing the Imperial Law, sticks not with your lordships; it was in case of an Appeal to Rome; these Appeals in cases of Marriages, and other causes counted ecclesiastical, had been frequent, had in most king's reigns been tolerated; some in times of Popery put a conscience upon them; the Statutes had limited the penalty to a Præmunire only, neither was that a total subversion, only an appeal from the ecclesiastical court here in a single cause, to the court of Rome; and if treason or not, that case proves not, a treason may be punished as a felony; a felony as a trespass, if his majesty so please; the greater includes the less in the case of Præmunire; in the Irish Reports, that which is there declared to be treason, was proceeded upon only as a Præmunire.

The thing most considerable in this is, Whether the Treasons at common-law, are taken away by the statute of 25 Ed. 3, which is to speak against both the direct words and scope of that Statute. In it there is this Clause, 'That because many other like Cases of Treason might fall out, which are not there declared; therefore it is enacted, That if any such case come before the Judges, they shall not proceed to judgment, till the Case be declared in parliament, whether it ought to be adjudged Treason or not.' These words, and the whole scope of that statute, shews, that it was not the meaning to take away any Treasons that were so before, but only to regulate the jurisdiction and manner of trial. Those that were single and certain acts, as conspiring the king's death, levying war, counterfeiting the money, or great seal, killing a judge; these are left to the ordinary courts of justice: The others not depending upon single Acts, but upon constructions and necessary inferences, they thought it not fit to give the inferior courts so great a latitude here, as too dangerous to the subject, those they restrained to the parliament.—This Statute was the great security of the Subjects, made with such wisdom, as all the succeeding ages have approved it; it hath often passed through the furnace, but like gold, hath left little or nothing.

The Statute of 1 H. 4, c. 10, is in these words, 'Whereas in the parliament held the 21st year of R. 2, divers pains of Treason were ordained, inasmuch that no man did know how to behave himself, to do, say, or speak: It is accorded that in no time to come, any Treason be adjudged otherwise, than it was ordained by the statute of 25th Edw. 3.' It hath been said, To what end is this Statute made, if it takes not away the common-law Treasons remaining after the statute of 25 Ed. 3.?

There be two main things which this statute doth; 1. It takes away for the future all the Treasons, made by any statute since 25 Ed. 3, to 1 H. 4, even to that time; for in respect, that by another act in that parliament, the statute of 21 R. 2, was repealed, it will not be denied, but that this statute repeals more treasons than these of 21 R. 2. It repeals all statute-treasons but those in 25 Edw. 3.—2. It not only takes away the Statute-Treasons, but likewise the declared Treasons in parliament, after 25 Edw. 3, as to the future, after declaration in parliament, the inferior courts might judge these Treasons; for the declaration of a treason in parliament after it was made, was sent to the inferior courts, that toties quoties the like case fell out, they might proceed therein, the subject for the future was secured against these; so that this Statute was of great use.

But by the very words of it, I shall refer all Treasons to the provision of 25 Ed. 3, it leaves that entire, and upon the old bottom. The Statute of 1 Mar. c. 1, saith, That no offences made Treason by any act of parliament, shall thenceforth be taken or adjudged to be treason, but only such as be declared and expressed to be treason by the statute of 25 Edw. 3, 'Concerning Treason, or the Declaration of Treason,' and no others: And further provides, 'That no pains of death, penalties, or forfeiture in any wise shall ensue, for committing any Treason, other than such as be in the statute of 25 Edw. 3, ordained and provided, any act of parliament, or any declaration, or matter to the contrary, in any wise notwithstanding.'

By the first of this Statute, only offences made treason by act of parliament, are taken away, the common-law-treasons are no ways touched, the words 'and no others,' refer still to offences made Treason by act of parliament; they restrain not to the treasons only, particularly mentioned in the statute in 25 Edw. 3, but leave that Statute entire to the Common-Law-Treason, as appears by the words immediately foregoing.

By the Second Part, for the pains and forfeitures of Treasons, if it intend only the punishment of Treason, or if it intend both Treason and Punishment, yet all is referred to the Provision and Ordinance of 25 Edw. 3, any act of parliament, or other declaration, or thing, notwithstanding.

It saith not, other than such Penalties or Treasons, as are expressed and declared in the Statute of 25 Edw. 3, that might perhaps have restrained it to those that are particularly mentioned, no, it refers all Treasons to the general ordination and provision of that statute, wherein the Common-Law-Treasons are expressly kept on foot.

If it be asked, What good this Statute doth, if it take not away the Common-Law-Treasons?—1. It takes away all the Treasons made by act of parliament, not only since 1 Hen. 4, which were many, but all before 1 Hen. 4, even until 25 E. 3, by express words. 2. By express words, it takes away all declared Treasons, if any such had been in parliament; those for the future are likewise taken away; so that whereas it might have been doubted, whether the statute of 1 H. 4, took away any Treasons, but those of the 22nd and 23rd years of H. 2. This clears it, both for Treasons made by parliament, or declared in parliament, even to the time of making the statute.

This is of great use, of great security to the Subject; so that, as to what shall be Treason, and what not, the Statute of 25 Ed. 3, remains entire, and so by consequence the Treasons at the common-law.

Only, my lords, it may be doubted, whether the manner of the parliamentary proceedings, be not altered by the Statute of 1 H. 4, c. 17, and more fully in the Parliament-Roll, n. 144, that is, whether since that statute the parliamentary power of Declaration of Treasons, whereby the inferior courts receive jurisdiction, be not taken away and restrained only to Bill, that so it might operate no further, than to that particular contained in the Bill, that so the Parliamentary Declarations for after-times, should be kept within the parliament itself, and be extended no further: Since 1 H. 4, we have not found any such declarations made, but all Attainders of Treason have been by Bill?

If this be so, yet the Common-Law Treasons still remaining, there is one and the same ground of reason and equity since 1 H. 4, for passing a Bill of Treason, as was before, for declaring of it without bill.—Herein the legislative power is not used against my lord of Strafford in the Bill, it is only the jurisdiction of the parliament.

But, my lords, because that either through my mistaking of the true grounds and reasons of the Commons, or my not pressing them with apt arguments, and precedents of former times; or that perchance your lordships, from some other reasons and authorities, more swaying with your lordships judgments, than these from them, may possibly be of a contrary or dubious opinion, concerning these Treasons, either upon the statutes of 25 E. 3, and 18 H. 6, or at the common-law.

My lords, If all these five should fail, they have therefore given me further in command, to declare to your lordships some of their Reasons, why they conceive that in this case, the mere legislative power may be exercised.

Their Reasons are taken from these three grounds; 1. From the Nature and Quality of the Offence. 2. From the Frame and Constitution of the Parliament, wherein this law is made. 3. From Practices and Usages of former times.

The horridness of the Offence, in endeavouring the overthrowing the laws and present government, hath been fully opened to your lordships heretofore.

The Parliament is the Representation of the whole kingdom; wherein the King as head, your Lordships as the most noble, and the Commons the other members, are knit together into one body politic; this dissolves the arteries and ligaments that hold the body together, the Laws; he that takes away the laws, takes not away the allegiance of one subject alone, but of the whole kingdom.

It was made Treason by the statute of 13 Eliz. for her time, to affirm, that the Laws of the realm do not bind the descent of the crown; no law, no descent at all.

No laws, no peerage; no ranks or degrees of men; the same condition to all.

It is treason to kill a Judge upon the bench; this kills not Judicem, sed Judicium; He that borrowed Apelles, and gave bond to return again Apelles the painter, sent him home, after he had cut off his right hand; his hand was broken; Apelles was sent, but not the painter. There are 12 men, but no law; there is never a Judge amongst them.

It is Felony to embezzle any one of the Judicial Records of the kingdom; this at once sweeps them all away, and from all.

It is Treason to counterfeit a 20s. piece; here is a counterfeiting of the law; we can call neither the counterfeit, nor true coin, our own.

It is Treason to counterfeit the Great-Seal for an acre of land; no property hereby is left to any land at all; nothing Treason now, either against king or kingdom; no law to punish it.

My Lords, If the question were asked at Westminster-hall, Whether this were a crime punishable in Star Chamber or in the King's Bench, by fine, or imprisonment? they would say it went higher: If whether Felony? they would say, that is for an offence only against the life, or goods of some one or few persons? It would, I believe, be answered by the Judges, as it was by the Chief Justice Thurning in 21 R. 2, that though he could not judge the case Treason there before him, yet if he were a peer in parliament he would so adjudge it.—My Lords, if it be too big for those Courts, we hope it is in the right way here.

2. The second consideration is from the Frame and Constitution of the Parliament; the Parliament is the great body politic, it comprehends all, from the king to the beggar; if so, say lords, as the natural, so this body, it hath power over itself, and every one of the members, for the preservation of the whole; It's both the physician and the patient; If the body be dis-temper'd, it hath power to open a vein, to let out the corrupt blood for curing itself; if one member be poisoned or gangrened, it hath power to cut it off for the preservation of the rest.

But, my lords, it hath often been inculcated, that Law makers should imitate the Supreme Law-giver, who commonly warns before he strikes. The law was promulged before the judgment of death for gathering the sticks. No law, no transgression.

My lords, To this rule of law is 'Frustra legis auxilium invocat, qui in legem committit,' from the Lex talionis; he that would not have had others to have a law, Why should he have any himself? Why should not that be done to him, that himself would have done to others?

It is true, we give law to Hares and Deers, because they be beasts of chase; It was never accounted either cruelty or foul play, to knock foxes and wolves on the head, as they can be found, because these be beasts of prey. The warrener sets traps for polecats and other vermin, for preservation of the warren. Further, my lords, most dangerous diseases, if not taken in time, they kill; Errors, in great things, as war and marriage, they allow no time for repentance; it would have been too late to make a law, when there had been no law.

My lords, for further Answer to this Objection, he hath offended against a law, a law within the endeavouring to subvert the laws and polity of the state wherein he lived, which had so long, and with such faithfulness protected his ancestry, himself, and his whole family: It was not malum quia prohibitum, it was malum in se, against the dictates of the dullest conscience, against the light of nature, they not having a law, were a law to themselves. Besides this, he knew a law without, that the Parliament, in cases of this nature, had potestatem vitæ et necis. Nay, he well knew, that he offended the promulged and ordinary rules of law. Crimes against law have been proved, have been confessed, so that the question is not de culpa, sed de pena, What degree of punishment those faults deserve? We must differ from him in opinion, That 20 Felonies cannot make a Treason, if it be meant of equality in the use of the legislative power; for he that deserves death for one of these Felonies alone, deserves a death more painful, and more ignominious for all together.

Every Felony is punished with loss of life, lands, and goods; a Felony may be aggravated with those circumstances, as that the parliament with good reason may add to the circumstances of punishment, as was done in the case of John Hall,* in the parliament of the 1 H. 4, who, for a barbarous murder, committed upon the duke of Gloucester, stifling him between two feather beds at Calais, was adjudged to be hanged, drawn, and quartered.

Batteries by law are only punishable by fine, and single damages to the party wounded. In the Parliament held in 1 H. 4, cap. 6, one Savage committed a battery upon one Chodder, servant to sir John Brooke, a knight of the parliament for Somersetshire. It is there enacted, that he shall pay double damages, and stand convicted, if he render not himself by such a time. The manner of proceedings quickened, and the penalty doubled; the circumstances were considered, it concerned the commonwealth, it was a battery with breach of privilege of parliament.

This made a perpetual act: no warning to the first offender: and in the King's Bench, as appears by the Book Case of 9 H. 4, the first leaf, double damages were recovered.

My lords, in this of the Bill, the offence is high and general, against the king and the commonwealth, against all, and the best of all. If every Felony be loss of life, lands, and goods; What is misuser of the legislative power, by addition of ignominy, in the death and disposal of the lands to the crown, the public patrimony of the kingdom? But it was hoped, that your lordships had no more skill in the art of killing men, than your worthy ancestors. My lords, this Appeal from yourselves to your ancestors we do admit of, although we do not admit of that from your lordships to the peers of Ireland.

He hath appealed to them: your lordships will be pleased to hear, what Judgment they have already given in the case, that is, the several Attainders of Treason in parliament; after the Statute of 25 E. 3, for Treasons not mentioned, nor within that Statute, and those upon the first offenders without warning given.—By the Statute of 25 E. 3, it is Treason to levy war against the king; Gomines and Weston afterwards in parliament, in the 1st R. 2, n. 38, 39, adjudged Traitors for surrendering two several castles in France, only out of fear, without any compliance with the enemy; this not within the statute of 25 E. 3.

My Lords, in the 3rd of Rich. 2, John Imperial that came into England upon Letters of Safe Conduct, as an agent for the state of Genoa, sitting in the evening before his door, in Bread-street, (as the words of the Records are) ‘Paulo ante ignitegium;’ John Kirkby, and another citizen, coming that way, casually Kirkby trod upon his toe, it being twilight, this grew to a quarrel, and the ambassador was slain; Kirkby was indicted of High Treason, the Indictment finds all this, and that it was only done se defendendo, and without malice.

The Judges, it being out of the Statute of 25 E. 3, could not proceed; the Parliament declared it Treason, and Judgment afterwards of High Treason: there is nothing can bring this within the statute of 25 E. 3, but it concerns the honour of the nation, that the public faith should be strictly kept: It might endanger the traffic of the kingdom; they made not a law first, they made the first man an example; this is in the Parliament Roll 3 R. 2, n. 18, and Hilary Term, 3 R. 2, rot. 31, in the King’s-Bench, where Judgment is given against him.

In 11 R. 2, Tresilian, and some others, attainted of Treason for delivering opinions in the subversion of the law, and some others for plotting the like. My lords, the Case hath upon another occasion been opened to your lordships; only this is observable, that in the parliament of the 1st of Hen. 4, where all Treasons are again reduced to the Statute of 25 E. 3, these Attainders were by a particular act confirmed and made good, that the memory thereof might be transmitted to succeeding ages, they stand good unto this day; the offences there as here, were the endeavouring the subversion of the laws.

My Lords, after the 1 H. 4, sir John Mortimer being committed to the Tower, upon suspicion of Treason, brake prison, and made his escape; this no way within any statute, or any former judgment at common-law for this, that is, for breaking the prison only, and no other cause; in the parliament held the 2 Hen. 6, he was attainted of High-Treason by Bill.*

My lords, Poisoning is only murder, yet one Richard Cooke having put poison into a pot of portage in the kitchen of the bishop of Rochester, whereof two persons died, he is attainted of Treason, and it was enacted, that he should be boiled to death by the statute of 22 H. 8, c. 9. By the Statute of the 25 H. 8, Elizabeth Barton the Holy Maid of Kent, for pretending Revelations from God, That God was highly displeased with the king, for being divorced from the lady Catharine, and that in case he persisted in the separation, and should marry another, that he would not continue king not above one month after, because this tended to the depriving of the lawful succession to the crown, she is attainted of Treason.

My lords, all these Attainders, for ought I know, are in force at this day. The statutes of 1 Hen. 4, and 1 queen Mary, although they were willing to make the Statute of 25 E. 3, the rule to the Inferior Courts, yet they left the Attainders in Parliament, precedent to themselves, untoucht, wherein the legislative power had been exercised. There is nothing in them whence it can be gathered, but that they intended to leave it as free for the future.

My lords, In all these Attainders, there were Crimes and Offences against the law; they thought it not unjust (circumstances considered) to heighten and add to the degrees of punishment, and that upon the first offender. My lords, we receive, as just, the other laws and statutes made by these our ancestors, they are the rules we go by in other cases, Why should we differ from them in this alone? These, my lords, are in part those things, which have satisfied the Commons in passing the Bill, it is now left to the judgment and justice of your lordships.

Upon the close of Mr. St. John’s Speech the house adjourned, nor was there one word spoken but by master St. John, only the Lord Lieutenant used the last part of his rhetoric, and by a dumb eloquence, ‘manibus ad sidera tenus,’ often holding up his hands towards Heaven, all along Mr. St. John’s Speech, made his replies with a deep silence.

April 30.

On Friday, the Earl petitioned the Lords to be heard again, alledging, That his lawyers had not fully spoken at their last meeting, but this was denied him, because the House of Commons were to have the last Speech, nor were they content to speak again.

THE KING’S SPEECH to the Commons.

Upon this information, or what else is not known, the King (it seems, fearing the inconsistency of the Lords) came to the house on Saturday, May 1, at ten of the clock, and having called for the House of Commons, spake much to this effect;

‘That he had sincerely, without affection or partiality, endeavoured to inform himself concerning the Lieutenant’s Charge; and had, at length, seriously pondered with himself, both concerning the Matter of Fact, and the Matter of Law: and now it stood him in hand to clear their judgments, than to exonerate his own conscience. For them, he had two things to declare:

First, That there was never such a project, nor had the lord Strafford ever offered such Advice, for the transporting of the Irish Army into England; so that in nothing the Lieutenant had been more misunderstood than in that: which imputation did in no small measure reflect on himself (the King) as if he had intended to make war upon his own Subjects; which thought (he said) was far enough from his breast, nor could any man in probability think so unworthy of him, who had perceived how graciously he had dealt with his subjects elsewhere, that had deserved a great deal worse.

Secondly, That the Lieutenant had never advised him to establish an Arbitrary Government; nor, if he had, should he have escaped condign punishment: nor would any of his good subjects ever think otherwise, unless they conceived him either to be a Fool or a Tyrant; that he either could not, or would not discern such wickedness. He was well content, he said, with that Authority and Power which God had put into his hands; nor should he ever think it his Prerogative, to intrude upon the propriety of the subject.

For himself, and his own conscience, he said, he was now to declare, That, in his own judgment, there was nothing in the Process against the Lieutenant that deserved the censure of Treason. Oversights and Misdemeanors there were, in such a measure, that he confessed the lord Strafford was never worthy hereafter to bear any office in his kingdoms, no, not so much as of a Constable; but was to be answerable for all his errors, when they were to be charged upon him; and to this none of them should concur with greater alacrity than himself. That he hoped none of them would deny to give him the privilege of the first voice, which was, That he would never, in heart nor hand, concur with them to punish this man as a Traitor; and desired therefore, that they would think of some other way how the business might be composed: nor should it ever be less dear to him (though with the loss of his dearest blood) to protect the innocent, than to punish the guilty.*

* "As soon as the earl of Bedford was dead, the lord Say (hoping to receive the reward of the Treasurership) succeeded him in his undertaking, and faithfully promised the king, that he should not be pressed in the matter of the earl of Strafford's life: and under that promise got credit enough, to persuade his majesty to whatsoever he said was necessary to that business. And thereupon, when the Bill was depending with the lords, and when there was little suspicion that it would pass, though the house of commons every day by Messages

May 8.

Upon Saturday, the Bill against the lord Strafford passed the lords; there were 45 present, of which 19 voiced for him, and 26 against him. The greatest part of his friends absented themselves, upon pretence (whether true or supposititious) that they feared the multitude;

endeavoured to quicken them, he perswaded the king 'to go to the house of peers, and according to custom to send for the house of commons, and then to declare himself, That he could not, with the safety of a good conscience, ever give his consent to the Bill that was there depending before them concerning the earl of Strafford, if it should be brought to him, because he was not satisfied in the point of Treason: but he was so fully satisfied that the Earl was unfit ever to serve him more, in any condition of employment, that he would join with them in any act, to make him utterly incapable of ever bearing office, or having any other employment in any of his majesty's dominions; which he hoped would satisfy them.'—This advice, upon the confidence of the giver, the King resolved to follow. But when his resolution was imparted to the Earl, he immediately sent his brother to him, beseeching his majesty 'by no means to take that way, for that he was most assured it would prove very pernicious to him; and therefore desired, he might depend upon the honour and conscience of the peers, without his majesty's interposition.' The king told his brother, 'that he had taken that Resolution by the advice of his best friends; but since he liked it not, he would decline it.' The next morning the lord Say came again to him, and finding his majesty altered in his intention, told him, 'If he took that course he advised him, he was sure it would prevail; but if he declined it, he could not promise his majesty what would be the issue, and should hold himself absolutely disengaged from any undertaking.' The king observing his positiveness, and conceiving his intentions to be very sincere, suffered himself to be guided by him; and went immediately to the house, and said as the other had advised. Whether that lord did in truth believe the discovery of his majesty's conscience in that manner, would produce the effect he foretold; or whether he advised it treacherously, to bring on those inconveniences which afterwards happened, I know not: but many who believed his will to be much worse than his understanding, had the uncharitableness to think, that he intended to betray his master, and to put the ruin of the Earl out of question.—The event proved very fatal; for the king no sooner returned from the house, than the House of Commons, in great passion and fury, declared this last act of his majesty's, to be 'the most unparalleled breach of privilege, that had ever happened; that if his majesty might take notice what bills were passing in either house, and declare his own opinion, it was to forejudge their counsel;

otherwise his suffrages had more than counterpoised the voters for his death.

May 9.

Sunday all the day the king was resolute never to give way to the Bill * against the lord Strafford, telling them withal, That it seemed strange to him that the man could not die, unless he, and he only, by giving Sentence the king's legislative way, should condemn him.

‘and they should not be able to supply the Commonwealth with wholesome laws, suitable to the diseases it laboured under; That this was the greatest obstruction of Justice, that could be imagined; That they and whosoever had taken the late protestation, were bound to maintain the privileges of parliament, which were now too grossly invaded and violated: with many sharp discourses to that purpose.’
Lord Clarendon.

* Lord Clarendon, in his History of the Rebellion, (vol. 1. p. 257, Oxford 8vo ed. 1717) says, “That when the Privy Council pressed the King to pass the Bill of Attainder against the Earl of Strafford, saying, ‘there was no other way to preserve himself and his posterity than by so doing, and therefore that he ought to be more tender of the safety of the kingdom than of any one person how innocent soever:’ his majesty told them, ‘That what had been proposed to him to do, was directly contrary to his conscience, and that being so, he was sure they would not persuade him to it, though themselves were never so well satisfied.’ To that point they desired him ‘to confer with his Bishops, who they doubted not would better inform his conscience.’ The Archbishop of York [Williams] was at hand; who, to his argument of conscience, told him, That ‘there was a Private and a Public conscience; that his public conscience as a king might not only dispense with, but oblige him to do that which was against his private conscience as a man; and that the question was not, Whether he should save the Earl of Strafford, but whether he should perish with him; that the conscience of a king to preserve his kingdom, the conscience of a husband to preserve his wife, the conscience of a father to preserve his children, (all which were now in danger) weighed down abundantly all the considerations the conscience of a master or a friend could suggest to him for the preservation of a friend or servant.’ And by such unprelatical, ignominious arguments, in plain terms advised him ‘even for conscience sake to pass that Act.’ Though this bishop acted his part with more prodigious boldness and impiety, others of the same function (for whose learning and sincerity the king and the world had greater reverence) did not what might have been expected from their calling or their trust, but at least forbore to fortify and confirm a conscience, upon the courage and piety of which, the security of their persons, and their order, did absolutely under-stand depend.”

THE EARL'S LETTER to the KING.

The same day, the King received the following Letter from the Earl :

‘It hath been my greatest grief in all my troubles, to be taken as a person that should endeavour to prevent, and set things amiss between your majesty and your people, and to have given counsel tending to the disquiet of your majesty and your three kingdoms.

‘Most true it is, that such an attempt (my private condition considered) had been a great madness, seeing, through your gracious favour, I was so provided, as I could not expect in any kind to mend my fortune, or to please my mind, more than by resting where your bounteous hand had placed me; nay, the business is most mightily mistaken; for unto your majesty it is well known, that my poor and bumble advices concluded still in this, That your majesty should never be happy, till there were a right understanding procured betwixt you and them: No other means to effect and settle this happiness, but by the counsel and assent of the parliament; and no way to prevent the growing evils of this state, but by putting yourself entirely upon the loyalty and good affection of your subjects.

‘Yet (such is my misfortune) the truth finds little credit, the contrary (it seems) generally believed, and myself reputed the cause of this great separation betwixt you and your people: Under a heavier censure than this, I am persuaded no gentlemen can suffer; and now I understand, that the minds of men are more incensed against me, notwithstanding your majesty hath declared, That in your princely opinion I am not guilty of Treason, nor are you satisfied in conscience to pass the Bill. This brings me into a great strait. Here is before me the ruin of my children and family, hitherto untouched in all the branches of it with any foul crime. Here are before me the many evils which may befall your sacred person, and the whole kingdom, should yourself and the parliament be less satisfied the one with the other than is necessary for the king and people. Here are before me the things most valued, most feared by mortal men, life and death: To say, Sir, there hath not been a conflict within me about these things, were to make myself less man than (God knows) my infirmities will give me leave; and to call a destruction upon myself and my young children, where the intentions (at least) of my heart have been innocent of this great offence, (may be believed) would find no easy consent from flesh and blood.

‘But, out of much sadness, I am come to a resolution of that which I take to be best becoming me, that is, To look upon that which is principally to be considered in itself, and that is, doubtless, the prosperity of your sacred Person and the Commonwealth, infinitely to be preferred before any man's private interest: And therefore, in few words, as I have put myself wholly upon the honour and justice of

• my peers, and so clearly as I wish your ma• jesty had been pleased to have spared that • Declaration of yours on Saturday last, and to
 • have left me intirely to their lordships; so
 • now, (to set your majesty's conscience at • liberty) I do most humbly beseech you, for
 • the preventing of such mischiefs as may hap• pen by your Refusal to pass the Bill, by this • means to remove (praised be God I cannot • say this accursed, but I confess) this unfor• tunate thing forth of the way towards that • blessed agreement, which God, I trust, shall
 • for ever establish betwixt you and your sub• jects. Sir, my consent herein shall acquit you
 • more to God than all the world can do be-
 • side. To a willing man there is no injury
 • done; and, as by God's grace, I forgive all the • world, with a calmness and meekness of infi-
 • nite contentment to my dislodging soul, so,
 • sir, I can give the life of this world with all
 • cheerfulness imaginable, in the just acknow-
 • ledgments of your exceeding favours, and only
 • beg, that in your goodness you would vouch-
 • safe to cast your gracious regard upon my poor
 • son and his three sisters, less or more, and no
 • otherwise, than their unfortunate father shall • appear more or less guilty of this death. God
 • preserve your majesty, Your majesty's most
 • humble, and faithful subject and servant.

Tower, May 9, 1641. 'STRAFFORD.*

* Hume, in a Note to the 6th volume of his History, says: "Mr. Carte, in his Life of the Duke of Ormond, has given us some Evidence to prove, that this Letter was entirely a forgery of the popular leaders, in order to induce the king to sacrifice Strafford. He tells us, that Strafford said so to his son, the night before his execution. But there are some reasons why I adhere to the common way of telling this story: 1. The account of the forgery comes through several hands, and from men of characters not fully known to the public: a circumstance which weakens every evidence. It is a hearsay of a hearsay. 2. It seems impossible, but young lord Strafford must inform the king, who would not have failed to trace the forgery, and expose his enemies to their merited infamy. 3. It is not to be conceived but Clarendon and Whitlock, not to mention others, must have heard of the matter. 4. Sir George Ratcliffe, in his Life of Strafford, tells the story the same way that Clarendon and Whitlock do. Would he also, who was Strafford's intimate friend, never have heard of the forgery? It is remarkable, that this Life is dedicated or addressed to young Strafford, would not he have put sir George right in so material and interesting a fact?"—That this Letter was a forgery is also stated, and inferred from arguments, in Carte's History, but there no authority is given for the assertion that lord Strafford told his son he had not written such a letter. When told by secretary Carleton, that the king had signed the commission for passing the Bill of Attainder, Strafford rose from his chair with marks of astonishment and horror, and raising

Upon the receipt whereof, and after they had wrestled him breathless, at last victus dedit manus; being overcome with such incessant importunities, he yielded. And about nine of the clock at night the King promised to sign both the Bills the next morning; which was accordingly done, and a Commission drawn up for his Execution.

The EARL'S PETITION to the PEERS.

The Earl of Strafford understanding that his majesty had passed the Bill, did humbly petition the house of peers: viz.

' Seeing it is the good will and pleasure of ' God, that your Petitioner is now shortly to ' pay that duty which we all owe to our frail
 ' nature; he shall in all Christian patience ' and charity, conform and submit himself to ' your justice, in a comfortable assurance of ' the great hope laid up for us, in the mercy
 ' and merits of our Saviour-blessed for ever.—
 ' Only he humbly craves to return your lord-
 ' ships most humble thanks for your noble
 ' compassion towards those innocent children, ' whom now with his last blessing, he must ' commit to the protection of Almighty God,
 ' beseeching your lordships to finish his pious ' intentions towards them, and desiring that the ' reward thereof may be fulfilled in you, by ' Him that is able to give above all we are able ' to ask or think; Wherein I trust the honour' able House of Commons will afford their ' Christian assistance.—And so beseeching
 ' your lordships charitably to forgive all his ' omissions and infirmities, he doth very heart' ily and truly recommend your lordships to ' the mercies of our heavenly Father, and that ' for his goodness he may perfect you in every ' good work, Amen. THO. WENTWORTH.'

THE BILL OF ATTAINDER.

' Whereas the knights, citizens, and bur' gesses of the House of Commons in this pre' sent parliament assembled, have in the name
 ' of themselves, and of all the commons of Eng' land, impeached Thomas earl of Strafford of ' High-Treason, for endeavouring to subvert
 ' the antient and fundamental laws and govern' ment of his majesty's realms of England and ' Ireland, and to introduce an arbitrary and ty' rannical government against law in the said
 ' kingdoms, and for exercising a tyrannous and ' exorbitant power over, and against the laws ' of the said kingdoms, and the liberties, es' tates, and lives of his majesty's subjects; and
 ' likewise having by his own authority com' manded the laying and assessing of soldiers
 ' upon his majesty's subjects in Ireland, against ' their consents, to compel them to obey his ' unlawful summons and orders made upon pa' per-petitions in causes between party and ' party, which accordingly was executed upon ' divers of his majesty's subjects in a warlike his eyes to Heaven exclaimed, "Put not your trust in princes, nor in the sons of men, for in them there is no salvation."

‘manner, within the said realm of Ireland; and ‘in so doing, did levy war against the king’s ‘majesty and his liege people in that kingdom;
 ‘And also for that he, upon the unhappy dis‘solution of the last parliament, did slander
 ‘the house of commons to his majesty, and did ‘counsel and advise his majesty, ‘That he was ‘loose and absolved from the rule of govern‘ment, and that he had an army in Ireland,
 ‘by which he might reduce this kingdom;’
 ‘for which he deserves to undergo the pains
 ‘and forfeitures of High-Treason.

‘And the said Earl hath been an incendiary
 ‘of the wars between the two kingdoms of ‘England and Scotland; all which offences
 ‘have been sufficiently proved against the said
 ‘Earl upon his impeachment.

‘Be it therefore enacted by the king’s most ‘excellent majesty, and by the lords and com‘mons in this present parliament assembled,
 ‘and by the authority of the same, that the ‘said Earl of Strafford, for the heinous crimes
 ‘and offences aforesaid, stand, and be adjudg‘ed and attainted of High-Treason, and shall ‘suffer such pain of death, and incur the forfei-‘tures of his goods and chattels, lands, tene‘ments and hereditaments of any estate of ‘freehold, or inheritance in the said kingdoms
 ‘of England and Ireland, which the said Earl,
 ‘or any other to his use, or in trust for him,
 ‘have or had the day of the first sitting of this ‘parliament, or at any time since.

‘Provided*, that no judge or judges, justice,
 ‘or justices whatsoever, shall adjudge or inter‘pret any act or thing to be Treason, nor hear ‘or determine any treason in any other man‘ner than he or they should, or ought to have ‘done before the making of this act, and as if ‘this act had never been had or made; Saving ‘always unto all and singular persons, bodies
 ‘politic and corporate, their heirs and succes‘sors, others than the said Earl and his heirs,
 ‘and such as claim from, by, or under him all ‘such right title and interest of, in, and to all

* “This Proviso,” says Rushworth, “hath occasioned the common discourse and opinion that this judgment against the Earl was enacted never to be drawn into precedent.” Mrs. Macaulay remarks, “This Clause, which relates to Judges in inferior courts, is consistent with all the Arguments urged by the Commons for the legality of their proceedings against Strafford. The statute of 1 Hen. 4, c. 17, being, as they asserted, to take away the parliamentary power of declaration of treasons, whereby the inferior courts receive jurisdiction, and restrain it to Bill, that it might operate no farther than to the particulars contained in the Bill. This clause of the Commons in the Bill of Attainder against Strafford, shews a very laudable attention to the preservation of Public Liberty, yet it has been represented by monarchical writers, that the Bill of Attainder was of so extraordinary a nature, that the legislators themselves were obliged to insert a Clause, that it should never be drawn into precedent.”

‘and singular such of the said lands, tenements ‘and hereditaments, as he, they, or any of ‘them had before the first day of this present ‘parliament, any thing herein contained to the ‘contrary notwithstanding.

‘Provided, That the passing of this present ‘Act, or his majesty’s assent thereunto, shall ‘not be any determination of this present ses‘sions of parliament; But that this present
 ‘sessions of parliament, and all bills and mat‘ters whatsoever depending in parliament, and ‘not fully enacted or determined, and all sta‘tutes and acts of parliament, which have ‘their continuance until the end of this pre‘sent session of parliament, shall remain, con‘tinue, and be in full force as if this act had ‘not been.’

THE KING’S LETTER on behalf of the EARL OF STRAFFORD.

The day following, the King wrote this Letter to the Lords on the behalf of the Earl of Strafford, and sent it by the Prince*.

‘My Lords; I did yesterday satisfy the jus‘tice of the kingdom, by passing the Bill of At‘tainer against the Earl of Strafford; but ‘mercy being as inherent and inseparable to a ‘king as justice, I desire at this time in some ‘measure to shew that likewise, by suffering ‘that unfortunate man to fulfil the natural ‘course of his life in a close imprisonment;

The EARL'S EXECUTION.

On Wednesday, May 12th, the Earl having mounted the Scaffold*, he made his obeisances, and began to take his last farewell of his friends, who appeared much more concerned than himself: and observing his brother, sir George Wentworth, to weep excessively, 'Brother,' said he, with a cheerful briskness, 'What do you see in me to deserve these tears? Dosth any indecent fear betray in me a guilt, or my innocent boldness any atheism? Think now that you are accompanying me the third time to my marriage-bed: Never did I throw off my clothes with greater freedom and content than in this preparation to my grave: That stock (pointing to the block) must be my pillow; here shall I rest from all my labours: No thoughts of envy, no dreams of treason, jealousies or cares for the king, the state, or myself, shall interrupt this easy sleep; therefore, brother, with me, pity those who, besides their intention, have made me happy; rejoice in my happiness, rejoice in my innocence.'

Then kneeling down, he made this Protestation: 'I hope, Gentlemen, you do not think that either the fear of loss, or love of reputation, will suffer me to bely God and my own conscience at this time. I am now in the very door going out, and my next step must be from time to eternity, either of peace or pain: To clear myself before you all, I do here solemnly call God to witness, I am Not Guilty, so far as I can understand, of the great Crime laid to my charge, nor have ever had the least inclination or intention to damnify or prejudice the King, the State, the Laws, or the Religion of this Kingdom; but with my best endeavours to serve all, and to support all; So may God be merciful to my soul!'

Then rising up, he said, he desired to speak something to the People, but was afraid he should be heard by few, in regard of the noise: but having first fitted himself to the block, and rising, again he thus addressed himself to the spectators.

'My Lord Primate of Ireland, and my lords, and the rest of these noble gentlemen; It is a great comfort to me to have your lordships by me this day, because I have been known to you a long time, and I now desire to be heard a few words. I come here, by the good will and pleasure of Almighty God, to pay that last debt I owe to sin, which is Death; and by the blessing of that God, to rise again through the merits of Jesus Christ to righteousness, and life eternal.' [Here he was a little interrupted.]

'My lords, I am come hither to submit to that Judgment which hath passed against me; I do it with a very quiet and contented mind; I thank God I do freely forgive all the world; a forgiveness that is not spoken from the teeth outward, (as they say) but from the very heart: I speak it in the presence of Almighty God, before whom I stand, that there is not a displeasing thought arising in me towards any man living. I thank God I can say it, and truly, too, my conscience bearing me witness, that in all my employments, since I had the honour to serve his majesty, I never had any thing in the purpose of my heart, but what tended to the joint and individual prosperity of king and people, although it hath been my ill fortune to be misconstrued.

'I am not the first that hath suffered in this kind; it is the common portion of us all, while we are in this life, to err; righteous judgment we must wait for in another place, for here we are very subject to be misjudged one of another. There is one thing that I desire to free myself of, and I am very confident (speaking it now with much cheerfulness) that I shall obtain your Christian charity in the belief of it. I was so far from being against Parliaments, that I did always think the Parliaments of England were the most happy constitutions that any kingdom or nation lived under, and the best means, under God, to make the king and people happy.

'For my death I here acquit all the world, and beseech the God of heaven heartily to forgive them that contrived it, though in the intentions and purposes of my heart I am Not Guilty of what I die for: And, my Lord Primate, it is a great comfort for me, that his majesty conceives me not meriting so severe and heavy a punishment, as is the utmost execution of this Sentence. I do infinitely rejoice in this mercy of his, and I beseech God to return it into his own bosom, that he may find mercy when he stands most in need of it.
'I wish this kingdom all the prosperity and

* "On Wednesday, May 12th," says Kennett, "the Earl was brought to the Scaffold upon Tower-hill; as he passed near the lodgings of the Archbishop of Canterbury (whom he had desired by a message to be at the window and to bless him as he went to execution) he looked up, and bowing said, 'My lord, your prayers and your blessing.' The Archbishop lift up his hands for the sign of bestowing both, but was so overcome with grief that he fell back in a swoon; the Earl bowed again, and said, 'Farewel, my lord, God protect your innocency.' Many of the spectators observed, that he walked more like a general, at the head of an army, than like a condemned man. The Lieutenant desired him to take coach, for fear the people should rush in upon him and tear him in pieces: 'No,' said he, 'Master Lieutenant, I dare look death in the face, and I hope the people too. Have you a care that I do not escape, and I care not how I die, whether by the hand of the executioner, or the madness and fury of the people, if that may give them better content; it is all one to me.'"

‘happiness in the world; I did it living, and now dying, it is my wish. I do most humbly recommend this to every one who hears me, and desire they would lay their hands upon their hearts, and consider seriously, whether the beginning of the happiness and reformation of a kingdom should be written in letters of blood; consider this when you are at your homes, and let me be never so unhappy, as that the least drop of my blood should rise up in judgment against any one of you: but I fear you are in a wrong way.

‘My Lords, I have but one word more, and with that I shall end. I profess that I die a true and obedient son to the Church of England, wherein I was born, and in which I was bred. Peace and prosperity be ever to it.

‘It hath been objected, if it were an objection worth the answering, That I have been inclining to Popery; but I say truly from my heart, that from the time that I was 21 years of age, to this present, going now upon 49, I never had in my heart to doubt of this Religion of the Church of England, nor ever had any man the boldness to suggest any such thing to me, to the best of my remembrance. And so being reconciled by the merits of Jesus Christ my Saviour, into whose bosom I hope I shall shortly be gathered, to those eternal happinesses which shall never have end; I desire heartily the forgiveness of every man for any rash or unadvised words, or any thing done amiss. And so, my Lords and Gentlemen, farewell; farewell all things of this world.

‘I desire that you would be silent, and join with me in prayer, and I trust in God we shall all meet and live eternally in Heaven, there to receive the accomplishment of all happiness; where every tear shall be wiped away from our eyes, and every sad thought from our hearts: And so God bless this kingdom, and Jesus have mercy on my soul!

Then turning himself about, he saluted all the noblemen, and took a solemn leave of all considerable persons upon the scaffold, giving them his hand.

After that, he said, ‘Gentlemen, I would say my Prayers, and intreat you all to pray with me, and for me;’ then his Chaplain laid the Book of Common-Prayer upon the chair before him as he kneeled down, on which he prayed almost a quarter of an hour, and then as long, or longer, without the Book, and concluded, with the Lord’s-Prayer.

Standing up, he spies his brother, sir George Wentworth, and calls him to him, saying, ‘Brother, we must part; remember me to my sister, and to my wife, and carry my blessing to my son, and charge him that he fear God, and continue an obedient son to the Church of England, and warn him that he bear no private grudge, or revenge, toward any man concerning me; and bid him beware that he meddle not with church-livings, for that will prove a moth and canker to him in his estate; and wish him to content himself to be a ser‘vant to his country, not aiming at higher preferments.

‘Aliter.] To his son, Mr. Wentworth, he commends himself, and gives him charge to serve his God, to submit to his king with all faith and allegiance in things temporal, to all church in things spiritual; chargeth him again and again, as he will answer it to him in heaven, never to meddle with the patrimony of the church; for if he did, it would be a canker to eat up the rest of his e-tate.’

‘Carry my blessings also to my daughters, Anne and Arabella, charge them to serve and fear God, and he will bless them; not forgetting my little infant, who yet knows neither good nor evil, and cannot speak for itself; God speak for it and bless it.’ ‘Now,’ said he, ‘I have nigh done; one stroke will make my wife husbandless, my dear children fatherless, and my poor servants masterless, and will separate me from my dear brother, and all my friends; but let God be to you and them all in all.’

After this, going to take off his doublet, and to make himself ready, he said, ‘I thank God I am not afraid of death, nor daunted with any discouragement rising from any fears, but do as cheerfully put off my doublet at this time, as ever I did when I went to bed.’ Then he put off his doublet, wound up his hair with his hands, and put on a white cap.

Then he called, ‘Where is the man that is to do this last office?’ (meaning the Executioner) ‘call him to me;’ When he came and asked him forgiveness, he told him, he forgave him and all the world. Then kneeling down by the block, he went to prayer again himself, the Primate of Ireland kneeling on the one side, and the Minister on the other: to the which Minister, after prayer, he turned himself, and spake some few words softly, having his hands lifted up, and closed with the Minister’s hands.

Then bowing himself to lay his head upon the block, he told the Executioner, ‘That he would first lay down his head to try the fitness of the block, and take it up again before he would lay it down for good and all;’ and so he did: and before he laid it down again, he told the Executioner, that he would give him warning when to strike by stretching forth his hands, and presently laying down his neck upon the block, and stretching forth his hands, the Executioner struck off his head at one blow; and taking it up in his hand, shewed it to all the people, and said, ‘God save the king.’*

* “And so fell this noble Earl, who if his Master could have saved him, might have been able to save his Master: This was indeed the blow that by degrees reached up to the king’s own head. Take his character thus given by the lord Clarendon. ‘Thus fell the greatest subject in power, and little inferior to any in fortune, that was at that time in any of the three kingdoms; who could well remember the time when he led those people who then pursued him to his grave. He was a man of

His body was afterwards embalmed, and appointed to be carried into Yorkshire, there to be buried amongst his ancestors.

AN ACT for REVERSING the Earl of STRAFFORD's ATTAINDER.*

'Whereas Thomas late Earl of Strafford was impeached of High Treason, upon pretence of endeavouring to subvert the fundamental laws, and called to a public and solemn Arraignment and Trial before the peers in parliament, where he made a particular Defence to every Article objected against him; insomuch that the turbulent party then seeing no hopes to effect their unjust designs, by any ordinary way and method of proceedings, did at last resolve to attempt the Destruction and Attainder of the said Earl, by an Act of Parliament, to be therefore purposely made, to condemn him upon Accumulative Treason, none of the pretended Crimes being Treason apart, and so could not be in the whole, if they had been proved, as they were not: and also judged him guilty of Constructive Treason, (that is, of levying war against the king) though it was only the commanding an Order of the Council

'great parts, and extraordinary endowments of nature, not unadorned with some addition of art and learning.'" Kennett.

The following are the amiable and sound reflections of Mr. Fox on this transaction: "The prosecution of lord Strafford, or rather the manner in which it was carried on, is less justifiable" (than the regulations proposed by the Parliament in regard to the Militia). "He was doubtless a great delinquent, and well deserved the severest punishment; but nothing short of a clearly proved case of self-defence can justify, or even excuse, a departure from the sacred rules of criminal justice. For it can rarely indeed happen, that the mischief to be apprehended from suffering any criminal, however guilty, to escape, can be equal to that resulting from the violation of those rules to which the innocent owe the security of all that is dear to them. If such cases have existed, they must have been in instances where trial has been wholly out of the question, as in that of Cæsar, and other tyrants; but when a man is once in a situation to be tried, and his person in the power of his accusers and his judges, he can no longer be formidable in that degree which alone can justify (if any thing can) the violation of the substantial rules of criminal proceedings." Introductory Chapter to the History of the early part of the reign of James the 2d. 4to ed. p. 10.

One of the most candid representations which have been exhibited of the Character of lord Strafford, proceeds from the pen of Mrs. Hutchinson, who thus expresses herself in her Memoirs of the Life of Colonel Hutchinson: "There were two above all the rest, who led the van of the King's Evil Counsellors, and these were Laud, archbishop of Canterbury, and fellow of mean extraction and arrogant pride,

'Board in Ireland, to be executed by a Serjeant at Arms and three or four soldiers, which was the constant practice of the deputies there for a long time. To the which end, they having first presented a Bill for this intent to the House of Commons, and finding there more opposition than they expected, they caused a multitude of tumultuous persons to come down to Westminster, armed with swords and staves, and to fill both the Palace Yards, and all the approaches to both houses of parliament, with fury and clamour, and to require 'Justice, 'speedy Justice,' against the Earl of Strafford; and having by those and other undue practices obtained that Bill to pass the House of Commons, they caused the Names of those resolute gentlemen, who in a case of innocent blood had freely discharged their consciences, being 59, to be posted up in several places about the cities of London and Westminster, and stiled them "Straffordians," and Enemies to their Country; hoping thereby to deliver them up to the fury of the people, whom they had endeavoured to incense against them. And then procured the said Bill to be sent up to the house of peers, where it having some and the earl of Strafford, who as much outstripped all the rest in favour, as he did in abilities, being a man of deep policy, stern resolution, and ambitious zeal to keep up the glory of his own greatness. In the beginning of this king's reign, this man had been a strong assertor of the Liberties of the People, among whom he had gained himself an honourable reputation, and was dreadful to the Court Party, who thereupon strewed snares in his way, and when they found a breach at his ambition, his soul was that way entered and captivated. He was advanced first to be Lord President of the Council in the North, to be a Baron, after, an Earl, then Deputy of Ireland, the nearest to a favourite of any man since the death of the duke of Buckingham, who was raised by his first master, and kept up by the second, upon no account of personal worth, or any deserving abilities in him, but only upon violent and private inclinations of the princes. But the earl of Strafford wanted not any accomplishment, that could be desired in the most serviceable minister of state. Besides, he having made himself odious to the people, by his revolt from their interest, to that of the oppressive court, he was now obliged to keep up his own interest with his new party, by all the malicious practices that pride and revenge could inspire him with." P. 60, 69, Mem. of Col. Hutchinson, by his Widow.

How different this from the arrogant, undigested, and scarcely human scurrility of Mrs. Macaulay, who, after telling us in the text of her diatribe against Strafford, that 'the badness of his heart had corrupted his judgment,' suggests in a note, that it was rather the badness of his judgment which had corrupted his heart!

* See Luders's "Observations on the Law of High Treason." 99, 100.

time rested under greater deliberation; at last, in a time when a great part of the peers were absent by reason of the tumults, and many of those who were present protested against it, the said Bill passed the house of peers: and at length his majesty, the late king Charles I, of glorious memory, granted a Commission for giving his royal assent thereunto; which nevertheless was done by his said majesty with exceeding great sorrow then, and ever remembered by him with unexpressible grief of heart; and out of his majesty's great piety, he did publicly express it, when his own sacred life was taken away, by the most detestable traitors that ever were.

For all which Causes, be it declared and enacted by the king's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons in this present parliament assembled, That the Act, intituled, 'An Act for the Attainder of Thomas Earl of Strafford, of High Treason,' and all and every Clause and Article, and thing therein contained, being obtained as aforesaid, is now hereby repealed, revoked, and reversed.

And to the end that right be done to the memory of the deceased Earl of Strafford aforesaid, be it further enacted, That all records and proceedings of parliament, relating to the said Attainder, be wholly cancelled and taken off the file, or otherwise defaced and obliterated; to the intent the same may not be visible in after-ages, or brought into example, to the prejudice of any person whatsoever.

Provided, That this Act shall not extend to the future questioning of any person or persons, however concerned in this business; or who had any hand in the tumults, or disorderly procuring the act aforesaid; any thing herein contained to the contrary thereof notwithstanding.

The following Speeches,* said to be made by the Earl of Strafford, are taken from the Sommers' Collection of Tracts.

The SPEECH of THOMAS WENTWORTH, late Earl of STRAFFORD, and Deputy of Ireland, in the Tower, to the Lords before he went to Execution, Sommers' Tracts, 2 Coll. vol. 2, p. 4.

"Right honourable, and the rest, you are now come to convey me to my death, I am willing to die, which is a thing no more than all our predecessors have done, and a debt that our posterity must in their due time discharge, which since it can be no way avoided, it ought the less to be feared; for that which is common to all, ought not to be intolerable to any: it is the law of nature, the tribute of the flesh, a remedy from all worldly cares and troubles; and to the truly penitent, a perfect path to blessedness. And there is but one death, though several ways unto it: mine is not natural, but enforced by the law and justice: it hath been said that the laws vex only the meaner sort of people, but the mighty are able to withstand them: it is not so with me, for to the law I submit myself, and confess that I receive nothing but justice: for he that politically intendeth good to a common weal, may be called a just man, but he that practiseth either for his own profit, or any other sinister ends, may be well termed a delinquent person; neither is delay in punishment any privilege for pardon. And moreover, I ingenuously confess with Cicero, That the death of the bad is the safety of the good that be alive.

"Let no man trust either in the favour of his prince, the friendship and consanguinity of his peers, much less in his own wisdom and knowledge, of which I ingenuously confess I have been too confident; kings, as they are men before God, so they are Gods before men, and

* "There are two Speeches," says Mrs. Maccaulay, "in Sommers's Collection of Tracts, pretended to have been composed by Strafford, one spoken to some Lords who attended him in the Tower immediately before his Execution, the other intended to be spoken at his Death. They are full of contrition for his past conduct, and the style so different from the account generally given of his behaviour, from his professions, from his advice to his family, and from his character, and the strong prejudices he had imbibed in the latter part of his life, that there is great reason to suspect their authenticity."

I may say with a great man once in this kingdom, 'Had I strived to obey my God as faithfully, as I sought to honour my king diligently, 'I had stood and not fallen.' Most happy and fortunate is that prince, who is as much for his justice feared, as for his goodness beloved: for the greater that princes are in power above other, the more they ought in virtue to excel other; and such is the royal sovereign whom I late served.

"For my peers, the correspondence that I had with them during my prosperity, was to me very delightful and pleasing, and here they have commiserated my ruin, I have plentifully found, who (for the most generous of them) I may boldly say, though they have detested the fact, yet they have pitied the person delinquent; the first in their loyalty, the last in their charity: ingeniously confessing, that never any subject, or peer of my rank, had ever that help of counsel, that benefit of time, or a more free and legal trial than I have had: in the like whereof, none of my predecessors hath had so much favour from his prince, so much sufferance from the people; in which I comprehend the understanding commons, not the many-headed monster, multitude; but I have offended, am sentenced, and must now suffer.

"And for my too much confidence in my supposed wisdom and knowledge, therein have been the most deceived: for he is wise to himself, that knows by others faults to correct his own offences: to be truly wise is to be secretaries to ourselves; for it is mere folly to reveal our intimate thoughts to strangers: wisdom is the most precious gem with which the mind can be adorned, and learning the most famous thing for which a man ought to be esteemed, and true wisdom teacheth us to do well, as to speak well: in the first I have failed, for 'the wisdom of man is foolishness with God.'

"For knowledge, it is a thing indifferent both to good and evil, but the best knowledge is for a man to know himself; he that doth so shall esteem of himself but little, for he considereth from whence he came, and whereto he must go, he regardeth not the vain pleasures of this life, he exalteth God, and strives to live in his fear; but he that knoweth not himself, is wilful in his own ways, unprofitable in his life, unfortunate in his death, and so an I. But the reason why I sought to attain unto it, was this: I have read that he that knoweth not that which he ought to know, is a brute beast amongst men; he that knoweth more than he ought to know, is a man amongst beasts: but he that knoweth all that may be known, is a God amongst men. To this I much aspired, in this I much failed; 'Vanity of vanities; all is but vanity.'

"I have heard the people clamour and cry out, saying, that through my occasion the times are bad, I wish that when I am dead they may prove better: most true it is, that there is at this time a great storm impending (God in his mercy avert it.) And since it is my particular lot, like Jonah, to be cast into the sea, I shall think my life well spent, to appease God's wrath, and satisfy the people's malice.

"O what is eloquence more than air? fashioned with an articulate and distinct sound, when it is a special virtue to speak little and well, and silence is oft the best oratory; for fools in their dumbness may be accounted wise: it hath power to make a good matter seem bad, and a bad cause appear good: but mine was to me unprofitable, and like the cypress trees, which are great and tall, but altogether without fruit.

"What is honour? but the first step to disquietness, and power is still waited on by envy, neither hath it any privilege against infamy. It is held to be the chief part of honour, for a man to join to his office and calling, courtesy and affability, commiseration and pity: for thereby he draweth to him with a kind of compulsion, the hearts of the multitude. But that was the least part of my study, which now makes me call to mind, that the greater the persons are in authority, the sooner they are caught in any delinquency, and their smallest crimes are thought to be capital, the smallest spot seems great in the finest linnen, and the least flaw is soonest found in the richest diamond. But high and noble spirits finding themselves wounded, grieve not so much at their own pain and perplexity, as at the derision and scoffs of their enemy: but for mine own part, though I might have many in my life, I hope to find none in my death.

"Amongst other things which pollute and contaminate the minds of great spirits, there is none more heinous than ambition, which is seldom unaccompanied with avarice: such to possess their ends, care not to violate the laws of religion, and reason, and to break the bonds of modesty and equity, with the nearest ties of consanguinity, and amity; of which as I have been guilty, so I crave at God's hands forgiveness. It is a maxim in philosophy, that ambitious men can be never good counsellors to princes; the desire of having more is common to great lords, and a desire of rule a great cause of their ruin.

"My lords, I am now the hopeless precedent, may I be to you all an happy example: for ambition devourereth gold, and drinketh blood, and climbeth so high by other mens heads, that at the length in the fall it breaketh its own neck: therefore it is better to live in humble content, than in high care and trouble: for more precious is want with honesty, than wealth with infamy: for what are we but mere vapours, which in a serene element ascend high, and upon an instant, like smoke, vanish into nothing: or like ships without pilots, tost up and down upon the seas by contrary winds and tempests. But the good husbandman thinks better of those ears of corn, which how down, and grow crooked, than those which are straight and upright, because he is assured to find more store of grain in the one than in the other. This all men know, yet of this, how few make use: the defect whereof must be now my pain: may my suffering prove to others profit.

“ For what hath now the favour of my prince, the familiarity with my peers, the volubility of a tongue, the strength of my memory, my learning, or knowledge, my honours, or offices, my power, and potency, my riches, and treasure, (all these the special gifts, both of nature, and fortune) what have all these profited me? Blessings I acknowledge, though by God bestowed upon man, yet not all of them together upon many: yet by the divine providence, the most of them met in me: of which had I made happy use I might still have flourished, who now am forced immaturely to fall.

“ I now could wish (but that utinam is too late) that God with his outward goodness towards me had so commixed his inward grace, that I had chused the medium path, neither inclining to the right hand, nor deviating to the left; but like Icarus with my waxen wings, fearing by too low a flight to moisten them with the waves: I soared too high, and too near the sun, by which they being melted, I aiming at the highest, am precipitated to the lowest: and am made a wretched prey to the waters: but I who before built my house upon the sand, have now settled my hopes upon the rock my Saviour: by whose only merits my sole trust is, that whatsoever becomes of my body, yet in this bosom my soul may be sanctuaried.

“ Nimrod would have built a tower to reach up to Heaven, and called it Babel; but God turned it to the confusion of languages, and dissipation of the people. Pharaoh kept the children of Israel in bondage, and after having freed them, in his great pride would have made them his prey; but God gave them a dry and miraculous passage, and Pharaoh and his host a watry sepulchre. Belshazzar feasted his princes and prostitutes, who drunk healths in the vessels taken from the Temple, but the hand of God writ upon the wall, Mene. Tekel. Phoras, and that night before morning was both his kingdom and life taken from him: thus God lets men go on a great while in their own devices, but in the end it proves their own ruin and destruction, never suffering them to effect their desired purposes: therefore let none presume upon his power, glory in his greatness, or be too confident in his riches: these things were written for our instruction, of which the living may make use, the dying cannot; but wit and unfruitful wisdom are the next neighbours to folly.

“ There can be no greater vanity in the world, than to esteem the world, which regardeth no man; and to make slight account of God, who greatly respecteth all men; and there can be no greater folly in man, than by much travail to increase his goods, and pamper his body, and in the interim with vain delights and pleasures, to lose his soul. It is a great folly in any man to attempt a bad beginning, in hope of good ending; and to make that proper to one, which was before common to all, is mere indiscretion, and the beginning of discord, which I positively wish may end in this my punishment.

“ O how small a proportion of earth will contain my body, when my high mind could not be confined within the spacious compass of two kingdoms? But my hour draweth on, and I conclude with the Psalmist, not aiming at any one man in particular, but speaking for all in general: ‘How long will ye Judges be corrupted? how long will you cease to give true judgment? &c. Blessed is the man that doth not walk in the council of the wicked, nor stand in the way of sinners, nor sit in the seat of the scornful, therefore they shall not stand in the Judgment, nor sinners in the assembly of the righteous, &c.’”

THE SPEECH of Thomas Earl of Strafford, intended to be spoken on the Scaffold the day he was beheaded; (May 12, 1641) but being interrupted, he delivered it to his brother, Sir George Wentworth, from whose original Copy, under the Earl's own hand, this is word for word transcribed. [Sommers' Tracts, 1 Coll. vol. 4. p. 449.]

“ People of my native country (I wish my own or your charity, had made me fit to call you friends);

“ It should appear by your concourse and gazing aspects, that I am now the only prodigious meteor, towards which you direct your wondering eyes. Meteors are the infallible antecedents of tragical events, and do commonly level their malevolent operation upon some remarkable person. At this present time, I am become my own prodigy, and the crossed influence will appear in my (too sudden) execution: And this fear is only left me, The consequence will produce a greater effusion than mine. I would to God, my blood would cure your sad hearts of all their grievances (though every drop thereof were a soul on which a life depended) I should render it with as much alacrity as some (nay, the most) of you have come to triumph in my fatal extirpation.

“ In regard I have been of you (my native country, whose wisdom and justice, in respect of the generality of it, is no way questionable) voted to this untimely end, I have not one syllable to say in justification of myself, or those actions for which I suffer; only, in excuse of both, give me leave to say, my too much zeal to do my master service, made me abuse his regal authority; and howsoever I have been one most unfortunate, yet, at all times, a favourite in the prosecution, of my places and offices; and yet (as I shall answer before the dreadful tribunal, whereunto your just anger hath before nature doomed me) my intents were fairer than my actions: But God knows, the over-greatness of my spirits severity, my government, the witchcraft of authority, and flattery of multitudes to sharpen it, are but ill interpreters of my intentions; which that you may believe, I have no argument, but imprecation, which hath but this circumstance to confirm it, That it proceeds from a dying man.

“ If I should take upon me to make a relation of all the particulars of my arraignment and attainer, it would but too much prorogue your longing expectation of my shameful death: Besides, it would be needless, in respect I should but say over again what I said before the parliament, (and perhaps be as little believed) though the terms on which I then answered, be far different from my attestation now, (that being before my condemnation, and this after it.) Besides there were multitudes to catch it, as fast as I uttered it, (and doubtless you shall have it upon every stall-book post) for I have been, and whilst I breathe am, the pestilence which rages through your minds, your estates, and trades: and you will be ready to read the bills of your own losses, though the disease that brought the destruction be removed.

“ Having nothing in this world but a little breath, which within a few minutes is to be expired, I should not use it to this purpose, but that custom upon these directions prescribes my warrant for it: And further, that I might be an example to great persons, that they may know, the favour of a great king is not equivalent to the breath of nations; and that it is a thousand times better and more noble for a lion to play with a glove, than tear it: nor is it proper for a dove to soar with eagle's wings; and the rather, because the necessity of the times requires that I should die, only for example.

“ He that gave conscience to you all, (that are willing to accept it) my royal master, did in his own conscience once declare me guiltless of these facts, for which this death is come upon me: But Heaven that hath made your general clamours the organ of my destiny, thought me not worthy to enjoy this life I have abused; and from your voices, as from the lips of oracles, I have received my woful doom, wherein my charity (at this hour) cannot, nor will accuse you of the least injustice: but still I trench upon your patience, and linger in the thing you came to look for, my death.

“ A little, little more, and I have done. For testimony of my faith and religion, he pleased to understand, that I have professed and do (now) die in the true Protestant religion, not in any points deviating in my belief from the fundamental grounds of the true Protestant religion, professed, practised, maintained, and authorized by the church of England. I would say more of this, but that I desire my private ejaculations may be my last meditations, only, because I know there is not any one of you, at odds with my soul or person (though with my facts and vices) I cannot doubt, but your humanity and charitable inclinations will afford me your devout prayers, for my Saviour's sweet mercy. Good people pray for me, pray for me, even for my eternal Saviour's sake, into whose bosom I render my woful and afflicted soul: Sweet Jesus, my Redeemer, (the Redeemer even of me, a woful and dejected sinner) receive into thy arms my spirit.”

The Account given by May, (of whose work Warburton very justly thus writes to Hurd: “ It is an extraordinary performance, little known, written with great temper, good sense, and spirit, has the qualities of a regular composition, which neither Ludlow nor Whitlock have: It is written with much judgment, penetration, manliness, and spirit, and with a candour that will greatly increase your esteem, when you know he wrote by order of his masters the Parliament.” Letters, June 30, 1753, August 16th, 1753:) of the Proceedings against Lord Strafford, and of some circumstances connected with those Proceedings, are highly interesting. See May's “ History of the Parliament,” b. 1, p. 87 to 99.—For the Proceedings on the alleged Plot, for the Escape of the Earl of Strafford, the Seduction of the Army, and bringing in the French, see the Historians, and 6 Rushw. also 2 Colb. Parl. Hist. The following Evidence is the chief of what relates to Strafford's Escape:

The House of Commons having been alarmed with the apprehensions of some Plots or Designs on foot, and having appointed a Committee to inquire into the same, they on the 5th of May made their Report to the house, That this Plot consisteth of three Heads: the first, was, the Design upon the Tower. The second, To engage the Army. The third, To bring in foreign forces. For the Tower, it appeared to be thus: captain Billingsly being examined upon oath, confessed, That he was acquainted with sir John Suckling: That the said sir John lately offered him employment in one of the king's ships then at Portsmouth; afterwards, employment for Portugal: that this Deponent having notice to meet at the privy lodgings at White-hall, did there receive orders to get 100 men to serve in the Tower under him; and if he did fail, he should answer it with his life. And afterwards meeting with sir John Suckling, and acquainting him therewith, he told him he would furnish him with the said number. Sir William Belfoe, Lieutenant of the Tower, being examined, said, That he had command to receive capt. Billingsly, with 100 men, into the Tower, who should be under his command: That the Earl of Strafford at that time, expostulating with him about his Escape, told him, He would attempt nothing in that kind without his privacy; and that he should have the king's Warrant for his indemnity; and that the Warrant should be to command him to remove the Earl of Strafford, from the Tower to some other Castle; and he would then take his opportunity to escape: That the Lieutenant of the Tower not giving any complying Answer thereunto, the said Earl sent again to intreat him to come to him, and would have persuaded him to let him make an escape; saying, ‘ Without your concurrence it cannot be done; and if you will consent thereunto, I will make you present payment of 22,000*l.*; besides, you shall have a good marriage for your son.’ To which the Lieutenant of the Tower replied, ‘ He was so far from concurring therein, that he was not to be farther moved in such a thing.’ Thus much the Lieutenant of the Tower delivered upon his Oath.

As for the Designs from beyond the Seas, the Committee did make Report to the house, That it was cleared unto them, That the governor of Calais had examined some Englishmen, whether the earl of Strafford's head was cut off; and this was in point of time, the 1st of May, according to the English stile; and sir Philip Cartwright, governor of Guernsey, wrote Letters also, which came in great haste, That he understood the French had a design upon that island, or some part of England. It also appeared to the Committee, by divers of the Letters, which were opened coming from beyond sea, that they expected the earl of Strafford there. It also appeared by the ex-paragement of the whole house, about the Earl of Strafford's death, viz. 'They had committed murder with the sword of justice; and that he would not for a world have so much blood lie on his conscience, as did on theirs for that sentence:' which Words being proved against him by the mayor of Windsor (to whom he spoke it) and some others, he was expelled the house, and voted incapable of ever being a Parliamentman; committed to the Tower during pleasure; to be carried down to Windsor, there to make recantation for those Words, and to return back to do the same at the bar; and it was ordered that a writ should presently issue out for a new election in his room." 2 Cobb.
