

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

State Trials.

127. Proceedings on the HABEAS CORPUS, brought by Sir Thomas Darnel, Sir John Corbet, Sir Walter Earl, Sir John Heveningham, and Sir Edmund Hampden, at the King's-bench, in Westminster-hall: 3 CHARLES I. A. D. 1627: Together with the Proceedings in Parliament, relating to the LIBERTY OF THE SUBJECT: A. D. 1628 and 1629.

THE king having deprived himself of the prospect of all parliamentary Aids, by dissolving the parliament, and yet resolving to prosecute the war; it was necessary to project all possible ways and means of raising money; to which end letters were sent to the Lords Lieutenants of the counties, to return the names of the persons of ability, and what sums they could spare; and the Comptroller of the king's Household issued forth letters in the king's name, under the privy seal, to several persons returned for the Loan-money; some were assessed 20*l.* some 15, and others 10*l.* and Commissioners were appointed with private instructions how to behave themselves in this affair, and divers lords of the council were appointed to repair into their counties to advance the Loan*. Collectors were also appointed to pay into the exchequer the sums received, and to return the names of such as refused, or discovered a disposition to delay the payment of the sums imposed. This assessment of the general-Loan did not pass currently with the people, for divers persons refused to subscribe or lend at the rate proposed; the non-subscribers of high rank in all counties were bound over by recognizances to tender their appearance at the Council-board, and performed the same accordingly, and divers of them committed to prison: which caused great murmuring. But amongst those many gentlemen who were imprisoned throughout England, for refusing to lend upon the Commission of Loans, only five of them brought their Habeas Corpus, viz. sir Thomas Darnel, sir John Corbet, sir Walter Earl, sir John Heveningham, and sir Edmund Hampden.

ARGUMENTS

UPON THE HABEAS CORPUS.

Sir THOMAS DARNEL his case, Mich. 3 Caroli.
Banco Regis.

Sir Thomas Darnel, baronet, being imprisoned in the Fleet, by virtue of a warrant signed by the king's Attorney General, upon the 3rd of November, by serjeant Bramston, his assigned council, moved the justices of the King's Bench to grant him a Writ of Habeas Corpus cum causa; directed to the Warden of the Fleet, to shew that court the cause of his imprisonment, that thereupon they might determine whether his restraint were legal or illegal; and it was granted by the court returnable Thursday following the 8th of November.

* " Sir Randolph Crew shewing no zeal for the advancement of the Loan was then removed from his place of Lord Chief-Justice, and sir Nicholas Hyde succeeded in his room: a person who, for his parts and abilities, was thought worthy of that preferment; yet nevertheless came to the same with a prejudice, coming in the place of one so well-beloved and so suddenly removed." 1 Rushworth, 420.—Croke (Charles) p. 58. " Mem. upon Friday the 10th of Nov. sir Randolph Crew, Chief Justice of the King's Bench, was discharged of that place, by writ under the great seal, for some cause of displeasure conceived against him; but for what, was not generally known."

On Thursday, sir Thomas Darnel expected that his Writ should be returned, but it was delayed; and it was moved that the return should be on Saturday, the 10th of November, which made sir Thomas the more remiss in suing out an Alias upon his Habeas Corpus.

On Saturday the Writ was not returned, and thereupon the king's Attorney General gave order for an alias upon the Habeas Corpus for sir Thomas Darnel, returnable upon Thursday morning the 15th of Nov.; by virtue of which Writ, the warden of the Fleet brings sir Thomas Darnel to the King's Bench, and returneth as followeth:

Executio istius Brevis pacet in quadam schedula annexat' huic brevi.

The return was this:

'Ego Henricos Liloee miles guardianus prisonæ domini regis de le Fleet serenissimo domino regi certifico quod dic' Thomas Darnel baronet' detentus est in prisona prædict' sub custodia mea virtute ejusdem warranti duorum de privato consilio mihi directi, cujus tenor sequitur in his verbis, viz.

'Whereas heretofore the body of sir Thomas Darnel hath been committed to your custody, these are to require you still to continue him; and to let you know that he was and is committed by the special command of his majesty, &c.'

Et hæc est causa detentionis prædict' Thomæ Darnel.

Serj. Bramston. May it please your lordship, I did not expect this cause at this time, neither did I hear of it until I came now into the Hall; and therefore I shall now humbly shew you what my client hath informed me since my coming hither. I understand by him that he expected not his coming to this place to day; the Writ by which he was brought hither was not moved for by him, but was procured without his privity; and seeing his case is so, and that he perceives the cause of his coming, which before he knew not, his motion to your lordship is, that you would be pleased to let him have the copy of the return, and give him time to speak unto it, and that this Writ being not sent out by his procurement, may not be filed.

Attorney General Heath. My lords, it is true that this gentleman, sir Thomas Darnel, being imprisoned in the Fleet, did heretofore move your lordships for a Habeas Corpus, &c. and it was granted him: and his majesty being made acquainted therewith, was very willing that he and all his people might have equal justice; and when they desire that which seems to accord with the rules of the law, they should have it. But it fell out so; that on the day when the Writ should have been returned, the Warden of the Fleet did not return it, as it was his duty to have done; he did forbear to do it upon a commandment, because it was conceived, there being five at that time to appear, the Court would have been straitened for want of time: but I imagined that these gentlemen who did desire the Writ before, should have again been earnest to renew them, which it seems they did not. This Habeas Corpus was sent out by special command, because these gentlemen gave out in speeches, and in particular this gentleman, That they did wonder why they should be hindered from Trial, and what should be the reason their Writs were not returned: nay, his majesty did tell me, that they reported that the king did deny them the course of justice, and therefore he commanded me to renew the Writ, which I did, and think I may do it ex officio.

Sir Tho. Darnel. My lords, I knew not until now, but that I was committed by Mr. Attorney's Warrant only, and thereupon I did desire a Habeas Corpus at the bar, which you were pleased to grant me; but now I understand that my restraint is by another means, and therefore I shall crave leave to have some time to speak to it. And as for the words alledged against me, as if I had spoken them, I humbly pray they may be no disparagement to my cause, for I do patiently refer myself to your grave censures, as being accused of a fact whereof I am no ways guilty.

Hyde (L. C. Justice.) You give a temperate and fair answer; and now you may perceive the upright and sincere proceedings that have been in this business. You did no sooner petition to have counsel assigned you, but you had it granted to you, for indeed we cannot deny it; and I know not but that any counsel might have moved for you, without having been assigned for you, and yet have had no blame; for it is the king's pleasure his laws should take place and be executed, and therefore do we sit here. When you made a motion for a Habeas Corpus, that was likewise granted; whether the commitment be by the king or others, this Court is a place where the king doth sit in person, and we have power to examine it; and if it appears that any man hath injury or wrong by his imprisonment, we have power to deliver and discharge him; if otherwise, he is to be remanded by us to prison again. Now it seems you are not ready to speak to this return; if you desire a further day, we ought to grant it.

Sir T. Darnel. My lords, I humbly desire it.
L. C. J. I know no cause why it should be denied.

Serj. Bramston. My lords, we shall desire the Writ may not be filed, and that we may have a copy of the return.

Att. Gen. You cannot deny the filing of the Writ, if you desire to have a copy of the return.

L. C. J. Although you be remanded at this time to prison, because you are not ready to speak to the return, we can adjourn you to a new day upon the Writ, and so you may prepare yourself; but if you will not have this filed, there must go out a new Habeas Corpus, and thereupon must be another return.

Serj. Bramston. My lord, we desire some time, that we may be advised whether we may proceed or not.

L. C. J. Will you submit yourself to the king?

Sir T. Darnel. My lord, I desire some time to advise of my proceedings: I have moved many men, and offered to retain them of my counsel; but they refuse me, and I can get none to be of counsel with me without your assistance.

L. C. J. You shall have what counsel assigned you will have or desire; for no offence will be taken against any man that shall advise you in your proceedings in law.

Att. Gen. I will pass my word, they that do advise you, shall have no offence taken against them for it; and I shall give consent to any way that you shall desire, either that it may be filed, or that it may not be filed; for if you desire justice, you shall have it, and the king will not deny it; but if it shall be conceived, as it is rumoured, that there was a denial of justice on the king's part, you must know that his majesty is very tender of that. And for the gentleman, now he is brought hither, I conceive, but yet I leave it to your lordship's judgment, that the writ must be filed, and you must either deliver him, or remand him, or else it will be an escape in the warden of the Fleet.

Sir T. Darnel. I would not have it thought that I should speak anything against my prince, and for those words I do deny them; for upon my conscience they never came into my thought: perhaps you shall find that they have been spoken by some other, but not by any of us.

L. C. J. Sir, you have made a fair answer, and I doubt not but Mr. Attorney will make the like relation of it; you move for the not filing of the Writ; if you refuse to have it filed, whereby it should not be of record, you must have no copy of it; but if you will have it filed you shall have a copy of it, and further time to speak to it; chuse whether of them you will.

Serj. Bramston. We desire to have the return read once more.

And it was read as before.

Serj. Bramston. So as the writ may not be filed, we will desire no copy of the return.

L. C. J. Then the gentleman must return back again into the custody of the Warden of the Fleet; and therefore I ask you, whether you desire to come hither again upon this Writ, or will you have a new one?

Sir T. Darnel. I desire your lordship that I may have time to consider of it.

L. C. J. Then in God's name take your own time to think of it.

Mich. 3 Car. Regis, Nov. 22, 1627.

Sir John Corbet, bart. sir Walter Earl, sir John Heveningham, sir Edmund Hampden, knights, were brought to the bar.

Serj. Bramston. May it please your lordship to hear the return read, or shall I open it?

L. C. J. Let it be read.

Mr. Keeling reads the return, being the same as that of sir T. Darnel.

Serj. Bramston. May it please your lordship, I shall humbly move upon this return in the behalf of sir John Heveningham, with whom I am of counsel; it is his petition, that he may be bailed from his imprisonment: it was but in vain for me to move that to a court of law, which by law cannot be granted: and therefore in that regard, that upon this return it will be questioned, whether as this return is made, the gentleman may be bailed or not? I shall humbly offer up to your lordship the case, and some reasons out of mine understanding, arising out of the return itself, to satisfy your lordship that these prisoners may, and, as their case is, ought to be bailed by your lordship.

The exception that I take to this return, is as well to the matter and substance of the return, as to the manner and legal form thereof: the exception that I take to the matter, is in several respects.

That the return is too general, there is no sufficient cause shewn in special or in general of the commitment of this gentleman; and as it is insufficient for the cause, so also in the time of the first imprisonment: for howsoever here doth appear a time upon the second warrant from the lords of the council to detain him still in prison, yet by the return no time can appear when he was first imprisoned, though it be necessary it should be shewn; and if that time appear not, there is no cause your lordship should remand him; and consequently he is to be delivered.

Touching the matter of the return, which is the cause of his imprisonment, it is expressed to be 'per speciale mandatum domini regis:' this is too general and uncertain, for that it is not manifest what kind of command this was.

Touching the legal form of the return, it is not, as it ought to be, fully and positively the return of the keeper himself only, but it comes with a significavit, or prout, that he was committed 'per speciale mandatum domini regis,' as appeareth by warrant from the lords of the council, not of the king himself; and that is not good in legal form.

For the matter and substance of the return, it is not good, because there ought to be a cause of that imprisonment.

This Writ is the means, and the only means that the subject hath in this and such-like case to obtain his liberty; there are other Writs by which men are delivered from restraint, as that De Homine Replegiando, but extends not to this cause, for it is particularly excepted in the body of the Writ De Manuptione, et de Cautione Admittenda, but they lie in other cases: but the Writ of Habeas Corpus is the only means the subject hath to obtain his liberty, and the end of this Writ is to return the cause of the imprisonment, that it may be examined in this court, whether the parties ought to be discharged or not: but that cannot be done upon this return: for the cause of the imprisonment of this gentleman at first is so far from appearing particularly by it, that there is no cause at all expressed in it.—This Writ requires that the cause of the imprisonment should be returned, and if the cause be not specially certified by it, yet should it at the least be shewn in general, that it may appear to the judges of the court; and it must be expressed so far, as that it may appear to be none of those causes for which by law of the kingdom the subject ought not to be imprisoned; and it ought to be expressed that it was by presentment or indictment, and not upon petition or suggestion made to the king and lords, which is against the statute made in the 25 E. 3, c. 4. 42 E. 3, c. 3.

By the statute 25 E. 3, c. 4. it is ordained and established, 'That no man from henceforth shall be taken by petition or suggestion made to the king or his council, but by indictment or course of law;' and accordingly it was enacted, 42 E. 3, c. 3. the title of which statute is, 'None shall be put to answer an accusation made to the king without presentment.' Then, my lord, it being so, although the cause should not need to be expressed in such manner as that it may appear to be none of these causes mentioned in the statute, or else the subject by this return loseth the benefit and advantage of these laws, which be their birth-right and inheritance; but in this return there is no cause at all appearing of the first commitment, and therefore it is plain, that there is no cause for your lordship to remand him; but there is cause you should deliver him, since the writ is to bring the body and the cause of the imprisonment before your lordship.

But it may be objected, that this writ of Habeas Corpus doth not demand the cause of the first commitment, but of the detaining only; and so the writ is satisfied by the return; for though it shew no cause of the first commitment, but of detaining only, yet it declareth a cause why the gentleman is detained in prison: this is no answer, nor can give any satisfaction; for the reason why the cause is to be returned, is for the subject's liberty, that if it shall appear a good and sufficient cause to your lordship, then to be remanded; if your lordship think and find it insufficient, he is to be enlarged.

This is the end of this writ, and this cannot appear to your lordship, unless the time of the first commitment be expressed in the return. I know that in some cases the time is not material, as when the cause of the commitment is (and that so especially) returned, as that the time is not material, it is enough to shew the cause without the time, as after a conviction or trial had by law; but when it is in this manner, that the time is the matter itself: for intend what cause you will of the commitment, yea though for the highest cause of treason, there is no doubt but that upon the return thereof the time of it must appear; for it being before trial and conviction had by law, it is but an accusation, and he that is only accused ought by law to be let to bail.

But I beseech your lordship to observe the consequence of this cause. If the law be, that upon this return this gentleman should be remanded, I will not dispute whether or no, a man may be imprisoned before he be convicted according to the law; but if this return shall be good, then his imprisonment shall not continue on for a time, but for ever; and the subjects of this kingdom may be restrained of their liberties perpetually, and by law there can be no remedy for the subject: and therefore this return cannot stand with the laws of the realm, or that of Magna Charta; nor with the statute of 28 E. 3, c. 3. for if a man be not bailable upon this return, they cannot have the benefit of these two laws, which are the inheritance of the subject.—If your lordship shall think this to be a sufficient cause, then it goeth to a perpetual imprisonment of the subject: for in all those causes which may concern the king's subjects, and are applicable to all times and cases, we are not to reflect upon the present time and government, where justice and mercy floweth, but we are to look what may betide us in the time to come, hereafter.

It must be agreed on all sides, that the time of the first commitment doth not appear in this return; but by a latter warrant from the lords of the council, there is a time indeed expressed for the continuing of him in prison, and that appears; but if this shall be a good cause to remand these gentlemen to prison, they may lie there these seven years longer, and seven years after them, nay, all the days of their lives. And if they sue out a writ of Habeas Corpus, it is but making a new warrant, and they shall be remanded, and shall never have the advantage of the laws which are the best inheritance of every subject.—And in E. 6, fol. 36, the laws are called the great inheritance of every subject, and the inheritance of inheritances, without which inheritance we have no inheritance. These are the exceptions I desire to offer up to your lordship touching the Return, for the insufficiency of the cause returned, and the defect of the time of the first commitment, which should have been expressed.

I will not labour in objections till they be made against me, in regard the Statute of Westminster primo is so frequent in every man's mouth, that at the common law those men that were committed in four cases were not replevisable; viz. those that were taken for the death of a man, or the commandment of the king, or his justices for the forest. I shall speak something to it, though I intend not to spend much time about it, for it toucheth not this case we have in question.

For that is concerning a case of the common law, when men are taken by the king's writs, and not by word of mouth, and it shall be so expounded, as Mr. Stamford, fol. 73, yet it is nothing to this case, for if you will take the true meaning of that statute, it extends not at all to this writ of Habeas Corpus; for the words are plain 'they shall be replevisable by the 'common writ,' that is, by the writ 'De ho-

'mise replegiando,' directed to the sheriff to deliver them, if they were bailable: but this case is above the sheriff, and he is not to be judge in it, whether the causes of the commitment be sufficient or not, as it appears in Fitz-Herbert, 'De homine replegiando,' and many other places, and not of the very words of the statute this is clear, for there be many other causes mentioned, as the death of a man, the commandment of the justice, &c. in which the statute: saith, men are not replevisable. But will a man conceive that the meaning is, that they shall not be bailed at all, but live in perpetual imprisonment? I think I shall not need to spend time, in that it is so plain; let me but make one instance.

A man is taken de morte hominis; he is not bailable by writ, saith this Statute; that is, by the common writ: there was a common writ for this case, and that was called de odio et acia, as appeareth, Bracton, Coron. 34. This is the writ intended by the statute, which is a common writ, and not a special writ; but, my lord, as this writ de odio et acia was before this statute, so it was afterwards taken away by the statute of 28 E. 3, c. 9. But before that statute, this writ did lie in the special case, as is shewn in Coke's 9th Report, the poulterer's Case; and the end of this writ was, that the subject might not be too long detained in prison, as till the justices of Eyre discharged them. So that the law intended not that a man should suffer perpetual imprisonment, for they were very careful that men should not be kept too long in prison, which is also a liberty of the subject; and, my lord, that this court hath bailed upon a suspicion of High-Treason, I will offer it to your lordship, when I shall shew you precedents in these cases of a commitment by the privy-council, or by the king himself: but before I offer these precedents unto your lordship, of which there be many, I shall by your lordship's favour speak a little to the next exception, and that is to the matter of the return which I find to be 'per speciale mandatum domini regis.' And what is that? It appears by this writ, there may be sundry commands by the king; we find a special command often in our books, as in the statute of Marl. cap. 8. they who were imprisoned Rediss,' shall not be delivered without the special command of our lord the king. And so in Bracton, de Actionibus, the last chapter, where it appears that the king's commandment for imprisonments is by special writ; so by writ again men are to be delivered, for in the case of Rediss' or Post Rediss,' if it shall be removed by a Certiorari, that is by a special writ to deliver parties. So that by this appears, that by the king's commandment to imprison, and to deliver in those cases, is understood this writ, and so it may be in this case which we have heard.

And this return here is a special Mandatum; it may be understood to be under some of the king's seals, 42 Ass. and ought to be delivered; and will you make a difference between the king's command under his seal, and his command by word of mouth? What difference there is, I leave it to your lordship's judgment: but if there be any, it is the more material that it should be expressed what manner of command it was, which doth not here appear; and therefore it may be the king's command by writ, or his command under his seal, or his command by word of mouth alone.

And if there is any of these commands of a higher nature than the other, doubtless, it is that by writ, or under seal, for they are of record, and in these the person may be bailed, and why not in this? As to the legal form, admitting there were substances in the return, yet there wants legal form; for the writ of Habeas Corpus is the commandment of the king to the keeper of the prisons, and thereupon they are to make return both of the body, and of the cause of the commitment, and that cause is to appear of them who are the immediate officers. And if he doth it by signification from another, that return is defective in law, and therefore this return cannot be good, for it must be from the officer himself; and if the cause returned by him be good, it binds the prisoners.

The warrant of the lords was but a direction for him; he might have made his return to have been expressly by the king's commandment, there was warrant for it, I shall not need to put you cases of it; for it is not enough that he returns that he was certified that the commitment was by the king's command, but he must of himself return this fact as it was done. And now, my lord, I shall offer to your lordship precedents of divers kinds, upon commitments by the special command of the king, and upon commitments both by the king and the lords together. And howsoever I conceive, which I submit to your lordship, that our case will not stand upon precedents, but upon the fundamental laws and statutes of this realm; and though the precedents look the one way or the other, they are to be brought back unto the laws by which the kingdom is governed. In the 1st of Hen. 8, Rot. Parl. 9, one Harrison was committed to the Marshalsea by the command of the king; and being removed by H. Corpus into the court, the cause returned was, that he was committed 'per mandatum domini regis,' and he was bailed.

In the 40 Eliz. Thomas Wenden was committed to the gatehouse by the commandment of the queen, and the lords of the council: and being removed by an H. Corpus, upon the general return he was bailed.—In 8 Jac., one Caesar was committed by the king's commandment, and this being returned upon his H. Corpus, upon the examination of this case it doth appear that it was over-ruled, that the return should be amended, or else the prisoner should be delivered.

The precedents concerning the commitment by the Lords of the Council, are in effect the same with these where the commitment is, by the reason why the cause of the commitment should not be shewn, holds in both cases, and that is the necessity of suit; and therefore Mr. Stamford makes the command of the king, and that of the lords of the privy-council, to be both as one; and to this purpose, if they speak, he speaks; and if he speaks, they speak.

The precedents that we can shew you, how the subject hath been delivered upon commitment by the lords of the council, as in the times of Hen. 8, and in the times of queen Eliz., and queen Mary, are infinite; as in the 9th Eliz. Thomas Lawrence was committed to the Tower by the lords of the council, and bailed upon an H. Corpus.

In the 43 Eliz., Calvin's case. In the 3d Eliz., Vernon's case. These were committed for High Treason, and yet bailed; for in all these cases there must be a conviction in due time, or a deliverance by law.

There be divers other precedents that might be shewn to your lordship. In 12 Jac., Miles Renards. In 12 Jac., Rot. 155, Rd. Beckwith's case. In 4 Jac., sir Thomas Monson was committed for treason to the Tower of London, and afterwards was brought hither, and bailed; and since our case stands upon this return, and yet there is no sufficient cause in law expressed in the return of the detaining this gentleman; and since these precedents do warrant our proceedings; my humble suit to this court is, that the gentleman, sir John Heveningham, who hath petitioned his majesty, that he may have the benefit of the law, and his majesty hath signified it: it is his pleasure that justice according to the law should be administered at all times in general to all his subjects: and particularly to these gentlemen, which is their birth-right: my humble suit to your lordship is that these gentlemen may have the benefit of that law, and be delivered from their imprisonment.

Mr. Noye's Argument of Counsel with sir Walter Earl at that time.

May it please your lordship, I am of counsel with sir Walter Earl, one of the prisoners at the bar: the return of this writ is as those that have been before, they are much of one tenour, and as you have heard the tenour of that, so this gentleman coming hither by an H. Corpus, I will by your lordship's favour read the writ:

'Carolus, Dei gratis, &c. Johanni Liloe militi' Guardian' prison' nostræ de le Fleet salut', Præcipimus tibi quod corpus Walteri Earl militi' in prison' nostra sub custodia tua detent' ut dicit' una cum causa detentionis suæ quocunque nomine prædict' Walter' censeat in eadem Habeas Corpus, ad subjiciendum et recipiendum ea quæ curia nostra de eo adtunc et ibidem ordin' conting' in hac parte et hæc nullatenus omit' periculo incumbend' et habeas ibi hoc breve. Test' Hyde, apud Westminster, quarto die Nov., anno 8.' Executio istius Brevis patet in quadam schedula huic brevi annexat.'

Respons. Johan' Liloe Guardian' Prison' de le Fleet.

'Ego Johannes Liloe Milit' Guardian' Prison' domini Regis de le Fleet, serenissimo domino regi, apud Westminster 8. Post receptionem hujus brevis quod in hac schedula est mentionat', Certifico quod Walter Earl miles, in eodem brevium nominat' detentus est in prisona de le Fleet sub custodia mea prædict' per speciale mandatum domini regis mihi significatum per Warrantum duorum et aliorum de Privato Concilio perhonorabilissimi dicti domini regis, cujus quidem tenor sequitur in hæc verba.'

Whereas sir Walter Earl, knight, was heretofore committed to your custody, these are to will and require you still to detain him, letting you know, that both his first commitment, and this direction for the continuance of him in prison, were and are by his majesty's special commandment. From Whitehall, 7 Novembris, 1627. Thomas Coventry, C. S., Henry Manchester, Thomas Suffolk, Bridgewater, Kelly, R. Dunelm', Thomas Edmunds, John Cook, Marlborough, Pembroke, Salisbury, Totness, Grandison, Guliel' Bath and Wells, Robert Nanton, Richard Weston, Humphry Maycs.

To the Guardian of the Fleet or his Deputy.

'Et hæc est causa detentionis prædict' Walteri Earl sub custodia mea in prison prædict'. Attamen corpus ejusdem Walteri coram domino rege ad diem et locum prædictum, post receptionem brevis prædict' parat' habeo prout istud breve in se exiget et requirit.'

Respon' Johan' Liloe Militi' Guardian' Prison' de le Fleet.

My lord, the first Habeas Corpus bears date the 4th of Nov., then there is an Alias Habeas bears Teste after that, and the tenour thereof is a command to the warden of the Fleet, 'quod Habeas Corpus Walteri Earl, coram nobis ad subjiciendum et recipiendum ea quæ curia nostra de eo, &c. ordin' conting'.' And the Warden of the Fleet, he certifies as your lordship has heard. May it please your lordship, I desire as before was desired for the other gentlemen, that sir Walter Earl may be also bailed, if there be no other cause of his imprisonment: for if there were a cause certified, and that cause were not sufficient to detain him still in prison, your lordship would bail him; and if a man should be in a worse case, when there is no cause certified at all, that would be very hard.

The writ is, that he should bring the prisoner coram nobis, before the king, the end of that is 'ad subjiciendum et recipiendum'; now I conceive, that though there be a signification of the king's pleasure to have this gentleman imprisoned, yet when the king grants this writ to bring the prisoner hither, 'ad subjiciendum et recipiendum,' his pleasure likewise is, to have the prisoner let go, if by law he be not chargeable; or otherwise to detain him still in prison, if the case so require it.

I will put your lordship in mind of a case, and it was Pasch. 9 Edw. 3, M. 3. I will cite by the Placita, because my book is not paged as other books are; it is in the case of a Cesariis. In that case there were two things considerable: the one that there was a signification of the king's pleasure past, and that determined with him: the other, that though there was a signification of the king's pleasure before, yet there comes after that a writ; and that was another signification of the king's pleasure, that the prisoner shall be brought hither ad subjiciendum, to submit himself to punishment, if he have deserved it; or ad recipiendum, to receive his enlargement, and be delivered, if there be no cause of his imprisonment.

And if upon an Habeas Corpus, a cause of commitment be certified, that cause is to be tried here before your lordship. But if no cause be shewn, then the proceedings must be 'ut curia nostra ad mar' contigerit,' the court must do that which stands with law and justice, and that is to deliver him.

My lord, I shall be bold to move one word more touching this Return: I conceive that every officer to a court of justice must make his return of his own act, or of the act of another, and not what he is certified of by another. But in this case the warden of the Fleet doth not certify himself, of himself, that this gentleman was commanded to him by the king, but that he was certified by the lords of the council, that it was the king's pleasure that he should detain him. But in our case the warden of the Fleet must certify the immediate cause, and not the cause of the cause, as he doth by this return; 'Detentus est sub custodia mea per speciale mandatum Domini Regis mihi significatum per Warrantum duorum de Privato Concilio;' that is not the use in law, but he ought to return the primary cause, and not the subsequent cause: as in 32 Edw. 3. return, Rex vicecom' 87. in a writ De Homine Replegiando, against an abbot, the sheriff returns, that he hath sent to the bailiff of the abbot, and he answered him, that the party was the abbot's villain, and so he cannot deliver him; that it is held an insufficient return, and a new Alias was granted. But if the sheriff had returned, that the abbot did certify him so, it had been good; but he must not return what is certified him by another.

In one of the precedents that hath been noted, as that of Parker, 22 H. 8, there the guardian of the prison certifies, that Parker 'detentus est sub custodia mea per mandatum Domini Regis mihi nunciatum per Robertum Pecke;' now our case is by the nunciation of many, but in law 'Majus et minus non variant in speciem,' the certification of one and of many is of the same effect, although in moral understanding there may be a difference.

Trin. 2 E. 3, Rot. 46. in this court in 21 E. 3, in the printed Book there is a piece of it: the abbot of Bury brings a prohibition out of this court, the bishop of Norwich pleaded in bar of that, 'Quod mihi testificatum quod con-

'tinetur in Archivis,' that he is excommunicated; there were two exceptions taken to this case in this precedent, and they are both in one case: the first was, that no cause appeareth, why he was excommunicated; there may be causes why he should be excommunicated, and then he should be barred, and there may be causes why the excommunication should not bar him: for it may be the excommunication was for bringing the action, which was the king's writ; and therefore because there was no cause of the excommunication returned, it was ruled that it was not good. The other reason is that upon the Roll, which is mihi testificatum.

Now every man, when he will make a certificate to the court, 'Proprium factum suum non alterius significare debet,' he must inform the court of the immediate act done, and not that such things are told him, or that such things are signified unto him; but that was not done in this case, and therefore it was held insufficient, and so in this case of ours I conceive the return is insufficient in the form. There is another cause, my lord, for which I conceive this return is not good.

But first I will be bold to inform your lordship, touching the statute of Magna Charta 29. 'Nullus liber homo capiatur vel imprisonetur, &c. nec super eum mittimus nisi per legale judicium parium suorum, vel per legem terræ.' That in this statute these words in carcerem are omitted out of the printed books: for it should be, 'nec eum in carcerem mittimus.' For these words 'per legem terræ;' what 'Lex terræ' should be, I will not take upon me to expound, otherwise than I find them to be expounded by acts of parliament; and this is, that they are understood to be the process of the law, sometimes by writ, sometimes by attachment of the person: but whether, 'speciale mandatum Domini Regis' be intended by that or no, I leave it to your lordship's exposition upon two Petitions of the commons, and Answer of the king, in 36 E. 3, No. 9, and No. 20.

In the first of them the commons complain that the Great Charter, the Charter of the Forest, and other statutes were broken, and they desire that for the good of himself and of his people, they might be kept and put in execution, and that they might not be infringed by making an arrest by special command, or otherwise: and the answer was, that the assent of the lords established and ordained, that the said charter and other statutes should be put in execution according to the petition, and that is without any disturbance by arrest by special command or otherwise; for it was granted, as it was petitioned.

In the same year, for they were very careful of this matter and it was necessary it should be so, for it was then an usual thing to take men by writs 'quibusdam de causis,' and many of these words caused many acts of parliament; and it may be some of these writs may be shewn: and I say in the same year they complained that men were imprisoned by special command, and without indictment or other legal course of law, and they desired that thing may not be done upon men by special command against the Great Charter.

The king makes answer, that he is well pleased therewith: that was the first answer; and for the future he hath added farther, if any man be grieved, let him complain, and right shall be done unto him. This, my lord, is an explanation of the Great Charter, as also the statute of 37 Ed. 3, c. 18. is a commentary upon it, that men would not be committed upon suggestion made to the king, without due proofs of law against them, and so it is enacted twice in one year.

We find more printed books, as in Hen. 6, Mrus de facts, Fitz. 184. which is a strong case, under favour, in an action of trespass for cutting down trees. The defendant saith, That the place where the trees are cut, is parcel of the manor of B. whereof the king is seized in fee, and that the king did command him to cut them: and the opinion of the court was, that this was no good plea, without shewing the speciality of the command; and they said, if the king command me to arrest a man, and I arrest him, he shall have an action of false imprisonment against me, although it were done in the king's presence.

In 1 Job. cap. 7, fol. 46, it is in print, and there we leave it.

Hussey, Chief Justice saith, that sir John Markham told king Edw. 4, that he could not arrest a man upon suspicion of felony or treason, as any of his subjects might; because if he should wrong a man by such arrest, the parties could have no remedy against him, if any man shall stand upon it. Here is a signification of the king's pleasure, not to have the cause of the commitment examined; he hath here another signification of his pleasure by writ, whereby the party is brought hither 'ad subjiciendum et recipiendum,' that he hath made your lordship judge of that, which should be objected against this gentleman, and either to punish him, or to deliver him; and if there be no cause shewn, it is to be intended that the party is to be delivered, and that it is the king's pleasure it should be so: and the writ is a sufficient warrant for the doing of it, there being no cause shewn of the imprisonment. And now, my lord, I will speak a word to the writ of de homine replegiando, and no other writ, for that was the common writ; and the four causes expressed in that statute, to wit, the death of a man, the command of the king, or his justice, or forest, were excepted in that writ before that statute made, as appears Bracton 133, so that the writ was at the common-law before that statute.

And it appears by our Books, that if a man be brought hither by an Habeas Corpus, though he were imprisoned de morte hominis, as in the 21 Edw. 4, 7. Winckfield was bailed here, this court bailed him, for he was brought hither 'ad subjiciendum et recipiendum,' and not to lie in prison God knows how long; and if the statute should be expounded otherwise, there were no bailing men outlawed, or breakers of prison, for they are not within this statute, and yet this court doth it at pleasure.

But plainly by the statute itself, it appears, that it meant only the common writ; for the preamble recites, that the sheriffs and others had taken and kept in prison persons detected of felony, and let out to plevin such as were not reparable, to grieve the one party, and to the gain of the other; and forasmuch as before this time it was not determined what prisoners were reparable, and what not, but only in certain cases were expressed, therefore it is ordained, &c.

Now this is no more than for direction to the keepers of the prisons, for it leaves the matter to the discretion of the judges, whether bailable or not; for when the statute hath declared who are repleviable, who are not, as men outlawed, those who have abjured the realm, breakers of prison, burners of houses, makers of false money, counterfeiting of the king's seal, and the like; it is then ordained, that if the sheriff, or any other, let any go at large by surety, that is not reparable, whether he be sheriff, constable, or any other that hath the keeping of prisons, and thereof be attainted, he shall lose his office and fee for ever; so that it extends to the common gaolers and keepers of prisons, to direct them in what cases they shall let men to bail, and in what cases not: and that they shall not be judges whom to let to replevin, and whom to keep in prison; but it extends not to the judges, for if the makers of the statute had meant them in it, they should have put a pain or penalty upon them also.

So then I conclude, under your lordship's favour, that as this case is, there should have been a cause of the commitment expressed, for these gentlemen are brought hither by writ ad subjiciendum, if they be charged; and ad recipiendum, if they be not charged; and therefore in regard there is no charge against them, whereupon they should be detained in prison any longer, we desire that they may be bailed or discharged by your lordship.

Mr. SELDEN's Argument at the King's-bench bar the same day.

My Lords; I am of counsel with sir Edm. Hampden; his case is the same with the other two gentlemen: I cannot hope to say much, after that that hath been said; yet if it shall please your lordship, I shall remember you of so much as is befallen my lot. Sir Edmund Hampden is brought hither by a writ of Habeas Corpus, and the keeper of the Gatehouse hath returned upon the writ, that sir Edm. Hampden is detained in prison 'per speciale mandatum domini regis, mihi significatum per warrantum duorum privati concilii dicti domini regis.' And then he recites the warrant of the lords of the council, which is, that they do will and require him to detain this gentleman still in prison, letting him know that his first imprisonment, &c. May it please your lordship, I shall humbly move you that this gentleman may also be bailed; for under favour, my lord, there is no cause in the return, why he should be any farther imprisoned and restrained of his liberty.

My lord, I shall say something to the form of the writ; and of the return; but very little to them both, because there is a very little left for me to say.

My lord, to the form, I say it expresseth nothing of the first caption, and therefore it is insufficient; I will add one reason, as hath been said: the Habeas Corpus hath only these words, 'quod habeas corpus ejus una cum causa detentionis, et non captionis.' But, my lord, because in all imprisonments, there is a cause of caption and detention, the caption is to be answered as well as the detention. I have seen many writs of this nature, and on them the caption is returned, that they might see the time of the caption, and thereby know whether the party should be delivered or no, and that in regard of the length of his imprisonment.

The next exception I take to the form is, that there is much uncertainty in it, so that no man can tell when the writ came to the keeper of the prison, whether before the return or after; for it appears not when the king's command was for the commitment, or the signification of the council came to him. It is true, that it appears that the warrant was dated the 7th of November; but when it came to the keeper of the prison, that appears not at all: and therefore, as for want of mentioning the same time of the caption, so for not expressing the same time when this warrant came, I think the return is faulty in form, and void.

And for apparent contradiction also, the return is insufficient; for in that part of the return which is before the warrant, it is said, 'Quod detentus est per speciale mandatum domini regis.' The warrant of the lords of the council, the very syllables of that warrant are, that the lords of the council do will and require him still to detain him, which is contrary to the first part of the return.—Besides, my lord, the lords themselves say, in another place and passage of the warrant, that the king commanded them to commit him, and so it is their commitment; so that upon the whole matter, there appears to be a clear contradiction in the return; and there being a contradiction in the return, it is void.

Now, my lord, I will speak a word or two to the matter of the return; and that is touching the imprisonment, 'per speciale mandatum domini regis,' by the lords of the council, without any cause expressed: and admitting of any, or either, or both of these to be the return; I think that by the constant and settled laws of this kingdom, without which we have nothing, no man can be justly imprisoned by either of them, without a cause of the commitment expressed in the return. My lord, in both the last arguments the statutes have been mentioned and fully expressed: yet I will add a little to that which hath been said.

The statute of Magna Charta, cap. 29, that statute if it were fully executed as it ought to be, every man would enjoy his liberty better than he doth. The law saith expressly, 'No freeman shall be imprisoned without due process of the law;' out of the very body of this act of parliament, besides the explanation of other statutes, it appears, 'Nullus liber homo capiatur vel imprisonatur nisi per legem terræ.' My lord, I know these words 'legem terræ,' do leave the question where it was, if the interpretation of the statute were not. But I think under your lordship's favour, there it must be intended by due course of law, to be either by presentment or by indictment.

My lords, if the meaning of these words, 'per legem terræ,' were but, as we use to say, according to the laws, which leaves the matter very uncertain; and 'per speciale mandatum,' &c. be within the meaning of these words, 'according to the law;' then this act had done nothing. The act is, 'No freeman shall be imprisoned but by the law of the land.' If you will understand these words, 'per legem terræ,' in the first sense, this statute shall extend to villains as well as to freemen; for if I imprison another man's villain, the villain may have an action of false imprisonment. But the lords and the king, for then they both had villains, might imprison them; and the villain could have no remedy. But these words in the statute, 'per legem terræ,' were to the freeman, which ought not to be imprisoned, but by due process of law: and unless the interpretation shall be this, the freeman shall have no privileges above the villain.

So that I conceive, my lords, these words, 'per legem terræ,' must be here so interpreted, as in 42 Eliz. The bill is worth observing. It reciteth that divers persons without any writ or presentment were cast into prison, &c. that it might be enacted, that it should not be so done hereafter. The answer there is, that as this is an article of the Great Charter, this should be granted. So that it seems the statute is not taken to be an explanation of that of Magna Charta, but the very words of the statute of Magna Charta.

I will conclude with a little observation upon these words, 'nec super eum mittimus;' which words of themselves signify not so much, a man cannot find any fit sense for them. But, my lord, in the 7th king John, there was a Great Charter, by which this statute in the 9th H. 3, whereby we are now regulated, was framed, and there the words are, 'nec eum in carcerem mittimus.' We will not commit him to prison; that is, the king himself will not; and to justify this, there is a story of that time in Matthew Paris, and in that Book this Charter of king John is set down at large, which book is very authentic, and there it is entered: and in the 9th of Hen. 3, he saith, that the statute was renewed in the same words with the Charter of king John. And, my lord, he might know it better than others, for he was the king's Chronologer in those times : and therefore, my lord, since there be so many reasons, and so many precedents, and so many statutes, which declare, that no freeman whatsoever ought to be imprisoned but according to the laws of the land ; and that the Liberty of the Subject is the highest inheritance that he hath ; my humble request is, that according to the ancient laws and privileges of this realm, this gentleman, my client, may be bailed.

The ARGUMENT of MR. CALTHROP, at the King's-Bench bar, 22 Nov. Mich. 3 Car. regis.

SIR John Corbet being brought to the King's-Bench bar, with sir Edmund Hampden, sir Walter Earl, and sir John Heveningham, who were also brought thither by several writs of Habeas Corpus, with the same return ; I being assigned by the court of King's-Bench, upon a petition delivered, to be of counsel with sir John Corbet, did move that sir John Corbet might be discharged of his imprisonment, and put in bail ; for I did conceive that the return of this H. Corpus was insufficient, both in the matter of the return, and in the manner of the return, and so there ought not to be a longer detaining of sir John Corbet in prison. For as to the manner of the return, it is not laid down precisely, that sir John Corbet is detained in prison by the special commandment of the king, signified by the warrant of the lords of the council ; the which is not a direct affirmation that he is detained by the special command of the king, but that the lords of the council, by their warrant, have signified unto him that he was committed and still detained by the special command of the king.

And howsoever the lords of the council had signified that he was detained by the commandment of the king, yet it may be he was not detained by the commandment of the king ; for their signification of the same by warrant may be untrue, and the warrant of the lords of the council that is returned in hac verba, importeth that the keeper of the Gatehouse rather took upon him to return, that it was signified unto him by the warrant of the lords of the council, that sir John Corbet was committed and detained by the special commandment of the king ; because if the keeper had taken upon him to affirm it upon his return, then needed he not to have returned the warrant of the lords of the council : and the warrant itself sheweth that he had only his information from the lords of the council. For their warrant is to let the keeper know, that both the first commitment, and this direction for the continuing of him in prison, were and are by his majesty's special commandment ; and I do not see, as this return is made, that an accord upon the case can lie upon the keeper of the Gatehouse, if sir John Corbet was not committed nor detained by the special commandment of the king, so long as the warrant of the lords of the council be returned as it was made, because he doth return the same as the significavit of the lords by their warrant. Register 65, the writ of Excommunicat' Capiend' goeth, ' Rex vicecom' Lincoln' S. significavit nob' venerabilis pater Henricus Lincolnienensis episcopus per literas suas patentes quod R. suus parochial' propter suam manifestam contumac' autoritate ipsius episc' ordin' excom' est, nec se vult per censuram ecclesiasticam justiciar' &c. tibi præcipimus quod prædict' R. per corpus suum secundum consuetud' Angliæ justic' &c.' And yet no man will say that there is an information of the king, that R. is excommunicated, but only that the bishop of Lincoln had signified unto him that R. was excommunicated. And in Fitz. Nat. Br. 663, and Register 65, it appears that the form of the writ of Excommunication deliberand' is, ' Rex vicecom' London salut'. Cum Thom' Jay alligat' London' qui nuper ad denuntiat. venerabil' patris archiep' Eborum pro contumacijs suis ratione contractus in civitate nostra Eborum habit' ut dicebat. tanquam excom' et claves ecclesiæ contemner' per corpus suum secundum consuetud' Angliæ per te justic' præcepimus, donec &c. esset satisfact' eid' archiepiscop. ad satisfaciendum Deo et sanctæ ecclesiæ, sufficientem expositus cautionem, per quod eidem archiepiscopus offic. archidisc. And yet it cannot be said, that although the king recited in his writ that the archbishop had signified unto him that he had written unto the official of the archdeacon, that the king said, that the archbishop had written ; for he doth not affirm so much precisely, but only referreth himself unto the certificate of the archbishop.

Plowden 122. Buckley and River's case, it is put, That if a man will bring an action of debt upon an obligation, and declare that it appears by the obligation that the defendant stood bound to the plaintiff in 20*l.* the which he hath not paid, this declaration is not good ; inasmuch as it is not alleged by matter in fact, that he was bound unto him in 20*l.* but the deed is alleged by recital only, 31 Ed. 4, 43.

Plowden Com. 126 & 143. Browning and Beeston's Case.

The Abbot of Waltham being appointed collector of a Disme granted unto the king, in discharge of himself, in the Exchequer, pleadeth, ' Quo inter recordat' Ter. Pasc. anno 15. ' domini Regis Edwardi 1 inter alia continetur quod R. 2.' had granted unto the predecessors of the said Abbot, that he nor any of his successors should be any collectors of any dimes to be granted afterwards, and it was adjudged that this plea was ill.

For the saying 'It was contained among the Records,' it is no precise affirmation that the king had granted to his predecessors, that they should be discharged of the collecting any dimes, but it is only an allegation by way of recital, and not by precise affirmation, the plea may not be good.

2 & 3 Mar. Dyer 117. & 118. the plaintiff's reply in bar of all pleadeth, that John Abbot of W. was seized of his lands in right of his church, and so seized by the assent of the tenant by indenture, 14 H. 4, 'testat' quod prædict' Abbat' et convent' demiserunt et tradiderunt' unto the plaintiff; and ruled, that this form of pleading was ill, insomuch as it was not alleged by precise affirmation, 'quod demiserunt, sed indentura testatur, quod demiserunt;' which is not sufficient, insomuch as it is only an allegation by way of recital, that the indenture doth witness, and the same indenture may witness so much, and yet not be a demise.

And if in pleading there must be direct affirmation of the matter alleged, then à fortiori in a return, which must be more precise than in pleading; and so by all the cases I have formerly touched, it appeareth that this return is no express affirmation of the keeper of the Gatehouse, that sir John Corbet is detained in prison by the special commandment of the king, but only an affirmation of the lords of the council, who had signified unto him that his detainment in prison, was by special command of the king.

The return, which ought to be certain, and punctual, and affirmative, and not by the way of information out of another man's mouth, may not be good, as appeareth by the several books of our law.

23 Ed. 3, Rex sic' 181. upon a Homine replegiando, against the Abbot of C. the sheriff returneth that he had sent to the bailiff of the abbot, that answered him, that he was the villain of the abbot, by which he might not make deliverance, and a Sicut alias was awarded, for his return was insufficient; insomuch that he had returned the answer of the bailiff of the abbot, where he ought to have returned the answer of the abbot himself out of his own mouth.

Trin. 22 E. 2, Rot. 46. parent' vill' et Burg. Evesque de Norwich, repl' 68. Nat. Br. Case 34. Fitz. Nat. Br. 65. & 34 E. 3, Excom' 29. the case appeareth to be such in a trespass; the defendant pleadeth the plaintiff is excommunicate, and sheweth forth the letter of the bishop of Lincoln, witnessing that for divers contumacies, &c. and because he had certified no excommunic' done by himself, but by another, the letter of excommunication was annulled, for the bishop ought to have certified his own act, and not the act of another.

Hillarii 21 H. 8, Rot. 37, it appeareth by the return of an H. Corpus, that John Parker was committed to prison for security of the peace, and for suspicion of felony, as 'per mandatum domini regis nunciatum per Robertum Peck,

'de Clifford's-Inn;' and upon his return, John Parker was bailed: for the return 'Commiss. fuit per speciale mandatum domini regis, nunciatum per Robertum Peck,' was not good, insomuch that it was not a direct return that he was committed 'per mandatum domini regis.'

And for the first point, I conclude, that this return is insufficient in form, insomuch, that it doth not make a precise and direct return, that he was committed and detained by the special command of the king, but only as it was signified by the warrant of the lords of the council, which will not serve the turn. And upon the book of 9 H. 6, 44. the return of the cause of a man's imprisonment ought to be precise and direct upon the H. Corpus, insomuch as thereby to be able to judge of the cause, whether it be sufficient or not: for there may not any doubt be taken to the return, be it true or false, but the court is to accept the same as true; and if it be false, the party must take his remedy by action upon the case.

And as concerning the matter of the return, it will rest upon these parts: 1. Whether the return, that he is detained in prison by special commandment of our lord the king, be good or not, without shewing the nature of the commandment, or the cause whereupon the commitment is grounded in the return? 2. Whether the time of the first commitment by the commandment of the king, not appearing to the court, is sufficient to detain him in prison? 3. Whether the imprisonment of the subjects without cause shewed, but only by the commandment of the king, be warrantable by the laws and statutes of this realm?

As to the first part, I find by the books of our law, that commandments of the king are of several natures, by some of which the imprisonment of a man's body is utterly unlawful: and by others of them, although the imprisonment may be lawful, yet the continuance of him without bail or mainprize, will be utterly unlawful.—There is a verbal command of the king, which is by word of mouth of the king's only; and such commandment by the king, by the books of our law, will not be sufficient either to imprison a man, or to continue him in prison, 16. 6. 'Monstrans de fait si,' upon an action of trespass brought for cutting of trees, the defendant pleadeth that the place where he cut them is parcel of the manor of D. whereof the king is seized in fee, and the king commanded him to cut the trees: and the opinion of the court there is, that the plea in bar was ill, because he did not shew any special commandment of the king; and there it is agreed by the whole court, that if the king commandeth one to arrest another, and the party commanded did arrest the other, an action of trespass or false imprisonment is maintainable against the party that arrested him, although it were done in the presence of the king, 39 H. 6, 17. where one justifieth the seizure of the goods of a person that is outlawed by the commandment of the king, such a party being no officer, may not in an action brought against him have any aid of the king; for such a commandment given to one that is not an officer, will not any ways avail him, that is to justify himself by the return of that commandment.

37 H. 6, 10. if the king give me a thing, and I take the same by his commandment by word of mouth, it is not justified by law; nothing may pass without matter of record.

10 H. 7, 7. and 17, 18, it is agreed, that justices may command one to arrest another that is in their view or presence, but not one that is out of their view or presence. (1 Croke. Holiday V. Oxenbridge.)

And Keble 10 H. 7, 13, said, that where one is arrested by a parol command in their view or presence, it is fitting that a record may be made of it, insomuch, that without such a record there can hardly be a justification in another term.

2. There is a commandment of the king by his commission, which, according to Calvin's case in Coke's 7th Report, it is called by him, 'breve mandatum non remediabile;' and by virtue of such a commandment, the king may neither seize the goods of his subject, nor imprison his body, as it is resolved in 42 Ass. pl. 5, where it is agreed by all the justices, that a commission to take a man's goods, or imprison his body, without indictment or suit of the party, or other due process, is against the law.

3. There is a commandment of the king, which is grounded upon a suggestion made to the king or to his council; and if a man be committed to prison by such a suggestion, by commandment of the king, it is unlawful, and not warranted by the law of the realm.

The 25 of E. 3, cap. 4, De Provisionibus, where it is contained in the Great Charter of the franchises of England, that none shall be imprisoned or arrested of his freehold or of his franchises, nor of his free customs, but by the law of the land.—It is awarded, consented and established, that from henceforth none shall be taken by petition or suggestion made to our sovereign lord the king, or to his council, until it be by indictment or presentment of his good and lawful neighbours, where such deeds are done in due manner, or by process made by writ original at the common law; nor that none shall be arrested of his franchises, nor of his freehold, unless he be duly brought in, and answer, and forfeigned of the same by way of law: and if any thing be done against the same, it shall be redressed and holden for nought.

37 E. 3, c. 10, although it be contained in the Great Charter, that no man be taken or imprisoned or put out of his freehold, without due process of the law; nevertheless, divers persons make false suggestions to the king himself, as well for malice as otherwise, whereby the king is often grieved, and divers of the realm put in great damages, contrary to the form of the same statute.

Wherefore it is ordained, that all they that make such suggestions, be sent with their suggestions to the Chancellor or Treasurer, and they and every of them find sureties to pursue their suggestions, and endure the same pain as the other should have had in case that his suggestion be found untrue: and that then process of the law be made against them, without being taken or imprisoned, against the form of the same charter, and other statutes.—So that it appears by these several statutes, that such commandments of the king as are grounded upon suggestion, either made to himself or to his council, for the imprisonment of a man, are against the law.

Fourthly, I find that there is a commandment of the king which is made under his hand, with his signet; for in 4 and 5 of Philip and Mary, Dyer 162, where the statute of 1 Ric. 2, c. 11, restraineth the Warden of the Fleet for letting any man at large that is in upon judgment at the suit of any man, except it be by writ or other commandment of the king; it was doubted, whether the queen by letter under her hand and privy-signet doth give commandment to the Warden of the Fleet to suffer a man that is there in execution to go about his business, or the affairs of the queen; whether this be a warrantable command or not within the statute: and the law hath always been conceived upon that book, that such a commandment is not warrantable by law. And if such a command will not serve the turn, to give unto a man his liberty, which the law favoureth, and had the countenance of an act of parliament for the doing of it; then I conceive it should be a more strong case, the king should not have power by his commandment to imprison a man without due process of the law, and restrain him of his liberty, when there had been so many acts of parliament made for the liberty of the subjects.

Fifthly, I do find that there is the commandment of the king, which is by his writ under the great seal, or the seal of the court out of which it issueth, Regist. f. 69, and 70. In the writ 'De cautione admittenda,' I find the words, 'mandatum regis' expounded to be 'breve regis,' for the writ goeth: 'Rex vic' salutem. Cum nuper ad requisitionem S. de Isle canonici Lincolne venerabilis patris H. Lincolne. Episcopi ipso in remotis agente vicarii general. per literas suas patentes nobis significantes Nicho. B. dict. Lincoln. dioc. propter manifestam contumaciam autoritate ipsius episcopi ordinari. excommunicat. esse nec si velle, &c. vobis preceperimus quod prestat. &c. satisfactum ex parte ipsius N. qui virtute mandati nostri predict. per vos capt. et in prison. nostra de Newgate detent. existit, &c. nos nolentes quod prestat. N. per breve nostrum predict. via precludatur, &c. prosequi possit in forma juris maxim. &c. integer esse debeat, vobis precipimus quod scire, &c. quod sit, &c. quare predict. N. a prisona predict. deliberari non debeat. Rex justiciar' suis de Banco salut. Cum nos nuper ad significationem S. de Isle, &c. usque ibi excommunicat. extitisse, nec se velle, &c. esset satisfactum ex parte ipsius N. virtute mandati nostri predict. cap. et in prisona nostra de Newgate.

' tunc detanti, &c. et nolentes eo prætextu præfato N. per breve nostrum præd. via præcludat. quo minus appellat. suæ negotium, &c. processerat. et appellant. statut. &c. per breve nostrum præceperimus præfat. vic. quod scire facerent, &c. vobis signific. et consult. et circumspect. in placitis per breve prædict. coram vobis pendentibus procedere valeatis secundum legem et consuetudinem regni nostri.'

Staf. 72, 5 E. 3, c. 8. 1 E. 3, c. 9, saith, that every Capias in a personal action is a commandment of the king, for it is 'Præcipimus tibi quod capias,' &c. and yet the defendant, as there it is said, is replevisable by the common law. 7 R. 20, a. Calvin's Case, saith, That there are two kind of writs, viz. 'brevia mandatoria et remedialia, et brevia mandatoria et non remedialia.' Brevia mandatoria et remedialia, are writs of right, formed on, &c. debts, trespasses, and shortly all writs real and personal, whereby the party wronged is to recover somewhat, and to be remedied for that wrong which is done unto him.

Sixthly, I do find by our books of law, and by the Register, that this special 'mandatum domini regis,' is expounded to be this writ, and that the law taketh no notice of any other 'speciale mandatum,' than by this writ. The which being so, when the return is made, that he is imprisoned and detained in prison by the special commandment of the king, how can the court adjudge upon this return, that sir John Corbet ought to be kept in prison, and not to be bailed; when the nature of the special commandment is not set forth in the return, whereby it may appear unto the court that he is not bailable? In Bracton, c. 12, 112, you shall see a writ reciting, 'Præcipimus tibi quod non implicites nec impliciter permittas talem de libero tenemento suo tali villa, sint speciali præcepto nostro vel capitalis justiciar' nostri.'

And the reason of it there is given, 'Quia nemo de libero tenemento sine brevi sive libello conventionali nisi gratis vquerit respondere.' So as the exception of special commandment by the very book, appeareth to be 'breve sive libellus conventionalis.' Regist. 271, the Writ of Manucaption goeth in this manner: 'Rex vic. salut cum nuper assignaverimus dilectos et fideles nostros A. B. et C. D. ad inquisitiones de forstallariis. et transgressionibus contra formam statuti dudum apud Winton. editi in com. tuo faciend. et ad illos quos inde culpabiles invenirent. capiend. et in prisona nostra salvo custod. faciend. donec aliud inde præcissemus quod C. D. et E. pro hujusmodi forstallamentis et transgressionibus unde eoram præfat. A. B. et C. D. indict. fuerint, capt. et in prisona de L. detent. exist. à qua deliberari non possunt, sine mandato nostro speciali, nos volentes eisdem C. D. et E. gratiam in hac parte facere specialem, tibi præcipimus quod si prædict. C. D. et E. occasione prædict. et non alia in prisona prædict. detineantur, et pro transgressionibus illis secundum legem et consuetudinem regni nos-

' tri Angliæ replegiabiles existunt, &c. tunc impositos' C. D. et E. a prisona prædict. si ea occasione. et non alia detineantur in eadem, interrim deliberari facias per manucapt. supradict. et habeas tibi tunc coram præfat. justiciar. nomina manucapt. illorum et hoc breve.'

And the exposition of this 'speciale mandatum domini regis,' mentioned in the Writ, is expounded to be 'breve domini regis,' and thereupon is this writ directed unto the sheriff for the delivery of them.—And so much for the first branch of the first part: I conclude, that the special command of the king, without shewing the nature of the commandment of the king, is too general, and therefore insufficient; for he ought to have returned the nature of the commandment of the king, whereby the court might have adjudged upon it, whether it were such a commandment that the imprisonment of sir John Corbet be lawful or not; and whether it were such a commandment of the king, that although the imprisonment were lawful at first, yet he might be bailed by law.

And as for the general return of 'speciale mandatum domini regis,' without shewing the cause of the imprisonment either special or general, I hold, that for that cause also the return is insufficient.

First, in regard of the Habeas Corpus, which is the commandment of the king only, made the 15th of November.

According to the teste of the Writ, commanding the keeper of the Gate-house to have the body of sir John Corbet, 'una cum causa detentionis, et ad subjiciendum et recipiendum ea quæ curia nostra de eo ad tunc ibid. ordinari contingat'; so as the commandment of the writ being to shew the cause of his detaining in prison, the keeper of the Gate-house doth not give a full answer unto the writ, unless the cause of the detainment in prison be returned; and the court doth not know how to give their judgment upon him, either for his imprisonment, or for his discharge, according to the purport of the writ, when there is not a cause returned. And forasmuch as upon an Excommungement certified, it hath been adjudged oftentimes that certificates were insufficient, where the cause of the commitment hath not been certified; that the court might adjudge whether the ecclesiastical judges, who pronounced the excommunication, had power over the original cause, according to the book of 14 Hen. 4, 14, 8. Rep. 68. Trollop's case, and 20 Edw. 3, Excommungement 9.

So upon an Habeas Corpus in this court, where a man hath been committed by the Chancellor of England, by the Council of England, Marches of Wales, Warden of the Stanaries, High-Commission, Admiralty, Dutchy, Court of Request, Commission of Sewers or Bankrupts; it hath several times been adjudged that the return was insufficient, where the particular cause of imprisonment hath not been shewn, to the intent that it might appear, that those that committed him had jurisdiction over the cause, otherwise he ought to be discharged by the law : and I spare to recite particular causes in every kind of these, because there are so many precedents of them in several ages of every king of this realm : and it is an infallible maxim of the law, That as the court of the King's-Bench, and Judges, ought not to deny an Habeas Corpus unto any prisoner that shall demand the same, by whomsoever he be committed ; so ought the cause of his imprisonment to be shewn upon the return, so that the court may adjudge of the cause, whether the cause of the imprisonment be lawful or not. And because I will not trouble the court with so many precedents, but such as shall suit with the cause in question, I will only produce and vouch such precedents, where the party was committed either by the commandment of the king, or otherwise by the commandment of the privy-council, which Stamford. fol. 72. termeth the mouth of the king ; such acts as are done by the privy-council, being as acts done by the king himself.—And in all these causes you shall find that there is a cause returned as well as ‘ a speciale mandatum domini regis, &c.’ or ‘ mandatum privati concilii domini regis,’ whereby the court may adjudge of the cause, and bail them if they shall see cause.

In the 8th Hen. 7, upon return of an Habeas Corpus awarded for the body of one Roger Sherry, it appeareth that he was committed by the mayor of Windsor for suspicion of felony, and ‘ ad sectam ipsius regis pro quibusdam felonis et transgressionibus ac per mandatum domini regis ;’ 21 H. 7. upon the return of an Habeas Corpus sent for the body of Hugh Pain, it appeared that he was committed to prison, ‘ per mandatum dominorum privati consilii domini regis pro suspicione felonie.’

1 Hen. 8, Rot. 9, upon the return of an Habeas Corpus sent for the body of one Tho. Harrison and others, it appears that they were committed to the earl of Shrewsbury, being marshal of the household, ‘ per mandatum domini regis, et pro suspicione felonie, et pro homicidio facto super mare.’—3 et 4 Philip. et Maria, upon a return of an Habeas Corpus, sent for the body of one Peter Man, it appeareth that he was committed ‘ pro suspicione felonie, ac per mandatum domini regis et regine.’—4 et 5 Philip et Maria, upon the return of an Habeas Corpus sent for the body of one Thomas Newport, it appeared that he was committed to the Tower, ‘ pro suspicione contrafacti monetæ per privatum concilium domini regis et regine.’—33 Eliz. upon the return of an Habeas Corpus for the body of one Laurence Brown, it appeared that he was committed, ‘ per mandatum privati concilii domine regine pro diversis causis ipsam reginam tangent’ ac etiam pro suspicione prodicionis.’

So as by all these precedents it appeareth where the return is either, ‘ per mandatum domini regis,’ or ‘ per mandatum dominorum privati concilii domini regis,’ there is also a cause over and besides the mandatum returned. As to that which may be objected, that ‘ per mandatum domini regis,’ or ‘ privati con-

1. That there is a cause: for it is not to be presumed that the king or council would commit one to prison without some offence; and therefore this mandatum being occasioned by the offence or fault, must be the cause, and not the command of the king or council, which is occasioned by the cause.

2. It appears that the jurisdiction of the privy-council is a limited jurisdiction, for they have no power in all causes, their power being restrained in certain causes by several acts of parliament, as it appeareth by the Stat. of 20 E. 3, c. 11. 25 E. 3, c. 1. Stat. 4, (vide 4 Instit. p. 53.) the private petition in parliament permitted in the 1 R. 2, where the commons petition that the privy-council might not make any ordinance against the common law, customs or statutes of the realm; the 4 H. 4. cap. 3. 13 H. 4, 7. 31 H. 6. And their jurisdiction being a limited jurisdiction, the cause and grounds of their commitment ought to appear, whereby it may appear if the lords of the council did commit him for such a cause as was within their jurisdiction: for if they did command me to be committed to prison for a cause whereof they had not jurisdiction, the court ought to discharge me of this imprisonment. And howsoever the king is ‘ Vicarius Dei in terra,’ yet Bracton, cap. 8, fol. 107, saith, ‘ quod nihil aliud potest rex in terris cum sit minister Dei et vicarius, quam solum quod de jure potest, nec obstat, quod dicitur quod principi placet, legis habet vigorem, quia sequitur in fine legis cum lege regia que de ejus imperio lata est; id est, non quicquid de voluntate regis temere præsumptum est, sed animo condendi jura, sed quod consilio magistratum suorum regis author, præstant, et habita super hoc deliberatione et tract. rect. fuer. definit. potestat. itaque sua juris est, et non injuria.’ The which being so, then also it ought to appear upon what cause the king committeth one to prison; whereby the judges which are indifferent between the king and his subjects, may judge whether his commitment be against the laws and statutes of this realm, or not.

3. It is to be observed, that the king's command by his writ of Habeas Corpus, is since the commandment of the king for his commitment; and this being the latter commandment, ought to be obeyed: wherefore that commanding a return of the body ‘ cum causa detentionis,’ there must be a return of some other cause than ‘ per mandatum domini regis,’ the same commandment being before the return of the writ.

Pasch. 9 E. 3, pl. 30, fol. 56, upon a writ of Cessavit brought in the county of Northumberland, the Defendants plead, That by reason of the county being destroyed by wars with the Scots, king Ed. 2 gave command that no writ of Cessavit should be brought during the wars with Scotland, and that the king had sent his writ to surcease the plea, and he averreth that the wars with Scotland did continue.

Hearle that giveth the rule saith, That we have command by the king that now is, to hold this plea, wherefore we will not surcease for any writ of the king that is dead. And so upon all these reasons and precedents formerly alledged, I conclude, that the return that sir John Corbet was committed and detained in prison, 'per speciale mandatum domini regis,' without shewing the nature of the commandment, by which the court may judge whether the commandment be of such a nature as he ought to be detained in prison, and that without shewing the cause upon which the commandment of the king is grounded, is not good. As to the second part, which is, Whether the time of the commitment by the return of the writ, not appearing unto the court, the court ought to detain him in prison, or no? I conceive that he ought not to be continued in prison, admitting that the first commitment by the command of the king were lawful; yet when he hath continued in prison by such reasonable time, as may be thought fit for that offence for which he is committed, he ought to be brought to answer, and not to continue still in prison without being brought to answer.—For it appears by the books of our laws, that liberty is a thing so favoured by the law, that the law will not suffer the continuance of a man in prison for any longer time than of necessity it must; and therefore the law will neither suffer the party, sheriffs or judges to continue a man in prison by their power and their pleasure, but doth speed the delivery of a man out of prison, with as reasonable expedition as may be.

And upon this reason it is resolved, in 1 & 2 El. Dyer 175. & 8 Ed. 4, 13, That howsoever the law alloweth that there may be a term between the teste of an original writ and the return of the same, where there is only a summons, and no imprisonment of the body; yet it will not allow that there shall be a term between the teste of a writ of Capias, and the return of the same, where the body of a man is to be imprisoned: insomuch that it will give no way, that the party shall have any power to continue the body of a man imprisoned any longer time than needs must, 39 E. 3, 7. 10 H. 7, 11. 6 E. 4, 69. 11 E. 4, 9. 48 E. 3, 1. 17 E. 3, 1. & 2 Hen. 7.

Keilaway's Reports do all agree, that if a Capias shall be awarded against a man for the apprehending of his body, and the sheriff will return the Capias that is awarded against the party, a 'non est inventus,' or that 'languidus est in prisona,' yet the law will allow the party against whom it is awarded, for the avoiding of his corporal penance and duress of imprisonment, to appear gratis, and for to answer.—For the law will not allow the sheriff by his false return to keep one in prison longer than needs must, 38 Ass. pl. 22. Brooks imprisonment 100. saith, That it was determined in parliament that a man is not to be detained in prison, after he hath made tender of his fine for his imprisonment; therefore I desire your lordship that sir John Corbet may not be longer kept in durance, but be discharged according to the law.

L. C. Justice. Mr. Attorney, you have heard many learned Arguments; if you be provided to answer presently, we will hear you; but if you will have a longer day, for that you are not provided to argue, you may, we will give it you.

Doderidge. If you will, you may see the precedents; it may be you have not seen some of them, and we must see them too.

Att. Gen. (Heath.) May it please your lordship, the gentlemen that be of counsel with the knights at the bar, they have said much, and spoken very long for their clients, and to good purpose and pertinently. It is a cause that carrieth with it a great deal of weight, both towards the king and his subjects also, and I am not so hasty to put myself upon the main point of this cause, when it is almost time for your lordship to rise.

My lord, the gentlemen have severally spoken, and given and insisted upon several reasons, and they have cited many precedents. I could say something of them at this present, and that some of them have been mistaken; and therefore I beseech your lordship, that I may have time to answer, that I may not wrong the cause of the king's part, or slight the cause on the subject's part.

But that which I desire to say now is, that these gentlemen have all of them gone in one form, to divide the cause into two parts: The first, the Form of the return. The second, the Matter of the return. For the form, methinks we may put an end to that now, if your lordship please, that we may have no return to that another day, but I may apply myself unto the matter of the return.

To the Form of the return they have taken divers exceptions, but they especially insisted upon two main heads: First, That the Return is not good, because it is not an absolute return. I confess the ground is well laid, and the major is good, that if this return be not positively the return of the Warden of the Fleet himself, but the relation of another, it is no good return, therefore I need spend no time in that, the ground being well laid. But under your lordship's favour, the minor proposition I deny, we differ only in that; for I say that this return is certain, and that it is not the words of any man else, but the express words of the warden himself, and that this is added ex abundanti to give satisfaction to the court, that he had order to make the return: therefore I desire your lordship to cast your eyes upon the substance of the return, and distinguish it into parts. The words are, 'Detentus est in prisona sub custodia mea per speciale mandatum domini regis, mihi significatum per Warrantum duorum privati concilii dicti domini regis, &c.' If he had turned these words, and said, 'Detent' est prout mihi significat' per 'Warrantum duorum privati concilii per speciale mandatum domini regis,' then it might be taken to be the words of the lords of the council: but the first words being positive, 'Detentus est per speciale mandatum domini regis,' that is sufficient, and the rest is surplussage, and he doth not say, 'prout mihi significat,' but 'mihi significat' only; which is absolute, and the resolution thereof resteth more in your lordship's expounding of the words, than in putting any case upon them.

The second exception is taken to the Form of the return, for that there is not the cause of the imprisonment returned, but of the detaining alone. My lord, I say no more at present to that, but this: no man is bound to answer more than that which is the contents of the writ. But the writ it may be to know specially the cause of the detaining, or what the cause of the caption is only, and if the officer make answer to that which is required of him in the writ, it is sufficient. It may be, there be precedents both ways, I am sure there are for detentions, and there is no cause why the officer shall shew the time of his commitment: but if the prisoner shall desire it, your lordship may grant him a writ, to shew the cause both of his caption and detention also.

Thirdly, They say that this return is uncertain, and that it is the Warrant of the lords of the council, and not of the king, by which he is committed. For that, my lords, I say, that if it had all been left out, and he had only said, 'Detentus fuit per speciale mandatum domini regis,' it had been sufficient: but when he doth more, it is superfluous, and not necessary, for it appeared before by whom he was committed; and when he returns the warrant of the lords of the council, it is not their words that commit him: but they being the representative body of the king, they do express what the king's command is, but they signify nothing of their own; and therefore I desire your lordship to deliver your opinion in that point of the return, whether it be positive or no.

This cause, as it greatly concerns the Subjects, so it much concerns the king too. I am sorry there should be any occasion to bring these things in question; but since it is now here, I hope I shall give satisfaction to your lordship, and to the parties too, and I desire that I may have till Monday for it.

L. C. Justice. I think it is not best for us to declare our opinions by piece-meals, but upon all the case together, and as you are a stranger to the return, so are we; and there be many precedents and acts of parliament not printed, which we must see.

Doderidge. This is the greatest cause that ever I knew in this court; our judgments that we give between party and party, between the king and the meanest subject, ought to be maturely advised on, for so are the entries of our judgments, 'Quod matura deliberatione habita,' It was judged, &c. And we must see the precedents and acts of parliament that we hear mentioned.

Justice Jones. Mr. Attorney, if it be so that the law of Magna Charta and other statutes be now in force, and the gentlemen be not delivered by this court, how shall they be delivered? Apply yourself to shew us any other way to deliver them.

Doderidge. Yea, or else they shall have a perpetual imprisonment.

Per Curiam. Monday was appointed for the Attorney's argument, and in the interim the Counsel for the gentlemen were by order appointed to attend the Judges with all the precedents and unprinted statutes which they mentioned, and that they should let the Attorney see them also.—And the gentlemen being asked if they desired to come again, answered they did, and a Rule was entered for it.

Monday, 26 November, 1627. Tertio Michaelis, 38 Caroli Regis, in Banco Regis.

Sir John Corbet, sir Walter Earl, sir John Heveningham, sir Edmund Hampden, knights, were brought to the bar.

Attorney-General (Heath). May it please your lordship, these gentlemen, sir John Corbet, sir Walter Earl, sir John Heveningham, and sir Edmund Hampden, upon their motion to this Court to have their Habeas Corpus, and that themselves, and the cause of their detaining them in their several prisons, might be brought before your lordship, had it granted to them.—My lord, at the first motion of it, the knowledge thereof coming, and that they had such a desire, his majesty was very willing to grant unto them, as to all his subjects, this common case of justice; and though it be a case which concerns himself in a high degree, yet he hath been so gracious and so just, as not to refuse to leave the examination and determination thereof to the laws of this kingdom.—My lord, it is very true that this is a very great cause, and hath raised a great expectation, and for the manner of it, more than was necessary; but, my lord, I am afraid these gentlemen whom it concerns, have rather advised their counsel, than their counsel them: but I shall take the case as now I find it, and as the gentlemen's counsel, on the other side, have led me the way to it.—The exceptions that have been taken by the counsel on the other side, to the return made by the warden of the Fleet, and the rest of the guardians of several prisons, have been two. For renewing of your lordship's memory, we will read one of the Returns, they are all alike.

Then the Return was read for sir John Heveningham, by Mr. Keeling.

Attorney-General. May it please your lordship, against this return the counsel of the gentlemen have taken some exceptions, and have divided their objections into two main points, the one the Form, the other the Matter. To the Form they have objected four several things: 1. That the return is not positive, but referred to the signification made by another, as the lords of the council. 2. That the keepers of the prisons have not returned the cause of the commitment, but the cause of the cause, which is not good. 3. That the return is imperfect, for that it shews only the cause of the detaining in prison, and not the cause of the first commitment.—And lastly, That the return is contradictory in itself, for that in the first part thereof there is a certification that the detaining of these gentlemen in prison, is ‘per speciale mandatum domini regis;’ and when the Warrant of the lords of the council is shewed, it appears that the commitment is by the command of the king, signified by the lords of the council: and by your lordships favour, I will give a several answer to every of these several objections. And for the first, that the return is not positive and affirmative, but depends upon and hath relation to some other, and therefore it is not good; I do agree that the ground is true, that if the return be not positive, it is not good: we differ only in the minor, that the return is not positive and affirmative; for I agree that these Book-cases, that have been put, are good law: as 27 Ass. pl. 65, that if the sheriff return that he had sent to the bailiff of the hundred, and he gives him that answer, that is no good return; for the sheriff ought to make the return as of his own act, without naming of the bailiff of the hundred in his return: for if he return, ‘Quod mandavi ballivo itineranti qui habet return’ ‘omnium brevium et executionum eorund’ per ‘cartam domini regis qui mihi dedit nullum responsum;’ this is not good, if he were not bailiff of a franchise or signiory, for so is 21 H. 7, fol. 4.

There hath been cited to maintain these objections, 20 Ed. 3. The record I have perused, and there I find that the Bishop said, that it is found in archivio, in the record, &c. that he was excommunicated; but it was found to be in archivio, &c. and that is no positive return that it is so. I will oppugn what hath been said by the Counsel on the other side; it must be granted that if the return here be not positive, it is imperfect, and in 5 H. 7, 28, it is said, that an imperfect return is no return at all, it is all one; but if the return was so, that was not much material, for then it were but temporary, and it might be amended: but, my lord, they have mistaken the minor proposition, for they have taken it as granted that there is an imperfect return from the lords of the council. My lord, I shall intreat you to cast your eyes upon the return, and you shall find the first words positive and affirmative: the words are, ‘Quod detentus est sub custodia mea per speciale mandatum domini regis;’ the other words, ‘mibi significatum,’ follow after, but are not part of the affirmation made before it. But if they will have it as they seem to understand it, then they must turn the words thus: ‘Quod testificatum,’ or ‘significatum est mihi per dominos privati concilii quod detentus est per speciale mandatum domini regis;’ and then indeed it had not been their own proper return, but the signification of another, the lords of the council: the turning of the sentence will resolve this point; the thing itself must speak for itself. I conceive by your lordship’s favour, that it is plain and clear, here is a positive return, that the detaining is by the commandment of the king: and the rest of the return is rather for satisfaction to myself and the Court, than otherwise any part of the return.

The second Objection hath dependance upon this, as that he hath returned the cause of the cause, and not the cause itself, wherein, under your lordship’s favour, they are utterly mistaken; for the return is affirmative, ‘Ego Johannes hannes Lilioe testifico, &c.’ I know that among the logicians there are two causes, there is causa causans, and causa causata: the causa causans here in this case is not the warrant from the lords of the council, for that is causa causata: but the primary and original cause, which is causa causans, is ‘speciale mandatum domini regis;’ the other is but the council’s signification or testification, or warrant for him that made the return.

To the third Objection, that the return is imperfect, because it shews only the cause of the detaining in prison, and not the cause of the first commitment: My lord, for that I shall not insist much upon it, for that I did say the last day, which I must say again, it is sufficient for an officer of the law to answer that point of the Writ which is in command.—Will your lordship please to bear the Writ read, and then to see, whether the wardens of the prisons have not made answer to so much as was in command?

Then the Writ was read by Mr. Keeling.

Attorney-General. My lord, the Writ itself clears the objection; for it is to have the party mentioned in it, and the cause of his detention, returned into this court; and therefore the answer to that is sufficient. Only, my lord, the warden of the Fleet, and the rest of the keepers of the prisons, had dealt prudently in their proceedings, if they had only said, that they were detained ‘per speciale mandatum domini regis;’ and it had been good, and they might have omitted the rest: but because, if they should make a false return, they were liable to the actions of the party, they did discreetly to have the certification of the lords of the council, in suspicion that if this return was not true, they were liable to the actions of these gentlemen.—In 9 H. 6, 40, 44, it is said, That whatsoever the cause be that is returned, it must be accepted by the court; they must not doubt of the truth of the Return, and the officer that shall return it is liable to an action if the return is false; and therefore the guardians of the prisons did wisely, because they knew this was a case of great expectation, to shew from whom they had their warrant, and so to see whether the cause be true or not.

The last Objection to the Return is, that it is contradictory in itself, as that the first part of it is, that they are detained in prison ‘per speciale mandatum domini regis;’ but in this relation of it, it shews that they are detained by the command of the lords of the council; for the words of their Warrant are, to require you still to detain him, &c.—But, my lord, if they will be pleased to see the whole Warrant together, they shall find that the lords of the council speak not their own words or command in that warrant, but they say that you are to take notice of it, as the words and command of the king; for, my lord, the lords of the council are the servants to the king, they signify his majesty's pleasure to your lordship, and they say it is his majesty's pleasure you should know that the first commitment, and this present detaining him in prison, are by his majesty's special commandment.—And this, my lord, is all that I will say for the sufficiency of the Form of the return, to prove that it is sufficient.

Touching the matter of the return, the main point thereof, it is but a single question, and I hope, my lord, of no great difficulty; and that is, whether they be replevisable, or not replevisable? It appears that the commitment is not in a legal and ordinary way, but that it is 'per speciale mandatum domini regis;' which implies, not only the fact done, but so extraordinarily done, that it is notorious to be his majesty's immediate act and will it should be so; whether in this case they should be bailable or not in this court, which I acknowledge to be the highest court of judicature for such a case as is in question.

The counsel on the other side desire, that they may be bailed, and have concluded that they may not be remanded; their grounds of argument, though they were many that did speak, I have in my Collection divided into five points:

The first was, Reasons that they must be so, arising from the inconveniences that would fall to the subjects, if it should not be so in the main points of their liberty. The second was, they shewed divers authorities out of their law-books, which they endeavoured to apply. The third was, The Petition of the Commons answered by several kings in parliament. The fourth was, Acts of Parliament in print. The last was, Precedents of divers times, which they alledged to prove, that men committed by the king's commandment, and by the commandment of the lords of the privy-council, (which I conceive to be all one, for the body of the privy-council represents the king himself) that upon such commitment in such causes men had been bailed.

In the course of my arguments I will follow their method, first, to answer their Reasons, and then those Books which they have cited, which I conceive to be pertinent to this question, and then the Petition and Answer made in parliament, and then their Acts of Parliament, next their Precedents; and lastly, I will give your lordship some reasons of my own, which I hope shall sufficiently satisfy your lordship and all others, but the parties themselves, for I except them.

My lord, the great and mighty Reason that they insisted upon, was the inconveniences that might come to the subjects in their liberties, if this return should be good; and this reason they inferred out of records and books of the common law, which gives the liberty of the subjects; I do acknowledge that the Liberty of the Subject is just, and that it is the inheritance of the subject, but yet it is their inheritance secundum legem terræ.

My lords, they put many Cases likewise to enforce it, 1 and 2 Eliz. Dyer, fo. 175, that the continuance of a Capias shall be from term to term, without a term betwixt, because otherwise the party defendant may be kept too long in prison; and 38 Ass. pl. 22, Broke tit Imprisonment 100, that imprisonment is but to detain the party till he have made fine to the king, and therefore the king cannot justly detain him in prison after the fine tendered; and 16 H. 6, monstrans de faict 182, if the king command me to arrest a man, and thereupon I do arrest him, he may have an action of false imprisonment, or of trespass against me, though it be done in the king's presence: and 1 H. 7. 4, the discourse of Hussey, where he saith, that sir John Markham delivered unto king Edward the 4th, that he should not arrest upon treason or felony any of his subjects, because he could not wrong his subjects by such arrest, for they could not have remedy against him.

These, my lord, are the Causes that they insisted upon for this purpose. To the two first, I shall give but one answer; which is, That the restraint in these two cases, and most of the other cases before cited, appears to be in the ordinary course of judicature fit for Westminster-hall, and not for the king's council-table. A writ of Capias was the first original of it, and therefore not to be applied to the cause of ours.

And for the other two cases, the law presumeth that the active part of them is not so proper for the majesty of a king, whoever doth these things by his subordinate officers; but that the subject should not be committed by the king, was never heard of, for the king may commit any man at his pleasure; but that is not our case: but whether when the king hath committed one, he must render a cause of that commitment, that it may appear whether the party be bailable or not, or else the party must be delivered.

The book 9 E. 3, fol. 16, pl. 30, cited of a Cessavit, the king having by proclamation commanded, that in the county of Northumberland no Cessavit should be brought, &c. during the war; the tenant pleaded this command, and it was denied him, and he, notwithstanding that, was commanded to plead; but the reason thereof was, because the commandment thereof was given by E. 2, who being dead, the commandment was determined.

The Book of Edw. 3, 4 fol. 16, is indeed, where the commandment was given by the same king, and that was likewise denied him; for the king cannot command your lordship, or any other court of justice, to proceed otherwise than according to the laws of this kingdom; for it is part of your lordship's oath, to judge according to the law of the kingdom. But, my lord, there is a great difference between those legal commands, and that absoluta potestas that a sovereign hath, by which a king commands; but when I call it absoluta potestas, I do not mean that it is such a power as that a king may do what he pleaseth, for he hath rules to govern himself by, as well as your lordships, who are subordinate judges under him. The difference is, the king is the head of the same fountain of justice, which your lordship administers to all his subjects; all justice is derived from him, and what he doth, he doth not as a private person, but as the head of the common wealth, as judiciarius regni, yea, the very essence of justice under God upon earth is in him; and shall not we generally, not as subjects only, but as lawyers, who govern themselves by the rules of the law, submit to his commands, but make inquiries whether they be lawful, and say that the king doth not this or that in course of justice?

If your lordship sitting here shall proceed according to justice, who calleth your actions in question, except there are some errors in the proceeding; and then you are subject to a writ of error.—But who shall call in question the actions or the justice of the king, who is not to give any account for them? as in this our case, that he commits a subject, and shews no cause for it.

The king commits and often shews no cause; for it is sometimes generally, 'Per speciale mandatum domini regis,' sometimes 'Pro certis causis ipsum dominum regem moventibus;' but if the king do this, shall it not be good? It is all one when the commitment is 'Per speciale mandatum domini regis,' and when it is 'Pro certis causis ipsum dominum regem moventibus;' and it is the same if the commitment be 'Certis de causis ipsum dominum regem tangentibus.'

And, my lord, unless the Return to you doth open the secrets of the commitment, your lordship cannot judge whether the party ought by law to be remanded, or delivered; and therefore if the king allow and give warrant to those that make the return, that they shall express the cause of the commitment, as many times he doth, either for suspicion of felony, or making money, or the like; we shall shew your lordship that in these causes this court in its jurisdiction were proper to try these criminal causes, and your lordship doth proceed in them although the commitment be 'per speciale mandatum domini regis,' which hath not a secret in it in these causes, for with the warrant he sendeth your lordship the cause of the committing; and when these warrants are made and brought into this court, your lordship may proceed: but if there be no cause expressed, this court hath always used to remand them; for it hath been used, and it is to be intended a matter of state, and that it is not ripe nor timely for it to appear.

My lord, the main fundamental grounds of argument upon this case begins with Magna Charta, from thence have grown statutes for explanation thereof, several Petitions of parliament, and Precedents for expedition; I shall give answers to them all.

For Magna Charta, in the 29th chapter, hath these words; 'No freeman shall be taken or imprisoned, or disseised, of his freehold liberties, nor free customs, nor be outlawed, or exiled, nor any other way destroyed, nor we will not pass upon him nor condemn him, but by lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the realm.'—My lord, this statute hath been many times confirmed; the lord Coke numbered up the number to be about twenty; and we are to conclude on this, it is the foundation of our Liberties.

No freeman can be imprisoned but by 'legale iudicium parium suorum, aut per legem terræ.' But will they have it understood that no man should be committed, but first he shall be indicted or presented? I think that no learned man will offer that; for certainly there is no justice of peace in a county, nor constable within a town, but he doth otherwise, and might commit before an Indictment can be drawn or a presentment can be made: what then is meant by these words, 'Per legem terræ?' If any man shall say, this doth not warrant that the king may for reasons moving him commit a man, and not be answerable for it, neither to the party, nor (under your lordship's favour) unto any court of justice, but to the High Court of Heaven; I do deny it, and will prove it by our Statutes.

My lord, it was urged by the counsel on the other side, that our printed Magna Charta, which saith 'nec super eum mittimus,' is mistaken; and that in divers Manuscripts it is expressly set down to be, 'nec eum in carcerem mittimus.' I cannot judge of the Manuscripts that I have not seen; but, my lord, I have one here by me, which was written many years ago, and the words in print are word for word as that which is here written.

Then they say, that Matthew Paris sets it down so in his History: My lord, we do not govern ourselves by Chronicle, but to answer that of Matthew Paris, he reports a thing done in king John's time, but it was then but thought on, and it was enacted in the time of Henry 3; and there be many things said to be done in Matthew Paris which were not, and many things omitted by him which were done. This Charter was but in election in the time of king John, and then it might be, 'nec eum in carcerem mittimus;' but it was not enacted till the time of Henry 3, and then that was omitted, and the Charter granted as now we have it.—But if they do see no more than I in this Clause, I know not why we should contend about these words, seeing the first part of this Statute saith, 'Nemo imprisonetur,' why then may not I say as well, 'nec eum in carcerem mittimus?' I see no difference in the words, and therefore, my lord, I shall not insist any longer upon the literal exposition of the words of Magna Charta, but I will resort to the rest of it, which is express in the subsequent statute and in common practice.

The Counsel on the other side said, that the statute of 28 E. 3, c. 3. expresseth and giveth life to this Charter; I shall desire to have that Statute read.

Keeling, Clerk. Item, 'Whereas it is contained in the Great Charter,' &c. (Vide all these Statutes in Littleton's Argument in Parliament postea.)

Attorney General. My lord, the reading of this statute will give answer to it; for it is apparent by the words thereof, none shall be taken by Petition, &c. and that the court be extended to the first arrest, but they are to be understood that none shall be condemned, but he shall be brought to answer, and be tried. And if it be expounded otherwise, it will be contrary to that practice which was then in use.—But it is utterly forbidden by this Statute, that any man should be condemned upon suggestions or petitions made to the king or council, without due trial by law.—The next Statute they cited was 25 E. 3. cap. 4. My lord, I desire that that may be read.

Keeling, Clerk. Item, 'That no man, of what estate or condition soever he be, shall be put out of land or tenement, nor taken, nor imprisoned, nor disinherited, nor put to death, without being brought to answer by due process of law.'

Attorney General. My lord, this Statute is intended to be a final prosecution: for if a man shall be imprisoned without due process, and never be brought to answer, that is unjust, and forbidden by this statute; but when a man is taken in causes that are unknown to us, (who walk below stairs) we are not privy to the circumstances which may cause the trial to be delayed; and peradventure it is not time to bring the matter to trial, because it is not yet come to maturity, and therefore this is not within the meaning of the statute.—Another Statute that they mention is in the same year, and it is page 9. ch. 9. I desire it may be read.

Keeling, Clerk. Item, 'Because the People of the realm, &c.' (Vide Littleton's Argument postea.)

Attorney General. My lord, it is very clear that this Statute had no manner of thought of this cause in question; but whereas sheriffs did procure commissions to be awarded to themselves for their private gain, to the prejudice of the subject, the statute condemneth those commissions, but it maketh nothing to this question, which we have now in hand. The next Statute which they cited, was 37 Ed. 3, cap. 18. I beseech it may be read.

Keeling, Clerk. 'Item, Though it be contained in the Great Charter,' &c. (Vide as abovesaid.)

Attorney General. My lord, this Statute seems to be a commentary and light to the other Statutes, the scope whereof is against private suggestions made to the king or his council, and not in a legal way, and therefore it condemns them; and this is more fully expressed in the Statute of 38 Edw. 3, cap. 9. which they likewise mentioned: By which statute direction is given what security, those persons which make such suggestions, are to give, that they should prosecute their suggestions, and what punishment they shall undergo, if their suggestions be found false.

Keeling, Clerk. 'Item, As to the article made at the last parliament,' &c. (Vide as before said.)

Attorney General. My lord, this and the last Statute seem to conduce both to one purpose, that they that in their accusations went not in a legal way to bring the party to his answer, it was directed by this statute, that they should go a legal way.—The last act of parliament in print, the counsel on the other side produced; was the Statute of 1 K. 2, cap. 12. which I desire may be read.

Keeling, Clerk. 'Item, Whereas divers people at the suit of parties were committed to the Fleet,' &c. (Vide as before.)

Attorney General. My lord, it appeareth that the scope of this Statute is against the Wardens of the Fleet, for some miscarriages in them; but there is one thing in this Statute which I shall desire your lordship to observe; and that is, for those misdemeanors he shall forfeit his office, except it be by writ from the king, or his commandment; so that it was no new doctrine in those times, that the king might then give such commandment for committing. The scope of this Statute had two hands: 1. That the warden should forfeit his office; and, 2. That he should recompense the party.

In the 4th and 5th of Phil. et Mar. Dyer 162. it was resolved, That if the Warden shall deliver a man out of prison without command, he forfeiteth his office, and damage unto the party; but if he have the command of the king, that shall excuse the forfeiture of his office: but he must bring the party hither, and here these gentlemen are now, for that commandment of the king is no exception for him not to observe.—If he receives a writ from this court, to shew the court from whence he receives his warrant, it may excuse the forfeiture of his office, but notwithstanding he is subject to the action of the party.

But I desire your lordship to observe that part of the Statute, which the other party would not make use of, which is, that the king may command by writ or otherwise; these were all the printed statutes cited by the counsel on the other side. But because I would not misinterpret these statutes, I thought it equal to desire your lordship that they might be read. Besides the printed Statutes, they mentioned Petitions by the commons, and the Answers to them of several kings in parliament. The first is, Rot. pl. 6 Ed. 3, numero 1 et 20: besides these two, there is one other of 28 Ed. 3, n. 18.

My lord, of these three Petitions and their Answers, the two first were mentioned by the counsel on the other side; and that in 28 Ed. 3, 28, I have produced, all of them even to one purpose. The commons then petitioned the king, that all the Statutes made in exposition of Magna Charta, and of the Forest, may be kept and observed: the king makes Answer, that it shall be done. And in one of the Answers it is said, If any man be grieved he may complain. But what is all this to the point in question? Could there be any other Answer to give life to these requests? The king he is petitioned that some are injured; he answers, That if they complain, they shall be relieved.

And now, my lord, we are where we were, to find out the true meaning of Magna Charta, for there is the foundation of our case; all this that hath been said concerneth other things, and is nothing to the thing in question. There is not a word either of the commitment of the king, or commandment of the council, in all the Statutes and Records.

And now, my lord, I am at an end of those Statutes, and come to that that was alledged and mentioned to be in 3 H. 6, 46. and if I could have found it, I would have brought it, but I could not find it; therefore if they have it, I desire that they will shew it, but I think they have it not, and therefore I will let that go.

My lord, I come to that which I insisted upon, the question as it was at first, not whether the king or the lords of the council can commit a man, and shew no cause wherefore they do commit him; but whether the ordinary courts of justice have power to bail him or no; for that I will insist upon the Statute of Westm. 1. which I desire your lordship may be read, and then I will apply. (vide Westm. primo.)—My lord, this Statute, if I misunderstand it not, is a full expression to the purpose of Magna Charta; the scope whereof is to direct us in what cases men unprisoned were to be bailed. It was especially for direction to the sheriffs and others; but to say courts of justice are excluded from this statute, I conceive it cannot be. It recites, That whereas heretofore it was not resolved in what cases men were replevisable, and in what cases not, but only in these four cases; for the death of a man, or by the commandment of the king, or of his justices, or of the forest.—My lord, I say that this statute expresseth not the law was made by this statute, that in these cases men were not replevisable; but it expresseth that the law was clear in these cases; in these four cases it was clearly resolved before.

I pray you, my lord, observe the time of the making of this Statute; that of Magna Charta was made in the time of Henry 3, and this of Westminster in the time of Edw. 1, so that it was made in the time of the same.—And, my lord, if they had understood the statute of Magna Charta in another sense, would they not have expressed it so in this statute? Was it not fitter for them than for us, they being nearer the first making of Magna Charta than we are? But certainly the Statute of Magna Charta was expounded at the time, as I have shewed before; if not, without all doubt at the time of making of Westm. primo.

● The parliament would not have been so careful to provide for things of lesser moment and omit this of so great consequence, if there had been any question of it. In all times and ages, Magna Charta hath been confirmed, but they shew not any one law that doth except against this positive law of Westminster the first, or any acts of parliament; nay more, in any printed Books, that in this case men should be replevisable.

My lord, if you know nothing printed or unprinted, if any will desire to alter a course that always hath been held, you will seek for Precedents, for the constant use and course is the best exposition of the law; it is not enough for me to say, This it is, unless I make it good.

First then, I say, they on the other side cannot cite one Book, Statute, or other thing, to prove, that they that have been committed 'per speciale mandatum domini regis,' are bailable. But, my lord, I find some to the contrary, that they are not bailable, and I will cite some of them, and read of others; for I would not in a case of that expectation, that it should be thought that any thing should be misinterpreted.

In the 33 Hen. 6, f. 29, Robert Poyning's Case, he was committed 'pro diversis causis' 'ipsum dominum regem tangeret'; this alters not the case, for it was as good as no cause, for it was the Warrant 'domini regis,' and there is no question upon this: but, my lord, I know this is not the point in question.

The next thing I shall shew unto your lordship, is Pusch. 21 Edw. 1, Rot. cla. 2, and this, my lord, was near the time of making of the statute of Westm. 1, and this precedent is to this purpose: The sheriff of Leicestershire and Warwickshire (for then there was but one sheriff to both those shires) did receive commandment by letters from the king, That whereas the earl of Warwick had commanded divers persons to the custody of the said sheriff, the king sent a letter to the said sheriff, commanding, that to those who were committed to his custody by the earl of Warwick, he should shew no grace to them; that is, they should not be bailed.—The sheriff, notwithstanding this command, lets some of those prisoners to bail; whereupon he was complained of in parliament, that he had done against the king's commandment, and he was condemned for it.

This was in parliament; I wonder this should be done in parliament, and that it was not said there, that this commitment, being done by the king's commandment, was not good; no, he was condemned in parliament, for it was one that did break the statute of Westm. prim.

My lord, the use that I make of this Record is this: It recites, that the earl of Warwick committed divers, it might be that he did commit them by direction from the king; but the record mentioneth not so much, but it shews, that the king by letters commanded the sheriff, that he should shew those persons no grace, and yet he did; he was examined upon this, and by parliament committed.

The next matter I will offer to your lordship's judgment for the true exposition of the law in this case, is the Book we call The Register, an authority respected, it is the foundation of all our writs at the common law; I bring not the book. In this book there is one writ saith thus, 'Rex, &c. Quod repari' fac' A. nisi fuerit per 'speciale mandatum domini regis.'

Justice Doderidge. In what writ is that, 'De homine replegiando?'

Attorn. Gen. Yes, in the writ 'De homine replegiando;' and there is another writ directed to the constable of Dover, in the very same words; by which it appears that they that are imprisoned by the king's command, 'non sunt replegiabiles.' Mr. Fitzherbert, a grave judge, and is in authority with us, perusing these writs, expressed it in these words plainly: "There are some cases wherein a man cannot have this writ, although he be taken and detained in prison; as if he be taken by the death of a man, or if he be taken by the commandment of the king's justices;" and mentions not Chief Justice: which I believe is to be intended not of the chief of the court of judicature, but of the chief justice of England, for there was such a one in those days. Thus, my lord, you see the opinion of Mr. Fitzherbert in this case.

The next thing, that I will shew your lordship, is the opinion of Mr. Stamford, in his Pleas of the Crown, fol. 72, where he sets down the Statute of Westminster primo, and then he adds, That by this it appears, that in four cases at the common law a man is not replevisable; in those that were taken for the death of a man, or by the commandment of the king, or of his justices, or of the forest: and there he saith, That the commandment of the king is to be intended, either the commandment of his mouth or of his council, which is incorporated to him, and speak with the mouth of the king.—My lord, I shall desire no better commentaries upon a law, than these reverend grave Judges, who have put Books of Law in print, and such Books as none, I believe, will say their judgments are weak.

The next thing I shall offer unto your lordship, is this, That I cannot shew with so great authority as I have done the rest, because I have not the thing itself by me; but I will put it to your lordship's memory, I presume you may well remember it; it is the resolution of all the Judges, which was given in the 34th of queen Elizabeth, it fell out upon an unhappy occasion, which was thus: the Judges they complain that Sheriffs and other officers could not execute the process of the law as they ought, for that the parties on whom such process shall be executed were sent away by some of the queen's Council, that they could not be found: the Judges hereupon petitioned the Lord Chancellor, that he would be a suitor to her majesty that nothing be done hereafter. And thereupon the Judges were desired to shew in what cases men that were committed were not bailable, whether upon the commitment of the queen or any other.

—The Judges make answer, that if a man shall be committed by the queen, by her command, or by the privy council, he is not bailable: if your lordship ask me what authority I have for this, I can only say, I have it out of the Book of the lord Anderson, written with his own hand.

My lord, I pray you give me leave to observe the time when this was done; it was in a time, and we may truly call it a good time, in the time of good queen Elizabeth, and yet we see there was then cause of complaint: and therefore I would not have men think that we are now grown so bad (as the opinion is we are), for we see that then in those times there was cause of complaint, and it may be more than is now.—This, my lord, was the resolution of all the Judges and Barons of the Exchequer, and not by some great one.

Now I will apply myself to that, which has been enforced by the counsel on the other side, which was the reason that the subject hath interest in this case.

My lord, I do acknowledge it, but I must say that the sovereign hath great interest in it too. And sure I am, that the first stone of sovereignty was no sooner laid, but this power was given to the sovereign: if you ask me whether it be unlimited; my lord, I say it is not the question now in hand: but the common law, which hath long flourished under the government of our king and his progenitors kings of this realm, hath ever had that reverend respect of their sovereign, as that it hath concluded the king can do no wrong: and as it is in the lord Berkley's Case in Plowden's Com. 216, b. it is part of the king's prerogative that he can do no wrong.—In the 4th of Edw. 4, fol. 25, the king cannot be a disseisor; and so it is also in the lord Berkley's Case in 32 Hen. 8, Dyer, fol. 8.

The king cannot usurp upon a patron, for the common law hath that reverend respect to him, as that it cannot conceive he will do any injury.—But the king commits a subject, and expresseth no cause of the commitment: What then? Shall it be thought that there is no cause why he should be committed? Nay, my lord, the course of all times hath been, to say there is no cause expressed, and therefore the matter is not ripe, and thereupon the courts of judicature have ever rested satisfied therewith, they would not search into it.

My lords, there be 'Arcana Dei, et Arcana Imperii;' and they that search too far into them, and make themselves busier with them than their places do require, they will make themselves, &c. I will say no more; but I shall be able to shew that there shall as much prejudice come to the kingdom, if God direct not the heart of the king, which is in the hand of God, as the rivers of waters; I say, there may as much hazard come to the commonwealth in many other things, with which the king is trusted, as in this particular there can accrue to the subject.

If a treason be committed, as it was not long ago, not far removed from our memories; since there was a treason, and the actors thereof fled, some to the court of Rome, some to Brussels, when it was to be put in execution; the treason being discovered, one is apprehended upon suspicion of it, and is put into the Tower, and there he lieth, and thinketh the time very long; and I cannot blame him.

It may be he is innocent, and thereupon he brings a Habeas Corpus, and by virtue of that writ he is brought hither; and will your lordship think it fit or convenient to bail him, when the accusation against him must come from beyond the sea? I think you will rather so respect the proceedings of the state, as that you will believe these things are done with a cause, than inquire further of them.—Peradventure some great misdemeanor may be committed, and some of the parties make away, so as Proclamation cannot overtake them, and some are taken, is it fit that they that are in prison should be tried before the principal be taken?

I will give you an instance, that lately was put into my mind; there be some prisoners in the Tower at this present, which were put in thither when they were very young; if they should bring an Habeas Corpus, they were imprisoned for State-matters, will your lordship deliver them? No, in that the state doth not think it fit to send them back into their own countries, you will esteem so reverently of the state for committing children, that you will believe that there is great reason of state so to do, or else they would not do it: many inconveniences may follow, if it should be otherwise. It may be, divers men do suffer wrongfully in prison, but therefore shall all prisoners be delivered? That were a great mischief.

No doubt but the king's power is absolutely over his coins; if then he shall command his coin shall be turned to brass or leather, I confess it were inconvenient; but if the king would do it, the answer that I can make is, that he would not undo the kingdom: but can your lordship hinder it, as being an inconvenience, if he would do it? The Cinque Ports are free for traffick for all his subjects; but the king in his cabinet understands there is danger of war to come upon this kingdom, thereupon he shuts the ports, that no man can go out; shall the merchant say this is injustice in the king? And as in this, so in many other particulars this may appear, but I will not go too high; and therefore we are too wise, may we are too foolish, in undertaking to examine matters of state, to which we are not born. Now, my lord, I come to our book-cases, by which it appears what our king may do, and nothing can be said against it, but he will not do it; the king may pardon all traitors and felons, and if he should do it, may not the subjects say, If the king do this, the bad will overcome the good? But shall any say, The king cannot do this? No, we may only say, He will not do this.

The king may exempt men from the office of Sheriff, is not this inconvenient? And may it not be said, he may exempt ten in a shire, and then the burden of the country shall rest upon the meaner sort of people? can any man say more to this, than that he will not do it?—Inheritances are to be decided upon trial, the king may exempt private men from being of a Jury; but if he exempt all men, who shall try our causes? for it is to be presumed, that he will not do it.

But to our case: By the statute of Magna Charta, no man shall be put out of his Freehold, &c. But if the king will do it, must not the party that is so put out go to the king by petition? But you will say, It is a petition of right; and it may be these gentlemen's is so; admit it be, yet when such a petition comes to the king, must it not be answered with these words, Soit droit fait al parte? And when the king will give that warrant for it, then they must have it done, and not before.

And this may answer a perpetual imprisonment, and God forbid that this should be so; and now, my lord, I will trouble you no longer, but I will go to precedents. Precedents I know prevail much, and rule in many cases; and if the precedents they cite were not misinterpreted, I should think they had said a great deal.

But, my lord, I will answer their precedents with precedents; nay, I will shew your lordship that the precedents which they have cited are no precedents for them.—And, my lord, it is a dangerous thing for men in matters of weight to avouch precedents with confidence, when they make nothing for them: for, my lord, precedents are now become almost proclamations, for they already run up and down the town; and yet they know but part of them, and not all, and I think if they knew all, men would be more modest.

But, my lord, I will now come to these Precedents, where I may say they have not dealt freely with me, for they have shewed me many precedents more than they mentioned here, and it may be they have done the like unto your lordship. They alledged but 8 precedents before your lordship, but they have brought 16 unto me: for these eight mentioned here, I will take them in order as they were cited, and answer.

The first precedent they cited was in H. 8, Rot. 9, of one Harrison: we have the Record here to shew your lordship, that he was committed for suspicion of Felony, which was expressed in the warrant; and then, my lord, this is clear, if the king, or the lords of the council, will express any thing within your lordship's jurisdiction, there is good ground for your proceedings; but when there is nothing expressed, whether you will judge what the cause of the warrant is, I will leave to your lordship's judgment; but it appears this was the cause, and that he was delivered.

The next precedent was 22 H. 8, Rot. 57, and it was Parker's case: and it is true that his commitment appeared to be 'per speciale mandatum domini regis,' but it was also proposed to be 'pro pace et suspicione felonie'; and the signification of the command was given by Mr. Peck of Clifford's-Inn: but there the warrant shews the cause of the commitment was for the peace and suspicion of felony, and therefore he was bailed.

The next was in 40 Eliz. Wendon's case; but, my lord, that commitment was out of the Star-Chamber by an ordinary course; then they cited 8 Jac. Thomas Cæsar's case; he indeed was committed by 'speciale mandatum domini regis,' and brought his Habeas Corpus, but the Roll saith 'remititur:' and is that a warrant for them to say that he was delivered?

Then sir Tho. Vernon's case was cited; and, my lord, when we looked into the Records, we found that he was committed for suspicion of treason; and he was tried for it and discharged.

The next precedent was sir Tho. Monson's case; I wonder that they did cite that, for he was committed by the lords of the council indeed; but the ground of it was suspicion of the death of sir Tho. Overbury, and he was discharged again by the lords of the council. Certainly if they had known this, they would not have named this as a precedent.

The next was Reynor's case; he, my lord, was one of the Gun-Powder-Treason, and yet there was a warrant to discharge him too. And therefore what these precedents are, I shall submit to your lordship: I must confess, when they are cited together, they make a great noise; but when they are examined severally, they prove nothing.

My lord, there is one more precedent that was cited here before your lordship, and I hope that one shall be as none. It was mentioned to be Laurence Brown's Case, 30 Eliz. I know not what it is, but it is like to be of the same value as the rest; 'Pro certis causis eos moventibus, &c.'

And thus, my lord, I have gone through those precedents that were alledged here before your lordship; and now I will come to those precedents that were brought to me, and not mentioned here.

The first was John Browning's case, in 21 H. 8. My lord, these precedents came not to me before Saturday last, about candle-lighting; and yesterday was no time fitting to search out precedents, and how could I then search for this?

The next was William Roger's case, of the same time. But the cause is expressed to be for suspicion of felony, which is a cause within the jurisdiction of this court.

Newport's case was the like, in 4 et 5 Phil. et Mar. and so was Thomas Laurence's case, 9 Eliz. and Edw. Harcourt's case, 5 Eliz. which was for suspicion of felony. R. Beckwith and not Bartwith, as was cited, for they have mistaken both names and matters, was committed 'per speciale mandatum domini regis;' and the Record saith he was bailed. But it was by reason of a letter from the lords of the council.

The cause of Peter Man's commitment in the 4 and 5 of Philip and Mary, appears to be for suspicion of felony and robbery.

For Reynor's case, it is the same with Beckwith, and were both for one thing.

In the 8 Hen. 7 one Roger Cherry was committed 'per mandatum domini regis,' and it was for a criminal case; and he was afterwards indicted and acquitted and delivered. And there is another precedent thereof, that saith, he was afterwards arraigned, condemned, and hanged; we have the Record of it.

And now, my lord, I will shew some precedents on the other side, where men have been committed by the commandment of the king, and by the commandment of the council, and have been delivered again by their directions: and of this kind there be two in the Tower, that as they were committed by warrant, so by warrants again for their bailing they were delivered; the offences were against the forest, and for murder.

In 4 E. 3, M. 4, Edmund de Newport in Essex was indicted for an offence committed by him in the Forest. And M. 7. John Fox was likewise indicted for an offence by him done in the Forest: and there be two warrants to bail them.

M. 20. John Cobb was the like, and there was a letter from the king, 'Quod ponatur in ballium usque ad proximam assisam.' These were offences within Westminster primo, and there be several warrants to bail them.

The clerk of this court hath many records, by which it appeareth, that many have been committed by the command of the king and of the queen, and of the council, and brought their Habeas Corpus; and the success was, that many of them were committed to the same prisons, and divers were committed to the marshal of this court: the reason was, for that many of them were to appear here, their causes being triable here; and it would have been a great trouble to send them back so far to prison as into the countries, and therefore they were delivered to the marshal of the king's household: again, many had their trials in this court, and some suffered, and some were delivered by special command, as they were committed by special command.

—The number of these of this nature are infinite that have been in our times; we have found some forty precedents of men committed out of the Chancery, and by the high-commission, for contempts, and some by the barons of the exchequer, and some in London, that have been brought hither by Habeas Corpus.

Of this I shall observe, that in the 11 Jac. there was a private constitution in London, made between the white bakers, that they might live one by another, and the one not to invade the other's liberties; and for contempt against this ordinance, some were committed to prison; as Thomas Hening, and Littlepage: they had a Habeas Corpus, and the cause was shewn to be by reason of the said constitution, and thereupon the prisoners were sent back to London, to abide the order of the mayor. For, my lord, this court hath been ever careful not to examine the Decrees of the Chancery, or Court of Requests, but have only looked whether the cause returned be within the jurisdiction of this court; nor have they called in question the by-laws and constitutions of London, but they send them back to the court of justice that committeth them.—And hath this court been so careful of these inferior courts to this which is the chief? and when the king, who is the head of justice, shall commit a man, shall not they be as careful to do the like justice to him? But when the king saith to them, The commitment was by my warrant and commandment will you question this, and whether this commitment be good or no? I hope you will not.

And now, my lord, touching some Precedents which have been taken out of their own shewing, I shall make it appear, that as they have been committed by the king or council, so they had warrants also to discharge them: and they, my lord, are two ancient records; the first is 7 H. 7, Rot. 6. the other, Rot. 73. The first was Thomas Brown, he was committed to the Marshalsea, 'per mandatum domini regis, et aliis certis de causis:' and afterwards the records say, 'Dominus rex quoad chase relaxavit mandatum suum,' and he was bailed and the rest lay by it.

My lord, I will conclude; I could be infinite in this case in precedents, but enough is enough, your lordship knoweth the weight of precedents; it is not enough to shew this was done, but also to shew the reason why it was done. I will trouble your lordship no longer, but if any man shall doubt whether that or any part thereof be truly recited which hath been said touching the Records or Statutes, I can say no more, but that the Statutes have been read, and the Records are ready sorted out to be seen by your lordship.

I shall conclude (what I shall say) in this case, to answer the fear rather than the just ground of them that say, this may be a cause of great danger, with the words of Bracton, who spake not to flatter the present age; lib. 1. cap. 3, in the end, speaking of a writ for wrong done by the king to the Subject touching land, he hath these words: 'Si iudicium a rege testatur (cum breve non currat contra ipsam) locus erat supplicationi quod factum suam corrigit et emendat, quod quidem si non fuerit, satis sufficit ei ad penam quod dominium expectet ultorem, nemo quidem de factis suis presumat disputare, multo fortius contra factum suum venire.'—My lord, I English it not, for I apply it not, any man may make use of it as he pleaseth; and so I conclude both for the point of exception, and matter of the return, which I refer to your lordship's judgment, whether all in the return but these words, 'per speciale mandatum domini regis,' be not superfluous. And for the matter, whether these gentlemen be bailable or not bailable, I have shewed your lordship, that by the practice of all ages they are not bailable, but have been remained back.

And therefore I pray your lordship, that these gentlemen may be remitted, and left to go the right way for their delivery, which is by a petition to the king. Whether it be a Petition of right or of grace, I know not; it must be, I am sure, to the king, from whom I do personally understand that these gentlemen did never yet present any petition to him that came to his knowledge.

L. C. Justice. Mr. Attorney, thus much we must say to you, you have taken a great deal of pains, you having had so short a time to consider of this case; it is a case of very great weight and expectation, and we do not intend that you shall expect long for our resolution, for that these gentlemen are in prison, and desire no doubt to know where they must trust; I hope we shall resolve according to the reason of former times, and according to our consciences: but this I must tell you, as I did those that argued, you must bring in your Precedents; for though we have seen some of them, yet some of them we have not seen, therefore we desire that your servants or yourselves do attend, and bring unto us after dinner those precedents you have mentioned on the king's part, for we intend to meet this afternoon, and you shall have our Opinions to-morrow: and I must tell you on the other side, that this cause being of such weight, counsel should be wary how they speak any thing to inveigle the court.—Touching such precedents as you urged in some of them, we know there is something urged which makes not for you, so you have omitted some material things to be shewn; I speak it to this purpose, not to prejudice the cause, or to deliver my opinion, which becomes me not, but to shew, that counsellors should be careful: and this I dare say, there is matter in some of the precedents themselves that leads to another case, if they were entirely cited.—The Term grows away, you shall not be long in expectation, we will meet this afternoon, and give you our Opinions to-morrow morning.

Mr. Noye. We desire that Mr. Attorney may bring the precedents of 34 Eliz. with him.

Mr. Attorney. I will shew you any thing; but, my lord, I shall be bold to claim the privilege of my place, as the king's counsel; when the king's Attorney has spoken, there ought to be no arguments after that; but if you ask to see any thing, you shall have it.

L. C. Justice. It is that we aim at, that truth and right may appear, and not to satisfy the one or the other part; but it is not desired to make use of it by way of reply, but for satisfaction only.

Serj. Bramston. My lord, for the precedents I cited, I did think they should have been brought and read in the court, that your lordship might see them.

L. C. Justice. You shall need no apology, the Records and Precedents shall be brought to the court, and read openly, for the court will not wrong you, and you shall see the difference between them, and your relation of them; nor you must not wrong us with your written verities.

On Thursday the 28th of November, Michaelis, 3 Caroli Regis, Chief-Justice Hyde, Justice Doderidge, Justice Jones, and Justice Whitlock on the bench: Sir John Corbet, sir Walter Earl, sir John Heveningham, and sir Edmund Hampden at the bar.

L. C. Justice. I am sure you here expect the resolution of the whole Court, as accordingly yesterday we told you you should have. This is a case of very great weight and great expectation, and it had been fit we should have used more solemn arguments of it than now for the shortness of the time we can do; for you have been long in prison, and it is fit you should know whereunto you should trust: I am sure you expect justice from hence, and God forbid we should sit here but to do justice to all men according to our best skill and knowledge, for it is our oaths and duties so to do, and I am sure there is nothing else expected of us. We are sworn to maintain all Prerogatives of the king, that is one branch of our oath; and we are likewise sworn to administer justice equally to all people.

We cannot, I tell you, deliver in solemn Arguments, and give the Judgments of every one of us touching this case, as the weight thereof requireth; but we have met together, and we have duly and seriously considered of it, and of all that which has been spoken of on either side, and we are grown to a Resolution, and my brothers have enjoined me to deliver to you the resolution of the whole court; and therefore, though it be delivered by my mouth, it is the resolution of us all: I hope I shall not mistake any thing of their intention in my delivery; but if I do, they sit here by me, and I shall not take it ill if they right me. Therefore I must tell you, there hath been many points learnedly argued at the bar, which we shall not touch, or give our resolution upon, but bend ourselves to the point in judgment here.

These three Statutes, as for example, the Statute of Magna Charta, 25 E. 3, and 36 E. 3, and the Statute of Westminster primo, and divers other statutes that have been alledged, and particularly disputed of, we all acknowledge and resolve, that they are good laws, and that they be in force: but the interpretation of them at this time belongs not to us, for we are driven to another point; and though the meaning of them belongs to the one way or the other, yet our judgment must be the same; for that which is now to be judged by us is this, Whether one that is committed by the king's authority, and no cause declared of his commitment, according as here it is upon this return, whether we ought to deliver him by bail, or to remand him back again? Wherein you must know this which your counsel will tell you, we can take notice only of this return; and when the case appears to come to us no otherwise than by the return, we are not bound to examine the truth of the return, but the sufficiency of it, for there is a great difference between the sufficiency and the truth.

We cannot judge upon rumours nor reports, but upon that which is before us on record; and, therefore the Return is examinable by us, whether it be sufficient, or not.

The Exceptions which have been taken to this Return were two: the one for the Form, the other for the Substance.

For the Form, whether it be formally returned or no, for it is not returned, as it is said, positively and absolutely, that they were committed by the king, but as it appears by a warrant from the lords of the council, and then there seems to be a contradiction in the return.—For first it saith, they were committed by the king's command, and afterwards it alledgeth it to be by a warrant of the lords of the council, and so it is repugnant.

Now we conceive that this is a positive and an absolute Return, and so the reason is, that he first returns that they are detained by the special command of the king, and if he had ceased there it had been positive; now there follows, that this was signified to them by the lords of the council. This is returned, to ascertain the court that he returned the cause truly, and to shew us that we should not doubt the verity of this return; and not to shew to us that he hath no knowledge of the cause but by the signification of the lords of the council: according to that Case of the bishop of Norwich, touching the Excommunication, he must testify his own knowledge, and not 'contineatur in archidia:' so a Sheriff must not return 'quod mandavi ball', &c. and he gives this answer, unless it be a bailiff of a liberty that hath return of writs.

And so here if the Warden of the Fleet had returned, that the lords of the council had signified unto him that his prisoner was detained by the king's commandment, that had been sufficient: but when he returns positively at the first, that it is done by the king's direction, he shews afterwards that which should make it appear that he deals not falsely; which might have been omitted, but being mentioned that that is the scope of it, and not otherwise, the return is good and positive.

Now then to the other Objections, because he speaks nothing of the caption why they were taken, you know it is the usual return of all officers to answer the point in question; there is not one word in the Writ that demands the cause why they were taken, but why they are detained: so that the point in the writ is sufficiently answered; for though sometimes it is necessary that the cause of the caption should be certified, yet sometimes it is superfluous: but in our case the cause of the detention is sufficiently answered, which is the demand of the writ, and therefore we resolve that the form of this return is good. The next thing is the main point in law, whether the substance or matter of the return be good or no, wherein the substance is this, he doth certify that they are detained in prison by the special command of the king; and whether this be good in law or no, that is the question.

To this purpose, if you remember this point, I say you did not cite any Book or Case in print, but many precedents, which, I confess, are so strong as any Book-cases, for Book-cases, I confess, are taken and selected out of the Records and Resolutions of Judges, and that is which is in our books, though they be not so obvious for every eye, but are found out by pains and diligent search, and being produced, are of the same and equal authority with our Book-cases; but this must be when Records are brought faithfully and entirely, so that the court may judge of them.

Now the Precedents, you urged them to be so many, and so fully to the point, that we may thereby see that it is good to hear what can be said on both sides, and for to hear all, and view the Records themselves; and therefore we required you to bring the Records to us, and you did so, and you brought us more than you mentioned here; and we have perused them all, that thereby we might see whether the court be faithfully dealt withal or no; for though counsellors may urge a book for their own advantage, yet it is the duty of the court to see and distinguish of their allegations as the truth may appear.

This I told you yesterday, when I told you your Precedents warranted not so much as you urged them for; for if you remember, you urged some precedents to be, that where men were committed by the king, or by the lords of the council, and no cause expressed why they were committed, they were delivered.—This is in effect our case, if the precedents affirm that when a man is committed by the king's command, and no just cause is shewn, that upon such a general return the party shall ipso facto be delivered; for if the return be not amended, then he shall be discharged.—For although men come with prepared minds, yet the preparation of every man's heart ought to submit to the truth, and by the precedents, you shall see if it be so as you have alleged; but this I dare affirm, that no one of the Records that you have cited, doth enforce what you have concluded out of them, no not one; and therefore as you have cited Records and Precedents, Precedents shall judge this case.

I will shew you how they differ from the Records: you have concluded, when the king hath committed one, and expresseth not the cause, the court hath delivered the party; but you shall see the contrary concluded in every case that you have put: where the cause of the commitment hath been expressed, there the party hath been delivered by the court, if the case so required; but where there hath been no cause expressed, they have ever been remanded; or if they have been delivered, they have been delivered by the king's direction, or by the lords of the council: if this fall now in proof, you see you have gathered fair conclusions out of the Records; and that you may see that this is so, I have brought the Records with me of your own propounding, and I will go through them from point to point, and then judge yourselves of the case.

It is not material whether I call for them in that order as you produced them or no, and therefore I will take them as they are, first or last in the king's reign. They are in number many, in the time of H. 7, H. 8, Mary, Eliz. and king James's time.

I will shew you sir Thomas Monson's Case in 14 Jac. which was in all our memories.

I will begin with Hill. 8 H. 7, R. Cherry's Case; you vouched it to this purpose, That Cherry being committed by the mayor of Windsor, was brought hither by a Habeas Corpus, and the mayor returns that he was committed 'per mandatum domini regis,' and that thereupon he was delivered; but you shall find by the Record, that he was committed by the mayor at the suit of the king for felony, for which he was afterwards indicted, brought to trial, and then discharged. (Vide this Record in Mr. Selden's Argument in the parliament, 3 & 4 Car. II. Regis, and so all the rest postea.)

The next was 19 H. 7, Urwick's Case; and you say he was brought hither by the Warden of the Fleet, who, as you said, returned that he was committed 'per mandatum domini regis,' and you said he was discharged, but he was bailed upon the Lord's Letter, and brought hither to record his return, for he was bound to appear here, and then he was discharged; but that was the cause of his bringing hither. (Vide the Records as aforesaid.)

The next was Hugh Pain's Case, in 21 H. 7, and that you urged thus: You say that he was brought hither by a H. Corpus by the Warden of the Fleet, who returned that he was committed by the king's council, and he was bailed: now, we find that he was committed by them for suspicion of felony; and that cause was declared, and he was bailed: so that you see there was a cause expressed. (Vide the Records aforesaid.)

The next is 2 H. 8, Thomas Beckley, and Robert Harrison's Case; these you said were brought in hither by George, earl of Shrewsbury, and Thomas earl of Surry; and the return was, that they were committed by the command of H. 7, and that they were bailed; but you shall find that they were committed for suspicion of felony; and that Harrison was committed by H. 7, but it was for Homicide upon the sea, and so the cause is expressed, and afterwards he was bailed. The next was in 22 H. 8, John Parker's Case: you urged it to this purpose, That he was brought hither by a H. Corpus by the sheriffs of London, and they you said returned, that he was committed 'per speciale mandatum domini regis nunciatum,' &c. by Robert Peck, &c. The cause why you urged this was two-fold; 1. That he was committed by the king's command, and yet he was bailed: 2dly, That he was committed 'per mandatum domini regis nunciatum,' per such a one: but you shall find by the Record that he was committed for the security of the peace, and for suspicion of felony, and that was the cause for which he was bailed, for he is bailable by law when such a cause appears. (Vide the Record as aforesaid.)

Go on to the next, and that is Peter Man's Case, in the 3 and 4 Phil. and Mary; you urged that to this purpose, you say, that he was brought by the Keeper of the Gate-house, and you say, that he returned, that he was committed by the command of the king and queen's council, and thereupon he was bailed; but you shall find that he was committed for suspicion of felony and robbery, and thereupon he was bailed.

The next is in the 4 and 5 Phil. et Mar. Edward Newport's Case; you said that the Constable of the Tower brought him hither, and returned that he was committed by the council of the king and queen, and that he was bailed: but you see by the Records, that he was committed for suspicion of coining, which is bailable only in this court, and therefore it was removed hither. Yet this I must tell you, that it is true, in one Record it appears not but as you have cited it; but you may see how it is supplied by another record, and the cause, and he was delivered by a proclamation. (Vide both Records in Mr. Selden's Argument).

Daderidge. He could not be delivered by proclamation, unless it was for a criminal cause.

L. C. J. (Hyde). Observe another thing in the Book, he is brought hither by the special command of the council: so that although it appears not in the record, yet if the king or lords mean to have him tried for his life, he is brought hither. Then you cited Robert Constable's case, 9 Eliz. and you said he was brought hither by the Lieutenant of the Tower, who returned that he was committed by the lords of the council, and thereupon he was bailed; but you shall find that he came hither to plead his pardon, and he was pardoned. (Vide the Record as aforesaid).

Thomas Lawrence's Case in 9 Eliz. is the same with Constable's, for it appears that he was brought hither to plead his pardon, and he was pardoned, and that was the cause he was brought hither.

The next was in the 21 Eliz. John Browning's Case; it is true he was committed by the lords of the council, and he was brought by a H. Corpus to the chamber of sir Christ. Wray, chief-justice, and he was there bailed.

The next was 33 Eliz. Wm. Rogers; and he, you said, was brought hither by the Keeper of the Gate-house, who returned, that he was committed to him by the lords of the council, yet there was a cause expressed, and that was for suspicion of coining of money.

The next was in 39 Eliz. Laurence Broome; you say that he was brought hither by the keeper of the Gate-house, who returned, that he was committed for divers causes, moving the lords of the council, and thereupon he was delivered; but the Record is, that the return also was for suspicion of treason; and although the suspicion of treason appears not in one Record, yet there is another for it. Here you see the cause of his commitment, and that he was bailed, but it was by the king's command, aque Oct. Michaelis. (Vide the Record).—

I blame not you that are of counsel with these gentlemen for urging this Record, for this cause is not expressed in your Record, but that he was committed by the command of the council only; but he was committed for suspicion of felony with sir Thomas Smith. (Vide the Record).

The next is in 40 Eliz. Edward Harcourt's case, and Thomas Wenden's case; I bring them together, because they are both in one year. In the 40 of Eliz. Harcourt, you say, was committed to the Gate-house by the lords of the council; and the return was, that he was committed by them, 'Certis de causis ipsos moventibus ignotis,' and he was bailed.—Here is another in the same time committed to the same prison by the lords in the Star-chamber, it was Thomas Wenden's case; and he, you say, was committed by them, 'certis de causis,' (as the other was) and that he was bailed; but you shall find in the margin of the Roll, 'Tradit in ball' ex assensu concilii domine regine;' and that was the relation of the queen's Attorney, so that you see how the precedent fits you.

The next are two more commitments to the Gate-house, Beckwith and Reyner; they, you said, were committed to the Gate-house, brought their H. Corpus, and the Keeper of the Gate-house returned, that they were committed by virtue of a warrant from the abp. of Canterbury, Henry earl of Northampton, lord warden of the Cinque Ports, and others of the privy-council; requiring the said Keeper to receive the said Beckwith and Reyner into his charge, until they should have further order from them in that behalf; and you say they were bailed. (Vide the Record in Mr. Selden aforesaid).—Now you shall see the direction to bail him; he was bailed by the direction from the lords of the council, as appears by their letter. (Vide as aforesaid).

Now we come to Casar's Case, in 6 Jacobi; you urged that to this purpose: you say he was committed to the Marshalsea, who upon a H. Corpus returned, that he was committed 'per speciale mandatum domini regis,' and you say, because the return was so general, the rule of the court was, that it should be amended, or else he should be discharged. I will open to you what the reason of that rule was, for that notice was taken, that the Keeper of the prison had used a false return, and had usurped the name of the king; I know not how, but the commitment was not by the king's command; and that was the cause that he had a day given him to amend his return, but his body was remanded to prison, as you shall see by the Record. (Vide the Record, &c.).

The last precedent that you used, was that of sir Tho. Monson; and that was so notorious, and so late, that I marvel that was offered at all, it made me jealous of all the rest, that was so notorious; and now I have omitted none you brought me. (Vide the Record).—By this Record you may see that he was committed by divers lords of the council; and it was for the suspicion of the death of sir Tho. Overbury; and it is notoriously known, that he was brought hither to plead his pardon.

I will not tell you that you read all these precedents, for you read none, but urged them here before us; but we required you to bring them to us, and they were brought to us, Mr. Corbet brought them all but one, and that Mr. Noye brought, it was in the 22 H. 8, Parker's Case; and one Mr. Holborn, a man whose face I never saw before, nor is he now in mine eye, did yesterday bring us one precedent to this purpose; and it was sir John Brocket's Case in 1 Jac. he was committed to the Gatehouse, and upon a Habeas Corpus, the Keeper returned that 'Commiss' fuit per warrantum 'domisorum de privat' concilio, cujus tenor 'sequitur in hæc verba,' viz. 'To the Keeper 'of the Gatehouse,' &c. (Vide Mr. Selden's precedents; but see upon what ground he was bailed, it was a special command of the lords of the council. Vide the Record).

These are all the Records and Precedents that you ministered unto us in your Argument, and that were delivered unto us, for I have dealt faithfully with you; and now you have seen them in the cases, I would have any man judge of the conclusion which you made the last day, that when a man is committed, and the case not known, but it is certified to be by the king's special commandment, and the Habeas Corpus is procured by yourselves and speeded by the king, that we can discharge or bail them.

Then the Precedents are all against you every one of them, and what shall guide our judgments, since there is nothing alledged in this case but precedents? That if no cause of the commitment be expressed, it is to be presumed to be for matter of state, which we cannot take notice of; you see we find none, no not one, that hath been delivered by bail in the like cases, but by the hand of the king or his direction.

If we should cease here, you see you have shewn nothing to satisfy us, and we know that you that be of their counsel, will satisfy your clients therein. But you shall see that we have taken a little pains in this case, and we will shew you some Precedents on the other side; and I believe there be 500 of this nature, that may be cited to this purpose. I shall go retrograde, and go backwards in citing the years of the precedents that I shall mention.

I will begin with 7 H. 8, Edward Page, he was brought hither by the Steward of the Marshalsea, who returned that he was committed 'per mandatum domini regis,' and he was remitted, so that he was not delivered upon this general return, but he was remanded.

The next was 12 H. 7, there you shall see a precedent where one was committed, his name was Thomas Yew, he was committed for felony, and also 'per mandatum domini regis,' and the king's Attorney came hither and released the king's command, and thereupon he was bailed.

Mr. Noye. It is all one with Parker's case.

L. C. J. No; for here were two causes of the commitment, Hobart was then the king's Attorney, and he signified in open court that he was discharged by the king's command, and 'Postea traditur in ball' pro suspicione feloniz.'

The next was Humphrey Broch, 9 H. 7, Rot. 14. you shall find it much to that purpose as the other was before; he was imprisoned for an outlawry, and by the commandment of the king also, and after that the release of the king's commandment was certified to the chief-justice, he was thereupon discharged. (Vide the Record).

The next is 7 H. 7, Thomas Brown, John Rawlings, Robert Sherman and others, were committed 'per mandatum domini regis,' and for felony, outlawry, and other causes, as appears by the Records, and after the king releaseth his commandment, and that the outlawry should be reversed, and for the felony he was bailed. (Vide the Record).

So that you may see the offences mentioned in the Warrant for the commitment were triable here, and when the king releases his commandment they were bailed for the rest, but they that were committed by the commandment of the king were released by the king.

In 7 H. 7, the cases of Wm. Bartholomew, Henry Carre, William Chase, and others, is to the same effect, by all which you may see, that when the king releaseth his commandment, they were bailed for the rest, and as they were committed by the king's commandment, so they were released by the king's command.

Now here I shall trouble you with no more Precedents, and you see your own what conclusion they produce. And as to those strong precedents alledged on the other side, we are not wiser than they that went before us; and the common custom of the law is, the Common Law of the land, and that hath been the continual common custom of the law, to which we are to submit, for we come not to change the law, but to submit to it.

We have looked upon that precedent that was mentioned by Mr. Attorney; the resolution of all the Judges of England, in 34 Eliz. We have considered of the time, and I think there were not before, nor have been since, more upright Judges than they were, Wray was one, and Anderson another: in Easter term this was certified under the hands of all the Judges of England, and Barons of the Exchequer, in a duplicate, whereof the one was delivered to the Lord-Chancellor, and the other to the Lord-Treasurer, to be delivered to the queen. We have compared our copies, not taking them the one from the other, but bringing them; we have long had them by us together, and they all agree word for word; and that which Mr. Attorney said, he had out of Judge Anderson's Book, and it is to this purpose, to omit other things, that if a man be committed by the commandment of the king, he is not to be delivered by a Habeas Corpus in this court, for we know not the cause of the commitment. (Vide the latter end of the first part of Mr. Selden's argument, as aforesaid).

But the question now is, Whether we may deliver this gentleman or not? You see what hath been the practice in all the kings times heretofore, and your own Records; and this resolution of all the Judges teacheth us, and what can we do but walk in the steps of our forefathers? If you ask me which way you should be delivered, we shall tell you, we must not counsel you.

Mr. Attorney hath told you that the king hath done it, and we trust him in great matters, and he is bound by law, and he bids us proceed by law, as we are sworn to do, and so is the king; and we make no doubt but the king, if you seek to him, he knowing the cause why you are imprisoned, he will have mercy; but we leave that. If in justice we ought to deliver you, we would do it; but upon these grounds, and these Records, and the Precedents and Resolutions, we cannot deliver you, but you must be remanded. Now if I have mistaken any thing, I desire to be righted by my brethren, I have endeavoured to give the Resolutions of us all.*

PROCEEDINGS IN PARLIAMENT

RELATING TO THE

LIBERTY OF THE SUBJECT.

The Gentlemen continued in custody till the 29th of January following, when his majesty in council ordered all of them to be released; and writs being issued about this time for electing members of parliament, to meet March the 17th, 1627-8, those gentlemen who suffered for the Loan, were elected in many places. On the 17th of March the house met, and sir John Finch was chosen Speaker. On the 20th, the house

* Mr. Whitlock in his Memorials of the English Affairs, p. 8, (edit. 1732), says, "Five of the imprisoned gentlemen, by Habeas Corpus were brought to the King's-bench; and (by their counsel assigned) took exceptions to the Return, "For that it had not the cause of their Commitment, but of their detainer in prison, 'per speciale mandatum regis,' which is no particular cause; and the law being most tender of the subjects liberty," Noye, Selden, Bramston, Calthorpe, and others, who were of counsel for the prisoners, prayed they might be released and discharged.—Heath, the King's Attorney, at another day argued in maintenance of the Return. Hyde, Chief-Justice, declared the opinion of the court, "That the Return was positive and absolute, by the king's special command, and the signification of it 'by the lords of the council is only to inform the court: and that the Habeas Corpus is not to return the cause of the imprisonment, but of the detention in prison; that the matter of this Return is sufficient, and the court is not to examine the truth of the Return, but must take it as it is. So the Prisoners were remanded."

settled their Committees; and the 22d was spent in opening the Grievances, as Billenting of Soldiers, Loans by Benevolence and Privy-Seal, and the imprisoning certain Gentlemen who refused to lend upon that Account, who afterwards bringing their Habeas Corpus, were notwithstanding remanded to prison; nor did the house incline to supply his majesty till these Grievances were redressed. To which purpose,

Sir Francis Seymour spoke thus:

This is the great council of the kingdom, and here (if not here alone) his majesty may see as in a true glass the state of the kingdom; we are called hither by his majesty's writs to give him faithful counsel, such as may stand with his honour; but this we must do without flattery: we are sent hither by the commons to discharge that trust reposed in us, by delivering up their just Grievances, and this we must do without fear: let us not therefore be like Cambyeses's judges, who being demanded of their king whether it were not lawful for him to do what in itself was unlawful? They, rather to please the king, than to discharge their own consciences, answered, That the Persian kings might do what they listed. This base flattery tends to mischief, being fitter for reproof than imitation; and as flattery, so fear taketh away the judgment: let us not then be possessed with fear or flattery, of corruptions the basest. For my own part, I shall shun both these, and speak my conscience with as much duty to his majesty as any man, but not neglecting the public, in which his majesty and the commonwealth have an interest: but how can we shew our affections, whilst we retain our fears? or how can we think of giving of subsidies, till we know, whether we have any thing to give or no? For if his majesty be persuaded by any to take from his subjects what he will, and where it pleaseth him; I would gladly know what we have to give! It is true, it is ill with those subjects that shall give laws to their princes, and as ill with those princes which shall use force with those laws; that this hath been done, appeareth by the billeting of Soldiers, a thing no way advantageous to his majesty's service, but a burden to the commonwealth; this also appeareth by the last Levy of Money against an Act of Parliament. Again, Mr. Speaker, what greater proof can there be of this, than the imprisonment of divers Gentlemen for the Loan, who if they had done the contrary for fear, their fault had been as great as theirs that were the projectors in it; and to countenance these proceedings, hath it not been preached (or rather prated) in our pulpits, that all we have is the king's Jure Divino, say these time-servers; they forsake their own function, and turn ignorant statesmen: we see how willing they will be to charge a good conscience for a bishopric; and Mr. Speaker, we see how easy it is for a prince, how just and good soever, to be abused, in regard he must see with other men's eyes, and bear with other men's ears. Let us not flatter his majesty, it is too apparent to all the world, the king and people suffer more now than ever; his majesty in his affairs abroad, and his people in their estates at home: but will you know the reason of all this? Let us look back to the actions of former princes, and we shall find that those princes have been in greatest want and extremity that exacted most of their subjects, and most unfortunate in the choice of their ministers, and to have failed most in their undertakings; happy is that prince that hath those that are faithful of his council. That which his majesty wanted in the management of his affairs concerning France and Spain, I am clear, was his want of faithful council to advise: the reason is plain, a prince is strongest by faithful and wise council; I would I could truly say, such have been employed abroad. I will confess, and still shall from my heart, he is no good subject, nor well affected to his majesty and the state, that will not willingly and freely lay down his life, when the end may be the service of his majesty, and the good of the common-weal. But on the contrary, when against a parliament-law, the Subject shall have taken from him his goods against his will, and his Liberty against the laws of the land; shall it be accounted want of duty in us to stand upon our privileges, hereditary to us, and confirmed by so many acts of parliament?—In doing this we shall but tread the steps of our forefathers, who ever preferred the public interest before their own right, nay, before their own lives; nor can it be any wrong to his majesty to stand upon them, so as thereby we may be the better enabled to do his majesty service. But it will be a wrong to us and our posterity, and our consciences, if we willingly forego that which belongs unto us by the law of God, and of the land, and this we shall do well to present to his majesty; we have no cause to doubt of his majesty's gracious acceptance.

Sir Thomas Wentworth.

This debate carries a double aspect towards the sovereign and the subject; though both be innocent, both are injured and both to be cured. Surely, in the greatest humility I speak it, these illegal ways are punishment and marks of indignation, the raising of Loans strengthened by commission, with unheard-of instructions and oaths; the billeting of soldiers by the lieutenants, and deputy-lieutenants, have been as if they could have persuaded christian princes, yea worlds, that the right of empires had been to take away by strong hands, and they have endeavoured, as far as possible for them, to do it. This hath not been done by the king (under the pleasing shade of whose crown I hope we shall ever gather the fruits of justice), but by projectors, who have extended the prerogative of the king beyond the just symmetry, which maketh the sweet harmony of the whole: they have brought the crown into greater want than ever, by anticipating the revenues; and can the shepherd be thus smitten, and the sheep not scattered? They have introduced a Privy-

Council, ravishing at once the spheres of all ancient government, imprisoning us without either bail or bond; they have taken from us, what? What shall I say indeed, what have they left us? All means of supplying the king, and ingratiating ourselves with him, taking up the root of all property, which if it be not seasonably set again into the ground by his majesty's own hands, we shall have, instead of beauty, baldness. To the making of those whole, I shall apply myself, and propound a remedy to all these diseases. By one and the same thing have king and people been hurt, and by the same must they be cured; to vindicate, what, new things? No, our ancient vital liberties, by re-inforcing the ancient laws made by our ancestors, by setting forth such a character of them, as no licentious spirit shall dare to enter upon them. And shall we think this is a way to break a parliament? No, our desires are modest and just, I speak truly, both for the interest of the king and people; if we enjoy not these, it will be impossible for us to relieve him.—Therefore let us never fear they shall not be accepted by his goodness; wherefore I shall shortly descend to my motions, consisting of four parts; two of which have relation to our persons, two to the propriety of goods. For our Persons: first, the freedom of them from imprisonment: secondly, from employment abroad, contrary to the ancient customs. For our goods, that no Levies be made, but by parliament; secondly, no billeting of Soldiers. It is most necessary that these be resolved, that the subject may be secured in both.

Sir Benjamin Rudyard.

This is the crisis of parliaments; we shall know by this if parliaments live or die, the king will be valued by the success of us, the counsels of this house will have operations in all, it is fit we be wise; his majesty begins to us with affection, proclaiming, that he will rely upon his people's love. Preservation is natural, we are not now on the bene esse, but on the esse; be sure England is ours, and then prune it. Is it no small matter that we have provoked two most potent kings? We have united them, and have betrayed ourselves more than our enemies could. Men and brethren, what shall we do? Is there no balm in Gilead? If the king draw one way, and the parliament another, we must all sink. I respect no particular, I am not so wise to condemn what is determined by the major part; one day tells another, and one parliament instructs another. I desire this house to avoid all contestations, the hearts of kings are great, it is comely that kings have the better of their subjects. Give the king leave to come off; I believe his majesty expects but the occasion. It is lawful, and our duty to advise his majesty, but the way is to take a right course to attain the right end; which I think may be thus: by trusting the king, and to breed a trust in him: by giving him a large supply according to his wants, by prostrating our grievances humbly at his feet, from thence they will have the best way to his heart, that is done in duty to his majesty. And to say all at once, let us all labour to get the king on our side, and this may be no hard matter, considering the near subsistence between the king and people.

Sir Edward Coke.

'Dum tempus habemus, bonum operemur.' I am absolutely for giving a Supply to his majesty; yet with some caution. To tell you of foreign dangers and inbred evils, I will not do it; the State is inclining to a consumption, yet not incurable: I fear not foreign enemies, God send us peace at home: for this disease I will propound remedies, I will seek nothing out of mine own head, but from my heart, and out of acts of parliament. I am not able to fly at all Grievances, but only at Loans. Let us not flatter ourselves; who will give Subsidies, if the king may impose what he will? and if, after parliament, the king may inahnce what he pleaseth? I know the king will not do it, I know he is a religious king, free from personal vices; but he deals with other men's hands, and sees with other men's eyes. Will any give a Subsidy that will be taxed after parliament at pleasure? The king cannot tax any by way of Loans: I differ from them, who would have this of Loans go amongst Grievances, but I would have it go alone.—I will begin with a noble Record, it cheers me to think of it, 25 E. 3; it is worthy to be written in letters of gold; Loans against the will of the Subject, are against Reason, and the Franchises of the Land, and they desire restitution: what a word is that Franchise? The lord may tax his villein high or low, but it is against the franchises of the land, for freemen to be taxed but by their consent in parliament. Franchise is a French word, and in Latin it is Libertas. In Magna Charta it is provided that, 'Nullus liber homo capiatur vel imprisonetur aut disseisietur de libero tenemento, suo, &c. nisi per legale iudicium parium suorum vel per legem terra;' which Charter hath been confirmed by good kings above thirty times.

When these gentlemen had spoken, sir John Cook, Secretary of State, took up the matter for the king, and concluded for redress of Grievances, so that Supplies take the precedence; and said:

Mr. Secretary Cook.

I had rather you would hear any than me; I will not answer what hath been already spoken; my intent is not to stir, but to quiet; not to provoke, but to appease: my desire is, that every one resort to his own heart to re-unite the king and his state, and to take away the scandal from us; every one speaks from the abundance of his heart: I do conclude out of every one's conclusion, to give to the king, to redress grievances; all the difference is about the manner. We all are inhabitants in one house, the Common-wealth, let every one in somewhat amend his house, somewhat is amiss: but if all the house be on fire, will we then think of mending what is amiss? will you not rather quench the fire? the danger all apprehend. The way that is propounded, I seek not to decline. Illegal courses have been taken, it must be confessed, the redress must be by laws and punishment: but withal, add the law of necessity; necessity hath no law, you must abilitate the state to do, what you do by petition require. It is wished we begin with Grievances; I deny not that we prepare them, but shall we offer them first? Will not this seem a condition with his majesty? Do we not deal with a wise king, jealous of his honour? All subsidies cannot advantage his majesty so much, as that his subjects do agree to supply him; this will amaze the enemy more than ten Subsidies: begin therefore with the king, and not with ourselves.

Sir Robert Phillips.

This day's debate makes me call to mind the custom of the Romans who had a solemn Feast once a year for their slaves, at which time they had liberty, without exception, to speak what they would, whereby to ease their afflicted minds; which being finished, they severally returned to their former servitude. This may, with some resemblance and distinction, well set forth our present state; where now, after the revolution of some time, and grievous sufferings of many violent oppressions, we have, as those slaves had, a day of liberty of speech; but shall not, I trust, be herein slaves, for we are free, we are not bondmen, but subjects: these, after their feasts, were slaves again; but it is our hope to return freemen. I am glad to see this morning's work, to see such a sense of the Grievances under which we groan. I see a concurrence of grief from all parts, to see the Subject wronged, and a fit way to see the Subject righted: I expected to see a division, but I see an honourable conjunction, and I take it a good omen. It was wished by one, that there were a forgetfulness of all; let him not prosper that wisheth it not. No, there is no such way to perfect remedy, as to forget injuries; but not so to forget, as not to recover them. It was usual in Rome to bury all injuries on purpose to recover them. It was said by a gentleman, that ever speaks freely, 'We must so govern ourselves, as if this parliament must be the crisis of all parliaments, and this is the last.' I hope well, and there will be no cause for the king, our head, to except against us, or we against him. The dangers abroad are presented to us; he is no Englishman that is not apprehensive of them.

We have provoked two potent kings (the one too near, who are too strongly joined together; the dangers are not chimerical, but real, I acknowledge it, but it must be done in proportion of our dangers at home: I more fear the violation of public Rights at home, than a foreign enemy. Must it be our duties and direction to defend foreign dangers, and establish security against them, and shall we not look at that which shall make us able and willing thereuto? We shall not omit to confide and trust his majesty, otherwise our counsels will be with fears, and that becomes not Englishmen. The unaccustomed violences, I have nothing but a good meaning, trench into all we have. To the four Particulars already mentioned, wherein we suffer, one more may be added, lest God forbear to hear me in the day of my trouble; our Religion is made vendible by Commissions: alas! now a toleration is granted (little less), and men for pecuniary annual rates dispensed withal, whereby Papists, without fear of law, practise idolatry, and scoff at parliaments, at laws, and all. It is well known, the people of this state are under no other subjection, than what they did voluntarily consent unto, by the original contract between king and people; and as there are many prerogatives and privileges conferred on the king, so there are left to the Subject many necessary Liberties and Privileges, as appears by the common laws and acts of parliament, notwithstanding what these two Sycophants, Sibthorp and Manwaring, have prated in the pulpit to the contrary. Was there ever yet king of England that directly violated the Subjects Liberty and Property, but their actions were ever complained of in parliament, and no sooner complained of than redressed? 21 E. 3, there went out a Commission to raise money in a strange manner; the succeeding parliament prayed redress, and, till H. 8, we never heard of the said Commissions again.—Another way was by Loan, a worm that cankered the law, the parliament did redress it, and that money was paid again. The next little engine was Benevolence; what the force of that was, look into the statute of R. 3, which damned that particular way, and all other indirect ways.

Since the Right of the Subject is thus bulwarked by the law of the kingdom, and princes upon complaint have redressed them, I am confident we shall have the like cause of joy from his majesty.

I will here make a little digression: the county, Somersetshire, I serve for, were pleased to command me to seek the removal from them of the greatest burthen that ever people suffered. It was excellently said, Commissionary Lieutenants do deprive us of all liberty; if ever the like was seen of the lieutenancy that now is, I will never be believed more: they tell the people they must pay so much upon warrant from a Deputy-Lieutenant, or be bound to the good behaviour, and sent up to the Lords of the Council; it is the strangest engine to rend the liberty of the subject that ever was: there is now a Decemviri in every county, and amongst that Decemviri, there is some Claudius Appius that seek their own revenges. We complain of Loans and Impositions, but when Deputy-Lieutenants may send Warrants to imprison our persons at pleasure, if we pay not what they sent for, it concerns us to preserve the country in freedom, and to consider of this kind of people: There is now Necessity brought in for an argument; all know that Necessity is an armed man, and that Necessity is an evil Counsellor, I would we had never known that counsel; we are almost grown like the Turks, who send their Janizaries, who place the halbert at the door, and there he is master of the house. We have Soldiers billeted, and Warrants to collect money, which if they do not, the soldiers must come and rifle. The Romans sending one into Spain, found no greater complaint, than the discontent that did arise, from soldiers placed amongst them. I would you would look into Fortescue, where he puts the prince in mind, what misery he saw, where soldiers were put upon the people: but, saith he, no man is forced to take Soldiers but Inns, and they are to be paid by them. I desire we resort to his majesty for redress, and to reduce all into bounds.

The other way of Grievance is a Judgment in a legal course of proceeding; we have had three Judgments of late times, all exceeding one another in prejudice of the subject: the first was, that which was judged in all formality, the Postnati, Scots, case, * which people I honour; for we find many of them love us more than we do ourselves: I do not complain of it, but only mention it.

The other Judgment was for Impositions, † which was given in the Exchequer, and this house twice afterwards damned that Judgment: how remiss our eyes are upon that I grieve to see.

There is a Judgment, if I may so call it, a fatal Judgment against the Liberty of the Subject, Mich. 3 Car. in sir John Heveningham's Case, argued at the bar, and pronounced but by one alone. I can live although another without title be put to live with me; nay, I can live, although I pay Excises and Impositions for more than I do: but to have my Liberty, which is the soul of my life, taken from me by power, and to be pent up in a gaol without remedy by law, and this to be so adjudged to perish in gaol; O improvident ancestors! O unwise forefathers! to be so curious in providing for the quiet possession of our lands and liberties of parliament, and to neglect our persons and bodies, and to let them die in prison, and that durante bene placito, remediless. If this be law, what do we talk of our Liberties? Why do we trouble ourselves with the dispute of Law, Franchises, Propriety of Goods? It is the summa totalis of all miseries; I will not say it was erroneous, but I hope we shall speak our minds, when that Judgment comes here to be debated. What may a man call this? if not Liberty. Having passed in some confusion in the fashion of my delivery, I conclude: we will consider two particulars, his Majesty, and his People. His Majesty calls to us, and craves our assistance to revive again his honour, and the honour of the nation: the People send us, as we hope, with that direction, that we shall return to them with that olive branch, that assurance of being free from those calamities, under which they can hardly breathe. Our sins have brought on us those miseries, let us ail bring our portion to make up the wall: we come with loyal hearts; his majesty shall find, that it is we that are his faithful counsellors; let all sycophants be far removed from his majesty, since we cannot help his majesty without opening our Grievances; let us discharge our duties therein: yet while we seek Liberty, we will not forger subjection. All things a state can be capable of, either blessings or punishments, depend on this meeting: if any think the king may be supplied, and the commonwealth preserved without redress of Grievances, he is deceived. The kings of England were never more glorious than when they trusted their subjects; let us make all haste to do the errand for which we came; let the house consider to prepare our Grievances fit for his majesty's view, not to make a law to give us new liberties, but declaratory, with respective penalties; so that those which violate them, if they would be vile, they should fear infamy with men; and then we shall think of such a Supply as never prince received, and with our money we shall give him our hearts, and give him a new people raised from the dead: then I hope this parliament will be entitled, 'The Parliament of Wonders,' and God's Judgments diverted, and these beams of goodness shall give us life, and we shall go home to our own countries, and leave our posterities as free as our ancestors left us.

But this day, as also the two next day's Debate, produced no Resolutions.

Monday, 24 March. Secretary Cook renewed the motion of Supplies for his majesty, yet so, that Grievances be likewise taken into consideration. Then he made a motion, "That the same Committee may hear Propositions of general heads of Supply, and afterwards go to other businesses of the day for Grievances." Others preferred the consideration of Grievances, as a particular root that invaded the main Liberty of the Subject. It is the law (said they), that glorious fundamental Right, whereby we have power to give; we desire but that his majesty may see us have that right therein, which, next to God, we all desire; and then we doubt not, but we shall give his majesty all supply we can. The time was, when it was usual to desire favours by sowing of discords, as Gondomar did for Raleigh's head. But the debates of this day came to no Resolution.

The day following, being the 25th, Mr. Secretary Cook tendered the house certain Propositions from the king, touching Supply; and told them, That his majesty, finding time precious, expects that they should begin speedily, lest they spend that time in deliberation, which should be spent in action: that he esteems the Grievances of the house his own, and stands not on precedens in point of honour. Therefore, to satisfy his majesty, let the same Committee take his majesty's Propositions into consideration, and let both concur, whether to sit on one in the forenoon, or the other in the afternoon, it is all one to his majesty.—Hereupon the house turned themselves into a Committee, and commanded Edward Littleton, esq. unto the chair, and ordered the Committee to take into consideration the Liberty of the Subject, in his Person, and in his Goods: and also to take into consideration his majesty's Supply. In this Debate the Grievances were reduced to six heads, as to our Persons.

1. Attendance at the Council-board. 2. Imprisonment. 3. Confinement. 4. Designation for foreign Employment. 5. Martial Law. 6. Undue Proceedings in matter of Judicature.

The first matter debated, was the Subject's Liberty in his Person: the particular instance was in the case of sir John Heveningham, and those other gentlemen who were imprisoned about Loan-money, and thereupon had brought their Habeas Corpus, had their Case argued, and were nevertheless remanded to prison, and a Judgment, as it was then said, was entered.

Then Sir Edward Coke spoke as follows.

It is true, that the king's Prerogative is a part of the law of this kingdom, and a supreme part, for the prerogative is highly tendered and respected of the law; yet it hath bounds set unto it by the laws of England. But some worthy members of this house have spoken of foreign states, which I conceive to be a foreign speech, and not able to weaken the side I shall maintain.

That Mr. Attorney (sir Robert Heath) may have something to answer unto, I will speak, without taking another day, to the body of the cause, yet keeping something in store for another time. I have not my Vade mecum here, yet I will endeavour to recite my authorities truly: I shall begin with an old authority, for 'Errorem ad sua principia referre, est referre.' here.

The ground of this error was the Statute of West. 1, cap. 15, which saith, 'That those are not repleviable, who are committed for the death of a man, or by the commandment of the king, or his justices, or for the forest', (for so it was cited:) and Stamford 72, expounded hereof, the 'commandment of the king' to be the commandment of the king's mouth, or of his council: but it is clear that by præceptum is understood the commandment of the Justices of the King's bench, and Common-Pleas: and this is 'contemporanea expositio, quæ est fortissima in lege.'

To this purpose vide Westm. 1. cap. 9. the Book of 2 R. 2. item, cap. 20, de malefactoribus in parc, the Book of 8 H. 4. 5, item, 25, 26, 29, c. ejusdem statuti, whereby it may appear that the commandment here spoken of to be the commandment of the king, is his commandment by the Judges, 'Præceptum Domini Regis in Curia, non in Camera.' So it is likewise taken 1 R. 2, cap. 12, in a Statute made in the next king's reign, and expressly in

Dyer, fol. 162. §. 50. et fol. 192. §. 24. Shall I further prove it by matter of Record? 'Fac hoc et vives:' it is 18 E. 3, Rot. 33 coram Rege, John Bilston's Case: who being committed and detained in prison by the commandment of the king, was discharged by Habeas Corpus, 'eo quod breve domini regis non fuit sufficiens causa.'

All the acts of parliament in title of Accusation are direct to the point, and also the 16 H. 6, Brooke and Littleton, 2, 8, monstrans de fait 182, per Cur. The king cannot command a man to be arrested in his presence: the king can arrest no man, because there is no remedy against him, 1 H. 7, 4, likewise predict. stat. c. 13, the king's pleasure is not binding without the assent of the realm.

I never read any opinion against what I have said, but that of Stamford, mistaken (as you see) in the ground: yet I say not that a man may not be committed without precise shewing the cause in particular; for it is sufficient if the cause in general be shewed, as for Treason, &c. 1 E. 2, stat. de fran. gen. prison. nullus habeat iudicium, &c. there the cause of imprisonment must be known, else the statute will be of little force; the words thereof do plainly demonstrate the intent of the statute to be accordingly. I will conclude with the highest authority, that is, 25 chap. of the Acts of the Apostles, the last verse, where St. Paul saith, 'It is against reason to send a man to prison without shewing a cause.'—Thus, Mr. Attorney, according to the rules of physic, I have given you a preparative, which doth precede a purge. I have much more in store.*

Mr. Cresswell.

I stand up to speak somewhat concerning the point of the subjects grievances by imprisonment of their persons without any declaration of the cause, contrary unto, and in derogation of, the fundamental laws and liberties of this

* "I rise not to make an argument in this point, the greatest that ever was in this place, or elsewhere. This liberty, which all men, as well lawyers as others, believe, as I hope, hath been violated, though not without complaint: but except in this late course, I am confident, was never adjudged before. The Habeas Corpus was brought, the cause was returned by command of the king, intimated by the lords of the council; Argument was made; seven acts of parliament were mentioned, and all were passed over, and only commended; and upon that a Declaration of Judgment was given, and so adjudged; 'That upon any commitment by the king or the council, no enlargement can be.' I ever observed, in any great cause, solemn arguments used to be made. We see his majesty and his council are both interested in this. I do desire that some of the king's counsel may speak what they can to satisfy us of this great power." MSS. Pymmii apud virum honoratum Thomam Hales baronetum. kingdom. I think I am one of the Puisnes of our profession, which are of the members of this house; but howsoever sure I am in that respect of my own inabilities, I am the Puisne of all the whole house; therefore, according to the usual course of students in our profession, I (as the Puisne) speak first in time, because I can speak least in matter.

In pursuance of which course I shall rather put the case than argue it: and therefore I shall humbly desire first of all, of this honourable house in general, that the goodness of the cause may receive no prejudice by the weakness of my argument; and next of all, of my masters here of the same profession in particular, that they by their learned judgments will supply the great defects I shall discover by declaring of my unlearned opinion.

Before I speak of the question, give me leave, as an entrance thereunto, to speak first of the occasion. You shall know, Justice is the life and the heart's blood of the commonwealth; and if the commonwealth bleed in the master vein, all the balm in Gilead is but in vain to preserve this our body of policy from ruin and destruction. Justice is both 'columna et corona reipublicæ,' she is both the column and the pillar, the crown and the glory of the commonwealth. This is made good in Scripture by the judgment of Solomon, the wisest king that ever reigned on earth. For 1, she is the pillar; for he saith, that by Justice the throne shall be established: 2, she is the crown; for he saith, that by Justice a nation is exalted.—Our laws, which are the rules of this Justice, they are the ne plus ultra to both the king and the subject; and as they are the Hercules' pillar, so are they the pillar to every Hercules, to every prince, which he must not pass. Give me leave to resemble her to Nebuchadnezzar's tree: for she is so great, that she doth shade not only the palace of the king, and the house of the nobles, but doth also shelter the cottage of the poorest beggar.

Wherefore, if either now the blasts of indignation, or the irresistible violator of laws, necessity, hath so bruised any of the branches of this tree, that either our persons, or goods, or possessions have not the same shelter as before; yet let us not therefore neglect the root of this great tree, but rather with all our possible endeavour and unfeigned duty, both apply fresh and fertile mould unto it, and also water it even with our own tears, that so these bruised branches may be recovered, and the whole tree again prosper and flourish. For this I have learned from an ancient Father of the Church, that though 'preces regum sunt armate,' yet 'arma subditorum' are but only 'preces et lacrymæ.'

I know well that 'cor regis inscrutable;' and that kings, although they are but men before God, yet are they Gods before men. And therefore to my gracious and dread sovereign, (whose virtues are true qualities ingenerate both in his judgment and nature) let my arm be cut off, nay, let my soul not live that day, that I shall dare to lift up my arm to touch that forbidden fruit, those flowers of his princely crown and diadem.

But yet in our Eden, in this garden of the commonwealth, as there are the flowers of the sun, which are so glorious that they are to be handled only by royal majesty; so are there also some dainties and wholesome herbs, which every common hand that lives and labours in this garden may pick and gather up, and take comfort and repose in them. Amongst all which this oculus dicit, this bona libertas is one, and the chief one.

Thus much in all humbleness I presume to speak for the occasion. I will now descend to the question: wherein I hold, (with all dutiful submission to better judgments) that these acts of power in imprisoning and confining of his majesty's subjects in such manner, without any declaration of the cause, are against the fundamental laws and liberties of this kingdom.

And for these reasons thus briefly drawn, I conclude,

1. The first, from the great favour which the law doth give unto, and the great care which it hath ever taken of the liberty and safety of this kingdom. I should not need to take the question in pieces, nor handle it in parts dividedly, but as one entire; because I hold no other difference between Imprisonment and Confinement than only this, that one hath a less and straiter, the other a greater and larger prison. And this word Confinement not being to be found in any one case of our law, if therefore it is become the language of state, it is too difficult for me to define.

To proceed therefore in maintenance of my first reason; I find our law doth so much favour the Subject's Liberty of his person, that the body of a man was not liable to be arrested or imprisoned for any other cause at the common-law, but for force, and things done against the peace. For the common-law (being the preserver of the land) so abhorreth force, that those that commit it she accounts her capital enemies, and therefore did subject their bodies to imprisonment. But by the statute of Marlebridge, Cap. 24, which was made 35 H. 3, who was the eighth king from the Conquest, because bailiffs would not render accounts to their lords, it was enacted, that their bodies should be attached: And afterwards by the Statute 23 Ed. 3, 17, who was the eleventh king after the Conquest, because men made no conscience to pay their debts; it was enacted, that their bodies should likewise be attached: But before those statutes no man's body was subject to be taken or imprisoned otherwise than as aforesaid. Whereby it is evident, how much the common-law favoured the Liberty of the Subject, and protected his body from imprisonment.

I will in once the reason further by a rule in law, and some cases in law upon that rule. The rule is this, That 'Corporalis injuria non recipit satisfactionem à futuro;' So as if the question be not for a wrong done to the person, the law will not compel him to sustain it, and afterwards accept a remedy; for the law holds no damage a sufficient recompence for a wrong which is corporal.

The cases in law to prove this, shall be these. If one menace me in my goods, or that he will burn the evidence of my land which he hath in his custody, unless I make unto him a bond: there I cannot avoid the bond, by pleading of this menace. But if he restrains my person, or threatens me with battery, or with burning my house, which is a protection for my person, or with burning an instrument of manumission, which is an evidence of my enfranchisement; upon these menaces or dares, I shall avoid the bond by plea.

So if a trespasser drives my beast over another man's ground, and I pursue to rescue it, there I am a trespasser to him on whose ground I am. But if a man assault my person, and I for my safety fly over into another man's ground, there I am no trespasser to him, for, 'Quod quis in tuitione sui corporis fecerit, jure id fecisse existimatur.'

Nay, which is more, the Common-law did favour the Liberty not only of Freeman, but even of the persons of bondmen, and villeins, who have no propriety either in lands or goods, as freemen have; and therefore by the law, the lord could not maim his villein; nay, if the lord commanded another to beat his villein, and he did it, the villein should have his action of battery against him for it.—If the lord made a lease for years to his villein, if he did plead with his villein, if he tendered his villein to be champion for him in a writ of right; any of those acts, and many other, which I omit, were in law enfranchisements, and made these villeins freemen. Nay, in a suit brought against one, if he by attorney will plead that he is a villein, the law is so careful of freedom, that it disallows this plea by attorney, but he must do it propria persona, because it binds his posterity and blood to the villein's also. And thus much in the general for my first reason.

2. My next reason is drawn by an argument à majori ad minus; I frame it thus: If the king have no absolute power over our lands or goods, then à fortiori not over our persons, to imprison them without declaring the cause, for our persons are much more worth than either lands, or goods; which is proved by what I have said already, and Christ himself makes it clear, where he saith, 'An non est corpus supra vestimentum?' Is not the body of more worth than the raiment? Where the Canonists say, that vestimentum comprehendeth all outward things which are not in the same degree with that which is corporal. And our law maketh it also plain; for if a villein purchaseth frankland, this makes it villein-land according to the nature of his person; but it holds not à converso, frankland shall not free the person. Now that the king hath no absolute power either over our lands or goods, I will only at this time but put a case or two: for without proof of the premises, my conclusion would not follow.

First for Land: The king cannot by his letters-patent make the son of an alien heir to his father, nor to any other, for he cannot disinherit the right heir, saith the book, nor do no prejudice to the lord of his escheat. The king by his prerogative shall pay no toll for things bought in fairs and markets; but a custom for paying toll to go over the soil and freeholds of another shall bind the king, for this toucheth the inheritance of the subject; and therefore the king shall not have so much as a way over his lands without paying; and if not a way, then certainly not the land itself.

Next for goods; If a man hath a jewel in gage for ten pound, &c. and is attainted for treason, the king shall not have this jewel, if he pays not the ten pound. So if cattle be distrained, and the owner of them afterwards be attainted, yet the king shall not have them until he have satisfied that for which they were distrained. And if in these cases, where the owners of the goods are such capital offenders, the king cannot have them; much less shall he have them when the owner is innocent, and no offender.

Nay, I may well say that almost every leaf and page of all the volumes of our Common-Law prove this right of propriety, this distinction of meum and tuum, as well between king and subject, as one subject and another: and therefore my conclusion follows, That if the prerogative extend not neither to lands nor to goods, then à fortiori not to the person, which is more worth than either lands or goods, as I said. And yet I agree, that by the very law of nature, service of the person of the subject is due to his sovereign; but this must be in such things which are not against the law of nature: but to have the body imprisoned without any cause declared, and so to become in bondage, I am sure is contrary unto, and against the law of nature, and therefore not to be enforced by the sovereign upon his subjects.

3. My next reason is drawn ab inutili et incommodo. For the Statute de frangentibus prisonam, made 1 E. 2. is, 'quod nullus qui prisonam frerit, subeat iudicium vitæ vel membrorum pro fractione prisonæ tantum, nisi causa pro qua captus imprisonetur tale iudicium requiratur.' Whence this conclusion is clearly gathered, That if a man be committed to prison without declaring what cause, and then if either malefactor do break the prison, or the gaoler suffer him to escape, albeit the prisoner so escaping had committed crimen lese majestatis, yet neither the gaoler nor any other that procured his escape, by the law suffer any corporal punishment for setting him at large; which, if admitted, might prove in consequence a matter of great danger to the commonwealth.

4. My next reason is drawn ab regis honore, from that great honour the law doth attribute unto sovereign majesty; and therefore the rule of law is, that 'solum rex hoc non potest facere, quod non potest injuste agere.' And therefore if a subject hath the donation, and the king the presentation to a church, whereunto the king presents without the subject's nomination, here the quære impedit lies against the incumbent, and the king is in law no disturber.

And Hussey, Chief-Justice, in 1 H. 7, fol. 4. saith, That sir John Markham told king Edw. 4. he could not arrest a man either for treason or felony, as a subject might, because that if the king did wrong, the party could not have his action against him.

What is the reason that an action of false imprisonment lies against the Sheriff, if he doth not return the king's writ, by which he hath taken the body of the subject, but this, because the writ doth brevisiter enarrare causam captivitatis, (which if it doth not, it shall abate, and is void in law) and being returned, the party when he appears may know what to answer, and the court upon what to judge? And if the king's writ under his great seal cannot imprison the subject, unless it contains the cause, shall then the king's warrant otherwise do it without containing the cause; that his judges upon return thereof may likewise judge of the same, either to remain, or judge the party imprisoned?

I should argue this point more closely upon the statute of Magna Charta 29. 'Quod nullus liber homo imprisonetur;' the Statute of West. 1. cap. 15. for letting persons to bail; and the Judgments lately given in the King's-Bench; but the latter of these Statutes having been by that honourable gentleman sir Edward Coke (to whom the professors of the law both in this and all succeeding ages, are, and will be much bound) already expounded unto us, and that also fortified by those many cotemporary expositions and judgments by him learnedly cited; and there being many learned lawyers here, whose time I will not waste, who were present; and some of them perhaps of counsel in the late cause adjudged in the King's-Bench, where you (to whose person I now speak) do well know I was absent, being then of counsel in a cause in another court, and my practice being in the country, far remote from the Treasure of Antiquity, and Records conducing to the clearing of this point; therefore the narrowness of my understanding commends unto me sober ignorance, rather than presumptuous knowledge, and also commands me no further to trouble your patience.

But I will conclude with that which I find reported by sir John Davis, who was the king's Serjeant, and so, by the duty of his place, would no doubt maintain to his uttermost the prerogatives of the king his royal master; and yet it was by him thus said in those Reports of his upon the case of Tanistry Customs, p. 29. That the kings of England always have had a monarchy-royal, and not a monarchy-seignoral: where, under the first (saith he,) "the subjects are free-men, and have propriety in their goods, and free-hold, and inheritance in their lands; but under the latter they are as vassals and slaves, and have propriety in nothing. And therefore (saith he) when a royal monarch makes a new conquest, yet if he receives any of his nation's ancient inhabitants into his protection, they and their heirs after them shall enjoy their lands and liberties according to the law." And there he voucheth this Precedent and Judgment following, given before William the Conqueror himself, viz. "That one Sherborn a Saxon, at the time of the Conquest being owner of a castle and lands in Norfolk, the conqueror gave the same to one Warren a Norman; and Sherborn dying, the heir claiming the same by descent according to the law, it was before the conqueror himself adjudged for the heir, and that the gift thereof by the Conqueror was void."

If then it were thus in the Conqueror's time, and by his own sentence and judgment, and hath so continued in all the successions of our kings ever since, what doubt need we have, but that his most excellent majesty, upon our humble Petition prostrated at his feet, (which, as was well said, is the best passage to his heart) will vouchsafe unto us our ancient liberties and birth-rights, with a thorough reformation of this and other just grievances? And so I humbly crave pardon of this honourable house, that I have made a short lesson long.

Upon this and other arguments made in this Case of the Habeas Corpus, the house referred the whole business to a Committee, to examine all the proceedings: concerning which, Mr. Selden afterwards made report to the house, that Mr. Waterhouse, a Clerk in the Crown-Office, being examined before the Committee, did confess, that by direction from sir Robert Heath, the king's Attorney-General, he did write the draught of a Judgment in the Case before-mentioned, which was delivered to Mr. Attorney. And Mr. Keeling being examined before the Committee did confess, that after Mich. term last, the Attorney-General wished him to make a special entry of the Habeas Corpus: to which he answered, he knew no special entry in those cases, but only a Remittitur: but said to Mr. Attorney, that if he pleased to draw one, and the court after assented to it, he would then enter it. The Attorney did accordingly make a draught, and the copy thereof Mr. Keeling produced to the committee. And further said, that he carried this draught to the Judges, but they would not assent to a special entry: nevertheless, the Attorney-General divers times sent to him, and told him there was no remedy, but he must enter it. Yet a week before the parliament met, the Attorney-General called for the draught again, which accordingly he gave unto him, and never heard of it more.

Sir Robert Philips, upon this report, gave his opinion, "That this intended Judgment in the Habeas Corpus, was a draught made by some man that desired to strike us from all our Liberties: but the Judges justly refused it. But if the Judges did intend it, we sit not here (said he) to answer the trust we are sent for, if we present not this matter to his majesty. Let this business be further searched into, and see how this Judgment lies against us, and what the Judges do say concerning the same."

March 27. The house proceeded in further Debate of the Liberty of the Subject. When Mr. Hackwell resumed the debate of the matter concerning the Habeas Corpus.

Mr. Hackwell.

The late Judgment, said he, which lies in bar, is only an award, and no Judgment; and in the L. C. Justice's argument, there was no word spoken, That the king might commit or detain without cause. For the king to commit a man, is indignum rege: mercy and honour flow immediately from the king, judgment and justice are his too, but they flow from his ministers; the sword is carried before him, but the sceptre is in his hands. These are true emblems of a good king. The law admits not the king's power of detaining in prison at pleasure. In ancient times prisons were but 'custodia, carceres non ad pœnam, sed ad custodiam.' Admit the king may commit a man, yet to detain him as long as he pleaseth is dangerous, and then a man shall be punished before his offence: Imprisonment is a maceration of the body, and horror to the mind; it is vita pejor morte.

Then the house commanded that Case in the Lord Chief Justice Anderson's Book, all of his own hand-writing, to be openly read. The words of the Report were these:

"Divers persons fueront committes a several temps a several prisons, sur pleasure sans bon cause parte de queux estiant amesnes en Banck le Roy. Et parte en se Commune Banck fueront accordant a la ley de la terre mise a large et discharge de le imprisonment, pur que aucuns grants fueront ostendus et procure un commandment a les Judges que ils ne feraissent apres. Ceo nient meens les Judges ne surcease mes per advise enter eux ils feoient certain Articles le tenour de queux ensue, et deliver eux al seigneurs Chauancelor et Treasurer et eux subscribe avec toute leur maines, les Articles sont come ensuont."

"We her majesty's justices of both benches, and barons of the Exchequer, desire your lordships, that by some good means some order may be taken, that her highness's subjects may not be committed or detained in prison by commandment of any nobleman or counsellor against the laws of the realm; either else help us to have access to her majesty, to the end to become suitors to her for the same; for divers have been imprisoned for suing ordinary actions and suits at the Common Law, until they have been constrained to leave the same against their wills, and put the same to order, albeit judgment and execution have been had therein, to their great losses and griefs; for the aid of which persons, her majesty's writs have sundry times been directed to sundry persons, having the custody of such persons unlawfully imprisoned, upon which Writs, no good or lawful cause of imprisonment hath been returned or certified. Whereupon, according to the laws, they have been discharged of their imprisonment; some of which persons so delivered, have been again committed to prison in secret places, and not to any common or ordinary prison, or lawful officer or sheriff, or other lawfully authorized, to have or keep a gaol; so that upon complaint made for their delivery, the queen's courts cannot tell to whom to direct her majesty's writs; and by this means justice cannot be done. And moreover, divers officers and sergeants of London have been many times committed to prison for lawful executing of her majesty's writs, sued forth of her majesty's courts at Westminster; and thereby her majesty's subjects and officers are so terrified, that they dare not sue or execute her majesty's laws, her writs and commandments: divers others have been sent for by pursivants, and brought to London from their dwellings, and by unlawful imprisonment have been constrained, not only to withdraw their lawful suits, but have also been compelled to pay the pursivants, so bringing such persons, great sums of money. All which upon complaint the judges are bound by office and oath to relieve and help, by and according to her majesty's laws. And when it pleaseth your lordships to will divers of us to set down in what cases a prisoner, sent to custody by her majesty or her council, are to be detained in prison, and not to be delivered by her majesty's Court or Judges; we think, that if any person be committed by her majesty's command, from her person, or by order from the Council-board; and if any one or two of her council commit one for High-Treason, such persons so in the cases before committed, may not be delivered by any of her courts, without due trial by the law, and judgment of acquittal had: nevertheless the Judges may award the queen's writ to bring the bodies of such prisoners before them; and if upon return thereof, the causes of their commitment be certified to the judges as it ought to be: then the judges in the cases before, ought not to deliver him; but to remand him to the place from whence he came, which cannot be conveniently done, unless notice of the cause in general, or else in special, be given to the keeper or gaoler that shall have the custody of such prisoner." All the Judges and Barons did subscribe their names to these Articles, Tr. Paschæ 34 Eliz. and delivered one to the Lord-Chancellor, and another to the Lord Treasurer: after which time there did follow more quietness than before, in the cause before-mentioned.

After the reading of this Report,

Sir Edward Coke said, That of my own knowledge this Book was written with my lord Anderson's own hand, it is no flying report of a young student. I was solicitor then, and treasurer Burleigh was as much against commitment as any of this kingdom; it was the White Staves, that made this stir. Let us draw towards a conclusion: the question is, Whether a Freeman can be imprisoned by the king, without setting down the cause? I leave it as bare as Æsop's crow, they that argue against it, 'Humores moti et non remoti corpus destruunt.' It is a maxim, the common law has admeasured the king's prerogative, that in no case it can prejudice the inheritance of the subjects; had the law given the prerogative to that which is taken, it would have set some time to it, else mark what would follow. I shall have an estate of inheritance for life, or for years in my land, or propriety in my goods, and I shall be a tenant at will for my liberty; I shall have propriety in my own house, and not liberty in my person, 'Perspicue vera non sunt probanda.' The king hath distributed his judicial power to courts of justice, and to ministers of justice; it is too low for so great a monarch as the king is, to commit men to prison; and it is against law, that men should be committed, and no cause shewed. I would not speak this, but that I hope my gracious king will hear of it: yet it is not I, Edward Coke, that speaks it, but the Records that speaks it; we have a national appropriate Law to this nation, 'divisis ab orbe Britannis.'

Mr. Selden.

I was sent hither, and trusted with the lives and liberties of them that sent me. Since I came, I took here an oath to defend the king's prerogatives and rights. I profess, though once I was of council, and then I spoke for my fee, for the gentlemen in their Habeas Corpus; yet now I speak according to my knowledge and conscience.

The question is, Whether any subject or freeman, that is committed to prison, and the cause not shewn in the Warrant, he ought to be bailed or delivered? I think, confidently, it belongs to every subject that is not a villain that he ought to be bailed, or delivered.

I shall speak in this course. 1. I will shew the Reasons. 2. Acts of Parliament. 3. Precedents. 4. Answer Objections.

I. Reasons drawn from three heads:

1. From Remedies provided by the common law against imprisonment. For that precious thing of Liberty there are divers remedies, by which it appears, if no known cause be of further detainment, he is to be delivered. I will not mention the action of false imprisonment, but the writ de odio et atia which is not taken away, for that it is in Magna Charta. That writ was sent to know, if the party imprisoned were committed for any cause of malice and hatred, and this was to be enquired of in jury. For the writ de homine replegiando, if one be imprisoned under the sheriff, he must be delivered, if he be not detained for a cause for which he is not replevisable. For the Habeas Corpus, the Keeper is to bring the body 'ad subjiciendum et recipiendum.' If there be no cause, how can the Court consider of the cause? For appeal, by the old law in the time of H. 1, one imprisoned might have his appeal, as appears by Bracton, c. 25. lib. de corona. Fleta, c. 42.

2. The second reason is from the consideration of Freeman and Villeins. All admit we are liberi homines; but do but consider the difference of Villeins and Freeman, and I know no difference in their persons, but only the one cannot be imprisoned, as the other may. Whoever can say I can imprison him, I will say he is my villein. It is the sole distinction of Freeman, that they cannot be imprisoned at pleasure. In old time none but Jews and Villeins could be imprisoned, and confined. The Jews were as demesne villeins of the king; he could send to them to lend money, and if they did not, he imprisoned them.

3. From matter of Punishment. When any thing is declared by any new statute to be an offence, it goes, That he shall be fined and imprisoned. To what end were this in any act of parliament, if imprisonment was at the king's will?

II. For Acts of Parliament, Magna Charta, c. 19. In that act when it was first made, it was 'nec eum in carcere mittimus,' 17 Job. that statute was made, and then it had those words. The course then was to send down all acts of parliament and charters to the abbeyes to be enrolled. Matthew Paris, 345. & 342. recites that charter of 17 John.

They object in Magna Charta, there is 'lex terræ,' and by the law one may be imprisoned. 'Lex terræ' is the process of law, for the law imprisons no man at all, but it is meant the process of law, 5 E. 3. Upon some occasion it was enacted, That none be attached contrary to the Great Charter and the law of the land. 25 E. 3, divers were committed to the Tower, and no man knew wherefore, whereupon was 25 E. 3, made, 28 E. 3, c. 3, 36 E. 3, n. 9. is against imprisonment, 'per speciale mandatum.'

III. For Precedents, 18 E. 3, rot. 33 H. 1, H. 8, rot. 9, 12 Jac. rot. 153.

IV. Objections against it. First, Against the reason; a man may be committed for a point of state, that may not be known: I understand not matters of state; I expected not the objection in a Court of Justice; and it may be a word for any king to try the courage of his judges, and to suppose there is a cause of state, when perhaps there is no cause appears to them. It is as if they sent him back to prison, they knew not wherefore; which cannot be in a court of justice, where they are sworn to do justice.

Secondly, As to the Acts of Parliament, the Judges gave no answer, but only commended them; but the Attorney answered them with one blow to strike them all; that they are to be considered for common and ordinary causes, that happen in Westminster-hall only. But do but consider Magna Charta, which reflects upon the king; 'nec super eum ibimus.' By the law, if I bring an Appeal of Murder against a nobleman, which is my suit, he shall not be tried by his peers; but if he be indicted for that murder, which is the king's suit, he shall; which shews, that that which is in Magna Charta is meant of the king, though it be not in the third person.

Third Objection is against the Statute of Westminster 1. c. 15. But the king's command is the command of the king by his justices; and also the word, 'Replevisable,' never signifiesailable;ailable, is in a Court of Record, by the king's justices: but replevisable, is by the sheriff. The statute is to the sheriff, and it shews the particular causes, and concludes that the sheriff shall lose his bailiwick. The sheriff could never. replevy one for murder, or matters of the forest: but in the King's-bench for murder, or matters of the forest, they may, 3. assis. 19, 21 E. 4, 25. 22 H. 6, 48. Newton. If any man be taken by our command, or by the command of the king, if the sheriff take the party, he must come to us, we will grant a Supersedeas.

Fourthly, They object against the precedents cited; they are all of this kind, they were imprisoned 'per mandatum domini regis,' or 'concilii,' without cause, or the cause is expressed. When the cause is expressed, and is within the cognizance of the court, there they bailed them; but when it is for felony or treason, it may be done beyond the seas, and then the court has no cognizance of them. 'When no cause is set, yet bailment is alledged; then they answer divers were so bailed, but the cause appears by Paper-Books; but I never saw these Books to be Records, and Judges of Record made their Judgment in Records, and the cause only appears by Record.

For the Resolution cited 34 Eliz. all precedents were read, acts of parliament indeed were passed over, and yet that was not read. As we have that liberty here, so I dare say, no prince in Christendom doth assume this power to imprison any without any cause. I find no steps or vestigium of any such power.*

Saturday, March 29, 1628. Mr. Solicitor spake as followeth:

My care when I spake last was to give satis-

* "*Die Veneris, Mar. 28. I rise to make a motion. Yesterday a learned Argument was made by Mr. Solicitor, and 21 Edw. 1, was cited by him, which makes clearly for the Subject, also for that salus populi. I am sure that 'libertas populi est salus populi.' And Festus himself that sent Paul to Agrippa was a lawyer of the empire; and to send a prisoner without signifying the crimes laid against him, seemed unreasonable to Festus to do. By the law of the empire none were to be committed above thirty days, and the gaoler is under a penalty to certify the cause of the prisoner's commitment: and if the gaoler be slack, he is to be fined. When they speak here of the Judgment given in the King's Bench, they say the Precedents were mis-recited. Let a Sub-committee search into those Judgments and Precedents. I heard here a quousque, and there is nothing but a remittitur. The course of the officer is to enter quousque, &c. and that is till they be delivered by law, and is all the Judgment that can be." Ex MSS. Pymii. See Selden's Life in his Works.*

fiction that the judges did not err in their late Resolutions; but if they did, it was cum patribus: the Judges knew nothing of the cause of the gentlemen's imprisonment; if they had known the cause of their imprisonment in private, they would have appealed to his majesty for his grace. For to reiterate all the authorities I will not, I have something to say in the point, to put into the scale, which might have been then said, had it not been for the unhappy difference that might have been between the two courts in Westminster-hall, the King's-bench and the Chancery Court.

In 13 Jac. divers were committed for disobedience to the Decree of the Court of Chancery, as namely Roswell and others, and it was resolved, That the Judges could not deliver such, and at the same time some were committed by warrant from the king and the lords of the council, and this came in question, Mich. 13 Jac. and so continued divers Terms. There was then recourse had to those arguments, and I have a report here of that time what the judges did then, part whereof I will read.

It was resolved by Coke,* Crook, Doderidge and Houghton, that the return was good, and that the cause need not be disclosed, being 'per mandatum concilii,' as 'arcana regni' (and the report further saith, That in 34 Eliz. it was resolved accordingly), and by Coke it was said, That if the privy-council commit one, he is not bailable by any court of justice, and Stamford's opinion is so, fol. 72. See what opinion the Judge had of the resolution in 34 Eliz. and of Stamford.

To this sir Edward Coke replied: This report move: not me at all; that report is not yet 21 years old, but under age, being in 13 Jac. In truth, when I read Stamford, I was of his opinion at the first, but since, looking into those Records before-mentioned, I was of another mind.† He brings in an ill time 13 Jac. when there was clashing between the Court of King's-bench and Chancery, as also there were then many of the traitors that were of the Powder-Treason, committed 'per mandatum concilii.'

Upon Monday, April 1, the Debate being re-assumed, sir Robert Philips moved, That considering the house was now ready for the

* Coke was then a Judge, and in favour at court.

† "Coke of one mind, when a Judge, and in favour; of another, when out of court, and discontented." (Note to old Edition.)

Of Coke's conduct in parliament, Mr. Barrington, in a Note to his Observations on Statute Westminster the Second, says, "The late publication of the Journals of the House of Commons shews, that he did not, as a Member of Parliament, prostitute his amazing knowledge of municipal law, to political purposes; as he generally argues in the same manner, and from the same authorities, which he cites in his Institutes."

question, they might hear the resolution read of all the Judges in 34 Eliz. about this matter. Then Sir Edward Coke stood up and said, The glass of Time runs out, and something cast upon us hath retarded us; when I spake against the Loans and this matter, I expected blows, and somewhat was spoken, though not to the matter. Concerning that (that hath been objected), I did when I was a Judge, I will say somewhat. Indeed, a motion was made, but no argument or debate, or resolution upon 'advice; I will never palliate with this house, there is no Judge that hath an upright heart to God, and a clear heart to the world, but he hath some warrant for every thing that he doth. I confess when I read Stamford then, and had it in my hands, I was of that opinion at the Council-Table; but when I perceived that some members of this house were taken away, even in the face of this house, and sent to prison, and when I was not far off from that place myself, I went to my book, and would not be quiet till I had satisfied myself. Stamford at the first was my guide, but my guide had deceived me, therefore I swerved from it: I have now better guides, Acts of Parliament and other precedents, these are now my guides. I desire to be free from the imputation that hath been laid upon me.

As for the Copy of the intended Judgment, I fear, had it not been for this parliament, it had been entered ere this time; a parliament brings Judges and all other men into good order: if any clerk had drawn this draught, he would have done it by a precedent, and there can be no precedent found that warrants it, and therefore I believe that some other did it.—This draught of the Judgment, should it be entered, will sting us to death, 'quia nulla causa fuit ostenta, ideo ne fuit baileabile;' and that it appears to be so by the Records. I persuade myself Mr. Attorney drew it; I had a copy of my lord Anderson's Report of the Judges Resolution, 34 Eliz. long ago; but I durst not vouch it (and it was so in that copy) for that it was Apocrypha, and did not answer his gravity that made it, and yet it was cited in the King's Bench, 'That all the Judges of England ruled it so.'

Then the House of Commons came to the following Resolutions:

Resolved upon the question, nem. con.

I. That no Freeman ought to be detained or kept in prison, or otherwise restrained by the command of the king or privy-council, or any other, unless some cause of the commitment, detainer or restraint be expressed, for which by law he ought to be committed, detained or restrained.

II. That the Writ of Habeas Corpus may not be denied, but ought to be granted to every man that is committed or detained in prison, or otherwise restrained, though it be by the command of the king, the privy-council, or any other, he praying the same.

‘ III. That if a Freeman be committed or detained in prison, or otherwise restrained by the command of the king, the privy-council, or any other, no cause of such commitment, detainer, or restraint being expressed, for which by law he ought to be committed, detained, or restrained, and the same be returned upon an Habeas Corpus, granted for the said party; then he ought to be delivered or bailed.’

And then taking into consideration the Property of the Subject in his Goods, they came to this Resolution, to which there was not a negative; viz.

‘ That it is the antient and indubitable Right of every Freeman, that he hath a full and absolute property in his goods and estate; that no Tax, Taille, Loan, Benevolence, or other like charge ought to be commanded, or levied by the king, or any of his ministers, without common consent by act of parliament.’

The Commons having shewed their care of the Subjects in the Liberty of their Persons, and Propriety in their Goods, did now prepare to transmit their Resolutions to the Lords for their concurrence; and several members were appointed to manage a Conference with the Lords concerning the same; and Monday, April 7, the Conference was held, and opened by sir Dudley Diggs.

A CONFERENCE desired by the Lords, and had by a Committee of both Houses, concerning the Rights and Privileges of the SUBJECTS.

Sir Dudley Diggs.

My Lords; I shall, I hope, auspiciously begin this Conference this day, with an observation out of an Holy Story, in the days of good king Josiah, 2 Chron. 34, when the land was purged of Idolatry, and the great men went about to repair the House of God; while money was sought for, there was found a Book of the Law which had been neglected, and afterwards being presented to the good king, procured the blessing, which your lordship may read in the Scriptures. 2 Kings 22.

My good lords, I am confident your lordships will as cheerfully join with the commons, in acknowledgment of God's great blessing in our good king Josiah, as the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the house of commons, by me their unworthiest servant, do thankfully remember your most religious and truly honourable invitation of them to the late Petition, for cleansing this land from Popish Abominations; which I may truly call a necessary and a happy repairing of the House of God. And, to go on with the parallel, whilst we the commons, out of our good affections, were seeking for money, we found, I cannot say a Book of the Law, but many, and those fundamental points thereof neglected and broken, which hath occasioned our desire of this Conference: wherein I am first commanded to shew to your lordships in general, that the Laws of England are grounded on reason, more ancient than books, consisting much in unwritten customs, yet so full of justice and true equity, that your most honourable predecessors and ancestors many times propugned them with a voluntas mutari; and so ancient, that from the Saxon days, notwithstanding the injuries and ruins of time, they have continued in most parts the same, as may appear in old remaining monuments of the laws of Ethelbert, the first Christian king of Kent, Ina the king of the West-Saxons, Offa of the Mercians, and of Alfred the great monarch, who united the Saxon Heptarchy, whose laws are yet to be seen, published, as some think, by parliament, as he says to that end, ‘ Ut qui sub uno rege, sub una lege regerentur.’ And though the Book of Litchfield, speaking of the troublesome times of the Danes, says that then ‘ Jus sopitum erat in regno, leges et consuetudines sopite sunt,’ and ‘ prava voluntas, vis, et violentia magis regnabat quam judicia vel justitia;’ yet, by the blessing of God, a good king, Edward, commonly called St. Edward, did awaken those laws, and as the old words are, ‘ Excitatis reparavit, reparatas decoravit, decoratas confirmavit.’ Which ‘ confirmavit,’ shews, that good king Edward did not give those laws, which William the Conqueror, and all his successors, since that time, have sworn unto.

And here, my lords, by many cases frequent in our modern laws, strongly concurring with those of the ancient Saxon kings, I might, if time were not precious, demonstrate that our Laws and Customs were the same.

I will only intreat your lordships leave to tell you, that as we have now, even in those Saxon times they had their Courts-Baron and Courts-Leet, and Sheriff-Courts, by which, as Tacitus says of the Germans their ancestors, ‘ Jura reddebant per pagos et vicos;’ and, I do believe, as we have now, they had their parliaments, where new laws were made ‘ cum consensu prælatorum, magnatum et totius communitatis;’ or, as another writes, ‘ cum consilio prælatorum, nobilium, et sapientium laicorum.’ I will add nothing out of Glanville that wrote in the time of H. 2, or Bracton that wrote in the days of H. 3, only give me leave to cite that of Fortescue, the learned Chancellor to H. 6, who writing of this kingdom, says, ‘ Regnum illud in omnibus nationum, et regum temporibus, eisdem quibus nunc regitur legibus et consuetudinibus, regebatur.’ But, my good lords, as the poet said of Fame, I may say of our Common-Law;

‘ Ingrediturque solo caput inter nubila condit.’ Wherefore the cloudy part being mine, I will make haste to open way for your lordships to hear more certain Arguments, and such as go on more safe grounds.

Be pleased then to know, that it is an undoubted and fundamental point of this so ancient Common-Law of England, that the Subject hath a true property in his Goods and Possessions, which doth preserve, as sacred, that meum et tuum, that is the nurse of industry, and mother of courage, and without which, there can be no justice, of which meum et tuum is the proper object. But the undoubted birthright of free Subjects, hath lately not a little been invaded and prejudiced by pressures, the more grievous, because they have been pursued by imprisonment, contrary to the franchises of this land; and when, according to the laws and statutes of this realm, redress hath been sought for in a legal way, by demanding Habeas Corpus from the Judges, and a discharge or trial according to the law of the land, success hath failed; that now enforceth the commons, in this present parliament assembled, to examine by acts of parliament, precedents and reasons, the truth of the English Subjects Liberty, which I shall leave to learned gentlemen, whose weighty Arguments, I hope, will leave no place in your lordships memories, for the errors and infirmities of your humblest servant, that doth thankfully acknowledge the great favour of your honourable and patient attention.

MR. LITTLETON'S ARGUMENT.

Made by the command of the House of Commons out of Acts of Parliament, and authorities of law, expounding the same, at the first Conference with the Lords, concerning the Liberty of the Person of every Freeman.*

My lords; Upon the occasions delivered by the gentleman that last spake, your lordships have heard the Commons have taken into their serious consideration the matter of Personal Liberty, and after long debate thereof on divers days, as well by solemn arguments, as single propositions of doubts and answers, to the end no scruple might remain in any man's breast unsatisfied, they have upon a full search, and clear understanding of all things pertinent to the question, unanimously declared: That no Freeman ought to be committed or detained in prison by the command of the King or Privy-Council, or any other, unless some cause of the commitment, detainer, or restraint be expressed, for which by law he ought to be committed, detained, or restrained. And they have sent me, with other of their members, to represent unto your lordships the true grounds of such their Resolution, and have charged me particularly, leaving the reasons of law and precedents for others, to give your lordships satisfaction, that this Liberty is established and confirmed by the whole state, the king, the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, by several acts of parliament; the authority whereof is so great, that it can receive no answer, save

* This Argument of Mr. Littleton is printed in 'Cottoni Posthuma'; as if made by sir Robert Cotton, bart. But whosoever consults the Historians of those times, will find, that Diggs, Littleton, Selden and Coke, were the four lawyers appointed by the House of Commons to manage that memorable Conference.

by interpretation or repeal by future statutes. And those that I shall mind your lordships of, are so direct in point, that they can bear no other exposition at all, and sure I am they are still in force.

The first of them is the Grand Charter of the Liberties of England, first granted in the 17th of king John, and renewed in the 9 Hen. 3, and since confirmed in parliament above 30 times. The words are these, ch. 29. 'Nullus liber homo capiatur, vel imprisonetur, aut disseisetur de libero tenemento suo, vel libertatibus, vel liberis consuetudinibus suis, aut utlagetur, aut exuletur, aut aliquo modo destruat, nec super eum ibimus, nec super eum mittemus, nisi per legale iudicium parium suorum vel per legem terræ.'

These words, 'nullus liber homo,' &c. are express enough, yet it is remarkable that Matthew Paris, an author of special credit, doth observe, fol. 432, that the Charter of 9 H. 3, was the very same as that of 17 John, 'in nullo dissimilis' are his words; and that of king John he setteth down verbatim, fol. 342, and there the words are directly 'Nec eum in carcerum mittemus;' and such a corruption as is now in print, might easily happen betwixt 9 H. 3, and 28 E. 1, when this Charter was first exemplified, but certainly there is sufficient left in that which is extant to decide this question. For the words are, 'That no Freeman shall be taken or imprisoned, but by the lawful judgment of his peers;' which is by a jury of peers, ordinary jurors, or others, who are their peers, or by the law of the land: which words, 'Law of the land,' must of necessity be understood in this nation, to be by due process of the law, and not the law of the land generally, or otherwise it would comprehend bond-men (whom we call Villains) who are excluded by the word 'Liber;' for the general law of the land doth allow their lords to imprison them at their pleasure without cause, wherein they only differ from the freemen in respect of their persons, who cannot be imprisoned without a cause. And that this is the true understanding of these words, 'Per legem terræ,' will more plainly appear by divers other statutes that I shall use, which do expound the law accordingly. And though the words of this Grand Charter be spoken in the third person, yet they are not to be understood of suits betwixt party and party, at least not of them alone, but even of the king's suits against his subjects, as will appear by the occasion of getting of that Charter, which was by reason of the differences betwixt those kings and their people, and therefore properly to be applied unto their power over them, and not to ordinary questions betwixt subject and subject.

Secondly, The word 'per legale iudicium parium suorum,' immediately preceding the other of 'per legem terræ,' are meant of Trials at the king's suit, and not at the prosecution of a subject. And therefore, if a peer of the realm be arraigned, at the suit of the king, upon an Indictment of murder, he shall be tried by his peers, that is nobles; but if he be appealed of murder by a subject, his trial shall be by an ordinary Jury of 12 freeholders, as appeareth in 10 E. 4, 6, 33 H. 8, Brooke Title Trials 142. Stan. Cor. li. 3, ca. 1, fol. 152. and in 10 E. 4, 6, it is said, such is the meaning of Magna Charta, for the same reason: therefore as 'per judicium parium suorum' extends to the king's suit, so shall these words 'per legem terræ.'

And in 8 E. 2, rot. parl. n. 7, there is a Petition that a Writ under the privy-seal went to the guardians of the great seals, to cause lands to be seized into the king's hands, by force of which there went a writ out of the Chancery to the Escheator, to seize, against the form of the Grand Charter, that the king nor his ministers shall out no man off his freehold without reasonable judgment, and the party was restored to his land: which shewed the statute did extend to the king.

There was no invasion upon this personal liberty, till the time of Edw. 3, which was soon resented by the subject; for in 5 E. 3, c. 9, it is ordained in these words: 'It is enacted that no man from henceforth shall be attacked by any accusation, nor fore-judged of life or limb, nor his lands, tenements, goods, nor chattels, seized into the king's hands, against the form of the Great Charter, and the law of the land.' 25 E. 3, c. 4, it is more full, and doth expound the words of the Grand Charter, and is thus: 'Whereas it is contained in the Grand Charter of the franchises of England, that no freeman shall be imprisoned, nor put out of his freehold, nor free custom, unless it be by the law of the land; it is awarded, assented, and established, that from hence none shall be taken by petition or suggestion, made to our lord the king, or to his council, unless it be by Indictment, or presentment of his good and lawful people of the same neighbourhood; which such deeds shall be done in due manner, or by process made by writ original at the common law, nor that none be outed of his franchises, nor of his freehold, unless he be duly brought in to answer, and fore-judged of the same by the course of the law; and if any thing be done against the same, it shall be redressed and holden for nought.'

Out of this Statute I observe, that what in Magna Charta, and the preamble of the Statute is termed 'by the law of the land,' is in the body of the Act expounded to be by process made by the writ original at the common law, which is a plain interpretation of the words 'law of the land' in the Grand Charter. And I note that this law was made upon the commitment of divers to the Tower, no man yet knoweth for what.

28 E. 3, c. 3, it is more direct, this liberty being followed with fresh suit by the subject, where the words are not many, but very full and significant; 'That no man, of what state or condition soever he be, shall be put out of his lands or tenements, nor taken, nor imprisoned, nor disinherited, nor put to death, without he be brought in to answer by due process of law.'

Here your lordships see the usual words, 'the law of the land,' are rendered by due process of the law.

36 E. 3, Rot. Parl. n. 9. Amongst the petitions of the commons, one of them being translated into English out of French, is thus; first, that the Great Charter, and the Charter of the Forest, and other Statutes made in his time, and the time of his progenitors, for the profit of him, and his commonalty, be well and firmly kept; and put in due execution, without putting disturbance, or making arrest contrary to them by special command, or in other manner.

The answer to the Petition, which makes it an act of parliament, is, 'Our lord the king, by the assent of the prelates, dukes, earls, barons, and the commonalty, hath ordained and established, that the said Charters and Statutes be held, and put in execution, according to the said Petition.' It is observable, that the Statutes were to be put in execution according to the said Petition, which is, that no arrest should be made contrary to the Statutes, by special command. This concludes the question, and is of as great force as if it were printed, for the Parliament Roll is the true warrant of an act, and many are omitted out of the Books, that are extant in the Roll.

36 E. 3, Rot. Parl. n. 22, explaineth it further; for there the Petition is, 'Whereas it is contained in the Grand Charter and other Statutes, that no man be taken or imprisoned by special command without Indictment, or other due process to be made by the law, and oftentimes it hath been, and yet is, many are hindered, taken and imprisoned without Indictment, or other process made by the law upon them, as well of things done out of the Forest of the king, as for other things; that it would therefore please our said lord to command those to be delivered, which are so taken by special command against the form of the Charter and Statutes as aforesaid.'

The Answer is, 'The king is pleased, that if any man find himself grieved, that he come and make his complaint, and right shall be done unto him.' 37 E. 3, c. 18, agreeth in substance with them: it saith, 'Though it be contained in the Great Charter, that no man be taken nor imprisoned, nor put out of his freehold without process of the law; nevertheless divers people make false suggestions to the king himself, as well for malice as otherwise, whereat the king is often grieved, and divers of the realm put in damage, against the form of the same Charter; wherefore it is ordained, that all they which make such suggestions, shall be sent with the same suggestions, to the Chancellor, Treasurer, and his grand council, and that they there find surety to pursue their suggestions, and incur the same pain that the other should have had, if he were attainted, in case that the suggestion be found evil; and that then process of law be made against them without being taken or imprisoned, against the form of the said Charter, and other Statutes.' Here the law of the land in the Grand Charter is explained to be without process of law.

42 E. 3, c. 13. At the request of the Commons by their Petition put forth in this parliament, to eschew mischief and damage done to divers of his commons by false accusers, which oftentimes have made their accusations, more for revenge and singular benefit, than for the profit of the king, or of his people; of which accused persons some have been taken and caused to come before the king's council by writ, and otherwise upon grievous pains against the law; it is assented and accorded for the good governance of the commons, That no man be put to answer without presentment before justices or matter of record, or by due process and writ original, according to the old law of the land: and if any thing from hence be done to the contrary, it shall be void in the law, and holden for error.

But this is better in the Parliament Roll, where the Petition and Answer, which makes the Act, are set down at large, 42 E. 3, Rot. Parl. n. 13.

The Petition.

'Item. Because that many of your commons are hurt and destroyed by false accusers, who make their accusations more for their revenge and particular gain, than for the profit of the king, or of his people: and those that are accused by them, some are taken, and others are made to come before the king's council by writ, or other commandment of the king, upon grievous pains, contrary to the law: That it would please our lord the king, and his good council, for the just government of his people, to ordain, that if hereafter any accuser propose any matter for the profit of the king, that the same matter be sent to the justices of the one bench or of the other, or the Assizes, to be enquired and determined according to the law; and if it concern the accuser or party, that he take his suit at the Common Law; and that no man be put to answer without presentment before the justices or matter of record, and by due process and original writ, according to the ancient law of the land. And if any thing henceforward be done to the contrary, that it be void in law, and held for error.'

Here by due process and original writ, according to the ancient law of the land, is meant the same thing, as 'per legem terræ,' in Magna Charta; and the abuse was, they were put to answer by the commandment of the king.

The King's Answer is thus:

'Because that this Article is an Article of the Grand Charter, the king willeth that this be done, as the Petition doth demand.' By this appeareth that 'per legem terræ,' in Magna Charta, is meant by due process of the law.

Thus your lordships have heard Acts of Parliament in the point. But the Statute of Westminster, 1. c. 15, is urged to disprove this opinion, where it is expressly said, That a man is not repleviable, who is committed by the command of the king; therefore the command of the king, without any cause shewed, is sufficient to commit a man to prison. And because the strength of the Argument may appear, and the Answer be better understood, I will read the words of the Statute, which are thus:

'And forasmuch as sheriffs and others, which have taken and kept in prison persons detected for felony, and oftentimes have let out by replevin such as were not repleviable, and have kept in prison such as were repleviable, because they would gain of the one party, and grieve the other; and forasmuch as before this time it was not certainly determined what persons were repleviable, and what not, but only those that were taken for the death of a man, or by the commandment of the king, or of his justices, or for the forest; it is provided, and by the king commanded, that such prisoners as were before outlawed, and they which have abjured the realm, provers, and such as be taken with the manner, and those which have broken the king's prison, thieves openly defamed and known, and such as be appealed by approvers; so long as the approvers are living, and if they be not of good name, and such as be taken for burning of houses feloniously done, or false money, or for counterfeiting the king's seal, or persons excommunicate taken at the request of the bishop, or for manifest offences, or for treason touching the king himself, shall be in no wise repleviable by the common writ, or without writ.'

But such as be indicted of larceny by inquests taken before sheriffs or bailiffs by their office, or of light suspicion, or of petty larceny, that amounteth not above the value of twelvenpence, if they were not guilty of some other larceny aforesaid, or guilty of receipt of felons, or of commandment, or of force, or of aid of felony done, or guilty of some other trespass, for which one ought not to lose either life or member: and a man appealed by an approver, after the death of the approver; if he be no common thief or defamed; shall from henceforth be let out by sufficient surety, whereof the sheriff will be answerable, and that without giving ought of their goods. And if the sheriff, or any other, let any go at large, by surety, that are not repleviable, if he be sheriff or constable, or any other bailiff, or such as hath a fee, which hath keeping of prisons, and thereof be attained, he shall lose his office and fee for ever. And if the under-sheriff, constable or bailiff, or such as hath fee for keeping of prisons, do it contrary to the will of his lord, or any other bailiff being not of fee, they shall have three years imprisonment, and make a fine at the king's pleasure; and if any man withhold prisoners repleviable, after that they have offered sufficient surety, he shall pay a grievous amercement to the king; and if he take any reward for the deliverance of such, he shall pay double to the prisoner, and also shall pay a grievous amercement to the king.

The Answer.

It must be acknowledged, that a man taken by the commandment of the king is not replevable, for so are the express words of this Statute: but this maketh nothing against the Declaration of the House of Commons; for they say not, the sheriff may replevy such a one by sureties, scilicet manucaptors, but that he is bailable by the king's court of justice: for the better apprehending whereof, it is to be known, that there is a difference between replevable, which is always by the sheriff upon pledges or sureties given, and bailable, which is by a court of record, where the prisoner is delivered to his bail, and they are his gaolers, and may imprison him, and shall suffer for him body for body, as appeareth 33 & 36 Edw. 3, titulo Mainprize 12 & 13, where the difference betwixt Bail and Mainprize is expressly taken. And if the words of the Statute themselves be observed, it will appear plainly, that it extends to the Sheriff and other inferior officers, and doth not bind the hands of the judges.

The Preamble, which is the key that openeth the entrance into the meaning of the makers of the Law, is, 'Forasmuch as Sheriffs and others have taken and kept in prison persons detected of felony.' Out of these words I observe, that it nominateth Sheriffs, and then if the Judges should be included, they must be comprehended under that general word, 'others;' which doth not extend to those of an higher rank, but to inferiors, for the best by all courses is first to be named. And therefore if a man bring a Writ of Customs and Services, and name Rents and other things, the general shall not include Homage, which is a personal service, and of an higher nature, but it shall extend to ordinary annual service, 31 E. 1, droit 67. So the Statute of 13 Eliz. c. 10, which beginneth with Colleges, Deans and Chapters, Parsons, Vicars, and concludes with these words, 'and others having spiritual Promotions,' shall not comprehend Bishops that are of an higher degree, as appeareth in the archbishop of Canterbury's Case, reported by sir Edw. Coke, lib. 2, fol. 46, B.

And thus much is explained in the very Statute towards the end, when it doth enumerate those who were meant by the word, 'others,' namely, Under-Sheriffs, Constables, Bailiffs, &c.

Again, the words are, 'Sheriffs and others which have taken and kept in prison.' Now every man knoweth, Judges do neither arrest, nor keep men in prison; that is the office of Sheriffs and other inferior ministers. Therefore this Statute meant such only, and not Judges.

The words are further, That they let out by replevin such as are not replevable, that is the proper language for a Sheriff; nay, more express afterward in the body of the Statute, that such as are there mentioned, shall in nowise be replevable by the common Writ, which is 'De homine replegiando,' and is directed to the Sheriff, nor without writ, which is by the Sheriff ex officio. But that which receives no answer is this, that the command of the Justices, who derive their authority from the crown, is there equal as to this purpose with the command of the king. And therefore by all reasonable construction, it must needs relate to officers that are subordinate to both, as sheriffs, under-sheriffs, bailiffs, constables, and the like. And it were a harsh exposition to say, that the Justices might not discharge their own command, and yet that reason would conclude as much; and that this was meant of the sheriff and other ministers of justice, appears by the Recital, 27 Edw. 1, c. 3, and likewise by Fleta, a Manuscript, so called, because the author lay in the Fleet when he made the Book: for he, l. 2, c. 52, in his Chapter of Turns, and the Views of the Hundred Courts in the Country, setteth down the Articles of the Charges that are there to be inquired of; amongst which, one of them is 'De replegiabilibus in juste detentis et irreplegiabilibus dimissis;' which cannot be meant of not bailing by the Justices; for what have the inferior courts in the country to do with the acts of the Justices?

And to make that more plain, he setteth down in that Chapter, that concerneth Sheriffs only, the very statute of Westminster 1, which he translates verbatim out of the French into the Latin; save that he renders taken by the command of the Justices, thus, 'per judicium Justiciariorum;' and his Preface to the Statute plainly sheweth, that he understood it of Replevin by Sheriffs; for he saith, 'Qui debent per plégios dimitti, qui non declarat hoc Statutum;' and 'per plégios' is before the Sheriff.

But for direct Authority, It is the opinion of Newton, chief justice, 22 Hen. 6, 46, where his words are these: 'It cannot be intended that the Sheriff did suffer him to go at large by Mainprize; for where one is taken by the writ of the king, or the commandment of the king, he is irreplevable; but in such case his friends may come to the Justices from him if he be arrested, and purchase a Supersedeas.' This Judge concludes, that the sheriff cannot deliver him that is taken by the command of the king, for that he is irreplevable, which is the very word of the statute: but, saith he, his friends may come to the Justices, and purchase a Supersedeas. So he declares the very question, that the Sheriff had no power, but the Justices had power to deliver him that is committed by the king's command, and both the antient and modern practice manifest as much: for he that is taken for the death of a man, or for the Forest, is not replevable by the sheriff, yet they are ordinarily bailed by the Justices, and were by the king's writs directed to the sheriffs in the times of Edw. 1 and 2, as appears in the close Rolls, which could not be done if they were not bailable. And it is every day's experience, that the Justices of the King's bench do bail for murder, and for offences done in the Forest, which they could not do, if the word 'irreplevable,' in Westminster 1, were meant of the Justices, as well as of the Sheriffs.

For Authorities that have been offered to prove the contrary, they are in number three. The first is 21 Edw. 3, Rot. 2, which also is in the Book of Pleas in Parliament at the Tower, upon an action there brought, fol. 44. It is not an act of parliament, but a resolution in parliament upon an action there brought, which was usual in those times: and the case is, that Stephen Rabez, the sheriff of the counties of Leicester and Warwick, was questioned, for that he had let at large by surety, amongst others, one William, the son of Walter le Persons, against the will and command of the king, whereas the king had commanded him by letters under the privy-seal, that he should do no favour to any man that was committed by the earl of Warwick, as that man was; whereunto the sheriff answered, that he did it at the request of some of the king's household upon their letters; and because the sheriff did acknowledge the receipt of the king's letters, thereupon he was committed to prison according to the form of the statute.

To this I answer, the sheriff was justly punished, for that he is expressly bound by the statute of Westminster 1, which was agreed from the beginning; but this is no proof, that the Judges had no power to bail this man.

The next Authority is 33 Hen. 6, in the Court of Common Pleas, fol. 28; b. 29, where Robert Poynings, esq. was brought to the bar upon a Capias, and was returned, that he was committed 'per duos de concilio,' (I believe it is misprinted for 'duos de concilio,' i. e. 'dominos de concilio,' which is strongest against what I maintain) 'pro diversis causis regem tangentib.' And he made an attorney there in an action, whence it is inferred, that the return was good, and the party could not be delivered.

To this the answer is plain: 1. No opinion is delivered in that book, one way or other, upon the return, neither is there any testimony whether he were delivered, or bailed, or not. 2. It appears expressly, that he was brought thither to be charged in an action of debt, at another man's suit, no desire of his own to be delivered, or bailed; and then if he were remanded, it is no way material to the question in hand. But that which is most relied upon, is the Opinion of Stamf. in his Book of Pleas of the Crown, lib. 2, c. 18, f. 72, 73, in his Chapter of Mainprize, where he reciteth the Statute of Westm. 1, c. 15, and then saith thus: 'By this Statute it appears, that in four cases at the Common Law a man was not repleviable; to-wit, those that were taken for the death of a man, by the command of the king, or his justices, or for the forest; thus far he is most right. Then he goeth on, and saith, 'As to the command of the king, that is understood by the command of his own mouth, or his council, which is incorporated unto him, and spake with his mouth, or otherwise every Writ or Capias to take a man, which is the king's command, would be as much; and as to the command of the Justices, that is meant their absolute commandment, for if it 'be by their ordinary commandment, he is repleviable by the sheriff, if it be not in some of the cases prohibited by the statute.'

The answer that I gave unto this is, that Stamford had said nothing whether a man may be committed without cause by the king's command, or whether the Judges ought not to bail him in such case, only that such a one is not repleviable; which is agreed, for that belongs to the Sheriff. And because no man should think he meant any such thing, he concludes the whole sentence touching the command of the King and the Justices, that one committed by the ordinary command of the justice, is repleviable by the sheriff; or at least it appears not that he meant that a man committed by the king, or by the privy-council without cause, should not be bailable by the justices, and he hath given no opinion in this case; what he would have said, if he had been asked the question, cannot be known, neither doth it appear, that, by any thing that he hath said, he meant any such thing as would be inferred out of him. And now, my lords, I have performed the commands of the Commons, and as I conceive shall clear the declaration of personal Liberty, an ancient and undoubted truth, fortified with seven acts of parliament, and not opposed by any statute or authority of law whatsoever.—See Littleton's Precedents after Mr. Selden's.

MR. SELDEN'S ARGUMENT.

My lords; Your lordships have heard from the gentleman that last spake, a great part of the grounds upon which the House of Commons, upon mature deliberation, proceeded to that clear Resolution touching the Right of the Liberty of their Persons. The many acts of parliaments, which are the written laws of the land, and are expressly in the point, have been read and opened, and such objections as have been by some made to them, and some objections also made out of another act of parliament, have been cleared and answered. It may seem now perhaps, my lords, that little remains needful to be further added, for the enforcement and maintenance of so fundamental and established a Right and Liberty belonging to every freeman of the kingdom. But in the examination of questions of Law of Right, besides the laws or acts of parliament, that ought chiefly to direct and regulate every man's judgment, whatsoever hath been put in practice to the contrary, there are commonly used also former Judgments, or Precedents, and indeed have been so used sometimes, that the weight of reason, of law, and of acts of parliament, hath been laid by, and resolutions have been made, and that in this very point, only upon the interpretation and apprehension of precedents. Precedents, my lords, are good media, or proofs of illustration or confirmation, where they agree with the express law: but they can never be proof enough to overthrow any one law, much less seven several acts of parliament, as the number of them is for the point. The House of Commons therefore taking into consideration, that in this question, being of so high a nature, that never any exceeded it in any court of justice whatsoever, all the several ways of just examination of the truth should be used, have also most carefully informed themselves of all former Judgments and Precedents concerning this great point either way, and have been no less careful of the due preservation of his majesty's just Prerogative than of their own Rights. The Precedents here are of two kinds, either merely matter of Record, or else the former resolutions of the Judges, after solemn debate in the point.

This point that concerns Precedents, the house of commons have commanded me to present to your lordships, which I shall as briefly as I may, so I do it faithfully and perspicuously. To that end, my lords, before I come to the particulars of any of those Precedents, I shall first remember to your lordships, that which will seem as a general key for the opening and true apprehension of all them of record, without which key, no man, unless he be versed in the entries and course of the king's-bench, can possibly understand them.

In all cases, my lords, where any Right or Liberty belongs to the subjects by any positive law written or unwritten, if there were not also a remedy by law, for the enjoying or regaining this Right or Liberty, when it is violated or taken from him, the positive law were most vain, and to no purpose; and it were to no purpose for any man to have any right in any land or other inheritance, if there were not a known remedy, that is, an action or writ, by which, in some court of ordinary justice, he might recover it. And in this case of Right or Liberty of Person, if there were not a remedy in the law for regaining it, when it is restrained, it were of no purpose to speak of laws, that ordain it should not be restrained. Therefore in this case also, I shall first shew you the remedy that every freeman is to use for the regaining of his liberty, when he is against law imprisoned, that so upon the legal course and form to be held in using that remedy, the precedents or judgments upon it, for all judgments of record rise out of this remedy, may be easily understood. There are in law divers remedies for enlarging of a freeman imprisoned, as the writs of odio et atia, and of homine replegiando, besides the common or most known writs of Habeas Corpus, or 'Corpus cum causa,' as it is also called.

The first two writs are to be directed to the sheriff of the county, and lie in some particular cases, with which it would be untimely for me to trouble your lordships, because they concern not that which is committed to my charge. But that Writ of Habeas Corpus or Corpus cum causa, is the highest remedy in law, for any man that is imprisoned, and the only remedy for him that is imprisoned by the special command of the king, or the lords of the Privy-Council, without shewing cause of the commitment: neither is there in the law any such thing, nor was there ever mention of any such thing in the laws of this land, as a petition of right to be used in such cases for liberty of the person, nor is there any legal course for enlargement to be taken in such cases; howsoever the contrary hath upon no ground or colour of law been pretended. Now, my lords, if any man be so imprisoned by any such command, or otherwise, in any prison whatsoever through England, and desire by himself, or any other in his behalf, this writ of Habeas Corpus for the purpose in the court of king's-bench, the writ is to be granted to him, and ought not to be denied him, no otherwise than another ordinary original writ in the chancery, or other common process of law, may be denied; which amongst other things the house resolved also, upon mature deliberation, and I was commanded to let your lordships know so much. This writ is directed to the keeper of the prison, in whose custody the prisoner remains, commanding him that after a certain day, he bring in the body of the prisoner, 'ad sub-jiciend. et recipiend. juxta quod curia consideraverit, &c. una cum causa captionis et detentionis;' and oftentimes 'una cum causa detentionis' only, 'captionis' being omitted.

The keeper of the prison thereupon returns by what warrant he detains the prisoner, and with his return filed to his writ, brings the prisoner to the bar at the time appointed; when the return is thus made, the court judgeth of the sufficiency or insufficiency of it, only out of the body of it, without having respect unto any other thing whatsoever: that is, they suppose the return to be true whatsoever it be: if it be false, the prisoner may have his action on the case against the gaoler that brought him. Now, my lords, when the prisoner comes thus to the bar, if he desire to be bailed, and that the court upon the view of the return think him in law to be bailable, then he is always first taken from the keeper of the prison that brings him, and committed to the marshal of the King's-Bench, and afterwards bailed, and the entry perpetually is, 'Committitur Mariscallo et postea traditur in Ball'; for the court never bails any man, until he first becomes their own prisoner, and be 'in custodia Mariscall' of that court. But if upon the return of the Habeas Corpus, it appear to the court, that the prisoner ought not to be bailed, nor discharged from the prison whence he is brought, then he is remanded or sent back again, there to continue, until by course of law he may be delivered; and the entry in this case is, 'Remittitur quousque secundum legem deliberatus fuerit,' or 'Remittitur, quousque,' &c. which is all one, and the highest award or judgment that ever was or can be given upon an Habeas Corpus. But if the Judges doubt only whether in law they ought to take him from the prison whence he came, or give a day to the sheriff to amend his writ, as often they do, then they remand him only during the time of their doubt, or until the sheriff hath amended his return, and the entry upon that is 'Remittitur only, or 'Remittitur prisonæ præd.' without any more. And so 'remittitur' generally is of far less moment in the award upon the Habeas Corpus, than 'remittitur quousque, &c. however the vulgar opinions raised out of the late Judgment be to the contrary. All these things are of most known and constant use in the Court of King's-Bench, as it cannot be doubted but your lordships will easily know from the grave and learned my lords the judges.

These two courses, the one of the entry of 'Committitur Mariscall. et postea traditur in Ballium,' and the other 'remittitur quousque &c. et remittitur' generally, or 'remittitur prisonæ præd.' together with the nature of the Habeas Corpus, thus stated; it will be easier for me to open, and your lordships to observe, whatsoever shall occur to the purpose in the Precedents of Record, to which I shall come now in the particular. But before I come to the Precedents, I am to let you know the Resolution of the house of commons touching the enlargement of a man committed by the command of the king, or the privy-council, or any other, without cause shewed of such commitment: it is thus; That if a freeman be committed or detained in prison, or otherwise restrained by the command of the king, the privy-council, or any other, and no cause of such commitment, detainer, or restraint be expressed, for which by law he ought to be committed, detained or restrained; and the same be returned upon an Habeas Corpus granted for the party, then he ought to be delivered and bailed.

This Resolution, as it is grounded upon the acts of parliament already shewn, and the reason of the law of the land, which is committed to the charge of another, and anon also to be opened to you, is strengthened also by many Precedents of Record.

But the Precedents of Record that concern this point are of two kinds, for the house of commons hath informed itself of such as concern it either way. The first, such as shew expressly, that persons committed by the command of the king, or of the privy-council, without other cause shewed, have been enlarged upon bail when they prayed it; whence it appears clearly, that by the law, they are bailable, and so by Habeas Corpus to be set at liberty: for though they ought not to have been committed without a cause shewed of the commitment, yet it is true that the reverend judges of this land did pay such respect to such commitments, by the command of the king, or of the lords of the council, (as also to the commitment sometimes of inferior persons) that upon the Habeas Corpus, they rarely used absolutely to discharge the persons instantly, but only to enlarge them upon bail; which sufficiently secures and preserves the Liberty of the Subject, according to the laws that your lordships have already heard, nor in any of the cases is there any difference made between such commitments by the lords of the council, that are incorporated with him. The second kind of precedents of Record are, such as have been pretended to prove the law to be contrary, and that persons so committed ought not to be set at liberty upon bail, and are in the nature of objections out of record.

I shall deliver them summarily to your lordships with all faith, and also true copies of them; out of which it shall appear clearly to your lordships, that of those of the first kind, there are no less than twelve, most full and directly in the point, to prove that persons so committed are to be delivered upon bail: and amongst those of the other kind, there is not so much as one, not one, that proves at all any thing to the contrary. I shall first, my lords, go through them of the first kind, and so observe them to your lordships, that such scruples as have been made upon them by some that have excepted against them, shall be cleared also according as I shall open them severally.

The first of the first kind is of E. 3d's time, it is in Pasche 18 E. 3, Rot. 33. The case was thus: king E. 3, had committed by Writ, and that under his great seal (as most of the king's commands in those times were) one John de Bildeston, a clergyman, to the prison of the Tower, without any cause shewed of the commitment. The lieutenant of the Tower is commanded to bring him to the King's-bench, where he is committed to the marshal; but the court asks of the Lieutenant, if there were any cause to keep this Bildeston in prison, besides that commitment of the king; he answered no: whereupon the Roll says, 'quia videtur cur. bre. præd. sufficient. non esse causam præd. Johan. de Bildeston in prisona dom. regis hic detinend. idem Johannes admittitur per manucaptionem Willielmi de Wakefield,' and some others, where the Judgment of the point is fully declared in the very point.

The second, in the first kind of precedents of Record, is in the time of H. 8, one John Parker's Case, who was committed to the sheriff of London, 'pro securitate pacis,' at the suit of one Brinton, 'ac pro suspicione feloniz' committed by him in Gloucestershire, 'ac per mandatum dom. ra.' he is committed to the marshal of the King's-Bench, 'et postea isto eodem termino traditur in Ball'. Here were other causes of the commitment, but plainly one was by the command of the king, signified to the sheriffs of London, of which they took notice; but some have interpreted this, as if the commitment had been for suspicion of felony by the command of the king, in which case it is agreed of all hands, that the prisoner is bailable; but no man can think so of this precedent, that observes the context, and understands the grammar of it, wherein most plainly 'ac per mandatum dom. regis' hath no reference to any other cause whatsoever, but is a single cause enumerated in the return by itself, as the record clearly sheweth; it is in 22 H. 8, Rot. 37.

The third is of the same king's time, it is 35 H. 8. Rot. 33. John Binck's Case; he was committed by the lords of the council 'pro suspicione feloniz ac pro aliis causis illos moventu-

'bus, qui committitur Mariscallo et immediate 'ex gratia curiaz speciale traditur in Balli.' They committed him for suspicion of felony, and other causes them thereunto moving, wherein there might be matter of state, or whatsoever else can be supposed, and plainly the cause of their commitment is not expressed; yet the court bailed him without having regard to these unknown causes that moved the lords of the council. But it has indeed some difference from either of those other two that precede, and from the other nine also that follow; for it is agreed, that if a cause be expressed in the return, inasmuch that the court can know why he is committed, that then he may be bailed, but not if they know not the cause. Now if a man is committed for a cause expressed, 'et pro aliis causis dominos de concilio moventibus;' certainly the court can no more know in such a case what the cause is than any other.

The fourth of these is in the time of queen Mary, it is Pasch. 2 & 3. P. & Mar. Rot. 58. Overton's Case: Richard Overton was returned upon an Habeas Corpus, directed to the sheriffs of London, to have been committed and detained 'per mandatum prænobiliū dominorum honorabilis concilii dominorum regis 'et reginæ, qui committitur Marr. et immediate 'traditur in Balli.' In answer to this precedent, or by way of objection to the force of it, it hath been said, that this Overton at this time stood indicted of High-Treason. It is true, he was so indicted, but that appears in another Roll, that hath no reference to the Return, as the Return hath no reference to that Roll; yet they that object this against the force of this precedent, say, that because he was indicted of treason, therefore though he was committed by the command of the lords of the council, without cause shewed, yet he wasailable for the treason, and upon that was here bailed: than which objection nothing is more contrary, either to law or common reason. It is most contrary to law, for that clearly every Return is to be adjudged by the court out of the body of itself, and not by any other collateral or foreign record whatsoever. Therefore the matter of the indictment here, cannot in law be cause of bailing of the prisoner; and so it is adverse to all common reason, that if the objection be admitted, it must of necessity follow, that whosoever shall be committed by the king, or privy-council, without cause shewed, and be not indicted of treason, or some other offence, may not be enlarged, by reason of supposition of matter of state. But that whosoever is so committed, and withal stands so indicted, though in another record, may be enlarged, whatsoever the matter of state be for which he was committed. The absurdity of which assertion needs not a word for further confutation, as if any of the gentlemen in the last judgment, ought to have been the sooner delivered, if he had been also indicted of treason; if so, Traitors and Felons have the highest privilege in personal liberty, and that above all other subjects of the kingdom.

The fifth of this kind is of queen Mary's time also, it is Pasch. 4. & 5 P. & Mar. Rot. 45. the Case of Edward Newport: He was brought into the King's-Bench by Habeas Corpus out of the Tower of London, 'Cum causa, viz. quod 'commissus fuit per mandatum Concilii Domine Regine, qui committitur Marr. et immediate 'traditur in Ballium.' To this the like answer has been made, as to that other case of Overton's next before cited; they say that in another roll of another term of the same year, it appears he was in question for suspicion of coining, and it is true he was so; but the return, and his commitment mentioned in it, have no reference to any such offence, nor hath the bailment of him relation to any thing, but to the absolute commitment by the Privy-council: So that the answer to the like objection made against Overton's Case, satisfies this also.

The sixth of these is of queen Elizabeth's time, Mich. 9 El. Rot. 55. the Case of Tho. Laurence; this Laurence came in by Habeas Corpus, returned by the sheriffs of London, to be detained in prison 'per mandat. Concilii 'Domine Regine, qui committitur Marr. et 'super hoc traditur in Ballium.' An objection hath been invented against this also; it hath been said, that this man was pardoned, and indeed it appears so in the margin of the roll, where the word 'pardonatur' is entered: but clearly his enlargement by bail was upon the body of the return only, unto which that note of pardon in the margin of the Roll hath no relation at all; and can any man think, that a man pardoned (for what offence soever it be) might not as well be committed for some Arcanum, or matter of state, as one that is not pardoned, or out of his innocency wants no pardon?

The seventh of these is in the same year, and of Easter-term following: it is P. 9, Rot. 68, Robert Constable's Case: He was brought by Habeas Corpus out of the Tower; and in the return it appeareth he was committed there, 'per mandatum privati Concilii Domine Regine, qui committitur Mar. et postea isto 'eodem ter' traditur in balli.' The like objection hath been made to this, as that before of Laurence, but the self-same answer clearly satisfies for them both.

The eighth is of the same queen's time, in Pasch. 20 El. Rot. 72, John Browning's Case. This Browning came by H. Corpus out of the Tower, whither he had been committed, and was returned to have been committed, 'per 'privat. Concil. Domine Regine qui committitur Mar. et postea isto eodem termino traditur 'in balli.' To this it hath been said, that it was done at the C. Justice Wray's chamber, and not in the court; and thus the authority of the precedent hath been lessened or slighted. If it had been done at his chamber, it would have proved at least this much, that sir Christ. Wray, then C. J. of the King's-Bench, being a grave, learned, and upright judge, knowing the law to be so, did bail this Browning, and enlarge him, and even so far the precedent were of value enough; but it is plain that though the

H. Corpus were returnable, as indeed it appears in the Record itself, at his chamber in Serjeants-Inn, yet he only committed him to the King's-Bench presently, and referred the consideration of enlarging him to the court, who afterward did it: for the Record says, 'Et postea isto eodem termino traditur in ball.' which cannot be of an enlargement at the C. Justice's chamber.

The ninth of this first kind is Hill. 40 El. Rot. 62, Edward Harecourt's Case; he was imprisoned in the Gatehouse, and that 'per dominos de privato concilio dominæ reginæ pro certis causis eos moventibus et ei ignotis:' and upon his H. Corpus was returned to be therefore only detained, 'Qui committitur Marr. et postea isto eodem termino traditur in ball.' To this never any colour of answer hath been yet offered.

The tenth is Catesbie's Case in the Vacation after Hill. Term, 43 El. Rot. Robert Catesbie was committed to the Fleet 'per warrantum diversor. prænobilitium viror. de privato concilio dominæ reginæ;' he was brought before justice Fenner, one of the then justices of the King's-Bench, by H. Corpus at Winchester-house, Southwark; 'Et commiss. fuit Marr. per præfat. Edwardum Fenner, et statim traditur in ball.'

The eleventh is Rich. Beckwith's Case, which was in Hil. 12th of king James, Rot. 153. He was returned upon his H. Corpus to have been committed to the Gatehouse by divers lords of the privy-council; 'Qui committitur Marr. et postea isto eodem termino traditur in ball.'

To this it hath been said by some, that Beckwith was bailed upon a letter, written by the Lords of the Council to that purpose to the Judges; but it appears not that there was ever any letter written to them to that purpose: which though it had been, would have proved nothing against the authority of the Record; for it was never heard of, that judges were to be directed in point of law by letters from the lords of the council, although it cannot be doubted, but that by such letters sometimes they have been moved to bail men, that would or did not ask their enlargement without such letters, as in some examples I shall shew your lordships among the Precedents of the Second kind.

The twelfth and last of these is that of sir Tho. Monson's Case; it is Mich. 14 Jac. Rot. 147. He was committed to the Tower 'per warrantum à diversis dominis de privato concilio domini regis locum tenenti directum;' and he was returned by the lieutenant to be therefore detained in prison, 'qui committitur Marr' et super traditur hoc in Ball.' To this it hath been answered, that every body knows by common fame, that this gentleman was committed for suspicion of the death of sir Tho. Overbury, and that he was therefore bailable: a most strange interpretation, as if the body of the Return and the Warrant of the privy-council should be understood, and adjudged out of fame only. Was there not as much a fame, why the gentlemen, that were remanded in the last judgment, were committed, and might not the self-same reason have served to enlarge them, their offence, if any were, being I think much less than that for which this gentleman was suspected?

And thus I have faithfully opened the number of twelve Precedents, most express in the very point in question, and cleared the objections that have been made against them. And of such Precedents of Record as are of the first kind, which prove plainly the practice of former ages, and judgment of the court of king's bench, in the very point, on the behalf of the subject, my lords, hitherto.

I come next to those of the second kind, or such as are pretended, that persons so committed are not to be enlarged by the Judges upon the Habeas Corpus brought, but to remain in prison still at the command of the King or the Privy-Council. These are of two natures; the first of these are, where some assent of the King or the Privy-Council appears upon the enlargement of a prisoner so committed; as if, that because such assent appears, the enlargement could not have been without such assent.—The second of this kind, are those which have been urged as express testimonies of the Judges denying bail; and in such cases, I shall open these also to your lordships: which being done, it will most clearly appear, that there is nothing at all in any of these, that makes any thing at all against the Resolution of the house of commons, touching this point; nay it is so far from their making any thing against it, that some of them add good weight also to the proof of that Resolution.

For those of the first nature of this second kind of Precedents, they begun in the time of H. 7. Tho. Brugge, and divers others, were imprisoned in the King's-Bench 'ad mandatum domini regis,' they never sought remedy by Habeas Corpus, or otherwise, for aught appears: But the Roll says, that 'dominus rex relaxavit mandatum,' and so they were bailed. But can any man think, that this is an argument either in law or common reason, that therefore they could not have been bailed without such assent? It is common in cases of common persons, that one being in prison for surety of the peace or the like, at the suit of another, is bailed upon the release of the party plaintiff; can it follow, that therefore he could not have been bailed without such release? Nothing is more plain than the contrary: It were the same thing to say, that if it appear, that if a plaintiff be non-suit, therefore unless he had been non-suit, he could not have been barred in the suit. The case last cited is Mich. 7 H. 7, rot. 6.

The very like is in the same year, Hill. 7 H. 7, Rot. 13. The case of Will. Bartholomew, Will. Chase, and divers others, and the self-same answer, that is given to the other, clears this.

So in the same year, Pasch. 7 H. 7, Rot. 18. John Beomond's case, is the same in substance with those other two, and the self-same answer also satisfies, that clears them.

The next case is, Mich. 22 H. 7, Rot. 8. Tho. Yew's case; he was committed 'ad sec. pacis,' for the security of the peace, at the suit of one Freeman, and besides, 'ad mandatum dom. regis.' And first, 'Freeman relaxavit sec. pacis,' and then sir James Hobbard, the then king's Attorney-General, 'relaxavit mandatum dom. regis;' and hereupon he is bailed. The release of the king's Attorney no more proves that he could not have been enlarged without such release or assent, than that he could not have been bailed without release of surety of the peace by Freeman.

The very like is in Hill. 9 H. 7. Rot. 14. The case of Humphry Broche, which proves no more here than the rest of this kind already cited.

Then for this point also, Broome's case of queen Elizabeth's time, is Trin. 39 El. Rot. 138. Laurence Broome was committed to the Gate-house 'per mandatum dom. concilii dominæ reginæ;' and being returned so upon the H. Corpus, is first committed to the Marshalsea as the course is, and then bailed by the court; which indeed is an express precedent, that might perhaps well have been added to the number of the first twelve: which so plainly shews the practice of enlarging prisoners in this case, by judgment of the court upon the H. Corpus. But it is true, that in the Scrolls of that year, where the bails are entered, but not in the Record of the H. Corpus, there was a note, that this Broome was bailed 'per mandatum privati concilii;' but plainly this is not any kind of argument, that therefore in law he might not have been otherwise bailed.

The self-same is to be said of another of this kind, in Mich. 40 El. Rot. 37, Wenden's Case. Tho. Wenden was committed to the Gatehouse by the queen and the lords of the council 'pro certis causis' generally; he is brought by H. Corpus into the King's-Bench, and bailed by the court. But it is said, that in the Scrolls of that year, it appears that his enlargement was 'per consensum dom. privati concilii;' and it is true that the queen's Attorney did tell the court, that the lords of the council did assent to it. Follows it therefore, that it could not have been without such assent?

Next is Hill. 43 El. Rot. 89, when divers gentlemen of special quality were imprisoned by the command of the privy-council; the queen being graciously pleased to enlarge them, sends a commandment to the judges of the King's-Bench, that they should take such a course, for delivering them upon bail, as they should think fit: and they did so, and enlarged them upon writs of H. Corpus. Follows it therefore, that this might not have been done by law, if the parties themselves had desired it?

So in Trin. 1 Jac. Rot. 30. Sir John Brocket being committed to the Gatehouse, is returned to stand committed 'per mandatum privati concilii,' and he is enlarged 'virtute warrantii a concilio predicto.' But the same answer that satisfies for the rest before cited, serves for this also.

The last of these, is Reyner's case, in Mich. 12 Jac. Rot. 119. He was committed to the Gatehouse by the lords of the council, and being brought into the King's-Bench by Habeas Corpus, is enlarged upon bail; but this they say was upon a letter written from one of the lords of the council to the judges. It is true, that such a letter was written, but the answer to the former precedents of this nature, are sufficient to clear this also.

And in all these observe, 1. That it appears not, that the party ever desired to be enlarged by the court, or was denied it. 2. Letters either from the king or council cannot alter the law in any case: so that hitherto nothing hath been brought on the contrary part, that hath any force or colour of reason in it.

We come now, my lords, to those Precedents of the other nature cited against the Liberty of the Subject: that is, such as have been used to mislike the persons so committed may not be enlarged by the court. They are in number eight, but there is not one of them that proves any such thing, as your lordships will plainly see upon opening them. The first four of them are exactly in the same words, saving that the names of the persons and the prisons differ; I shall therefore recite them all one after another, and then clear them together.

The first is Richard Everard's case, Hill. 7 H. 7, Rot. 18. He and others were committed to the Marshalsea of the household, 'per mandatum domini regis,' and so returned upon a H. Corpus into the King's-Bench; whereupon the entry is only 'Qui committitur Marr.' &c.

The second is Hill. 8 Hen. 7, Richard Chery's case; he was committed to the mayor of Windsor, 'per mandatum domini regis,' and so returned upon a H. Corpus; and the entry is only, 'Qui committitur Marr.' &c.

The third is Hill. 9 Hen. 7, Rot. 14, Christ. Burton's case, who was committed to the Marshalsea of the household, 'per mandatum domini regis,' and so returned upon his Habeas Corpus; and the entry is likewise, 'Qui committitur Marr.' &c.

The fourth is George Urswick's case, Pasch. 19 Hen. 7, Rot. 19. He was committed to the sheriffs of London, 'per mandatum domini regis,' and returned so upon his Habeas Corpus, 'Qui committitur Marr.' &c.

These four have been used principally, as express Precedents, to prove that a prisoner so committed cannot be enlarged; and perhaps at the first sight, to men that know not, and observe not the course and entries of the court of King's-Bench, they may be apprehended to prove as much: but in truth they rather prove the contrary, at least there is no colour in them of any such matter as they have been used for. To which purpose I beseech your lordships to call to your memories, that which I first observed to you touching the course of that court. Where a prisoner is brought in by H. Corpus, he is (if he be not to be remanded) first committed to the marshal of the court, and then bailed as his case requires. This is so certain, as it can never be otherwise. Now these men being thus committed by the express command of the king, are first, you see, taken from the prisons whether they were first committed; wherein you may observe, my lords, that if a general suspicion of matter of state were of force in such a case, it might be as needful in point of state, to have the prisoner remain in the prison, where the king by such an absolute command committed him, as to have him at all committed. When they have taken them from the prisons where before they were, they commit them to the marshal of their own court, which is but the first step to bailing them. Now it appears not indeed that they were bailed, for then 'Traditur in Ball' had followed, but nothing at all appears that they were denied it; perhaps they never asked it, perhaps they could not find such as were sufficient to bail them. And in truth, whosoever any man is but removed from any prison in England (though it be for debt or trespass only) into that court, the entry is but in the self-same syllables as in these four cases.

And in truth if these Proceedings did prove, that any of the prisoners named in them were not bailable, or had been thought by the court not to have been bailable; it will necessarily follow, that no man living that is ordinarily removed from any prison into the King's-Bench; or that is there upon any ordinary action of debt, or action of trespass, could be bailed; for every man that is brought thither, and not remanded, and every man that is arrested but for a debt or trespass, and was returned into that court, is likewise committed to the marshal of that court, and by the self-same entry, and not otherwise; yet these four have been much stood on, and have strangely misled the judgment of some that did not, or would not, seem to understand the course of that court.

The fifth of this nature is Edward Page's Case; it is Tr. 7 Hen. 8. This might have been well reckoned with the former four, had not the misentry of the clerk only made it vary from them. Edward Page was committed to the Marshalsea of the household, and that 'per mandatum domini regis,' and returned to be therefore detained, and the entry is 'Qui committitur Mar' hospitii dom. regis.' This word 'Marr.' is written in the margin of the Roll; this hath been used to prove, that the judges remanded this prisoner; if they had done so, the remanding had been only while they advised, and not any such award which is given when they adjudge him not bailable. But in truth the word 'committitur' shews, that there was not any remanding of him, nor doth that court ever commit any man to the Marshalsea of the household: and besides, the word 'Marr.' for Marescallo in the margin, shews plainly that he was committed to the marshal of the King's-bench, and not remanded to the Mar-shalsea of the household; for such entry of that word in the margin, is perpetually in cases of that nature, when they commit a man to their own prison, and so give him the first step to bailment, which he may have if he ask it, and can find bail. And doubtless these words of 'Hospitii præd.' were added by the error of the clerk, for want of distinction in his understanding, from the 'Marr.' of the King's-bench, to the marshal of the household.

The sixth of these is Thomas Cæsar's Case; it is 8 Jac. rot. 99. This Cæsar was committed to the Marshalsea of the household, 'per mandatum domini regis,' and returned to be therefore detained, and indeed a 'remittitur' is in the roll, but not a 'remittitur quousque,' but only that kind of 'remittitur' which is only used while the court advises. And in truth this is so far from proving any thing against the resolution of the house of commons, that it appears that the opinion of the reverend Judges of that time was, that the return was insufficient, and that if it were not amended, the prisoner shall be discharged. For in the Book of Rules in the court of Mich. Term (when Cæsar's Case was in question), they expressly ordered, that if the steward's marshal did not amend their return, the prisoner should be absolutely discharged: the words of the rule are, 'nisi senescallus et marescal. hospitii domini regis sufficienter returnaverint breve de Habeas Corpus Thomæ Cæsar dier. Mercur. prox. post quindenam scilicet Martin. def. exonerabitur.' And this is also the force of that precedent, but yet there hath been an interpretation upon this rule. It hath been said that the judges gave this rule, because the truth was, that the return was false, and that it was well known, that the prisoner was not committed by the immediate command of the king, but by the command of the lord-chamberlain, and thence (as it was said) they made this rule; but this kind of interpretation is the first that ever was supposed, that judges should take notice of the truth or falshood of the return, otherwise than the body of the return could inform them. And the rule itself speaks plainly of the sufficiency only, and not of the truth or falshood of it.

The seventh of these, is the Case of James Desmaistres, Edward Emerson, and some others that were Brewers, and were committed to the Marshalsea of the household, 'per mandatum domini regis,' and so returned upon H. Corpus: and it is true, that the roll shews that they were remanded, but the remanding was only upon advisement. And indeed the grave and upright judges of that time were so careful, lest upon the entry of the remanding, any such mistake might be, as might perhaps mislead posterity in so great a point, that they would expressly have this word 'immediate' added to the 'remittitur,' that so all men that should meet with the roll might see, that it was done for the present only, and not upon any debate of the question. And besides, that there is no 'quousque' to it, which is usually added, when the highest award upon debate or resolution of this kind is given by them.

The eighth of these is the Case of Saltonstall; it is Hill. 12 Jac. Sir Samuel Saltonstall was committed to the Fleet, 'per mandatum domini regis;' and besides, by the Court of Chancery, for disobeying an order of that court, and is returned upon his Habeas Corpus, to be therefore detained. And it is true that a 'remittitur' is entered in the roll, but it is only a 'remittitur prisonæ prædict.' without 'quousque secundum legem deliberatus fuerit:' and in truth it appears on the record, that the court gave the Warden of the Fleet three several days at several times to amend his return, and in the interim 'remittitur prisonæ prædict.' Certainly if the court had thought that the return had been good, they would not have given so many several days to have amended it; for if that 'mandatum domini regis' had been sufficient in the case, why need it to have been amended?

The ninth and last of these is, Tr. 13 Jac. rot. 71, the Case of the said sir Samuel Saltonstall: he is returned by the Warden of the Fleet, as in the case before, and generally, 'remittitur' is in the roll, which proves nothing at all, that therefore the court thought he might not by law be enlarged; and besides, in both cases he stood committed also for disobeying an order in the Chancery.

These are all that have been pretended to the contrary in this great point, and upon the view of them thus opened to your lordships, it is plain that there is not one, not so much as one at all, that proveth any such thing, as that persons committed by the command of the king, or the lords of the council without cause shewed, might not be enlarged; but indeed the most of them expressly prove rather the contrary.

Now, my lords, having thus gone through the Precedents of Record, that concern the point of either side, before I come to the other kind of Precedents, which are the solemn Resolutions of Judges in former times, I shall (as I am commanded also by the house of commons) represent unto your lordships somewhat else they have thought very considerable; with which they met, whilst they were in a most careful enquiry of whatsoever concerned them in this great question.

It is, my lords, a Draught of an Entry of a Judgment in that great Case lately adjudged in the court of King's-bench, when divers gentlemen imprisoned 'per speciale mandatum domini regis,' were by the award and order of the court, after solemn debate, sent back to prison, because it was expressly said, they could not in justice deliver them, though they prayed to be bailed. The Case is famous, and well known to your lordships, therefore I need not further to mention it: as yet indeed there is no Judgment entered upon the Roll, but there is room enough for any kind of Judgment to be entered. But, my lords, there is a form of a Judgment, a most unusual one; such a one as never was in any such case before (for indeed there was never before any case so adjudged), and thus drawn on by a chief clerk of that court (by direction of Mr. Attorney-General), as the house was informed by the clerk, in which the reason of the Judgment, and remanding of those gentlemen, is expressed in such sort, as if it should be declared upon Record for ever, that the laws were, that no man could ever be enlarged from imprisonment that stood committed by such an absolute command.

The draught is only in sir John Heveningham's Case, being one of the gentlemen that was remanded, and it was made for a form for all the rest. The words of it are after the usual entry of a Curia advisare vult for a time; that 'Visis retur. prædict. nec non diversis antiquis recordis in curia hic remanent. consimiles casus continentibus, maturaq. deliberatione, inde prius habita, eo quod nulla specialis causa captionis sive detentionis prædict. Johannis exprimitur, sed generaliter quod detentus est in prisona prædict. per speciale mandatum domini regis, ideo prædict. Johannes remittitur præfatis custodi mar. hospitii prædict. salvo custodiendi. quousq. &c.' that is, 'quousque secundum legem deliberatus fuerit.' And if that court, that is the highest for ordinary justice, cannot deliver him secundum legem; what law is there, I beseech you, my lords, that can be sought for in any other inferior court to deliver him? Now, my lords, because this draught, if it were entered in the Roll, (as it was prepared for no other purpose) would be as great a declaration, contrary to the many acts of parliament already cited, contrary to all precedents of former times, and to all reason of law; to the utter subversion of the highest liberty and right belonging to every freeman of this kingdom, and for that especially also it supposes, that divers ancient records had been looked into by the court in like cases, by which records their judgments were directed: whereas in truth, there is not any one record at all extant that with any colour (not so much indeed as with any colour) warrants the judgment: therefore the house of commons thought fit also, that I should, with the rest that hath been said, shew this draught also to your lordships.

I come now to the other kind of Precedents, that is, solemn Resolutions of Judges, which being not of Record, remain only in authentic copies: but of this kind there is but one in this case, that is the Resolution of all the Judges in the time of queen Elizabeth. It was in the 34th of her reign, when divers persons had been committed by absolute command, and delivered by the Justices of the one Bench or the other; whereupon it was desired, that the Judges would declare in what cases persons committed by such command were to be enlarged, which hath been variously cited, and variously apprehended. The House of Commons, therefore, desiring with all care to inform themselves as fully of the truth of it as possibly they might, got into their hands from a member of their house, a Book of selected cases, collected by a reverend and learned Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas, that was one of them that gave the Resolution, which is entered at large in that Book : I mean the L. C. Justice Anderson, it is written in the Book with his own hand, as the rest of the Book is, and howsoever it hath been cited, and was cited in that great Judgment upon the Habeas Corpus in the King's-Bench : if it had been, that upon such commitments, as Judges might not bail the prisoners; yet it is most plain, that in the Resolution itself no such thing is contained, but rather expressed the contrary. I shall better represent it to your lordships by reading it, than by opening it.

Then it was read here. (See ante, p. 76).

If this Resolution doth resolve any thing, it doth indeed upon the enquiry resolve fully the contrary to that which hath been pretended, and enough for the maintenance of the ancient and fundamental point of liberty of the person, to be regained by Habeas Corpus when any is imprisoned. And I the rather thought it fit now to read it to your lordships, that it might be at large heard; because in the great Judgment in the King's-Bench, though it was cited at the Bar, as against this point of personal liberty, as also at the Bench, yet though every thing else of record that was used, were at large read openly, this was not read either at bar or bench: for indeed if it had, every hearer would easily have known the force of it to have been indeed contrary to the Judgment.

My lords, having thus gone through the charge committed to me by the house of commons, and having thus mentioned to your lordships, and opened the many Precedents of Records, and that Draught of the Judgment in this like case, as also this Resolution; I shall now (as I had leave and direction given me, lest your lordships should be put to much trouble and expence of time in finding, or getting copies at large of those things which I have cited) offer also to your lordships authentic copies of them all, and so leave them, and whatsoever else I have said, to your lordships further consideration.

The true Copy of the Precedents of Record.

Inter Record. Domini Regis Caroli in Thesaur. Recept. Scaccarii sui sub custodia Thesaurar. et Camerar. ibidem remanent. viz. Pl. coram ipso Domino Rege, et Concilio suo, ad Parliamentum suum post Pasch. apud London in Maner Arch-Episcopi Ebor', anno Regni Domini Regis Ed. 3. 21. Inter alia sic conuenitur et sequitur, Rot. 2. indorsa.

Stephanus Rabaz vicecomes Leic. et Warw. coram ipso domino rege et ejus concilio apenatus et ad rationem positus de hoc quod cum J. B. E. H. & W. H. nuper balliv' ipsius vicecomitis per dom. regem fuissent assigna' ad gualas domini regis deliberand. eidem vic' quendam W. P. per quendam appellatorem ante adventum eorum justiciariorum ibidem appellat. et capt. vivente ipso appellatore usque diem deliberationis coram eis fact. demiss. per pleviam contra formam statuti, &c. Et etiam quendam R. de C. qui de morte hominis judicatus fuit, et per eundem vicecomit' captus, idem R. sine ferris coram eisdem justiciari' ad deliberationem præd' produxit contra consuetudinem regni, et similiter quendam Walterum filium Walteri le Persone qui per præceptum comitis Warwici captus fuit, dimisit per pleviam contra vocam et præceptum domini regis; cum idem dominus rex per literas suas sub privato sigillo suo eidem vicecomit. precipit quod nulli per præceptum pred. com. Warwici capt. aliquam gratiam vel favorem fac. &c. Et super hoc prefat. J. B. qui presens est, et qui fuit primus justiciar. pred. premiss. recordatur et pred. vicecomes dicit quoad pred. W. P. ipse nunquam a tempore captionis ipsius W. per pred. appellatorem demiss. fuit per pleviam aliquam ante advent. pred. justiciar. Imo dicit quod per dimid. anni ante adventum eorum justiciar. captus fuit. Et quoad pred. R. bene cognoscit quod ipse dimisit eum per pleviam, et hoc bene facere potuit ratione ac autoritate officii sui, eo quod captus fuit pro quadam simplici transgressionis, et non pro aliqua feloniam, pro qua pleviari non potuit. Et quoad S. viz. W. filium Persone bene cognoscit quod ipse captus fuit per præceptum pred. com. Warwici et quod dimisit eum per pleviam. Sed dicit quod hoc fecit ad rogatum quorundam de hospitio et curia dom. regis, qui eum specialiter inde rogarunt per literas suas. Et super hoc idem vicecom. quesivit per dom. regem quis eum rogavit, et literas suas ei direxit, et ubi literæ illæ sunt, dicit quod Walterus de Langton eum per literas suas inde rogavit, sed dicit quod literæ illæ sunt in partibus suis Leic. Et super hoc idem vicecomes profert bre. dom. regis de privato sigillo eidem vic. direct. quod testatur quod dominus rex eidem vic. precipit, quod omnes illos trans. contra pacem et de quibus comes Warwici ei scire fecit, caperet, et salvo custodir. absque aliqua gratia eis faciendâ. Et quia pred. justiciari' expressè recordat. quod ipsi et socii sui per bonam et legalem inquisitionem de militibus et aliis communibus coram eis fact. invenerunt quod pred. W. de Petling dimissus fuit per pleviam per magnum tempus ante adventum eorundem justic. usq; adventum eorundem et per vic. pred. Et etiam quia pred. vic. cognoscit quod pred. R. dimissus fuit per pleviam per ipsum vic. et hoc dic. quod bene facere potuit, eo quod captus fuit pro levi transgression. et per record. ejusdem justiciar. compert. est quod captus fuit pro morte hominis quod est contrar. dict. pred. vicecom. et similiter quod idem vicecom. cognovit, quod recepit literam dom. regis per quam rex ei precepit, quod nullam gratiam fecerit illis qui capt. fuer. per precept. pred. com. et idem vicecomes contra præceptum illud dimisit pred. Willielmum filium Walteri per pleviam qui captus fuit per præceptum pred. comitis prout idem vicecomes fatetur. Et sic tam ratione ipsius transgr. quam aliarum pred. incidit in penam stat. cons. est quod pred. vicecomes committatur prisona juxta formam statuti, &c.

Sir EDWARD COKE took up the Argument, as to the rational part of the Law, and began with this INTRODUCTION.*

Your lordships have heard seven acts of parliament in point, and thirty-one Precedents summarily collected, and with great understanding delivered; which I have perused, and understand them all thoroughly, and that there was not one of them against the Resolution of the house of commons. Twelve of the Precedents are in terminis terminantibus, a whole Jury of Precedents, and all in point; and to my understanding, they admit of no answer: but I am persuaded in my conscience, that a number of them was never shewed at the King's-bench, because I know out of whose quiver two of them came, and that they were not known before. I am much transported with joy, because of the hopes to proceed with good success in this weighty business, your lordships being so full of justice, and the very theme and subject doth promise success, which was, 'Corpus cum causa,' the freedom of an Englishman, not to be imprisoned without cause shewn; which is my part to shew, and the reason and the cause why it should be so. And I doubt not but we shall go on happily; and, my lords, it would be unseasonable to be prolix and copious, because, 'quod intempestum injucundum.' I would speak here a little to some points which are not so clear and obvious, for otherwise 'perspicua vera non sunt probanda,' and to gild gold were idle and superfluous; therefore shall briefly clear to your lordships some doubts made of the Statute of Westminster, which says, Sheriffs and others may not replevy men in prison for four causes;

* "The Lord President, who reported the Conference to the house, begun thus: The Conference upon Monday last with the lower house, was about the Liberty of the Subject; to set this forth, they employed four Speakers: the first was sir Dudley Diggs, a man of a voluble and eloquent speech, his part was the introduction; the second was Mr. Littleton, a grave and learned lawyer; whose part was to represent the Resolution of the house, and their grounds wherupon they went; the third was Mr. Selden, a great antiquary, and a pregnant man, his part was to shew the law, and the precedents in point; the fourth was the lord Coke, that famous reporter of the law, whose part was to shew the reason of all that the others had said, and all that which was said was but an affirmation of the common law." From a MS. belonging to the late Peter le Neve, esq.; and written at that time, wherein the Conference is related.

1. For death of a man.
2. Commandment of the king.
3. Absolute command from the Justices.
4. For matters of the forest.

I was once a Judge of the King's-bench, and did wonder how the Judges of these times thus interpret the Statute. The Statute only shews what Sheriffs can only do, by way of replevin; the Sheriffs Court is a petty and base court, and not of record, where the Sheriff is not the Judge, but the Jurors, that is, John a Noke, and John a Stiles, William Roe, and John Doe, and such worthies as these. Again, the Statute saith there, he cannot be replevied if he be taken for the death of a man; and no marvel, whoever thought it; for the Scripture saith, 'Sanguis nullo modo expiari potest nisi sanguine.' But if he cannot be there replevied, at the King's-bench he may, it is there done every day. Mr. Sheriff, you should replevy a man in such a case, ergo, not hail him, my lords the Judges. (non sequitur): What not Judges hail? What not the King's-bench, the highest Court of Record of ordinary jurisdiction? For the King's-bench is higher than the Chancery. And this he proved by heraldry, 'Additio probat minoritatem,' that addition proves the younger brother. Now the Teste of the King's-bench is 'coram dom. rege,' without any addition, but that of the Chancery, 'coram dom. rege in cancellaria,' with that addition of a cadet, a younger brother. I am very sorry I am so much straitened for want of time, for I am much delighted with these things. What, may not the Judges meddle with any thing in the Forest? If that were so, I would never dwell in a forest, to be wholly under the jurisdiction of the wardens and regarders. These glosses and interpretations are very strange to me, and others who have been Judges. My lords, all those Arguments offered unto your lordships in this last conference, are of a double nature. 1. Acts of Parliament. 2. Judicial Precedents. For the first, I hold it a proper argument for your lordships, because you, my lords temporal, and you, my lords spiritual, gave your assent unto those acts of parliament; and therefore if these cannot persuade you, nothing can. For the second, which are judicial precedents, it is 'Argumentum ab autoritate,' and 'Argumentum ab autoritate valet affirmative:' that is, I conceive, though it be no good argument to say negatively, the Judges have given no opinion in the point, ergo, that is not law; yet affirmatively it concludes well: the Judges have clearly delivered their opinions in the point, ergo, it is good law; which I fortify with a strong axiom, 'Neminem oportet sapientiorum esse legibus,' as long as these laws stand unrepealed. Now, these two arguments being so well pressed to your lordships by my colleagues, I think your lordships may wonder what my part may be; it is short, but sweet: it is the reason of all those laws and precedents, and reason must needs be welcome to all men; for all men are not capable of the understanding of the law, but every man is capable of reason. And those reasons I offer to your lordships, in affirmance of the ancient laws and precedents made for the liberty of the subject, against imprisonment without cause expressed, and shall shew them in order and method, to confirm the same.

1. A re ipsa.
2. A minori ad majus.
3. From the Remedies provided.
4. From the extent and universality of the same.
5. From the infiniteness of the time.
6. A fine.

The first general reason is, à re ipsa, even from the nature of imprisonment, 'ex visceribus causæ'; for I will speak nothing but ad idem, be it close or other imprisonment: and this argument is threefold, because an imprisoned man upon will and pleasure is,

1. A Bondman.
2. Worse than a Bondman.
3. Not so much as a man; for 'mortuus homo non est homo,' a prisoner is a dead man.

1. No man can be imprisoned upon will and pleasure of any, but he that is a Bondman and Villein, for that imprisonment and bondage are 'propria quarto modo' to villeins.* Now 'propria quarto modo,' and the species, are convertible; whosoever is a Bondman, may be imprisoned upon will and pleasure, and whosoever may be imprisoned upon will and pleasure is a Bondman.

2. If a Freeman of England might be imprisoned at the will and pleasure of the king or his commandment, then were they in worse case than Bondmen or Villeins; for the lord of a villein cannot command another to imprison his villein without cause, as of disobedience, or refusing to serve, as it is agreed in the Year-books. And here he said, that no man should reprehend any thing that he said out of the Books or Records: he said, he would prove a freeman imprisonable upon command or pleasure, without cause expressed, to be absolutely in worse case than a villein; and if he did not make this plain, he desired their lordships not to believe him in any thing else: and then produced two Book-cases, 7 E. 3, fol. 50, in the new print, 348 old print. 'A Prior had commanded one to imprison his Villein, the Judges were ready to bail him till the Prior gave his reason, that he refused to be bailiff of his manor; and that satisfied the Judges. 2d Case, 33 Ed. 3, title Tresp. 253. in Faur imprisonment, it was of an abbot, who commanded one to take and detain his villein, but demanded his cause; he gives it, because he refused, being thereunto required, to drive his cattle.' 'Ergo, Freeman imprisoned, without cause shewn, are in worse case than villeins, that must have a cause shewn them why they are imprisoned.'

'3. A Freeman imprisoned without cause, is so far from being a Bondman, that he is not so much as a man, but is indeed a dead man, and so no man: imprisonment is accounted in law a civil death, 'perdit domum, familiam, vicinos, patriam,' and is to live amongst wretched and wicked men, malefactors, and the like.' And that death and imprisonment was the same, he proved by an argument ab effectis, because they both produce the like immediate effects; he quoted a Book for this: if a man be threatened to be killed, he may avoid a Feoffment of Lands, Gifts of Goods, &c. 39 H. 1, 65, &c. so it is if he be threatened to be imprisoned, the one is an actual, the other is a civil death. And this is the first general argument, drawn à re ipsa, from the Nature of Imprisonment, to which 'res ipsa consilium dedit.'

The second general Reason he took also from his Books; for he said he had no law, but what by great pains and industry he learnt at his book; for at ten years of age, he had no more law than other men of like age: and this second Reason is, à minori ad majus; he takes it from Bracton, fol. 105, 'Minima poena corporalis, est major qualibet pecuniaria.'

But the king himself cannot impose a Fine upon any man, but it must be done judicially by his Judges, 'per justiciarios in curia, non per regem in camera'; and so it hath been resolved by all the Judges of England: he quoted 3 R. 2, fol. 11.

The third general Reason is taken from the number and diversity of Remedies, which the laws give against imprisonment, viz.

Breve de homine replegiando.

De odio et atia.

De Habeas Corpus.

An Appeal of Imprisonment.

Breve de manucaptione.

Two of these are antiquated, but the Writ 'de odio et atia' is revived, for that was given by the Statute of Magna Charta, c. 26, and therefore though it were repealed by the Statute of 28 E. 3, c. 9, yet it is revived again by the Statute 43 E. 3, c. 1, by which it is provided, that all Statutes made against Magna Charta are void. Now the law would never have given so many Remedies, if the Freeman of England might have been imprisoned at free will and pleasure.

The fourth general Reason is from the Extent and Universality of the pretended Power to imprison: for it should extend not only to the commons of this realm, and their posterities, but to the nobles of the land, and their progenies, to the bishops and clergy of the realm, and their successors. And he gave a cause why the commons came to their lordships, 'Commone periculum commune requirit auxilium.' Nay, it reacheth to all persons, of what condition, or sex, or age soever; to all judges and officers, whose attendance is necessary, &c. without exception; and therefore an imprisonment of such an extent, without reason, is against reason.

The fifth general Reason is drawn from the Indefiniteness of Time; the pretended power being limited to no time, it may be perpetual during life; and this is very hard: to cast an old man into prison, nay, to close prison, and no time allotted for his coming forth, is a hard case, as any man would think that had been so used. And here he held it an unreasonable thing, that a man had a remedy for his horse or cattle, if detained, and none for his body thus indefinitely imprisoned; for a prison without a prefixed time, is a kind of hell.

The sixth and last Argument is à fine; and 'sapiens incipit à fine,' and he wished he had begun there also; and this argument he made threefold.

Ab honesto. This being less honourable.

Ab utili. This being less profitable.

A tuto. This imprisonment by will and pleasure, being very dangerous for the king and kingdom.

1. Ab honesto. It would be no honour to a king or kingdom, to be a king of bondmen or slaves; the end of this would be both dedecus et damnum, both to king and kingdom, that in former times hath been so renowned.

2. Ab utili. It would be against the profit of the king and kingdom, for the execution of those laws before remembered, Magna Charta, 5 E. 3, 25 E. 3, 28 E. 3, whereby the king was inhibited to imprison upon pleasure; you see (quoth he) that this was vetus querela, an old question, and now brought in again, after seven acts of parliament: I say, the execution of all these laws are adjudged in parliament to be for the common profit of the king and people; (and he quoted the Roll) this pretended power being against the profit of the king, can be no part of his prerogative.—He was pleased to call this a binding reason, and to say, that the wit of man could not answer it; indeed the great men kept this Roll from being printed, but that it was equivalent in force to the printed Rolls.

3. A Reason à tuto. It is dangerous to the king for two respects; 1. of loss; 2. of destroying the endeavours of men. First, If he be committed without the expression of the cause, though he escape, albeit in truth it were for treason or felony, yet this escape is neither felony nor treason; but if the cause be expressed for suspicion of treason or felony, then the escape, though it be innocent, is treason or felony. [The Act, which is in Latin, is, 'nisi causa pro qua captus, et imprisonat. fuit tale iudicium requirat, si de illa pro legem et consuetudinem terræ fuisset convictus.'] He quoted a cause in print like a reason of the law, not like 'remitterur' at the rising of the court; for there the prisoner 'traditur in ballium quod breve regis non fuit sufficiens causa.' The king's command. He quoted another famous cause; the commons in parliament, incensed against the duke of Suffolk, desire he should be committed: the lords and all the Judges, whereof those great worthies, Prescott and Fortescue, were two, delivered a flat opinion, that he ought not to be committed without an especial cause. He questioned also the name and etymology of the writ in question, 'Corpus cum causa;' ergo, the cause must be brought before the judge, else how can he take notice hereof?

Lastly, he pressed a place in the Gospel, Acts 25. last verse, where Festus conceives it an absurd and unreasonable thing, to send a prisoner to a Roman emperor, and not to write along with him the Cause alledged against him: send therefore no man a prisoner without his Causes along with him, hoc fac et vires. And that was the first reason, a tuto, that it was not safe for the king, in regard of loss, to commit men without a cause.

The second Reason is, that such commitments will destroy the endeavours of all men. Who will endeavour to employ himself in any profession, either of war, merchandize, or of any liberal knowledge, if he be but a tenant at will of his liberty? For no tenant at will will support or improve any thing, because he hath no certain estate; Ergo, to make men tenants at will of their liberties destroys all industry and endeavours whatsoever. And so much for these six principal Reasons: taken,

1. A re ipsa.
2. A minori ad majus.
3. A remediis.
4. From the Extent and Universality.
5. From the Infiniteness of the Time.
6. A fine.

Loss of } Honour.
 Profit.
 Security.
 Industry.

These were his Reasons.

Here he made another Protestation, That if a Remedy had been given in this Case, they would not have meddled therewith by no means; but now that remedy being not obtained in the King's-bench, without looking back upon any thing that hath been done or omitted, they desire some provision for the future only. And here he took occasion to add four Book-cases and Authorities, all in the point; saying, that if the learned counsel on the other side could produce but one against the Liberties, so pat and pertinent, oh! how they could hug and cull it! 16 Hen. 6. tit. Monstrance de fait 82, by the whole Court, the king in his presence cannot command a man to be arrested, but an action of false imprisonment lieth against him that arresteth: If not the king in his royal presence, then none others can do it. 'Non sic itur ad astra.' 1 Hen. 7, 4. Hussey reports the Opinion of Markham, C. Justice to Ed. 4, that he could not imprison by word of mouth; and the reason, because the party hath no Remedy; for the law leaves every man a remedy of causeless imprisonment. He added, that Markham was a worthy judge, though he fell into adversities at last by the lord Itivers's means. Fortescue, chap. 8. 'Pro prio ore nullus regum usus est,' to imprison any man, &c. 4 Eliz. Times blessed and renowned for justice and religion, in Plowden, 235, the Common Law hath so admeasured the king's prerogative, as he cannot prejudice any man in his inheritance; and the greatest inheritance a man hath, is the Liberty of his Person, for all others are necessary to it. For thus he quoted the orator Cicero, 'Major hæreditas venit unicuique nostrum à jure legibus quam à parentibus.'

And these are the Authorities he cited in this point.

Now he propounded and answered two Objections: first, in point of State; secondly, in the course held by the House of Commons.

May not the Privy Council commit, without cause shewed, in no matter of state where secrecy is required? Would not this be an hindrance to his majesty's service?

It can be no prejudice to the king by reason of matter of State, for the cause must be of higher or lower nature. If it be for suspicion of treason, misprision of treason, or felony, it may be by general words couched; if it be for any other thing of smaller nature, as Contempt, and the like, the particular cause must be shewed, and no 'individuum vagum,' or uncertain cause to be admitted.

Again, if the law be so clear as you make it, why needs the Declaration and Remonstrance in parliament?

The Subject hath in this case sued for Remedy in King's-bench by Habeas Corpus, and found none; therefore it is necessary to be cleared in parliament.

And here ended his Discourse. And then he made a Recapitulation of all that had been offered unto their lordships, that generally their lordships had been advised by the most faithful counsellors that can be; dead men, these cannot be daunted by fear, nor misled by affection, reward, or hope of preferment, and therefore your lordships might safely believe them: particularly their lordships had three several kinds of Proofs.

1. Acts of Parliament, judicial Precedents, good Reasons. First, You have had many as-cient acts of parliament in the point, besides Magna Charta; that is, seven acts of parliament, which indeed are thirty-seven, Magna Charta being confirmed thirty times, for so often have the kings of England given their royal assent thereto.

2. Judicial Precedents of grave and reverend Judges, in terminis terminantibus, that long since departed the world, and they were many in number. Precedents being twelve, and the Judges four of a Bench, made four times twelve, and that is forty-eight Judges.

3. You have, as he termed them, viduas rationes, manifest and apparent Reasons: towards the conclusion he declareth to their lordships, that they of the House of Commons have, upon great study and serious consideration, made a great manifestation unanimously, nullo contradicente, concerning this great Liberty of the Subject, and have vindicated and recovered the body of this fundamental Liberty, both of their lordships and themselves, from shadows, which sometimes of the day are long, sometimes short; and sometimes long again; and therefore we must not be guided by shadows: and they have transmitted to their lordships, not capita rerum, Heads or Briefs, for these compendia are dependia; but the Records at large, in terminis terminantibus. And so he concluded, that their lordships are involved in the same danger, and therefore 'ex congruo et condigno,' they desired a Conference, to the end their lordships might make the like Declaration as they had done; 'Commune periculum requirit commune auxilium,' and thereupon take such further course as may secure their lordships and them, and all their posterity, in enjoying of their ancient, undoubted, and fundamental Liberties.

The Substance of the OBJECTIONS made by Mr. Attorney-General (Sir Robert Heath) before a Committee of both Houses, to the ARGUMENT that was made by the House of Commons, at the first Conference with the Lords.

AFTER the first Conference, which was desired by the Lords, and had by a Committee of both Houses in the Painted Chamber, touching the Reasons, LAWS, Acts of Parliament, and Precedents concerning the Liberty of the Person of every Freeman; Mr. Attorney-General being heard before the Committee of both Houses, as it was assented to by the house of commons, that he might be, before they went up to the Conference; after some preamble made, wherein he declined the answering all Reasons of Law, and Acts of Parliament, came only to the Precedents used in the Argument before delivered; and so endeavoured to weaken the strength of them, that had been brought in behalf of the subjects, and to shew that some other were directly contrary to the law, comprehended in the resolutions of the house of commons, touching the bailing of prisoners, returned upon the Writ of Habeas Corpus to be committed by the special command of the king, or the council, without any cause shewed, for which by law they ought to be committed. And the course which was taken (it pleased the Committee of both houses to allow of) was, that Mr. Attorney should make his Objections to every particular Precedent, and that the Gentlemen appointed, and trusted herein by the house of commons, by several replies should satisfy the lords touching the Objections made by him, against, or upon every particular, as the order of the Precedents should lead them. He began with the first twelve Precedents that were used by the House of Commons at the Conference desired by them, to prove that prisoners returned to stand so committed, were delivered upon bail by the Court of King's-Bench.

The first was that of Bildeston's Case, in the 18 Edw. 3, Rot. 33.

To this he objected; first, that in the return of him into the Court, it did not appear, that this Bildeston was committed by the king's command; and secondly, that in the Record it did appear also that he had been committed for suspicion of counterfeiting the great seal, and so by consequence was bailable by the law, in regard there appeared a cause why he was committed: in which case it was granted by him (as indeed it was plain and agreed of all hands) that the prisoner is bailable, though committed by command of the king. And he said that this part of the Record, by which it appeared he had been committed for suspicion of Treason, was not observed to the lords in the Argument before used; and he shewed also to the lords, that there were three several kinds of Records, by which the full truth of every award, or bailing upon an Habeas Corpus is known. First, the Remembrance-Roll, wherein the award is given; secondly, the File of the Writ and the Return; and thirdly, the Scrut-Roll or Scrut finium, wherein the bail is entered, and that only the Remembrance-Roll of this case was to be found: and that if the other two of it were extant, he doubted not but that it would appear also, that upon the return itself the cause of the commitment had been expressed. And so he concluded, that this proved not for the Resolution of the house of commons, touching the matter of bail, where a prisoner was committed by the king's special command without cause shewed.

To these Objections the reply was, First, that it was plain that Bildeston was committed by the king's express command. For so the very words of the Writ are to the Constable of the Tower, 'quod eum teneri et custodiri facias,' &c. than which nothing can more fully express a commitment by the king's command. Secondly, however it be true, that in the latter part of the Record it doth appear, that Bildeston had been committed for suspicion of Treason, yet if the times of the proceeding, expressed in the Record, were observed, it would be plain that the objection was of no force; for this one ground, both in this case and in all the rest, is infallible, and never to be doubted of in the law, That Justices of every court adjudge of the force and strength of a return out of the body of itself only, and as therein it appears. Now in Easter term in the 18 Ed. 3, he was returned and brought before them, as committed only by the Writ; wherein no cause is expressed, and the Lieutenant and the Constable of the Tower, that brought him into the court, says, That he had no other warrant to detain him 'nisi breve predictum,' wherein there was no mention of any cause; and the Court thereupon adjudged, that 'breve predictum,' or that special command, was not sufficient cause to detain him in prison, and thereupon he is by judgment of the court in Easter Term let to Mainprise. But that part of the Record wherein it appears, that he had indeed been committed for suspicion of Treason, is of Trinity Term following, when the king, after the letting of him to Mainprise, sent to the Judges that they should discharge his Mainprise, because no man prosecuted him. And at that time it appears (but not before) that he had been in for suspicion of Treason; so that he was returned to stand committed by the king's special command only, without cause shewed, in Easter Term, and then by judgment of the court let to Mainprise, (which to this purpose is but the same with Bail, though otherwise it differ). And in the Term following upon another occasion the court knew, that he had been committed for suspicion of Treason, which has no relation at all to the letting of him to Mainprise, nor to the judgment of the court then given; when they did not, nor could possibly know any cause for which the king had committed him. And it was said, in behalf of the house of commons, that they had not indeed in their Argument expressly used this latter part of the Record of Bildeston's Case, because it being only of Trinity Term following, could not concern the reason of an award given by the court in Easter Term next before; yet notwithstanding that they had most faithfully, at the time of their Argument, delivered in to the lords, as indeed they had, a perfect copy at large of the whole Record of this case; as they had done also of all other precedents whatsoever cited by them; inasmuch as in truth there was not one precedent of Record on either side, the copy whereof they had not delivered in likewise, nor did Mr. Attorney mention any one besides those that were so delivered in by them. And as touching those three kinds of Records, the Remembrance Roll, the Return and File of the Writ, and Scrivets; it was answered by the Gentlemen employed by the house of commons, that it was true, that the Scrivet and the Return of this case of Bildeston was not to be found; but that did not lessen the weight of the precedent, because always in the award or judgment drawn up in the Remembrance-Roll, the cause (whatsoever it be) when any is shewed, upon the return is always expressed, as it appears clearly by the constant entries of the King's-Bench court. So that if any cause had appeared unto the court, it must have appeared plainly in that part of the Roll which belongs to Easter Term, wherein the judgment was given; but the return of the commitment by the king's command without cause shewed, and the Judgment of the court, that the prisoner was to be let to mainprise, appears therein only. And so, notwithstanding any objection made by Mr. Attorney, the cause was maintained to be a clear proof, among many others, touching that Resolution of the house of commons.

To the second of these twelve, which is Parker's Case, in the 22 H. 8. Rot. 37, his objections were two; 1, that it is true, that he was returned to be committed 'per mandatum domini regis;' but it appeared that this command was certified to the sheriffs of London by one Robert Peck gentleman; and that in regard that the command came no otherwise, the return was held insufficient, and that therefore he was bailed. 2. That it appears also in the Record that he was committed 'pro suspicionem feloniam ac per mandatum domini regis;' so that in regard that the expression of the cause of his commitment, suspicion of felony, precedes the command of the king, therefore it must be intended that the court took the cause why the king committed him to be of less moment than felony, and therefore bailed him. For he objected, that even the house of commons themselves, in some arguments used by them, touching the interpretation of the Statute of Westminster the first, cap. 15, about this point, had affirmed, that in enumeration of particulars, those of greatest nature were first mentioned, and that it was supposed, that such as followed were usually of less nature or moment.

But the reply was to the first Objection, That the addition of the certifying of the king's command by Robert Peck, altered not the case: 1, because the sheriffs in their return, took notice of the command as what they were assured of: and howsoever it came to them, it was of equal force, as if it had been mentioned without reference to Peck. 2, As divers Patents pass the great seal by writ of privy seal, and are subscribed 'per breve de privato sigillo;' so divers 'per ipsum regem,' are so subscribed; and oftentimes in the Roll of former times, to the words 'per ipsum regem,' are added 'nunciante A. B.' So that the king's command generally, and the king's command related or certified by such a man, is to this purpose of like nature. 3, In the late great case of Habeas Corpus, where the return of the commitment was 'per speciale mandatum domini regis mihi significatum per domino de privato concilio;' the court of King's-Bench did agree, that it was the same, and of like force as if 'mihi significatum, &c.,' had not followed, and that those words were void. According whereunto, here also 'per mandatum dom. regis nunciatum per Robert Peck,' had been wholly omitted and void likewise. And in truth in that late case, this Case of Parker was cited both at the bar and bench; and at the bench it was interpreted by the Judges no otherwise, than if it had been only 'per man- datum domini regis' in place of it: but the objection there was made of another kind, as was delivered in the first Argument, made out of Precedents in behalf of the house of commons. Therefore to the second objection, touching the course of enumeration of the causes in the Return, it was said, that howsoever in some acts of parliament, and elsewhere in the solemn expressions used in the law, things of greater nature preceded, and the less follow; yet in this case, the contrary was most plain, for in the Return it appears, that there were three causes for detaining the prisoners; Surety of the peace, suspicion of felony, and the king's command: and surety of the peace is first mentioned, which is plainly less than felony. And therefore it is plain, if any force of argument be taken from this enumeration, that the contrary to that which Mr. Attorney inferred is to be concluded: that is, that as Felony is a greater cause than surety of the peace, so the matter whereupon the king's command was grounded, was greater than felony. But in truth this kind of argument holds neither way here, and whatsoever the cause were, why the king committed him, it was impossible for the court to know it: and it also might be of very high moment in matter of state, and yet of far less nature than felony. All which shews, that this precedent hath its full force also, according as it was first used in argument by the house of commons.

To the third of these, which is Binck's case in the 35 H. 8, Rot. 33, the objection was, that there was a cause expressed 'pro suspicious felonis:' and though 'pro aliis causis illos' 'moventibus' were added in the return, yet because in the course of enumeration, the general name of aliis coming after particulars, includes things of less nature than the particular doth, therefore in this case suspicion of felony being the first, the other causes afterwards generally mentioned must be intended of less nature, for which the prisoner was bailable, because he was bailable for the greater, which was suspicion of felony. Henceunto it was replied, that the argument of enumeration in these cases is of no moment, as is next before shewed: and that although it were of any moment, yet aliis cause, though less than felony, might be of very great consequence in matter of state, which is pretended usually upon general returns of command, without cause shewed; and it is most plain, that the court could not possibly know the reasons, why the prisoner here was committed, and yet they bailed him, without looking further after any unknown thing under that title of matter of state, which might as well have been in this case as in any other whatsoever.

To the fourth of these, which is Overton's Case, in Pasch. 2. et 3. Phil. et Mar. Rot. 58. And to the fifth, which is Newport's Case, Pasch. Phil. et Mar. 4 et 5 Rot. 62, only these objections were said over again by Mr. Attorney, which are mentioned in the Argument made out of the Precedents in behalf of the house of commons at the first conference: and in the same argument are fully and clearly satisfied, as they were in like manner now again.

To the sixth of these, which was Lawrence's Case, 9 Eliz. Rot. 35, and the seventh, which is Constable's, Pasch. 9 Eliz. Rot. 68, the same objections were likewise said over again by Mr. Attorney, that are mentioned, and are clearly and fully answered in the argument made at the conference out of precedents in behalf of the house of commons; the force of the objection being only, that it appeared in the margin of the Roll, that the word Pardon was written; but it is plain that the word there hath no reference at all to the reason why they were bailed, nor could it have reference to the cause why they were committed, in regard the cause why they were committed is utterly unknown, and was not shewed.

To the eighth of these Precedents, which was Browning's Case, Pasch. 20 Eliz. Rot. 79. it was said by Mr. Attorney, that he was bailed by a letter from the Lords of the Council, directed to the Judges of the Court; but being asked for that letter, or any testimony of it, he could produce none at all; but said, he thought the testimony of it was burnt, among many other things of the Council-table, at the burning of the Banqueting-House.

To the 9th, being Harecourt's Case, Pasch. 40 Eliz. Rot. 62, the self same objection was made by him, but no warrant was shewed to maintain his objection.

To the 10th, which is Catesby's Case, in vacation Hill. 43 Eliz. he said, That it was by direction of a privy-seal from the queen; and to that purpose he shewed the privy-seal of 43 Eliz. which is at large among the transcripts of the Records concerning bails taken in cases, where the king or the lords assented. But it was replied, That the privy-seal was made only for some particular gentlemen mentioned in it, and for none other, as indeed appears in it: and then he said, that it was likely that Catesby here had a privy-seal in this behalf, because those other had so: which was all the force of his objection.

To the 11th of these, which is Beckwith's Case in Hill. 12 Jac. Rot. 153, he said, that the lords of the council sent a letter to the court of King's-Bench to bail him. And indeed he produced a letter, which could not by any means be found when the arguments were made at the first conference: and this letter, and a copy of an obscure report made by a young student (which was brought to another purpose, as is hereafter shewed), were the only things written of any kind that Mr. Attorney produced, besides the particulars shewed by the house of commons at the first conference. To this it was replied, That the letter was of no moment, being only a direction to the Chief-Justice, and no matter of Record, nor any way concerning the rest of the Judges:

and besides, either the prisoner was bailable by the law, or not bailable; if bailable by the law, then he was to be bailed without any such letter; if not bailable by the law, then plainly the Judges could not have bailed him upon the letter, without breach of their oath, which is, 'That they are to do justice according to the law, without having respect to any command whatsoever.' So that the letter in this case, or the like in any other case, is for point of law to no purpose, nor hath any weight at all by way of objection against what the Record and the Judgment of the court shew us.

To the 12th and last of these, which is sir Thomas Monson's Case in the 14 Jac. Rot. 147, the same objection only was said over by him, which was mentioned and clearly answered in the argument; and that one ground which is infallible, 'That the judgment upon a return is to be made only out of what appears in the body of the return itself,' was again insisted upon in this case, as it was also in most of the rest. And indeed that alone which is most clear law, fully satisfies almost all kind of objections that have been made to any of these precedents; which thus rightly understood, are many ample testimonies of the Judgment of the Court of King's-Bench, touching this great point, in the several ages, and reigns of the several princes under which they fall.

After his Objections to the twelve, and the replies and satisfactions given to these objections, he came next to those wherein the assent of the king and privy-council appears to have been upon the enlargement: but he made not to any of these any other kind of objections whatsoever, than such as are mentioned and clearly answered, as they were now again, in the Argument made at the first Conference. And for so much as concerns letters of assent or direction, the same was here said again by way of reply to him, as is before said touching the letter in Beckwith's Case.

After these were dispatched, he came to urge the eight Precedents, which seemed to make for the other side against the Resolution of the house of commons: which eight were used, and copies of them also were given into the lords at the first Conference.

Of these eight, the first four were urged by him, as being of one kind; the difference of them only being such, that, save only in the names of prisons and of persons, they are but the self-same.

To the force of these four he objected thus: that Richard Everard, for the purpose, in the first of them, which is 5 H. 7, Rot. 18. Roger Cherry in the second of them, which is 8 H. 7. Rot. 12, Christ. Burton, in the third of them, which is 9 H. 7, Rot. 14, and George Urswick in the fourth of them, which is 19 H. 7, Rot. 13, were returned into the King's-Bench upon several writs of Habeas Corpus, to have been committed and detained in the several prisons whence they came 'per mandatum domini regis,' and that upon that Return they were committed to the marshal of the King's-Bench; and that however it had been objected against those precedents, that this kind of commitment was by the course of that court always done before the bailing of the prisoner, yet, that it did not appear that they were bailed.

The Reply to this objection was, That by constant course of King's-Bench, whosoever came in upon Habeas Corpus, or otherwise upon any writ in that court, cannot be bailed until he be first committed to the marshal of that court; and that thence it was, that all those four were committed to the marshal, as appears by that entry, 'Qui committitur Marescallo, &c.' which is the usual entry in such a case, and that the clerks of that court acknowledge this course and entry to be most constant. So that all the inference, that can be made out of these four, is, that four prisoners being brought from four several prisons by Habeas Corpus into the King's-Bench, and returned to stand committed 'per mandatum domini regis,' were so far from being remanded by the law, that in all these four cases, they were first taken from the several prisons, wherein they had been detained, by such a general command (which could not have been if they had not been adjudged in every one of the cases to have been bailable by the court), and that this commitment of them to the marshal of the King's-Bench, was the first step towards the bailing of them, as in all other cases. But that it appears not, that either they ever demanded to be bailed, or that they were able to find sufficient bail; and if they did not the one, or could not do the other, it may follow indeed that they were not bailed. But this commitment to the King's-Bench being the first step to the bailing of them, as by the constant course it is, shews most plainly that they were bailable by the law, which is the only thing in question. So that although these four precedents were ranked among them, that may seem to make against the Resolution of the house of commons, which was done, both because they have this small colour in them for the other side, to any man that is not acquainted with the nature and reasons of the Entries, and courses of the court of King's-Bench, and also because all or some of them had been used in the late great case in the King's-Bench, as precedents that made against the liberty claimed by the subject; yet, in truth, all four of them do fully prove their Resolution: that is, they plainly shew that the court of King's-Bench in every one of them resolved, that the prisoners so committed were bailable, otherwise they had been remanded, and not committed to the marshal of the King's-Bench. And this was the Answer to the Objection made by Mr. Attorney upon those four precedents, being all of the time of king Henry the seventh.

To the fifth of these eight, being Edward Page's Case, in 7 H. 8, Rot. 23. Mr. Attorney objected thus: He said, that Edward Page was committed to the Marshalsea of the Houshold, 'per mandatum domini regis ibidem salvo custodiendi, &c.' 'Qui committitur Marescallo,

'&c. Hospitii domini regis.' By which it appeareth, as he said, that the court remanded him back to the prison of the Marshalsea of the Household: and he said, that whereas it had been objected at the first conference, that there was some mistaking in the entry; he conceived, indeed, that there was a mistaking, but it was that the clerk had entered 'committitur' for 'remittitur,' and that it should have been 'Qui remittitur Marescallo Hospitii domini regis:' for whenever they remanded the prisoner, 'remittitur' and not 'committitur' should be entered. And that mistaking being so rectified and understood, he conceived it was a direct precedent against the Resolution of the house of commons.

To this it was answered by the Gentlemen of the house of commons, That there was no doubt, indeed, but that a mistake was in the entry by the clerk, but that the mistaking was quite of another nature. The addition of those words, 'hospitii dom. regis,' was the mistaking, and the entry should have been, 'qui committitur Marescallo, &c.' only; that is, he was committed to the Marshal of the King's Bench; and so indeed the force of this precedent should be but just the same with the first four; but the ignorance of the clerk that entered it, knowing not how to distinguish between the Marshal of the Household and the Marshal of the King's Bench, was the cause of the addition of these words, 'hospitii dom. regis.'

And to confirm fully this kind of interpretation of that precedent, and of the mistaking of it, it was observed by the Gentlemen of the House of Commons, that there is in the margin of the Roll an infallible character that justifies so much. For by the course of that court, whensoever a prisoner is committed to the Marshal of the King's Bench and not remanded, the word Marescallo is written in the margin short by Mars turned up: and that is never written there, but when the meaning and sense of the entry is, that the prisoner is committed to the prison of the same court. Now in this case 'Marr' in the margin is likewise written: which most clearly shews that the truth of this case was, that this Page was committed to the Marshal of the King's Bench, and not remanded; which if it had been, neither could the entry have been 'committitur,' nor should the margin of the Roll have had 'Marr' written in it.

And thus they have answered Mr. Attorney's objections touching this precedent, and concluded that now, besides the first four of the eight, they had another, and so five to prove that a prisoner committed 'per mandatum domini regis,' generally was bailable by the judgment of the court. However, it appears not in these particulars that they were bailed; which perhaps they were not, either because they prayed it not, or because they could not find sufficient bail.

The sixth of these Precedents, being the case of Thomas Cæsar, in the 8 Jac Regis Rot. 99. Mr. Attorney objected to it thus: That Cæsar being committed 'per mandatum domini regis' to the Marshalsea of the Household, was returned upon Habeas Corpus to be so committed, and therefore detained in prison, and that the entry is, 'Qui committitur prisonæ Marescal. prædict.' by which it appears clearly, that he was remanded to the same prison from whence he came.

To this the Gentlemen of the House of Commons gave this answer: They said, that the usual entry of a 'remittitur,' when it is to shew that the court by way of judgment, or award upon a resolution, or debate, remands the prisoner, is, 'remittitur quousque secundum legem deliberatus fuerit:' but when they advise, or give way to the keeper of the prison to amend his return, or the like, then the entry is only 'remittitur' generally, or 'remittitur prisonæ prædict.' But it was indeed affirmed by Mr. Keeling, a clerk of great experience in that court, that the entry of a 'remittitur' generally, or 'remittitur prisonæ prædictæ,' was indifferently used for the same, as 'remittitur quousque,' &c. Yet it was expressly shewed by the gentlemen of the House of Commons, that there was sometimes a difference, and that so it might well be in this case. For in the last of these eight precedents, which is Saltonstall's Case, they observed that 'remittitur prisonæ prædictæ' is often used; and that it is twice used only for a remanding, during the time that the court gave leave to the Warden of the Fleet to amend his return; which shews plainly, that though sometimes 'remittitur' generally, and 'remittitur quousque,' &c. may mean the same, yet sometimes it doth not. And that, in this case of Cæsar it doth not mean any other, but only so much as it doth twice in that of Saltonstall's case, was proved also by a Rule of the court, which was cited out of the Rule-book of the court of King's Bench, by which rule the court expressly ordered, that unless the steward and marshal of the Household did sufficiently return the writ of Habeas Corpus for Cæsar, that he should be discharged. The words of the rule are, 'Nisi prædicti Senescallus et Marescallus hospitii domini regis sufficienter returnaverint breve de Habeas Corpus, Tho. Cæsar die Mercurii proxima post quindenam Sancti Martini de prisona exonerabitur.' And this was the opinion of the court: which shews that the court was so far from remanding him upon the return, that they resolved, that unless some better return were made, the prisoner should be discharged of his first imprisonment, though it appeared to them out of the body of the return (upon which they were only to judge), that he was committed 'per mandatum domini regis' only. And the rule not only shews the opinion of the court then to have been agreeable with the Resolution of the house of commons, but also proves that 'Remittitur' generally, or 'Remittitur prisonæ prædictæ,' doth not always imply a remanding upon judgment or debate. And this answer was given to this of Cæsar's Case, that is the sixth of this number.

The seventh is the Case of James Demetrius. It was 12 Jac. Rot. 153. Mr. Attorney objected that this Demetrius and divers others being brewers, were committed 'per concilium domini regis' to the Marshalsea of the Houshold, and that upon the commitment so generally returned, they were remanded, and that the entry was 'immediatè remittitur præfacto marescallo prædicti hospitii;' where he observed, that 'immediatè' shews that the Judges of that time were so resolved of this question, that they remanded them presently, as men that well knew what the law was herein.

Hereunto the Gentlemen of the House of Commons gave these Answers.. 1. That the Remittitur in this case is but as the other in Cæsar's, and so proves nothing against them. 2. That 'immediatè' being added to it, shews plainly that it was done without debate, or any argument or consideration had of it, which makes the authority of the precedents to be of no force in point of law; for judgments and awards given upon deliberation-only and debate are proofs and arguments of weight, and not any sudden act of the court without debate or deliberation. And the entry of 'immediatè' being proposed by Mr. Keeling, it was confirmed by him, that by that entry it appears by this course, that the remanding of him was the self-same day he was brought, which, as it was said by the Gentlemen of the House of Commons, might be at the rising of the court, or upon advisement, and the like. And this answer was given to this precedent of the brewers.

The last of the eight, to which Mr. Attorney objected, is Saltonstall's Case, in the 13 Jac. regis. He was committed 'per mandatum dominorum regis de privato concilio;' and being returned by the Warden of the Fleet to be so, 'Remittitur prisonæ prædictæ;' and in the 13 Jac. in the same case there is 'remittitur' generally in the roll. And these two make but one case, and are as one precedent.

To this the Gentlemen of the House of Commons answered, That it is true, the Rolls have such entries of 'remittitur' in them generally, but that proves nothing, upon the reason before used by them in Cæsar's case. But also Saltonstall was committed for another cause besides 'per mandatum dom. regis,' a contempt against an order in the chancery, and that was in the return also. And besides the court, as it appears in the record, gave several days to the Warden of the Fleet to amend his return, which they would not have done, if they had conceived it sufficient, for that which is sufficient needs not amendment.

To this Mr. Attorney replied, That they gave him a day to amend his return, in respect of that part of it which concerns the order in Chancery, and not in respect of that which was 'per mandatum dom. regis.' But the Gentlemen of the House of Commons answered, That that appeared not any where, nor indeed is it likely at all, nor can be reasonably so understood: because if the other return 'per mandatum dom. regis' had been sufficient by itself, then doubtless they would have remanded him upon that alone; for then they needed not at all to have stood upon the other part of the return in this case. So that out of the Record itself it appears fully, that the court conceived the return to be insufficient.

So the Gentl. men of the House of Commons concluded, that they had a great number of Precedents besides divers acts of parliament, and Reasons of Common Law, agreeable to their Resolution; and that there was not one precedent at all that made against them, but indeed, that almost all that were brought, as well against them as for them, if rightly understood, made fully for the maintenance of their Resolution: and that there was not one example or precedent of a Remittitur in any kind upon the point before that of Cæsar's case, which is before cleared with the rest, and is but of late time, and of no moment against the Resolution of the House of Commons.

And thus, for so much as concerned the Precedents of Record, the first day of the Conference desired by the lords ended.

The next day, they desired another Conference with the House of Commons, at which it pleased the Committee of both houses to hear Mr. Attorney again make what Objections he could against other parts of the Argument formerly delivered from the House of Commons. He then objected against the Acts of Parliament, and against the Reasons of Law, and his objections to those parts were answered, as it appears by the Answers by order given into the House of Commons by the gentlemen that made them. (Vide postea.) He objected also upon the second day against the second kind of Precedents, which are Resolutions of Judges in former times, and not of record, and brought also some other testimonies of the opinions of Judges in former times, touching this point.

First, for that Resolution of all the Judges of England in 34 Eliz. mentioned and read in the Arguments at the first Conference, he said, That it was directly against the Resolution of the House of Commons, and observed the words of it in one place to be, that persons so committed by the king, or by the council, may not be delivered by any of the courts, &c. And in another, that if the cause were expressed, either in general or in specialty, it was sufficient; and he said that the expressing of a cause in generality was to shew the king or the council's command: and to this purpose, he read the whole words of that Resolution of the Judges. Then he objected also, that in the Report of one Roswell's Case in the King's-bench, in 13 Jac. he found that the opinion of the Judges of that court (sir Edward Coke being then Chief Judge and one of them) was, that a prisoner being committed 'per mandatum dom. regis,' or 'privati concilii,' without cause shewed, and so returned, could not be bailed because it might be matter of state, or 'Arcana imperii,' for which he stood committed. And to this also be added, an opinion he found in a Journal in the House of Commons of 13 Jac. wherein sir Edward Coke speaking to a Bill preferred for the explanation of Magna Charta touching imprisonment, said in the same house, That one so committed could not be enlarged by the law, because it might be matter of state for which he was committed. And amongst these objections of the other nature also, he spake of the confidence that was shewed in behalf of the House of Commons: and he said, it was not confidence on either part could add any thing to the determination of the question: but if it could, that he had as much reason of confidence for the other side against the Resolution of the House of Commons, grounding himself upon the force of his objections, which, as he conceived, had so weakened the arguments of the House of Commons.

To this a reply was made; and first it was said to the lords on the behalf of the House of Commons, That notwithstanding any thing yet objected, they were upon clear reason still confident of the truth of their first Resolution, grounded upon so just examination, and deliberation taken by them. And it was observed to the lords also, that their confidence herein was of another nature, and of greater weight, than any confidence that could be expressed by Mr. Attorney, or whomsoever else being of his majesty's counsel learned.

To which purpose the lords were desired to take into their memories the difference between the present qualities of the Gentlemen that spake in behalf of the House of Commons, and of the King's learned Counsel in their speaking there, howsoever accidentally they were both men of the same profession: for the King's Counsel spake as counsel perpetually retained by fee, and if they made glosses or what advantageous interpretation soever for their own part, they did but what belonged to their place and quality, as Mr. Attorney had done. But the Gentlemen that spake in behalf of the House of Commons, came there, bound on the one side by the trust reposed in them by their country that sent them, and on the other side by an oath taken by every of them before he sit in the house, to maintain and defend the Rights and Prerogatives of the Crown: so that even in the point of confidence alone, those of them that speak as retained counsel by perpetual fee, and those that by their place being admitted to speak, are bound to utter nothing but truth, both by such a trust and such an oath, were no way to be so compared or counterpoised, as if the one were of no more weight than the other.

And then the Objections before mentioned were also answered.

For that of the Resolution of all the Judges of England in 34 Eliz. it was shewed, that plainly it agreed with the Resolution of the House of Commons: for although indeed it might have been expressed with more perspicuity, yet the words of it, as they are, sufficiently shew the meaning of it to be no otherwise.

To that purpose, besides the words of the whole frame of this Resolution of the Judges, as it is in the copy transcribed out of the L. C. Justice Anderson's Book, written in his own hand, which book was here offered to be shewed in the behalf of the house of commons; it was observed, that the words of the first part of it shew plainly, that all the Judges of England then resolved, that the prisoners spoken of in the first part of their Resolution were only prisoners committed with cause shewed; for they only say they might not be delivered by any court without due trial by law, and judgment of acquittal had; which shews plainly they meant that by trial and acquittal they might be delivered. But it is clear that no trial or acquittal can be had, where there is not some cause laid to their charge, for which they ought to stand committed. Therefore in that part of the Resolution such prisoners are only meant as are committed with cause shewed, which also the Judges in that Resolution expressly thought necessary, as appears in the second part of their Resolution, wherein they have these words: 'If upon the return of their Habeas Corpus, the cause of their commitment be certified to the Judges, as it ought to be, &c.' By which words they shew plainly, that every return of a commitment is insufficient that hath not a cause shewed of it. And to that which Mr. Attorney said, as if the cause were sufficiently expressed in generality, if the king's command or the council's were expressed in it, as if that were meant in the resolution for a sufficient general cause; it was answered, That it was never heard of in law, that the power or person that committed the prisoner was understood for the 'causa captionis' or 'causa detentionis,' but only the reason why that power or person committed the prisoner. As also in common speech, if any man ask why or for what cause a man stands committed, the answer is not, that such a one committed him, but his offence or some other cause is understood in the question, and is to be shewed in the answer. But to say that such a one committed the prisoner, is an answer only to the question, who committed him? and not why, or for what cause he stands so committed?

Then for that of the copy of the Report, in 13 Jac. shewed forth by Mr. Attorney, it was answered by the Gentlemen of the House of Commons, That the report itself which had been before seen, and perused among many other things at a committee made by the house, was of slight or no authority, for that it was taken by one, who was at that time a young student, and as a reporter in the King's Bench, and there was not any other report to be found that agreed with it. Secondly, Although the reports of young students, when they take the words of Judges as they fall from their mouths at the Bench, and in the same person and form as they have spoken, may be of good credit; yet in this case there was not one word so reported: but in truth there being three cases at a time in the King's-Bench, one Roswell's case, Allen's, and Saltonstall's case, every of which had something of like nature in it, the student having been present in the court, made up the frame of one report or case out of all three in his own words, and so put it into his Book: so that there is not a word in the report, but it is framed according to the student's fancy, as it is written; and nothing is expressed in it, as it came from the mouth of the Judges, otherwise than his fancy directed it in.

Thirdly, There are in the report plain falsehoods of matter of fact, which are to be attributed either to the Judges or to the reporter. It is most likely by all reason, that they proceeded from the Reporter's fault; howsoever, these matters of falsehood shew sufficiently that the credit of the rest is of light value. It is said in the report, that Harecourt being committed by the council, was bailed, in 40 Eliz. upon a privy seal or a letter, whereas in truth there is no such thing. And it is said there, that kind of letters are filed in the crown-office, whereas in truth there was not any such kind of letters filed there in any case whatsoever. That Resolution of the Judges in 34 Eliz. is mis-cited there, and made in 36 Eliz. And it is said there, that by that Resolution, a prisoner returned to be committed by the command of the king, might not at all be delivered by the court; whereas no such thing is comprehended in that Resolution.

But that which is of most moment is, that howsoever the truth of the report were, yet the opinion of the Judges being sudden, and without any debate had of the case, is of light moment: for, in difficult points especially, the most grave and learned men living may on the sudden let fall (and that without any disparagement to them) such opinions as they may well, and ought to change upon further inquiry, examination, and full debate had before them, and mature deliberation taken by them. Now plainly in that of 13 Jac. there is not so much as a pretence of any debate at the bar or bench. All that is reported to have been, is reported as spoken of the sudden. And can any man take such a sudden opinion to be of value against solemn debates and mature deliberations since had of the point? And indeed this great point, and all circumstances belonging to it, have within this half year, been so fully examined and searched into, that it may well be affirmed, that the most learned man whatsoever that hath now considered of it, hath within that time, or might have, learned more reason of satisfaction in it, than ever before he met with. Therefore the sudden opinion of the Judges to the contrary is of no value here, which also is to be said of that opinion obviously delivered in the commons house in 18 Jac. as Mr. Attorney objected out of the Journal of the house. But besides, neither was the truth of that report of that opinion in the Journal any way acknowledged; for it was said in behalf of the house of commons, that their Journals were for matters of Orders and Resolutions of the house of such authority, as that they were as their records. But for any particular man's opinion, noted in any of them, it was so far from being of any authority with them, that in truth no particular opinion is at all to be entered in them, and that their clerk offends, whenever he doth to the contrary. And, to conclude, no such opinion whatsoever can be sufficient to weaken the clear law comprehended in these resolutions of the house of commons, grounded upon so many acts of parliament, so much reason of the common-law, and so many precedents of record, and the resolution of all the judges of England; and against which not one law, written or unwritten, not one precedent, not one reason hath been brought, that makes any thing to the contrary.

And thus ended the next day of the Conference desired by the lords, and had by a Committee of both houses.

Seijeant ASHLEY'S ARGUMENT, seconding Mr. Attorney, in the behalf of his Majesty.

I hope it will be neither offensive nor tedious to your lordships, if I said somewhat to second Mr. Attorney: which I the rather desire, because yesterday it was taken by the Gentlemen, and argued on the behalf of the Commons, that the cause was as good as gained by them, and yielded by us, in that we acknowledged the statute of Magna Charta, and the other subsequent Statutes, to be yet in force: for so that they enforced this general conclusion; 'That therefore no man could be committed, or imprisoned, but by due process, presentment or indictment.' Which we say is a Non sequitur upon such our acknowledgment; for then it would follow by necessary consequence, that no imprisonment could be justified but by process of law, which we utterly deny. For in the cause of the Constable cited by Mr. Attorney, it is most clear, that by the ancient law of the land a constable might ex officio, without any warrant, arrest, and restrain a man to prevent an affray, or to suppress it. And so is the authority 38 Hen. 8, Brook's Abstract. So may he, after the affray, apprehend and commit to prison the person that hath wounded a man that is in peril of death, and that without warrant or process; as it is in 38 E. 3, fol. 6.

Also any man that is no Officer may apprehend a felon without writ, or warrant, or pursue him as a wolf, and as a common enemy to the Commonwealth, as the Book is 14 Hen. 3, fol. 16. So might any one arrest a night-walker, because it is for the common profit, as the reason is given 4 Hen. 7, fol. 7.

In like manner the Judges in these several Courts may commit a man, either for contempt or misdemeanor, without either process or warrant, other than 'Take him Sheriff,' or 'Take him Marshal, or Warden of the Fleet.' And the adversaries will not deny, but if the king will alledge cause, he may commit a man 'per mandatum' as the Judges do, without process or warrant.—And various are the cases that may be instanced, wherein there may be a lawful commitment without process. Wherefore I do positively and with confidence affirm, that if the imprisonment be lawful, whether it be by process, or without process, it is not prohibited by the law.

Which being granted, then the question will aptly be made, Whether the King or Council may commit to prison 'per legem terræ,' were only that a part of the municipal law of this realm, which we call the Common-Law? For there are also divers jurisdictions in this kingdom, which are also reckoned the law of the land.

As in Cawdry's Case in Coke's 5th report, fol. 1. the first ecclesiastical law is held the law of the land, to punish blasphemies, schisms, heresies, simony, incest, and the like, for a good reason there rendered, viz. That otherwise the king should not have power to do justice to his subjects in all cases, nor to punish all crimes within his kingdom.

The Admiral's jurisdiction is also lex terra, or things done upon the sea: but if they exceed their jurisdiction, a prohibition is awarded upon the Statute of nullus liber homo; by which appears that the statute is in force, as we have acknowledged.

The Martial Law likewise, though not to be exercised in times of peace, when recourse may be had to the king's courts, yet in times of invasion, or other times of hostility, when an army-royal is in the field, and offences are committed, which require speedy reformation, and cannot expect the solemnity of legal Trials; then such imprisonment, execution, or other justice done by the law-martial is warrantable, for it is then the law of the land, and is ius gentium; which ever serves for a supply in the defect of the common law, when ordinary proceeding cannot be had.

And so it is also in the case of the Law of the Merchant, which is mentioned 13 Edw. 4, fol. 9, 10, where a Merchant-stranger was wronged in his goods, which he had committed to a carrier to convey to Southampton, and the carrier imbezelled some of the goods: for remedy whereof the Merchant sued before the council in the Star-Chamber for redress. It is there said thus: Merchant-strangers have by the king safe-conduct for coming into this realm; therefore they shall not be compelled to attend the ordinary trial of the common law, but, for expedition, shall sue before the king's council, or in Chancery, 'de die in diem' 'et de hora in boram;' where the case shall be determined by the law of merchants.

In the like manner it is in the Law of State; when the necessity of state requires it, they do and may proceed to natural equity; as in those other cases where the law of the land provides not, the proceeding may be by the law of natural equity: and infinite are the occurrences of state, unto which the common law extends not. And if these proceedings of state should not also be accounted the law of the land, then we do fall into the same inconveniency mentioned in Cawdry's case, that the king should not be able to do justice in all cases within his own dominions.

If then the king nor his council may not commit, it must needs follow, that either the king must have no council of state, or having such a council, they must have no power to make orders, or acts of state; or if they may, they must be without means to compel obedience to those acts: and so we shall allow them jurisdiction, but not compel obedience to those acts; but not correction, which will be then as fruitless as the command. 'Frustra potentia quæ nunquam redigitur in statutum.' Whereas the very act of Westminster the first, shews plainly that the king may commit, and that his commitment is lawful, or else that act would never have declared a man to be irrepleviable when he is committed by the command of the king, if the law-makers had conceived that his commitment had been unlawful. And Divine Truth informs us, that the kings have their power from God, the Psalmist calling them 'the children of the Most High;' which is in a more special manner understood than of other men: for all the sons of Adam are by election the sons of God, and all the sons of Abraham by recreation, or regeneration, the children of the Most High, in respect of the power which is committed unto them; who hath also furnished them with ornaments and armist for the exercising of that power, and hath given them sceptres, swords, and crowns; sceptres to institute, and swords to execute laws; and crowns as ensigns of that power and dignity, with which they are invested. Shall we then conceive that our king hath so far transmitted the power of his sword to inferior magistrates, that he hath not reserved so much supreme power as to commit an offender to prison? 10 Hen. 6, fol. 7, it appears that a steward of a court leet may commit a man to prison, and shall not the king, from whom all inferior power is deduced, have power to commit? We call him the Fountain of Justice, yet when these streams and rivulets, which flow from that fountain, come fresh and full, we would so far exhaust that fountain, as to leave it dry. But they that will admit him so much power, do require the expression of the cause; I demand whether they will have a general cause alledged, or a special? If general, as they have instances for treason, felony, or for contempt, (for to leave fencing, and to speak plainly as they intend it) viz. If loan of money should be required and refused, and thereupon a commitment ensue, and the cause signified to be for contempt, this being unequal inconveniency from yielding, the remedy is sought; in the next parliament would be required the expression of the particular cause of the commitment. Then how unfit would it be for king or council in cases to express the particular cause, it is easily to be adjudged, when there is no state, or policy of government, whether it be monarchical, or of any other frame, which have not some secrets of state, not communicable to vulgar understanding.

I will instance but one; if a king employ an ambassador to a foreign country or state, with instructions for his negotiation, and he pursue not his instructions, whereby dishonour and damage may ensue to the kingdom, is not this committable? And yet the particular of his instruction, and the manner of his miscarrying, is not fit to be declared to his keeper, or by him to be certified to the Judges, where it is to be opened and debated in the presence of a great audience.

I therefore conclude, for offences against the State, in case of State Government, the king and his council have lawful power to punish by imprisonment, without shewing particular cause, where it may tend to the disclosing of State Government. It is well known to many that know me, how much I have laboured in this law of the subjects liberty very many years before I was in the king's service, and had no cause then to speak, but to speak ex animo; yet did I then maintain and publish the same opinion which now I have declared concerning the king's supreme power in matters of state, and therefore cannot justly be censured to speak at this present only to merit of my master. But if I may freely speak my own understanding, I conceive it to be a question too high to be determined by any legal direction; for it must needs be an hard case of contention, when the conqueror must sit down with irreparable losses, as in this case. If the subject prevails, he gains liberty, but loseth the benefit of that State Government, by which a monarchy may soon become an anarchy; or if the State prevails, it gains absolute sovereignty, but loseth subjects: not their subjection, for obedience we must yield, though nothing be left us but prayers and tears, but yet loseth the best part of them, which is their affections, whereby sovereignty is established, and the crown firmly fixt on his royal head. Between two such extremes there is no way to moderate, but to find a medium for the accommodation of the difference; which is not for me to prescribe, but only to move your lordships, to whom I submit.

After Mr. Serjeant's speech ended, my Lord President said thus to the Gentlemen of the House of Commons; 'That though at this free conference, liberty was given by the Lords to the king's counsel to speak what they thought fit for his majesty, yet Mr. Serjeant Ashley had no authority, or direction from them to speak in that manner he had done.' And he was committed into custody, and afterwards, being sorry for any hasty expression he might have used, was discharged.

THE OBJECTIONS of the King's Counsel, with the ANSWERS made thereunto, at the two Conferences touching the same matter.

It was agreed by the Attorney-General, sir Robert Heath, that the seven Statutes urged by the Commons were in force, and that Magna Charta did extend most properly to the king. But he said, 1. That some of them are in general words, and therefore conclude nothing, but are to be expounded by the precedents; and others that be more particular, are applied to the suggestions of subjects, and not to the king's command simply of itself. Hereunto it was answered, That the Statutes were as direct as could be, which appeareth by the reading of them; and that though some of them speak of suggestions of the subjects, yet others do not: and they that do, are as effectual, for that they are in equal reason, a commitment by the command of the king, being of as great force, when it moveth by a suggestion from a subject, as when the king taketh notice of it himself; the rather for that kings seldom intermeddle with matters of this nature, but by information from some of their people.

2. Mr. Attorney objected, that 'per legem terræ' in Magna Charta, (which is the foundation of this question) cannot be understood for process of the law and original writs; for that in all criminal proceedings no original writ is used at all; but every constable either for felony or breach of the peace, or to prevent the breach of the peace, may commit without process or original writ, and it were hard the king should not have the power of a constable. And the statute cited by the commons, makes process of the law and writ original, to be all one.

The answer of the Commons to this objection was, that they do not intend original writs only by law of the land, but all other legal process, which comprehends the whole proceedings of law upon cause, other than trial by jury, Judicium parium, unto which it is opposed. Thus much is imported ex vi termini out of the word process; and by the true acceptation thereof in the statutes that have been used by the commons to maintain the declaration, and most especially the statutes of 25 Ed. 3, cap. 4, where it appeareth that a man ought to be brought in to answer by the course of the law, having former mention of process made by original writ.

And in 28 Ed. 3, cap. 3, 'by the course of the law' is rendered 'by due process of the law.' And 36 Ed. 3, Rot. Parl. n. 20, the petition of the commons saith, 'that no man ought to be imprisoned by special command without indictment or other due process to be made by the law,' 37 Ed. 3, cap. 18, calleth the same thing 'process of the law;' and 42 Ed. 3, cap. 3, stileth it 'by due process and writ original;' where the conjunctive must be taken for a disjunctive, which change is ordinary in an exposition of statutes and deeds, to avoid inconve- niences, to make it stand with the rest; and with reason, as it may be collected, 'by the law of the land' in Magna Charta, 'by the course of the law' in 25 Ed. 3, 'by the due process of law' in 28 Ed. 3, 'other due process to be made by the law' in 36 Ed. 3, 'process of the law' in 37 Ed. 3, and 'by due process and writ original' in 42 Ed. 3, are meant one and the same thing; the latter of these statutes referring always to the former, and that all of them import any due and regular proceedings of law upon a cause other than the Trial by Jury. And this appeareth 10 Rep. 74, in the case of the Marshalsea, and 11 Rep. 99, James Bagg's case, where it is understood of giving jurisdiction by charter or prescription, which is the ground of a proceeding by course of law. And in Selden's Notes on Fortescue, fol. 29, where it is expounded for law-wager, which is likewise a trial at law by the oath of the parties differing from that by jury. And it doth truly comprehend these and all other regular proceedings in law upon cause, which gives authority to the constable to arrest upon cause. And if this be not the true exposition of these words 'per legem terræ,' the king's counsel were desired to declare their meaning, which they never offered to do; and yet certainly these words were not put into the statute without some intention of consequence.

And thereupon Mr. Serjeant Ashley offered an interpretation of them thus: namely, That there were divers laws of this realm, as the Common Law, the Law of the Chancery, the Ecclesiastical Law, the Law of the Admiralty or Marine Law, the Law of the Merchants, the Martial Law, and the Law of State; and that these words 'per legem terræ,' do extend to all these laws.

To this it was answered, That we read of no Law of State, and that none of these laws can be meant there, save the Common Law, which is the principal and general law, and is always understood by way of excellency, when mention is made of the law of the land generally: and that though each of the other laws, which are admitted into this kingdom by custom or act of parliament, may justly be called a law of the land, yet none of them can have the pre-eminence to be stiled the law of the land. And no Statute, Law-Book, or other Authority, printed or unprinted, could be shewn, to prove that the law of the land, being generally mentioned, was ever intended of any other than the Common Law; and yet even by these other laws, a man may not be committed without a cause expressed.

But it standeth with the rule of other legal expositions, that 'per legem terræ,' must be meant the Common Law, which is the general and universal law by which men hold their inheritances; and therefore if a man speak of escauge generally, it is understood, as Littleton observeth, sect. 99, of the uncertain escauge, which is a knight's service tenure, for the defence of the realm, by the body of the tenant in time of war, and not of certain escauge, which giveth only a contribution in money, and no personal service.

And if a Statute speak of the King's Courts of Record, it is meant only of the four at Westminster by way of excellency, Coke's 6 Rep. 20, Gregory's case. So the Canonists by the Excommunication simply spoken, do intend the greater Excommunication. And the Emperor in his Institutions saith, That the Civil Law being spoken generally, is meant of the Civil Law of Rome, though the law of every city is a civil law; as when a man names The Poet, the Grecians understand Homer, the Latinists, Virgil.

2. Admit 'per legem terræ' extend to all the laws of the land, yet a man must not be committed by any of them, but by the due proceedings that are executed by those laws, and upon a cause declared.

Again, it was urged, That the king was not bound to express a cause of imprisonment, because there may be in it matter of state, not fit to be revealed for a time, lest the confederates thereupon make means to escape the hands of justice. And therefore the Statutes cannot be intended to restrain all commitments, unless a cause be expressed; for that it would be very inconvenient and dangerous to the state, to publish the cause at the very first.

Hereunto it was replied by the Commons, That all danger and inconvenience may be avoided by declaring a general cause, as for treason, suspicion of treason, misprision of treason, or felony, without specifying the particular; which can give no greater light to a confederate, than will be conjectured by the very apprehension upon the imprisonment, if nothing at all were expressed.

It was further alledged, That there was a kind of contradiction in the position of the Commons, when they say, a party committed without a cause shewed, ought to be delivered or bailed; bailing being a kind of imprisonment; delivery a total freeing.

To this it hath been answered, that it hath always been the discretion of the Judges, to give so much respect to a commitment by the command of the King or the privy-council, (which are ever intended to be done in just and weighty causes) that they will not presently set them free, but bail them to answer what shall be objected against them on his majesty's behalf; but if any other inferior officer do commit a man without shewing cause, they do instantly deliver him, as having no cause to expect their leisure. So the delivery is applied to an imprisonment by the command of some mean minister of justice; bailing, when it is done by the command of the king or his council.

It was argued by Mr. Attorney, that bailing was a grace and favour of a court of justice, and that they may refuse to do it.

This was agreed to be true in divers cases; as where the cause appears to be for Felony, or other crimes expressed, for that there is another way to discharge them in some convenient time by their trial; and yet in these cases, the constant practice hath been anciently and modernly to bail men: but where no cause of the imprisonment is returned, but the command of the king, there is no way to deliver such person by trial or otherwise, but that of the Habeas Corpus. And if they should be then remanded, they might be perpetually imprisoned, without any remedy at all; and consequently a man that had committed no offence, might be in a worse case than a great offender; for the latter should have an ordinary trial to discharge him, the other should never be delivered.

It was further said, that though the statute of Westminster 1. c. 15, be a statute which by way of provision did extend only to the sheriff, yet the recital of that statute touching the four cases, wherein a man was not replevable at the common law, namely, those that were committed for the death of a man, by the command of the king, or of his justices, or for the forest; did declare that the justices could not bail such a one, and that replevable andailable were synonymous or all one: and that Stamford, a judge of great authority, doth expound it accordingly (Stam. pl. Cor. 72.) and that neither the statute nor he say 'replevable by the sheriff,' but generally 'without restraint;' and that if the chief justice commits a man, he is not to be enlarged by any other court, as appeareth in the Register.

To this it was answered, 1. That the recital of the body of the statute, relateth to the sheriff only, as appeareth by the very words. 2. That replevable is to the sheriff, for that the word imports no more; but a man committed by the Chief Justice, isailable by the court of King's-Bench. 3. That Stamford meaneth all of the sheriff, or at least he hath not sufficiently expressed that he intended the justices. 4. It was denied that replevable andailable were the same, for they differ in respect of the place where they are used, bail being in the King's Court of Record, replevable before the sheriff; and they are of several natures, replevable being a letting at large upon sureties, bailing being when one 'traditur in ballium,' the bail are his gaolers, and may imprison him, and shall suffer body for body; which is not true of replevying by sureties: and bail differeth from mainprize in this, that mainprize is an undertaking in a sum certain, bailing is to answer the condemnation in civil causes, and in criminal, body for body.

The reasons and authorities in the first Conference were then renewed, and no exceptions taken to any, save that in 22 Hen. 6, it doth not appear that the command of the king was by his mouth, which must be intended, or by his council, which is all one, as is observed by Stamford; for the two words are, that a man is not replevable by the sheriff, who is committed by the writ or the commandment of the king.

21 Ed. 1, Rot. 2, dors. was cited by the King's Counsel; but it was answered, that it concerned the sheriff of Leicestershire only, and not the power of the judges. 33 Hen. 6, the king's Attorney confessed, was nothing to the purpose; and yet that book hath been usually cited by those that maintain the contrary to the declaration of the commons. And therefore such sudden opinions as have been given thereupon, are not to be regarded, the foundation failing.

And where it was said that the French of 36 Ed. 3, Rot. Parl. n. 9, which can receive no answer, did not warrant what was inferred thence;

but that these words; 'sans disturbance met-tre, ou arrest faire, et le contre per special mandement ou en autre maniere,' must be understood, that the Statutes should be put in execution, without putting disturbance, or making arrest to the contrary by special command or in other manner; the commons did utterly deny the interpretation given by the king's counsel: and to justify their own did appeal to all men that understood French. And upon the seven statutes did conclude, that their declaration remained an undoubted truth, not controlled by any thing said to the contrary.

Mr. Kerton acquainted the house, that the earl of Suffolk had said to some gentlemen, 'That Mr. Selden had razed a Record, and deserved to be hanged, for going about to set division betwixt the king and his subjects.' And being demanded to whom the words were spoken, he was unwilling to name any, till upon the question it was resolved he should nominate him. He then named sir John Strangways; who was unwilling to speak what he had heard from the earl: but being commanded by the house, and resolved upon the question, he confessed,

That upon Saturday last, he being in the Committee-Chamber of the lords, the earl of Suffolk called to him, and said, 'Sir John, will you not hang Selden?' To whom he said, 'For what?' The earl replied, 'By God he hath razed a Record, and deserves to be hanged †.'

This the House of Commons took as a great injury done to the whole house, Mr. Selden being employed by them in the Conference with the lords in the great cause concerning the Liberty of the Persons of the Subjects.

The House presently sent sir Robert Phillips with a Message to the Lords to this effect; he expressed the great care the Commons had upon all occasions to maintain all mutual respect and correspondency betwixt both houses: then he informed them of a great injury done by the earl of Suffolk to the whole house, and to Mr. Selden, a particular member thereof,

* This was Theophilus earl of Suffolk, son to James earl of Suffolk Lord-Treasurer, temp. Jac. 1.

† Mr. Selden. "I am called up to justify myself. I see the words charge me to have razed Records. I hope no man believes I ever did it. I cannot guess what this lord means. I did deliver in whole copies of divers Records examined by myself, and divers other gentlemen of this house. These I delivered in to the lords house; and the Clerk of the Crown brought in the Records of the office before the lords: I desire that there may be a Message from this house to the lords, to make at the bar there a Charge against the lord that spoke thus; and I hope we shall have justice." Ex MSS. Pymii in Selden's Life, in his Works, vol. , p. 16.

who by their command had been employed in the late Conference with their lordships: that the house was very sensible thereof, and according to former precedents, made them truly acquainted with it, and demanded justice against the earl of Suffolk. He read the words, saying they were spoken to sir John Strangways, a member of their house.

After a short stay, the lords called for the messenger, to whom the Lord-Keeper gave this answer; he signified the great desire and care of their lordships to maintain and increase the correspondencies betwixt both houses, and as a testimony thereof they had partly taken into consideration the charge: that the earl of Suffolk, being a man of great place and honour, had voluntarily protested upon his honour and soul, that there passed no such words as those from him to sir John Strangways: and the Lord-Keeper wished that their lordships speedy proceedings in this business might testify their love and good-will to the commons house.

The next day being the 15th of April, sir John Strangways made a Protestation openly in the house, wherein he avowed that (notwithstanding the Earl's denial) he did speak those words positively unto him, and would maintain it any way fitting a member of that house, or a gentleman of honour.

They ordered that this Protestation should be entered into the Journal-book, and that a committee should take into consideration what was fit for the house to proceed to, for the justification of sir John Strangways, and what was fitting to be done in this case, and to examine witnesses of the proof of the words.

Upon the 17th day sir John Elliot reported what the committee had done; That they had sent for and examined sir Christ. Nevil; who related, that upon Saturday being in the Lords Committee-Chamber, the earl of Suffolk said thus to him: Mr. Attorney hath cleared the business, and hath made the cause plain on the king's side; and further said, Mr. Selden hath razed a Record, and hath deserved to be hanged, and the lower house should do well to join with the higher in a petition to the king to hang him; and added as a reason, for Mr. Selden went about, and took a course to divide the king from his people, or words to that effect. And being asked, whether he conceived that those words of dividing the king from his people, had relation to the whole and general action of Mr. Selden before the lords, or to the particular of razing a record? He conceived they were referred to the general action.

They had examined one Mr. Littleton, who confessed he heard the earl of Suffolk speak to a gentleman, whom he knew not, words to this effect, viz. That he would not be in Mr. Selden's coat for 10,000*l.* and that Mr. Selden deserved to be hanged.

The second part of this report concerned the particular of sir John Strangways, wherein though the committee found no witness to prove the words spoken to sir John Strangways, yet there were many circumstances which persuaded them of the truth thereof. 1. That the same words in the same syllables were spoken to sir Christ. Nevil, and that the earl as he called to him sir John Strangways, so he called to him sir Christ. Nevil. 2. That the earl of Suffolk called sir John Strangways to him, and spake to him, was proved by sir George Fane, and sir Alex. St. John, at which time the earl seemed full of that which he delivered. 3. That sir John Strangways instantly after his discourse with the earl of Suffolk went to the earl of Hertford and delivered him the passages betwixt them, being the same related in the house. 4. From the unwillingness of sir John Strangways, though called upon by the house, to testify against the earl, till it was resolved by question he should do it: from a probability, that had not these words been spoken to himself, it is like he would have produced sir Christ. Nevil, from whom he also heard the same. 5. From the worth of the gentleman, and his ingenious Protestation in the house, That he was ready to justify the truth of what he said in any course the house should think meet, or was fit for a gentleman of honour.

Hereupon the house resolved upon the question:

1. "That the earl of Suffolk, notwithstanding his denial, had laid a most unjust and scandalous imputation upon Mr. Selden, a member of the house, being employed in the service of the house, and therein upon the whole house of commons. 2. That this house, upon due examination, is fully satisfied that sir John Strangways (notwithstanding the earl of Suffolk's denial) hath affirmed nothing but what is most true and certain. 3. That these particulars and additions be again presented to the lords, and the earl of Suffolk be newly charged at the bar, and the lords desired to proceed in justice against the earl, and to inflict such punishment upon him as an offence of so high a nature, being against the house of commons, doth deserve."

Sir John Elliot was sent with a Message to the lords; who after a while returned this Answer, That they had taken the Message into consideration, and would further take it into due consultation, and in convenient time would return an answer by messengers of their own. But what was done in this affair does not appear.]

Mr. Noye, on the 16th of April, offered an Answer to the inconveniencies presented by Mr. Attorney, which were four in number.

First, where it was objected, that it was inconvenient to express the cause, for fear of divulging the 'Arcana imperii,' for hereby all may be discovered, and abundance of traitors never brought to justice. To this that learned man answered, That the Judges by the intention of the law are the king's counsel, and the secrets may safely be committed to all or some of them, who might advise whether they will bail him: and here is no danger to king, or subjects; for their oath will not permit them to reveal the secrets of the king, nor yet to detain the subject long, if by law he be to be bailed.

Secondly, For that objection of the children of Odonell, he laid this for a ground, that the king can do no wrong; but in cases of extreme necessity, we must yield sometimes for the preservation of the state, 'ubi unius damnus utilitate publica rependitur:' he said there was no trust in the children of traitors, no wrong done if they did 'tabefacere,' or 'marcescere in carcere.' It is the same case of necessity, as when to avoid the burning of a town, we are forced to pull down an honest man's house, or to compel a man to dwell by the sea-side for defence or fortitude. Yet the king can do no wrong, for 'potentia juris est non injuria:' ergo the act of the king, though to the wrong of another, is by the law made no wrong; as if he commanded a person to be kept in prison, yet he is responsible for his wrong: he quoted a book 42. 6. Ass. Post.

Thirdly, The instance made of Westminster first, he said there was a great difference between those three, Mainprise, Bail, and Replevin. The Statute says, a man cannot be replevied: ergo, not bailed non sequitur. Mainprise is under pain; bail is body for body: but no pain is ever in court to be declared, unless the party appears. Replevin is neither by surety nor bail; and Replevin is never in court.

Fourthly, Where it is said that bail is ex gratia, he answers, That if the prisoner comes to Habeas Corpus, then it is not ex gratia, yet the court may advise, but mark the words 'ad subjiendum et recipiendum prout curia consideraverit.' Now it is impossible the Judges should do so, if no cause be expressed; for if they know no cause, he may bring the first, second, third, and fourth Habeas Corpus, and so infinite till he find himself a perpetual prisoner: so that no cause expressed, is worse for a man than the greatest cause or villainy that can be imagined. And thus far proceeded that learned gentleman.

Mr. Glanville said, That by favour of the house of commons he had liberty to speak, if opportunity were offered. He applied his answer to one particular of Mr. Attorney, who assigned to the king four great trusts: 1. War, 2. Coins, 3. Denizens, 4. Pardons; it is assented to, that the king is trusted with all these four legal prerogatives, but the argument followeth not, the king is trusted with many prerogatives: ergo, in this 'non sequitur non est sufficiens enumeratio partium.' He said he could answer these particulars with two rules, whereof the first should wipe off the first and the second; and the other, the third and fourth.

The first rule is this: there is no fear of trusting the king with any thing, but the fear of ill counsel: the king may easily there be trusted, where ill counsel doth not engage both the king and subjects, as it doth in matter of war and coin. If he miscarry in the wars, it is not always 'plectatur archivi,' but he smarts equally with the people; if he abase his coin, he loseth more than any of his people; ergo, he may safely be trusted with the flowers of the crown, war and coin.

The second rule he began was this, When the king is trusted to confer grace, it is one thing; but when he is trusted to infer an injury, it is another matter. The former power cannot, by miscounselling, be brought to pre-judice another, the latter may; if the king pardoneth a guilty man, he punisheth not a good subject; if he denizen never so many strangers, it is but damnum sine injuria: we allow him a liberty to confer grace, but not without cause to infer punishment; and indeed he cannot do injury; for if he command to do a man wrong, the command is void, 'et actor fit autor,' and the actor becomes the wrong doer. Therefore the king may safely be trusted with war, coin, denizens, and pardons, but not with a power to imprison without expression of cause, or limitation of time; as the poet tells us, because 'libertas potius auro.'

After these debates, the house of peers called upon the Judges to answer the Charge of the house of commons, for their Judgment on the Habeas Corpus, brought in Mich. term by the Gentlemen imprisoned for refusing to subscribe to the Loan.

The ANSWER of the Judges for matter of fact upon the Habeas Corpus, 21 April.

The Chief-Justice saith, They are prepared to obey our command, but they desire to be advised by us, whether they being sworn upon penalty of forfeiting body, lands, and goods, into the king's hands, to give an account to him, may without warrant do this.

The Duke said, He had acquainted the king with the business, and for aught he knew he is well content therewith; but for better assurance, he hath sent his brother of Anglesey to know his pleasure.

Devonshire. If a complaint be made by a mean man against the greatest officer in this place, he is to give an account of his doings to this house.

Bishop of Lincoln. This motion proceeded from him, and so took it for clear, that there was an appeal from the Chancery to a higher court than the King's-bench, and that court hath ever given an account of their doings.

The lord Say. He wondered there should be any question made of this business, because in his opinion, this being the highest court, did admit of no appeal.

The President. The Judges did not do this by way of appeal, but as the most common way for them, this being a matter concerning the king's prerogative.

Lord Say. If they will not declare themselves, we must take into consideration the point of our privilege.

The Duke. This was not done by the Judges, as fearing to answer, but respect to the king.

And now his brother was come with answer from the king, that they might proceed.

Order was taken that this passage should not be entered into the Journal-Book.

And so Judge WHITLOCK spake.

My lords, we are by your appointment here ready to clear any aspersion of the house of commons in their late presentment upon the King's-bench, that the Subject was wounded in this judgment there lately given. If such a thing were, my lords, your lordships, not they, have the power to question and judge the same. But, my lords, I say there was no Judgment given, whereby either the prerogative might be enlarged, or the Right of the Subject trench'd upon. It is true, my lords, in Michaelmas term last, four gentlemen petitioned for an Habeas Corpus, which they obtained, and counsel was assigned unto them; the return was 'per speciale mandatum domini regis,' which likewise was made unto us under the hands of 18 privy counsellors. Now, my lords, if we had delivered them presently upon this, it must have been, because the king did not shew the cause, wherein we should have judged the king had done wrong; and this is beyond our knowledge, for he might have committed them for other matters than we could have imagined. But they might say, thus they might have been kept in prison all their days; I answer no, but we did remit them, that we might better advise of the matter: and they the next day might have had a new writ, if they had pleased. But they say, we ought not to have denied bail. I answer, if we had done so, it must needs have reflected upon the king, that he had unjustly imprisoned them. And it appears in Dyer, 2 Eliz. that divers gentlemen being committed, and requiring Habeas Corpus, some were bailed, others remitted: whereby it appears, much is left to the discretion of the judges.

For that which troubled so much, 'remitter quousque,' this, my lords, was only (as I said before) to take time what to do; and whereas they will have a difference betwixt 'remitter' and 'remitter quousque,' my lords, I confess I can find none; but these are new inventions to trouble old Records. And herein, my lords, we have dealt with knowledge and understanding; for had we given a Judgment, the party must thereupon have rested. Every judgment must come to an issue in matter of fact, or demur in point of law; here is neither, therefore no judgment.

As to endeavouring to have a Judgment entered; it is true, Mr. Attorney pressed the same for his master's service; but we being sworn to do right betwixt the king and his subjects, commanded the clerk to make no entry, but according to the old form; and the rule was given by the Chief-Justice alone. I have spent my time in this court, and I speak confidently, I did never see nor know by any record, that upon such a return as this, a man was bailed, the king not first consulted with in such a case as this.

VOL. III.

The Commons House do not know what letters and commands we received, for these remain in our court, and were not viewed by them: for the rest of the matters presented by the house of commons, they were not in agitation before us, whether the king may commit, and how long he may detain a man committed. Therefore having answered so much as concerneth us, I desire your lordships good constructions of what hath been said.

Judge Jones said, He was here to deliver before us, what Judgment was given before them concerning the Habeas Corpus: he answered, No Judgment was given, and the matter of fact was such as my brother delivered unto you yesterday. These four gentlemen were committed to the Fleet, Gate-house, and marshal of the household. Four returns were made upon the writs, and every one of them had a counsellor appointed, who had copies of the returns. A rule was granted, their council heard, and exception taken to the return, because it did not shew cause of their caption.

These were of no force, in the opinion of the Judges. The next exception was, because no cause of their commitment was shewed, which the judges held to be all one in point of law. Then, my lords, they alledged many Precedents and Statutes of themselves, which the king's attorney answered, That persons committed by the king, or council, were never bailed, but his pleasure was first known.

We agreed at the Chamber of the Chief-Justice, that all the Statutes alledged are in force; but whether we should bail them or no, was the question, therefore we remitted them quousque. After which Mr. Attorney required a Judgment might be entered: I commanded the clerk, he should not suffer any such thing to be done, because we would be better advised.

But some will say, our act is otherwise: I answer, No; for we have done no more than we do upon an ordinary writ, when we purpose to be better advised, and that was only an interlocutory order. But, my lords, put the case a Habeas Corpus should be granted for one that is committed by the house of commons, would they (think you) take it well he should be bailed at his first coming to the court? I think they would not, and I think the king would have done so in this case. Now, my lords, there is a petition of right, and a petition of grace: to be bailed, is a matter of grace; therefore if a man be brought upon an Habeas Corpus, and not bailed, he cannot say the court hath done him any wrong. I have now served seven years a Judge in this court, and my conscience beareth me witness, that I have not wronged the same; I have been thought sometimes too forward for the Liberty of the Subject. I am myself Liber Homo, my ancestors gave their voice for Magna Charta. I enjoy that house still, which they did; I do not now mean to draw God's wrath upon my posterity; and therefore I will neither advance the king's prerogative, nor lessen the Liberty of the Subject, to the danger of either king or people. This is my profession before God and your lordships.

Judge Dodderidge said, It is no more fit for a Judge to decline to give an account of his doings, than for a Christian of his faith. God knoweth, I have endeavoured always to keep a good conscience; for a troubled one, who can bear? The kingdom holds of none but God, and Judgments do not pass privately in chambers, but publicly in court, where every one may hear, which causeth judgment to be given with maturity. Your lordships have heard the particulars delivered by my brethren, how that counsel being assigned to those four Gentlemen, in the latter end of Michaelmas Term their cause received hearing; and upon consideration of the Statutes and Records, we found some of them to be according to the good old law of Magna Charta: but we thought, that they did not come so close to this case, as that bail should be thereupon presently granted. My lords, the Habeas Corpus consists of three parts, the Writ, the Return upon the Writ or schedule, and the Entry or Rule reciting the Habeas Corpus; and the Return, together with the opinion of the court, either a 'remittitur,' or 'traditur in ballium.' In this case a remittitur was granted, which we did, that we might take better advisement upon the case, and upon the remittitur (my lords) they might have had a new writ the next day; and I wish they had, because it may be they had seen more, and we had been eased of a great labour. And, my lords, when the Attorney, upon the remittitur, pressed an entry, we all straitly charged the clerk, that he should make no other entry than such as our predecessors had usually made in like cases: for the difference (my lords) betwixt 'remittitur' and 'remittitur quosque,' I could never yet find any. I have now sat in this court fifteen years, and I should know something; surely, if I had gone in a mill so long, some dust would cleave to my cloaths. I am old, and have one foot in the grave, therefore I will look to the better part, as near as I can. But 'omnia habere in memoria, et in nullo errare, divisum potius est quam humanum.'

L. C. J. sir Nicholas Hyde, said, He should not speak with confidence, unless he might stand right in the opinion of the house; and protested what he spake the day before, was not said by him with any purpose to trench upon the privileges of this house, but out of that respect which by his place he thought he owed to the king. He said, concerning the point he was to speak of, that he would not trouble the lords with things formerly repeated, wherein he concurred with his brethren. He said, if it were true the king might not commit, they had done wrong in not partly delivering; for, my lords (saith he), these Statutes and good laws being all in force, we meant not to trench upon any of them; most of them being commentaries upon Magna Charta: but I know not any statute that goeth so far, that the king may not commit. Therefore justly we think, we delivered the interpretation thereof to that purpose: for, my lords, lex terra is not to be found in this statute, they gave me no example, neither was there any cause shewed in the return. A precedent (my lords) that hath run in a storm, doth not much direct us in point of law, and records are the best testimonies. Those precedents they brought being read, we shewed them wherein they were mistaken; if we have erred, 'erramus cum patribus,' and they can shew no precedent, but that our predecessors have done as we have done, sometimes bailing, sometimes remitting, sometimes discharging. Yet we do never bail any committed by the king; or his council, till his pleasure be first known. Thus did the L. C. J. Coke in Rayner's case. They say, this would have been done if the king had not written; but why then was the letter read and published, and kept; and why was the town-clerk sent carefully to enquire (because the letter so directed) whether these men offered for bail were Subsidy men? The letter sheweth also, that Beckwith was committed for suspicion of being acquainted with the Gunpowder-Treason; but no proof being produced, the king left him to be bailed.

My lords, I will observe something out of the law wherein this Liberty of the Subject's person is founded, and some things out of precedents which have been alledged. For the law of Magna Charta, and the rest concerning these points, they are acknowledged by all to be of force; and that they were to secure the subjects from wrongful imprisonment, as well, or rather more concerning the king, than the subject. Why then, besides the Grand Charter, and those six other acts of parliament, in the very point, we know that Magna Charta hath been at least thirty times confirmed; so that upon the matter we have six or seven-and-thirty acts of parliament to confirm this Liberty, although it was made matter of derision the other day in this house.

One is that of 36 E. 3, n. 9. and another in the same year, n. 20. not printed, but yet as good as those that are; and that of 42 E. 3. cap. 3. so express in the point, especially the Petition of the Commons, that year; which was read by Mr. Littleton with the king's answer so full, and free from all exception, to which I refer your lordships, that I know not how any thing in the world can be more plain. And therefore, if in parliament ye should make any doubt of that which is so fully confirmed in parliament, and in a case so clear go about by new glosses to alter the old and good law, we shall not only forsake the steps of our ancestors, who in cases of small importance would answer, 'nolumus mutare leges Angliæ;' but we shall yield up and betray our right in the greatest inheritance the subjects of England have, and that is the laws of England. And truly I wonder how any man can admit of such a gloss upon the plain text, as should overthrow the force of the law: for whereas the law of Magna Charta is, that no freeman shall be imprisoned but by lawful Judgment of his peers, or the law of the land; therefore that the king hath power to commit without cause, is a sense not only expressly contrary to other acts of parliament, and those especially formerly cited, but against common sense. For Mr. Attorney confesseth this law concerns the king; why then, where the law saith, the king shall not commit, but by the law of the land, the meaning must be, as Mr. Attorney would have it, that the king must not commit but at his own pleasure. And shall we think that our ancestors were so foolish, to hazard their persons and estates, and labour so much to get a law, and to have it thirty times confirmed, that the king might not commit his subjects but at his own pleasure? And if he did commit any of his subjects without a cause shewn, then he must lie during pleasure, than which nothing can be imagined more ridiculous, and contrary to true reason.

For the Precedents, I observe, that there hath been many shewn, by which it appears to me evidently, that such as have been committed by the king's council, they have been delivered upon Habeas Corpus, and that constantly. It is true, that some precedents were brought on the king's part, that when some of these persons desired to be delivered by Habeas Corpus, the king, or his council, signified his majesty's pleasure that they should be delivered, or the king's attorney hath come into the court, and related the king's command: but this seems to make for the subject; for it being in his majesty's power to deliver them, who by his special command were imprisoned, may not we well think, that his majesty would rather at that time have stayed their deliverance by law, than furthered it with his letters; and made the prisoners rather beholden to him for his grace and mercy, than to the judges for justice, had not his majesty known that at that time they ought to have been delivered by law? I think no man would imagine a wise king would have suffered his grace and prerogative, if any such prerogative were, to be so continually questioned; and his majesty and his council so far from commanding the judges not to proceed to deliver the prisoner by them committed, without cause shewn, as that on the other side, which is all the force of these precedents, the king and the council signified to the Judges, that they should proceed to deliver the parties. Certainly if the king had challenged any such prerogative, that a person committed, without any cause shewn, ought not to be delivered by the Judges without his consent, it would have appeared, by one precedent or other amongst all that have been produced, that his majesty would have made some claim to such a prerogative. But it appears to the contrary, that, in many of these cases, the king or his council did never interpose; and where they did, it was always in affirmation and encouragement to that court to proceed. And besides, the writing of letters from his majesty to the judges to do justice to his majesty's subjects, may with as good reason be interpreted, that without those letters they might not do justice: also the king signified his willingness, that such and such persons, which were committed by him, should be delivered; therefore they could not be delivered without it, which is a strange reason. So that finding the laws so full, so many, and so plain in the point, and finding, that whenever any were committed, without cause shewn, and brought their Habeas Corpus, they were delivered, and no command ever given to the contrary, or claim made on the king's part to any such prerogative: I may safely conclude, as the house of commons have done; and if any one precedent or two of late can be shewn, that the judges have not delivered the prisoners so committed, I think it is their fault, and to be inquired of. But contrary, it seems to me to be an undoubted Liberty of the Subject, that if he be committed without cause, or without cause shewn, yet he may have some speedy course to bring himself to trial, either to justify his own innocency, or to receive punishment according to his fault: for God forbid, that an innocent man, by the laws of England, should be put in worse case than the most grievous malefactors are; which must needs be, if this should be, that if a cause be shewed, he may have his trial; but if none, he must lie and pine in prison during pleasure. Mr. serjeant Aspley, the other day, told your lordships of the emblem of a king, but by his leave made wrong use of it. For a king bears in one hand the globe, and in the other the golden scepter, the types of sovereignty and mercy, but the sword of justice is ever carried before him by a minister of justice; which shews, subjects may have their remedies for injustice done, and appeals to higher powers: for the laws of England are so favourable to their princes, as they can do no injustice.

Therefore I will conclude, as all disputes I hold do, 'Magna est veritas et prævalebit; so I make no doubt, we living under so good a prince as we do, when this is represented unto him, he will answer us, 'Magna est Charta et prævalebit.'

From this time to the 25th of the same month, the House of Commons in a Grand Committee spent most of their time in debate about Martial Law, and part thereof in giving the lords a meeting at two conferences, concerning their resolves, in order to a Petition of Right, transmitted by the commons to their lordships.

Friday, 25th of April. 1628.

The Lords had a Conference with the Commons, where the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, (Dr. George Abbot) spake as follows:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons; The service of the king and safety of the kingdom do call on us, my lords, to give all convenient expedition, to dispatch some of these great and weighty businesses before us. For the better effecting whereof, my lords have thought fit to let you know, that they do in general agree with you, and doubt not, but you will agree with us, to the best of your power, to maintain and support the fundamental laws of the kingdom, and the fundamental Liberties of the Subject: for the particulars which may hereafter fall in debate, they have given me in charge. to let you know, That what hath been presented by you unto their lordships, they have laid nothing of it by, they are not out of love with any thing that you have tendered unto them; they have voted nothing, neither are they in love with any thing proceeding from themselves: for that which we shall say and propose unto you, is out of an intendment to invite you to a mutual and free conference, that you with confidence may come to us, and we with confidence may speak with you; so that we may come to a conclusion of those things, which we both unanimously desire. We have resolved of nothing, designed or determined nothing, but desire to take you with us, praying help from you as you have done from us.—My lords have thought of some Propositions, which they have ordered to be read here, and then left with you in writing, that if it seem good to you, we may uniformly concur for the substance; and if you differ, that you would be pleased to put out, add, alter, or diminish, as you shall think fit, that so we may come the better to the end that we do both so desirously embrace.

Then the five PROPOSITIONS following were read by the Clerk of the Upper House.

1. "That his majesty would be pleased graciously to declare, That the good old law called Magna Charta, and the six statutes conceived to be declarations and explanations of that law, do still stand in force to all intents and purposes.

2. "That his majesty would be pleased graciously to declare, That according to Magna Charta, and the statutes afore-named, as also according to the most ancient customs and laws of this land, every free subject of this realm hath a fundamental Propriety in his Goods, and a fundamental Liberty of his Person.

3. "That his majesty would be graciously pleased to declare, That it is his royal pleasure to ratify and confirm unto all and every his loyal and faithful subjects, all their ancient, several, just Liberties, Privileges, and Rights, in as ample and beneficial manner, to all intents and purposes, as their ancestors did enjoy the same, under the government of the best of his most noble progenitors.

4. "That his majesty would be pleased graciously to declare, for the good content of his loyal subjects, and for the securing them from future fear, That in all cases within the cognizance of the common law concerning the Liberties of the Subject, his majesty would proceed according to the common-law of this land, and according to the laws established in the kingdom, and in no other manner or wise.

5. "As touching his majesty's royal Prerogative, intrinsicall to his sovereignty, and intrusted him withall from God, 'ad communiem totius populi salutem, et non ad destructionem,' his majesty would resolve not to use or divert the same, to the prejudice of any of his loyal people, in the propriety of their goods, or liberty of their persons; and in case, for the security of his majesty's royal person, the common safety of his people, or the peaceable government of this kingdom, his majesty shall find just cause for reason of state to imprison or restrain any man's person, his majesty would graciously declare, That within a convenient time he shall, and will express the cause of the commitment or restraint, either general or special; and upon a cause so expressed will leave him immediately to be tried according to the common justice of the kingdom."

After the reading of the Propositions, the Archbishop said:

This is but a model to be added unto, altered, or diminished, as in your reasons and wisdoms ye shall think fit, after ye have communicated the same to the rest of the members of the house.

To this Speech, Sir DUDLEY DIGGS, it being at a Free Conference in behalf of the Commons, made this Reply;

My lords; it hath pleased Almighty God many ways to bless the knights, citizens and burgesses, now assembled in parliament, with great comfort, and strong hopes, that this will prove as happy a parliament as ever was in England. And in their consultations for the service of his majesty, and the safety of this kingdom, our special comfort and strong hopes have risen from the continued good respect, which your lordships so nobly have been pleased to shew unto them; particularly at this present, in your so honourable profession to agree with them in general, in desiring to maintain and support the fundamental laws and liberties of England.

The commons have commanded me in like sort, to assure your lordships they have been, are, and will be, as ready to propugn the just Prerogative of his majesty, of which in all their Arguments, Searches of Records, and Resolutions, they have been most careful, according to that which formerly was, and now again is, protested by them.

Another noble argument of your honourable disposition towards them is expressed in this, That you are pleased to expect no present answer from them, who are (as your lordships in your great wisdoms, they doubt not, have considered) a great body, that must advise upon all new Propositions, and resolve upon them before they can give answer, according to the ancient order of their house. But it is manifest in general, God be thanked for it, there is a great concurrence of affection to the same end in both houses, and such good harmony, that I entreat your lordships leave to borrow a comparison from nature, or natural philosophy: As two lutes well strung and tuned brought together, if one be played on, little straws and sticks will stir upon the other, though it lie still; so though we have no power to reply, yet these things said and propounded cannot but work in our hearts, and we will faithfully report these passages to our house, from whence in due time (we hope) your lordships shall receive a contentful answer.

Mr. SELDEN'S Speech, about the five Propositions sent from the Lords to the House of Commons, April 26, 1628.

Our debate is now, how we like of the Propositions. Ours were resolutions of law, and no man can make question of them. And as we are constant, so I hope they of other places that have weighed them, are of the same mind with us. But now their lordships laying them by, propound what they would have to be law. As they may speak to what comes from us, so may we to what comes from them, and they did invite us thereto. I think there is not one of the five fit to be desired and asked. The first three are not fit, for there is no use of them in these great questions. The fourth we have already, and the fifth is not fit to be had at all. The first is, to declare that Magna Charta and the six statutes, conceived to be declarations and explanations of that law, do still stand in force to all intents and purposes. Consider what it is we ask: Who doubts whether they stand in force or no? Indeed some have published that Magna Charta is but a charter and no law. But it is an act of parliament; and let men speak what they will, that was the fashion of statutes till printing came in. The statutes were sent down in the king's name to be proclaimed, and he prefixed his name, and this was till about Hen. 6. Also the body of Magna Charta is, that it is consented to by all the earls, &c. and for the assent there was a fifteenth granted, and clearly that cannot be without an act of parliament: and so constant it is, that all else in it is to this day put in execution. In former parliaments, by thirty at least, it was confirmed, but it was not of necessity, and yet they are surer than this declaration you will now add. For the second, that his majesty will declare that every subject hath a Propriety in his goods, and liberty of his person; they that drew this might mean somewhat more than I understand: I know not what we gain. Who doubts of our propriety! I never heard it denied, but in the pulpit, which is of no weight. For the third, that his majesty will confirm all just liberties; none can tell what this will produce. It is not fit we trouble his majesty with it. The fourth is not fit to be asked; That in all cases within the cognizance of the Common Law concerning the Liberties of his subjects, his majesty would proceed according to the Common Law. I conceive his majesty never proceeded but according to law. It may be there were commitments, yet the courts of justice were open for the parties to seek justice. And if any thing be done against the law, there, it is the fault of them that sit there. So we shall take it. But yet his majesty hath done nothing against the law. For the fifth, it is not fit to be had, and therefore not fit to be asked. If we ask it parliamentarily, we shall have a law to that sense, and so we shall destroy our fundamental liberties, which we have already resolved. Now a 'convenient time' must be set down. In former times there was no need of such innovations; for such law of state, in a 'convenient time' every man was to be delivered by law. If they were so wise then to hold it needless, why is it now necessary? And for 'convenient time'; what is convenient time? Who shall judge of it but the Judges? And so they now shall have the power of the lords, and of the council. Also now we desire in some cases the prerogative, &c. I would fain see if any person may not be committed at pleasure by this clause, and no man is exempted. At this little gap every man's liberty may in time go out.

The Commons were not satisfied with these Propositions, which were conceived to choak the Petition of Right, then under consideration, but demurred upon them.

Monday, 28 April. The LORD KEEPER spake to both Houses of Parliament by the King's Command, who was then present.

My Lords, and ye the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the House of Commons, ye cannot but remember the great and important affairs, concerning the safety both of State and Religion, declared first from his majesty's own mouth, to be the causes of the assembling of this parliament; the sense whereof, as it doth daily increase with his majesty, so it ought to do, and his majesty doubts not but it doth so with you, since the danger increaseth every day, both by effluxion of time, and preparations of the enemy.

Yet his majesty doth well weigh, that this expence of time hath been occasioned by the Debate which hath arisen in both houses touching the Liberty of the Subject; in which, as his majesty takes in good part the purpose and intent of the houses, so clearly and frequently professed; that they would not diminish or blemish his royal and just prerogative, so he presumes, that ye will all confess it a point of extraordinary grace and justice in him, to suffer it to rest so long in dispute without interruption. But now his majesty considering the length of time which it hath already taken, and fearing nothing so much as any future loss of that, whereof every hour and minute is so precious: and foreseeing that the ordinary way of debate, though never so carefully husbanded, must, in regard of the form of both houses, necessarily take more time than the affairs of Christendom can permit; his majesty, out of his great princely care, hath thought of this expedient to shorten the business, by declaring the clearness of his own heart and intention: and therefore hath commanded me to let your know, 'That he holdeth the Statute of Magna Charta, and the other six Statutes insisted upon for the Subject's Liberty, to be all in force, and assures you, that he will maintain all his Subjects in the just Freedom of their Persons, and Safety of their Estates: and that he will govern according to the laws and statutes of this realm; and that ye shall find as much Security in his majesty's royal word and promise, as in the strength of any law ye can make; so that hereafter ye shall never have cause to complain.' The conclusion is, That his majesty prayeth God, who hath hitherto blessed this kingdom, and put into his heart to come to you this day, to make the success thereof happy, both to king and people: and therefore he desires, that no doubt or distrust may possess any man, but that ye will all proceed speedily and unanimously to the business.

The Commons being returned from the lords house, Mr. Secretary Cook persuaded them to comply with the king.

His majesty, said he, puts us in mind of the great important affairs of the state, and of his sense thereof, that by effluxion of time increaseth in him, and he doubts not but that it doth increase in us. Ye see his majesty's moderation in the interpretation of all our actions; he saith, that he hopes we have the same sense he hath, he is pleased to consider of the occasion of expence of time that grew from the Debates in both houses. We see how indulgent he is, that however the affairs of Christendom are great, yet he omits not this, nay, he takes in good part our Proceedings and our Declarations, that we will not impeach the Prerogative: also his majesty presumes, that we will confess, that he hath used extraordinary grace, in that he hath endured dispute so long, he acknowledgeth it justice to stand as we have done.

Further out of a princely care of the public, he is careful no more time be lost; and because he sees some extraordinary course to be taken to satisfy us, he observes, that in the form of the debate, such length is required as the nature of the business will not endure. It is to be presumed, that his government will be according to the law: we cannot but remember what his father said, 'He is no king, but a tyrant, that governs not by law:' but this kingdom is to be governed by the Common Law, and his majesty assures us so much; the interpretation is left to the Judges, and to his great Council, and all is to be regulated by the common law. I mean not Magna Charta only, for that Magna Charta was part of the common law, and the ancient law of this kingdom; all our difference is in the application of this law, and how this law, with difference, is derived into every court. I conceive there are two rules, the one of brass, that is rigid, and will not bend, and that is the law of the King's-Bench, this law will not bend; and when it lights on subjects sitting, if it do not bend, it is unjust; and there comes in the Law of Chancery and equity: this is application of law in private men's causes, when it comes to memorandum et litem. And thus the general government of cases, with relation to the common state of the kingdom, is from the Council-board, and there they are to vary from the law of the kingdom; suppose it be in time of dearth, propriety of goods may in that time be forced, and be brought to the market: we saw the experience of it in coals in London, and the Council-Board caused them to be brought forth and sold. In a time of Pestilence men may be restrained: if a schism be like to grow in a Church, the State will enquire after the favourers of it: if there be fear of an Invasion, and it be encouraged by hope of a party among us, it is in the power of the government to restrain men to their houses.

In the composure of these things, there is great difference: what differences have been between the courts of Chancery and King's-Bench? It is hard to put true difference between the king's Prerogative and our Liberties. His majesty saw expence of time would be prejudicial; it pleased God to move his majesty by a divine hand to shew us a way to clear all our difficulties, let us attend to all the parts of it; there be five degrees, and there is more assurance than we could have by any law whatsoever. His majesty declares, that Magna Charta and the other Statutes are in force: this is not the first time that the Liberty of the Subject was infringed, or was in debate and confirmed; all times thought it safe, that when they came to a negative of power, it was hard to keep government and liberty together: but his majesty stopped not there; but according to the sense of these laws, that he will govern his subjects in their just Liberties, he assures us our liberties are just, they are not of grace, but of right; nay, he assures us, he will govern us according to the laws of the realm, and that we shall find as much security in his majesty's promise, as in any law we can make, and whatsoever law we shall make, it must come to his majesty's allowance; and if his majesty find cause in his government, he may not put life to it: we daily see all laws are broken, and all laws will be broke for the public good, and the king may pardon all offenders; his majesty did see, that the best way to settle all at unity, is to express his own heart: the king's heart is the best guider of his own promise, his promise is bound with his own heart. What prince can express more care and wisdom?

Lastly, he saith, That hereafter ye shall never have the like cause to complain: may we not think the Breach is made up? Is not his majesty engaged in his royal word? The conclusion is full of weight: and he prays God, that as God hath blessed this kingdom, and put it into his heart to come amongst us, so to make this day successful. 'The wrath of a king is like the roaring of a lion,' and all laws with his wrath are to no effect; but 'the king's favour is like the dew upon the grass,' there all will prosper; and God made the instruments to unite all hearts. His majesty having thus discharged himself, he prays us to proceed to the business that so much concerns him. As his majesty hath now shewed himself the best of kings, let us acknowledge his majesty's goodness, and return to that Union which we all desire.

But this motion was not received with general acceptance; and

Sir Benjamin Rudyard replied to it:

We are now upon a great Business, and the manner of handling it may be as great as the business itself. I need not tell you, that Liberty is a precious thing, for every man may set his own price upon it, and he that doth not value it deserves to be valued accordingly. For my own part, I am clear without scruple, that what we have resolved, is according to the law; and if any judge in England were of a contrary opinion, I am sure we should have heard of him ere now. Without all question, the very point, scope, and drift of Magna Charta was, to reduce the regal to a legal power, in matter of Imprisonment, or else it had not been worthy so much contending for.

But there have been Precedents brought to prove the practice and interpretation of the law. I confess I have heard many Precedents of utility and respect, but none at all of truth, or of law: certainly there is no court of justice in England, that will discharge a prisoner committed by the king, rege inconsulto, without acquainting the king; yet this good manners was never made, or mentioned as a legal part of the delivery.

It is objected, That the king ought to have a trust left and deposited in him: God forbid but he should: and I say, that it is impossible to take it from him, for it lies not in the wit of man to devise such a law as should be able to comprehend all particulars, all accidents, but that extraordinary cases must happen, which, when they come, if they be disposed of for the common good, there will be no law against them, yet must the law be general, for otherwise admissions and exceptions will fret, and eat out the law to nothing. God himself has constituted a general law of nature, to govern the ordinary course of things, he hath made no law for miracles; yet there is this observation of them, that they are rather 'præter naturam,' than 'contra naturam,' and always 'propter bonos fines:' for king's Prerogatives, are rather besides the law, than against it; and when they are directed to right ends for the public good, they are not only concurring laws, but even laws in singularity and excellency.

But to come nearer, Mr. Speaker, let us consider where we are now, what steps we have done and gained; the king's learned Counsel have acknowledged all the laws to be still in force: the Judges have not allowed any judgment against these laws: the Lords also have confessed, that the laws are in full strength; they have further retained our Resolutions entire, and without prejudice.

All this hitherto is for our advantage; but above all, his majesty has this day, himself being publicly present, declared by the mouth of the Lord-Keeper, before both the houses, That Magna Charta, and the other six Statutes, are still in force; that he will maintain his subjects in the Liberties of their Persons, and Properties of their Goods: that he will govern them according to the Laws of the kingdom: this is a solemn and binding satisfaction, expressing his gracious readiness to comply with his people in all their reasonable and just desires. The king is a good man, and it is no diminution to a king to be called so; for whosoever is a good man, shall be greater than a king that is not so. The king certainly is very tender of his present honour, and of his fame hereafter: he will think it hard to have a worse mark set upon his government than upon any of his ancestors, by extraordinary restraints: his majesty hath already intimated unto us by a message, That he doth willingly give way to have the abuse of power reformed. By which I do verily believe, that he doth very well understand what a miserable power it is, which hath produced so much weakness to himself, and to the kingdom; and it is our happiness, that he is so ready to redress it.

For my own part, I shall be very glad to see that good old decrepid law of Magna Charta, which hath been kept so long, and lain bed-ridden as it were; I shall be glad to see it walk abroad again with new vigour and lustre, attended and followed with the other six Statutes: questionless it will be a great heartening to all the people. I doubt not, but upon a debating Conference with the Lords, we shall happily fall upon a fair and fit accommodation, concerning the Liberty of our Persons and Propriety of our Goods. I hope we may have a Bill, to agree in the point, against imprisonment for Loans or Privy-Seals. As for intrinsical power and reason of state, they are matters in the clouds, where I desire we may leave them, and not meddle with them at all: lest by the way of admittance, we may lose somewhat of that which is our own already. Yet this by the way I will say of Reason of State, That, in the latitude by which it is used, it hath eaten out almost, not only the laws, but all the religion of Christendom.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will only remember you of one precept, and that of the wisest man; 'Be not over wise, be not over just:' and he gives this reason, 'for why wilt thou be desolate?'—Sir, if justice and wisdom may be stretched to desolation, let us thereby learn, that moderation is the virtue of virtues, and the wisdom of wisdoms. Let it be our master-piece so to carry our business, that we may keep parliaments on foot: for as long as they are frequent, there will be no irregular power; which though it cannot be broken at once, yet in short time it will fade and moulder away: there can be no total or final loss of Liberties, but by loss of Parliaments. As long as they last, what we cannot get at one time, we may have at another.—Let no man think, that what I have said is the language of a private end, my aim is upon the good success of the whole; for, I thank God, my mind stands above any fortune that is to be got by base and unworthy means: no man is bound to be rich or great, no, nor to be wise; but every man is bound to be honest, out of which heart I have spoken.

The Bishop of Exeter's (Dr. Joseph Hall) Letter sent to the House of Commons, 28 April, 1628.

Gentlemen; For God's sake be wise in your well-meant zeal: why do you argue away precious time that can never be revoked, or repaired? Woe is me! while we dispute, our friends perish, and we must follow them. Where are we, if we break; and (I tremble to think) we cannot but break, if we hold so stiff. Our Liberties and Properties are sufficiently declared to be sure and legal, our Remedies are clear and irrefragable; what do we fear, every subject sees the way now chalked out for future justice, and who dares henceforth tread besides it? Certainly whilst Parliaments live, we need not mis-doubt the violations of our Freedoms and Rights; may we be but where the law found us, we shall sufficiently enjoy ourselves and ours; it is no season to search for more! O let us not, whilst we over-rigidly plead for an higher strain of safety, put ourselves into a necessity of ruin and utter despair of redress: let us not, in the suspicion of evils that may be, cast ourselves into a present confusion. If you love yourselves and your country, remit something of your own terms; and since the substance is yielded by your noble patriots, stand not too rigorously upon points of circumstance: fear not to trust a good king, who, after the strict laws made, must be trusted with the execution. Think that your country, nay Christendom, lies on the mercy of your present resolutions. Rent, or farewell welfare. From him whose faithful heart bleeds in a vowed sacrifice for his king and country,

EXETER.

Upon this Debate, it was ordered, That a Committee of Lawyers do draw a Bill, containing the substance of Magna Charta, and the other Statutes, that do concern the Liberty of the Subject; which business took up two whole days.

MR. SELDEN'S SPEECH at the Committee about the Bill for Magna Charta, and the Liberties of the Subject. April 28, 1628.

I would have the violation tenderly mentioned. Let us set down the Statute of Magna Charta. 13 Hen. 4; it is adjudged in the Parliament Roll, that the Statute of Tallage is an Act of Parliament. It is not entered in the Statute Roll, and it was 34 Ed. 1. 19 Ed. 2, rot. claus. mem. 15: 'Les comens priont lon divers fuer' prise et imprisonment per accusation de persons malevolent lon ne fuer' indict acc' al ley del terre, ils priont que ils que sont prise sans iudicement veignent en Chancery, et que droit serra fait. Et roy vault que nul serra prise.' But this is not in the Parliament Rolls Ed. 3, c. 9. 14 Ed. 3, c. 1, that there shall be no aid nor charge but by Parliament. 25 Ed. 3, c. 4. 'None shall be attached by petition without presentment, or an original writ.' 25 Ed. 3, no. 16. 'Item, priont les comens que les loans soient release, et null serra compell de faire arreter encontre les franchises del terre. Le roy le ple st.' 28 Ed. 3, c. 3. 'Nul serra ouste de terre ou tenemens sans due proces del ley.' 36 E. 3, no. 9. 'Que le grand Charter serra duly observe, et null serra imprisonment sur special command.' 36 Ed. 3, no. 20. 'Que nul serra imprisonment per special command.' 36 E. 3, no. 24. 'Si ascun homme soit grieve contre les articles, avant dit veigne en Chancery et droit serra fait.' 37 Ed. 3, no. 10. 'Ils la desire que le grand Charter et especialment les articles darrein stat. soient execute.' 37 Ed. 3, c. 18. 'Il est conteneu en le grand Charter que nul serra imprisonment, &c. ils que font tiel, &c.' 38 Ed. 3, no. 10. 'Les comens priont que le grand Charter et les autres statuts soient execute et que breves serront grauntez al cestuy que sue pur ceo, et si ascun judgment soit fait, il serra void.'

Thursday the 1st of May, Mr. Secretary Cook delivered a Message from his majesty, viz. to know whether the house will rest on his Royal Word, or no, declared to them by the Lord Keeper; which if they do, he assures them it shall be royally performed.

Upon this there was a silence for a good space: then Mr. Secretary Cook proceeded: This silence invites me to a further speech, and further to address myself; now we see we must grow towards an issue. For my part, how confident I have been of the good issue of this parliament, I have certified in this place, and elsewhere, and I am still confident therein; I know his majesty is resolved to do as much as ever king did for his subjects: all this debate hath grown out of a sense of our sufferings, and a desire to make up again those breaches that have been made.

Since this parliament begun, hath there been any dispense made of that which hath formerly been done? When means were denied his majesty, being a young king, and newly come to his crown, which he found engaged in a war, what could we expect in such necessities? His majesty called this parliament to make up the breach: his majesty assures us we shall not have the like cause to complain; he assures, the laws shall be established, what can we desire more; all is, that we provide for posterity, and that we do prevent the like suffering for the future. Were not the same means provided by them before us? Can we do more? We are come to the Liberty of the Subjects, and the Prerogative of the King; I hope we shall not add any thing to ourselves, to depress him. I will not divine, I think we shall find difficulty with the king or with the lords; I shall not deliver my opinion as a counsellor to his majesty, which I will not justify and say here, or at the Council-board. Will we in this necessity strive to bring ourselves into a better condition and greater liberty than our fathers had, and the crown into a worse than ever? I dare not advise his majesty to admit of that: If this that we now desire be no innovation, it is all contained in those acts and statutes; and whatsoever else we would add more, is a diminution to the king's power, and an addition to our own. We deal with a wise and prudent prince, that hath a sword in his hand for our good, and this good is supported by power. Do not think, that by cases of law and debate we can make that not to be law, which in experience we every day find necessary.—Give me leave freely to tell you, that I know by experience, that by the place I hold under his majesty, if I will discharge the duty of my place and the oath I have taken to his majesty, I must commit, and neither express the cause to the gaoler, nor to the judges, nor to any counsellor in England, but to the king himself; yet do not think I go without ground of reason, or take this power committed to me to be unlimited; yea, rather it is to me a charge, burthen, and danger: for if I by this power shall commit the poorest porter, if I do it not upon a just cause, if it may appear, the burthen will fall upon me heavier than the law can inflict, for I shall lose my credit with his majesty, and my place. And I beseech you consider whether those that have been in the same place have not committed freely, and not any doubt made of it, nor any complaint made by the subject.

Sir Robert Phillips hereupon spake thus: That if the words of kings strike impressions in the hearts of subjects, then do these words upon this occasion strike an impression in the hearts of us all: to speak in a plain language, we are now come to the end of our journey, and the well disposing of an Answer to this Message, will give happiness or misery to this kingdom. Let us set the commonwealth of England before the eyes of his majesty, that we may justify ourselves, that we have demeaned ourselves dutifully to his majesty.

Mr. Hackwell of Lincoln's-Inn, 1 May, 1628, spake thus:

Sir; I chose rather to discover my weakness by speaking, than to betray my conscience by silence: my opinion is, that we shall do well totally to omit our Resolution out of this Bill, and rely only upon a confirmation of the laws.

The Objections made against this opinion are two. The first is, that we shall thereby recede from our own Resolution.

The second, that by a bare confirmation of the old laws, without inserting of our Resolution, by way of explanation, we shall be but in the same case as before.

For the first, that though we desire only a confirmation without adding of our Resolution, we do not thereby recede from our Resolution, I reason thus: Our Resolution was drawn out of the sense of those laws, which are now desired to be confirmed, so that no question can be made by any of us that have thus declared ourselves, but that our Resolution is virtually contained in these laws. If that be so, how can our acceptance of a confirmation of these laws be a departure from our Resolution?—Nay, rather we think the contrary is true; he that doubts, that by confirmation of these laws our Resolution is not hereby confirmed, doubts whether we have justly deduced our Resolutions out of those laws, and so calls our Resolutions into question.—This argument alone is, in my opinion, a full answer to that first Objection, that in desiring a bare confirmation of those laws, we depart from our Resolutions.

The second Objection is, that if we have nothing but a confirmation we are in no better case than we were before those late violations of the law. This I deny, and do confidently affirm, that although we have no more than a confirmation of those laws which are recited in the bill that is now before us, we shall depart hence in far better case than we came, and that in divers respects.

1. Some of the laws recited in this Bill, and desired to be confirmed, are not printed laws, and are known to few professors of the law, and much less to others, and, yet they are laws of as great consequence for the Liberty of the Subject, if not of greater, than any that are printed: as namely 25 Edw. 3, no. 1. 'That Loans against the will of the lender are against reason and the freedom of the realm.' 36 Ed. 3, no. 9, by which Imprisonments by special commandment without due process are forbidden. These two are not printed.—That excellent law De Tullagio non concedendo in print, hath in a public court been by a great counsellor said to be but a Charter, and no law.—The statute 1 Rich. 3, against Benevolences, is by some opinions in print an absolute law. If we can get all these good laws, besides those six other, which are expositions of Magna Charta, in the point of the freedom of our persons, to be confirmed and put in one law, to the easy view of all men, is not our case far better than when we came hither?

2. Will not the occasion of the making of this law of confirmation, so notoriously known, be transmitted to all posterity? Certainly it will never be forgotten, that the occasion thereof was the imprisonment of those worthy Gentlemen for not lending, and the Resolution in the King's-Bench in denying to bail them; and is not the occasion of the making of a law a good rule to expound it? If so, then by giving a confirmation upon this occasion, we have bettered our case very much.

3. Have not the Judges in the King's-Bench, in open parliament, upon our complaint, disclaimed to have given any Judgment in the point? Which generally before by the parties ment was otherwise conceived; for now they say, it was but an Award and no Judgment, will such a notorious act upon so important an occasion in so public a place be quickly forgotten? Nay, will not the memory of it for ever remain upon record? Is not our case then much better than when we came hither?

4. Will not the Resolution of this house, and all our arguments and reasons against imprisonment without a cause expressed (which no doubt by the course we have taken will be transferred to posterity) be a great means to stay any judge hereafter from declaring any judgment to the contrary, especially if there be likelihood of a parliament? Is not our case in this very much amended?

Lastly, Have we not received Propositions from the lords, wherein, amongst other things, they declared, that they are not out of love with our proceedings? Is not this a great strengthening to it? But after so long debate amongst them about it, they cannot take any just exception to it; and doth not this also much amend our case?

From all these reasons, I conclude that the second Objection, that by a confirmation we are in no better case than when we came together, is also a weak objection.

Now for Reasons to move us to proceed in this course of accepting a confirmation: 1. We have his majesty's gracious promise to yield to a confirmation of the old laws, from which we may rest most assured he will not depart; if we tender him, withal, our Proposition to be enacted, we have cause to doubt that we shall lose both the one and the other. 2. We are no less assured of the lords joining with us, for in their propositions sent to us they have delivered themselves to that purpose: this is then a secure way of getting somewhat of great advantage to us; as we have great hopes, and in a manner assurance on this side; so on the other side we have great doubts and fears, that by offering our Resolution to be enacted, we shall lose all.—For first we have had already experience of the lords, that they are not very forward to join with us in a declaration of our Proposition to be law; if they stumble at a declaration, much more will they, in yielding to make a law in the same point. And have we not much more cause to doubt that his majesty will not yield unto it, seeing it toucheth him so near? Is it not the notice of his pleasure that hath wrought thus with the lords?

If we should clog our Bill with our Proposition, and it should be rejected by the lords, or by the king, is not our Resolution much weakened by it; and are we not then in far worse case than before we made it? Our Resolution for the rejecting of our Proposition, will tend to a justification of all that hath been done against us in this great point of our liberty.—Let us then, like wise men, conform our desire to our hopes, and guide our hopes by probabilities; other desires and other hopes are but vain. This is my poor opinion in this weighty business.

And so the day following they had further debate upon that matter, the house being turned into a Grand Committee, and Mr. Herbert in the chair. Some said that the Subject has suffered more in the violation of ancient Liberties within these few years, than in 300 years before, and therefore care ought to be taken for the time to come.

Sir Edward Coke said, That that 'Royal Word,' had reference to some Message formerly sent; his majesty's word was, that they may secure themselves any way, by bill or otherwise, he promised to give way to it. And to the end that this might not touch his majesty's honour, it was proposed, that the Bill come not from the house, but from the king: We will and grant for us and our successors, and that we and our successors will do thus and thus; and it is the king's honour, he cannot speak but by record.

Others desired the house to consider, when and where the late promise was made; was it not in the face of both houses? Cruel kings have been careful to perform their promises, yea, though they have been unlawful, as Herod. Therefore if we rest upon his majesty's promise, we may assure ourselves of the performance of it; besides, we bind his majesty, by relying on his word: we have laws enough, it is the execution of them that is our life, and it is the king that gives life and execution.

Sir Thomas Wentworth concluded the debate, saying, That never house of parliament trusted more in the goodness of their king, for their own private account, than the present; but we are ambitious that his majesty's goodness may remain to posterity, and we are accountable to a public trust: and therefore seeing there hath been a public violation of the laws by his ministers, nothing will satisfy him but a public amends; and our desires to vindicate the Subjects Right by Bill, are no more than are laid down in former laws, with some modest provision for instruction, performance and execution.

Which so well agreed with the sense of the house, that they made it the subject of a Message to be delivered by the Speaker to his majesty.

Amidst those deliberations, another Message was delivered May 2, from his majesty, by Mr. Secretary Cook; "That howsoever we proceed in this business we have in hand, which his majesty will not doubt, but to be according to our constant profession, and so as he may have cause to give us thanks; yet his resolution is, that both his royal care, and hearty and tender affection towards all his loving subjects, shall appear to the whole kingdom, and all the world, that he will govern us according to the laws and customs of this realm; that he will maintain us in the Liberties of our Persons, and Proprieties of our Goods, so as we may enjoy as much happiness as our fore-fathers in their best times; and that he will rectify what hath been, or may be found amiss amongst us, so that hereafter there may be no just cause to complain. Wherein as his majesty will rank himself amongst the best of our kings, and shew he hath no intention to invade or impeach our lawful liberties, or right; so he will have us match ourselves with the best subjects, not by encroaching upon that sovereignty and prerogative, which God hath put into his hands for our good, but by containing ourselves within the bounds and laws of our fore-fathers, without restraining them, or enlarging them by new explanations, interpretations, expositions, or additions in any sort; which, he telleth us, he will not give way unto.—That the weight of the affairs of the kingdom, and Christendom, do press him more and more, and that the time is now grown to that point of maturity, that it cannot endure long debate or delay; so as this session of parliament must continue no longer than Tuesday come seven-night at furthest: in which time his majesty, for his part, will be ready to perform what he promised; and if the house be not ready to do that is fit for themselves, it shall be their own faults.—And upon assurance of our good dispatch and correspondence, his majesty declareth, that his royal intention is to have another session of parliament at Michaelmas next, for the perfecting of such things as cannot now be done."

This Message was debated the next day, being Saturday, May 3, whereupon

Sir John Elliot spake to this effect: The king, saith he, will rank himself with the best of kings, and therefore he would have us rank ourselves with the best subjects; we will not incroach upon that sovereignty that God hath put into his hands; this makes me fear his majesty is mis-informed in what we go about; let us make some enlargement, and put it before him, that we will not make any thing new. As for the time of this session, it is but short; and look how many messages we have, so many interruptions, and mis-reports, and mis-representations to his majesty produce those messages.

Sir Miles Fleetwood continued the debate, and said, That this business is of great importance, we are to accommodate this: the breach of this parliament will be the greatest misery that ever befell us: the eyes of Christendom are upon this parliament, the state of all our Protestant friends are ready to be swallowed up by the emperor's forces, and our own kingdom is in a miserable strait, for the defence of our religion that is invaded by the Roman Catholics, by the colour of a commission, which is intolerable; the defence of our realm by shippings is decayed, the king's revenue is sold and gone; where shall the relief be obtained but in parliament? Now we are in the way, let us proceed by way of bill, in pursuance of the king's message, to establish the fundamental laws in propriety of our goods, and liberty of our persons: It was declared to us, 'that courses by Loan and Imprisonment were not 'lawful; let us touch them in our Bill, and that all precedents and judgments seeming to the contrary, be void; and that all commitments against the law be remedied, and that we be protected against the fear of commitments.

Mr. Mason's Speech.

I am of opinion with the gentleman that spake first, that, in our proceedings in the matter now in debate, we should have use of the title of the statute, called circumspecte agatis; for it concerns the Liberty of our persons, without which we do not enjoy our lives.

The Question is: Whether in this Bill for the explanation of Magna Charta, and the rest of the statutes, we shall provide that the cause of the commitment must be expressed upon the commitment, or upon return of the Habeas Corpus?

Before I speak to the question itself, I shall propose some observations, in my conceit, necessarily conducing to the debate of the matter.

1. That we ought to take care, and to provide for posterity, as our predecessors have done for us, and that this provident care cannot be expounded to be any distrust of the performance of his majesty's gracious declaration, this act providing for perpetuity, to which his highness's promise, unless it were by act of parliament, cannot extend.

2. That we having long debated and solemnly resolved our rights and privileges by virtue of these statutes, and if now we shall reduce those declarations and those resolutions into an act, we must ever hereafter expect to be confined within the bounds of that act, being made at our suit, and to be the limits of the prerogative in that respect, and it being an act of explanation, which shall receive no further explanation than itself contains.

3. That by this act we must provide a remedy against the persons which detain us in prison, for as to the commander, there can be no certainty.

Concerning the Question itself:

It hath been solemnly and clearly resolved by the house, that the commitment of a Freeman, without expressing the cause at the time of the commitment, is against the law: If by this act of explanation we shall provide only that the cause ought to be expressed upon the return of the H. Corpus, then out of the words of the statute, it will necessarily be inferred, that before the return of the H. Corpus the cause need not to be expressed, because the statute hath appointed the time of the expression of the cause; and it will be construed, that if the makers of the statutes had intended that the cause should have been sooner shewn, they would have provided for it by the act, and then the act, which we term an act of explanation, will be an act of the abridging of Magna Charta, and the rest of the statutes: or if this act do not make the commitment without expressing the cause to be lawful, yet it will clearly amount to a toleration of the commitment, without expressing the cause, until the

H. Corpus, or to a general or perpetual dispensation, beginning with and continuing as long as the law itself. And in my understanding the words in this intended law, that no freeman can be committed without cause, can no ways advantage us, or satisfy this objection; for till the return of the H. Corpus, he that commits is Judge of the cause, or at least hath a licence by this law till that time to conceal the cause, and the gaoler is not subject to any action for the detaining of the prisoner upon such command. For if the prisoner demanded the cause of his imprisonment of the gaoler, it will be a safe answer for him to say that he detains a prisoner by warrant, and that it belongs not unto him to desire those which commit the prisoner to shew the cause until he returns the H. Corpus. And if the prisoner be a suitor to know the cause from those that committed him, it will be a sufficient answer for them to say, they will express the cause at the return of the H. Corpus. In this case there will be a wrong, because the commitment is without cause expressed, and one that suffers that wrong, viz. the party imprisoned; and yet no such wrong-doer but may excuse, if not justify himself by this law.

In making of laws, we must consider the inconveniences which may ensue, and provide for the prevention of them, 'lex caveat de futuris.' I have taken into my thoughts some inconveniences which I shall expose to your considerations, not imagining that they can happen in the time of our gracious sovereign; but in an act of parliament, we must provide for the prevention of all inconveniences in future times.

1. If a man be in danger to be imprisoned in the beginning of a long vacation for refusing to pay some small sum of money, and knows that by this act he can have no enlargement till the return of the H. Corpus in the term, and that the charge of his being in prison, and of his enlargement by H. Corpus, will amount to more than the sum, he will part with money to prevent his imprisonment, or to redeem himself thence, because he cannot say any man doth him wrong, until the return of the H. Corpus, and the law resolves. A man will pay a fine rather than be imprisoned, for the judgment which is given when one is fined, is ideo capiatur, and the execution for debt is a capias ad satisfaciendum; the law presuming any man will part with his money to gain his liberty. And if the prisoner procure an H. Corpus, and be brought into the King's-bench by virtue of it, yet the cause need not to be then expressed; the provision of this law being, that if no cause be then expressed, he shall be bailed, and no cause being shewn upon the return of the H. Corpus, yet it may be pretended, that at the time of his commitment there were strong presumptions of some great offence, but upon examination they are cleared: or it may be said, that the offence was of that nature, that the time of his imprisonment before the return was a sufficient punishment. And we may be frequently imprisoned in this manner, and never understand the cause, and have often such punishment, and have no means to justify ourselves; and for all these proceedings this law will be the justification, or colour.

2. If by this act there be a toleration of imprisonment without shewing cause, until the return of the H. Corpus; yet it is possible to accompany that imprisonment with such circumstances of close restraint, and other hardships, which I forbear to express, as may make an imprisonment for that short time, as great a punishment, as a perpetual imprisonment in an ordinary manner.

3. The party may be imprisoned a long time before he shall come to be delivered by this law; the place of his imprisonment may be in the furthest part of this kingdom; the judges always make the return of the H. Corpus answerable to the distance of the prison from Westminster; the gaoler may neglect the return of the first process, and then the party must procure an Alias, and the gaoler may be then in some other employment for the king, and excuse the not returning the body upon that process; and this may make the imprisonment for a year. And in the end no cause being returned, the party may be discharged; but in the mean time he shall have imprisonment, he shall never know the cause, he shall have no remedy for it, nor be able to question any for injustice, which have not a justification, or excuse by this law.

4. The party may be imprisoned during his life, and yet there shall be no cause ever shewn. I will instance in this manner: a man may be committed to the furthest part of the kingdom Westward; he obtains an H. Corpus; before the gaoler receives the H. Corpus, or before he returns it, the prisoner by warrant is removed from that prison to another, it may be the furthest Northern part of the realm. The first gaoler returns the special matter, which will be sufficient to free himself, and in like manner the prisoner may be translated from one prison to another, and his whole life shall be a peregrination, or wayfaring from one gaol to another, and he shall never know the cause, nor be able to complain of any, who cannot defend their actions by this bill.

5. If the prisoner be brought into the court by H. Corpus, and no cause expressed, and thereupon he be enlarged, he may be partly committed again, and then his enlargement shall only make way for his commitment: and this may continue during his life, and he shall never know the cause; and this not remedied, but rather permitted by this act.

And there are also some things remarkably considerable in this matter; the expence of the party in prison; his fees to the gaoler, his costs in obtaining and prosecuting an Habeas Corpus, and his charges in removing himself, attended with such as have the charge of his conduct: and that the prisoner must sustain all this without satisfaction, or knowing the cause.

The only reason given by those of the other opinion is, That it is requisite, the king and council should have power to command the detainer of a man in prison for some time, without expressing the cause; because it is supposed, that the manifestation of the cause at first may prevent the discovery of a treason. The reason is answered by the remedy proposed; by this act it being proposed, that it shall be provided by this bill, that upon our commitment, we may instantly have recourse to the Chancery for an H. Corpus, returnable in that court, which is always open; and that upon the receipt thereof, the writ must be returned, and the cause thereupon expressed. If then this remedy be really the cause of commitment, it must partly appear; which contradicts the former reason of state.

And in my own opinion, we ought not only to take care, that the subject should be delivered out of prison, but to prevent his imprisonment; the statute of Magna Charta, and the rest of the acts, providing that no man should be imprisoned, but by the law of the land. And although the king, or council, as it hath been objected, by force may commit us without cause, notwithstanding any laws we can make; yet I am sure without such an act of parliament, such commitment can have no legal colour, and I would be loth we should make a law to endanger ourselves. For which reasons I conceive, that there being so many ways to evade this act, we shall be in a worse case by it, than without it; as it provides no remedy to prevent our imprisonment without expressing the cause to be lawful, and administers excuses for continuing us in prison, as I have before declared. And thus for providing for one particular out of reason of state, which possibly may fall out in an age or two, we shall spring a leak, which may sink all our liberties, and open a gap, through which Magna Charta, and the rest of the Statutes, may issue out and vanish. I therefore conclude, that in my poor understanding (which I submit to better judgments), I had rather depend upon our former resolutions, and the king's gracious declarations, than to pass an act in such manner as hath been proposed.

In conclusion, the Commons agreed to an Answer to all the preceding Messages, and presented it to the king by the mouth of their Speaker.

The Speaker's (sir John Finch) SPEECH to the King, in answer to several Messages, in the Banqueting-House, May 5.

Most Gracious and Dread Sovereign; Your loyal and obedient subjects, the commons now assembled in parliament, by several Messages from your majesty, and especially by that your declaration delivered by the Lord-Keeper before both houses, have, to their exceeding great joy and comfort, received many ample expressions of your princely care and tender affections towards them, with a gracious promise and assurance, that your majesty will govern according to the laws of this realm, and so maintain all your subjects, in the just freedom of their persons, and safety of their estates, that all their rights and liberties may be by them enjoyed, with as much freedom and security in their time, as in any age heretofore by their ancestors, under the best of your progenitors: for this so great a favour, enlarged by a comfortable intimation of your majesty's confidence in the proceedings of this house, they do, by me, their Speaker; make a full return of most humble thanks to your majesty, with all dutiful acknowledgment of your grace and goodness herein extended unto them.—And whereas in one of those messages delivered from your majesty, there was an expression of your desire to know, whether this house would rest upon your royal word and promise, assuring them, that if they would, it should be royally and really performed; as they again present their humble thanks for the seconding and strengthening of your former royal expressions, so in all humbleness they assure your majesty, that their greatest confidence is, and ever must be, in your grace and goodness, without which, they well know, nothing they can frame or desire, will be of safety or value to them; therefore are all humble suitors to your majesty, that your royal heart will graciously accept and believe the truth of theirs, which they humbly present, as full of truth and confidence in your royal word and promise, as ever house of commons reposed in any of their best kings.—True it is, they cannot but remember the public trust, for which they are accountable to present, and future times; and their desires are, That your majesty's goodness might, in fruit and memory, be the blessing and joy of posterity.—They say also, That of late, there hath been public violation of the Laws, and the Subjects Liberties, by some of your majesty's ministers; and thence conceive, that no less than a public remedy will raise the dejected hearts of your loving subjects to a cheerful supply of your majesty, or make them receive content in the proceedings of this house.—From these considerations, they most humbly beg your majesty's leave to lay hold of that gracious offer of yours, which gave them assurance, that if they thought fit to secure themselves in their Rights and Liberties, by way of Bill or otherwise, so it might be provided with due respect to God's honour, and the public good; you would be graciously pleased to give way unto it. Far from their intentions it is, any way to encroach upon your sovereignty or prerogative; nor have they the least thought of stretching or enlarging the laws in any sort, or by any new interpretations or additions; the bounds of their desires extend no further, than to some necessary explanation of that, which is truly comprehended within the just sense and meaning of those laws, with some moderate provision for execution and performance, as in times past, upon like occasion, hath been used. The way how to accomplish these their humble desires, is now in serious consideration with them, wherein they humbly assure your majesty, they will neither lose time, nor seek any thing of your majesty, but that they hope may be fit for dutiful and loyal subjects to ask, and for a gracious and just king to grant.

His Majesty's ANSWER was delivered by the Lord-Keeper, Thomas Lord Coventry:

Mr. Speaker, and you Gentlemen of the House of Commons, his majesty has commanded me to tell you, that he expected an answer by your actions, and not delay by discourse: ye acknowledge his trust and confidence in your proceedings, but his majesty sees not how you requite him by your confidence of his word and actions; for what need explanations, if ye doubted not the performance of the true meaning? for explanations will hazard an incroachment upon his prerogative. And it may well be said, What need a new law to confirm an old, if you repose confidence in the declaration his majesty made by me to both houses? And yourselves acknowledge, that your greatest trust and confidence must be in his majesty's grace and goodness, without which nothing that you can frame will be of safety, or available to you. Yet, to shew clearly the sincerity of his majesty's intentions, he is content that a Bill be drawn for a confirmation of Magna Charta and the six other statutes insisted upon for the Subjects Liberties, if ye shall chuse that to be the best way; but so, as it may be without additions, paraphrases, or explanations.—Thus, if you please, you may be secured from your needless fears, and this parliament may have a happy wished-for end; whereas by the contrary, if you seek to tie your king by new, and indeed impossible bonds, you must be accountable to God and your country for the ill success of this meeting: his majesty having given his royal word, that you shall have no cause to complain hereafter; less than which hath been enough to reconcile great princes, and therefore ought much more to prevail between a king and his subjects.—Lastly, I am commanded to tell you, that his majesty's pleasure is, That without further replies or messages, or other unnecessary delays, you do what you mean to do speedily, remembering the last Message, which his majesty sent you by secretary Cook, in point of time: his majesty always intending to perform his promise to his people.

Notwithstanding the intimation of his majesty's good pleasure for a Bill, Mr. Secretary Cook, Tuesday, May 6, again pressed the house to rely upon the king's word, saying, That he had rather follow others, than begin to enter into this business: loss of time hath been the greatest complaint; the matter fallen now into consideration, is, what way to take, whether to rely on his majesty's word, or on a Bill? If we will consider the advantage we have in taking his majesty's word, it will be of the largest extent, and we shall chuse that that hath most assurance; an act of parliament is by the consent of the king and parliament; but this assurance by word is, that he will govern us by the laws; the king promises that, and also that they shall be so executed, that we shall enjoy as much freedom as ever. This contains many laws, and a grant of all good laws; nay, it contains a confirmation of those very laws, assurance, which binds further than the law can: first, it binds his affection, which is the greatest bond between king and subject, and that binds his judgment also, nay, his honour, and that not at home, but abroad; the royal word of a king is the ground of all treaty; nay, it binds his conscience. This confirmation between both houses is in nature of a vow; for my part, I think it is the greatest advantage to rely on his majesty's word.—He further added, this debate was fitter to be done before the house, and not before the committee; and that it was a new course to go to a committee of the whole house.

Sir John Elliot replied, That the proceeding in a committee is more honourable and advantageous to the king and the house, for that way leads most to truth, and it is a more open way, and where every man may add his reason, and make answer upon the bearing of other men's reasons and arguments.

This being the general sense, the house was turned into a Committee, to take into consideration what was delivered to the King by the Speaker, and what was delivered to them by the Lord-Keeper, and all other Messages, and the Committee was not to be bounded by any order: the key was brought up, and none were to go out without leave first asked.

In the debate of this business at the committee, some were for letting the bill rest: but sir Edward Coke's reasons prevailed to the contrary. Was it ever known, said he, that general words were a sufficient satisfaction to particular grievances? Was ever a verbal declaration of the king verbum regni? When Grievances be, the parliament is to redress them. Did ever parliament rely on Messages? They put up Petitions of their Grievances, and the king ever answered them: the king's answer is very gracious, but what is the law of the realm, that is the question? I put no diffidence in his majesty, the king must speak by a Record, and in particulars, and not in general: did you ever know the king's message come into a Bill of Subsidies? All succeeding kings will say, Ye must trust me as you did my predecessors, and trust my Messages; but messages of love never came into a parliament. Let us put up a PETITION OF RIGHT: not that I distrust the king, but that I cannot take his trust, but in a parliamentary way.

On Thursday, 8th May, the Petition of Right was finished, and the clause of Martial Law was added unto it, and it was delivered to the lords at a Conference in the Painted Chamber for their concurrence; which Conference was managed by sir Edward Coke, who thus expressed himself: I pray your lordships to excuse us, for we have been till one o'clock about the great business, and, blessed be God, we have dispatched it in some measure, and before this time we were not able to attend your lordships, but I hope that this will prove a great blessing to us. My lords, I am commanded from the House of Commons to express their singular care and affection they have of concurrence with your lordships, in these urging affairs and proceedings of this parliament; both for the good of the commonwealth; and principally for his majesty's. And this I may say in this particular, if we had hundreds of tongues, we were not able to express this desire which we have of that concurrence with your lordships: but I will leave it without any further expression. My lords, it is evident what necessity there is, both in respect of yourselves, and your posterities, to have good success in this business. We have acquainted your lordships with the Reasons and Arguments, and after we have had some Conference, we have received from your lordships five Propositions; and it behoves me to give your lordships some reasons why you have not heard from us before now; for in the mean time, as we were consulting of this weighty business, we have received divers Messages from our great sovereign the king, and they consisted of five parts:

1. That his majesty would maintain all his Subjects in their just freedom, both of their persons and estates.

2. That he will govern according to his Laws and Statutes.

3. That we should find much confidence in his Royal Word; I pray observe that.

4. That we shall enjoy all our Rights and Liberties, with as much freedom and liberty as ever any subjects have done in former times.

5. That whether we shall think it fit, either by way of Bill or otherwise, to go on in this great business, his majesty would be pleased to give way to it.

These gracious Messages did so work upon our affections, that we have taken them into consideration. My lords, when we had these Messages, (I deal plainly, for so I am commanded by the House of Commons) we did consider, what way we might go for our more secure way, nay, yours; we did think it the safest way to go in a parliamentary course, for we have a maxim in the house of commons, and written on the walls of our house, That old ways are the safest and surest ways: and at last we fell upon that which we did think, if that your lordships did consent with us, it is the most ancient way of all, and that is, my lords, via fausta, both to his majesty, to your lordships, and to ourselves. For, my lords, this is the greatest bond, that any subject can have in parliament, verbum regis, this is an high point of honour, but this shall be done by the lords and commons, and assented to by the king in parliament; this is the greatest obligation of all; and this is for the king's honour and our safety. Therefore, my lords, we have drawn a form of a Petition, desiring your lordships to concur with us therein; for we come with an unanimous consent of all the house of commons, and there is great reason your lordships should do so, for your lordships are involved in the same condition, commune periculum. So I have done with the first part: and now I shall be bold to read that which we have so agreed on, and I shall desire your lordships leave that I may read it.

Here the Petition of Right was read; but we forbear to insert it, as yet, because there were propositions for alteration; and it is not perfect, till the royal assent be given to it.

From the 8th to the 12th of May, all public business was laid aside. On Monday the 12th, the Lords had a Conference with the Commons, where the Lord Keeper made this Speech:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons; My Lords, having a most affectionate desire to maintain that good concurrence, that in this parliament and others have been of late between both houses, desired this Conference, to acquaint you, how, and in what manner, they have proceeded in the Petition of Right that came from this house, and to let you know, that as soon as they had received it, they, with all care and expedition they possibly could, addressed themselves to consider thereof; and after good time spent in debate in the whole house, they made a committee to consider, whether retaining the substance of the Petition, there might not be some words altered, or put in to make it more sweet, to procure it a passable way to his majesty: we know this must be crowned by the king, and good must come to all the kingdom by this course now taken. The committee hath met, and hath propounded some small matters to be altered in some few words, to make it passable, and not in substance. And the lords having this reported from their committee, and heard it read in their house, resolved of nothing till they have your consent; yet they think it fitter to have it propounded to you, to consider, whether there should be any alteration or no, and how the propounded alterations may stand with your liking.—Concerning the commitment by the king and the council, without expressing the cause, it was resolved by the lords to debate it this morning, and as soon as they should have debated it, they purposed to have your concurrence with them before they resolved it; but at the instant when they thought to have debated it, they received a Letter from his majesty, which, they conceive, will give a satisfaction to both houses in the main point. My lords desiring to keep that good concurrence begun, desired to communicate that Letter unto you, that you might take the same into your considerations, as they mean to do themselves: This Letter is to be read unto you:

To our right trusty and well-beloved, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal of the higher house of parliament.

C. R. We being desirous of nothing more than the advancement of the peace and pres-perity of our people, have given leave to free debate upon the highest points of our prerogative royal, which in the time of our predecessors, kings and queens of this realm, were ever restrained as matters that they would not have discussed; and in other things we have been willing so far to descend to the desires of our good subjects, as might fully satisfy all moderate minds, and free from all just fears and jealousies, which those messages, which we have hitherto sent into the Commons house, will well demonstrate unto the world. Yet we find it still insisted upon, that in no case whatsoever, should it never so nearly concern matters of state or government, we, or our privy council, have no power to commit any man without the cause shewed; whereas it often happens, that should the cause be shewed, the service itself would thereby be destroyed and defeated; and the cause alleged must be such, as may be determined by our judges of our courts of Westminster, in a legal and ordinary way of justice; whereas the causes may be such, whereof the judges have no capacity of judicature, nor rules of law to direct, and guide their judgment in cases of that transcendent nature; which happening so often, the very intermitting the constant rule of government, for so many ages, within this kingdom practised, would soon dissolve the very foundation and frame of our monarchy. Wherefore, as to our commons we have made fair propositions, which might equally preserve the just liberty of the subject; so, my lords, we have thought good to let you know that without the overthrow of sovereignty, we cannot suffer this power to be impeached; notwithstanding, to clear our conscience and just intentions, this we publish, That it is not in our heart, nor will we ever extend our royal power, lent unto us from God, beyond the just rule of moderation, in any thing which shall be contrary to our laws and customs, wherein the safety of our people shall be our only aim. And we do hereby declare our royal pleasure and resolution to be, which, God willing, we shall ever constantly continue and maintain, That neither we, nor our privy council, shall or will, at any time hereafter, commit or command to prison, or otherwise restrain the person of any for not lending money to us, nor for any cause, which in our conscience doth not concern the public good and safety of us and our people; we will not be drawn to pretend any cause, wherein our judgment and conscience is not satisfied with; which base thoughts, we hope, no man can imagine will fall into our royal breast; and that in all cases of this nature, which shall hereafter happen, we shall, upon the humble petition of the party, or address of our Judges unto us, readily and really express the true cause of their commitment or restraint, so soon as with conveniency and safety the same is fit to be disclosed and expressed. And that in all causes criminal of ordinary jurisdiction, our judges shall proceed to the deliverance or bailment of the prisoner, according to the known and ordinary rules of the laws of this land, and according to the Statutes of Magna Charta, and those other six Statutes insisted upon, which we do take knowledge stand in full force, and which we intend not to abrogate and weaken, against the true intention thereof. This we have thought fit to signify unto you, the rather to shorten any long Debate upon this great question, the season of the year being so far advanced, and our great occasions of state not lending us many more days for longer continuance of this session of parliament.' Given under our Signet at our Palace at Westminster, 12 Maii, the 4th year of our reign.

The same day the King's Letter was communicated to the house of commons, they laid it aside, and sir Thomas Wentworth said, It was a Letter of Grace; but the people will only like of that which is done in a parliamentary way: besides, the debate of it would spend much time, neither was it directed to the house of commons; and the Petition of Right would clear all mistakes: For, said he, some give it out, as if the house went about to pinch the king's prerogative. But the further debate of this matter took up several days.

May 17. The Lords propounded, at a Conference, an Addition to be made to the Petition of Right, which was delivered by the Lord-Keeper, to this purpose:

"You the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the house of commons, my lords have commanded me to present unto you the singular care and affection they have to preserve that correspondency and order, which the two houses (both in this and former parliaments, to the happiness of this kingdom) have heretofore enjoyed.

"They command me also to let you know, that they have no less care and affection to bring that great business, the Liberty of the Subject, to an happy issue. And whereas at the last Conference of both houses, there were some things propounded, that came from their lordships, out of a desire the Petition might have the easier passage with his majesty, not intending to alter in any manner the substance of the Petition; but it was then thought fit, that there was another part of the Petition, of as great importance and weight: my lords, since the time of that Conference, have employed themselves wholly to reduce the Petition to such a frame and order, that may give both to you and them hope of acceptance.

"And after many deliberations, and much advice taken, my lords have resolved to represent to you something which they have thought upon, yet not as a thing conclusive to them or you; and according to their desires (having mentioned it in the beginning) have held it fit to conclude of nothing, till that you be made acquainted with it, and that there may be a mature advisement between you and them, so that there may be the happier conclusion in all their business.

"This being the determination of the lords, that nothing, that is now offered unto you, should be conclusive, yet they thought it convenient to present it unto you.

"This alteration (and not alteration, but addition) which they shall propound unto you, to be advised and conferred upon, which is no breach of the same, they think it meet, if it shall stand with your liking, to be put in the conclusion of the Petition which I shall now read unto you.

"We present this our humble Petition to your majesty, with the care not only of preserving our own Liberties, but with due regard to leave intire that Sovereign Power, wherewith your majesty is trusted for the protection, safety, and happiness of the people."

"This is the thing the lords do present unto you, the subject of this Conference, concerning the adding of this in the conclusion of the Petition; and as they know, that this is no small thing, and that you cannot presently give an answer to it; therefore they desire you, that you do with some speed consider of it, and their lordships will be ready this afternoon."

This Addition produced several Speeches.

Mr. Alford. Let us look, said he, into the Records, and see what they are, what is "Sovereign Power?" Bodin saith, That it is free from any condition, by this we shall acknowledge a regal, as well as a legal power: Let us give that to the king, that the law gives him, and no more.

Mr. Pymm. I am not able to speak to this question, I know not what it is: All our Petition is for the Laws of England, and this power seems to be another distinct power from the power of the law. I know how to add sovereign to his person, but not to his power: And we cannot leave to him a sovereign power, when we never were possessed of it.

Mr. Hockwell. We cannot admit of those words with safety; they are applicable to all the parts of our Petition: It is in the nature of a Saving, and by it we shall imply, as if we had incroached on his prerogative; all the laws we cite are without a saving; and yet now after the violation of them we must add a saving: I have seen divers Petitions, and where the subject claimed a Right, there I never saw a saving of this nature.

Sir Edward Coke. This is magnum in parte, this is propounded to be a conclusion of our Petition: It is a matter of great weight; and, to speak plainly, it will overthrow all our Petition; it trenches to all parts of it: It flies at Loans, and at the Oath, and at Imprisonment, and Billiting of Soldiers; this turns all about again. Look into all the Petitions of former times, they never petitioned, wherein there was a saving of the king's sovereignty: I know that prerogative is part of the law, but 'sovereign power' is no parliamentary word. In my opinion, it weakens Magna Charta, and all our statutes; for they are absolute, without any saving of sovereign power. And shall we now add it, we shall weaken the foundation of law, and then the building must needs fall; let us take heed what we yield unto; Magna Charta is such a fellow, that he will have no sovereign. I wonder this sovereign was not in Magna Charta, or in the confirmations of it: If we grant this, by implication we give a sovereign power above all these laws: power, in law, is taken for a power with force: The Sheriff shall take the power of the county, what it means here, God only knows. It is repugnant to our petition, that is a Petition of Right, grounded on acts of parliament. Our predecessors could never endure a salvo jure suo, no more than the kings of old could endure for the church, salvo honore Dei et Ecclesie. We must not admit of it, and to qualify it, is impossible. Let us hold our privileges according to the law; that power, that is above this, is not fit for the king and people to have it disputed further. I had rather, for my part, have the prerogative acted, and I myself to lie under it, than to have it disputed.

Sir Thomas Wentworth. If we do admit of this addition, we shall leave the Subject worse than we found him, and we shall have little thanks for our labour, when we come home. Let us leave all power to his majesty to punish malefactors; but our laws are not acquainted with sovereign power: we desire no new thing, nor do we offer to trench on his majesty's prerogative; we must not recede from this Petition, either in part or whole.

Mr. Noye. To add a Saving, is not safe; doubtful words may beget ill construction: and the words are not only doubtful words, but words unknown to us, and never used in any act or petition before.

Mr. Selden. Let us not go too hastily to the question. If there be any objections, let any propound them, and let others answer them as they think good. I will not touch the reasons already given. The sum of this addition is, that our right is not to be subject to Loans or Imprisonment without cause, or Martial Law, but by sovereign power. If it hath no reference to our Petition, what doth it here? I am sure all others will say it hath reference, and so must we. How far it doth exceed all examples of former times, no man can shew me the like. I have made that search that fully satisfies me, and I find not another besides 28 Ed. 1. We have a great many petitions and bills of parliament in all ages, in all which we are sure no such thing is added. That clause of the 28 Edw. 1, it was not in the petition, but in the king's answer.

In Magna Charta there were no such clauses; the articles themselves are to be seen in a library at Lambeth, in a book of that time, upon which the law was made. There was none in the Statutes in king John's time, for these I have seen, there is no saving. In the articles of confirmatio chartarum, is a saving, 'les ancients aids,' that is, for 'file mayer, et pur fair fitz chivalier,' and for ransom. And in the articles of king John, in the original Charter, which I can shew, there those three aids were named therein, and they were all known. In the 25 E. 3, there is a petition against Loans, there is no saving, and so in others. As for that addition in the 28 E. 1, do but observe the petitions after Magna Charta; as 5 E. 3, they put up a petition: 'whereas in Magna Charta it is contained that none be imprisoned but by due process of law;' those words are not in Magna Charta, and yet there is no saving. And so in the 28 E. 3, and 36, 37, and 42 of E. 3, all which pass by petition, and yet there is no saving in them. And these are in them other words that are not in Magna Charta, and yet no saving. For that that Mr. Speaker said to the king, it was our heart, and ever shall be; but we then spoke of the king's prerogative by itself, and we are bound to say so: but speaking of our rights, shall we say we are not to be imprisoned, saving but by the king's sovereign power? Say my lands, without any title, be seized in the king's hand, and I bring a Petition of Right, and I go to the king, and say, I do by no means seek your majesty's right and title; and after that I bring a petition or monstrance de droit, setting forth my own right and title, and with all set down a saving, that I leave intire his majesty's right, it would be improper. It was objected, that in the 28 of E. 1, in the end of Articuli super Chartas, which was a confirmation of Magna Charta, and Charta de Foresta, in the end there is a clause, 'savant le droit et signiory;' the words are extant, in that Roll that is now extant, but the original roll is not extant.

In the 25 E. 1, there was a confirmation of the Charter: in the 27 E. 1, the parliament was called; and much stir there was about the Charter, and renewing the Articles, but then little was done. In 28 E. 1, the commons by Petition or Bill, did obtain the liberties and articles at the end of the parliament; they were extracted out of the Roll, and proclaimed abroad. The addition was added in the Proclamation: In the bill there was no savant, but afterwards it was put in; and to prove this, it is true, there is no Parliament-roll of that year, yet we have histories of that time. In the library at Oxford, there is a journal of a parliament of that very year, which mentions so much; also in the public library at Cambridge there is a manuscript that belonged to an abbey, it was of the same year 28 Ed. 1, and it mentions the parliament and the petitions, and 'articulos quos petierunt sic confirmaverat rex 'ut in fine adderet, salvo jure coronæ regis;' and they came by proclamation in London. When the people heard this clause added in the end, they fell into execration for that addition, and the great earls that went away satisfied from the parliament, hearing of this, went to the king, and afterwards it was cleared at the next parliament. Now there is no Parliament-roll of this at that time, only in one roll in the end of Edw. 3, there is a roll, that recites not the Parliament bill, but the statute that was the effect of the roll that was proclaimed.

The Lords afterwards, at a Conference, tendered Reasons to fortify their Addition; which were briefly reported by the Lord-Keeper:

"That the lords were all agreed to defend and maintain the just liberties of the subject, and of the crown; and that the word, 'leave,' was debated amongst them; and thereby they meant to give no new, but what was before: for the words 'sovereign power,' as he is a king, he is a sovereign, and must have power; and he said, the words were easier than the 'Prerogative.' As for the word, 'that,' which is a relative, and referred to 'that power,' that is for the safety of the people; and this, said he, can never grieve any man. Being thus published, it is not sovereign power in general; but now in confutation of our reasons, Magna Charta was not with a saving; but, said he, you pursue not the words in Magna Charta, and therefore it needs an addition. As for the 28 of Edw. 3, he said, there was a saving; and an ill exposition cannot be made of this, and both houses have agreed it in substance already; the commons did it in a speech delivered by the Speaker, and that we say we have not a thought to inroach on the king's sovereignty; and why may you not add it in your Petition?"

Upon this report,

Mr. Mason spake his opinion in manner following:

In our Petition of Right to the king's majesty, we mention the laws and statutes, by which it appeared, That no tax, loan, or the like, ought to be levied by the king, but by common assent in parliament: that no freeman ought to be imprisoned but by the law of the land; that no freeman ought to be compelled to suffer soldiers in his house. In the Petition we have expressed the breach of these laws, and desire we may not suffer the like; all which we pray as our Rights and Liberties.

The lords have proposed an Addition to this Petition, in these words: 'We humbly present this Petition to your majesty, not only with a care of our own Liberties, but with a due regard to leave entire that Sovereign Power wherewith your majesty is intrusted for the protection, safety, and happiness of your people.'—And whether we shall consent unto this Addition, is the subject of this day's discourse: and because my Lord-Keeper, at the last conference, declared their lordships had taken the words of the Petition apart, I shall do so too. The word, 'leave,' in a petition, is of the same nature as 'saving' in a grant, or act of parliament; when a man grants but part of a thing, he saves the rest: when he petitions to be restored but to part, he leaveth the rest: then in the end of our Petition, the word, 'leave,' will imply, that something is to be left of that, or at least with a reference to what we desire.

The word 'intire,' is very considerable; a conqueror is bound by no law, but hath power dare leges, his will is a law; and although William the Conqueror, at first, to make his way to the crown of England the more easy, and the possession of it more sure, claimed it by title: but afterwards when there were no powerful pretenders to the crown, the title of conquest (to introduce that absolute power of a conqueror) was claimed, and that statute of Magna Charta, and other statutes mentioned in our Petition, do principally limit that power. I hope it is as lawful for me to cite a Jesuit, as it is for Dr. Manwaring to falsify him; Suares, in his first book, de Legibus, cap. 17. delivered his opinion in these words, 'Amplitudo et restrictio potestatis regum circa ea quæ per se mala vel injusta non sunt, pendet ex arbitrio hominum et ex ambigua conventionne vel pacto inter reges et regnum.' And he farther expresseth his opinion, That the king of Spain was so absolute a monarch, that he might lawfully impose tribute without consent of his people, until about 200 years since, when it was concluded between him and his people, that without consent of his people by proxies, he should not impose any tribute. And Suares's opinion is, That by that agreement, the kings of Spain are bound to impose no tribute without consent.

And this agreement that author calls a restraining of that sovereign power; the Statutes then mentioned in our Petition, restraining that absolute power of a Conqueror; if we recite those statutes, and say, we leave the sovereign power intire, we do take away that restraint which is the virtue and strength of those statutes, and set at liberty the claim of the sovereign power of a conqueror, which is to be limited and restrained by no laws: this may be the danger of the word, 'intire.'

The next word delivered by the lords as observable, is the particule, 'that;' because it was said, that all sovereign power is not mentioned to be left, but only (that) with which the king is trusted for our protection, safety, and happiness: but I conceive this to be an exception of all sovereign power; for all sovereign power in a king, is for the protection, safety, and happiness of his people. If all sovereign power be excepted, you may easily judge the consequence, all loans and taxes being imposed by colour of that sovereign power.

The next word is, 'Trusted;' which is very ambiguous, whether it be meant, trusted by God only as a Conqueror, or by the people also, as King, which are to govern also according to laws, ex pacto. In this point I will not presume to adventure further; only I like it not, by reason of the doubtful exposition it admits. I have likewise considered the proposition itself, and therein I have fallen upon the dilemma, that this Addition shall be construed either to refer unto the Petition, or not; if it doth not refer unto the Petition, it is merely useless and unnecessary, and unbefitting the judgment of this grave and great assembly to add to a Petition of this weight. If it hath reference unto it, then it destroys not only the virtue and strength of our Petition of Right, but our rights themselves; for the Addition being referred to each part of the Petition, will necessarily receive this construction: that none ought to be compelled to make any gift, loan, or such like charge, without common consent, or act of parliament, unless it be by the sovereign power, with which the king is trusted for the protection, safety, and happiness of his people.

That none ought to be compelled to sojourn or billet soldiers, unless by the same sovereign power; and so of the rest of the Rights contained in the Petition: and then the most favourable construction will be, that the king hath an ordinary prerogative, and by that he cannot impose taxes, or imprisonment; that is, he cannot impose taxes at his will to employ them as he pleaseth: but that he hath an extraordinary and transcendent sovereign power for the protection and happiness of his people, and for such purpose he may impose taxes, or billet soldiers as he pleaseth; and we may assure ourselves, that hereafter all loans, taxes, and billeting of soldiers, will be said to be for the protection, safety, and happiness of the people. Certainly hereafter it will be conceived, that an house of parliament would not have made an unnecessary Addition to this Petition of Right; and therefore it will be resolved, that the Addition hath relation to the Petition, which will have such operation as I have formerly declared; and I the rather fear it, because the late loan and billeting have been declared to have been by sovereign power for the good of ourselves; and if it be doubtful whether this proposition hath reference to the Petition or not, I know not who shall judge whether loans or imprisonments hereafter be by that sovereign power or not?

A parliament, which is made a body of several writs, and may be dissolved by one commission, cannot be certain to decide this question. We cannot resolve that the Judges shall determine the words of the King's Letter read in this house, expressing the cause of commitment may be such, that the judges have not capacity of judicature, no rules of law to direct and guide their judgments in cases of that transcendent nature; the judges then, and the judgments, are easily conjectured. It hath been confessed by the king's counsel, that the statute of Magna Charta binds the king, and his sovereign power cannot be divided from himself. If then the statute of Magna Charta binds the king, it binds his sovereign power. If to the Petition these words be added, the exposition must be, that the statute of Magna Charta binds the king's sovereign power; saving the king's sovereign power, I shall endeavour to give some answer to the Reasons given by the lords.

The first is, That it is the intention of both houses, to maintain the just Liberty of the Subject, and not to diminish the just power of the king: and therefore the expression of that intention in this Petition, cannot prejudice us. To which I answer,

First, our intention was, and is, as we then professed, and no man can assign any particular in which we have done to the contrary; neither have we any way transgressed in that kind in this Petition: and if we make this Addition to the Petition, it would give some intimation, that we have given a cause or colour of offence therein; which we deny: and which if any man conceive so, let him assign the particular, that we may give answer thereunto.

By our Petition, we only desire our particular Rights and Liberties to be confirmed to us; and therefore it is not proper for us in it to mention sovereign power in general, being altogether impertinent to the matter of the Petition.—There is a great difference between the words of the Addition, and the words proposed therein, viz. between just power, which may be conceived to be limited by laws, and sovereign power, which is supposed to be transcendant and boundless.

The second Reason delivered by their lordships, was, That the king is sovereign: that as he is sovereign, he hath power, and that that sovereign power is to be left: for my part, I would leave it so, as not to mention it; but if it should be expressed to be left in this Petition, as it is proposed, it must admit something to be left in the king of what we pray, or at least admit some sovereign power in his majesty, in these privileges which we claim to be our right, which would frustrate our Petition, and destroy our right, as I have formerly shewed.

The third Reason given for this Addition, was, That in the statute of Articuli super Chartas, there is a saving of the Right and Seigniorie of the crown.

To which I give these Answers: That Magna Charta was confirmed above thirty times, and a general saving was in none of these acts of confirmation, but in this only; and I see no cause we should follow one ill, and not thirty good precedents; and the rather, because that saving produced ill effects, that are well known.—That saving was by act of parliament; the conclusion of which act is, That in all those cases the king did will, and all those that were at the making of that ordinance did intend, that the Right and Seigniorie of the crown should be saved: by which it appears that the saving was not in the Petition of the commons, but added by the king; for in the Petition, the king's will is not expressed.

In that act the king did grant, and part with, to his people, divers rights belonging to his prerogative, as in the first chapter he granted, That the people might chuse three men, which might have power to hear and determine complaints, made against those that offended in any point of Magna Charta, though they were the king's officers, and to fine and ransom them. And in the 8, 12, and 19 Chapters of that Statute, the king parted with other prerogatives, and therefore there might be some reason of the adding of that sovereign power, by the king's counsel: but in this Petition, we desire nothing of the king's prerogative, but pray the enjoying of our proper and undoubted rights and privileges; therefore there is no cause to add any words, which may imply a saving of that which concerns not the matter in the Petition.

The fourth Reason given by their lordships, was, That by the mouth of our Speaker, we have this parliament declared, That it was far from our intention to inroach upon his majesty's prerogative, and that therefore it could not prejudice us, to mention the same resolution in an addition to this Petition.

To which I answer, That that declaration was a general Answer to a Message from his majesty to us, by which his majesty expressed that he would not have his prerogative straitened by any new explanation of Magna Charta, or the rest of the statutes: and therefore that expression of our Speaker's was then proper, to make it have reference to this Petition, there being nothing therein contained, but particular Rights of the Subject, and nothing at all concerning his majesty's prerogative.—Secondly, That Answer was to give his majesty satisfaction of all our proceedings in general, and no man can assign any particular, in which we have broken it; and this Petition justifies itself, that in it we have not offended against the protestation: and I know no reason, but that this declaration should be added to all our laws we shall agree on this parliament, as well as to this Petition.

The last reason given, was, That we have varied in our Petition from the words of Magna Charta; and therefore it was very necessary that a saving should be added to this Petition.

I answer, that in the statute 5 E. 3, 25 E. 3, 28 E. 3, and other statutes, with which Magna Charta is confirmed: the words of the statute of explanation differ from the words of Magna Charta itself; the words of some of the statutes of explanation, being, 'That no man ought to be apprehended, unless by indictment, or due process of law;' and the other statutes differing from the words of Magna Charta, in many other particulars, and yet there is no saving in those statutes, much less should there be any in a Petition of Right. These are the Answers I have conceived to the Reasons of their lordships, and the exposition, I apprehend, must be made of the proposed words, being added to our Petition. And therefore, I conclude, that, in my opinion, we may not consent to this Addition, which I submit to better judgments.

The Commons afterwards appointed Mr. Glauville and sir Henry Martin to manage another Conference to be had with the Lords, concerning the said matter, and to clear the sense of the Commons in that point: The one argued the legal, the other the rational part.

Mr. GLAUVILLE'S Speech in a full Committee of both Houses of Parliament, May 23, in the Painted Chamber at Westminster.

My lords, I have in charge, from the Commons House of parliament (whereof I am a member) to express this day before your lordships some part of their clear sense, touching one point that hath occurred in the great debate, which hath so long depended in both houses.—I shall not need many words to induce or state the question, which I am to handle in this free conference. The subject matter of our meeting is well known to your lordships, I will therefore only look so far back upon it, and so far recollect summarily the proceedings it hath had, as may be requisite to present clearly to your lordships considerations, the nature and consequence of the particular wherein I must insist.

Your lordships may be pleased to remember, now that the Commons in this parliament have framed a Petition to be presented to his majesty, a Petition of Right rightly composed, relating nothing but truth, desiring nothing but justice; a petition justly occasioned, a petition necessary and fit for these times, a petition founded upon solid and substantial grounds, the laws and statutes of this realm, sure rocks to build upon; a petition bounded within due limits, and directed upon right ends, to vindicate some lawful and just liberties of the free subjects of this kingdom from the prejudices of violations past, and to secure them from future innovations.

And because my following discourse must reflect chiefly, if not wholly, upon the matter of this Petition, I shall here crave leave shortly to open to your lordships the distinct parts whereof it doth consist, and those are four.

The first concerns Levies of Monies, by way of Loans or otherwise, for his majesty's Supply; declaring, that no man ought, and praying that no man hereafter be compelled to make or yield any gift, loan, benevolence, tax, or such like charge, without common consent by act of parliament.

2. The second is concerning that Liberty of Person, which rightfully belongs to the free subjects of this realm, expressing it to be against the tenure of the laws and statutes of the land, that any freeman should be imprisoned without cause shewed; and then reciting how this liberty, amongst others, hath lately been infringed, it concludeth with a just and necessary desire, for the better clearing and allowance of this privilege for the future.

3. The third declareth the unlawfulness of billeting or placing Soldiers or Mariners to sojourn in free subjects houses against their wills, and prayeth remedy against that grievance.

4. The fourth and last sixth at redress touching Commissions, to proceed to the trial and condemnation of offenders, and causing them to be executed and put to death by the Law Martial, in times and places, when and where, if by the laws and statutes of the land they had deserved death, by the same laws and statutes also they might, and by none other ought to be, adjudged and executed.

This Petition, the careful house of commons, not willing to omit anything pertaining to their duties, or which might advance their moderate and just ends, did heretofore offer up unto your lordships' consideration, accompanied with an humble desire, That in your nobleness and justice, you would be pleased to join with them in presenting it to his majesty, that so coming from the whole body of the realm, the peers and people, to him that is the head of both, our gracious sovereign, who must crown the work, or else all our labour is in vain; it might, by your lordships concurrence and assistance, find the more easy passage, and obtain the better answer.

Your lordships, as your manner is, in cases of so great importance, were pleased to debate and weigh it well, and thereupon you propounded to us some few Amendments (as you termed them) by way of alteration, alledging, that they were only in matters of form, and not of substance; and that they were intended to no other end, but to sweeten the Petition, and make it the more passable with his majesty.

In this the House of Commons cannot but observe that fair and good respect which your lordships have used in your proceedings with them, by your concluding or voting nothing in your house, until you had imparted it unto them; whereby our meetings about this business have been justly stiled free conferences, either party repairing hither disengaged to hear and weigh the other's reasons, and both houses coming with a full intention, upon due consideration of all that can be said on the other side, to join at last in resolving and acting that which shall be found most just and necessary for the honour and safety of his majesty and the whole kingdom.

And touching those propounded Alterations, which were not many, your lordships cannot but remember, that the house of commons have yielded to an accommodation, or change of their Petition in two particulars; whereby they hope your lordships have observed, as well as you may, they have not been affected unto words and phrases, nor overmuch abounding in their own sense; but rather willing to comply with your lordships in all indifferent things.

For the rest of your proposed Amendments, if we do not misconceive your lordships, as we are confident we do not, your lordships, of yourselves, have been pleased to relinquish them with a new overture, for one only clause to be added in the end or foot of the Petition, whereby the work of this day is reduced to one simple head, whether that clause shall be received or not?—This yielding of the commons in part unto your lordships, of other points by you somewhat insisted upon, giveth us great assurance, that our ends are one; and putteth us in hope, that, in conclusion, we shall concur, and proceed unanimously to seek the same ends, by the same means.

The Clause propounded by your lordships to be added to the Petition is this:

'We humbly present this Petition to your majesty, not only with a care for preservation of Liberties, but with a due regard to leave intire that Sovereign Power, wherewith your 'majesty is intrusted for the protection, safety, and happiness of your people.'

A Clause specious in shew, and smooth in words, but in effect and consequence most dangerous, as I hope to make most evident: however, coming from your lordships, the house of commons took it into their considerations, as became them, and apprehending upon the first debate, that it threatened ruin to the whole Petition, they did heretofore deliver some Reasons to your lordships, for which they then desired to be spared from admitting it.

To these Reasons, your lordships offered some Answers at the last meeting; which having been faithfully reported to our house, and there debated as was requisite for a business of such weight and importance, I must say truly to your lordships, yet with due reverence to your opinions, the Commons are not satisfied with your arguments; and therefore they have commanded me to recollect your lordships reasons for this clause, and in a fair reply to let you see the causes why they differ from you in opinion.

But before I come to handle the particulars wherein we dissent from your lordships, I will in the first place take notice yet a little further, of that general wherein we all concur; which is, that we desire not, neither do your lordships, to augment or dilate the Liberties and Privileges of the Subjects beyond the just and due bounds, nor to encroach upon the limits of his majesty's Prerogative Royal. And as in this, your lordships at the last meeting expressed clearly your own senses, so were your lordships not mistaken in collecting the concurrent sense and meaning of the house of commons; they often have protested, they do, and ever must protest, That these have been, and shall be the bounds of their desires, to demand and seek nothing but that which may be fit for dutiful and loyal subjects to ask, and for a gracious and just king to grant: for as they claim by laws some liberties for themselves, so do they acknowledge a prerogative, a high and just prerogative belonging to the king, which they intend not to diminish. And now, my lords, being assured, not by strained inferences, or obscure collections, but by the express and clear declarations of both houses, that our ends are the same; it were a miserable unhappiness, if we should fail in finding out the means to accomplish our desires.

My lords, the heads of those particular Reasons which you insisted upon the last day, were only these:

1. You told us, that the word 'leave' was of such a nature, that it could give no new thing to his majesty.

2. That no just exception could be taken to the words 'Sovereign Power;' for that as his majesty is a king, so he is a sovereign; and as he is a sovereign, so he hath power.

3. That the sovereign power mentioned in this clause is not absolute, or indefinite, but limited and regulated by the particle 'that;' and the word 'subsequent' which restrains it to be applied only for protection, safety, and happiness of the people, whereby ye inferred, there could be no danger in the allowance of such power.

4. That this clause contained no more in substance, but the like expressions of our meanings in this Petition, which we had formerly signified unto his majesty by the mouth of Mr. Speaker, that we no way intended to encroach upon his majesty's sovereign power or prerogative.

5. That in our Petition we have used other words, and of larger extent, touching our Liberties, than are contained in the statutes whereon it is grounded: In respect of which enlargement, it was fit to have some express, or implied saving, or narrative declaratory for the king's sovereign power, of which narrative you alledge this clause to be.

Lastly, Whereas the commons, as a main argument against the clause, had much insisted upon this, that it was unprecedented, and unparliamentary in a petition from the Subject, to insert a saving for the crown; your lordships brought for instance to the contrary, the two statutes of the 25 Ed. 1, commonly called confirmatio chartarum, and 28 Ed. 1, known by this name of Articuli super Chartas; in both which Statutes there are savings for the king.

Having thus reduced to your lordships memories, the effects of your own Reasons; I will now, with your lordships favour, come to the points of our reply, wherein I most humbly beseech your lordships to weigh the reasons which I shall present, not as the sense of myself, the weakest member of our house, but as the genuine and true sense of the whole house of commons, conceived in a business there debated with the greatest gravity and solemnity, with the greatest concurrence of opinions, and unanimity, that ever was in any business maturely agitated in that house. I shall not, peradventure, follow the method of your lordships recollected Reasons in my answering to them, nor labour to urge many reasons. It is the desire of the commons, that the weight of their arguments should recompense, if need be, the smallness of their number. And, in conclusion, when you have heard me through, I hope your lordships shall be enabled to collect clearly, out of the frame of what I shall deliver, that in some part or other of my discourse there is a full and satisfactory answer given to every particular reason or objection of your lordships.

The Reasons that are now appointed to be presented to your lordships, are of two kinds, legal and rational, of which those of the former sort are allotted to my charge; and the first of them is thus:

The clause now under question, if it be added to the Petition, then either it must refer or relate unto it, or else not; if it have no such reference, is it not clear that it is needless and superfluous? And if it have such reference, is it not clear, that then it must needs have an operation upon the whole Petition, and upon all the parts of it? We cannot think that your lordships would offer us a vain thing; and therefore taking it for granted, that if it be added, it would refer to the Petition; let me beseech your lordships to observe with me, and with the house of commons, what alteration and qualification of the same it will introduce.

The Petition of itself, simply, and without this clause, declareth absolutely the rights and privileges of the subject, in divers points; and among the rest touching the levies of monies, by way of loans or otherwise, for his majesty's supply, That such loans and other charges of the like nature, by the laws and statutes of this land, ought not to be made or laid without common consent by act of parliament: But admit this clause to be annexed with reference (to the Petition), and it must necessarily conclude and have this exposition, That Loans and the like charges (true it is, ordinarily) are against the laws and statutes of the realm, 'unless they be warranted by sovereign power,' and that they cannot be commanded or raised without assent of parliament, 'unless it be by sovereign power.' What were this but to admit a sovereign power in the king above the laws and statutes of the kingdom?

Another part of this Petition is, That the free subjects of this realm ought not to be imprisoned without cause shewed: But by this clause a sovereign power will be admitted, and left entire to his majesty, sufficient to control the force of law, and to bring in this new and dangerous interpretation, That the free subjects of this realm ought not by law to be imprisoned without cause shewed, 'unless it be by sovereign power.'

In a word, this clause, if it should be admitted, would take away the effect of every part of the Petition, and become destructive to the whole: for thence will be the exposition touching the billeting of Soldiers and Mariners in freemen's houses against their wills; and thence will be the exposition touching the times and places for execution of the Law Martial, contrary to the laws and statutes of the realm.

The scope of this Petition, as I have before observed, is not to amend our case, but to restore us to the same state we were in before; whereas, if this clause be received, instead of mending the condition of the poor subjects, whose liberties of late have been miserably violated by some ministers, we shall leave them worse than we found them; instead of curing their wounds, we shall make them deeper. We have set bounds to our desires in this great business, whereof one is not to diminish the prerogative of the king, by mounting it too high; and if we bound ourselves on the other side with this limit, not to abridge the lawful privileges of the subject, by descending beneath that which is meet, no man, we hope, can blame us.

My lords, as there is mention made in the additional Clause of Sovereign Power, so is there likewise of a trust reposed in his majesty, touching the use of sovereign power.

The word 'Trust' is of great latitude and large extent, and therefore ought to be well and warily applied and restrained, especially in the case of a king: there is a trust inseparably reposed in the persons of the kings of England, but that trust is regulated by law. For example, when statutes are made to prohibit things not mala in se, but only mala quia prohibita, under certain forfeitures, and penalties, to accrue to the king, and to the informers that shall sue for the breach of them; the commons must and ever will acknowledge a regal and sovereign prerogative in the king, touching such statutes, that it is in his majesty's absolute and undoubted power, to grant dispensations to particular persons, with the clauses of non obstante, to do as they might have done before those statutes, wherein his majesty, conferring grace and favour upon some, doth not do wrong to others. But there is a difference between those statutes, and the laws and statutes whereupon the Petition is grounded: by those statutes the subject has no interest in the penalties, which are all the fruit such statutes can produce, until by suit or information commenced he become entitled to the particular forfeitures; whereas the laws and statutes mentioned in our Petition are of another nature; there shall your lordships find us rely upon the good old statute, called Magna Charta, which declareth and confirmeth the ancient common laws of the liberties of England: There shall your lordships also find us to insist upon divers other most material statutes, made in the time of king Edw. 3, and Edw. 4, and other famous kings, for explanation and ratification of the lawful rights and privileges belonging to the subjects of this realm: laws not inflicting penalties upon offenders, in malis prohibitis, but laws declarative or positive, conferring or confirming, ipso facto, an inherent right and interest of liberty and freedom in the subjects of this realm, as their birthrights and inheritance descendable to their heirs and posterity; Statutes incorporate into the body of the common law, over which (with reverence be it spoken) there is no trust reposed in the king's 'Sovereign Power,' or 'Prerogative Royal,' to enable him to dispense with them, or to take from his subjects that birthright or inheritance which they have in their liberties, by virtue of the common law and of these statutes.

But if this Clause be added to our Petition, we shall then make a dangerous overture to confound this good destination touching what statutes the king is trusted to controul by dispensations, and what not; and shall give an intimation to posterity, as if it were the opinion both of the lords and commons assembled in this parliament, that there is a trust reposed in the king, to lay aside by his 'sovereign power,' in some emergent cases, as well the Common Law, and such statutes as declare or ratify the subjects liberty, or confer interest upon their persons, as those other penal statutes of such nature as I have mentioned before; which, as we can by no means admit, so we believe assuredly, that it is far from the desire of our most gracious sovereign, to affect so vast a trust, which being transmitted to a successor of a different temper, might enable him to alter the whole frame and fabric of the commonwealth, and to resolve that government whereby this kingdom hath flourished for so many years and ages, under his majesty's most royal ancestors and predecessors.

Our next Reason is, that we hold it contrary to all course of parliament, and absolutely repugnant to the very nature of a Petition of Right, consisting of particulars, as ours doth, to clog it with a general Saving or Declaration, to the weakening of the right demanded; and we are bold to renew with some confidence our allegation, that there can be no precedent shewed of any such clause in any such petitions in times past.

I shall insist the longer upon this particular, and labour the more carefully to clear it, because your lordships were pleased the last day to urge against us the statutes of 25 and 28 of Edw. 1, as arguments to prove the contrary, and seemed not to be satisfied with that which in this point we had affirmed. True it is, that in those statutes there are such savings as your lordships have observed; but I shall offer you a clear answer to them, and to all other savings of like nature that can be found in any statutes whatsoever.

First in the general, and then I shall apply particular answers to the particulars of those two Statutes; whereby it will be most evident, that those examples can no ways suit with the matter now in hand. To this end it will be necessary, that we consider duly what that question is, which indeed concerneth a petition, and not an act of parliament. This being well observed, by shewing unto your lordships the difference between a petition for the law, and the law ordained upon such a petition, and opening truly and perspicuously the course that was holden in framing of statutes before 2 Hen. 5, different from that which ever since then hath been used, and is still in use amongst us, and by noting the times wherein these statutes were made, which was about one hundred years before 2 Hen. 5, besides the differences between these savings and this clause; I doubt not but I shall give ample satisfaction to your lordships, that the commons, as well in this as in all their other reasons, have been most careful to rely upon nothing but that which is most true and pertinent.

Before the second year of king Henry 5, the course was thus: when the commons were suitors for a law, either the Speaker of their house by word of mouth from them, the lords house joining with them, or by some Bill in writing, which was usually called their Petition, moved the king, to ordain laws for the redress of such mischiefs or inconveniences, as were found grievous unto the people.

To these petitions the king made answer as he pleased, sometimes to part, sometimes to the whole, sometimes by denial, sometimes by assent, sometimes absolutely, and sometimes by qualification. Upon these motions and petitions, and the king's answers to them, was the law drawn up and ingrossed in the statute-roll to bind the kingdom; but this inconvenience was found in this course, that oftentimes the statutes thus framed, were against the sense and meaning of the commons, at whose desires they were ordained; and therefore in the 2 Hen. 5, finding that it tended to the violation of their liberty and freedom, whose right it was, and ever had been, that no law should be made without their assent; they then exhibited a petition to the king, declaring their right in this particular: praying, that from thenceforth no law might be made or ingrossed as statutes, by additions or diminutions to their motions or petitions, that should change their sense, or intent, without their assent; which was accordingly established by act of parliament. Ever since then, the right hath been, as the use was before, that the king taketh the whole, or leaveth the whole of all Bills or Petitions, exhibited for the obtaining of laws.

From this course, and from the time when first it became constant and settled, we conclude strongly, that it is no good argument, because ye find Savings in acts of parliaments before the second of Hen. 5, that those Savings were before in the petitions that begat those statutes: for if the petitions for the two Loans so much insisted upon, which petitions, for any thing we know, are not now extant, were never so absolute, yet might the king, according to the usage of those times, insert the Savings in his answers; which passing from thence into the Statute-Roll, do only give some little colour, but are not proof at all that the petitions also were with Savings.

Thus much for the general; to come now to the particular statute of 25 Edw. 1, which was a confirmation of Magna Charta, with some provision for the better execution of it, as Common Law, which words are worth the noting. It is true, that statute hath also a clause to this effect, That the king, or his heirs, from thenceforth should take no Aids, Taxes, or Prisage of his subjects, but by common assent of all the realm, saving the ancient Aids and Prisage due and accustomed.

This Saving, if it were granted, (which is not, nor cannot be proved) that it was as well in the Petition as in the Act; yet can it no way imply, that it is either fit or safe, that the clause now in question should be added to our petition: for the nature and office of a Saving, or exception, is to exempt particulars out of a general, and to ratify the rule in things not exempted, but in no sort to weaken or destroy the general rule itself.

The body of that law was against all Aids, and Taxes, and Prisage in general, and was a confirmation of the common law, formerly declared by Magna Charta; the Saving was only of Aids and Prisage in particular, so well described and restrained by the words, 'ancient' and accustomed,' that there could be no doubt what could be the clear meaning and extent of that exception; for the king's right to those ancient Aids, intended by that statute to be saved to him, was well known in those days, and is not yet forgotten.

These Aids were three; from the king's tenants by knights service, due by the common law, or general custom of the realm: Aid to ransom the king's royal person, if unhappily he should be taken prisoner in the wars: Aid to make the king's eldest son a knight, and Aid to marry the king's eldest daughter once, but no more: and that those were the only Aids intended to be saved to the crown by that statute, appeareth in some clearness by the Charter of king John, dated at Running-Mead the 15th of June, in the fifth year of his reign, wherein they are enumerated with an exclusion of all other Aids whatsoever. Of this Charter I have here one of the originals, whereon I beseech your lordships to cast your eyes, and give me leave to read the very words which concern this point. These words, my lords, are thus: 'Nullum scutagium vel auxilium ponatur in regno nostro, nisi per commune consilium regni nostri, nisi ad corpus nostrum redimendum, et primogenitum filium nostrum militem faciendum, et ad filiam nostram primogenitam semel maritandam, et ad hoc non fiat nisi rationabile auxilium.'

Touching Prisage, the other thing excepted by this Statute, it is also of a particular right to the crown so well known, that it needeth no description, the king being in possession of it by every day's usage. It is to take one tun of wine before the mast, and another behind the mast, of every ship bringing in above twenty tuns of wine, and here discharging them by way of merchandise.

But our Petition consisteth altogether in particulars, to which if any general Saving, or words amounting to one, should be annexed, it cannot work to confirm things not excepted, which are none, but to confound things included, which are all the parts of the Petition; and it must needs beget this dangerous exposition, that the Rights and Liberties of the subject, declared and demanded by this Petition, are not theirs absolutely, but sub modo; not to continue always, but only to take place, when the king is pleased not to exercise that 'sovereign power,' wherewith, this clause admitted, he is trusted for the protection, safety, and happiness of his people. And thus that birthright and inheritance, which we have in our liberties, shall by our own assents be turned into a mere tenancy at will and sufferance.

Touching the Statute of 28 Edw. 1. Articuli super Chartas, the scope of that Statute, among other things, being to provide for the better observing and maintaining of Magna Charta, hath in it nevertheless two Savings for the king; the one particular, as I take it, to preserve the ancient prisage, due and accustomed, as of wines and other goods; the other general, signiory of the crown in all things.

To these two Savings, besides the former answers, which may be for the most part applied to this statute as well as to the former, I add these further answers: the first of these two Savings, is of the same prisage of wines, which is excepted in the 25 Edw. 1, but in some more clearness; for that here the word, wines, is expressly annexed to the word, prisage, which I take for so much to be in exposition of the former law: and albeit these words, and of other goods, be added, yet do I take it to be but a particular Saving, or exception, which being qualified with the words, ancient, due, and accustomed, is not very dangerous, nor can be understood of prisage or levies upon goods of all sorts at the king's will and pleasure; but only of the old and certain customs upon wool, woollens, and leather, which were due to the crown, long before the making of this statute.

For the latter of the two savings in this act, which is of the more unusual nature, and subject to the more exception; it is indeed general, and if we may believe the concurrent relations of the Histories of those times, as well those that are now printed, as those that remain only in manuscripts, it gave distaste from the beginning, and wrought no good effect, but produced such distempers and troubles in the state, as we wish may be buried in perpetual oblivion; and that the like saving in these and future times may never breed the like disturbance: for from hence arose a jealousy, that Magna Charta, which declared the ancient right of the subject, and was an absolute law in itself, being now confirmed by a latter act, with this addition of a general saving; for the king's right in all things by the saving was weakened, and that made doubtful, which was clear before. But not to depart from our main ground, which is, that savings in old acts of parliament, before the 2 H. 5, are no proof that there were the like savings in the petitions for those acts; let me observe unto your lordships, and so leave this point, that albeit this petition, whereon this act of 28 Ed. 1, was grounded, be perished; yet hath it pleased God, that the very frame and context of the act itself, as it is drawn up, and entered upon the Statute-roll, and printed in our book, doth manifestly import, that this saving came in by the king's answer, and was not in the original petition of the lords and commons; for it cometh in at the end of the act after the words (le roy le veut) which commonly are the words of the royal assent to an act of parliament. And though they be mixed and followed with other words, as though the king's counsel, and the rest who were present at the making of this ordinance, did intend the same saving; yet is not that conclusive, so long as by the form of those times, the king's answer working upon the materials of the petition, might be conceived by some to make the law effectual, though varying from the frame of the petition.

The next Reason which the Commons have commanded me to use, for which they still desire to be spared from adding this clause to their Petition, is this: This offensive law of 28 E. 1, which confirmed Magna Charta, with a saving, rested not long in peace, for it gave not that satisfaction to the lords or people, as was requisite they should have in a case so nearly concerning them: and therefore about 33 or 34 of the same king's reign, a latter act of parliament was made, whereby it was enacted, that all men should have their laws, and liberties, and free customs, as largely and wholly as they had used to have at any time when they had them best; and if any statutes had been made, or any customs brought in to the contrary, that all such statutes and customs should be void.

This was the first law which I call now to mind, that restored Magna Charta to the original purity wherein it was first moulded, albeit it hath since been confirmed above twenty times more by several acts of parliament, in the reigns of divers most just and gracious kings, who were most apprehensive of their rights, and jealous of their honours, and always without savings; so as if between 22 and 34 Edw. 1, Magna Charta stood blemished with many savings of the king's rights or seigniory, which might be conceived to be above the law; that stain and blemish was long since taken away, and cleared by those many absolute declarations and confirmations of that excellent law which followed in after ages, and so it standeth at this day purged and exempted now from any such saving whatsoever.

I beseech your lordships therefore to observe the circumstance of time, wherein we offer this Petition to be presented to your lordships, and by us unto his majesty: Do we offer it when Magna Charta stands clogged with savings? No, my lords, but at this day, when latter and better confirmations have viadicated and set free that law from all exceptions; and shall we now annex another and worse saving to it, by an unnecessary clause in that Petition, which we expect should have the fruits and effects of a law? Shall we ourselves relinquish or adulterate that, which cost our ancestors such care and trouble to purchase and refine? No, my lords, but as we should hold ourselves unhappy, if we should not amend the wretched estate of the poor subject, so let us hold it a wickedness to impair it.

Whereas it was further urged by your lordships, That to insert this clause into our Petition, would be no more than to do that again at your lordship's motion and request, which we had formerly done by the mouth of our Speaker; and that there is no cause why we should recede from that which so solemnly we have professed: To this I answer and confess, it was then in our hearts, and it is now, and shall be ever, not to encroach on his majesty's sovereign power. But I beseech your lordships to observe the different occasion and reference of that protestation, and of this clause.

That was a general Answer to a general Message, which we received from his majesty, warning us not to encroach upon his Prerogative; to which, like dutiful and loving subjects, we answered at full, according to the integrity of our own hearts; nor was there any danger in making such an answer to such a message, nor could we answer more truly or more properly: but did that Answer extend to acknowledge 'a sovereign power' in the king, above the laws and statutes mentioned in our Petition, or controul the Liberties of the Subjects, therein declared and demanded? No, my lords, it hath no reference to any such particulars; and the same words which in some cases may be fit to be used, and were unmannerly to be omitted, cannot in other cases be spoken, but with impertinency at the least, if not with danger. I have formerly opened my reasons, proving the danger of this clause, and am commanded to illustrate the impertinency of adding it to the Petition, by a familiar case, which was put in our house by a learned gentleman, and of my own robe: the case is this, two manors or lordships lie adjoining together, and perchance intermixed, so as there is some difficulty to discern the true bounds of either; as it may be touching the confines where the Liberty of the Subject, and the Prerogative of the Crown do border each upon the other; to the one of the manors the king hath clear right, and is in actual possession of it, but the other is the subject's. The king being mis-informed, that the subject hath intruded upon his majesty's manor, asketh his subject, whether he doth enter upon his majesty's manor, or pretendeth any title to it, or any part of it. The Subject being now justly occasioned, maketh answer truly to the king, that he hath not intruded, nor will intrude upon his majesty's manor, nor doth make any claim or title to it, or any part of it. This answer is proper and fair; nay, it were unmannerly and ill done of the subject not to answer upon this occasion. Afterwards the king, upon colour of some double or single matter of record, seizeth into his highness's hands, upon a pretended title, the subject's manor: the subject then exhibiteth his Petition of Right to his majesty, to retain restitution of his own manor, and therein layeth down title to his own manor only: Were it not improper and absurd in this case for him to tell the king, that he did not intend to make any claim or title to his majesty's manor, which is not questioned? Doubtless it were. This case, rightly applied, will fit our purpose well, and notably explain the nature of our Petition.

Why should we speak of leaving entire the king's Sovereign Power, whereon we encroach not, while we only seek to recover our own Liberties and Privileges, which have been seized upon by some of the king's ministers? If our Petition did trench actually upon his majesty's prerogative, would our saying, that we intended it not, make the thing otherwise than the truth?

My lords, there needeth no Protestation or Declaration to the contrary of that which we have not done; and to put in such a Clause, cannot argue less than a fear in us, as if we had invaded it: which we hold sacred, and are as sure, that we have not touched either in our words or in our intentions. And touching your lordships observation upon the word (leave), if it be not a proper word to give any new thing to the king, sure we are, it is a word dangerous in another sense; for it may amount, without all question, to acknowledge an old right of 'sovereign power' in his majesty, above those laws and statutes whereon only our liberties are founded; a doctrine which we most humbly crave your lordships leave freely to protest against. And for your lordship's proffering, that some saving should be requisite for preservation of his majesty's 'sovereign power' in respect our Petition runneth in larger words than our laws and statutes whereon we ground it; what is this but a clear confession by your lordships, that this clause was intended by you to be that saving? For other saving than this we find not tendered by you: and if it be such a saving, how can it stand with your lordships other arguments, that it should be of no other effect than our former expression to his majesty by the mouth of our Speaker? But I will not insist upon collections of this kind; I will only shew you the reasons of the commons, why this Petition needeth no such saving, albeit the words of these statutes be exceeded in the declaratory part of our Petition: those things that are within the equity and true meaning of a statute, are as good laws as those which are contained in the express letter, and therefore the statutes of the 42 Ed. 3, 36 H. 3, Rot. Par. u. 12, and other the statutes made in this time of king Edw. 3, for the explanation of Magna Charta, which hath been so often vouched in this parliament, though they differ in words from Magna Charta, had no saving annexed to any of them, because they enacted more than was contained in effect in that good law, under the words, 'per legale iudicium parium suorum, aut per legem terræ;' which by these latter laws are expounded to import, that none should be put to answer without presentment, or matter of record, or by due process, or writ original: and if otherwise, it should be void, and holden for error.

It hath not been yet shewn unto us from your lordships, that we have in any of our expressions or applications strained or misapplied any of the laws or statutes whereon we do insist; and we are very confident and well assured, that no such mistaking can be assigned in any point of our petition now under question: If therefore it do not exceed the true sense and construction of Magna Charta in the subsequent laws of explanation, whereon it is grounded, what reason is there to add a saving to this petition more than to those laws; since we desire to transmit the fruits of these our labours to posterity, not only for the justification of ourselves, in right of our present and their future liberties, but also for a brave expression and perpetual testimony of that grace and justice, which we assure ourselves we shall receive in his majesty's speedy and clear answer? This is the thing we seek for, and this is the thing we hoped for, and this is the thing only will settle such an unity and confidence betwixt his majesty and us, and raise such a cheerfulness in the hearts of all his loving subjects, as will make us proceed unanimously, and with all expedition to supply him for his great occasions in such measure, and in such way, as may make him safe at home, and feared abroad.

Sir Henry Martin. My lords, the work of this day, wherein the house of commons hath employed the gentleman that spoke last, and myself, was to reply to the Answer, which it hath pleased the Lord-Keeper to make to those Reasons, which we had offered to your lordships consideration, in justification of our refusal, not to admit into our Petition the Addition commended by your lordships. Which Reasons of ours, since they have not given such satisfaction as we desired, and well hoped, as by the Lord-Keeper's Answer appeared; it was thought fit, for our better order and method in replying, to divide the Lord-Keeper's Answer into two parts, a legal and a rational: The reply to the legal your lordships have heard, myself comes intrusted to reply to the rational, which also consisted of two branches, the first deduced from the whole context of the additional clause, the second enforced out of some part.

In the first were these Reasons, That the same deserved our acceptance. 1. As satisfactory to the king; 2. To your lordships; 3. Agreeable to what ourselves had often protested, and professed expressly by the mouth of our Speaker.

I must confess these motives were weighty and of great force; and therefore, to avoid misunderstanding and misconceit, which otherwise might be taken against the house of commons upon the refusal of the propounded Addition, it is necessary to state the question rightly, and to set down the true difference between your lordships and us. Now, indeed, there is no difference or question between your lordships and us, concerning this additional clause in the nature and quality of a proposition. For so considered, we say it is most true, and to be received and embraced by us, 'in toto et qualibet parte et qualibet syllaba;' yea, and were that the question, we should add to the Addition, and instead of due regard, say we have had, have, and ever will have, a special and singular regard, where to leave entire Sovereign Power. But this were to intimate, as if we had first crompt, and then left it; but our regard was to acknowledge and confess it sincerely, and to maintain it constantly, even to the hazard of our goods and lives, if need be.

To which purpose your lordships may be pleased to remember that strict Oath every member of the house hath taken this very session, in these words: 'I (A. B.) do utterly testify and declare in my conscience, That the king's highness is the supreme sovereign governor of this realm in all causes, &c. and to my utmost power will assist and defend all jurisdictions, privileges, preeminences and authorities, granted or belonging to the king's'

'highness, or united or annexed to the imperial crown of this realm, &c.'

So that your lordships need not to borrow from our protestations any exhortations to us, to entertain a writing in assistance of the king's sovereign power, since we stand obliged by the most sacred bond of a solemn oath, to assist and defend the same, if cause or occasion so required. So that the only question between your lordships and us, is, whether this clause should be added to our petition, and received into it as part thereof? Which to do, your lordships reasons have not persuaded us, because so to admit it, were to overthrow the fabric and substance of our Petition of Right, and to annihilate the right pretended by us, and the Petition itself in effect: For these words being added to our Petition, viz. 'We humbly present this Petition, &c. with due regard to leave entire your sovereign power, &c.' do include manifestly an exception to our Petition; and an exception being of the nature of the thing whereunto it is an exception, 'exceptio est de regula,' must of necessity destroy the rule or petition, so far as to the case excepted; 'Exceptio firmat regulam in casibus non exceptis, in casibus exceptis destruit regulam.' Then this construction followeth upon our Petition thus enlarged, that after we have petitioned, that no freeman should be compelled by imprisonment to lend or contribute money to his majesty without his assent in parliament, nor receive, against his will, Soldiers into his house, or undergo a commission of Martial Law for life or member in time of peace; we should add, Except his majesty be pleased to require our moneys, and imprison us for not lending, and send soldiers into our houses, and execute us by martial law, in time of peace, by virtue of his sovereign power: which construction, as it followeth necessarily upon this enlargement, so it concludeth against our right in the premises, and utterly frustrateth all our Petition; neither may it seem strange, if this clause additional (which of itself is in quality of a proposition we confess) being added to our Petition (which also is true) should overthrow the very frame and fabric of it, seeing the logicians take knowledge of such a fallacy, called by them, 'Fallacia à bene divisis ad mala conjuncta.' Horace the poet giveth an instance to this purpose, in a painter, who when he had painted the head of a man according to art, would then join to it the neck of a horse, and so marr the one and the other; whereas each by itself might have been a piece of right good workmanship.

The second branch of my Lord-Keeper's rational part was enforced out of the last words of this Addition, by which his lordship said, that they did not leave intire all sovereign power, but that wherewith his majesty is trusted, for the protection, safety, and happiness of the people; as if his lordship would infer, that sovereign power wherewith, &c. in this place to be terminum diminuentem, a term of diminution or qualification, and in that consideration might induce us to accept it. But under his lordship's correction, we cannot so interpret it: for first we are assured, that there is no sovereign power wherewith his majesty is trusted, either by God, or man, but only that which is for the protection, safety, and happiness of his people; and therefore, that limitation can make no impression upon us: but we conceive it rather in this place to have the force termini adaugentis, to be a term of important advantage against our Petition, a term of restriction, and that wheresoever his majesty's sovereign power should be exercised upon us in all or any the particulars mentioned in the Petition, we should, without further enquiry, submit thereto, as assuming and taking it pro concessio, it conduced to our safety and happiness, &c. Since therefore, (as the Petition is now conceived) it carrieth the form and face of a picture, which representeth to the life the pressures and grievances of the people, with the easy remedies; and therefore we hope that his majesty, casting upon it a gracious eye, will compassionate his poor loyal subjects, and afford a comfortable answer.

I do humbly praise your lordships not to marr or blemish the grace and face of this picture, with this unnecessary addition; and unnecessary I prove it to be, according to that rule, 'Expressio ejus quod tacite inest nihil operatur.' And sovereign power, in cases where it hath place, and ought to be used, is always necessarily understood, and though not expressed, yet supplied by reasonable intendment, or by the opinion of all learned men.

And therefore it neither is nor can be by us expressly included, especially in this Petition, where the Addition thereof would make such a confusion of the whole sense and substance.

The King's Sovereign Power and Prerogative is always able to save itself; and if it were not, we must, without this Addition, save it to our utmost powers, if we will save our oath, and save ourselves. The true state of the cause thus standing between your lordships and us, the house of commons doth not a little marvel upon what grounds your lordships are so earnest to urge upon them this Addition to be inserted into their Petition; they nothing doubt, but the same proceeded out of a solicitude and fear, which your lordships have, lest otherwise the simple and absolute passage of this Petition might be construed hereafter in prejudice of his majesty's sovereign power: and this your lordships solicitude and fear proceedeth from your love, as the poet saith. 'Res est solliciti plena timoris amor.' But I humbly pray your lordships to examine with us, the grounds of this your solicitude and fear; which grounds must needs be laid either upon the words of the Petition, or the intention of the petitioners.

Upon the words there is no possibility to lay them, for therein is no mention made of the Sovereign Power; and were the words doubtful, as thus, We pray the like things be not done hereafter, under pretext of your majesty's sovereign power; yet in respect of the protestations preceding, concomitant and subsequent to the Petition, such doubtful words ought reasonably to be interpreted only of such sovereign power as was applicable to the cases wherein it was exercised; and of such sovereign power as should be justly practised. But there are no such doubtful words, and therefore it followeth, that your lordships fear and solicitude must be grounded upon the intention of the petitioners. Now your lordships will know, that the house of commons is not ignorant, that in a session of parliament, though it continue so many weeks, as this hath done days, yet there is nothing prius et posterius, but all things are held and taken as done at one time. If so, what a strange collection was this, that at the same time the house of commons should oblige themselves, by a fearful abjuration, to assist and defend all privileges and prerogatives belonging to the king, and at the same time by a Petition (cautiously conveyed) endeavour or intend to divest and deprive the king of some prerogatives belonging to his crown? If therefore such fear and solicitude can neither be grounded upon the words of the Petition, nor intention of the petitioners, I humbly pray your lordships to lay them aside. As we do believe that the proposition of this Addition from your lordships was not only excusable, but commendable, as proceeding from your love; so now having heard our reasons, your lordships would rest satisfied, that our refusal to admit them into our Petition, proceedeth from the conscience of the integrity and uprightness of our own hearts, that we in all this Petition have no such end to abate or diminish the king's just prerogative. And so much in reply to that rational part, whereby my lord-keeper laboured to persuade the entertainment of this Addition.

This being done, it pleased the House of Commons to instruct and furnish me with certain Reasons, which I shall use to your lordships, to procure your absolute conjunction with us in presenting this Petition; which albeit I cannot set forth according to their worth, and the instructions given me by the house, yet, I hope, their own weight will so press down into your lordships consciences and judgments, that without farther scruple, you will cheerfully vouchsafe to accompany this Petition with your right noble presence.

A personis. The first argument wherewith I was commanded to move your lordships, was drawn from the consideration of the persons, which are petitioners, the House of Commons; a house, whose temper, mildness, and moderation in this parliament hath been such, as we should be unthankful and injurious to Almighty God, if we should not acknowledge his good hand upon us, upon our tongues, upon our hearts, procured, no doubt, by our late solemn and public humiliation and prayers.

This moderation will the better appear, if, in the first place, it may be remembered, in what passion and distemper many members of this house arrived thither, what bosoms, what pockets full of complaints and lamentable grievances the most part brought thither, and those every day renewed by letters and packets from all parts and quarters: you know the old proverb, 'Ubi dolor ibi digitus, ubi amor ibi oculus:' it is hard to keep our fingers from often handling the parts ill affected; but yet our moderation overcame our passion, our discretion overcame our affection.

This moderation also will the better appear, if in the second place it be not forgotten, how our ancestors and predecessors carried themselves in parliaments, when upon lighter provocations, less would not serve their turns, but new severe commissions to hear and determine offences against their liberties, public ecclesiastical curses, or excommunications against the authors or actors of such violations, accusations, condemnations, executions, banishments. But what have we said all this parliament? We only look forward, not backward: we desire amendment hereafter, no man's punishment for aught done heretofore; nothing written by us in blood, nay, not one word spoken against any man's person in displeasure. The conclusion of our Petition is, that we may be better intreated in time to come: and doth not this moderate Petition deserve your lordships cheerful conjunction, 'ex congruo et condigno?' If a worm being trodden upon could speak, a worm would say, Tread upon me no more, I pray you: Higher we rise not, lower we cannot descend; and thus much we think in modesty may well be spoken in our own commendation thence to move your lordships to vouchsafe us your noble company in this Petition without surcharging it with this Addition.

A tempore. Our next argument is drawn a tempore, from the unseasonableness of the time. The Wiseman saith, 'There is a time for all things under the sun; Tempus suum.' And if, in the Wiseman's judgment, a word spoken in its due time be precious as gold and silver, then an unseasonable time detracts as much from the thing or word done or spoken: we hold (under your favours) that the time is not reasonable now for this Addition. It is true, that of itself, sovereign power is a thing always so sacred, that to handle it otherwise than tenderly, is a kind of sacrilege, and to speak of it otherwise than reverently, is a kind of blasphemy. But every vulgar capacity is not so affected; the most part of men, nay almost all men, judge, and esteem all things, not according to their own intrinsic virtue and quality, but according to their immediate effects and operations, which the same things have upon them. Hence it is, that Religion itself receiveth more or less credit or approbation, as the teachers or professors are worse or better; yea, if God himself send a very wet harvest or seed-time, men are apt enough to censure divine power. The sovereign power hath not now, for the present, the ancient amiable aspect, in respect of some late sad influences; but by God's grace it will soon recover.

To intermix with this Petition any mention of Sovereign Power, rebus sic stantibus, when angry men say, sovereign power hath been abused, and the most moderate wish it had not been so used; we hold it not reasonable, under your lordships correction.

A loco. Our next argument is drawn à loco: we think the place where your lordships would have this Addition inserted, viz. in the Petition, no convenient or seasonable place. Your lordships will easily believe, that this Petition will run through many hands, every man will be desirous to see and to read what their knights and burgesses have done in parliament upon their complaints, what they have brought home for their five Subsidies: If, in perusing of this Petition, they fall upon the mention of sovereign power, they presently fall to arguing, and reasoning, and descanting, what sovereign power is, what is the latitude, whence the original, and where the bounds? with many such curious and captious questions; by which course, sovereign power is little advanced or advantaged: for I have ever been of opinion, that it is then best with sovereign power, when it is had in tacit veneration, not when it is profaned by public hearings or examinations.

Our last Argument is drawn from our duty and loyalty to his majesty, in consideration whereof, we are fearful at this time to take this Addition into our Petition, lest we should do his majesty herein some disservice: with your lordships, we make the great council of the king and kingdom; and though your lordships, having the happiness to be near his majesty, know other things better, yet certainly the state and condition of the several parts for which we serve, their dispositions and inclinations, their apprehensions, their fears and jealousies, are best known unto us. And here I pray your lordships to give me leave to use the figure called Reticentia, that is, to insinuate and intimate more than I mean to speak. Our chief and principal end in this parliament, is, to make up all rents and breaches between the king and his subjects, to draw them, and knit them together, from that distance, whereof the world abroad takes too much notice, to work a perfect union and reconciliation. How improperly and unapt at this time this Addition will be in respect of this end, we cannot but foresee, and therefore shun it; and do resolve, that it is neither agreeable to the persons of such counsellors, of whom we are, nor answerable to that love and duty which we owe to his majesty, to hazard an end of such unspeakable consequence, upon the admittance of this Addition into our Petition, whereof, as we have shewed, the omission at this time can by no means harm the king's prerogative, the expression may produce manifold inconveniences. And therefore, since the admittance of your lordships Addition into our Petition is incoherent and incompatible with the body of the same; since there is no necessary use of it for the saving of the king's Prerogative; since the moderation of our Petition deserveth your lordships cheerful conjunction with us; since this Addition is unseasonable for the time, and inconvenient in respect of the place where your lordships would have it inserted; and lastly, may prove a disservice to his majesty; I conclude with a most affectionate prayer to your lordships, to join with the house of commons, in presenting this Petition unto his sacred majesty, as it is, without this Addition.

Monday, 26th of May, the Lord Keeper made this Speech at a Conference.

Gentlemen; Ye that are knights, citizens and burgesses of the house of commons, I have many times this parliament, by command from my lords, declared the great zeal and affection which my lords have to maintain and nourish the good concurrence and correspondency which hath hitherto continued between both houses, that there might be a happy issue in this great business, for the common good of the king and kingdom. Now that which I have to say this day from my lords, is, to let you know, this fair proceeding is not a profession of words only, but really and indeed concerning the Petition, which hath been long in agitation, as the weight of the cause required. Since the last conference, my lords have taken it into their serious and instant consideration, and at length are fallen upon a resolution, which I am to acquaint you with.

The lords have unanimously agreed with you in omnibus, and have voted, that they will join with you in your Petition, with the only alteration of the word 'means' to be put instead of the word 'pretext'; and for the word 'unlawful' to be put out, and in place thereof to add 'not warrantable by the laws and statutes of the realm.' Which two alterations yourselves consented unto. So that concerning this business there remains nothing now, but that having the Petition in your hands, ye will, if ye have not already, vote it as they have done, and so prepare it for his majesty; and my lords will take order, that the king be moved for a speedy access to present the same to his majesty.

And, after some pause, he said, There rests one thing which my lords have commanded me to add, That in regard this Petition toucheth upon certain charges raised by the lords lieutenants, and other persons, many times for good use, for the service and safety of the kingdom; that ye take it into your care and consideration, and to provide a law for assessing of such charges, as the occasion of the time shall require.

The Lords and Commons being thus happily accorded, the Petition, with the aforesaid Amendments, was read in the house two several times together: then it was voted upon the question, and that it should be ingrossed, and read the third time, and the house to sit in the afternoon till it was ingrossed, and read, and ordered to be presented to the king; to which there was not a negative vote.

Wednesday, 28 May, the Lords and Commons had a Conference about the manner of delivery of the Petition; and sir Ed. Coke reported, that their lordships were agreed, That no addition or preface be used to the king, but that the Petition be preferred to his majesty by command of the lords and commons; and his majesty be desired, that to content his people, he would be pleased to give his gracious Answer in full parliament.

Monday, 2d June, the King came to the Parliament, and spake thus in brief to both Houses:

Gentlemen; I am come hither to perform my duty; I think no man can think it long, since I have not taken so many days in answering the Petition, as you spent weeks in framing it: and I am come hither to shew you, that as well in formal things as in essential, I desire to give you as much content as in me lies.

After this, the Lord Keeper spake as followeth:

My lords, and you the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the house of commons, his majesty hath commanded me to say unto you, that he takes it in good part, that in consideration of settling your own Liberties, you have generally professed in both houses, that you have no intention to lessen or diminish his majesty's prerogative; wherein as you have cleared your own intentions, so now his majesty comes to clear his, and to subscribe a firm league with his people, which is ever likely to be most constant and perpetual, when the conditions are equal, and known to be so: these cannot be in a more happy estate, than when your Liberties shall be an ornament and a strength to his majesty's Prerogative, and his Prerogative a defence of your Liberties; in this his majesty doubts not, but both he and you shall take a mutual comfort hereafter; and, for his part, he is resolved to give an example, in the using of his power for the preservation of your Liberties, that hereafter ye shall have no cause to complain. This is the sum of that which I am to say to you from his majesty: and that which farther remains, is, that you here read your own Petition, and his majesty's gracious Answer.

THE PETITION OF RIGHT.

The PETITION exhibited to his majesty by the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons in this present parliament assembled, concerning divers Rights and Liberties of the Subjects.

To the King's most excellent majesty.

I. "Humbly shew unto our sovereign lord the king, the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons in parliament assembled, that whereas it is declared and enacted by a statute made in the time of the reign of king Edward 1, commonly called, 'statutum de tallagio non concedendo*,' that no tallage or aid shall be laid or levied, by the king or his heirs, in this realm, without the good will and assent of the archbishops, bishops, earls, barons, knights, burgesses, and other the freemen of the commonalty of this realm: and by authority of parliament holden in the 25th year of the reign of king Edward 3*, it is declared and enacted, That from thenceforth no person shall be compelled to make any Loans to the king against his will, because such Loans were against reason, and the franchise of the land; and by other † laws of this realm it is provided, that none should be charged by any charge or imposition, called a Benevolence, nor by such like charge; by which the statutes before-mentioned, and other the good laws and statutes of this realm, your subjects have inherited this freedom, that they should not be compelled to contribute to any tax, tallage, aid, or other like charge, not set by common consent in parliament."

II. "Yet nevertheless, of late, divers Commissions, directed to sundry commissioners in several counties, with instructions, have issued; by means whereof your people have been in divers places assembled, and required to lend certain sums of money unto your majesty, and many of them, upon their refusal so to do, have had an oath administered unto them, not warrantable by the laws or statutes of this realm, and have been constrained to become bound to make appearance, and give attendance before your privy-council, and in other places; and others of them have been therefore imprisoned, confined, and sundry other ways molested and disquieted. And divers other charges have been laid and levied upon your people in several counties, by lords lieutenants, deputy lieutenants, commissioners for musters, justices of peace, and others, by command and direction from your majesty, or your privy-council, against the laws and free customs of this realm.

III. "And whereas also by the statute called †, 'The Great Charter of the Liberties of England,' it is declared and enacted, That no Freeman may be taken or imprisoned or be disseised of his freehold or liberties, or his free customs, or be outlawed or exiled, or in any manner destroyed, but by the lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land."

IV. "And in the 28th year of the reign of king Edward 3 §, it was declared and enacted by authority of parliament, That no man, of what estate or condition he be, should be put out of his land or tenements, nor taken, nor imprisoned, nor disherited, nor put to death, without being brought to answer by due process of law."

V. "Nevertheless, against the tenor of the said statutes ‖, and other the good laws and statutes of your realm, to that end provided,

* 25 Edw. 3, Rot. Parl.

† 1 Edw. 3, 6. 11 R. 2, 9. 1 R. 3, 2.

‡ 9 Hen. 3, 29.

§ 28 Edw. 3, 3.

‖ 37 Edw. 3, 18. 38 Edw. 3, 9. 42 Edw. 3, 3. 17 Ric. 2, 6.

divers of your subjects have of late been imprisoned, without any cause shewed; and when for their deliverance they were brought before your justices, by your majesty's Writs of Habeas Corpus, there to undergo and receive as the court should order, and their keepers commanded to certify the causes of their detainer; no cause was certified, but that they were detained by your majesty's special command, signified by the lords of your privy-council, and yet were returned back to several prisons, without being charged with any thing to which they might make answer according to the law.

VI. "And whereas of late, great companies of Soldiers and Mariners have been dispersed into divers counties of the realm, and the inhabitants, against their wills, have been compelled to receive them into their houses, and there to suffer them to sojourn against the laws and customs of this realm, and to the great grievance and vexation of the people.

VII. "And whereas, also, by authority of parliament, in the 25th year of the reign of king Edw. 3, it is declared and enacted, That no man shall be fore-judged of life or limb against the form of the Great Charter and other the laws and statutes of this realm: and by the said Great Charter, and other the laws and statutes of this your realm, no man ought to be adjudged to death, but by the laws established in this your realm, either by the customs of the same realm, or by acts of parliament: and, whereas no offender of what kind soever is exempted from the proceedings to be used, and punishments to be inflicted by the laws and statutes of this your realm: nevertheless, of late, divers commissions, under your majesty's great seal, have issued forth, by which, certain persons have been assigned and appointed commissioners with power and authority to proceed, within the land, according to the justice of martial law, against such soldiers and mariners, or other dissolute persons joining with them, as should commit any murder, robbery, felony, mutiny, or other outrage or misdemeanor whatsoever; and by such summary course and orders as is agreeable to martial law, and is used in armies in time of war, to proceed to the trial and condemnation of such offenders, and them to cause to be executed and put to death, according to the martial law.

VIII. "By pretext whereof some of your majesty's subjects have been, by some of the said commissioners, put to death; when and where, if by the laws and statutes of the land they had deserved death, by the same laws and statutes also they might and by no other ought to have been adjudged and executed.

IX. "And, also, sundry grievous offenders by colour thereof, claiming an exemption, have escaped the punishment due to them by the laws and statutes of this your realm, by reason that divers of your officers and ministers of justice have unjustly refused, or forborn to proceed against such offenders, according to the same laws and statutes, upon pretence that the said offenders were punishable only by martial law, and by authority of such commissions, as aforesaid; which commissions, and all others of like nature, are wholly and directly contrary to the said laws and statutes of this your realm.

X. "They do therefore humbly pray your most excellent majesty,* 1. That no man hereafter be compelled to make or yield any gift, loan, benevolence, tax, or such like charge, without common consent by act of parliament; 2. and that none be called to make answer, or take such oath, or to give attendance, or be confined, or otherwise molested or disquieted concerning the same, or for refusal thereof: 3. and that no freeman in any such manner as is before mentioned, be imprisoned or detained.

XI. "All which they most humbly pray of your most excellent majesty, as their rights and liberties, according to the laws and statutes of this realm: and that your majesty would also vouchsafe to declare, that the awards, doings, and proceedings, to the prejudice of your people, in any of the premises, shall not be drawn hereafter into consequence or example: and that your majesty would be also graciously pleased, for the further comfort and safety of your people, to declare your royal will and pleasure, that in the things aforesaid, all your officers and ministers shall serve you, according to the laws and statutes of this realm, as they tender the honour of your majesty, and the prosperity of this kingdom." [See Statutes at large, 3, & Car. 1.]

The King's ANSWER.

Which Petition being read the 2d of June, the king's Answer was thus delivered by the lord keeper:

"The king willeth that right be done according to the laws and customs of the realm; and that the statutes be put in due execution, that his subjects may have no cause to complain of any wrong or oppressions, contrary to their just Rights and Liberties: to the preservation whereof, he holds himself in conscience as well obliged, as of his prerogative."

On Tuesday, June 3, the king's Answer was read in the House of Commons, and seemed not full enough, in regard of so much expence of time and labour, as had been employed in contriving the Petition.

June 3. A Message was brought from the King by the Speaker,

"That his majesty having, upon the Petition exhibited by both houses, given an Answer full of justice and grace, for which we and our posterity have just cause to bless his majesty, it is now time to grow to a conclusion of the session; and therefore his majesty thinks fit to let you know, that as he doth resolve to abide by that Answer, without further change or alteration, so he will royally and really perform unto you what he hath thereby promised: and further, that he resolves to end this session upon Wednesday the 11th of this month. And therefore wisheth, that the house will seriously at-

read those businesses, which may best bring the session to a happy conclusion, without entertaining new matters; and so husband the time, that his majesty may with the more comfort bring us speedily together again: at which time, if there be any further grievances not contained, or expressed in the Petition, they may be more maturely considered than the time will now permit."

Another Message was brought from his Majesty by the Speaker, Thursday 5th of June.

"His majesty wished them to remember the Message he last sent them, by which he set a day for the end of this session, and he commanded the Speaker to let them know, that he will certainly hold that day prefixed without alteration; and because that cannot be, if the house entertain more business of length, he requires them, that they enter not into, or proceed with any new business, which may spend greater time, or which may lay any scandal or aspersion upon the state-government or ministers thereof."

Sir Robert Philips, upon this occasion, expressed himself thus: I perceive, that towards God, and towards man, there is little hope, after our humble and careful endeavours, seeing our sins are many and so great: I consider my own infirmities, and if ever my passions were wrought upon, that now this message stirs me up especially; when I remember with what moderation we have proceeded, I cannot but wonder to see the miserable straight we are now in: what have we not done, to have merited? Former times have given wounds enough to the people's liberty, we came hither full of wounds, and we have cured what we could; and what is the return of all but misery and desolation? What did we aim at, but to have served his majesty, and to have done that which would have made him great and glorious? If this be a fault, then we are all criminals. What shall we do, since our humble purposes are thus prevented, which were not to leave laid any aspersion on the government, since it tended to no other end, but to give his majesty true information of his and our danger: And to this we are enforced out of a necessity of duty to the king, our country, and to posterity; but we being stopped, and stopped in such manner, as we are enjoined, so we must now leave to be a council. I hear this with that grief, as the saddest message of the greatest loss in the world. But let us still be wise, be humble; let us make a fair declaration to the king.

Sir John Elliot. Our sins are so exceeding great, that unless we speedily return to God, God will remove himself further from us: we know with what affection and integrity we have proceeded hitherto, to have gained his majesty's heart, and out of a necessity of our duty, were brought to that course we were in: I doubt, a misrepresentation to his majesty hath drawn this mark of his displeasure upon us: I observe in the Message, amongst other sad particulars, it is conceived, that we were about to lay some aspersions on the government; give me leave to protest, that so clear were our intentions, that we desire only to vindicate those dishonours to our king and country, &c. It is said also, as if we cast some aspersions on his majesty's ministers; I am confident no minister, how dear soever, can—

Here the Speaker started up from the seat of the chair, apprehending sir John Ellot intended to fall upon the Duke, and some of the ministers of state; and said, There is a command laid upon me, that I must command you not to proceed.—Whereupon sir John Elliot sat down.

Sir Dudley Diggs. I am as much grieved as ever. Must we not proceed? Let us sit in silence; we are miserable, we know not what to do.

Hereupon there was a silence in the house for a while, which was broken by sir Nathaniel Rich, in these words:

Sir Nathaniel Rich. We must now speak or for ever hold our peace; for us to be silent when king and kingdom are in this calamity, is not fit. The question is, Whether we shall secure ourselves by silence, yea or no? I know it is more for our own security, but it is not for the security of those for whom we serve; let us think on them: some instruments desire a change, we fear his majesty's safety, and the safety of the kingdom, I do not say we now see it; and shall we now sit still and do nothing, and so be scattered? Let us go together to the lords, and shew our dangers, that we may then go to the king together.

Others said, that the Speech lately spoken by sir John Elliot had given offence (as they feared) to his majesty.

Whereupon the House declared, 'That every member of the house is freed from any undutiful Speech, from the beginning of the parliament to that day;' and ordered, 'That the house be turned into a Committee to consider what is fit to be done for the safety of the kingdom; and that no man go out upon pain of going to the Tower.' But before the Speaker left the chair, he desired leave to go forth; and the house ordered that he may go forth, if he please. And the house was hereupon turned into a Grand Committee: Mr. Whitby in the chair.

Mr. Wandesford. I am full of grief as others, let us recollect our English hearts, and not sit still, but do our duties: two ways are propounded, to go to the lords, or to the king; I think it is fit we go to the king, for this doth concern our Liberties, and let us not fear to make a Remonstrance of our Rights; we are his counsellors. There are some men which call evil good, and good evil, and bitter sweet; justice is now called popularity and faction.

Sir Edward Coke. We have dealt with that duty and moderation that never was the like, rebus sic stantibus, after such a violation of the Liberties of the Subject: let us take this to heart. In 30 Ed. 3, were they then in doubt in parliament to name men that misled the king? They accused John de Gaunt, the king's son, and lord Latimer, and lord Nevil, for misadvising the king, and they went to the Tower for it; now when there is such a downfal of the state, shall we hold our tongues? How shall we answer our duties to God and men? 7 H. 4, Parl. Rot. n. 31, & 32, 11 H. 4, n. 13, there the Council are complained of, and are removed from the king; they mewed up the king, and dissuaded him from the common good; and why are we now retired from that way we were in? Why may we not name those that are the cause of all our evils? In 4 H. 3, & 27 E. 3, & 13 R. 2, the parliament moderated the king's prerogative; and nothing grows to abuse, but this house hath power to treat of it. What shall we do? Let us palliate no longer; if we do, God will not prosper us. I think the duke of Buckingham is the cause of all our miseries; and till the king be informed thereof, we shall never go out with honour, or sit with honour here: that man is the grievance of grievances: let us set down the causes of all our disasters, and all will reflect upon him. As for going to the lords, that is not via regia; our liberties are now impeached, we are concerned; it is not via regia, the lords are not participant with our liberties.

Mr. Selden advised, That a Declaration be drawn under four heads: 1. To express the house's dutiful carriage towards his majesty. 2. To tender their Liberties that are violated. 3. To present what the purpose of the house was to have dealt in. 4. That that great person, viz. the Duke, fearing himself to be questioned, did interpose and cause this distraction. All this time, (said he) we have cast a mantle on what was done last parliament; but now being driven again to look on that man, let us proceed, with that which was then well begun, and let the charge be renewed that was last parliament against him, to which he made an answer, but the particulars were sufficient, that we might demand judgment on that answer only.

In conclusion, the house agreed upon several Heads for a Remonstrance. But the Speaker, who after he had leave to go forth, went privately to the King, brought this Message:

"That his majesty commands for the present they adjourn the house till to-morrow morning, and that all committees cease in the mean time."—And the house was accordingly adjourned.

At the same time the king sent for the Lord-Keeper to attend him presently; the house of lords was adjourned ad libitum. The Lord-Keeper being returned, and the house resumed, his lordship signified his majesty's desire, that the house and all committees be adjourned till to-morrow morning.

Friday, 6th of June, Mr. Speaker brought another Message from the King, and said:—In my service to this house I have had many undeserved favours from you, which I shall ever with all humbleness acknowledge, but none can be greater than that testimony of your confidence yesterday shewed unto me, whereby I hope I have done nothing, or made any representation to his majesty, but what is for the honour and service of this house; and I will have my tongue cleave to my mouth, before I will speak to the disadvantage of any member thereof: I have now a Message to deliver unto you;

"Whereas his majesty understanding, that you did conceive his last Message to restrain you in your just privileges, these are to declare his intentions, That he had no meaning of barring you from what hath been your right, but only to avoid all scandals on his council and actions past, and that his ministers might not be, nor himself, under their names, taxed for their counsel unto his majesty, and that no such particulars should be taken in hand, as would ask a longer time of consideration than what he hath already prefixed, and still resolves to hold; that so, for this time, Christendom might take notice of a sweet parting between him and his people: which if it fall out, his majesty will not be long from another meeting, when such grievances, if there be any, at their leisure and convenience may be considered."

Mr. Speaker proceeded:

I will observe somewhat out of this Message; ye may observe a great inclination in his majesty to meet in this house. I was bold yesterday to take notice of that liberty ye gave me to go to his majesty: I know there are none here but did imagine whither I went, and but that I knew you were desirous and content that I should leave you, I would not have desired it: give me leave to say, This Message bars you not of your right in matter, nay, not in manner; but it reacheth to his counsels past, and for giving him counsel in those things which he commanded.

The House of Lords likewise received this Message by the Lord-Keeper.

"My Lords, his majesty takes notice, to your great advantage, of the proceedings of this house upon the hearing of his majesty's Message yesterday; he accounts it a fair respect, that ye would neither agree on any committee, or send any Message to his majesty, though it were in your own hearts, but yield yourselves to his majesty's Message, and defer your own resolutions till you meet again at the time appointed by his majesty. Yet his majesty takes it in extreme good part to hear what was in your heart, and especially that you were so sensible of the inconvenience that might ensue upon the breach of this parliament: which if it had happened or shall hereafter happen, his majesty assures himself, that he shall stand clear before God and men of the occasion.—But his majesty saith, Ye had just cause to be sensible of the danger of considering how the state of Christendom now stands in respect of the multitude and strength of our enemies, and weakness on our part. All which his majesty knows very exactly, and in respect thereof, called this parliament; the particulars his majesty hold it needless to recite, especially to your lordships, since they are apparent to all men: neither will it be needful to reiterate them to his majesty, whose cares are most attentive upon them, and the best remedy that can be thought on therein, is, if his subjects do their parts. Therefore his majesty gives you hearty thanks, and bid me tell you, that nothing hath been more acceptable to him all the time of this parliament, than this dutiful and discreet carriage of your lordships, which he professeth hath been a chief motive to his majesty, to suspend those intentions that were not far from a resolution."

Sir Robert Philips assumed the debate, upon the Message delivered by the Speaker, and said; I rise up with a disposition, somewhat in more hope of comfort than yesterday; yet, in regard of the uncertainty of counsels, I shall not change much. In the first place, I must be bold without flattering, a thing not incident to me, to tell you Mr. Speaker, you have not only at all times discharged the duty of a good Speaker, but of a good man; for which I render you many thanks.—Another respect touching his majesty's Answer to our Petition; first, if that answer fall out to be short, I free his majesty, and I believe his resolution was to give that which we all expected: but in that, as in others, we have suffered, by reason of interposed persons between his majesty and us. But this day is by intervenient accidents diverted from that, but so, as in time we go to his majesty; therefore let us remove those jealousies in his majesty of our proceedings, that by some men overgrown have been misrepresented. We have proceeded with temper, in confidence of his majesty's goodness to us, and our fidelity to him; and if any have construed, that what we have done hath been out of fear, let him know we came hither freemen, and will ever resolve to endure the worst; and they are poor men that make such interpretations of parliaments. In this way and method we proceeded, and if any thing fall out unhappily, it is not king Charles that advised himself, but king Charles misadvised by others, and misled by misordered counsel; it becomes us to consider what we were doing, and now to advise what is fit to be done. We were taking consideration of the state of the kingdom, and to present to his majesty the danger he and we are in, if since any man hath been named in particular, (though I love to speak of my betters with humility) let him thank himself and his counsels, but those necessary jealousies give us occasion to name him; I assure myself we shall proceed with temper, and give his majesty satisfaction, if we proceed in that way. His majesty's message is now explanatory in point of our liberties, that he intends not to bar us of our rights, and that he would not have any aspersion cast on the counsels past; let us present to his majesty shortly and faithfully, and declare our intentions, that we intend not to lay any aspersions upon him, but out of a necessity to prevent the imminent dangers we are surrounded with, and to present to him the affairs at home and abroad, and to desire his majesty, that no interposition or mis-information of men in fault may prevail, but to expect the issue that shall be full of duty and loyalty.

The Commons sent a Message to the Lords, that they would join in an humble request to the king, that a clear and satisfactory Answer be given by his majesty in full parliament to the Petition of Right; whereunto the lords did agree.

June 7, the King came to the Lords House, and the house of commons were sent for. And the Lord-Keeper presented the humble Petition of both houses, and said,

"May it please your most excellent majesty, the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons in parliament assembled, taking into consideration that the good intelligence between your majesty and your people doth much depend upon your majesty's Answer unto their Petition of Right formerly presented; with unanimous consent do now become most humble suitors unto your majesty, that you would be graciously pleased to give a clear and satisfactory Answer thereunto in full parliament."

Whereunto the King replied,

"The Answer I have already given you was made with so good deliberation, and approved by the judgments of so many wise men, that I could not have imagined, but it should have given you full satisfaction; but to avoid all ambiguous interpretations, and to shew you that there is no doubleness in my meaning, I am willing to please you as well in words as in substance; read your Petition, and you shall have an Answer that I am sure will please you."

The Petition was read, and this Answer was returned:

Soit droit fait come il est desiré par le Petition.
C. R.

"This I am sure (said his majesty) is full, yet no more than I granted you in my first Answer; for the meaning of that was to confirm all your Liberties, knowing, according to your own protestations, that you neither mean nor can hurt my Prerogative. And I assure you, my maxim is, that the people's Liberties strengthen the king's Prerogative, and the king's Prerogative is to defend the people's Liberties. You see how ready I have shewed myself to satisfy your demands, so that I have done my part; wherefore, if this parliament have not a happy conclusion, the sin is yours, I am free from it."

Whereupon the Commons returned to their own house with unspeakable joy, and resolved so to proceed as to express their thankfulness.

The King's Message to the Lower House by sir Humphrey May, 10th of June 1628.

His majesty is well pleased that your Petition of Right, and his Answer, be not only recorded in both houses of parliament, but also in all the courts of Westminster; and that his pleasure is, it be put in print for his honour, and the content and the satisfaction of his people, and that you proceed cheerfully to settle businesses for the good and reformation of the commonwealth.

June 26. The Speaker being sent for to the king at Whitehall, came not into the house till about nine o'clock. I will after prayers, the Remonstrance concerning Tunnage and Poundage being ingrossed, was a reading in the house; and while it was a reading, the king sent for the Speaker and the whole house, and the king made a Speech as followeth:

"It may seem strange, that I came so suddenly to end this session; before I give my assent to the bills. I will tell you the cause, though I must avow, that I owe the account of my actions to God alone. It is known to every one, that a while ago the house of commons gave me a Remonstrance; how acceptable, every man may judge; and for the merit of it, I will not call that in question, for I am sure no wise man can justify it.—Now, since I am truly informed that a second Remonstrance is preparing for me to take away the profit of my Tunnage and Poundage, one of the chief maintenances of my crown, by alledging I have given away my right thereto by my Answer to your Petition:—This is so prejudicial unto me, that I am forced to end this session some few hours before I meant, being not willing to receive any more Remonstrances, to which I must give a harsh Answer. And since I see, that even the house of commons begins already to make false constructions of what I granted in your Petition, lest it be worse interpreted in the country, I will now make a Declaration concerning the true intent thereof:—The profession of both houses in the time of hammering this Petition, was no way to trench upon my Prerogative, saying, they had neither intention or power to hurt it. Therefore it must needs be conceived, that I have granted no new, but only confirmed the ancient Liberties of my Subjects. Yet to shew the clearness of my intentions, that I neither repent nor mean to recede from any thing I have promised you, I do here declare myself, That those things which have been done, whereby many have had some cause to suspect the Liberties of the Subjects to be trespassed upon, which indeed was the first and true ground of the Petition, shall not hereafter be drawn into example for your prejudice; and from time to time, in the word of a king, ye shall not have the like cause to complain. But as for Tunnage and Poundage, it is a thing I cannot want, and was never intended by you to ask, nor meant by me, I am sure, to grant.—To conclude, I command you all that are here to take notice of what I have spoken at this time, to be the true intent and meaning of what I granted you in your Petition; but especially you, my lords the Judges, for to you only, under me, belongs the interpretation of laws: for none of the houses of parliament, either joint or separate, (what new doctrine soever may be raised) have any power either to make or declare a law without my consent."

Then the Lord Keeper said, It is his majesty's pleasure that this session now end, and that the parliament be prorogued till the 20th of October next.

In the following sessions, viz. Wednesday, January 21st, it was ordered that Mr. Selden and others should see if the Petition of Right and his majesty's Answer thereunto were enrolled in the Parliament Rolls, and the Courts at Westminster, as his majesty sent them word the last session they should be; and also in what manner they were entered; which was done accordingly, and Mr. Selden made report to the house, that his majesty's Speech made the last day of the session in the upper house is also entered by his majesty's command.—Hereupon Mr. Pyn moved, that the debate hereof should be deferred till Tuesday next, by reason of the fewness of the house.

Sir John Elliot. This which is now mentioned, concerns the honour of the house, and the liberty of the kingdom; it is true, it deserves to be deferred till there be a full house, but it is good to prepare things. I find it is a great point; I desire a select Committee may enter into consideration thereof, and also how other Liberties of the kingdom be invaded. I find in the country the Petition of Right printed indeed, but with an Answer that never gave any satisfaction: I desire a committee may consider thereof, and present it to the house, and that the printer be sent for to give satisfaction to the house, by what warrant it was printed. Which was ordered.

Mr. Selden. For this Petition of Right, it is known how lately it hath been violated since our last meeting; the Liberties for life, person and freehold, how they have been invaded; and have not some been committed, contrary to that? Now we, knowing these invasions, must take notice of it. For Liberties, for State, we know of an order made in the Exchequer, that a sheriff was commanded not to execute a replevin, and men's goods are taken and must not be restored. Whereas no man ought to lose life, or limb, but by law; hath not one lately lost his ears (meaning Savage) that was censured in the Star-Chamber by an arbitrary sentence and judgment? Next, they will take away our arms, and then our lives. Let all see we are sensible of these customs creeping upon us: let us make a just presentation hereof to his majesty.

Norton the King's Printer was brought to the bar, and asked by what warrant the Additions to the Petition were printed? He answered, that there was a warrant (as he thought) from the king himself. And being asked, whether there were not some copies printed without additions, he answered, there were some, but they were suppressed by warrant.

Sir John Elliot desired some clearer satisfaction might be made, and that he might answer directly by what warrant.—Whereupon he was called in again: who said, he did not remember the particular, but sure he was there was a warrant.

Mr. Selden reported from the Committee concerning the printing of the Petition of Right, that there were printed 1500 without any Addition at all, which were published in the time of the last parliament: but since the parliament, other copies have been printed, and these suppress and made waste paper; which the Printer did, as he said, by command from Mr. Attorney, which he received from his majesty. And the Printer further said, That the Attorney was with the Lord Privy-Seal at Whitehall, and there delivered unto the Printer sundry papers, with divers hands to them, and on the backside was endorsed thus, 'We will 'and command you, that these Copies be 'printed.'

Which put an end to this Grand Affair.

128. Case of WALTER LONG, esq. Sheriff of Wilts, and one of the Burgesses for Bath, for absenting himself from his Bailiwick to attend his duty in Parliament: 4 CHARLES I. A. D. 1629. [1 Rushworth, 684. 2 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 518.]

IN Hilary Term, 1629, the Case of Walter Long, esq. one of the imprisoned Gentlemen, came to hearing in the Star-Chamber, which was as followeth:

An Information was exhibited into the Star-Chamber, by sir Robert Heath, knight, his majesty's Attorney-General, plaintiff, against the said Walter Long, defendant, for a great and presumptuous Contempt against his majesty, for breach of duty and trust of his office, and for manifest and wilful breach of his oath taken as High Sheriff of the county of Wilts, and not residing and dwelling in his own person in the said county, according to the said oath; but being chosen one of the citizens for the city of Bath, in the county of Somerset, to serve for the said city in the last parliament, by colour thereof he remained at London or Westminster, during the time of that parliament by the space of three months and above, in neglect of his duty, and in manifest contempt of the laws of this kingdom: which cause was now, by his majesty's said Attorney-General, brought to hearing upon the defendant's own confession.

And upon opening the Answer, and reading the Examination of the said defendant, it appeared to this Court, 'That the said defendant Long was by his now majesty, made High Sheriff of the county of Wilts in or about November, in the third year of his majesty's reign, and received his patent of sheriffwick for the said county about ten days after; and that he took an oath before one of the masters of the Chancery, for the due execution of the said office of Sheriff of the said county.' In which oath, as appeared by the same there read in court, he did swear, That he would in his own person remain within his Bailiwick during all the time of his Sheriffwick, unless he had the king's license to the contrary; and that at an election of citizens for the said city of Bath, the said defendant Long was chosen one of the citizens to serve for the said city of Bath in the parliament then summoned, to be holden and commence upon the 17th day of March in the said 3d year of his majesty's reign; and being so chosen, and returned by the Sheriff of the county of Somerset, notwithstanding his said oath taken to remain in his proper person, within his bailiwick, unless he were licensed by his majesty, he the said defendant did make his personal appearance in the commons house of parliament, at the city of Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, and did, during the most part of the said parliament, continue in and about the city of London and Westminster, and did attend in the parliament as a citizen for the said city of Bath: during all which time he likewise was and continued High Sheriff for the said county of Wilts, and had no particular license from his majesty to the contrary. Upon consideration whereof, as also of the particular causes and reasons of the defendant's demurrer and plea formerly exhibited unto the said Information, the benefit whereof was by order of the court reserved unto the defendant to be debated and considered of at the hearing of this cause, and of divers other matters now urged for the defendant, both to have justified his the said defendant's attendance in parliament, and his not residence in person in the county whereof he was then Sheriff; and amongst other things, that it properly belonged to the house of parliament to judge of the justness or unjustness of the said election; and upon grave and mature consideration thereof, had and taken by the court, their lordships did not only conceive the said demurrer and plea, and other the arguments and reasons used by the defendant and his counsel to be of no weight or strength, but also to be in opposition and derogation of the jurisdiction of the court; the reasons moved and urged for the defendant's excuse or justification being clearly answered, and the charges of the Information made good by Mr. Attorney-General, and others of his majesty's counsel learned. And therefore the whole court were clear of opinion, and did so declare, 'That the said defendant, who at that time, as High Sheriff, had the custody and

‘ charge of the county of Wilts committed unto him by his majesty, and had taken his oath according to the law to abide in his proper person within his bailiffwick during all the time of his sheriffwick as aforesaid, and whose trust and employment did require his personal attendance in the said county, had not only committed a great offence in violating the said oath so by him taken, but also a great misdemeanor in breach of the trust committed unto him by his majesty, and in contempt of his majesty’s pleasure signified unto him by and under his highness’s great seal, when he granted unto him the said office of sheriffwick aforesaid.’

For which said several great offences in breach of his said oath, neglect of the trust and duty of his office, and the great and high contempt of his majesty, their lordships did hold the same defendant worthy the sentence of the court; the rather, to the end that by this example the sheriffs of all other counties may be deterred from committing the like offences hereafter, and may take notice, that their personal residence and attendance is required within their bailiffwicks during the time of their sheriffwick. The court therefore thought fit, ordered, adjudged, and decreed, That the said Defendant should stand and be committed to the Prison of the Tower, there to remain during his majesty’s pleasure, and also to pay a fine of 2,000 marks to his majesty’s use; and further, make his humble submission and acknowledgment of his offence both in the court of Star-Chamber, and to his majesty, before his thence enlargement.

129. Proceedings against WILLIAM STROUD, esq. WALTER LONG, esq. JOHN SELDEN, esq. and others, on an Habeas Corpus, in Banco Regis: 5 CHARLES I. A. D. 1629.*

ON February 23rd, the house of commons being upon the debate of the business of the Customers, who had seized Goods belonging to Mr. Rolls, a member of the house, dissolved themselves into a grand committee, and at last resolved, “ That Mr. Rolls, a member of the house, ought to have privilege of person and goods; but the command of the king is so great, that they leave it to the house.”

After which, the king’s Message, in justification of the Farmers and Officers of the Customs, was taken into consideration; which occasioned warm debates, and the Speaker (Finch) being moved to put the question then proposed, refused to do it, and said, ‘ That he was otherwise commanded by the king.’

Then said Mr. Selden, Dare not you, Mr. Speaker, put the question when we command you? If you will not put it, we must sit still; thus we shall never be able to do any thing. They that come after you, may say, They have the king’s command not to do it. We sit here by the command of the king under the Great Seal, and you are, by his majesty, sitting in this royal chair, before both houses, appointed for our Speaker: and now you refuse to perform your office.

Hereupon the house, in some heat, adjourned till Wednesday the 25th, when both houses, by his majesty’s command, were adjourned until Monday the 2nd of March.

March 2. The commons met, and urged the Speaker to put the question; who said, ‘ I have a command from the king to adjourn till March the 10th; and put no question.’ And endeavouring to go out of the Chair, was notwithstanding held by some members (the house foreseeing a dissolution) till a Protestation was published in the house; 1. “ Against Popery and Arminianism. 2. Against Tunnage and Poundage not granted by parliament. 3. If any merchant yield or pay Tunnage and Poundage not granted by parliament, he should be reputed a betrayer of the liberties of England.”

Hereupon the king sent for the Serjeant of the house; but he was detained, the door being locked: Then he sent the Gentleman Usher of the Lords house, with a Message; and he was refused admittance, till the said Votes were read. And then in much confusion the house was adjourned to the 10th of March. Nevertheless his majesty, by proclamation, dated the 2nd of March, declares the parliament to be dissolved. (Though the proclamation was not published till the 10th) and the day following, (the 3rd) warrants were directed from the council to Denzil Hollis, esq.; sir Miles Hobart, sir John Elliot, sir Peter Hayman, John Selden, William Coriton, Walter Long, William Stroud, Benjamin Valentine, esqrs.; commanding their personal appearance on the morrow. At which time, Mr. Hollis, sir John Elliot, Mr. Coriton, Mr. Valentine, appearing, and refusing to answer out of parliament what was said and done in parliament, were committed close prisoners to the Tower; and Warrants were given (the parliament being still in being) for the sealing up of the studies of Mr. Hollis, Mr. Selden, and sir John Elliot. But Mr. Long and Mr. Stroud not then, nor for some time after, appearing, a Proclamation issued forth for the apprehending of them.

The king purposing to proceed against the members of the house of commons, who were committed to prison by him in the Star Chamber, caused certain Questions to be proposed to the Judges upon the 25th of April. Whereupon all the Judges met at Serjeants-Inn by command from his majesty, where Mr. Attor-

ner proposed certain Questions concerning the Offences of some of the parliament men committed to the Tower, and other prisons: At which time, one question was proposed and resolved, viz. 'That the statute of 4 H. 8, intituled, 'An Act concerning Richard Strode,' was 'a particular act of parliament, and extended 'only to Richard Strode, and to those persons 'that had joined with him to prefer a Bill to 'the house of commons concerning Tinnors: 'And although the act be private, and extendeth to them alone, yet it was no more than all 'other parliament men, by privilege of the 'house, ought to have, viz. Freedom of speech 'concerning those matters debated in parliament by a parliamentary course.'

The rest of the Questions Mr. Attorney was wished to set down in writing against another day.

Upon Monday following, all the Judges met again, and then Mr. Attorney proposed these Questions:

1. Whether if any Subject hath received probable information of any Treason or treacherous attempt or intention against the king or state, that Subject ought not to make known to the king, or his majesty's commissioners, when thereunto he shall be required, what information he hath received, and the grounds thereof; to the end the king being truly informed, may prevent the danger? And if the said subject in such case shall refuse to be examined, or to answer the questions which shall be demanded of him for further inquiry and discovery of the truth, whether it be not a high contempt in him, punishable in the Star Chamber, as an offence against the general justice and government of the kingdom?

Sol. The resolution and answer of all the Justices, That it is an offence punishable as aforesaid, so that this do not concern himself, but another, nor draw him to danger of treason or contempt by his answer.

2. Whether it be a good answer or excuse, being thus interrogated, and refusing to answer, to say, That he was a parliament man when he received the information, and that he spake thereof in the parliament house: and therefore the parliament being now ended, he refused to answer to any such questions but in the parliament house, and not in any other place?

Sol. To this the Judges, by advice privately to Mr. Attorney, gave this Answer, That this excuse being in nature of a plea, and an error in judgment, was not punishable, until he were over-ruled in an orderly manner to make another answer; and whether the party were brought in ore tenus, or by information, for this plea he was not to be punished.

3. Whether a parliament man, committing an offence against the king or council not in a parliament way, might, after the parliament ended, be punished or not?

Sol. All the Judges, una voce, answered, he might, if he be not punished for it in parliament; for the parliament shall not give privilege to any 'contra morem parliamentarium,' to exceed the bounds and limits of his place and duty. And all agreed, That regularly he cannot be compelled out of parliament to answer things done in parliament in a parliamentary course; but it is otherwise where things are done exorbitantly, for those are not the acts of a court.

4. Whether if one parliament man alone shall resolve, or two or three shall covertly conspire to raise false slanders and rumours against the lords of the council and judges, not with intent to question them in a legal course, or in a parliamentary way, but to blast them, and to bring them to hatred of the people, and the government in contempt, be punishable in the Star Chamber after the parliament is ended?

Sol. The Judges resolve, That the same was punishable out of parliament, as an offence exorbitant committed in parliament, beyond the office, and besides the duty of a parliament man.

There was another question put by Mr. Attorney, viz.

Whether if a man in parliament, by way of digression, and not upon any occasion arising concerning the same in parliament, shall say, The Lords of the Council and the Judges had agreed to trample upon the Liberty of the Subject, and the Privileges of Parliament, he were punishable or not?

The Judges desired to be spared to make any Answer thereunto, because it concerned themselves in particular.*

* Nalson in his Collections, vol. 2. p. 374, says, There were several Questions proposed to the three Chief-Judges about matters in Parliament, to which they gave these answers; which being something different from what is above, are here inserted: Quære 1. Whether a Parliament-man, offending the king criminally or contemptuously in the parliament-house (and not then punished), may not be punished out of parliament? Answer. We conceive, that if a parliament-man, exceeding the privilege of parliament, do criminally or contemptuously offend the king in the parliament-house (and not there punished) may be punished out of parliament.—2. Whether the king, as he hath the power of calling and dissolving a Parliament, have not also an absolute power to cause it to be adjourned at his pleasure? Ans. We conceive, that the king hath the power of commanding of adjournments of parliaments, as well as of calling, proroguing and dissolving of parliaments: But for the manner thereof, or the more particular answer to this, and the next subsequent question, we refer ourselves to the precedents of both houses.—3. Whether, if the king do command an adjournment to be made, he hath not also power to command all further proceedings in parliament to cease at that time? 4. Whether it be not a high contempt in a member of the house, contrary to the king's express commandment, contemptuously to oppose the adjournment? Ans. The king's express commandment being signified for an adjournment, if any after that shall contemptuously oppose it, further, or otherwise than the privilege of the house will warrant; this we

The next day Mr. Attorney put the Judges another case.

It is demanded of a parliament-man, being called ore tenus, before the court of Star-Chamber, being charged, that he did not submit himself to examination for such things as did concern the king and the government of the state, and were affirmed to be done by a third person, and not by himself; if he confesses his hand to that refusal, and make his excuse, and plead because he had privilege of parliament;

Whether the Court will not over-rule this Plea as erroneous, and that he ought to make a further answer?

Ans. It is the justest way for the king and the party not to proceed ore tenus, because it being a point in law, it is fit to hear counsel before it be over-ruled; and upon an ore tenus, by the rules of Star-Chamber, counsel ought not to be admitted; and that it would not be for the honour of the king, nor the safety of the subject, to proceed in that manner. [But the king dropped the Proceedings against them in the Star-Chamber.]

Pasch. 5 Car. upon an Habeas Corpus of this court to bring the body of William Stroud, esq. with the cause of his imprisonment, to the marshal of the King's-bench; it was returned in this manner:

conceive to be a great contempt.—5. Whether, if a few parliament-men do conspire together, to stir up ill affections in the people against the king, and the government, and to leave the parliament with such a loose, and by words or writings put it in execution, and this not punished in parliament, it be an offence punishable out of parliament? Ans. We conceive this offence to be punishable out of parliament.—6. Whether, if some parliament-men shall conspire together to publish papers containing false and scandalous rumours against the lords of the Privy-Council, or any one or more of them, not to the end to question them in a legal or parliamentary way, but to bring them into hatred of the people, and the government into contempt, and to make discord between the lords and commons; is not this an offence punishable out of parliament? Ans. We conceive this also to be an offence punishable out of parliament.—7. If two or three or more of the parliament shall conspire to defame the king's government, and to deter his subjects from obeying or assisting the king; of what nature this offence is? Ans. The nature and quality of this offence will be greater or lesser, as the circumstances shall fall out, upon the truth of the fact.—8. Can any privilege of the house warrant a tumultuous proceeding? Ans. We humbly conceive, that an earnest, though a disorderly and confused proceeding in such a multitude, may be called tumultuous, and yet the privilege of the house may warrant it.—We in all humbleness are willing to satisfy your majesty's command, but until the particulars of the fact do appear, we can give no direct Answer than before, And particularly as to the

' That Mr. William Stroud was committed under my custody by virtue of a certain Warrant under the hands of twelve the lords of the privy-council of the king. The tenour of which Warrant followeth in these words:

' You are to take knowledge, that it is his majesty's pleasure and commandment, that you take into your custody the body of William Stroud, esq.; and keep him close prisoner till you shall receive other order, either from his majesty, or this board: for so doing, this shall be your Warrant. Dated this 2d of April, 1629.' And the direction of the Warrant was, 'To the marshal of the King's-bench, or his deputy.'

He is also detained in prison by virtue of a Warrant under his majesty's hand; the tenour of which Warrant followeth in these words:

C. R.; 'Whereas you have in your custody the body of William Stroud, esq. by Warrant of our lords of our privy-council, by our special command, you are to take notice, that this commitment was for notable contempts by him committed against our self and our government, and for stirring up sedition against us; for which you are to detain him in your custody, and to keep him close prisoner, until our pleasure be further known concerning his deliverance. Given at Greenwich, second Quære, about the king's power of adjourning as well as calling and dissolving of Parliaments, these following parliamentary precedents were given in. 4 Aprilis, 1 Jac. Sess. 1. Mr. Speaker pronounceth his majesty's pleasure of adjourning the house till the 11th of April (and it was so done).—18 Dec. 1606. The lords by their messengers signified the king's pleasure, that the session should be adjourned till the 10th of Feb. following.—Upon this Message Mr. Speaker adjourned the house according to his majesty's said pleasure.—31 Martii 1607. The Speaker delivered the king's pleasure, that the house should be adjourned till Monday the 20th of April following.—20 Maii 1607. Mr. Speaker signified the king's pleasure about nine o'clock to adjourn the house till the 27th of the same month.—And the 27th of May, he being challenged for adjourning without the privy of the house, he excuseth it, and saith, as the house had power to adjourn themselves, so the king had a superior power, and by his command he did it.—30 Martii 1610. His majesty's pleasure to adjourn from Tuesday till Monday sevennight.—11 July. The king by commission adjourneth the lords house. Messengers sent to the commons. They send by messengers of their own to the lords, that they use to adjourn themselves. The commission is sent down, Mr. Speaker adjourneth the house till the 1st of August.—26 Febr. 4 Car. Mr. Speaker signifieth his majesty's pleasure, that the house be presently adjourned till Monday next, and in the meantime all committées and other proceedings to cease. And thereupon Mr. Speaker in the name of the house adjourned the same accordingly.

' the 7th of May, 1629, in the 5th year of our ' reign.'

The direction being, ' To the marshal of our ' bench for the time being, et hæ sunt causæ ' captionis et detentionis prædicti Guhelmi ' Stroud.'

And upon another Habeas Corpus to the Marshal of the Houshold, to have the body of Walter Long, esq. in court, it was returned according to the return of Mr. Stroud was.

Mr. Ask, of the Inner-Temple, of counsel for Mr. Stroud; and Mr. Mason of Lincoln's-Inn, of counsel for Mr. Long; argued against the insufficiency of the Return.

Mr. Ask. That the Return was insufficient. The Return consists upon two Warrants, bearing several dates, which are the causes of the taking and detaining of the prisoner. For the first warrant, which is of the lords of the council, that is insufficient: because no cause is shewn of his commitment, which is expressly against the resolution of the parliament, and their Petition of Right, in the time of this king, which now is, to which he had likewise given his assent; so his taking by virtue of the said warrant is wrongful. And for the second warrant, it is insufficient also, and that notwithstanding it be the king's own; and for the king himself cannot imprison any man, as our books are, to wit, 16 H. 6, F. Monstrance de faits. 1 H. 7, 4. Hussey reports it to be the opinion of Markham, in the time of Edw. 4, and Fortescue in his book, ' De laudibus Legum Angliæ,' c. 18. And the reason given is, because no action of false imprisonment lies against the king, if the imprisonment be wrongful; and the king cannot be a wrong doer. The statute of Magna Charta is, That no freeman be imprisoned but by the law of the land. And it appears by these books, that it is against the law of the land that the king should imprison any one.

2. Admit that this be only a signification and notification given by the king himself, of the commitment of the prisoner; yet it seems that that signification is of no force, 1. Because the words are general and uncertain—' for notable contempts.'—There are in the law many contempts of several natures; there are contempts against the Common Law, against the Statute Law; contempts in words, gestures, or actions. And it appears not to the court of what nature these contempts were.—' Notable'—Every contempt which is made to the king is notable.—' Against our government'—Contempt which is committed in the Court of Record or Chancery, is a contempt against the government of the king, to wit, because they disobey the king when he commands them by his writs, Coke 8, 60, a. Beecher's Case. The last words of the Return are,—' For stirring up ' of sedition against us'—which words likewise are indefinite and general. I find not the word 'Sedition' in our books, but taken adjectively, as seditious books, seditious news, &c. In the Statute of the 1st and 2d Phil. and Mary, cap. 3, the words are, ' If any person shall be convicted, &c. for speaking, &c. any false, sedi' tious, or slanderous news, saying of tales of ' the queen, &c. he shall lose his ears, or pay ' 100l.' There the penalty imposed upon such sedition is but a fine. Coke 4. Lord Cromwell's Case, p. 13, where sedition is defined to be seorsum illis, when a man takes a course of his own, and there it is said, that the words—' maintain sedition against the queen's ' proceedings'—shall be expounded according to the coherence of all the words, and the intent of the parties. So that it is plain, that there is a sedition that is only fineable, and which is no cause of imprisonment without bail: And what the sedition is that is here intended, cannot be gathered out of the words, they are so general.—' Against us'—those words are redundant, for every sedition is against the king.

Upon the generality and uncertainty of all the words in the Return, he put these Cases; 18 E. 3. A man was indicted, ' quia furatus ' est equum,' and doth not say, felonice, and therefore ill. 29 Ass. 45. A man was indicted that he was ' communis latro,' and the indictment held vicious, because too general. So here the offences are returned generally. But there ought to be something individual, Coke 5, 57. Specot's case, ' quia schismaticus inventatus,' is no good cause for the bishop to refuse a clerk, for it is too general, and there are schisms of divers kinds. 38 E. 3, 2. Because the clerk is criminatus, it is no good cause for the bishop to refuse him. 8 and 9 Eliz. Dy. 254. The bishop of N. refuseth one, because he was a haunter of taverns, &c. for which, and divers other crimes, he was unfit; held that the last words are too general and uncertain. 40 E. 3, 6. In the tender of a marriage, and refusal of the heir, he ought to alledge a certain cause of refusal, whereupon issue may be taken. Coke 8, 68. Trollop's case, to say, That the plaintiff is excommunicated for divers contumacies, shall not disable him, without shewing some cause in special of the excommunication, upon which the court may judge whether it were just or no: so here. And he concluded with a Case that was resolved, Hill. 33 Eliz. Peak and Paul the defendants said of the plaintiff, Thou art a mutinous and seditious man, and maintainest sedition against the queen; and the words adjudged not actionable.

Mr. Mason (afterwards recorder of London) moved also, that the Return was insufficient. For the first Warrant, That he was committed by command of the king, signified by the privy-council, I will not argue that, because it was claimed as an ancient right pertaining to the subject in the Petition of Right, whereto the king himself hath given his consent. For the second Warrant, the Return is,—' for stirring up sedition against us and our government.' Sedition is not any determined offence within our law; our law gives definitions or descriptions of other offences, to wit, of treason, murder, felony, &c. but there is no crime in our law called Sedition. It is defined by a civilian to be ' Seditio,' or ' Secessio, cum 'pars reipublicæ contra partem insurgit;' so that sedition is nothing but division. Bracton and Glanville have the word Seditio generally. Before the statute of 25 E. 3, cap. 2, it was not clear enough what thing was Treason, what not; by which statute it is declared what shall be called Treason, and that the Judges shall not declare any thing to be Treason, that is not contained within the said statute, but it shall be declared only by parliament. And that statute speaks not of sedition, nor the statute of 1 H. 4, c. 10, which makes some things treason, which are not contained within the said statute of 25 E. 3. The statute of 1 E. 6, c. 12, takes away all intervenient statutes, which declared new treasons; and the said act declares other things to be treason, but mentions not sedition. Sedition is the quality of an offence, and is oftentimes taken adverbially, or adjectively. To raise tumults or trespasses is sedition, Trin. 21 E. 3, rot. 23, B. R. Garbart's case; a man was indicted, because in the high-street he took J. S. there being in hostile manner, and usurped over him royal power, which is manifest sedition; and there it was but an indictment of trespass. Mich. 20 E. 1, rot. 27. One that was surveyor of the wood-work for the king, was indicted for stealing of timber, and detaining wages (ridding carpenters wages) by one that was but a boy; and this is there termed sedition, and yet it was but a petty felony. Mich. 42 E. 3, rot. 65. B. R. R. Pope was appealed by the wife of J. S. because he feloniously and seditiously murdered J. S. and 'seditiously' was there put in, because it was done privily. By which cases it appears, that Sedition is not taken as a substantive, so that it may be applied to treason, trespass, or other offences. By the statute of 2 H. 4, c. 15, there is a punishment inflicted for the raising of seditious doctrine, and yet no punishment could have been inflicted for it until the said statute; and yet it was seditious, as well before the said statute as after. And this appears also by the statute of 1st and 2d of Philip and Mary, c. 3, which hath been cited. The statute 13 Eliz. c. 2. recites, that divers seditious and evil-disposed persons, &c. obtained bulls of reconciliation from the pope, which offence was made treason by the said statute, (for it was not before, and yet there was sedition) and by the said statute, the aiders and abettors are but in the case of Premunire. By the statute of 13 Eliz. c. 1, for the avoiding of contentious and seditious titles to the crown, it is enacted by the said statute, That he that shall declare the successor of the king, shall forfeit the moiety of his goods, &c. so that the said offence, although it be seditious, is not treason by the common law, nor is it made treason by the statute of 25 E. 3, nor by the statute of 13 Eliz. By the statute of 23 Eliz. c. 2, he that speaks seditious or slanderous news of the queen shall lose his ears, or pay 200*l*. and the second offence is made felony. The statute of 35 Eliz. c. 1. is against seditious sectaries, which absent themselves from the church; they are to be punished 10*l*. by the month. Out of all which statutes it may be collected, that the word 'sedition' is taken variously, according to the subject in hand. And Coke 4, 13. Lord Cromwell's case, 'seditious' is referred to doctrine. There are offences more high in their nature than sedition, which were not treason, unless so declared by act of parliament. Every rebellious act is sedition, yet if such acts be not within the statute of 25 E. 3, they are not treason. 17 R. 2, c. 8, insurrection of villeins and others is made treason; which proves, that before this act it was not treason. And this act of 17 R. 2, is repealed by the statute of 1 H. 4. By the statute of 3 and 4 E. 6, c. 5, to assemble people to alter the laws, is made treason, if they continue together an hour after proclamation made. This assembly of people was sedition at the common law; and the very assembly, if they after dissolve upon proclamation made, is not treason by the said statute. By the statute of 14 Eliz. c. 1. it is made felony, maliciously and rebelliously to hold from the queen any castles, &c. but because this relates not to the statute of 25 E. 3, it is not treason. 2. It seems clearly, that this case is within the Petition of Right, in which Magna Charta, and the statutes of 25 and 28 E. 3, are recited. The grievance there was, that divers have been imprisoned without any cause shewed, to which they might make answer according to the law. And upon this return, nothing appears to be objected to which he might answer. It appears not what that act, which is called Sedition, was. This is the very grief intended to be remedied by this statute; to this he cannot answer according to law. It appears not whether this were a seditious act, trespass, or slander, or what it was at all. The words are, 'Sedition against the king;' this helps not, for every offence is against the king, against his crown and dignity; that which disturbs the commonwealth is against the king; seditious doctrine is sedition against the king, as is before said. In 28 H. 6, vide prostrat. fol. 19. the lords and commons desire the king, that William de la Pool may be committed for divers treasons, and sundry other heinous crimes; and the petition held not good, because too general: whereupon they exhibit particular Articles against him.—And therefore upon the whole matter, prayed, that Mr. Long might be discharged from his imprisonment.

On another day, Berkley and Davenport, the king's Serjeants, argued for the king, that this Return was sufficient in law to detain them in prison.

Berkley began, and said, That the case is new, and of great weight and consequence; and yet, under favour, the prerogative of the king, and the liberty of the subject, are not mainly touched therein; for the case is not so general as it hath been made, but particular upon this particular return. The Liberty of the Subject is a tender point, the right whereof is great, just, and inviolable. The Prerogative of the King is an high point, to which every subject ought to submit. I intend not to make any discourse of the one or the other, I will only remember what the king hath determined upon them both, in his speech which he made upon the Petition of Right; to wit, that the people's Liberties strengthen the king's Prerogative, and that the king's Prerogative is to defend the people's Liberties. This may settle the hearts of the people concerning their liberty. The way which I intend to treat in my argument, is, to answer the Objections and Reasons which have been made, and to give some Reasons, whereby this return shall be sufficient.

The Objections which have been made are reducible to four heads: 1. By what the prisoner here shall be said to be committed and detained. 2. That this commitment is against the Petition of Right. 3. That the cause which is here returned is general and uncertain. 4. That the offences mentioned in the Return are but fineable; and therefore, notwithstanding them, the party is bailable.

For the first, it hath been objected, That the commitment here was by the lords of the privy-council, and the signification of this cause is by the king himself. But I say, that there is a further matter in the return; for the lords of the council do it by the command of the king, and they only pursue this command. I will not dispute whether the Lords of the Council have power to commit an offender or no, it is common in experience, 33 H. 6, 28. Poigne's Case is express in it. And in the Petition of Right it is admitted, that they may commit. And this is not alledged there for a grievance, but the grievance there was, because the particular charge of commitment was not shewed. Some books have been objected to prove, that the king, though in person, cannot commit any person; 16 H. 6, F. Monstraee de faits 182. But the authority of that book varies, if the case be put at large, which was in trespass for cutting of trees. The defendant said, That the place where, &c. is parcel of the manor of D. whereof the king is seized in fee, and the king commands us to cut. And the opinion of the court was, that this is no plea, without shewing a speciality of the command of the king. And there the whole court says, That if the king command me to arrest a man, whereby I arrest him, he shall have trespass or imprisonment against me, although it be done in the presence of the king. That the following words are to be understood, that the principal case was of one command of the king by word, and then such command by word to arrest a man is void. And 1 H. 7, 4. was objected; Hussey says, that Markham said to king Edw. 4, that he cannot arrest a man for suspicion of treason or felony, because if he do wrong, the party cannot have his action. To this I say, That the book there is to be understood of a wrongful arrest, for there it is spoken of an action of false imprisonment; and a wrongful arrest cannot be made by the king.

3. It stands not with the dignity of the king to arrest any man. Coke, 4. 73. The king makes a lease for years, rendering rent, with condition of re-entry for non-payment; he shall take advantage of the condition without any demand; and the reason there given, is, that a decorum and conveniency might be observed. So it is not befitting for the king in person to arrest any man, but the king may command another to do it. Bracton; lib. 2. 'De acquirendo rerum dominio,' fol. 55. says, That the crown of the king is to do justice and judgment, and facere pacem, without which the crown itself cannot subsist. Several constructions are to be made upon those several words; and the last words 'facere pacem' imply, that the king hath a coercive power. Buiton f. 1. amongst the Errata. The king said, Because we are not sufficient in person to do every thing, we divide the charge into many parts. We are the people's justice, and a justice implies one that hath power to do justice in every kind, to wit, by imprisonment, or otherwise, 20 H. 7, 7 Coke 11, 85. it is said, That the king is the Chief-Justice. And Lambert, in his Justice of Peace, fol. 3. says, That in ancient histories, the Chief-Justice of England is called 'Capitalis Justiciarius et Prima Justicia,' after the king in England. So that the king hath the same power of justice, as he chief-justice had. This imprisonment here, which is before conviction for any offence, is not used toward the subject as imprisonment for any fault, but is rather an arrest or restraint to avoid further inconveniences, 14 H. 7, 8. A justice of peace may arrest men riotously assembled, for prevention of further mischief. And the Book also says, That he may leave his servants there to arrest men, for safeguard of the peace. It is a case well known, that if a house be set on fire, every man may pull down the next house, for prevention of a greater mischief; so it seems concerning the incendiaries of state, they ought to be restrained and supprest, lest others should be stirred up by them to the same combustion, 22. Ass. 56. and 22 E. 4, 45. in false imprisonment the defendant justifies, because the plaintiff was mad and out of his wits, and that he had done some harm, and that he had bound and beat him to avoid further harm, which might have happened by his madness; and the justification was held good. So is it in matter of government; to avoid commotions, the king ought to use his coercive power against those that are enraged. The objection was, that this course was against the Petition of Right. But I answer, That this case is out of the words of that Petition; the words of the Petition were "Whereas by the statute called the Great Charter, and by the statute of 28 E. 3, no freeman may be taken or imprisoned;—yet against the tenour of the said statute, &c. divers of your subjects have of late been imprisoned, without any cause shewed; and when for their deliverance, &c. they were brought before the justices by writs of Habeas Corpus, there to undergo and receive as the court should order, and their keepers commanded to certify the cause of their detainer, and no cause was certified, but that they were detained by your majesty's special command, signified by the lords of your council; and yet were returned back to several prisons, without being charged with any thing to which they might make answer according to law." These last words are observable, 'without being charged with any thing to which they might make answer;' these words do not refer to the return of the Habeas Corpus; for the cause returned therein cannot be traversed, 9 H. 6, 54, but the court took it as true. 'But the setting forth of the cause, and the answer to the same cause, is to be upon other proceedings, to wit, upon the indictment for the offence, or otherwise. And there is a great difference between the return of a writ to which a man may answer, and the return of an Habeas Corpus, 10 E. 4, and 3 H. 7, 11, are, that if the sheriff return Rescous, all certainties of every circumstance ought to be shewed; because it is fitting, that a thing certain be brought into judgment. And upon shewing of the grievance, as above, the petition is, that no freeman, in any such manner as before is mentioned be imprisoned or detained; such, and it hath relation to such imprisonment, which is mentioned in the premises. And imprisonment mentioned in the premises of the petition, is, where no cause at all was mentioned; then where any cause is shewed, is out of the petition, and that such is the word relative, appears by Coke 11. 62. where many cases are put to the same purpose, which see.

The third Objection was, That the Return was general and uncertain. The counsel on the other side had divided the words of the return, but that is to offer violence thereto; for an exposition shall not be made by fractions, but upon the whole matter. For the first words,—'notable contempts'—it hath been said, that the addition of the word notable is but to make a flourish: But I say, That notable is not the emphasis of the return, but it only expresseth the nature of the offence; and yet 'notable' is a word observable by itself in the law, and implies, that the thing is known and noted. By 27 E. 1, sheriffs shall be punished, that let notorious offenders to bail; and by the statute of 4 H. 4, cap. 3. a notorious of common thief shall not make his purgation: and 26 E. 3, 71. in a trespass for false imprisonment, the defendant said, That the plaintiff came into the town of Huntington, and because he was seen in the company of R. de Thorby, who was a notorious thief, he, as bailiff of Huntington, took him upon suspicion. I confess, that—'for contempts'—is general, yea, it is genus generalissimum, and within the Petition of Right; but the words are,—'against our self.' It hath been said, that this might be by irreverent words or gestures.—'And our Government'—it hath been said, that this might be by contempt to the king's writ, or by Retrahit, as Beecher's case is. To this I answer, that those words which are spoken to one purpose, ought not to be wrested to another; and this is against the common meaning of the words. Coke 4. Thou art a murderer, the defendant shall not afterwards explain it to be a murderer of hares, for the highest murder is intended. So here, the highest government is intended.

4. It hath been objected that—'for stirring up of sedition against us'—may perhaps be but an offence fineable: but those words joined with the former words, shew this to be an offence of the highest nature; sedition is a special contempt. And although sedition in itself may be but a general offence, yet here it is,—'sedition against us and our government'—which makes it particular. It hath been confessed by one, that argued on the other side, that there is a general in a particular. Coke 4. p. 75. Holland's case, there is the most general, and there is a general in particular, as the state ecclesiastical. Thirdly, There is more particular, as the colleges, deans, and chapters. This being in a case of return upon Habeas Corpus, no precise certainty is required. In an indictment, a certainty of all circumstances is requisite; in pleading, a certainty is required; in counts, a more precise certainty; in bars, a certainty to a common intent is enough. There is not such precise certainty required here as in indictment or count, because the party ought to answer unto them; nor so much certainty required in this as in a bar. And the return is not uncertain; for, as it is said in Plowden 202. and 193. a thing is uncertain, where it may be taken indifferently one way or the other. But where the intendment the one way exceeds the intendment the other way, it is not uncertain, as it is here: The words are,—'for notable contempts against us and our Government, and for stirring up of sedition against us.'—Here is a certainty of intendment one way. There are many writs which are more uncertain than this return here is, and yet good. The Writ concerning the taking of an Apostate is general, 'quod spreto habitu ordinis;' and yet there are more sorts of apostacies. In the writ concerning the moving of a leper, the words are general, and yet it appears by F. N. B. that there are two kinds of lepers, one outward, and the other inward; and for the latter, the writ concerning moving a leper. So the writs concerning the burning of an heretic, and concerning the burning of an idiot, are general; and yet there are sundry kinds of heretics and idiots also. But it hath been objected, that Sedition is not a law-term, nor known in the law, of which the judges can take no notice; but the words to express offences of this nature, are murder, treason, felony, &c. and that no indictment of sedition generally was ever seen. To this I answer, perhaps it is true, that no indictment was ever seen made, because the form of an indictment is precise; words of art are required therein, as appears in Dyer 69, 261. Coke 4. p. 39. Vaux's case; yet in 5 E. 6, Dyer 69. it is said, that juratus implies felonice cepit, although the contrary hath been objected. In a return, words by periphrasis are sufficient.

The warrant of a justice of peace to apprehend J. S. because of prepenne malice, interfecit J. D. is good enough, although there wants the word murdravit. In 5 R. 2. F. Trial 54. Belknap says, That a miscreant shall forfeit his land. Out of which it may be gathered, that a man may be indicted for miscreancy. And it seems likewise, that an indictment of sedition may be good, for in some cases it is treason. I agree, Peake's case, which hath been objected, that for these words 'seditious fellow' no action lies, and so is Coke 4. 19. because those words do not import an act to be done, but only an inclination to do it; but if a man say such words of another, which import that he hath made sedition, they are actionable, as it was resolved in Phillips's and Badby's case, 24 Eliz. Coke 4. 19. 'Thou hast made a seditious Ser-mou, and moved the people to sedition this 'day,' adjudged actionable. So in the lord Cromwell's, Coke 4. 12, 13. the action would have lain for those words, 'You like of those 'ceedings,' if there had not been another matter in the case. I agree, the case of 21 E. 3. Sir John Garbyol's case, and 42 E. 3, for in those cases, sedition was only taken adjectively, and shews an inclination only to do a seditious act; and in such sense, sedition may be applied to other offences than treason. In 31 E. 1. f. Gard. 157. Gardein in Socage made feoffment of land which he had in ward, this is forfeiture, says the book, for the treason which he did to the ward; so there, one thing is called treason, which is a breach of trust. In an appeal of Mayhem, it is felonice, and yet 6 H. 7. 1. it is not felony; but felony is there only put to express the heinousness of the offence; it is, as it were, a felony. The statute of 2 H. 4. 1 Mar. 13 Eliz. 35 Eliz. 17 R. 2. 3 & 4 E. 6. 14 Eliz. which have been objected, have the word sedition, but not applicable to this case. Bracton in his book de Corona, says, 'si quis,' &c. If any by rash attempt, plotting the king's death, should act, or cause any to act, to the sedition of the lord the king, or of his army, it is treason. And Glanville, in as many words, says, That to do any thing in sedition of the kingdom, or of the army, is high-treason. And Britton, fol. 16. it is high-treason to disinherit the king of the realm, and sedition tendeth to the disinheritation of the king; for, as it hath been said, 'Seditio est quasi seorsum itio,' when the people are severed from the king; or it is, 'Separans à ditione,' when the people are severed from the power of the king. And in this sense sedition is no stranger in our law; and such sedition which severs the people from the king, is treason.

But it hath been objected, That by the statute of 25 E. 3, the parliament ought only to determine what is treason, what not. To this I answer, That upon the said statute, the positive law had always made explication and exposition. Br. Treason 24, the words are 'Compass 'or imagine the death of the king;' and there it is taken, that he that maliciously deviseth how the king may come to death, by words or otherwise, and does not act to explain it, as, in assaying harness, this is treason. 13 El. Dy. 298. Doctor Story's case, he being beyond sea, practised with a foreign prince to invade the realm, and held treason, because invasion is to the peril of the prince, and so within the statute of 24 E. 3, Mar. Dy. 144. The taking of the castle of Scarborough was treason in Stafford, by 30 Ass. p. 19, which was presently after the making of the statute of 25 E. 3. A man ought to have been hanged and drawn, that brought letters of excommungement from the pope, and published them in England; and it is to be noted, that at the same time there was no statute to make it treason, but upon construction of the said statute of 25 E. 3, though now it be made treason by the statute of 15 Eliz. if it be with intention to advance foreign power. Perhaps the sedition mentioned in this return is high treason; and yet the king may make it an offence finable, for he may prosecute the offender in what course he pleaseth; and if it be treason, then the prisoners are not bailable by the statute of Westminster. But, suppose that it is but a finable offence, yet by the said statute, those who are imprisoned for open and notorious naughtiness, shall not be bailed; the same naughtiness is there intended high and exorbitant offence.

2. It is fit to restrain the prisoners of their liberty, that the common-wealth be not damaged. It is lawful to pull down a house to prevent the spreading mischief of fire; it is lawful to restrain a furious man. And by the 14 H. 7, a justice of peace may restrain a rout. Then the restraint of dangerous men in the common-wealth is justifiable and necessary. 24 E. 3, 33. p. 25. sir Thomas Figet went armed in the palace, which was shewed to the king's council: wherefore he was taken and disarmed before the chief-justice, and committed to the prison, and he could not be bailed till the king sent his pleasure; and yet it was shewed, that the lord of T. threatened him. Out of which case I observe two things: 1. That the judge of this court did cause a man to be apprehended, upon complaint made to the council, that is, to the lords of the privy-council. 2. That although he did nothing, he is not mainpernable until the king sent his pleasure, because he was armed and furiously disposed. So here. Wherefore I pray, that the prisoners may be sent back again.

Davenport argued to the same intent and purpose, and therefore I will report his argument briefly.

1. He said, That the return here is sufficient. The counsel on the other side have made fractions of this return, and divided it into several parts, whereas the genuine construction ought to have been made upon the entire return; for no violence ought to be offered to the text. 7 E. 4, 20. In false imprisonment, the defendant did justify, and alledged several reasons of his justification; to wit, because a man was kill'd, and that this was in the county of S. and that the common voice and fame was that the plaintiff was culpable. And this was held a good plea, although Bryan did there object. That the plea was double or treble; and the reason was, because twenty causes of suspicion make but one entire cause; and indivisible unity in this ought not to be divided: so Coke 8, 66. Crogate's case. In an action of trespass, the defendant justifies for several causes, and held good, because upon the matter, all of them make but one cause. Coke 8. 1. 17. It is said, That it is an unjust thing, unless the whole law be looked into, to judge and answer, by propounding any one particular thereof; and if it be unjust in the exposition of a law, it is uncivil in a return to make fractions of it; in the construction thereof especially, it being a return for information, and not for accusation.

2. Although the counsel on the other side have taken this case to be within the Petition of Right, yet this is Petitio principii, to take that for granted which is the question in debate. He said, That he would not offer violence to the Petition of Right, to which the king had assented, and which shall really be performed. But the question here is, whether this return be within it? And the Judges are keepers, not masters of this pledge; and it seems, that this return is out of the letter and meaning of the said statute.

3. He said, That this was the actual commitment of the lords of the privy-council, and the habitual or virtual commitment of the king. [But because upon these two matters he put no case, nor gave any reason, but what had been put or given in the argument of the grand Habeas Corpus, Mich. 3 Caroli, and afterwards in the house of commons, (vide page 59, &c. ante) which was reported to the lords in the painted chamber, I have here omitted them.] And for the great respect which the law gives to the commands of the king, he put these cases: 7 H. 3, attachment of waste against the tenant in dower, and the waste was assigned in the taking of fish out of a pond, and the carrying them away. And the defendant pleaded, That her second husband, by the command of the lord the king, took all the fish out of the said pond to the use of the lord the king, and held a good justification; which proves, that the command of the king there to her husband, excused her of the said waste. And yet it is clear, that a tenant in dower is liable to an action of waste, for waste done in the time of her second husband: but contrary is it, where a woman is tenant for life, and took a husband, who made waste and died, no action lies against the wife for that waste. And F. N. B. 17 A. If the tenant in precipi at the grand cape makes default, the king may send a writ to the justices, rehearsing that he was in his service, &c. commanding them, that that default be not prejudicial to him; and this command of the king excuseth his default, be the cause true or no.

4. For the particulars of the return, it is—
'for notable contempts against the government;'

—but as to that, it hath been said, that the king hath sundry governments, to wit, ecclesiastical, political, &c. and it is not shewn against which of them. This is but a cavilling exception; they might as well have excepted to this return, because it is not shewn, that these contempts were after the last general pardon; that had been a better exception. The last words of the return are,—'raising sedition against us;'
—but as to this, it has been said, that seditio is not a word known in the law, and is always taken either adverbially, or adjectively, and is not a substantive. To this he said, that although it is not a substantive for the preservation, yet it is a substantive for the destruction of a kingdom. And he said, that he found the word seditio in the law, and the consequent of it likewise, which is seductio populi. But it is not ever found to be taken in a good sense, it is always ranked and coupled with treason, rebellion, insurrection, or such like, as it appears by all those statutes which have been remembered on the other side. Therefore he prayed that the Prisoners might be sent back.

Trin. 5 Car. I. B. R.

The first day of the Term, upon Habeas Corpus to sir Allen Apsley, the Lieutenant of the Tower, to bring here the body of John Selden, esq. with the cause of detention; he returned the same cause as in Mr. Stroud's case: and Mr. Littleton (afterwards sir Edward, and Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and Keeper of the Great Seal) of counsel with him moved, That the Return was insufficient in substance; therefore he prayed that he might be bailed. It is true, that it is of great consequence, both to the crown of the king, and to the Liberty of the Subject. But, under favour, for the difficulty of law contained in it, the case cannot be called grand. In my argument, I will offer nothing to the court, but that which I have seen with these eyes, and that which in my understanding (which is much subject to mistakes) can receive no sufficient answer.

I will divide my argument into four several Heads:

1. To point out those matters which I think unnecessary, and not conducible to the matter in question.

2. I will consider the Warrant of the Privy Council in this case.

3. The Warrant of the king himself.

4. The Objections which have been made by the contrary side, the strength of them, and give answer to them.

For the first of these heads, 1. I will admit, that the king may commit a man. 2. That a man committed by the king is not replevisable by the sheriff, but he is bailable by this court, notwithstanding the statute of Westm. 1, c. 15. And that he shall not be bailable, is against the Petition of Right; I will not dispute it, for it is established by the Answer of the king to the said Petition. And the arguments made to this purpose in the said parliament, and in the Painted Chamber before both the houses, are recorded in parliament, to which every one may resort. But I will lay as a ground of my following argument, that as offences are of two natures, capital, or as trespasses; so they are punished in two manners, to wit, capitally, or by fine, or imprisonment. For the offences of the first nature, as Treasons, and the like, imprisonment is imposed upon the offender, only for custody; but for misdemeanors of the second nature, imprisonment is imposed upon him for a punishment. Then this is my ground, That no Freeman that is imprisoned, only for misdemeanors before conviction, may be detained in prison without bail, if it be offered, unless it be in some particular cases, in which the contrary is ordained by any particular statute.

2. For the Warrant of the Privy Council, which signifies the pleasure of the king to commit the prisoner; perhaps this was a good ground of the commitment, but it is no ground for the detaining of the prisoner without bail; and this the king himself hath acknowledged, as the ancient right of the subject, in the Petition of Right; wherefore it is not now to be disputed.

3. For the Warrant of the king, as it is certified by this Return, there is not any sufficient cause contained within it, for the detaining of the prisoner in prison; for the law being, as I have declared above, that for a misdemeanor before conviction, no freeman may be imprisoned before conviction, without bail or mainprize, the sole question now is, if this return contain within it any capital offence; or if only a trespass or misdemeanor, and then the party is bailable: and for the disquisition hereof, I will consider the Return, 1. As it is divided in several parts: 2. I will consider all those parts of it together. 1. As it is severed in parts. The first part of it, 'for notable contempts by him committed against ourself and our government.' For 'contempts,' all contempts are against the king, mediately, or immediately, and against his government. 'Notable,' this is all one with notorious and manifest, as appears by the statute of Westm. 1, c. 15, and 26 E. 3, 71, which hath been remembered. And 'notable' is but an emphatical expression of the nature of the thing, and alters it not. 'Against us,' all riots, routs, batteries, and trespasses, are against us, and against our crown and dignity; contempt against our court of justice is a contempt against us. But if the Return were made here, that he was committed for a contempt made in Chancery, the party shall be bailed, as it was resolved in this Court in Michael Apsley's case, and in Russwell's case, 13 Jacobi, for the return is too general. In the nature of the offence ought to be expressed, that the court may judge thereof. And 'contempts' here is individuum totum: therefore for them, before conviction, the party cannot be imprisoned without bail or mainprize.

The second part of the Return is 'and for stirring up of Sedition against us:' the other side said, That seditio is ever taken in the worse sense: that is true. But hence it follows not, that the party that commits it is not bailable. Every small offence is taken in the worst sense, as the stealing of an apple, and the like; but such kind of offenders shall not be committed without bail. To examine the nature of this offence, which is called 'sedition,' it ought to be understood, as this Return is, either as trespass, or as High Treason; for it cannot be intended to be Petty Treason, for Petty Treason is so called in respect of the offence done to any particular subject; but in respect of the king, it is but as a Felony, therefore the Indictments for the same are feloniously and traitorously. And here the words are, 'sedition against us;' so of necessity it ought to be intended of an offence, that more immediately concerns the same king. For the discussing of this matter,

1. I will consider in what sense and significance this word seditio is used.

2. How it shall be expounded here by relation thereof to the king.

3. What sense these words 'against us,' shall have here.

1. For Sedition; it is not found in the division of offences in our law, but as it is mingled and coupled with other offences. No indictment of sedition only was ever seen, nor can be shewn; routs, riots, and unlawful assemblies, are much of the same nature with it, and do well express the nature of sedition. The English word is drawn from the word seditio in Latin, and the derivation of it is, as hath been observed, se-itio, or seorum itio; and the seditious, as one says, take a diversion and draw others: it is used in the Bible, in poets, histories, and orators, for tumult, or hurly-burly, or uproar, or confused noise,—'Seditioque recens dubioque susurro,' in Liv. lib. 2. cap. 44. And in Tacitus it is taken for mutiny in an army, when the army is always repining at the captain. In the Italian language, which is the elder son of Latin, sedition and discord is all one. Numb. cap. 20, 3, the Latin translation is, 'Versi in seditione;' the English is, 'chode,' or 'murmured.' Numb. 26, 9, the Latin is, 'In seditione Corah;' the English is, 'In the Company of Corah.' Numb. 27, 3, the Latin is, 'Nec fuit in seditione eorum;' the English is, 'in the company or assembly of them.' Judg. 12, 1, the Latin translation is, 'Facta est ergo seditio in Ephraim;' the English translation is, 'The men of Ephraim gathered themselves together.' In the New Testament, Acts 19, 40. Seditio in the Latin is translated 'uproar' or 'meeting.' Acts 15, 2. 'Facta est ergo seditio,' &c. and it is translated 'dissension' and 'disputation.' Acts 24, 5, Tertullus the Orator accuseth Paul for moving sedition; and the subsequent words are, 'A ring-leader of the sect of the Pharisees;' so that his sedition there was but a schism; and the words there are in a manner the very same with our's here; there it was, 'for moving;' here, 'for stirring of Sedition.' Seditio, as an approved author says, imports discordiam, to-wit, when the members of one body fight against another. The lord of St. Albans, who was lately the Lord-Chancellor of England, and was a lawyer and great statesman likewise, and well knew the acceptation of this word 'sedition' in our law, hath made an essay of sedition, and the title of the essay is, 'Of Seditions and Tumults:' the whole essay deserves the reading. (See 3 Bacon's Works, 320.) And there is a Prayer in the Litany,— 'from Sedition and Heresy, &c.' So that here sedition is taken as a kind of sect.

This being the natural signification of the word, then the next labour shall be to see, if any thing in our Law cross this exposition. And it seems clearly, that there is not, 2 H. 4, c. 15. And it is in the Parliament-roll, n. 48, against Lollards, who at that time were taken as heretics, and says, That such preachers which excite and stir up to sedition, shall be convented before the Ordinary, &c. There, sedition is taken for dissension and division in doctrine. And this is not made Treason by the said statute, although the said statute be now repealed by the statute of 25 H. 8, c. 4, 1 and 2 Phil. & Mar. c. 3, which is in Rastal, News 4, which is an act against seditious words and news of the king and queen, which is a great misdemeanor; and yet the punishment appointed to be inflicted by the said statute, is but the pillory, or a fine of 100*l*. And the said statute by the statute of 1 Eliz. c. 16, was extended to her also, which statute now by her death is expired: which I pray may be observed, 13 Eliz. cap. 1, against those who seditiously publish who are the true heirs of the crown, that they shall be imprisoned for a year, &c. And 13 Eliz. c. 2, the seditious bringing in of the pope's bulls is made treason, which implies, that it was not so at the common law. 23 Eliz. c. 2. If any person shall devise, write, or print any book, containing any false, seditious and slanderous matter, to the stirring up or moving of any rebellion, &c. every such offence shall be judged felony. And in an Indictment upon the said statute (which see Coke's Entries, f. 352, 353.) there are the words—'rebellionem et seditionem movere;' and yet it is but felony, 35 Eliz. c. 1, made against seditious sectaries. Also there are certain Books and Authorities in law, which express the nature of the word sedition, Coke's 4 Rep. p. 13, the lord Cromwell's Case. In an action for those words ['you like 'of those that maintain seditions against the 'queen's proceedings'] the defendant pleaded, That he intended the maintenance of a seditious sermon; and this was adjudged a good plea and justification. From which it follows, that the seditious sermon mentioned in the declaration, and the maintaining of sedition against the queen, is all of one signification; for if they might have been taken in a different sense, the justification had not been good. Philips and Badby's case, which is in Coke's 4 Rep. p. 19, a, which was objected by serjeant Berkeley, makes strongly for me; for there an action upon the case was brought by a person for those words, 'Thou hast made a seditious sermon, and moved the people to sedition this 'day.' And although it were there adjudged, that the action lay, yet the reason of the Judgment is observable, which was, because the words scandalize the plaintiff in his profession; which imply, that if they had not scandalized him in his profession, no action would have lain. And ordinary words, if they scandalize a man in his profession, are actionable; as to say to a Judge, that he is a corrupt man; or to a Merchant, that he is a bankrupt; although if they were spoken to another man, they would not bear an action. And although the Book say, that no act followed there; yet if the matter objected had been treason, the very will had been punishable, and, by consequence, a great slander. But it is observed, that words which imply an inclination only to sedition, are not actionable, as 'seditious knave;' but inclination to treason is treason, therefore words which imply it are actionable. And also for divers words an action upon the case will lie, which induce not treason or felony; as for calling a woman whore, by which she loseth her marriage, and such like. Then sedition is no offence in itself, but the aggravation of an offence; and no indictment, as I have said afore, was ever seen of this singly by itself. Trin. 21 E. 3, rot. 23. Sir John Garbut's case, which was put before by Mr. Mason; the indictment was in prejudice of his crown, and in manifest sedition; and yet the offence there was but a robbery. It is true, that upon his arraignment he stood mute, therefore the Roll is, that he was put to penance, that is, to strong and hard pain; and this proves, that it was not Treason; for if a man arraigned of treason stand mute, yet the usual judgment of treason shall be given on him: And it is true also, that he cannot have his clergy, because insidiator vicarum was in the indictment; which if it was, out the party of its clergy, until the Statute of 4 H. 4, c. 2, as is observed in Coke's 11 Rep. p. 29. Alexander Poulters Case. And upon the same Roll of 21 E. 3, there are four other indictments of the same nature, where sedition is contained in them. Anno 1585. Queen Elizabeth sent a Letter, which I have seen, by the hands of the noble antiquary sir Robert Cotton, to the mayor of London, for the suppressing of divers seditious Libels which were published against her princely government; and yet in the conclusion of the Letter it appears, that they were only against the earl of Leicester, and this was to be published only by proclamation in London.

5 H. 4, m. 11, and 13, the earl of Northumberland preferred a Petition to the king in parliament, in which he confesseth, that he had not kept his majesty's laws as a liege subject; and also confesseth the gathering of power, and the giving of liberties: wherefore he petitioned the worship of the king (for so are the words) for his grace. The king, upon this Petition, demanded the opinion of the lords of parliament, and of the judges assistant, if any thing contained within the said Petition were treason, or no; and it was resolved by them all, that nothing, as it is mentioned in the said Petition, was Treason, but great Misdemeanors; and yet truly, though not fully there mentioned, it was a great rebellion and insurrection. But they adjudged according to the said petition, as you are now to judge upon the Return as it is made here. In Mich. 33 Eliz. Cawdry's Case, Coke's fifth Report, p. 1. Sedition and Schism were described; as Schism is a separation from the unity of the Church, so Sedition is a separation from the unity of the Commonwealth. And an Author says, That a seditious person differs from a schismatic, because the one opposeth the spiritual truth, the other the temporal: and as Schism of itself is not Heresy, so Seditio without other adjuncts is not Treason. Bracton, f. 112, 113, 118. hath been objected, that he makes sedition treason: I will grant to them, Hengham also, who is to the same purpose: for in those Books it is called, 'Seditio regis et regni.' To them I answer, 1. That they are obscure. For what signified 'seditio regis,' or 'tumultus regis?' Shall it be the same thing in sense with 'seditio contra regem?' It seems that the said authors neither remember law nor language. 2. Although they reckon sedition amongst the crime lese majestatis, yet that is not to be regarded; for they are obsolete Authors, and are not esteemed as authors in our law, as it is in Pl. 356, and Coke 8. 35, but they may be used for ornament, and they are good marks to shew to us how the law was then taken, but not to declare how the law is at this day; they are no binding authority; and if they be, yet we have them on our side likewise: for in his 14th book, Glanville says, That a man accused of such a crime shall be bailed, and that the accuser shall give pledges. And Bracton says, That if no accuser appears they shall be set at liberty. And Hengham reckons amongst the crimes lese majestatis, the breach of the peace, and so does Glanville also. Fleta, who was a follower of Bracton, and transcribes much verbatim out of him, calls Sedition, 'Seductionem' of the lord the king. And 12 Edw. 1, the statute of Rutland, which prescribes laws for Wales, enacts, that the sheriff shall inquire in his turn, 'de seductori-bus domini regis;' and it is not apparent, whether he intended those which seduce the king or his people. And in latter times, Seditio is called Seditio. In the time of Hen. 7, the earl of Northumberland, being a great and potent peer, and the king standing in awe of him, caused him, with 24 others of great quality, to enter into an obligation of 20,000l. (which obligation is in the hands of sir Robert Cotton) unto him, That if the said earl knew Treason, Sedition, loss, &c. to be intended to the king, that he should reveal it. 3. Also 'erimen lese majestatis,' which is the phrase of the Civil Law, is more general than Treason; and the old authors which have been cited much, follow the Civil Law, which hath this expression; and sedition by the Civil Law is treason.

But it was resolved 11 R. 2. n. 14, we are not governed by the Civil Law.* And the 'Mirrour of Justices,' the principal copy whereof is in Bennet-College library in Cambridge, and there is also a copy in Lincoln's-Inn library; nor Britton in his Book, who writ in the name of the king, have not the word Seditio in them. And I affirm confidently, that there cannot be shewn any record, book, or statute, after the making the statute of 25 Edw. 3, in which Seditio is taken as a capital offence. And yet the 'Mirrour of Justices' reckons up several kinds of Treason, which he divides into Treasons against the celestial or terrestrial majesty; against the celestial majesty, as Schism, Heresy, Miscreancy (and according to this, the Book of 5 R. 2, Trial 54, is to be understood, which says, That a miscreant shall forfeit his hands, because it is a kind of treason). And also he shews divers Treasons against the king, as, The deflowering of the king's eldest daughter, &c. but not a word of Seditio. But admit, that Sedition imports a greater offence than tumult, yet there is no colour to say, that it is treason; for 25 Edw. 3, is a flat bar (that I may use the Inuer-Temple phrase) to any thing to be treason, which is not contained in it, unless it be made treason by any special act afterwards; and 25 Edw. 3, does not make it treason. Stamford cites Glanville, and Bracton, and other ancient books, to shew what was treason before the said statute, and what not; and he says, that it was a great doubt what shall be called treason; saving that all agree, that any thing that tends to the death of the king was treason. 3dly, Now examine the words, — 'against us' — those words make not the crime more heinous, as the case is. I agree, that if the words had been, — 'Seditio to take away the life of the king' — it would have been treason; yea, the very thought of treason is treason, (though none can judge thereof till it be produced in act) 19 H. 6, 47. b. by Newton, 13 Jac. B. R. John Owen's case, the writing of a letter, whereby he intended the death of the king, was treason; but it is not expressed, that the raising of this sedition was with such intent, whereby this differs from all the cases which can be put, in which there is such an intent of the death of the king. Also this raising of sedition against us, shall not be intended treason; for if it had been so, the king would have so expressed it by the word Treason: for, as in his gracious disposition, he will not extend a fault beyond the magnitude thereof, so he will give to every offence the true and genuine name. If the return had been — 'against our person' — it had been more certain, that it concerned the king immediately; this may be against any point of his government. And the proper and natural signification of the words, — 'against us' — is as much as, against our authority, our superintendency, against our peace, crown and dignity, which are the usual words in every indictment of felony. Every breach of the peace is against the king. The usual Return upon every ordinary writ out of this court is, that the party be before Us; and contempt to this court is, contempt against Us; and it is in the nature of sedition to the king. Contempts to the court of Star-Chamber are contempts against Us; and upon them, commissions of rebellion issue: and if the parties are brought in upon such commissions, yet they are bailable until their conviction. The king styles himself, Us, in writs; and every disobedience to any writ may be said, 'Sedition against Us.' Riots, riots, illegal assemblies, may well be said and called, 'Sedition against Us;' and for such offences, a man shall not be restrained of his liberty upon an 'it may be.' Such a Return is necessary, by which the court may be truly informed of the offence. For the writ of Habeas Corpus is, to submit and receive what the court shall ordain. And this return of this nature is not to be compared to writs, which are general, and make a brief narration of the matter, and are pursued and explained by subsequent declarations. And yet I urge not, that the return ought to be as certain as an indictment; for an Indictment of Murder is not good, if it lack the word murdravit. But the return upon an Habeas Corpus, q. d. interfecit I. S. upon premeditated malice, is good; for the nature of the thing is expressed, although the formal word be wanting; but out of the Return, the substance of the offence ought always to appear, which appears not here. But it hath been said by the other side, That let the cause in the return be as it will, yet it is not traversable, 9 H. 6, 54. and I confess it. But as Coke's 11 Rep. p. 93. James Bagg's Case is, the return ought to have certainly so much in it, that, if it be false, the party grieved may have his action upon the case. And the grievance complained of in the Petition of Right is, That upon such return no cause was certified, that is, no such cause upon which any indictment might be drawn up; for we never understand, that the party shall be tried upon the H. Corpus, but that upon the matter contained within it an Indictment shall be made, and he shall have his trial upon it. And yet it is clear, and it hath been agreed of all hands, in the argument of the grand H. Corpus, Mich. 3 Car. in this court, that if the cause be certified upon the return of the H. Corpus, that the court may judge of the legality of that cause. 2. Consider the parts of this Return, as they are coupled together,—'for notable contempts by him committed against our self and our government, and for stirring up of sedition against Us.'—Upon the entire Return, the king joins Sedition with notable Contempts; so that it is as much as if he had said, that Sedition is one of the notable contempts mentioned in the first part of the Return, so that he makes it but a contempt. For the generality and uncertainty of the Return, I refer myself to the cases put by Mr. Ask; and I will not wave any of them.

True it is, if the Return had been, that it was for treason, he had not been bailable but by the discretion of the court, and such return would have been good; but it is not so of Sedition. Gard. 157. treason is applied to a petty offence, to the breach of trust by a guardian in Socage; but it is not treason. And so Sedition is of far less nature than Treason, and is oftentimes taken of a trespass; it is not treason of itself, nor seditione was never used in an Indictment of Treason. It was not Treason before the 25 of Edw. 3, nor can it be treason; for 25 Edw. 3, is a flat bar (as I have said before) to all other offences to be treason, which are not contained within the said act, or declared by any statute afterwards. And there are offences which are more heinous in their nature than sedition is, which are no Treason, as Insurrections, &c. which see in the statute 11 H. 7, c. 7. 2 H. 5, c. 9. 8 H. 6, c. 14. 5 R. 2, c. 6. 17 R. 2, c. 8. And by 3 and 4 E. 6, c. 5, the assembly of twelve persons to attempt the alteration of any law, and the continuance together by the space of an hour, being commanded to return, is made treason; which act was continued by the Statute of 1 Mar. c. 12, and 1. Eliz. c. 16. but now is expired by her death, and is not now in force, (although the contrary be conceived by some) which I pray may be well observed. By the Statute of 14 Eliz. c. 1, rebellious taking of the Castles of the king is made Treason, if they be not delivered, &c. which shews clearly, that such taking of Castles in its nature was not treason. But the said Statute is now expired; and also all statutes, creating new Treasons, are now repealed. But, for a conclusion of this part of my argument, I will cite a case, which I think express in the point, or more strong than the case in question: and it was M. 9, E. 3, roll 39, B. R. Peter Russel's Case; he was committed to prison by the Deputy-Justice of North-Wales, because he was accused by one William Solymán of Sedition, and other things touching the king; And hereupon a Commission issued out of the Chancery, to enquire, if the said Peter Russel behaved himself well or seditiously against the king; and by the inquisition it was found, that he behaved himself well. And upon an Habeas Corpus out of this court, his body was returned, but no cause. But the said inquisition was brought hither out of Chancery; and for that no cause of his caption was returned, he prayed delivery; but the court would not deliver him, till it knew the cause of his commitment: Therefore, taking no regard of the said inquisition, they now send a Writ to the now justice of Wales, to certify the cause of his commitment. And thereupon he made this return, That the aforesaid Peter Russel was taken, because one William Solymán charged him, that he had committed divers Seditions against the lord the king; and for that cause he was detained, and for no other. And because the Return mentions not what Sedition in special, he was bailed, but not discharged. And I desire the bailment of the prisoner only, and not his deliverance. I desire that the Case be well observed. In the said case, there was an actual Sedition against the king; here is only a stirring up of sedition. The words of the said Award are, 'videtur curia;' which are the solemn words of a Judgment, given upon great deliberation. There it was—'for other things concerning us'—This is all one as if he had said,—'for other things against us'—Concerning the king, and, against the king, are all one, as appears by 25 E. 3, c. 4, de Clero, Stamford. 124, Westm. 1, c. 15. Bracton, f. 119, 14 Eliz. c. 2. And the words of the Judgment in the said Case, were not 'dimittitur' 'ideo dimittentur,' which imply the right of the party to be bailed. The said case in some things was more particular than our case, and more strong; for there was an accuser to boot, which wants in our case. There, true it is, that he was committed by the Justice of Wales, and here by the king himself; but this makes no difference, as to this Court; for, be the commitment by the king himself, or by any other, if it be not upon just cause, the party may be bailed in this court. And for the inquisition, which is mentioned, it was no trial in the case; nor did the court give any regard thereto. To detain the prisoner by the command of the king singly, is against the Petition of Right; but it being coupled with the cause, the cause is to be considered, and the truth of the cause is to be intended, as well where it is mentioned to be by an inferior Judge, as where by the king himself, for it is traversable neither in the one nor other. And 22 H. 8, roll 37, B. R. and 1 H. 8, roll 8. Harrison's Case, resolved, That a man committed by the command of the king is bailable. And 33 Eliz. it was resolved by all the Justices of England, which I have viewed in Chief-Justice Anderson's Book, under his own hand, and it was produced in parliament, That all men committed by the privy-council are bailable, if the commitment be not for High-Treason. In all cases of commitment, an accuser is understood. Suppose that the accusation mentioned in Russel's Case of Sedition, had been an accusation of Treason, then the Judges ought not to have bailed him of right, and no man will say, but that the said accusation was a good cause to commit him. But the discovery of the offence ought to be afterward in an indictment.

Fourthly, I come to the Objections which have been made on the contrary.

1. It was objected, That this was a case of great consequence; I confess it, but this consequence is not to the king; for if it be truly treason, then they might have returned treason, and then the party was not to be bailed of right, till there should be a failure of prosecution; as was lately in Melvin's Case, who was haled for lack of prosecution; the return being for High-Treason.

2. It was objected that there can be no conviction, as this case is, therefore there ought to be coercive power to restrain the prisoner. This is strange news to me, that there shall be any offence for which a man cannot be convicted. And if there can be no conviction, it hence follows, that there is no offence; and if there be no offence, there ought by consequence to be no imprisonment.

3. The case of 14 H. 7, 8, hath been objected, that a Justice of Peace may commit rioters without bail. I confess it, for this is by force of a statute which ordains it.

4. It hath been objected, That if an house be on fire, it is lawful to pull down the neighbour's house, for the prevention of further mischief; and the cases of 22 Ass. and 22 E. 4, that every man may justify the coercion of a mad-man. I answer, That these cases are true, as of necessity, and no other evasion: but here, bail is proffered, which is, body for body. Fire is swift, and cannot be punished, and no caution can be obtained thereof. But observe the true inference and consequence of this argument; If my house be on fire, my neighbour's must be pulled down; Mr. Selden is seditious, ergo Mr. Herbert, his neighbour, must be imprisoned.

5. It hath been objected out of Br. Treason, 24. 1 Mar. That the said Statute of 25 E. 3, is taken largely, and that the detaining of a Castle or Fortress is Treason. To this I answer, that the bare detaining of a Castle is not Treason, unless it be with intention of the death of the king; but the taking of a Castle is treason. And the case there meant by Brook, is Constable's Case, Dy. 128. And I confess, 15 Eliz. Dy. 298, Dr. Story's Case*, that conspiracy to invade the kingdom, is Treason; for this cannot be without great danger of the death of the king; for, 'arma tenenti, omnia dat qui justa negat.' And all those Indictments were, that they intended the death of the king; but no such intention is expressed here.

6. It hath been objected, That this case is out of the Petition of Right, because in this return there is a cause shewed. But the grievance whereupon the Petition of Right was framed, was, where no cause was returned. It is true, that the grievance goes no further, but where no cause was returned; for that was the grievance at that time. But the words of the Petition of Right are further, 'without being charged with any thing, to which they might make answer by the law,' which implies, that such cause ought to be contained in the Return, which being put into an Indictment, the party may have his Answer thereto.

7. It was objected, That the Return shall not be construed and expounded by fractions. I answer, That we need not make such an exposition; for the joint construction thereof makes more for us, than the several, as is shewed before.*

8. That a general Return is sufficient, and it need not have terms of art in it, as an indictment.

* See Shower's Magistracy of England vindicated; which will be found at the end of the Trial of Lord Russel: A. D. 1683. See also Sir John Hawkes's Reply to the Magistracy of England vindicated, p. 26.

ment ought to have. For answer I confess it; but I affirm, as above, that a return ought to be so particular, that the nature of the offence ought to appear out of it: and it is not to be compared to general Writs, as 'Apostata capi-endo, Idiota examinando, Leproso amovendo,' and the like: for those writs are good enough, because they contain the very matter. And although it hath been said, that there are two kinds of lepers, yet I never heard but of one: and the Writ, 'de heretico comburendo,' is general, and good, because it is but a writ of execution upon a Judgment given by the spiritual power. But because they might not meddle with the blood of any man, the execution is by the secular power.

9. It hath been objected out of 30 Ass. p. 19. that the king would have one drawn and hanged for bringing into England the Bulls of the pope. But the Book answers itself, for he was not drawn and hanged.

10. The Statute of Westminster. 1, c. 15. was objected. But as oft as that Statute is objected, I will always cry out, 'The Petition of Right, The Petition of Right!' as the king of France cried out nothing but France, France! when all the several dominions of the king of Spain were objected to him.

11. A curious distinction hath been taken by serjeant Davenport, between stirring to Sedition, and stirring up Sedition; for the first implies an inclination only to do it, the second implies an act done. But this is too nice, for if a man stir up Sedition, or to Sedition, if it be with intention of the death of the king, the one and the other is Treason.

12. The opinion of Fortescue in 31 H. 6, 10. b. hath been objected, That for an offence done to the court, a man may be committed before conviction. To this I answer, 1. That the Book does not say, that he shall be committed without bail. 2. The offence being done in face of the court, the very view of the court is a conviction in law.

13. There was objected the 24 of Edw. 3, 23. Sir Thomas Fitchet's Case, who, for going armed in the palace, was committed by this court without bail or mainprize; which seems to be the strongest and hardest case that hath been objected. But the answer to it is clear, and undeniable; for the statute of 2 E. 3, c. 3. is, That if any one come armed before the Justices, he shall forfeit his armour, and shall be imprisoned during the king's pleasure; so that by the express purview of the statute, such a man is not bailable. So my conclusion remains firm, notwithstanding any of those objections. That the prisoner here, being committed before conviction of any offence, (it being not possible to understand this offence treason) is bailable; and that he is bailable here, I will offer two other reasons: 1. The return is here for Sedition; and there is an information in the Star-chamber against the prisoner, for seditious practices against the king and his government. I will not affirm, that they are the same offence, but there is some probability that they are the self-same; and if they be the same offence, then the sedition here intended is not Treason, and so the party is bailable. 2. This prisoner was ready at this bar the last term, and here was a grand-jury at bar the last term, and here was the king's counsel present, who are most watchful for the king; and yet an indictment was not preferred to them against this prisoner. Which things induce me to be of opinion, that the offence here mentioned in this Return is not Treason, or so great as is pretended on the other side. I will remember one case which perhaps may be objected, (and yet I think they will not object it) and so conclude. 11 R. 2, Parliament Roll 14. in the printed statute, c. 3. and 5. where it appears, that divers questions were propounded by the king to Tresilian and Belknap, the two Chief-Justices, and to the other justices: one of which questions was, how they are to be punished, who resisted the king in exercising his royal power, &c.? And the answer of the Judges was, una voce, that they are to be punished as traitors; and 21 R. 2, c. 21. this opinion was confirmed. But afterwards in 1 H. 4, c. 3. and 4. and 1 H. 4, in the Parliament-Roll, n. 66, 67, the Judges were questioned, for their opinion, in parliament. They answered, That they were threatened and enforced to give this opinion, and that they were in truth of the contrary opinion. And Belknap said, That he acquainted and protested to the earl of Kent beforehand, that his opinion was always to the contrary. But the parliament was not content with these excuses, but they were all adjudged Traitors; and Tresilian's end is known to all, and Belknap was banished; for his wife, in 2 H. 4, brought a writ, without naming her husband, because he was banished. And the said Statute of 21 R. 2, was repealed. Therefore upon the whole matter I conclude, that the prisoner ought to be bailed.

On the same day, sir Miles Hobart and Benjamin Valentine, and Denzil Holles, esquires were at the bar, upon an Habeas Corpus directed to the several prisons; and their counsel was ready at the bar to have argued the case for them also: but because the same Return was made as above, they said; That all of them would rely upon this Argument made by Mr. Littleton.

Upon the writ of Habeas Corpus ad subjiciendum et recipiendum, directed out of the King's-bench to the Lieutenant of the Tower, he returns, that the prisoner was first committed to his custody by a warrant of the lords of the privy-council, dated 4 Martii 5 Caroli regis, and recites the warrant wherein the king's pleasure for the commitment is also signified. And farther, he returns, that the prisoner is detained by him, by virtue of another warrant, afterward directed to him, under the king's own hand, dated the 7th of May following; wherein it is signified, that he was to take knowledge, that the commitment was 'for notable contempt committed against Our Self and Our Government, and for stirring up of Sedition against Us,' with a command to detain him until his majesty's pleasure were farther known, &c. And so certifies the court, that these are the causes of taking and detaining him, and brings in his body according to the writ. And, whether upon this Return, the prisoner ought to be delivered by the court, upon sufficient bail, or remanded to the Tower, is the question? That is, supposing the Return to be every way true (as in all cases it must be supposed, when the question arises upon a return), whether there be sufficient cause expressed in it, for which the prisoner ought to be remanded? Or, that the cause of the commitment be such (as it is expressed in the return) that he ought to be bailed? If there were no more in the case, but the lords, or the king's command only, without farther cause shewed of the commitment; then it were clear, by the Declaration of both houses of parliament, and the Answer of his majesty to that Declaration, in the late Petition of Right, that the prisoners were to be remanded. And the objections that some have made, out of the statute of Westminster, the first, c. 15. That persons committed by command of the king, are not replevisable, and out of Stamford, fol. 73. as if he interpreted 'bailable' (which indeed he doth not, if he be observed) to be understood in that statute by 'replevisable,' and the like, are directly against the very body of the Petition of Right, and were so fully cleared in the debates, out of which the Petition of Right was framed, that to dispute them again, were but to question what the whole parliament had already resolved on, as the certain and established law of the kingdom. Nor is it timely to dispute here again the general power of commitment, by the lords or by the king himself. There is a commitment in the case, and there is a cause shewed of that commitment, and of the detainer in prison; and the quality of that cause only is truly the sole question; to the stating of which, the nature and course of bails upon offences, either returned generally upon Habeas Corpus, or appearing more specially upon indictments, is shortly to be first opened. All offences, by the laws of the realm, being of two kinds: the first, punishable by loss of life or limb; the second, by fine, or some pecuniary mulct, or damage and imprisonment, or by one of them; and those of the first kind being treason, murder, felonies of less nature, and some more; and of the second kind, bloodbeds, affrays, and other trespasses: If any prisoner stand committed (though before conviction) for treason or murder; the Judges, for aught appears in the Books, have not often used to let him to bail, unless it have appeared to them, that there hath been either want of prosecution, or of evidence to proceed, or that the proceeding through disability of the appellant (in case of appeals, as when he is excommunicate, is delayed; or that the evidence is slight, or some such-like cause. So that in the bailing upon such offences of the highest nature, a kind of discretion, rather than a constant law, hath been exercised, when it stands wholly indifferent in the eye of the court, whether the prisoner be guilty or not.* And according to that, they often let to bail, detain in prison, or remand the prisoner. Also in Felonies of less nature; which being all, as those of the greatest nature, capital, and so the punishment of the same above imprisonment, the imprisonment of the offenders without bail, is only used ad salvam custodiam, and cannot be used ad penam. But if a prisoner before conviction, or somewhat that supplies a conviction, (so therefore also fit enough before conviction) stand committed for trespasses only, as all offences of the second kind are, and are punishable only by fine and imprisonment, or by one of them (in which case imprisonment is to be the highest part of his punishment, after conviction) there, by the constant course (unless some special act of parliament be to the contrary in some particular case) upon offer of good bail to the court, he is to be bailed; which agrees also with all justice and exactness of reason, that so both the court may, by his sureties and bail (to whose care he is a-new committed) be assured to have him ready at the day given him upon the bail, to answer all proceeding against him; and he himself, having sureties that so undertake for his appearance, may not be compelled, before conviction, to endure that continually, ad custodiam only, which is the highest part of what he is to suffer, after conviction, ad penam. So that in cases of imprisonment for offences of the first kind, divers circumstances might be, for which sufficient bail offered might, according to the use, be refused by the court. But in cases of imprisonment for offences of the second kind, sufficient bail, offered before conviction, ought of common right to be accepted; saving still, where a special act of parliament alters the law in some particular case: but there is no colour or pretence of any such act concerning the case in question; so that we are to examine it (for the point of bailing) only at the common law.

* The Editor of Mr. Selden's Works, in his Preface to the third Volume, says, "This is the Substance of an Argument made in his (Mr. Selden's) own case, and which was pronounced by Mr. Littleton." But as there is so great a difference between them, we leave the Reader to judge of that; and, as it concerns so grand a point as the Liberty of the Subject, have therefore given both.

The state then of the question is but this: Whether that expression, 'for notable contempt against Our-self, and our government, and for stirring up of sedition against Us,' do denote any offence of the first kind; Which, if it do not, or so do not, as that the court may by the words of it be sufficiently informed that it is some offence, at least, of the first kind; the bail, in this case, ought to be accepted. The offences in the return being two; first, 'notable contempts,' and then 'stirring of sedition,' and both 'against the king.'

There can be no question made of it, but that all Contempts, of what kind soever, that are punishable by the laws of the realm, are 'against the king and his government,' immediately or mediately. And although the latitude of them be such, as that some may vastly exceed others; yet they are all, as Contempts, only trespasses, &c. punishable only by fine or imprisonment, or by both, but not until conviction of the parties (as neither are other like offences), unless the contempt be in the face of some court, against which it is committed, which supplies a conviction. Now in this case, the contempts are only expressed in a generality, and no conviction appears of them. So that for that part of the return, there can be no colour why the bail ought not to be accepted. But all the doubt of the case depends upon the second offence; that is, 'the stirring up of Sedition against the king.' Which if it be an offence only of the same kind as Contempts are, or a mere trespass only to the king; or, if by the words of the return, it appears not to the court to be an offence of the first kind, that is, either treason, or felony at least, (there being no conviction in the case) the prisoner ought to be bailed. For, unless the court be assured, out of the words of the Return, that the prisoner stands committed for some such cause, for which he might not, of right, demand his bail; it is clear they ought to bail him. It rests therefore to examine the nature of the offence comprehended in those words 'stirring up sedition against us.' If it be any thing above what is trespass only, plainly it must be either treason or felony. For felony, no man pretends that by those words, any kind of felony is to be understood. The question then must be, whether the 'stirring up sedition against the king,' be treason or no; that is high-treason, as all treason is that toucheth the king, as treason? For petit-treason, by the common-law, is felony, in regard of the king, and treason only with respect to persons slain, against the faith and obedience due from the offender; and therefore the indictments of it say 'felonicè et proditoricè.'

In the consideration of the question thus stated, first, the use of the word Sedition, and the sense of it in our language, and in our laws, that received it out of that language, is to be examined; and then what those words 'against us,' import. Out of both which, it will be easily concluded, that the offence, as it is expressed in the return, although it be a great one, yet it is only a trespass, and punishable by fine only or imprisonment, or both of them. For Sedition, and the general notion of it, we have not either in the division or explication of offences that occur in our books an express definition, description or declaration of it, though it occurs sometimes as mingled with some other offences, and the adjective of it oftener than the substantive: Nor hath there been yet found any indictment or proceeding upon the crime of Sedition, by that name singly, as an offence in law, clearly enough known by itself. 'Unlawful assemblies, routs, riots, commotions,' are the nearest, if not the very things that by other names do, for the most part, express what sedition is in our laws. Vid. 3 Hen. 7, fol. 1, et Brook, Riots 4 et 5. But our language, rather than our laws, hath received the word from Latin, and thence hath in preambles of statutes, and of indictments, sometimes inserted it; so that missing an express exposition of the word in our law, we have reason to seek for it first in the language whence we received it, and then in the use of it in our own.

In Latin, that which is mutiny, raising of tumult, assembling of any armed power, or conventicles, or the like, is sedition. Whence it is, that in the civil-law, seditio et tumultus are frequently joined; and concitatores seditiosis, and actores seditiosis, occur in the text of that law*, for such as stir up Sedition. And thence also seditio militaris is used for a mutiny of the Soldiers in the Army, in Tacitus and others, and that for no more than the professing themselves against any command whatsoever given by the general. In this sense it is used also by a lawyer of Ephesus, in the holy text, where Demetrius the silversmith assembled the rest of his company against St. Paul, for preaching against Diana. 'For we are (saith he, speaking to appease the assembly) even in jeopardy to be accused of this day's Sedition, forasmuch as there is no cause where by we may give a reason of this concourse of people,' Acts xix. 40. In the same sense Tertullus, an orator and lawyer, pleading against St. Paul at Cæsarea, before Felix the governor there, 'We have found this man a mover of Sedition amongst all the Jews throughout the world, and a chief maintainer of the sect of the Nazarenes,' Acts xxiv. 5. And such like testimonies are very obvious. In the self-same sense the word was received into our language, as we may see in that act of parliament against the Lollards, under H. 4, 2 H. 4, c. 15. The words there are, 'That they taught openly and privily divers new doctrines, contrary to the faith and determinations of the holy church; and of such sect and wicked doctrine and opinions they make unlawful conventicles and confederacies, they hold and exercise schools, they make and write books, they do wickedly instruct and inform people.' 'Et ad seditioem seu insurrectionem excitant quantum possunt, et magnas dissestiones et divisiones in populo faciunt.' Rot. Parl. 2 H. 4, n. 48.

'And, as much as they may, incite and stir them to Sedition and insurrection, and maketh great strife and division among the people, &c.' And about the beginning of queen Mary, an act of parliament was made against Seditious Words and Rumours; in the preamble whereof, 'seditious and slanderous news' is mentioned, and 'seditious and slanderous writings, and persons intending and practising to move and stir seditions' (so it is in Rastall and the Roll of parliament, not 'seditious,' as in the Statutes at large), 'discord, dissension, and rebellion within this realm,' 1 et 2 Phil. et Mar. 3. And to the same purpose, an act of explanation of the said act of queen Mary was made in 1 Eliz. c. 6, wherein mention also is of 'false, seditious, and slanderous news, or tales,' against the queen. As also in her 13th year, c. 1, a provision is made against 'contentious and seditious spreading abroad of titles to the succession of the crown.' And in another Act of the same year, c. 2, also the bringing Bulls from Rome, 'to raise and stir sedition,' is mentioned in the preamble. And in the 23rd year, another act 23 Eliz. c. 2, was made with this title, 'Against seditious words and rumours uttered against the queen's most excellent majesty.' And in indictments upon that statute of the 1st and 2nd of Philip and Mary, as it was continued in the act of the 23rd Eliz.; the party indicted for slanderous words, in defamation of the queen, is said to have been 'machinans et intendens seditionem et rebellionem infra hoc regnum Angliæ movere et suscitare,' and that 'advisate, et cum malitiosa intentione, contra dictam dominam reginam, et felonice ut felo dictæ domine regine nunc, devisavit et scripsit quædam falsas, seditiosas, et scandalosas materias, &c.' 34 Eliz. Coke, lib. intrat. indictment. fol. 352, col. 3 and 353, where the title is misreferred to the act of 1 Eliz. cap. 2.

In the lord Cromwell's Case also, 20 Eliz. Coke 4. in act. de scandalis, Seditio is mentioned 'against the queen's proceedings;' and 'seditio domini regis, vel exercitus sui,' in Bracton, fol. 118, and 'seditio regni, vel exercitus,' in Glanville, l. 14. c. 1, and 'seditio personæ domini regis vel exercitus,' in Hengham, c. 2.

Now, for the sense of the words 'sedition,' and 'seditious,' it will be most plain, that in all these places, (except those old Books of Bracton, Glanville, and Hengham, the interpretation of whom hath fittest place after the examination of the objections made to prove sedition to be treason) they denoted in our language, and in the use of our laws, that received them thence, such an offence as was not punishable (without some special provision by act of parliament) otherwise than by fine and imprisonment at the utmost; and were reputed singly, but as words or names designing 'tumults, unlawful assemblies, routs, factions or rebellions,' against any part of the established laws, or public commands. Therefore in that act of 2 Hen. 4, concerning the Lollards, the punishment of them that offended against the acts, and 'were such stirrers of sedition and insurrection,' was, that they should be imprisoned only by virtue of that act, until purgation, if they purged themselves; and imprisoned and fined after conviction, and detained in prison till abjuration: and upon refusal to abjure, or upon relapse, to be burnt for heretics: but that act is repealed by the 25 Hen. 8, c. 14. So, by the act of the 1st and 2nd of Philip and Mary, the first offence of 'speaking seditious and slanderous words,' or rumours of the king or queen, was after conviction, standing on the pillory, and loss of ears, (unless he redeemed them by the fine of 100*l.*) and three months imprisonment. And if any, from another's report, shall speak any seditious and slanderous news of the king and queen, he should, after conviction, lose one ear, (or redeem it by 100 marks) and have one month's imprisonment: And that 'if any should maliciously devise, or write any book or writing, containing any false matter, clause or sentence, of slander, reproach, and dishonour of the king or queen, to alienate the minds of the subjects from their dutiful obedience, or to the encouraging, stirring, or moving of any insurrection or rebellion within this realm; or, if any procure any such thing to be done (the said offence being not punishable by the statute of 25 of Edw. 3, of treason) he should lose his right hand. And that the second offence of them that were punishable by loss of ear or ears, should be imprisoned during life, and loss of all their goods and chattels.' This act of queen Mary expired at her death, and agreeable to it was that provision of the act of 1 Eliz. c. 6, which extended the same to queen Eliz. during her life; but there is no such law at this day in being. So, in that of the 13 of Eliz. c. 1, the first offence of 'contentious and seditious spreading abroad of titles to the succession of the crown,' is punished by the imprisonment of one whole year, and the loss of half the offender's goods, and the second offence by the pains of a præmunire. The bringing in of Bulls also from Rome, to alienate the minds of the subjects from their dutiful obedience, and to raise and stir sedition and rebellion; is made high treason by that other act of the same year. By which it appears, that 'stirring to sedition' alone is in that very act clearly supposed of far less nature. But that act is also expired. In that also of the 23 of Eliz. c. 2, the reporters of 'seditious news or rumours' against the queen, was made loss of ears (as before;) or, that to be redeemed at 200*l.* besides imprisonment of six months: and the reporters from another's mouth, to be punished according to that of 1 and 2 of Philip and Mary; saving, that the imprisonment, by this act, is three months, and the second offence is made felony, and writing of any seditious matter, to the purposes in that act of queen Mary, is made felony, upon which act the indictments of felony before mentioned, are grounded; but that act also expired by the death of queen Eliz. And in that case of the lord Cromwell, who brought a scandalum magnatum against the parson of Northelham in Norfolk, for saying, 'That you like not of me, but you like of them that maintain seditions against the queen's proceedings.' Although, in the report of the case, sedition generally be called an open and heinous crime, and described to be as in the nature of some great factious assembly, or riot; yet the defendant justifies the words, by this, that the plaintiff and he had discourse of one that preached against the Book of Common Prayer, and that in their discourse the plaintiff said to the defendant, 'I like not of thee.' To which he replied, 'It is no marvel, for you like of them that maintain sedition, (prædict' seditiosam doctrinam inuendo) against the queen's proceedings;' and the justification allowed good. Whence it appears clearly, that 'maintaining sedition,' generally may be, such preaching of seditious doctrine which is punishable only by the statute of 1 Eliz. cap. 1, by fine and imprisonment. Out of all which examples, it appears, that sedition, and acts seditiously done, are of themselves singly no capital crimes, or otherwise punishable than by fine or imprisonment, or both; unless by some special act of parliament it be ordained otherwise. And to confirm this also, we may observe divers other statutes; where routs, riots, rebellions, and insurrections (all which, of themselves, if no traitorous attempt appear, by some overt act, are punishable but by fine or imprisonment, unless some act of parliament especially ordain a greater punishment) have special punishments appointed for them; being at the common law but in the nature of trespasses. As in the 17 Rich. 2, c. 8. it appears, that in the 5th year of the same king (which is 5 Rich. 2, c. 6. Stat. 1.) 'outrageous assemblies of the people against the king's dignity, and his crown, and the laws of the land' (as every great riot is) were made Treason; which act is long since repealed. Whence it is also very observable to this purpose, that in two Acts of parliament, the one of the 2 Hen. 5, c. 9. Stat. 1. and the other of the 8 Hen. 6, c. 14. the simple word 'riots' (which is most known in the law, to this day, for seditious assemblies) is taken plainly as an expression sufficiently comprehending assemblies of people, in great number, in manner of insurrection, and also rebellions, as will appear plainly, by comparing the preambles with the bodies of the same acts. And in 11 Hen. 7, c. 7. for the punishment of 'unlawful raising and leading of people, riots, routs, and other unlawful assemblies,' a form of proceeding is appointed; wherein appears most plainly and expressly, that the punishment was only by fine and imprisonment, and the act was to continue but till the next parliament, when it expired. Therefore also by the act of 3 & 4 Edw. 6, c. 5. entitled, 'An Act for the punishment of unlawful assemblies, and rising of the king's subjects,' it was ordained, 'That if any persons, to the number of twelve, or above, being assembled together, shall intend, with force of arms, unlawfully, and of their own authority, to kill or imprison any of the king's privy-council, or to alter or change any laws established by parliament, and shall not depart and retire to their own habitations, within one hour after command made by the sheriff, some justice of the peace, or other such officer, in that behalf, the offence should be high-treason. And if such persons assembled, to the pulling down of ditches, or laying open inclosures, or to the committing of some such more offences, retire not within that space, that it shall be felony in them. And if any should incite such persons to any such act, by speaking, ringing a bell, sounding a trumpet, firing of beacons, or the like; insomuch that they remained together after any such command as aforesaid by the space of an hour, and commit any such act, as aforesaid, it should be felony also. And the persons so assembled, and remaining together, to the number of forty, by the space of two hours, are by the same made traitors. And that if the number be above two, and under twelve, that with force of arms, unlawfully, and of their own authority, assembled for the casting down of ditches, inclosures, and divers such other things, their staying together after such command by the space of an hour, should be punished by a year's imprisonment, and fine and ransom at the king's pleasure.' And it is also in the same Act ordained, 'That if any person shall procure, move, or stir any other person, or persons, to arise, or make any traitorous or rebellious assembly, to the intent to do any of the things before-mentioned, it should be felony. And further, that if any person were spoken to, moved, or stirred to make any commotion, insurrection, or unlawful assembly for any of the intents before-mentioned, and did not tell it within twenty-four hours afterward, unless he have sufficient excuse, to some head officer where such speaking were had, should suffer imprisonment, until he were discharged by three justices of the peace, whereof one to be of the quorum.' This Act was to endure till the end of the next parliament only, which was in 7 Edw. 6, and then, cap. 11. it was continued till the end of the next which was in 1 Mar. sess. 2. wherein, c. 12. it is repealed, and another of the same nature made. Both which shew most evidently, that those unlawful assemblies, insurrections, commotions, and the like, which are plainly Seditions, provided for by those acts, were before but trespasses, punishable only by fine and imprisonment. That of the 1 Mar. sess. 2. c. 12. is intitled, 'An Act against unlawful and rebellious assemblies,' where the clause of the privy-councillors (that was in the 3 & 4 Edw. 6.) is omitted; and the rest of the offence touching the altering of laws, is expressed, as in that of Ed. 6, saving that the crime is made felony, whereas it was treason by that of Ed. 6. The rest of that act of 1 Mar. is, for the most part, agreeable with that of Ed. 6, saving, that none of the offences are treason by this act, but felony at the most. And for the being 'spoken to, or stirred to make any commotion, and not discovering it,' here, in this of queen Mary, the offender is to suffer imprisonment only for three months, unless he be discharged by three justices of the peace, as in that of Ed. 6. This of queen Mary, was kept on by continuance only, from one parliament to another, during her time; and in 1 Eliz. c. 16. it was made to continue during the life of queen Eliz. and at her death expired. To this purpose also the Act of 14 Eliz. c. 1. is observable; where, 'unlawful practices, secret conspiracies and devices, to take or surprize any of the queen's fortified castles, and the malicious and rebellious intent of surprizing, or taking them, being expressed by overt-act, or word,' are made felony; 'and the not giving them up within six days after command from her, is made treason;' which act also expired with her life. Here the offences made Treason and Felony by the Act, were both seditious of a high nature; and yet but trespasses before the act made, nor are they other now the act is expired. For the surprizing or detaining of a castle, without levying a war, or some other act of treason (as in Sherley's case in Dyer) was not treason, but by that act. To these we may justly add that case of the earl of Northumberland in 5 Hen. 4, rot. parl. n. 11, 12. &c. He acknowledged by writing, in parliament, that he was guilty of not 'keeping the laws as ligeance asketh, and of gathering power, and giving of liveries' (which are the words of the Parliament-Roll), and upon special consideration had, by the lords and Judges in parliament, of the nature of the offence thus set forth, they adjudged it was neither felony nor treason, but only trespass; and so are the express words of the roll. Yet the 'gathering of power, and giving liveries, and breaking of allegiance,' are large expressions of that, which in itself was truly sedition, and that of a high nature. And thus, both by the use of the word, and the punishment provided, in some cases in parliament, for remedy of the offence (without which special provision it is never found capital) it appears clearly that sedition, or the stirring of sedition, alone, at the common law, (and no statute, now in force, hath ordained otherwise) is but trespass, and punishable only by fine and imprisonment.

Now for the words 'against Us;' that is, against the king. There is no doubt at all, but that all offences are against the king. Every slight trespass, by the law, is 'contra pacem domini regis;' and whatsoever, is against his peace is against him; as also divers indictments of mere trespasses conclude with 'in contemptum domini regis,' and 'contra coronam et dignitatem suas.' As in an Indictment for bearing of mass, is 'contra pacem, dignitatem et coronam domini regis.' All which import 'against the king.' And that act of 23 Eliz. is made 'against seditious words against the queen's most excellent majesty;' which, even after the act, remained not capital, being before but trespass. And in the preamble of that of 14 Eliz. it appears, the act was made against 'unlawful practice, secret conspiracies and devices, stirred and moved against our sovereign lady the queen, in seeking unlawfully to take 'her castles, fortresses, and the like.' And in Bracton, fol. 119. b. §. 3. & 120. b. §. 6. the concealing of treasure, which is punishable by fine and imprisonment, is expressly said to be 'gravis presumptio contra regem et dignitatem, et coronam suam;' as also the not keeping, the assises of bread and ale, and the like. Neither is there any doubt of this, but that the words, 'against the king,' may be applicable to any kind, and as well to the least as the greatest kind of offences, and imply nothing that increases the offence above trespass.

It follows then, for the last part of the consideration, that (sedition being but that which we otherwise call unlawful assemblies, riot, mutiny, rebellion, or the like; and every offence punishable, being against the king) the 'stirring up' of sedition against the king, which is or may be the 'stirring up of a rout, unlawful assembly, mutiny, rebellion,' or the like, against some ordinary, or extraordinary command, process, writ, or execution of some established law, is no other offence, by the expression in the return; nor can thereby be understood to be other, without some special act of parliament have altered the law, than trespass, and punishable only by fine and imprisonment, and so, by consequence, no Treason. As for a special act of parliament, that maketh 'sedition against the king,' to be higher than 'trespass,' there is none such extant. Among all the acts of parliament that are in force, there is none gives any colour here, but that of 25 Ed. 3, wherein treason is declared: and in that act, only these words; 'if any one levy war against our lord the king, in his realm, or be adhering to the enemies of our lord the king in his realm, giving to them aid or comfort in his realm, or elsewhere, and hereof be attainted of overt act, it is High-Treason.' The other words concerning other and higher treasons, in that act, have nothing that can so much as of themselves suppose a 'sedition against the king;' but it is true, that in these before recited there may be a 'sedition against the king;' that is, the levying of war against the king may be by sedition, or the adhering to the king's enemies, or the levying of war against him, may be, by a low expression, perhaps stiled 'sedition against the king;' as in every greater crime, as in theft, trespass may be included, or understood. Now, unless on the other side, in that which is sedition against the king, treason must necessarily be understood, these words of the 25 Ed. 3, make no more to prove that sedition is treason, than any act against theft, can prove that trespass is felony. Therefore also, in that very act of 25 Ed. 3, the riding openly or secretly with armed men to kill or rob another man, or to take him, and keep him until he make fine and ransom for his deliverance, though it be plainly 'sedition against the king,' it being against his peace, his laws, and his crown and dignity, is but felony, if robbery be committed with it, and trespass only if imprisonment till fine and ransom. And so it is declared expressly in that act. And though there have been divers acts of parliament since that of the 25 Ed. 3, that have made divers other facts treason, yet there is none of them that remain unrepealed, or not expired, that make any such fact treason, as is of the nature of sedition against the king; and except only the treasons made by those special acts of parliament, that remain in force (as those concerning bulls from Rome, jesuits, clipping of coin, and some few more), there is nothing at this day treason, saving what is comprised in that act of 25 Ed. 3, to which some special laws* have, in the ages since Ed. 3, now and then reduced all treason, by abrogating all intervencient laws of treason. And by that act, if there be a doubt that happens before the judges, by reason of any new case that comes before them, they ought not to judge it treason, until it be enacted by parliament to be so. And it doth, in the same act, appear, that before that time, there was a greater latitude of treason, than at any time since. Now, even in that time, there is an express judgment of the very point in question; though not in the same terms with this case, yet in the self-same sense, as if this case had then been before the judges. It was the case of one Russel; he was imprisoned by the Justice of North Wales, in 9 Ed. 3, and returned to be so, 'eo quod A. B. inposuit ei fecisse debuisse diversas seditiões, &c. dominum regem tangentes.' Upon this return, the court adjudged, that the offences contained in the return, and as they could thereby be understood, were such for which he ought to be bailed; and they give their reason with the judgment, 'because it did not appear what kind of seditiões against the king were meant by it.' 'Eo quod non specificatur quales seditiões, &c. ideo dimittendus,' by mainprize or bail, which to this purpose are all one. For if the sedition had been with traitorous intents, and so expressed, then it had been treason, for which they would not have let him to mainprize. But because sedition against the king might be of divers other natures, and mere trespasses, therefore they said, 'ideo dimittendus est;' expressing therein the right of the prisoner, that he might justly claim to be bailed, and by law ought to be bailed, and not only that he was bailable. But three objections may, perhaps, be made to this judgment, to make it differ in substance from the case in question. The first, that 'A. B. inposuit ei fecisse debuisse diversas seditiões, &c. which being as an accusation in so general terms, was not certain enough to make him answer to it, and thence might be cause of the judgment. The second, that it is not 'contra dominum regem,' or 'against the king,' as the case here is, but 'tangentes,' or 'touching' the king. And the third, that here is the king's warrant witnessing the offence, and command for imprisonment, and in that of 9 Ed. 3, only the charge of a subject and the commitment of a subject. To all three, the reply is easy. For the first, it is plain, that the justice of North Wales shews the reason of the imprisonment to be, because Russel was charged by A. B. to have committed 'sedition touching the king,' as every one that is returned to stand committed for any offence, is supposed to stand so committed, because somebody charged him, or accused him, or can testify against him; and that is here more particularly expressed, which in every return is supposed to be understood in the general words. As, suppose the return were, that such a one stands committed for treason, or murder, upon the accusation, testimony, or examination of A. B. taken thus, or thus: would the court bail him the sooner for that addition? And in returns, it was never expected that there should be such certainty as that the prisoner might plead and be tried. Which can never be done from returns, but only by appeals or indictments, wherein the offence is in special set forth by time, place, and all circumstances. Or, if they had, in this case of Russel, expected or considered such a certainty, they ought not to have let him into mainprize, or bailed him; but clearly dismissed him. For, if an appeal, which is an accusation, were brought against a man, or an indictment put in 'de diversis murdris,' or 'de murdro,' generally; or, 'de proditiõe,' generally; clearly, upon such an appeal or indictment, the court would not put the party neither to answer, nor so much as to the trouble of bail or mainprize, because such a charge that way, were merely void. For in appeals and indictments, the particular circumstance, and the special offence must always be set forth, or else they are void; but in returns, the general expression is sufficient for the court to judge, whether the offence be such, as that the prisoner ought to be bailed or no, as the common and most known practice is. So that the first objection is of no force. For the second, it is certain that the words 'tangentes regem,' and 'contra regem,' in matter of offences, occurring in our laws, are taken as synonymous. As in 25 Ed. 3, Stat. de Clero, c. 4. we have Treasons or Felonies, 'touchants auters persons que le roy mesme ou son royal majestie,' touching others than the king; which is the same with, 'being against others than the king,' or 'besides the king;' that is, petit Treasons (which are both Treasons and Felonies) as it appears in Stamford, l. 2. c. 43. fol. 124. b. High-Treason being 'touching the king,' or 'against the king,' or 'extending to the king;' which is the same in 25 Ed. 3, de proditiõibus. Where the sense of the words appears by a law made but few years after this very case of Russel. So in Westmin. 1. ch. 15, 'Treason que toucha le roy mesme,' is expressly for 'Treason against the king;' that is, High-Treason. And Bracton, fol. 119, b. §. 2. calls the counterfeiting the Great Seal, which is High-Treason to this day, 'Crimen læsæ majestatis, quod tangit coronam regis,' or 'Treason against the king.' And, in this latter age, we see in the statute of 14 Eliz. c. 2, that

'Treason touching the person of the queen,' and 'Treason concerning the person of the queen' are both as the same, and both for 'Treasons against the queen's person.' So that 'tangentes regem,' and 'contra regem,' denote the self-same thing in the law, and for that matter, Russel's case and this return are of the self-same nature. Now for the third objection concerning the king's warrant and command in this present case, which is not in that of Russel's, but only the accusation, or charge, and command of a subject. For the command singly considered, it is clearly against the Petition of Right: but if it be considered here (as it ought) joined with the cause of commitment, then the cause is only considerable by itself, as expressed by the warrant. But there is no book-case, act of parliament, or other testimony of law with us, that in this kind of consideration makes any difference between the expression of an offence, in a return of the king's warrant, and the expression of it in a return of a subject. For all returns of this kind, in judgment of law, are supposed true; and the sole point examinable, for matter of bail, is the nature of the offence; unless the commitment were by one that might not commit, or that some other circumstance, not concerning these matters, were in the case. And besides, in 22 Hen. 8, rot. 38. Parker's case, et 1 Hen. 8, rot.—the king's command for commitment for murder, and other offences of high nature, hath been in the return, where the prisoner was bailed. Nor will there remain any colour of testimony to maintain this last objection.

And as against this case of Russel (which is so fully in the point) these objections may be made; so against the main, the conclusion, it may be objected out of those old authors, Bracton, Glanville and Hengham; that Bracton, in express words, makes 'seditio domini regis' to be treason: 'si quis aliquid egerit' (saith he, fol. 118. b.) 'ad seditionem domini regis, vel exercitus sui, vel procurantibus auxilium et consilium præbuerit vel consensum,' it is 'crimen læsæ majestatis,' to be punished with death, and so supposes it High-Treason. So Glanville, 'Si quis machinatus fuerit, vel aliquid fecerit, in mortem regis, vel seditionem regni, vel exercitus;' he saith it is likewise Treason. And Hengham bringing examples of the 'Placita de crimine læsæ majestatis,' adds, 'ut de nece vel seditione personæ domini regis, vel regni, vel exercitus.' Where we see, 'seditio regis,' or 'regni,' or 'exercitus,' is supposed Treason. But the answers to the authority of these old authors is various. First, However they were all three (if at least that of Glanville be the work of sir Randal Glanville, Chief-Justice of England under H. 2.) learned and famous Judges in their ages, yet they lived so long since, and the rest of the particulars of which they write, are so different (whether we observè the pleas of the crown in them, or the pleas between party and party) from the practice and established laws of the ensuing ages, that their authority is of slight or no moment, for direction in judgment of the law at this day, though it be very considerable in examination what the law was in their times: and that way it sometimes is used as an ornament in argument only, as it is said in the Commentaries of them. The first of them died about 400 years since; the second, about 350; and Hengham about 300 years past. Secondly, the words of 'seditio regis,' or 'regni,' are an obscure expression, and hardly so intelligible as that we may know what they meant. For what can 'seditio of the king' mean, in English or in Latin, as they express it? And if it be taken for 'seditio against the king' (as indeed the like words are interpreted in Scottish, out of the 'regiam injestatem,' by Mr. Skene) it must be so taken against all grammar, and usual context of words; for no more than 'tumultus regis, rebellio regis, insurrectio regis,' is 'tumult against the king,' or 'rebellion against the king,' or 'insurrection against the king,' is 'seditio regis,' in force of language, 'seditio against the king.' Thirdly, Admit it be rightly taken for 'seditio against the king,' in those old Authors, yet the statute of 25 Ed. 3, 'de proditoribus,' so settles the law for treason, that whatsoever was treason before that act, and is not comprised within that act, is no treason at this day, unless some special act of parliament have ordained it. Fourthly, The constant course of testimonies, as they are before shewed, since the 25th of Ed. 3, prove expressly, that only 'seditio against the king' is taken for a less offence, and mere trespass. Fifthly, in particular offences, we see Bracton (whose authority is the chief of the three, whether we regard the expression, or the quality of the writer) differs much from the common law of the later ages: and so much, that he is directly, in some things of great moment, contrary to the clear known law, both of the present and of ancient times. As he allows no killing of a man to be murder, but what is done so secretly, that it is not known who doth it. Bracton, l. 3, de Corona, fol. 134. b. & 135. And that if the offender be taken, or if the party hurt live long enough to discover him that hurt him, though he die afterward, it is (saith he) no murder. Which is directly contrary to the law, yet altered by no special act of parliament. So, 'Si quis alterius virilia absciderit, et libidinis causa, vel commercii castraverit, sequitur' (saith he, p. 144. b. §. 3.) 'pœna aliquando capitalis, aliquando perpetuum exilium, cum omnium bonorum ademptione;' whereas there is no such thing in the laws of England. But indeed, by the civil law, 'qui hominum libidinis, vel promercii causa castraverit, pœna legis Corneliæ de sicariis punitur;' that is, is punishable capitally, ff. ad leg. Cornel. de sicariis, l. 3. §. 4. & l. 4. §. ult. Whence, doubtless, Bracton, (who cites often, to other purposes, the very texts and words, and quotes the places of the Digests, and the Code) had that punishment for such as gelded men. And thence also had, by all likelihood, that touching sedition. For, by the Civil Law, all sedition, public raising of tumults, gathering armed men without public authority, and whatsoever is but with us as a commotion or riot, is treason (crimen læsæ majestatis) and capital. To which purpose there be divers texts in that law ff. ad leg. Julianæ majest. l. 1. & de pœnis, l. 38. §. 2. de appellat[i]onibus, l. 16. C. de seditionibus, l. 1. & 2. &c. which doubtless he both read and often followed: and by 'concitatores seditionis,' or 'stirrers up of sedition,' by that very name were condemned as capital traitors. But this was never, for aught appears, law in England; but the contrary appears plain enough by what is already said. Sixthly, for answer to the objections out of Bracton and Glanville, if their authority shall be taken sufficient to maintain sedition to be treason: then will it be as reasonable to prove, that in such a case bail also should be taken. For Bracton saith expressly of that, and other treasons, that he joins with it, that the prisoner ought to be bailed, unless an accuser be present. 'Si quis,' saith he, 'de hoc crimine defamatus fuerit, tunc videndum erat utrum apparent accusator, vel non; si autem nullus appareat, nisi sola fama que tantum apud bonos et graves oriatur, hic salvo attachiabitur per salvos et securos plegios vel si plegios non habuerit, per carceris inclusionem, donec de criminibus sibi imposito veritas inquiretur.' And Glanville saith expressly, that although an accuser be present, yet he is to be bailed. 'Etiamsi accusator fuerit' (saith he) 'accusatus dimittitur per plegios; aut si non fuerit, in carcerem dimittitur.' So that either the authority of these old authors is of no moment, for the reasons before shewed; or if it be valuable, and that advantage must be taken from them, it is as reasonable that their other opinion, for the bail, be as well accepted and allowed of in this case. But there remains, perhaps, one objection, out of the opinions of Tresilian and Belknap, the two Chief-Justices; and of Holt, Fulthorp, and Burgh, justices of the Common-Pleas, and Lockton, one of the king's serjeants in 11 Rich. 2, (Vide 21 Rich. 2, c. 11, see the roll :) Who being, among other things, demanded at Nottingham by the king, and charged to answer, upon their faith and legiance to the king, how they ought to be punished that did interrupt the king, so that he might not exercise those things that pertaineth to his regality and prerogative: (in which words, perhaps, may be included all kind of sedition against any proceeding, process, or ordinary command of the king) with one assent they answered, That they ought to be punished as traitors. And if that were law, it were hard to find a sedition against the king, but that it were treason. For all his proceedings, process, and ordinary commands, belong to his regality and prerogative, and every sedition against him, is a kind of interruption of the exercise, at least, of those proceedings, process, and ordinary commands.

It is true, that in the 11 Rich. 2, such an answer, among divers others of like nature, were given by those judges, and that serjeant;

and they put their seals also to them. But it is as true, that for these very answers they were accused by the commons in parliament, the self-same year, where they answered upon the accusation: First, That the answers were written in the original to which their seals were put, otherwise than their meaning was, in some part. Secondly, That they had been threatened to make no other answer than what might agree with the king's liking. Thirdly, That their answers proceeded not of their free-will, but for fear of death; and that some of them had revealed as much to the earl of Kent, desiring him to witness as much hereafter if time served. Rot. Parl. 11 Rich. 2, n. 14, and vide Stat. 11 Rich. 2. c. 3, 5, &c. Notwithstanding all which, at the instance of the commons, they were judged all by declaration in parliament made by the king and commons, which was according to the act of 25 Edw. 3, and so by act of parliament, to be traitors, and to suffer as in case of treason; good part of which proceeding is remembered in the statutes of that year, but much more in the Rolls of that parliament. And although in the parliament of 21 Rich. 2, that parliament, and in particular, this proceeding against the judges, were wholly annulled, and their answers adjudged good; as appears in the printed statutes of that year, 21 Rich. 3, c. 12, yet in the 1st of Hen. 4, it was declared by parliament, 1 Hen. 4, c. 3, that this proceeding of parliament of 21 Rich. 2, being caused by a certain number only of the members of parliament, and that the 'Statutes, judgments, ordinances, and establishments, were made, ordained, and given erroneously and deceitfully, in great disberison and final destruction, and undoing of the liege people of the realm.' Where also it was further declared and adjudged, in the same parliament, that all the parliament of 21 Rich. 2, and all circumstances and dependents thereupon to be of no force or value, but annulled. And besides, that 'the parliament of the 11 Rich. 2,' wherein those Judges were condemned as Traitors, for that answer, and all the rest of that kind, should 'be firmly holden and kept, after the purport and effect of the same, as a thing made for the great honour and common profit of the realm.' So that that answer of the Judges, in the 11 Rich. 2, so highly condemned as false and erroneous, by two parliaments, both which have to this day continued in firm strength, is of no weight to prove that 'sedition against the king is Treason.' Nor doth any thing else prove it, but the contrary is manifested by the arguments before urged. And by consequence, it is only trespass against the king, and punishable by fine and imprisonment, and therefore the prisoner returned to stand committed 'for stirring it up against the king' ought to be bailed.

Some days after, sir Rob. Heath, the King's Attorney General, argued, That this Return was good, and that the parties ought not to be bailed: And that within the Return there ap-appears good cause of their commitment, and of their detaining also. The case is great in expectation and consequence: and concerns the Liberty of the Subject on the one part, whereof the argument is plausible; and on the other part, it concerns the safety and sovereignty of the king, which is a thing of great weight. The consideration of both pertains to you the Judges, without slighting the one, or too much elevating the other. The Return, which now is before you, is entire; but I will first consider it as divided in parts. First, the first Warrant, which is that of the Lords of the Privy Council, is general, that it was by the command of the lord the king: and this in former times was held a very good return, when due respect and reverence was given to government; but, tempora mutantur. And this Return is no way weakened by any latter opinion; for notwithstanding that, the first commitment of a man may be general: for if upon the return, the true cause should be revealed to the gaoler, by this means, faults should be published and divulged before their punishment, and so the complices of the fact will escape, and it is not fit that the gaoler, which is but a ministerial officer, should be acquainted with the secrets of the cause. But when the cause is returned in court, more certainty is requisite; for then (as it hath been objected) something ought to be expressed to which the party may answer, and upon which the court may ground their judgment. And to this purpose, the Petition of Right hath been much insisted upon; but the law is not altered by it, but remains as it was before. And this will appear upon the view of all the parts of the Petition. 1. The occasion of the Petition, and the grievance, is shewed in these words: 'Divers of your subjects have been of late imprisoned, without any cause shewed,' &c. But in this return there is a cause shewed, to which the parties may answer. Then, 2. The prayer of the Petition is, That no Freeman, in any such manner as before is mentioned, be imprisoned or detained; that is, such manner of imprisonment, the ground whereof doth not appear. Thus the Answer of the king to the Petition was in sundry words: 2 June 1628, in these words, 'The king willeth, that right be done according to the laws and customs of the realm,' &c. Which answer gave not satisfaction. And afterwards his Answer was in a parliamentary phrase, 'Soit droit fait come est desire.' But afterwards, on the 26th of June, 1628, the king expressed his intention and meaning in the said Answer. "It must be conceived, that I have granted no new, but only confirmed the ancient Liberties of my Subjects, &c." A Petition in parliament is not a law, yet it is for the honour and dignity of the king, to observe and keep it faithfully; but it is the duty of the people not to stretch it beyond the words and intention of the king. And no other construction can be made of the Petition, than to take it as a confirmation of the ancient liberties and rights of the subjects. So that now the case remains in the same quality and degree, as it was before the Petition. Therefore we will now consider, how the law was taken before the Petition; and for the discussing thereof, we will examine the second part of the Return, and in it two things: 1. If the Return, as it is now made, shall be intended for true. 2. Admit that it is true, if there be any offence contained within it; which is good to detain the prisoners. For the 1st it is clear, that the cause shall be intended true which is returned, though in truth it be false; and so are 9 H. 6, 44, and F. Corpus cum causa, and 2 Coke's Rep. 11. p. 93, Bagg's case. It seems that there is such a crime contained in this return, which is a good cause for detaining the prisoners. It is true, that it was confidently urged in parliament, in 3 Car. that general returns, that were committed by the command of the lord the king, are not good: and that those arguments remain as monuments on record, in the upper house of parliament; but I will not admit them for law. But I will remember what was the opinion of former times, 22 H. 6, 52, by Newton; a man committed by the command of the king, is not replevisable. And the opinion cannot be intended of a replevin made by the sheriff, because the principal case there is upon a return in this court. 33 Hen. 6, 28, Poyning's case, where the return was, That he was committed by the lords of the council, and it was admitted good. It is true, that this opinion is grounded upon West. 1. c. 15. but I will not insist upon it. But the constant opinion hath always been, that a man committed by the command of the king is not bailable. In 9 H. 6, 44, it is said, That if one be taken upon the king's suit, the court will not grant a superseatas. The contrary opinion is grounded upon Magna Charta, which is a general law, and literally hath no sense to that purpose: and it is contrary to the usual practice in criminal causes, in which the imprisonment is always lawful until the trial, although it be made by a justice of peace, or constable. And that a man committed by the command of the king or privy council, is not bailable, he cited 1 Jac. sir John Brocket's case; 8 Jac. Thomas Caesar's case; 13 Jac. James Demaistres's case; 43 Eliz. William Rinch's case; and in the case of M. 36 Eliz. and 4 and 5 Eliz. R. Thimelby's case; and said, that there are innumerable precedents to this purpose. M. 21 and 22 Eliz. upon the return of an Habeas Corpus it appears, that Michael Page was committed by the command of the lord the king, but was not delivered; and after was arraigned in this court, and lost his hand. And at the same time Stubbs was committed by the command of the lord the king, for seditious words and rumours, and he lost his hand also upon the same trial. M. 17 and 18 Eliz. upon Habeas Corpus for John Loan, it was returned, That he was committed for divulging sundry seditious writings, and he was remanded. And 7 H. 7, roll 6. Rug's Case; and roll 13. Chase's Case, where the return was, That they were committed by the command of the lord the king, and they were not delivered; and this was also the opinion in this court, M. 8 Car. and after the said time the law is not altered; and so, I hope, neither are your opinions.

But to consider the particular cause mentioned in the return, I will not rely upon the first part of the words, although they be of great weight, but only upon the last words,—‘for stirring up of Sedition against Us.’—But it hath been objected, that Sedition is not a word known in the law: But I marvel that the signification of the word is not understood, when it is joined with the words—‘against Us;’—this ought to be understood, Sedition against the king, in his politic capacity. Sedition hath sundry acceptations, according to the subject handled, as it appears Coke’s 4 Rep. p. 13, lord Cromwell’s Case, which hath been cited. If it be spoken of a man, that he is seditious, if it be of a Company in London, it shall be understood sedition in the company; if it be spoken of a Soldier, it shall be taken for mutinous. Mr. Littleton, who argued this case, very well said, That Tacitus used this word, and it is true; and he says, That there are two manners of seditious, ‘Seditio armata et togata;’ and the last is more dangerous than the former. But couple it with the subsequent words here, ‘against us,’ the interpretation and sense thereof is easy, and ‘loquendum ut vulgus.’ Mr. Littleton shews the acceptation of this word in divers places of Scripture, and I will not reject them, for they make for me; 20 Numb. 3, the Latin is,—‘populi versi sunt in seditionem;’—and it is Englished ‘murmuring;’ but clearly it was high-treason against the governor, and God himself. 36 Numb. 9, ‘in seditione Corah,’ it is manifest, that that was a great insurrection. 12 Jud. 1, ‘facta est ergo seditio in Ephraim;’ ‘The Ephraimites rose against Jephtha;’ and he at the same time was their judge and governor, so it was the height of insurrection. It is true, that in 15 Acts 2, ‘facta est seditio;’ and in some translations it is, ‘Orta est repugnantia non parva,’ for it may be taken in several senses. 19 Acts 40, the town-clerk there knew not how to answer for ‘this day’s sedition,’ or insurrection, and no doubt he was in great peril, for it was a great insurrection; and I wish the greater ones were as circumspect as he was. 24 Acts 5, ‘Tertullus accused Paul ‘of sedition,’ and doubtless it was conceived a great offence, if you consider the time and other circumstances, for they were heathens and Romans. And although he in very truth taught the gospel of God, yet he was taken for a pestilent fellow, and as a persuader to shake off government. Bracton, lib. 3, de Corona, c. 2, ranks sedition amongst the crimes lese majestatis. But it hath been objected, that if it be a capital offence, it ought to be felony or treason. To this I say, that it cannot be felony, but it may be treason, for any thing that appears. It is true, that by the statute of 25 E. 3, treasons are declared, and nothing shall be called treason, which is not comprised within the said statute, unless it be declared so by act of parliament. But upon Indictment of treason, such sedition as this may be given in evidence, and perhaps will prove treason. And the return is not, that he was seditious, which shews only an inclination; but that he stirred up sedition, which may be treason, if the evidence will bear it. In divers acts of parliament, notice is taken of this word Seditio, and it is always coupled with insurrection or rebellion, as appears by the statutes of 5 R. 2, c. 6. 17 R. 2, c. 8. 2 H. 5, c. 9. 8 H. 6, c. 14. 3 & 4 E. 6, c. 5. 2 R. 2, c. 5. 1 & 2 Phil. & Mar. c. 2. 1 Eliz. c. 7. 13 Eliz. c. 2. 23 Eliz. c. 2. 27 Eliz. c. 2, and 35 Eliz. c. 1, all which were cited before; and they prove, that Sedition is a word well known in the law, and of dangerous consequence, and which cannot be expounded in good sense. Wherefore, as to the nature of the offence, I leave it to the court. But out of these statutes it appears, that there is a narrow difference between it and Treason, if there be any at all.

3dly, As to the Objections which have been made, I will give a short answer to them.

1. It was objected, That every imprisonment is either for custody, or punishment; the last is always after the Judgment given for the offence; and if it be but for custody, the party upon tender of sufficient mainperners is bailable. I confess, that this difference is true, but not in all respects; for I deny, that a man is always bailable, when imprisonment is imposed upon him for custody: For imprisonment is for two intents; the one is, that the party which had offended, should not avoid the judgment of law; the second is, that he shall not do harm in the interim during his trial; and the law is careful in this point. But it hath been said, That although the party be bailed yet he is imprisoned. I deny that, for so is 1 H. 4, 6. If the party come not at the day, the bail shall be imprisoned; but yet the bail shall not suffer the same punishment which ought to have been inflicted upon the party; as if it were for treason, the bail shall not answer for the fault, but only for the body. Serjeant Berkley did well call a seditious man, an Incendiary to the government, and, as communis incendium, is to be restrained of his liberty. And he put 22 E. 4, and 22 Ass. 56, that a madman may be restrained, to prevent the hurt he would otherwise do himself and others. A seditious man is as a madman, in the public state of the Commonwealth, and therefore ought to be restrained. And it appears by the writ ‘De Leproso amovendo,’ that a leper is to be removed, and, in a manner, imprisoned, for the contagion of the disease; and this is for the safeguard of others, lest his leprosy infect others. The application is easy, and by the Statute of 1 Jac. c. 33, is restrained to keep within doors; and if he go abroad, any man may justify the killing of him. The infection of Sedition is as dangerous as any of these diseases, therefore it is not safe to let seditious men to bail, or at liberty; and in dangerous cases, the wisest way is to make all safe. In all cases of this nature, much is left to the discretion of the court. The Case of M. 9 E. 3, roll. 39 Russell, hath been objected, to be in the point; I have viewed the record of that case, and although it be verbally, yet it is not materially to this purpose: for the commitment was by a Justice of North Wales, upon the accusation of an accuser; and it was within a short time after the statute of 5 E. 3, by which it was ordained, That none should be imprisoned upon the accusation of one accuser: but here the detainment is by the king himself, for stirring up of sedition. And there the return was, That he was accused of seditions and indecencies, where the latter word doth qualify the former. And there issued a Writ of good behaviour, (as the use was) to enquire of the truth of the offence; and it was found, that there was no such offence: and then upon the same return again he was set at liberty; so that the case there was special, and the manner of proceedings special. And I desire that one thing may be observed, that Russell came in here upon the Habeas Corpus, 20 Sept. but was not delivered until Hillary Term following. And for 28 H. 6, the duke of Suffolk's Case, which was objected, that the general accusation of divers treasons was not legal: That is true, because it was in parliament, and in the nature of an accusation; and being in a court of justice, it had been unjust to condemn a man before his trial; and yet this court, upon probability of a fault, does oftentimes restrain a man before conviction. But it hath been objected in this case, They have been a long time imprisoned, and no proceedings against them. It is well known, there have been some proceedings against them, and they declined them; and also more than three months is requisite for the preparation of such proceedings, and the king intends to proceed against them in convenient time. And some that were offenders in the same kind are already delivered, to wit, Mr. Coriton and sir Peter Hayman. Therefore, if any injury be done to the Prisoners, they themselves are the cause of it, for not submitting themselves to the king. And for the instance which Mr. Littleton used of the Judges in 11 R. 2, although they suffered for their opinions given to the king, I desire, that the time when their opinion was delivered, may be considered, to wit, in the time of R. 2, and the time when they suffered, to wit, in the time of H. 4. And it was the saying of a noble gentleman, the lord Egerton, That Belknap suffered rather by the potency of his enemies, than the greatness of his offence: and yet it is to be confessed, that they might have given better counsel; but there was no time to dispute of the justness of their counsel, when the sword was in the hands of the conqueror.

What hath been relied upon is the Resolution of all the Justices of England in 34 Eliz. which Resolution is now registered in the upper house of parliament, at the request of the commons, in tertio Caroli regis; but I leave it to you, as that Resolution shall sway your judgments. The said Resolution is, That the cause ought to be certified in the generality, or speciality; and here the general cause is certified at least, if the special be not so: and upon the whole matter the bailment of these prisoners is left to your discretion; and I have shewed to you the discretion of your predecessors. And if any danger appear to you in their bailment, I am confident that ye will not bail them, if any danger may ensue; but first ye are to consult with the king, and he will shew you where the danger rests. Therefore upon the whole matter I pray, that they be remanded.

When the Court was ready to have delivered their Opinions in this great business, the Prisoners were not brought to the bar, according to the rule of the court. Therefore proclamation was made for the Keepers of the several prisons to bring in their Prisoners; but none of them appeared, except the Marshal of the King's Bench, who informed the Court, that Mr. Stroud, who was in his custody, was removed yesterday, and put in the Tower of London by the king's own warrant: and so it was done with the other prisoners; for each of them was removed out of his prison in which he was before. But notwithstanding, it was prayed by the counsel for the prisoners, that the Court would deliver their Opinion as to the matter in law: but the Court refused to do that, because it was to no purpose; for the Prisoners being absent, they could not be bailed, delivered, or remanded.

The evening before, there came a letter to the Judges of this court from the King himself, informing the court with the Reasons, wherefore the Prisoners were not suffered to come at the day appointed for the Resolution of the Judges.

To our trusty and well-beloved, our Chief Justice, and the rest of our Justices of our Bench.

“C. R. Trusty and well-beloved, we greet you well. Whereas by our special commandment we have lately removed sir Miles Hobart, Walter Long, and William Stroud, from the several prisons where they were formerly committed, and have now sent them to our Tower of London; understanding there are various constructions made thereof, according to the several apprehensions of those who discourse of it, as if we had done it to decline the course of justice; we have therefore thought fit to let you know the true reason and occasion thereof; as also, why we commanded those and the other Prisoners should not come before you the last day. We (having heard how most of them a while since did carry themselves insolently and unmannerly both towards us and your lordships) were and are very sensible thereof; and though we hear yourselves gave them some admonition for that miscarriage, yet we could not but resent our honour, and the honour of so great a court of justice, so far, as to let the world know how much we dislike the same; and having understood that your lordships, and the rest of our Judges and Barons of our Courts of Common Pleas and Exchequer, whose advices and judgments we have desired in this great business, so much concerning our government, have not yet resolved the main question; we did not think the presence of those Prisoners necessary; and until we should find their temper and discretions to be such as may deserve it, we were not willing to afford them favour. Nevertheless, the respect we bear to the proceedings of that Court, hath caused us to give way, that Selden and Valentine should attend you to-morrow, they being sufficient to appear before you, since you cannot as yet give any resolute Opinion in the main point in question. Given under our signet, at our manor at Greenwich, this 24th June, in the fifth year of our reign."

Within three hours after the receipt of those Letters, other letters were brought unto the said Judges, as followeth:

To our trusty and well-beloved, our Chief-Justice, and the rest of our Justices of our Bench.

"C. R. Trusty and well-beloved, We greet you well. Whereas by our letters of this day's date, we gave you to understand our pleasure, That of those prisoners which, by our commandment, are kept in our Tower of London, Selden and Valentine should be brought to-morrow before you; now, upon more mature deliberation, we have resolved, That all of them shall receive the same treatment, and that none shall come before you, until we have cause given us to believe they will make a better demonstration of their modesty and civility, both towards us and your lordships, than at their last appearance they did. Given under our signet, at Greenwich, this 24th day of June, in the fifth year of our reign."

So the Court this Term delivered no opinion, and the imprisoned Gentlemen continued in restraint all the long vacation.

Towards the latter end of this vacation, all the Justices of the King's-Bench being then in the country, received every one of them a letter to be at Serjeant's-inn upon Michaelmas-day. These Letters were from the Council-Table; and the cause expressed in them was, 'That his majesty had present and urgent occasion to use their service.' The Judges came up accordingly on Tuesday, being Michaelmas-day. The next morning about four o'clock, letters were brought to the Chief-Justice from Mr. Trumbal, Clerk of the Council then attending, that he and Judge Whitelocke, one of the Judges of that court, should attend the king that morning so soon as conveniently they could; which the Chief-Justice and that Judge did at Hampton that morning; where the king taking them apart from the Council, fell upon the business of the Gentlemen in the Tower, and was contented they should be bailed, notwithstanding their obstinacy, in that they would not give the king a Petition, expressing, 'That they were sorry he was offended with them.' He shewed his purpose to proceed against them by the Common Law in the King's-Bench, and to leave his proceeding in the Star-Chamber. Divers other matters he proposed to the said Judges by way of Advice,* and seemed well contented with what they answered, though it was not to his mind; which was, That the offences were not capital, and that by the law the prisoners ought to be bailed, giving security for their good behaviour. Whereupon the king told them, 'That he would never be offended with his Judges, so they deny plainly with him, and did not answer him by Oracles and Riddles.†

The first day of Michaelmas Term it was moved by Mr. Mason, to have the Resolution of the Judges; and the court with one voice

* Mr. Whitelocke in his Memorials, p. 13, says, "My father did often and highly complain against this way of sending to the Judges for their Opinions beforehand; and said, That if bishop Laud went on in his way, he would kindle a flame in the nation."

† Mr. Whitelocke, in his Memorials of the English Affairs, page 13, says, "The Judges were somewhat perplexed about the Habeas Corpus for the Parliament-men, and wrote an humble and stout Letter to the king, 'That by their oaths they were to bail the Prisoners; but thought fit, before they did it, or published their Opinions therein, to inform his majesty thereof, and humbly to advise him (as had been done by his noble progenitors in like case) to send a direction to his Justices of his bench, to bail the prisoners.' But the Lord Keeper would not acknowledge to my father, who was sent to him from the rest of his brethren about this business, that he had shewed the Judges Letter to the king, but dissembled the matter, and told him, that he and his brethren must attend the king at Greenwich, at a day appointed by him.—Accordingly the Judges attended the king, who was not pleased with their determination, but commanded them not to deliver any Opinion in this case without consulting with the rest of the Judges; who delayed the business, and would hear Arguments in the case as well as the Judges of the King's-Bench had done; and so the business was put off to the end of the Term. Then the Court of King's-Bench being ready to deliver their Opinions, the Prisoners were removed to other prisons, and a Letter came to the Judges from the king, 'That this was done because of their insolent carriage at the bar.' And so they did not appear.—The Judges of the King's-Bench were sent for by the Lord-Keeper to be in London on Michaelmas-day; the chief-justice Hyde, and my father, were sent for to the king at Hampton-Court, who advised with them about the imprisoned Parliament-men; and both these Judges did what good offices they could, to bring on the king to heal these breaches."

said, That they are now content that they should be bailed, but that they ought to find sureties also for the good behaviour. And Justice Jones said, That so it was done in the Case which had been often remembered to another purpose, to wit, Russel's Case, in 9 E. 3. To which Mr. Selden answered (with whom all the other Prisoners agreed in opinion), That they have their sureties ready for the bail, but not for the good behaviour; and desire, that the bail might first be accepted, and that they be not urged to the other; and that for these reasons:

1. The case here hath long depended in court, and they have been imprisoned for these thirty weeks, and it had been oftentimes argued on the one side and the other; and those that argued for the king, always demanded that we should be remanded; and those which argued on our side, desired that we might be bailed or discharged; but it was never the desire of the one side or the other, that we should be bound to the good behaviour. And in the last Term four several days were appointed for the Resolution of the court, and the sole point in question was, If bailable or not? Therefore he now desires, that the matter of Bail and of good Behaviour may be severed, and not confounded.

2. Because the finding of Sureties of good behaviour is seldom urged upon Returns of Felonies or Treasons. And it is but an implication upon the return, that we are culpable of those matters which are objected.

3. We demand to be bailed in point of Right; and if it be not grantable of right, we do not demand it: but the finding of Sureties for the good behaviour, is a point of discretion merely; and we cannot assent to it without great offence to the parliament, where these matters which are surmised by return were acted; and by the statute of 4 H. 8, all punishments of such nature are made void, and of none effect. Therefore, &c.

Court. The Return doth not make mention of any thing done in parliament, and we cannot in a judicial way take notice that these things were done in parliament. And by White-locke, the surety of good behaviour, is a preventing medicine of the damage that may fall out to the commonwealth; and it is an act of government and jurisdiction, and not of law. And by Croke, it is no inconvenience to the Prisoners; for the same bail sufficeth, and all shall be written upon one piece of parchment. And Heath, Attorney-General, said, That by the command of the king, he had an Informa-tion ready in his hand to deliver in the court against them.

Hyde, Chief-Justice. If now you refuse to find Sureties for the good behaviour, and be for that cause remanded, perhaps we afterwards will not grant a Habeas Corpus for you, inas-much as we are made acquainted with the cause of your imprisonment.

Ashley, the King's Serjeant, offered his own bail for Mr. Hollis, one of the prisoners, who had married his daughter and heir, but the court refused it; for it is contrary to the course of the court, unless the Prisoner himself will become bound also.*

And Mr. Long, that had found sureties in the Chief-Justice's Chamber, for the good behaviour, refused to continue his sureties any longer, inasmuch as they were bound in a great sum of 2,000*l.* and the good behaviour was a ticklish point. Therefore he was committed to the custody of the Marshal, and all the other Prisoners were remanded to prison, because they would not find sureties for the good behaviour.

Mich. 6 Car. B. R.

John Selden was committed to the Marshal- sea of the King's-Bench, for not putting in Sureties for his good behaviour. There were with him in the same prison, Hobart, Stroud, and Valentine. In the end of Trinity Term, 6 Car. the sickness increasing in Southwark, the three last named made suit unto the Judges of the King's-Bench, to be delivered over to the Gatehouse in Westminster, to avoid the danger. The Judges thought it charity, and by writ to the marshal of the King's-Bench, commanded him to deliver them to the Keeper of the Gatehouse, and sent him a writ to receive them. Mr. Selden never sent unto them whilst they were in town, but when they were all gone, made suit to the Lord-Treasurer to move the king, that, to avoid this danger, he might be removed to the Gatehouse; which he did, and sent a warrant under his hand to the marshal, signifying his majesty's pleasure to remove him to the Gatehouse: accordingly he was removed. Thereupon, when the Judges came to town in Michaelmas Term, they called the Marshal to account for his Prisoner, Mr. Selden; and he presenting unto them the Lord

* "This motion of discharging proceeded from the king himself, who had conferred with the Judges, and had declared his content the Prisoners should be bailed, notwithstanding their obstinacy, that they would not so much as present a Petition to him to express, that 'they were sorry he was offended with them.' But the Prisoners began now to value themselves upon their suffering, and had so much countenance from several of their late fellow-members, that they would not now accept of a deliverance, but unanimously refused to find sureties for their behaviour: nay, Mr. Hollis was so industrious to be continued in custody, that when offered his own bail, he would not yield to the course of the Court, to be himself bound with him. And even Mr. Long, who had actually found sureties in the Chief Justice's Chamber, declared in court, that his sureties should no longer continue. Such a merit did they now place in confinement, as to labour against their own liberty; and by such glorying in persecution to raise a popularity to themselves, and cast an odium on the king." 3 Kennet, p. 49.

Treasurer's Warrant by the king's direction, the Judges told him it would not serve, for he could not be removed but by writ; and upon his majesty's pleasure signified, it might so have been done. And although the Judges were out of town, yet the Clerk of the Crown would have made the writ upon so good a warrant, and it might have been subscribed by the Judges at their return. And to avoid the like error hereafter, the court sent justice White-locke to the Lord Treasurer, to let him know, that Mr. Selden never looked after any of the Court, but sought a new and irregular way to be removed without them. The Lord Treasurer made a very honourable answer, That he would not move the king for Mr. Selden to be removed by this means, until he sent him word, on his credit, that it was a legal way; and told that Judge, that Mr. Selden was at the Judges dispose, to remove back when they would, for it was not the king's meaning to do any thing contrary to the order of the court, or their formal proceedings: so Writs were sent this Michaelmas Term to remove the four Prisoners back again to the Marshalsea.

THE CASE OF SIR MILES HOBART, AND WILLIAM STROUD, ESQ.

On the 23rd of January, the Attorney-General exhibited two several Informations, the one against Wm. Stroud, esq. the other against sir Miles Hobart, knt. The charge against both of them therein, was for several escapes out of the prison of the Gatehouse: they both pleaded, Not Guilty. And their cases appeared to be as followeth: The said William Stroud, and sir Miles Hobart, were by the king's command committed to prison, for misdemeanors alleged against them, in their carriage in the House of Commons at the last parliament. Afterwards in Trinity Term, anno 6 Caroli, both of them being by order of this court, and by a warrant from the Attorney-General, to be removed unto the Gatehouse; the warden of the Marshalsea, where they were before imprisoned, sent the said Stroud to the keeper of the Gatehouse, who received him into his house lately built, and adjoining to the prison of the Gatehouse, but being no part thereof. After which receipt, the same night, he licensed the said Stroud to go with his keeper unto his chamber in Gray's-inn, and there to reside. Sir Miles Hobart was also by the said warden of the Marshalsea, delivered to the keeper of the Gatehouse, but being sick, and abiding at his chamber in Fleet-street, he could not be removed to the prison of the Gatehouse, but there continued with his keeper also. Afterwards the Sickness increasing in London, they (with the licence of the keeper of the Gatehouse, as it was proved) retired with their under-keepers to their several houses in the country for the space of six weeks, until Michaelmas Term then next following, when by direction of the said keeper they returned to his house; but in all that space it could not be proved, that they were in any part of the old prison of the Gatehouse, but in the new building thereto adjoining; unless when they once withdrew themselves to a close-stool, which was placed near to the parlour, and was part of the old prison of the Gatehouse. This Evidence was given to both the Juries, and both of them returned their Verdicts severally, 'That they were not Guilty,' according to the Information exhibited against them. And in this case it was debated at the Bar and Bench, whether by this receipt and continuance in the new house only, it may be said, That they ever had been imprisoned? And the Judges held, 'That their voluntary retirement to the close-stool made them to be prisoners.' They resolved also, that in this and all other cases, although a Prisoner depart from prison with his keeper's licence, yet it is an offence as well punishable in the prisoner as in the keeper. And Calthorpe made this difference between breach of prison and escape; the first is 'against the Gaoler's will;' the other is 'with his consent,' but in both the Prisoner is punishable: whereunto the whole Court agreed. It was also resolved that the Prison of the King's Bench is not any local prison, confined only to one place, and that every place where any person is restrained of his liberty is a prison: as, if one take sanctuary and depart thence, he shall be said to break prison.*

In the next parliament, which met April 13, 1640, it was referred to a committee, to consider of the breach of privilege by sir John Finch (the Speaker), 5 Car. 1, who refused to put the question by command of the house; and the committee ordered to state matter of fact, and so report.

* Mr. Whitlocke, in his Memorials, p. 16, says, "In the year 1631, some of the imprisoned Parliament-men, upon their Petition, were removed from the prisons wherein they then were, to other prisons, to prevent the danger of the sickness then increasing. Sir Miles Hobart put in sureties for his good behaviour, and so was discharged from his imprisonment.—Anno 1631. Sir John Walter died, a grave and learned Judge; he fell into the king's displeasure, charged by his majesty 'for dealing cauteously, and not plainly, with him, in the business concerning the parliament-men:' as if he had given his opinion to the king privately one way, and thereby brought him on the stage, and there left him, and then was of another Judgment. His opinion was contrary to all the rest of the Judges, 'That a Parliament-man for misdemeanor in the house, criminally, out of his office and duty, might be only imprisoned, and not farther proceeded against:' which seemed very strange to the other Judges, because it could not appear, whether the party had committed an offence, unless he might be admitted to his answer. The king discharged him of his service by Message, yet he kept his place of Chief-Baron, and would not leave it but by legal proceeding; because his patent of it was, Quam diu se bene gesserit, and it must be tried whether he did bene se gessere, or not: he never sat in court after the king forbade him, yet held his place till he died."

Monday, April 20. Mr. Treasurer reported, That sir John Finch late Speaker did not say, 'He would not put the question;' but that, 'He durst not put it:' that 'he left the Chair not to disobey the house,' but 'to obey his majesty.'

The house thereupon resolved, That it was a breach of Privilege of the house, for the Speaker not to obey the commands of the house; and that it appeared the Speaker did adjourn the house by command of the king, without consent of the house, which is also a breach of privilege; it was therefore ordered, that this should be humbly represented to his majesty. But this parliament being soon dissolved, viz. May 5, 1640, nothing was done for these Gentlemen, but in the next parliament, which met Nov. 3, 1640, reparation was ordered them; as will be shewa in the following proceeding.

130. Proceedings against Sir JOHN ELLIOT, DENZIL HOLLIS, esq. and BENJAMIN VALENTINE, esq. for seditious Speeches in Parliament: in B. R. Mich. 5 CHARLES I. A. D. 1629.*

SIR Robert Heath, the king's Attorney-General, exhibited informations in this court against sir John Elliot, knight, Denzil Hollis, and Benjamin Valentine, esqrs. the effect of which was,† That the king that now is, for weighty causes, such a day and year, did summon a parliament, and to that purpose sent his writ to the sheriff of Cornwall to chuse two knights: by virtue whereof sir John Elliot was chosen and returned knight for Cornwall. And that in the same manner, the other defendants were elected burgesses of other places, for the same parliament. And shewed further, that sir John Finch was chosen for one of the citizens of Canterbury, and was Speaker of the house of commons. And that the said Elliot publicly and maliciously in the house of commons, to raise sedition between the king, his nobles, and people, uttered these words, 'That the Council and Judges had all conspired to trample under foot the Liberties of the Subjects.' He further shewed, that the king had power to call, adjourn, and dissolve parliaments: and that the king, for divers reasons, had a purpose to have the house of commons adjourned, and gave direction to sir John Finch, then the Speaker, to move an adjournment; and if it should not be obeyed, that he should forthwith come from the house to the king. And that the Defendants, by confederacy aforehand, spake a long and continued speech, which was recited verbatim, in which were divers malicious and seditious words, of dangerous consequence. And to the intent that they might not be prevented of uttering their premeditate speeches, their intention was, that the Speaker should not go out of the Chair till they had spoken them; the Defendants, Hollis and Valentine, laid violent hands upon the Speaker, to the great affrightment and disturbance of the house. And the Speaker being got out of the Chair, they by violence set him in the Chair again; so that there was a great tumult in the house. And after the said speeches pronounced by sir John Elliot, Hollis did recapitulate them.

And to this Information,

The Defendants put in a Plea to the Jurisdiction of the court, because 'these offences are supposed to be done in parliament, and ought not to be punished in this court, or in any other, but in parliament.'

And the Attorney-General moved the Court, to over-rule the plea to the jurisdiction. And that, he said, the court might do, although he had not demurred upon the plea. But the court would not over-rule the plea, but gave day to join in demurrer this term. And on the first day of the next term, the record shall be read, and within a day after shall be argued at bar.

Hyde, Chief-Justice, said to the counsel of the Defendants; So far light we will give you: this is no new question, but all the Judges in England, and Barons of the Exchequer, before now, have oft been assembled on this occasion, and have, with great patience, heard the arguments on both sides; and it was resolved by them all with one voice, That an offence committed in parliament, criminally or contemptuously, the parliament being ended, rests punishable in another court.

Jones. It is true, that we all resolved, That an offence committed in parliament against the crown, is punishable after the parliament in another court; and what court shall that be, but the court of the King's-bench, in which the king, by intendment, sitteth?

Whitlocke. The question is now reduced to a

* The king at first intended to proceed against the above gentlemen in the Star-Chamber, to which end an Information was exhibited against them in that court, on the 7th of May; but that being dropped, they were proceeded against in the King's-bench, and the same matters in effect were set forth as in the Information in the Star-Chamber.

narrow room, for all the Judges are agreed, That an offence committed in parliament against the king or his government, may be punished out of parliament. So that the sole doubt which now remains, is, whether this court can punish it.

Croke agreed, That so it had been resolved by all the Judges, because otherwise there would be a failure of justice. And by him, if such an offence be punishable in another court, what court shall punish it but this court, which is the highest court in the realm for criminal offences? And perhaps not only criminal actions committed in parliament are punishable here, but words also.

Mr. Mason of Lincoln's-Inn argued for sir John Elliot, one of the Defendants. The charges in the Information against him are three:

1. For Speeches.

2. For Contempts to the King, in resisting the Adjournment.

3. For Conspiracy with the other Defendants, to detain Mr. Speaker in the Chair.

In the discussion of these matters, he argued much to the same intent he had argued before, therefore his argument is reported here very briefly.

1. For his Speeches, they contain matter of accusation against some great peers of the realm; and as to them, he said, that the king cannot take notice of them. The Parliament is a Council, and the Grand Council of the king; and councils are secret and close, none other have access to those councils of parliament, and they themselves ought not to impart them without the consent of the whole house. A Jury in a leet, which is sworn to inquire of offences within the said jurisdiction, are sworn to keep their own counsel; so the house of commons inquire of all grievances within the kingdom, and their counsels are not to be revealed. And to this purpose was a Petition, 2 H. 4, n. 10. That the king shall not give credit to any private reports of their proceedings, to which the king assents: therefore the king ought not to give credit to the information of these offences in this case. 2. The words themselves contain several accusations of great men; and the liberty of accusation hath always been parliamentary 50 E. 3. Parliament Roll, n. 21, the lord Latimer was impeached in parliament for sundry offences. 11 R. 2, the archbishop of York; 18 H. 6, n. 18, the duke of Suffolk; 1 Mar Dy. 93, the duke of Norfolk; 36 H. 6, n. 60, un Vicker General; 2 and 3 E. 6, c. 18, the lord Seymour; 18 of king James, the lord of St. Albans, Chancellor of England; and 21 of king James, Cranfield, Lord Treasurer; and 1 Car. the duke of Buckingham. 3. This is a privilege of parliament, which is determinable in parliament, and not elsewhere; 11 R. 2, n. 7, the Parliament Roll, a Petition exhibited in parliament, and allowed by the king. That the liberties and privileges of parliament shall only be discussed there, and not in other courts, nor by the common, nor civil law; (see this Case more at large in Selden's Notes upon Fortescue, f. 42.)

11 R. 2, Roll of the process and judgment. An appeal of Treason was exhibited against the archbishop of Canterbury and others, and there the advice of the sages of the one law and the other being required; but because the appeal concerned persons which are peers of the realm, which are not tried elsewhere than in parliament, and not in an inferior court. 28 H. 6, n. 18. There being a question in parliament concerning precedency, between the earl of Arundel, and the earl of Devon, the opinion of the Judges being demanded, they answered, That this question ought to be determined by the parliament, and by no other. 31 H. 6, n. 25, 26. During the prorogation of the parliament, Thorp that was the Speaker, was out in execution at the suit of the duke of York; and upon the re-assembly of the parliament, the commons made suit to the king and lords to have their Speaker delivered. Upon this, the lords demand the opinion of the Judges; who answer, That they ought not to determine the privileges of the high court of parliament. 4. This accusation in parliament is in legal course of justice, and therefore the accuser shall never be impeached, 13 H. 7, and 11 Eliz. Dy. 285. Forging of false deeds brought against a peer of the realm, action de scandalis magnatum, doth not lie. Coke's Rep. 4. 14, Cusler and Dixy's case, where divers cases are likewise put to this purpose. 35 H. 6, 15. If upon the view of the body the slayer cannot be found, the Coroner ought to enquire, Who first found the dead body? And if the first finder accuse another of the murder, that is afterward acquit, he shall not have an action upon the case, for it was done in legal manner. So it is the duty of the commons to enquire of the Grievances of the Subjects, and the causes thereof, and doing it in a legal manner, 19 H. 6, 19. 8 H. 4, 6, in conspiracy it is a good plea, that he was one of the indictors. And 20 H. 6, 5, that he was a grand Jury-man, and informed his companions. And 21 E. 4, 6, 7, and 35 H. 6, 14, that he was a Justice of Peace, and informed the Jury, 27 Ass. p. 12, is to the same purpose. And if a Justice of Peace, the first finder, a juror, or indictor, shall not be punished in such cases; à fortiori, a member of the house of commons shall not, who, as 1 H. 7, is a Judge. 27 Ass. p. 44, may be objected, where two were indicted of a conspiracy, because they maintained one another; but the reason of the said case was, because maintenance is a matter forbidden by the law; but parliamentary accusation, which is our matter, is not forbidden by any law. Coke's Rep. 9. 56, there was a conspiracy, in procuring others to be indicted. And it is true, for there it was not his duty to prefer such accusation. (2) The accusation was extra-judicial, and out of court; but it was not so in our case. (3) Words spoken in parliament, which is a superior court, cannot be questioned in this court, which is inferior. 3 E. 3, 19, and Stamford 153, will be objected, where the bishop of Winchester was arraigned in this court, because he departed the parliament without licence; there is but the opinion of Scroop, and the case was entered, P. 3 E. 19. And it is to be observed, that the plea of the bishop there, was never over-ruled. From this I gather, that Scroop was not constant to his opinion, which was sudden, being in the same term in which the plea was entered; or if he were, yet the other Judges agree not with him; and also at last the bishop was discharged by the king's writ. From this I gather, that the opinion of the court was against the king, as in Pl. 20. in Fogassa's case, where the opinion of the court was against the king, the party was discharged by privy seal. 1 and 2 Phil. and Mar. hath been objected, where an information in this court was preferred against Mr. Plowden, and other members of the house of commons, for departing from the house without licence. But in that case I observe these matters. (1) That this information depended during all the life of the queen, and at last was sine die, by the death of the queen. (2) In the said case, no plea was made to the jurisdiction of the court, as here it is. (3) Some of them submitted themselves to the fine, because it was easy, for it was but 53s. 4d. But this cannot be urged as a precedent, because it never came in judgment, and no opinion of the court was delivered therein. And it is no argument, that because at that time they would not plead to the jurisdiction, therefore we now cannot if we would. (4) These offences were not done in the parliament house, but elsewhere by their absence, of which the country may take notice; but not of our matters done in parliament. And absence from parliament, is an offence against the king's summons to parliament. 20 R. 2, Parliament Roll 12. Thomas Hacksey was indicted of high treason in this court, for preferring Petition in parliament; but 1 H. 4, n. 90. he preferred a Petition to have this judgment voided, and so it was, although the king had pardoned him before. And 1 H. 4. n. 104. all the commons made petition to the same purpose, because this tends to the destruction of their privileges. And this was likewise granted. 4 H. 8, c. 8, Strode's case, That all condemnations imposed upon one, for preferring of any Bill, speaking, or reasoning in parliament, are void. And this hath always been conceived to be a general act, because the prayers, time, words, and persons are general, and the answer to it is general; for a general act is always answered with, Le roy voit, and a particular act with Sous droit fait al parties. And 33 H. 6, 17, 18. a general act is always inrolled, and so this is.

2. For the second matter, the Contempt to the command of the adjournment, Jac. 18. it was questioned in parliament, whether the king can adjourn the parliament, (although it be without doubt that the king can prorogue it). And the Judges resolve, that the king may adjourn the house by commission: and 27 Eliz. it was resolved accordingly. But it is to be observed, that none was then impeached for moving that question. (2.) It is to be observed, that they resolve, that the adjournment may be by commission, but not resolved that it may be by a verbal command, signified by another; and it derogates not from the king's prerogative, that he cannot so do, no more than in the case of 26 H. 8, 8. that he cannot grant one acre of land by parol. The king himself may adjourn the house in person, or under the great seal, but not by verbal message, for none is bound to give credit to such message; but when it is under the Great Seal, it is teste meipso. And if there was no command, then there can be no contempt in the disobedience of that command. (3) In this, no contempt appears by the information; for the information is, that the king had power to adjourn parliaments. Then put the case, the command be, that they should adjourn themselves: this is no pursuance of the power which he is supposed to have. The house may be adjourned two ways, to wit, by the king, or by the house itself: the last is their own voluntary act, which the king cannot compel, for, 'Voluntas non cogitur.'

3. For the third matter, which is the Conspiracy: although this be supposed to be out of the house, yet the act is legal; for members of the house may advise of matters out of the house: for the house itself is not so much for consultations, as for proposition of them. And 20 H. 6, 34. is, that inquests which are sworn for the king, may enquire of matters elsewhere. (2) For the Conspiracy to lay violent hands upon the Speaker, to keep him in the Chair; the house hath privilege to detain him in the Chair, and it was but lightly and softly, and other Speakers have been so served. (3) The king cannot prefer an information for trespass; for it is said, the king ought to be informed by a jury, to wit, by indictment, or presentment. (4) This cannot be any contempt, because it appears not that the house was adjourned; and if so, then the Speaker ought to remain in the chair; for without him, the house cannot be adjourned. But it may be objected, that the information is, That all these matters were done maliciously and seditiously. But to this I answer, That this is always to be understood according to the subject matter, 15 E. 4, 4. and 18 H. 8, 5. A wife that hath title to have dower, agrees with another to enter, (which hath right) that she against him may recover her dower. This shall not be called Covin, because both the parties have right and title. (2) It will be objected, That if these matters shall not be punishable here; they shall be unpunished altogether, because the parliament is determined. To this I say, That they may be punished in the subsequent parliament, and so there shall be no failure of right. And many times matters in one parliament have been continued to another, as 4 E. 3, n. 16. the lord Berkley's Case, 50 E. 3, n. 185. 21 R. 2, c. 16. 6 H. 6, n. 45, 46. 8 H. 4, n. 12. offence in the forest ought to be punished in cyre, and eyes oftentimes were not held but every third year. C. 9. Epistle. and 36 E. 3. c. 10. A parliament may be every year. Error in this court cannot be reversed but in parliament, and yet it was never objected, that therefore there shall be a failure of right. 25 E. 3, c. 2. If a new case of treason happen, which is doubtful, it shall not be determined till the next parliament. So in Westm. 2, c. 28, where a new case happens, in which there is no writ, stay shall be made till the next parliament. And yet in these cases, there is no failure of right. And so the judges have always done in all difficult cases; they have referred the determination of them to the next parliament, as appears by 2 E. 3, 6, 7. 1 E. 3, 8. 33 H. 6, 18. 5 E. 2, Dower 145, the case of dower of a rent-charge. And 1 Jac. the Judges refuse to deliver their opinions concerning the union of the two kingdoms. The present case is great, rare, and without precedent, therefore, not determinable but in parliament. And it is of dangerous consequence; for (1) by the same reason, all the members of the house of commons may be questioned. (2) The parties shall be disabled to make their defence, and the clerk of parliament is not bound to disclose those particulars. And by this means, the debates of a great council shall be referred to a petty jury. And the parties cannot make justification, for they cannot speak those words here, which were spoken in the parliament, without slander. And the defendants have not means to compel any to be witnesses for them; for the members of the house ought not to discover the counsel of the house: so that they are debarred of justification, evidence, and witness. Lastly, By this means, none will adventure to accuse any offender in parliament, but will rather submit himself to the common danger; for, for his pains he shall be imprisoned, and perhaps greedily fined: and if both these be unjust, yet the party so vexed can have no recompence. Therefore, &c.

The Court. The question is not now, whether these matters be offences, and whether true or false. But admitting them to be offences, the sole question is, Whether this court may punish them; so that a great part of your argument is nothing to the present question.

At another day, being the next,

Mr. Calthorpe (who succeeded Mr. Mason, as Recorder of London) argued for Mr. Valentine, another of the defendants:

1. In general, he said, for the nature of the crimes, that they are of four sorts: 1. In Matter. 2. In Words. 3. By Consent. 4. By Letters.

Two of them are laid to the charge of this Defendant, to wit, the crime of the Matter, and of Consent. And of offences, Bracton makes some public, some private. The offences here are public. And of them, some are capital, some not capital; as assault, conspiracy, and such like, which have not the punishment of life and death. Public crimes capital are such as are against the law of nature, as treason, murder; I will agree, that if they be committed in parliament, they may be questioned elsewhere out of parliament. But in our case, the crimes are not capital, for they are assault and conspiracy, which in many cases may be justified, as appears by 22 H. 7, Keilw. 92. 2. Ass. 3 H. 4, 10. 22 E. 4, 43. Therefore this court shall not have jurisdiction of them, for they are not against the law of nations, of God, or nature; and if these matters shall be examinable here, by consequence all actions of parliament-men may be drawn in question in this court. But it seems by these reasons, that this court shall not have jurisdiction, as this case is:

1. Because these Offences are justifiable, being but the bringing the Speaker to the Chair, which also perhaps was done by the Votes of the Commons; but if these matters shall be justified in this court, no trial can be, for upon issue of his own wrong, he cannot be tried, because acts done in the house of commons are of record, as it was resolved in the parliament, 1 Jac. and 16 H. 7, 3. C. 9. 31. are that such matters cannot be tried by the country. And now they cannot be tried by record, because, as 22 H. 8, Dy. 32. is, an inferior court cannot write to a superior. And no Certiorari lies out of the Chancery, to send this here by Mittimus, for there was never any precedent thereof; and the book of the house of commons, which is with their clerk, ought not to be divulged. And C. Little. is, that if a man be indicted in this court for piracy committed upon the sea, he may well plead to the jurisdiction of this court, because this court cannot try it.

2. It appears by the old Treatise, 'De modo tenendi Parliamentum,' that the Judges are but assistants in the parliament; and if any words or acts are made there, they have no power to contradict or controul them. Then it is incongruous that they, after the parliament dissolved, shall have power to punish such words or acts, which at the time of the speaking or doing, they had not power to contradict. There are superior, middle, and more inferior magistrates; and the superior shall not be subject to the controul of the inferior. It is a position, that 'in paret est nullum imperium, multo minus in eos, qui magis imperium habent.' C. Little. says, That the parliament is the supreme tribunal of the kingdom, and they are Judges of the supreme tribunal; therefore they ought not to be questioned by their inferiors. (3) The Offences objected do concern the privileges of parliament, which privileges are determinable in parliament, and not elsewhere, as appears by the precedents which have been cited before. (4) The Common Law hath assigned proper courts for matters, in respect of the place and persons: 1. For the place, it appears by 11 Ed. 4, 3, and old Entries, 101, that in an ejectione firme, it is a good plea, that the land is ancient demesne, and this excludes all other courts. So it is for land in Durham, old Entries, 419, for it is questionable there, and not out of the county. 2. For persons, H. 15 H. 7, fol. 93, old Entries, 47. If a clerk of the Chancery be impleaded in this court, he may plead his privilege, and shall not answer. So it is of a Clerk of the Exchequer, old Entries, 473, then much more when offences are done in parliament, which is exempt in ordinary jurisdiction, they shall not be drawn into question in this court. And if a man be indicted in this court, he may plead sanctuary, 22 H. 7, Keilw. 91. & 22, and shall be restored, 21 E. 3, 60. The Abbot of Bury's Case is to the same purpose. (5.) For any thing that appears, the house of commons had approved of these matters, therefore they ought not to be questioned in this court. And if they be offences, and the said house hath not punished them, this will be a casting of imputation upon them. (6.) It appears by the old Entries, 446, 447. that such an one ought to represent the borough of St. Germain, from whence he was sent; therefore he is in nature of an ambassador, he shall not be questioned for any thing in the execution of his office, if he do nothing against the Law of Nature or Nations, as it is the case of an ambassador. In the time of queen Elizabeth, (Camden's Brit. 449.) the bishop of Ross, in Scotland, being ambassador here, attempted divers matters against the State; and by the opinion of all the civilians of the said time, he may be questioned for those offences, because they are against the law of nations and nature; and in such matters, he shall not enjoy the privileges of an ambassador. But if he commit a civil offence, which is against the municipal law only, he cannot be questioned for it, as Bodin. de Republica, agrees the case. Upon the Statute of 23 H. 8, c. 15, for Trial of Pirates, 13 Jac. the case fell out to be thus: A Jew came ambassador to the United Provinces, and in his journey he took some Spanish ships, and after was driven upon this coast; and agreed upon the said statute, that he cannot be tried as a pirate here by commission, but he may be questioned civilliter in the admiralty; for, 'legati suo regi soli iudicium faciunt.' So ambassadors of parliament, soli parlamento, to wit, in such things, which of themselves are justifiable. (7.) There was never any precedent, that this court had punished offences of this nature, committed in parliament, where any plea was put in, as here it is to the jurisdiction of the court; and where there is no precedent, non-usage is a good expositor of the law. Lord Littl. Section 180. Co. Littl. f. 81, says, as usage is a good interpreter of the laws, so non-usage, where there is no example, is a great intendment that the law will not bear it. 6 Eliz. Dy. 299, upon the Statute of 27 H. 8, of inrollments, that bargain and sale of a house in London ought not to be enrolled; the reason there given is, because it is not used. 23 Eliz. Dy. 376, no error lies here of a Judgment given in the five ports, because such writ was never seen; yet in the diversity of Courts it is said, that error lies of a Judgment given in the five ports. 39 H. 6, 39, by Ashton, that a protection to go to Rome was never seen, therefore he disallowed it. (8.) If this Court shall have jurisdiction, the court may give judgment according to law, and yet contrary to parliament law, for the parliament in divers cases hath a peculiar law. Notwithstanding the Statute of 1 H. 5, c. 1. That every burghess ought to be resident within the borough of which he is burghess, yet the constant usage of parliament is contrary thereunto; and if such matter shall be in question before ye, ye ought to adjudge according to the statute, and not according to their usage. So the house of Lords hath a special law also, as appear by 11 R. 2, the Roll of the process and judgment (which hath been cited before to another purpose) where an appeal was not according to the one law or the other, yet it was good according to the course of parliament. (9.) Because this matter is brought in this court by way of Information, where it ought to be by way of Indictment. And it appears by 41 Ass. p. 12, that if a bill of Deceit be brought in this court, where it ought to be by writ, this matter may be pleaded to the jurisdiction of the court, because it is vi et armis, and contra pacem. It appears by all our Books, that informations ought not to be grounded upon surmises, but upon matter of record, 4 H. 7, 5. 6 E. 6, Dy. 74. Information in the Exchequer, and 11 H. 8, Keilw. 101, are to this purpose. And if the matter be vi et armis, then it ought to be found by inquest. 2 E. 3, 1, 2. Appeal shall not be granted upon the return of the sheriff, but the king ought to be certified of it by indictment. 1 H. 7, 6, and Stamf. f. 95, a. upon the statute of 25 E. 3, c. 4, that none shall be imprisoned but upon indictment or presentment; and 28 E. 3, c. 3, 42 E. 3, c. 3, are to the same purpose. So here, this information ought to have been grounded upon indictment, or other matter of record, and not upon bare intelligence given to the king. (10.) The present case is great and difficult, and in such cases, the Judges have always outed themselves of jurisdiction, as appears by Bracton, Book 2, f. 1, 'Si aliquid novi non usitatum in regno acciderit,' 2 E. 3, 6, 7, and Dower 242.

Now I will remove some Objections which may be made.

Where the king is Plaintiff, it is in his election to bring his action in what Court he pleases. This is true in some sense, to wit, That the King is not restrained by the Statute of Magna Charta, 'Quod communia placita non sequantur curiam nostram' for he may bring his quare impedit in B. R. And if it concerns Durbam, or other County Palatine, yet the king may have his action here: for the said Courts are created by patent, and the king may not be restrained by parliament, or by his own patent, to bring his action where he pleaseth. But the king shall not have his action where he pleaseth against a prohibition of the common law, as 12 H. 7, Keilw. 6, the king shall not have a formedon in Chancery. And C. 6, 20 Gregory's Case, if the king will bring an information in an inferior court, the party may plead to the jurisdiction. So where the Common Law makes a prohibition, the king hath not election of his court.

The information is contra formam statuti, which Statute, as I conceive, is intended the statute of 5 H. 4, c. 6, and 11 H. 6, c. 11, which gives power to this court to punish an assault made upon the servant of a knight of Parliament. But our case is not within those statutes, nor the intent of them; for it is not intendible, that the parliament should disadvantage themselves in point of their privilege. And this was a Trespass done within the house, by parliament-men amongst themselves. And Crompton's Jurisdiction of Courts, f. 8, saith, That the parliament may punish trespasses done there.

Precedents have been cited of Parliament-men imprisoned and punished for matters done in parliament. To this I say, That there is via juris, and via facti; and via facti is not always via juris. C. 4, 93, Precedents are no good directions, unless they be judicial.

Otherwise there will be a failure of justice, wrongs shall be unpunished. To this I answer, That a mischief is oft-times rather sufferable than an inconvenience, to draw in question the privileges of parliament. By the ancient Common Law, as it appears by 21 E. 3, 23, and 21 Ass. if an infant bring an Appeal, the suit shall be staid during his infancy; because the party cannot have his trial by battle against the infant; but the law is now held otherwise in the said case. And in some cases, criminal offences shall be dispunished, 29 H. 8, Dy. 40. Appeal of Murder lies not for Murder done in several Counties.

This court of B. R. is coram ipso rege; the king himself, by intendment, is here in person. And, as it is said, C. 9, 118, it is, 'Supremum Regni Tribunal,' of ordinary jurisdiction. But to this I say, That the Parliament is a transcendent court, and of transcendent jurisdiction: it appears by 28 Ass. p. 52, that the stile of other courts is coram rege, as well as this is; as 'coram rege in cancellaria, coram rege in camera;' and, though it be coram rege, yet the Judges give the judgment. And in the time of H. 3, in this court, some entries were 'coram rege,' others, 'coram Hugone de Bigod.'

The Privileges of Parliament are not questioned, but the conspiracies and misdemeanors of some of them. But to this I say, that the distinction is difficult and narrow in this case, where the offences objected are justifiable, and if they be offences, this reflects upon the house, which hath not punished them.

The Cases of 3 E. 3, 19, and 1 and 2 Phil. et Mar. have been objected. But for the last it is observable, That no plea was pleaded to the jurisdiction, as it is in our case. And if a parliament-man, or other which hath privilege, be impleaded in foreign court, and neglect his plea to the jurisdiction, the court may well proceed, 9 H. 7, 14, 36 H. 6, 34 H. 13 Jac. In this Court the lord Norreys, that was a peer of parliament, was indicted for the murder of one Bigod, and pleaded his pardon. And there it was doubted, how the Court should proceed against him (for he, by Law, ought to have his trial by his peers). And it was resolved, that when he pleads his pardon, or confesseth his fault, thereby he gives jurisdiction to the court, and the court may give judgment against him. So that these cases, where it was not pleaded to the jurisdiction, can be no precedent in our case.

The privilege here is not claimed by Prescription or Charter, therefore it is not good. But I say, that notwithstanding this, it is good; for where the Common Law ousts a court of jurisdiction, there needs no Charter or Prescription; 10 H. 6, 13, 8 H. 8, Keilw. 189. Br. n. c. 515. Where sanctuary of a Church is pleaded, there is no need to make prescription, because every Church is a sanctuary by the common law. Therefore, &c.

Sir Robert Heath, the King's Attorney, the same day argued on the other side, but briefly. First, he answered the Objections which had been made.

1. He said, That informations might well be for matters of this nature, which are not capital; and that there are many precedents of such informations. (But Note, that he produced none of them.)

2. It hath been objected, That they are a council, therefore they ought to speak freely. But such speeches which are here pronounced, prove them not counsellors of state, but Bedlams; the addition of one word would have made it treason, to wit, proditorie. But it is the pleasure of the king to proceed in this manner, as now it is. And there is great difference between Bills and Libels, and between their proceedings, as council and as mutinous.

3. That it would be of dangerous consequence; for by this means none would adventure to complain of grievances. I answer, they may make their complaints in a parliamentary manner; but they may not move things, which tend to distraction of the king and his government.

4. These matters may be punished in following parliaments. But this is impossible, for following parliaments cannot know with what mind these matters were done. Also the House of Commons is not a court of justice of itself. The two houses are but one body, and they cannot proceed criminally to punish crimes, but only their members by way of imprisonment; and also they are not a Court of Record. And they have forbid their clerk to make entry of their speeches, but only of matters of course; for many times they speak upon the sudden, as occasion is offered. And there is no necessity that the king should expect a new parliament. The Lords may grant Commissions to determine matters after the parliament ended; but the House of Commons cannot do so. And also a new House of Commons consists of new men, which have no cognizance of these offences: 1 H. 4. The bishop of Carlisle, for words spoken in the parliament, that the king had not right to the crown, was arraigned in this court of High-treason; and then he did not plead his privilege of parliament, but said, That he was Episcopos unctus, &c.

5. 4 H. 8. Strode's Case hath been objected. But this is but a particular act, although it be in print; for Rastal entitles it by the name of Strode: so the title, body, and proviso of the act are particular.

6. That this is an inferior court to the parliament, therefore, &c. To this I say, That, even sitting the parliament, this court of B. R. and other courts, may judge of their privileges, as of a parliament-man put in execution, &c. and other cases. It is true that the judges have oft-times declined to give their judgment upon the privileges of parliament, sitting the court. But from this it follows not, that when the offence is committed there, and not punished, and the said court dissolved, that therefore the said matter shall not be questioned in this court.

7. By this means the Privileges of parliament shall be in great danger, if this court may judge of them. But I answer, That there is no danger at all; for this court may judge of acts of parliament.

8. Perhaps these matters were done by the Votes of the house; or, if they be offences, it is an imputation to the house to say, That they had neglected to punish them; but this matter doth not appear. And if the truth were so, these matters might be given in evidence.

9. There is no precedent in the case, which is a great presumption of law. But to this I answer, That there was never any precedent of such a fact, therefore there cannot be a precedent of such a judgment. And yet in the time of queen Elizabeth, it was, resolved by Brown, and many other justices, that offences done in parliament may be punished out of parliament, by imprisonment or otherwise. And the case of 3 E. 3, 19, is taken for good law by Stamford and Fitzh. And 22 E. 3, and 1 Mar. accord directly with it. But it hath been objected, that there was no plea made to the jurisdiction. But it is to be observed, that Plowden, that was a learned man, was one of the defendants, and he pleaded not to the jurisdiction, but pleaded licence to depart. And the said information depended during all the reign of queen Mary, during which time there were four parliaments, and they never questioned this matter.—But it hath been further objected, That the said case differs from our case, because that there the offence was done out of the house, and this was done within the house. But in the said case, if licence to depart be pleaded, it ought to be tried in parliament, as well as these offences here. Therefore, &c.

The Judges also the same day spake briefly to the case, and agreed with one voice, 'That the court, as this case is, shall have jurisdiction, although that these offences were committed in parliament, and that the imprisoned members ought to answer.'

Jones began and said, That though this question be now newly moved, yet it is an ancient question with him; for it had been in his thoughts these 18 years. For this information, there are three questions in it: 1. Whether the matters informed be true or false? And this ought to be determined by Jury or Demurrer. 2. When the matters of the information are found or confessed to be true, if the information be good in substance? 3. Admit that the offences are truly charged, if this Court hath power to punish them? And that is the sole question of this day.—And it seems to me, that of these offences, although committed in parliament, this court shall have jurisdiction to punish them. The plea of the Defendants here to the jurisdiction being concluded with a demurrer, is not peremptory unto them, although it be adjudged against them; but if the plea be pleaded to the jurisdiction, which is found against the Defendant by verdict, this is peremptory.

In the discussion of this point, I declined these questions: 1. If the matter be voted in parliament, when it is finished, it can be punished and examined in another court? 2. If the matter be commenced in parliament, and that ended, if afterward it may be questioned in another court?

I question not these matters; but I hold, that an offence committed criminally in parliament, may be questioned elsewhere, as in this court; and that for these Reasons:

1. 'Quia interest reipublicæ ut maleficia non maneat impunita.' and there ought to be a fresh punishment of them. Parliaments are called at the king's pleasure, and the king is not compellable to call his parliament; and if before the next parliament, the party offending, or the witnesses die, then there will be a failure of justice.

2. The parliament is no constant court; every parliament mostly consists of several men, and, by consequence, they cannot take notice of matters done in the foregoing parliament; and there they do not examine by oath, unless it be in Chancery, as it is used of late time.

3. The parliament cannot send process to make the offenders to appear at the next parliament; and being at large, if they hear a noise of a parliament, they will fugam facere, and so prevent their punishment.

4. Put the case, that one of the Defendants be made a baron of parliament, now he cannot be punished in the house of commons, and so he shall be unpunished.

It hath been objected, 'That the parliament is the superior court to this, therefore this court cannot examine their proceedings.'

To this I say, That this Court of the King's-Bench is a higher court than the Justices of Oyer and Terminer, or the Justices of Assize: but if an offence be done where the King's-Bench is, after it is removed, this offence may be examined by the Justices of Oyer and Terminer, or by the Justices of Assize. We cannot question the judgments of parliaments, but their particular offences.

2 Object. It is a privilege of parliament, whereof we are not competent judges.

To this I say, That 'privilegium est privata lex et privat. legem.' And this ought to be by grant or prescription in parliament: and then it ought to be pleaded for the manner, as is in 33 H. 1, Dy. as it is not here pleaded. Also we are Judges of all acts of parliament: as 4 H. 7, ordinance made by the king and commons is not good, and we are judges what shall be a session of parliament, as it is in Plowden, in Partridge's Case. We are Judges of their lives and lands, therefore of their liberties. And 8 Eliz. which was cited by Mr. Attorney, it was the opinion of Dyer, Oatlyn, Welsh, Brown, and Southcot, justices, That offences committed in parliament may be punished out of parliament. And 3 Ed. 5, 19, it is good law. And it is usual near the end of parliaments, to set down some petty punishment upon offenders in parliament, to prevent other courts. And I have seen a Roll in this Court, in 6 H. 6, where Judgment was given in a Writ of Annuity in Ireland, and afterward the said judgment was reversed in parliament in Ireland; upon which judgment, Writ of Error was brought in this Court, and reversed.

Hyde, Chief-Justice, to the same intent: No new matter hath been offered to us now by them that argue for the Defendants, but the same reasons and authorities in substance, which were objected before all the justices of England, and barons of the Exchequer, at Serjeants-in in Fleet-street, upon an Information in the Star-Chamber for the same matter. At which time, after great deliberation, it was resolved by all of them, 'That no offence committed in parliament, that being ended, may be punished out of parliament.' And no court more apt for that purpose than this court in which we are: and it cannot be punished in a future parliament, because it cannot take notice of matters done in a foregoing parliament.

As to what was said, That an inferior court cannot meddle with matters done in a superior; true it is, that an inferior court cannot meddle with judgments of a superior court; but if particular members of a superior court offend, they are oft-times punishable in an inferior court, as, if a judge shall commit a capital offence in this court he may be arraigned thereof at Newgate, 3 E. 3, 19. and 1 Mar. which have been cited, over-rule this case. Therefore, &c.

Justice Whitlocke. 1. I say in this case, 'Nihil dictum quod non dictum prius.' 2. That all the Judges of England have resolved this very point. 3. That now we are but upon the brink and skirts of the cause: for it is not now in question, if these be offences or no; or, if true or false; but only if this court have jurisdiction.

But it hath been objected, That the offence is not capital, therefore it is not examinable in this court.

But though it be not capital, yet it is criminal, for it is sowing of sedition to the destruction of the commonwealth. The question now is not between us that are Judges of this Court, and the parliament, or between the king and the parliament, but between some private members of the house of commons and the king himself: for here the king himself questions them for those offences, as well he may. In every commonwealth there is one super-eminent power, which is not subject to be questioned by any other, and that is the king in this commonwealth, who, as Bracton saith, 'Solum Deum habet ultorem.' But no other within the realm hath this privilege. It is true, that that which is done in parliament by consent of all the house, shall not be questioned elsewhere: but if any private members 'exuant personas iudicem, et induunt malefacientium personas, et sunt seditiosi;' is there such sanctimony in the place, that they may not be questioned for it elsewhere? The bishop of Ross, as the case hath been put, being ambassador here, practised matters against the state: and it was resolved, That although 'legatus sit rex in alieno solo,' yet when he goes out of the bounds of his office, and complots with traitors in this kingdom, that he shall be punished as an offender here. A minister hath a great privilege when he is in the pulpit; but yet, if in the pulpit he utter speeches, which are scandalous to the state, he is punishable. So in this case, when a Burgess of parliament becomes mutinous, he shall not have the privilege of parliament. In my opinion, the realm cannot consist without parliaments, but the behaviour of parliament-men ought to be parliamentary. No outrageous speeches were ever used against a great minister of state in parliament which have not been punished. If a judge of this court utter scandalous speeches to the state, he may be questioned for them before commissioners of Oyer and Terminer, because this is no judicial act of the court.

But it hath been objected, That we cannot examine acts done by a higher power.

To this I put this case: when a peer of the realm is arraigned of Treason, we are not his judges, but the High-Steward, and he shall be tried by his peers: but if error be committed in this proceeding, that shall be reversed by error in this court: for that which we do is coram ipso rege.

It hath been objected, 'That the Parliament-law differs from the law by which we judge in this court in sundry cases.' And for the instance which hath been made, 'That by the statute, none ought to be chosen Burgess of a town in which he doth not inhabit, but that the usage of parliament is contrary;' But if information be brought upon the said statute against such a Burgess, I think that the statute is a good warrant for us to give judgment against him.

And it hath been objected, 'That there is no Precedent in this matter.'

But there are sundry Precedents, by which it appears, that the parliament hath transmitted matters to this court; as 2 R. 2, there being a question between a great peer and a bishop, it was transmitted to this court, being for matter of behaviour: and although the Judges of this court are but inferior men, yet the court is higher. For it appears by 11 Eliz. Dy. That the Earl Marshal of England is an officer of this court; and it is always admitted in parliament, That the Privileges of Parliament hold not in three cases, to wit, 1. In case of Treason. 2. In case of Felony. And 3. in suit for the Peace. And the last is our very case. Therefore, &c.

Croke argued to the same intent; he said, That these offences ought to be punished in the court, or no where; and all manner of offences which are against the crown are examinable in this court. It hath been objected, 'That by this means, none will adventure to make complaint in parliament.' That is not so; for he may complain in a parliamentary course; but not falsely and unlawfully, as here is pretended: for that which is unlawfully, cannot be in a parliamentary course.

It hath been objected, 'That the parliament is a higher court than this.' And it is true: But every member is not a Court; and if he commit offence he is punishable here. Our court is a court of high jurisdiction, it cannot take cognizance of real pleas; but if a real plea comes by error in this court, it shall never be transmitted. But this court may award a Grand Cape, and other process usual in real actions: but of all capital and criminal causes, we are originally competent judges, and by consequence of this matter. But I am not of the opinion of Mr. Attorney-General, that the word proditore would have made this treason. And for the other matters, he agreed with the judges. Therefore by the court, the defendants were ruled to plead further: and Mr. Leithal of Lincoln's-Inn was assigned of counsel for them.

But inasmuch as the Defendants would not put in any other Plea, the last day of the Term judgment was given against them upon a nilil dicit; which Judgment was pronounced by Jones to this effect:

"The matter of the Information now, by the confession of the Defendants, is admitted to be true, and we think their plea to the jurisdiction insufficient for the matter and manner of it. And we hereby will not draw the true Liberties of Parliament-men into question; to wit, for such matters which they do or speak in a parliamentary manner. But in this case there was a conspiracy between the Defendants to slander the state, and to raise sedition and discord between the king, his peers, and people; and this was not a parliamentary course. All the Judges of England, except one, have resolved the statute of 4 H. 8, to be a private act, and to extend to Strode only. But every member of the parliament shall have such pri-viliges as are there mentioned; but they have no privilege to speak at their pleasure. The parliament is an high court, therefore it ought not to be disorderly, but ought to give good example to other courts. If a Judge of our court should rail upon the state, or clergy, he is punishable for it. A member of the parliament may charge any great officer of the state with any particular offence; but this was a malevolous accusation in the generality of all the officers of state, therefore the matter contained within the information is a great offence, and punishable in this court.

2. "For the Punishment, although the Offence be great, yet that shall be with a light hand, and shall be in this manner.

1. "That every of the Defendants shall be imprisoned during the king's pleasure: Sir John Elliot to be imprisoned in the Tower of London, and the other Defendants in other prisons.

2. "That none of them shall be delivered out of prison until he give security in this court for his good behaviour, and have made submission and acknowledgment of his offence.

3. "Sir John Elliot, inasmuch as we think him the greatest offender, and the ringleader, shall pay to the king a Fine of 2,000*l.* and Mr. Hollis, a Fine of 1,000 marks: and Mr. Valentine, because he is of less ability than the rest, shall pay a Fine of 500*l.*" And to all this, all the other Justices with one voice accorded.

Afterwards the Parliament which met the 3d of November, 1640, upon report made by Mr. Recorder Glyn, of the state of the several and respective Cases of Mr. Hollis, Mr. Selden, and the rest of the imprisoned Members of the parliament, in Tertio Caroli, touching their extraordinary sufferings, for their constant affections to the Liberties of the kingdom, expressed in that parliament; and upon Arguments made in the house thereupon, did, upon the 6th of July, 1641, pass these ensuing Votes: which, in respect of the reference they have to these last mentioned proceedings, we have thought fit to insert: viz.

July 6, 1641.

1. "Resolved upon the question, That the issuing out of the Warrants from the lords and others of the privy-council, compelling Mr. Hollis, and the rest of the members of that parliament, 3 Car. during the parliament, to appear before them, is a breach of the privilege of parliament by those privy counsellors.

2. "That the committing of Mr. Hollis and the rest, by the lords and others of the privy-council, during the parliament, is a breach of the Privilege of parliament by those lords, and others.

3. "That the searching and sealing of the chamber, study, and papers of Mr. Hollis, Mr. Selden, and sir John Elliot, being members of this house, and during the parliament, and issuing of Warrants to that purpose, was a breach of the privilege of parliament, by those that executed the same.

4. "That the exhibiting of an Information in the Court of Star-Chamber, against Mr. Hollis and the rest, for matters done by them in parliament, being members of parliament, and the same so appearing in the Information, is a breach of the privilege of parliament.

5. "That sir Robert Heath, and sir Humphrey Davenport, sir Heneage Finch, Mr. Hudson, and sir Robert Berkeley, that subscribed their names to the Information, are guilty thereby of the breach of privilege of parliament.

6. "That there was a delay of justice towards Mr. Hollis, and the rest that appeared upon the Habeas Corpus, in that they were not bailed in Easter and Trinity-term, 5 Car.

7. "That sir Nich. Hyde, then Chief Justice of the King's-bench, is guilty of this delay.

8. "That sir William Jones, being then one of the Justices of the court of King's-bench, is guilty of this delay.

9. "That sir James Whitlocke, knt. then one of the justices of the court of King's-bench, is not guilty of this delay*."

* Mr. Whitlocke in his Memorials of the English Affairs, p. 36, 39, says, "In the house there fell out a Debate touching the Writs of Habeas Corpus, upon which Seiden and the rest of his fellow-prisoners demanded to be bailed; and the Judges of the King's-bench did not bail them, as by law they ought; but required of them sureties for their good behaviour. This was so far aggravated by some, that they moved, 'The prisoners might have reparation out of the estates of those Judges who then sat in the King's-bench when they were re-manded to prison;' which Judges they named to be Hyde, Jones, and my father: as for Judge Croke, who was one of that court, they excused him, as differing in opinion from the rest.—I being a member of the house, and son to the Judge, knew this to be mistaken, as to the fact, and spake in the behalf of my father, to this effect: 'That it was not unknown to divers worthy members of the house, that Judge Whitlocke had been a faithful, able, and stout assertor of the Rights and Liberties of the free-born subjects of this kingdom; for which he had been many ways a sufferer. And particularly by a strait and close imprisonment, for what he said and did, as a member of this honourable house in a former parliament: and he appeals to those noble gentlemen, who cannot but remember those passages; and some who were then sufferers with him. And for his Opinion, and carriage in the Case of the Habeas Corpus, it is affirmed to have been the same with that of Judge Croke; and he appeals for this, to the honourable gentlemen who were concerned in it; and others, who were present then in court.' Hampden, and divers others, seconded this motion; who affirmed very much of the matter of fact, and expressed themselves with great respect and honour to the memory of the deceased Judge, who was thereupon reckoned by the house in the same degree with Judge Croke, as to their censure and proceedings."

Ordered, That the further debate of this shall be taken into consideration on to-morrow morning.

July 8, 1641.

10. "Resolved upon the question, That sir George Croke, knight, then one of the Judges of the King's-bench, is not guilty of this delay.

11. "That the continuance of Mr. Hollis, and the rest of the Members of Parliament, 3 Car. in prison, by the then Judges of the King's-bench, for not putting in sureties for their good behaviour, was without just or legal cause.

12. "That the exhibiting of the information against Mr. Hollis, sir John Elliot, and Mr. Valentine, in the King's-bench, being Members of Parliament, for matters done in parliament, was a breach of the privilege of parliament.

13. "That the over-ruling of the Plea, pleaded by Mr. Hollis, sir John Elliot, and Mr. Valentine, upon the information, to the jurisdiction of the court, was against the law and privilege of parliament.

14. "That the judgment given upon a nitid dicit, against Mr. Hollis, sir John Elliot, and Mr. Valentine, and fine thereupon imposed, and their several imprisonments thereupon, was against the law and privilege of parliament.

15. "That the several proceedings against Mr. Hollis, and the rest, by committing them, and prosecuting them in the Star-Chamber, and in the King's-Bench, is a Grievance.

16. "That Mr. Hollis, Mr. Stroud, Mr. Valentine, and Mr. Long, and the bears and executors of sir John Elliot, sir Miles Hobart, and sir Peter Heyman, respectively, ought to have reparation for their respective damages and sufferings, against the lords and others of the council, by whose warrants they were apprehended and committed, and against the council that put their hands to the information in the Star-Chamber, and against the Judges of the King's-Bench.

17. "That Mr. Lawrence Whitaker, being a member of the parliament 3 Car. entering into the chamber of sir John Elliot, being likewise a member of the parliament, searching of his trunks and papers, and sealing of them, is guilty of the breach of the privilege of parliament, this being done before the dissolution of parliament.

18. "That Mr. Lawrence Whitaker being guilty of the breach of the privileges as aforesaid, shall be sent forthwith to the Tower, there to remain a prisoner during the pleasure of the house."

Mr. Whitaker was called down, and kneeling at the bar, Mr. Speaker pronounced this Sentence against him accordingly.

Mr. Whitaker being at the bar, did not deny, but that he did search and seal up the chamber, and trunk, and study of sir John Elliot, between the 2d and 10th of March, during which time the parliament was adjourned: but endeavoured to extenuate it, by the confusion of the times, at that time; the length of the time since that crime was committed, being thirteen years; the command that lay upon him, being commanded by the king and 23 privy-counsellors.

Afterwards Mr. Recorder Glyn made a farther Report to the House of Commons, viz.

The Warrant, which issued and was subscribed by twelve privy-counsellors, to summon nine of the members of the house of commons, in the Parliament of tertio Caroli, to appear before them during the parliament, viz. Mr. Wm. Stroud, Mr. Benj. Valentine, Mr. Hollis, sir John Elliot, Mr. Selden, sir Miles Hobart, sir Peter Heyman, Mr. Walter Long, and Mr. Wm. Coriton, bearing date tertio Martii, quarto Caroli; and the names of the twelve privy-counsellors that signed this warrant, were read: the parliament being adjourned the 2d of March, to the 10th of March, and then dissolved.

The Warrants under the hands of sixteen privy-counsellors, for committing of Mr. Denzil Hollis, sir John Elliot, Mr. John Selden, Mr. Benj. Valentine, and Mr. Wm. Coriton, close prisoners to the Tower, bearing date, quarto Martii, quarto Caroli, during the parliament; were read; and the names of the privy-counsellors that subscribed them, were read. The Warrants under the hands of 22 privy-counsellors, directed to Wm. Boswel, esq. to repair to the lodgings of Denzil Hollis, esq. and to Simon Digby, esq. to repair to the lodgings of Mr. John Selden, and to Lawrence Whitaker, esq. to repair to the lodgings of sir John Elliot, requiring them to seal up the trunks, studies, and cabinets, or any other thing that had any papers in them, of the said Mr. Hollis, Mr. John Selden, and sir John Elliot, were read, and likewise the names of the privy-counsellors that subscribed the said Warrants. A Warrant under the hands of 13 privy-counsellors, for the commitment of Mr. Wm. Stroud close prisoner to the King's-Bench, bearing date 3d April, 1628, was read, and the names of the privy-counsellors that subscribed it: The like Warrant was for the commitment of Mr. Walter Long, close prisoner to the Marshalsea.

Resolved, &c. 1. "That Mr. Hollis shall have the sum of 5,000*l.* for his damages, losses, imprisonments, and sufferings, sustained and undergone by him, for his service done to the commonwealth in the parliament of tertio Caroli."

2. "That Mr. John Selden shall have the sum of 5,000*l.* for his damages, losses, imprisonments, and sufferings, sustained and undergone by him, for his service done to the commonwealth in the parliament of tertio Caroli."

3. "That the sum of 5,000*l.* be assigned for the damages, losses, imprisonments, and sufferings, sustained and undergone by sir John Elliot, for his service done to the commonwealth in the parliament of tertio Caroli, to be disposed of in such manner as this house shall appoint."

4. "That the sum of 2,000*l.* part of 4,000*l.* paid into the late court of Wards and Liveries, by the heirs of sir John Elliot, by reason of his marriage with sir Daniel Norton's daughter, shall be repaid to Mr. Elliot, out of the arrears of monies payable into the late court of Wards and Liveries, before the taking away of the said late court."

Ordered, "That it be referred to the committee who brought in this report, to examine the decree made in the late court of Wards and Liveries, concerning the marriage of sir John Elliot's heir with sir Daniel Norton's daughter; and what monies were paid by reason of the said Decree, and by whom; and to report their opinion thereupon to the house. Also, That it be referred to the committee, to examine after what manner sir John Elliot came to his death, his usage in the Tower, and to view the rooms and places where he was imprisoned, and where he died, and to report the same to the house."

Resolved, &c. 5. "That the sum of 5,000*l.* shall be paid unto the of sir Peter Heyman, for the damages, losses, sufferings, and imprisonments, sustained and undergone by sir Peter, for his service done to the commonwealth in the parliament of tertio Caroli."

6. "That Mr. Walter Long shall have the sum of 5,000*l.* paid unto him, for the damages, losses, sufferings, and imprisonment, sustained and undergone by him, for his service done to the commonwealth in the parliament tertio Caroli."

7. "That the sum of 5,000*l.* shall be assigned for the damages, losses, sufferings, and imprisonment, sustained and undergone by Mr. Stroud (late a member of this house) deceased, for service done by him to the Commonwealth in the parliament of tertio Caroli."

8. "That Mr. Benj. Valentine shall have the sum of 5,000*l.* paid unto him, for the damages, losses, sufferings, and imprisonments, sustained and undergone by him, for his service to the Commonwealth in the parliament of tertio Caroli."

9. "That the sum of 500*l.* shall be bestowed and disposed of, for the erecting a Monument to sir Miles Hobart, a member of the parliament of tertio Caroli, in memory of his sufferings for his service to the Commonwealth in the parliament of tertio Caroli."

Ordered, That it be recommitted to the Committee, who brought in this report, to consider how the several sums of money this day ordered to be paid for damages to the several members before named, for their sufferings in the service of the Commonwealth, may be raised.

In the reign of king Charles 2, this Affair was taken into consideration, and the House of commons came to several Resolutions; viz.

Die Martis, 12 Nov. 1667.

Upon a Report made by Mr. Vaughan from the committee concerning Freedom of Speech in parliament.

Resolved, &c. That the house do agree with the committee, That the act of parliament in 4 Hen. 8, commonly intitled, An Act concerning Richard Strode, is a general law, extending to indemnify all and every the members of both houses of parliament, in all parliaments, for and touching any bills, speaking, reasoning, or declaring of any matter or matters, in and concerning the parliament to be communed and treated of, and is a declaratory law of the ancient and necessary rights and privileges of parliament.

Die Sabbati, 23 Nov. 1667.

Resolved, &c. That the Judgment given 5 Car. against sir John Elliot, Denzil Hollis, and Benj. Valentine, in the King's-Bench, is an illegal judgment, and against the freedom and privilege of parliament.

Die Sabbati, 7 Dec. 1667.

Resolved, &c. That the concurrence of the lords be desired to the Votes of this house concerning Freedom of Speech in parliament: and that a Conference be on Monday next desired to be had with the lords, at which time the Votes may be delivered, and reasons for them given.

Die Jovis, 12 Dec. 1667.

A message from the lords by sir William Child and sir Thomas Estcourt. 'Mr. Speaker; The lords have commanded us to acquaint you, that they agree with this house in the Votes delivered them at the last Conference concerning Freedom of Speech in parliament.'

Die Mercurii, 11 Dec. 1667.

Next the Lord Chamberlain and the lord Ashley reported the effect of the Conference with the house of commons yesterday, which was managed by Mr. Vaughan, who said he was commanded by the house of commons to acquaint their lordships with some resolves of their house concerning the Freedom of Speech in Parliament, and to desire their lordships concurrence therein:

In order to which, he was to acquaint their lordships with the Reasons that induced the house of commons to pass those resolves. He said the house of commons was accidentally informed of certain Books published under the name of sir George Croke's Reports, in one of which there was a Case published, which did very much concern this great Privilege of Parliament: and which passing from hand to hand amongst the men of the long robe, might come in time to be a received opinion as good law.

The House of Commons considering the consequence, did take care that this Case might be enquired into, and caused the Book to be produced and read in their house, and he thought it the next and clearest way to inform their lordships, is to read the Case itself, which is Quinto Caroli primi Michaelmas term, which Case was read as followeth:

"The King v. sir John Elliot, Denzil Hollis, and Benjamin Valentine.

"An Information was exhibited against them by the Attorney-General, reciting, that a parliament was summoned to be held at Westminster, 17 Martii 3 Caroli regis ibidem inchoat. And that sir John Elliot was duly elected and returned knight for the county of Cornwall, and the other two burgesses of parliament for other places: and sir John Finch chosen Speaker. That sir John Elliot, 'machinans et intendens omnibus viis et modis seminare et excitare' discord, evil will, murmurings, and seditious, as well 'versus regem, magnates, prelatos, proceres et justiciarios, et reliquos subjectos regis, et totaliter depravare et subvertere regimen et gubernationem regni Anglie, tam in domino rege quam in conciliaris et ministris suis cujuscunque generis, et introducere tumultum et confusionem' in all estates and parts, 'et ad intentionem,' that all the king's subjects should withdraw their affections from the king, the 23d of Feb. anno 4 Car. in the parliament, and hearing of the commons, 'falso, malitiose, et seditiose,' used these words, 'The king's privy council, his judges, and his counsel learned, have conspired together to trample under their feet the Liberties of the Subjects of this realm, and the liberties of this house.'

"And afterwards, upon the 2nd of March, anno 4, aforesaid, the king appointed the parliament to be adjourned until the 10th of March next following, and so signified his pleasure to the house of commons; and that the three Defendants the said 2d day of March, 4 Car. malitiose agreed, and amongst themselves conspired to disturb and distract the commons, that they should not adjourn themselves according to the king's pleasure before signified; and that the said sir John Elliot, according to the agreement and conspiracy aforesaid, had maliciously 'in propositum et intentionem predictam' in the house of commons aforesaid, spoken these false, pernicious, and seditious words precedent, &c. And that the said Denzil Hollis, according to the Agreement and Conspiracy aforesaid, between him and the other defendants, then and there 'falso, malitiose, et seditiose' uttered hæc falsa, malitiosa et scandalosa 'verba præcedentia, &c.' And that the said Denzil Hollis, and Benjamin Valentine, 'secundum agreementum et conspirationem predictam, &c. ad intentionem et propositum predictum,' uttered the said words upon the said 2d day of March, after the signifying the king's pleasure to adjourn; and the said sir John Finch, the Speaker, endeavouring to get out of the Chair, according to the king's command, they 'vi et armis manu forti et illicito' assaulted, evil treated, and forcibly detained him in the Chair; and afterwards being out of the Chair, they assaulted him in the house, and evil treated him, 'et violenter manu forti et illicito' drew him to the Chair, and thrust him into it. Whereupon there was great tumult and commotion in the house, to the great terror of the Commons there assembled, against their allegiance, in maximum contemptum, and to the dishonour of the king, his crown and dignity, for which, &c. To this Information the Defendants appearing, pleaded to the jurisdiction of this court, that the court ought not to have cognizance thereof, because it is for offences done in parliament, and ought to be there examined and punished, and not elsewhere. It was thereupon demurred, and after Argument adjudged, that they ought to answer; for the charge is for conspiracy, seditious acts and practices, to stop the adjournment of the parliament, which may be examined out of parliament, being seditious and unlawful acts; and this court may take cognizance and punish them: Afterwards divers rules being given against them, viz. Sir John Elliot, that he should be committed to the Tower, and should pay 2,000*l.* fine, and upon his enlargement should find sureties for his good behaviour; and against Hollis, that he should pay 1,000 marks, and should be imprisoned, and find sureties, &c. and against Valetine, that he should pay 500*l.* fine, be imprisoned, and find sureties."

Then Mr. Vaughan laid much emphasis upon the words 'machinans et intendens, &c.' and then went on, That the house of commons had not only read the Case as it was in the Book, but did look into the Record, where, in the Information itself, they found some considerable differences from the print; as that the crime alledged consisting partly of Words spoken in the house, partly of criminal actions pretended to be committed; the Gentlemen accused pleaded severally, namely, specially to the words, and a several plea apart to the criminal actions: But the court dealt so craftily, that they over-ruled the whole plea, mingled together, and took it in general, so that perhaps whatsoever was criminal in the actions might serve for a justification of their rule, and might make it seem in time to become a Precedent, and a ruled case against the Liberty of Speech in Parliament, which they durst not singly and bare-faced have done.

The House of Commons did take care to enquire what ancient laws did fortify this the greatest Privilege of both houses; and they found in the 4 Hen. 8. an Act concerning one Richard Strode, who was a member of parliament, and was fined at the Stannary Courts, in the West, for condescending and agreeing with other members of the house to pass certain acts to the prejudice of the Stannaries; this act was made occasionally for him, but did reach to every member of parliament that then was, or shall be; the very words being, viz.

'And over that, it be enacted by the same authority, that all suits, accusations, condemnations, executions, fines, amerçemens, punishments, corrections, grievances, charges and impositions, put or had, or hereafter to be put. or had unto, or upon the said Richard, and to every other person or persons aforespecified, that now be of this present parliament, or that of any parliament hereafter shall be, for any bill, speaking, reasoning, or declaring of any matter or matters concerning the parliament to be commenced and treated of, be utterly void, and of none effect. And over that, it be enacted by the said authority, that if the said Richard Strode, or any of the said other person or persons hereafter be vexed, troubled, or otherwise charged for any causes, as is aforesaid, that then he or they, and every of them so vexed or troubled of, or for the same, to have action upon the case against every such person or persons so vexing or troubling any, contrary to this ordinance and provision; in the which action the party grieved shall recover treble damages and costs, and that no protection, essoyne, nor wager of law in the said action in any wise be admitted nor received.'

He said, it is very possible the Plea of those worthy persons, Denzil Hollis, sir John Elliot, and the rest, was not sufficient to the jurisdiction of the court, if you take in their criminal actions altogether; but, as to the words spoken in parliament, the court could have no jurisdiction while this act of 4 Hen. 8. is in force, which extends to all members that then were (or ever should be,) as well as Strode; and was a public general law, though made upon a private and a particular occasion.

He recommended to their lordships the consideration of the time when these words in the Case of sir George Croke's Reports were spoken, which was the 2nd of March, 4 Caroli primi, being in that parliament which began in the precedent March, 3 Car. at which time the Judgment given in the King's-Bench about the Habeas Corpus was newly reversed, which concerned the freedom of our persons, the liberty of speech invaded in this case; and not long after the same Judges (with some others) joined with them in the Cases of Ship-money, invaded the propriety of our goods and estates; so that their lordships find every part of these words for which those worthy persons were accused, justified.

If any man should speak against any of the great officers, as the Chancellor or Treasurer, or any of the rest recited in those acts, as by accusing them of corruption, ill counsel, or the like, he might possibly justify himself by proving of it; but in this case it was impossible to do it, because those judgments had preceded and concluded him, for he could make none, but by alledging their own judgments which they themselves had resolved, and would not therefore allow to be crimes, which they had made for laws.

He did inform their lordships, that the Bill in the Rolls hath another title than that he did mention; this being that, that the clerks knew it by, rather than the proper title.

The words in the Case are charged ea intentione, which ought not to be; for it is clear, and undoubted law, that whatever is in itself lawful, cannot have an unlawful intent annexed to it. Things unlawful may be made a higher crime by the illness of the intent; for instance, taking away my horse is a trespass only, but intending to steal him makes it felony; borrowing my horse, though intending to steal him, is not felony, because borrowing is lawful; and there were no use of freedom of speech otherwise, for a depraved intention may be annexed to any the most justifiable action. If a man eat no flesh, he may be accused for the depraved intention of bringing in the Pythagorean religion, and subverting the Christian: If a man drink water, he may be accused of the depraved intention of subverting the king's government, by destroying his revenue both of excise and custom.

No man can make a doubt, but whatsoever is once enacted is lawful; but nothing can come into an act of parliament, but it must be first offered or propounded by somebody, so that if the act can wrong nobody, no more can the first propounding; the members must be as free as the houses. An act of parliament cannot disturb the state, therefore the debate that tends to it cannot, for it must be propounded and debated before it can be enacted.

In the reign of Henry 8, when there were so many persons taken by act of parliament out of the lords house, as the Abbots and Priors, and all the religious houses and lands taken away; it had been a strange information against any member of parliament then, for propounding so great an alteration in church and state.

Besides, religion itself began then to be altered, and was perfected in the beginning of queen Edward the 6th's reign, and returned again to Popery in the beginning of queen Mary's; and the Protestant religion restored again in the beginning of queen Elizabeth's.

Should a member of parliament, in any of these times, have been justly informed against in the King's-Bench for propounding or debating any of these alterations; so that their lordships perceive the reasons and inducements the house of commons had to pass these votes now presented to their lordships?

Afterwards these Votes were read, viz.

Resolved, &c. "1. That the act of parliament 4 Hen. 8, commonly intitled, An Act concerning Richard Strode, is a general law, extending to indemnify all and every the members of both houses of parliament, in all parliaments, for and touching any bills, speaking, reasoning, or declaring of any matter or matters in and concerning the parliament, to be commended and treated of; and is a declaratory law of the antient and necessary rights and privileges of parliament. 2. That the Judgment given 5 Car. against sir John Elliot, Denzil Hollis, and Benjamin Valentine, esquires, in the King's-bench, was an illegal Judgment, and against the freedom and privilege of parliament."

To both which Votes the lords agree with the house of commons.

Upon consideration had this day of a Judgment given in the court of King's-Bench in Michaelmas term, in the 5 Charles 1, against sir John Elliot, knt. Denzil Hollis, and Benjamin Valentine, esquires, which Judgment is found to be erroneous: It is ordered by the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the said Denzil Hollis, esq. (now lord Hollis, baron of Ifield) be desired to cause the Roll of the Court of King's-Bench, wherein the said Judgment is recorded, to be brought before the lords in parliament by a Writ of Error, to the end that such further Judgment may be given upon the said case, as this house shall find meet.

'The miserable condition we are in, both in matters of religion and policy, makes me look with a tender eye both to the person of the king and the subject: you know how Arminianism doth undermine us, and how popery comes upon us so open-ly as it gives a terror to the law; that factually concerning the plantation of Jesuits amongst us, and other things incident thereto, do manifestly shew it. And not only these men who are actors themselves, I mean the Jesuits, but those that are their great masters and fators, they have the power of the law, and dare check magistrates in the execution of their duties; from them it comes that we suffer their guilt, and the fear of punishment that may befall them, brings us upon those rocks. There are among them some prelates of the church, the great bishop of Winchester and his fellows; it is apparent what they have done to cast an aspersion upon the honour, piety and goodness of the king. These are not all: but it is extended to some others, who, I fear, in guilt and conscience of their own ill deserts, do join their power with that bishop, and the rest, to draw his majesty into a jealousy of the parliament; amongst them I shall not fear to name the great Lord Treasurer, in whose person is, I fear, contracted all that which we suffer. If we look into religion and policy, I find him building upon the ground laid by the duke of Bucks, his great master; from him, I fear, came those ill counsels which contracted that unhappy conclusion of the last session of parliament. And whosoever shall go about to break parliaments, parliaments will break him! I find that not only in the affections of his heart, but also in relation to him, he is the head of the Papists. They and their priests and Jesuits have all relation to him, and I doubt not to fix it indubitably upon him; and so far from the greatness and power of him comes the danger of our religion. For policy in that great question of Tonnage and Poundage; that interest that is pretended to be the king's, is but the interest of that person to undermine the policy of this government; and thereby to weaken the kingdom. It was the counsel of Hospitales, chancellor to Charles the Ninth, king of France, that the way to weaken this kingdom was to impeach the trade of it, and so to lay our walls waste and open. And I doubt not, but by the disquisition of a few days to prove that his labours are to undermine us; That he invites strangers to come in to drive our trade, or at least our merchants to trade in strange bottoms, which is as danger-

‘ out; and this is that which imprints this fear
 ‘ in his person, and makes him to misinterpret ‘ our proceedings to his majesty. Now there‘ fore it will be fit for true Englishmen to per‘ form their duties, and to shew their desire of ‘ the safety both of the king and kingdom, and ‘ to resolve to defend the sincerity of our reli‘ gion, and to declare our resolutions also for ‘ the defence of the right of the subject, where‘ by we may declare ourselves to be freemen,
 ‘ and so the more wealthy and able to supply
 ‘ his majesty upon all occasions. And that ‘ we should declare all that we have suffered ‘ to be the effect of new counsels, to the ruin ‘ of the government of this state, and to make ‘ a protestation against all those men, whether ‘ greater or subordinate, that they shall all be ‘ declared as capital enemies to the king and ‘ kingdom, that will persuade the king to take ‘ Tonnage and Poundage without grant of par‘ liament. And that if any merchants shall ‘ willingly pay those duties without consent of ‘ parliament, they shall be declared as acces‘ saries to the rest.’ Quodque pred. D. H. se-

Et protulit in cur. dicti dom. regis coram dom. rege tunc ibidem quoddam breve ipsius dom. regis de privat. sigillo sibi et al. direct. et petit il-

lud irrotulari et allocari, cujus quidem brevis tenor sequitur in hæc verba: ' Charles, by the grace of God, king of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. To the lord high-treasurer of England, chancellor, under-treasurer, and barons of our Exchequer, and all other officers and ministers of the same court for the time being, and to the chief-justice, and the rest of our justices of our court of King's-Bench, and to our attorney-general, and all other officers and ministers of the same court for the time being, greeting. Whereas in Michaelmas term, in the tenth year of our reign, upon an Information in our name exhibited in our court of King's-Bench, against Benjamin Valentine, esq.; and others, for divers offences, trespasses, and contempts therein mentioned, the said Benjamin Valentine, by Judgment of the same court, was fined to us in the sum of 500*l*. and to be committed to our prison of our Marshalsea during our pleasure; and that he shall find sufficient security for his good behaviour to us and our people, as by the said Information and Judgment thereupon remaining upon record in our said court of King's-Bench, more at large may appear. And whereas the said B. V. hath been restrained of his liberty since the last parliament for not satisfying the said fine so imposed on him, as aforesaid. Now know ye, That we of our special grace have remitted, released, and quit-claimed, and by these presents, for us, our heirs and successors, do remise, release, and quit-claim unto the said B. V. the said fine or sum of 500*l*. by the Judgment of our said court on him the said B. V. imposed as aforesaid. And all commitment, imprisonment, and other matters whatsoever adjudged or inflicted upon him by our said court, for or by reason of the trespasses, offences or contempts aforesaid. Wherefore we do by these presents will and require, as well the lord-treasurer, chancellor, under-treasurer, and barons of our Exchequer, as the justices of our court of King's-Bench, and the officers and ministers of the said several courts respectively, to whom it shall or may appertain, that they, and every of them respectively, at all times hereafter do forbear, and utterly surcease to make or grant forth any extents, seizures, executions, or other process whatsoever, against the said B. V. his heirs, executors or administrators, or his or their lands, tenements, hereditaments, goods or chattels, for or concerning the levying of the said fine or sum of 500*l*. or any part thereof. And that they take order as well for his full and clear discharge thereof, as of and from his commitment and imprisonment as aforesaid. And these presents, or the enrolment thereof, shall be unto them, and every of them to whom it shall or may appertain, a sufficient warrant and discharge in that behalf. And lastly, we will, and by these presents authorise and require our attorney-general for the time being, for us, and in our behalf, to ac' knowledge satisfaction upon record of and for the said fine of 500*l.* on the said B. V. by Judgment of our said court so imposed as aforesaid. Whereby he may be fully and absolutely acquitted and discharged thereof against us, our heirs and successors; and these presents, or the enrolment thereof, shall be unto our said attorney-general for the time being, a good and sufficient warrant in that behalf. Given under our privy-seal at our palace of Westminster, the 7th day of March, in the fifteenth year of our reign.'

Judgment of the Court at the Attorney's prayer, that Valentine be discharged.

Et super hoc idem J. B. miles attorn. dicti dom. regis general. pro eodem dom. rege virtute brevis de privat. sigillo predict. dicit et cognovit ipsum dominum regem fore plenar. satisfact. de pred. fin. 500*l.* super ipsum B. V. pro offens. predict. in informatione predict. mentionat. per cur. hic ut preteritur imposit. et pet. quod pred. B. V. virtute brevis pred. de imprisonment. suo ads. ipsius dom. regis et de judic. pred. exoneretur et diinnittatur super quo vis. et per cur. hic intellect. omnibus et singulis premiss. cons. est per cur. quod pred. A Message was sent to the House of Commons by sir William Child and sir Justinian Lewin, to acquaint them, that the Lords do agree to those Votes which were delivered at the Conference yesterday.

Die Mercurii, 15 April, 1668.

"Whereas counsel have been this day heard at the bar, as well to argue the Errors assigned by the lord Hollis, baron of Iseild, upon a Writ of Error depending in this house, brought against a Judgment given in the court of King's-Bench in 5 Car. 1, against the said lord Hollis, by the name of Denzil Hollis, esq. and others; as also to maintain and defend the said Judgment on his majesty's behalf: Upon due consideration had of what hath been offered on both parts thereupon, the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament do order and adjudge, That the said Judgment given in the court of King's-Bench in 5 Car. 1, against the said Denzil Hollis, and others, shall be reversed."

The Form whereof (to be affixed to the Transcript of the Record) followeth :

' Et quia curia parliamenti de judicio suo de et super præmissis reddendi nondum advisatur, ' dics datos est tam prædict' Gafrido Palmer ' militi et baronet' qui sequitur, &c. quam prædict' Denzil domino Hollis coram eadem curia usque ad diem Mercurii decimum quintum diem Aprilis tunc proximum sequentem apud Westmonast. in comitat' Midd' de judicio suo inde audiend' eo quod curia prædict' nondum, &c. Ad quem diem coram curia prædict' Gafridus Palmer qui sequitur, &c. quam prædictus Denzil dominus Hollis in propriis personis suis. Super quo, visis, et per eandem curiam nunc hic plenius intellectis omnibus et singulis præmissis, maturaque deliberatione inde habita, consideratum est per curiam prædictam, quod judicium prædict' ob errores prædictos et alios in recordo et processu prædictis compertos, revocetur, annulletur et penitus pro nullo habeatur. Et quod prædict' Denzil dominus Hollis ad omnia quæ idem Denzil dominus Hollis occasione judicii prædict. amisit, restituetur.'

Jo. BROWN, Cleric. Parliamentorum.

It seems to be but just towards the characters of the Judges of this time to add the following passages from Kennet :

"The urgent necessity of Supplies, to be in some measure suitable to the king's honour, and the very nation's support, must exercise the king's council in finding out all possible ways and means to bring in money. In order to this urgent end, the king sent his letters, dated May 13, 1630, to the Judges and Attorney-General, to frame and publish certain orders for execution of the office of Receiver and Collector of Fines and Forfeitures, erected by his late father of blessed memory, and by his present majesty confirmed to John Chamberlain his majesty's physician, and Edward Brown, esq. The Judges met and concluded, that the said letters patents were both against law and his majesty's profit, and sent an account of the excesses and irregularities in the said patent, in a letter from all the Justices and Barons, directed severally to the Lord Keeper and Lord Treasurer. And though this did well demonstrate the integrity of the Judges, that they would never prostitute an opinion to the mere interest of the king; and did as much vindicate his majesty's honour, that he would insist upon no method, though begun by his father, which the Judges of his realm should not pronounce to be strictly lawful; yet, however, this too was applied to the prejudice of the court, as if they were pursuing methods which the very Judges condemned for arbitrary and illegal.

"Westminster-hall was exercised with many singular cases, that serve much to express the disposition of the times. In Easter Term sir Henry Martyn, LL.D. and Judge of the Admiralty, made a great complaint to the king against the Judges of the King's-Bench, for granting prohibitions against his court: and upon this occasion the Judges were called before the king, where they stoutly justified their proceedings in those cases to be according to law, and from whence they could not depart by virtue of their oaths. About the next Term, the feoffees in trust for the buying in of impropriations to be bestowed upon preaching ministers, were brought into the Exchequer for breach of their trust in not augmenting poorer vicarages, but giving arbitrary pensions to lecturers and disaffected preachers: their corporation was dissolved, and their fund and stock adjudged to the king; of which we must take some farther notice in our view of church affairs. Nigh the same time, Huntley, a minister in Kent before mentioned, having been censured and imprisoned by the High Commission Court, brought now his action of false imprisonment against the keeper Mr. Barker, and some of the commissioners by name. The Attorney General moved, that the action might lay against the gaoler only, and by no means against any of the persons in the High Commission: but after long debate, the Court ordered that two of the commissioners should answer. The bishop of London made the king sensible, that the authority of his High Commission Court would fall to nothing, if the Judges of it must be now exposed to personal actions. Upon which the king sent his advocate, Dr. Ryves, to the Lord Chief Justice, requiring him to proceed no farther in that cause till he had spoken with his majesty. The Chief Justice answered, 'We receive the Message;' and then consulted with the Judges, and they came to this resolution, that 'they conceived such a message not to stand with their oaths, which commanded an indefinite stay of a cause between party and party, that might stop the course of justice so long as the king would.' And they farther declared the doctor to be no fit messenger, all messages from the king to them being usually by the lord keeper, or the attorney general, in causes relating to the administration of justice. By the court's desire, the chief justice acquainted the lord keeper and the bishop of London, who both agreed that the message was mistaken, and that the king's mind was not to command a stop, but to desire as much slowness as might stand with justice.' After this, upon the importunity of the commissioners, who would no longer act if thus exposed to suits at common law; the king assumed the matter to himself, and sending for the Judges, charged them with 'express command, that they should not put the commissioners to answer.' The Judges stoutly replied, that they could not, without breach of their oaths, perform that command. Afterwards the matter was handled at the council-table in presence of the Judges; where, after long hearing, it was determined, that the Judges had done their duty, and that the commissioners ought to answer. Toward the end of Trinity term the sickness encreasing in Southwark, Hobart, Stroud, and Valentine, three of the late members, imprisoned in the Marshalsea, sued to the Judges of the King's-bench to be removed to the Gate-house, and were by writ from the court so removed. But Mr. Selden, being at the same time in the Marshalsea, had forgot or omitted to make the like application to the King's-bench till the term was over, and the Judges in the circuit: After which he sued to the Lord-Treasurer for the like favour of removal, and by warrant from his lordship was accordingly so removed. But in Michaelmas term the Judges called on the marshal for his prisoner Selden; and he producing the treasurer's warrant by the king's direction, they declared such warrant to be illegal, and sent their writ to remand the prisoner back again to the Marshalsea. In the Hilary term following, the attorney-general exhibited two several informations against sir Miles Hobart, kt. and William Stroud, esq.; (who by writ from the King's-bench had been removed from the Marshalsea to the Gate-house) for escapes out of prison, proving that Stroud had resided with a keeper in his own chambers at Gray's-Inn; and Hobart had continued with a keeper at his lodgings in Fleet-street. The jury returned their verdicts severally Not Guilty; And the Judges resolved, that the prison of the King's-bench is not any local prison confined to one place; but that every place where any person is by authority of that court restrained of his liberty, is a prison. These several cases, and the decision of them, do abundantly prove, that the present set of Judges were no servile creatures of the court; and that the king did not insist upon their obsequious compliance with him; but they gave their judgments with freedom and courage, and the king acquiesced in their opinion, though contrary to his own."

That the court of King's-bench can commit to any prison, see Rex v. Hart and White, in dom. proc. May 1809, and the cases and authorities cited in that case.

191. Proceedings against ROGER MANWARING, D. D. for preaching and publishing two Sermons, maintaining Doctrines tending to the Subversion of the Laws and Liberties of the Kingdom: 4 CHARLES I. A. D. 1628. [1 Rushw. Coll. 2 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 388. Sir John Napier's MS.]

DR. Roger Manwaring promoted the same business (the Forced Loan) in two Sermons. In one of them he said: 'That the king is not bound to observe the laws of the realm concerning the Subjects' Rights and Liberties, but that his royal will and command in imposing Loans and Taxes, without common consent in parliament, doth oblige the subjects conscience upon pain of eternal damnation. That those who refused to pay this Loan, offended against the law of God, and the king's supreme authority, and became guilty of impiety, disloyalty, and rebellion. And that the authority of parliament is not necessary for the raising of Aids and Subsidies; and that the slow proceedings of such great assemblies, were not fitted for the supply of the state's urgent necessities, but would rather produce sundry impediments to the just designs of princes.*

* Sanderson, in his Life of Charles 1, says, "That this Dr. Manwaring preached two bold Sermons, one before the king, and the other at his parish church. In the first he asserted, 'That the king's royal command, imposing Taxes and Loans, without consent of parliament, did so far bind the conscience of the subjects of this kingdom that they could not refuse the payment without peril of damnation.' The other was on this topic, 'That the authority of parliament was not necessary

On the 23rd of June 1629, Mr. Rouse, a Member of the House of Commons, brought in a Charge against Dr. Roger Manwaring, which some days after was seconded with a Declaration: viz.

"Mr. Speaker; I am to deliver from the committee a Charge against Mr. Manwaring, a preacher in divinity; but a man so criminous, that he hath turned his titles into accusations; for the better they are, the worse is he that dishonours them. Here is a great Charge that lies upon him, it is great in itself, and great, because, it hath many great Charges in it; 'Serpens qui serpentem devorat fit draco,' his Charge having digested many Charges into it, becomes a Monster of Charges.

"The main and great one is this, a Plot and Practice to alter and subvert the frame and 'for the raising Aids and Subsidies.' This author adds, he well remembers what the king said when he was afterwards censured for it; 'He that will preach more than he can prove, let him suffer for it; I give him no thanks for giving me my due.' So that this being entirely the business of parliament, he was left, both by the king and church, to their Sentence."

Kennet says, both Sermons were first preached at Outlands in July 1627. The preacher was made Dean of Worcester 1633; bishop of St. Davids 1635; and died at Carmarthen, in poverty, 1653.

fabric of this estate and commonwealth. This is the great one, and it hath others in it that gives it more light. To this end,

"1. He labours to infuse into the conscience of his majesty, the persuasion of a Power not bounding itself with laws, which king James of famous memory, calls, in his Speech to the parliament, Tyranny, yea tyranny accompanied with perjury.

"2. He endeavours to persuade the conscience of the Subjects, that they are bound to obey commands illegal; yea, he damns them for not obeying them.

"3. He robs the Subjects of the Propriety of their Goods.

"4. He brands them that will not lose this propriety with most scandalous speech, and odious titles, to make them both hateful to prince and people; so to set a division between the head and the members, and between the members themselves.

"5. To the same end, not much unlike to Faux and his fellows, he seeks to blow up Parliaments, and Parliamentary powers.

"The fifth being duly viewed, will appear to be so many Charges, and they make up all the great and main Charge, a mischievous Plot to alter and subvert the frame and government of this state and commonwealth.

"And now, though you may be sure, that Mr. Manwaring leaves us no propriety in our goods, yet he hath an absolute propriety in this Charge; hear himself making up his own Charge. [Here he read several passages out of his Book, and then proceeded and said:] You have heard his Charge made up by his own words, and withal I doubt not but you seem to hear the voice of that wicked one, 'quid dabitis?' What will you give me, and I will betray this state, kingdom, and commonwealth?

"But there are two observations (I might add a third, which is like unto 'a three-fold cord, which cannot easily be broken') will draw the Charge more violently upon him.

"The first is of the time when this Doctrine of destruction was set forth; it was preached in the heart of the Loan, and it was printed in the beginning of that Term which ended in a Remittur: so that you might guess there might be a double plot, by the law and conscience, to set on fire the frame and estate of this commonwealth: and one of these entailed foxes was Mr. Manwaring.—Another note may be taken of the time, that is, the unseasonableness of it; for this Doctrine of the Loan (in case of necessity) was the year after an assent in parliament to four Subsidies and three Fifteens, which might serve for a sufficient stopple for the doctor's mouth, to keep in his doctrine of necessity.

"A second observation may be of the means by which he seeks to destroy this commonwealth; his means are Divinity, yea, by his Divinity he would destroy both king and kingdom.

"The king: for there can be no greater mischief to a prince, than to put the opinion of deity into his ears; for if from his ears it should have passed to his heart, it had been mortal: you know how Herod perished. Now this man gives a participation of divine omnipotence to kings; and though a part may seem to qualify, yet all doth seem again to fill up that qualification, and very dangerously, if we remember that God saith of himself, 'I am a jealous God.'

"He goes about to destroy the kingdom and commonwealth by his divinity; but do we find in Scripture such a destroying divinity? Surely I find there, that 'God is a God of order, and not of confusion:' and that 'the Son of God came to save, and not to destroy.' By which it seems he hath not his divinity from God, nor from the Son of God: and that we may be sure he went to hell for divinity, he names sundry Jesuits and friars, with whom he consulted and traded for his divinity. But not to bely hell itself, the Jesuits are honestier than he: for if he had not brought more hell unto them than he found with them, he had not found this divinity in them which he hath brought forth; yea, in his quotations he hath used those shifts and falshoods, for which boys are to be whipt in schools, and yet by them he thinks to carry the cause of a kingdom.

"But, for a conclusion, to give the true character of this man, whom I never saw, I will shew it you by one whom I know to be contrary to him: Samuel we know all to be a true prophet; now we read of Samuel, that 'he writ the law of the kingdom in a Book, and laid it up before the Lord.' And this he did, as one of Mr. Manwaring's own authors affirms, that the king may know what to command, and the people what to obey; but Mr. Manwaring finding the law of this kingdom written in Books, tears it in pieces, and that in the presence of the Lord, in a pulpit, that the king may not know what to command, nor the people what to obey.

"Thus Mr. Manwaring being contrary to a true prophet, must needs be a false one, and the judgment of a false prophet belongs to him. I have shewed you an evil tree, that bringeth forth evil fruit; and now it rests with you to determine, whether the following Sentence shall follow, 'Cut it down, and cast it into the fire.'

June 4. The commons proceeded with a Declaration against Dr. Manwaring; which was the same day presented to the lords at a Conference between the committees of both houses: and Mr. Pym was appointed by the Commons to manage that Conference.—The Declaration was as follows:

"For the more effectual prevention of the apparent ruin and destruction of this kingdom, which must necessarily ensue, if the good and fundamental laws and customs, therein established, should be brought into contempt and violated; and that form of government thereby altered, by which it hath been so long maintained in peace and happiness; and to the honour of our sovereign lord the king, and for the preservation of his crown and dignity, the commons in this present parliament assembled, do, by this their bill, shew and declare against Roger Manwaring, clerk, D. D. that whereas, by the laws and statutes of this realm, the free subjects of England do undoubtedly inherit this right and liberty, not to be compelled to contribute any tax, toll, age, or aid, or to make any loans, not set or imposed, by common consent, by act of parliament: and whereas divers of his majesty's loving subjects, relying upon the said laws and customs, did, in all humility, refuse to lend such sums of money, without authority of parliament, as were lately required of them:

“ Nevertheless he the said Roger Manwaring, in contempt, and contrary to the laws of this realm, hath lately preached in his majesty's presence, two several Sermons, that is to say, the 4th day of July last one of the said Sermons, and upon the 29th day of the same month the other of the said Sermons; both which Sermons he hath since published in print in a Book intitled, Religion and Allegiance; and with a wicked and malicious intention, to seduce and misguide the conscience of the king's most excellent majesty, touching the observation of the laws and customs of this kingdom, and of the rights and liberties of the subjects, to incense his royal displeasure against the good subjects so refusing, to scandalize, subvert, and impeach the good laws and government of this realm, and the authority of the high court of parliament, to alienate his royal heart from his people, and to cause jealousy, sedition, and division in the kingdom. He the said Roger Manwaring doth in the said Sermons and Book persuade the king's most excellent majesty,

1. “ That his majesty is not bound to keep and observe the good laws and customs of this realm, concerning the rights and liberties of the subjects aforementioned: And that his royal will and command in imposing loans, taxes, and other aids upon his people, without common consent in parliament, doth so far bind the consciences of the subjects of this kingdom, that they cannot refuse the same without peril of eternal damnation.

2. “ That those of his majesty's loving subjects which refuse the loan aforementioned, in such manner as is before cited, did therein offend against the law of God, against his majesty's supreme authority, and by so doing became guilty of impiety, disloyalty, rebellion, and disobedience, and liable to many other taxes and censures, which he in the several parts of his book doth most falsely and maliciously lay upon them.

3. “ That authority of parliament is not necessary for the raising of aids and subsidies; that the slow proceedings of such assemblies are not fit for the supply of the urgent necessities of the state, but rather apt to produce sundry impediments, to the just designs of princes, and to give them occasion of displeasure and discontent.

“ All which the commons are ready to prove, not only by the general scope of the same Sermons and Book, but likewise by several clauses, assertions, and sentences therein contained; and that he the said Roger Manwaring, by preaching and publishing the Sermons and Book aforementioned, did most unlawfully abuse his holy function, instituted by God in his church for the guiding of the consciences of all his servants, and chiefly of sovereign princes and magistrates, and for the maintenance of the peace and concord, betwixt all men, especially betwixt the king and his people, and hath thereby most grievously offended against the crown and dignity of his majesty, and against the prosperity and good government of this state and commonwealth. And the said commons, by protestation saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter, on any other occasion of impeachment against the said Roger Manwaring, and also of replying to the Answers which he the said Roger shall make unto any of the matters contained in this present Bill of Complaint, and of offering further proof of the premises, or any of them, as the cause, according to the course of parliament, shall require, do pray, that the said Roger Manwaring may be put to answer to all and every the premises; and that such proceeding, examination, trial, judgment, and exemplary punishment, may be thereupon had and executed, as is agreeable to law and justice.

Mr. Pym's Speech at the delivery of the Charge against Dr. Manwaring.

This Declaration, ingrossed in parchment, being read, Mr. Pym addressed himself to the lords in this manner:

“ That he should speak to this cause with more confidence, because he saw nothing out of himself that might discourage him: If he considered the matter, the offences were of an high nature, of easy proof; if he considered their lordships, who were the judges of their own interest, their own honour, the example of their ancestors, the care of their posterity, would all be advocates with him in this cause on the behalf of the common-wealth; if he considered the king our sovereign (the pretence of whose service and prerogative might perchance be sought unto as a defence and shelter for this delinquent) he could not but remember that part of his majesty's Answer to the Petition of Right of both houses, that he held himself bound in conscience to preserve those liberties, which this man would persuade him to impeach: he said further, That he could not but remember his majesty's love to piety and justice, manifested upon all occasions; and he knew love to be the root and spring of all other passions and affectionous. A man therefore hates, because he sees somewhat in that which he hates contrary to that which he loves; a man therefore is angry because he sees somewhat in that wherewith he is angry, that gives impediment and interruption to the accomplishment of that which he loves.—If this be so, by the same act of his apprehension, by which he believes his majesty's love to piety and justice, he must needs believe his hate and detestation of this man, who went about to withdraw him from the exercise of both.

“Then he proceeded to that which, he said, was the task enjoined him, to make good every clause of that which had been read unto them: which that he might the more clearly perform, he propounded to observe that order of parts, unto which the said declaration was naturally dissolved. 1. Of the Preamble. 2. The body of the Charge. 3. The Conclusion, or prayer of the commons. The Preamble consisted altogether of recital; first, of the inducements upon which the commons undertook this complaint. The second of those laws and liberties, against which the offence was committed. The third, of the violation of those laws which have relation to that offence.

“From the connexion of all those recitals, he said, there did result three positions, which he was to maintain as the ground-work and foundation of the whole cause.

“The first, That the form of government in any state could not be altered without apparent danger of ruin to that state. The second, the law of England, whereby the subject was exempted from Taxes, and Loans, not granted by common consent of parliament, was not introduced by any statute, or by any charter or sanction of princes, but was the ancient and fundamental law, issuing from the first frame and constitution of the kingdom. The third, that this Liberty of the Subject is not only most convenient and profitable for the people, but most honourable, most necessary for the king; yea in that point of supply for which it was endeavoured to be broken.

“The form of government is that which doth actuate and dispose every part and member of a state to the common good; and as those parts give strength and ornament to the whole, so they receive from it again strength and protection in their several stations and degrees. If this mutual relation and intercourse be broken, the whole frame will quickly be dissolved, and fall in pieces, and instead of this concord and interchange of support, whilst one part seeks to uphold the old form of government, and the other part to introduce a new, they will miserably consume and devour one another. Histories are full of the calamities of whole states and nations in such cases. It is true, that time must needs bring some alterations, and every alteration is a step and degree towards a dissolution; those things only are eternal which are constant and uniform: therefore it is observed by the best writers upon this subject, that those common-wealths have been most durable and perpetual, which have often reformed and recomposed themselves according to their first institution and ordinance; for by this means they repair the breaches, and counterwork the ordinary and natural effects of time.

“The second question is as manifest, there are plain footsteps of those laws in the government of the Saxons, they were of that vigor and force, as to over-live the Conquest, nay, to give bounds and limits to the Conqueror, whose victory gave him first hope; but the assurance and possession of the crown he obtained by composition, in which he bound himself to observe these, and the other ancient laws and liberties of the kingdom, which afterwards he likewise confirmed by oath at his coronation: from him the said obligation descended to his successors. It is true, they have been often broken, they have been often confirmed by charters of kings, by acts of parliaments; but the petitions of the subjects, upon which those charters and acts were founded, were ever petitions of right, demanding their ancient and due liberties, not suing for any new.

“To clear the third Position (he said) may seem to some men more a paradox, That those Liberties of the Subject should be so honourable, so profitable for the king, and most necessary for the supply of his majesty. It hath been upon another occasion declared, that if those liberties were taken away, there should remain no more industry, no more justice, no more courage; who will contend, who will endanger himself for that which is not his own?

“But, he said, he would not insist upon any of those points, nor yet upon others very important; he said, that if those liberties were taken away, there would remain no means for the subjects, by any act of Bounty or Benevolence, to ingratiate themselves to their sovereign.— And he desired their lordships to remember what profitable prerogatives the laws had appointed for the support of sovereignty; as wardships, treasures-trove, felons goods, fines, amercements, and other issues of courts, wrecks, escheats, and many more, too long to be enumerated; which for the most part are now by charters and grants of several princes dispersed into the hands of private persons; and that besides the ancient demenes of the crown of England, William the Conqueror did annex, for the better maintenance of his estate, great proportions of those lands, which were confiscated from those English which persisted to withstand him; and of these, very few remain at this day in the king's possession: And that since that time, the revenue of the crown had been supplied and augmented by attainders, and other casualties, in the age of our fathers, by the dissolution of monasteries and chantries near a third part of the whole land being come into the king's possession. He remembered further, that constant and profitable grant of the subjects in the act of tannage and poundage. And all these, he said, were so alienated, anticipated, over-charged with annuities and assignments, that no means were left for the pressing and important occasions of this time, but the voluntary and free gift of the subjects in parliament.

“The hearts of the people, and their bounty in parliament, is the only constant treasure and revenue of the crown, which cannot be exhausted, alienated, anticipated, or otherwise charged and incumbered."

In his entrance into the second part, he propounded these steps, by which he meant to proceed.

1. "To shew the state of the cause, as it stood both in the Charge and in the Proof, that so their lordships might the better compare them both together.

2. "To take away the pretensions of mitigations and limitations of his opinions, which the doctor had provided for his own defence.

3. "To observe those circumstances of aggravation, which might properly be annexed to his Charge.

4. "To propound some Precedents of former times, wherein, though he could not match the offence now in question (for he thought the like before had never been committed) yet he should produce such as should sufficiently declare, how forward our ancestors would have been in the prosecution and condemning of such offences, if they had been then committed.

"The Offence was prescribed in a double manner; First, by the general scope and intention, and by the matter and particulars of the fact, whereby that intention was expressed.

"In the description of the intention he observed six points, every one of which was a character of extreme malice and wickedness.

1. His attempt to misguide and seduce the conscience of the king. 2. To incense his royal displeasure against his subjects. 3. To scandalize, impeach, and subvert the good laws and government of the kingdom, and authority of parliaments. 4. To avert his majesty's mind from calling of parliaments. 5. To alienate his royal heart from his people. 6. To cause jealousies, sedition, and division in the kingdom. Of these particulars (he said) he would forbear to speak further, till he should come to those parts of the fact, to which they were most properly to be applied.

"The materials of the Charge were contrived into three distinct Articles; the first of these comprehended two clauses.

1. "That his majesty is not bound to keep and observe the good laws and customs of the realm, concerning the Right and Liberty of the Subject to be exempted from all Loans, Taxes, and other Aids laid upon them, without common consent in parliament.

"That his majesty's will and command in imposing any Charges upon his subjects without such consent, doth so far bind them in their consciences, that they cannot refuse the same without peril of eternal damnation.

"Two kinds of Proof were produced upon this Article. The first was from some assertions of the doctor's, concerning the power of kings in general, but by the necessary consequence to be applied to the king of England. The next kind of proof was from his censures, and determinations upon the particular case of the late Loan, which by necessity and parity of reason, were likewise applicable to all cases of the like nature. And lest by frailty of memory he might mistake the words, or invert the sense, he desired leave to resort to his paper, wherein the places were carefully extracted out of the book itself. And then he read each particular clause by itself, pointing to the page for proof, which we here forbear to mention, referring the reader to the book itself.

"Then he proceeded and said, That from this evidence of the fact doth issue a clear evidence of his wicked intention to misguide and seduce the king's conscience, touching the observation of the laws and liberties of the kingdom, to scandalize and impeach the good laws and government of the realm, and the authority of parliaments, which are two of those characters of malice which he formerly noted, and now enforced thus: If to give the king ill counsel, in some one particular action, hath heretofore been heavily punished in this high court; how much more heinous must it needs be thought by ill counsel to pervert and seduce his majesty's conscience, which is the sovereign principle of all moral actions, from which they are to receive warrant for their direction before they be acted, and judgment for their reformation afterwards? If scandalum magnatum, slander and infamy cast upon great lords and officers of the kingdom, have been always most severely censured; how much more tender ought we to be of that slander and infamy which is here cast upon the laws and government, from whence is derived all the honour and reverence due to those great lords and magistrates?

"All men (and so the greatest and highest magistrates) are subject to passions and partialities, whereby they may be transported into over-hard injurious crosses: which considerations may sometimes excuse, though never justify, the railing and evil speeches of men, who have been so provoked; it being a true rule, that whatsoever gives strength and enforcement to the temptation in any sin, doth necessarily imply an abatement and diminution of guilt in that sin. But to slander and disgrace the laws and government, is without possibility of any such excuse, it being a simple act of a malignant will, not induced nor excited by any outward provocation: the laws carrying an equal and constant respect to all, ought to be revered equally by all.—And thus he derived the proofs and enforcements, upon the first Article of the Charge.

"The second Article he said contained three clauses. 1. That these refusers had offended against the law of God. 2. Against the supreme authority. 3. By so doing, were become guilty of impiety, disloyalty, rebellion, disobedience, and liable to many other taxes.

"For proof of all these (he said) he needed no other evidence than what might be easily drawn from those places which he had read already; for what impiety can be greater, than to contemn the law of God, and to prefer human laws before it? What greater disloyalty, rebellion, and disobedience, than to depress supreme authority, to tie the hands and clip the wings of sovereign princes? yet he desired their lordships patience in hearing some few other places, wherein the stains and taint, which the doctor endeavoured to lay upon the refusers, might appear by the odiousness of their comparisons, in which he doth labour to rank them.

“The first comparison is with Popish Recusants; yet he makes them the worst of the two, and for the better resemblance, gives them a new name of Temporal Recusants. For this he allegeth the 1st Sermon, p. 31, 32, and part of the fifth consideration, by which he would persuade them to yield to this loan.

“Fifthly, If they would consider what advantage this their recusancy in temporals, gives to the common adversary, who for disobedience in spirituals, have hitherto alone inherited that name, for that which we ourselves condemn in them for so doing, and profess to hate that religion which teacheth them so to do; that is, to refuse subjection unto princes in spirituals; the same, if not worse, some of our side now (if ours they be) dare to practise.

“We must needs be argued of less conscience, and more ingratitude, both to God and the king, if in temporal things we obey not; they in spirituals deny subjection, wherein they may perhaps frame unto themselves some reasons of probability, that the offence is not so heinous, if we in temporal shall be so refractory, what colour of reason can we possibly find to make our defence withal, without the utter shaming of ourselves, and laying a stain which cannot easily be washed out, upon that religion which his majesty doth so graciously maintain, and ourselves profess?”

“The second comparison is with Turks and Jews, in the 2d Sermon, p. 47. What a Paradox is, &c. What a Turk will do for a Christian, and a Christian for a Turk, and a Jew for both, &c. the same and much less Christian men should deny to a Christian king.

“The third comparison is with Corah, Dathan and Abiram, Theudas and Judas; which is taken out of the 2d Sermon, p. 49, where he labours to deprive those refusers of all merit in the sufferings for this cause.—Corah, Dathan and Abiram, whom for their murmurings God suddenly sunk into hell-fire, might as well alleadge their sufferings had some resemblance with that of the three children in the Babylonian furnace; and Theudas and Judas, the two incendiaries of the people, in the days of Cæsar’s tributes, might as well pretend their cause to be like the Maccabees.

“Thus he ended the second Article of the Charge, upon which, he said, were imprinted other two of these six characters of malice, formerly vented: that is, a wicked intention to increase his majesty’s displeasure against his good subjects so refusing, and to alienate his heart from the rest of his people: both which were points so odious, that he needed not to add any further inforcement or illustration.

“The third Article contained three Clauses.

“1. That authority of parliament is not necessary for the raising of Aids and Subsidies.
—3. That the slow proceedings of such as-semblies, are not fit to supply the urgent necessity of the state.—3. That parliaments are apt to produce sundry impediments to the just designs of princes, and give them occasion of displeasure and discontent.

“For proof of all which he alleged two places, containing the two first of those six considerations, which are propounded by the doctor, to induce the refusers to yield to the Loan, in the first Sermon, p. 26, 27.

“First, if they would please to consider, that though such assemblies as are the highest and greatest representations of a kingdom, be most sacred and honourable, and necessary also to those ends to which they were at first instituted; yet know we must; that ordained they were not to this end, to contribute any right to kings, whereby to challenge tributary aids and subsidiary helps; but for the more equal imposing, and more easy exacting of that which unto kings doth appertain by natural and original law and justice, as their proper inheritance annexed to their imperial crowns from their birth. And therefore if by a magistrate that is supreme, if upon necessity, extreme and urgent, such subsidiary helps be required, a proportion being held respectively to the ability of the persons charged, and the sum and quantity so required surmount not too remarkably the use and charge for which it was levied, very hard would it be for any man in the world, that should not accordingly satisfy such demands, to defend his conscience from that heavy prejudice of resisting the ordinance of God, and receiving to himself damnation; though every of those circumstances be not observed, which by the municipal law is required.

“Secondly, if they would consider the importunities that often may be urgent, and pressing necessities of state, that cannot stay without certain and apparent danger, for the motion and revolution of so great and vast a body as such assemblies are, nor yet abide their long and pausing deliberation when they are assembled, nor stand upon the answering of those jealous and over-wary cautions and objections made by some, who, wedded over-much to the love of epidemical and popular errors, and bent to cross the most just and lawful designs of their wise and gracious sovereign; and that under the plausible shews of singular liberty and freedom, which, if their conscience might speak, would appear nothing more than the satisfying either of private humours, passions, or purposes.

“He said, he needed not draw any arguments or conclusions from these places; the substance of the Charge appeared sufficiently in the words themselves: and to this 3d Article he fixed two other of these six characters of malice, that it is his wicked intention to avert his majesty’s mind from causing of parliaments, and to cause jealousies, seditious, and divisions in the kingdom; which he shortly enforced thus: if parliaments be taken away, mischief and disorders must needs abound, without any possibility of good laws to reform them; grievances will daily increase, without opportunities or means to redress them; and what readier way can there be to distractions betwixt the king and people, to tumults and distempers in the state, than this?

“And so he concluded this third Article of the Charge.

“The limitations whereby the doctor had provided to justify (or at least to excuse) himself, were propounded to be three. 1. That he did not attribute to the king any such absolute power as might be exercised at all times, or upon all occasions, according to his own pleasure, but only upon necessity; extreme and urgent. 2. That the sum required must be proportionable to the ability of the party and to the use and occasion. 3. That he did not say, that the substance of the municipal or national laws might be omitted or neglected, but the circumstances only.

“To these were offered three Answers, the first general, the other two particular. The general Answer was this, That it is all one to leave the power absolute, and to leave the judgment arbitrary, when to execute that power; for although these limitations should be admitted, yet it is left to the king alone to determine, what is an urgent and pressing necessity, what is a just proportion, both in respect of the ability, and of the use and occasion: and what shall be said to be a circumstance, and what of the substance of the law; and the subject is left without remedy: the legal bounds being taken away, no private person shall be allowed to oppose his own particular opinion in any of these points to the king's resolution; so that all these limitations, though specious in shew, are in effect fruitless and vain.

“The first particular Answer applied to that limitation of urgent necessity, was taken from the case of Normandy, as it appears in the Commentaries of Guilme Jeremie, upon the customary laws of that duchy: they having been oppressed with some grievances, contrary to this franchise, made their complaint to Lewis the tenth, which by his charter, in the year 1314, acknowledging the right and custom of the country, and that they had been unjustly grieved, did grant and provide, that from thence-forward they should be free from all subsidies and exactions to be imposed by him and his successors; yet with this clause, ‘si necessitate grand ne le requirret’: which small exception hath devoured all these immunities; for though these states meet every year, yet they have little or no power left, but to agree to such levies, as the king will please to make upon them.

“The second particular answer applied to the limitation and diminution of this power, which may be pretended to be made by this word, circumstances, as if he did acknowledge the king to be bound to the substance of the law, and free only in regard of the manner; whereas if the places be observed, it will appear, that he intends by that word, The assembly of parliaments, and assent of the people, such contribution, which is the very substance of the right and liberty now in question.

“The Circumstances of Aggravation observed to be annexed to this cause, were these. The first from the place where these sermons were preached; the court, the king's own family, where such doctrine was before so well believed, that no man needed to be converted. Of this there could be no end, but either simoniacal, by flattery and soothing to make way for his own preferment; or else extreme malicious, to add new afflictions to those who lay under his majesty's wrath, disgraced and imprisoned, and to enlarge the wound which had been given to the laws and liberties of the kingdom.

“The second was from the consideration of his holy function: he is a preacher of God's word; and yet he had endeavoured to make that which was the only rule of justice and goodness, to be the warrant for violence and oppression. He is a messenger of peace, but he had endeavoured to sow strife and dissension, not only amongst private persons, but even betwixt the king and his people, to the disturbance and danger of the whole state: he is a spiritual father, but like that evil father in the gospel, he hath given his children stones instead of bread; instead of flesh he hath given them scorpions. Lastly, he is a minister of the church of England, but he hath acted the part of a Romish Jesuit; they labour our destruction, by dissolving the oath of allegiance taken by the people; he doth the same work, by dissolving the oath of protection and justice taken by the king.

“A third point of aggravation was drawn from the quality of these authors, upon whose authority he doth principally rely, being for the most part friars and Jesuits, and from his fraud and shifting in citing those authors to purposes quite different from their own meanings.

“Touching which it was performed, that most of his places are such as were intended by the authors concerning absolute monarchies, not regulated by laws or contracts betwixt the king and his people; and in answer to all authorities of this kind, were alledged certain passages of a Speech from our late sovereign king James, to the lords and commons in parliament, 1609.

“In these our times we are to distinguish betwixt the state of kings in their first original, and between the state of settled kings and monarchs that do at this time govern in civil kingdoms, &c.

“Every just king in a settled kingdom, is bound to observe the paction made to his people by his laws, in framing his government agreeable thereunto, &c.

“All kings that are not tyrants or perjured, will be glad to bound themselves within the limits of their laws; and they that persuade them to the contrary are vipers and pests, both against them and the commonwealth.

“It was secondly observed, that in the 27 page of his first Sermon, he cites these words,

Suarez de legibus, lib. 5, cap. 17. Acceptationem populi non esse conditionem necessa-riam ex vi juris naturalis aut gentium, neque ex jure communi. The Jesuit adds, neque ex antiquo jure Hispaniæ; which words are left out by the doctor, lest the reader might be invited to inquire what was antiquum jus His-paniæ; and it might have been learned from the same author in another place of that work, that about two hundred years since, this liberty was granted to the people by one of the kings, that no tribute should be imposed without their consent. And the author adds further, that after the law introduced and confirmed by custom, the king is bound to observe it. From this place he took occasion to make this short digression, That the kings of Spain being powerful and wise princes, would never have parted with such a mark of absolute royalty, if they had not found in this course more advantage than in the other, and the success and prosperity of that kingdom, through the valour and industry of the Spanish nation, so much advanced since that time, do manifest the wisdom of that change.

The third observation of fraud, in perverting his authors, was this: In the twentieth page of the first Sermon, he cites these words out of the same Suarez, de legibus, lib. 5. c. 15. fol.
300. Tributa esse maxime naturalia, et præ se ferre justitiam, quæ exiguntur de rebus propriis; this he produceth in proof of the just right of kings to lay tributes. And no man that reads it doubts, but that in Suarez's opinion, the king's interest and propriety in the goods of his subjects, is the ground of that justice; but the truth is, that Suarez in that chapter had distributed tributes into divers kinds, of which he calls one sort, Tributum reale, and describes it thus, Soleat ita vocari pensiones quedam quæ penduntur regibus et principibus exteris et agris, quæ à principio ad sustentationem illis applicata fuerunt, ipsi vero in feodum in aliis ea donarunt sub certa pensione annua, quæ jure civili canon appellari solet, quia certa regula et lege præscripta erat; so that the issue is, this, which Suarez affirms for justification of one kind of tribute, which is no more than a fee-farm of rent due by reservation in the grant of the king's own lands, the Dr. herein, worse than a Jesuit, doth wrest to the justification of all kinds of tribute exacted by imposition upon the goods of the subjects, wherein the king had no interest or propriety at all.

4. The last aggravation was drawn from his behaviour since these Sermons preached, whereby he did continue still to multiply and increase his offence, yea, even since the sitting of the parliament, and his being questioned in parliament; upon the 4th of May last he was so bold, as to publish the same doctrine in his own parish-church of St. Giles; the points of which Sermons are these:

That the king had right to order all, as to him should seem good, without any man's consent. That the king might require, in time of necessity, aid; and if the subjects did not supply, the king might justly avenge it. That the propriety of estates and goods was ordinarily in the subject; but extraordinarily, that is, in case of the king's need, the king hath right to dispose them.

These assertions in that Sermon, he said, would be proved by very good testimony, and therefore desired the lords that it might be carefully examined, because the commons held it to be a great contempt to the parliament for him to maintain that so publicly, which was here questioned.

They held it a great presumption for a private divine to debate the right and power of the king, which is a matter of such a nature, as to be handled only in this high court, and that with moderation and tenderness.—And so he concluded that point of aggravation.

In the last place, he produced some such precedents as might testify what the opinion of our ancestors would have been, if this case had fallen out in their time; and herein, he said he would confine himself to the reigns of the first three Edwards, two of them princes of great glory: He began with the eldest, Westm.
1. c. 33.

By this statute, 3 Ed. 1, provision was made against those who should tell any false news or device, by which any discord or scandal may arise betwixt the king, his people, and great men of the kingdom.

27 Edw. 3, Rot. Parl. n. 20. It was declared by the king's proclamation, sent into all the counties of England, That they that reported that he would not observe the Great Charter, were malicious people, who desired to put trouble and debate betwixt the king and his subjects, and to disturb the peace and good estate of the king, the people, and the realm.

5 Edw. 2. Inter novas ordinationes, Henry de Beaumont, for giving the king ill counsel against his oath, was put from the council, and restrained from coming into the presence of the king, under pain of confiscation and banishment.

19 Edw. 2. Clause Minidors. Commissions were granted to inquire upon the statute of W.
1. touching the spreading of news, whereby discord and scandal might grow betwixt the king and his people.

10 Edw. Clause M. 26. Proclamation went out to arrest all them who had presumed to report, that the king would lay upon the wools certain sums, besides the ancient and due customs, where the king calls these reports, Exquisita mendacia, &c. quæ non tantum in publicam læsionem, sed in nostrum cedunt damnum, et dedecus manifestum.

12 Edw. 3. Rot. Almaniz. The king writes to the archbishop of Canterbury, excusing himself for some impositions which he had laid, professing his great sorrow for it, desires the archbishop by indulgences and other ways to stir up the people to pray for him, hoping that God would enable him by some satisfactory benefit to make amends and comfort his subjects for those pressures.

"To these temporal precedents of ancient times which were alledged, he added an ecclesiastical precedent out of a book called Pupilla Oculi, being published for the instruction of confessors, in the title 'de participantibus cum excommunicatis,' fol. 59. All the articles of Magna Charta are inserted with this direction, 'Hos articulos ignorare non debent quibus incumbit confessiones audire infra provinciam Cantuariensem.'

"He likewise remembered the proclamation 8 Jac. for the calling in and burning of doctor Cowel's book, for which these reasons are given, For mistaking the true state of the parliament of the kingdom, and fundamental constitution and privileges thereof: for speaking irreverently of the common law, it being a thing utterly unlawful for any subject to speak or write against that law under which he liveth, and which we are sworn and resolve to maintain."

"From these precedents he collected, that if former parliaments were so careful of false rumours and news, they would have been much more tender of such doctrines as these, which might produce true occasions of discord betwixt the king and his people.

"If those who reported the king would lay impositions, and break his laws, were thought such heinous offenders, how much more should the man be condemned, who persuaded the king he is not bound to keep those laws? If that great king was so far from challenging any right in this kind, that he professed his own sorrow and repentance for grieving his subjects with unlawful charges: If confessors were enjoined to frame the consciences of the people to the observances of these laws, certainly such doctrine, and such a preacher as this, would have been held most strange, and abominable in all these times?"

"The third general part was the conclusion or prayer of the commons, which consisted of three clauses. 1. They reserved to themselves liberty of any other accusation, and for this, he said, there was great reason, that as the doctor multiplied his offences, so they may renew their accusations. 2. They save to themselves liberty of replying to his Answer, for they had great cause to think that he who would shift so much in offending, would shift much more in answering. 3. They desire he might be brought to examination and judgment; this they thought would be very important for the comfort of the present age, for the security of the future against such wicked and malicious practices; and so he concluded, that seeing the cause had strength enough to maintain itself, his humble suit to their lordships was, That they would not observe his infirmities and defects, to the diminution or prejudice of that strength."

June 9. The Lord Keeper having reported the Declaration before mentioned, and the substance of Mr. Pym's Speech on the delivery of it, the lords ordered, that the said Manwaring should be taken into custody, and brought to answer the Charge exhibited against him.

June 10. The lords examined several witnesses in Dr. Manwaring's cause.

June 11th. Roger Manwaring, doctor in divinity, being this day brought to the bar, the Declaration of the commons against him was read. Then Mr. Serjeant Crew and Mr. Attorney-General did charge him with the offences contained in the said Declaration: and opened the Proofs of the said Offences out of the several places of his two Sermons, which he preached before the king in July last. And they did further charge the said Roger for preaching a third Sermon the 4th of May last, sitting the parliament, in his own parish church of St. Giles in the Fields; wherein he delivered three Articles to this effect, viz. 1. "That in matters of Supplies, in cases of necessity, the king had right to order all, as seemed good to him, without consent of his people. 2. That the king might require Loans of his people, and avenge on such as should deny. 3. That the subject hath property of his goods in ordinary; but, in extraordinary, the property was in the king."—And they charged the said Manwaring with great presumption, to dispute the right of the king and liberty of the subject, and the right of the parliaments, in his ordinary Sermons.

The Charge being ended, the Lord-Keeper demanded of Dr. Manwaring, Whether he did acknowledge the 3 tenets to be preached by him in his Sermons 4th of May: this he absolutely denied. Whereupon the Clerk read the Examination of H. Clayton, esq. and sir D. Norton, knt. who had affirmed some parts thereof upon their oaths. Then Dr. Manwaring being admitted to speak for himself, protested before God, upon his salvation, "That he never had any meaning to persuade the king to alter the fundamental laws of the kingdom: his only ends were to do his majesty service; and to persuade a supply in cases of extreme necessity; he desired favour and justice to explain himself; and, because his book consists of many conclusions, that the spiritual lords might be judges of the inferences and logical deductions therein." He further humbly besought their lordships to allow him counsel to speak for him, in point of law; time to answer the particulars; a copy of the Charge in writing; and recourse to his books at home, upon caution to attend again, when their lordships shall appoint.

The prisoner being withdrawn, and, after some debate on his requests, brought to the bar again, the Lord-Keeper, by direction of the house, blamed him for that he divided his judges; by requiring a part of his Charge against him to be referred to the lords the bishops; whereas the whole matter belongs to all the lords jointly.—Then his lordship told him, That the house had considered of his other requests, and granted him these, viz. 1. To have a copy of his Charge. 2. To have time till Friday morning to make his Answer. 3. To have leave to go to his own house, and to abide there with a keeper. And his lordship further told him, That if, upon recollecting himself, he shall desire access to their lordships tomorrow morning, it shall be granted him.

June 12. A Message from the commons, by sir Edw. Coke and others.

The 2nd part of which Message was concerning Dr. Manwaring's Book; They said they found his majesty's command set upon the first leaf, to warrant the printing of that book; but that this they had cause to suspect, because, though they found those words struck out in the original, they still stood in the printed book. And, as they conceive the printer durst not do it without warrant, they therefore desired their lordships to examine by what means this special command was derived, from his majesty to the printer? And when their lordships have found the party, or parties, who gave the warrant, the commons demand to have him or them punished, with as much severity or more, as Manwaring himself.—Ans. “The lords do, unanimously, agree, That his majesty's said Message for the entering, enrolling, and printing of the said Petition and Answer, shall be entered here, as is desired: and, as concerning the examination who gave the warrant for printing of Dr. Manwaring's Book, their lordships will take it into consideration; and do that therein, which shall be fit.”

The same day, upon another Message of the commons to the upper house, it was ordered by their lordships, That Rd. Badger, who printed Dr. Manwaring's Book, be presently brought before their lordships; who, being brought to the bar, sworn and examined, answered, That Dr. Manwaring, himself, delivered him his two Sermons to be printed, with the bishop of London's signification to that effect, under his lordship's hand: and that when the book was fully printed, Dr. Manwaring brought the title of his said book, written with his own hand, as it is now printed. Hereupon the said printer was dismissed at this time; and the earl of Essex and the bishop of Lincoln were sent, from the house, to the bishop of London, to understand, from his lordship, what authority he had for signifying his majesty's special command for the printing of Dr. Manwaring's Book.

June 13. Dr. Manwaring being this day brought to the bar before the lords, and admitted to speak for himself unto the Charge of the commons against him, answered in effect as followeth; “First, he shewed that he was under a great hurthen of sorrow and weakness here to present himself unto their lordships: and then rendered them humble thanks, for giving him leave and time to recollect himself before he made his Answer: and craved a favourable interpretation of what he was now to speak. As touching his two Sermons complained of by the commons, he said, ‘That he was induced to preach them by a public remonstrance of the necessities of the state at that time: and that he printed them at his majesty's special command. That the grounds of his positions, in those two Sermons, are in the holy scriptures, and in the interpreters of the scriptures, and are not complained of by the commons, but the inferences only, drawn from those grounds, are questioned by them. He craved leave to explain himself in two of those positions: The first where he says, ‘That kings partake of omnipotence with God,’ he said, that he meant no more by this than is meant by the holy scriptures, and by the laws of the land: for the Psalms say, ‘Dii estis’; and Mr. Calvin saith, ‘Reges a Deo imperium habere, et divinam potestatem in regibus residere’; wherefore to offend against kings he thought it sacrilege; and, by the laws of the kingdom, a great image of God is in the king. The other position, which he desired to explain, was touching the king's justice; where he says, in his second Sermon, p. 25. ‘That justice intercedes not between God and man, nor between the prince, being a father, and the people, as children:’ he said, ‘That he meant thereby, that as man cannot requite God, nor the child the father; so the king, being dispenser of God's power, cannot be required; but his meaning was not, that the king should not have laws.’—And touching those inferences, made by the commons out of his two Sermons complained of, which they impute either to sedition or malice, or to the destroying of the municipal laws of the land, or slighting of parliaments, he protested, before God and his holy angels, that they were never in his thoughts. He only thought to persuade those honourable gentlemen, who refused to conform themselves, to yield a supply unto the present and imminent necessities of the state. And, in the conclusion of his speech, he expressed his great sorrow to be thus accused: and begged pardon and mercy of their lordships, and of the commons, even for God's sake; for the king's sake, whom they so much honoured; for religion's sake; and for his calling's sake; humbly beseeching them to accept of this submission.”

This being spoken by Dr. Manwaring, and he willed to withdraw; the lord archbishop of Canterbury, (Dr. George Abbot) called to him to stay; and having desired leave of the house that he might say somewhat unto him, which was granted; his grace then told him, ‘That he might have made some better use of the great favour which they did him, in giving him time to recollect himself before his Answer: but he saw in him (as St. Bernard saith) ‘*That there are some men who are *miseri sed non miserendi!’ and that he was sorry to hear such an Answer to the accusation of the commons:’ but, God be thanked, the king had now wiped away what was intended by his two Sermons: which Sermons, his grace said, he both disliked and abhorred, and was sorry that he came only to extenuate his fault. Touching the participation, which Dr. Manwaring gave the king with God, his grace told him, ‘That it was very blasphemy; and that those words in the Psalms, ‘Dii estis, do warrant no such matter:’ and touching his other assertion, that there is no justice but between equals, and not between God and man; the parent and his children; nor between the king and his people; his grace told him, 'It was impious and false; and that he had thereby drawn an infamy upon us and our religion; and had given an occasion to the Jesuits to traduce us:' and shewed him, 'That the scriptures do plainly declare and prove a justice from God to man, from a parent to his children, and from a king to his people:' and further, 'That, by the laws of God and man, there was ever a communitive justice between the king and his people, for matter of coins, and a distributive justice for government.' Then putting him in mind of Anaxarchus the philosopher, whom the king of Cyprus caused to be brayed in a brazen mortar for his base flattery (as a just reward for all flatterers of princes) he blamed him much for citing of Suarez, and other Jesuits in his sermons: and willed him to read the Fathers, the ancient interpreters of the scriptures."

The Archbishop having ended his grave admonition, Dr. Manwaring made a short reply touching his said two assertions: and said, 'That he denied not justice and law to be between king and people; but affirmed that the king's justice could not be required: and excused himself for citing of Suarez, for in those places he spake for the king.'

The prisoner being withdrawn, the lords considered of their censure against him; and their lordships thought him worthy of severe punishment, for attributing unto the king a participation of God's omnipotence, and an absolute power of government; for his scandalous assertions against parliaments; and for branding those gentlemen, who refused the late Loans, with damnation; but, for that he so deeply protested that he had no intention to seduce the king's conscience; nor to sow sedition between his majesty and his people; nor to incense his majesty against parliaments; nor to abrogate the municipal laws, as was objected by the commons; and in regard that the king himself had protested (as was affirmed by some lords of the privy-council) that he understood him not in that sense; and for that his majesty's gracious Answer unto the Petition of Right exhibited this parliament, hath removed those jealousies, which otherwise the subjects might justly have feared, by the assertions in those Sermons: and also for that he, the said Dr. Manwaring, had shewed himself very penitent and sorry for the same: their lordships agreed of a milder Sentence against him than otherwise they would.—This Sentence, being first argued by parts, was afterwards read and assented unto by the general and unanimous vote of the whole house.

June 14. A Message was sent to the commons, 'That the lords were ready to proceed to Judgment against Dr. Manwaring; if they, with their Speaker, will come to demand the same.' Ans. 'They will come presently.' The lords being in their robes, Dr. Manwaring was brought to the bar by the serjeant at arms; and the commons with their Speaker being come, Mr. Speaker said:—"My lords; the knights, citizens, and burgesses, of the commons house of parliament, have impeached before your lordships Roger Manwaring, clerk, doctor in divinity, of divers enormous crimes; for which your lordships have convened him before you, and examined the said offences: and now, the commons have commanded me, their Speaker, to demand Judgment against him for the same."

The JUDGMENT against Dr. Manwaring.

Then the Lord Keeper pronounced the Judgment against him in these words, viz.

"Whereas Roger Manwaring, doctor in divinity, hath been impeached by the house of commons for misdemeanours of a high nature, in preaching two Sermons before his majesty in summer last; which are since published in print, in a Book intituled, 'Religion and Allegiance;' and in a third Sermon preached in the parish church of St. Giles in the Fields, the 4th of May last; and their lordships have considered of the said Dr. Manwaring's Answer thereunto, expressed with tears and grief for his offence, most humbly craving pardon therefore of the lords and commons: yet nevertheless, for that this can be no satisfaction for the great offences wherewith he is charged by the said declaration, which do evidently appear in the very words of the said two Sermons, their lordships have proceeded to judgment against him; and therefore this high court doth adjudge,—1. That Roger Manwaring, doctor in divinity, shall be imprisoned during the pleasure of the house. 2. That he shall be fined at 1,000*l.* to the king. 3. That he shall make such submission and acknowledgment of his offences, as shall be set down by a committee in writing, both here at the bar, and in the house of commons. 4. That he shall be suspended for the term of three years, from the exercising of the ministry; and in the mean time a sufficient preaching minister shall be provided out of the profits of his living to serve the cure: this suspension, and this provision of a preaching minister, shall be done by the ecclesiastical jurisdiction. 5. That he shall be disabled for ever to preach at the court hereafter. 6. That he shall be for ever disabled to have any ecclesiastical dignity or secular office. 7. That the said Book is worthy to be burnt: and that for the better effecting of this, his majesty may be moved to grant a proclamation to call in the said Books, that they may be all burnt accordingly, in London, and in both the universities; and for the inhibiting the printing thereof, hereafter, upon a great penalty. And this is the Judgment of the lords."

Then the commons departed, and Dr. Manwaring was sent prisoner to the Fleet.—After this the bishop of Lincoln (Dr. John Williams) reported the Answer of the bishop of London, unto the Message sent him by the house the 12th of June, to this effect, viz. 'That the bishop of London (Dr. George Mountaigne) answered, 'That he received a letter from the bishop of Bath and Wells (Dr. W. Laud) the last summer, for the printing and publishing of Dr. Manwaring's two Sermons, by his majesty's command: and thereupon his lordship did give way for the printing thereof, without further examination: and caused these words, 'Published by his Majesty's Special Command,' to be put on the front of the said book; that it might appear to be printed by his majesty's authority, and not by his lordship's approbation.' Hereupon the said bishop of Bath and Wells, being present, said, 'He could give no sudden Answer unto this report; but acknowledge. That he wrote the said letter unto the bishop of London, by his majesty's express commandment, that the said two Sermons should be printed: which letter, he said, he wrote last summer from Woodstock, when his majesty was there.' And the earl of Montgomery affirmed, upon his honour, 'That he was then present at Woodstock, and heard his majesty command the bishop of Bath and Wells to cause the said Book to be printed; and that the said bishop desired his majesty to think better of it, for there were many things therein which would be very distasteful to the people.'—The duke of Bucks, also, and the earls of Suffolk and Dorset, protested, on their honours, 'That they have since heard his majesty affirm as much.'

June 16. The House of Lords ordered to be delivered to the king by the Lord-Keeper two Messages, one against Dr. Manwaring's Books; desiring his majesty to put out his Proclamation to call in the said Books, that they might be all burnt in London and Westminster, and at both the universities. Also to inhibit the reprinting of them under severe penalties, &c.

June 18. The Lord Keeper reported the king's Answer to the two Messages, concerning the cancelling the commission of Excise, and about Dr. Manwaring's Books. As to Dr. Manwaring, his majesty said, "That he was well pleased with their request, and would order the attorney-general to prepare a proclamation accordingly."

Dr. Manwaring's SUBMISSION.

June 21. Dr. Manwaring was brought to the bar, in order to read and subscribe the following Submission, which a committee of lords had drawn up for that purpose: viz.

"May it please this honourable house, I do here, in all sorrow of heart and true repentance, acknowledge the many errors and indiscretions which I have committed; in preaching and publishing those two Sermons of mine, which I called 'Religion and Allegiance,' and my great fault in falling upon this theme again, and handling the same rashly and unadvisedly, in my own parish church of St. Giles in the Fields, the 4th of May last past. I do fully acknowledge those 3 Sermons of mine, to have been full of many dangerous passages, inferences, and scandalous aspersions in most parts of the same: and I do humbly acknowledge the justice of this honourable house, in that Judgment and Sentence passed upon me for my great offence: and I do, from the bottom of my heart, crave pardon of God, the king, and this honourable house, the church, and this commonwealth in general, and those worthy persons adjudged to be reflected upon by me in particular; for these great errors and offences.

"ROGER MANWARING."

After this, the Doctor was led into the house of commons by the warden of the Fleet prison, where he made the same Submission, on his knees, at their bar.*

* Doctor Manwaring's Sermons, intituled, "Religion and Allegiance," were suppressed by proclamation, the king declaring, that though the grounds thereof were rightly laid to persuade obedience from subjects to their sovereign, and that for conscience sake; yet in divers passages, inferences, and applications thereof, trenching upon the laws of this land, and proceedings of parliaments, whereof he was ignorant, he so far erred, that he had drawn upon himself the just censure and sentence of the high court of parliament, by whose judgment also that Book stands condemned: Wherefore being desirous to remove occasions of scandal, he thought fit that those Sermons, in regard of their influences and applications, be totally suppressed.

Moreover bishop Montague, and doctor Manwaring, procured a royal Pardon of all errors heretofore committed by them, either in speaking, writing, or printing, for which they might be hereafter questioned: And doctor Manwaring, censured by the lords in parliament, and perpetually disabled from future ecclesiastical preferments in the church of England, was immediately presented to the rectory of Stamford Rivers in Essex, and had a dispensation to hold it, together with the rectory of St. Giles's in the Fields.

152. The Case of HUGH PINE, esq. upon an Accusation of Treason, for Words spoken in Contempt of the King: 4 CHARLES I. 1628. [Croke, Car. 117.]

In Serjeants-Inn Hall, at a Meeting of the Twelve Judges, viz.

The King's Bench.—Sir Nicholas Hyde, knt. Chief Justice; sir John Doderidge, knt.; sir Wm. Jones, knt.; sir James Whitlock, knt. Justices.

The Common Pleas.—Sir Tho. Richardson, knt. Chief Justice; sir Richard Hutton, knt.; sir Francis Harvey, knt.; sir George Croke, knt.; sir Henry Yelverton, knt. Justices.

The Exchequer.—Sir Jn. Walter, knt. Chief Baron; sir Edward Bromley, knt.; sir John Denham, knt.; sir George Vernon, knt.; sir Thomas Trevor, knt. Barons.

WILLIAM Collier, attending Mr. Pine at his house in the country, was demanded of him, Whether he had seen the king at Hinton, or no? Collier answered, That he had seen the king there. Mr. Pine replied, "Then hast thou seen as unwise a king as ever was, and so governed as never king was; for he is carried as a man would carry a child with an apple; therefore I and divers more did refuse to do our duties to him."

After which words spoken, William Collier, meeting with Richard Collier his brother, asked him, "Whether the king were not a wise king?" who answered, "Yes, he was a wise and temperate king."

After which, at another time, Monsieur Sebiza being at Mr. Pawlett's house, at Hinton, Mr. Pine asked Collier; whether the king was there, or no? who answered, that he heard he was. Mr. Pine replied, That he could have had him at his house, if he would, as well as Mr. Pawlett.

At another time one George Morley, a locksmith, being at Mr. Pine's house, he asked him, "What news?" whereunto he answered, That he heard the king was at Mr. Pawlett's at Hinton. Then Mr. Pine said, "That is nothing; for I might have had him at my house, as well as Mr. Pawlett, for he is to be carried any whither." And then Mr. Pine said aloud, "Before God, he is no more fit to be king than Hickwright." This Hickwright was an old simple fellow who was then Mr. Pine's shepherd.

These words being thus proved by William Collier and George Morley, all the judges were commanded to assemble themselves, to consider and resolve what offence the speaking of those words were.

Whereupon sir Nicholas Hyde, chief justice of the king's bench; sir Thomas Richardson, chief justice of the common pleas; sir John Walter, chief baron of the exchequer; sir William Jones, one of the justices of the king's bench; sir Henry Yelverton, one of the justices of the common pleas; sir Thomas Trevor and George Vernon, barons of the exchequer, none other of the judges being then in town, met at Serjeants-Inn, in Fleet-street, where they debated the case amongst themselves, in the presence of sir Robert Heath, the attorney-general; and divers precedents were then produced, viz.

The Case of Juliana Quick, (Kanc.) Anno vicesimo primo Henrici Sexti.

Juliana filia Willielmi Quick, et alii falsi proditores incogniti in occulto machinantes mortem regis, &c. prædicta Juliana ex assensu Willielmi, et aliorum proditorum ignotorum, eidem domino regi, ut fuit equitans in via adhesit, et dixit eidem domino regi: 'Harry of Windsor, ride soberly, thy horse may stumble and break thy neck.' And when the noble John Beauchamp then said to her, 'To whom speakest thou?' she answered, 'To that proud boy in red, riding on horseback,' pointing with her hand to the said king. And further calling out to the said king, said, 'It becometh thee better to ride to thy uncle, than that thy uncle should ride to thee; thou wilt kill him, as thou hast killed thy mother: send to thy uncle's wife, whom thou keepest from him. Thou art a fool, a known fool throughout the whole kingdom of England.' She had pausa fort et dure because she would not plead.*

Thomas Kerver's Case, (Berkshire). In the twenty-first year of Hen. 6.

Thomas Kerver indictatur, pro eo quod ipse proditorie dixit verba sequentia, 'Woe to the kingdom where a child is king.' Et iterum dixit, 'It had been better for the kingdom of England by an hundred thousand pounds, if the said king had been dead twenty years before.' Et iterum, 'It had been better for the said kingdom by an hundred thousand pounds, if the said king never had been born.' And, 'That the Dauphin of France was in Aquitain and Gascoyn, with a great power, and valiantly fighting, possessing himself of the land of the king of England in Aquitain and Gascoyn. And if the said king were but of as much humanity as the Dauphin, who is of his age, the said king might quietly and peaceably hold and enjoy his said lands.' To this he pleaded Not Guilty, and was committed to the constable of the Tower of London; and afterward recommitted to Wallingford castle.—Ideo nil ultra apparet.

John Clipsham's Case, (Sussex). In the twenty-ninth year of Hen. 6.

Johannes Clipsham indictatur, pro eo quod

* A prisoner standing mute in high-treason is ipso facto attainted: 2 Hale, 286, 4 Bl. Com. 348. And in felony and piracy such obstinacy amounts to a conviction, by 19 Geo. 3, c. 20. See 2 Hawk. P. C. ch. 30, 8vo. edit.

ipsi et alii dixerunt, quod dominus rex non fuit de potestate, nec scientia, ad regnum Angliæ gubernandum, et quod noluerunt ulterius obedire regi, nec gubernationi suæ, infra idem regnum; minantesque inter se veros populos domini regis de comitatu Kancie, pro eo quod ipsi noluerunt resistere ipsam regem de justitia sua infra eundem comitatum, ac similiter insurrexerunt, &c.

The Mirfields' Case, (Sussex). In the twentieth year of Hen. 6.

Johannes Mirfield et Willielmus Mirfield indictantur, pro eo quod dixerunt, 'That the king was a natural fool, and would oftentimes hold a staff in his hand, with a bird over the end, playing therewith as a fool; and that another king must be ordained to rule the land; saying, That the king was not a person able to rule the land.' Et ulterius dixerunt, 'That the charter that the king made at the first insurrection was false; and that he and his fellowship would arise again; and when they were up, they would not leave any gentleman alive but such as they list, &c.'—Per indictam. session. Sussex.

Bretenham's Case, (Norfolk). In the thirty-first year of Hen. 6.

Willielmus Bretenham generosus indictatur, pro proditoris verbis, viz. quod 'Richardus dux Eborum extra terram Hiberniæ infra quindecim dies tunc proxime sequentes veniret et coronam dicti domini regis de eodem rege auferret, et illud super caput ejusdem ducis infra brevi poni faceret.'—Notatur in margine indictamenta sic, trespas enormia, contempt. et alia offence. Tamen in indictamento est 'proditorie loquebatur, &c.'

William Ashton's Case, (Suffolk). In the thirty-first year of Hen. 6.

Willielmus Ashton miles indictatur, pro eo quod ipse et alii proditorie diversas billas et scripturas in rythmis et balladis factas et fabricatas, super ostia et fenestras diversorum hominum posuerunt, recitantes in eisdem, quod dominus rex, per consilium ducis Suffolciæ, episcopi Sarum, episcopi Cicestræ domini de Say, et aliorum de concilio domini regis existent. vendidit regna Angliæ et Franciæ; et quod rex Franciæ, avunculus regis, regnaret super dictum regem, dicentes et scribentes hæc omnia et singula. Et similiter miserunt literas hominibus de Kanc. ad insurgendum erga regem, ad adjuvandum ducem Eborum, &c. ad guerram levandum. Per indictamentum Suff. anno 31 H. 6.

John Gayle's Case, (Essex). In the thirty-fourth year of Hen. sexti.

Johannes Gayle indictatur, pro eo quod ipse et alii dixerunt, quod 'dictus rex, et omnes domini sui circa personam suam, et concilium suum, falsi sunt, et quod ipsi petitiones suas, in ultimo parlamento dicti regis, apud Westmonasterium tentam, per ipsos et totam communitatem Kancie petitionat. &c. in vitis dentibus dicti regis habere voluerunt; et quod

'non licet episcopis dieti regni ullam potestatem, nec aliquam congregationem populi erga ipsos ad perturbandum de bonis propositis suis perimplendis, assemblare, nec retinere. Quodque presbyteri totius Angliæ nulla bona nec catalla, præter cathedram et candelabrum, ad inspiciendum super libros suos haberent et possiderent. Ac quod Johannes Mortimer, alias Cade, est vivens; et quod ipse esset eorum capitalis capitaneus in omnibus propositis suis perimplend. credentes, et dicentes, quod ipsi essent infra tres dies quinque millia hominum armatorum: et similiter guerram erga regem levarent.'—Haberunt chartam allocationis eodem termino.

Oliverus Germaine, taylor, et alii falsi proditores, machinantes et proponentes quomodo regem Edvardum, &c. destruere potuerunt; et Henricum sextum, nuper de facto, et non de jure, regem Angliæ, inimicum regis Angliæ, autoritate parlamenti reputat. et approbat. infra regnum Angliæ, extra regnum Scotiæ reducere, et regem Edvardum deponere, &c. mortem regis compasser, &c. credentes et dicentes inter se, in prophesiis, ut falsi heretici, quod dominus Henricus, nuper rex, infra breve esset eorum rex in regno Angliæ sicut prius, et coronam suam in eodem regno haberet et retineret, dicentes hæc omnia ea intentione, quod veri populi domini regis cordialem amorem extraherent.—Judgment, to be hanged, drawn, and quartered.

William Belmy's Case, (Norfolk). Anno nono Edvardi quarti.

Willielmus Belmy, de Norwic, mercer, indictatur, quod cum Robertus de Ryddesdale, à diuturno tempore proponens statum et dignitatem regis Edvardi quarti, &c. adhillare, &c. et ipsum regem per guerram, &c. de regali, &c. privare, &c. inter alias falsas proditioes, &c. diversos articulos proditorum, &c. fabricavit, publicavit, et proclamavit. Et quod prædictus Willielmus quandam scedulam tenorem prædictorum articulorum continent. apud N. &c. monstravit et publicavit, et eosdem articulos pro bonis articulis, et communi utilitate regni expedientes affirmavit, et quamplures personas ad ipsos articulos manutenendum et approbandum excitavit.—Nota, Non dicitur proditorie in eodem indictamento.

Juratores præsentant, quod Thomas Burdet, nuper de Arrow, in comitatu Warwici, armiger, Deum præ oculis non habens, et debitum legiæ suæ minime ponderans, ex malitia præcogitata, diabolica instigatione seductus, vicesimo die Aprilis, anno regni regis Edvardi quarti, post conquestum decimo quarto, et per diversas vices postea, apud villam Westmonasterii, in comitatu Middlesexiæ, falso et proditorie, contra legiæ suæ debitum, mortem et destructionem ipsius regis imaginavit compassus fuit et circumivit, ac ipsum regem false et proditorie adtunc et ibidem interficere proposuit, et ad illud falsam nefandum propositum suum perimplendum, falso et proditorie laboravit et procuravit quosdam Johannem Stacy, nuper de Oxonia, in comitatu Oxon, generosum, et Thomam Blake, nuper de Oxon, in comitatu Oxon, clericum, apud villam Westmonasterii prædictam duodecimo die Novembris tunc proxime sequent. ad calculandum et laborandum de et circa nativitatem dicti domini regis et Edvardi filii sui primogeniti, principis Walliz, et de morte eorundem domini regis ac principis ad sciendum quando iidem rex et Edvardus filius ejus moriantur. Dicitque Johannes Stacy et Thomas Blake, scientes illud falsum et nefandum propositum prædicti Thomæ Burdet, ipsi Johannes Stacy et Thomas Blake, dicto duodecimo die Novembris, apud villam Westmonasterii prædictam, falso et proditorie mortem ipsorum regis et principis imaginaverunt et compassi fuerunt, ac ipsos regem ac principem adtunc et ibidem interficere proposuerunt. Et postea, sexto die Februarii, dicto anno decimo quarto, apud villam Westmonasterii prædictam, prædicti Johannes Stacy ac Thomas Blake eorum falsum et proditorium propositum perimplendum, falso et proditorie laboraverunt et calculaverunt per artem magicam, nigromanciam, et astronomiam, in mortem et finalem destructionem ipsorum regis ac principis. Et postea, scilicet, vicesimo die Maii, anno regni dicti regis, viceimo quinto, apud villam Westmonasterii prædictam, prædicti Johannes Stacy et Thomas Blake, falso et proditorie artibus prædictis laboraverunt; licet juxta determinationem sacram sanctæ ecclesiæ ac doctrinam diversorum doctorum, cuilibet ligo domini regis, de intromitendo de regibus et principibus, in formâ prædictâ, absque eorum voluntate, et præceptis inhibitum fuit. Et postea, iidem Johannes Stacy et Thomas Blake, ac prædictus Thomas Burdet, apud prædictam villam Westmonasterii, vicesimo sexto die Maii, eodem anno decimo quinto, cuidam Alexandro Russeton, et aliis de populo domini regis, falso et proditorie manifestaverunt et dixerunt, 'quod per calculationem et artes prædictas, per ipsos Johannem Stacy et Thomam Blake, in formâ prædictâ factas, 'iidem rex et princeps non diu viverent, sed 'infra breve obierent,' ad intentionem quod per detectionem et hujusmodi materia manifestationem, populi ipsius regis magis ab ipso rege cordialem amorem retraherent; et idem dominus rex per notitiam illarum detectionis et manifestationis, tristitiam inde caperet et abbreviationem vite sue. Ac quod prædictus Thomas Burdet, mortem et destructionem ipsius regis supretui dicti domini sui et prædicti domini principis, ac subversionem legum suarum per guerram et discordiam inter ipsum regem et ligoos suos in regno prædicto movendum, sexto die Martii, anno regni dicti regis decimo septimo, apud Holborn, in comitatu Middlesexie, falso et proditorie imaginavit, compassus fuit, et circumvit, ac ipsos regem ac principem interficere proposuit. Et ad illud falsum nefandum propositum suum finaliter perimplendum, prædictus Thomas Burdet diversas billas et scripturas in rythmis et balladis de murmurationibus seditionibus et proditoris excitationibus, factas et fabricatas apud Holborn, et villam Westmonasterii prædicti, falso et proditorie dispersit, projecit, et seminavit dicto sexto de Martii, ac quinto et sexto diebus Maii, dicto anno decimo septimo, ad intentionem quod populi domini regis cordialem amorem ab ipso rege retraherent ac ipsum relinquerent, ac erga ipsum regem insurgerent, et guerram erga ipsum regem levarent, in finalem destructionem ipsorum regis ac domini principis, et contra ligoanciam suam, necnon contra coronam et dignitatem ipsius regis.— Judgment, to be hanged, drawn, and quartered.

The Case of John Alkerter, (Kanc.) Anno decimo octavo Edvardi quarti.

Johannes Alkerter, yeoman, nuper servicus Richardi comitis Warwici et Sarum, a diuturno tempore proponens statum regis pejorare et de regimine, &c. quantum in se fuit proditorie; per diversa verba nefanda, et alia dicta sua venenosa, de diversis murmurationibus seditionibus proditorum excitationibus factis et fabricatis, a gubernatione privare, &c. ad intentionem quod populi ejusdem regis cordialem amorem retraherent, per discordiam inter regem et populum suum movendum, proditorie dixit Willielmo Pend, Willielmo Fowle, et Sampsoni Halk, sub hac forma, viz. quod Willielmus Pend et Johannes Alkerter olim servientes dicti Richardi comitis Warwici fuerunt, et nunc quod idem comes diem suum clausit extremum; et hoc non obstante infra breve haberent comitem Oxoniæ (qui superates est) infra hoc regnum Angliæ, qui in futuro parcelam hujus patriæ gubernet; affirmandoque ulterius verba sua cuidam Galfrido Peke, quod Edvardus quem vos vocatis regem Angliæ falso fuit, &c.; dicendo, quod idem Edvardus per subtilem artem suam eundem comitem Warwici interfecit et murtavit, ac fratrem suum, nuper ducem Clarenciæ, ad mortem simili modo traxit, non habens causas nec aliquam veritatem; et dicendo, quod quicumque inheritabilis sit directe post mortem naturalem Henrici sexti (nunc de facto, et non de jure, regis Angliæ), ad coronam Angliæ ille tantummodo sinneret et suus homo esset. Et multa alia hujusmodi verba proditorie dixit.—Utlagatus fuit, prout patet per rotul. session. Kanc. anno 18 Ed. 4.

Thomas Hever's Case, (Kanc.) Anno decimo octavo Edvardi quarti.

Thomas Hever indictatur, pro eo quod proditorie dixit, 'quod ultimum parlamentum domini regis, apud Westmonasterium tentum, 'magis simplex et insufficientis fuit quam unquam antea.' Et ulterius, 'Quod dominus rex proposuit moram suam infra comitatum Kancie trahere et amorem ligoorum suorum 'ibidem habere, quia amorem cordialem infra eandem civitatem non habuit, nec in futuro 'habebit; et quod si episcopus Bathoniensis

'moriētur, quod tunc immediate Thomas archiepiscopus Cantuariensis et cardinalis Angliæ caput suum amitteret' Et multa diversimoda verba proditoria de rege quam alia verba malitiosa de dominis suis, tam spiritualibus quam temporalibus.—Utlagatas, prout patet per rotul. sessionis.

Collingbourn's Case, (London). Hilar. an. secundum Richardi tertii.

Willielmus Collingbourn, nuper de Lydyard, in comitatu Wilts, armiger, et alii falsi proditores, mortem regis et subjectionem regni proditorie imaginaverunt et compassi fuerunt: et ad illud perimplendum, excitaverunt, &c. quendam Tho. Yate ei offerendo octo libras ad partes transmarinas exire, ad loquendum ihidem cum Henrico nuncupante se comit. Richmundiæ, et aliis, &c. proditorie attingit. per parliamentum, &c. ad dicendum, quod ipsi cum omni potestate, &c. revenirent in Angliam citra festum Sancti Luca evangelistæ, et totum integrum redditum totius regni Angliæ, de termino Sancti Michaelis, &c. in eorum relevamen haberent. Et ulterius, ad demonstrandum eis, quod per concilium ipsius Willielmi Collingbourn, si dictus comes Richmundiæ, et alii, &c. ad terram Angliæ, apud Poole, in comitatu Dorcestriæ, arrivare voluerant, ipse Willielmus Collingbourn et alii proditores, eis associando commotionem populi ipsius regis, insurrectionem et guerram erga ipsum regem interim levare causarent; et partem ipsorum falsorum proditorum contra regem in omnibus acciperent; et omnia infra regnum Angliæ ad eorum dispositionem essent. Et ulterius, ad dicendum et demonstrandum dictis proditoribus, &c. ad destinandum Johannem Cheyne usque ad regem Franciæ, ad demonstrandum sibi, quod ambassatores sui in Angliam à dicto rege Franciæ venientes defraudari debeant; et quod rex Angliæ nullum promissum eis custodiret sed solummodo ad deponendum seu ad respectuandum guerram inter dominum regem tempore hyemali, eò quod in principio temporis æstivalis Anglica potestas in omnibus preparari possit ad bellum dicto domino regi Franciæ præbendum, et eundem regem et terram suam ad tunc finaliter destruendo. Et ulterius ad advisandum ipsum regem Franciæ ad auxilium dictorum proditorum pecuniis, &c. ut ipse iter regis Angliæ usque terram Franciæ impedire proponet. Et sic prædictus Willielmus Collingbourn et alii fuerunt proditorie adhaerentes, &c. Et quod prædictus Willielmus Collingbourn, et alii falsi proditores, Deum præ oculis, &c. à diuturno tempore intendens per covinam assensum et voluntatem diversorum aliorum proditorum eisdem proditoribus adherentium, &c. associaverunt, et mortem regis per guerram, commotionem, et discordiam inter regem et ligeos suos infra regnum Angliæ levandum, compassi fuerunt, &c. Et ad illud perimplendum, prædictus Willielmus Collingbourn, et alii, diversas billas et scripturas in rhythmis et balladis de mormurationibus, seditionibus, et loquelis, et proditoris excita-tionibus, falsè et proditorie fecerunt, scripserunt, et fabricaverunt, et illas per ipsos sic factas, scriptas, et fabricatas, die, &c. super diversa ostia ecclesiæ cathedralis Sancti Pauli, London. proditorie posuerunt, et publicè ibidem fixerunt, ad movendum et excitandum ligeos regis billas et scripturas illas legentes et intelligentes, commotionem et guerram erga ipsum regem facere et levare, contra ligeos suos debitu, et finilem destructionem regis, et subversionem regni, &c.—Judgment, to be hanged, drawn, and quartered.

Bagnall's Case, (London). Anno nono Henrici septimi.

Thomas Bagnall et alii mortem regis imaginaverunt, &c. et ad intentionem prædictam, quod populi regis cordialem amorem retrahere, &c. diversas billas et scripturas in rhythmis et balladis de mormurationibus, seditionibus, et proditoris excitationibus, tam versus regem quam alios magnates de consilio suo tangent, proditorie fecerunt, &c. super ostium ecclesiæ sancti Benedicti in Gracious-street, et super le Standard in Cheap, ac super ostium ecclesiæ Pauli posuerunt, &c. et quod ipsi fuerunt adhaerentes cuidam Petro Warbeck, inimico regis, in partibus transmarinis existent, ad levandum guerram ad deponendum regem.—Judgment, to be hanged, drawn, and quartered.

Stanley and Clifford's Case, (Middl.). Decimo Henrici septimi.

Willielmus Stanley, miles, et Robertus Clifford, miles, ad invicem inter se communicaverunt et interlocuti fuerunt de quodam Petro Warbeck de Thornaco sub obedientia archiducis Austria et Burgundiæ, inimico domini regis, &c. falsè nuncupante se fore Richardum secundum filium domini Edwardi nuper regis Angliæ quarti, in partibus exterioribus ultra mare existent, ac mortem, &c. regis, ac subversionem regni Angliæ, proditorie conspiraverunt, &c. et eundem regem per guerram, &c. in regno Angliæ, levandum de coronâ, &c. deponendum, &c. Et ad illud perimplendum, &c. prædicti Willielmus Stanley et Robertus Clifford proditorie, &c. inter se aggregati fuerunt, quod ipse Robertus ad partes externas prædictas ad præfatum Petrum Warbeck, &c. transfretaret, et in ipsius Petri adventum ad guerram levandum expectaret; et ipsum Petrum in regnum Angliæ cum toto posse suo introduceret, ipsum in regem erigeret, &c. Et ulterius dictus Willielmus Stanley præfato Roberto Clifford proditorie promisit, &c. ad quodcumque et quotiescumque ipse Robertus Clifford aliquos ad domum Willielmi Stanley à partibus exterioribus, per privatum signum inter ipsos habitum, destinaret, pro ipsius ac dicti Petri Warbeck, inimicorum regis, &c. adjuvamine; ipse Willielmus Stanley eo toto posse adjuvare vellet, &c. quorum, &c. prætextu dictus Robertus Clifford iter suum ad partes externas, præfato Petro Warbeck arripuit, &c. Et sic fuerunt adhaerentes, &c.—Judgment, to be hanged, drawn, and quartered.

March and Carew's Case, (Surrey). Anno tricesimo Henrici octavi.

Henricus Marchio, Exon, proditorie dicebat, 'I like well of the proceedings of Cardinal Pool:' et ulterius, 'But I like not the proceedings of this realm;' and 'I trust to see a change in the world:' et ulterius 'I trust once to have a fair day upon those knaves which rule about the king:' et ulterius, 'I trust to give them a buffet one day.' Et quod Nicholaus Carew, miles, malitiose et proditorie murmuravit, et indignatus fuit, et dicebat hæc verba Anglicana, 'I marvel greatly that the indictment against the lord marquis was so secretly handled, and to what purpose? for the like was never seen.'—Per bagam sessionis tent. coram Thom. Audley, cancellar. et alias, 30 Hen. 8.

The Case of John Rugg, (Berkshire). In the thirty-first year of Henry 8.

John Rugg, chivaler, for these words, 'The king's highness cannot be supreme head of the church of England by God's law.' Hugo, abbot of Reading, superinde dixit, 'What did you for saving your conscience when you were sworn to take the king for supreme head?' Et superinde prædictus Joh. Rugg dixit, 'I added this condition in my mind, to take him for supreme head in temporal things, but not in spiritual things.'—Per indictam. Mich. 31 Hen. 8.

The Case of Robert Rumwick, (Kent). In the thirty-first year of Henry 8.

Robertus Rumwick indictatur, quod cum diversi fuerunt comedentes et compotantes, &c. Thomas Brook, tenens quandam ciphum cervisie impletum, &c. dixit, 'God save the king! here is good ale.' Ad quod prædictus Robertus dixit proditorie, &c. desiderans mortem regis, &c. 'God save the cup of good ale! for king Henry shall be hanged when twenty others shall be saved.' Cui prædictus Thomas dixit, 'Knowest thou what thou sayest?' Prædictus Robertus iterum dixit ut supra, 'God, &c.'

The Case of Lionel Haughton, (Leicester).

Anno tricesimo tertio Henrici octavi.

Lionellus Haughton, nuper de Ormeskirk, in comitat. Lancastriae, taylor, pro verbis, viz. being shooting at the butts, said, 'I would the king's body had been there as the arrow did light;' and, 'By the mass I would it had been in his body.'—Per indictment. Mich. 33 H. 8.

The Case of Edward Peacham.

Edward Peacham was indicted of treason for divers treasonable passages in a sermon which was never preached, or intended to be preached, but only set down in writings, and found in his study: He was tried and found guilty, but not executed.—Note, That many of the judges were of opinion, that it was not treason. [See vol. 2. p. 870.]

Challercomb's Case.

Henry Challercomb was also indicted of treason for words, and was found guilty, and executed.

The Case of John Williams.

John Williams was also indicted, found guilty, and executed, for writing a treasonable book, called Balaam's Ass. [See v. 2. p. 1086.]

Upon consideration of all which precedents, and of the statutes of treason, it was resolved by all the Judges before-named, and so certified to his majesty, that the speaking of the words before-mentioned, though they were as wicked as might be, were not treason.

For they resolved, that unless it were by some particular statute, no words will be treason; for there is no treason at this day but by the statute 25 Edw. 3, c. 2, for imagining the death of the king, &c. and the indictment must be framed upon one of the points in that statute: and the words spoken here can be but evidence, to discover the corrupt heart of him that spake them; but of themselves they are not treason, neither can any indictment be framed upon them.

To charge the king with a personal vice, as to say of him, 'That he is the greatest whore-monger or drunkard in the kingdom,' is no treason; as Yelverton said it was held by the Judges, upon debate of Peacham's Case.

133. Proceedings against JOHN FELTON,* for the Murder of the Duke of Buckingham: 4 CHARLES I. A. D. 1628. [Rushw. Coll. 635. Whitel. Mem. 11. May's Hist. of the Parl. 10. 1 Clar. Hist. of the Rebellion, (Oxford ed. of 1707) 28, 42. 3 Kennet, 45. 4 Carte's Hist. 195.]

THE town of Rochel was at this time straitly beleaguered by the French king, and the king of who being advanced as far as Portsmouth, on Saturday August 23, 1628, being Bartholomew Eve, was suddenly slain * in his own lodgings there, by one lieutenant Felton, about nine in the morning, who with one blow, having got a knife for the purpose, struck the duke under the left rib, and up into the heart, leaving the knife in his body, and got away undiscovered. In the fall to the ground, the duke was heard to say, 'The villain hath killed me.' Company coming presently in, found him weltering in his blood; and each person looking upon another, marvelled who should do so horrid an act: a jealousy was presently had of Monsieur Sobiez, who was then there labouring for speedy relief to be sent to Rochel; but he protesting his innocence, Felton immediately stepped out, and said, 'I am the man that have done the deed, let no man suffer that is innocent.' Whereupon he was immediately apprehended, sent to London, and there imprisoned. The king was within four miles of Portsmouth, when the news was brought him of the death of the duke: he bid secure the murderer: and bishop Laud have had (as some did then talk) any inspiration or calling of God to it: His confessions to his friends, both public and private, were, That he had often secret motions to that purpose, which he had resisted and prayed against, and had almost overcome, until he was at last confirmed in it, by reading the late dissolved parliament's Remonstrance against the duke: That then his conscience told him it was just and laudable, to be the executioner of that man, whom the highest court of judicature, the representative body of the kingdom, had condemned as a traitor. But, let posterity censure it as they please; certain it is, that Felton did much repent him of the unlawfulness of the fact, out of no fear of death, or punishment here, for he wished his hand cut off before the execution, which his judges could not doom by the laws of England."

* James Howell, in a letter to the countess of Sunderland, dated Aug. 5th 1628, gives the following Account of this transaction:

"Upon Saturday last, which was but next before yesterday, being Bartholomew eve, the duke did rise up in a well-disposed humour out of his bed, and cut a caper or two, and being ready, and having been under the barber's hand, (where the murderer had thought to have done the deed, for he was leaning upon the window all the while) he went to breakfast, attended by a great company of commanders, where Mons. Soubize came to him, and whispered him in the ear that Rochel was relieved: the duke seemed to slight the news, which made some think that Soubize went away discontented. After breakfast, the duke going out, col. Fryer stepped before him, and stopping him upon some business, and lieut. Felton being behind, made a thrust with a common tenenny knife over Fryer's arm at the duke, which lighted so fatally, that he slit his heart in two, leaving the knife sticking in the body.

had advertisement of his death the 24th of Aug. being then at Croydon, with bishop Neal and other bishops, consecrating bishop Montague for Chichester.

Whilst Felton remained a prisoner at London, great was the resort of people to see the man who had committed so bold a murder, others came to understand what were the motives and inducements thereunto; to which the man for the most part answered, that he did acknowledge the fact, and condemned himself for the doing thereof. Yet withal, confessed he had long looked upon the duke as an evil instrument in the common-wealth, and that he was convinced thereof by the remonstrance of parliament. Which considerations, together with the instigation of the evil one (who is always ready to put sinful motions into speedy actions) induced him to do that which he did; He was a person of a little stature, of a stout and revengeful spirit, who having once received an injury from a gentleman, he cut off a piece of his little finger, and sent it with a challenge to the gentleman to fight with him, thereby to

The duke took out the knife, and threw it away; and laying his hand on his sword, and drawing it half out, said, 'The villain hath killed me,' (meaning, as some think, col. Fryer) for there had been some difference betwixt them; so reeling against a chimney he fell down dead. The dutchess being with child, hearing the noise below, came in her night-peers from her bed-chamber, which was in an upper room, to a kind of rail, and thence beheld him weltering in his own blood. Felton had lost his hat in the crowd, wherein there was a paper sowed, wherein he declared, that the reason which moved him to this act, was no grudge of his own, though he had been far behind for his pay, and had been put by his captain's place twice, but in regard he thought the duke an enemy to the State, because he was branded in parliament; therefore what he did was for the public good of his country. Yet he got clearly down, and so might have gone to his horse, which was tyed to a hedge hard by; but he was so amazed that he missed his way, and so struck into the pastry, where, although the cry went that some Frenchman had done it, he thinking the word was Felton, boldly confessed, it was he that had done the deed, and so he was in their hands. Jack Stamford would have run at him, but he was kept off by Mr. Nicholas; so being carried up to a tower, captain Mince tore off his spurs, and asking how he durst attempt such an act, making him believe the duke was not dead, he answered boldly, that he knew he was dispatched, for it was not he, but the hand of Heaven that gave the stroke; and though his whole body had been covered over with armour of proof, he could not have avoided it. Captain Charles Price went post presently to the king four miles off, who being at prayers on his knees when it was told him, yet never stirred, nor was he disturbed a whit till all divine service was done."

let him know that he valued not the exposing his whole body to hazard, so he might but have an opportunity to be revenged.

Afterwards Felton was called before the council, where he confessed much of what is before mentioned concerning his inducement to the murder: the council much pressed him to confess who set him on work to do such a bloody act, and if the Puritans had no hand therein; he denied they had, and so he did to the last, that no person whatsoever knew any thing of his intentions or purpose to kill the duke, that he revealed it to none living. Dr. Laud, bishop of London, being then at the council-table, told him if he would not confess, he must go to the rack. Felton replied, if it must be so he could not tell whom he might nominate in the extremity of torture, and if what he should say then must go for truth, he could not tell whether his lordship (meaning the bishop of London) or which of their lordships he might name, for torture might draw unexpected things from him: after this he was asked no more questions, but sent back to prison. The council then fell into debate, whether by the law of the land they could justify the putting him to the rack: The king being at council said, before any such thing should be done, let the advice of the judges be had therein, whether it be legal or no, and afterwards his majesty the 13th of November, 4 Car. propounded the question to sir Tho. Richardson, lord chief justice of the common pleas, to be propounded to all the justices, (viz.) Felton now a prisoner in the Tower having confessed that he had killed the duke of Buckingham, and said he was induced to this, partly for private displeasure, and partly by reason of remonstrance in parliament, having also read some books, which, he said, defended that it was lawful to kill an enemy to the republic, the question therefore is, whether by the law he might not be racked, and whether there were any law against it, (for said the king) if it might be done by law, he would not use his prerogative in this point, and having put this question to the lord chief justice, the king commanded him to demand the resolutions of all the judges.

First the Justices of Serjeants Inn in Chancery-lane did meet and agree, that the king may not in this case put the party to the rack. And the 14th of November all the justices being assembled at Serjeants Inn in Fleet-street, agreed in one, that he ought not by the law to be tortured by the rack, for no such punishment is known or allowed by our law*.

On Thursday the 27th of November, Felton was removed from the Tower to the Gate-house, in order to his trial, and was the same day brought by the sheriffs of London to the King's-bench bar, and the indictment being read, he was demanded whether he were guilty of the murder therein mentioned: He answered, he was guilty in killing the duke of Buckingham, and further said, that he did deserve death for the same, though he did not do it out of malice to him. So the court passed sentence of death upon him; whereupon he offered that hand to be cut off that did the fact; but the court could not, upon his own offer, inflict that further punishment upon him: Nevertheless the king sent to the judges to intimate his desire, that his hand might be cut off before execution. But the court answered, that it could not be; for in all murders, the judgment was the same, unless when the statute of 25 E. 3, did alter the nature of the offence, and upon a several indictment, as it was in queen Elizabeth's time, when a felon at the bar flung a stone at a judge upon the bench, for which he was indicted, and his sentence was to have his hand cut off; which was accordingly done. And they also proceeded against him upon the other indictment for felony, for which he was found guilty, and afterwards hanged. And Felton was afterwards hung up in chains, in manner as is usual upon notorious murders*.

* "All the historians abound with testimonies of the king's fondness for Buckingham. It appears that to shew his affection to the duke's memory, he gave command for a magnificent funeral, till the thrifty treasurer diverted the project by telling his majesty, 'Such pomp would but prove but an hour's show: and it would be more for his glory to erect him a stately monument that might be done for half the cost.' Upon which his body was privately interred, on September 25. And when the king afterwards talked of a costly monument, the treasurer is said to have used this other evasion: 'Sir, I am loth to tell your majesty what the world will say both here and abroad, if you should raise a monument for the duke before you erect one for your father.'" See 3 Kennet, 45.

134. Proceedings against Mr. RICHARD CHAMBERS, in the Star-Chamber, for seditious Speeches before the Privy-Council: 5 CHARLES I. 1629.* [1 Rushw. Collections, 670.]

IN the year 1629, sir Robert Heath, the king's Attorney-General, preferred an Information in the Star-Chamber against Richard Chambers of the city of London, merchant. Wherein, first, he did set forth the gracious government of the king, and the great privileges which the merchants have in their trading, by paying moderate Duties for the goods and merchandizes exported and imported; and setting forth, that the raising and publishing of undutiful and false speeches, which may tend to the dishonour of the king or the state, or to the discouragement or discontentment of the subject, or to set discord or variance between his majesty and his good people, are offences of dangerous consequence, and by the law prohibited, and condemned under several penalties and punishments. That nevertheless the said Richard Chambers, the 28th day of September last, being, amongst other merchants, called to the Council-board at Hampton-Court, about some things which were complained of in reference to the Customs, did then and there, in an insolent manner, in the presence or hearing of the lords and other of his majesty's privy-council, then sitting in council, utter these undutiful, seditious, and false words, 'that the merchants are in no part of the world so screwed and wrung as in England; that in Turkey they have more encouragement.' By which words, he the said Richard Chambers, as the Information setteth forth, did endeavour to alienate the good affection of his majesty's subjects from his majesty, and to bring a slander upon his just government: and therefore the king's Attorney prayed process against him.

To this Mr. Chambers made answer, That having a case of silk grograms brought from Bristol by a carrier to London, of the value of 400*l.* the same were, by some inferior officers, attending on the Custom-House, seized without this defendant's consent, notwithstanding he offered to give security to pay such customs as should be due by law; and that he hath been otherwise grieved and damaged, by the injurious dealing of the under-officers of the Custom-House; and mentioned the particulars wherein: and that being called before the lords of the Council, he confesseth, that out of the great sense which he had of the injuries done him by the said inferior officers, he did utter these words, 'that the merchants in England were more wrung and screwed than in foreign

'parts.' Which words were only spoken in the presence of the privy-council, and not spoken abroad, to stir up any discord among the people; and not spoken with any disloyal thought at that time of his majesty's government, but only intending by these words to introduce his just complaint against the wrongs and injuries he had sustained by the inferior officers; and that as soon as he had heard a hard construction was given of his words, he endeavoured by petition to the lords of the council, humbly to explain his meaning, that he had not the least evil thought as to his majesty's government; yet was not permitted to be heard, but presently sent away prisoner to the Marshalsea: and when he was there a prisoner, he did again endeavour by petition to give satisfaction to the lords of the council; but they would not be pleased to accept of his faithful explanation, which he now makes unto this honourable court upon his oath; and doth profess from the bottom of his heart, 'that his speeches only aimed at the abuses of the inferior officers, who in many things dealt most cruelly with him and other merchants.'

There were two of the clerks of the Privy-Council examined as witnesses to prove the words, notwithstanding the defendant confessed the words in his Answer as aforesaid, who proved the words as laid in the information. And on the 6th of May, 1629, the cause came to be heard in the Star-Chamber, and the court were of opinion, that the words spoken were a comparing of his majesty's government with the government of the Turks; intending thereby to make the people believe, that his majesty's happy government may be termed 'Turkish tyranny;' and therefore the Court fined the said Mr. Chambers in the sum of 2,000*l.* to his majesty's use, and to stand committed to the prison of the Fleet, and to make submission for his great offence, both at the council-board, in court of Star-Chamber, and at the Royal Exchange.

There was a great difference of opinion in the Court about the Fine: and because it is a remarkable case, here followeth the names of each several person who gave sentence, and the fine they concluded upon, viz.

Sir Francis Coltington, chancellor of the Exchequer, his opinion was for 500*l.* fine to the king, and to acknowledge his offence at the council-board, the Star-Chamber Bar, and the Exchange.

Sir Thomas Richardson, lord chief justice of the Common Pleas, 500*l.* fine to the king, and to desire the king's favour.

Sir Nicholas Hyde, lord chief justice of the King's-Bench, 500*l.* and to desire the king's favour.

* Laud was accused of having aggravated the matter against Chambers, and of having said to the king, "If your majesty had many such Chambers, you would soon have no Chamber left to rest in." Hist. of the Trial and Troubles of Abp. Laud.

 Sir Humphrey May, chancellor, 1,500*l.*
 Sir Thomas Edmonds, 2,000*l.*
 Sir Edward Barret, 2,000*l.*
 Dr. Neal, bishop of Winchester, 3,000*l.*
 Dr. Laud, bishop of London, 3,000*l.*
 L. Carlton, principal secretary of state, 3,000*l.*
 Earl of Doncaster, 1,500*l.*
 Earl of Salisbury, 1,500*l.*
 Earl of Dorset, 3,000*l.*
 Earl of Suffolk, 3,000*l.*
 E. of Mountgomery, lord chamberlain, 1,500*l.*

So the fine was settled to 2,000*l.*—And all (except the two chief justices) concurred for a Submission also to be made. And accordingly the copy of the Submission was sent to the Warden of the Fleet, from Mr. Attorney-General, to shew the said Richard Chambers, to perform and acknowledge it; and was as followeth:

“I Richard Chambers, of London, merchant, do humbly acknowledge, that whereas upon an information exhibited against me by the king’s attorney-general, I was in Easter term last sentenced by the honourable court of Star-Chamber, for that in September last, 1628, being converted before the lords and others of his majesty’s most honourable privy-council-board, upon some speeches then used concerning the merchants of this kingdom, and his majesty’s well and gracious usage of them; did then, and there, in insolent, contemptuous, and seditious manner, falsely and maliciously say and affirm, ‘that they,’ meaning the merchants, ‘are in no parts of the world so screwed and wrung as in England; and that in Turkey they have more encouragement.’ And whereas by the sentence of that honourable court, I was adjudged, among other punishments justly imposed upon me, to make my humble acknowledgment and submission of this great offence at this honourable board, before I should be delivered out of the prison of the Fleet, whereto I was then committed, as by the said decree and sentence of that court, among other things, it doth and may appear: now I the said R. Chambers, in obedience to the sentence of the said honourable court, do humbly confess and acknowledge the speaking of these words aforesaid, for the which I was so charged, and am heartily sorry for the same; and do humbly beseech your lordships all to be honourable intercessors for me to his majesty, that he would be graciously pleased to pardon this great error and fault so committed by me.”

When Mr. Chambers read this draught of Submission, he thus subscribed the same:

‘All the aforesaid contents and Submission,
 ‘I Richard Chambers do utterly abhor

‘and detest, as most unjust and false;
 ‘and never till death will acknowledge
 ‘any part thereof. RICH. CHAMBERS.’

Also he under-writ these texts of Scripture to the said Submission, before he returned it.

RICHARD CHAMBERS.’

Afterwards in the term of Trinity, the 5th year of king Charles, it is found in the great Roll of this year, that there is demanded there, of Richard Chambers of London, merchant, 2,000*l.* for a certain Fine, imposed on him, hither sent by virtue of a writ of our said lord the king, under the foot of the great seal of England, directed to the treasurer and barons of this Exchequer, for making execution thereof to the use of the said lord the king, as is there contained; and now, that is to say, in the octab of the blessed Trinity, this term, comes the said Richard Chambers in his own proper person, and demands oyer of the demand aforesaid, and it is read unto him; and he demands oyer also of the writ aforesaid, under the foot of the great seal of England, hither sent, and is read unto him in these words:

“Charles by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. to his treasurer and barons of his Exchequer, health. The extrete of certain fines taxed and adjudged by us and our council, in our said council, in our court of Star-Chamber, in the term of St. Michael, the term of St.

Hilary, and the term of Easter last past, upon Thomas Barnes, of the parish of St. Clement Danes in the county of Middlesex, carpenter, and others, severally and dividedly, as they be there severally assessed, we send unto you included in these presents, commanding, that looking into them, you do that which by law you ought to do against them, for the levying of those fines. Witness ourself at Westminster, the 21st of May, in the year of our reign the 5th."

And the tenor of the Schedule to the said Writ annexed, as to the said Richard Chambers, followeth in these words :

"In the term of Easter, the fifth year of King Charles, of Richard Chambers of London, merchant, 2,000*l.* which being read, heard, and by him understood, he complains, that he is grievously vexed and inquired by colour of the premises; and that not justly, for that protesting, that the great roll, and the matter therein contained, is not in law sufficient, to which he hath no need, nor is bound by law to answer. Yet for plea the said Richard Chambers saith, that he, of the demand aforesaid, in the great roll aforesaid mentioned, and every parcel thereof, ought to be discharged against the said lord the king, for that he said, that he from the time of the taxation of the aforesaid fine, and long before, was a freeman and a merchant of this kingdom; that is to say, in the parish of the blessed Mary of the Arches, in the ward of Cheap, London: and that by a certain act in the parliament of the lord Henry, late king of England, the third, held in the ninth year of his reign, it was provided by authority of the said parliament, that a freeman shall not be amerced for a little offence, but according to the manner of the said offence; and for a great offence, according to the greatness of the offence, saving to him his contentment or freehold; and a merchant in the same manner, saving unto him his merchandize; and a villain of any other than the king after the same manner to be amerced, saving his wainage; and none of the said amerancements to be imposed but by the oaths of good and lawful men of the neighbourhood: and by a certain other act in the parliament of the lord Edward, late king of England, the first, held in the third year of his reign, it was and is provided, that no city, borough, or town, nor any man, shall be amerced, without reasonable cause, and according to his trespass; that is to say, a freeman, saving to him his contentment; a merchant, saving to him his merchandize; and a villain, saving to him his wainage: and this by their peers: and by the same act in the parliament of the said lord Henry, late king of England, the third, held in the 9th year of his reign aforesaid, it was and is provided by the authority of the said parliament, that no freeman should be taken or imprisoned, or disseized of his freehold, or liberties, or free-customs, or out-lawed, or banished, or any way destroyed: and that the lord the king should not go upon him, nor deal with him, but by a lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land: and by a certain act in parliament of the lord Edward, late king of England, the third, held in the fifth year of his reign, it was and is provided by the authority of the said parliament, that no man henceforward should be attached by reason of any accusation, nor prejudged of life or member, nor that his lands, tenements, goods or chattels should be seized into the hands of the lord the king against the form of the Great Charter, and the law of the land: and by a certain act in the parliament of the lord Henry, late king of England, the seventh, held in the third year of his reign, reciting, that by unlawful maintenances given of liveries, signs, and tokens, and retainders by indentures, promises, oaths, writings, and other imbraceries of the subjects of the said lord the king, false demeanors of sheriffs, in making of pannels, and other false returns, by taking of money by jurors, by great riots and unlawful assemblies, the policy and good government of this kingdom was almost subdued; and by not punishing of the said inconveniencies, and by occasion of the premises, little or nothing was found by inquisition; by reason thereof, the laws of the land had little effect in their execution, to the increase of murders, robberies, perjuries, and insecurities of all men living, to the loss of their lands, and goods, to the great displeasure of Almighty God; it was ordained for reformation of the premises, by authority of the said parliament, that the chancellor and treasurer of England for the time being, and the keeper of the privy-seal of the lord the king, or two of them, calling to them one bishop, one lord temporal of the most honourable council of the lord the king, and the two chief justices of the King's-bench and Common Pleas for the time being, or two other justices in their absence, by bill or information exhibited to the chancellor for the king, or any other, against any person, for any other ill behaviours aforesaid, have authority of calling before them, by writ of privy-seal, such malefactors, and of examining them and others by their discretion, and of punishing such as they find defective therein, according to their demerits, according to the form and effect of the statutes thereof made, in the same manner and form as they might and ought to be punished, if they were thereof convicted according to the due course of law: and by a certain other act in the parliament of the lord Henry, late king of England, the eighth, held in the 21st year of his reign, reciting the offences in the foresaid statute of the said late king Henry the seventh, before-mentioned, by authority of the said parliament, it was and is ordained and enacted, that henceforward the chancellor, treasurer of England, and the president of the most honourable privy-council of the king, attending his most honourable person for the time being, and the lord keeper of the privy-seal of the lord the king, or two of them, calling to them one bishop, and one temporal lord, of the most honourable council of the lord the king, and two chief justices of the King's-bench, and Common Pleas for the time being, or two justices in their absence, by any bill or information then after to be exhibited to the chancellor of England, the treasurer, the president of the most honourable council of the lord the king, or the keeper of the privy-seal of the lord the king for the time being, for any misdemeanor in the aforesaid statute of king Henry the seventh aforesaid before recited, from henceforth have full power and authority of calling before them, by writ or by privy-seal, such malefactors, and of examining of them and others by their discretion, and of punishing those that are found defective according to their demerits, according to the form and effect of the said statute of the aforesaid lord king Henry the seventh, and of all other statutes thereupon made not revoked and expired, in the same manner and form as they might and ought to be punished, if they were convicted according to the due order of the laws of the said lord the king. And by the aforesaid writ, under the foot of the great seal, it manifestly appears, that the said fine was imposed by the lord the king and his council, and not by the legal peers of the said Richard Chambers, nor by the law of the land, nor according to the manner of the pretended offence of the said Richard Chambers, nor saving unto him his merchandize, nor for any offence mentioned in the said statutes. All and singular the which, the said Richard Chambers is ready to verify to the court, &c. and demands judgment; and that he be discharged of the said 2,000*l.* against the said lord, the now king; and that as to the premisses he may be dismissed from this court.

WATERHOUSE."

With this Plea, he annexed a Petition to the lord chief baron, and also to every one of the barons, humbly desiring the filing of the plea, with other reasons in the manner of a motion at the bar, because he said, counsel would not move, plead, nor set hand to it, as further appeareth.

The copy of the Order upon Mr. Attorney's motion in the Exchequer, the 17th of July, 1629, after the Plea put in, and order to file it. Per the lord chief baron.

"Touching the Plea put into this court by Richard Chambers, to discharge himself of a fine of 2,000*l.* set on him in the Star-Chamber, forasmuch as sir Robert Heath, knight, his majesty's attorney-general, informed this court, that the said Chambers in his said plea recites divers statutes, and Magna Charta, and what offences are punishable in the Star-Chamber, and how the proceedings ought to be; and upon the whole matter concludes, that the said fine was imposed by the king and his council, and not by a legal judgment of his peers, nor by the laws of the land, nor according to the manner of his offence, nor saving his merchandize, nor for any offence mentioned in the said statutes; which plea, Mr. Attorney conceiving it to be very frivolous and insufficient, and derogatory to the honour and jurisdiction of the court of Star-Chamber, humbly prayeth might not be allowed of, nor filed: it is therefore this day ordered, that the said plea shall be read on Saturday next; and then upon hearing the king's counsel, and the counsel of the said Richard Chambers, this court will declare their further order therein; and in the mean time the said plea is not to be filed nor delivered out."

In Michaelmas term following, Mr. Chambers was brought by a Habeas Corpus out of the Fleet; and the warden did return,

"That he was committed to the Fleet by virtue of a decree in the Star-Chamber, by reason of certain words he used at the council-table, viz. that the merchants of England were screwed up here in England more than in Turkey. And for these and other words of defamation of the government, he was censured to be committed to the Fleet, and to be there imprisoned until he had made his submission at the council-table, and to pay a fine of 2,000*l.* And now at the bar he prayeth to be delivered, because this sentence is not warranted by any law or statute: for the statute of 3 H. 7, which is the foundation of the court of Star-Chamber, doth not give them any authority to punish for words only. But all the court informed him, that the court of Star-Chamber was not erected by the statute of 3 H. 7, but was a court many years before, and one of the most high and honourable courts of justice; and to deliver one who was committed by the decree of one of the courts of justice, was not the usage of this court; and therefore he was remanded."

As a concurrent proof of these proceedings concerning Mr. Chambers, we shall insert here a Petition of his (though out of time) to the Long Parliament.

To the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland; and Ireland.

The brief Remonstrance and humble Petition of Richard Chambers, merchant, late alderman and sheriff of the city of London:

"Shewing; That in the parliament held in the years 1627 and 1628, it was voted and declared by the honourable house of commons, that whosoever shall counsel or advise the taking or levying of the subsidy of Tunnage and Poundage, not granted by parliament, or shall be any actor or instrument therein, shall be reputed an innovator in the government, and a capital enemy to the kingdom and commonwealth; and if any merchant or person whatsoever shall voluntarily yield or pay the said subsidy of Tunnage and Poundage, not being granted by parliament, they shall likewise be reputed betrayers of the liberties of England, and enemies to the same, as may appear by the said Order upon record.

"In submission and obedience whereunto, the petitioner first opposed and withstood the payment of Tunnage and Poundage, until they were settled by parliament, and all other illegal taxes; for which submission and obedience, in the years 1628 and 1629, the petitioner had 7,000*l.* of his goods wrongfully taken and detained from him by the late king's officers and farmers of the Custom-house of London, for pretended duties, and a heavy sentence and fine in the Star-Chamber, which was imposed upon him in the year 1629. Besides which losses, the petitioner further suffered in his person by six whole years imprisonment in the Fleet, for not submitting to that sentence and fine; and in the year 1637, nine months imprisonment in Newgate for withstanding Ship-money; by which losses and imprisonments, the petitioner was put by the exercise of his calling, and was wounded in his credit and reputation.

"Which sufferings the honourable house of commons (upon the petitioner's complaint in the year 1640,) taking into their grave considerations, were pleased to refer the examination thereof to a committee of fifty members, wherein were included the committee for the navy and customs; who being well satisfied of the truth thereof, by oath, and other good sufficient proofs upon record, drew up their report, that the petitioner ought then to have 13,680*l.* in part of reparation, leaving the rest of those reparations to the further judgment of the honourable house, as by the annexed copy of that report may further appear.

"In pursuit of which report, the parliament then levied and received from the old farmers and officers of the customs 50,000*l.* for wrongs and abuses done to the petitioner, chiefly, and other merchants, intending first to give to the petitioner satisfaction out of the same, because he was the first man that opposed the pretended duties, and the greatest sufferer.

"Whereupon in the year 1642, the petitioner was chosen alderman, and in the year 1644 sheriff of the city of London: which places the petitioner earnestly endeavoured to shun; but such were the earnest importunities, and persuasive encouragements of divers members of the honourable house, (who then desired to have the petitioner in place of trust, for his former service to the commonwealth) that the petitioner was constrained to accept not only of the place of alderman, but further underwent the office and charge of sheriff of London, which stood the petitioner in 4,000*l.* that year.

"But notwithstanding the aforesaid promises and intents of the parliament to give the petitioner satisfaction, such were the great compulsive exigents, and urgent necessities of those times, caused by the public distractions, that the said monies were converted to the public use. Therefore the parliament desired the petitioner to have a little patience, promising him speedy satisfaction as well for the forbearance as for the principal debt. But the distractions continuing, the petitioner had neither interest nor any part of his principal. The parliament in the year 1648, in part of satisfaction, settled the petitioner in the office of surveyor and check in the Custom House of London, then worth at least 600*l.* per annum; but the petitioner having enjoyed that place only eight months, was causelessly ousted by sinister information of intruders, who have enjoyed that office and divided the profit thereof between them ever since that intrusion.

"Moreover, the late king, by privy seal, owes to the petitioner's wife (who is the relict of Mr. Thomas Ferrer) for linen cloth 5,000*l.* and for money lent 1,200*l.* for which she was assigned satisfaction out of the customs of tobacco. Besides, she was further assigned out of sir Thomas Dawes' office 100 marks per annum. All which debts likewise lie wholly unsatisfied, to the petitioner's great prejudice.

"Besides the aforesaid losses, hinderances, expences, sufferings, and forbearances of the profit of the said office, the petitioner from time to time hath laid out himself for the common good, in acting, lending, spending, (and serving) when others refused; exposed himself to that imminent danger at Brentford, by leading out a troop of horse for the privileges, liberties, and rights of the city of London and commonwealth, insomuch, that thereby, and for want of his satisfaction aforesaid, the petitioner, having consumed his estate, hath been constrained to sell and mortgage some part of his lands to pay creditors, and to maintain his family, having a wife and nine children; and is likely to be undone for obeying the parliament's commands, unless by the justice and commiseration of this honourable assembly he be speedily relieved and righted; for that ever since the said reported sum, the petitioner from time to time hath made his humble addresses to the supreme powers for the time being, for satisfaction thereof, and to be restored to the said office, but could not prevail.

"The petitioner therefore humbly prays, that he may not perish for acting for the public good according to the declaration of parliament; but that now after 26 years suffering, whereof 12 years in fruitless and wearisome waitings, this honourable assembly would now be pleased to take the unparalleled sufferings of the petitioner into their grave considerations, for some speedy course for the petitioner's satisfaction, to pay his debts, and redeem his lands, by ordering him the one moiety of his debt in ready money out of the daily customs of London, (from whence his first losses and sufferings sprang) and the other moiety to be discompted upon such goods as the petitioner shall make entries of by exportation or importation in the Custom House, London, until his debt with the interest be fully satisfied and paid; or any other speedy way, as in your grave wisdoms shall seem meet: and in like manner for his wife's debt, which is to pay debts and legacies: and that the petitioner may forthwith be restored to, and settled in the said office, and have reparations from the intruders. And the petitioner, with his, shall in all duty ever pray, &c. RICHARD CHAMBERS."

Sept. 6, 1654.

The petitioner being wearied out with 12

year's attendance upon one parliament, in hopes of reparation for his imprisonment, troubles, and losses, during the 11 years former interval of parliament, in standing for the liberty of the subject, grew infirm; and being not relieved, was reduced to a low estate and condition. He died in summer 1656, being about the age of 70 years.

135. Proceedings in the Star-Chamber against Dr. ALEXANDER LEIGHTON, for a Libel: 6 CHARLES I. A. D. 1630.

[“The following report of this Case is extracted from 2 Rushworth, 55. Mrs. Macaulay, in her history, comments on the proceedings against Dr. Leighton with great severity. 2 Macaul. Hist. 91. Indeed, the cruelty of the Sentence is beyond excuse.” Hargrave.]

AN Information formerly exhibited in the Star-Chamber against Alexander Leighton, a Scotsman born, and a doctor of divinity, came to be heard the 4th of June in the court of Star-Chamber, for framing a book entitled, ‘An Appeal to the Parliament, or a Plea against ‘Prelacy,’ which he printed and published, during the sitting of the last parliament: and delivered it to diverse persons in a way of presenting just complaints (as he gave out) to the then common house of parliament, 4 Car. 1.

The defendant was charged by the said Information with framing, publishing, and dispersing a scandalous book against King, Peers, and Prelates, wherein amongst other things he sets forth these false and seditious assertions and positions following:

1. “That we do not read of greater persecution and higher indignity done upon God’s people in any nation professing the gospel, than in this our island, especially since the death of queen Elizabeth.

2. “He terms the Prelates of this realm ‘men of blood,’ and enemies to God and the state, and saith, that the maintaining and establishing of bishops within this realm is a main and master-sin established by law, and that ministers should have no voices in council deliberative and decisive.

3. “He avowed the prelacy of our Church to be ‘antichristian and satanical;’ and terms ‘the bishops, ‘ravens and magpies,’ that prey upon the state.

4. “He terms the canons of our church, made anno 1603, ‘nonsense canons.’

5. “He disallowed and condemned the ceremony of kneeling in the receiving of the sacrament, alleging that the suggestion of false fears to the king by the prelacy, and the seeking of their own unlawful standing, brought forth that received spawn of the beast, kneeling at the receiving of the sacrament.

6. “He affirms that the prelates did corrupt the king, forestalling his judgment against God and goodness; and most audaciously and wickedly calleth his majesty’s royal consort, our gracious queen, ‘the daughter of Heth.’

7. “He most impiously seems to commend him that committed the barbarous and bloody act of murdering the late duke of Buckingham; and to encourage others to second him in the like wicked and desperate attempt, to the destruction of others.

8. “He layeth a most seditious scandal upon the king, state, and kingdom, wickedly affirming, ‘that all that pass by us spoil us, and we spoil all that rely upon us;’ and amongst other particulars, instanceth the black pining death of the famished Rochelers, to the number of 15,000 in four months: by which passages and wicked positions and assertions, he did, as much as in him lay, scandalize his majesty’s sacred person, his religious, wise and just government, the person of his royal consort the queen, the persons of the lords and peers of this realm, especially the reverend bishops.

9. “That in another place of the said Book, endeavouring to slander not only his majesty’s sacred person and government, but also to detract from his royal power, in making laws and canons for government ecclesiastical, and in matters concerning the church, he saith, ‘that the church hath her laws from the scripture, and that no king may make laws in the house of God: for if they might, then the scripture might be imperfect.

10. “And further charged, that in another place of the said book, thinking to save all with an expression of his sacred majesty, he hath these words following; ‘what pity it is and indelible dishonour it will be to you the states representative, that so ingenious and tractable a king should be so monstrously abused, to the undoing of himself and his subjects?’

The defendant in his Answer confessed the writing of the Book, but with no such ill intention, as by the said information is suggested; his end therein being only to remonstrate certain Grievances in church and state, under which the people suffered, to the end the parliament might take them into consideration, and so give such redress, as might be for the honour of the king, the quiet of the people, and the peace of the church.

At the hearing of the cause (June 4), the defendant’s Answer was read at large, and the aforesaid particulars charged in the Information as seditious and scandalous, were also read out of the Book. After which the court proceeded to give Sentence, and did there declare, that it evidently appeared upon proof, That the defendant had printed 5 or 600 of the said books, and that in their opinion he had committed a most odious and heinous offence, deserving the severest punishment the court could inflict, for framing and publishing a book so full of most pestilent, devilish and dangerous assertions, to the scandal of the king, queen and peers, especially the bishops.

The two Lord Chief Justices being present, delivered their opinions, that they would without any scruple have proceeded against the defendant as for treason committed by him, if it had come before them; and other lords expressly affirmed, that it was his majesty's exceeding great mercy and goodness, that he was brought to receive the censure of this court, and not questioned at another tribunal as a traitor.

And their lordships by an unanimous consent adjudged and decreed, That Dr. Leighton should be committed to the prison of the Fleet, there to remain during life, unless his majesty shall be graciously pleased to enlarge him; and he shall pay a fine of 10,000*l.* to his majesty's use.

And in respect the defendant hath heretofore entered into the ministry, and this court for the reverence of that calling, doth not use to inflict any corporal or ignominious punishment upon any person, so long as they continue in orders, the court doth refer him to the High-commission, there to be degraded of his ministry; and that being done, he shall then also for further punishment and example to others, be brought into the pillory at Westminster, (the court sitting) and there whipped, and after his whipping be set upon the pillory for some convenient space, and have one of his ears cut off, and his nose slit, and be branded in the face with a double S S, for a Sower of Sedition; and shall then be carried to the prison of the Fleet, and at some other convenient time afterwards shall be carried into the pillory at Cheapside, upon a market-day, and be there likewise whipt, and then be set upon the pillory, and have his other ear cut off, and from thence be carried back to the prison of the Fleet, there to remain during life, unless his majesty shall be graciously pleased to enlarge him.

This Sentence being given toward the end of Trinity-term, and the court not usually sitting after the term, unless upon emergent occasions, and it requiring some time in the Ecclesiastical court, in order to the degradation of the defendant, it was Michaelmas-term following before any part of the Sentence could be put in execution; but Nov. 4th he was accordingly degraded, and on Wednesday Nov. 10th (being a Star-Chamber day) he was to have undergone the execution of this sentence; but the evening before he escaped out of the Fleet, where he had been kept a close prisoner, and information hereof being given to the lords of the privy-council, they ordered this hue and cry to be printed to retake him.

Whereas Alexander Leighton, a Scottish man born, who was lately sentenced by the honourable court of Star-Chamber, to pay a great fine to his majesty, and to undergo corporal punishment, for writing, printing, and publishing a very libellous and scandalous book against the king, and his government, hath this 11th day of November escaped out of the prison of the Fleet, where he was a prisoner: these are in his majesty's name to require and command all justices of peace, mayors, sheriffs, bailiffs, customers, searchers and officers of the ports, and all other his majesty's loving subjects, to use all diligence for the apprehending of the said Alexander Leighton; and being apprehended, safely to keep him in custody, until his majesty shall receive notice thereof, and shall give further direction concerning him. He is a man of low stature, fair complexion: he hath a yellowish beard, a high forehead, between forty and fifty years of age.

This hue and cry followed him to Bedfordshire, where he was apprehended, and brought again a prisoner to the Fleet. Concerning whose escape, and executing of the Sentence upon him afterwards, the bishop of London in his Diary, on the 4th of November, makes this memorial, viz.

Leighton was degraded at the High-Commission, Tuesday the 9th of November; that night Leighton broke out of the Fleet, the warden says he got or was helped over the wall, and moreover professed he knew not this till Wednesday noon, he told it not me till Thursday night. He was taken again in Bedfordshire, and brought back to the Fleet, within a fortnight. Friday November the 16th, part of his sentence was executed upon him in this manner, in the new palace at Westminster, in term time: 1. He was severely whipt before he was put in the pillory. 2. Being set in the pillory, he had one of his ears cut off. 3. One side of his nose slit. 4. Branded on one cheek with a red hot iron, with the letters S S, signifying a Stirrer up of Sedition, and afterwards carried back again prisoner to the Fleet, to be kept in close custody.

And on that day seven-night, his sores upon his back, ear, nose, and face being not cured, he was whipt again at the pillory in Cheapside, and there had the remainder of his sentence executed upon him, by cutting off the other ear, slitting the other side of the nose, and branding the other cheek.

The severe punishment of this unfortunate gentleman many people pitied, he being a person well known both for learning, and other abilities; only his untempered zeal (as his countrymen then gave out) prompted him to that mistake, for which the necessity of affairs at that time required this severity from the hand of the magistrate, more than perhaps the crime would do in a following juncture.

Afterwards those who procured his escape were taken and brought into the Star-Chamber, and proceeded against, viz. The defendants practising with one Leighton, a notable offender, to procure his escape out of the Fleet,

Levingston put off his cloak, hat and breeches, being all of a grey colour, and Anderson his doublet, and Leighton put theirs on, and in that disguise they all went out of the Fleet unsuspected; but were afterwards taken again, and for these offences, and respect had of their penitency, they were only fined 500*l.* a-piece,

ceedings against Dr. Leighton. Particularly, they resolved, that the fine and corporal punishment and imprisonment by the sentence of the Star-Chamber were illegal, and that he ought to have satisfaction for his sufferings and damages. Journ. Comm. 21 April 1641.* Hargrave.

136. Proceedings in the Star-Chamber against the Earl of BEDFORD, the Earl of CLARE, the Earl of SOMERSET, Sir ROBERT COTTON, JOHN SELDEN, esq. OLIVER ST. JOHN, esq. and others, for publishing a seditious and scandalous Writing: 26th May, 6 CHARLES I. A. D. 1630. [Rushw. Hist. Coll. Tanner's MSS. in the Bodleian Library.]

["The written piece, which gave occasion to these Proceedings, was a most unconstitutional Project* for advancing the king's Pre-rogative and Revenue. It appears to have been sent over from Italy by the famous sir Robert Dudley, son of queen Elizabeth's favourite the earl of Leicester; and sir Robert is supposed to have been the author; though if that was really so, it highly reflects on one, who on other accounts is transmitted to us with high encomiums for his mental endowments and accomplishments, as the reader will see by consulting sir William Dugdale. See 2 Dugd. Baron. 222. It is probable, that the prosecution was commenced, in order to exculpate both James and Charles the first, with their respective ministers, from the imputation of approving of the Project. It may seem surprizing to the reader, that such persons as Mr. Selden, and the other defendants named, except the earl of Somerset, should lie under a suspicion of countenancing Propositions so irreconcilable with their political professions and conduct at the time. But, as there can be no reason for supposing that they gave their approbation to such arbitrary proposals, perhaps they were included in the prosecution from a suspicion of having encouraged a belief, that the king secretly favoured the scheme and meditated to execute it. On consulting the Book intitled the "Annals of James and

* On this matter Kennet thus expresses himself, "On the same day [May 29, 1630; on which he just before mentions that the prince, afterwards king Charles 2. had been born] a great cause was brought to hearing in the Star-Chamber concerning a Discourse, intituled, 'A Proposition for his Majesty's Service to bridle the Impertinency of Parliaments,' which had given so much offence and jealousy about the time of the last dissolution, that the king ordered his Attorney-General to prefer an information against the earls of Bedford, Clare, and Somerset, sir Robert Cotton, Mr. Selden, Mr. St. John, and others, for spreading the said libel. The earl of Somerset by his counsel pleaded that this discourse was either the same that was shewed him in the time of his attendance upon his late majesty king James, or had the same things in it, and finding no cause of concealing such a former project, and imagining it to be of no scandal to the present government, he had casually imparted it to the earls of Bedford and Clare, who after perusal thereof, delivered this opinion of it at their next meeting, 'that it was a fantastic project of some brain-sick traveller, who had made collections of some princes in Italy, and other foreign states, no way suitable to the government of this kingdom.' And upon the depositions of sir David Fowles, it appeared that the very original manuscript was penned by sir Robert Dudley, at Florence, and sent over hither in the time of king James, by one Mr. Bates, who sent it in a letter to the deponent, and he delivered it to the earl of Somerset, and the earl communicated it to the king.—While this cause was hearing in a great presence of the nobility and gentry, the king sent word to the Lord Keeper, "that in respect of the great joy upon the birth of his son, he should immediately order the proceedings to be stopped and the defendants to be discharged." Accordingly, the keeper acquainted the court with his majesty's special command, and upon which the said writing was ordered to be burned, as seditious, and scandalous, and the proceedings were taken off the file. And here, though the project was proved to have been a private essay in a former reign, and in a foreign country, and though the stopping of process hereupon was a generous act of favour, upon a proper season of public joy, yet those persons who had the art, and the ill-nature, to turn every thing as a disgrace and a disadvantage upon the court, knew how to insinuate as if the king and the ministry had really formed that scheme against the use of future parliaments, and therefore would not suffer it to be examined to the bottom."

Charles the First," we observe that the author adopts a like construction, adding that the piece in question was written by sir Robert Dudley at Florence, in 1613. See p. 361.—We shall now lay before the reader, first the writing which was the cause of the Prosecution; and secondly the account of the Proceedings in the Star-Chamber; for both of which we are obliged to Mr. Rushworth." Extract from Rushworth's Appendix to his Historical Collections, vol. 1. p. 12.

A PROPOSITION FOR HIS MAJESTY'S SERVICE TO BRIDLE THE IMPERTINENCE OF PARLIAMENTS.

THE Proposition for your majesty's service, containeth two parts: the one to secure your State, and to bridle the Impertinency of Parliaments: the other, to increase your majesty's Revenue, much more than it is.

1. Touching the first, having considered divers means, I find none so important to strengthen your majesty's regal authority, against all oppositions and practises of troublesome spirits, and to bridle them, than to fortify your kingdom, by having a fortress in every chief town, and important place thereof, furnished with ordnance, munition, and faithful men, as they ought to be, with all other circumstances fit for to be digested in a business of this nature; ordering withal, the trained soldiers of the country to be united in one dependency with the said fort, as well to secure their beginning as to succour them in any occasion of suspect; and also to retain and keep their arms for more security, whereby the countries are no less to be brought in subjection, than the cities themselves, and consequently the whole kingdom; your majesty having by this course the power thereof in your own hands. The reasons of the suggests are these. 1. That in policy, there is a greater tie of the people by force and necessity, than merely by love and affection; for by the one, the government resteth always secure; but by the other, no longer than the people are contented. 2. It forceth obstinate subjects to be no more presumptuous, than it pleaseth your majesty to permit them. 3. That to leave a state unfurnished, is, to give the bridle thereof to the subjects; when, by the contrary, it resteth only in the prince's hands. 4. That modern fortresses take long time in winning, with such charge and difficulty, as no subjects in these times have means probable to attempt them. 5. That it is a sure remedy against rebellion, and popular mutinies, or against foreign powers; because they cannot well succeed, when by this course the apparent means is taken away to force the king and subject upon a doubtful fortune of a set battle, as was the cause that moved the pretended invasion against the land, attempted by the king of Spain in the year 1588. 6. That your majesty's government is the more secure, by the people's more subjection; and by their subjection, your parliament must be forced consequently to alter their style, and to be conformable to your will and pleasure; for their words and opposition import nothing, where the power is in your majesty's own hands, to do with them what you please; being indeed the chief purpose of this discourse, and the secret intent thereof, fit to be concealed from any English at all, either counsellors of state or other.

For these, and divers other weighty reasons, it may be considered in this place, to make your majesty more powerful and strong, some orders be observed, that are used in fortified countries, the government whereof imports as much as the states themselves, I mean, in times of doubt or suspect, which are these. Imprimis, that none wear arms or weapons at all, either in city or country, but such as your majesty may think fit to privilege, and they to be enrolled. 2. That as many highways as conveniently may be done, be made passable through those cities and towns fortified, to constrain the passengers to travel through them. 3. That the soldiers of fortresses be sometimes chosen of another nation, if subject to the same prince; but howsoever, not to be born in the same province, or within 40 or 50 miles of the fortress, and not to have friends or correspondency near it. 4. That at all the gates of each walled town be appointed officers, not to suffer any unknown passengers to pass, without a ticket, shewing from whence he came, and whither to go. And that the gates of each city be shut all night, and keys kept by the mayor or governor. 5. Also innkeepers to deliver the names of all unknown passengers that lodge in their houses; and if they stay suspiciously at any time, to present them to the governor: whereby dangerous persons seeing these strict courses, will be more wary of their actions, and thereby mischievous attempts will be prevented. All which being referred to your majesty's wise consideration, it is meet for me withal to give you some satisfaction of the charge and time to perform what is purposed, that you may not be discouraged in the difficulty of the one, or prolongation of the other; both which doubts are resolved in one and the same reason, in respect that, in England, each chief town commonly hath a ruined castle, well seated for strength, whose foundation and stones remaining, may be both quickly repaired for this use, and with little charge and industry made strong enough, I hope, for this purpose, within the space of one year; by adding withal bulwarks and rampiers for the ordnance, according to the rules of fortification. The ordnance for these forts may be of iron, not to disfigure your majesty's navy, or be at a greater charge than is needful.

To maintain yearly the fort, I make account an ordinary pay, 3,000 men will be sufficient, and will require 40,000*l.* charge per annum, or thereabouts, being an expence that inferior princes undergo, for their necessary safety. All which prevention, added to the invincible sea-force your majesty hath already, and may have, will make you the most powerful and obeyed king of the world: which I could likewise confirm by many examples, but I omit them for brevity, and not to confuse your majesty with too much matter. Your majesty may find by the scope of this discourse, the means shewed in general to bridle your subjects, that may be either discontent or obstinate. So likewise am I to conclude the same intent particularly, against the perverseness of your parliament, as well to suppress that pernicious humour, as to avoid their oppositions against your profit, being the second part to be discoursed on: and therefore have first thought fit, for better prevention thereof, to make known to your majesty the purpose of a general Oath your subjects may take, for sure avoiding of all rubs, that may hinder the conclusion of these businesses. It is further meant, that no subject, upon pain of high treason, may refuse the same oath, containing only matter of allegiance, and not scruples in points of conscience, that may give pretence not to be denied. The effect of the oath is this, that all your majesty's subjects do acknowledge you to be as absolute a king and monarch within your dominions, as is among the Christian princes; and your prerogative as great; whereby you may and shall of yourself, by your majesty's proclamation, as well as other sovereign princes doing the like, either make laws, or reverse any made, with any other act so great a monarch as yourself may do, and that without further consent of a parliament, or need to call them at all in such cases; considering, that the parliament in all matters, excepting causes to be sentenced at the highest court, ought to be subject unto your majesty's will, to give the negative or affirmative conclusion, and not be constrained by their impertinencies to any inconvenience, appertaining to your majesty's regal authority; and this, notwithstanding any bad pretence or custom to the contrary in practise, which indeed were fitter to be offered a prince elected, without other right, than to your majesty, born successively king of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and your heirs for ever; and so received, not only of your subjects, but also of the whole world. How necessary the dangerous supremacy of parliament's usurpation is to be prevented, the example of Lewis the 11th, king of France, doth manifest, who found the like opposition as your majesty doth, and by his wisdom suppressed it. And to the purpose here intended, which is not to put down altogether Parliaments and their authority, being in many cases very necessary and fit; but to abridge them so far, as they seek to derogate from your majesty's regal authority, and advancement of your greatness; the caution in offering the aforesaid Oath, may require some policy, for the easier passage at first, either by singular or particular tractation; and that so near about one time over the land, as one government may, not know what the other intendeth; so it may pass the easier, by having no time of combination or opposition. There is another means also more certain than this, to bring to pass the oath more easily, as also your profit and what else pretended; which here I omit for brevity, requiring a long discourse by itself, and have set it down in particular instructions to inform your majesty.

2. The second part of this discourse is, touching your majesty's profit, after your state is secured: wherein I should observe both some reasonable content to the people, as also consider the great expences that princes have now-a-days, more than in times past, to maintain their greatness, and safety of their subjects, who, if they have not wit or will to consider their own interest so much indifferently, your majesty's wisdom must repair their defects, and force them to it by compulsion; but I hope there shall be no such cause, in points so reasonable, to increase your majesty's revenue, wherein I set down divers means for your gracious self to make choice of, either all or part at your pleasure, and to put it in execution by such decrees and cautions, as your great wisdom shall think fit in a business of this nature.

Imprimis, the first means or course intended to increase your majesty's revenues or profits withal, is, of greatest consequence, and I call it a decimation, being so termed in Italy, where in some part it is in use, importing the tenth of all subjects estates, to be paid as a yearly rent to their prince, and as well monied-men in towns, as landed-men in the countries, their value and estates esteemed justly as it is to the true value, though with reason; and this paid yearly in money: which course applied in England for your majesty's service, may serve instead of subsidies, fifteens, and such like, which in this case are fit to be released, for the subjects benefit and content, in recompence of the said decima, which will yield your majesty more in certainty, than they do casually, by 500,000*l.* per annum at the least.

Item, that when your majesty hath gotten money into your hands by some courses to be set down, it would be a profitable course to increase your entrada, to buy out all estates and leases upon your own lands, in such sort, as they be made no losers; whereby having your lands free, and renting it out to the true value, as it is most in use, and not employed as heretofore, at an old rent, and small times, you may then rent it out for at least four or five times more money than the old rent comes unto. So as if your majesty's lands be already but 60,000*l.* per annum, by this course it will be augmented at the least 200,000*l.* per annum: and to buy out the tenants estates will come to a small matter by the course, to make them no losers, considering the gain they have already made upon the land: and this is the rather to be done, and the present course changed, because it hath been a custom used merely to cozen the king.

Item, whereas most princes do receive the benefit of salt in their own hands, as a matter of great profit, because they receive it at the lowest price possible, and vent it at double gain yearly; the same course used by your majesty, were worth at least 150,000*l.* per annum. It is likewise in other parts, that all weights and measures of the land, either in private houses, shops, or public markets, should be viewed to be just, and sealed once a year, paying to the prince for it; which in England, applied to your majesty, with order to pay 6*l.* for the sealing of each said weight or measure, would yield near 60,000*l.* per annum.

Item, though all countries pay a gabella for transportation of cloth, and so likewise in England; yet, in Spain, there is impost upon the wools, which in England is so great a wealth and benefit to the sheep-masters, as they may well pay you 5*l.* per cent. of the true value at the shearing, which I conceive may be worth 140,000*l.* per annum.

Item, whereas the lawyers fees and gains in England be excessive, to your subjects prejudice: it were better for your majesty to make use thereof, and impose on all causes sentenced with the party, to pay 5*l.* per cent. of the true value that the cause hath gained him; and for recompence thereof, to limit all lawyers fees and gettings, whereby the subject shall save more in fees and charges, than he giveth to your majesty in the gabella, which I believe may be worth, one year with another, 50,000*l.*

Item, whereas the inns and victualling-houses in England are more chargeable to the travellers than in other countries, it were good for your majesty to limit them to certain ordinaries, and raise besides a large imposition, as is used in Tuscany, and other parts; that is, a prohibiting all inns and victualling-houses, but such as shall pay it; and to impose upon the chief inns and taverns, to pay 10*l.* a-year to your majesty, and the worst 5*l.* per annum, and all ale-houses 20*s.* per annum, more or less, as they are in custom. Of all sorts there are so many in England, that this impost may well yield 100,000*l.* per annum to your majesty.

Item, in Tuscany, and other parts, there is a gabella of all cattle, or flesh, and horses sold in markets, paying three or four per cent. of what they are sold for, which by conjecture may be worth in England, 200,000*l.* per annum; using the like custom upon fish, and other victuals, (bread excepted) and for this cause, flesh, and fish, and victuals in the markets, to be priced and sold by weight, whereby the subject saveth more in not being cozened, than the imposition impairerth them.

Item, in Tuscany is used a taxation of 7 per cent. upon all alienation of lands to the true value. As also 7 per cent. upon all dowries, or marriage-monies. The like, if it be justly used in England, were worth at least 100,000*l.* per annum; with many other taxations upon meal, and upon all merchandises in all towns, as well as port-towns, which here I omit, with divers others, as not so fit for England. And in satisfaction of the subject for these taxes, your majesty may be pleased to release them of wardships, and to enjoy all their estates at 18 years old; and in the mean time, their profits to be preserved for their own benefit. And also in forfeitures of estate by condemnation, your majesty may release the subject, as not to take the forfeiture of their lands, but their goods, high treason only excepted; and to allow the counsel of lawyers in case of life and death; as also not to be condemned without two witnesses, with such like benefit, which importeth much more their good than all the taxations named can prejudice them.

Item, some of the former taxations, used in Ireland and in Scotland, as may easily be brought about by the first example thereof used in England, may very well be made to increase your revenue there, more than it is, by 200,000*l.* per ann.

Item, all offices in the land, great and small, in your majesty's grant, may be granted, with condition, to pay you a part yearly, according to the value: this, in time, may be worth, as I conceive, 100,000*l.* per annum: adding also notaries, attornies, and such like, to pay some proportion yearly towards it, for being allowed by your majesty to practise, and prohibiting else any to practise in such places.

Item, to reduce your majesty's household to beard-wages, as most other princes do, reserving some few tables; this will save your majesty 60,000*l.* per annum, and ease greatly the subject besides, both in carriages and provision, which is a good reason, that your majesty in honour might do it.

Item, I know an assured course in your majesty's navy, which may save at least 40,000*l.* per annum, which requiring a whole discourse by itself, I omit; only promise you to do it, whensoever you command.

Item, whereas your majesty's laws do command the strict keeping of fasting-days, you may also prohibit on those days to eat eggs, cheese, and white-meats, but only such as are contented to pay eighteen pence a year for the liberty to eat them, and the better sort ten shillings. The employment of this may be for the defence of the land, in maintaining the navy, garrisons, and such like, much after the fashion of a Crusado in Spain, as your majesty knoweth, being first begun there under the pretence to defend the land against the Moors. And the same used in England, as aforesaid, may very well yield, one year with another, 100,000*l.* without any disgust to any, because it is at every one's choice to give it or no. Lastly, I have a course upon the Catholics, and very safe for your majesty, being with their good-liking, as it may be wrought, to yield you presently at least 200,000*l.* per annum, by raising a certain value upon their lands, and some other impositions; which requiring a long discourse by itself, I will omit it here, setting it down in my instructions. It will save your majesty at least 100,000*l.* per annum, to make it pain of death and confiscation of goods and lands, for any of the officers to cozen you, which now is much to be feared they do, or else they could not be so rich; and herein to allow a fourth part benefit to them that shall find out the cozenage. Here is not meant officers of state, as the lord treasurer, &c. being officers of the crown.

The sum of all this account amounteth unto two millions, or 2,000,000*l.* per ann.: suppose it to be but one million and a half, as assuredly your majesty may make by these courses set down, yet it is much more than I promised in my letter for your majesty's service. Besides, some sums of money in present, by the courses following: imprimis, by the prince's marriage, to make all the earls in England grantees of Spain, and principi, with such like privileges, and to pay 20,000*l.* a-piece for it. 2. As also, if you make them feudatories of the towns belonging to their earldoms, if they will pay for it besides, as they do to the king of Spain in the kingdom of Naples. And so likewise barons, to be made earls and peers, to pay 19,000*l.* a-piece, I think might yield 500,000*l.* and oblige them more sure to his majesty. 3. To make choice of 200 of the richest men of England in estate, that be not noblemen, and make them titulate, as is used in Naples, and paying for it; that is, a duke 30,000*l.* a marquis 15,000*l.* an earl 10,000*l.* and a baron or viscount 5,000*l.* It is to be understood, that the ancient nobility of barons, made earls, are to precede these as peers, though these be made marquises or dukes; this may raise a million of pounds and more unto your majesty. To make gentlemen of low quality, and franchlins, and rich farmers, esquires, to precede them, would yield your majesty also a great sum of money in present. I know another course to yield your majesty at least 300,000*l.* in money, which as yet the time serveth not to discover, until your majesty be resolved to proceed in some of the former courses, which till then I omit. Other courses, also, that may make present money, I shall study for your majesty's service, and, as I find them out, acquaint you withal.

Lastly, to conclude all these discourses by the application of this course used for your profit, that it is not only the means to make you the richest king that ever England had, but also the safety augmented thereby to be most secure, besides what was shewed in the first part of this discourse; I mean, by the occasion of this taxation, and raising of monies, your majesty shall have cause and means to employ in all places of the land so many officers and ministers, to be obliged to you for their own good and interest, as nothing can be attempted against your person, or royal state, over land, but some of them shall, in all probability, have means to find it out, and hinder it. Besides, this course will detect many disorders and abuses in the public government, which were hard to be discovered by men indifferent. To prohibit gorgeous and costly apparel to be worn, but by persons of good quality, shall save the gentry of the kingdom much more money, than they shall be taxed to pay unto your majesty. Thus withal I take my leave, and kiss your gracious hands, desiring pardon for my error I may commit herein.

Extract from Rushworth, vol. 2, p. 51.

On the 29th of May, 1630, a great cause was brought to hearing in the Star-Chamber, concerning a Discourse, intituled, 'A Proposition for his Majesty's Service to bridle the Impertinency of Parliaments.' Wherein the king's Attorney-General was plaintiff, the earl of Bedford, the earl of Clare, the earl of Somers, sir Robert Cotton, John Selden, Oliver St. John, and others, defendants. Here now followeth the Answers of the Defendants, and the Judgment of the court thereupon, viz.

After the king's Attorney-General opened the aforementioned Information, the Answer of Robert earl of Somers to the said Information, was also opened by his council, to this effect:

That the Discourse, as he believed, was either the same that was shewed him in the time of his attendance near his late majesty king James, or had many of the same things in it: and finding no cause of concealing a Proposition made in a former king's time, and having no apprehension, that scandal to his majesty, or the present government, might thereby happen, he casually imparted it to the earls of Bedford and Clare, who, after perusal thereof, delivered their opinion concerning it, at their next meeting; 'that it was a phantastic project of some brain-sick traveller, who had made collections of some princes in Italy, and other foreign states, no way suitable to the government of this kingdom.'

And further said, that, besides that one time, there was never any conference, nor any passage by letter or otherwise, betwixt them concerning it, or with any other person, and denied that he either contrived the Proposition, or knew of the contriving thereof, or ever imagined that his majesty would innovate the ancient form of government, dispose of the estates of his subjects without their consents, make or repeal laws by proclamation without consent of parliament, plant garrisons in his principal cities and towns, or put in execution any part of the said discourse: and the reason why he did not present the discourse to his majesty, or some of the lords of the council, or some magistrate, was, because he did not conceive the same did in any sort concern the time of his majesty's government, but was contrived in some former time, as appeared manifestly, by the particulars therein contained; and that about 16 or 17 years ago, sir David Fowles shewed him the project, to whom he replied, 'That he was satisfied no use could be made thereof, and so he redelivered it, and concluded that the divulging thereof was in his opinion pardoned by the general pardon granted upon his now majesty's coronation.'

The rest of the Defendants denied any their contrivance thereof, alledging the author, as they were informed, was living beyond sea, and that they ought not to be questioned for it, being writ in the time of king James, and not in reference to his now majesty's government, denying that they had the least thought or intention to scandalize the government; for that they rejected the discourse as soon as they read it, as a foolish and impertinent issue of some-projecting brain; and they averred their detestation of such a project, and that they bore loyal hearts to his majesty, and blessed God for the happy and peaceable government under him.

After the publication of the Cause in order to a hearing, it appeared by the Depositions of sir David Fowles, that he received the said Writing from one Mr. Yates, in the time of king James, who brought it from sir Robert Dudley at Florence, together with a Letter, desiring him to deliver it to the earl of Somerset, that he might communicate it to king James, which was done accordingly, and that in his hearing the earl signified a dislike thereof; and that he received it back from the earl, being the original, and kept it by him till the lords of the council sent for it, and that he made no copy thereof.

It appeared also by the Depositions of other witnesses, that this Discourse, nine years ago, was bought by them in Little-Britain amongst other manuscripts.

So this Cause coming to hearing, a great presence of nobility being in court, the attorney-general opened the Charge. But before much proceeding, his majesty sent word unto the lord keeper Coventry, then in court, that the queen was brought to bed of a son, and a private message also was delivered to him from the king; whereupon the Lord-Keeper declared in court, that his most sacred majesty had taken this matter into his most serious consideration, and although the same was of so high a nature, as it was necessary to be brought in question, (being contrary to many laws and statutes, and the common law itself), yet his majesty balancing the same in the scales of justice and mercy, the Author of the Discourse being discovered to live beyond the seas, found these Defendants rather fitting to be objects of his mercy, than justice, they being some of them noblemen, and such as his majesty did and doth well esteem and like of, in his royal opinion: and that his majesty was the rather inclined to extend his goodness, in regard of the time; it having now pleased the great justice of heaven to bless his majesty and his kingdom with a royal issue of his body, a hopeful prince, the great joy and long expectation both of the king and kingdom.

Upon this declaration of the king's pleasure the Lord-Keeper made known, that the court by his majesty's special command was to proceed no further in the hearing of this cause; but ordered the Project, or Book, to be burnt, as seditious and scandalous, both to his majesty, the state, and government of this kingdom. And ordered the Proceedings to be taken off the file.

An Account of this Proposition is contained in a volume in the hand-writing of archbishop Sancroft among Tanner's MSS. in the Bodleian Library at Oxford. It begins with the Attorney-General's Information as follows:

"To the King's most excellent Ma'ty.

"Humbly complayning enformeth your most excellent ma'ty, sir Rob. Heath kt. your ma'ties Attorney-Gen'all, that whereas your sacred ma'tie ever since your happy access to the imperial crowne of this reialn hath gov'ned your people with soe much justice, and moderation, that all your good subjects do beare that rc'v'ence and love to your sacred person, as is justly due to so gracious a soveraigne; and your ma'ty, next to the service of Almighty God, and the maintenance of his true religion, hath preserved and maintained the ancient and fundamentall laws of this kingdom without innovation: Yet so it is, may it please your most excellent majesty, That some malicious persons who are as yet unknowne to your said Attorney, being ill affected to your ma'ty, and to your happy gov'nment, and intending to raise false scandalis, and seditious rumours against your ma'ty, and your gracious governem't, have of late wickedly and seditiously framed, contrived, and written, a false, seditious, and pestilent discourse in these words following."

Then follows the Proposition as printed above, ending with a formal request to the king, to call on the defendants for trial, signed by the Attorney-General. Then follows:

The ANSWER of Francis, Earle of Bedford, one of the Def'ts, to the Information exhibited against him, and others, by Sir R. Heath, kt. his Ma'ties Attorney-Gen'all.

The said Def't, saving, &c. with all duty and thankfulness, doth acknowledge y't his ma'ty hath with great justice and moderation governed his people, for which among the rest of his loving subjects, this def't hath alwaies had and ever shall have a speciall love and reverence of his sacred person, as due to so gracious a so'aigne. He doth also acknowledge his ma'ties gracious care to preserve and unmaintaine the ancient, and fundamentall lawes of this kingdome, without innovation; insomuch that the said def't nev'r had thought, that his most excellent majesty did intend to innovate his lawes in any thing: for his gov'ment hath been so moderate as this def't hath alwaies conceived it to be a speciall happiness to his people, neither did he, this def't, ever raise any rumours at all against his ma'ty, or his gov'ment. And concerning the discourse in the information mentioned, the said def't saith that he did not name, write, or contrive the same, nor doth know who did name, write, or contrive the same, but for declaration of the def't's knowledge and thoughts concerning the same, saith that he never did see or heare the said discourse until the month of July or August, in the 5th year of his ma'ty's happy reigne, about which time, a writing conteyning the said discourse was sent to this def't, he then being at his house in Whoborne in Bedfordshire; which was sent, as the def't was informed, from one Mr. Oliver St. John, of Lincoln's Inne, who then and formerly was of this def't's counsell in his law businesse, and within two or three weeks after, the s'd Mr. St. John repaired to this def't's house, and there this def't and the s'd Mr. St. John, had some speech and conference concerning the said discourse, upon which conference the s'd Mr. St. John did declare to this def't, that he had the said discourse from s'r Rob. Cotton, kt. and baronett, and that he was enformed and told, that it was written about the 12th year of the late k. James, of blessed memory, which this def't easily believed, for that he observed it could not be applied to his ma'ties time, y't now is, as well for that there is in the same discourse mention made of the king's son the prince, to be married for raising of present monies, as for some other passages therein, w'ch this def't doth still believe; neither did this def't think, or beleeve, or can be perswaded, that it was presented, or meant or intended to be presented to his gracious ma'ty, y't now is, for that he hath observed his ma'ties averness from such courses. And he this def't further s'ith that he this def't kept the same discourse by him, till the end of Sept'r or beginning of Oct'b'r in the said year, at w'ch time this def't repaired to his house in the parish of Chiswick in the county of Middlesex, in w'ch parish the earle of Som'sett, and other of the def'ts named in the same information both then and before dwelt, and after some time of this def't's being at Chiswick aforesaid, meeting with the said earle of Som'sett, and conferring of divers matters happening in such time, as the earle of Som'sett had been in grace and favour with his s'd late ma'tie, among other speeches, they had communication of severall ways then propounded both for preservation, as also for increase of his s'd late ma'ties revenues. W'ch said earle of Som'sett then related, that div'se waies had been offered unto him about those times, and among others he mentioned some like these waies y't are expressed in the said discourse, in the information specified. Whereupon this def't did aske of his l'd's'p, whether he had seen a discourse tending to such purpose, mentioning an army and gabels, and he answered, y't he had then a notion of some such matter, but did not then perfectly call the particulars thereof to mind, but if he might see it, he should then better remember it, and thereupon this def't did send, or deliv'd unto him the said copy, w'ch was sent unto this def't, w'ch when the s'd earle had read, he returned to this def't, and told him, that he remembered that in the time of the s'd late king, Heads, or Propositions of like effect, had been tendred unto his l'd'p. And this def't s'ith he nev'r did write, or cause any topic thereof to be written, nor did he communicate, shew, or publish the same otherwise than as aforesaid, saving to some of the l'ds of his majesties most ho'ble privy-councell by their command in this M'ch'mas terme. And the said def't saith, that the said discourse doth not concerne the present time of his ma'ty, or his gov'nem't; neither did he ev'r say, affirme, or believe, that there ev'r was any purpose to intaine it: neither did this def't disperse, or divulge the same, to the intent that the same, or any thing conteyned therein should be divulged, or dispersed, as if the same had been intrainted by his most excellent ma'ty, or by any other, or with purpose to put in executio', or to raise fears, or jealousies in any w'tsoever, or that his sacred ma'ty had any purpose to alter, or innovate any laws of this kingdom, or the ancient manner of the gov'nem't thereof, or to draw things to be disposed of at his will, or dispose of the states, revenues, or goods of his ma'ties subjects; or to make or repeale statutes by his ma'ties proclamation, or that he purposed to place, or maintaine garrisons or fortified places for any such end, as in the s'd information is declared, and he is fully assured, y't his ma'ty nev'r did, nor will give the least intertainment to any such design, and the said def't confesseth, y't he did not shew or deliv'r the said wrighting to any of his ma'ties most ho'ble privy-councell, or other magistrate otherwise than as afores'd, for what [qu. that] he did not, nor yet doth conceive, that it had any relation to his ma'ties gov'nem't, or that he ever had purpose, or disposition to give care to such projects, or devices, or that any would so believe. And as to all and every the misdeameano's and offences in the information laid to the charge of this def't, he is thereof not guilty in manner and forme, as by the said information is supposed. W'ch matters the said def't doth, and will aver and prove, as this ho'ble court shall award, and praieth to be dismissed without further attending, because of the said suit, &c. . . .

137. The Trial of MERVIN Lord AUDLEY, Earl of CASTLEHAVEN, for a Rape and Sodomy: 7 CHARLES I. A. D. 1631. [2 Rushw. Coll. 99. Hutt. Rep. 115.]

THERE were three Indictments found at Salisbury in Wiltshire against the earl, the Wednesday preceding Easter, before the Lord Chief Justice Hyde, the L. C. J. Richardson, and baron Denham, Justices of Assize for that circuit, and special commissioners in that matter. One Indictment was for a Rape upon his own wife; for holding her by force, while one of his minions forcibly, against her will, had carnal knowledge of her: so that he was indicted as Præsumptus, Auxilians and *Confortians; and therefore a principal. The other two Indictments were for Buggery with a man.

* Britton, c. 9. says, that sodomites, sorcerers, and some other offenders, were to be burned. The Mirrour says they were to be buried alive; in conformity with which, Ld. Co. 3 Inst. c. 10, quotes Fleta b. 1. c. 35, where I cannot find any such matter: however, it seems likely that afterwards they had ceased to be punished capitally; which occasioned the statute of 25 Hen. 8. c. 6, passed in the year 1534, which was about six years after H. 8, had begun upon the suppression of Monasteries, [See 14 Rymer's Fœd. 258] and about the time when the general suppression of them seems to have been resolved on. About a year afterwards (1536) the lesser monasteries were suppressed. And in four years more (1540) the work was completed by the final dissolution of all manner of abbeys, priories, monasteries, &c. and the transfer of their revenues and estates to the crown, by st. 31 H. 8, c. 13. See 1 Cobbett's Parl. Hist. 526, 537, 1 Rapin 782, 807—821. fol. ed. and Burnet's Hist. of the Reformation. The st. 25 H. 8, c. 6, was repealed by the general st. 1 E. 6, c. 12, and by 2 E. 6, c. 29, the crime was made felony without benefit of clergy, but without forfeiture of lands or goods, or corruption of blood, which st. of 2 E. 6, c. 29, was repealed by st. 1 Mar. c. 1, so both acts stood repealed until the statute 5 Eliz. c. 17, by which the whole act 25 H. 8, c. 6, is revived and re-enacted. Mr. Barrington in the first edition of his "Observations on the Statutes," p. 31, "Assisa panis et cerevisiæ," made a remarkable mistake in quoting by memory a passage from Tacitus. He seems to have thought it likely that the custom of pelting criminals in the pillory was derived from the ancient Germans, "Infames," says he, "luto ac cœno aspergunt." The passage which he had in his mind is doubtless the following in Tacitus de Mor. Germ. s. 12. "Distinctio pœnarum ex delicto. Proditores et transfugas arboribus suspendunt: ignavos et imbelles et corpore infames cœno ac palude, injectâ in super crate, mergunt. Diversitas supplicii illuc respicit; tanquàm scelera ostendi oporteat dum puniuntur, flagitia abscondi." The passage in

The Judges, on Friday morning before the trial, being sent for, all but Denham being met at Serjeants-Inn in Fleet-street, these Questions were proposed them by sir Robert Heath, the king's Attorney General; a Memorial of which a learned judge, sir James Whitlock, one of the eight hereafter mentioned, set down in writing; to the effect following.

1. Whether a peer of the realm might waive his Trial by peers, and plead he will be tried by God and the country? Ans. He might not: for his Trial by peers was no privilege, but the law declared by Magna Charta: which if he would not plead to by a trial of his peers, it was standing mute.

2. Whether a peer might challenge his peers, as in the case of common Jurats? Ans. He might not, (which I think is so, said that Judge) because they were not upon their oath, but upon their honour, and a challenge is tried whether he stands indifferent, as unsworn.

3. Whether a peer might not have counsel any more than a commoner? Ans. If matter of law appeared, he might; not for matter of fact.—Certain Examinations having been taken by the lords without an oath: It was resolved, Those could not be used until they were repeated upon oath, unless of the party to be tried; which might be read without an oath.

4. Whether the Wife in this case might be a witness against her husband for the rape? Ans. She might: for she was the party wronged; otherwise she might be abused*. In like manner a villain (vassal) might be a witness against his lord in such cases.

5. Whether, if he stood mute, he could demand his clergy? Ans. If he stood † mute in the case of Rape or Buggery, he might have his clergy † in either.

the Mirrour, c. 4, s. 14, p. 252, is "Le mortal peché de majesté vers le roy celestre de sodomy soy fornist per enlover les pecheurs tous vifs profond en terre; issint que memoire soit restrainé pour la grande abomination del fait." The words in Britton are, "Soit enquis de ceux que felonissent en temps de pees eient autre blees ou autre mesons ars. Et ceux que serrount de ceo atteyntes soient ars, issint que eux soient punys par mesme cele chose dont ils pecherent; et mesme cel jugement eient sorciers et sorceresses et sodomites et mescreants appartenent atteyntes." Britton fo. xvi.

† See the Note to Weston's Trial, vol. 2. p. 914. See also Barrington's Obs. on St. West. 1st. c. 12.

‡ The statute of 25 H. 8, c. 6, in case of Buggery, and of 18 Eliz. c. 7, in case of a Rape, take away Clergy only from such as are convicted by verdict, outlawry, or confession:

6. Then if he might not be put to a trial on the other Indictment, might not he be for a later Buggery, and be denied the clergy? Ans. On that he might by 18 Eliz. 7.

7. Whether, in case one stood mute, Evidence might be opened by the court's command concerning the fact, though the delinquent was to be pressed to death for his contempt? Ans. That was a matter which lay in the discretion of the court.

8. Whether in cases wherein clergy was allowable, the party might pray it before he answered, and deny to answer otherwise? Ans. This was a confession.

9. Whether in a Rape there must be penetration? The Answer was in the affirmative.

10. The prisoner having petitioned to be bailed, whether it might not be granted? Ans. The king, as king, was to advise about it: The Judges acquainted the Lord Keeper he could not in justice require it; yet he might be bailed ex gratia, which was not fit in that odious case.

At a second meeting of the Judges in Serjeants Inn, there were other things considered of concerning this matter. They made a difference between Buggery and a Rape, in point of having the clergy if he stood mute: for it was argued he might have his clergy if he stood mute in a Rape, but not in Buggery; because by the statute 25 H. 8, Buggery was made felony, which by the common law was not. And in the very creation of the offence, clergy was taken away; whereas clergy lay for a rape until it was (should be) taken away by statute.

It was concluded the Lords might eat and drink before they were agreed, but that they could not separate nor adjourn till they gave their Verdict: That this appeared out of the lord Dacres of Greystock's Case*, who was tried for Treason, and acquitted by his peers in 26 Hen. 8. It was agreed by the Justices in that case of the lord Dacres, That verdict could not be given by a lesser number of lords than 12; and that if 12 were for the king, and 13 for the prisoner, the prisoner should be acquitted: That in an Appeal, if the Defendant should be mute, he should be hanged; and it was an Attainder, it being not within the statute of Westminster, cap. 12. De Peine fort et Dure.† No more was Treason.‡

It was also agreed, That a lord of parliament was within the statute of Westminster 1, in case of Felony, and should be pressed to death.

Farther, That if the lord Audley should have his clergy upon his being mute, yet he might be tried upon the other Indictments of Rape and Buggery, and should not have his clergy, by the statute of 18 Eliz. because the admitting him to his clergy would be a supersede as to all indictments of offences within clergy, not of those without, by that statute: For by the common law, he that was admitted to his clergy was discharged from answering any other offence; for by indictment of that law he was taken out of the power of the secular judge, and put into the hands of the ordinary, whose prisoner he was all his life after.

It was resolved, from the lord Dacres's Case, That the Lord Steward, after Verdict given, might take time to advise upon it, for any point of law; that his office continued to him till his Judgment and Resolution; and it was but a commission pro hac vice notwithstanding.

THE ARRAIGNMENT.

The lord Coventry, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of England, was appointed Lord High Steward for that day; who, having orders for the said Trial from his majesty, gave directions for the same.

The lords the peers took their places about 8 of the clock in the morning, and were seated on benches on each side of a large table, covered with green cloth; and below them were the Judges placed, and the king's learned counsel, and the officers of the court. And having disposed of themselves in their several places, the Lord Steward about 9 of the clock entered the hall uncovered, with seven maces carried before him by seven Serjeants at Arms, and was attended upon by sir John Burroughs, garter principal king at arms, and Mr. James Maxwell, usher of the black rod.

After the Lord Steward had saluted all the lords the peers, (who saluted him again) he presently ascended the state; and being seated in the chair, he was presented with his majesty's Commission by one of the masters of the Chancery, which bore date the 13th of April, 1631.

After he had received the said Commission, he commanded an O Yes to be made, by one of the Serjeants at Arms, for a general silence; and then delivered the said Commission to sir Thomas Fenshaw, Clerk of the Crown, to be openly read. Which being done, Mr. Maxwell kneeled down and presented his lordship with a white staff verge of state, which he gave to one of the Serjeants at Arms, who held the same up by the cloth of state on the right hand thereof. And after the Commission was read, and the staff received as aforesaid, his grace commanded a solemn O Yes to be made; and then gave leave to all the lords, the peers, and the judges, and to all privy counsellors there present, to be covered; and command was given, that none under that degree should keep on their hats upon pain of imprisonment. And then the peers were severally called by their names, and each of them answered particularly, viz. 1. Lord Weston, Lord High Treasurer of England; 2. Earl of Manchester, Lord Privy Seal; 3. Earl of Arundel and Surrey, Earl Marshal; 4. Earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, Lord Chamberlain; 5. Earl of Kent; 6. Earl of Worcester; 7. Earl of Bedford; 8. Earl of Essex; 9. Earl of Dorset; 10. Earl of Salisbury; 11. Earl of Leicester; 12. Earl of Warwick; 13. Earl of Carlisle; 14. Earl of Holland; 15. Earl of Berks; 16. Earl of Denbigh; 17. Viscount Wimbleton; 18. Visc. Conway; 19. Visc. Dorchester; 20. Visc. Wentworth; 21. Lord Percy; 22. Lord Strange; 23. Lord Clifford; 24. Lord Petre; 25. Lord North; 26. Lord Goring; 27. Lord Howard.

The Judges present: sir Nicholas Hyde, L. C. J. of the King's-Bench; sir Thomas Richardson, L. C. J. of the Common-Pleas; sir Humphrey Davenport, L. C. B. of the Exchequer; Baron Denham; Judge Jones; Judge Hutton; Judge Whitlocke; Judge Croke.

The King's Counsel: sir Robert Heath, Attorney-General; sir Richard Shelton, Solicitor-General; sir John Finch, queen's Attorney-General; sir Thomas Crew, king's Serjeant at Law.

Officers of the Court: sir Thomas Fenshaw, Clerk of the Crown; Mr. John Keeling, his Deputy or Assistant.

This done, the Lord Steward, after a solemn recognizance, commanded the Indictments to be certified and brought in; and then, by a serjeant at arms, the lieutenant of the Tower was called to bring forth the Prisoner, (who until that time was kept in a little room by the Common-Pleas) and the lieutenant brought him to the bar, with divers of the guard attending on him, where he had a place in manner of a pew, lined with green, in which he stood; and the lieutenant had another of the same form for him to rest in, adjoining to it. And when he had done his obeisance to the Lord-High Steward and the peers, (who all re-saluted him again) the Lord-High-Steward spake to him in the manner following:

The Lord-High-Steward's Speech.

My lord Audley; the king hath understood, both by report and the verdict of divers gentlemen of quality in your own country, that you stand impeached of sundry crimes of a most high and heinous nature; and to try whether they be true or not, and that justice may be done accordingly, his majesty brings you this day to your Trial, doing herein like the mighty King of Kings, in the 18th of Genesis, ver. 20, 21, who went down to see whether their sins were so grievous as the cry of them: 'Because the cry of Sodom and Gomorrah is great, and their sins be grievous, I will go down (saith the Lord) and see whether they have done altogether according to the cry of it.' And kings on earth can have no better pattern to follow than the King of Heaven; and therefore our sovereign lord the king, God's vicegerent here on earth, hath commanded that you shall be here tried this day, and to that end, hath caused these peers to be assembled: and the desire of his maj. is, that your trial shall be as equal as equity and justice itself; and therefore these noble men your peers (whose hearts are as full of integrity, justice, and truth, as their veins full of noble blood) are this day to try you. Wherefore, if you be innocent, speak boldly and confidently, and fear not to justify yourself; and be assured that those that accuse you (if you be free yourself) shall not escape free. But if you be guilty of those crimes, I advise you to give honour to God and the king, and confess your fault; for it is not vain confidence, nor subtilty, nor standing out in denial, that can hide the truth; and all shifts and subtilties against it are but 'Concilia adversus Dominum.' Therefore, if truth touch you at the heart, and your conscience, which is a thousand witnesses, and God's grace, which is greater than both, stand not out against it: And if you do, God will put it into the hearts of these noble persons to find it out, and to do that which is just.

The Lord Audley's Answer.

May it please your grace; I have been close prisoner these six months, without friends, without counsel or advice: I am ignorant of the advantages and disadvantages of the law, and am but weak of speech at the best, and therefore I desire to have the liberty of having Counsel to speak for me.

The Lord-High-Steward's Reply.

For your so long imprisonment, it hath been to you a special favour; for you have had time enough to bethink yourself, and more than ever any man had that hath been committed for such an offence, and more favour than ever any had that came to this bar; and you shall demand nothing, which the law can allow, but you shall have it. But for your demand, I must move it to the lords the Judges, and they shall satisfy you in it, or any other thing you desire.

Then his grace desired to be resolved of the Judges, Whether this demand of my lord Audley, to have Counsel to plead for him, might be granted or not?

The Judges answered, That, in criminal cases, counsel is not to be admitted for matter of fact; but for matter of law they may.

Then the Lord Steward proceeded to the Charge, commanded the three Indictments to be read by sir Thomas Fenshaw, Clerk of the Crown; two for Sodomy with Lawrence Fitz-Patrick, his footman; the third for a Rape committed on his own wife, the countess of Castlehaven: viz.

The THREE INDICTMENTS.

The following are Copies of the said Indictments: viz.

Then being asked, whether he was Guilty of them, or Not Guilty? He answered, Not Guilty. Then he was asked how he would be tried? The earl said, By God and my Peers. Whereupon the peers put off their hats; and thereupon the issue was joined.

The Lord High Steward’s Speech to the Lords.

My Lords; The prisoner stands indicted for a Rape by one Indictment, and of Sodomy* by two; and he hath pleaded Not Guilty to them all: it is my duty to charge you with the Trial of it, and you are to judge of it. The offences wherewith he stands charged, are to be proved by Evidence; and the crimes that come this day before us, may in some breed detestation, and the person of his lordship in others may breed compassion; I desire your lordships to set these two aside, and let your reason sway your judgment, and let that rule your affections, and your hearts your heads; for neither of these ought to be put into the balance, for a grain on either side may sway the scale. You are to give attentive hearing, and then to weigh equally, that the scale may lean the right way. The Judges will assist you in the points of law, which if you doubt of you are to expound it to me, and I to them. And this you are to do without corporal oath; for the law conceiveth you of such integrity, that you will do that for justice, which others do upon their oaths; and therefore admits of no challenge: and God direct you to do as you ought.

Then Sir Tho. Crew gave the first Charge; and after him Mr. Attorney said as followeth:

My Lord Steward; May it please your grace, there are three Indictments against Mervin lord Audley; the first for a Rape, the other two for Sodomy. The person is honourable; the crimes of which he is indicted dishonourable; which if it fall out to be true, which is to be left to trial, I dare be bold to say, never poet invented, nor historian writ of any deed so foul. And although Suetonius hath curiously set out the vices of some of the emperors who had absolute power, which might make them fearless of all manner of punishment, and besides were heathens, and knew not God; yet none of these came near this lord's crimes. The one is a crime, that, I may speak it to the honour of our nation, is of such rarity, that we seldom or never knew of the like; but they are all of such a pestilential nature, that, if they be not punished, they will draw from Heaven a heavy judgment upon this kingdom.

Whereupon (Mr. Attorney digressing from the matter) the lord Audley would have interrupted him, and required to hold him to the points in the Indictments. But the Lord High Steward desired his lordship to be patient, and assured him he should be heard in fit time at full. Whereupon Mr. Attorney proceeded again in his Charge as followeth:

May it please your Grace; I can speak it with joy and comfort, during all my time of service, both in his majesty's father's time, and since he came to the crown, I had never the like occasion to speak in this place against a peer of the realm before now; and God knows I do it now with sorrow, and I hope I shall never have the like occasion to do so much again. But his majesty, who is the pattern of virtue, not only as king, but in his person also; in whom it is hard to judge whether he most excels in justice or mercy, but I rather think in mercy, would have my lord Audley the prisoner at the bar, heard with as much favour as such a crime can admit: and when he first heard of it, he gave strict command, that the truth should be searched out, that his throne and people might be cleared from so heavy and heinous sins; and thereupon he was indicted in his own country, according to the law, and by gentlemen of worth and quality. The Bill was found; and now he is personally brought to the bar to be tried by these his honourable peers, such of whose wisdom and sincerity there can be no question, but that he shall have just and honourable trial. And first, I shall begin with the Indictment of Rape. Bracton tells us of king Athelstane's Law before the Conquest: 'If the party were of no chaste life, but a whore, yet there may be a ravishment; but it is a good plea to say she was his concubine.'

In an Indictment of Rape, there is no time of prosecution necessary; for 'nullum tempus occurrit regi:' but in case of an Appeal of Rape, if the woman did not prosecute in convenient time, it will bar her. If a man take away a maid by force, and ravish her, and afterwards she give her consent and marry him, yet it is a Rape.

For the crimen sodomiticum, our law had no knowledge of it till the 25th of Henry 8, by which statute it was made Felony: and in this there is no more question, but only, whether it be crimen sodomiticum sine penetratione; and the law of 15 Eliz. sets it down in general words:

and where the law doth not distinguish, neither must we. And I know you will be cautious how you will give the least mitigation to so abominable a sin, which brought such plagues after it, as we may see in Gen. xvii. Levit. xviii. Judg. xix. Rom. i. But, my lord, it seemed to me strange at the first, how a nobleman of his quality should fall to such abominable sins; but when I found he hath given himself over to lust, and that 'Nemo repente fit pessimus,' and if once men habit themselves in ill, it is no marvel if they fall into any sins, and that he was constant to no religion, but in the morning he would be a Papist and go to mass, and in the afternoon a Protestant and go to a sermon. When I had considered these things, I easily conceived, and shall be bold to give your grace a reason why he became so ill. He believed not God, he had not the fear of God before his eyes; he left God, and God left him to his own wickedness: and what may not a man run into? What sin so foul, what thing so odious, which he dares not adventure? But I find in him things beyond all imagination: for I find his ill imagination and intentions bent to have ever his wife naught with the wickedest man that I heard of before: for who would not have his wife virtuous and good, how bad soever himself be? And I find him bawd to his own wife. If she loved him, she must love Skipwith, whom he honoured above all, and not any honest love, but in a dishonest love; and he gives his reason by Scripture, 'She was now made subject to 'him';' and therefore if she did ill at his command, it was not her fault but his, and he would answer it. His irregular bounty toward Skipwith was also remarkable. He lets this Skipwith, whom he calls his favourite, spend of his purse 500*l.* per annum; and if his wife or daughter would have any thing, though never so necessary, they must lie with Skipwith, and have it from him, and not otherwise; also telling Skipwith and his daughter-in-law, he had rather have a child by him than any other. But for these things, I had rather they should come of the Witnesses mouths than from me: and thereupon desired that the Proofs might be read.

The Deposition of WALTER BIGG.

Walter Bigg deposed, That Amptil was a page to sir H. Smith, and had no more means when he came to my lord Audley, but the mare he rode on. He entertained him as his page 8 years, and afterwards let him keep horses in my lord's grounds, by which I think he enriched himself 2,000*l.* but he never sat at table with my lord till he had married his daughter, and then he gave him to the value of 7,000*l.*—That Skipwith was sent from Ireland to be my lady's page; and that his father and mother were very poor folks there. He spent of my lord's purse per annum 500*l.* and he gave him at one time 1,000*l.* and hath made divers deeds of land unto him.—My lord was first a Protestant; but after, by buying of Founthill, he turned his religion.

Lord AUDLEY'S Examination.

That Henry Skipwith had no means when he came to him, and that he had given him 1,000*l.* and that Skipwith lay with him when he was straitened in rooms; and that he gave a farm of 700*l.* per annum to Amptil that married his daughter, and at other times to the value of 7,000*l.* and that there was one Blandina in his house 14 days, and bestowed an ill disease there, and therefore he sent her away.

The lord Audley's Examination taken before the Lord-Keeper, Lord-Treasurer, Lord-Marshal, and others; which being shewed to him, subscribed with his own hand, he would not acknowledge, but excused it, saying his eyes were bad; but being perfectly read, he acknowledged it.

My Lord-Steward's Advice to my lord Audley.

My lord; I would advise you not to deny the things which are clearly proved; for then the lords will give less credit to the rest you say.

The Countess of CASTLEHAVEN'S Examination.

That shortly after the earl married her, viz. the first or second night, Amptil came to the bed's side, while she and her husband were in bed, and the lord Audley spake lasciviously to her, and told her, 'That now her body was his; and that if she loved him she must love Amptil; and that if she lay with any other man with his consent, it was not her fault but his; and that if it was his will to have it so, she must obey, and do it.'—That he attempted to draw her to lie with his servant Skipwith; and that Skipwith made him believe he did it, but did it not.—That he would make Skipwith come naked into his chamber, and delighted in calling up his servants to shew their privities; and would make her look on, and commended those that had the largest.—That one night, being a-bed with her at Founthill, he called for his man Brodway, and commanded him to lie at his bed's feet; and about midnight (she being asleep) called him to light a pipe of tobacco. Brodway rose in his shirt, and my lord pulled him into bed to him and her, and made him lie next to her; and Brodway lay with her, and knew her carnally, whilst she made resistance, and the lord held both her hands and one of her legs the while: and that as soon as she was free, she would have killed herself with a knife, but that Brodway forcibly took the knife from her and broke it; and before that act of Brodway, she had never done it.—That he delighted to see the act done; and made Amptil to come into bed with them, and lie with her whilst he might see it: and she cried out to have saved herself.

Then Lawrence Fitz-Patrick was produced: but before his Examination was read, the earl desired that neither he, nor any other, might be allowed Witnesses against him, until he had taken the oath of allegiance. This was referred to the lords the Judges.

The Judges resolve against him, that they might be Witnesses, unless they were convicted recusants.

The Examination of FITZ-PATRICK was then read, the truth of which he then again confirmed upon Oath.

That the earl had committed Sodomy twice upon his person; that Henry Skipwith was the special favourite of my lord Audley, and that he usually lay with him: and that Skipwith said, that the lord Audley made him lie with his own lady; and that he saw Skipwith in his sight do it, my lord being present: and that he lay with Blandina in his sight, and four more of the servants, and afterwards the earl himself lay with her in their sights.

Then SKIPWITH was produced and sworn, and his Examination read, which he again confirmed upon oath, and deposeth, viz.

That the earl often solicited him to lie with the young lady, and persuaded her to love him; and to draw her thereunto, he urged that his son loved her not; and that in the end he usually lay with the young lady, and that there was love between them both before and after; and that my lord said, he would rather have a boy of his begetting than any other; and that she was but twelve years of age when he first lay with her; and that he could not enter her body without art; and that the lord Audley fetched oil to open her body, but she cried out, and he could not enter; and then the earl appointed oil the second time; and then Skipwith entered her body, and he knew her carnally; and that my lord made him lie with his own lady, but he knew her not, but told his lord he did.—That he spent 500*l.* per ann. of the lord's purse, and, for the most part, he lay with the said earl. That the earl gave him his house at Salisbury, and a manor of 600*l.*—That Blandina lay in the earl's house half a year, and was a common whore.

FITZ-PATRICK'S second Examination.

That the lord Audley made him lie with him at Founthill and at Salisbury, and once in the bed, and emitted between his thighs, but did not penetrate his body; and that he heard he did so with others.—That Skipwith lay with the young lady often, and ordinarily; and that the earl knew it, and encouraged him in it, and wished to have a boy by him and the young lady.—That Blandina lived half a year in my lord's house, and was a common whore.

EDMUND SCOT'S Examination.

He deposeth, That Skipwith frequently knew the young lady, and that the earl knew it, and encouraged him therein.

Fry's Examination.

That Henry Skipwith and the young lady lay often together, and the earl in company; and that theu the earl protested, that he would fain have a boy of his begetting.

Then was read the young lady AUDLEY's Examination.

That she was married to her husband by a Romish priest in the morning, and at night by a prebend at Kilkenny; that she was first tempted to lie with Skipwith by the earl's allurements; and that she had no means but what she had from Skipwith; but she would not lie with Pawlet; he solicited her also to lie with one Green.—That the Earl himself saw her and Skipwith lie together divers times; and nine servants of the house had also seen it.

When the Earl solicited her first, he said, that upon his knowledge her husband loved her not; and threatened, that he would turn her out of doors, if she did not lie with Skipwith; and that if she did not, he would tell her husband she did.—That she being very young, he used oil to enter her body first: and afterwards he usually lay with her, and it was with the earl's privity and consent.

BRODWAY's Examination, who confesseth,

That he lay at the Earl's bed's feet, and one night the earl called to him for tobacco; and as he brought it in his shirt, he caught hold of him, and bid him come to bed, which he refused; but to satisfy my lord, at last he consented, and came into the bed on my lord's side: then my lord turned him upon his wife, and bid him lie with her, which he did; and the earl held one of her legs and both her hands, and at the last (notwithstanding her resistance) lay with her.—Then the earl used his body as the body of a woman, but never pierced it, only emitted between his thighs.—He hath seen Skipwith lie with the young lady in bed together; and when he had got upon her, the earl stood by and encouraged him to get her with child: and that he hath made him the said Brodway kiss his own lady, and often solicited him to live with her, telling him, that he himself should not live long, and that it might be his making; and that he hath said the like to Skipwith.

The EARL's second Examination.

The Earl desired to be pardoned of those things whereof he must accuse himself, and said, 'That condemnation should not come out of his own mouth.'

These Testimonies being read, Mr. Attorney pressed things very earnestly, and in excellent method against the Earl, and said,

My lords; you have seen the clearness of the Proofs, and I know your wisdoms to be such, as you well know in so dark a business clearer proofs cannot possibly be had; for let a man be never so wicked, or never so impudent, he will not call Witnesses to see his wickedness: yet you see here this point fully proved.

Then he shewed how both the laws of God and man were against Sodomy, and cited Levit. 18, towards the end, 'That by these Abominations the land is defiled; and therefore the 'Lord doth visit this land for the iniquity thereof.' And then concludes; That God may remove and take away from us his plagues, let this wicked man (saith he) be taken away from amongst us.

Then the Earl (after the Lord Steward had told him he should be heard in his own Defence, with as much patience as was admitted in his Charge) entered into his own Defence. But the Lord Steward advised him to speak pertinently; whereupon he alledged, that he was a weak man, and of ill memory, and therefore desired that he might not be interrupted.

1. Then he began his defence with exceptions against his wife, urging, that she was naught and dishonest with Brodway, by her own confession.

Whereupon my Lord Steward answered, That this made against his lordship; therefore he ought not to alledge for his Defence that fact, as an imputation to his wife, which he forced her unto by compulsion and violence.

2. Then he objected against the Incompetency of the Witnesses, as the one his wife, the other his servants; and they drawn to this by his son's practice, who sought his life: and desired to know, if there were not a statute against the Incompetency of Witnesses?

The Judges resolved him, that there was none touching Witnesses; but in cases of High-Treason, there was a statute concerning Accusers.

3. Then he desired to be resolved, whether, because Brodway doth not depose any Penetration, but only that he emitted upon her belly while the earl held her, that should be judged Felony as for a Rape?

The Judges resolved it to be a Rape, and so consequently to be Felony.

4. Then he desired to be resolved, whether his wife is to be allowed a competent Witness against him, or not?

The Judges resolve, That in civil cases the Wife may not; but in a criminal cause of this nature, where the wife is the party grieved, and on whom the crime is committed, she is to be admitted a witness against her husband.

Then the Lord High-Steward desired the lords the Judges to resolve the questions which Mr. Attorney in his Charge submitted and referred to their judgments.

1. Whether it were to be accounted Buggery within the statute, without penetration? The Judges resolve, that it was; and that the use of the body, so far as to emit thereupon, makes it so.

2. Whether, it being proved that the party ravished were of evil fame, and of an unchaste life, it will amount to a Rape? The Judges resolve it to be a Rape, though committed on the body of a common strumpet; for it is the enforcing against the will which makes the Rape; and a common whore may be ravished against her will, and it is Felony to do it.

3. Whether it is adjudged a Rape, when the woman complaineth not presently? And, whether there be a necessity of accusation within a convenient time, as within 24 hours? The Judges resolve, That inasmuch as she was forced against her will, and then shewed her dislike, she was not limited to any time for her complaint; and that in an Indictment, there is no limitation of time, but in an Appeal there is.

4. Whether men of no worth shall be allowed sufficient Proofs against a Baron, or not? The Judges resolve, that any man is a sufficient witness in case of Felony.

Then the Lord Steward spake, and said; My lord, you have been graciously dealt with in this proceeding, for it is not an usual thing in so capital and heinous causes as this, to bring the party and witnesses face to face before trial: but, my lord, you have long before this time heard their Examinations, and questioned and opposed them face to face; and are thereby the better enabled to make your Defence; and his majesty is still graciously pleased to continue his goodness towards you, and hath commanded that you should be heard at full: if therefore you have any thing else to say for yourself, speak it.

Whereupon the Earl answered, (having first made a solemn Protestation of his Innocency, but nevertheless implored the mercy of God and the king) That he had nothing more to say, but left himself to God and his peers, and presented to their consideration three Woes:

1. Woe to that man, whose Wife should be a Witness against him!
2. Woe to that man, whose Son should persecute him, and conspire his death!
3. Woe to that man, whose Servants should be allowed Witnesses to take away his life!

And he willed the lords to take this into their consideration; for it might be some of their cases, or the case of any gentleman of worth, that keeps a footman or other, whose wife is weary of her husband, or his son arrived to full age, that would draw his servants to conspire his father's death.

He said further, his wife had been naught in his absence, and had had a child, which he concealed to save her honour.

That his son was now become 21 years old, and he himself old and decayed; and the one would have his lands, and the other a young husband: and therefore, by the testimony of them and their servants added to their own, they had plotted and conspired his destruction and death.

And then (being thereunto required by the Lord Steward) he withdrew himself from the bar.

Then the Lord Steward (after solemn proclamation of silence) addressed himself to the lords, and said: My lords the peers, your lordships have heard the Proofs, the Prisoner's Defence, all his Doubts and Questions resolved by the lords the Judges; and therefore your lordships, if you please, may withdraw yourselves, if you are satisfied; because the Prisoner is not to be called to the bar again, until your lordships are agreed upon the Verdict.

Then the peers withdrew themselves; and after two hours debate, and several advices and conferences with the Lord Chief Justice, whom they sent for, and consulted with four several times; having in that time also sent the earl of Warwick, and viscount of Dorchester, together with the Lord Chief Justice, to consult with the Lord Steward, at the last they returned to their places: and then the Lord Steward asked them one by one, beginning at the lowest, and so ascending;

1. Whether the said earl of Castlehaven was Guilty of the Rape whereof he stood indicted, or not? And they all gave him Guilty.

2. Whether the said earl of Castlehaven was Guilty of the Sodomy with which he was charged, or not? And fifteen of the lords condemned him, and the other twelve freed him.

THE SENTENCE.

When the Verdict was thus given, the lieutenant of the Tower was again commanded to bring the prisoner to the bar, to hear his Sentence; and after he was brought in, the Lord Steward said unto him:

Forasmuch as thou Mervin lord Audley, earl of Castlehaven, hast been indicted for divers Felonies, by three several Indictments; one for a Rape, the other two for Sodomy; and hast pleaded Not Guilty to them all, and for thy Trial (thou hast put thyself upon God and thy peers; which trial thou hast had, and they found thee Guilty of them all: What canst thou say for thyself, why the Sentence of Death should not be pronounced against thee?)

Whereupon he answered, He could say no more, but referred himself to God and the king's mercy.

Then the Lord Steward said, My heart grieveth for that which my tongue must utter; but justice is the way to cut off wickedness, and therefore hear thy Sentence.

Thou must go from hence to the prison from whence thou camest, and from thence to the place of execution, there to be hanged by the neck till thou be dead, and the Lord have mercy on thy soul.

The Lord Steward's Exhortation.

Oh think upon your offences! which are so heinous and so horrible, that a Christian man ought scarce to name them, and such as the depraved nature of man (which of itself carries a man to all sin) abhorreth! And you have not only offended against nature, but the rage of a man's jealousy! And, although you die not for that, that you have abused your own daughter! And having both honour and fortune to leave behind you, you would have had the impious and spurious offspring of a harlot to inherit! Both these are horrid crimes. But my lord, it grieves me to see you stand out against the truth so apparent; and therefore I will conclude with this admonition, That God might have taken you away when you were blinded in your sins, and therefore hope he hath reserved you as a subject of his mercy: and as he sends you to see this day of shame, that you may return unto him, so thereby in a manner he lovingly draws you to him: therefore spend the remainder of your time in tears and repentance: and this day's work, I hope, will be a correction from many crimes and corruptions.

Whereupon, at last, the Earl descended to a low Petition to the lords, and very humbly besought them to intercede with his majesty, that he might not suddenly cut him off, but give him time of repentance. And then he desired their lordships pardons, in that he had been so great a stain to honour and nobility.

Then a Proclamation being made by a serjeant, declaring, That the lord High-Steward's pleasure was, that all such as had attended this day's service might depart; the lieutenant of the Tower carried the earl away, and the court broke up.

THE EXECUTION.

In pursuance of the Sentence, a warrant was issued for his Execution upon Saturday the 14th of May following; notice whereof was given him, and his coffin carried into the Tower about a week before, that he might the better prepare himself for death: The dean of Paul's, doctor Winerfe, failed not daily to visit him, and to see how he stood, and to settle him in his religion.

Being brought to the scaffold, attended by the dean of Paul's and Dr. Wickham, together with his servants, he saluted the noble personages, and whole assembly, shewing to them all a very noble, manly and cheerful countenance, such as seemed no ways daunted with the fear of death. After a short while shewing himself to the people, he addressed himself to prayer, the deans accompanying him in that exercise, but somewhat apart; which being not long, he stood upon his legs, and leaned upon the two deans, conferring with them. Then he turned to the Lords, and spake to this effect:

"I acknowledge with thankfulness the great goodness of Almighty God, that it hath pleased his divine majesty to bestow on me many endowments, as honour, riches, and the like, which I have mis-spent; having been a vicious liver, and justly deserved death, for as much, and in that the least sin at God's hands justly deserveth death, and no less; but for the two heinous crimes with which I am branded, condemned, and here to suffer for, I do here deny them upon my death, freely forgiving those that have accused me, and have been the occasion of my death, even as freely as I myself do desire forgiveness at God's hands, which I hope to obtain through his infinite goodness and mercy; and somewhat the rather, by your Christian prayers, which I expect, and humbly beg of your lordships and this whole assembly. Now for as much as there hath been speech and rumour of my unsettledness in my Religion, I have, for explanation thereof, not only made Confession of my Faith to these two worthy doctors, but for better satisfaction to the world in that point, express the same in writing under my hand signed; which as it is here set down, I desire may be publicly read."

The Confession of his Faith then was read by a young gentleman, with a loud voice, wherein he professes he dies in the faith of the church of England.

After which he proceeded: "I acknowledge the great justice and mercy of the king's majesty; his justice in bringing me to the bar; and his mercy in affording me such a noble and gracious Trial there: and I give his majesty humble and hearty thanks for assigning my death to be in this manner, contrary to the Sentence pronounced against me at my arraignment. But there is a greater favour than this, for which I am to render thanks unto his sacred majesty, and that is, the long time I have had to repent in; whereof (praised be Almighty God) I can speak with comfort, I have made good use, and am now fully prepared for death, and much the better, by the good help and instruction of these two worthy men, to whom I acknowledge myself bounden, and do here, before you all, give them hearty thanks for their great pains taken in coming to me, praying for me, and preaching and reading to me.—And I desire your lordships to present my humble acknowledgment to his majesty, for his goodness in sending them to me, and my thanks for the same.—I do also from my heart desire and beseech Almighty God to bless the king's majesty, the queen, and the young prince, together with all such other issue as he shall hereafter in mercy bestow on them, and the whole state; and my trust and desire is, there may be ever one of their line to sway the scepter of these kingdoms to the world's end.—And I beseech, and do heartily pray for the welfare and happy prosperity of the king and queen of Bohemia, with all their princely issue. I do again desire your lordships to make tender of my humble acknowledgement of his mercy and goodness.—And now lastly, That you will not bend your eyes so much upon me, as your hands and hearts to heaven in prayers for me; and so I take my last farewell of your lordships and the world."

Then he went again to his private prayers; which being done, he prepared himself for death, striving to shew the like courage and magnanimity which he had formerly done, unto the last: but sight of the headsman (whom yet he freely forgave, and took him by the hand, bidding him do his office manfully) together with the apprehension of his near approaching end, made him somewhat to change colour, and shew some signs of trembling passion; for his hands shook a little in undoing his hand-strings; which his man perceiving, stept to him and helpt him, as also off with his doublet. Then taking leave again of the lords, the doctors, and his man, saying a very short prayer by himself, he pulled down his handkerchief over his face, and laid his head upon the block; which was taken off at one blow.

138. The Trial of LAWRENCE FITZ-PATRICK and GILES BROADWAY, two Servants of the before-mentioned Lord AUDLEY, Earl of Castlehaven, at the King's-Bench, for a Rape and Sodomy: 7 CHARLES I. A. D. 1631. [2 Rushw. Coll. 102.]

ON Monday the 27th of June 1631, the marshal of the King's-Bench brought Fitz-Patrick and Brodway to the bar, where was a jury of sufficient and able Wiltshire men, impannelled to go upon and try them.

The countess of Castlehaven herself was in court, to give Evidence against Brodway; and she came in upon the instant, when the Lord Chief Justice (sir Nicholas Hyde) demanded of her, Whether the Evidence she had formerly given at her lord's Arraignment was true, and the full matter of Charge she had then to deliver against the Prisoner? Whereupon she answered, It was.—My lord said: Madam, you have sworn that Brodway, prisoner at the bar, hath lain with you by force, which may be, and yet no act committed: Did he enter your body? She said, That in her former oath taken, when she testified he lay with her by force, her meaning was, that he had known her carnally, and that he did enter her body*.

Then was she wished to look on the Prisoner: unto which motion and commandment she made a short reply: That although she could not look on him, but with a kind of indignation, and with shame, in regard of that which had been offered unto her, and she suffered by him, yet she had so much charity in her, and such respect to God and his truth, that she had delivered nothing for malice: and therefore hoped that her oath and evidence thereupon should be credited: and so desired to be believed and dismissed. Which being granted, she departed with as much privacy as might be into her coach.

Fitz-Patrick being asked concerning his guiltiness or innocency, demanded, who were his accusers? The Lord Chief Justice answered, * Emission is necessary to constitute a rape. So ruled by eight judges, though indeed it does not seem perfectly clear what was lord Mansfield's opinion, cont. lord Loughborough C. J. of C. B. Buller J. of B. R. and Heath J. of C. B. (Perryn B. absent) in the case of Hill tried at Lincoln assizes in 1781. See East's Crown Law tit. Rape, where an account is given of previous opinions on this point. In practice, direct proof of emission is not required. It may be inferred from circumstances. Note, It seems that Mr. East was not aware that the earl of Castlehaven and lord Audley was the same person. The earldom of Castlehaven was an Irish peerage, which in 1777 became extinct on the death of the last Earl, for want of male descendants, claiming through males only from the first earl. The English honour of Audley, being a barony in fee, is inheritable by females, and still subsists.

You have accused yourself sufficiently. Fitz-Patrick replied, That he thought neither the law of the kingdom required, nor was he bound to be the destruction of himself: what Evidence he had formerly given, was for the king against the earl, and no further.

The Lord Chief Justice replied, It was true, the law did not oblige any man to be his own accuser; yet where his testimony served to take away any one's life, and made himself guilty of the same crime, therein it should serve to cut him off also.

Then the Jury demanded of the Court satisfaction concerning the words of the Statute, which run, 'To charge him alone to be, and accounted a felon in law, that committed a Buggery with man or beast.' (Of which fact the late earl was found guilty, and had suffered.)

The Lord Chief Justice replied, That forasmuch as every accessory to a felon is a felon in law; so he being a voluntary prostitute, when he was not only of understanding and years to know the heinousness of the sin, but also of strength to have withstood his lord, he therefore was so far forth guilty.

Whereupon the Jury found the bill, and the Sentence of Death was passed on them both; and they were delivered and committed to the sheriff of Middlesex, who, after he had suffered them to have some repast at Mr. Hill's in the Palace Yard, and conference with their friends, carried them to Newgate, where they behaved themselves civilly and religiously.

As soon as they were found guilty, the Judges of the Court wrote this Letter to the Lord Keeper to prepare him for the king.

"Right Honourable; May it please your lordship to be informed, That this day Giles Brodway and Lawrence Fitz-Patrick were tried before us in the King's-Bench, for the several offences of Rape and Buggery, of which they were indicted, and they have received Judgment of Death: but we forbear awarding Execution, upon a message sent from your lordship by sir Thomas Fenshaw, of his majesty's pleasure for the stay of Execution, until further direction from his majesty: but conceiving there is great cause to put the malefactors to execution, we thought it our duty to acquaint your lordship with the passages of the Trial, that his majesty by your lordship's means being made acquainted therewith, may signify his further pleasure.—Brodway, who was arraigned for the Rape, very impudently denied his own Confession, taken before the lords the peers in the Trial of my lord Audley: he pretended he was amazed, and knew not what he subscribed; and professed himself guiltless, with great execrations. He would not be satisfied, unless the lady was produced face to face, which she was; who by her oath, visa voce, satisfied the auditors, both concerning the truth of the fact and his own impudence.—Fitz-Patrick, who was arraigned for the Buggery, confessed his Examination to be true; but like one very ignorant, or rather senseless, would have them true against the lord Audley, and not against himself, which was impossible: he pretended he was promised security from danger, if he would testify against the lord Audley; and so sought to raise a suspicion, as if he had been wrought upon, to be a witness to bring the lord Audley to his end. They were both found guilty, to the full satisfaction of all that were present; and we for our parts thought it to stand with the honour of common justice, that seeing their testimony had been taken to bring a peer of the realm to his death, for an offence as much theirs as his, that they should as well suffer for it as he did, lest any jealousy should arise about the truth of the fact, and the justness of the proceedings. But upon receipt of your lordship's Message, we have stopped the Execution till his majesty's further pleasure be known; to which we shall humbly submit ourselves, and rest at your lordship's command, N. Hyde, W. Jones, J. Whitlock, G. Croke."

The king by this means being truly informed how things stood, signified his pleasure, that they should be executed, but to have a week's time for repentance.

On Wednesday, the 6th of July 1631, they were wedged to Tyburn; where, when the executioner had tied the halter about Fitz-Patrick's neck, he said:

"Forasmuch as I am here, and, as it were, upon the instant to suffer death, I desire all loving subjects and members of the church of Rome to pray for me." Then he proceeded to pray to our Saviour, his Mother, and the Saints; in which he was interrupted by some gentlemen, who told him, that the beginning of his prayer was good, for that he offered it to Christ Jesus, in whom only salvation is to be found; as for the Virgin Mary, and the Saints, they could do him no good. But notwithstanding he persisted, saying, "O yes, the blessed Virgin never forsook or failed any that trusted in, or called upon her; and therefore he would depend upon her and the rest of the Saints; and so proceeded to an exhortation to Mr. Brodway, to cleave to the same opinion, and die in the Romish faith; for which to have him do, he said, if he had it, he would give the whole world." Unto which motion Brodway gave no answer, or seemed not to regard it. "Then he proceeded to shew how he had been examined by my Lord Chief Justice touching the corruptness of my lord of Castlehaven's life, wherein he said he confessed nothing to prejudice the said earl.

"That being within three days after sent for before the lords of the council, my lord Dorset had entrapped and enanared him to his destruction; for saying upon his honour, and speaking it in the plural number (as the mouth of the whole board) that whatsoever he delivered should no ways prejudice himself, he thereby got him to declare the earl guilty of the sin of Buggery; wherein himself being a party, was the only cause he came now to suffer death: for which his lordship's skill and policy in sifting him, together with a dispensation of his promise and oath, he freely forgave him; saying farther, the said lord had done him no wrong, because he therein was but an instrument to send him out of this world into a better. Then he demanded of the company, if the earl denied the sin at his death; and wished my lord had not (if he did) for it was too true; his lordship had both bugged him, and he his lordship. That it was true (for some private discontentment) he bore a little malice to the earl and Skipwith, for which he asked God forgiveness. That for Brodway, if he had done any thing to the countess, he did it not out of his own ill corrupt nature, but was provoked and persuaded to it by the earl.

"He cleared the young lord, as never being any occasion or means of his father's death, in hiring, or persuading him to give evidence, as he had done. He confessed he had lived an ill life, in that he had delighted in drinking, whoring, and all manner of uncleanness; but now, as he was heartily sorry, so he doubted not of mercy of Almighty God, to pardon and forgive him all his sins, through and for the merits and mediation-sake of Christ Jesus, the blessed Virgin, and the Saints in Heaven.

"That he had fallen or run into these sins, (and especially that which he came to die for) by reason he had neglected, and not so duly, as he should have done, repaired to his ghostly father, to make confession, and take instructions from him. That after he did make confession and his sins known to the priest, he was not only sorry for them, but also resolved never to come into my lord's house again; but it was through frailty, and because he was not furnished of another place."

So turning again to Brodway, and persuading him to embrace the Romish faith, wherein, as he perceived, his labour was in vain, so the sheriff and other persons of quality willed him to forbear, and shut up his discourse, unless he had any thing more to say to the purpose. Whereupon praying for the king, queen and state, he betook himself to private prayer, and therein for the most part continued to his death.

Brodway came, (and as it was thought by the company, a true penitent) and after fetching a deep sigh at the sight of the tree, he lifted up his eyes and hands towards Heaven, making and saying to himself two short prayers; so attending Fitz-Patrick's discourse, he sat in private meditation, often making it manifest he was in prayer most of the time, and also rejoicing at the assembly's well wishing of him, for which he returned smiles and thanks. His time being come to stand up and have the halter put about his neck, and so declare himself, he willingly suffered the one, and proceeded to the other. First asking Fitz-Patrick if he had done, he pulled a sheet of paper out of his pocket; which being writ broadways, he could not spread it to read, therefore desired to have his hands untied; which was done, and he read it distinctly, to the assembly; the effect whereof was, to declare himself guilty, in the sight of Almighty God, of death and damnation; for that he had broke all the commandments, in thought, word, and deed, and sinned in pride of life, lust of the eye, conceit of his own beauty, matchless strength, and other natural gifts, in desire of revenge, not pitying the poor, unlawful riches, not repairing to sermons, not observing the Sabbath, &c. For all which, and other his sins whatsoever, he both desired of, and trusted in God for pardon, and that through and for the only merits of our Saviour Christ Jesus, his bitter death and passion. He expressed a strong assurance, which his very soul had, of forgiveness, in that, through the assistance of the Holy Ghost, he had laid such hold on Christ as he had done. This paper-writing contained the confession and prayer; also (as I remember) something of his slender guiltiness and desert of death, but not so much. Then delivering his to the sheriff, he opened a little book, intitled, 'Learn to die,' and desired the company to join with him; so reading over three short prayers, the last whereof was composed only of confession, and for pardon, which prayer he pronounced with great comfort, at every Amen clapping himself on the breast; he closed it up, and gave it to his ghostly father, a minister and kinsman of his, who came along with him on horseback close by the cart. Then he pulled out a little paper, which contained a prayer of his own making; and when he had read it, and every one joined with him in the Amen, he commended it also to the sheriff; and then throwing away his posy of flowers, he roused himself and said to this effect:

"Gentlemen, though true it is, what I formerly have delivered touching my guiltiness and desert of death, my meaning was, and is, only in respect of my sins towards God, and no further for breach of the laws of the kingdom, than only lying once with the lady Castlehaven, through persuasion of the earl, who was then in bed with her: and using some small force for the purpose, I did emit, but not penetrate her body. I came not to my lord with a desire or intent any ways to serve him, but was rather inclined for the sea: only Mr. Skipwith had drawn me thither for society-sake: and not hearing from my friends concerning my intended voyage, and being more kindly respected by the earl than I looked for, I staid from week to week, and from month to month, contrary to my intention. Then my lord, making me his bed-fellow, did one day, when Skipwith was with him in the garden; (but walking somewhat apart) break out in speeches to me to this purpose: Broadway, thou art young, lusty, and well favoured, and therefore canst not but prevail with any woman thou attemptest: wherefore for that I am old, and cannot live long, my wife wholly delighting in lust, which I am neither able nor willing to satisfy, thou mayest do well to lie with her: and so pleasing her, after my death marry her, and thereby raise thy fortune. Fitz-Patrick knows my lord had solicited me again and again, hearing him use this language when we have been in bed together, and he lying at the bed's feet." Which to clear, he charged Fitz-Patrick to speak his knowledge; who replied, "Twas true." Then he was asked by one of the lords, "Whether when my lord solicited him, my lady desired to have him know her carnally?" To whom he said, "No, he would not wrong her, though she hated him infinitely. But," said he, "I know well, if I were minded, and able to proffer, she would not say nay: for Mr. Skipwith and Auptil lay with her commonly."

He added, "That Skipwith confessed to him he had often known her, and gotten a child upon her, which she, like a wicked woman, had made away: which was the only and sole occasion he the said Skipwith now hated her, and therefore had turned to the young lady Audley; all which he presumed Skipwith would confess upon his oath. That the countess was the wickedest woman in the world, and had more to answer for than any woman that lived, as he thought." At which words, that Lord which asked him the former question, said, Grow not into a passion, Mr. Broadway, and speak nothing for malice. He answered, "God forbid I should, I am in charity with all living people, and do as freely forgive my lady Castlehaven, as I do desire God to forgive me: but what I speak, is true, as I shall presently answer before him that redeemed me, and the Holy Ghost who sanctified me: To whom be all honour and glory, now and for evermore. Amen."

Then he proceeded farther, and said, "That my lord would have had him done it long before: for one night coming to him to his bedside, he caught him, and bid him come to bed to him and his wife: that thereupon he made to him as if he would; but being got from him, departed the chamber, never intending to do so foul a deed; and that for the reasons aforesaid he hated her of all women living. Howbeit, that one time, satisfying my lord's desire, he came to bed to them, where (being gratified) nature provoked him to a kind of desire, and he emitted, but did not enter her body, as he hoped for salvation; that he never knew any woman carnally whilst he lived in my lord's house.

"That it was not his intentions to bring to light either my lord's or my lady's shame; but that when he was upon his oath he could not but speak the truth, his nature being never prone to lying; or if it were in his youth, the good correction of his parents had weaned him from it, saying, that his mother had often told him the old Proverb, 'A liar is worse than a thief;' and he thought he had more stripes for that than all faults else whatsoever: that he had, as he hoped, spoke nothing of moment against my lord at his arraignment; he could not now remember every thing; if he had, he desired pardon." And so concluding his Speech, prepared himself for death; pulling out a laced handkerchief, he desired the executioner to tie it about his head. Then pulling off his garters, and unbuttoning his doublet, Mr. Goodcoale, the minister, asked him, if he would not have a Psalm. He said, Yes, with all my heart. Then he read the 143rd psalm; which Mr. Broadway, pulling up the handkerchief, sung very cheerfully, never changing colour at all. The minister desired him to make confession of his faith; so he pronounced aloud the belief.

Mr. Goodcoale said, These are the Articles of the Christian Faith according to the Church of England, into which faith you was baptized; pray signify whether in that faith you intend to die? He said, Yes; for there is no other faith, (as I suppose) in and by which a man can be saved. Then he made request to the sheriffs and those of his kindred there, that he might be buried in his own country. It was then told him, that it was granted, and order taken to have it so, wherefore he should now mind his prayer. When his kinsman asked him, if he had never another prayer in his pocket? he said, No. Then asked Mr. Goodcoale, if he would say after him? And he said, Yes, with all my heart; but first he desired the executioner to tie his hands again. Which being done, Mr. Goodcoale said a short prayer to recommend his soul and body to Almighty God, in and for the merits of Christ's death and passion: to which Broadway and the people said Amen. Then lifting up his hands to Heaven, he said, 'Lord Jesus receive my spirit, and the cart was drawn away.'

Fitz-Patrick lifting up his hands, and commending himself to God, was executed in like manner.

139. The Trial of JAMES Lord UCHILTRIE, for Calumnies and slanderous Speeches against James Marquis of Hamilton; and the Earls of Haddington, Roxburgh, and Buccleugh, tending to the sowing of Sedition betwixt his Majesty and the said Noblemen, at Edinburgh: 7 CHARLES I. Intran'

JAMES Lord Uchiltrie delatit of the making of Leasings, Calumnies and slanderous Speeches against James marquis of Hamilton; the earls of Haddington, Roxburgh, and Buccleugh; tending to the sowing of sedition betwixt his majesty and the said noblemen, his majesty's loyal subjects; in form and manner specified and set down in his Dittay.

Pursuer, sir Thomas Hope of Craighall, knight and baronet, Advocate to our sovereign lord for his highness's entries.

My Lord Advocate produced an Act of secret council, commanding him to pursue James lord Uchiltrie, now entered upon pannel for the crimes contained in his Dittay, of the which Act of Council the tenor follows:

' Apud Hallyrudhouse vicesimo 2do die mensis Novembris A. D. millesimo, sexcente-

' simo, trigesimo primo.' ' Forasmekill as the ' king's majesty, by his letter directed to the ' lords of his privy-council, having signified his ' royal pleasure and direction, that James lord
' Uchiltrie, whom his majesty has sent home
' to be kept in close ward, shall be tryed and
' censured according to the laws of this king' dom, for some Informations given by him, re' flecting upon some noblemen and counsellors
' of the same, before what judicatory and judges
' the said lords should think fit and competent ' for that purpose: and his majesty having, to ' that end, sent down to the said lords some
' Depositions under the lord Uchiltrie's own ' hand; and the authentic copies of others,
' whereof the principals are retained by his ma' jesty, because they likewise concern other ' persons. And the said lords having read and ' considered the same Depositions, and having ' taken into their consideration, which is the ' most proper Judgment for trying and censur-
' ing of matters of this kind; they have all
' with one voice found, and by the tenor of ' this act, finds and declares, That the Trial
' and Censuring of the said lord upon the ' particular aforesaid, is most proper and com' petent to be followed out before his majesty's
' justice: and therefore ordains sir Thomas
' Hope of Craighall, knt. his majesty's Advo' cate, to form and draw up the said lord Uchil-
' trie's Dittay; and to pursue him criminally
' thereupon, before his majesty's justice, upon ' the last day of November instant; and or-
' dains his majesty's said Advocate to give a

‘ just copy of the Dittay to the said lord Uchiltrie, betwixt and the 24th of November at night ; to the intent he may have time to be advised therewith, and to consult his Advocates, anent his lawful defences competent to him against the same. Anent the doing whereof, the extract of this Act, shall be unto his majesty’s said advocate a warrant, ‘ Extractum de libris actorum secreti concilii S. D. N. Regis, per me Jacobum Prymrois Clericum ejusdem sub meis signo et subscriptione manualibus, sic subscribitur James Prymrois. ”

After production and reading of the which Act of Council, my Lord Advocate also produced his majesty’s Letter, directed to the lords of his majesty’s privy-council of this kingdom, dated the 24th of Sept. 1631, together with two Depositions of the lord Uchiltrie’s, the one dated the 20th of June 1631, the other upon the 24th of June 1631. Then three several Depositions made by Donald lord Rea, whereof two thereof dated upon the 21st of June 1631, and the third upon the 24th of June 1631, all true copies thereof under the hands and subscription of the Committee of the Council of England. Of the which Depositions and Letter above-written, directed by his majesty to the council, the tenor follows. In the first, the deposition made by James lord Uchiltrie upon the 20th of June 1631.

The said Examinant saith, That on or about the 6th or 7th of May last, at the sign of the Bear near the Bridge-foot, the lord Rea told this examinant, that soldiers and travellers did often hear those things, whereof those that staid at home had no notice ; and said, he did believe there was a plot against this land. This Examinant wished him, if he had any good grounds so to think, that he should not fail to discover it. The lord Rea said, he had no certain ground, but if he had stayed but five weeks longer in the Low Countries, he would have known the certainty ; and that he would have hazarded his life but he would have had the certainty. The 13th of May the lord Rea came to this Examinant’s chamber, and there putting this examinant in mind of the former speech between them, he told this examinant, that he had learned more certainty than ever he had before since the time of their last speech ; whereupon divers passages were between his lordship and this examinant, about the discovery of it, and the manner. In the end his lordship told this examinant, that the purpose of the marquis of Hamilton’s Levies (as divers of his commanders and followers had informed him the said lord Rea) was, that either they should not go out of England and Scotland, or if they did, they should return to England or Scotland, and surprize the king’s houses in Scotland, viz. the castles of Edinburgh, Striveeling, and Dunbarton ; and fortify themselves in Leith, under pretence of training ; and should take Berwick, and so march forward into England. And this Examinant asking what could be their intention so to do ; the lord Rea said, that he was informed they meant to take the king’s person, and to inmurate him, to send the queen into a cloister, and to capivate the young prince with his father, and to strike off the heads of all the principal men about the king, both English and Scots : and in particular the Lord-Treasurer of England, the earl of Monteith, sir William Alexander, and sir Thomas Hope. And this examinant saith, That before the lord Rea discovered the particularities aforesaid to this examinant, this examinant using persuasions to him to reveal it, asked the lord Rea what it might be, saying, it was either a French or a Spanish faction. To which the lord Rea said, It was neither ; but told this examinant what it was, and so revealed the particulars above-mentioned. Whereupon the lord Rea being fully resolved to proceed to a further discovery, and thinking it fitter to be done by this examinant than by himself, lest those whom it concerned might sooner suspect it, desired this examinant to acquaint his majesty or the Lord-Treasurer therewith.

On the morrow, being Saturday the 14th of May at night, this Examinant came to have spoken with the Lord-Treasurer ; but his lordship being gone to bed, by his appointment, this examinant came the next morning, and told him, he had somewhat to reveal that concerned his majesty, and all his kingdoms and posterity. The Lord-Treasurer thereupon went instantly up to the king, and after, the same day, told this examinant, that his majesty had given him commission to hear this examinant’s relation. This examinant further saith, That the lord Rea told this examinant, that he had much of this beyond sea from Robert Meldrum and David Ramsay. But since his coming into England (as he said) he had spoken with sir James Ramsay, sir James Hamilton, col. Alex. Hamilton and captain Douglas, and had gotten somewhat out of every one of them : he also said, he had spoken with the lord Seaforth, and understood somewhat from him.

On Monday the 16th of May, this Examinant attended the Lord-Treasurer at Whitehall ; and entering into a relation, in the very beginning discovered, that the matter which he was to relate concerned the lord marquis of Hamilton and his actions ; which so soon as he had named, the Lord-Treasurer commanded him to say no more, until he had acquainted the king again ; but wished this examinant that he and the lord Rea should go presently to Greenwich, where the Lord-Treasurer would meet them. But the king being come towards Whitehall, this examinant and the lord Rea came back again, and were then appointed by the Lord-Treasurer to attend his majesty on Thursday at ten o’clock, which they did. The examinant further saith, That on Monday the 16th of May, this examinant delivered to the Lord-Treasurer a List of Names, to represent to his majesty the strength of the lord Hamilton's party and adherents in Scotland. At this examinant's coming to his majesty, this examinant told the king, that the business was a Treason intended against his majesty, and the party was the marquis of Hamilton, as this examinant was informed; and that it was the filthiest treason that ever was intended, and was sorry that any Scottish man should have a hand in it, for it was a shame to the whole nation. And then the lord Rea himself coming in, made relation to his majesty, who remitted him to the Lord-Treasurer; whereupon this examinant coming to the Lord-Treasurer, and telling him the king had remitted the lord Rea unto him; the Lord-Treasurer wished, that the lord Rea would put his relation in writing. Whereupon the lord Rea and this examinant went together, and sat up all night; and the lord Rea first putting it into writing, this examinant wrote it out of the lord Rea's papers, who on the morrow brought the same to the Lord-Treasurer: but this examinant was not then present; but the next time that he came to the Lord-Treasurer's, being asked by him whose the hand-writing was, this examinant said, it was his own hand; and the Lord-Treasurer telling him that the lord Rea had not subscribed it, this examinant said, he would without doubt subscribe it. And about two days after he brought the lord Rea to the Lord-Treasurer, who read over the whole writing, and subscribed his name to it, saying, he would seal it with his blood.

This Examinant further confesseth, That he told the Lord-Treasurer, that the lord Rea told him he had yet more, and would say so much, that the marquis should not have the face to deny it: which the lord Rea then present affirmed; insomuch as the Lord-Treasurer said, Then is the business at an end, there needs no writing.

This Examinant further saith, That on the Sunday morning, when the marquis of Hamilton came out of Scotland, the lord Rea told this examinant, that he had spoken with the lord Seaforth, who assured him their purpose was to take the king, the queen, and the prince; and this examinant asking how they should effect it, the lord Rea replied, The lord Seaforth had told him, they were great with the earl of Dorset, who had the custody of the prince. And this examinant further saith, That the lord Rea told him, that he was assured by my lord of Roxburgh, that the marquis and his company would hasten their purpose; and the lord Rea said, that surely the Hamiltons had taken some vent of the business, and that sir James Ramsay had told him, he had 1500 men in readiness upon an hour's warning, but they should not come about London till their business was ready withal; which this examinant the same morning acquainted the Lord-Treasurer, to the intent that his majesty might know thereof.

And further saith, That shortly after the lord Rea told him he had spoken with the lord

Seaforth, who told him, that the matter which he had formerly told him concerning the earl of Dorset, was but a disguised thing.

This Examinant further saith, That on that Sunday morning he wished the Lord-Treasurer to advise the king, that he should go to London for more safety; and understanding the king had sent for the lord Rea, this examinant wished the lord Rea were not sent for, because the lord Rea was gone to the lord Seaforth's to learn more: And further saith, That the same time being in the end of the king's dinner, this examinant told the king in these words: 'Sir, now we know the business, but know not the time; and therefore, sir, either do or die.'

Copia Vera. My Lord Rea's first Examination, 21st of June, 1631*.

In the Examination of Donald lord Rea, taken the 21st of June, 1631, the said examinant saith, That having heard in Sweden from David Ramsay, such things as are contained in the written Relation which hath been delivered to his majesty; and before having heard in Pomerland those passages from Robert Meldrum which are in the same relation, this examinant having a resolution to come for England about December last, was stayed in Denmark by reason of the ice, so as he came not to Holland till about March last, where he had conference with David Ramsay, and heard from him such other passages as are contained in the same relation. And after coming into England, because David Ramsay had told this examinant, that he would write to the marquis of Hamilton, how far forth the said David Ramsay had treated with this examinant, this examinant expected that the marquis would have spoken thereof unto him; he did therefore forbear to say any thing thereof; yet about two or three days before the lord marquis went into Scotland, this examinant did speak to the lord Uchiltrie to this purpose: That his lordship was better acquainted than this examinant with the fashions and laws of this land; and desired to know what danger it was, if any man hearing beyond sea of things that might be dangerous to the king or state, should not speak of it. To which the lord Uchiltrie answered, No less than your head and estate. And this was all that passed between them at that time, being the first time they spake thereof; and the place was, as he thinketh, at the lord Uchiltrie's own lodgings.

He further saith, That about eight or ten days after, this examinant coming to the lord Uchiltrie's lodgings to talk of some other business, after speech thereof, spake to this effect: My lord, you remember I asked you a question awhile since, what the danger might be, not to speak of matters dangerous to the king or state, which he had heard beyond the seas, and I would now again have your advice therein: And the lord Uchiltrie promising his readiness to advise him, so as he might be acquainted with the particular, thus examinant told him, he would acquaint him with the particular, if he would swear not to discover it but as he should direct; adding, That if he did otherwise, this examinant would pay him. The lord Uchiltrie then said, and protested, That he would not discover any thing but as this examinant should appoint; whereupon this examinant declared the particular to him, who hearing it, told this examinant it was necessary to be revealed, and doubted lest this examinant had kept it too long already: But then this examinant said, Considering it concerned one so near the king as the marquis of Hamilton, he thought it not fit that this examinant should himself break it to the king, lest the king should at first reject it; but it would be fitter for some other to do it, and therefore desired his opinion how to discover it. The lord Uchiltrie, advising awhile, said, He thought it best it were discovered to some of the Privy-Council; whereupon this examinant said, That he would not discover it to any Scotsman, but thought it best to reveal it to the Lord-Treasurer, because he thought the Lord-Treasurer was no way in the Plot.

According to which resolution the lord Uchiltrie, as he after told this examinant, did, according as was agreed between him and this examinant, repair to the Lord-Treasurer the same night; but failing then to speak with him, he went the next morning, before this examinant saw him, and returning, told this examinant he had been with the Lord-Treasurer, and in general imparted to him, that he had a matter to discover which nearly concerned his majesty: And said further, it was no English business, but it was, to his own shame he spake it, a Scottish business, neither was it any Popish Plot: And the Lord-Treasurer then refused to hear it, till he had warrant from the king.

After the lord Uchiltrie and this Examinant were appointed to wait on the king at Greenwich, whither this Examinant coming, found the lord Uchiltrie within with his majesty; and then this examinant coming in, made a full relation to his majesty; who asking this Examinant wherefore he had not himself told his majesty sooner of it, this examinant answered, That considering the nearness of the marquis of Hamilton to his majesty, this examinant was afraid lest his majesty would have been impatient towards this examinant; and besought his majesty to forgive this examinant, if he had thought he had done amiss therein. His majesty thereupon referred this examinant to the Lord-Treasurer, and bid this examinant put the Relation in writing. Whereupon that night this examinant and the lord U. sat up all night, and this examinant writing it first down, the lord U. wrote it sheet after sheet, out of this examinant's paper. And this examinant brought the same written relation to the Lord-Treasurer, and read it unto him, and left it with him. And a day or two after, this examinant and the lord U. came again together to the Lord-Treasurer; the lord U. having told him, that this examinant had forgotten to sign it; and then this examinant signed it, saying, he would make it good with his blood.

At which time this Examinant remembers the lord U. told the Lord-Treasurer, that this examinant had more to say yet, which this examinant did then also affirm; and the cause wherefore he did affirm it, was, because this examinant had spoken with the lord Seaforth, and had some particulars from him, which he did not particularly tell to the lord U. but affirmed to him in the general, that he could say no more; but a day or two after, this examinant went again to the lord Seaforth, and spake with him, and then he told the same, first to the lord U.

He further saith, That the lord Uchiltrie, on Sunday morning, told this Examinant, that he had been with the Lord-Treasurer, and had told him of the passages with the lord Seaforth, and of the marquis's return, and that he conceived it might be dangerous at that time for his majesty. But this examinant told him, he had done evil therein, for there was no such suddenness to be feared: and on the same Sunday in the afternoon, this examinant coming to his majesty, and hearing from him, that he had been advertised of somewhat importing matter of present danger; this examinant said, he had been with the lord Seaforth, but had not the certainty of things, but prayed his majesty to give him leave to go again to the lord Seaforth's, and then he would learn all. And at the same time his majesty telling what danger had been suggested to him, now upon the marquis's return: this examinant protested he knew nothing against the person of the marquis; but that he was, for aught this examinant knew, as good a subject as any the king had.

Copia Vera. My Lord Rea's second Examination the 21st of June 1631.

The said lord Rea, having deliberately heard read the Examination of James lord Uchiltrie, taken the 20th of this instant, doth acknowledge the same to be true in all points, so far as the same concerneth the knowledge, words or acts of this examinant, saving the explanations hereafter following: He saith, that as touching the conference between the lord U. and this examinant the 13th of May last, where it is therein mentioned that this examinant told him, that since the time of their last speech, he had learned more certainty than ever he had before; this examinant did not say, that he had learned more certainty since their last speech, for in truth he had not learned any thing within that time. But thinks he might say, that he had learned more certainty since he came to England than he had before; and therefore takes it, that the lord U. did mistake in that point.

And whereas in the same conference it is set down, that this Examinant should say that he was informed, that they meant to strike off the heads of all the principal men about the king, this examinant said, that he was informed they would strike off the heads of the Spanish faction; and that he named the Lord-Treasurer, the two bishops, the earl-marshal, the earl of Carlisle, sir Francis Cottington, the lord Monreith, sir Wm. Alexander, and sir Thomas Hope, and likewise sir Kenelm Digby, and spake of none other, neither in general nor particular; and saith, that he was so informed touching the Spanish faction by Mr. Meldröm, and David Ramsay; and touching the Scots by the earl of Seaforth. And saith, that Meldröm and David Ramsay did name the aforesaid Englishmen to be of the Spanish faction. And whereas it is said, that this examinant desired the lord Uchiltrie to acquaint his majesty or the Lord-Treasurer with the matter; this examinant did desire him to acquaint the Lord-Treasurer, but did not mention his majesty, but that it should come by the Lord-Treasurer to his majesty.

He confessed, he said, that since his coming into England, he had spoken with sir James Ramsay, sir James Hamilton, and capt. Douglas, and gotten somewhat out of every one of them; but did not say he had spoken with Alex. Hamilton, or gotten any thing out of him since this examinant's coming into England.

This Examinant denieth, that he either said himself, or affirmed its being said by the lord U. that he could say so much as the marquis should not have the face to deny it; but said he could bring as honest a man as this examinant, that would tell to the marquis's face more than this examinant would do: and thus he meant by the lord Seaforth.—He confessed that he said, sir James Ramsay told him he had 1,500 men in readiness, but would not bring them together, till the parties in Scotland were first ready; and saith, sir James told him as much, and that there were good officers, and the earl of Essex, and the abb. of Canterbury were sareties for some of them; and other than this, he spake not touching the 1,500 men.—He saith, he was not acquainted with the list of the names delivered by the lord U. to the Lord-Treasurer, nor had any thing to do therein.

The said Examinant confesseth, that the understanding which he had of the business, concerning the marquis of Hamilton, whereof he hath been so often examined, came to him from the lord Rea. He confesseth further, that the paper of Names which he did deliver to the Lord-Treasurer, was made by this examinant himself, and the lord Rea was not privy to the making of it, or to the delivery thereof to the Lord-Treasurer, till after it was done.—He saith that the cause wherefore he did in that paper mention the lord marquis to be prime agent, was, for that the lord Rea had told him, the lord marquis's followers had said, the intent of the marquis's levies was to invade Scotland. Being told, that the lord Rea hath been so far from charging the marquis, that he hath affirmed before his majesty, that for aught he knows, the marquis is as good a subject as any the king hath; he answereth, if in tenderness and care of the king's safety, and upon ground of the lord Rea's relation, for the lord marquis's followers, he have gone any thing too far, he trusteth his majesty will impute it to his duty.

Being asked, why, in the aforesaid Paper, he makes the earl of Melros, the earl of Roxburgh, and the earl of Buccleugh to be plotters, saith, that the lord Rea told him, the lord Seaforth had affirmed it to him, that the earls of Melros and Roxburgh were acquainted with the particulars and secrets of the business. And further saith, the lord Rea had told him, he could not guess who else should be in the plot, unless it were the lord Buccleugh; of whom the lord Rea said, he heard him speak terrible and presumptuous words against the king, at his own table in Holland.

He said, the lord Rea did affirm to this Examinant, that he had the aforesaid report of the earls of Melros and Roxburgh from the lord Seaforth, before he, this examinant, made or delivered the said Paper to the Lord-Treasurer: The said examinant doth avow, that on the 13th of May, the lord Rea had affirmed to him, that since their former speech, (which was the 6th or 7th of May) he had learned more certainty than ever he had before.—He confesseth, that whereas in his former Examination, he said, the lord Rea told him, he was informed that they meant to strike off the heads of all the principal men about the king; he was mistaken in mentioning all, and did not well mark himself when he so expressed it; his purpose being to have said, they would strike off the heads of many; for so, he takes it, was the scope of the lord Rea's speech.

Being told that the lord Rea denieth, that he spake with col. Alexander Hamilton since his coming into England, he saith, it is possible that this examinant might mistake in adding that name to the rest, and therefore will not contest about that. He doth avow, that in the presence of the lord Rea, before the Lord-Treasurer, this examinant said, the lord Rea could say so much as the marquis should not have the face to deny it; and what this examinant said, the lord Rea being then present, and hearing it, did not gainsay.—He saith, the lord Rea told him, sir James Ramsay said to him, that he had 1,500 men in readiness, and the first time said, upon an hour's warning. But at a second time, the lord Rea spoke of eight days warning; and further, that he would not bring them to London, till their business was ready.—Being acquainted with what John Macky, son to the lord Rea, had confessed to have been told him by this examinant, he doth acknowledge it, and that he said it to John Macky, after the lord Rea and this examinant had attended his majesty about the same business, but did not think his speech thereof to John Macky should have done any hurt to the business.

(Copia vera.) The third Examination of Donald Lord Rea, taken the 24th of June 1631.

He saith, that the first time that the lord Senforth had any speech with this Examinant, touching the earls of Melros and Roxburgh, being privy to the particulars and secrets of the lord Hamilton's business, was on Monday after the marquis's coming out of Scotland, and not before.—He further saith, that the lord Uchiltrie having some speech with this examinant, who might be like in Scotland to take arms, if the marquis of Hamilton should take up arms; the said lord U. and not this examinant, named the lord Buccleugh: whereupon this examinant told him, that at the siege of the Busse, this examinant heard the lord Buccleugh use some words, whereby this examinant took him to come male-content out of England.

The Tenor of his Majesty's Letter directed to the Lords of his Majesty's Council of Scotland.

'C. R. Right trusty, &c. The lord Uchiltrie having been examined before our council here, touching some Informations given by him, reflecting upon some of the nobility of that our kingdom; we have been pleased to remit him thither, to be tryed according to the laws thereof; having to that purpose sent you herewith inclosed some Depositions under his own hand, and the authentic copies of others, whereof the principals we cause to be reserved here, because they likewise concern other persons. Our pleasure is, that having given order for receiving and committing him to safe custody, you cause try and censure him according to our said laws, before what judicature and judges you shall think fit and competent for that purpose; and for your so doing these shall be sufficient warrant. Given at our honour of Hampton-Court, the 24th of September, 1631.'

After this, my Lord Advocate produced the List of Names, or Representation written and given in by him to the Lord-Treasurer of England, upon the 16th of May 1631, together with the lord Uchiltrie's Dittay, of the which List or Representation and Dittay aforesaid, the tenor followeth:

Apud Edinburgh vigesimo nono Novembris 1631. In presence of the bishop of Dunblane, my lord of Carnegie, my lord Justice Clerk, and Justice Depute. The whilk day James lord Uchiltrie being present before the lords examiners above-named; and the list of Names before mentioned being shewed unto him, and he required to declare if he would recognize and acknowledge the same to be his own hand-writing; the said lord Uchiltrie, after inspection and consideration thereof, declared that List of Names was written with his own hand, and delivered by him to the Lord-Treasurer of England; sic subscribitur J. Uchiltrie, ad B. of Dunblane, Carnegie, Geo. Elphinstoun, A. Colville.

The Tenor of the lord Uchiltrie's Dittay or Indictment.

James lord Uchiltrie; Ye are indicted and accused forasmekill as by divers acts, statutes and constitutions of parliament, made and published in the days of our sovereign lord's most royal progenitors, specially by the 43d act of the 2nd parliament of James 1, of worthy memory it is enacted, statute and ordained, That all leasing-makers and tellers of them, whilk may engender discord betwixt the king and his people, wherever they may be gotten, shall be challenged by them that power has, and tyme life and goods to the king. And likewise by the 83d act of the sixth parliament of king James 1, of eternal memory, bearing touching the article of Leasing-makers to the king's grace, of his barons, great men and lieges, and for punishment to be put to them; therefore it is thereby declared, that the king's grace, with advice of his three estates, ratifies and approves the acts and statutes made thereupon of before, and ordains the same to be put to due execution in all points; whilks acts of parliament, in the 205th act of the 14th parliament of our sovereign lord's dearest father king James the 6, of happy and never-dying memory, and with advice of his highness's estates in that parliament ratified, approven, and confirmed, and ordained to be put in execution in all time thereafter following, as in the said laws and acts of parliament, at length is contained. Notwithstanding whereof, it is of verity, that he the said James lord Uchiltrie, having in the month of May, the year of God 1631, last past, heard by relation of Donald lord Rea, that certain speeches, surmises and informations were made to him by David Ramsay, with the head of Mr. Robert Meldrum, and certain other persons beyond sea, in Sweden, Pomerland and Holland respectively; and by the said David Ramsay and certain other persons within the kingdom of England, anent some plot and dangerous purpose intended against the sacred person of our gracious lord and sovereign, the king's most excellent majesty, his gracious queen, and their dearest son the prince, and against the land by surprizing the king's majesty's houses and castles of Edinburgh, Striveiling, and Dunbarton, and for seizing of the town of Leith. Ye not being content to retain yourself within the bounds of a faithful subject, by revealing of that, whereof ye had received information from the said lord Rea, out of a malicious policy and design, tending to the sowing of discord and sedition betwixt his majesty and his most loyal subjects, the lord marquis of Hamilton, the earl of Haddington, the earl of Roxburgh, and the earl of Buccleugh; did at your first meeting with his majesty, which was upon the 17th of May last past, signify to his highness that the business was a Treason intended against his majesty: and that the party was the marquis of Hamilton, as ye was informed. And to the effect his majesty might be put in better assurance of the truth of your said speeches, ye upon the 16th of May preceding, delivered, to the lord-treasurer of England, a List of Names, to represent to his majesty, the strength of the said marquis of Hamilton's party and adherents in Scotland. Whilk is all written with your own hand, and intitled, "Representation for my Lord-Treasurer." Wherein ye name the marquis of Hamilton to be the prime agent, and names the earl of Melros, now earl of Haddington, the earl of Roxburgh, and the earl of Buccleugh, to be plotters. Likewise upon Sunday, being the 22d of May last past, at which day the marquis of Hamilton (having come post from Scotland in three days) was to present himself to his majesty. And ye thinking that ye had possessed his majesty sufficiently with your malicious Leasings and Calumnies against the said lord marquis; and that his majesty being so instigate and irritate against him, would follow your cruel and malicious counsel; ye came to his majesty about the end of his dinner, and most boldly and male-pertly spake to his majesty these words, 'Sir, now ye know the business, but knows not the time, and therefore, Sir, either do or die.' By the whilk malicious counsel (if God by his grace had not ruled and directed the heart of our gracious sovereign to proceed in the business with greater wisdom, calmness and moderation,) ye by your former wicked counsel intended ye thereby did what in you lay, to move and cause his majesty, to put in practice some sudden and violent course, for subversion of the life and honour of the said lord marquis, his majesty's most loyal subject. Like as all the present articles and passages in your proceedings, in the premises, were maliciously forged, invented and practised by yourself; without any warrant arising to you from the Relation of the said lord Rea's; whilk is manifest by your own Deposition, made in the presence of a number of the council of England, deputed by his majesty for your examination, upon the 20th and 24th of June last past. By the which ye have granted and confessed the premises laid to your charge to be of verity; and also does grant that the paper of Names which ye did deliver to my Lord-Treasurer, as said is, was made by yourself. And that the lord Rea was not privy to the making thereof, nor to the delivery of the same, to the said Lord-Treasurer. And sic-like in your examination, ye being inquired for what cause, ye did name the said lord marquis to be prime agent, ye could assign no true reason, nor cause, by any warrant of the lord Rea against the marquis. But by the contrary the said lord Rea being examined upon the 21st of June, in presence of his majesty's council, declared that he knew nothing against the person of the lord marquis; but that the said lord marquis was as good a subject as any the king's majesty had. And likewise ye being asked by what warrant ye did call the earls of Melros, Roxburgh, and Buccleugh to be Plotters; ye answered thereto, that the lord Rea had told you, that the lord Seaforth had affirmed to him, that the earls of Melros and Roxburgh were acquainted with the particulars and secrets of that business, declaring thereby that the lord Rea had affirmed that to you, before you gave in, and delivered your paper of representation to the lord treasurer. And further, ye declared, that the lord Rea had told you, that he could not guess who else should have been upon the plot, unless it were the lord Buccleugh. Albeit the lord Rea being examined in presence of his majesty's council upon the 24th of June last past, declared, that the first time the lord Seaforth had any speech with him, anent the earls of Melros and Roxburgh, and their being privy to the marquis of Hamilton's business, was upon the Monday after the marquis of Hamilton's coming out of Scotland, and not before: and the marquis having come to court from Scotland upon Saturday the 21st of May, and the representation given by you to the Lord Treasurer, containing the list of the Plotters and Actors, being given in by you to the said Lord Treasurer, upon the 16th of May before; ye could never truly affirm, that ye had named the said earls to be plotters, upon pretence of any information received from my lord Rea, who did not speak to you anent them, at the time of the giving of the said Representation; but eight days thereafter, and such like. The said lord Rea deponed upon the said 24th of June, that ye, and not he, did name the earl of Buccleugh, as one who would take arms in Scotland to assist the marquis; by the which Leasings, Calumnies, and slanderous Speeches, untruly allotted, devised and vented by you, against the said marquis of Hamilton, the earls of Haddington, Roxburgh, and Buccleugh, in manner foresaid; all of them being his majesty's faithful councillors and loyal subjects; ye have manifestly controverted the tenor of the said laws, and acts of parliament, and incurred the pains and punishment mentioned therein, viz. the deserved punishment of death, which ought and should be execute upon you with all rigour, to the terror and example of others.

The Justice at command of a warrant and direction of the lords of the secret council, whereof the tenor follows: 'Apud Halyrud-house, vicesimo quinto die mensis Nov. 1631. The Lords of the secret council, for some special cause, and considerations moving them, ordains and commands his majesty's justice, justice-clerk and their deputies, to prorogate and continue the Dyet appointed for the Trial of James lord Uchiltrie, until Thursday next, the 1st of Dec. next to come: whereanent this extract of the act shall be unto the said justice, justice-clerk and their deputies, a Warrant extractum de libris actorum secreti concilii S. D. N. regis, per me Jacobum Prymrose, clericum ejusdem, sub meis signo et subscriptione manualibus, sic subscribitur Jacobus Prymrose;' Prorogates and continues the Trial of James lord Uchiltrie, now impanelled, to the morn the 1st of December next to come, and ordained him to be returned back to ward, to be kept in sure firmance, in the mean time: the jury or persons of assize summoned to this day, are warn'd, apud acta to compare the said 1st day of December next to come: ilk person under the pain of six marks.—Whereupon the Advocate asked Instruments.

Prolocutors in defence.—Mr. Robert Nairne, Mr. Alexander Pierson, Gilbert Neilson, Advocates.

The Prolocutors for the impanelled, produced an Act of the Lords of secret council; ordaining and commanding them to compare and assist him, by proponing of all lawful defence, competent to him on his Trial, and desired the same might be insert and remain on process, whereof the tenor follows: 'Apud Halyrudhouse vicesimo quinto die mensis Novembris, 1631. Whereas James lord Uchiltrie has made choice of Mr. Robert Nairne, Mr. Alexander Pierson, and Gilbert Neilson, advocates, to concur and join with him, for proponing of his lawful defences, competent to him against the Dittay, whereupon he is to be accused before his majesty's justice, upon the 1st of December next: therefore the Lords of secret council ordains and commands the said three advocates to confer and meet with the said lord Uchiltrie, to receive his informations; to accompany and assist him at the bar; and to do their duty and office in all and every thing lying to their charge, concerning the proponing of all lawful defences, competent to the said lord in his trial. Whereanent the extract of this act shall be to them a warrant extractum de libris actorum secreti concilii S. D. N. regis per me, magistrum Gilbertum Prymrose, clericum ejusdem, sub meis signo et subscriptione manualibus, sic subscribitur M. Prymrose.' After reading of the which Act of Council, the said Prolocutors protested, because the present matter of disputation est res ardua, anent Treason and Relations thereof, from party to party; that whatever the exigence of the cause requires from them, as probs to speak herein, for clearing of the noblesman impanelled, his innocence, and of the warrants of his information; that it is not with any thought of wronging, or tasking of any parties, noblemen or others; but to do that which their duty as Prolocutors craves of them to be done, being commanded hereto by the Lords of his majesty's secret Council: and that the purpose and speeches that shall by God's assistance be uttered and delivered by them in this matter, may be so accepted of my Lord Justice.

Thereafter the Indictment of the lord Uchiltrie, being read judicially, and he accepted of the crimes therein contained; my Lord Advocate asked Instruments of the reading thereof, and of the acts of parliament set down in the proposition of the said Indictment. And because the subsumption of the said Indictment is founded upon certain Depositions made in England, in presence of five of his majesty's councillors, deputed by his majesty to that effect: he therefore repeats the Examinations of the lord Uchiltrie produced yesterday in process, dated the 20th and 24th of June last; with the three Examinations of my lord Rea's, whereof two are dated the 21st of June, and the third upon the 24th of June: and declared, that he used these Depositions under the hands and subscriptions of the five councillors of England, as authentic copies, which should make as good faith, as if the principal were produced.

It is alleged by Mr. Alexander Pierson, as Prolocutor for the pannel, that it cannot, nor should not be proceeded against the impannelled here in Scotland, but conform to the laws and statutes of England; the place of the pannel his offence, (if any be) and not conform to the municipal laws of Scotland. 'Quia de jure judex originis vel domicilii non potest punire subditum delinquentem extra territorium, nisi secundum poenam impostam a jure comunni, vel secundum statuta loci in quo deliquit non; autem secundum statuta ipsius loci originis, vel domicilii.' Julius Clarus, quest. 85, numb. quarto.

It is answered by my Lord Advocate, that the alledgents is no ways relevant, except the pannel will condescend to the relevance of the Dittay; and of his own consent be content, that the same pass to the knowledge of an assize. Next, it is answered by his majesty's advocates that he opposes his majesty's Letter direct to the council, bearing, that the impannelled shall be tried according to the laws of this kingdom. And in the one place it shall be justified, that his majesty's letter shall be grounded upon the civil and common law.

It is answered thereto by the lord Uchiltrie and his Prolocutors; that the king's majesty's Letter is, and must be understood, without prejudice, of the pannel's lawful defences.

Item, That the alledged crimes contained in the Dittay are, or perchance may be, lawful in England, and yet criminal in Scotland; and it carries no reason that the pannel should be punished here in Scotland, for any fact committed in England, not punishable by the laws of England, where the pannel is tutus ratione loci.

Secundo, It is alledged by the Pannel, that the subsumption of the indictment has no dependence upon the proposition thereof; because the particulars contained in the subsumption are no ways the leasings mentioned in the said acts of parliament, whereupon the proposition is founded, especially seeing the leasings mentioned in the said acts, are leasings tending to discord betwixt the king and his people: and the telling whereof is unlawful and prohibitt. But the particulars of the Dittay or Indictment are no ways such. But by the contrary, the matter thereof being an heinous treason against the king's majesty and estate; in favour of both, 'propter publicam utilitatem,' it is incumbent to every subject that shall hear speeches of such matter, though the matter itself be a lie and untruth, which is alike to the hearer, neither does it belong to him, to judge or discern therein; it is incumbent, I say, to every subject incontinently to tell the same; the telling whereof tends not to discord between the king and his people; but to suppress and prevent the same, and the chief cause thereof, which is Treason; and the not telling and revealing whereof is punishable by the law of all nations, by our municipal laws and acts of parliament; yea, by the same acts, whereupon the Dittay is founded, viz. James 6, parliament 14, cap. 205. And therefore the telling thereof is no ways prohibited and punishable by the said acts, neither are these particulars in the Indictment the leasings mentioned in the said acts, which is medium concludendi in the Dittay. And which last act being the last in time, as it ratifies, so it explains the true sense of the former.

And further, it is alledged by Gilbert Neilson, prolocutor for the Pannel, that not only by the foresaid act, of the 14th parliament of king James 6, whereupon the Dittay is founded, is there a necessity laid upon the impannelled, and all his majesty's lieges, to reveal what they hear, concerning his majesty's prejudice; but likewise by the 134th act of James 6's 8th parliament, it is specially statute, That whosoever hears any speeches to the harm or prejudice of the king's majesty's estate, shall with all diligence reveal the same to his majesty, or to some other, the king's majesty's officers, that may make the same manifest to his majesty, with this special addition, that in case the same be not done, the person concealer, and not teller or revealer, shall incur the like punishment, contained in the said acts, set down against the principal leasing-makers. And so the impannelled was necessitate, upon no less pain than his life and estate, to reveal the same.

It is answered by his majesty's Advocate, That this preceding defence can elude no part of the Dittay; because the first part thereof anent the lawfulness or necessity of revealing of treason is granted in the Dittay or Indictment. And if the pannel had contained himself within the duty of revealing, albeit the Plot and Treason revealed had been false, yet he would have deserved commendation and reward from his master. But the Indictment is founded upon three particulars, to the which no answer is made; and which three particulars agrees and quadrates with the natural quality of the leasings, contained in the act of parliament, whereupon the Dittay is founded. Because they are such, as might have engendered discord betwixt his majesty and his loyal subjects; in so far as it is qualified in the Dittay, that the impannelled having only had his relations from the lord Rea, and which relations had no warrant against the marquis of Hamilton's person, as author or actor of the Treason, nor against the three noblemen as Plotters, but depended 'ex auditis, vel relatione relati ab altero'; that is, from David Ramsay, and Mr. Robert Meldrum, of whom neither of them did relate any thing that could prove against the marquis; but simply upon the speeches and report of some; whom they call his followers, or upon their imagination, or possibly foolish and perverse wishes, that the nobleman who was employed for the levying of an army for aiding the king of Sweden, should employ his forces to the destruction of the king, his queen, the prince their dearest son, and kingdom. Yet the impannelled, when as he might have sufficiently express his loyal duty to his master, by bringing the lord Rea to his majesty, to make his own relation, did at the first appearance before his majesty turn the uncertain report and relation to a positive speech: shewing that the business was a treason; and the party the marquis of Hamilton. Next, the Pannel, by his Representation all written with his own hand, and delivered to my Lord-Treasurer of England, to be shewn to his majesty, he has expressed the lord marquis to be prime agent; and the earls of Haddington, Roxburgh, and Buccleugh to be plotters; and hath added to the number of 30 or 30 noblemen, as adherents to them. And last, when his majesty had received this positive information, and was possessed with appearance of the truth thereof; to add a spark to the fuel, the Motto was given, 'Sir, now either do or die;' whilk words could not contain any other intention or event (if his majesty had not been graciously and wisely disposed), but either to have used some violent course against the marquis's person and life, or to commit him to prison, and to cause him to make answer as to Treason, ex vinculis: whilk is the condition of traytors, both by the common law and by the act of parliament, made by king James 2, parliament 12, cap. 49, whereby it is ordained, That persons slandered of Treason, shall be taken and remain in firman, while they thole an assize. And all their proceedings are directly contrary to the act of parliament, whereupon the Dittay is founded, especially seeing the Pannel, by his Deposition made the 90th of June, Article primo, in relating the lord Rea's first speeches declared that the lord Rea granted that he had no certain ground for the Treason alledged by him; and it is an heinous and odious fact, punishable by all laws, to turn relation into defation, and to be an author or adviser to a sovereign prince, to begin at execution before trial. And all the particular points of the Dittay are clear, and evident by the Deposition of the impannelled, made upon the 20th and 24th days of June; whilk are the true copies of the original and authentic Depositions, made in the presence of five of his majesty's council in England; like as the copies produced and read in the presence of the Pannel, and his prolocutors, are subscribed by the said five councillors; and also are declared by his majesty's letter, directed to his council the 24th of September, to be true copies of the said Depositions: whereof the principals are retained by his majesty, for the causes mentioned in the said Letter. And therefore ought to have full faith, as if the principals were produced; like as the Pannel by his acts de calumnia will not refuse, but that the Representation containing the list of the names was given in by him, without the privy of the lord Rea, and also that he spake these words to his majesty upon the Sunday after dinner, being the 22d of May; which was the self same day that the marquis came from Scotland to England, and was to present himself to his majesty, viz. 'The purpose is known, the time not known; Sir, either do or die;' in respect whereof the alledgente ought to be repelled.

It is duplyed for the Pannel by his Prolocutors, as to the particulars contained in my Lord Advocate's Answer, they cease to answer him now in the general, seeing they are upon the relevancy of the Dittay and Indictment, and shall answer every one, singulatim as they lie in the Indictment, suo loco.

Tertio, It is alledged for the Pannel, that the particulars contained in the Indictment are not Leasings, 'quoad referentem neque id genus referens mentitur, quoniam quantum in ipso est non fallit, sed fallitur, et quicquid falsitatis vel mendacii in relatis inest, id ad suos auctores referendum, cap. Is autem 22 quest. 2. et cap. 55. Beatus Paulus ibidem, ubi dicitur, non mentiri eum qui inimum fallendi non habet quod est essenziale et formale mendacii, impostura scilicet et intentio fallendi.' And the telling and revealing of the whilks matters aforesaid, 'nullum habet in se delictum, sed est de natura boni;' being commanded, and therefore in the hearer and relater, 'presumitur omnis dolus abesse, quia parere necesse habet.' And specially in such a business as this, whilk so highly concerns the king's majesty and estate. Whereof there was so great appearance, by the relation made by the lord Rea, whilk the pannel craves may be read to the judge.

It is answered by my Lord Advocate, that if the defence means of the Treason related by the lord Rea, the pannel cannot be quarrelled for it, nor for telling thereof, albeit it were a lye. But the Leasings and Calumnies assumed upon in the Dittay, arises upon the contradiction, betwixt that which was related by the lord Rea, and that whilk was spoken and affirmed positive to his majesty. And where it is alledged, that 'mendacium est semper cum animo fallendi;' that is, 'in discrepantia inter intellectum et vocem ejusdem persone;' where he thinks one thing, and speaks another, whilk is not our case. But 'mendacium vel falsitas,' whereupon we dispute, is the discrepance and the contrariety betwixt the relation made by the lord Rea, and that which is related by the pannel: wherein the pannel was obliged, as a faithful subject, to make a simple or true relation, 'sine paraphrasi, vel periphrafi, sine interpretatione, vel circumlocutione, et ut in Apographa vel exemplari committitur falsitas, si transcriptio differt ab exemplari, ita committitur falsitas ubi relatio positive refertur;' whilk is the lessings, whereupon the Dittay subsumes. And where it is desired that the lord Rea's relation may be produced and read to the Judge, if it be meant of that relation whilk is subscribed by the five councillors of England; and if the pannel will acknowledge it, to make faith as the principal, together with the remanent depositions of the pannel, and the lord Rea, whilk are all subscribed by the said five councillors, and already produced and read to the judge; the pannel shall receive satisfaction of his desires, otherwise not.

It is duplyed for the Pannel, that the foresaid alledgeance is to answer that part of the Dittay, bearing the heads thereof to be forged and vented by the pannel.

Quarto, it is alledged by the Pannel, that as to the subsumption of the Dittay, bearing, that all the articles and passages of proceeding therein mentioned, were maliciously invented and practised by the pannel, whilk is qualified by the Pannel's own Deposition and alledged Confession against himself, and by the Pannel's Deposition freeing the Lord Rea, and the lord Rea's Deposition freeing himself thereof; the qualification inforces not the pannel in the particulars to be a leasing-maker, and to have forged lyes.—First, For the Pannel's own Deposition, it inforces the just contrary, to wit, that the lord Rea was the Pannel's informer in all. As for the lord Rea's Deposition against the pannel, propoerted in the Dittay; that inforces not forging of lyes against the pannel, neither can the lord Rea's deposition have any force against him; first, because the lord Rea is party, and the pannel is a witness against him for the king, and whose deposition cannot be respected against the testimony, made against himself, for the king's majesty: and in effect is but a denial, whilk can neither liberate himself, nor weaken the pannel's deposition. 'Et omnibus in re propria dicendi testimonii facultatem jura submoverunt, lege 10. Cod. de testibus.' Item, The lord Rea's deposition made by him, not being sworn, and so is null of the law; 'Quia testis injuratus examinatus non probat nec fidem faciat, lege jurisjurandi;' nona Cod. de testibus et lege testium xviii. Cod. eodem.

Item, The lord Rea's Deposition not made in the presence of the pannel, and so 'non valeat authentica, sed etsi,' Cod. de testibus. Item, Although the lord Rea were not party, he is but 'testis singularis et nihil probat.' Item, The lord Rea's Depositions produced cannot be respected, because they are not the principal subscribed by my lord Rea, but relations, and doubtless from the council. 'Et in criminalibus aliorum judicium relationibus credere non oportet,' Lege singul. xiv. Cod. de accusationibus et inscriptionibus.

It is declared by the lord Uchiltre himself, now upon Pannel, that the Depositions whilk he made in England, and subscribed with his hand, are true in themselves, as he there deponeed, according to the relations and grounds of Information, which he received from the lord Rea. The reconciliations which are ingrossed in the several Depositions, being allowed and admitted for reconciling of any apparent contrariety, without prejudice of what explanation of the same depositions he may justly make further; he declares, that the alledged copies of the Pannel's own depositions, under the hand of the five councillors, so far as his memory can serve him, are not different in the substance of them, from the original. But that there is no more in his depositions, nor that whilk the subscribed copies contain, that he cannot say. And this his lordship does according to his memory, and in reverence of his majesty's letter, and noblemen's hands thereat.

My Lord Advocate takes instruments of the impannelled's declaration in that part, whereby he grants that the copies of his depositions made by him, under the hand of the five councillors, is not different in substance, according to the Pannel's memory.

Thereafter, my lord Uchiltre and his Prolocutors craved that the lord Rea's Relation made upon the 18th of May, whilk under the hand of the five councillors, might be read to him, because he minds to found exceptions thereupon.—To the whilk, it is answered by his majesty's Advocate, that he cannot be compelled to produce the said Relation, in respect no part of the qualification of the Dittay is founded thereupon. And yet according to his former answer, says, if the Pannel will acknowledge the same, as it is under the hands of the five councillors, to make as great faith as the principal, he is content, that the said Relation be read; of the whilk Relation the tenor follows.

The true Relation of such passages, as I DONALD LORD REA have heard or learned, which may concern my most dread sovereign, or his estate, beyond seas and elsewhere, as I will be ready to take my oath upon, and seal with my blood against all opponents. Written this 18th of May, 1631.

In the month of April, 1630, or thereby, at my coming from Stockholm, I found col. Alex. Hamilton, brother to the earl of Haddington, sir James Hamilton, son to the said earl, sir James Hamilton of Reidhall, nephew to the said earl, and one Hamilton the lord of —; who were all officers under the king of Sweden then. But before my coming there, they had all cashiered themselves, not having served one year.

At this time the laird of Bensho, Lyndesay, my lieutenant colonel, being bed-fellow and comrade to sir James Hamilton son to the earl of Haddington, keeping a chamber in James Mackleat's a Scotsman's house in Stockholm, Lyndesay did inform me, that the reason why the Hamiltons had cashiered themselves, was because their chief, the marquis of Hamilton, was to be a soldier, and they would follow his fortunes. I asked Lyndesay who had told him so much; he told me sir James Hamilton of Priestfield, Haddington's son: and Lyndesay told me withal, that all these Hamiltons, and sir John Hamilton, another son of Haddington's, had denuded themselves of their fortunes and estates, some of them to their friends, but the earl of Haddington's children to their father.

Moreover, Lyndesay told me, that sir James Hamilton, Haddington's second son, had told him that sir James Spence, now lord Spence, had directed Mr. Robert Meldrum with letters into England; and that thereafter they did expect David Ramsay with the head cousin to the lord Spence, as ambassador from the marquis of Hamilton: and all the Hamiltons did expect David Ramsay's coming.—Also Lyndesay did inform me, that sir James Hamilton did desire him to join with them, and that they would give him a regiment; which he did accept, and did desire my consent, which I did yield unto.

Also ten or twelve days after we did hear from Denmark, that there was an ambassador coming from England, who proves to be David Ramsay; who did give himself out, all the way as he came, to be an ambassador: which to prove, he did stand in competition with his majesty, our dread sovereign's extraordinary ambassador sir Thomas Roe; both the said sir Thomas and David Ramsay encountering in the town of - - - in Denmark: yet David Ramsay would never do so much as visit the other ambassador. Upon which oversight I did question David Ramsay, whose answer was, he did not desire to be seen of any man that would discover him; affirming to his cousin sir Robert Anstruther (as David Ramsay told me) that no honest man could live at home. David Ramsay, col. Alex. Hamilton, and sir James Hamilton, attending their dispatch from the king of Sweden at Elmsby, were forced to reside with me in my ship, for at this time we were all on ship-board.

And one night drinking some healths, amongst the rest, the marquis's health coming by course, I asked col. Alex. Hamilton, the marquis's christian name; he answered me, 'James, by the grace of God;' sir James added, 'King of Scotland;' therefore his health passed under that name, till I did take exceptions, and did desire them to alter their title; sir James Hamilton answered volens, volens, it should be so, and did laugh. I did desire them to drink it more covertly, thus, 'To the happy event of all Good Intentions;' so David Ramsay said it should be so.

That night, after the two colonels Hamiltons went to bed, David Ramsay and I being alone on the hatches above, David Ramsay and I drinking and smoking a pipe of tobacco, told me many abuses in the court of England; laying the whole blame upon the Lord-Treasurer.

He told me, that the marquis had sent him with a challenge to the Treasurer, and that Popery and Arminianism had ever come the most part from the Bishops; and that there was nothing looked for but desolation and change of religion, and that the poor soul the king was blinded to his ruin; and that he had been plain with the king, till he did give him no ear; therefore he said, he had retired himself from thence, since no honest man could live there, and with many such discourses he laboured to possess me. My answer was, The Lord amend those evils, and no remedy but patience. By God, Donad, (said he) I will use your own phrase, we must help God to amend it. He told me, he had brought as much gold with him, as would maintain him at the rate of six pound a-day for three years, and did assure me that before that time would expire, that God would raise up some men to defend his Church, and liberate honest men from slavery. Withal he told me, that his majesty at his parting with him, told him, that he would do with him as king Henry 4. said to Colvil, I will think on thee in absence as present.

Thereafter I did desire one favour of him, that he would tell me if the marquis of Hamilton would come over; he said, he would tell me to-morrow. The next night after, I did renew my former question of the marquis's coming over, and he said he would. I asked him what content my lord marquis had at home? He said none; for the king had forced him to marry a wife, and to acknowledge her, who he said was a very beast. I asked him of what religion my lord marquis was? He said, a good protestant, and before it were long, he would let the world see his aim was the defence of his religion. I told him, it did avail us little to make the Gospel a fair passage in Germany, if we lost it at home. He said, there were many honest men in our land, and that the marquis would use his army to protect them, which was his only aim. I desired him to go no further on with me; for I would not desire more trust of it, but that I would spend my blood in my lord marquis's quarrel. Well, my lord, I will go no further, for my master's secret no man shall get.

The third night, on land in an isle, he told me, that Alex. Hamilton and sir James were to go for England, and he to Holland; yet if I had any thing to do in England, that he would be willing to do me service. I told him I had a mind to seek the reversion of Orkney from the king my master, if the marquis would mediate with my master; for it were good for my lord to have a friend in that place for his ends. He said, By God it was to be thought upon; and he did desire me to give him leave to think upon it that night. On the morrow, he and Alexander Hamilton did desire me to write a general letter to the marquis, with the two colonel Hamiltons, with great assurances of true friendship from their master, if I would continue constant in resolution; I did give them my letter, and so we parted.

In the month of July, a day or two after the taking of Stetin, I did encounter Mr. Meldrum who came from England: after salutations, I did ask him what news? He answered me, matters are worse and worse; the king giveth greater way to Papists and Arminians than before; that Cottingham was gone to beg peace with Spain; that Pembroke was dead; that the marquis governed all, and was made Keeper of Windsor, and was made knight of the garter, and was to be Admiral of England. He did ask me where his cousin David Ramsay was: I told him he was gone for Holland; he did ask me, what he had done: I did answer, that all was ended to his mind, and that Alex. Hamilton was to get powder, arms, and munition with him from Sweden, to the marquis. At these news, he did throw his cap to the ground, and cut a caper, calling aloud, Good news! good news! I am a happy man! I am happy and made for ever! I thank God my five years pains is not for nothing; good my lord Rea, is this true? Yes, said I, for I have one double of the contract, I am engaged in the business to David Ramsay, and Alex. Hamilton and sir James Hamilton, and by writ to my lord Hamilton. O my lord, (saith he) that was the work of God and not man, to inspire your lordship to go with us?

At that time I cast Lyndesay loose, to find more of Meldrum; who told Lyndesay that 6,000 trained soldiers would do the turn with their own faction in the country.

The next day at col. Leslie's tent, I encountered Meldrum, whom I did call out, and he told me that king Charles was good and created for nothing, but for desolations and undoing of kingdoms, religion, and people. There was no way but to immurate him within a wall or dungeon for ever. I asked what way we might do that? He said the way was easy: first, after the men were listed in Scotland, that they might take one month's time to learn to handle their arms at Leith, without any suspicion: then they might seize on the castles of Edinburgh, Sterling, and Dumbarton in one night, and upon Berwick; and having the castle of Edinburgh, the town durst not stir; then to fortify Leith: thereafter into England per force. I answered, the plot was good if it held.

He told me further, that he was writing a Declaration of the justness of the marquis's quarrel, with the tyrannical using and suffering of the Church under king James in his last days, and now worse groaning under his son; with the Hamiltons clear title to the crown. I allowed of all. But I did demand who I thought would take our parts; he said, he did know nine of the best eurls in Scotland that would live and die with us. As also that the body of England was with us, and some of the nobility for evil will of the Treasurer. The next day there came news of the birth of the prince; I did ask Meldrum if that would cool the marquis's intentions: he sighed and said, not if the king and queen of Bohemia will give their daughter to the marquis, as they had promised.

Is that true, said I? He answered, I should see ere it were long. That night I did desire Lyndesay to drink with Meldrum, which he did, and Harry Muschampe an English gentleman was with them. Lyndesay told me on the morrow, he did think Meldrum to be the worst secretary in the world, for he did reveal this last night all he did think. I do not remember the night's discourse; but do remit to Muschampe's relation.

A week after, I did speak with Meldrum again in Leslie's tent; so he did desire me to walk forth, and told me he had been with secretary Sadeler, to whom Meldrum did deliver a private packet of letters, and did require answer. But the Secretary told him, that the king of Sweden would write none, till he heard from the marquis of his last letters, sent with David Ramsay. Meldrum went further with the Secretary of Sweden, telling him, that it was greatly for the advantage of the king of Sweden, whose ambition was without limits, that the marquis did raise war in Britain; for if the king of Sweden had a mind to take Denmark, the king of Britain should not be able to help his uncle. The secretary of Sweden did answer, that we care not for, neither do we fear your king: for he that would not help his own sister, will never help his uncle.—I did ask Meldrum what they did intend to do with the prince and queen of Britain? He answered, the child should be cast in with his father, and the queen sent home to her mother to be put in a monastery. I did ask him, what charge he would have in those employments? He said, he should be Secretary of State, and have a horse-troop.—Meldrum did shew me also, that all who would not take our part, of Scotsmen in Scotland should be put in the Bass, or some other prison, till all were ours; and that the marquis would take pledges of all who in Scotland did lie by as neutrals at the first.

At my coming to Holland in March last, David Ramsay did leave word at Amsterdam, when I did come, to send him word; which I did: he came from the Hague to Amsterdam, and stayed with me eight days, where he did deliver me a letter from the marquis only of compliment and thanks. He told me all went right with the marquis; that he had gotten from his majesty 10,000*l.* in England, and the Wine-Customs of Scotland for 16 years; which the marquis would sell, and that all things went on without any obstacle; and that the only stay was for want of arms and munition, and especially powder; and desired me to put on hard for this, with the Swedish ambassador, which I did. Thereafter he told me, he had evil news to tell me, that the marquis's wife was brought to bed of a child.

I did ask him, where our forces should meet; he said upon the sea, and thereafter land in Scotland or England, he would tell me no more: but that for my business of Orkney, I might have it better cheap than to pay the duties of it; and he told me, that when I should meet with the marquis, he would injure in me that which he durst not ; since he would have the marquis to take the thanks to himself. And withal he did desire me, that I should not tell the marquis what had past between him and me.

I did ask him, what part of England we should best land at ? He said at Yarmouth or Harwich, or thereby. He told me that England had made a peace with Spain very prejudicial to Holland ; and that the treasurer, and such of the Spanish faction, as Carlisle, and Cottingham, and Kenelm Digby, had muffled the king to bar the Hollander from the fishing ; which he said might fall out happily for them, and he did desire me to assist them at the prince of Orange's hand, as a special service to the marquis : and I did speak to the prince of Orange, and his excellency told me, that he would do his best therein.

He told me, that Spain and France were striving who should first drink up England in their ambition ; but he hoped the marquis should prevent them both. He did ask my advice, whether it were best to cross the seas once, or to go on bravely ? I answered, delays were not good, which he did subscribe to ; and so we concluded, and I came for England.

At my coming to England, my lord Hamilton did give me many thanks, assuring me, that he would not want me ; and that I should have what conditions I would desire, for he said, that should not separate us. I did desire his lordship to go on with me really, if he meant to have my service, he should have it without conditions ; he did answer, My lord, I will not want you, for I have written to the king of Sweden, with Elphinston and Meldrum, that I will detain you with me, and assure your lordship, that he that will hazard with me now in this business, it shall be a tie to me and my posterity, to hazard my fortune and estate with him and his. The same word the next day he sent to me, with sir James Hamilton, the earl of Haddington's son.

The said sir James Hamilton and I being together, I did much commend a suit of apparel which sir James had ; his answer was, I have them on, pay them who will, I have taken them up, it may be a merchant of London will pay for them, ere it be long ; my lord, take one also on luck's head.

The first day, my lord marquis went down to Greenwich in a barge, accompanied with sir James Ramsay, sir James Hamilton, sir Robert Ballenden, Capt. Douglas, and, I do think, Ludowick Leslie, the king our master having gone before ; the discourse was moved, if they were to make an insurrection, where would they begin ? The marquis answered, he would march to London directly ; and one of them, I think Capt. Douglas, said, that he knew a house in London should make them up for ever.

That day my lord marquis told me, he would sell the Wine-Customs, for he expected no more from England. Capt. Douglas told me, that they would have from the king 100 barrels of powder, and that they would make shift for arms. Sir James Ramsay told me, on Sunday last at Greenwich, that he had 1,500 men in readiness on a week or less advertisement ; and that his stay only was here, till he heard the men in Scotland were ready, and that his rendezvous would be at Norwich, and meet the rest. Sir James Hamilton told me, that the English rendezvous should ship at Harwich, for he said, the devil have his part of the river of Thames, he did not like it.

The earl of Roxburgh told me, that he and others the marquis's friends, were at first against the marquis's courses ; but now since they saw his lordship so far engaged, and that he only aimed at the glory of God, that he and all others his friends would put to their helping hand.

On Thursday last, the earl of Roxburgh told me, that the marquis would hasten his resolution, and said, that he would assure me, my lord marquis thinks himself for ever bound to me, and so do all his friends, for his lordship's cause ; and I will assure your lordship he trusts you, and that you never took a more fast and real friend by the hand.

My lord Roxburgh, sir James Ramsay, and captain Douglas questioned me, what was the reason, that I had taken on sir Pierce Crosby, since the marquis had cast him off ? This day severally, I told them, I was forced, in honour and conscience, to keep my promise to the king of Sweden ; so that I did take on sir Pierce Crosby, to send him thither with Irish and English, and that myself was minded with all the Scots that I could get, to follow the marquis's fortunes ; the which answer severally given, gave them all content.

In witness of the truth of these, I have signed it with my hand, day and year aforesaid.

After reading of the whilk relation judicially, the said lord Uchiltrie declared, that so far as his memory serves him, there is no difference betwixt the foresaid copy of relation, subscribed by the five counsellors, and the principal, or original, set down and subscribed by the said Donald lord Rza : upon the making of the whilk declaration, his majesty's Advocate asked Instruments.

Thereafter his majesty's Advocate answering to the former alledgeances proponed by the pannel, and to the first part thereof, he opponed the pannel's own Depositions, made upon the 20th and 24th of June, subscribed by the five councillors ; and whilk are granted by the pannel to be true copies, together with the representation subscribed and written with the pannel's own hand, whilk verifies the first and last points of the particulars concerning the pannel's positive affirmation of the treason. And that the marquis was prime agent thereof, together with the speeches spoken to his majesty, upon the Sunday after dinner ; and as to the third particular point of the Dittay, anent the earls of Haddington, Roxburgh, and Buccleugh, who are called Plotters; that is verified by the relations made by the lord Rea the 18th of May, acknowledged also by the pannel, and by the lord Rea's Depositions, whilk are used conjunctly, for verifying the second particular point of the Judgment, anent the three noblemen who are called Plotters, the one thereof, viz. the relation to prove the negative part of the Dittay, and that the pannel had no warrant from the lord Rea: and for verifying the affirmative, that the lord Rea disclaimed the same uses, the said lord Rea's Depositions. And where it is alledged, that the Dittay, so far as it is founded upon the lord Rea's Deposition, is not relevant against the pannel, because he is the pannel's party, and because he was not sworn, and not in presence of parties, 'quod est testis singularis,' and not subscribed by him; it is answered, first, That the negative point per se is sufficient to infer the relevancy of the Dittay in this point; that he gave them up as Plotters, without any warrant of the relation from the lord Rea, whilk is clear, by conferring the List of Representation, given in by the pannel (wherein they are called Plotters), with the said lord Rea's relation. Whereby it is evident that the Representation, given in upon the 16th of May, could have no warrant of the relation, whilk in the pannel's Depositions is affirmed to have begun upon the 13th of May, and closed the 18th of May, and delivered to the Lord-Treasurer to be given in to his majesty. Within the whilk relation there is not a word of the said three earls; neither can the pannel pretend ignorance hereof, in respect he in his own Deposition grants and confesseth, that the Lord-Treasurer, to whom they were remitted by his majesty, desired to give in the relation in writing, conform to the whilk the pannel and the lord Rea went together and consumed the whole night in drawing the said relation; whilk night was the night or evening of the said 17th of May, whereupon first they appeared before his majesty. And the pannel having given in the representation of the prime agent and the plotters upon the 16th day preceding, he could not have omitted such a substantial point of the relation, which so nearly touched the marquis and the three noblemen aforesaid, and the pannel's own exoneration. Like as the pannel himself with his own hand wrote up and drew off the said lord Rea's Papers the said relation of the 18th of May: so that the pannel can never affirm, that he had any warrant from the said relation for branding the marquis as prime agent, and the said three noblemen as plotters.

And as to the Arguments made against the lord Rea's Deposition; First, the same is not used per se, but jointly with the other, 'Et junctâ plena faciunt fidem.' Next the lord Rea is not the pannel his party, 'sed est author et mandator quem tenebatur edere,' otherways he would have been himself culpable of treason, or, a delator of treason against the said noblemen, 'pœna talionis vel tautopatheias' by act of parliament, made by king James 6, par. 11, cap. 42. Next, 'Nulla necessitas jurisjurandi quia non testis sed author a reo nuncupatus.' And the singularity cannot be objected, because he used him 'tanquam singularem et solum,' to warrant his declaration; and for present he could not be, if the lord Rea had been examined 'tanquam testis,' as the pannel alledges; and as to the authentickness of the copy of the relation, it is approved by the pannel, and he cannot be heard to object against the authentickness thereof, nor of the other copies; because they are subscribed by the said five counsellors, and have the warrant of his majesty's missive letter directed to the council: which the pannel for reverence of his majesty's letter, and of the counsellors subscribers of the said copies, has acknowledged as true. And therefore cannot be heard to object against the remanent, whilk has the like solemnity of his majesty's letter, and consequently the fourth alledgeance ought to be repelled.

Quinto, It is alledged for the pannel by his prolocutors, That as to the particulars of his Dittay, the pannel purges every one of them in manner following; viz. The first particular point is not relevant, because that the pannel at his first meeting with his majesty upon the 17th of May did signify to his majesty, that the business was a Treason against his majesty, and that the party was the marquis of Hamilton, as he was informed. This Article enforces not against the pannel, that he is a leasing maker and forger, but clearly frees him thereof, bearing 'as he was informed.' Whilk Article being the sum and substance of the whole Dittay having the aforesaid clause (as he was informed) annexed thereto, inforces of necessity the same clause to all the particulars of the Dittay comprehended under the said general, 'quia semper specialia generalibus insunt.' And that the pannel spake it by information, it is clear by the pannel's Depositions upon the 20th and 24th days of June, and by the lord Rea's Deposition the 21st of June, acknowledging the pannel's Examination to be true in all points, in so far as the same concerns the knowledge, words and acts of the lord Rea, and by the relations made by the lord Rea and subscribed by him, and other relations made by the said lord Rea to the pannel by word, as the pannel's own deposition bears. Neither was it ever heard or practised, that any subject being necessitated by the law to reveal what may concern the king's majesty or the state, and revealing the same with his informer therein, and constantly abiding thereat, and willing to maintain the same upon any torture or trial whatsoever; that the revealer, upon the party's denial, should be called in question of his life, as the deviser and forger, or the same to work any ways against the revealer; and which if it should now take place, and begin to be a preparative against the pannel; it were to give way and occasion to all treasonable exploits, and that securely, because none would or durst reveal the same.

Next, as for the List of Names of the principal agent and plotters represented to the Lord Treasurer the 16th of May, affirmed to be forged and invented by the pannel himself without any warrant from my lord Rea, conform to the pannel's deposition upon the 20th and 24th days of June last, none of the pannel's depositions foresaid, to the whilk the Dittay remits, bear any such confession or forging by the pannel; but bears expressly the lord Rea's relation to him in both the pannel's depositions, which is sufficient for an informer.

It is asked by the pannel, That whereas it is alleged by my Lord Advocate, that the pannel could never ascribe any true cause or knowledge in the List or Representation where the lord marquis is named prime agent, and the said earls of Haddington, Roxburgh, and Buccleugh, plotters; because the Lord Advocate affirms, that the relation was given in upon the 18th day, and the List presented to the Treasurer the 16th day; and so the pannel could have no just reason why these contained in the List, were not contained in the Relation, which was posterior. The pannel affirms, that howsoever the List was given in before, the reason thereof is thus: The Lord Advocate making mention of his relation, distinguishes not betwixt a relation by word, and another by writ; but so it is, that my lord Rea made relation to the pannel upon the 13th of May of the whole things contained in the Relation upon the 18th of May, as appears evidently by the pannel's 1st and 2nd depositions, and upon the 14th and 15th days my lord Rea renewed the discourse concerning my lord Seaforth, and explains himself in these particulars concerning the earls of Haddington and Roxburgh, anent their being upon the secret and counsel of the marquis's courses; That it was represented upon the 14th and 15th days, the lord Rea and the pannel being both at Greenwich, returned upon Monday morning, being the 16th day, to London; at which time the pannel went unto the Lord Treasurer, and there fell in discourse with the Treasurer on the business concerning the marquis's power in Scotland, and friendship with the pannel, and to shew his lordship he would let him know was very great; and so came forward to the pannel's own house, and wrote the Representation, and delivered the same to the Lord Treasurer, which was done upon the 16th day, being Monday. And where my Lord Advocate alleges, that there could be no ground for this representation before the giving in thereof from my lord Rea's written relation, because the representation preceded it in time, and the Plotters were not named in the relation, whilk therefore followed upon the 18th of May, answers the verbal relations concerning the Plotters made by the lord Rea to the pannel preceded the scriptural relations given in to the Treasurer; yea and the representation both, because done upon the 14th and 15th days of May, the representation being upon the 16th, and the written relation upon the 18th. Neither was it needful to the lord Rea to make that relation in this paper, which he had made to the pannel before by word, like as there are sundry other things in the pannel's depositions, whilk are not set down in that written relation. First, because in all the written relation, no mention is made of my lord Seaforth, or any thing proceeding from him; if of nothing from him, why then of the grounds of the pannel's representation, whilk was had from my lord of Seaforth?

The Justice continues all farther disputation and reasoning in this matter (by reason of the lateness of the night) to the morn the 2d of this month of December, and ordains the Pannel to be returned to Ward, to remain therein in the mean time; the persons also warned apud acta to the morn, all persons under the pain of a thousand marks.

Intran'

James Lord Uchiltrie, delated of the crimes foresaid, contained in his Dittay.

Pursuer.—Sir Thomas Hope of Craighall, knight and baronet; his majesty's Advocate for his highness's entries.

Prolocutors in Defence.—Mr. Robert Nairne, Mr. Alexander Pierson, Gilbert Neilson, Advocates.

The said James lord Uchiltrie by himself repeats the former first Alliegance, word by word, as it stands, and eikis thereto, that he can no ways be in mala fide: That the grounds of his Representation preceded not his written representation hoc argumento, as it is alleged, because the lord Rea had omitted in his relation to make mention thereof; whereas my lord Rea's facts cannot make the pannel guilty simply; neither can his omissions take away the strength of the pannel's arguments of his innocency: For it was the pannel's part to follow him, and not to lead him; to reveal assertions, and not to indite assertions to him. Neither was the Pannel under any just cause of fear that his omission could endanger him in the point; because he was conscious to himself, that my lord Rea had told him the grounds of his Representation of before, viz. upon the 14th and 15th days of May, by verbal relations thereof upon the said days. The pannel likewise knew that there was a second relation wrote of sundry other particulars to be made by my lord Rea subsequent; among the whilk he knew the grounds of his preceding verbal relations of his representation was to be justified and cleared. So by these reasons the lord Rea's omission of the grounds of the pannel's

Representation out of his scriptural relation, in tempore, can give no just ground to invalid or infringe the truth of the pannel's assertion. That my lord Rea by verbal relation preceding both the representation and that written relation, had told him that the earls of Haddington and Roxburgh were upon the council and secret of the business informed against the lord marquis. The same last argument holds good likewise for my lord Buccleugh; and as to the representation in general, the pannel declares, that it was written and given in upon a discourse of my lord treasurer's inquiry for the friendship of the marquis in Scotland by blood and interest; whereby conjecture might be made if his power suppositive, if his friends had joined to him. And this is clear by the very writ itself, in naming it a representation, and not an information, accusation, nor relation. The general strain of the writ likewise evidences, that there was no intent by that writ to reflect any thing concerning the lord marquis or those three noblemen. Because the representation containing one side and a half of piper, but which concerns these noblemen originally will scarce take up two long lines. Whereby it is manifest, that the intent of the pannel was more to illustrate other things, viz. The alliance and interest in blood of the noblemen to these first four, than any intent of either delating or asserting any crime or fact against these first four; but to distinguish by way of narration betwixt the one and the other. And although he be said, the pannel attests, that the mentioning of these noblemen succeeding the first four, be taken in no evil part, for he attests no meaning to that effect, whilk the pannel thinks Christian charity will not presume; his wife's son, his children's brother, the prop of his providence under God, and of his wife and children, the earl of Cassils being one; and the marquis of Huntley his chief by his mother, his good dame, brother's son, who saved the pannel's life, and for whom the pannel has ventured his life, or any of his; can it be presumed that he impannelled would have intended malice to that mass, wherewith these two helped to make up the construction? Neither doth it appear by any intent, that any thing was meant by the representation, but an explanation of noblemen's power in Scotland. Neither let this be thought any new invention, or new explanation; because it is mentioned before that alledged by my Lord Advocate in the Dittay, and acknowledged thereby; neither can it be presumed, that these words, prime Agent and Plotters, import an information of any thing, because all direct affirmations must be enunciation, and must have suum vinculum to join the subject and the attribute together. Which vinculum and connection of it want no enunciation; if no enunciation, no affirmation, nor lye. But if it is, the words (prime agent) have no vinculum, nor the word 'plotters' simply has no vinculum betwixt them as attributes, and the persons named as the subject, and therefore no enunciation, nor affirmation, nor lye. And where my Lord Advocate in his Dittay affirms, that it is manifest by the pannel's own deposition, the truth of the Dittay; and in the dispute yesterday, produces a particular, that the pannel should have deponed, that the lord Rea said, that he had no certainty of the business; this can no ways fortify the assumption of the Dittay. Because the pannel's deposition says not that the lord Rea had certainty, but whether he had certainty or no, the words whilk the pannel alledges was told to him by the lord Rea; for the pannel's deposition depends not upon a scientia certa, but relatio certa, that he spake it to the pannel as he has deponed. As to the third Article of the Dittay, auent the pannel's proceeding and speeches to his majesty the 23d of May, to-wit, 'Sir, ye know the business, but know not the time; sir, either do, or die;' this Article enforces not upon the pannel lying to his majesty. For the lord Rea, and the pannel upon his information, both had acquainted his majesty with the business, so that the pannel might truly say, 'Sir, ye know the business;' and it is as true, that the pannel knew not the time. As to the words 'do or die,' that is a usual phrase of speech, and imports, 'Sir, see to your safety,' till these informations had been cleared, and is of itself a faithful advice to his majesty, and not a malicious counsel; and advice for to prevent the king's majesty his harm, and not to draw harm upon any other: like as the words themselves inforces not against the pannel, as the Dittay bears; but does very well admit a harmless sense, and should be interpreted to the best meaning the words may admit. 'Quia de jure etiam in dubiis et obscuris quod minimum et benignius sequimur. Lege nona et 56 de regulis juris; et in ambiguis orationibus maxima sententia spectanda est ejus qui eas protulit. Lege 96. ibidem: et quoties idem sermo duas sententias exprimit, ea potissimum accipienda est, qua rei gerendae aptior est, dabit autem operam exprimi reus dicta verba at cui licito;' to-wit, the revealing of purposes he heard against the king and state. 'Denique in pœnalibus causis semper benignius interpretandum est.' And therefore the pannel's speaking and insisting with the king's majesty to see to his own safety, should be referred to its own cause; to-wit, the pannel's most bounden duty and tender love to the king's majesty, his welfare, and to the state of the kingdom, fearing their faith, upon that relation that had been made to him. And also fearing his own faith, if that he should have been found any ways remiss or slack in not insisting with his majesty to prevent those evils and treasonable plots, so often related and repeated to him; and whilk the pannel then feared to have been treason, and to have come beyond sea. And should not be attributed, as the Dittay bears, to any malicious counsel, or purpose of the pannel, for instigating, or stirring up of his majesty, to any sudden and violent course against the marquis's life and honour; as the pannel attested before God, to have been his true meaning. Like as he in his Examination in June, upon the 21st thereof, depones, that upon Sunday morning whilk was that day he advised the king's majesty with these former words, was, that he should go to London for more safety, and that the pannel had no other end of speaking of the words foresaid.

Item, The words 'do or die,' can be no Leasing, because they are not words of affirmation, but of counsel or advice.

As to the Paper of Names, whilk the Dittay affirms; the pannel has confessed to be made by himself, and that the lord Rea was not privy to the making thereof nor delivery of the same to the Lord-Treasurer; it is answered, these words made by yourself, is written with your own hand, so purported to be by the Dittay itself, in that article anent the list of names delivered to the treasurer. To the writing of the whilk paper with pen and ink, and to the instant delivery thereof, by the pannel to the said Lord-Treasurer, the lord Rea was not privy, he not being present with the pannel at that time; but does no ways enforce, that the names and matter of that written paper was forged and devised by the pannel. But by the contrary, the pannel by his deposition, made the 20th of June, whilk bears, that after the lord Rea had revealed to him the particulars, he desired the pannel to acquaint his majesty; or the Lord-Treasurer, therewith; leaving to the pannel his own free-will, whether he should acquaint him therewith by word or writ. 'Et hic maxime spectanda est sententia preferentis,' who is no ways contrary to himself in his depositions; and whilks both subsists in their own true sense.

As to the Article bearing the pannel in his Examination, being inquired for what cause he did name the lord marquis to be prime Agent; and that the pannel affirmed, that he could assign no true reason nor warrant from the lord Rea: it is answered, that the pannel is not obliged to give any true cause. But that the lord Rea's relation to him qualis qualis is a sufficient warrant.

Secundo, The Pannel's deposition upon the 21st of June bears the contrary of the said Article, and assigns the cause to be, that the lord Rea had told him, that the lord marquis's followers had said, the intent of the marquis's levies was to invade Scotland or England. As also the Pannel's Examination upon the 20th of June purports, that upon the 13th of May, the lord Rea came to the Pannel's chamber, and there putting the Pannel in mind of their former speeches, told the Pannel that the purpose of the marquis of Hamilton's levies, as divers of his commanders and followers had informed him, was, that either they should not go out of England or Scotland, or if they did, they should return to England or Scotland, and surprize the king's houses in Scotland, viz. the castles of Edinburgh, Striveling and Dumbarton, and fortify themselves in Leith, under the pretence of training, and should take Berwick, and so march forward into England: and that the intention so to do, was, as the lord Rea said, that he was so informed, and as the deposition in itself bears.

Tertio, The lord Rea's written relations of divers persons discourses to the same purpose of the whilk he was informed by themselves whilks written relations, although they be written on the 18th of May last, yet are of matters and purposes that passed long before, and related of before to the pannel by word, by the said lord Rea.

Quarto, The lord Rea at his first coming to his majesty in this business, in the pannel's hearing, being asked of the king's majesty, why he had not told his majesty sooner of it; the said lord Rea answered, because it concerned so near the marquis of Hamilton, who was so near to his majesty; he was afraid to communicate the same to his majesty immediately, as the said lord Rea's deposition taken upon the 21st of June purports.

Item, The lord Rea's deposition made upon the 21st of June, wherein he depones, that he said he should bring as honest a man as himself, that would tell to the lord marquis's face more nor the lord Rea would do; so all that the pannel spake herein, was by information, and so therein is no forger, nor maker of Leasings.

Item, The pannel's deposition, taken upon the 20th of June, bearing that the pannel told the Lord-Treasurer, That the lord Rea told him, he had yet more, and would say so much, as the lord marquis would not have a face to deny it; whilk the lord Rea then present affirmed, in so much as the Lord Treasurer said, then is the business at an end, there needs no more writing. And this Article before repeated, the pannel affirms, that the Lord-Treasurer of England heard these words, and did affirm the same before the king's majesty and council of England, upon the peril of the pannel's head.

Item, As to the Article bearing the lord Rea's Declaration upon the 21st of June, that he knows nothing against the person of the lord marquis, but that the marquis was as good a subject as any the king had: it is answered thereto by the pannel, that his deposition and representation depends not upon the lord Rea's knowledge, but upon his relation made to the pannel. And that Declaration of the lord Rea's takes not away the relation made by him to the pannel, and doth not infer making and forging of Leasings in the pannel without warrant from him; this specially being considered, for weakening and infringing of the lord Rea's oppositions to the pannel's depositions, that my lord Rea having said these words in presence of the Treasurer of England, and justified by the Lord-Treasurer of England, in presence of his majesty and council of England, that the lord Rea would say so much, as the marquis should not have the face to deny it; and now he says that he knows nothing anent the marquis's person: whilk are contradictory to himself, and renders himself not sufficient to improve the pannel's depositions.

Item, Here the pannel, in this place, repeats the objections of the nullities, made against the lord Rea's Depositions, so far as the same may be prejudicial to the pannel.

Item, As to the Article, bearing that the pannel being asked, by what warrant, he called the three earls Plotters; and that he answered that the lord Rea had told him, that the lord Seaforth had affirmed to him, that the earls of Melros and Roxburgh were acquainted with the particulars and secrets of that business; declaring therewith, that the lord Rea had affirmed the same to him, before he gave in the paper of representation to my Lord-Treasurer. Albeit the lord Rea, by his deposition the 24th of June, declared, that the first time the lord Seaforth had speech with him, anent the said two earls, and their being privy to the marquis's business, was upon the Monday after the marquis's coming out of Scotland, and not before; and so after the representation given in to the Treasurer upon the 16th of May, containing the names of the Plotters and Actors; at which time the pannel could not truly affirm any information from my lord Rea: to the which it is answered by the pannel, that he, by his deposition made the 24th of June, has declared, that all the understanding the pannel had in the business, came to him from the lord Rea, also by his deposition the 20th of June.

Item, The lord Rea's granting of the speech himself, anent the two earls, makes presumption against the said lord Rea, likewise for the time, 'Quia dicta facta presupponunt et trahunt se cum suis circumstantiis:' neither is it probable nor ordinary, that there should be that sagacity of spirit in the pannel, as to press what the lord Rea should make to him so long before, 'Quod non præsumeret, sed præsumptio, pro eo est, quod maxime est, secundum naturam toto; titulo de presumptionibus.' And so this Article enforces not against the pannel, that he is maker and forger, because the lord Rea denies not simply, but the time of the pannel's deposition thereanent; which is no leasing.

Item, The pannel in his Examination upon the 20th of June, in the course and order of the depositions thereof, which is the order of time, before the article anent the representation of the list of names to the Lord-Treasurer; he depones, that the lord Rea had told him, that he had spoken with the lord Seaforth, and had understood that from him; which general has no other meaning but that which is particularized, by the said lord Rea's Examination upon the 24th of June; in that article thereof, bearing that the lord Rea did affirm to the pannel, that he heard the aforesaid report of the two earls, before the pannel made or delivered the paper of representation.

Item, The lord Rea's deposition upon the 24th of June, bears not the lord Rea to deny, that he did affirm to the pannel, that he heard the report of the said two earls from the lord Seaforth, before the pannel made or delivered the paper of representation to the Treasurer.

But purports, that the first time that the lord Seaforth had any speech with the lord Rea, touching the two earls, their being privy to the particulars and secrets of the lord Hamilton's business, was upon Monday after the marquis's coming from Scotland. And so that the lord Seaforth had not spoken with the lord Rea thereanent at that time; which is nothing to the pannel, whether the lord Seaforth had spoken with the lord Rea or not. But denies not the foresaid report of the two earls made by the lord Rea to the pannel, which the lord Rea did then affirm, that he had the same by information of the lord Seaforth; neither is the pannel obliged to make good the lord Rea's warrant herein, that the lord Rea had the same by information of the lord Seaforth; but the question is, if the pannel heard the same from the lord Rea, before the giving in of the representation to the Treasurer. Which the pannel affirms and abides at, conform to his depositions, made upon the 20th and 24th of June, as said is.

Item, The pannel here also repeats all the objections against the lord Rea's Depositions, ut supra.

Item, Anent the Article, bearing, the lord Rea to have told the pannel, that he could not guess who else should have been in the plot, unless it were the lord Buccleugh; and that the lord Rea, who by his deposition upon the 24th of June depones, that the pannel, and not he, did name the earl of Buccleugh, as one would take arms in Scotland to assist the marquis: It is answered thereto, ut supra, that the pannel by his deposition has declared, that all the understanding he had in the business, came to him from the lord Rea; as the pannel's examination bears, and which he abides at as most true.

Item, The pannel's deposition upon the 24th of June, bearing the lord Rea told him, anent the earl of Buccleugh, is not simply, but cum causa, bearing the lord Rea's reason, wherefore he named him: and which reason in substance is granted by the lord Rea, although with some diversity of words, at the least not denied in his Examination upon the 24th of June. And therefore, the said lord Rea's deposition affirming the reason, but denying the naming the said lord Buccleugh, ought not to be credited in his denial; but the lord Rea's affirming of the reason, inforces upon him the naming of the said earl. 'Quia ratio confessa dicti præponderat et præsumit contra proferentem.'

Item, The lord Rea's speeches to the pannel anent the lord Buccleugh, though conjectural, necessitate the pannel to the representation, and revealing of the same to his majesty; especially seeing the lord Rea strengtheneth the same with reason wherefore he so spake, to wit, that he heard the lord Buccleugh speak terrible and presumptuous words against the king's majesty, at his own table in Holland; as the pannel's deposition upon the 24th of June purports, and which is granted by the lord Rea himself in substance, at the least not denied.

Item, The pannel repeats here again all his objections against the lord Rea's depositions; and alleges that it was never heard nor practised, that a subject being necessitate by the law, to reveal what may concern the king or state, and revealing the same with his informer therein, and constantly abiding thereat, and willing to maintain the same by any trial or torture, that the revealer, upon the party's denial, should be called in question of his life, or the same any ways work against the revealer. And whilk if it should now take place, and begin a preparative against the pannel, the same were to give way and occasion to all treasonable exploits; and that securely, because none would or durst reveal the same.

And further, where it is affirmed by the ditty, that in the list presented by the pannel to the Lord-Treasurer, there is designed the earls of Haddington, Roxburgh and Buccleugh to be Plotters; the pannel had ground to make the relation, no ways affirming any thing positive; because in the pannel's deposition made the 24th of June, being examined and asked why in the aforesaid paper, he makes the said earls plotters;

It is answered in the Deposition, that the lord Rea had told the pannel, he could not guess who else should be in the plot, unless it were the earl of Buccleugh; whilk word Plot, having had relation to the earl's business, must also have relation to the other two earls, seeing they were spoken of all at one time.

It is answered by his majesty's Advocate, first to the first article of the fifth exception, anent the purging of the Pannel's speech to his majesty, upon the 17th of May: By this word that is subjoined, as the Pannel is informed, whilk the proponer for the Pannel will have to be repeated in all the subsequent passages concerning the business; first, that this word, 'as he is informed,' cannot purge him, because he received no positive information from the lord Rea against the marquis, nor no warrant to call him party, prime agent, and to affirm to his majesty the business was known; to whilk last he subjoins his counsel, very dangerous for the life and estate of the marquis; whilks three are conjoined to infer against the pannel, an exceeding of the relation made to him by the lord Rea, and the exceeding of it, with the peril of the nobleman, his life and estate; there being neither word nor passage in the lord Rea's written relation, whilk may either warrant their speeches; or infer them by consequence. And in matters of this high strain, as of treason, no illation by consequence is permissible, but upon the peril of him that infers: For in all the written relation there is not a direct word spoken against the marquis, neither by David Ramsay, nor by Mr. Robert Meldrum; but allanerly some mad and frantick speeches uttered by Meldrum upon his own imagination, or wish to have it so, for disturbance of the estate, by expressing the manner how such an enterprise, according to his foolish opinion, might be performed; but not one word or syllable, that Meldrum heard it from the lord marquis, or from any who declared they heard the marquis speak it. And as to David Ramsay, the worst word that is in his relation, is anent the marquis's discontentment, and all the marquis's aim was to use his levy for the protection of religion; whilk aim and intention the lord Rea, after his coming to England, clearly understood by the lord marquis himself; who employed him to be a colonel in his company, and gave him this assurance, that he that would hazard with him in that glorious business for assistance of the king of Sweden, should make use of him, with the hazard of his fortune and estate: and none of these passages will quadrate with those speeches spoken by the Pannel to his majesty: That it was a treason, an odious treason, and the lord marquis party, as the Pannel was informed; and that it was the filthiest treason that ever was intended, and that the Pannel was sorry that any Scotsman should have fallen into it, it being a shame to the whole nation: whilk is a positive affirmation, not as the Pannel was informed, but as he himself did infer, upon the relation made to him by my lord Rea, who would give the Pannel no assurance he had any certain ground, whilk is manifest by the Pannel's deposition upon the 20th of June last. And as to the relation albeit it avowed with these words, as he is informed, could give the Pannel no warrant to express these positive speeches to his majesty, upon the 17th of May; so far less to the other of prime agent, and known business, with the subsequent counsel. First, Because they are positively spoken without adjection, (as he is informed), and where the proponer for the Pannel urges that these words 'as he is informed,' must be repeated in all subsequent passages; that has some probability, 'in unico continuo actu, vel unica scriptura.' But here the acts are diverse, the days diverse, the expression of writing diverse, the list being upon the 16th of May; the speech with the king, as he is informed, upon the 17th of May; and the speech of the known business with the council being upon the 22d of May: and these three taken conjunctim evidently charges the Pannel with the excess of his duty. For he did all his duty that was required of him, as a faithful subject, when upon the 15th of May, whilk preceded all the expressions, he came to the Lord-Treasurer and told him, that he had a business to reveal concerning his majesty, and whilk, as he said, concerned the marquis of Hamilton's actions; and that he had the same of the lord Rea: after the whilk, he had no necessity as a loyal subject, to go further. And yet he goes on to the expression of all these speeches, and adds thereto his dangerous counsel to his majesty; whilk can have no respect to the lord Rea's relation, nor to the Pannel's duty in revealing of it. And where the Pannel would purge his giving in of the lists first, because it is not an enunciative speech, 'quia caret vinculo' this is contrary to the representation, bearing the vinculum to the marquis of Hamilton as prime agent: and this word is must be repeated in the subsequent word Plotters; the sentence being, the earls of Melros, Roxburgh, and Buccleugh plotters. Whilk is a sentence that has a clear signification, affirming the attribute plotters upon them three, in as evident and clear signification, as the clause subsequent, whilk names the whole noblemen adherent by blood.

And where it is alledged, that albeit the pannel named the lord marquis prime agent, he did allanerly upon intention to distinguish the marquis, and the other three earls from these of their adherents in blood; and urges that this intention should be charitably expounded :

It is answered, that ' crimen vel delictum ' non potest purgari bona intentione.' And if the points contained in the Dittay, whereupon the pannel is accused, be in their own nature criminal, they cannot be purged by a good intention, nor yet by a protestation adjected, the time of the doing it. But the intention, with the fact and deed, are both alike judged odious, and punishable. ' Et nunquam præsumitur ' bona intentio nisi probetur, ad eluendum crimen,' as it is instanced, by Jul. Clarus de injuriis, ' ta mentiris salva reverentia.' This instance being adduced, whilk by the opinions of all the doctors cannot excuse the committers of the injury, and much less in this Dittay; whilk contains ' injuriam capitale,' striking upon the life and fame of the noblemen. ' Nam qui defamat, jugulat plusquam maledic- ' to quam in manu injuria est qui sic inciditur, ' ut nota et iam ad posteros transeat, quod est ' sepe eundem occidere.' and charity can have no place here, without the offence of justice, whilk craves the due punishment from the offender. And where it is alledged, that the pannel had no warrant, both to name the marquis prime agent, and the earls plotters, by a verbal relation from the lord Rea, there can be no respect had to a verbal relation, except it were proven to the judge, especially in a matter ' tantæ atrocitatis.' Neither can the pannel alledge to a verbal relation, to colour his behaviour therewith; because the pannel affirms, that their verbal relations were made upon the 14th and 15th of May; whilk precedes the relation exhibited in writ, upon the 18th of May. In the whilk relation there is not a syllable of the three earls as plotters; albeit in the relation there is mention made of the speeches spoken by the earl of Roxburgh to the lord Rea. And the pannel having given in his list upon the 16th of May, and knowing the peril of adding or paring to that, whilk was related to him in a matter of this importance; whilk should have been as tenderly handled, as the life, honour and safety of our gracious sovereign upon the one side; and the care to eschew the branding of noblemen with the odious aspersion of his treason, did require of him, on the other part: And cannot pretend a colour of excuse by the omission of the names of the said three earls in the relation given in upon the 18th of May thereafter; specially seeing the relation in effect was his own deed; because he brought the lord Rea to his majesty, to make the relation. And the lord Rea, in his relation to his majesty, spake never a word of the three earls; nor yet the pannel in his relation to the king's majesty, and the Lord-Treasurer, spake not a syllable thereof: whilk is clear by the pannel's depositions upon the 20th of June, which bears his relation, made in presence of the councillors his examiners; wherein is no word of the three earls. And likewise by the Examination of the lord Rea upon the 21st of June, which is such like; and when his majesty had remitted the pannel and the lord Rea to the Treasurer, who directed them to draw up the lord Rea's relation in writ; the pannel confesseth, that he and the lord Rea went home, and sat up all night; and that the pannel, after the lord Rea had put the relation in writ, did write the same over with his own hand, out of the lord Rea's Papers. And yet not a word of the relation of the three earls; which would not have been omitted, if it had been truly done. And where the pannel pretends, that the omission thereof was in respect that the relation contains allanerly that which was related by the lord Rea upon the 13th of May; but not that which was upon 14th and 15th of May; which was learned of the lord Seaforth; that alledgeance hath no warrant of the relation, nor yet any appearance at all; because in the pannel's examination upon the 20th of June, the pannel doth confound of that which was done upon the 14th and 15th of May; but not one word of the earls, albeit in that same examination he makes mention, that the lord Rea had spoken with the lord Seaforth. And sic-like, in the examination of Donald lord Rea, upon the 21st of June, 1631, and also the pannel's own deposition foresaid; that the pannel two days after the relation, which behoved to be upon the 20th of May (relation being upon the 18th), the pannel brought the lord Rea to the Treasurer, and caused him to subscribe his relation; at which time the pannel told the Lord-Treasurer, that the lord Rea had more to say: whereupon the lord Rea being asked what it was, and wherefore detained, the lord Rea answered, that he had spoken with the lord Seaforth, and had sundry particulars from him, which he did not tell to the lord Uchiltrie in particular, but generally affirmed to him he would say more. But one or two days after, the lord Rea went to the earl of Seaforth, and then told the same, first to the pannel. And that the pannel, upon the Sunday of the morning (which was the day of the marquis's returning from Scotland) he had told the Lord-Treasurer these particulars, spoken by the lord Seaforth, and therewith also of the marquis's return: whereby it is clear, that as nothing is contained in the relation touching the three earls, neither in the verbal relation to his majesty and Lord-Treasurer, nor in the subscribed relation; so the speeches thereanent spoken by the lord Rea to the pannel, was not till eight days after giving in of the list.

And where it is alledged by the pannel, that as the lord Rea's fact cannot burden him, far less his omission; it is answered, first, it must bind him, because he has named him, to be his author: and wherein he is not his author, the pannel himself must needs be the forger. And next, because the relation in effect is the pannel's own deed, as said is; and as to the purgation of the speeches, that the business is known, 'Sir, either do or die;' that the same must be interpret 'secundum communem usum loquendi;' and to mean as mickel as, see to your own safety: it is answered, that they must be taken properly, and not improperly, and must be ruled by the preceding speeches of the party and prime agent; as if the pannel had said to any person, this man slew your father, 'do or die.' In the which case, the words would not be exponed safety, but revenge: and where it is alledged 'quod in du-bis benignior fieri debet interpretatio;' this rule of law has only place 'in contradicibus, sed non in criminibus, præcipue atrocioribus,' as this is. But it is urged, 'hic sumus in fac-to licito;' but it is answered, 'hic in maxime illicito.' Because there was nothing required of the pannel, but to reveal, whilk was done of before; and whatever was done after the revealing, that might tend to the hurt of the reputation of the noblemen, or touch them in their life and estate, was altogether unlawful and capital; and the unlawfulness is manifest, by the subjoining of that pernicious counsel, 'to do or die:' whilk is not of the nature of a relation, but of the nature of the instigation, of a sovereign prince to a dangerous act, tending to the destruction of the life and honour of them, against whom the counsel is given; and by their answers, the whole objections made against the particulars of the libel are solved. To the which is added, the lord Rea's declaration by oath, freeing the marquis, his majesty's letter of the 29th of June, sent down to the council, declaring the lord marquis, and the said three earls of Haddington, Roxburgh and Buccleugh (to be as his majesty knows them to be) as good and faithful subjects as any within his majesty's kingdoms; and declaring his majesty's resolution, to have those who have given false information against them, to be punished. After the which, did follow his majesty's letter of the date of the 24th of September, for trying and censuring the pannel, upon the particulars given forth by him against the noblemen: wherein the pannel, notwithstanding of all his purgations, can have no just warrant against the marquis, specially in the two last points of prime agent, and known business; nor pretext against the earls of Haddington and Roxburgh; but, by the pannel's confession, least of all against the earl of Buccleugh, against whom he had nothing but a guess by his own confession, and yet he makes him plotter.

It is duplyed by Mr. Robert Nairne for the pannel, that this Dittay consists upon three deeds done and committed, by the pannel, together with his intention in the doing of them. As to the pannel's intention, that it was not of purpose of making any leasing, against the act of parliament, but to the revealing of an alledged treason against his majesty; the revealing whereof was necessitate by that addition ad-joint to the last act of parliament libelled: for obedience of the whilk act, the pannel did what-ever was done in this business by him, and that the first part of the dittay is not relevant against the pannel to infer the punishment libelled against him, is clear, by retorting of the argu-ment after this manner: A deed commanded by the act of parliament, cannot infer a punish-ment by the same act of parliament; true it is, that the first deed contained in the assumption of this dittay was commanded by the act of parliament, imponing a necessity to all hearers of treasonable speeches against the king or state to reveal the same: Ergo, he did the same lawfully. Whereas it is alledged in the dittay, that by and after the information which the pannel had by relation, he has exceeded in the particulars expressed in the dittay. And first, in the first particular, at the doing and speak-ing whereof by and after the anterior informa-tion, which the pannel had received, the lord Rea his author was present: who being inquired or by his majesty, why he was so long in re-vealing of the alledged treasons; he answered, That he was afraid to do the same, in respect of the nearness betwixt his majesty and the marquis. So that that which the pannel did for obedience to the law, and his author being present beside him, is no ways relevant to infer the punishment of Leasing-makers against him contained in the act of parliament. Like as also the said lord Rea, after the said relation to his majesty being remitted to the lord-treasurer, declared that the marquis was party; and further said, That he would cause as honest men as the lord Rea himself to affirm the same.

Whereas my Lord Advocate, in his reply, quarrels the former words positively set down, and not by relation: it is duplyed, That the form of the speech is not in question here, but the matter; for albeit, that the pannel had reported in other words, or by a description, or paraphrase, that which my lord Rea related unto him, without changing or altering of the substance, commits no fault, nor cannot be accounted therefore a leasing-maker. And here the proponer repeats the words contained in the relation and depositions, which he remits to the Judges consideration. And to the second part of the subsumption, aenit the deli-very of the List of Names to the treasurer, it is answered, That that part of the Dittay is most irrelevant, and cannot be subsumed upon the proposition of the indictment; for to reason thus, all leasing makers should be punished. True it is, that the pannel has written, and delivered a list of names to the treasurer: Ergo, he ought to be punished, is an evil argu-ment, which is remitted to the judge, except it had libelled, that the said list contained leas-ings, which is not libelled. And albeit it had been libelled, it is alledged, that the said list of names as it is set down, contains no purpose, for it is not written therein, prime agent and plotters in such a treason; not only indefinite prime agent and plotters. And if the pursuer will force these words, to this alleged treason contained in the relation, the pannel then will repeat the word used of before (as he is informed). And here alledges, that it is as lesome, or rather more lesome to the pannel, to erk true words for the pannel's good, nor to the pursuer of the Dittay, to erk others for his accusation. And albeit the said words had been adjected, whereby the sentence might have been filled against the pannel; yet he closes himself with the relation made by the said lord Rea verbally, before making of the written relation. And where it is disputed, that there cannot be a verbal relation here respected; it is answered for the pannel, that it is clear, the written relation we learned of the marquis's servants and followers tantum.

And further alledges, That the disputation of the time of the giving in of the List upon the 16th day, and the time of the speaking of the lord Rea with the lord Seaforth, upon the 21st day, is no ways relevant nor material; it being confessed, at the least not denied by my lord Rea, that he had related of the three earls to the pannel: For the deed being constant, the circumstance of time is not so material, and cannot be presumed that the pannel should have any knowledge thereof; who had of before been very long absent, and no ways interested in their advice, and altogether ignorant of them; could of himself without any information, named the same persons whom the revealer was to name, and none other.

It is answered by his majesty's Advocate, That he opposes the Dittay, with the reply made to the former defences.

Lastly, It is alleged for the pannel, That as it cannot be proceeded against the Pannel here in Scotland, but conform to the laws and statutes of England, the place of the pannel's alleged offence, and according as the fact is punishable, or not punishable, and more and less punishable in the kingdom of England; so there can be no legal accusation institute or laid against the pannel here in Scotland for the said facts and deed, but upon the laws of England, or at least upon the common law. And true it is, that the Dittay is not founded upon the laws of England, nor yet upon the common law; but upon the municipal laws of Scotland, and acts of parliament thereof: And therefore the Dittay is no ways relevant, subsuming and concluding upon the acts of parliament, mentioned in the proposition of the Dittay.

Item, If the relevancy of the Dittay all be sustained, it is alleged, that there can be no pain inflicted, but that whereby the said facts and deeds are punishable by the laws and statutes of England, or by the common law, and no ways by the pains mentioned in the said acts of parliament. 'Quia iudex originis vel domicilii non potest punire subditum delinquentem extra territorium, nisi secundum penam impositam a jure communi vel statutis loci in quo deliquit, non autem secundum statuta ipsius loci originis vel domicilii.' Jul. Clarus, Quæstio 85.

To the whilk it is answered by his majesty's Advocate, That the first part of the alledgeance is altogether unreasonable and absurd; and as to the second part of the alledgeance, it is answered, That the pannel, being a Scotsman by birth, and also quond domicilium being resident, by his lady and children in Scotland; and having committed the crime libelled against four noblemen in Scotland; he must be subject not only to the laws of the kingdom, but to the pain and punishment contained in the laws: like as his majesty by his missive letter has ordained him to be tried and censured by the laws of the kingdom. And where it is alledged, that he is only punishable by the pain inflicted in England, where the crime is committed; and for this alledged Jul. Cl. in his 85th question; first Julius Clarus in that place calls the matter disputable, 'et egere decisione Cæsaren.' Next, he adduces the number of doctors, conflicting in divers opinions pro et contra. And in the end he seems himself to incline to the punishment loci delicti. And after it, cites Marianus in cap. 'Postulasti extra de foro competenti: quid dicit generaliter esse communem conclusionem, quod delinquens debeat punire pœna imposita a statutis loci in quo delinquens puniatur.' And this last speech after his own carries communem opinionem, for his own is only given, ad cautionem, to free the judges from inquisition of law. From whilk the Justice-General is well warranted, by his majesty's letter commanding the pannel to be judged, conform to the laws of the kirgdom.

And further, it is granted by Jul. Clar. to the which the proposer assents in his acceptation, 'quod posset delinquens punire pœna juris communis vel pœna loci ubi delinquitur.' But so it is, that by the common law, 'Calumniatores puniuntur pœna talionis, lege quisvis Cod. de Calumniatoribus, novella Leonis 77. Lege finali Cod. de accusationibus Leg. 38. digest. de pœnis.' And Cicero in his fragments cites the Law in his Twelve Tables, in these words: 'Nostræ inquit, duodecim tabulæ cum per paucas res capite sanxissent in his hanc sanxientiam putaverint; si quis activavisset quod infamiam fateret flagitiumve alteri, et præterea atrox injuria, de jure communi punibilis est pœna mortis.' Jul. Clar. Questione 83 numero 9.

The Justice continues this Diet with all further disputation and reasoning in this matter, to the morn the third day of December instant; and ordains the pannel to be returned back to his ward, therein to remain in the mean time. The persons of assise warned thereto, apud acta, as of before, ilk person under the pain of 1,000 marks.

Intran'

James lord Uchiltrie, delated in the crimes foresaid, specified in his Dittay.

Pursuer.—Sir Thomas Hope of Craighall, knight and baronet; Advocate to our sovereign lord for his highness's entries.

Prolocutors in defence.—Mr. Robert Nairne, Mr. Alexander Pierson, Gilbert Neilson, Advocates.

It is duplyed by the said James lord Uchiltrie himself, being entered upon pannel anent the first part of my Lord Advocate's reply, hearing, that the Clause, as he was informed, can no ways be repeated in the particulars. And although the pannel so said, yet he has no positive information from the lord Rea; it is answered, the same ought to be repelled, because of the clause 'as the pannel was informed' purposed in the Dittay itself: For the pannel in that whilk is the same, and strength of the whole Dittay, is necessarily understood, and should be repeated in all the subsequent passages of the Dittay; because it is unicus actus continuatus. And whilk whole three parts of the subsumption, as they are used conjunctly by my Lord Advocate against the pannel; so the pannel alledges that these words, as he is informed, contained in the general, must be understood and repeated in all the three several parts of the subsumption; as being the sum of all, whilk is after alledged, or was after imparted by the pannel, and ought so to be understood. And where it is alledged, that where the pannel, although he said, 'as he was informed,' yet it is no positive information from my lord Rea, to ground a positive assertion of the whole, contained in the Dittay.

It is answered thereto, He had positive assertions and information quoad relationem; sed quoad veritatem he was not bound to have it; sic-like many parts of his affirmations would be best cleared by the confronting of the pannel and his informer, whilk was never yet done. Neither are the chief of the pannel's affirmations, alledged by my Lord Advocate, simply taken, positive affirmations, but with interpretations, constructions and glosses, dipping in mentem of the pannel: To which God is his only judge, and it is an hard matter by presumed constructions, to draw the pannel to the question of his life; 'Nan non presumuntur delicta, sed probantur.' The pannel refers himself to his deposition, in substantialibus, undenied by the lord Rea, as is clear by the pannel's former exceptions. Whereas my Lord Advocate mentions the madness and foolish imagination of Meldrum, as the lord Rea's author of the speeches; first, the pannel protests, he urges nothing against those noblemen from himself, ab origine. But he adheres to the Relations of the lord Rea, verbal and by writ; neither disputes he against Meldrum's sufficiency, or for it; but that Meldrum's words, related to him by the lord Rea, gave him just ground of revealing. And as to the words alledged, related by the pannel to the king, anent the odiousness of the matter, and the lord marquis as party; this can no ways be laid to the pannel's charge as a fault, much less as a crime capital, because the informer, viz. the lord Rea, was present at the discourse; and related himself to the king, eadem tempore, the particulars of what the pannel had spoken; neither did he at that time oppose him, or contradict him in one circumstance, whereby the pannel was bona fide exonerated, and therefore ought not now to be laid to his charge. And further, in the time of the pannel's relating his own words, the pannel affirms, that he did it with tears coming over his cheeks, no sign of malice, or sowing sedition, in expressing these words to the king, like as his majesty bare record thereof, before the council of England, the impannelled being present.

And to that part of my Lord Advocate's Reply, anent the lord marquis to be prime agent; the pannel repeats the first member of his duply, together with the impannelled's former exceptions thereanent.

And where my Lord Advocate affirms, that the pannel did his duty sufficiently in the first discourse, and might have acquiesced there with duty; the pannel affirms, that he could not, because all the time, from the 13th of May to the 20th, it was actus continuatus, by constant information running from the informer to the pannel; and so required a constant duty, whilk he durst not omit, neither with safety nor duty. And this is clearly by my lord Rea's own Deposition; who affirms the relating of several things, in several days and times, and is manifestly proven by the pannel's own depositions.

And where my Lord Advocate refuses to the pannel the exception of charity, answering, That 'crimen non potest purgari bona intentione, transeat,' where there is 'crimen simplex.' But where there is 'tantum crimen,' by constructions, periphrases, and glosses, supra mentem, yea, contra mentem of the pannel; there charity justly may be admitted: For a good intention, as it will not purge a manifest crime, neither should the wresting of the pannel's intention inforce a crime, and so not debar charity.

And where my Lord Advocate doth urge against the pannel's defaming of the noblemen, it is answered by the pannel, that the first author must be the defamer, and not the revealer; the whole matter of the pretended defamation, being original acts of the lord Rea's quoad defensorum, upon pannel, and not acts of the pannel; as it is evident, by the pannel's two depositions, the lord Rea's first deposition the 21st of May, where the said lord Rea doth acknowledge the examination of the pannel, taken the 20th of June, to be true in all points, so far as the same concerns the knowledge, words and acts of the said lord Rea; upon the explanations then following. By which explanations, and notwithstanding thereof, there is substance enough in the pannel's deposition, to prove that the lord Rea, and not the pannel, was author to the whole matter of the pretended defamation. And whereas my Lord Advocate would in his reply seem to question the verbal relations, flowing from the lord Rea to the pannel; to this the pannel opposes his own deposition, and the first article of my lord Rea's examination formerly cited, wherein the lord Rea ratifies the pannel's verbal assertions: if he ratifies them, they must be in rerum natura; if they be, my Lord Advocate's assertion is not relevant. And where my Lord Advocate alleges the leaving forth of the lord Rea's verbal relation, out of his representation in writ, given in to the Lord Treasurer; the pannel repeats his exception made therean as before. And to all my Lord Advocate's discourse to that effect, containing one side of paper, the pannel opposes his first answer, and his depositions, and the lord Rea's relations, and his examinations agreeing thereto. And whereas my Lord Advocate would bind the pannel to answer for the lord Rea's omissions, because the lord Rea is his author; the pannel being sitting behind at the time of the expression, can hardly find means to be persuaded that it came from his majesty's advocate; and opposes and repeats the pannel's exception herein. And where my Lord Advocate, upon these words, ye know the business, and not the time (do or die), says, that these words should have a proper interpretation; which is, says he, to be a counsel given by the pannel, for subversion of the marquis's honour and estate: the pannel answers thereto, that he adheres to his exception already already alleged; and further adds, that the lord Rea said to the pannel that Sunday morning, that the lord Seaforth had said to the lord Rea, their purpose was to take the king, the queen, and the prince: and so the information being given to the pannel, furnished to the pannel great cause of fear, and his fear the reason of the expression of these words, of advising the king to prevent his danger; as the pannel had formerly advised my Lord Treasurer of England, to advise his majesty to retire to Whitehall from Greenwich, as to a place of more safety. And this is clear, by the pannel's deposition the 20th of June, ratified by the lord Rea in the first article of his examination the 21st of June.

And where my Lord Advocate alleges, that the lord Rea and his majesty's letter frees the marquis of Hamilton, and the other noblemen, by the lord Rea's oath: It is answered thereto by the pannel, that the pannel doth not charge them; he only charges the lord Rea as his informer and author, humbly attesting, that in what essential points the lord Rea is contrary to the pannel, he does the pannel wrong: and therefore the pannel declares, that whosoever it shall please his majesty to permit the pannel and the lord Rea to be confronted, or if then upon difference, the matter be not cleared of the pannel's innocency; the pannel is ready to hazard his life in a duel, to the glory of God, and to the clearing of the truth of this business, his majesty commanding the same, with a protestation, that he carries no malice to the said lord Rea. If the business be not decided by this, or that if his majesty is pleased to admit torture before a duel-trial, the pannel is ready with him to bear out the torture, and to be tried thereby, with the said lord Rea, and let the truth then appear: which if it be not then, whenever it shall please God to call the pannel to bear testimony thereof with his blood, if God be not graciously pleased to bear him up in it, let men so conceive: and if God bear him out in it, then will he be found meet after his death, to have been an honest man, and his blood shall be required of the takers thereof.

My Lord Advocate, before any answer to be made by him to the pannel's former duply, produced his majesty's Letter sent down to the lords of his majesty's privy-council, of the date of the 20th of June, 1631, and desired the same to be judicially read, of the which the tenor follows:

"To our right trusty, &c. the viscount of Duplin, our Chancellor; the earl of Menteith, President of our privy-council; and to the remanent earls, lords, and other of our privy-council, of our kingdom of Scotland."—Sic suprascritur,

"C. R. Right trusty, &c. we greet you well. Whereas we are informed of a practice in appearance so pernicious, and nearly concerning us, as we would not but take some trial thereof, both by ourself, and some of our council, appointed by us for that purpose. But in the mean time, because of some sinistrous rumours maliciously dispersed thereupon, to the prejudice of our right trusty and right well-beloved cousins and counsellors, the marquis of Hamilton, and the earls of Haddington, Roxburgh, and Buccleugh, and some others; lest the like reports be brought unto your ears, we have thought good hereby to declare, that not only we have found by the trial we ourselves have taken, that they are altogether innocent and clear thereof; but likewise that the prime informer thereof hath now cleared them upon oath, testifying them, as we know them to be, as good and faithful subjects, as we have in any of our kingdoms. And for the business itself, whosoever it shall be fully tried, we will thereafter express our further pleasure concerning others interested therein, according as we shall find just cause, either in punishing any person that shall be found guilty, or in punishing any person that shall be found to have given false information. And whereas we have formerly by our letters recommended unto you, our right trusty and right well-beloved cousin the mar ‘quis of Hamilton, for furthering the speedy levy and transportation of his men with all possible diligence; these are again to require you to contribute the best help that your authority or endeavours can afford for that effect. Whereof, both out of the regard we have to him, and to that employment, being very confident of your best care; we bid you farewell. From our Court, at Greenwich, the 29th of June, 1631.’

After reading of the which Letter of his majesty, it is answered by my Lord Advocate, that the urging of the pannel to have the words ‘as he is informed,’ to be repeated in all the rest of the Dittay, wants all reason; the points of the Dittay bearing relation of several deeds done in several times. And where it is alleged by the pannel, that these words, ‘as he was informed,’ were true, ‘quoad relationem et quoad veritatem,’ there was no necessity: If this were true, the Dittay were eluded, for the pannel is not accused of a Leasing in respect of the verity of the matter related, but in respect of his discrepance from his author, and that he affirms more than his author, and with greater certainty than his author: and that, not content with both these two excesses, he follows it out to the very point of execution, which is evident in the point of certainty, by these words spoken to his majesty, ‘the business is known,’ which is more certain by the opposition of the uncertainty of time only, which redoubles the certainty of the business. And in the point of execution, by that pernicious and cruel counsel, ‘do or die:’ the effect of which pernicious counsel, if God in mercy had not disposed the royal heart of our wise and gracious sovereign, would have produced more lamentable effects, nor could be quenched with the pty of tears shed by the pannel. And the conferring of the lord Rea (whom the pannel calls the prime author) with himself, in the progress of his behaviour, will manifest the pannel’s guiltiness of the points of the Dittay, wherein he is accused: for the lord Rea, who behaved to have greater certainty than the pannel, never proceeded to the points of positive party, prime agent, plotters; and to say to the supreme sovereign prince, that the business was known, in all which points the pannel has involved himself; but the lord Rea was content to reveal the reports made to him by David Ramsay, and Mr. Robert Meldrum, to the pannel, without adding or paring. And when the pannel, upon the 22d of May, which was the day of the marquis’s returning from Scotland to England, came to the lord Rea, and told him, that he had been with the Lord Treasurer, and acquainted him with the passages, which he had from the lord Seaforth, and of the lord marquis’s return, and that he had conceived, that it might be dangerous at that time for his majesty; for the which cause the pannel in his deposition saith, that he did advise the king to remove from Greenwich to Whitehall or Loudon; my lord Rea answered, that the pannel had done evil therein, for there was no such suddenness to be feared: yet notwithstanding hereof, and that his author had reproved his rashness, the pannel went thereafter and attended his majesty at dinner, and at the end of dinner spake these words of the certainty of the plot, uncertainty of the time, and added the counsel. Like as the pannel being asked, hereupon granted that he met with the lord Rea upon that Sunday the marquis came to court, and also that he met with the Lord Treasurer; and counselled his majesty’s removing from Greenwich to London. But denies that the lord Rea said, that he thought it was evil done. Notwithstanding hereof, the pannel went thereafter and attended his majesty at dinner, spake the words and gave the counsel; like as his majesty being something awakened by that fearful counsel, sent for the lord Rea, and did acquaint him, that some present danger was suggested to his majesty, upon the marquis’s returning. To the which the lord Rea answered by oath, that he knew nothing against the marquis, for any thing he knew, but that he was as good a subject as any his majesty had.

And where the pannel would labour to free himself, by denying the counsel given to him by the lord Rea; it cannot be a warrantable excuse, except he would prove that his author advised him to do it: which is improbable, seeing the lord Rea, his author, neither did it, nor allowed of its being done by the pannel. And where it is alleged by the pannel, that he had sufficient warrant from his informer, he cannot affirm it, as being contrary to the relation made by his author: which is not a syllable of the marquis as prime agent, nor of the three noblemen as Plotters. And whatever the pannel did after the discovery of the business to the Lord-Treasurer, which was upon the 15th of May; it was the pannel’s own word, work and deed, as the giving in of the list, expressing the certainty of the plot, and urging the putting in execution. And where the pannel alledges, that all was done upon a good intention, and that God is only judge of the mind; it is true where the mind is not revealed by speech or act punishable of the law: but if either speech or deed be done against the law, the pretext of the mind will never excuse it.

And albeit it be true, as the pannel alledges, ‘Quod delicta non presumuntur sed probantur,’ yet it is as true, ‘Quod in delictis presumitur dolus nisi probatur contrarium.’ And in the case of this Dittay, we have a law prohibiting Leasings and Calumnies under the pain of death; and seeing by the Dittay, there are three particulars libelled, which his majesty in his Letter of the date of the 29th of June, has called false informations, and which directly fall within the compass of the law, as reflecting upon the life, honour and estate of the noblemen; the pannel’s excuse by intention is too slender, to free him from the punishment of the law. And where it is alleged by the pannel, that he has named his author, and that he was present the time of his relation, and did not contradict him therein, which the pannel alleges for a sufficient ground of his exoneration; the contrary is true: for the lord Rea, in his Examination upon the 21st of June, doth acknowledge the pannel's Examination to be true in all points, saving the explanations thereafter subjoined. But this approbation cannot exceed the subject; and also the subject must be restricted according to the conditions of the explanation; but so it is, that in the pannel's examination, which is approved by the lord Rea; there is not one syllable of the lord marquis as party or prime Agent, or of the three noblemen as Plotters.

And therefore that falls not within the compass of the approbation, and where it may appear that in the pannel's examination upon the 20th of June, it is granted, that on Monday the 16th of May, he delivered to the Lord Treasurer the list of names; that is not a part of the pannel's relation approved by the lord Rea: but it is the pannel's answer to an interrogatory, asked of him by the counsel, which could have no respect to the lord Rea's relation. Like as the pannel being examined thereupon the 24th of June, grants that the list was made by himself: and that the lord Rea was not privy to the making thereof, which is also confessed by the lord Rea himself in his examination the 21st of June, 1631, and last article thereof. Wherein he depones, not only that he was not acquainted with the list of names delivered to the Lord-Treasurer, but that he had nothing to do therein; which both excludes the concurrence of the making of the list, and his knowledge of the purpose of it. And where it is alledged by the pannel that after the revealing to the Lord-Treasurer, he could not abstain from the remanent passages of his behaviour, because it was actus continuatus by the lord Rea to the pannel, from the 13th of May to the 20th of May; it is answered, that after the first revealing, the pannel had no more to do in the necessity of duty, because his author was revealed: and whatever followed after discovery made by the pannel, would have tied the author and not the pannel; there being no law that might have punished the pannel for shifting his course after the revealing. But there being manifest hazard and danger in law, to follow further after the revealing of the business, which the author thought neither clear nor certain; and the pannel not being conscious upon what mind the lord Rea made his first information to him, which might very readily have been upon malecontentment, grudging and malice, his credulity to him was cruelty against the noblemen. And his going forwards after the revealing, was a manifest engagement of himself, in the malice of the author, and drawing upon himself the opinion of greater.

And where it is alledged by the pannel, that his behaviour cannot be counted in the nature of Leasings, punished by act of parliament, but allanerly by way of illation and sinister construction; the contrary is clear, by the three points of the Dittay. And the pursuer, in his reply, has most justly challenged the pannel as a defamer of noblemen; because their fame, honour and credit was unblameable before it was taxed by the pannel; and the lord marquis brought under danger of the loss of life, honour and estate.

And where it is pretended by the pannel, that the cause of his speaking of these words to his majesty, upon the Sunday of the marquis's coming to court, was because the lord Rea told the pannel that the lord Seaforth had assured him, that the Plot was for taking off the king and the queen; first, that excuse has no warrant from the lord Rea's deposition; next, in that same conference betwixt the pannel and the lord Rea upon the said Sunday, the lord Rea told him it was an idle fear; and thirdly, it cannot be a pretext, because that passage of the taking the king and queen, is contained in the relation made by the lord Rea upon the 18th of May; and so cannot be pretended as a new information lately come to his knowledge, to waken the pannel to such a pernicious counsel. And this shall suffice for answer to the duply, which is closed with that which is contained in the reply; that the pannel had no warrant of his speeches and proceedings positive against the marquis; nor colour of warrant against the three earls, and neither warrant nor colour at all against the earl of Buccleugh, against whom the pannel, by his own confession, had nothing but the guess of the lord Rea; which the lord Rea not the less refuses, and affirms to be the nomination of the pannel. But howsoever it is only a guess, by his own confession, from his author, and yet in his list he makes him a plotter. And albeit the like evidence of the pannel's calumnies against the other two earls being undoubted, as having no warrant at all from the lord Rea's relation, wherein there is no syllable of these noblemen; and that the excuse made by the pannel of a verbal relation by the lord Rea, has no probability, and also is contradicted by the lord Rea, being poised thereupon: yet in these two noblemen the pannel covers himself under the shadow of a verbal relation, against that which himself drew up in writing; but in the lord Buccleugh's he is excluded from all verbal relation, in respect of his own deposition, whereby he is manifestly convinced of incurring the punishment of the acts of parliament whereupon the dittay is formed, as having named him plotter, when by his own deposition he grants it to be a guess of the lord Rea.

It is quadruply by the pannel, that for answer to the triply, made by the Lord Advocate his pursuer, he repeats and opposes his defences contained in the former exception and duply. And further the pannel adds, that where it is objected by my lord advocate against the pannel, that he had no ground nor cause from the lord Rea's relation, from the pannel by word, to call the two earls of Haddington and Roxburgh plotters; but by the contrary, that the lord Rea refuses and denies the same; again the which objection, the pannel does repeat and adhere to that article of his second deposition, dated the 24th of June in these words following: he saith, the lord Rea did affirm to the examinant, that he had the fore-said report, anent the earls of Melros and Roxburgh, from the lord Seaforth, before the pannel then examined, made or delivered this said paper or list to the treasurer. And in the article preceding, in the same deposition, the pannel affirms the lord Rea told him this; whereby it evidently appears by the two articles joined together, that the pannel had ground for that part of his representation.

And whereas it is affirmed by my Lord Advocate, that the lord Rea denies the same, this comparing of the pannel's assertion, and the words of the lord Rea's denial together, the lord Rea's words will be found to import no direct nor clear denial; the pannel affirms that the lord Rea told him, that the earl of Seaforth told him, that the said two earls were upon the secrets of the business of the marquis; my lord Rea's words in his denial bearing, that the first time the lord Seaforth had any speech with him, touching the said earls of Haddington and Roxburgh, their being privy to the particulars and secrets of the lord Hamilton's business, was on the Monday after the marquis's coming out of Scotland. The pannel affirms, that the lord Rea told him such a thing; the lord Rea says, the lord Seaforth spake not to him any such matter before such a day: how do these two agree or contradict one another? The pannel affirms the lord Rea told him; my lord Rea affirms my lord Seaforth told him not such a thing before such a day: what is that to the pannel, if the lord Seaforth had never told that to the lord Rea, the lord Rea might have told it to the pannel for all that? And where it is alledged for the fortifying of the triply by my lord advocate, that the lord Rea in his deposition, denieth that he was acquainted with the list of names, delivered by the pannel, or had any thing to do therein; the pannel affirms, that this eludes not the particular words concerning the two earls; because of the denial of the general list, wherein they were ingrossed: for the manner of the discovery was left to the pannel, when the direction of the discovery was given him. And so it was not needful that the lord Rea should be acquainted with the papers, with the pen, the ink, the hour and the manner of the writing; because that was left to the pannel. Neither can the general denial of one piece of paper take away the pannel's testimony of the certain, determined, condescended upon by word. And for his word that he had no hand therein, is not meant de materia, affirmed by the pannel, reported to him against the said two earls; because he grants the substance in the preceding deposition made by him thereanent. And as to that relation by that list, concerning the earl of Buccleugh as plotter, for defence of the pannel's deposition it is produced in these words, bearing, 'And further saith (to wit the pannel),

'that the lord Rea had told him, he could not guess who also should be in the plot unless it were the lord Buccleugh; of whom the lord Rea said, he heard him speak terrible words against the king, at his own table in Holland.' There it is affirmed, that he suspected the lord Buccleugh to be upon the plot: if suspected to be on the plot by the lord Rea, and told by him to the pannel; the pannel was necessitated to reveal the same, yea in iisdem terminis, to reveal him to be a plotter; whom he said, he suspected to be upon the plot. To this my lord advocate objected, my lord Rea's denial, which are in these words: 'That the pannel and lord Rea having some speech together, who might be looked for in Scotland to take arms; the pannel, and not the lord Rea, named the lord Buccleugh. Whereupon the lord Rea told, that at the siege of the Busse, the lord Rea heard the lord Buccleugh use some words, whereby the lord Rea took the lord Buccleugh to have come malecontent out of England. In this presumed denial, there is contained a discourse betwixt the pannel and the lord Rea, as the lord Rea alledges. And in this discourse, that the pannel should have named the lord Buccleugh, and not the lord Rea; this naming, is a naming in the respect of time first or last; for the lord Rea grants that he did name the lord Buccleugh, because of the last words of that clause; so that his denial respects only priority of time, but no ways the pannel's assertion: for not a word of his assertion is denied. But by the contrary, for corroboration of the pannel's just ground, concerning the earl of Buccleugh; the lord Rea makes addition of more nor the pannel had remembrance of; and so fortifies his affirmation, and proves no denial thereof.

The pannel adds further, for eluding of the mistaking of these his words, 'Sir, we know the business, but not the time, therefore do or die.' It is affirmed by the lord Rea, that he did hear of his majesty that there was a danger suggested to him; which danger my lord advocate alledges to have come from the pannel's words. If a danger but by the king's self apprehended, then not a persecution, for a danger imports defensive remedies, and not violent and malicious attempts; yea, it imports and implies a preventing, and not a prosecuting. And lastly, it clearly confirms the mentioned intention of the pannel's expressing of those words, which was to prevent his majesty's danger. This the pannel's alledgeance, is cleared in the lord Rea's deposition, made the 21st of June; yea, this is my lord Rea's relation, to whom the pannel never spake, since the pannel and he entered to their trial. As for the words, 'Sir, we know the business infallibly, this is no lie;' because the pannel and the lord Rea was at his majesty's ten days before, and affirmed the same: the pannel by relation from the lord Rea, and the lord Rea from others, 'and so that is no lie.' And that the pannel did not know the time, it is alledged in the contrary, ergo, not no lie. As for the words 'do or die,' by my lord advocate's declaration, it is but 'concilium perniciosum.' And that it is not 'mendacium,' neither can it be made nor interpreted 'mendacium,' by any probability or sense, and no malicious council, as is alledged against the pannel; considering the pannel's declared intent, and the lord Res's before-mentioned examination, wherein it is called a danger, 'so not a lie,' and therefore not rightly subsumed.

My Lord Advocate repeats his former replies and triples, and desires my Lord Justice to close this process, so that there be no further dispensation or reasoning herein, till ament the relevance or irrelevance of the indictment. The Justice by Interloquitor declares the process to be closed; and continues Interloquitor upon the alledgeances proponed by the pannel against the ditay, and answers made thereto by his majesty's advocate, to Wednesday next, the seventh of December instant; the persons of assize warned apud acta, to compear the said day in the hour of cause, ilk person under the pain of 1,000 marks. And ordained the pannel to be returned to ward, therein to remain in the mean time: whereupon my Lord Advocate asked instruments.

James lord Uchiltrie, delated of the crimes foresaid, mentioned in his indictment.

Pursuer.—Sir Thomas Hope of Craighall, knight and baronet; his majesty's advocate for his highness's entries.

Prolocutors in Defence.—Mr. Robert Nairne, Mr. Alexander Pierson, Gilbert Neilson, Advocates.

The lord Uchiltrie being entered upon pannel, produced to my Lord Justice, an Act of the lords of his majesty's secret Council, for continuation of this Diet, and of all further trial or proceeding against him, for the crimes contained in his Ditay, to the first day of February next to come; of the which act of council the tenor follows: 'Apud Halyrudhouse sexto die mensis Decembris, anno Dom. millesimo, sexcentesimo, tricesimo primo. The Lords of the secret Council, for some special causes and considerations, ordains and commands his majesty's justice, justice-clerk and their deputies, to continue all farther Trial and proceeding against James lord Uchiltrie, upon the crimes whereof he has been accused before them, till the 1st day of February next.

Whereanent the extract of this act shall be unto them a warrant, extractum de libris actorum secreti consilii S. D. N. Reg's, per me Jacobum Prymrose clericum ejusdem, sub meis signo et subscriptione manualibus, sic subscribitur Jacobus Prymrose.' According to the which Act of Council, warrant and command aforesaid, therein contained, the Justice continues all further trial and proceeding against the said James lord Uchiltrie, upon the crimes aforesaid, unto the said 1st day of February next to come: and ordained him to be taken back again to his ward, therein to remain in sure firmance, till the said day. The whole persons of assize, called upon by their names, are of new warned, apud acta, to compear before his majesty's justice, the said 1st day of February next to come, in the hour of cause; ilk person under the pain of 1,000 marks. Whereupon my Lord Advocate asked instruments.

The lord Uchiltrie, appearing on the said 1st of February, was sentenced to perpetual Imprisonment.*

* "The lord Uchiltrie, a man of a subtil spirit and good parts, had not those endowments of his mind been stained with some ill qualities: his malice against the marquis of Hamilton was hereditary, he being the son of capt. James Stewart, who in king James's minority, when the Hamiltons were groundlessly and in a mock parliament attained, carried the title of earl of Arran, and possessed their fortunes." Burnet's Memoirs of the dukes of Hamilton, p. 11, and 12. where he relates the whole business; and p. 12, says, "This was a calumny, than which hell could not have forged a fouler, for lord Uchiltrie judged that this would infallibly have produced one of two effects, either raised such a jealousy in the king's thoughts, as to have quite ruined the marquis, since few ministers are proof against such whispers, or at least it would have stopped his voyage for a while, till he was tried, and the smallest delay in that would have scattered his soldiers, (which the king was to send under the marquis's command, to assist the king of Sweden to recover the Palatinate) so that this design failing, in which his honour was now so far engaged, a stain should lie on him through all Europe. Lord Weston carried this story to the king, whether provoked to it out of hatred to the marquis, or moved from his zeal and duty to the king, shall not be determined; though the last was pretended by him, in many of his letters to the marquis. But his majesty knew the marquis too well, and understood all his motions and the progress of this affair, too exactly to give any credit to this forgery." And p. 18. "But the marquis was not able to lie under such terrible imputations, wherefore he pressed that Uchiltrie might be put to it, to prove what he had alledged: but all he offered against Ramsay was only a presumption, which Ramsay denied, and Rea affirmed; so that they were both put under bail, and nothing appeared that did touch the marquis: for though Ramsay had been as guilty as the lord Rea called him, that left no imputation on him, since none can be made answerable for those they employ, unless it appear that they followed the Instructions given them. So the marquis was dispatched to Germany. Lord Uchiltrie had charged the marquis with Treason, and failing so totally in his probation, was sent down to Scotland to be tried, where he had a legal and free trial for his false charge before the Justice-General, and such assessors as were appointed to sit with him, by the privy-council; and had the marquis repaid him in his own coin, he could not have escaped capital punishment. But he was satisfied with his own justification, and such a censure put on the calumniator, as might deter others from the like attempts. Wherefore he was condemned to perpetual imprisonment in Blackness Castle, and he continued there for twenty years."—He was released by Cromwell. The severity of the Sentence against lord Uchiltrie seems to have deterred the earl of Rothes from maintaining the charge which he advanced against the Lord Register of falsely reporting the votes of the Scots parliament in 1633, respecting the confirmation of the statutes concerning religion, as then professed, and the grant to king Charles the 1st of the power to regulate ecclesiastical habits. See 3 Laing's Hist. of Scotland, 103, 104, and the authorities there referred to.

140. Proceedings in the Court of Chivalry,* on an Appeal of High-Treason: by DONALD Lord REA, against Mr. DAVID RAMSEY, 7 CHARLES I. A. D. 1631. [Sanderson's Charles the First, 164. 2 Rushw. Coll. 62, 106, 112, 142.]

["The following Case is an instance of awarding a Trial by Duel in the Court of Chivalry, though afterwards the duel was prevented. There are two accounts of it, which we shall submit to our readers. One is from "Sanderson's History of the Life and Reign of Charles the First;" the other from "Rushworth's Historical Collections." Bishop Burnet relates the history of the accusation in his "Lives of the Dukes of Hamilton," principally with a view to justify the first duke of Hamilton, whose name was involved in the affair. See Burnet's Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton, p. 11. to 14. The bishop, it is observable, charges Sanderson with giving a journal of the procedure on lord Rea's appeal, in order to impeach the duke of Hamilton's loyalty. In Rushworth there is a Letter from Charles the first to the duke of Hamilton, which explains what was done in the Court of Chivalry, and amply proves, that the king was quite satisfied of the duke's innocence. This Letter forms a part of Rushworth's relation. As to the account in the Annals of James and Charles the first, it is merely a copy of Sanderson, with the addi-

* "It seemeth that by the antient Common Law one accuser or witness was not sufficient to convict any person of High Treason, for in that case where is but one accuser it shall be tried before the Constable or Marshal by combat, as by many records appeareth." Lord Coke's 3d Inst. c. 2, p. 26. See more concerning this Court in 4th Inst. c. 17.

"The Court of Chivalry, of which we also formerly spoke as a military court, or court of honour, when held before the earl marshal only, is also a criminal court, when held before the lord high constable of England jointly with the earl marshal. And then it has jurisdiction over pleas of life and member, arising in matters of arms and deeds of war, as well out of the realm as within it. But the criminal, as well as civil part of its authority, is fallen into entire disuse; there having been no permanent high constable of England (but only pro hac vice at coronations and the like) since the attainder and execution of Stafford duke of Buckingham in the 13th year of Henry 8; the authority and charge, both in war and peace, being devolved too ample for a subject: so ample, that when the chief justice Fineux was asked by king Henry the 8th, how far they extended, he declined answering; and said, the decision of that question belonged to the law of arms, and not to the law of England." Bl. Comm. b. iv. c. 19. § 4.

"The form and manner of waging battel upon appeals are much the same as upon a writ of right; only the oaths of the two combatants are vastly more striking and solemn. The appellee, when appealed of felony, pleads Not Guilty, and throws down his glove, and declares he will defend the same by his body: the appellant takes up the glove, and replies that he is ready to make good the appeal, body for body. And thereupon the appellee, taking the book in his right hand, and in his left the right hand of his antagonist, swears to this effect. 'Hoc audi, homo, quem per manum teneo,' &c. 'Hear this, O man, whom I hold by the hand, who callest thyself John, by the name of baptism, that I, who call myself Thomas by the name of baptism, did not feloniously murder thy father, William by name, nor am any way tion of the king's Letter from Rushworth." Hargrave.]

SANDBERSON'S RELATION.

WHEN friends fall out their faults are found, as appears by the quarrel between Donnold lord Rea, a Scottish highlander, or rather more northward of the isles Orkney, and one David Ramsey, a true Scot courtier, concerning words and designs of treason against the king and kingdom, which because Ramsey denied, they are admitted the Trial by Combate, the manner being as followeth.

The day prefix for trial was the 28th of Nov. 1631, before Robert earl of Lindsey, lord high-chamberlain of England, and now pro tempore deputed lord high constable of England. Tho. earl of Arundel, earl marshal of England, the 'guilty of the said felony. So help me God, and the saints; and this I will defend against thee by my body, as this court shall award.' To which the appelland replies, holding the bible and his antagonist's hand in the same manner as the other: 'Hear this, O man whom I hold by the hand, who callest thyself Thomas by the name of baptism, that thou art perjured; and therefore perjured, because that thou feloniously didst murder my father, William by name. So help me God and the saints; and this I will prove against thee by my body, as this court shall award.' The battel is then to be fought with the same weapons, viz. batons, the same solemnity, and the same oath against amulets and sorcery, that are used in the civil combat: and if the appellee be so far vanquished, that he cannot or will not fight any longer, he shall be adjudged to be hanged immediately; and then, as well as if he be killed in battel, providence is deemed to have determined in favour of the truth, and his blood shall be attained. But if he kills the appelland, or can maintain the fight from sunrising till the stars appear in the evening, he shall be acquitted. So also if the appelland becomes recreant, and pronounces the horrible word of craven, he shall lose his liberam legem, and become infamous; and the appellee shall recover his damages, and also be for ever quit, not only of the appeal, but of all indictments likewise for the same offence." Bl. Comm. b. iv. c. 27. § 3.

In Co. Litt. lib. 2, c. 3. sect. 102, a case is mentioned which went off by reason of what seems to have been a denial of justice. Lord Coke's words are, 'Regina voluit constituere Constabularium Angliæ, &c. et ideò dormivit Appellum.' See too sect. 153. 745.

Concerning the Constable and Marshal, see also Madox's Hist. of the Exchequer, 27. Dr. Oldis v. Donmille, Shower's Parl. Cas. 58. Some curious matter concerning Duels, and the Courts of the Constable, Marshal and High Steward, are to be found in the Bodleian Library in Oxford, Tanner's MSS. Nos. 14, 84, 85, 89, 103, 176, 278. and a treatise in MS. by Sir John Burgh in the library of the Inner Temple.

earl of Pembroke, lord chamberlain of the king's household, the earl of Dorset, chamberlain to the queen's household, the earl of Carlisle, earl of Mulgrave, earl of Morton, viscount Wimbleson, viscount Wentworth, viscount Falkland, sir Henry Vane.

The place was the Painted Chamber at Westminster: at the upper end thereof a bench was erected four feet high for the constable, and marshal, and lords assistants. Under them seats about a square table, filled with the heralds of arms, and serjeants at arms, and other officers of the court. Directly under the upper bench sate the register doctor Dethick, and over against him doctor Duck the king's advocate for the marshals court. Behind him at the bar were the two pews for the appelland and defendand.

At eight a clock comes the earl marshal (ushered in with nine heralds, and three serjeants at arms) bearing his marshal truncheon of gold, tipped with black, and commanding room, and giving orders, retired into the upper house of parliament, and then returned into the court, as to make way for the high constable, who followeth, and all took place in their degrees.

The earl marshal rises, makes obedience to the constable, and passing forward meets sir William Seager king of heralds, and both of them present to the constable his commission, which he received with his hat off: and delivered it to the register to read, in effect,

'That his majesty being informed by Donnold lord Rey, how David Ramsey esq. had plotted, and was privy unto divers Treasons and Conspiracies against his royal person, government, and kingdoms. In the search whereof the king had used all ways and means for the discovery of the truth: the one of them accusing, the other denying, and so no certain security to his own person and his subjects: therefore he doth authorize the said Robert Bartie earl of Lindsey lord high constable, for to call unto him Thomas earl of Arundel earl marshal, and with him such other peers, sheriffs, and officers, as he thinks fit, to hold a marshal's court, for sifting the truth between the said parties, &c.'

Then the king of heralds delivers to the constable, his silver verge or staff, half a yard in length, headed with a crown of gold. Then the earl marshal delivered a key to a herald, to fetch in the Appelland ushered in by the herald, and accompanied with his sureties, sir Pierce Crosby, sir Walter Crosby, sir William Forbiez, sir Robert Gordon, and sir William Evers. He was apparelled in black velvet trimmed with silver buttons, his sword in a silver imbroidered belt, in his order of a Scottish baronet, about his neck, and so with reverence entered into his pew. His council doctor Reeves standing by. His behaviour (like himself, tall, swarthy, black, but comely) very port-like and of staid countenance.

The Defendant was alike ushered in by another herald. His sureties were the lord Roxborough and lord Abercorn: and his deport like himself, stern and brave, a fair, ruddy, yellow-headed bush of hair, (so large, and in those days unusual, that he was called Ramsey Redhead). His apparel scarlet, over-laced with silver, the ground hardly discerned, and lined with sky-coloured plush, but unarmed, without a sword. After his reverence to the court, he faced the Appellant, who alike sterned a countenance at him.

After O yes! the earl Marshal told them the effect of the commission, and the power of this court, which was not of any strange nature, but legal and justifiable as any other trial in Westminster-hall; and that there had been no more nor other trials of this kind of late, we were to attribute it to Gods goodness, the justice of the king, and loyalty of the subject, with the providence of state, and wished there might be no more in time to come; and that to expect any combat, this court he hoped would prevent it by the discovery of the light, and so magna est veritas, et prævalebit.

He referred the further proceedings unto Dr. Duck, the king's Advocate, who spake thus in effect:

That the kings majesty had committed the trial of the business to your grace my lord high constable, the earl marshal, and this court, which course was warrantable by the laws of other nations, and also by our own, who have used the same manner of trial.—That our law admitted sundry proofs for Treason, which in other matters it did not: that all subjects were bound to discover treasons: and cited two ancient civilians, Hieronymus and Tiberius, who gave their reasons for this kinde of trial. And he mentioned sundry records of our own chronicles and examples herein, as the duke of Norfolk combating against the duke of Hartford in Henry 4, his time; Jo. Ely and William Scroop against Ballamon at Burdeaux, the king being there; the lord Morley impeached Mountague earl of Salisbury; and that Thomas of Walsingham and Thomas of Woodstock in their learned writings, expressed sundry precedents for this manner of proceeding; wishing the court in Gods name to go on to the trial, and the Appellant to give in his evidence.

Then the Appellant came up upon the table, to whom the earl marshal delivered the petition, which he had the day before exhibited to the king. And the Defendant being also called up, the petition was read, which was in effect, That he having accused Ramsey of treason, and also Meldram his kinsman, and of confederacy, against whom captain Notwick was witness, therefore had desired, that the court would proceed against Meldram first.

But he was told by the court, that their cases differing, the Appellant was ordered to deliver in his Charge against the Defendant, which he did, in writing by bill, containing sundry particulars, viz.

That in May last in the Low-Countries, Ramsey complained to him against the court of England. That the matters of church and state was so out of frame as must tend to a change, if not desolation. That therefore he had abandoned the kingdom, to live where now he was, and to expect a mutation forthwith, to which end he had brought present monies to maintain him at 6*l.* a day for three years. That marquess Hamilton had a great army promised to him, for pay whereof the king had given in hand 10,000*l.*, and all the wine customes in Scotland for 16 years, presently to be sold for the armies subsistence. And that he staid for ammunition and powder to come over, for which his lordship was to mediate with his majesty of Sweden and the states, and then link themselves together, of whose minde Key should know hereafter.

That their friends in Scotland had gotten therefore arms and powder out of England, and that what he should procure in Holland was to be brought over by the marquess; and that all Scotland were sure to them except three. That France and Spain thirsted for England, but Hamilton would defeat them for himself. His onely fear was of Denmark, where he meant to land, and either to take him off, or make a party. That afterwards at Amsterdam, Ramsey with Alexander Hamilton solicited him the lord Rey to be true to them, and to be of their council, though as yet they durst not reveal too much of Hamilton's secrets, but if he repaired to England, he would justrust him with letters; and that his brother in law Sea-port knew all.

This being the effect of the charge. He added,

That if Ramsey would deny it, he was a villain and a traitour, which he would make good, And therewith cast him his glove.

Ramsey denied all, and said, Rey was a liar, a barbarous villain, and threw down his glove, protesting, to gar him dy for it, if he had had him in place for that purpose.

Rey was temperate, without any passion, but smiling, replied, Mr. Ramsey, we will not contend here. Answer to my bill.

Then Ramsey offered some reasons of the impossibility of the Charge, the slender numbers of men from England, but 6,000 raw soldiers, against three kingdoms, whom the first proclamation might dissipate. That the marquess was neither so wicked, nor weak in judgment: and if he should conceit to surprize the king, what hope had he against his children and kindred? And therefore, said he, my lord Rey is a barbarous villain, and a liar, and he will gar him dy for it, or lose his dearest blood.

He was interrupted by the Earl Marshal, telling him, he must not stand upon conjectures, but answer the bill of form according to law, and was advised to take counsel therein.

Then Ramsey in general acknowledged all the particular circumstances of time and place alleged by Rey, and the discourse to that effect; but concluded, that no treason was intended or uttered, and craved counsel to answer, which was granted.

And so the court adjourned to the 5th of December, but upon a fresh arrest by the Earl Marshal they were to put in bail for appearance, which were the old security; and Ramsey ordered to answer upon oath. At which day appearing, the fame of the cause brought thither such a crowd of people as was not imaginable.

Rey entered as before in manner and habit; but Ramsey was new suited in black satten, and presented his Answer in writing to this effect;

That having well considered the time, place, and communication with the lord Rey beyond the seas, (as before urged) he confesses; That Rey demanded of him, whether the marquess Hamilton intended to come over and follow the wars? He said, yes; and told him of his forces 6,000 men, and of the 10,000*l.* in money, and Wine-Customes in Scotland, which he would sell to maintain the army, and that he would come so provided with ammunition, that being joined with his friends he valued no enemy. Upon which Rey replied, that his own two regiments should wait upon him: but the place of these forces to meet was at sea, and there to receive directions from the king of Swede, where to rendezvous. Upon which Rey said, that his life and fortunes should wait on the marquess; who being told of his friendship, wrote a letter to Rey, which Ramsay delivered, in effect, that Rey would get some ammunition from the king of Swede, which was wanting. And that, speaking in general of matters arising in England, Rey answered, God amend all. To whom Ramsey replied, by God, Donould, we must help him to amend all. And to all the other matters and things he utterly denies, and craves revenge upon Rey's person by dint of sword.

Then doctor Eden of council for Ramsey spake to the court, that being assigned his council, his opinion was, that the defendant might decline the combat, and reply to the appellant's bill in brief, with these reasons: First, that by the words in the bill, no man can be charged a traitor by one that is guilty in his own particular, and so is not tied to be defendant, nor to answer such a bill. Secondly, the incertainty and doubtfulness of the words in the charge; so that till the court doth censure them to be treasonable, the defendant is not tied to answer. Thirdly, the Appellant refers the combat till the last, if he cannot in the mean time prove the charge by any other ways; then he offers to make it good by his body. So then, the defendant may forbear his answer, and decline the combat.

And now my lords (said he) I humbly shall acquaint you with the Defendants answer to me in private, which was, That though in law he might, yet in honour and innocency he would not, decline the combat, but being his own consent, his advocate bath the less to say for him. And so time was given for Rey's replication till Friday after.

Rey's counsel moved, whereas Dr. Eden had excepted at some words in the Charge, he answered, that whoever was accused of treason, was not to insist, how polluted the answer was, but how to approve and clear himself: then to refer the combat to the last, was well done, ultimum refugium, to expose his life, for God, the king and his country.

This speech being somewhat peremptory, and directory to the court, he was told, That the court needed not his direction, as to the Tryall of Combate, their wisdoms would consider of that when it was time; and so the court adjourned, both parties being admitted to have common lawyers; but to plead only by civilians.

This day come, Rey appears as before; but Ramsey in a new suit, of ash-colour cloth, opened with scarlet colour, the cloke scarlet cloth, lined with ash-coloured velvet, and the whole suit and cloke overlaid with silver and sky-coloured lace.

The former proceedings were read by the register; and thereupon the Appellants Replication presented to the high constable: in effect, That Ramsey in his Answer had cunningly slipt over a part of the Charge, which was, that the lord Rey protested, he was not engaged in wars, for want of subsistence, and therefore would not hazard in any desigae, without sure knowledge, upon which words, depends much of the matter and main of that part of the bill. And so ripping up the several charges of the bill, the strength, reasons, and likelihood, and the defendant's defects in not clearing the chief points, they went on with the council.

It was his part to enforce the Charge against Ramsey to this effect:

He observed, that the first day, Ramsey denied all the charge, whilst he stood upon positive resolution, but afterwards his council brought him to particulars, and taught him to answer superficially; first he knew nothing, and yet now so much. No doubt there was some stranger enterprise by the marquess Hamilton, then to serve the king of Swede, by Ramsey's professing that Hamilton was a protestant, and bore arms for religion, not caring with whom to grapple; from hence observing, that they intended somewhat to attempt of themselves. Ramsey stiled the marquess his master in discourse, and in many of his letters produced, much of the discovery by Rey was to fish out of Ramsey the truth of his doubtful words; how unlikely it was that Rey having two regiments of old souldiers, captain of the king of Swedes dragoons in good pay for all, should offer to serve Hamilton who was to be commanded by the king.

And that Ramsey might decline the combat, or forbear answering till the last, was a strange opinion of council; because, combat was to be reserved till all other means of discovery sayled, and therefore Rey his reasons were supplemental proofs; and requesting Meldram's testimony; but however he was now ready, if the court thinks fit, to give the combat presently.

And concluded with an example in case of murder. Two men fight in secret, the one is slain, the other flies, and though without any witness of the fact, his seeking to escape condemns him guilty. So Ramsey having been accused of treason above three months by the lord Rey, and both confined, Ramsay despairing of his cause, seeks his flight from justice by sending to Rey a private challenger, being a sufficient conviction in law, as by ancient presidents in this court: viz. Kiteles, after an appeal, sends a challenger to Scroop, and was therefore adjudged guilty.

Doctor Duck answered to all. That first, it was prudence for Ramsey to answer in general negatively, having been newly lauded from sea; and might be excused till time and consideration, to refresh his memory, being not upon oath; and as yet, the Defendant need not answer perfectly, till further time and favour, to view the exhibits in court by copies, which he desires.

And directly urged against the lord Rey's replication, not to be allowed; because, Rey, referring himself now to proofs, might have saved the trouble of this court of honour and chivalrie and hazard of their persons by combat, which intends the trial without proofs; and that the Defendant having engaged his sureties, but to this day, he humbly desires the time and place to be ordered for the sudden combat, according to the law of arms, and custom of this court; saying, that the duel foreseen, must ensue upon the appeal and denial; and therefore ought now to be granted.

Doctor Reeves moved for continuance of the replication, and consented to the combat; the court admitted the replication, and ordered time till Wednesday for exceptions thereto.

Doctor Duck offered some reasons to satisfy Rey, and extremely to censure Ramsey, where he was interrupted and told by the earl marshal, that the court will save him the labour and counsel, till the rejoinders be put in, and then to be ordered.

Doctor Eden shewed, that the copies of the letters exhibited were not given out: nor shall, says the earl marshal, till the court have considered of the contents, and so they were read.

The one was from Ramsey to Rey, certifying him of passages in the Low Countreys since their parting, to put the marquesse in minde of directing him how to dispose of the ammunition and arms in his custody; subscribed, "your servant, Ramsey."

The other from the lord marquesse, to the lord Rey, congratulating his love and affection, expressing a great desire to meet him in Germany, upon any termes he would propose; and that Ramsey the bearer was instructed for him to treat with the king of Swede, whom he desires to favour and assist, "which will oblige him his friend and servant, Hamilton."

Doctor Duck opened the whole matter, and each particular, insisting, that my lord Rey's evidence being for the king, and he a person of honour, and peer of Scotland, his testimony was sufficient. And moves that Mr. Meldram might be admitted for supply, for though they were not joyned witnesses together, of the words, which made the charge; yet for as much that they were spoken asunder, and agreeing together, made up a full proof: that no testimony may be neglected in matters of treason. That if any part of the charge was denied by the Defendant, and proved by the Appellant, it might convince him in a manner of the whole: and urged the offence of Ramsey's challenging Rey. But more of that hereafter.

But doctor Reeves prosecuted the matter, for that Ramsey's counsel endeavoured to prove that he might decline the combat, or forbear answering, because of some words which reflected upon my lord Rey as matter of reproach, that Rey had uttered words of treason to catch Ramsey, and then to turn informer. But (said he) no office can be accounted base, when the king and kingdom's safety is concerned; citing a story out of Livie, that the Romans confederate with the Sanubies, were to undergo a base office that stood not with honour, and resolved, so long as it was advantageous to the Romans state, it might with honour be undertaken.

Doctor Eden was earnest to excuse himself for putting in these words against the lord Rey, saying, that his client enforced to have them inserted.

But being a point of honour, the earl marshal interposed, that true it was, the best man may not refuse the basest office to preserve a king and nation; but again, it was most unworthy the degree of honour, for any man to angle and intrap another, and then to present him to that king's justice.

Then the pleaders argued concerning Meldram's testimony, that no proof ought to be omitted for the king; but it was offered for Ramsey to joyn issue upon that point in law; for the bill was laid against him not general, but particular to place, time and matter, viz. that in May last in a ship, and afterwards at Amsterdam, then again at Delph, Ramsey should say such and such words, which if Meldram would justify, besides himself, they ought to be admitted, otherwise it was no good matter, but must refer to a new bill.

That the Defendant had answered fully, for that the lord Rey profered his service to the marquesse without pressing to know any designe. That nothing in the letters could convict Ramsey. That the lord Rey standing upon his great offices under the king of Swede, and so not necessitated to serve the marquesse, he had not those places of command then, but since; and that since his coming into England, he said that he would have served under the marquess, and concluded that Ramsey and the marquess might use such words, and yet not intend treason to his majesty.

But having in this tryal medled so much with the marquess, the court was faine to enter an order or protection, to clear the marquess his words or actions from dishonour.

Then the court proceeded to examine Witnesses viva voce.

Archibald Rauchen was to prove the challenge as the bringer: upon these questions he confessed, that he was in Ramsey's chamber at Richmond the last of October. That Ramsey did not employ him to carry any challenge to the lord Rey; but at that time Ramsey told him, that it was his grief to be restrained not to meet Rey, who was a trayterous villain, and wished to meet him in the open fields at Barn Elms, he would make him dye for it, and tear his heart, with other such words of reproach, and wished this deponent to tell Rey so much, which he did, but it was three weeks after, and then, not until the lord Rey told him, that Ramsey had sent him a challenge; so that, said Ramsey, my message was but a relation, not a challenge.

But Rauken was observed to falter from what he affirmed before Dr. Reeves, and others, viz. to have carried the challenge, and that Ramsey could not deny it; so that Rauken was threatened not to accuse Ramsey.

Gilbert Seaton deposed, that Ramsey said, he had made it come to Rey's ears, to have ended this business without troubling the king or lords.

Then doctor Duck summoned up all the proceedings, observing that formerly in the presence of the king, Ramsey had with deep protestations and oath denied the time, place, and matter which he now confesseth, and though then not examined upon oath, yet in France and other countreys, the very holding up of the hand is an oath, and so Tertullian sayes of the Romanes, and Ramsey confessing part, he might be guilty of the whole charge.

Doctor Eden said, that Rey was not a competent witness against Ramsey, though for the king, for he was 'particeps criminis; capitalis inimicus:' for the first his bill made him so; for if Ramsey spake treason, so did Rey; for the second, it appeareth by Rey's violent prosecution, and if all failed, his sword must make it good; and so the Defendant was not bound to answer, nor to accept the challenge unless he will, to which he is so willing.

But doctor Duck said these reasons did not 'currere quatuor pedibus.' Some of the conspirators with Cataline were revealers of the treason, and allowed as witnesses.

Doctor Reeves concluded, that although some of the lord Rey's witnesses did not affirm what they might, it would encourage him to set a sharper edge upon his sword when he entered the lists; and that the God of right would so weaken the heart of Ramsey, that it should fail him when he took his sword in hand.

The holy-daies of Christmas drawing nigh, the court ordered, that either party might repair to sir Henry Martin, and possess him with further proofs, out of these witnesses already examined, but of no other. And so adjourned the court till Monday the 9th of January, when after some small debates, but no further matter or proofs, the business was briefly determined to be referred to the king's pleasure.

Which came to this account. That Hamilton's power with the king got all favour for Ramsey; and well rewarded in due time; and Rey having done the duty of a loyal subject, left the court and kingdom, and returned to his command in Sweden. But this story, though tedious, will enlighten us further to the truths of the Scottish affairs.

RUSHWORTH'S ACCOUNT.

Towards the end of this year (1630), the marquis of Hamilton arrived at the court of England, where was at that time Mackay, lord Ochiltry, a lord in Scotland, by name Stuart, and who once bore the name of the earl of Arran, when by a parliament which contracted a by-name in that kingdom, the Hamiltons were attainted of Treason, but afterwards both blood, honour, and estate were restored to them. This lord had no kindness for the marquis of Hamilton, but nourished a discourse, which Ramsay let fall to the lord Rea when they were beyond seas; and prevailed so far with lord Weston, then lord high treasurer of England, as to impart the business to the king, being a Treason of an high nature (if true) to this effect; 'That he raised this new army, with design, when he was at the head of them, to set himself up as king of Scotland.' Much credit was given to this design by the lord Weston lord high treasurer, who endeavoured to persuade the king not to permit the marquis to come near his sacred person, and in no kind to have the privilege to lie in his majesty's bed-chamber, lest his majesty's life were hazarded thereby.

The lord Weston pressed this home unto the king, but his majesty kept his thoughts private to himself; and having a great affection to Hamilton, as soon as he came into his presence, embraced him with great kindness, and discovered to him what he was accused of, but said, I do not believe it; and that the world may know I have a confidence in your loyalty, you shall lie in my bed-chamber this night. But the marquis beseeched his majesty to excuse him, till he had received a Trial, and was cleared of the Treason he was accused of; but the king would receive no denial, yet told him he would put the business into a way of examination; but afterwards when the examination was taken, it was found that the one affirmed the accusation to be true, and the other as positively denied it, and that there appeared not then any concurrent proof of the same.

A report of these Examinations was afterwards made to the king's majesty, who was graciously pleased to refer the whole matter to a Trial before the lord high constable, and earl marshal, in the Court of Honour, of which the reader will have a full account towards the end of the next year in its proper time and place. In the mean time, the king caused Rea and Ramsey to be secured in order to that trial: so the marquis proceeded in making provisions for the imbarquing of his army, and ordering those forces in Scotland to be in readiness to be shipped, to come to the place of rendezvous when they received orders,

A MEMORIAL made by Mr. Justice Whitlock in his life-time concerning the lord Rea's Discovery of the marquis of Hamilton's Conspiracy.

Presently after my return from this circuit, myself and the rest of the Judges of the King's Bench were sent for by the Lord-Keeper to London, to advise with him about the affairs of his majesty. We came thither on Monday, 24 August, except the Chief-Justice, who was sick. The matter consulted of, was to give our opinion, concerning the conference had in Germany between certain Scottish gentlemen about the making the marquis of Hamilton the head of a party against the king and his kingdoms of England and Scotland.

The lord Rea, a Scottish baron, did impeach Ramsey and Meldrum for moving him to this Conspiracy: they denied it punctually, and no witness could be produced. Ramsey, a soldier, offered to clear himself by combat, that he was innocent; and the appellants accepted of his offer. The king was desirous it should be put upon a Duel; and we were consulted with, 1st. What the offence was? 2dly, Where the trial might be?

We all with the Lord-Keeper were of the opinion, 1st, That it was an high and horrible Treason, if that in the Examinations were found true. 2dly, That the Trial might be by an Appeal of Treason, upon which the Combat might be joined: but the king must make a constable durante bene placito, for the marshal could not take the appeal without him: that it must be after the manner of the civil law, and we were not to meddle in it. Likewise we were of opinion that this proceeding before the constable and marshal was, as it was before the statute of the 35 H. 8, cap. 2. and that statute devised a way how to try these foreign treasons in England, but did not take away the other. We were also of opinion that the statute of 1 Mar. cap. 10. did not take it away nor intend it; and that a conviction in this appeal was no corruption of blood or forfeiture at the common law. See Doughtie's Case in Coke's Commentaries, fol. 75, sect. Escuage.

By order of a commission under the great seal, dated the 24th of November, (1631) there began a notable Trial, before Robert earl of Lindsey, constable of England; and Thomas earl of Arundel and Surrey, earl marshal of England, in the Court of Chivalry, judicially sitting in the Painted-Chamber at Westminster; together with other honourable persons, namely Philip earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, lord chamberlain of the king's household; Edward earl of Dorset, lord chamberlain of the queen's household; James earl of Carlisle; Edmund earl of Mulgrave; William earl of Morton; William earl of Stratherne; Edward vicount Wimbleton; Thomas vicount Wentworth; Henry vicount Faulkland; and sir Henry Martin, Judge of the high court of Admiralty; all of counsel with the court; Gilbert Dethrick being Register. And first William Seager, king of arms, presented to the lord constable of England letters patents of the tenor following.

Carolus Dei gratia Angliæ, Scotiæ, Franciæ, et Hiberniæ, rex, fidei defensor, &c. predilecto et per-quam-fideli consanguineo et consiliario nostro Roberto comiti Lindsey summo camerario Angliæ salutem. Cum officium constabulari Angliæ vacans existat, ac Donaldus Mackay dominus Rea nuncupatus, in regno nostro Scotiæ oriundus, quendam Davidem Ramsey armiger. in eodem regno nostro ortum, de quibusdam contemptis et proditiōibus contra nos in partibus transmarinis actis et perpetratis, in curia militari appellare intendit, et nobis supplicavit sibi justitiam super appellatione predicta exhiberi: Nos in hac parte fieri volentes, quod justum est, ac de fidelitate et provida circumspectione vestra plenius confidentes, vobis concessimus officium constabulari Angliæ (hac vice) ad appellationem predictam Donaldi in hac parte, una cum predilecto et per-quam-fideli consanguineo ac consiliario nostro Thoma comite Arundel et Surr. mareschal. nostro Angliæ, audiendi. et sine debito terminand. et omnia quæ ad officium constabulari pertinent in causa et negotio predictis faciend. et exarcend. secundum legem et consuetudinem armorum et curiæ militaris Angliæ, vobis, ut predictum est, auctoritatem damus et committimus, tenore presentium: et ideo vobis mandamus, quod circa premissa, una cum prefato marescallo intendentes sitis, in forma predicta: damus autem ducibus, marchionibus, comitibus, vicecomitibus, baronibus, justiciariis, ballivis, prepositis et ministris, et aliis fidelibus nostris universis et singulis, tam infra libertates, quam extra, tenore presentium in mandatis, quod vobis in premissis faciend. et explend. intendentes sitis, et consulentes, respondentes, et auxiliantes, quoties et prout per vos fuerint super hoc premoniti ex parte nostra. In cujus rei testimonium has literas nostras fieri fecimus patentes. Teste me ipso apud Westm. vicesimo quarto die Novemb. anno regni nostri septimo. Per ipsum regem.

Which letters patents being read by the Register of the court, Donald lord Rea, the Plaintiff, and David Ramsay, gentleman of the king's privy-chamber, Defendant, made their personal appearance. Then the lord marshal spake in defence of the Court of Chivalry, and the manner of proceeding therein, according to the law and custom of arms, shewing;

“That it was legal and agreeable to right and justice, as any judicial process in any other court of this realm: especially when the nature of the cause required it. And that in these latter ages this kind of trial hath not bin frequently used, but that was to be attributed to the pious and peaceable government of the state, under our most happy and prudent king, and his most illustrious predecessors, the kings and queens of England, and the obedience and fidelity of the people of England; both which are to be ascribed to the favour of Almighty God, conferring this blessing upon our nation above all the nations round about us."

The Lord Marshal further shewed; "That it was an error in many, to apprehend, that as soon as an Appeal is brought into this court, it was presently to be decided by Duel; when as duelling was the ultimate trial in defect of all others. And even then it was in the arbitrament of the court, whether a duel shall be granted or denied."

The Earl Marshal's speech being ended, Arthur Duck, doctor of the civil law, made a speech concerning the antiquity, jurisdiction, and necessity of the Court of Chivalry, held by the Lord High Constable, with the Earl Marshal, especially in cases of Treason, where the truth can no otherwise be discovered.

Then Rea and Ramsey were called into the inner court, and the one stood on the right hand, and the other on the left, of the lord constable, and earl marshal.

The lord Rea presented his Appeal in writing; and his Petition formerly exhibited to the king, was read in these words:

To the King's most excellent majesty. The humble PETITION of Donald lord Rea.

"Most humbly sheweth; That whereas he having heard sundry speeches fall from Mr. David Ramsey, importing plots and practices against your royal crown and realms, did, according to his duty and allegiance, reveal the same to your majesty; the truth whereof he is ready to maintain with the hazard of his life, and dearest blood, if he be thereunto required. Now so it is (may it please your sacred majesty) that your petitioner being informed, by his counsel, that these trials, by duel, or single combat, are ultimum remedium; and that a man may not appeal to this kind of divine judgement, but where all possibility of discovery by ordinary trials fail, and cannot be had. And whereas your supplicant, at such time as he disclosed all the practices which he heard from the said Ramsey, and did withal discover what he heard likewise from Robert Meldrum; against whom also one captain James Borthwick hath been examined, and the examination of Meldrum taken thereupon. And your supplicant conceiving that if Meldrum be guilty, the said Mr. Ramsey cannot be innocent, your supplicant therefore, not out of any inclination to decline the combat (as God who knoweth his heart can witness with him) but only out of his sincere desire to have the truth discovered, in a case so highly concerning your majesty's safety, honour and government, most humbly prayeth, that you would be graciously pleased, that Meldrum may be first proceeded against according to law; and if upon his tryal, the Conspiracy affirmed by your petitioner do not fully appear, he shall then with all alacrity (as in a case which otherwise cannot be cleared) justify his assertions to be most true: either as a defendant against the said Ramsey, who demanded the combat of him before your majesty, or as a challenger, if the court of Chivalry shall so award; and shall he bound in all duty ever to pray for your majesty's long life and happy reign."

LORD REA'S APPEAL.

The Petition being read, the Lord Constable, with the counsel of the other nobles, declared his majesty's pleasure, that this cause should be tried in this court, and gave the Appeal to be read as followeth:

"In the name of God, Amen. Before you, most illustrious and right honourable lords, Robert earl of Lindsey, constable of England, and Thomas earl of Arundel and Surrey, marshal of England, or your lieutenants in this court-martial: I Donald lord Rea do accuse and challenge thee David Ramsey in the month of May or of June in the year of our Lord 1630, and in the 6th year of the reign of our lord Charles, by the grace of God king of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, being then alone in my ship within or near the port of Elsinore, in the kingdom of Swedeland, in the upper part or deck of the said ship, when thou hadst this discourse or the like, and spakest these or the like words to me in English, viz. You told me many abuses in the court of England, and that there was nothing to be looked for but desolation and change of religion, and therefore you had retired yourself thence, since no honest man could live there, and with many such discourses you laboured to possess me: to which my answer was, The Lord mend those evils, and no remedy but patience. 'By God, Donald,' said you, (I will use your own phrase) 'we must help God to amend it. You told me you had brought as much gold with you as would maintain you at the rate of 6*l.* a day for three years, and you assured me before that time would expire, God would raise up some men to defend his church, and liberate honest men from slavery. I desired if you could tell if the marquess of Hamilton would come over. You said he would the morrow or next day. After I asked you what content my lord marquess had at home. You said, none. I asked you what religion my lord marquess was. You said, a good protestant, and before it be long he would let the world see his design was for the defence of his religion, and the glory of God, and that he should have an army so well provided with brave men, and all warlike provision, that he should not need to be afraid with whom he encountered. I asked you what advantage was it to us to make a free passage for the Gospel in Germany, if we lost it at home. You said there were many honest men in our land, speaking of Scotland; adding, if we had once an army over, what would you think if we should take a start to settle them also, for ere it be long you will hear our country will go together by the ears. So closing that night's discourse; he says at last, some such thing perhaps is intended, but I will not tell you more, for my master's secrets are dear to me. The third night after, in an island, you told me, that Alex. Hamilton and sir James Hamilton were to go for England, and you for Holland, and in the mean while pretended yourself willing to do me service in England. I told you I had a promise of the reversion of Orkney from the king my master; if the marquess would mediate with his majesty for it, he would do me a great kindness, and I said, it were good for my lord to have a friend in that place for his ends. You moreover asked me, if there were good harbours in Orkney, or in my land, or in any part that might be fortified. I said, yes. You said, 'by God, it was to be thought upon;' and you desired leave to think upon it that night, and on the morrow you and Alexander Hamilton did desire me to write a general letter to the marquess, with trust to the bearer Alex. Hamilton, concerning Orkney, lest letters should miscarry, with great assurance of true friendship from your master, if I would continue constant in resolution, and so I gave you my letter.

"Afterwards in March last past, you came to me from the Hague in the Low-Countries to Amsterdam, where you stayed with me eight days, and delivered me a letter from the marquess, only of compliment and thanks; and you told me all went right with the marquess, that he had gotten from his majesty 10,000*l.* in England, and the Wine Customs of Scotland for 16 years, which the marquess would sell, and all things went on without any demur or obstacle, and the only stay was for want of arms, ammunition, and especially powder, and desired me to put in hard with the Swedish ambassador, which I did; and you told me, that the marquess had writ to you, that if the arms and other provisions were obtained, they should be sent to England and not to Scotland; at which you did marvel, because his lordship had changed his resolution, being all the other provisions were sent to Scotland. Also you told me, that my lord had sent over a man to receive them, as I desired. I told you the letter which Mr. Lindsey brought me, desired the arms to be sent to England. You said, though the arms were had, yet you would not send them till you had further order from the marquess, and you desired me to-haste to you the answer thereof. In the end you told me you had evil news to tell me, that the marquess's lady was brought to bed of a child.

"Some few days after, in March or April last past, at Delf in the Low-Countries, I told you that I had a letter from the king of Sweden to the king of Britain, desiring some ships for the marquess. You said the marquess and I must beware of that, for then they will think that we mean to take their land from them with their own ships. I asked you, where our forces should meet. You answered me, on the sea. I asked you, where we should land. You said in some part of your old master the king of Denmark's country. You asked further, what think you if we should plunder some nook of his land, and thereafter go where we please; for we think he will be the only man that will be most against us. I answered, I am content; for he rests in him more than you all.

I asked if my lord was to raise any men in England. You said, one regiment. I asked you if they would be true to us? You said that there were English that my lord was as much assured of as of any Scots. I asked, where we should make these meet. You said at Harwich or Yarmouth. I asked if they were fortified. You said, that no parts of all those coasts in England or Scotland could hold us from landing. I told you that I feared Mr. Meldrum was an evil secretary. You asked me wherein. I said, that Meldrum had told me many things, and that I thought he had told it to others. You said Mr. Meldrum knew nothing thereof when you came from England, though he might well suspect, and that he spake once to you at that time, as if all were ours, and that you had great patience to hold your hands off him, although he was your cousin. I told you that I was not a soldier of fortune; but had bread at home, and might live without hazarding my life in the fortunes of war; yet notwithstanding that, I would hazard my life and fortune with the marquess, only that I would know the business. You answered, you would tell me no more of your master's secrets; but that you would write a letter with me to the marquess, and when I came there, the marquess would infuse in me that which you would not; which you desired me not to tell the marquess what had passed betwixt you and me, whereby the marquess should have all the thanks to himself: adding that he was very close, and that he would discover himself to them that he knew would hazard with him. That my brother-in-law Seaforth knew all, and that the marquess trusted him much. I asked you what was done in my business of Orkney. You told me, nothing till my coming, and said, it might be I should have it better cheap than to pay the duty of it; and you told me England had made a peace with Spain, very prejudicial to Holland; and that Spain and France were both striving who should first drink up England, but you hoped we should prevent them both. Besides, you told me the lack of powder was the greatest let. As for arms, we might get help thereof in every house, and that we had reasonable provision thereof already; and that my lord had written to you that he had 90 pieces of cannon great and small already provided. I desired you to go in person and speak to the Swedish ambassador for the powder, and to advertise me in the Brill of his answer, that so I might assure the marquess what he might expect: and you did send a letter by one of your own men to the Brill: to shew me that you were with the ambassador, and hoped to have that which we spake of. You asked my advice whether it was best to cross the seas once, or to go on bravely. I answered, 'delays were not good, which you did condescend unto, or you used words and speeches to that effect.

"But if thou the said David Ramsey shall deny the premises, or say thou hadst not the same discourse, or to the same effect with me, at the foresaid times and places; I the foresaid Donald lord Rea say and affirm, that thou David Ramsey art a false traitor and liest falsely. And in case the premises cannot otherwise be found out by the Sentence of this court, proffer myself ready by the help of God, to prove and justify this my Accusation and Appeal, by my body upon thy body, according to the laws and customs of weapons in a Duel, to be performed in the presence of our lord the king, &c."

Which challenge being publickly recited, the said Donald lord Rea, the party challenging, threw his glove in the Court, of a red or brown colour, for a pawn or pledge, in presence of the foresaid lord constable, and Thomas lord marshal, in confirmation of all contained in the Bill and Challenge.

Then the said David Ramsey answered, in his own person, and said, "That the said Bill and Appeal was and is false, and that the said Donald lord Rea, the appellant or challenger, did lie falsely, and that he was ready to justify and prove this in Duel, according to the laws and customs of arms, and of this court, by his body upon the body of the said Donald lord Rea, as it should seem good to the court."

And thereupon in confirmation and justification of the premises, he threw his glove in the court, of a white colour, for his pawn, or pledge, in presence of the lord constable, and earl marshal aforesaid; which gloves respectively Richard St. George, otherwise Clarenceux, king of arms, took up and delivered into the hands of the said lord constable, with due reverence, and the said lord constable, together with the earl marshal, committed them to the custody of the foresaid Register of the court. Then the said Lord Marshal arrested, as well the said lord Rea, the Challenger, as the aforesaid David Ramsey, esq. the Defendant. And the said Donald lord Rea produced sir Robert Gordon, sir Pierce Crosby, sir Walter Crosby, and sir William Forbes, knights and barones, and William Innis, esq. for his sureties, who obliged themselves all, and every of them, et divisim et conjunctim, to our lord the king, for the said lord Rea, body for body, that the said lord Rea should duly prosecute this aforesaid Challenge to the final and last determination of the same; and that in the mean time the said lord Rea should keep the peace of our lord the king, against all and every of his lieges, and especially against the aforesaid David Ramsey, esq.

And the said David Ramsey produced for his sureties, the right honourable James earl of Abercorne, and Robert earl of Roxborough. Then the Earl Marshal aforesaid released Donald lord Rea the Challenger, and the aforesaid David Ramsey Defendant, from the aforesaid arrest, and at their request respectively delivered their bonds of suretiships to be cancelled.

After this, there was read in the court, the lord Rea's Petition to the king, for divers noblemen and others to be of his counsel in this cause; whose names he presented in a schedule annexed, as they are here recorded.

To the King's most excellent majesty, the humble Petition of Donald lord Rea.

"Humbly beseeching your royal majesty in this cause of appeal against David Ramsey in the Court of Chivalry, to grant unto the said petitioner, that he may have the parties, whose names are in the Schedule hereunto annexed, to be of his counsel in the said court. And he shall daily pray for your majesty's long life and happy reign over us." Viz.

"George earl of Lyncey, lord Gordon; Miles visc. Mayo; Theobald baron of Brillis; Maurice Roch, son and heir of the vicount Fennoy; Donnough Mac Charty, son and heir of the vicount Maskery; sir Robert Gordon; sir Pierce Crosby; sir Walter Crosby; sir William Forbes; Donnough O Conno Sligo; James Hay, esq. of his majesty's body; William Innis, esq.; Dr. Rives; Dr. Duck; Mr. Selden, and Mr. Littleton, of the Inner Temple."

Upon which his majesty issued out the following Order:

"It is his majesty's pleasure, that only these should serve, both for his friends to advise him, and his Counsel to plead for him."

RAMSEY'S DEFENCE.

"In the name of God, Amen. In the presence of you most illustrious and right honourable Robert earl of Lindsey, constable of England, and Thomas earl of Arundel and Surrey, marshal of England, or your deputies in your court marshal; I David Ramsey, esq. Defendant, say and affirm, that all and every the things contained in the said pretended Appeal and Accusation, were and are false, and suggested and proposed against me maliciously, and against truth, excepting what follows at the time and place under-written, I had the under-written discourse with thee, or to the same effect, and no other, viz.

"I David Ramsey being with thee Donald lord Rea, in the month of May or June, as it is in the said bill mentioned, and in the ship there also mentioned, being in or near the port there mentioned, thou desiredst that I would tell thee, if the marquess of Hamilton would come over; and I answered he would. And you asking me of what religion the lord marquess was, I said, a good Protestant, and before it be long, he would let the world see his design was for the defence of his religion, and the glory of God. And then asking me whether he would come over with an army; I said, yes, with an army of brave men, and all warlike provision, that he cared not with whom he encountered. Which passages, upon often and better recollecting of my memory and thoughts than heretofore, I do now remember. And you the said Donald lord Rea, having then under your command two regiments of soldiers in service of the king of Swedland, and then and there of thine own accord saying to me, thou wouldst get leave of the said king to join your said two regiments with the said lord marquess his forces, and serve the said king in the wars under the lord marquess, I kindly accepted that motion of yours, and desired to confirm it in you; and I told you, that Alex. Hamilton and sir James Hamilton were to go for England; and you told me you had a promise of the reversion of Orkney from the king your master, if the marquess would mediate with your master for it; and I and Alex. Hamilton did desire you to write a general letter to the marquess, with trust to the bearer Alex. Hamilton concerning Orkney; and assured you of the said marquess his friendship, if you would continue constant in your resolution, in joining your regiments with the lord marquess, when he should come over, and you gave a letter accordingly. Afterwards in March last, I being then at the Hague in imploiment for providing furniture for the said marquess his companies, which were to go over into the king of Sweden's service, came to you from the Hague to Amsterdam, being earnestly invited thereunto by letters from you; where I staid with you eight days, and delivered to you a letter from the marquess only of complement and thanks for your offer, to join your regiment under the marquess his command. And I told you all went right with the marquess, and that I heard he had gotten from his majesty 10,000*l.* in England, and the Wine-Customs in Scotland for 16 years, which he would sell; and all things for his coming over with his forces went on without any demur or obstacle; and the only stay was, for want of arms and ammunition, especially powder, and desired you to put in hard for that with the Swedish ambassador, which you did after the premises. And in March or April last, in Delf in the Low-Countries, you told me, you had a letter from the king of Sweden to the king of Britain, to desire some ships for the marquess. And you said further, that the king of Sweden said, he had no ships to spare of his own, but he would write to our king for some for him; and that he the said king of Sweden would allow 40,000 rix-dollars for the entertainment of the said ships to be always in readiness upon the motions of his army. You also asked me, if my lord marquess was to raise any men in England. I answered, I heard he was to raise three regiments in England, and three in Scotland. You asked me where these forces should meet. I answered, on the sea. You asked where they should land. I answered, I was doubtful where, because the rendezvous was to be appointed by the king of Sweden. You said further, that you was not a souldier of fortune, that you had bread at home, and might live without hazarding yourself in the fortunes of war; yet that you would hazard your life and fortune with the marquess. I answered, I knew no more of the marquess his designs, than I had then told you, but that I would write to the marquess to commend to him your forward affection to his service, or to that purpose. I told you, that since my being in Holland, I did perceive the Hollanders did conceive, that England had made a peace with Spain very prejudicial to Holland; and that divers of them had said so in my hearing: which passages concerning the said peace, upon often and better recollection of my memory and thoughts than heretofore, I do now remember. And I also told you, that the lack of powder was the greatest stay of the marquess his coming over; and you desired me to speak myself to the Swedish ambassador for the powder, and to advertise you of his answer, that you might assure the said lord marquess what he might expect; and I did send one of my men to the Brill, called John Thompson, to shew you I was with the ambassador, and hope to have what we spoke of.

“ But whereas thou the said Donald lord Rea in thy said pretended Accusation or Appeal dost affirm, that I said other words to thee, than such as are here set down in this my Defence: I the aforesaid David Ramsey say and affirm, that thou liest falsly, and art a false calumniator, and oughtest to be punished with the punishment of a false traitor; and I offer myself ready to prove and justify, by the help of God, this my Defence and Exception, by my body upon thy body, according to the law and custom of arms in a Duel, to be performed in the presence of our lord the king. And I humbly and instantly desire, that a day and place may be assigned for the said Duel, &c.”

Then was read in court the Petition of David Ramsey to the king, beseeching his majesty to assign him the person, whose name was written in the Schedule annexed, to be of counsel with him in this cause. The name written in the Schedule was Mr. Dr. Eden. The Witnesses in this cause were commanded to make their personal appearance in the court, and were there examined; and divers letters written, as well from marquess Hamilton as from Ramsey to the lord Rea, were then produced.

Mr. Ramsey had bin released from imprisonment in the Tower upon bail, and his promise to appear before the Earl Marshal of England, or such other persons as his majesty should appoint, at such time and place as should be assigned unto him, upon three days warning; in the mean time to keep the peace, and to confine himself to Richmond, having the liberty of three miles walk, with this acknowledgment, that in case of absenting himself from such appearance, or breaking the peace, he will be accounted guilty of the crime, for which he stood committed. And for the performance of this engagement, the earls of Abercorne and Roxborough entered into a bond of 4,000*l.* to the king.

A while after Ramsey entered in the court a Protestation of the tenor following:

RAMSEY'S PROTESTATION.

“ Whereas in obedience to his majesty's commands, and in conformity to this honourable court, I have heretofore, contrary to such intentions as seemed to me most reasonable, procured some personages to stand engaged for my personal appearance in this court, concerning this pretended cause; and have, in obedience and conformity as aforesaid, used the counsel of Dr. Eden, assigned unto me for that purpose by his majesty, as defendant in the said cause: and whereas at my first appearance, upon sight of my lord Rea's bill, I accepted of the Trial by Combat, and ever since avoided and waved all courses usually proposed by defendants to avoid the combat, which at this present I am ready to entertain; and whereas since from the premises, and the lord Rea's pretences of proving new matters, the final decree in this cause, to my great prejudice in my other occasions, hath bin from time to time put off, and nothing, as I conceive, under favour of this honourable court, proved against me, either to convince me of any matter objected against me, or to urge me by the law of arms to submit myself to trial by combat, if I had a desire to decline it: I do here again once more, and that most instantly, desire a certain day and place to be assigned and decreed for the combat between the said lord Rea and me, for the trial of the matter in issue between us in this honourable court; and I do with all humbleness desire of this honourable court, that after all these delays used on the lord Rea's behalf, I may now betake myself to my said first intentions; and therefore I do protest, that so much as in me lieth, I do now disengage, and do desire this honourable court for ever after this time, to hold for disengaged those honourable personages that are bound for my personal appearance; and I do humbly desire to know what his majesty's further pleasure is concerning me, since I came hither upon his majesty's command by letters, and am here ready to satisfy my loyalty as his faithful servant, with the hazard of my life."

And so instantly desiring and urging to be released of his obligation, and that his sureties might be likewise released, he was remanded to the Tower of London, and his sureties were released, and the bonds were rendered to them.

At another sitting, when Dr. Duck moved divers things in behalf of the lord Rea, declaring, that with due reverence he submitted to the court in all things;

The Earl Marshal made answer, That the lord Rea had governed himself in the whole process of the cause with much prudence and moderation, and wished that Ramsey had used the like moderation in his Defence. And he further said, That now it seems necessary to lay open the series of the whole business: and so continuing his speech, he shewed that our sovereign lord the king, so soon as he had knowledge of the crime objected, did use all diligence to find out the truth, and called the parties before him; and the lord Rea constantly affirmed the truth of these things, and offered to justify the same with the hazard of his blood and life; and Mr. Ramsey on the other part with the like constancy denied the accusation, and said, he would prove it false against the lord Rea by duel, if it seemed good unto his majesty; and that the king observing the confidence of the parties, and the defect of other proofs, and the parties free choice of duel, consulted about the way of a public duel by the authority of this court, and took care to be informed of the proceedings and customs thereof. That it was certain, that this court was the only publick judicature, to which the cognizance of treasons committed beyond sea appertained before the time of Henry the 8th; and that the statute of 26th and 35th years of that king, concerning another manner of proceeding therein, was not derogatory to the authority of this court, but only superadded another way of trial. That all private duels were accounted and are unlawful; but publick duels, decreed by the authority of this court, were always granted to be lawful in cases of treason, when for the safety of the king and state the truth would not otherwise appear. That his majesty therefore consented to the requests of these parties, that they should fight a duel for the discovery of the truth in this behalf; and therefore he constituted and confirmed this court under the great seal of England. That the Lord Constable, and he the Earl Marshal, according to the king's letters patents, together with those noble persons that were of counsel with the court, had heard with patience whatsoever was alledged on either side; and that there were three ways of determining things of this nature in this court used by our ancestors.

1. To absolve the accused; which in this case, the nature, quality, and circumstances of the fact and crime objected being considered, cannot be.

2. To condemn the accused, when the truth of the crime objected evidently appeareth by witnesses, or any other way; which in this case hath not been, nor seemeth possible to be, when out of the accusation it self, it appeareth, that the words were spoken secretly, and not before witnesses.

3. By way of publick duel, to the decreeing whereof the lord constable and himself, with the assent of those honourable persons of counsel with the court, did intend to proceed.

Then the Lord Constable together with the Earl Marshal demanded of the parties, whether they had any thing more to speak or propound in this cause. They severally answered they had nothing more. The forenamed lords asked the lord Rea, whether he would finally acquiesce in his forementioned Bill of Appeal. Whereunto he answered he would therein acquiesce. Then they asked Ramsey, whether he would acquiesce in his Answer to the Bill of Appeal. Whereunto he also answered that he would therein acquiesce. After this, the Register read in court the lord Rea's Bill of Appeal, and Ramsey's Defence in the presence of the parties. Presently the lord Rea sealed his Bill with his seal at arms, and subscribed his name with his own hand. After the same manner Mr. Ramsey sealed and subscribed his Answer.

Then the Lord Constable taking the Appeal in his hands, and folding it up, put it into the glove, which the lord Rea had cast forth in the court for a pawn in this behalf; and held the Bill and glove in, his right hand, and in his left hand the Answer and glove or pawn of David Ramsey; and then joining the Bill and Answer, and the gloves, and folding them together, he, with the Earl Marshal, adjudged a Duel between the parties under this form of words:

'In the name of God the Father the Son and the Holy-Ghost, the Holy and most Blessed Trinity, who is one, and the only God and Judge of battels; we, as his vicegerents under the most excellent prince in Christ our lord and king, by whom we are deputed to this, do admit you the aforesaid Donald lord Rea, the party challenging, and you the aforesaid David Ramsey, the defendant, to a Duel, upon every accusation contained in this bill and the answer to the same; and we assign unto you the 19th day of the month of April next following, between sun and sun, in the fields called Tuttle-fields, in or near Westminster, in the presence of our lord the king, to do and perform your parts to your utmost power respectively.—And we will and enjoyn you the aforesaid lord Rea the Challenger, to be in the aforesaid fields, and within the list there, between 7 and 9 of the clock in the forenoon of the aforesaid day. And we enjoyn you the aforesaid David Ramsey the Defendant, to be in the fields in the aforesaid list between 9 and 11 of the clock in the forenoon of the said day, upon peril attending you respectively in that behalf.'

Which Decree and final Sentence pronounced,

The lord Rea craving pardon of the court, spake to this effect. First, he gave thanks to the lord constable, the earl marshal, and the rest of the lords, that they had with so much patience and justice heard and examined this cause, and for the justice therein exercised, especially for the Sentence already given. Then he protested before Almighty God and that court, that he had revealed nothing against David Ramsey, or any other, for malice, or hatred, or hope of reward, either gain, or honour, but only out of his faithfulness to our lord the king, and for the safety of his flourishing kingdoms, knowing that nothing is more pernicious to kingdoms and commonwealths than intestine wars. He professed that if he himself had not revealed the premises, but some other acquainted with the treason had first discovered it, he without all doubt had deserved the death of a traitor. And whereas it might be said, that he by revealing it had hazarded his own life: to this he answered, that he was unworthy of all honour, yea of life itself, that was not ready to lay down, much more to hazard his own life for the safety of king and kingdom. And whereas he might seem in the process of this cause to have declined a duel; he desired to be understood that whatsoever was done in that behalf, he did in hope and expectation, that the treason, which was communicated to many, might be some way brought to light; for he did neither distrust his own cause, nor fear the person of his adversary, nor any other in so just a cause, only in this he grieved, that an adversary, equal to him in birth, degree, and nobility, was not offered. And whereas many wondered that he would hazard his life for revealing words, whereof he was doubtful, whether they would amount to treason or not; he said, he knew much more concerning the treason, than what was contained in this bill, which, by the interposing of authority, was for just causes yet to be suppressed.

As for the duel now decreed, he professed, that he embraced the sentence with all cheerfulness, and desired no further delay of the combat, than that in the mean time he might provide himself with such necessaries for this duel as became his stock and kindred, and the combatant and champion of so great a king. That he had no private hatred to the person of David Ramsey, but was now to encounter him, being by the court declared his public enemy. And so having prayed to God for his majesty's safety, and happy government, and imploring the favour of the court, he made an end of speaking.

After this the court assigned to both parties a day, whereon to make such propositions as they would think fit.

Then the lord Rea desired, that the crimes and words, by him objected in his bill against David Ramsey, might be declared treasonable, and that Ramsey were guilty of treason, if he uttered those words: which the court with an unanimous consent did declare so, and adjudge.

Ramsay moved, that a shorter time, and some day within the 12th of April, might be assigned for the duel, saying that he would soon compel the lord Rea to confess the falshood of the crime objected, if he would meet him in place convenient.

The Lord Marshal answered, that the day was determined; and further intimated to both parties that they were to be attached and kept in safe custody, if they gave not sufficient caution for their appearing at the day and place appointed, and in the mean while for keeping the peace. For the performance whereof on his part the lord Rea produced sureties, namely sir Pierce Crosby, sir William Forbes, sir Walter Crosby, knights and baronets, and William Jones, esq. who bound themselves to the king body for body.

Then Mr. Ramsay being asked, whether he would bring forth sureties, answered, that he was ready in the word and honour of a gentleman, to oblige himself to whatsoever in that regard should be by the court enjoined; but as for sureties that he had none, or at least desired none; that it was troublesome for him to engage noble persons, who had in other respects interposed in this behalf. Whereupon the lord Rea's advocate desired, that Ramsay be conmitted to the Tower till the day appointed for the combat.

Then Robert earl of Roxborough publicly offered, and said that himself and James earl of Abercorne were ready to put in caution for Ramsey, if the court would admit them; and Walter earl of Balclough made the same offer; and the court admitted them, (although the lord Rea's advocate alleged many things to the contrary) and they became bound body for body. Whereupon Ramsey was released from his imprisonment in the Tower.

The lord constable and earl marshal admonished both parties to keep within the bounds assigned them, to wit, that the lord Rea should not go westward beyond Charing-cross, nor Mr. Ramsey beyond Whitehall eastward. These bounds they might not pass without the special licence of the court, or some just and reasonable cause.

The weapons, which the court assigned to the combatants, were a spear, a long sword, a short sword, and a dagger; each of them with a point.

Then the lord Rea presented these Protestations to the court.

First, he did humbly desire of the right honourable judges the lord constable and earl marshal, that his arms and weapons might be assigned him for to aid himself therewith against his adversary in the day and place to him assigned, and also in any other day and place, if any should be assigned him; and that he might have no weapon of advantage, and that he might be received in the lists or field with those arms as shall be assigned him, and armed in what sort he should please; and that he might have with him all other things needful and accustomed by right to aid himself at need against his adversary, although they be not expressly written; and desired that his adversary should have no other weapon, nor of other size than those, that he the said lord Rea should have; and if the said adversary should bring into the list any other weapons, or of other size than the court should assign him, that such weapon should be taken from him, and that he be allowed no other.

It seemed reasonable to the court, that he should be received into the lists armed as is at: and as for the weapons, was to have a spear, a long sword, a short sword and a dagger, each with a point, as above said, and for the rest the court would do reason, according to the custom and law of arms.

Item, the said challenger did pray, that his counsel might be received into the lists or field with him, for to counsel him what should be needful, and that he might have a chirurgeon with his ointments and instruments to serve and aid him when need required; and he did pray, that his counsel might remain with him, until the words lesser les armes were cried.

The court willeth, that he shall have sufficient counsel, a chirurgeon with his ointments and instruments within the said lists, as appertaineth, until the words lesser les armes be pronounced.

Item, he did pray, that he might have, within the said lists or fields, a seat or pavilion, or other coverture to rest himself; that he might have bread, wine, or other drink, iron-nails, hammer, file, scissars, bodkin, needle and thread, armorer and tailor with their instruments, and other necessaries to aid and serve him in and about his armour, weapons, apparel and furniture, as need required.

The court willed, that he have a seat and such coverture as he shall please, without fixing any thing in the ground, bread, wine, and other necessaries, in such cases requisite, till the words lesser les armes were pronounced.

Item, he did pray, that he might have liberty to make trial of his arms and weapons within the field, to put them off, and to put them on, and change them at his pleasure; to nail, fasten, or loose his arms and apparel, and other things needful; to eat and drink, and to do all other his necessities.

The court granted, until the words lesser les armes were pronounced.

Item, he did pray, that after he did orce come into the field and lists, that his adversary should not be permitted to make him stay and attend too long, under pain of being convict.

To this the court returned answer, The court will do you reason.

Item, he did pray, that if it should happen, either by the delay of his adversary, or any other impediment, that he should not be able to prove his intent upon his adversary in the day assigned him, between sun and sun, that then he might have further time and day allowed and assigned him for the proof thereof on his said adversary.

To this the court answered, The court in this case will do as anciently hath been used according to the custom and law at arms.

Item, he did pray, that the field and lists might be well and safely guarded for him until the end of the battel, and as well in the night as in the day, until that with the aid of God he should make good, and prove his intent upon his adversary.

It was answered, The court will do herein as is right.

Item, he did humbly pray, that if God should so dispose, as that he died in the prosecution of this his rightful appeal in this behalf, that then his heirs, without any impeachment or hindrance, might take his body and give it Christian burial, in such place as he shall appoint by his last will and testament.

It was answered, This must be at the king's pleasure.

Item, he did pray, that notwithstanding that the custom of arms will, that he should bear into the field certain things necessary for him, that these, or some of these things, may be brought by others in ease of him, and that they might be saved and carried back for him, if in case God should please to give him the victory, as he may of his special goodness and mercy.

Hereupon this order was made by the court: The court willeth, that you do herein according to the custom of arms used in like cases before this time.

Item, he did desire, that the same day when with God's help he did intend to prove his intent upon his adversary, he might have all other things necessary for him, and accustomed by right and law of arms, although they were not expressed in these his protestations.

To this it was answered, The court herein will do that which shall seem reasonable unto them.

Item, he did pray, that these his protestations, nor the copy of them, might be delivered nor shewed to his adversary, nor to any of his counsel, or other person, whereby his said adversary might have knowledge thereof: further praying, and desiring, that these his protestations and demands might be graciously granted unto him, by those honourable lords, as the right and law of arms did require.

It was answered, The court would herein do that which should be reason.

Item, he did pray, that it might be lawful for him to go or ride into Tuttle-fields, in or near Westminster, at his pleasure, and so often as he should think fit, to view the ground which should be assigned him for the proving of his intent, and for such other ends as should be most for his advantage for the proving of his intent upon his adversary.

To this the court answered, It seemeth reasonable unto the court, that at convenient times, which should be signified and expressed under the hands of the lord constable and earl marshal, what should be lawful for him to do as was desired.

Item, he did humbly pray, that since by the law and custom of arms, and of the honourable court, the defendant is never to be allowed counsel, nor to have any assistants, nor to have any petitions of favour granted, except in due time he shall have desired, or shall have protested that he would desire them; and that in this case his adversary publicly hath protested against the having of counsel, and all other aids and assistants in this court, as by the acts of the court appeareth; he humbly prayeth, that he might not have any counsel, nor aids, or assistants assigned unto him in this behalf; and that no petitions or protestations, if he shall make any, might be granted unto him; and in this he humbly desired the justice of that honourable court.

Answer was made, The court would do herein upon consideration, as to the custom and law of arms appertained.

The dimensions of the Weapons were as followeth:

A long sword, four foot and a half in length, hilt and all; in breadth two inches.

Short sword, a yard and four inches in length, hilt and all; in breadth two inches.

Pike, fifteen foot in length, head and all.

Dagger, nineteen inches in length, hilt and all; in breadth an inch.

The weapons were not to exceed this proportion; but the parties might abate of this length and breadth if they thought fit.

These protestations and petitions were accepted and registered.

Afterwards Mr. Ramsay presented a petition to the lord high constable, and to the earl marshal:

RAMSAY'S PETITION.

To the right honourable the lord high constable and the lord marshal of England; The humble Petition of Mr. David Ramsay, gent. of his majesty's privy-chamber in ordinary.

Shewing; That in regard there can be no president shewed forth by authentical record, whereby the choice of arms was ever heretofore permitted or granted to the challenger, or refused to the defender, suitable to the custom and law of all Christian nations; as likewise in regard the challenger himself, as I suppose, being ashamed of his protestations and demand for defensive armour, has in good company denied the same, and ascribed it to your lordships imposing; he therefore according to the said law of nations, and custom of the kingdom, doth humbly intreat, that there be no other arms allowed for the trial, than such as he hath bin already suitor for, viz. rapier and dagger, as being in the number of such as your lordships were pleased to nominate, which are the most common in all gentlemen's opinions, and that are carried by all and every man that is acquainted with the management of them.

Lastly, intreating, that if there chanced to be found any want or mistake in the formality of this, that your lordships will be pleased to pass over the same, and attribute it to the absence of the lawyer allowed by your lordships, having now no other counsel than the justice and equity of his demand. And as in duty bound, he shall never be wanting, either in action or speech, to shew his gratitude for these your lordships so just and noble favours.

To the foregoing Petition, this following Answer was returned decimo Aprilis 1652.

The first part concerning my lord Rea, the lords having called sir William Balfour, (the witness vouched by Mr. Ramsay) and heard him, but could not prove what was alledged.

The second part concerning the election of arms, the lords thought it was not fit to be granted, the custom of this court being otherwise, and other arms being already assigned by the court.

On the 10th of April, Rea and Ramsay appeared again before the court, sitting in the council chamber at Whitehall; at which time the lord high constable and the earl marshal signified to the parties, that it was the king's pleasure, for certain just and urgent causes, to prorogue the day of combat, from the 12th of April to the 17th of May; and they prorogued the same accordingly; and required Rea and Ramsay to appear in Tuttle-Fields, upon the day last assigned, at the hours appointed in the former day; for the performance whereof, both the challenger and the defender produced their several sureties, and the cautions and sureties for the former day were by the court remitted.

The lord Rea desired to know the pleasure of the court, whether he might use defensive arms; and in case he might, whether according to his own discretion, or as the court shall regulate.

The judges of the court answered, that the offensive weapons and their dimensions were assigned by the court already; but both parties might use defensive weapons at their own discretion.

May the 12th, the court reassembled, and the parties were called, and answered to their names.

Then the constable, together with the marshal, declared, that upon hearing and examination of this cause, they had not found David Ramsay guilty of treason, nor was the treason intimated made appear by the lord Rea, though he had so long time attempted it; yet they found that he had seditiously committed many contempts against his majesty, the reformation whereof his majesty reserved to himself; and therefore the court decreed, that they (the said lord Rea and David Ramsay) should both be committed to the Tower of London, till by sureties to be approved by his majesty, they gave in sufficient caution, that neither in their own person nor by any in their families, nor by their procurement or assent, they would attempt any thing one against the other, and that so long, till it seemed good to his majesty to set them at liberty; and so they were both arrested by order of the lord constable and marshal, and by serjeants at arms delivered over to sir William Balfour, lieutenant of the Tower.

Then a letter was brought from his majesty by Richard St. George, king of arms, to the lord constable and marshal, by which his majesty revoked his letters patents, given to the said lords for the trial of this cause, not willing to have it decided by duel. And so there was nothing more done in it.

On the 8th of May this year, [1632] a period was put to the great trial in the court of honour before the lord high constable, and lord marshal, between Rea and Ramsay, concerning the forementioned accusation of high treason against marquess Hamilton, which begun to have a hearing in November the last year, and was now decreed by that court in this year to be determined by combat: which in regard it is a trial remarkable after the proceeding of the civil law, we have given the reader an account thereof at large. However, take his majesty's thoughts of it, as it is expressed in this letter to the marquess.

“James; Since you went I have not written to you of Mackay's business, because I neither desire to prophesy nor write half news; but now seeing (by the grace of God) what shall be the end of it, I have thought fit to be the first advertiser of it to you. I doubt not but you have heard, that (after long seeking of proofs for clearing the business as much as could be, and formalities which could not be eschewed)

the combat was awarded, day set, weapons appointed: but having seen and considered all that can be said on either side, as likewise the carriage of both the men, upon mature deliberation I have resolved not to suffer them to fight. Because, first, for Mackay, he hath failed so much in his circumstantial probations, especially concerning Muschamp, upon whom he built as a chief witness, that nobody now is any way satisfied with his accusations. Then for David Ramsey, though we cannot condemn him for that that is not, yet he hath so much, and so often offended by his violent tongue, that we can no ways think him innocent, though not that way guilty whereof he is accused; wherefore I have commanded the court shall be dismissed, and combat discharged, with a declaration to this purpose, that though upon want of good proof the combat was necessarily awarded, yet upon the whole matter I am fully satisfied that there was no such treason as Mackay had fancied. And for David Ramsey, though we must clear him of that treason in particular, yet not so far in the general, but that he might give occasion enough by his tongue of great accusation, if it had been rightly placed, as by his foolish presumptuous carriage did appear.—This is the substance, and so short, that it is rather a direction how to believe others, than a narration itself; one of my chief ends being that you may so know David Ramsey, that you may not have to do with such a peat as he is, suspecting he may seek to insinuate himself to you upon this occasion. Wherefore I must desire you, as you love me, to have nothing to do with him.—To conclude now; I dare say that you shall have no dishonour in this business; and for myself, I am not ashamed that herein I have shewed myself to be, Your faithful friend, and loving cousin, CHARLES R. London, May 8, 1632.”

Chief Justice Dyer reports two cases of Wager of Battel; the first is Reade v. Rocheforth, and others, 2 and 3 Phil. and Mary, Appeal of death. One of the Appellees pleaded Not Guilty, and ready to defend it with his body, and waged his battel. On this plea plaintiff demurred in law, and the demurrer in law was adjudged against the plaintiff, wherefore he was barred of his Appeal against him who waged battel, and that he should go without day, Dyer's Reports 120, a. The other is Lowe and Kyme v. Paramour, Trin. 13 Eliz. In a writ of right the tenant chose trial by battle, but when every thing was prepared and performed, at the day and place appointed for the battle, the demandants being solemnly called made default, whereupon final judgment was given against them. Dyer's Rep. 301, a. In this last case is given some account of the apparatus prepared for the combat; and Mr. Vaillant the learned editor of the last edition, refers for more particulars to Minsbew's Dictionary, from which the following extract is made:

“Combat in our common law is taken for a formal trial of a doubtful cause or quarrell by the sword or bastons, of two champions. Of this you may reade at large, Paris de Puteo de re militari et duello. Alciat de duello. Hotoman. disput. feudalium, cap. 42. As also in our common lawyers of England, namely Glanville li 14. c. 1. Bracton lib. 3. tractat. 2. cap. 3. Britton cap. 22. Horns Mirrour of Iustices, lib. 3. cap. des exceptions in fine proxime ante C. Iuramentum duelli apud Dier. fol. 301. nu. 41, 42. ¶ Staunf. Plees of the Crowne, lib. 2, fo. 176. b. and 177 a. saith that it is an auncient triall in our law, and much used in times past, as appeareth by divers presidents in the times of Edward the 3rd, and Henry the 4th: which is not yet out of use, but may be by the law in use at this day, if the defendant will, and nothing can be drawn in counter-plee thereto. And it is said M. 37. H. 6. f. 3. that to wage battle, or to combat, is by the civil law: but Moile saith it is by our common law, and as Stamford Plees of the Crowne, fo. 177. a. saith, That they shall come armed into the court, and ioine issue: the plaintiefe beginnes his appeale, &c. and the defendant pleads not guiltie, and (as Britton setteth it downe, fo. 41.) undertakes to defend it with his bodie, &c. And after, one taketh another by the hand, and first the defendant saith in this manner: Hearre you this, you man whom I hold by the hand, which are called Iohn by your christian name, that I Pierce, such a yeere, such a day, in such a place, the aforesaid murder of N. neither did doe, nor goe about, neither purpose, nor assented to such a felonie, as you have alleged. So God me helpe, and his Saints. And after the accuser saith: Hearre you this, you man whom I hold by the hand, which are called P. by your christian name, you are periured: For on such a day, such a yeere, in such a place, you did such treason or such a murder, which I have alleged against you, or wherof I challenge you. So God mee helpe, and his Saints. Then they shall be both lead into a certaine place, where both further say, Hearre you this, iustices, that we I. and P. have neither eat nor drunke, nor done any other deed whereby the law of God should be abased, or the law of the diuell advanced. And fourthwith there shall be an oyez or proclamation made, that none shall hee so bold but the combatants, to speake or doe any thing that shall disturbe the combat or battle: and whosoever shall doe against this proclamation, shall suffer imprisonment for a yeere and a day. Then they shall fight with weapons, but not with any iron, but with two staves or bastons tipt with horne; of an ell long, both of equal length, and each of them a target, and with no other weapon may they enter the lists. And if the defendant can defend himselfe till after sunne set, and as my author saith, till you may see the starres in the firmament, and demand iudgement if he ought to fight any longer, then must there be iudgement given on the defendants side. And Bracton agreeth hearewith in these words: 'Quod si appellatus se defenderit contra appellantem, tota die, usque ad horam qua stellæ incipiunt

'apparere, tunc recedat appellatus, quietus de appello, ex quo appellans se obligavit ad convincendum eum. una hora diei, quod quidem non fecit.' When the defendant doth plead to the appeale not guilty, and undertakes to defend it with his bodie, he must throw downe his gauntlet or glove into the court; and if the plaintiefe doth enter reioinder, to the battle, then must hee take up the glove or gauntlet; but if the plaintiefe doth counter-plead unto it, then must hee suffer the glove or gauntlet to lie, and the other shall demurre in law or void him of his appeale, because he refused his glove or gauntlet. When they are sworne, they must produce mainprisers or pledges to performe the combat or battle, and then the court shall appoint them a day and place to fight, and as Fitz. p. 385. further saith, that the challenger shall be at libertie, but the defendant in the custody of the marshall, and the marshall shall array them both at their owne charge, and that must be the night before the battle, for that they may be ready in the field or lists by sunne rising. The formes of battle described 17 Edw. 3. et 9 H. 4. differ from that described by Bracton and Britton, and that described by Dier, Termino Trinitatis, anno 13 Eliz. as hee sets it downe betweene one Chevin and another Paramour a Kentish gentleman, about the triall of land, and levying a fine thereof: and on the issue Paramour chose the triall by combat or battle, and had a champion one George Thorne a gentleman of Kent and no doubt his dearest friend, that would enter the lists to such a hazard of life, &c. And the other had one Henrie Nailor a master of fence, and the court awarded the battle, and the champions were mainprised and sworne (Quære fornam iuramenti) to performe the combat or battle, apud Totehill in Westm. 18. Iunij. prox. post crast. Trinitat. which was the first day of the vtus of the terme, and on the day appointed was there a list made foure-square on even ground, every square 60 foot, and East, West, North, and South: and the place and seat of the iudges was made without, yet close upon the lists, and a barre made for the sergeants at law, 'et circa horam decemam eiusdem diei,' three iustices or iudges of the Common Pleas, viz. Dier, Weston, Harper. (the fourth, namely Welsh, was away by reason he was sicke) did repaire to the place in their robes of scarlet, with their other habits and coifes, and the sergeants at law also: and there a proclamation being made with three Oyez. the demandants were first called for, and they came not. After that, the mainprisers of the champions were called to bring forth first the champion of the demandant or challenger, which came into the place in rugged sandals, bare legged from the knee downward, and bare headed, and bare armes to the elbow, being brought in by the hand of a knight, sir Jerome Bowes by name, who carried a red baston, of an ell long, tipped with horne, and a yeoman carrying the target, made of double leather, and they were brought in at the north side of the lists, and went about the side of the lists, untill the midst of the lists, and then came towards the barre before the iudges, with three solemne cogies, and there was hee made to stand at the south side of the place, being the right side of the court. And after that, the other champion was brought in, in like manner, at the south or contrary side of the lists, with like cogies, &c. by the hands of sir Henry Cheney knight, &c. and was set on the north side of the barre (quite opposite to the other champion) and two sergeants being of counsell of each partie, in the midst betweene them: This done, the demandant was solemnly called againe, and appeared not, but made default; upon which default, Barham sergeant for the tenant, praieth the court to record the nonsuit; which was done: Then Dier chiefe iustice reciting the brieve, the matter, and issue of the battle or combat, and the oath of the champions to performe it, and the prefixed day and place, gives final iudgement against the demandant, and that the tenant shall hold the land, to him and to his heires for ever quietly, from the said demandant or challenger, and their heires for ever, and the demandants and their pledges, 'de prosequendo,' to be at the mercy of the queene, &c. And then was there solemne proclamation made, that the champions and all others there present (which by estimation were about 4000 persons) should depart in Gods peace and the queenes. And so they departed with a shout, God save the queene. Likewise, according to the lawes and ancient customs of the realme of England, 9 Iacobi Termino Hilarij, a gentleman, by name Mr. Egerton, having challenged another gentleman, one Mr. Robinson, for the killing of the brother of M. Egerton, slaine in the field upon a quarrell betwixt the said M. Egerton slaine, and one M. Morgan, with whom (as it is said) the said M. Robinson at the same time went as a friend into the field, &c. The proofes being no more apparent, and the defendant challenged, &c. as by the formes of our ancient lawes first above recited, it was granted by the iudges of the land, that it should be tried by combat: The glove or gauntlet was cast downe in the open court, ex parte provocantis, and received in due forme, ex parte defendentis. The oath was administred solemnly, and pledges put in by each partie, foure sufficient men to answer for either, body for body. But an error or scape being made in the plea, the bill was frustrated, so that they came not at all to the lists. An antiquarie, Verstegan by name, in his booke intituled, A Restitution of decayed intelligence, in antiquities concerning the most noble and renowned English nation, sets it downe in these words, and saith thus: "In the triall by single combat or camp-fight, the accuser was with the perill of his owne bodie to prove the accused guiltie, and by offering him his glove, to challenge him to this triall: the which the other must either accept of, or else acknowledge himselfe culpable of the crime whereof he was accused. If it were a crime deserving death, then was the camp-fight for life and death, and either on horsebacke or on foot. If the offence deserved imprisonment, and not death, then was the camp-fight accomplished when the one had subdued the other, by making him to yield, or unable to defend himselfe, and so bee taken prisoner. The accused had the libertie taken to choose another in his stead, but the accuser must performe it in his owne person, and with equalitie of weapons. No women were admitted to behold it, nor no men children under the age of thirteene yeares. The priests and people that were spectators, did silently pray that the victory might fall unto the guiltlesse. And if the fight were for life or death, a beere stood ready to carry away the dead bodie of him that should bee slaine. None of the people might crie, scrike out, make any noise, or give any signe whatsoever. This was so strictly and severely punished at Hall in Swevia, (a place appointed for camp-fight) that the executioner stood beside the iudges, ready with an axe to cut off the right hand and left foot, of the partie so offending. Hee that (being wounded) did yield himselfe, was at the mercie of the other, to be killed, or to be let live. If he were slaine, then was he carried away, and honourably buried: and he that slue him reputed more honourable than before. But if being overcome he were left alive, then was he by sentence of the iudges declared utterly void of all honest reputation, and never to ride on horseback nor carrie armes." Verstegan, p. 64.

The last case of Trial by Battel was 14 Car. 1. A. D. 1638. 2 Rushw. Coll. 783, Claxton v. Lilburn, (father of John Lilburn the famous republican). Upon one point in this case, Rushworth records the opinion of the Judges as follows:

"The tenant waged Battel, which was accepted; and at the day to be performed, Berkeley, Justice there examined the Champions of both parties, whether they were not lured for money? And they confessed they were; which confession he caused to be recorded, and gave further day to be advised. And by the king's directions, all the Justices were required to deliver their Opinions, whether this was cause to de-arraign the Battel by these Champions? And by Bramstone, Chief Justice, Davenport, Chief Baron, Denham, Hutton, Juñes, Cook, and other Justices, it was subscribed, That this exception coming after the Battel gaged, and Champions allowed, and Sureties given to performe it, ought not to be received."

Of the Trial by Battel Mr. Barrington (Observ. on Stat. De Magnis Assis et Duellis et St. 8 Ric. 2) has collected some particulars, and has referred to some curious passages on the subject, in the writings of English and French authors. He observes on the ludicrousness of some of the circumstances contained in Rushworth's account (printed in the text) of the proceedings in this case of lord Rea and Mr. Ramsey. He also relates a story from Grafton of a citizen of London of strong make but faint heart, who, entering the lists against an antagonist both weak and puny, was made drunk by his friends with the design of raising his courage; and so fell an easy prey to his adversary. Mr. Barrington could find no reference in the indexes to any bill for abolishing the duel by champions on a writ of right, but cites an entry in the Lords' Journals, Mar. 19th, 1629, of such a bill having been twice read and reported: and observes that it is very remarkable that the time when the Trial by Ordeal was disused, does not appear. Concerning the Trial by Ordeal see Blackst. Comm. b. 4. c. 27, and the fifteenth volume of the Archæologia, in which are published "Some Remarks on the different kinds of Trial by Ordeal which formerly prevailed in England, by Robert Studley Vidal, esq.;" wherein he announces his intention of publishing "An Inquiry concerning the forms and ceremonies used in some of the antient modes of trial in England, particularly in the fire and water ordeals, the corsned, the judicial combat, and other Judicia Dei." Mr. Barrington (Obs. on Westm. the First) says, "That in the arraignment of prisoners, the question 'Culprit, how wilt thou be tried?' is improperly answered, By God and my country. It originally must have been, By God or my country." Upon this Blackstone observes, "A learned author, who is very seldom mistaken in his conjectures, has observed that the proper answer is, 'by God or the country,' that is, either by ordeal or by jury; because the question supposes an option in the prisoner. And certainly it gives some countenance to this observation, that the trial by ordeal used formerly to be called judicium Dei. But it should seem, that when the question gives the prisoner an option, his answer must be positive: and not in the disjunctive, which returns the option back to the prosecutor."

Doubtless the superintending providence of God was appealed to and was supposed to direct the judgment, to whatever mode of trial recourse was had. By God and my country therefore would be in contradistinction from, By God and the Battel, By God and the Ordeal, &c.

41. Proceedings in the Star-Chamber against HENRY SHERFIELD,* esq. Recorder of Salisbury, for breaking a painted Glass Window in the Church of St. Edmonds in the said City: 8 CHARLES I. A. D. 1632. [2 Rushw. Coll. 153.]

The Information was thus opened:

MR. Attorney-General (sir Rob. Heath) hath exhibited an Information, in the behalf of his majesty, against Henry Sherfield, esq. an antient benchler of Lincoln's-Inn; for taking upon him, of his own authority, to deface a Parish-Church in the city of New-Sarum, in the county of Wilts, and that in opposition to the church government, established by the laws amongst us.—His majesty's Attorney, in the said Information, setteth forth, That his majesty is in his kingdom, next under Christ, the supreme Head: that all Churches are sacred, and both founded and maintained by regal and sovereign power; that no subject can meddle with them, in doing any thing for their ornament or structure, without licence of the bishops in their several dioceses, or the ordinary for the time being, who derive their authority from the sovereign power.—That the party delinquent was an inhabitant of the parish of St. Edmonds, in the city of New-Sarum.—That in the same Church was an antient and fair Window, containing a description of the Creation: That in January, quinto Caroli, the Defendant, and some factious persons, intending to deface it, there met and agreed so to do.—John Davenant bishop of Sarum commanded the contrary, and accordingly made a public act thereof.—But in Oct. following, he the said Defendant got the keys of the Church, upon pretence to walk there, and then locked the door, and contrary to the bishop's appointment, he beat down the said Window, and utterly defaced it; and when he had thus done, he did boast and glory in that he had so done, and reported that himself was a Defacer of Idolatry.—And for punishing of this great crime is this Information exhibited, by his majesty's Attorney in this honourable court.

Mr. Herne. The Defendant humbly offers to the consideration of this honourable court, that he is aged, and has grey hairs upon him. That among all the crosses of his life hitherto, he doth not account this the least. That he is this day not only suspected, but accused as an enemy to his majesty and his religious government; and the thing that he is especially accused and charged with, is, that of breaking the Glass Window, whereunto himself giveth this Answer:

That in the Time of king Hen. 3. this church of St. Edmonds in Sarum was built, and that there was a College of priests there; for there was an house adjoining, called The College to this day. That by the act in the time of Hen. 8, this college came to the crown, and there remained until king James granted it to Gouge and Lloyd, who afterwards granted the same to Bartholomew Tookey, and others, to the use of the parish of St. Edmonds, together with the advowson and free disposition of the vicaridge there, which they have by grant from his said late majesty king James.

And though he did conceive the said Church

* Vide infra Land's Case, eighth day of his hearing.

to be a lay-fee, yet he offereth this, that what he hath done, was not to usurp authority over the bishop of Sarum, nor in opposition to his majesty's government: But the parishioners, and such as are vestry-men of the said parish, have time out of mind assembled, and met upon occasions, in a little room called the Vestry, in or near to the church of St. Edmonds; and there they have used, time out of mind, to make orders, whereby new windows have been made, divers seats in the church altered and new made, and many other things done for ornament, and otherwise, in the same; and this without any order from the bishop of Sarum, or any other ordinary, for the time being.

For this Window that is charged to contain the History of the Creation, he answereth,

That it is no true relation or story of the Creation, in that true manner as it is set down in the book of Moses; but there are made and committed by the workmen divers falsities and absurdities in the painting of the same Window, as that he hath put the form of a little old man in a blue and red coat, for God the Father, and hath made seven such pictures; whereas God is but one in Deity: and in his order of placing the several days works of God in the Creation, he hath placed them preposterously, the fourth before the third; and that to be done on the fifth, which was done on the sixth day; and in one place he hath represented God the Father creating the Sun and Moon with a pair of compasses in his hand, as if he had done it according to some geometrical rules.

That this was not one of the greatest and fairest windows in the said church, it contained only four lights; for the cost at first in setting it up could not be more than 40 shillings; and that which is broken is very little damage to the Window, and may be repaired for a very little cost.

He conceiveth, for his defacing of this profane Representation of God the Father, it is not so heinous a crime as deserves the sentence of this honourable Court; and for his Defence he saith, That he hath for many years past (he setteth down for thirty years past) been seuled and resolved in his judgment, and that upon good and sound authorities (as he conceiveth) that it is utterly unlawful to make any such Representations of God the Father; and by such authorities as were set out and declared in the time of queen Elizabeth, and otherwise, for the taking down and abolishing superstitious Images and Pictures, especially in the Churches.

He was thereupon the rather emboldened to desire and endeavour the taking away of the said Window; and because it had been a cause of Idolatry plainly to some ignorant people. He saith he was placed in the church in such a seat as that the said Window was always in his eye, during his abode in the church; and not out of opposition to the king's majesty, but by special order and agreement of the Vestry, about January 1629, (wherein it was ordered that Mr. Sherfield might, if he thought fit, take down the said Window, and set up new glass for the same) he thereupon did with his staff pick out some of the glass in that part of the Window only which represented the Deity; but for the doing the same through combination with others, and by force, he denieth the same: and that he should do it contrary, and against the command of the said bishop of Sarum, and his said act, and letter supposed to be sent, this he also denieth, and saith, that he had no notice thereof in any part.—And to all the rest of the Misdemeanours and Offences charged in the information, he pleadeth Not Guilty, and submitteth himself to the Judgment of this honourable court.

For the King.

Solicitor General (Sir Richard Skelton). For that divers things seem to be set forth in the Defendant's Answer, which have not been opened; we that are of counsel for the king, desire that the Answer may be read; and the rather, because he hath thereby confessed more than we have proved, or indeed could prove against him.

Whereupon the Answer was read in effect as followeth:

The Answer of Henry Sherfield of Lincoln's-Inn, in the county of Middlesex, esq. to the Information of sir Robert Heath, kt. his majesty's Attorney General.

All advantages of exception to the uncertainties and insufficiencies of the said Information to the Defendant, now and at all times saved. This Defendant saith, That k. H. 3, founded in New-Sarum the college of St. Edmonds, and the church thereunto belonging. That there belonged unto the said College and Church, a provost and 13 priests, which had maintenance there allowed them. That in the time of k. H. 8, by the act of dissolution, the said college and church, with the revenue thereof, came to the crown, and so remained till septimo Jacobi, who granted the same to Gouge and Lloyd, who alienated it to Bayne, who conveyed the whole premises to Bartholomew Tookey, one of the defendants named, who, in 13 Jacobi, for many good uses, conveyed the same to the use of the parishioners of the same church.

That this Defendant is one of them, so that the right of the said church is in the said parishioners, who are seized thereof, as of their lay-fee; and the said church is exempt from the jurisdiction of the bishop of Sarum; and that they, as lawful owners, had lawful power without the bishop to take down or set up any window, and to do any other thing in repairing or adorning the said church, and for reformation of such things as are amiss in the same.

And that he, this Defendant, and the rest of the parishioners being Vestry-men, have met, and have used to meet for a long while, and their predecessors, time out of mind, in the Vestry-house, and there have made orders for the taking down, and setting up again, parts of the church. They have taken down glass windows, they have removed altars, roodlofts have been pulled down, seats pulled down and altered, the pulpit taken down and set in another place; and these and many other things without any special licence of the king's majesty that now is, or of his father king James, or of John lord bishop of Sarum, or of his predecessors.

That at a meeting of the said Vestry-men of the said parish, this Defendant being one of them, in or about January, 1629, it was ordered, that this Defendant might, if he pleased, take down the said Glass Window, being in the south-side of the said church, so as at his own cost and charges he would repair the same with new plain glass. And this Defendant being to come to London, desired it should be done before his return; and that the glazier might not mistake the window, he pulled down with his staff two or three of the small quarrels of glass, and so left it to the church-wardens to be done.

That he is accused to be an opposer of his majesty's government, and of the reverend bishops; and this by the procurement of those that are ignorant of the thing, which this Defendant accounteth a very great affliction.

He saith, That this Window, and the painting therein, was not a true Representation of the Creation; for that it contained divers forms of little old men in blue and red coats, and naked in the heads, feet and hands, for the picture of God the Father; and in one place he is set forth with a pair of compasses in his hands, laying them upon the Sun and Moon; and the painter hath set him forth creating of the birds on the third day, and hath placed the picture of beasts, and man and woman, the man a naked man, and the woman naked in some part, as much as from the knees upwards, rising out of the man; and the seventh day he therein hath represented the like Image of God, sitting down, taking his rest: whereas this Defendant conceiveth this to be false, for there is but one God, and this representeth seven Gods; and the Sun and Moon were not made on the third day, but on the fourth day; nor the trees and herbs on the fourth day, but on the third day; nor the fowls on the third day, but on the fifth: and man was not created on the fifth, but on the sixth day; nor did the Lord God so create woman as rising out of man, but he took a rib of the man, when he was in a deep sleep, and thereof made he the woman, in all which the workman was mistaken: in regard of which falsifications, this Defendant deemeth, that this was not a true Representation of the Creation, though it be so pretended, but rather an abuse of the true and lively Word of God, which to pull down, as aforesaid, cannot be any offence in him, this Defendant, as he conceiveth, at least in that manner as in the information it is pretended. But in as much as he is accused of infidelity and impiety to Almighty God, and to be disaffected to the king, therefore this Defendant humbly craveth leave to declare his opinion in the thing itself.

And he saith, that he believeth it altogether unlawful to make the Representation of the true God in any church, or wall, or window; and this he hopeth to make appear by the Scripture, by orthodox Writers, Councils, and Decrees of Emperors, and by a certain Book of the now bishop of Sarum (Dr. John Davenant) written on one of St. Paul's Epistles, in the 97th and 98th pages; king James's Book, intitled his 'Premonition to all Christian kings and princes;' the Book of Homilies, set forth by authority, and therein the Homily against Idolatry in particular: That this being so false a Representation, and so profane a setting down of the Image of God the Father seven times, he, this Defendant, being a parishioner, and troubled therewith in conscience by the space of twenty years, for that he could not come into the church, but he must see it, sitting right opposite to it, he was much grieved therat, and wished a long while that the same were removed, and yet in respect of himself laboured still to disaffect his thoughts; but seeing the dishonour done to God thereby by some ignorant persons, (as this Defendant was informed by the pastor of the said parish) and fearing that others might offend in Idolatry, he (by order of the Vestry aforesaid) did take down some little quarrels of the Window; and it was done by him only, without any disturbance, and he did it only in such places of the glass as the Representation of the Deity so falsified was: he did it not to arrogate to himself authority, but as bound to do what he did to preserve a good conscience; it was not done riotously, nor by combination with any others. And he saith, That he never deserved, nor will deserve such a bitter charge, as, through the malice of his enemies, is laid upon him by the said information. And he saith, that he, and other of the Defendants, were justices of the peace, and not altogether private persons, and they were parishioners, and entrusted, as aforesaid; and the taking down of the Window seemed to be warranted by the statute of Edw. 6, and by the late queen's injunctions, set forth in print in the first year of her reign, whereby it was commanded that all idolatrous and superstitious pictures, roodlofts, altars, and other relics of idolatry, especially in churches, should be defaced and abolished, but the wall preserved, and this to be done by the church-wardens, and these injunctions being by act of parliament, they are still in force, as he conceiveth. And in the 13th of Elis. in the convocation held by the Archbishops, amongst other Canons, this for taking down and defacing idolatrous Pictures and Images was one, and made an article, that the Church-Wardens shall inquire whether it be done accordingly: and the same ordered by the Convocation, in the 1st of king James. He saith, That he doth not countenance any contemners of the Church, nor ever did: that the painted Window aforesaid was one of the meanest Windows in the said church, containing but four lights, whereof all the glass at first was worth but 40s. and all that was taken down by this Defendant, was not worth more than 18d.

And this Defendant denieth that the bishop of Sarum sent to him to forbid the taking of it down; and denieth that he had any notice by way of act, letter or monition to the contrary, or that any such came to his hands. But this Defendant saith, That he often attended the lord bishop, as well upon this defendant's own business, as on the bishop's occasions; and yet his lordship never used any speech thereof to him at all. And therefore this Charge, that it was done by this Defendant against the bishop's directions, is not true, as will appear by Proof. But this Defendant doth aver, what he hath done is lawfully done; and to all other the Offences, &c. he pleadeth Not Guilty.

Sol. Gen. Here is a confession of the fact, and a justification; and therefore we made no examinations or interrogatories; for as I said before, so I make bold to say again, that he hath confessed more than we could prove against him. The Question is, Whether a parishioner may of himself undertake to pull down and set up what he conceiveth to be idolatrous, and so take upon him to be a reformer? In this Gentleman's Answer, you see how curious he hath been in confuting the painter that is dead 100 years ago. (Nay, 'it hath been there these 300 years,' said the Archbishop of York.) From the 5th of January 1629, till October following, he could find no opportunity to execute the Vestry's order; and yet he saith, shortly after the order, he did with his staff take down some of the quarrels of the Window, &c. First, for the manner of coming into the church, we shall read a Witness or two for that.

DEPOSITIONS OF WITNESSES on the King's part read.

Bowen the Sexton's Wife saith, That Mr. Sherfield came unto her (her husband not being at home) and said, Woman, bring the keys of the church-door, and let me into the church; whereupon she presently brought the key, and opened one of the little doors of the church, and Mr. Sherfield went in, and made the door fast unto him, and stayed there alone by himself. That when he went into the church, he said, Now, woman, go about your business, while I walk in the church. That thereupon she went into her house, and after she had tarried a little in her house, her child, that was abroad gathering of sticks, came in, and brought her two or three pieces of the Glass Window, and said it was done by a man all in black. Thereupon she went to a private door and looked into the church, and she saw Mr. Sherfield standing upon a seat some four foot above the ground, and so he stood breaking the window with a black staff with a pike in the end of it. That the Window was broken in eleven several places. And after she went by the same window, and saw it broken; but being on the outside, she did not then see it, yet she heard one groan, which she conceived was Mr. Sherfield fallen from the seat whereon he stood, to the ground. And she the rather believeth it was Mr. Sherfield, because he afterwards sent for a horse, and rode home. That afterwards the window was broken by another, and a pitch-fork left in it; and divers other windows were also broken, but by whom this deponent knoweth not. That therefore a watch was set, and continued for a fortnight, to see who should attempt to break any of the windows of the said church.

Elizabeth Bowen, the Sexton's Daughter, saith, That Mr. Sherfield came to this deponent's mother, about three or four of the clock in the afternoon, a little after Michaelmas, and commanded her mother to open the church door for him, and she did open it: when he was in the church he said, Get you about your business; and when her little brother brought in part of the Glass of the Window, saying, Somebody was within breaking some of the windows of the church, she then run out of her father's house and went unto the church, and saw him beating of the ladder, and heard him talk to himself, and thereupon said to her-mother, That she thought Mr. Sherfield was mad. That thereupon Mr. Sherfield came out of the church, and went into the clerk's house; and after he had been there a little space, he went again into the said church, and bolted the door after him on the inside, but she peeped in at the door, and saw him break the window with his black staff, which had a pike in the end of it. That the staff broke, and he fell down into the seat, and lay there a quarter of an hour groaning; but what hurt he had, she knoweth not. That he afterwards kept his house for a month. That the Window was broke afterwards, and one John Palmer seen there about four of the clock in the morning.

Dr. Webb of Steeple-Ashton saith, That Mr. Sherfield coming thither to keep a court-leet, he afterwards went with this deponent into the church of Steeple-Ashton to view it, and he asked this deponent why they should bestow so much cost in their windows; and he declared his dislike thereof, giving these reasons, to wit, That it made the windows darker; and it was the occasion of idolatry; and he conferred with this deponent about the window now in question, which he said he would have taken down; but the bishop's chancellor opposed him, and said, He knew no cause why he should, for that it was a lay-fee.

John Lywminge of the city of New Sarum saith, That he hath been thirty years a parishioner, and two years ago he was church-warden of the parish of St. Edmond's in the city of New Sarum; that then the order was made, when he was church-warden. That he was present in the vestry at the making thereof. That Mr. Sherfield moved the matter to the rest that were present, and they all consented thereunto, saving two, who said, They desired to have the lord bishop's leave for doing it. To whom Mr. Sherfield said, Do not trouble yourselves, I will give my lord bishop satisfaction. That the bishop afterwards sent for this deponent, being then church-warden, as aforesaid; and he went to his lordship, who told this deponent, He had heard of such an order or agreement to have been made at the vestry, and asked this deponent: if it were so? This deponent answered, That it was so: that thereupon the lord bishop said, Let it not be done, and gave directions and commandment to this deponent, not to give notice of this inhibition therein to the rest of the vestrymen.

Francis Roberts, servant to the bishop's Register, saith, That an Agreement was brought to the bishop under Mr. Sherfield's hand, and the hands of divers others, by Mr. Sherfield; and the effect of the order was, as he taketh it, for the taking down of the Window, in the south porch of the church of St. Edmond's in the city of New Sarum. That the lord bishop caused this deponent to take a copy thereof, which he did; and thereupon the church-wardens were sent for, and were forbidden by the bishop to put the same in execution, and made a public act thereof, which this deponent wrote.

It was urged by those of the King's Counsel, that the Answer was not in this rightly opened, and was therefore one of the reasons why they desired the Answer itself to be read. In the Answer he justifieth the act as well done; but the counsel that opened the same, did now shew it so to be.

Mr. Herne. In opening the Answer, we declined, as but an opinion of the Defendaut, and from this a man may recede: It was not the point in issue, therefore we were advised not to stand upon it; and we do acknowledge the church to be a parochial church, and subject to the bishop of Sarum.

Whereupon sir John Finch desired that John Lymminge's Deposition might be read again, and it was read to this purpose, 'That Mr. Sherfield said he would satisfy the bishop, 'urging that this was after the bishop's inhibition: but this did not appear to the court.—Sir John Finch concluded the Evidence on the king's part: the question is not what is fit to be in a church; the matter is, that he hath taken upon him to determine what is fit. He is an antient reader, and well read in the law; but our law saith, (and this every one knoweth, that hath sucked the least sweetness from the Books of the Law), That the church must be governed by the reverend bishops of the church. That it was a parochial church he knew well, for that himself was a parishioner: and though his counsel decline this, yet his Defence is, that it is a lay-fee, and that he might well do as he did, to pull down the Window. He is well acquainted with the bishop, and yet would never desire his leave in taking it down; but he goeth to the vestry for power to do it, and yet there it is his own motion; and when some questioned their own power to do it, he beareth them in hand he will satisfy the bishop. When he cometh to Steeple-Ashton to Dr. Webb, there he saith it is a lay-fee; for he being a justice of the peace, that seemeth to add another wing to bear him up: But the matter's not in question, it appertaineth to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction. For the bishop's inhibition, that Mr. Sherfield, being a vestryman, should not have notice of this, this is very improbable. If it had been done in execution of the vestry's agreement, why then was it done so privately, and not some of the vestry called to be with him? But to have the doors shut, to do it with such privacy and so many colours, as reading in a book in the church, walking and viewing of the clerk's house; this could not be but that he feared something, and that this was the inhibition.

Note, This was a great defect in the Proof of the king's part, that the relator could not prove that Mr. Sherfield had notice of the bishop's inhibition: nay, he had not the act of the bishop, which was so easy to be had, to shew in court, for which the bishop of London was much displeas'd, and so was the Lord-Keeper.

To remedy this, if it might be, the bishop of London (Dr. William Laud) desired that Dr. Lynn, the bishop of Sarum's chancellor, who was the relator in this cause, might be heard what he could say to this point. And he was permitted to speak, yet could not directly say that Mr. Sherfield had any notice of the bishop's inhibition; yet he mentioned a letter that was sent to him to give him notice of the bishop's commands to the contrary, but it could not be proved that ever any such letter came to his hands.

For the Defendaut.

Mr. Herbert. That the Information contained seven several Charges against the Defendaut; for five of which, that is to say, 1. That he being factiously disposed, and disaffected to his majesty's government, on his own authority took upon him to deface the parish church of St. Edmond's in New Sarum. 2. That he is an opposer of the authority of the reverend bishops and their government. 3. That he is an encourager and maintainer of all such as are ill-affected persons to their government, and contemners of their authority. 4. That the defacing of the Window in question was done by combination and confederacy between him and ten others, Defendauts. 5. That this was done riotously and routously with force and arms.

For all these I appeal to this honourable court, what colour of Proof hath been made; only it hath been proved that the Defendaut himself took down a little of the glass of that Window. And there hath been some offer of Proof made, that it was done against the Lord Bishop of Sarum's Inhibition. And whereas the said Dr. Lynn, the said Bishop's Chancellor, hath endeavoured to prove some things out of course for this last Charge, we shall desire and beseech your lordships to consider that he is the prosecutor of the cause against the Defendant. For the manner of the prosecution, it hath been very violent, injurious, and savouring of malice. He was the man that went to these Witnesses and forty other persons, to raise up and frame a Charge upon the Defendant. He exhibits a foul bill, or causeth the same to be exhibited against the Defendant, and ten others. And then falleth off from all those ten, and desireth that two of the defendants might be witnesses for him; and when he had thus done, never used them. And this, my lord, hath been the manner of prosecution.

For the taking away of the Glass Window, it is true, we confess we did take down part of the glass; but for the second thing, it doth not appear that he had notice of the Bishop's Inhibition. And whereas sir John Finch hath insisted upon some probabilities for Proof hereof; we hope this cause shall not be sentenced according to probabilities. Now though the Charge of those five before mentioned be not proved, nor any interrogatory administered to prove them, yet we shall desire leave to offer our Proofs to the contrary to your lordships considerations.

And first, as to the Charge that we are ill affected to the Church Government, and an encourager of those that be like minded, and this for private ends, and out of a private spirit: We answer, That Mr. Sherfield the Defendant hath on the contrary, in all his actions, been conformable to the canons and constitutions ecclesiastical, the Rites and Ceremonies of the Church of England. That he hath been so far from encouraging such factious persons, that he hath been very active in his place to punish Separatists. And that he did not this (in removing this little quantity of glass) of his own head or private spirit; but it is true, he conceived it to be idolatrous, and so was it thought by the pastor of the church, and by all the men of the vestry thought fit to be removed. What we did therefore, was no way out of a singular or private spirit, nor our own authority, but by order from the vestry; not in opposition to the church government, or governors; but as in respect to the nature of the thing. Besides, all the Canons, Constitutions, and Commands for taking away such superstitious and idolatrous relics, we shall prove, in fact, there has been much idolatry committed therewith. We say, that of a long time there have been meetings in the vestry by some ancient men, of the parish, and this by power from, and under the ecclesiastical governors; and this they have used to do, they have ordered many such things, and they agreed this Window should be taken down by Mr. Sherfield, if he thought fit, and to set up new glass.

We go not about to entitle the vestry to any jurisdiction; we say they are respondent to the bishop, and he may punish them if they abuse their power: but though they have not legally a jurisdiction, yet de facto they do meet, and do such things, though it be not justifiable; yet this is the question before your lordships, Whether those of his majesty's learned council can make it a crime, Yea, or No? The curate and church wardens assented, as is required by the statute.

The queen's Injunctions, 1 Eliz. give power to the commissioners and others to take away things of this nature, especially in churches, preserving the walls, &c. So in the Articles set out in 13 Eliz. to enquire whether they were removed, Yea or No. Afterwards there was the like in the first of king James; and the Canons contain one particular of the like power given to the church wardens to enquire of such matters, &c.

Depositions of Witnesses on the Defendant's part read.

John Joye of the city of New Sarum, gent. saith, That he hath known the Defendant above 20 years, and hath ever since observed him to be conformable to the church of England; and that the Defendant, when he is in health and at home, is present at divine service and sermons, and that during all the time of this deponent knowing of him, giving good example by his religious and pious carriage unto others; and that this deponent hath known this Defendant divers times to have received the sacrament of the Lord's supper kneeling.—That this deponent is a parishioner within the parish of St. Edmond's in Sarum, and a vestryman.—That the Vestrymen of the said parish have met, and used to meet as often as they thought fit, and used to make orders for repairing and adorning the said parish church, and have hitherto many times ordered the taking down of seats in the church, and the setting up of new, taking down of windows, walls, and pieces of the same church. And this deponent remembereth, that about 20 years since, a new pew was erected in the middle of the church for the minister to read prayers in; and 14 years since a new pulpit was set up, and part of the minister's seat was again altered; there was also a new loft made for ringing of the bells, and thirty seats were taken down and new made, and a glass window in the Towers was quite taken away; and all this was done without any special order from the bishop of Sarum, for the time being, or any other ordinary, and never any doubt or question was made thereof.—That upon the 16th Jan. 1629, at a meeting in the said vestry, by the vestrymen, it was ordered, that the Window in question should be taken down, and the reason why, as this deponent remembereth, was for the darkness caused by it, and for that it was superstitious; and that five of the said vestrymen were Justices of the Peace within the said city of New Sarum.

Mr. Herne noted, that the Defendant's Witnesses are Justices of the Peace, and such as have been mayors of the city, and are aldermen there; but the other's Witnesses are poor people, and silly women led by Mr. Chancellor.

This Witness and many others, testified the Defendant to have been conformable during all the time of their knowing him, and observant of the rites and ceremonies of the church of England.

Peter Thatcher, clerk, vicar of the parish church of St. Edmond's in New Sarum, saith, That he hath known the defendant, by the space of 8 years last past; that when he is well, and in good health, he cometh to church, and there stayeth all the time of divine service and sermon, and hath received the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper kneeling. That there was an order made in the Vestry, where this deponent was present, for taking down of the Window in question by Mr. Sherfield. That he hath seen the said Window since it was broken; that the Story intended thereby to be set forth, may well enough be discerned, and this, upon his certain knowledge, for he took special notice thereof, upon Saturday last, before his Examination; that there are no letters in the Window aforesaid, describing the Representation of the Creation. That it may be amended for a very small matter. That it is not so good work as some other windows of the church. That he hath heretofore seen an accompt, made in the time of Henry 7, of Charges in setting up certain Windows in the said church, which are all painted glass; and there was set down a particular of 94 foot of glass, set up at 3*d*. a foot, and this Window in question containeth 72 foot of glass or thereabouts.

Note, That in the time while this Deposition was reading, Mr. Sherfield caused a map of the said Window to be presented to the lords, representing the said Window, and all the several breakings of the same, set forth in colours like the window itself, which was inspected by the lords.

The Bishop of London at this time took some exception to the testimony of the last Deponent, Peter Thatcher, for that he saith he knoweth he cometh to church, and stayeth there all the time of divine service; whereas he knoweth that this Thatcher himself hath not read all the divine service in a whole year together; he hath not done it heretofore, whatsoever of late he hath done for by-respect.

Then proceeded the Deposition of the said Peter Thatcher.

That the Picture of the old man in blue and red, is taken to be the picture of God the Father, the Creator of Heaven and Earth; and that he is taken to be there represented creating the birds and beasts, the sun and moon, and speaking to Adam and Eve, &c. That, as this deponent taketh it, there are many mistakes, falsities and absurdities contained in the said Window. That he saw Emma Browne bowing to the Window aforesaid, on which occasion (this Deponent coming in the mean while) he asked what was the cause she so bowed. To which she answered, I do it to my Lord God. Why, said this Deponent, where is he? Said the said Emma Browne, In the Window, is he not? This deponent thinketh he told this Defendant of the same, but doth not remember the time when.

Michael Mackerell, of the city of New Sarum, gent. saith, That he hath known the Defendant, by the space of 20 years and more, during all which time he hath been conformable to the church of England, and duly repairth to the Church and Sacrament, &c. That this Deponent knoweth he hath called divers in question for their Inconformity, and divers have been accused for Anabaptists and Separatists before him, and other justices of the peace in the same city, and some of them were imprisoned, some bound to their good behaviour, and some otherwise punished by his means; and the deponent set down the names of those who were called in question for Inconformity in particular.

James Palmer, of the city of New Sarum, senior, aged about 80 years, saith, That in the said parish of St. Edmond's, for 50 years past, he hath known divers of the parishioners to have met from time to time in the vestry of the said church, which is part of the same church, or adjoineth thereunto; and they have ordered many things for reparation of the said church, without the bishop of Sarum, or any of his predecessors; and divers of the said parish are, and have been called, and have been and are vestry-men of the said church, and they have done divers things in the church without the bishop's leave, as namely, the place of reading the Service was altered from out of the choir, and appointed and ordered by them to be read in the body of the church, without license from the bishop: And therefore the parishioners did not ask leave in this case, of the bishop, to remove the said window.

The Bishop of London. Often Vestries take upon them that authority which pertaineth not unto them; and usually transgress their bounds; they were made by the bishops heretofore, where they are granted and suffered, and in many cases, by the common law, we cannot do without them. The truth is, that the Archdeacon in every diocese was wont to be 'magnus oculus episcopi,' to view and inform the bishop of the things fit to be reformed. But you will say, Shall not those men repair, nor do any thing in the church without leave? Yes, they may, but not doubtful things; therefore for such things they should ask license of the bishop at their perils.

The Lord Keeper. So for mending of a wall, or repairing things not well done in the church, vestry-men may do it; but when they do ill, they are to be punished.

February 8.

This day the Defendant's counsel proceeded in reading their Witnesses for their Defence.

William Antopp of the city of New Sarum, gent., saith, That heretofore, about 9 or 10 years since, he took notice of one William Trumpeter, who came as a stranger into the town; and this deponent after understood his name was Aldersey. That this Deponent hath observed the said William putting off his hat to the said Window; and that the said William's master, called Beech, did kneel down and pray before the Crucifix in one of the windows. This Deponent had conference with the said William, and with his said master, the said Beech; and in their talk they much commended Pictures in Church-Windows, and praised Cellar-mine's Writings; wherefore this Deponent did conceive them both to be Romish Recusants: And this Deponent saw the said Trumpetter kneeling and praying towards the said window; and the said Beech kneeling before the Crucifix, beating his breast, which this deponent did conceive was idolatry.

Here the Defendant's Counsel offered to speak something to discharge the Defendant of that point, as to the doing of the said act contrary to the lord bishop of Sarum's Inhibition.

Whereunto Mr. Attorney said, That this was not worthy to be insisted on, because they had come short in Proof against him: But as for Mr. Chancellor's enquiring into the said offence done, we conceive it was rightly done, and proper for him to do it; for that this fact is of a mixt cognizance, ecclesiastical and temporal; and therefore, he being an ecclesiastical officer, it was not a fault, but a commendable thing in him strictly to enquire of the thing as he did, and it was his duty so to do. And for the preparing and pre-examining of the witnesses, we say, in this case by him it was lawfully done, and they were justly prepared.

The Defendant's Counsel proceeded, and read divers Statutes and Proclamations, and other Records and authorities in justification of the Defendant's fact, as concerning the nature of the thing. And first was read the particular Injunction in the point, set out 1 Eliz. the 23d Article or Injunction; Church-Wardens are to see the Churches kept clean, and all loathsomeness by dust or otherwise removed; That they have in the Churches the Holy Bible and Homilies, late set out in print against Rebellion, and other outrageous crimes. That there be in every Church a fair joining Table, and a convenient Pulpit, &c. Also they shall see that all Shrines, Coverings, and Candlesticks, Pictures, Pilgrimages, Relicks of famed Miracles, Rolls of Wax, and superstitious things, be taken away and defaced, preserving nevertheless the walls of the stone buildings of the Windows.

Archbishop of York (Neale). The Church-Wardens executed this by direction of the queen's Visitors, not upon their own authority.

Then was read the Article touching this matter, set forth in the Book of Articles, in the 13th year of the late queen. The title of which book is, 'Articles agreed upon by Matthew Archbishop of Canterbury, and the rest of the Reverend Bishops, 3 Aprilis, 1571. The Article itself runneth thus: Item. Whether all Shrines, Coverings, Rolls of Wax, &c. and pictures of false and feigned miracles, be moved and abolished.

Bishop of London. I do not think that the Story of the Creation was a Picture of false Miracles.—The canon of 13 Eliz. was, That the Church-Wardens should enquire and make presentment of such things to the bishop or ordinary; but it gave no power to them, being but lay men, to do what they would in reformation.

Archbishop of York. The Injunctions were in 1 Eliz. when the Church was very much out of Order; and this was done by special commissioners, and not by the Church-Wardens power.

Then was read the Canon made 13 Eliz. the 18th Canon, That the Church-Wardens should see the Church kept clean, the Holy Bible to be in the Churches, and the Holy Homilies lately set forth against Rebellion, a fair joining Table for the Celebration of the Communion; and all roodlofts, wooden crosses, pictures of false and feigned miracles, and all other relics of superstition destroyed and demolished; the walls of the Churches to be new whited, and sentences of Holy Scripture to be written upon them in great letters, and a bason to be in the Church wherein baptism is to be administered.

There was the like made in 1 of king James, and 2 Jacobi, 1603, Canon 85, That the Windows of the Church be well glazed, the pavements even and decently kept: the like care to be had for the Church-walls and Church-yards, that they be shut in with pales, walls, and rails, as hath been accustomed. And the officers are to see that the peace be well kept, and that the Book of Homilies be in the church, which speaketh against idolatry and superstition, &c.

Mr. Herbert. The matter before your lordships in judgment, is the removal of some few parcels of glass out of a Church-Window. Now, upon things thus opened, whether this be a crime punishable in this court, we humbly leave to your lordships to judge. But if it shall be conceived to be an ornament to the Church, and so a fault in any to remove it without the bishop's leave; we say it is true, we did it, but not upon our own private head, the Vestry agreed upon it.

And whereas it hath been objected, and charged, that the Defendant did this to encroach upon the Church-Government, we hope it doth not so now appear to your lordships; but that he is a good constant observer of the Church of England. And for the taking down of this glass, we have shewed what we did simply, and not so much what our own opinion was, but as it was conceived idolatrous by others.—If this be a fault, it is then because it seemeth to derogate from the honour and authority of the Church and done in opposition to the bishops jurisdiction; or else it ariseth out of our Answer, in that we justify the doing thereof, as in our lay-fee. But we have shewed he did not this to make a power in the vestry against the power of the bishop; no, this was an act of duty to the bishop, and punishable by him if it were not well done: so we do not divide the power from the bishop, but the question is upon the exercise of this power, whether the vestry-men, when they have done well, are to be reprehended; or whensoever they do any thing about the church, whether they must still go to the bishop for leave?

But though this be not an offence in the nature of it, yet it is said, that to us it is an offence, because of our Justification; which is not only de facto that it is done, but that it is rightly done by the vestry as their act in their lay-fee, which is exempt from the bishop's jurisdiction.

To this we answer, That this was only the opinion of the Defendant, it was not the issue; but his disposition is not to stand out in a thing, which afterwards appeareth unto him to be otherwise; he did conceive it was a lay-fee, and was their impropriation: and though he said it was exempt from the power of supreme authority, the archbishop or the king's majesty, yet he did it as the act of the Church-Wardens, which is subject to the bishop.

For the act itself, the taking away of some little quantity of glass, we have shewed you the usage of the vestry, what they have done in other cases; and if every alteration in a church should be prosecuted as a crime in this court, I suppose the court would be overmuch filled with prosecutions of this nature. Thus much for the Matter of the fact; then for the Manner of doing it, it is pretended, that it was done against the bishop's Inhibition.

The Defendant hath denied this point upon his oath, and sheweth probability to the contrary: my lord bishop had long and often conferences with him, but never spake to him of this thing.

Next, for that circumstance, that by this example of his breaking the Window, some others have done the like; but in the Books we find only that somebody did break the windows again after this, but who it was, is not set down. Two or three times a year for glass windows to be broken by accident is a common thing. We find also that after this a pitchfork was found hanging in the Window; we say that this was discovered only upon Proof, and was not in the Pleading: but the men that examined this, said that it was a madman indeed that came that way, and threw his pitchfork there, and this might have been proved. And shortly after many more glass windows were broken, but where or in what Church it doth not appear as I conceive. And whereas it hath been said by a silly maid that she thought Mr. Sherfield was mad; and it hath been said, he went about like a madman: We say, that if his faithful care and industry in that city for the good thereof, if his advice in all the kingdom so well known be respected, he is not to be accounted a madman: he did not come in a mad and braving manner, but secretly, and this is proved by the mother and daughter; we say the more privately it was done, the less offensive it was: which we submit to your lordships, and the whole Cause together with it. The Charge against the Defendant is, that he did dishonour to the Church: but we say that the act was to do honour to God.

Bishop of London. Was not this done contrary to the bishop's Inhibition? Let me ask this question of the Defendant's counsel. Why did Mr. Sherfield promise to satisfy the Bishop? Did he give this satisfaction before he did the fact? This I must needs declare to your lordships, that my lord bishop of Sarum hath written to me, and by his letters it appeareth sufficiently how this matter was carried and what passed about it: If it please my Lord Keeper, it may be read. (But this being out of course, and a thing to which the Defendant could make no Answer, was not approved of.) There hath been no fault in the bishop of Sarum; but the business on the prosecutor's part hath been as ill followed as ever I saw: And on the other side, by the Defendant's counsel, as well defended; so much I must say for them.

Sir Richard Skelton. This offence is clearly against the bishop's authority; and the greater by his Defence set forth in his Answer; and by what the Defendant hath shewed, it appeareth he did this by his own authority. The Order or Agreement of the Vestry is no more but this: You may, if you please, do such a thing: Mr. Sherfield may, if he please, take down the Glass Window; that is to be understood at his peril, they would not stand to it. This, especially in a man of his example, is not to be passed over in these times. I undertake there are some spirits now, that if they had been alive in Solomon's time, would have gone nigh to have done violence to the Cherubims; God knoweth what would have become of them!

Mr. Herne. As to my lord of London's objection, that it seemeth it was done after the Inhibition, Mr. Sherfield, upon his oath, denieth that he had notice of it. Mr. Chancellor himself saith, he had not notice till after the fact: He was often with the bishop, and he never used any words about it to him.

Bishop of London. He undertook to satisfy the bishop (and the bishop, you are to know, is not bound to give notice to every man of his public act;) but your Proofs are, that the vestry have done these and these things, without the bishop; they prove matter of fact, but what was done heretofore, maketh not much for an evil custom.

Attorney General (William Noy). We will not talk of the authority of the Vestry against the Bishop's authority, they were at first made and suffered through negligence of the prelates themselves. The vestry consists of the minister and curate, and some lay-men, I do not say lay-elders; they here agree for the taking of this Window down, but the question lieth not, upon their power, it lieth upon the fact itself, confessed by the Defendant himself: and, I say, if he had not confessed and proved more against himself than the relator himself hath done, he might (I think) have gone without the censure of this court. It is proved by the Defendant's Witnesses; and that he did it, is confessed; but he allegeth in his excuse, that for 20 years he observed this window, and he took offence at it; he sat in a seat in the church, and he could not choose but gaze on it; he could not rest with a good conscience, but the Window must be taken down: But in all these 20 years he never complained to the Ordinary; but after 20 years he proposeth it to the vestry; there were present the churchwardens, the vestry-men, and Mr. Thatcher the minister; some were so wise as to question whether the bishop's consent were not to be had unto it: To this the Defendant saith, he will satisfy the bishop, but never offered to do it: Afterwards it is agreed Mr. Sherfield may take it down, provided he make it up again with new plain glass. The bishop, hearing of this, sendeth for one of the churchwardens, and makes a publick act to prohibit the taking of the Window down, and suspends the power of the vestry, if they had any: of this the bishop is not bound to give notice: The Defendant must do it afterwards at his peril, and he told others that the chancellor opposed it.

For the Manner of it, when he cometh from London, he went in secret manner, it was between four and five of the clock, when at that time of the year it was between day and night, growing to darkness: And he went by himself, he took no glazier with him, nor any other to witness his act, no not so much as any one of the vestry-men, upon whose authority he said he did it; and thus in private and secret manner he committed this exploit. It is said by the Witnesses on his part, that some did, by occasion of it, commit Idolatry, but Mr. Sherfield knew not of it, (for any thing that appeareth; besides, he did not follow the Vestry's order in doing it, for he broke it down, he did not take it down: he taketh offence at the painted errors, but he hath broken it, and never mended it again: But he breaketh that part only which offended him, the head and the feet: If this had been done in the execution of a publick act, he would surely have had some witnesses of it; but he had none, he bolted himself into the church, that none might see him, he was not willing to be seen; so it was clandestinely done: If it had been done by him upon the order, he would have consulted with the glazier; wherefore certainly he executed his own humour, and not the vestry's order.

It hath been farther said, to excuse the Defendant, that he may and must do it; but of how dangerous consequence this 'may and must be,' is, I shall endeavour briefly to shew unto your lordships. He takes notice, first, that the church is a lay-fee, and being in the parishioners, and himself a parishioner, that he may therefore do it: but from this they have already started, and they may and must do it; for they well know it is a parochial church, and endowed with a vicarage, which if they should have denied, we have the record itself ready here in court to prove it.—But yet they say, there hath been a vestry even from the first foundation: and they have done, and used to do divers such things; they have made seats, pulled down seats, removed the place for reading the service out of the choir into the body of the church, taken down walls of the church, and the like, without the bishop's leave or license, and therefore may take down this Window.

My lords, there is a great deal of difference between repairing and reforming: Reformation ought to be made always by the supreme power, not by private men: but when private persons, or a vestry, will take upon them reformation, I make hold to say, it is the highway to pull all out of order with their reformation. Something was said, as if the reason why the Window should be taken down, was, because the painting darkened the church: But if this had been all, I should not have spoken much against it. But it was done for reformation, his conscience could not bear it. If it should be lawful for private men to do thus much, what will they do next?

Nay, some hold our church is idolatrous and unclean, because Common Prayers are said in them, and Masses have heretofore been said in them; and therefore these reformers would at the next bout take away our churches also; this must be next. As to the kneeling down to the windows by some; it may be some will do so to a Saint, or one of the Prophets of the Old Testament, when they see their pictures in a church or chapel, (as in Lincoln's-Inn Chapel) which if they do, then Mr. Sherfield must pull such windows down, or somebody else to whose conscience it is a trouble. Again, because it is a Cause of Idolatry in others, therefore must Mr. Sherfield pull it down; but it is such idolatry as must be concealed from the ordinary. Suppose another man come, and say it is no cause of idolatry, and therefore it shall stand still: Thus they differ first, and then they fight for it; next they have partakers on both sides, and so an insurrection may come of it, which has many times taken its beginnings from less occasions than this: And though, God be thanked, in this case it was not so, yet it might have been, and may be so, if such things should be allowed, in other instances of like nature hereafter. But he may and must do it, because of the late queen's Injunctions and Articles, &c.

The Injunctions and Articles are but to authorize the Ordinary to enquire of such things, fit to be reformed in churches by the churchwardens, and other officers: and they are to present it to them, and so they are to be reformed by the power of the Ordinary in every diocese and jurisdiction: And the meaning was, that all relics of idolatry and superstition should be taken away; but every memorial, or story of a saint and prophet, is not a relic of idolatry or superstition. Any monument of superstition, or of feigned or false miracles, may be taken down; but monuments, or pictures for memorials of saints or prophets, are not idolatrous or superstitious. If they should be so, because some men conceive them so, and then they may pull them down of their own heads, why then; many might, and I doubt not but some fiery spirits would, take upon them the boldness, to pull down all cathedral churches, because they are made in form of a cross, which some of the precise sort cannot abide: And so, because churches stand for the most part east and west, they would pull them down, because, forsooth, they hold it superstition. But reformation is, and always hath been a work of public authority, and some men have been punished in this court, heretofore, for offending in this kind.

In the queen's time, many went abroad, of their own heads, to break down crosses, images, and pictures of all sorts, in the 44th Eliz. At Banbury they pulled down the cross there. And in the 12th of king James some were brought here in this court, ore tenus, and sentenced for the like. And by the Sentence you shall see what name is given to those men, who pulled down crosses; I shall read but these two records, and say no more.

The Records were read by Mr. Robert Page, the Recorder's Attorney.

'By the Queen, a Proclamation against pulling down of Images and Pictures: Whereas many violent persons have of late of their own authority gone about to deface the Walls and Glass Windows of Churches, and in their violence have pulled down Tombs and Monuments of noblemen, and gentlemen deceased, to their dishonour, and to the breach of our peace: Therefore a strict commandment is given that all men forbear to break the Pictures set upon tombs or graves, and not to break the pictures or portraictures of the noblemen, or others in churches, church-walls, windows, &c. nor any images whatsoever, without the advice of the ordinary, or the advice of the queen's majesty, or her council, &c. Given 44th Eliz.'

The other Record is this:

'In Camera Stellata anno regni Jac. duodecimo. Whereas William Dale, John Eden, Hugh Jones and Richard Jackson, and other refractory Puritans and Brownists, did deface divers Crosses in high-ways, in the night-time: For this the Judgment of this Court is upon their confession in open court, that the said William Dale, John Eden, Hugh Jones and Richard Jackson, shall be bound to the good behaviour, and acknowledge their offence at the assizes, and every one of them pay 100 marks fine to the king's use.'

Your lordships see now that the defendant might not do it as he did, nor was he bound to do it at all; we therefore leave it now to your lordships to censure.

THE SENTENCE.

Chancellor of the Exchequer (Lord Cottington). This Cause, may it please your lordships, is of great weight, and well deserves the consideration of this Court: it is brought by his majesty's Attorney General against the Defendant, Henry Sherfield, and some others; but the rest are not proceeded against. His offence, as it hath been proved by witnesses, and confessed by himself, is the wilful breaking of a Glass Window in a church in Salisbury, which window anciently stood there; and thus he endeavours to justify. That these, and such like, are the acts of Puritans and Brownists, it appeareth upon record. His Answer, I conceive, to be against him, though he now quits that part of his justification, and it sheweth his spirit. It is said he is a wise man, and an old man, learned in the laws, and that grey hairs are upon him; but it had been a better argument of extenuation to have said he was a weak man, a poor man, or a mad man. He took scandal, and it was an offence to his conscience; but this was a tender and scandal-receiving conscience; he must have the window removed.

This, and such like matters may go very far, and great mischiefs may arise by it, as there have of late years both here in this kingdom and in France. He did not only do this, but he boasted of it when he had done, as if he had reformed Superstition: one Day's Work, in the representing the Creation, is set before another; and the Picture of the little old man in blue, must be the picture of God the Father. But this is as light as to affirm, that Idolatry may be committed to any thing, which for ornament the painter hath made. But for the making of pews in the church, pulpits, &c. this is but reparation, from this they come to reformation. Six of the vestry, at least, conceive they have power to pull down this Window, they agree it shall be taken down, and Mr. Sherfield may do it if he please, &c. This was in Jan. 1629, 5 Car.; but it was not done till Oct. following, and then it is not taken down, but broken down. I verily believe, though it appears not in proof, and therefore as a non liquet I pass it by, that he knew of the bishop's Inhibition. But, say they, why then should not the bishop speak to him of it? He saith it is a lay-fee; and said, that before the fact Mr. Chancellor opposed him. The violent manner of his doing it, is both proved and confessed. It is said he is a justice of peace, I hope your lordships will take order he be justice no longer. It is proved he received the Communion kneeling; why did they not prove likewise that Mr. Sherfield was baptized? Who doubts that Mr. Sherfield was baptized? There was a strict inquisition to prove the fact; it was well done so to enquire, you see the ill example of it, others followed it. They say it was a madman who did it: this was not proved; but it was more like he was mad himself; it was indeed the act of a madman, and fit for none but madmen to imitate.

For his Answer, I take it to be full of singularity and pride; and notwithstanding any thing contained therein; or in the Proof, I hold this his action a great offence, an offence of great scandal and presumption as to him that knows the law. If he or others had been minded, upon good advice, or in good way to have presented this or the like thing fit to be reformed, to the proper ordinary, or to the king's majesty, being the supreme head, he and they should have done well, and have had a great many thanks for so doing: but though it were fit to be removed, it was not in his or the vestry's power to do it. I take it, it differs not from that case adjudged here in this court the last day, when a great many poor men, who had a Right to Common, but in claiming it made a riot, were justly punished. So here, though this Window were scandalous, yet a private man, nor many private men cannot take it down: for what, as Mr. Attorney said, if one half the town would have it stand, and the other half would have it down, what must follow but insurrection? So that here is in this a great deal of disobedience, and that done in the singularity of his spirit in contempt of the Church; he hath thereby touched upon the regal power, and encroached upon the hierarchy of the bishops, who have their authority from the king. I come now to my Sentence; 'I will have him to be no more Recorder of this city, That he be bound to the good behaviour. That he make a public acknowledgment of his fault in that Church where his fact was done, and in the Cathedral Church, and that he may pay 1,000*l.* fine to the king's majesty.'

Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas (sir Robert Heath). In this cause, brought by Information by myself, when I was his majesty's Attorney-General, against Mr. Sherfield and others, the relator hath only proceeded against this one Defendant. Upon all that hath been said on both sides, these things come to my consideration, the fact, and the circumstances of aggravation: for the first of these, I shall agree it to be an offence; but I shall not agree in the manner of punishment, set by my lord that spake last. I dare not give encouragement for any private man to do any public thing in church or commonwealth of his own authority, it is a very pernicious and dangerous thing; but yet I shall not sentence him for some things, which in the first place I shall make mention of.

1. That he should do it by Confederacy and Conspiracy with others, and that riotously: it is true, it is thus charged in the Bill; but this is not proved, nor any other, than Mr. Sherfield himself prosecuted. I must confess, I was informed that the Cause was much fouler than it is, and many others were suspected to have an hand in it; and this was the reason of the Charge in the Information.

2. It may be he took just scandal at this superstitious Window; and had he only moved it at the vestry, this alone had not been so great a fault, if he had done according as the Vestry ordered.

3. That he did it contrary to the command and direction of the bishop; but this I dare not say is so fully proved, as on it to ground my Sentence, though I verily think, as to my own private satisfaction, he could not but know of the bishop's Inhibition. However, seeing it is not proved, (though if it had been carefully followed, I doubt not but it might have been made appear sufficiently; for the bishop of Salisbury himself, and many others, might have been examined in it) I pass it over as a thing not manifest.

4. That this was done out of the spirit of contradiction, and in opposition of the Church-Government: I condemn his rashness and heat of spirit in doing it without the bishop; but I cannot perceive that it was done to oppose the bishop, or ecclesiastical government. If this had been proved, or did appear in his actions, I should have accounted it the greatest matter against him; as for his inward thoughts, I dare judge no man's conscience.

5. That he did this in a profane manner, and that it was a breach of piety towards God. I must confess I think not so, but rather that the offence was fit to be removed; he was grieved, and his conscience offended at it; and I verily think, if the bishop had been told of it in a decent manner, he would have reformed it.

6. That it was done riotously; but it is clear there was no riot in the manner of doing this thing: and so I hold this no aggravating circumstance, he did but satisfy his ill-grounded conscience.

7. That when he had thus done, he boasted of it; this appeareth not, no man seeth this proved: nay, in his answer, opened by his counsel on his oath, he saith he accounted it a great cross to him, and is very sorry for it.

As to his place and authority, his wisdom and gravity, and his profession, these excuse him not, but rather increase his fault. As to the colourable pretences by him used in acting this business, I do not take these, or his secret going about it, to aggravate his fault; I think Vestries have too great power, and often take upon them to do things beyond their power; and yet I know nothing to the contrary but the reverend bishops may abridge that power when they will. As to this action of his, I find that he did it not 'contra voluntatem episcopi, sed prater;' that he was the first mover of the matter to the Vestry: this is not a fault in him, I think, but well done of him; and yet when the vestry had done this, and the Defendant executed their order or agreement, I do not see, but the bishop, if they had done ill, might have punished them. Give me leave, I beseech your lordships, to speak thus much: a judge must not speak his own imaginations, but according to Proof; he is bound ever to give Sentence secundum probata, not probabilia. That he undertook to satisfy the bishop, this I think is proved by one single Witness; but yet this action of the Defendant, I conceive to be an error in the Defendant. The Vestry (be should have known) are but private men, and have no jurisdiction to reform, whatsoever they have done in matters of repair heretofore. But if this, or such like things should be permitted in the Church-government, to be done upon private authority, why should not the like men do the like in the commonwealth? and then we should be at an evil pass. We read in the Book of the Judges of Israel, when there was no king in Israel, private men did what was good in their own eyes, and many erroneous things and slaughters fell out thereupon.

There was cause, I am satisfied, that this Window should be removed. It was made for the Picture of God the Father, and so it was generally conceived to be: but though it was idolatrous, and their bowing to the same was conceived to be idolatry, they should therefore have told the bishop of it; which seeing neither Mr. Sherfield nor the Vestry did do, he is not in this to be excused. I shall therefore agree to sentence him for this fault; but I shall forbear to put him from his place of Recorder in the said City: it is not an offence in him as Recorder, nor as Justice of Peace. I hold every man that is sentenced should, as near as may be, be sentenced eo modo quo offendit, and therefore I think not fit that he be put from either of his places, for else we should for this one offence censure him as worthy to be cut off from his places, and so good for nothing. And I shall forbear to bind him to the good behaviour, for he is a gentleman of reputation in the country where he dwelleth; and I have observed, that a gentleman is not bound to the good behaviour, but for very foul and enormous offences. But I would have him to make acknowledgment of his Fault unto my lord bishop of Salisbury, and before such as he shall call unto him: and I would have him give some satisfaction, and this in the very kind that he hath offended, at the discretion of the Bishop. For the Fine of 1,000*l.* set by my lord, that spake last before me, I hold it to be too much for an error, being there appeareth no contempt: I shall therefore think, and so set 500 marks to be enough.

Lord Chief Justice of the King's-Bench (Sir Thomas Richardson). My lords, Mr. Attorney General is plaintiff against Henry Sherfield, esq. We are not to take notice of any more Defendants, because they are not proceeded against; for this cause, my lords, I hold it comes fitly and properly before your lordships here. This is rightly crimen stellionatum. There be many covers in it; for it is of mixed cognizance, and therefore fit for this court, which I ever held to be the greatest court, except the parliament.

In delivering of my mind, I shall crave pardon; if I speak any thing which shall be mistaken. For the fact, (as it appeareth unto me upon the Proofs) it was the breaking of a certain Window of painted glass, not one of the greatest in the church: it was a private Window, and it was privately done by him with his black staff. His motive to do it was this, There was offence in this Window, and he conceived that it was idolatry, or the cause of idolatry. The offence was, that God the Father should be pictured there in the form of an old man in blue and red. I have no reason to think Mr. Sherfield took this to be made for God the Father; for he never was nor never can be pictured. Who knoweth him so well? Moses himself saw but his back parts. But give me leave, my lords, as for Idolatry. This worshipping of idols is the greatest sin of all others; it is a spiritual idolatry; it is to give God's honour unto creatures: For the Homilies of the Church, I think they are very excellent things (and so they are without doubt;) and there is an excellent Homily against Idolatry: so that Mr. Sherfield, and others, taking offence at the pictures in this Window, (although I see not why it should be taken for God the Father) they might, to avoid occasions of evil desire, endeavour to remove the same. But then I hold he should have gone to the proper judge that hath power. And here I find fault with him, that in the 20 years of his continued offence thereat, he would never resort to the bishop to complain thereof: This was certainly 'scandalum acceptum, et non datum.' He should have gone to the bishop; but for his colour to do the same, by the order of the vestry, I think it a mere colour. Two without stood this motion, eight or six consented to the taking of it down. I marvel any question at all was made of it; for I know Mr. Sherfield is as well beloved of the citizens as any man can be; and, I presume, he might command an order in the vestry: but, I say, the vestry hath nothing to do to reform, it wholly belongeth to the bishop. And the power of the church-wardens, by the Canons and Constitutions, is but to inquire and present; but the bishop, the supreme ordinary in his diocese, and the arch-deacon, who is 'magnus oculus episcopi,' are the proper agents in a work of reformation; what mischiefs would else ensue? There was a special commission in Henry 8's time. I know who were commissioners, and have seen the commission: They did strange things; but I have seen again as strange stories of things befallen those houses.

In 3 Edw. 6, cap. 10. it was enacted, That Reformation in the churches should be made by Archbishops and their Commissaries. This was repealed by queen Mary, but set on foot again 1 Jac. and these times must follow the wisdom of an act of parliament. Again, of what dangerous consequence is this act of Mr. Sherfield's? If these men should be permitted to be reformers, they would reform some things that need no reformation. I have seen, in some churches in my circuit, some Stories of the New Testament, some in windows, some in needle-work, and woven-work; God forbid these should be taken away.

The manner of his doing of it I like not. He did not take it down, but break it down in the head and feet, which offended him: This should have been the act of public authority; he presumed to do it in the church, a sacred place, and ever privileged: Therefore it was an offence to use any violence in it, though but to the windows, and therefore to be punished. I think churches too little regulated; I hold it very ill that he did it so in private. He might rather have taken a glazier with him. Yet I hold clearly, he doth not disaffect the government. To my knowledge, he hath done good in that city since I went that circuit; so that there is neither beggar nor drunkard to be seen there. For ecclesiastical government, he is outwardly conformable: I have been long acquainted with him; he sitteth by me sometimes at church; he bringeth a Bible to Church with him (I have seen it) with the Apocrypha and Common-Prayer Book in it, not of the new cut.

That he should do it against my lord bishop's special direction to the contrary, I do not think so. There is but one that proves his undertaking to satisfy the bishop. And for the Inhibition, he had no notice of it, for aught is proved; nay, he expressly denieth it upon his oath, wherefore I do not believe he had notice.

To speak somewhat of the Offence that sticketh upon him, the breaking of the Window; I assure myself, if Mr. Sherfield had gone and acquainted the bishop with this order, when it was made, this cause had been prevented; but done as it was, it was disorderly done, and without warrant. This therefore is an offence done by the Defendant; and it is an offence, in arrogating to himself power and authority not belonging to him, and his zeal and good intention shall not excuse him: Zeal must not transport a man out of his calling, nor beyond his bounds; if it doth, it censeth to be zeal, it is rashness and boldness, it is (my lords) presumption. I proceed to my Sentence, wherein I must crave liberty (and in all things whenever I speak in this place) to use my own conscience; and I shall ever hold this rule, to judge and inflict punishment, 'secundum quantitatem delicti'

For this Defendant, I think him transported with a little indiscreet zeal; and he would not seek remedy for his grievance of his ordinary, that he might have had leave to do this deed, but rather do it of his own head, and this by colour of the vestry's order, nothing to the purpose. And this, my lords, is rather an error, in not doing what he ought to have done, than any great offence in doing what he ought not.

My lords, this I remember always, that every punishment here must be 'ad reformationem, non ad ruinam:' therefore I shall not agree to discharge him of his Recordership, nor of his place of Justice of Peace in that city. For binding him to the good behaviour, I humbly crave pardon to dissent from that; he is a grave bench, and a learned man, and a gentleman well governed hitherto, howsoever his indiscreet zeal transported him into this error. This is the first offence that ever you heard of him. I shall agree for his Submission and Confession of his fault to my lord bishop of Salisbury, to be made before his lordship, and such as he shall call unto him: But, my lords, for his Fine to the King, 1,000*l.* is too much, and 500 marks is too little; I shall therefore go between both, and set 500*l.* and imprisonment according to the course of the court.

Secretary Windebanke. I agree in Sentence with Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, 1,000*l.* Fine, Acknowledgment in both Churches; to be put out of his place, and imprisoned.

Secretary Cooke. His majesty's Attorney General Plaintiff, and Mr. Sherfield, an antient gentleman, is Defendant. In my Sentence I shall endeavour to keep a good rule, which is this, not to make faults where they are not, nor to make them greater than in themselves they are. The Information hath charged seven several crimes upon the Defendant; but of all these, nothing but one, touching the defacing of such ornaments, sticketh upon him: But is this so much? This picture was made for the picture of God the Father. So I thought also, I confess, whosoever was mistaken: for Images in Churches, there hath been heretofore much trouble about them. The first trouble that I have read of, was in or about the second Nicene council; and we read, that imagery, or image-worship, grew up after it had slyly crept in, in this manner.

First they were made for Stories, to teach that to the eye which the word doth to the ear. Then they began to gain some shew of reverence at their approach unto them; but not to the images, the reverence was done to God. Afterwards they came, as we read, (out of the windows and walls) into the church, and at last upon the altars, and then to be worshipped and offered unto. Howbeit, this was but a relative worship, as they would excuse it; nay, as St. Gregory de Valentia saith, they did in his time give co-worship to the Images with God: But our Church doth not allow any adoration to be given to any image or picture whatsoever, nor the image of God the Father to be in the church.

This is the matter of his Accusation: So that as unto the matter, the taking away of such a picture is no offence; but in the manner of doing it, is the greatness of the offence. Reformation in a private man, is deformation, it is not to be permitted: I shall ever be as ready to punish such as any. But that he did this of his own head, without leave of the churchwardens, and against the bishop's Inhibition, it doth not appear to me as it standeth before us. I conceive he had some opinion that the Vestry, or his own authority, might allow him in that which he did, and warrant him in it; but he should then have done it according to the authority. I think he did this out of a little more zeal than he thought to be in others; and I find that he did it without acquainting the bishop therewith: but it is fully proved that he is conformable, and therefore it doth not appear to be in opposition of the reverend bishops.

I incline to my lord the Judge's opinion that spoke last, that it was done out of zeal; and he himself answereth, it was done out of tenderness of conscience: yet I say, that private men are not to make batteries against glass windows in Churches at their pleasure, upon pretence of reformation. Notwithstanding, I conceive the danger of example to encourage others to break down such windows, will not be so great, as the occasion of triumph to ill-affected persons would be, if this court should too severely punish an error in pulling that down which the church disalloweth. Therefore an Acknowledgment to the bishop of Salisbury, in the presence of such others as he shall appoint, that he hath not done well in not asking his leave, would do well; and I hold it fit it should so be: And that he be admonished to conform himself to the government; but I acquit him (for my part) of his Fine, and all other punishment.

Sir Thomas Jarmyn. The cause before your lordships, is upon Mr. Attorney General's Information against this gentleman, Mr. Sherfield; and it is for doing of a thing, which, if it had been done with answerable circumstances, had been no fault in him, 'sed bonum est ex integris causis.' So that the not doing of this thing in a right manner, maketh it an evil; but not so great an evil, in my opinion, as by our sentence to ruin him. But it is a great error for men to be zealous in their private spirits, and to put themselves forward upon public actions belonging to the supreme government. I hold that the practical solecism, by overt actions, is the greatest opposition against authority. These are to be vigilantly met withal; but for this gentleman, some things here spoken make me pity his case: besides his doing the fact in such manner as he confesseth, there is not any one thing else brought home upon him by two witnesses. To speak my Sentence shortly; As I shall not say any thing to encourage those hot-spirited men, so I shall still bear and remember that excellent and just saying, mentioned by one of my lords the Judges, that we are to judge secundam probata, not probabilia; and therefore I agree with the same lord in all the Sentence.

Sir Henry Vane. As to the cause, before this court, at this time, it is (my lords) a crime in the Defendant; none differeth from this, that he hath done that which becometh not his wisdom and experience. I have learned long since, that ignorance doth not excuse an offence, either in church or commonwealth: and I hold that this offence of conscience is not to excuse him; for he went not to the bishop to complain of it, all these 20 years that he was troubled at it. I heard some commend his manner of doing it. I am not of that mind, he could not but know, that if he had an order he must pursue it. I must confess, I do admire, that he (being a lawyer) should be ignorant of the Proclamation to the contrary: but he is a learned man, a Recorder, a Benchman, and a Parliament man; I have known him give grave and wise counsel in that place: all these aggravate his offence, and make it willfulness in him. But for his conformity, and yet doing a thing contrary to his profession of conformity, I ground my Sentence the heavier upon him. He shall pay (I think fit) 1,000*l.* he shall make acknowledgment of his Offence in the cathedral Church of Sarum before the Bishop, Prebendaries, and Canons, but not be put out of his Recordership.

Sir Thomas Edmonds. I agree with my lord Heath for 500 marks fine, acknowledgment before the bishop of Sarum only, and such as he shall please to call unto him.

Bishop of London. If there be 'defensio facti,' or 'confessio facti,' or else two Witnesses, I think any one of these three will be a sufficient proof to convict a man of an offence; and I have observed there are all these together, in this cause against Mr. Sherfield. He confesseth that he broke the Windows, and setteth forth his justification in his Answer to Mr. Attorney's Information; and this was done by him with his pike-staff, as is testified by two witnesses, such as they were; yet they were eye-witnesses, which is the strongest testimony. I am persuaded, as I am a private man, that at least he heard of the bishop's Inhibition; I do not say, but ignorantia facti may excuse a man in such a case, at least a tanto, though not a toto perchance; but ignorantia juris never doth excuse: yet, because it is not directly proved that he had notice of the act of Inhibition, made by my lord bishop, I shall forbear to give my Sentence touching this particular, the rather because he hath cleared himself of it by his oath; and yet I have met with as strange an equivocation in some of late as almost hath been heard of, I have not read the like; but seeing there is not plain proof, I must not judge him other than an honest man.

Mr. Herbert hath defended this as well as ever any did a cause to my knowledge. As for Vestries, which were made and suffered first by negligence doubtless, yet being of continuance, we cannot so easily restrain the power which they use. I have had experience of what I speak herein, in a parish church within my diocese, St. Lawrence by name, there is a Vestry: it fell out once that they could not agree upon some election, I interposed as Ordinary; I had no sooner done this but I was inhibited by the archbishop of Canterbury; afterwards, by his grace's means, it was referred to me to end, which I endeavoured; but then a Prohibition at the common law was sent me; so that it is not an easy matter to restrain a custom.

But it is not in the power of a Vestry to remove or displace any thing in the Church that is doubtful; and though they made an Order, in this case, for the taking down of the Window, yet it was Mr. Sherfield's fault to go so disorderly to work; his violent and riotous breaking into the church, and upon a consecrated thing, is criminal in him.

Whereas divers things touching his conformity have been proved, I am confident upon good information, had the cause been followed as well as defended, (but it was ill followed by them that prosecuted, and unworthy their places) many more things might have been proved against him; and that it would have appeared, he had done more harm underhand in his place, than good otherwise. But for his trouble of conscience, which should impel to this action; it troubled not much, for he kept it in, and nourished it until it grew, as you see, to a great head, so that at last it hath brought him hither, even to the sentence of this court.

My conscience being laid at stake, I am not of opinion, that Images and Pictures were not in the Church until the time of Gregory the Great: nor am I of opinion that the first trouble about them was at the second council of Nice. St. Gregory, who was 600 years after Christ, in his 9th book and 9th epistle, written to —, saith of Images, 'vestustas admissit, &c.' But 200 years before this, we find that Gregory, surnamed the 'Divine,' otherwise called 'Gregory Nazianzen,' when the Emperor laid siege to the city of which he was bishop, in his Oration to the said Emperor, to move him to pity, saith, That the citizens, above all their losses, spoiling of the city walls, ruining of their houses and temples, took to heart the pulling down their statues; 'Et hoc acerbum,' saith he. Nay we find them in the church 200 years after Christ, they were upon the chalice, and that is ever upon the altar.

In Tertullian's time (who was one of the ancientest Fathers) there was painted upon the Chalice the picture of the Shepherd bringing home the lost sheep upon his shoulders; and this was objected against Tertullian himself, who in his latter time fell into the opinion and error of the Montanists, who are against second Marriage and Repentance after Baptism, affirming that no Repentance is left to him that sinneth after Baptism; against which error, the church used this symbol of the shepherd bringing home the lost sheep.

Again, in the time of that ancient Father Irenaeus, who is held to be the Scholar of St. John, they had the Picture of Jesus Christ; and they had it from the Gnosticks, who had adorations with it, and sacrifices: and therefore the holy father condemned that picture, because, saith he, the Gnosticks did that to this Picture which the Heathens did to their Idol Gods. But it hath been a distasteful thing to remove Pictures and Images. We read, that the bishop of Cyrene broke the Pictures in the Churches, which his people took so ill, that they rose against him, and were hardly appeased.

And of late times we have had experience of like mischiefs in France and the Low-Countries about this matter. And we know what rebellions were raised in the beginning of the Reformation here in this kingdom and in Germany: when Carolostadius and his company went about to pull down, and deface the Images in the churches, what a stir was there? If Luther himself had not come back and appeased the Multitude by his timely advice, that the work of Reformation was to be left to the supreme magistrates, (which was well done of him, and a thing wherein he shewed his wisdom) much more mischief would have ensued. I do not say these things to any such purposes, as that Images should have any part of Divine adoration.

When these were brought into the Churches, as one side fell to worshipping them, so the other side fell to breaking and defacing them, which bred many broils; and amongst the rest, one very sharp contention by reason of the prevailing of Worshippers of Images, was stirred in the time of Constantine the Great; for I read the Empress gave her voice against her son Constantine to put him off from the empire, because of his defacing of the Images, which they had in their Churches. But for that gross Council of Nice, (pardon me this gross term, but they deserve it in my opinion) they decree the same honour was to be done to the Image as to the Life, whether it were the picture of man, or of God, or of Christ. And then another Decree in that Council was, that a man must rather endure penury than do violence to a Picture: and their absurd distinction of Latria and Doulia, &c. Yet this I say, there is a great deal of difference between an Image and an Idol. But then, if men give worship to them as to the other, it is unlawful.

As for the Injunctions in the queen's time; this was done by public authority, and done in every place by their proper Judge.

And, touching the matter in question, I do not think it lawful to make the Picture of God the Father: but it is lawful to make the Picture of Christ, and Christ is called the express Image of his Father. I do not mean to say that the Picture of Christ, as God the Son, may be made; for the Deity cannot be portrayed or pictured, though the Humanity may. I do not think but the Representation of God the Father (as in the Prophet Daniel he is called the Antient of Days) hath been allowed (though erroneously) to be made, like an antient old man: and this the Lutheran party hold too; but whether it be idolatrous or superstitious or no, this I hold not to be the question. And I shall crave liberty not to declare mine opinion* at this time, whether it ought to be removed; but the Defendant, Mr. Sherfield, did this in contempt, at least in neglect of the Church's authority, and the authority of the king's majesty; for the church derive their authority from the king, as well as the Civility. I shall therefore sentence him for breaking this Window, whether it were fit or no to be in the church; if it had been white glass, it would have been the same thing to me; it was a violent and raging act, and it is now a business of great weight and ill consequence, and therefore fit for the timely censure of this Court. And I say farther, if it had been the Idol of Jupiter;

* "But he shewed his opinion, when upon his promotion to the See of Canterbury, he caused the same kind of Pictures to be set up in his Chapels at Lambeth and Croydon." † Rush, and they had professed Divine Worship to it, it had not have been lawful for Mr. Sherfield, or any private man, to deface it; and this I shall prove and maintain by Scripture.

The Idol of Jupiter was but as the golden calf which Aaron made, before which the People of Israel committed Idolatry; yet we see Judgment was executed by the supreme magistrate, by command from God, and the tribe of Levi was commanded to kill the Idolaters.

Then again, there was a Brazen Serpent appointed to be set up by the Lord himself; and afterwards it became an Idol, and the people committed idolatry with it; yet none of all Israel presumed to break it down, but Hezekiah the king did it. Also the Calves of Jeroboam, set up at Dan and Bethel, were plain Idols, yet they continued a long time, and were not pulled down until Josiah the king did it, and this he doth by his supreme power; and the king did this by the priests of the first and second order. Both these appear in their Stories in the 4th book of Kings, the 18th and 23d chapters.

As for the Second Commandment, 'Thou shalt not make any graven Image,' or Picture, to thyself: no, take heed, worship it not howsoever it be; if thou dost make an Image, yet thou shalt not worship it. But there is no command or example for breaking of Images (when they are made) without public authority. You shall see this plainly in that Altar set up by the Reubenites and Gadites at Jordan, this was conceived by some of the people to be an idolatrous thing, at least an intention in them to set up another manner of worship, and Jerusalem was the place of worship only: there was an embassy sent unto them, and Phineas and other princes were employed in it; they did not presently fall upon them and break down the Altar, though they had special and strict command to overthrow and break down all idolatrous and heathen Altars, Groves, places of Idolatry and Images; but this they were not to do presently, they were to tarry until the land was theirs, in their own power, as you may see in the 7th and 12th chapters of Deut. But you will say these were for the Jews, but not for us in the times of the Gospel. In St. Augustin's time the people committed Idolatry with their Images, and many there were that would have pulled down the Images (the causes of this Idolatry.) St. Augustin adviseth, No, first preach them out of men's hearts, and he called upon the ministers so to do; but you shall not pull them down (saith he) until the Supreme Power doth it, or power were given them. Thus, if it were Jupiter's Picture, Mr. Sherfield or any others are not to pull it down until power be given them, and Gerardus the Lutheran is of the same opinion.

The Homily against Idolatry (so much magnified) plainly shews it to belong to the supreme magistrate, and has reference to such pictures as are upon Walls; but Stories upon Glass Windows were not here meant. And as for my lord bishop of Salisbury, book of his worthy Lectures* at Cambridge, upon the 4th chapter of the Epistle to the Colossians, upon these words, 'Walk wisely towards them that are without,' what saith he? Why the very same that St. Austin did before, that a private man hath neither vocationem nor potestatem to do it; thus if he had read a little farther he should have found direction to have walked wisely. And indeed, those that are out of the Church must be dealt wisely withal. When you see these things, you cannot, as the Israelites did not, deface them, for they belong only to the supreme power. And you shall see St. Paul's practice in the 17th Chapter of the Acts of the Apostles; he saw they had set up an Altar to the unknown God, yet he went not to pull it down, but to teach them that God which they knew not, even as St. Austin afterwards advised.

So I come to this which is the Work of the Day; this is a violent, riotous and prophane entering into the Church by him, to break this Window down with his pike-staff: and as the matter standeth proved to me, it seemeth there are these circumstances of Aggravation of his fault.

1. The first circumstance of aggravation is, That when he went about the taking down of this window, he went not unto the bishop, but chose another way.
2. He was 20 years offended at it; and in all this time, we think some good spirit might have suggested unto him better advice, if he would have followed it.
3. By his Office and authority, his fault is the greater and more scandalous.
4. By his age, being grown grey, he should have learned wisdom.
5. That when he went to do this, he went in private, which some have said to be well done, but I am not of that opinion: true, if it had been a work of necessity in him to take it down, he might have done it, but then he must follow his order, and he should then have taken a glazier with him to have taken it down, and not brake it down with his staff.
6. His Offence is the greater by his office of justice of peace; certainly herein he was not conservator pacis, for besides the force and violence, there might have been much discord and blood-shed about it, as was well observed by Mr. Attorney.
7. By the doing of this act contrary to his Conformity, there have been the like insolences done in the same Church, for which I think there is a cause against some of them depending in the High Commission Court; there was the Tomb of a dead bishop there, his bones taken up, his skull made a mazer in an Apothecary's shop, (as I am informed) his dust thrown about, and all to bury a tanner's wife.
8. In regard of his tenderness of Conscience, which he alledged for himself: my reason is, for that, if he were of a tender conscience indeed; yet in this thing I shall sentence him, for not going to the bishop to reveal it to him; if it were but a shew of tenderness, then surely there was the more wilfulness in his offence, and this can be no excuse. 9. His fault is aggravated from his Profession: It is an honourable profession; and as it is a great offence in a divine to infringe the law of the kingdom wherein he is born and bred up, so is it also a great offence, if those of the profession of the law vilify the poor laws of the Church. Thus much let me say to Mr. Sherfield, and such of his profession as slight the ecclesiastical laws and persons, that there was a time when churchmen were as great in this kingdom as you are now; and let me be bold to prophesy, there will be a time when you will be as low as the Church is now, if you go on thus to contemn the Church.

* Davenant on the Colossians, cap. 4, s. p. 389.

To proceed, he went into the Church. It pleased God to give him a fall upon the place, and if it had not been God's mercy he had broken his back upon the edge of the pew; yet all this while these things have not wrought him to any Confession that he hath done amiss; nay he saith, he was persecuted for God's Cause, (as I am informed) but I think he persecuted the poor Sexton of the Church, they put him in prison, and there kept him, and would have kept him, if my Lord Bishop had not sent bail; and if it had not been for the bishop, they would have turned him out of his place. And then, just upon the fact committed, cometh a new Lecturer to town, and he pitcheth upon the text, Psalm cxix. ver. 121. 'I have executed Judgment and Justice; leave me not to mine Oppressors.' I have been the willing to render this account at this time; because some are ready to slander us, as maintainers of Popish Superstition, and I know not what. As for my Sentence, I agree with my Lord Cottington.

Lord Wentworth. This is an offence, my lords, committed by a man, of learning and judgment; the persons of men and times may aggravate offences. Men now in these days make themselves wiser than their teachers; whereas it is said, he did this out of conscience and zeal, and with an intent to honour God, he is out of his element. Uzzah touched the Ark with a good intention; but because he did this without warrant he was secretly punished; it is not for a Divine to meddle with 'Little-ton's Tenures,' nor a Lawyer with divinity, to govern matters in the Church. The Vestry had no power to reform, nor authorize Mr. Sherfield to do this thing: and I hold it a very great boldness in him, to justify his fact under these pretences: for things which Vestries undertake to do of themselves, if it be well done, it is well; if it be not, let them look to it. But for their frequent and ordinary transcending their power, it is high time that the bishops be directed by the king's majesty, to regulate all such things, and to reduce all these vestry-men into order and obedience. I shall not forbear to punish an offence of this dangerous consequence upon that ground for fear of giving an occasion of triumph to some. I think his impunity will be rather an encouragement, to men of other minds, to set their hands to the like, of which there is great danger. I shall not therefore in my Sentence go any thing less than any of my lords here before me have done; 'That he be not any longer Recorder of that city; that he be bound to the good behaviour;' I see no reason but a gentleman may be bound to the good behaviour: for his public acknowledgment, I think it necessary to be made in both Churches; and that he pay 1,000*l.* fine to his majesty's use.

Sir Robert Naunton, master of the Court of Wards and Liveries, gave not his Sentence because he was not in court the last day, at the beginning of the hearing.

Lord Newburgh, chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, forbore to give his Sentence for the same reason.

Viscount Falkland agreed in his Sentence with my lord Cottington, 'for 1,000*l.* fine unto the king, &c.'

Viscount Wimbleson agreed in his Sentence with my lord Heath, 'for acknowledgment of his Fault to the bishop, and such as he should think fit to call to him; and to pay a fine of 500 marks to the king's majesty.'

Earl of Holland. He was not present at the beginning of the hearing of the cause, and therefore did forbear to give his Sentence.

Earl of Devonshire. He agreed with my lord Cottington for 1,000*l.* &c.

Earl of Dorset. I conceive, my lords, that the prosecutor of this cause is much to be blamed, and did the court legally take notice of a prosecutor, where the king is a party, I should give my vote to fine such a man: he hath here made a great noise of terrible things, (seven in number) but hath not endeavoured to prove many of them. I shall speak somewhat of the matter in question that sticketh upon him, and not meddle with what hath not been proved. And first is to be considered what was done; a Window in a Church was broke, because of the Image of God the Father which was in it, in those places of the head and feet of the Representation of the Deity; this, if it had been done by the proper Judge, had been well done. If all unlawful pictures and images were utterly taken out of the churches, I think it were a good work; for at the best they are but vanities and teachers of lies. For the Antient of Days in Daniel (I take it) this doth not give warrant to frame a picture of God like an old man; but it showeth the eternity of God, that he was before all times and days, and it cannot be taken to be the portraiture of any other: for this being made to represent the Creation, it must needs be intended for the picture of God the Father; for what man did help God about the Creation? This therefore is unlawful, no man ever saw God, nor did he ever appear in any likeness to man. But we picture Christ, because he took upon him man's nature, and was man as well as God; and the Holy Ghost appeared in the similitude of a dove: but I wish there were no image of the Father, neither in the Church, nor out of the Church.

Secondly, I note the mind wherewith it was done, and it was out of a little too much zeal, his conscience was tender. This, if it had been guided well, would have been worthy of praise. I do not speak this to make as if men may take upon them to meddle in what belongeth not unto them; yet there is difference between a fault done of zeal, and the same thing done out of malice.

Next let us consider the authority whereby he did it; and herein especially Mr. Sherfield had no power. The Vestry had no power, neither could they give any to another; it was therefore an error in him to conceive, that because they used to meet and do things for repair and ornament in the church, that therefore they might do this, being a piece of reformation; I say, it was his error to do it without the bishop of the place. I would not be mistaken, as if I speak or did any thing against the authority of the reverend prelates: for I take it, whensoever that authority goeth down or decayeth, the monarchy dieth with it, I think they are inseparably joined together. But this was an opinion of his, that it was their lay-fee; and if he repent him of his opinion, recant it, and depart from his justification, (though his Answer be otherwise) I shall not take upon me to destroy a man for such an offence. Then in what manner did he it? Privately and without noise; and this I hold to be a diminution of his fault, for secret evils are not so bad as when they are openly done; the same evils done in chambers, are not so bad as if they were done in the market-place.—And it cannot aggravate his fault, that he is conformable: I say, in my opinion it was very necessary for him to prove himself a conformitant; and being charged in the information to be otherwise minded, he did well and wisely to clear himself by proof.

I come to my Sentence. I shall not sentence him for three or four Papists, nor shall I forbear to sentence him for three or four Schismatics; the reason why I shall not sentence him, is to avoid the tumults of the rude ignorant people in the countries where this gentleman dwelleth, where he hath been a good governor, as hath been testified, and is well known, and no doubt hath punished drunkenness and other disorders; and then such persons shall rejoice and triumph against him, and say, This you have for your severe government. This I think would be no good reward for his care. The reason why I shall sentence him, is because he hath erred in his manner of doing this thing, in going on his own head without the Ordinary, to a work of this nature; and this I shall hold to be an offence in this Defendant, or a misdemeanour, but not a crime. I would not have him to lose his place therefore, nor to be bound to the good behaviour; I would notwithstanding have him make such Acknowledgment to the bishop of Sarum, and in such manner as he shall think fit: but I do not set any Fine upon him.

Earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, Lord Chamberlain, he gave no Sentence at all.

Earl of Arundel, Lord Marshal. I find fault with this gentleman for keeping close his Office of Conscience, which he saith he had at this Window, by the space of 30 years together: He should in all this time have revealed his mind to the bishop, who had been able to direct him; but upon the matter, he goeth on his own authority to break down this window. This being long kept in his heart, breaketh out to deface the Image of God in a man. Besides, he leaveth the ordinary, who hath power, and goeth to the Vestry, who hath none; and in his fanatical humour he proceedeth, and breaketh the order of the Vestry. God gave him a warning; he fell upon the seat, and hath had time enough to think of it since, and in all this time he never came to acknowledge his offence. I agree therefore with my lord Cottington.

Earl of Manchester, Lord Privy Seal. In this cause, my lords, I shall propound two things to be considered, the fact itself, and the circumstance of it: For the fact, the breaking of the Window because of idolatry. If this had been in a man's lay-fee, then he had been bound to have pulled it down; but being in a parochial church, it is to be done by the Ordinary, or by his appointment. This therefore being done by Mr. Sherfield, upon some opinion that he had in the power of the Vestry, it was an error to him, but pardonable. It doth not appear that this was done contrary to the Inhibition of the bishop, 'Non notum est iudici, quod non notum est judicialiter,' he had not therefore notice of it: For my lord of London's aggravating circumstances, it is true, if the thing were done, as it is charged in the Information, then those would be all against him; but we see there were causes it should be taken down; it is proved some did adore it. How long soever pictures and images have been in the churches, I hold it a very offensive thing to make such a picture, or representation of God. I will mention but one author, which was before all them who were named, the prophet Isaiah, 'What likeness or similitude will you make of me, saith the Lord?' Yes; but idolatry lies in the worshipping of the image. Take a wise man's counsel, The painted picture injudgeth the ignorant to idolatry. I profess it would offend my conscience to see it, I am of such a pure conscience.

But there are three other things for which I shall censure him. 1. His pretending the Order of the Vestry. 2. That he would neglect authority, which is near unto Contempt. 3. His passion in doing it himself, and not by others.—This Cause and Sentence hath many judges, even so many as hear it are judges of it. All may take notice, that our votes are to maintain order and government, yet not to uphold superstition. I will be short, I will sentence the Defendant, but not fine him; 'to make Acknowledgement to the bishop,' not to disrecorder him: The fact deserves not a fine.

Archbishop of York (Dr. Neale). May it please your lordships, this gentleman, Mr. Sherfield, is informed against by his majesty's Attorney-General, for entering with force into the church of St. Edmond's in the city of Salisbury, and there undertaking, without the Ordinary of the place, to be a reformer of idolatry, in breaking a Glass Window in the same church, which he did of his own authority. In his Answer upon the matter, he setteth forth a justification.

First, he saith it was the lay-fee of the parishioners: but this will not help him, for it is a parochial church. Next, he had Warrant for what he did, as he pleadeth, That he did it by order of the Vestry: I wonder what is the Vestry, and what power and authority they have? It is a place where anciently the ornaments of the church were kept; since those things were gone, there were meetings by the parishioners to agree on matters of repair and assessments, and rates for the church, and the poor; and they did meet sometimes in the church, and sometimes in the Vestry, no man of the parish was excluded. Afterwards, to avoid tumults and multiplicity of voices, some bishops had appointed, by special instruments under their episcopal seals, that such and such, to a set number, should be Vestry-men, and be so called, and shall order matters for the repair of the church, or bread and wine for the Communion, and such like things, as the charges about bells, &c. And here I shall make bold to remember a story to your lordships of what passed between my lord Burleigh, myself, and Dr. Bancroft, the then bishop of London, when I was vicar of Cheshunt. I was then a young man, and I had an opinion that there was somewhat in a Vestry; and had a purpose which I acquainted my lord and honourable patron withal, to have some authority deputed us in our Vestry, by the bishop of London our ordinary; I had my lord Burleigh's letter of commendations, and special request to the bishop for the same. His lordship's Answer which he gave me was thus: 'If you have occasion to repair the church or the bells, to make rates for the poor, and such like things, this you may do; but if you think otherwise, or aim at any other power, it shall not be allowed you, and you smell of the presbytery; therefore, I pray you, commend me to my lord Burleigh, and tell his lordship I will not incur a premunire, for I have somewhat to lose.'

I conclude: The Vestry hath no power to make reformation, nor can the Defendant derive any power from them; Therefore, as for the matter of offence, the picture of God the Father, no man ever took upon him to paint the essence of the Deity. But the question is, whether it be lawful to express God the Father by any representation? I think it not unlawful in itself. The eternity of Alpha and Omega doth appear in Christ, and Christ is the Image of his Father. As for those divine Homilies of the church, set forth in king Edward's days, and that in special against Idolatry, we know the times did not bear them: nor are they to be taken or understood, as not to allow any manner of pictures or images (though it may seem so) of Christ upon the Cross; but it is like the forbearing of food for a time, as St. Paul saith he would, for fear of giving offence or scandal unto others, who are weak; I say that for the crucifix, there may be a very good use made of it. As for the purpose, he that shall look upon a crucifix not to adore it, or give any divine worship thereunto, he must needs think with himself, how can I but grieve and mourn for these sins of mine, which could not be expiated but by my Saviour's blood upon the cross? And then I cannot but think of the great love of our Lord Jesus Christ to mankind, that vouchsafed to die for my sins. And then, it serves to increase my confidence in him, by considering that he has given himself for me, and promised that I shall not want any thing that is good for me; and that he will not deny me my prayers in any thing which I ask agreeable to his will; so that this must needs work a deep impression on my heart. I thus think; but when it cometh to be superstitious, or that some make it a cause of idolatry, I must confess, I would then rather want the thing, and all the good uses of it, than incur the danger of propagating idolatry. That reverend Jewel, bishop of Salisbury, in his time had a commission, and he took down all idolatrous Windows in the churches, and set in place thereof clear glass; but he left alone this Window; and surely, if he had thought it to be idolatrous, he would have reformed it. And we have the Creed of Athanasius which hath these words, 'That Christ is of one substance with the Father;' therefore the Image of the Son is the Image of the Father, and therefore it cannot be idolatry simply to make it. But grant that it was a cause of idolatry, might Mr. Sherfield or the Vestry take it down? He saith in his Answer, That himself and four others of the Vestry are justices of the peace, and not altogether private men. I would ask him this question, Whether as justices of the peace, they are to meddle with Reformation in the Church? It is plain they are not; yet, as a private man, he hath undertaken to break this Window; whereas the agreement of the Vestry was to take it down: Neither was it meant that he should do it himself, but by the glazier, and set up new glass in the room of it; but he hath not followed this neither. My brother, that sitteth by me, hath very well and learnedly spoken of the authority by which these things ought to be done. I cannot add to what hath been said by him; I shall therefore, because much time hath been already spent, only insist on one thing in the Defendant's Answer, and so conclude my Sentence. He saith, the authority which the late queen had to reform and set forth those her Injunctions, were given to her by the parliament. This is not well spoken. The statute of 1 Eliz. is but an Act Declaratory, not to be taken as if without it the queen had no power to meddle with those things of the church; for this authority was invested in the crown, and is still without the parliament. He that said 'per me reges regnant,' giveth this authority to the king. It is good to meet with growing evils, we know not how great a fire may be kindled with a small spark. I cannot therefore do otherwise, but agree to fine and censure him highly, having offended with so many circumstances of aggravation, as have been well opened by divers of your lordships before me; therefore my Sentence is, that 'I concur with my lord Cottington in all the parts of his Sentence.'

Lord Coventry, Lord Keeper of the great seal of England. This Cause, my lords, I doubt not will produce a good effect; for this great audience consisting of gentlemen from all parts of the kingdom, cannot but be satisfied that we think it not fit nor lawful to represent the Deity by picture, and consequently we condemn Romish superstition; and on the other side, that we are resolutely bent to maintain the government by the reverend Fathers of the Church, the bishops. And all this I think fit to be carefully expressed in drawing up the Sentence. This I must premise, that when I speak my conscience I be not mistaken, I am no worshipper of graven images; nor on the other side, am I of that peevish turbulent humour with others. For the Charges in the Bill, if they had been proved, I should for my part have trebled the Fine set by any of your lordships. There was never cause worse prosecuted, yet we are to consider how much standeth proved against the Defendant. The Prosecutor causeth the Information to be exhibited against this Defendant and ten others; but those ten are not so much pressed to answer.

First, to speak to those things that are not proved, but only charged upon him. 1. He is charged with Inconformity, therefore it was necessary for him to discharge himself of it by his Proof, which he hath done, and no doubt remaineth in me to the contrary; for the prosecutor, though apt enough to charge him with this, yet he exhibiteth not a witness or interrogatory to prove it. 2. That he did this in Contempt of the Ecclesiastical Power, and contrary to the lord bishop's Act of Inhibition; but it is not proved he had any notice of it before the act was done, and therefore the oath of the party is to be believed: nay, there was no endeavour to prove it, so far as I see. And I like not so well Mr. Chancellor's moving the bishop to make an act to continue this Window, if it were for any other cause than to preserve the ecclesiastical jurisdiction. Mr. Chancellor should have done well to have declared this dislike and scandal to the Window to my lord bishop of Sarum, and he, no doubt, would have removed it. I do not say the bishop or ecclesiastical judge is bound to give notice of his judicial acts in their ordinary proceedings in course of the ecclesiastical laws, and their own jurisdictions: But if you will charge a man upon a contempt in a criminal court, as here you must, then prove he hath notice of the Inhibition: for else it is but ignorantia juris, which in the ordinary way will not excuse; and yet if it were ignorantia juris, I do not see but in so high a course of prosecution as in this court, it might in some cases diminish a fault; but this is ignorantia facti in this case. 3. That he did profanely demolish this Window, containing a representation of the Creation. This giveth occasion to look a little into the nature of these pictures; I conceive them to be unlawful and irreligious pictures of God the Father. Two of the Witnesses say they were idolatrous, and made to represent God the Father; that it is God the Son's picture, there is no proof. I think that opinion of making the Image of God according to that of Daniel, calling God the Antient of Days, in the form of an antient man, is, as my lord of London hath said, erroneously grounded; and also to bring God as he appeared unto Daniel to be presented in the Creation, which was long before, is somewhat improper. 4. Then that Mr. Sherfield boasted of it, it is not proved that he did, and it is evident that he doth not boast of it.

Now for what is charged upon him, and sticketh, that under colour of the Vestry's Order, he did the same, and without the bishop of Sarum. And for an answer what Vestries are, I read not of a Vestry in our Book of Common-Law; I read much of church-wardens, and their doings. If it be a meeting of the minister, church-wardens and parishioners, it is a good meeting, and they may well deal in matters of reparation, not reformation; and this is not derogatory from the authority of the bishop, but subordinate to it. But it may be through the neglect of the prelates, the vestries do encroach upon their government; and will be more disorderly, if they be not regulated. My lord of London did, in the beginning of this cause, well declare, that the archdeacon is 'magnus oculus episcopi'; it were fit for these to do their duties, and so such things should not be left to be done unto these men of the parish, I mean to these Vestry-men. Now, in the Vestry they make an order that this Window may be taken down by Mr. Sherfield. I do not say nor believe they have power to reform; yet he proveth by way of prescription for 69 years they have made reparations and meetings. But howsoever he doth not pursue his order; and this indeed was not discretion in him. But if he had taken down white glass, I do not see any reason why I should sentence him; this being not prosecuted in an ecclesiastical ordinary course. The council on both sides have carried themselves in the cause extremely well; and for their yielding it to be a parochial church, it is well done, and no fault is to be put on the party for his protestation; for I cannot think but when he made his Answer, he was of opinion it was a lay-fee, he sweareth it; and being he now confesseth it to be subject to the bishop, his fault is a great deal the less, in as much as it now appeareth, he doth not oppose the ecclesiastical authority.

I am glad to hear what I have heard this day from my lords who have spoken, and from my lords the reverend bishops. I say, it appeareth that nothing hath fallen from them or any here present, to allow the picturing of the Deity, or the worshipping of images. I am much inclined to that opinion of Mr. Secretary Cooke, 'That he be sentenced by way of Reprehension and Admonition; I hold fit that he make his acknowledgment before my lord bishop, and repair this broken Window in decent manner.' I am loth he should be put to any heavy Fine, the rather because he hath not been prosecuted in an ecclesiastical course, therefore I give no Fine at all.

The Votes of the said lords and others of his majesty's privy-council, were thus disposed. Nine agreed to set 1,000*l.* Fine upon Mr. Sherfield the Defendant, and he should be put out of his place of Recorder, be bound to the good behaviour, and make open acknowledgment of his fault in the church of St. Edmunds, where the offence was done, and likewise in the cathedral church of Sarum, before the bishop there, and the deans and prebends of that church.—And nine others, my Lord-Keeper's voice being one, agreed that he should not be discontinued, that he should make Acknowledgment in private to the bishop of Sarum of the said offence, and in such manner, and before such persons as the said bishop of Sarum should think fit. And for the king's Fine, these were again divided; four, whereof my Lord Keeper was one, gave no Fine at all, and five did give their voices to set a Fine; four of them set 500 marks, and one of them, viz. my L. C. J. Richardson, set 500*l.* which fine of 500*l.* was taken for the king, because according to the rules and orders of the court of Star-Chamber, when there is difference of fines in an odd, the king is to have the middle fine. Therefore the Sentence of the court was, and is thus entered:

'The Defendant being troubled in conscience, and grieved with the sight of the pictures which were in a Glass-Window in the church of St. Edmond in New Sarum, one of the said pictures, to his understanding, being made to represent God the Father; did procure an order to be made by the Vestry, whereof himself was a member, that the Window should be taken down; so as the Defendant did, at his own charge, glaze it again with white glass: and by colour of this order, the Defendant, without acquainting the bishop, or his chancellor therewith, got himself into the church, made the doors fast to him, and then, with his staff, brake divers holes in the said painted Window, wherein was described the Creation of the World; and for this offence committed, with neglect of episcopal authority, from whom the vestry derive their authority, and by colour of an order of vestry, who have no power to alter or reform any of the ornaments of the church, the Defendant was committed to the Fleet, fined 500*l.* and ordered to repair to the lord bishop of his diocese, and there make an acknowledgment of his offence and contempt, before such persons as the bishop would call unto him.'

142. Proceedings against WM. PRYNN,* esq. in the Star-Chamber, for Writing and publishing a Book intitled, "Histrio-mastix, or a Scourge for Stage-Players," &c.; and also against MICHAEL SPARKES, for printing, and against WILLIAM BUCKNER, for licensing the said Book: 9 CHARLES I. A. D. 1632-3. [1 Clarendon's Hist. 73, 158. 2 Rushw. Coll. 220.]

THE 7th of February 1632-3, Mr. William Prynne, utter-barrister of Lincoln's-Inn, was brought to the Star-Chamber; together with Michael Sparkes, William Buckner, and four other Defendants, upon Mr. Attorney Noy's Information; which being opened by Mr. Hudson of Gray's-Inn, did set forth, That about 8 Car. Reg. Mr. Prynne compiled and put in print

* "Mr. William Prynne now published his 'Histrio-Mastix' or Book against Stage Plays, licensed by the chaplain of archbishop Abbot; wherein, with very profuse collections, he exposed the liberties of the stage, and condemned the very lawfulness of acting. In his way of writing he could not refrain from over-doing any subject and from many appearances of railing. And because the Court became now more addicted to these ludicrous entertainments, and the queen herself was so fond of the amusement that she had bore the part of a pastoral in her own royal person; therefore this Treatise against Plays was suspected to be levelled against the practice of the court, and the example of the queen: and it was supposed an Innuendo, that in the Table of the Book this reference was put, 'Women actors notorious whores.' The Attorney-General prosecuted Prynne for this Libel in the Star-Chamber, where he was sentenced to imprisonment and other penalties. The misfortune was, that bishop Laud was the instrument and abettor of this process against the Book and the Author, by shewing the book to the king, and pointing at the offensive parts of it; and then by con-

a libellous volume, entitled by the name of "Histrio-mastix," against plays, masques, dancings, &c. And although he knew well, that his majesty's royal queen,* lords of the counsel, &c. were in their public festivals, and other times, presentspectators of some masques and dances, and many recreations that were tolerable, and in themselves sinless, and so published to be, by a Book printed in the time of his majesty's royal father; yet Mr. Prynne, in his Book, hath railed, not only against stage-plays, comedies, dancings, and all other exercises of the people, and against all such as behold them, but farther and particular against hunting, public festivals, Christmas-keeping, bonfires and maypoles; nay, against the dressing up of a house with green-ivy. And to manifest his evil and mischievous design in publishing of this Libel, he hath therein written divers incitements, to stir up the People to discontent, as if there were just cause to lay violent hands on their prince; and hath expressed in many speeches against his majesty, and his household, infamous terms unfit for so sacred a person. He hath cast an aspersion upon her majesty the queen, and railing and uncharitable censures against all christian people. He hath commended all those that are factious persons, that have vented any thing in any book against the state, as the factious Book of Dr. Leighton, Jo. Mariana a jesuit, to draw the people from his majesty's government, which is of most dangerous consequence to the realm and state. His Book is of above 1000 pages: and he dealt with one Michael Sparkes for the publishing, licensing, and printing thereof, who is a person that is a common publisher of unlawful and unlicensed books; and dealt also with Mr. Buckner, another Defendant, for the allowing of it for the press; and with the other four Defendants to print part of it, and publish the same: and by this means this Volume was allowed and published, to the great scandal of the whole realm. And to have this punished according to the demerit of the cause, is the end of Mr. Attorney's Information.

playing Dr. Heylyn to pick out all the virulent passages, and give the severest turn to them; and lastly, by carrying those Notes to the Attorney-General for matter of Information, and urging him earnestly to proceed against the Author: which though a prelate might do with sincere intention to suppress libelling, and to assert a respect to crowned heads; yet it was looked upon, by some serious men, as a giving countenance to the licentiousness and profaneness of the Stage, which ought rather to have been reproved and restrained by a christian bi-hop." Kennet.

* "The Queen had acted a part herself, in a pastoral at Somerset-House: and this Book of Prynne's was shewed her as leveled at her, there being a reference in it, to Women Actors notorious Whores; though in truth the book was published six weeks before the queen's acting." Whitlock's Mem. p. 18.

Mr. Atkins of Lincoln's-Inn (afterwards a Judge in the court of Common-Pleas) opened Mr. Prynne's Answer; That he the said Mr. Prynne taking into his serious consideration the frequent resort of sundry sorts of people to common Stage-Plays about the city of London; and having read divers counsels, laws and statutes of this and other realms, against the frequenting of common stage-plays, and the judgment and opinion of several divines, and other ancient authors, and divers English writers allowed by public authority, and his own judgment running with those; not intending to reflect, or to have relation to the king, queen, state, or government, or your lordships, did about seven years ago, compile this book entitled Histrio-mastix; which is no more but a collection of divers arguments and authorities against common Stage-Plays. That about four years since, he did commit the same to Michael Sparkes, one of the Defendants, to be commended to such persons as then had authority to license books for the press. Sparkes did carry it to Mr. King, belonging to the late Archbishop of Canterbury; and before he had perused this book, Mr. Buckner had authority to allow of the books, to the press: Sparkes brought this book to Mr. Buckner, who kept it by him three months, in which time he did fully peruse it. In the interim, he gave part of the book to Sparkes to print, and kept the rest till he had perused it, and said, that he should have that also to the press. In October following, he carried this copy with the licence, and caused them to be entered into Stationers-Hall, and did compound with those that had authority for the printing of this book. It was printed publicly, and not secretly; and because there was some of the copies close written, he caused these to be brought again to peruse, to the intent that he might not be deceived in them; and as he saw cause, corrected them accordingly. That in Easter-Term was twelvemonth, the Epistle, and the whole First Part of the Book was printed; and he had time to examine it between Easter-Term and Trinity, and then he did make such alterations as he saw cause, viz. in p. 711, &c. And afterwards the Second Part, and two sheets of the index of the book was likewise printed, and these were likewise brought to Mr. Buckner; so that the whole Book with the Index, was bound up about Christmas following, which was Christmas was a twelve-month. Mr. Buckner sent for Mr. Prynne, and the stationer was desirous that the Book might be published, and that he might send some volumes to him: but Mr. Buckner said, he could wish the word 'Pity,' in such a page might be left out; and I wish with Mr. Buckner, that 'Pity' might be added to every page of the Book. So when Mr. Prynne saw all this from him, that had licence to allow printed Books, he conceived it a sufficient warrant for his proceedings. And for that which is alledged in the Information, of Mr. Prynne's commending Dr. Leighton, for which the doctor received a Censure in this court, in the quotation whereof, viz. his Book, and of others, he adhereth to their meaning so far as, and wherein they are agreeable to the law: and this book was printed long before Dr. Leighton was questioned in this court. And as for encouraging of others to be factious or seditious, he saith upon his oath, That he was so far from disloyalty, schism, or sedition, or neglect of the king, state, or government, that he hath with much joy, cheerfulness, and thankfulness to God, ever acknowledged his, and the rest of the king's subjects happiness, by the peace we have under his majesty's happy government: and this Answer and intention is sincere, though other construction be made thereupon. He saith, he hath taken his oath of Supremacy and Allegiance in the University and Inns of Court where he hath taken his degrees. That it never came into his thoughts to approve of Schism or Sedition: and if any thing in his Book, contrary to his meaning, hath a mis-construction towards his majesty's government, state, or your lordships, he doth prostrate himself at his majesty's royal feet, and crave pardon and grace. And he doth appeal to your lordships interpretations of those parts of his book; and doth withal desire your lordships favour, and to take it into your consideration, that he hath been a year prisoner in the Tower: and this is the substance of his Answer.

Mr. Jenkins of Grays-Inn opened the Answer for four of the Defendants. First, for the poor Widow he saith, for any manner of combination, or knowledge of this book, or of the contents of it, &c. she knoweth nothing. For the rest, they all say, They being illiterate, were not able to judge whether it were fit to pass the Press, or not; that the Book was licensed to be printed, allowed after it was printed, and before it was published, and it was entered in the Stationers-Hall, and the warden there allowed and subscribed it to be a book passable. The book hath been three years in the press. All this time was spent before it was printed: there were searches made during this time, and they came unto the press. They saw the Book there in a public way, and not in corners, or privately printed, as is alledged in the Information; and it was printed and published, and some of the books sold by Sparkes: and Sparkes saith, the printing of this book cost him almost 300*l*. and saith upon his oath, he sold not many books. And for the charge upon him, of being a common printer of unlawful books, he saith, He hath prospered in his calling; and some other stationers having an eye upon him for his thrift, have envied him in publishing of books, and leaveth it to my lords the bishops, to know what success he hath had in the High-Commission.

Mr. Lightfoot of Gray's-Inn opened Mr. Buckner's Answer. He saith, That he was chaplain to the late archbishop of Canterbury, and doth approve of the church without any scruple, and of all the ceremonies of England.

Church-music he doth allow of; bowing at the name of Jesus: plays, music, and dancing, he doth esteem them just and lawful. And for those censures against ecclesiastical persons in this book, he doth, and ever did abhor and detest them. He confesseth he licensed part of the book, but never gave order to disperse the book; but when he heard it was published, he did endeavour to suppress it: and to the rest of the Information pleadeth Not Guilty.

Then, Mr. Noy, Attorney General, spake as followeth: This volume of Mr. Prynne's is written by himself, without the help of any man. There are passages in it that reflect upon the king, state, and government, &c. other things reflect upon the church and clergy; but for that there is no charge in the Information, which I did conceive fitter to be left out, and withal I received a command for the same: therefore finding the Church so deeply wounded by Mr. Prynne, I do leave her to avenge herself of him, and to inflict such punishment on him as he deserves. I shall be an humble suitor to the court, that they would be pleased to commend the prosecution of those things that concern the Church to the High Commission. There are divers particulars wherewith he is not charged within the Information by way of crime, and so it is not proper now to bring him into question for them. As for mentioning of Ceremonies, &c. of dedicating Paul's to Diana; of the Discipline of the Church; the complaint of new erected Altars: I wonder what Altars he means, I hope the church will examine in due time; as also who he means by his 'modern innovators' in the church, and by 'cringing and ducking to 'Altars,' a fit term to bestow upon the church; he learned it of the canters, being used among them. The Music in the church, the charitable term he giveth it, is, not to be a noise of men, but rather a 'bleating of brute beasts; 'Choristers bellow the tenor, as it were oxen; 'bark a counter point, as a kennel of dogs; roar 'out a treble, like a sort of bulls: grunt out a 'bass, as it were a number of hogs: his complaint for suppressing repetitions by way of Conventicles; all his general censure of all the bishops, and of all the clergy; they scorn to feed the poor; the 'silk and satin divines;' very charitable terms upon them of the church! Christmas, as it is kept, is a 'devil's Christmas;' nay, he doth bestow a great number of pages to make men affect the name of Puritan, as though Christ were a Puritan, and so he saith in his Index. Then concerning the Images in the Church, he speaketh against them, and putteth that now in print, which was contained in an Answer in this court. Also for the Sabbath-day, whether to begin on Saturday night, and end on Sunday at six of the clock. These are things proper to the examination of the Church; and whatsoever becometh of the rest of the cause in this Court, yet I commend these things to the consideration of the Church. I wonder what the man means to bring these things under the title of Stage-Plays; Pluralsities under the title of Stage Players. He had an end in it; he had an end in it.

Now concerning the Book itself: This Book, said Mr. Noy, it is the witness, it doth testify what was his intention, and by the Book he is to be judged. If it had been found in the street, and of Mr. Prynne's compiling, and brought to this court, and consideration taken of it, the court would proceed without a party against Mr. Prynne. And here Mr. Attorney recited a precedent of one that wrote a book, and it was brought to the council. It was demanded, who was the accuser? answer was made, the Book was the accuser: shall the heretic go unpunished? This Book it is Mr. Prynne's doing, he doth put his name to it, he swears that he did write it all.

Then for the time of compiling it; seven or eight years ago it was compiled, and it is grown seven times bigger than at the first. Mr. Prynne about eight years since, shewed it to Dr. Goade, who told him so good causes of dislike, that might make any reasonable man give it over. About seven years ago he came to Dr. Harris, to desire his opinion of the Book; and he told him it was unfit and unworthy to come to the press. In the Parliament time, before the year 1630, he gave some part of it to be printed; but it came not to Mr. Buckner till long after. Sparkes said, he would print any thing in Parliament time.

Now we are to consider two things, from the first compiling and printing of this Book, to the last: First, how it grew in volume; for after it was delivered to the press, it hath grown up with divers things, which then were impossible to be known at that time, when it was delivered to the press; which appeareth by this. In 1628 was the parliament, and in 1631 St. George began to look abroad into the world. This man bestows eight whole pages upon St. George, for being so bold to look out. He saith, that St. George the Arian was a Cappadocian, though born in Cilicia, a part or province of Cappadocia, &c. and that St. George's advocate was an Englishman, born in Gloucester; and that St. Basil the Great was bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, the native country of St. George the Arian. Certainly he could not tell that St. George would then remove himself abroad, or in the country of Gloucester, &c. at that time; but this man did go on according to the occasion in 1628. A woman, in 1628, acted a part of a Stage Play at Black Fryers; he spends many pages about this.

We all know what time the dearth was, three years ago: he taketh occasion not to pass it over. He maketh a long discourse of Plays, Masques, &c. in the late penurious times, how they were as expenciful as the wars were. This is to shew how by pieces it did grow bigger from time to time.

All Stage Players he terms them Rogues: In this he doth falsify the very act of parliament, for unless they go abroad, they are not rogues. The same term he giveth unto Scholars acting. Mr. Prynne had a purpose, not only in this to fall upon Stage Plays, but upon the body of the Commonwealth; and to infuse it into men's minds, that we are now running into Paganism and Gentilism. He falleth upon those things that have not relation to Stage Plays, Music, Music in the Church, Dancing, New-year's Gifts, whether Witchery, or not. Witchery, Church Ceremonies, &c. indistinctly he falleth upon them; then upon Altars, Images, Hair of Men and Women, Bishops and Bonfires, Cards and Tables do offend him, and Perukes do fall within the compass of his theme. St. George never offended him; but all this is to the end to bring a belief among the people, that we are returning back again to Paganism. His end is therefore to persuade men to go and serve God in another country, as many are gone already, and set up new laws and fancies among themselves. Consider what may come of it.

It may be fit enough and lawful to write against Plays, by men that have a mission; and they must do their errand in mannerly terms, and in the same terms as other men expect to bear with them. Mr. Prynne had no mission to meddle with these things, to see whether men should not return to Gentilism; the terms which he useth are such as he finds among the oyster women at Billingsgate, or at the common conduit. He hath raked up all the vile terms that could be found.

Now to prove that this is Mr. Prynne's Book, read Mr. Prynne's Examination, Inter. 5th, (which being read, was to this effect.) That Mr. Prynne, without the help of any other, did write, pen and compile the whole book, called Histrio-mastix, and the Epistle before the Book, and the Index and Table following.

Now for the publishing of this Book, it doth appear by the Deposition of Dr. Goade, that about 8 years since, Mr. Prynne did bring a Book to him in writing, of about a quire of paper, concerning Stage-Plays, to have the same licensed, but he held it unfit to be allowed; and doth well remember, that as to his argument of the unlawfulness for a man to put on woman's apparel, he put Mr. Prynne this question: Suppose, Mr. Prynne, yourself, as a Christian, were persecuted by Pagans, think you not, if you did disguise yourself in your maid's apparel, you did well? who answered, That he thought himself rather bound to yield to death than to do so.

Dr. Harris also deposed, That about 7 years ago, Mr. Prynne came to him to license a Treatise concerning Stage-Plays, but he would not allow of the same. So this man did deliver this Book when it was young and tender, and would have had it then printed; but it is since grown seven times bigger, and seven times worse.

Noy. We shall now prove when it went to the press. Read Austin the Stationer to Interrogatory the 28th, which being read, was to this effect; That the said book called Histrio-mastix, was given to this deponent, in or about the last parliament, at which time seven sheets thereof were printed at this deponent's house; which this deponent so printed, at the request of Mr. Prynne and Mr. Sparkes, upon Mr. Prynne's information, that it was licensed, and that he would bring the hand of the licenser unto it. But this deponent did refuse to print any more of the same.

Read Joseph H. to prove, that Sparkes would set upon it unlicensed in parliament-time, to Inter. 26, who saith, That the Defendant Sparkes did, in the time of the last parliament, print, or cause to be printed, divers books without licence; whereof some were Mr. Prynne's, some were Mr. Burton's works; and this deponent hath heard Sparkes say, he durst print any thing in parliament-time.

Another part of the Charge was managed by Mr. Mason of Lincoln's-Inn, reckoning up the number of Epithets wherewith Mr. Prynne had aspersed all sorts of people: and he said, that it was a Libel, not only against the state, but against every particular person; and proved the Charge by divers passages contained in the Book, fol. 201, &c.

Afterward Mr. Noy proceeded in the farther making good of his Charge against Mr. Prynne.

May it please your lordships; As he hath fallen foul upon all things, all persons, all sexes; upon the magistrates, upon the household of the king; so he hath not spared the king himself. I am sorry I shall have occasion to speak any thing of it; but there is a great deal too much in his Book. My lords, after he hath made all these complaints as intolerable, he falleth upon all indistinctly, and never taketh upon him to discern, to make a distinction, that there may be a toleration; but falleth foul upon every thing, that we are falling into Paganism; men and women are naught: he spareth not the king himself, but takes upon him to teach a remedy; the remedy is worse than the disease. What hateful comparisons he bringeth with other princes? as Nero: and speaketh of the consuming of the treasure of the realm with Masques, and of the late penurious times: a base word! A declaration of infamy upon princes, with such-like conclusions as these are. When all this is done, he teacheth the remedy not by way of precept, but by way of example; invites men to read John Mariana, and two grave authors more, he saith men not censured. I am very sorry I am to speak any thing wherein the king should be named, but he would not forbear it when the pen was in his hand; some of the words are so nasty that I will not speak them.

After Mr. Attorney General had spoken, he called for these Passages, amongst others, in Histrio-mastix, to be read, viz.

To his much-honoured Friends, the right worshipful Masters of the Bench of the honourable flourishing Law-Society of Lincoln's-Inn.

'Having, upon my first arrival here in London, heard and seen in four several Plays (to which the pressing importunity of some ill ac'quaintance drew me, while I was yet a novice) such wickedness, such lewdness as then made my penitent heart to loath, my conscience to abhor all Stage-Players ever since; and having then likewise observed some woful experiments of the lewd, mischievous fruits of Plays, of Play-houses, in some young gentlemen of my acquaintance, who though civil and chaste at first, became so vicious, prodigal, incontinent, debauched, yea so far past all hopes of amendment, in half a year's space or less, by their resort to Plays, where whores and lewd companions had inveigled them; that after many essays of their much desired reformation, two of them were cast off and utterly disinherited by their loving parents; whom I heard oft complaining, even with tears, that Plays and Play-houses had undone their children to their no small vexation, (a good Caveat for all young students to keep themselves from Play-houses, by these two youngsters harms :) Hereupon I resolved, out of a desire of the public good, to oppugn these common vice-fomenting evils: for which purpose about 7 years since, collecting those play-condemning passages, which I had met with in the Fathers and other authors, I digested them into one entire written Discourse: which having since that time enlarged beyond its intended bulk, because I saw the number of players, play-books, play-haunters, and play-houses still increasing; there being above 40,000 Play-Books printed within these 2 years (as Stationers inform me) they being now more vendible than the choicest Sermons; two old Play-houses being also lately re-edified, enlarged, and one new theatre erected: the multitude of our London play-haunters being so augmented now, that all the ancient Devil's Chapels (for so the Fathers style all Play-houses) being five in number, are not sufficient to contain their troops; whence we see a sixth now added to them: wherens even in vicious Nero's reign, there were but three standing theatres in Pagan Rome, though far more spacious than our Christian London, and those three too many. Hereupon I first commended it, being thus augmented, to the Licenser, and from him unto the press, where it hath lingered longer than I did expect; which being now at last brought forth into the world, in such a play-adoring age, that is like to bid defiance to it; I here bequeath it to your worthy patronage, to whom it was first devoted, not caring how it fares abroad, so it may do good and please at home.'

In the next place, Mr. Attorney Noy caused to be read out of the book of Histrio-mastix, such passages, as were scandalous to the king and government, as fol. 312, &c.

Mr. Atkins, in defence of Mr. Prynne, said, That the eloquence of those gentlemen who argued against Mr. Prynne, made an exposition which was no part of his intention, in which point he would endeavour to clear him; and the way was by letting their lordships know, that many Passages in that Book are only re-lately spoken, and not positive, and most of them are but the affirmations of other authors of several kinds and professions: as where it is said, that 'such incarnate devils as frequent Plays, &c. he speaketh by the way of common frequenting of Plays, lest they prove incarnate devils; and so of ladies that cast off their nature and modesty, that is relatively spoken by frequenting plays, lascivious dancing, &c. and when he speaketh of those in a continual proposition, his argument is thus:

'That which doth ordinarily (if not always) defile the eyes, the ears, and souls both of the actors and spectators, by ingendring, by exciting meretricious, lustful, lewd, adulterous desires and affections in their hearts, or by instigating, by preparing, by inducting them to actual uncleanness, must needs be abominable. and unlawful unto Christians; but these Stage-Plays, &c. therefore they must needs be abominable.' And there is none but Whores, Panders, or foul incarnate Devils, who dare controul that minor truth.

My lords; He doth not condemn New-year's Gifts, but acknowledges them to be as tokens and testimonies of favour and respect from superiors to their inferiors; and for Dancing (under favour) he doth not condemn it at all; he hath commended the same as single, and dancing the measures. And for dancing in great men and princes, he doth protest it was far from his thought to compare these times to Nero's, under so pious and religious a prince as we have, and by whom we receive so much happiness. That had been so impious and unworthy, that he could by no means make any apology; but as well his person as his pen should have been detestable, if he had made any such comparison.

And where he doth speak, that Dancing and Masquing have been near as expenceful as the wars, in that he means in Henry the 8th's time, and not in these days; as I take it, he speaks there of a History that doth express the great charge in that time.

I shall desire, as I did begin in the opening of his Answer, that he may lay fast hold upon the rock of the king's favour and mercy, and compassion of this court; and what his intentions are, they are best known to his own heart, his expressions known to your lordships. I cannot condemn his heart; I will not excuse his pen.

This if your lordships will give me leave, I shall say; I have long known him in a Society of Inns of Court, where he has lived: and for his ordinary discourses (except the matters in this Book) they have not been factious or seditious. But now he is before your lordships, truly for my part, I compare him to the condition of an Astronomer, who fixed his eyes so much upon the stars, that he did not look to his feet, and so fell into a ditch: for his eyes were so fixed upon this subject, upon the common resort to Stage-Plays, and the great abuse that comes by them, that he forgot to look down to his hand that guided his pen, which now bringeth him under your lordships censure. That I may not offend the patience of this court, (the court is full, and the expectation is great,) I will conclude with all humility, and wish and crave, that he who is the Supreme Judge, may be with your lordships in this matter, and may be over all your good thoughts, judgments and sentences this day, in this cause of this poor gentleman. And this is all I humbly offer in Defence.

The next day of hearing,

Mr. Holbourn, of counsel with Mr. Prynne, spake thus:

My lords; I am assigned counsellor with Mr. Prynne. The Information is for publishing in print a Libel or Volume of Libels against king, queen, state, &c. My lords, for Mr. Prynne, he doth humbly cast himself at your lordships feet. For the Book, I must say, he doth humbly submit himself to your lordships; yet, my lords, his heart will not give him leave to say, that he is guilty of those gross offences that are laid to his charge. He confesseth himself to be justly brought before your lordships for his ill expressions, which may prove an occasion of scandal by misconstruction, and so some dangerous principle may be infused into the subjects: And he beggeth your lordships to consider of them, according to the intentions of his heart, which were fair and honest, though harsh in expression, that he may receive a favourable construction, for that he citeth his Author, and their words, and not his own. And for that he meddleth with matters not proper to Stage-Plays, as in mentioning the Sabbath, his meaning was, Stage-Plays upon the Sabbath-day: his mentioning Habits and Recreations, was in relation to men putting on womens habits, and unlawful recreation at plays, and so he conceives them not altogether impertinent.

For the Manner of his writing he is heartily sorry, that his style is so bitter, and his imputations so unlimited and general; yet in this he was led thereunto by Authors in the like case, which he offers for his excuse: he Lopes his passion against these abuses by Plays may a little plead his excuse.

Now for the Manner and Matter alledged against him out of his own Book, in that he hopes your lordships favour: He saith, that those that are judges of the Books for licensing, they are guilty of the matter, and he hopeth that this Book doth differ from all the books brought into this court; for here are none brought but such as are unlicensed, and this is licensed: and he submitteth thus to that point.

My lords, as to the general end and intention of his Book, he sweareth, that the general resort unto plays was the first occasion; and his end was for the Reformation of the abuse of it, and no otherwise: and then, my lords, he hopeth he shall not incur your lordships severe censure. He did not send the Book beyond the seas to be printed, but printed it here; and it was three years in the press, and licensed and published.

And, my lords, the Declaration to the Information of this court, speaketh something to his intentions, viz. to whom he dedicated this Book, and he dispersed it himself to men of known integrity; and certainly if his heart had been guilty of those foul crimes, he would not have presented one of these Books to Mr. Attorney Noy himself. He did not absent himself, as one guilty of such offences would have done; he was so far from having disloyalty, that he doth commend the king and state, and that could not be with an intention against king and state. And all the Charges that lie upon him for his foul intentions are but inferences upon his Book, and consequences, and such of them only that be strained, and not of necessity.

The next thing charged upon him is Perjury, for that he said, he shewed no part of this Book to any before it was shewn to Sparkes; yet it was proved by Dr. Harris and Dr. Goadle, that they saw it many years ago. As to this he saith, they speak only of his Book, concerning Plays, containing a quire of paper: and that it is true, he did shew them such a book: but that book was not this book; though they be of one subject and matter, yet they differ much in form and frame.

Then Mr. Hern spake on his behalf as follows:

My lords; We that are assigned counsel for Mr. Prynne, do come with great disadvantage, both in number and judgments, considering the great ability of the king's counsel, who have spoken against us. If the construction they have made be theirs, then clearly we are (as they would have us) to fall deep by your lordships Sentence.

The weight of this Cause, and the aggravations upon it by the king's Counsel, made me the last day (without desire of my client) to crave farther time, for we durst not then give any Answer. All that I can now say, is, That your lordships would look upon the intentions of his heart, in that he hath explained himself as fair as any man can do by his oath: how is it possible to make other proof of the clear intentions of his heart, than by his oath? His oath is admitted as proof against him, in the acknowledgment of his Book; and shall it not be admitted to him, to clear the integrity of his heart? We beseech your lordships to look upon him, as not writing these things out of perverseness of spirit, but out of the abundance of his heart transported with zeal against the growing evils, which have befallen many of this nation, and some of his own acquaintance, by their frequenting of Stage-Plays. We that know him must say, as far as our knowledge will give us leave, that in all passages that have fallen from him to us, he hath expressed himself full of devotion and duty to his majesty and the queen; and shall humbly take leave to offer some passages out of his Book, which do bear evidence, that he doth speak well of both their majesties, and of the state; and that by inferences and distinctions there made: and what is it but inferences made out of other passages of his Book, which doth reflect upon him?—Which Passages were opened by the Counsel, but not read.

THE SENTENCE.

Three Star-Chamber days having been spent in the hearing of this Cause, the lords sat the fourth day to proceed to Sentence, which held till four of the clock in the afternoon; and they passed such Sentence, on Mr. Prynne, as is expressed in the ensuing speeches, which in effect comprehend all that was said by others.

The first was of Francis Lord Coltington, Chancellor of the Exchequer, whose turn was to begin first to speak, as being in the lowest degree of quality by his place. And commonly he that beginneth, as he openeth the matter at large, so he inclineth thereby many lords to forbear making of speeches, and only to declare themselves to concur in Sentence with him that began first, or with some other lord that spake before, as their judgments lead them.

My lords (said my lord Coltington), his majesty's Attorney-General hath brought Mr. Prynne before your lordships, with other Defendants, Thomas Luckner, Michael Sparkes, &c. It is for publishing a libellous Book, or Volume of Labels, to the scandal of his majesty and the state. To my understanding it may be more properly said, the great and high malice of Mr. Prynne, published and declared in that Libellous Book; a malice expressed in a manner against all mankind, and the best sort of mankind, against king, prince, peers, prelates, magistrates and governors, and truly in a manner against all things. But that which hath been more remarkable, is, his spleen against the Church and Government of it: therefore for that I will not sentence him, (because Mr. Attorney doth forbear to prosecute against him, for that which belongeth to the Church) yet it is an argument of his great and high malice: and when I consider of that, which hath been so often repeated, that he writ this Book alone, surely he was assisted immediately by the Devil himself, or rather he hath assisted the Devil. He hath written a book against the due reverence and honour, which all Christians owe to our Saviour Jesus, this doth convince my judgment against him; but the Book (as Mr. Attorney saith) declares the man, it is the witness: and if your lordships observe the particulars and style of it, you will say it is a strange thing; the very style doth declare the intent of the man, and that is (as Mr. Attorney said) to work a discontent and dislike in the king's people against the Church and Government and disobedience to our gracious sovereign king. If Mr. Prynne should be demanded what he would have, he liketh nothing, no state or sex; music, dancing, &c. unlawful even in kings; no kind of recreation, no kind of entertainment, no, not so much as hawking, all are damned. The very truth, Mr. Prynne would have a new government, he would have a new church, he would have new laws, new entertainment, God knows what he would have; a new king he would have, and have all the people of his mind, to be discontented with their king and government.

Mr. Prynne confesseth he did write the Book, and it is true he did endeavour the printing of it, and the publishing of it, this is proved very well; yea, but Mr. Prynne had no other intention but a tenderness of conscience, he meant no hurt to the king or state (as his Counsel said): but Mr. Attorney answered them, that he is not the declarer of his intentions, he must be judged by the Book, by his words, more certainly by the effect; for all good men do receive scandal by this Book, and all of Mr. Prynne's humour were glad of this Book. When I consider what kind of Libel it is, it is not like other libels: other libels have been by persons discontented, some poor rogues scattered up and down; but here is a libel in folio, and in print, and justifieth itself by authors with an high hand, 'That is there,' and 'that is there.' And (my lord) when I consider those high Passages in his Book, I protest unto you, they are things to be abhorred; they are not spoken relatively (as his counsel would have it) but positively, 'That our English ladies, shorn and frizzled madams, have lost their modesty; that the Devil is only honoured in dancing; that Plays are the chief delight of the Devil; that they that frequent plays are damned, and so are all that do not concur with him in his opinion, Whores, Panders, foul incarnate Devils, Judas's to their Lord and Master, &c. princes dancing in their own persons,' his censure of them is infamous, &c. But the foulest of all is, 'That this was the cause of untimely ends in princes.'

My lords, shall not all that hear these things think, that it is the mercy of the king that Mr. Prynne is not destroyed? Have we not seen men lately condemned to be hanged and quartered for far less matters? One Peacham, I was myself employed with others in the examining of him; he confessed, that the Writing for which he was questioned, was a Sermon that he did intend to preach: the Words were against the person of the king, yet he never preached it; yet because he had written it with an intention to preach it, he was brought up on this point and condemned to die. But this Book is in print; it is against all magistrates, and particularly against the king our sovereign, and his blessed consort. And yet, my lords, it pleaseth his majesty to let Mr. Prynne have his trial here. I will not trouble your lordships with any more parts of the Book: Mr. Attorney noted unto your lordships, that you should see how necessary it was, that Mr. Prynne should be clean cut off, as one that hath a long time endeavoured to move the people to disobedience against the king, &c. So I say with Mr. Attorney, it is high time that Mr. Prynne may be cut off, so far as may go with the Censure of this Court. My lords, Mr. Prynne is better dealt withal, than he would have princes dealt with; he hath had very fair trials.

For his Defence, I took notice of it likewise: I do remember that all those gentlemen, that were employed and assigned as counsel for his Defence, every one of them began to crave mercy of the Court; yet they came with a Defence and Justification, so far as their cause would bear. Mr. Holbourne said, That for 'Players, they were rogues by the statute.' Yet Mr. Attorney said, 'They are not rogues by the statute, unless they wander, &c.' My lords, he said, his intention was against public and common Plays; yet seek all his book thorow, and you shall find it is against plays in princes palaces. His intention now must be understood by his Book, and by his words; and that which he doth apply of any author is his own. And I think his Defence did aggravate his offence. As to his Defence against the ladies, he saith, he speaketh it relatively and not positively; yet he saith, 'Our English ladies are so and so wborish, &c.' And for that part of his Book, wherein he condemns Murder, Mr. Prynne will have murder unlawful; but execution of princes is not murder, and therefore that is a lawful act. Mr. Attorney said well, the end of this man and John Nannan, (a Jesuit) &c. they are all one, they all cry malice against princes.

I shall humbly crave pardon, and discharge my conscience, and shall let your lordships see, how I understand the sense, and that so I am to judge; and I conceive it to be as your lordships see, that the malice of this Book is against king and state: and, my lords, with this I sentence Mr. Prynne.

I do in the first place begin Censure with his Book; I condemn it to be burnt, in the most public manner that can be. The manner in other countries is, (where such Books are) to be burnt by the hangman, though not used in England (yet I wish it may, in respect of the strangeness and heinousness of the matter contained in it) to have a strange manner of burning; therefore I shall desire it may be so burnt by the hand of the hangman. If it may agree with the court, I do adjudge Mr. Prynne to be put from the bar, and to be for ever incapable of his profession. I do adjudge him, my lords, That the Society of Lincoln's-Inn do put him out of the society; and because he had his offspring from Oxford (now, with a low voice, said the bishop of Canterbury, 'I am sorry that ever Oxford bred such an evil member') there to be degraded. And I do condemn Mr. Prynne to stand in the pillory in two places, in Westminster and Cheapside; and that he shall lose both his ears, one in each place; and with a Paper on his head, declaring how foul an offence it is, viz. 'That it is for an infamous Libel against both their majesties, state and government.' And lastly, (nay not lastly) I do condemn him to 5,000*l.* Fine to the king. And lastly, perpetual Imprisonment.

There are other Defendants, Thomas Buckner, whom I conceive to be the chaplain charged with the licensing of the Book. I observe, that Mr. Attorney hath little or nothing prosecuted against him. It is said, he did combine with the Writer and Stationer for this infamous Libel. It doth appear that he did license it, or at least 64 pages thereof; I think it be also true, that Mr. Buckner did see the Book after it was printed. It is said, for his excuse, That Mr. Buckner was cozened and surprized by Mr. Prynne and Sparkes; but it is plain he licensed it, or at least 64 pages; therefore I shall judge according to the proof, as it is the usual custom of this Court. I must judge Mr. Buckner to be worthy of a very sharp Sentence, for certainly there is a very great inconvenience fallen upon the state, for want of due examination: to what purpose is there an examination of Books, if there shall be a connivance and winking at the party that doth it? I shall think Mr. Buckner not only worthy of a severe reprehension, but I shall censure him first to have Imprisonment according to the course of the court, and 50*l.* Fine to the king.

Now, my lords, the next is Michael Sparkes, and he is the third; and he is the Printer of the Book; and binder, and publisher thereof. In his Defence he hath shewed your lordships a piece of the Book licensed by Mr. Buckner, and saith, it was all licensed, but that he proves not; but that it was entered in the Stationers-Hall, that he proves. But I do find, that he persuaded men to buy this Book after it was prohibited; and before it was prohibited he persuaded men to buy it, saying, 'It was an excellent Book, and it would be called in,' and then sell well. I do fine Sparkes 500*l.* to the king, and to stand in the pillory, without touching of his ears, with a Paper on his head to declare his offence, and it is most necessary in these times; and for the pillory to be in Paul's Church-yard. ('It is a consecrated place,' saith the Archbishop of Canterbury). I cry your grace's mercy (said my lord Cottington) then let it be in Cheapside. For the other three, I find that Mr. Attorney doth not prosecute them; therefore, my lords, I do not censure them.

The next in course that spoke after the lord Cottington, was the L. C. J. Richardson.—My Lords; Since I have had the honour to attend this Court, writing and printing of Books have been exceedingly found fault withal, and have received a sharp censure, and it doth grow every day worse and worse; every man taketh upon him to understand what he conceiveth, and thinks he is nobody except he be in print. We are troubled here with a Book, a monster, 'Monstrum horrendum, informe, ingens!' It hath been a question who is the Author of this Book? Surely I am satisfied in my conscience he is the author of it: but truly give me leave, I do not think Mr. Prynne the only actor in this book, but that there were many heads and hands therein besides himself. I would to God in heaven, the devil and all else that had their heads and hands therein besides Mr. Prynne, were, &c. for I think they are all ill-willers to the state, and deserve severe punishment as well as Mr. Prynne doth. This Book is the subject of this day's work, and it is annexed, by Mr. Attorney, to the very information itself.

For the Book, I do hold it a most scandalous, infamous Libel to the king's majesty, a most pious and religious king; to the queen's majesty, a most excellent and gracious queen: such a one as this kingdom never enjoyed the like, and I think the earth never had a better. It is scandalous to all the honourable lords, and the kingdom itself, and to all sorts of people. I say, eye never saw, nor ear ever heard of such a scandalous and seditious thing as this mis-shapen monster is. How scandalous a thing it is, hath appeared already to your lordships, by the king and queen's counsel against Mr. Prynne; I will not for my part repent.

Yet give me leave to read a word or two, where he cometh to tell your lordships of the Reasons why he writ this book: Because he saw the number of the plays, play-books, play-haunters, and play-houses so exceedingly increased, there being above 40,000 play-books, being now more vendible than the choicest Sermons. What saith he in the Epistle Dedicatory, speaking of play-books? 'They are so big a price, and are printed in far better paper than most octavo and quarto bibles, which hardly find so good vent as they; and they come in such abundance, as they exceed all number, and it is a year's time to peruse them over, they are so multiplied: and then he putteth in the margin, 'Ben Johnson, &c. printed in better paper than most bibles.' Now if this be not a tax upon the kingdom, to print these books in better paper than the Bible itself, for my part I leave it to your lordships.' This monster, this huge, mis-shapen monster, I say, it is nothing but lies; and venom against all sorts of people. It is a strange thing what this man taketh upon him: He is not like those Powder-Traitors, they would have blown up all at once; this throweth all down at once to hell together, and delivereth them over to Satan. I beseech your lordships to give me leave: 'Stage-plays,' &c. saith he, 'none are gainers and honoured by them but the Devil and Hell; and when they have taken their wills in lust here, their souls go to eternal torment hereafter.' And this must be the end of this monster's horrible sentence. He saith, 'So many as are in play-houses, are so many unclean spirits;' and that 'Play-haunters, are little better than incarnate devils.' He doth not only condemn all Play-Writers, but all protectors of them, and all beholding of them; and dancing at plays, and singing at plays, they are all damned, and that no less than to hell. I beseech your lordships to give me leave but in a word to read unto you what he writes of dancing, &c. 'It is the Devil's profession; and he that entereth into a dance, entereth into a devilish profes'sion; and so many paces in a dance, so many paces to hell? This is that which he conceiveth of Dancing, 'The woman that singeth in the dance, is the prioress of the Devil, and those that answer are clerks, and the beholders are the parishioners, and the music are bells, and the fiddlers are the minstrels of the Devil.' I said it was a seditious Libel; this point of sedition is the only thing that troubles me, and it is that which I shall offer to your lordships: For I do know it, the good opinion, heart, will and affections of the king's people and subjects are the king's greatest treasure. Now if this be so, then for any man cunningly to undermine these things, to take away the hearts of the subjects from the king, and to bring the king into an ill opinion among his people, this is a most damned offence; and if I were in my proper place, and Mr. Prynne brought before me, I should go another way to work. I protest unto your lordships, it maketh my heart to swell, and my blood in my veins to boil, so cold as I am, to see this or any thing attempted which may endanger my gracious sovereign; it is to me the greatest comfort in this world to behold his prosperity.

Much hath been spoken concerning these things, and something by my lord Cottington before me; but good my lords, give me leave to remember you one or two Passages, not yet spoken of. He writeth thus: 'That Nero's acting and frequenting Plays was the chiefest cause that stirred up others to conspire his death.' Would any man think, that his acting and frequenting of plays was the chiefest occasion?

He writeth in another place worse than this, Fol. 464. 'Trebellius Pollio relates, That Martian, Heraclius, and Claudius, three worthy Romans, conspired together to murder Gallienus the emperor (a man much besotted, and taken up with Plays, to which he likewise drew the magistrates and people by his lewd examples) as Flavius and others conspired Nero's murder for the self-same cause, &c.' Now, my lords, that they should be called three worthy persons that do conspire an emperor's death, (though a wicked emperor) it is no Christian expression.

If subjects have an ill prince, marry what is the remedy? They must pray to God to forgive him, and not say they are worthy subjects that do kill him: If they were worthy acts, Mr. Prynne, I can tell what you are (Mr. Prynne standing during the Censure behind the L. C. J. Richardson, and archbishop Neal). No man will conspire to murder a king that can be a worthy actor; for the very thought of it is high-treason. He speaketh of these three, that they were three worthy Romans that did conspire to murder Nero. This is most horrible, and here can be no manner of exposition, but in the worst sense: for his excuse, he hath made none at all, only it was not his intention. Good Mr. Prynne, you are a lawyer. Intention! I know where the word standeth equal, as that you may take the intention this way, or that way, with the right-hand or left-hand, there in that case you may speak the intention; but where the words are plain and positive, as in your Books, here is no help of intention in the world: your Words are plain and clear, therefore you can never make any defence at all out of that. Not to hold your lordships any longer, my lords, it is a most wicked, infamous, scandalous, and seditious Libel. Mr. Prynne, I must now come to my Sentence, though I am very sorry, for I have known you long, yet now I must utterly forsake you; for I find that you have forsaken God, and his religion, and your allegiance, obedience, and honour, which you owe to both their excellent majesties, the rule of charity to all noble ladies, and persons in the kingdom, and forsaken all goodness. Therefore Mr. Prynne, I shall proceed to my Censure, wherein I agree with my lord Cottington, as he began very well: First, for the burning of the Book in as disgraceful a manner as may be, whether in Cheapside or Paul's Church-yard; for though Paul's Church-yard be a consecrated place, yet Heretical Books have been burnt in that place. And because Mr. Prynne is of Lincoln's-Inn, and that his profession may not sustain disgrace by his punishment, I do think it fit, with my lord Cottington, that he be put from the bar, and degraded in the University; and I leave to my lords, the lord bishops, to see that done; and for the pillory, I hold it just and equal, though there were no statute for it. In the case of a high crime it may be done by the discretion of the court, so I do agree to that too. I fine him 5,000*l.* and I know he is as well able to pay 5,000*l.* as one half of 1,000*l.* and perpetual imprisonment I do think fit for him, and to be restrained from writing, neither to have pen, ink, nor paper; yet let him have some pretty Prayer-Book, to pray to God to forgive him his sins; but to write, in good faith I would never have him: For, Mr. Prynne, I do judge you by your Book to be an insolent spirit, and one that did think by this Book to have got the name of a Reformer, to set up the Puritan or Separatist faction. I would not have Mr. Prynne go without a recognition of his offence to the king and queen's majesty. I agree to the Sentence on Buckner and Sparkes.

Secretary Cook. By this vast Book of Mr. Prynne's, it appeareth he hath read more than he hath studied, and studied more than he hath considered; whereas if he had read but one sentence of Solomon, it had saved him from the danger he is now like to fall into. The Preacher saith, 'Be not over-just, nor make thyself over-wise, for why wilt thou destroy thyself?' My lords, it is a Sentence requireth much study and consideration. It is most certain, that righteousness and wisdom are such virtues, as they help forward justice; but when wisdom is mixed with a man's own humours, as for the most part it is with flesh and blood, there is danger of straining it too far, and that will tend to the destruction of him and others.

Examples are too pregnant of this, and he may take it from a good Author, even from Christ himself. When his Apostles, out of zeal to their master, would have called for fire from Heaven against the Samaritans that refused to entertain him, the answer was, 'You know not of what spirit you are.' I would Mr. Prynne would have considered this.

There is a good Spirit that is meek, tempered with modesty and humility, with mildness and with equity; and such a spirit is always tender, not to destroy, root up, overthrow, but to bind, repair and preserve. But there is another fiery spirit, which is always casting of fire, nothing but damnation and destruction; certainly such a spirit ever tends to his own confusion. And if this be well observed, every man shall find it true, that such a spirit ever cometh before destruction. I wish Mr. Prynne were not an ill example of this. Certainly, my lords, vice and corruption ought not only to be reprehended, but to be punished severely, and that sharply too where it is; but Mr. Prynne should have considered, every man is not a fit reprehender. He had no invitation, nor office, nor interest to employ a talent which doth not belong unto him. If magistrates and princes should inveigh against all things, and tolerate nothing, we must live no longer among men; and certainly, if we will be thought to live with them that are wholly virtuous, we must go out of the world; we have a good author for this. But, my lords, a toleration must be used, and that Mr. Prynne would have found, if he had considered his own body: shall a man upon every slight distemper and disorder in his body take physic? Or shall ill-humours be purged till he purge all out? Certainly he will purge spirit, life and all away with it. And as it is in the natural body, so it is in the politic, there must be a toleration and connivance; it cannot be governed without it, and we have a warrant for it. Did not Christ himself forbid the cutting out of the tares, lest they should pluck corn, and destroy that too? I think, if Mr. Prynne should have been asked the question that Naaman did to the prophet, he would not at all have bid 'go away in peace,' he would have threatened Hell and Destruction. There is a Christian wisdom, and there must be a toleration in all states. And certainly the faults that have been tolerated in all times were greater than modest Plays, or modest Dancing. It is not my intention, neither do I think it is the intention of any of your lordships, to apologize for Stage-Plays, much less for the abuse of them; I wish, and so I think doth every good man, that the abuse of them were restrained; but, my lords, not by railing, cursing, damning, inveighing, &c. not only against the faults and players themselves, but against all spectators, and those that come to them, and that of all degrees, and with such bitterness and acrimony, that in all the authors alleged, which are infinite, there is not to be found an example. My lords, I am very sorry he hath so carried himself, that a man may justly fear he is the Timon that hath a quarrel against mankind. But I love not much to aggravate offences; which of themselves are heavy enough.

He calleth his Book Histrio-mastix; but therein he sheweth himself like unto Ajax, 'Anthropomastix,' as the Grecians called him, the Scourge of all mankind, that is, the whipper and the whip. I cannot but concur with the Censure already begun by my lord Cottington, given against Mr. Prynne, Buckner and Sparkes.

Afterwards the Earl of Dorset spake to this effect:

Such swarms of murmurers as this day disclose themselves, are they not fearful symptoms of this sick and diseased time? Ought we not rather with more justice and fear apprehend those heavy judgments which this minor Prophet, prophet Prynne, hath denounced against this land, for tolerating indifferent things, to fall upon us for suffering them, like those Mutineers against Moses and Aaron, as not fit to breathe? My lords, it is high time to make a lustration to purge the air. And when will Justice ever bring a more fit oblation than this Achan? Adam, in the beginning, put names on creatures correspondent to their natures: the Title he hath given this Book is Histrio-mastix, or rather, as Mr. secretary Cook observed, Anthropomastix; but that comes not home, it deserves a far higher title; Damnation, in plain English, of prince, prelacy, peers and people. Never did Pope in Cathedra, assisted with the spirit of infallibility, more positively and more peremptorily condemn Heretics and Heresy, than this doth mankind. Lest any partial Auditor may think me transported with passion, to judge of the base liveries he bestoweth upon court and courtiers, I shall do that which a Judge ought to do, viz. assist the Prisoner at the bar. Give me leave to remember what Mr. Attorney let fall the other day. I will take hold of it for the gentleman's advantage. That this gentleman had no mission; if he had had a mission, it would have qualified the offence. Our blessed Saviour, when he conversed in this world, chose Apostles, whom he sent after into the world, 'Ite, prædicatè,' &c. to shew the way of Salvation to mankind. Faith, hope, and charity, were the steps of this Jacob's ladder to ascend Heaven by. The devil, who hates every man upon earth, played the divine, cited books, wrought miracles; and he will have his disciples too, as he had his confessors and martyrs. My lords, this contempt, disloyalty, and despair, are the ropes which this emissary lets down to his great master's kingdom for a general service. My lords, as the tenor of their commission was different, so are the ways: these holy men advanced their cause in former times by meekness, humility, patience to bear with the weakness and infirmities of their brethren; they taught obedience to magistracy, even for conscience-sake; they divided not their estates into factions; they detracted from none, they sought the salvation of men's souls, and guided their bodies and affections answerably; they gave to Cæsar the things that were Cæsar's; if princes were bad, they prayed for them, if good, they praised God for them; however, they bore with them: this was the doctrine of the Primitive Church, and this they did. I appeal to my lords that have read this Book, if Mr. Prynne has not with breach of faith, discharged his great Master's end. My lords, when God had made all his Works, he looked upon them and saw that they were good. This gentleman, the Devil having put spectacles on his nose, says, that all is bad: no recreation, vocation, no condition good; neither sex, magistrate, ordinance, custom, divine and human, things animate, inanimate, all, my lords, wrapt up in masa damnata, all in the Ditch of Destruction. Here, my lords, we may observe the great prudence of this Prince of Darkness, a soul so fraught of malice, so void of humanity, that it gorgeth out all the filth, impiety and iniquity that the discontent of this age doth contract against the church and state. But it may be some follower of his will say, It was the pride and wickedness of the times that prompted him to this work, and set his zeal, through tenderness of conscience, to write this Book. My lords, you may know an unclean bird by his feathers; let him be unplumed, unmasked, pull off the deceitful vizard, and see how he appeareth: this brittle Conscience Brother, that perhaps starts at the sight of the Corner-Cap, sweats at the Surplice, swoons at the sign of the Cross, and will rather die than put on Woman's apparel to save his life; yet he is so zealous for the advancement of his Babel, that he invents legions, coins new statutes, corrupts, misapplies texts with false interpretatious, dishonours all men, defames all women, equivocates, lyes; and yet this man is a holy man, a pillar of the church. Do you, Mr. Prynne, find fault with the 'court and courtiers habit,' 'silk and sattin divines? I may say of you, you are all purple within, all pride, malice, and all disloyalty! you are like a tumbler, who is commonly squint-eyed, you look one way, and run another way: though you seemed by the title of your Book to scourge Stage-Plays, yet it was to make people believe, that there was an apostacy in the Magistrates. But, my lords, admit all this to be venial and pardonable, this pigmy groweth a giant, and invades the Gods themselves; where we enjoy this felicity under a gracious prince with so much advantage, as to have the light of the Gospel, whilst others are kept in darkness, the happiness of the recreations to the health of the body, the blessed government we now have: When did ever Church so flourish, and State better prosper? And since the Plagues happened, none have been sent among us such as this caterpillar is: What vein hath opened his anger? Or who hath let out his fury? When did ever man see such a quietus est as in these days? Yet in this golden age is there not a Shimei amongst us, that curseth the Anointed of the Lord? so puffed with pride, nor can the beams of the sun shaw his frozen heart, and this man appeareth

yet. And now, my lords, pardon me, as he hath wounded his majesty in his head, power and government, and her majesty, his majesty's dear consort, our royal queen, and my gracious mistress; I can spare him no longer, I am at his heart. Oh! quantum! &c. If any cast infamous aspersions and censures on our queen and her innocency, silence would prove impiety rather than ingratitude in me, that do daily contemplate her virtues; I will praise her for that which is her own, she drinks at the spring-head, whilst others take up at the stream. I shall not alter the great truth that hath been said, with a heart as full of devotion, as a tongue of eloquence, the other day, as it came to his part, (meaning sir John Finch.) My lords, her own example to all virtues, the candor of her life, is a more powerful motive than all precepts, than the severest of laws: no hand of fortune nor of power can hurt her; her heart is full of honour, her soul of chastity; majesty, mildness and meekness are so married together, and so im-paled in her, that where the one begetteth admiration, the other love; her soul of that excellent temper, so harmoniously composed, her zeal in the ways of God unparalleled; her affections to her lord so great, if she offend him, it is no sunset in her anger; in all her actions and affections so elective and judicious, and a woman so constant for the redemption of all her sex from all imputation, which men (I know not how justly) sometimes lay on them; a princess, for the sweetness of her disposition, and for compassion, always relieving some oppressed soul, or rewarding some deserving subject: were all such Saints as she, I think the Roman church were not to be condemned: on my conscience she troubleth the ghostly father with nothing, but that she hath nothing to trouble him withal. And so when I have said all in her praise, I can never say enough of her excellency; in the relation whereof an orator cannot flatter, nor post lye: yet is there not Doeg among us, notwithstanding all the tergiversations his counsel hath used at the bar? I can better prove, that he meant the king and queen by that infamous Nero, &c. than he proves Players go to Hell: but Mr. Prynne, your iniquity is full, it runs over, and Judgment is come; it is not Mr. Attorney that calls for judgment against you, but it is all mankind, they are the parties grieved, and they call for judgment.

1. Mr. Prynne, I do declare you to be a Schism-Maker in the Church, a Sedition-Sower in the Common-wealth, a wolf in sheep's cloathing; in a word, 'omnium malorum ne-quissimus.' I shall fine him 10,000*l.* which is more than he is worth, yet less than he deserveth; I will not set him at liberty no more than a plagued man or a mad dog, who though he cannot bite, he will foam; he is so far from being a sociable soul, that he is not a rational soul; he is fit to live in dens with such beasts of prey, as wolves and tygers, like himself: Therefore I do condemn him to perpetual Imprisonment, as those monsters, that are no longer fit to live among men, nor to see light. Now for Corporal Punishment, my lords, whether I should burn him in the forehead, or slit him in the nose; for I find that it is confessed of all, that Dr. Leighton's offence was less than Mr. Prynne's, then why should Mr. Prynne have a less punishment? He that was guilty of murder was marked in a place where he might be seen, as Cain was. I should be loth he should escape with his ears, for he may get a perriwig, which he now so much inveighs against, and so hide them, or force his conscience to make use of his unlovely love-locks on both sides: Therefore I would have him branded in the forehead, slit in the nose, and his ears cropt too. My lords, I now come to this Ordure, I can give no better term to it, to burn it, as it is common in other countries, or otherwise we shall bury Mr. Prynne, and suffer his ghost to walk: I shall therefore concur to the burning of the Book; but let there be a Proclamation made, That whosoever shall keep any of the Books in his hands, and not bring them to some public magistrate to be burnt in the fire, let them fall under the sentence of this Court: for if they fell into wise men's hands, or good men's hands, that were no fear; but if among the common sort, and into weak men's hands, then tenderness of conscience will work something. Let this Sentence be recorded, and let it be sent to the library of Sion, (meaning a college in London) whither a woman, by her will, will allow Mr. Prynne's Work to be sent.

2. For Mr. Buckner, I believe that he had no intention at all this Work should come abroad; he is said to be a conformable man to the church of England: I shall hardly censure him, he deserveth admonition.

3. For Sparkes, I concur in all things: The feodary had his office taken away from him by this Court; I see therefore no reason but that he may be barred from printing and selling of Books and kept wholly to binding of books.

The Sentence * against Mr. Prynne was executed the seventh and tenth days of May following. †

* 2 Rushw. Coll. p. 248.

† "It was a softer answer" says Kennett, "to Mr. Prynne's Book against Plays and Actings, that about the beginning of November, [1633] to congratulate the king's return, and divert his royal consort, the four Inns of Court, by some of their principal members, offered a splendid Masque to be performed by their Societies jointly, as an expression of their love and duty to their majesties. The offer was very graciously accepted; and upon consult and order of the Benchers, was very nobly performed at Whitehall on Shrove-Tuesday Feb. 18th, and again at Merchant-Taylor's-Hall, where the king, queen, and court, were magnificently entertained by the city."

143. Proceedings in the Star-Chamber against Sir DAVID FOWLIS, Sir THOMAS LAYTON, and HENRY FOWLIS, esq. on a Charge of opposing the King's Service, and traducing his Officers of State; Hilary: 9 CHARLES I. A. D. 1633. [2 Rushw. Coll. p. 215.]

["The prosecution was apparently promoted by lord Wentworth, afterwards the famous earl of Strafford. It produced disagreeable consequences to the earl; for on the Trial of his Impeachment for Treason, sir David Fowles, and sir Thomas Layton, two of the Defendants in this case, were material witnesses against his lordship on the second Article of the Impeachment; both swearing to having heard him use those emphatically threatening words to some justices of the peace, 'that the king's little finger should be heavier than the loins of the law.' See 8 Rushworth, 149, 151." Hargrave.]

IN the month of February in Hilary Term, 1633, upon an Information in the Star Chamber against sir David Fowles, sir Thomas Layton, and Henry Fowles, esq. defendants, the cause came to a hearing.

The Information being opened to the court was to this effect:

That whereas several Commissions had issued lately out of his majesty's court of Exchequer in the 6th, 7th, and 8th years of his majesty's reign, directed to the lord viscount Wentworth, and to divers other lords, knights, and gentlemen of the best and principal rank and quality in those northern parts, who were thereby authorized for the more ease of the country, to treat, commune, and compound with all and singular his highness's subjects of the city and county of York, and other northern counties therein particularly expressed, as would make fine with his majesty for their contempts in not attending his majesty's coronation, to have taken the order of knighthood, as they ought to have done; and the said lord viscount Wentworth was by express letters from his majesty in that behalf specially appointed to be collector: and albeit the said sir David Fowles had received many gracious favours both in honour and profit, as well from king James, as his now majesty, which might justly have incited and stirred him up to all dutiful and grateful thankfulness for the same; nevertheless the said sir David Fowles most undutifully, and ingratefully, did not regard the same, but harboured some secret discontentment, and ill affection in his heart; for

whereas the said lord viscount Wentworth, and other his majesty's commissioners, carefully and dutifully intended the due execution of his highness's said commissions, and had by virtue thereof summoned, and given notice to Ralph Ewre, James Penniman, esquires, and sundry others dwelling and inhabiting near unto the said sir David Fowles, to attend the said commissioners at the said city of York, for their compounding for their said fines of knight-hood; the said sir David Fowles most un-dutifully endeavoured and practised what he possibly could to oppose his majesty's service therein, and to dissuade and divert persons from compounding with the said commissioners, and many times publicly declared his dislike and disaffection of, and to the said service, which was generally observed and noted throughout the country where he dwelt; which was by him so spoken of intent and purpose to cause men to forbear and refrain compounding, or resorting to the said commissioners, to make any composition for their aforesaid contempts; and thereby animated and encouraged sundry persons to stand out, and refuse to make any composition at all, who otherwise would have compounded with the said commissioners for their said fines of contempt, in not attending at his majesty's coronation to take the order of knighthood, as aforesaid. And in farther prosecution of his ill affection, and to shew his dislike of the said service, and the more fully to express and manifest himself, and his desire for the hindrance thereof, he the said sir David Fowles, at a public meeting, at the house of the said sir Thomas Layton, in the beginning of the month of July, 1632, did, in divers of his conferences with gentlemen concerning the compounding with the said lord viscount, and the other commissioners for their fines and contempts of knighthood, publicly affirm and say, 'That Yorkshire gentlemen had been in time past accounted and held stout spirited men, and would have stood for their rights and liberties, and were wont to be the worthiest of all other shires in the kingdom. And that in former times all other shires did depend, and would direct all their great actions by that county. And that other counties, for the most part, followed and imitated Yorkshire: but now in these days Yorkshiremen were become degenerate, more dastardly and more cowardly than the men of other counties, wanting their wonted courage and spirit, which they formerly used to have.' Which said words and speeches the said sir David Fowles then used and uttered purposely to dissuade and discourage persons from compounding for the said contempts and fines for knighthood, as aforesaid. And the more to encourage those that stood out, and refused to compound, the said sir David Fowles, at the same time and place, extolled and highly commended one James Maleverer, esq. for denying and refusing to compound with the said commissioner for his fines of knighthood, and said, 'that the said James Maleverer was the wisest and worthiest

'man in the country; and that he was a brave spirit, and a true Yorkshireman: and that none durst shew himself stoutly for the good of the country, but the said Mr. Maleverer, and was to be honoured therefore; and did very much commend him, both there, and at other places and times, for not compounding. And the said sir David Fowles being then told, it might perhaps prove more chargeable to the said Mr. Maleverer, for his wilful standing out in that manner; the said sir David replied, 'That the said Mr. Maleverer had put in his plea thereunto, and would easily procure his discharge, both of the fines and issues.' And in truth he had pleaded in his majesty's Exchequer an insufficient plea, and after such time as he had paid 15*l.* for issues, at last he compounded for his contempt. And farther to discourage and hinder men from compounding, the said sir David Fowles then also alledged, that in other counties and shires they had not advanced their fines of knighthood so high, as was done by the commissioners in Yorkshire, saying, that there were many in Buckinghamshire and Oxfordshire, who did utterly refuse to compound: and thereupon shewed forth a list or paper of the names of sundry persons of those two counties, that so refused to compound. And the said sir David Fowles taking notice of Mr. Ewre's, and Mr. Pennyman's compounding with the commissioners, blamed and reproved them for so doing, saying, 'That they had by compounding done themselves some wrong, and that the country hereafter would be much troubled with such impositions.' And the said sir David Fowles farther, to beget and draw a general disobedience in the hearts of his highness's people, and to cause them to deny and refuse to compound for their knighthood fines with the said commissioners, and to draw a scandal upon the said lord viscount Wentworth, and to bring him into disesteem in the hearts and minds of the gentlemen of that country, publicly said and pretended, 'That the people of Yorkshire did adore him the said lord viscount Wentworth, and were so timorous and fearful to offend his lordship, that they would undergo any charge, rather than displease him; and that his lordship was much respected in Yorkshire, but at court he was no more respected than an ordinary man; and that as soon as his back was turned for Ireland, his place of prebendship of the council would be bestowed on another man.' And the said sir David Fowles, and the defendant Henry Fowles, did, about the beginning of July, 1632, and at other times publicly, in the hearing of sundry knights and gentlemen, to the end to hinder his majesty's service, and to render the said lord viscount Wentworth odious to the inhabitants of Yorkshire, and the places and countries where he was employed as a commissioner, most falsely and untruly scandalize and wrong the said lord viscount Wentworth, to have received much money of the country for knighthood fines, by virtue of the aforesaid commission; and that his lordship had not paid the same, either to his majesty, or the Exchequer. The contrary whereof did plainly, clearly, and evidently appear by the several tallies and constats, which were produced and shewed in open court, testifying that the lord viscount Wentworth had, a year before the speaking of those words by the said sir David, and his son, paid unto his majesty's receipts for knighthood fines the sum of 24,500*l.* besides other assignments by his lordship disbursed about the said service amounting to about 700*l.* of his own money, and more than he had at that time received for his majesty. And the said sir David Fowlis and Henry Fowlis most falsely and maliciously, not only to the scandal of his majesty and his justice, but chiefly to wrong and slander the said lord viscount Wentworth, reported, gave out and affirmed in the presence of divers knights, gentlemen and others, that when the said lord viscount Wentworth was gone into Ireland, all such as had paid their fines to his lordship, although they had his lordship's acquittance for the same, yet they would and should be forced to pay the same over again to his majesty's use. And the defendant, Thomas Layton, caused his officer and bailiff to levy about 39*l.* issues upon the goods of one Mr. Wivel, who formerly compounded and paid his fine for knighthood, and had his lordship's acquittance for the same; and that complaint had been made to the council at York, in the absence of the said lord president, that the said sir Thomas Layton's officers or bailiffs had by his privity exacted and taken 40*s.* worth of the said Wivel's tenants goods, by colour of the said levy, for so levying of the said issues, whereby the said council conceived, that the same would much cross and oppose his majesty's said service, and the exaction was meet to be punished: and therefore did award and send the king's letter to the said sir Thomas Layton (being then high-sheriff for the county of York) for to appear, and answer an information exhibited against him, and his servants, for such their supposed exactions in that behalf, as was lawful for the said council to do; and caused the said sir Thomas Layton to be served therewith, who immediately shewed it to the said sir David Fowlis: then the said sir David Fowlis thereon took upon him in a great presence and assembly of divers knights and gentlemen of the county (himself being then one of his majesty's sworn council in the said northern parts, one of the deputy lieutenants there, and a justice of peace in the North Riding where he then dwelt) to advise and dissuade sir Thomas Layton, to yield obedience to his majesty's letter, which this court held to be a great contempt, and offence; for that he said that he held it not fit, that the said sir Thomas Layton being high-sheriff, should appear, and answer the said letter, before he had acquainted his majesty first therewith, and known the king's pleasure. The said sir David saying further, (in scorn and contempt of the said court and council, whereof himself was a member, and by his oath bound to maintain and uphold the rights and liberties thereof to his uttermost) 'That the said court was a paper-court, and the said lord president, and council, had done more than they could justify, by sending for the said high-sheriff; and that, if he were in the sheriff's case, he would not care a dog's turd for them.' And the more to draw the council into disesteem and disrespect in those parts, he the said sir David then also said, that the said council had nothing to do with a justice of peace; speaking withal comparatively, that the office of a justice was above the council at York; the one (meaning a justice of peace) was by act of parliament, the other (meaning the court at York) was made but by commission. And also the said sir David being reproved by some gentlemen there present, who much disliked his discourse, yet he answered, 'he cared not who heard it, nor if it were pro- claimed at the cross.'

To this Information sir David Fowlis made this Answer; "That he hath been so far from opposing the Commission concerning knighthood, as that he hath, according to his power, advanced the said service; and that he did persuade James Maleverer, and others, to submit to the commissioners, and compound for their fines. That he did persuade sir Thomas Layton to appear before the lord Wentworth, and the council, upon the king's letter, and denieth the words charged upon him. He confesseth he did say, That he knew not how his majesty would take it to have a high-sheriff committed, and disgraced for executing his majesty's writ: and confesseth, that it appears by the information, that Mr. Wivel had made his composition for knighthood, and that he received his acquittance; nevertheless process was awarded out of the Exchequer for levying issues, amounting to 30*l.* or thereabout: whereupon this defendant did say, that if the lord Wentworth had paid in all the monies he had received, he might have done well to have taken order, that those who had paid their money to him, should be free from any trouble, and not be compelled to make double payment."

Henry Fowlis pleaded not guilty.

Sir Thomas Layton for himself saith; "That a letter was served upon him from the lord president and council, he being then high-sheriff of the county, doing matters in the execution of his office; and that before he was in any contempt, he was within three days arrested by the pursivant attending the court, and by him carried prisoner from his own house to the said council, about thirty miles, and there remained in the custody of the said messenger, till he had answered an information there preferred against him, and interrogatories concerning the self-same matter now charged upon him; and before he was discharged, paid the said Wivel the money levied by virtue of the process, and also paid 40*s.* more, which (as was pretended) Appleby, the bailiff, exacted from the said Wivel.—During all which time of this defendant's restraint, he was high-sheriff of the county of York, of all which he desireth a consideration might be had; albeit he might justly plead the dependance of the snit at York, yet he doth waive the same: and doth deny, that if the said 40s. were exacted by the said bailiff, over and above the 39*l.* levied upon Mr. Wivel, that the same, or any part thereof came to this defendant."

And it plainly appeared to this honourable court, by good and sufficient testimony then openly read; that all the particulars before mentioned, wherewith sir David Fowlis stood charged by the information, were fully proved against him: whereupon the court, upon grave and deliberate consideration of all the aforesaid premisses, declared; "That the said sir David had many ways endeavoured and sought to oppose his majesty's service, and had with-greatly and highly thereby scandalized his majesty, who had done him so many gracious favours, and affronted his service, and had unjustly traduced his majesty's commissioners, and great officers of state, and shewed exceeding malice to the lord deputy: and the said sir David speaking these words charged upon him, to deter his majesty's subjects from making payment of their fines to his majesty's receiver, for knighthood money: and that the court duly weighing and considering the heinousness of the said defendant's offence therein, and declaring the same worthy of severe and extraordinary punishment, ordered:

"That the said sir David Fowlis, being a principal offender, shall stand, and be committed to the Fleet, there to remain during his majesty's pleasure; and that he shall pay a fine of 5,000*l.* to his majesty's use; and shall also publicly acknowledge his great and several offences, both to his majesty, and the said lord viscount Wentworth; not only in this court, but in the court of York, and likewise at the open assizes in the same county, where this decree shall be publicly read. And farther; that the said sir David Fowlis is a person altogether unworthy of the places he holds, as one of the council of York, deputy-lieutenant, and justice of peace, who hath breathed out so much faction and disobedience. And for that he sought and endeavoured to draw disesteem and scandal upon that court, whereof he himself was a member, and upon the principal officer and member of the said court, the lord Wentworth, a noble person of singular worth and merit, and worthily employed in a matter of greatest trust and importance: the court hath therefore ordered and adjudged, that the said sir David Fowlis shall, from henceforth, be held, and made incapable to have, or execute any of the said places, and that he shall pay good damage to the said lord Wentworth, re-lator in this court, whom this court highly commended for vindicating his majesty's honour, in such a service of so undoubted right, justly appertaining to the crown, and which hath been heretofore taken by many kings, his majesty's predecessors, constantly and successively. Their lordships generally condemned the said sir David therefore, and for the base and scandalous report, that he so published against the said lord Wentworth, ordered and decreed, that the said sir David should pay 3,000*l.* to the said lord Wentworth."

And touching the Defendant Henry Fowlis, the court likewise thought him worthy of censure, and ordered and decreed, That he should stand committed to the Fleet, and pay 500*l.* fine to his majesty's use.

And forasmuch as the council urged no proof against sir Thomas Layton, they dismissed him from any farther attendance.

144. The Trial of JOHN LORD BALMERINO, in Scotland, for a Libel: 10 CHARLES I.* A. D. 1634. [1 Burnet's History of his own Times, p. 32, &c. . 2 Rushw. Coll. p. 283.]

Curia Justiciarum S. D. N. Regis, tenta in prætorio de Edinburgh tertio die mensis Decembris, 1634, per nobilem et præpotentem comitem, Willielmum comitem Errolis, dominum Hay, magnum constabularium Scotie, ac Justiciarium Generalem ejusdem, hæc in parte ac in criminali processu subsequenti, contra Joannem dominum de Balmerino, virtute commissionis S. D. N. Regis, sub testimonio sui magno sigilli specialiter constituit. Curia legitime affirmat.

ASSESSORS to my Lord Justice General, sir Robert Spotswood of Dunnypace knight, president of the College of Justice; sir John Hay of Barro, knight, clerk register; sir James Learmouth of Balcomy, knight baronet.

* "Religious grievances are often ideal; but the Trial of lord Balmerino was an act of oppressive iniquity, conducted under the shade of the laws, and with all the forms of unsubstantial justice. In consequence of his father's disgrace and death, he had lived in retirement, and, till the arrival of Charles in Scotland, was unknown to the court. But his deportment in the late parliament was offensive; and his name was marked in the list of the dissenting nobility, from whom the rays of royal favour were now withdrawn. A temperate and submissive petition had been prepared by these peers, in order to exculpate themselves from the imputation of an opposition to prerogative, and to deprecate the operation of those articles from which they dissented; but when the design was intimated to Intra. John lord of Balmerino, delated of Airt and Part, (i. e. of his being Contriver and Partner) of the penning and setting down of a scandalous Libel, and divulging and dispersing it amongst his majesty's lieges; at the least of concealing and not revealing of Mr. William Haig, and not apprehending of him the said principal author of the said infamous Libel, as is at length contained in his Dittay (i. e. Indictment) following.

Pursuer, sir Thomas Hope of Craighall, knight, Advocate to our said lord, for his highness's interest.

Procurators in Defence, Mr. Roger Mowat, Mr. Alexander Pearson, Mr. Robert Macgill, Mr. John Nisbet, Advocates.

Charles, as a necessary precaution before the petition was presented, or even subscribed, the royal displeasure was signified in such severe terms that it was instantly abandoned. A copy retained by Balmerino, and imparted to a confidential notary, was surreptitiously transcribed and communicated to Hay of Naughton, his private enemy. The latter betrayed the secret to the archbishop of St. Andrew's, who repaired to court, and, under the specious pretext of allegiance, revealed it to the king. He affirmed that the petition was circulated through Scotland to obtain subscriptions; declared that nothing but the opposition of the nobility had rendered the clergy hitherto so averse from the surplice; and assured the king that their refractory spirit would be soon subdued, if their patrons were selected for a severe example. A commission was issued to examine the supposed offence, and Balmerino was imprisoned on a warrant obtained by Spottiswood; but the real author of the petition, Haig, an advocate, escaped to the continent.—It would be difficult to conjecture, what was criminal in a petition neither presented to Charles, nor divulged except to a confidential friend. There were laws in Scotland against the utterance of leasings, or false reports tending to excite sedition, or to sow dissensions between the king and the people; and according to the usual extension of state offences, whosoever listened with an air of approbation, and neither revealed the report nor secured its author, was obnoxious to the same capital punishment, as if equally guilty of the same crime. As the author and abettor of a seditious petition, Balmerino was accordingly arraigned for leasing making; as the author, because the copy, found in his custody, was slightly interlined with his own hand: as the abettor, because he concealed the petition, and suffered the author to escape undiscovered. A Petition, couched in the most inoffensive terms, was converted in the indictment into a dangerous Libel, 'that depraved the laws, and mis-

My Lord Advocate produced his majesty's Letter, commanding him to pursue the pannel, (i. e. the person indicted) for the crimes contained in his Dittay following; together with an Act of Session, nominating the assessors foresaids to be assessors to my Lord Justice General: And therewith produced the said Dittay or Indictment, with the executions thereof, of the which the tenour follows. And first the tenour of his majesty's Letter, directed to his majesty's Advocate.

To our right trusty and well-beloved counsellor, sir Thomas Hope of Craighall, knight and baronet, our Advocate for our kingdom of Scotland.

“C. R. Trusty and well-beloved counsellor, we greet you well. After due consideration having resolved to cause the lord Balmerino be put to the trial of ane assyse, (i. e. Jury) and to this purpose it being necessary that you in-

‘construed the proceedings of the king in the late parliament, so seditious that its thoughts infected the very air, a cockatrice which a good subject should have crushed in the egg,’ Balmerino, who forbore to crush this unhatched sedition, was oppressed by the intrigues of the prelates, and the criminal connivance of the judges and officers of state. The court of session appointed three assessors to the justice general; Learmouth one of their number, Hay lord register, and Spottiswood their president, second son of the archbishop, whose influence had incited, and still continued to foment the prosecution. It was represented in vain that the interlineations, as they softened the terms of the petition, could never constitute that libel which they served to abate; that the petition was neither promulgated, nor disclosed, except to a confidential lawyer for his private opinion; that there was no precedent for the trial of those who had neglected to reveal a seditious performance, or to secure its author, and that a severe law never executed must be regarded as having passed into oblivion; that it might be illegal perhaps to conceal the petition when adjudged seditious; but as its purport was apparently respectful, and intended to conciliate the king's affection, that no prudence could discover a different construction which was necessarily latent till determined by the court. The question was already prejudged by the court: the assessors sustained and referred the indictment to a jury, which the earl of Traquair had undertaken to corrupt or intimidate.—As peremptory challenges are unknown in Scotland, the jurors are invariably selected by the judge from the return made by the clerk of court. Nine of the jury, with a single exception, were ineffectually challenged: but when Traquair, a minister of state, was admitted, it was no longer doubtful that the rest were industriously selected for their hostility to Balmerino, or their devotion to the crown. The experiment did not entirely succeed. In the former century, Gordon form yourself of such particulars, as concern your charge in the legal prosecution of that business; it is our pleasure, that with all convenient diligence you insist therein, by preparing of an Indictment fit for that purpose, and that you carefully go on in every other thing, touching the prosecution thereof, as you will answer to us upon your trust: And that by the advice of the Chief Justice you prefix a day for the same, for which these presents shall be your warrant. Given at our manor of Hampton-Court, the 14th of October, 1634."

Follows the Act of Session, nominating the saids Assessors, at Edinburgh, the 2d of Dec. the year of God 1634, the which day the lords of council and session nominate, appoint and elect sir Robert Spotswood of Dunnypace, knight, president of the College of Justice; sir John Hay of Barro, knight, clerk of our sovereign lord's register council and rolls; and sir James Learmouth of Balcomy, knight baronet, senator of the said Collège of Justice; to be of Buckie had been engaged in the murder of the earl of Murray, and was appointed therefore as a sure man. When the jury had withdrawn, he addressed them unexpectedly in the most pathetic terms; and conjured them to reflect that the life of an innocent nobleman was at stake; whose blood would lie heavy on their souls to the last hour of their lives. While the tears streamed down his aged cheeks, he protested that his hands had once been imbrued in blood, for which he had procured a pardon from his sovereign; but that it had cost him many sorrowful days and nights, to obtain a remission to his conscience from heaven. The jury was moved with this impressive address: but Traquair, their foreman, resumed the argument, that it belonged to the court to determine whether the law was severe, or the petition seditious; whether the prisoner had concealed it was all that remained for them to decide. After a long altercation, the jury were equally divided; and in consequence of the final suffrage of Traquair their foreman, Balmerino was convicted of having heard and concealed a seditious petition, and of having forborne to reveal the author. Sentence of death was immediately pronounced; but his execution, to the great umbrage of the prelates, was suspended during the pleasure of the king.—During the whole trial the people discovered extreme agitation. They assembled daily, in opposition to the efforts of their magistrates, in tumultuous crowds; they prayed aloud, and in the streets, for the preservation of Balmerino; applauded the exertions of his friends, and showered imprecations on the heads of his adversaries. Their rage proceeded to the most desperate designs. Many consultations were secretly held; and it was determined to burst open the prison for his release; or, if that attempt should miscarry, to revenge his death on his judges and the eight jurors by whom he had been convicted. Some had undertaken to burn their houses; others to perpetrate the Assessors to William earl of Errol, Great Constable of Scotland, and having commission from his majesty to be Justice-General in the criminal pursuit intentit and depending before the said Justice against John lord Balmerino.

"Charles by the grace of God king of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith; to our Jovit (i. e. beloved) James Currie, Ormond pursevant, messenger, our sherrif in that part conjunctly and severally, specially constitute, greeting. Forsuameikle as it is complained and humbly meant to us by our trusty and well-beloved counsellor sir Thomas Hope of Craighall knight baronet, our advomassacre; when Traquair, apprised of his own danger, repaired to court, and represented that the execution of the sentence was impolitic and unadvisable, however justly the prisoner had forfeited his life. After a long and severe imprisonment, a warrant was procured for his enlargement; but a pardon was dispensed with a slow and reluctant hand. The merit of the pardon was variously ascribed to the intercession of Laud, or to the humane and merciful disposition of Charles, who was averse from bloodshed rather than from revenge; and who hesitated to execute an innocent nobleman against whom he was incensed, though prevented by no scruple from acquiring an unjust and absolute dominion over his life.—This iniquitous prosecution was ruinous in its consequences to the king's interest in Scotland. The people had long felt that the administration of justice was partial and corrupt; but the nobility now discovered that there was no protection for themselves, from the resentment of the prelates and the power of the crown. Whatever secret cause of offence existed; a speech or a petition, an expression of discontent or grievance casually heard, and concealed from motives of compassion or honour, might furnish a pretext for their own destruction. The lenity of their sovereign was no protection; and Balmerino, whose real crime was his conduct in parliament, justly considered the remission of his sentence as no redress of the injury which he had sustained. His danger made a deep impression on the minds of his peers. Under an infatuated, or despotical monarch, whenever the laws were perverted for their ruin, their order had found no resource but in a confederacy against the crown; and to this measure their thoughts were already directed by the frequent example of their ancestors; by the sense of their danger individually, and of their strength when united; and above all, by the inordinate and daily usurpations of the aspiring prelates." 3 Laing's Scotland, 107.

cate for our interest upon John lord of Balmorino, that where albeit by the common law, as also by the laws and acts of parliament of this kingdom, and specially by that act and statute of parliament made by our unquhile (i. e. late) dearest father king James 6, of happy and blessed memory, par. 10, chap. 10, it is statute and ordained, That all our subjects continue themselves in quietness, and dutiful obedience to us and our royal authority, and that none of them presume or take upon hand publicly to disclaim, or privately to speak or write any purpose of reproach or slander of our person, estate, or government; or to deprave our laws and acts of parliament, or misconstrue our proceedings, whereby any misliking may be moved betwixt us and our nobility and loving subjects in time coming, under the pain of death; certifying them that does in the contrair, they shall be repute as scditions and wicked instruments, enemies to us and the commonweal of this our realm: and the said pain of death shall be execute upon them with all rigour, in example of others. Like as by the 205th act of the 14th parliament of our said unquhile dearest father, in the month of June, 1594, the former act of parliament, with divers others, against leasing-makers, and authors of slanders and calumnies, is ratified and approved, and ordained to be published of new again, and to be put to execution in all time coming: with this addition, That whosoever hears the said leasing calumnies, or scandalous speeches, or writs to be made, and apprehends not the authors thereof, if it be in his power, or reveals not the same to us, or to any of our privy-council, or to our sheriff, steward, or bailie of our sherrifdom, stewardry or bailliary, stewards in regality or royalty, or to the provost, or one of the bailies within our burrows, by whom the samen may come to our knowledge, or to the knowledge of our privy-council; whereby the saids leasing-makers and authors of scandalous speeches, may be called, tryed, and punished, according to the said acts: the hearer and not revealer, and not apprehender, (if it lie in his power) and concealer and not revealer of the saids leasing-makers, and authors of the saids scandalous speeches and writs, shall incur the like pain and punishment as the principal offender, as in our saids acts of parliament at length is contained. Notwithstanding whereof, it having come lately to our knowledge, in the month of March last by-past, that there was a most scandalous, reproachful, odious and seditious Libel, found in the hands of one Mr. John Dunmure, notary in Dundee, and divulged and dispersed in the hands of several of our subjects: whilk scandalous, odious, infamous, and seditious Libel, did not only seditiously, reproachfully, and outrageously tax our sacred person in our behaviour at parliament; but also contains many points and purposes of false calumnies, public scandals and reproaches against us, our estate and government, depraving our laws and acts of parliament, and misconstruing our just and glorious proceedings in our first parliament, holden by us in person in the month of June of before, as doth manifestly appear in the hail tenour of the saids infamous Libel; and particularly in the particular passages hereof after following: insuair as albeit by the law of God and laws of all nations, the person of the supreme and sovereign prince is and ought to be sacred and inviolable, and he ought to be revered, honoured, and feared, as God's lieutenant on earth; and that all subjects are bound and tyed in conscience to content themselves in humble submission to obey and reverence the person, laws, and authority of their supreme sovereign: yet the said unhappy and infamous libel, in the first entry thereof, begins with an outrageous upbraiding and taxing of our sovereign lord's majesty of a point of injustice or indiscretion in our behaviour at parliament, for putting of Notes (as the saids infamous libel alleges) upon the names of a number of our subjects, who did vote contrair to the acts of our church government, past in parliament. Whilk is ane fearful thing in ane subject to pry into the gesture of his sovereign in his supreme court: and upon a gesture, without speech, to infer a ground of exprobration and reproach to the sovereign prince. Next, the said infamous Libel reproaches us for refusing to receive from some of our subjects their reasons for dis-assenting from the said acts, before their public hearing in parliament: whilk is a point no ways compatible with the humble obedience of a good, quiet, and peaceable subject; but carries with it the signal and token of discontentment, and rubs upon our sacred person and proceedings matter of reproach and scandal, tending, if it were possible, to diminish the glorious opinion and estimation of our royal person, equity, and justice, in the hearts of our subjects. Thirdly, the malicious heart of the penner, not content with the first aspersion laid upon us for putting notes upon these who dis-assented, does ingeminate the samen in ane most bitter invective and viperous style, in affirming that such a thing was never of before censured by a prince of so much justice as our sacred majesty: whilk in effect is to reproach us of manifest injustice, for doing of that, the like whereof was never done by a just prince. And the libeller, not content with these reproaches, most villainously and despitefully belicht and vomited fourth against our sacred person, proceeds to a most fearful and dangerous undermining of our honour, credit, and greatest happiness, in affirming that there is now a general fear of some innovation intended in essential points of religion: albeit (blessed be God) it be certainly known to all our good subjects, that we are, and in all our actings have shown ourselves to be a most devote and religious prince, hating and abhorring in heart and affection all papistical superstition and idolatry. And the libeller, (out of a devilish humour) not content to restrain his pen within the limits of this our kingdom of Scotland, as if it were too little for the compass of his carious and furious brain, he enters to pry into our estate of England, and assures that there is reports of allowance of reprinting of books of Popery and Arminianism in England, and of the restraint of answers made to them: and then returning to Scotland, most falsly affirms, that Arminianism is preached there without censure. After that, he goes to the estates of the parliament, and affirms most falsly and calumniously, that divers papists were admitted to parliament, and upon the articles, who by the law of the realm can be no member of any judicatory. Albeit it be constant and nottour, that none of these who were admitted to parliament and upon the articles, was professed papists, as will appear by the roll of the names of these who were upon the articles. And farther, the unhappy penner of that cursed libel proceeding to ane higher point of taxing and misconstructing of our proceedings, he affirms that the grievances allowed to be proponed in Convention in anno 1625, were altogether slighted in this our first parliament: which is a manifest lye and untruth, there being nothing concerning the public moved at parliament, which was not either determined by our estates, or remitted to our council. And thereafter it is as falsly affirmed, that the meetings of the gentry, which were appointed for representing the grievances of the country in the matter of Coin and increase of theft, were interrupted in our name: which is a manifest lye and calumny. Like as thereafter it is most scandalously scditionously affirmed, that we denied liberty to our nobility to meet and convene with the lords of the articles, against the constitution of a free parliament under such a just and lawful prince: albeit it be nottourly known, that our nobility did enjoy all the privileges of a free estate, which pertained to them and their predecessors. And sicklike thereafter it is affirmed ignorantly, foolishly, and falsely, That against the custom of this our kingdom, the bishops did chuse the articles of the nobility: albeit before the parliament in anno 1609, the nobility did erer chuse the articles themselves: which is notoriously false, and contrair to the fundamental laws and practices of all preceding parliaments, whereby it is constitute, that ever the clergy did chuse the articles of the nobility. And thereafter he affirms, That the bishops did chuse such of the nobility on the articles, as either were popishly affected, or had small knowledge of the estate and laws of this our country: which is an impudent malicious calumny and falsehood; these who were chosen on the articles (as will appear by their names) being of the most anient of the nobility, and most expert in the laws and customs of this our kingdom. Thereafter the cursed and unhappy libeller returns to his nipping and checking style; and most presumptuously challenges our sacred self upon our speeches in parliament, and upon our proclamations made upon our revocations; which was intended for augmentation of our patrimony, and for disburdening of our subjects of taxation; and that yet nevertheless huge and great taxations were imposed, against the counsel given by our unquible dearest father of blessed memory, in his Basillicon Doron, and against the practice of our dearest predecessor king James 1. who remitted to his subjects a great part of the taxation granted for his ransom: which is a peart and mischievous exprobaton to our sacred person, who out of the love and tender affection which we bear to this our antient native kingdom and country, vouchsafed that grace and favour to visit it in our royal person, without sparing of cost and charges for our journey, and other necessities belonging to our coronation; which is well known far to exceed the taxations voluntarily offered to us by our estates, in testimony of their humble and thankful gratitude for so great a blessing as the personal presence of us their sacred lord and sovereign, within this our native soil and antient kingdom. And as we did never enjoin nor urge any taxation, so the same being voluntarily and humbly offered to us by our loving and faithful subjects, as the mite of their humble affection, far within and beneath the respect of so glorious a benefit, yet we were pleased out of our love to accept it graciously. And yet this so gracious acceptance cannot pass the pen of this unhappy libeller, but must be casten up (i. e. reflected upon) with a false and despitiful exprobaton, as done against promise, proclamation, and the practice of king James 1. which is falsely and villainously affirmed. And when the infamous libeller has spent his unhappy breath and pen in reviling and maledicting the glorious name of us, his gracious sovereign, in our person and proceedings, he thereafter challenges us for applying our former taxations to a wrong use, in bestowing the samen upon parties and persons, whose waistrie (i. e. extravagance) and wants, our subjects are not obliged to supply. And with this besides, by the way, he upbraids our servants and counsellors for malversation, in the guiding and employing thereof: And is so peart and impudent in his devilish style, that he spares not the name of our ever-glorious dearest father king James of blessed memory; but most falsly casts up (i. e. mentions) a promise alledged to be made by his majesty or his commissioner, in the parliament holden in anno 1621, for discontinuing of the extraordinary taxation in all time to come. And then in the end, as a venomous wasp, he closes with an impudent reproach towards us, in that which is most commendable in a sovereign prince, by taxing us in our beneficence and liberality to the lords of our session, in providing honourable maintenance to them, and in bestowing pensions upon our officers; and leaves nothing within this our kingdom, which is not drawn in within the scourge of his devilish and malicious pen and tongue: So that it is not to be wondered and admired, that any person, living under such a gracious, pious, and just prince, could degenerate into so monstrous a contempt of our government, as to dare and presume upon to think, let be (i. e. much less) to speak and write such devilish, reproachful, scandalous, and seditious thoughts, which infest the very air, and can have no other end but the breeding in the hearts of our good and loving subjects, a fearful jealousy and dislike, and in the end contempt of our just government. And albeit all our good subjects be bound in conscience, as also by the laws of this our kingdom, to crush this Cockatrice in the egg, and to abhor it as a pestilentious clout; yet the said devilish libel was found in the hands of the said Mr. John Dunmure, notary in Dundee, and was divulged and dispersed amongst our subjects about the foresaid month of March last past: which coming to our notice and knowledge, we then gave power for examining of the said Mr. John Dunmure how the same came to his hands; who deponed, That he had the samen from the said John lord of Balmerino. Which John lord Balmerino being also examined, he granted the samen to be of verity, and therewith affirmed, that he had the said libel from one Mr. William Haig, whom he thought also to be the penner and author thereof. Of the which scandalous libel, the said John lord Balmerino himself was, and is, author, deviser, consuler, adviser, airt and part (i. e. contriver and partner) in the penning, writing, and drawing up thereof; at the least is guilty of the hearing thereof, and of the concealing and not revealing of the said Mr. William Haig, whom he affirms to have been author of the same; and also is most guilty of the not apprehending of the said Mr. William Haig, it being in the said John lord Balmerino his power to have taken and apprehended the said Mr. William; and, lastly, is guilty and culpable of the divulging and dispersing of the said scandalous and seditious libel amongst our subjects, in so far as the said John lord Balmerino knew of the penning of the said scandalous libel by the said Mr. William Haig, and advised and gave his opinion anent (i. e. about) the making of the samen; and in token thereof, interlined a part of the said infamous Libel in divers parts thereof with his own hand, which is yet extant to be seen by ocular inspection; and which interlining the said John lord Balmerino has confessed to be his own hand-writing. Likeas immediately after the forming of the said most infamous libel, the said John lord Balmerino received the same from the said Mr. William Haig, and delivered it to the earl of Rothes, of purpose to have the samen presented to us, and caused Mr. Robert Dalgleish his servant copy the said infamous libel; which copy he delivered to the said Mr. John Dunmure, in whose hands the samen was found, by occasion whereof the said infamous libel was divulged and dispersed amongst our subjects, and openly read and exposed to their view; to the prejudice and derogation of our sacred and glorious name, by the infamous, scandalous, and seditious passages and articles contained therein. Likeas the said lord of Balmerino kept and detained the said infamous libel in his hand continually, from the time of the closing of the parliament about the end of June, 1633, until the 9th of June 1634, last past, at which time he was challenged for the same, and did exhibit the said infamous libel, in presence of the lords appointed by us for his examination. Likeas the said John lord Balmerino having conferred with the said Mr. John Dunmure, after his first examination, which was in March 1634, and avowing that which he had done concerning the delivering of the said infamous libel to the said Mr. John Dunmure, and dispersing thereof, desired the said Mr. John Dunmure to go and tell the earl of Traquair, one of the examiners, that better men than the said John lord Balmerino himself would set their faces to (i. z. justify) the said libel, at the least knew of the samen. And albeit the said John lord Balmerino be a nobleman of good learning and understanding, and so presumed to have the knowledge of the laws and acts of parliament of this our kingdom, was bound in all duty, after receiving of the said infamous libel from the said Mr. William Haig, and reading thereof (which in the hail strain and tenour of the samen was of the nature of a scandalous and seditious libel, prohibited by our acts of parliament) as he would have eschewed the danger of our laws and punishment therein contained, as author thereof, to have revealed the same to us, or to some of our privy council: And also to have apprehended the said Mr. William Haig, whom he affirms himself to have been the author and penner thereof: yet the said lord Balmerino did no ways apprehend the said Mr. William Haig, nor yet reveal the said scandalous libel, it being in his power to have apprehended the said Mr. William Haig, who was but a single person, and the said lord Balmerino being a nobleman of power and credit: But the said lord, notwithstanding thereof, did still haunt and converse with the said Mr. William Haig, and did keep, detain and retain the said infamous libel in his hands. Likeas the said lord Balmerino, after he was cited to compare before the lords appointed for his examination, which was upon the 7th of June last; he comparing before the saids lords examiners upon the said 7th of June, being Saturday, he craved early of the saids lords to have his examination anent (i. e. about) his knowledge of the authors of the said infamous Libel, to be continued (i. e. delayed) till Monday next thereafter, which was the 9th of June; which being granted to him by the saids lords, and he thereupon being demitted from them upon the said 7th of June, being Saturday about 12 o'clock, he immediately thereafter met with the said Mr. William Haig, and shewed to him the warrant of the citation. At which time the said lord of Balmerino having the said Mr. William Haig in his own house, and so in his power, did not apprehend him, whom he knew and affirmed to be the author of the said scandalous libel: but by his shewing to him of his said warrant of citation, which bore the said lord Balmerino to have been conveyed before the saids lords examiners, to make answer anent the said seditious libel, found in the hands of the said Mr. John Dunmure, he thereby gave occasion to the said Mr. William Haig to escape out of the country, and become fugitive. Likeas the said Mr. William Haig, immediately after the sight of the said warrant shewn to him upon the said 7th of June, being Saturday, escaped and fled out of the country, and became fugitive, and remains out of the country continually since syne, (i. e. since that time.) Likeas the said John lord Balmerino being incarcerated (i. e. imprisoned) within the castle of Edinburgh, after his first and second examination, as author, airt, part, or accessory of the said infamous libel, received several letters from the said Mr. William Haig furth (i. e. out) of the Low Countries, and other places to which he escaped; which letters the said John lord Balmerino kept by him, without acquainting the saids lords examiners, until the time he was challenged. In the which letters and in other letters sent by the said Mr. William, and intercepted by the lords, it is affirmed and avowed by the said Mr. William, that he had the approbation and allowance of the said John lord Balmerino to the making and penning thereof. By the which particular deeds, circumstances, and other vehement presumptions particularly above expressed, it is clearly evinced, that the said John lord Balmerino was author, deviser, outsetter (i. e. publisher) adviser, airt and part of the penning and forming of the said infamous libel, at the least concealer and not revealer thereof; and is also culpable of the not apprehending of the said Mr. William Haig, whom he affirmed to be the author of the said infamous libel. As also of the dispersing and divulging of the said infamous libel, in manner particularly above-declared; incurring thereby the pain and punishment of death, specified and contained in our saids acts of parliament, which ought and should be inflicted upon him with all rigour, in example to others to attempt the like. Our will is heretofore, and we charge you straitly and command, that incontinent thir (these) our letters seen, ye pass, and in our name and authority, lawfully summon, warn, and charge the said John lord Balmerino presently in ward, within the castle of Edinburgh, to compare before our justice and his depts within the Tolbooth of Edinburgh, the 3rd day of December next to come, in the hour of cause (i. e. when the court is met) and there to underlie our laws for the crimes above-written: To the effect that upon his trial and conviction, as culpable thereof, justice may be ministered upon him conform to the laws of the realm; and that ye summon an assize, (jury) not exceeding the number of 45 persons, whose names ye shall receive in a roll subscribed by our advocate, ilk (each) person under the pain of 200 marks, according to justice. Given under our signet at Edinburgh the 11th day of November, and of our reign the 10th year, 1634."

Follows the Execution of the said Summons.

"Upon the 14th day of November 1634, I James Currie, Ormond pursevant and one of the sheriffs of that part within constitute, past at command of thir (these) our sovereign lord's letters within written, and by virtue thereof charged the within written John lord Balmerino personally apprehended in the castle of Edinburgh, and delivered to him a just and authentic copy of these his majesty's said letters, to compare before his majesty's justice and his depts in the Tolbooth of Edinburgh the 3rd day of Dec. next to come, in the hour of cause, and there to underlie his majesty's laws for the crimes within written; to the effect, that upon his trial and conviction as culpable thereof, justice may be administered upon him, conform to the laws of this realm: And this I did after the form and tenor of our sovereign lord's letters in all points, before these witnesses, Mr. Archibald Geddes, constable of the said castle of Edinburgh, and John Malcome, herald. And for the further verification of this my execution subscribed with my hand, my stamp is affixed. Sic. sub. Ja. Currie, Ormond pursevant."

Thereafter our Lord Advocate produced with the Summons above-written, the copy of the infamous Libel which was found in the hands of Mr. John Dunmure, notary in Dundee; bearing in the end thereof, that the said Mr. John being examined thereupon, he by his Deposition has granted it to be the samen Libel which was in his hands: Of the which copy the tenor follows:

To the King's most excellent majesty; the humble Supplication of a great number of the Nobility and other Commissioners in the late Parliament,

"Humbly sheweth; That the Notes which your majesty put upon the names of a number of your Supplicants in voting about these acts, which did imply a secret power to innovate the order and government long continued in the Reformed Church of Scotland; and your majesty's refusing to receive from some of your supplicants their reasons for dissenting from the said acts, before your majesty, and in your bearing in parliament, to breed a fear of our becoming obnoxious unto your majesty's dislike, if your highness should still remain unacquainted with the reasons of our Opinions delivered concerning the said acts: Seeing your supplicants are confident, that your majesty vouchsafing to take notice of the saids reasons, would be pleased to acknowledge, that no want of affection to your majesty's service, but a careful endeavour to conserve unto your majesty the hearty affections of a great many of your good subjects that are tender in these points of innovation, covertly thrust upon this church, did induce our wishes and voices to appear in opposition to the said acts; and that a predominant desire in us to have all your royal designs here to prosper without interruption, did absolutely command us to forbear any reasons that could have been propounded against many of the conclusions in the late parliament.

“ We do therefore humbly beseech your majesty graciously to ponder the considerations after-written, so shall we be encouraged (as in duty bound) to continue our humble prayers for your majesty's long and happy reign.

“ First, we humbly beseech your majesty to consider, That though these acts as they are conceived, and may concern your majesty's prerogatives, and the liberties of the church, had never been moved or concluded (as they are), your majesty would have suffered no prejudice in your benefit, honour, nor power: That your supplicants are much more free from all suspicion of private ends in dis-assenting, than the contrivers of the said acts, in offering them to the hazard of contradiction, or soliciting an assent thereto: That in deliberation about matters of importance, either in councils or parliaments, opinions do often differ; and they that have been of contrary mind to a resolution carried by the plurality of votes, have never hitherto been censured by a prince of so much justice and goodness as your majesty.

“ We do also most humbly beseech your majesty to believe, that all your Supplicants do, in most submissive manner, acknowledge your royal prerogative in as ample manner as is contained in the Article 1606, made thereanent (thereabout); and wihal do consider, that the long experience and incomparable knowledge your royal father had in matters of government, as well in church as in commonwealth, is the very cause expressed in the act 1609, for giving power to his majesty to prescribe apparel to kirk-men, with their own consent. And since in all the time of his life and government for the space of 16 years thereafter, he did forbear to make any change upon their former habits; we are bold to presume, that in his great wisdom he thought fit, that the apparel used in time of divine service ever since the reformation of religion till his death, and to this day, should be continued, as decent in the church, and most agreeable to the minds of his good subjects in this nation. We do also beseech your majesty to consider, That under the act intitled, ‘ A Ratification of the Liberty of the Church,’ the acts ratifying the assembly of Perth in parliament 1621, were declared to be comprehended: That most part of us being then in parliament, did oppose the same; that experience hath shewed how much these articles of Perth have troubled the peace of this church, and occasioned innumerable evils and distractions in it: That there is now a general fear of some novations intended in essential points of religion; and that this apprehension is much increased by the reports of allowance given in England for printing books of Popery and Arminianism, and the restraint of answers made to them; and by preaching Arminianism in this country without censure: by the admission made of divers papists to the parliament and upon the articles, who by the laws of this realm can be no members of any judicatory in it: That the minds of most of your good people being in this perplexity, your supplicants have great reason to suspect a snare in the subtle junction of the act 1609, concerning apparel, with that of 1606, anent your Royal Prerogative; which by a sophistical artifice should oblige us either to vote undutifully in the sacred point of Prerogative, or unconscionably in church novations, [A*.] which blessed king James would never have confounded, as appeared evidently in the parliament 1617, honoured with his gracious presence; where his majesty, by the bishops instigation, tried, urged, and past in Articles a ratification of his royal prerogative enacted in the parliament 1606, with Addition of an Article authorizing all things that thereafter should be determined in ecclesiastic affairs by his sacred majesty, with the consent of a competent number of the clergy, to have the strength and power of law. When this Act came to be heard in open parliament, his majesty gave order to read only the Kubrick of the Act; which being done, he was then pleased in his fatherly compassion over the tender affections of his loyal subjects (well known to his majesty, as fluctuating betwixt love and fear) publicly from his own mouth to declare his princely love and pleasure, for reasons known to himself, to have that Act suppressed, though passed in the Articles: because his Royal Prerogative being of itself inviolable, was already established sufficiently; and in the depth of his wisdom, he would absolutely prefer the peace of the Church to the appetite of church-men. And since we are fully persuaded of your majesty's unfeigned affection to the true religion, and so do presume, that none of these things lawfully rejected at the Reformation [†B—C—] thereof in this kingdom should be introduced again without consent of our clergy lawfully assembled; and fearing that a forcible and colourable intruding thereof, would diminish in the hearts of many of your loyal subjects, that affection which is founded on their opinion of your majesty's goodness and wisdom.

“ We do therefore dis-assent from the foresaid Acts, as importing a servitude upon this church unpractised before, and giving ground for introduction of other new indefinite devices.

“ We do further offer unto your majesty's consideration, that albeit our just and heavy Grievances allowed of in the late Convention of Estates 1625, and 1630, to have been represented to your majesty, in hopes of refreshment to the country's sufferings, have been altogether slighted in this your first parliament; albeit your majesty denying your nobility their freedom by authority to meet with the Lords of the Articles, may seem against the constitution of a free parliament (under such a just and lawful prince, and contrair to the custom of your ancestors), which before the parliament held in anno 1609, did always elect and chuse the Lords of the Articles from among them of their own rank and quality; there having been no parliamentary bishops from the reformation of religion till then, nor were they such as now do cull and single out such noblemen either popishly affected in religion, or of little experience in our laws, as having had their breeding abroad, and so none of the ablest to be upon our Articles, but fittest only for the clergy's mystical ends. Whereas the former practice was such, as seemeth most agreeable to reason, and what every estate should do, that so they may communicate their minds with the rest of their body; since none but men very presumptuous of their own knowledge, or senseless in themselves, will adventure to trust their first conceptions in matters of so great importance as are the conclusions of parliament. Albeit the humble supplications of the ministry to your majesty and estates of parliament, delivered to the Clerk Register, (and that your majesty was in all due humility petitioned by the ministers of this kingdom, both Conformists, and Non-conformists, to give them a hearing) have been suppressed: albeit the meeting of the gentry, and happily of the burrows too, in a joint purpose to have represented to your majesty our unpeakeable sufferings by the Abuses of the Coin (the Mastery of the Mint being a thing merely regal) and increase of Theft and Oppression of divers parties, and other things worthy your majesty's consideration, were in your majesty's name interrupted: And finally, albeit your majesty was graciously pleased by your former and later Speeches in the Parliament House to declare (answerable to your several Proclamations, bearing that the course taken by your revocation for settling the patrimony of your imperial crown, was, that ye should not be burdensome to your people), that your majesty had no purpose at this time to lay any burden upon this nation, according to the wise counsel of king James in his Basilicon Doron, treating of the right Use of Subsidies: albeit that the present condition of your subjects is worse, and the patrimony of the crown greater, than when king James 1. remitted to his people a great part of his Taxations, granted even for that good king's ransom; yet have we all as one man consented to all your majesty's demands, and more, even to have taxations multiplied, without representing how the former have been, or these may fall to be, bestowed upon divers parties, whose wastes and wants your good subjects are not obliged to supply; without objecting that some of them have been granted extraordinarily for Supplies of the Palatine, which being now by the mercy of God in a better condition, they might have pleaded in reason to be thenceforth discontinued; without foretelling that some of the subsidies are like to be means of more processes, (or suits) betwixt your majesty's subjects and the Treasurer, than matter of profit to your Treasury; without putting your majesty in remembrance of the impertinencies you have suffered by men's ambition after the public places of judicatories, which none have heretofore refused by reason of the small fees due to them; without contradicting the exceptions of your officers pensions, or alledging their Fees to be as sufficient for maintaining the dignity of their places now, as they were before your majesty's father succeeded to the crown of England. And all this have we done implicitly, only to testify our ingenuous affection to your majesty, and our obsequious resolutions to give you full content in every thing, that makes not a breach in our Religion and Laws, or occasioneth not offence to the weaker sort in the way of God's Worship here established; and albeit we were not acquainted with any of the statutes before the public voting of them in parliament. Therefore we are confident that your majesty finding such a harmony in our affections to your service in preserving our Religion and Liberties, will be unwilling, upon any suggestion of such as are (or hope to be) sharers of our voluntary contributions, to introduce upon the doctrine or discipline of this your Mother-Church, any thing not compatible with your majesty's honour, your good people's consciences, or that hath been rejected by acts and public practice of this Reformed Church.

Follows the said Mr. John Dunmure's Deposition, written upon the end of the said Copy.

Apud Edinburg xiv Martii 1634. convened St. Andrews, Traquair, Bishops of Edinburgh, Ross, Clerk of Register.

"I Mr. John Dunmure, notary in Dunder, being examined in presence of the lords of his majesty's secret council above-written, depone and confess, that this supplication within written, is all written with my own hand, and is that which I delivered to Mr. Peter Hay of Naughtoun about Lambas last. And farther I depone and confess, that this is the just and true copy of the paper delivered to me by John lord Balmerino, shortly after the end of the late parliament, within Edinburgh; and that then my lord of Balmerino (I being with him) said to me, Because ye have given me many papers, I will let you see this and have your judgment of it; but let it be tibi soli, as ye respect my credit. And that I kept it four or five days, and copied it, and then delivered the same back again. I farther depone, That the paper contained the supplication within written, in the same words and sense: and it is not by my lord Balmerino's hand, but by some other hand.

Sic Subscritur, JOAN. DUNMURE."

Written on the back of the said Copy, "For the Kirk and Country in the Parliament, 1633."

My lord Balmerino produces two Warrants of the Lords of Session, by their lordships deliverance of the several dates under-written, ordaining the procurators therein contained, to compare and defend my lord in the criminal process above; and the said lords by their deliverance, of the date the 19th of Nov. 1634.

The lords having considered the desire of the Supplication, &c. and appointed the persons therein condescended on by my lord to be his advocats for his Defence, viz. Sir Lewis Stewart, Mr. Thomas Nicholson, Walter Hay, and Mr. John Nisbet. And by the deliverance on the end of another Supplication given in by my lord to the said lords, craving (upon some of the former advocats refusal) more advocats, they by their deliverance thereon, of the date the 25th Nov. 1634, appoint and ordain Mr. Roger Mowat, Mr. Alexander Pearson, and Mr. Robert Macgill, Advocats; and ordains, &c. Upon the production and reading of the which Warrants, the said lord Balmerino took Instruments.

Thereafter it was objected by my Lord's Advocats, that my Lord Register could not sit as an assessor to my Lord Justice-General in this process, because not only my Lord Register has been one of the Judges of the particular committee appointed for Trial and Examination of the Pannel, before whom he has oftentimes compar'd and been examined; but also my Lord Register has given partial counsel, and has been upon the counsel of the advising and libelling of the Dittay now produced and read, and has assisted in the same at several occasions: and so by giving information and advice in that kind, has behaved himself as party in effect, and therefore cannot be Judge nor Assessor to the Justice-General. And after Answers and Replies, the lords by their Interlocutor repelled the first part of the alledgeance, bearing that my Lord Register cannot be Assessor, because he was a member upon the committee: and as to the second member thereof, declares that they will have my Lord Register to make his judicial Declaration, and that judicially thereupon, in presence of the Pannel, before any Answer be given thereto; which accordingly my Lord Register does.

The Pannel, in respect of my Lord Register's Declaration Judicial, is content that my Lord Register remain Assessor to the justice-general: whereupon my Lord Advocat asked instruments.

Thereafter the Pannel produced a Supplication to the Lords of privy council, with Deliverance thereupon, craving the Depositions made by the earl of Rothes, Mr. John Dunmore, and Mr. Robert Dalgleish, from the clerk, to be seen by his procurators; and their lordships, by their Deliverance thereon, dated at Edinburgh, 28 Nov. 1634, the lords remit to the justice the answering of the desire of this supplication. Sic subscriptur St. Andrews.

Accordingly my Lord Advocat, at the Justice Ordinance, (i. e. by order of court) gave up to Mr. Roger Mowat, one of the Pannel's procurators, two Depositions of Mr. John Dunmore, one of Mr. Robert Dalgleish, one of the earl of Rothes, one of Mr. Peter Hay; together with four missive Letters, sent by Mr. William Haig to the Pannel, to be reproduced Friday next, at which time they were accordingly reproduced.

Thereafter upon the said Decemb. 5, the Dittay and infamous Libel was read, as specified in the Dittay.

It is first alledged by Mr. Robert Macgill, as the Pannel's procurator, under protestation for himself and the rest of his brethren, with an apology that he nor they allows not the least sort of inordinate speech against his majesty, but only to free the innocent, as they who are commanded by the Lords of Session, and take instruments upon the first Article of the Actis imprinted in our sovereign's first parliament, anent the surveying of the laws; does alledge the Dittay cannot be inferred against the Pannel, upon the first act specially and at length set down (therein:) because it has not been the mind of the legislator there to inflict the pain of death upon such reproaches as are contained in the Dittay, and alledged to be contained in the Supplication or Petition styled by the Dittay 'Calumnious.' For the main cause of making that 20th act, parl. 10, holden in December 1585, (our dread sovereigns, and his honour, being ever proposed) was not only to ratify the grace given and extended to these noblemen, who a little before became in at Stirling, as may be seen by the particular acts of parliament unprinted anent the restoring of those noblemen, with their followers; but much more to strengthen the nobility (as reason was, and the time required) against captain James Stewart, who then had fled, and was the cause of their former banishment; and feared by them, that he might wrong them again, if he had regained his majesty's ear, because that they came in such a manner. And to strengthen also the nobility against any other, who should take in hand the like, as to come in betwixt the tree and the rind; I mean, betwixt his most sacred majesty and his favour et suos committates, for his nobles are so called, and has their names as they who should be ever accompanying his most sacred person. For the Deeds done 'contra aliquem et committatu viscantur ut crimen læsæ majestatis, Leg. quisquis, Cod. ad legem Juliam majestatis,' by the time.

The strain of the Act carries also this, to wit, Reproaches of his majesty's Estate or Government, or depraving his laws and acts of parliament, or misconstruing his proceedings: but answering to the question, In quem finem should these Reproaches have been written, whereby any misliking may be moved betwixt his majesty and his nobility and loving subjects? Where the word 'his nobility' is very emphatick, and the two last words expounds the same, being exegeticke of the former by a gracious praise, testifying by the word 'loving' the forgetting of the former slip, which had been more by misreport than in verity. Compare also this Act with that which was made during the said captain James his grandeur, a little more than a year preceding, parl. 8, cap. 134, Jac. 6, in the which, as it were consulto consilio, the noblemen are omitted ibi; to the reproach of his majesty's council and proceedings, to their great prejudice who were then put away by his (i. e. captain James's, counsel, and holden away by his detractions, until they pearly enough (yet encouraged by their own innocency) came in at Stirling: and incontinent did procure that tenth parliament to be holden, in which was made the said tenth act, no more days interreuing betwixt their return and its sitting but the days of citation. And is yet more clear by the words, 'deprave his laws and Acts of Parliament: meaning act 25 Jac. 2, parl. 6, against the Apprehenders of his majesty's person, as the act bears; the literal sense whereof might infer a Dittay against the committers, if it were not to deprave the laws, if the mind of the legislator were not looked unto. So that this tenth act cannot well be understood as convenient to infer the Dittay, especially seeing he was not the author or penner of that alledged infamous Libel; but Mr. William Haig, who has clearly taken it upon him by his own letter, as was constant (i. e. evident) to the Lords of the Committee, and is acknowledged in the Dittay by these words, 'At the least guilty of the hearing:' wherein the Pannel's part was not much worse than others who heard it, and yet not revealed the same. As also although that Remonstrance by way of supplication be now alledged to be scandalous, but then to be preferred to his sacred majesty, and was offered to be given; ergo the Dittay cannot be inferred in this act.

And as to the second Act libelled expressly, Jac. 6, parl. 14, cap. 209, containing divers Acts anent Lensing-makers; we repeat the forsaid Protestation, and say, If all sorts of inordinat Speeches (which let it be spoken with all humility and dutiful reverence, as not allowing any, but to shew the Pannel's innocency) against his majesty our dread sovereign and his government, even those which by interpretation or misconstruction may be inferred upon a man's speech (i. e. contrary to) his mind; and not only the author of the same, but also the hearers, not-revealers, and not apprehenders, are understood to be punished with death in our law, in the addition of that act, and so are all to be comprehended therein: then we should make our law to commit an absurdity, which no municipal law ought to do; but rather an interpretation should be taken out of the common law and reason. Gailus ad Longum, lib. 2. 'Observatione trigesima tertia, quo modo statutorum interpretatio facienda sit.' The absurdity is, that there should be equality of pains, and so equality of crimes, committed in Speeches, in most submissive manner be it said, against his most sacred majesty, not only by the authors, but also by the concealers and not apprehenders, whatever the scandalous speech be. But he that hears and not reveals a higher speech, shall be punished as he who hears treason. The connection is cleared by this, 'Quod delictum majus a parvo dignoscitur ex poena qualificata.' Tractatu incerti

Authoris de Læsa Majestatis Crimine, quest. 11 num. 5. Et passim in Jure, ut comprobatur Baldus in Capitulo primo, prima Nota ad Titulum 38 lib. 2. Feudorum de Vassallo qui contra constitutionem Lotharii. And the opinion of the civilians is exploded long since, 'ut sententia dignum horribili flagello.' For there are sundry sorts of inordinat Speeches and Contumelies against the prince and the estate; as these that are spoken against his majesty's person and blood outrageously, or in a conspiracy against the country, understood in some manner by Clarus, paragrapho Læsa Majestatis, num. 1, in fine. And here it is only that the lawyers find the hearers and not revealers, and not apprehenders, to be punished by death: Clarus, paragrapho ultimo, quest. 87 num. 2, Punctus in fine. And yet he requires 'ut adit Tractatus.' Such were the Speeches uttered betwixt Catiline and his complices; 'Et non nuda verba ab authoris animo detorta.' In which case it is well said, 'Quod crimen majestatis a iudicibus non in occasionem, ab principalis majestatis venerationem habendum sit,' Leg. 7, § 2, F. ad Legem Juliam Majestatis. The second sort are where 'directis verbis animo injuriandi viciis impropert,' to a prince for lack of virtue. Where the lawyers remit the author, 'Lege unica cod. si quis imperatori maledixerit; (it not being yet condescended fully amongst them, what is meant by the word Remittendum). But anent the hearers, nor revealers, and not apprehenders, not a mum, but on the contrary, 'quod nulla poena teneantur.' As 'in omni delicto nisi casibus dictis,' Clarus says, num. 3. 'Versiculo quod tamen, dicta questione 87.' Far less can the hearers, not revealers, and not apprehenders of the authors of the third sort of speeches be concluded under death with the first; and that third sort, in all humility I say, where vice and lack of virtue is not 'impropert directis verbis, (tantum abest ut sit animus injuriandi).' But as a flower or flourishing weed may afford both honey and venom, so Speeches written to one good end, by one misconstructing illation may be interpreted in one evil sense; as the informer of the Dittay makes the alledged Supplication to be a contumelious and infamous Libel: which cannot be done, in all humility and submission I say it, to infer the Dittay against this Pannel, upon the said addition in the act 205, as hearer, not reveler, not apprehender, without a manifest absurdity against the law and reason, as said is. For even in speech, 'quavis dixit dominum suum esse dominum hominum et bestiarum, quod non debet author puniri,' concluded remissive. 'Cæsar Orcellus in advocacione ad decisionem Mathei de afflictis' 265, num. 68, 69, et idem advocacione in decisionem 307, num. 15. Quod verba sunt civiliter capienda et ad bonum moderanda; iidem in dicto tractatu incerti authoris dicitur distinguendum inter verba narrativa et simpliciter enunciata quasi præterita, ac alia verba dispositiva seu positiones affirm-

'tas, ut ex illis non liceat argumentum sumere, 'ex his vero liceat.' Quæst. 6, num. 13, ibi nunc videndum. But of the Particulars, and even of this General, more falls to be said hereafter.

Only against Delators of Speeches, called, 'Frumentarii et Oc.ustai,' let it be remembered to the justice, that some good emperor 'quos infinitis illustrissimus et sacratissimus 'imperator noster præcurrit parasangis,' useth these folks to know what the people thought of them, and how to amend any slips, if any were. Capitolinus in Antonino Philosopho says, 'Erat famæ suæ curiosissimus, requirens 'ut verum quisque de se diceret, emendans 'quæ bene reprehensa viderentur, et passus se 'impune cavillando perstringi, dicitur civiliter 'se egisse.' Xiphilin reports the same of Titus; 'Imo Tiberius deprecatus est apud senatum nimis præcipites verborum penas.' Yea, to this tepid king James 5, of worthy memory, his disguising himself for such another inquiry; as also Goran, one of our dread sovereign's most worthy progenitors, is commended for the same by Hector Boyes. In respect whereof, the Dittay is not relevantly inferred upon the two acts of parliament libelled.

It is farther alledged by Mr. Roger Mowat for the Pannel, That the saids two acts of parliament mentioned in the Dittay, and whereupon the samen is founded, can be no ground in law for this criminal pursuit; in respect the saids two acts, and many others of that kind, but especially the last of the saids two acts, and the additions subjoined thereto; have never been in observance, custom, or practice heretofore, against any alledged contraveeners thereof: and therefore cannot now receive a beginning against this pannel, being a nobleman known by the hail course of his bygone life to have been an strict obsequious keeper and observer of his sacred majesty and his most noble progenitors their acts and statutes; in such sort, that it can never be verified that ever the pannel has been so much as once denounced rebel, and put to his majesty's horn, (outlawry) for any action or cause, civil or criminal, whatsoever; and so is not presumed to have contravened any of the said two acts, albeit the same had been in custom and practice, as they have not. And that the said two acts, specially the said addition of the last act, are fallen in desuetude, and never heretofore practised, is clear and evident, because the contrary cannot be shoven: And it has been received as a most laudable and warrantable custom amongst wise and judicious politiques, that laws in desuetude and out of custom are not to be introduced at an instant, without some new intimation thereof, when necessity is found for re-establishing of the said laws; but specially such laws and acts, as carry with them the pain of death, forfeiture, or such-like: Likeas some strict acts of parliament of this kind, containing the like or more grievous pains, being ratified by subsequent and posterior acts, the said posterior acts have ordained intimation to be made to the leidges of the said former acts, pains, and severity thereof, before the said pains should be inflicted upon the contraveener. And it is clear, that not only the said two acts mentioned in the Dittay are not of custom, and have not been practised, but many more, containing some less and some greater pains, in the most part of all preceding parliaments: For which I will only adduce some few, to verify and instance this part of my alleadgance, (allegation). And first I alleadge the 105th Act of the 7th parliament of king James 5, of worthy memory, intituled, 'Pains of them committing Fraud in Alienation;' which bears, about the end of the said act, That the person, seller or giver shall be declared infamous, and shall be punished in his person and goods at the king's will. And it cannot be denied, but that this act hath been many times contravened, by many of good sort, in points of double Alienations, and yet was never heretofore practised against the saids contraveeners.

There is another act of queen Mary's, of happy memory, par. 5, c. 16, made against them that swears abominable Oaths; which act is ratified by king James 6, of ever blessed memory, par. 7, c. 103, both the said acts bearing in express words, 'That for the fourth fault, 'prelats, earls, or lords contraveening, shall be 'banished or put in ward year and day, at the 'will of the prince.' These acts have been contraveened, yet no pursuit for the saids Pains has followed thereupon.

The 2nd act of the 16th parliament of most blessed king James, bears, 'That the slaying of 'salmond, smolts, kipper, or black fish, shall 'be a crime of theft in time coming, and to be 'punished as theft in every quality.' Which act, if it shall receive force, and be put in practice upon a landed man, (as questionless it may) it shall import him, or any landed man contraveener thereof, no less than tinsel (loss) and forfeiture of life and goods; because by the 50th act of the said 11th parliament, landed men convict of theft or receipt thereof, commits treason: ergo, landed men, slayers of salmond, smolts, &c. in forbidden time, commits theft, and consequently treason; which (as the act bears) is declared to be tinsel and forfeiture of life, lands, and goods.

These and many other of this kind, every where to be found amongst the said acts, does evince, that with reason the said acts libelled in the Dittay, and others of that kind, which never have been practised of before, cannot be received against the leidges (subjects) without a preceding intimation; whereby good and loyal subjects may be in mala fide in case they be found after the said intimation to have contraveened. And so the said two acts, specially the said addition mentioned in the last act, cannot be found nor sustained as warrantable grounds in law against this Pannel; being a nobleman, not only known to be ane observer and not breaker of his sacred majesty his noble progenitors their laws, acts, and statutes, to draw upon him for alleged hearing, concealing, and not revealing and not apprehending of the authors of the alleged infamous supplication, the pains contained in the said acts and in the said Dittay, which is the tinsel and loss of his life.

It is alleged further by Mr. Alexander Pearson for the pannel, in fortification of the Exception propounded, 'Quod leges per desuetudinem tacito consensu consensu abrogantur, expressa lege 32. § 1. P. de. Ita ut secundum ipsas non firmatas judicare non liceat, firmitatem autem leges cum moribus utentium approbentur, omnino in istis veris distinctione 4ta. Et si hoc obtinet in civilibus, quanto magis in criminalibus; ubi tanto cautius agendum est, quanto magis periculum vertitur? Unde illud papæ qui decrevit ut generaliter clerici in quinquagesim. a carnibus et deliciis jejurent, quia moribus utentium approbatum non est, aliter agentes transgressionis reus, non arguitur canone supra citato.' And therefore the acts of parliament whereupon the propositions of the Dittay are founded, none of them, at the least the last thereof, never having been in observance at no time since the making thereof, now by the space of forty years, even since the last act; the acts foresaid, specially the last, cannot sustain the Dittay, nor infer the pains therein mentioned.

It's answered by my Lord Advocate, That all the Allegances ought to be repelled, in respect of the acts of parliament, whereupon the Dittay is founded; and that there runs no prescription against laws, and specially against laws prohibitive of crimes, which are also prohibit and punished by the common law; of the nature whereof are these two acts whereupon the Dittay is founded. And the Allegance, 'Quod leges tacito consensu abrogantur,' is only 'per contrariam consuetudinem idque in contradicto judicio,' which is that which the law calls 'tacito consensu;' and all the arguments adduced in the contrary, are 'ab incommodo quod non solvit.' And the indulgence of the prince in the overseeing the punishment of crimes in by-gone time, cannot be adduced to warrant a crime when it is pursued; and specially when the crime is of the nature of rebellion against the prince, in his person, estate and government. And albeit this be a clear and sound answer, and that no more is necessary; yet it is constant and notoriously known, that these laws has been put in execution this 34 years by-gone; as namely, against Francis Tennant, in the year of God 1600, and against Mr. Thomas Rosse in anno 1618, and lately against Mr. George Nicol his infamous Libel.

It is duplyed (said again) for the Pannel by Mr. Alexander Pearson. That where it is alleged by my Lord Advocate, that Desuetude cannot be obtruded against acts of parliament, which has warrant from the common law; it is answered, that the acts ancient crimes by Desuetude rather loses their vigour than acts of civil business, because in acts criminal there is greater hazard, as loss of men's honour and life. As to any precedent in civil law giving warrant to the addition of the last act of parliament, it cannot be alleged, 'Quia non est lex statuens peenam mortis,' contra hearers, concealers, and not revealers, which is the addition of the act. And where it is alleged by my Lord Advocate, that Desuetude of laws is only 'per contrariam consuetudinem in judicio contradicto;' it is answered, That Desuetude of laws is clearly expounded otherwise by the citations above rehearsed: so that 'leges quæ nunquam in usum forensium productæ sunt et quæ moribus utentium approbantur,' are become in Desuetude, licet non sit consuetudo in foro contradicto in contrarium.'

It is further duplyed by Mr. Robert Macgill: Not to dive any further into the acts of parliament, but respecting the distinction already said, I allege, that the addition of the act 205, cannot be thought to be 'in viridi observantia' in this our case; because if so ought to be, it should much more have been practised against the havers, hearers, readers and seers of any using Mr. George Buchanan's Books: But this hath never been used yet, act 134, parliament 8th, albeit there has been many. But so it is, that this has not been used in its own case; ergo it ought not to be begun to be put in use against this pannel, who let be his other virtues, has been ever a patron of dutiful obedience to his and our most gracious and sacred sovereign. The connection is clear, because that Book, as sundry reports it who has read it out of the country, 'ipsam regiminis cardinem nititur convellere, et impingit in regiam prerogativam.' Further, if all sort of speeches (let me say it in all due reverence) against his majesty and government, come under the acts ratified here, with the addition against havers, hearers, revealers, and not apprehenders, and were 'in viridi observantia,' who should not be brought before this judicatory, and under the compass of the said act? for as we live all in one family, every man in his own, and talk thereof, so live we also in a commonwealth, whereof to talk sometimes bitterly (which is not to be allowed) though foolish: And so the most part think that they have their own interest, and will force as it were the wiser, nill they will they, to hear them. And ament that which my lord advocate says, 'quod non valent argumentum ab incommodo,' it ought to be repelled in respect of the place alledged out of Gaius, Libro secundo, Observations 33. where he concludes, that the argument is good against the municipal law to make it to be ruled according to the civil law, and to common reason. And farther, that our own municipal laws ought to receive limitation according to reason. I repeat the foresaid 25 Act Jac. 2. Item by the said Act 134. Par. 8. Jac. 6. it is made capital to meddle in his highness's affairs and estate, either present, by-gone, or to come; saying further, That none of his subjects of whatsoever function, degree, or quality, presume in time coming to meddle as said is, without any exception: then shall a nobleman, who is born as it were by our laws to meddle in such affairs as concern the commonwealth and country, not have so much liberty as to petition his majesty most humbly in matters of government, for the weal of all, as may seem to him, while his reasonings be discoursed, nor not in parliament; yea, even extra parlamentum, his sacred majesty was petitioned after his majesty's revocation, howsoever it was conceived, and in whatsoever terms: So that punishment of Speeches anent Government, and the Laws, must receive their right sense. Wherefore 'till they be surveyed (which has been most royally begun long since by his most sacred majesty, and now enacted in his first parliament) the rigour of the said addition ought not to be practised upon this pannel; ' Par enim præcipua legis est voluntas, et verborum dicitur prærogativa, lege non dubiam. Codice de Legibus. And Menochius passim de arbitrariis Judiciis, gives exception from municipal laws, according to equity and reason.

It is farther dplyed by Mr. Roger Mowat, to that part of my Lord Advocat's Answer anent the instances and practices alledged for proving of the Custom and Consuetude of the said two acts of parliament, to wit, Francis Tennant, Mr. Thomas Ross, and Mr. George Nicols; That the said practices or instances cannot be respected, because they are not produced: and if they were produced (as they are not) it should be clearly shewn, that they met not in (did not suit) this case, either because they are not founded upon the said acts of parliament, and specially upon the said addition contained in the said last act, or else because the crimes are not alike: for the first crime of Tennant's was one Cokiland (Libel) bearing and reporting express positive scandals and reproaches, whereof he was condemned to have been the actor and author. And so whether he was pursued and convict upon the acts or upon the common law, his Dittay was most relevant. As for Mr. Thomas Ross, his crime was also a most abominable speech written by himself against the hail nation directis verbis, whereof he confessed himself (being upon pannel) to be the penner, former, deviser, and divulger; and copies of his most infamous libel affixed upon public places with his own hand: and so cannot be obtruded as a practice or precedent in this case. As for Mr. George Nicol his crime, it needs not to be answered, because he was not pannelled nor convict; and so his process intended against him cannot be adduced as a practice to rule the like cases thereafter: and the pain inflicted upon him was by warrant of council, and so none of the saids practices can be respected. In respect whereof, the argument founded upon the desuetude of the said two acts, and the danger that may follow hereafter upon other acts of that kind, &c. which have not heretofore been practised, stands relevant. And it is craved, that the dangers which may ensue to good subjects upon the practice of the acts before alledged, may be adverted unto, and the dangerous sequels prevented.

Secundo, It is alledged for the Pannel by Mr. Alexander Pearson, under Protestation for-said, That the Writing whereupon the sub-sumption of the Dittay is foundit, is not an infamous libel quoad accusatum; neither in the pannel's part in the particulars libelled against him seditious and calumnious; neither can he be presumed to have had any such intention. First, not an infamous Libel quoad accusatum, but an humble supplication of some lords and commissioners of the late parliament, offered to his majesty himself; whereunto the Suppliants were induced in love and tendering of his majesty's honour, and in fear of their offence to his majesty by their voting anent some acts of the late parliament. For removing whereof, and for satisfaction to his majesty, they did humbly beseech his majesty to be graciously pleased to ponder their reasons for dis-assenting from the saids acts; and to consider the Suppliants hearty obsequiousness to his majesty in other matters of the said parliament, wherein they did forbear to represent any thing to the contrary thereof, for testification of their ingenuous affection to his majesty, This doing of the Suppliants is no crime, sed de natura boni; and far from any culpable commission, in meddling with things not belonging to them. And it is hard that any supplicants deprecating humbly his majesty's offence, should by so doing incur his majesty's offence, and the crime of capital punishment: specially the supplicants having no private respects, but for the publick, wherein they had interest, and special charge; and for conservation of themselves in his majesty's good favour, the loss whereof, or the fear of loss, should be most grievous to any loyal subjects; ' Cujus reipublicæ tantus ubique favor ut proclamant leges quod reipublicæ veneranda causa secundum bonos mores sit, etiamsi ad contumeliam alicujus privati pertinet, quia tamen non ex mente magistratus facit ut injuriam faciat, sed ad vindictam majestatis publicæ respiciat, actione injuriarum non tenetur. Leg. 13, F. de injuriis et famosis libellis. — Est ergo quoad accusatum Libellus supplex et si libellus supplex postulat juri contraria, hujusmodi postulata ab omnibus judicibus refutari præcipiunt leges et supplicansem iterum super eadem causa non audiendum, L. 3, 5, et 7. Codice de precibus imperatori offerendis. Sed non ideo supplicans reus est sceleris, quia libellus continet refutanda; nec libellus supplex ideo famosus, cum hæc fuit bragyma. — Non Libellus famosus quoad accusatum, quia non ad infamiam, sed favoris conciliationem, ut supra: Item non clanculum et secreto, sed professo et reapse domino regi oblatum. Atque ideo nullo modo quoad accusatum detractorius aut calumniosus, cum detractio sit seminatio mali occulte, et calumnia sit adversus absentem; neutram autem committitur cum is cujus interest proponat querelam coram eo cujus parte sunt de ea cognoscere; de eo cujus interest reipublicæ ejusque salutis causa duntaxat. — Nam Libellus famosus quoad accusatum, quia non constat directis asser-

'tionibus in quibus venit verum aut falsum, quod omnino requirit libellus famosus.' Leg. unica, Codice de famosis Libellus. 'Sed postulat in quibus considerandum venit bonum, justum, et qui verum et falsum non agnoscunt cum non fuit enunciatio.'

Farder, the Pannel cannot be presumed to have had any other intention than the strain and tenor of it, as a supplication does imply, and which is most beseeching thereto; to wit, to the voice of ane humble supplicant. 'Ea sententia accipienda est semper, quæ rei gerendæ aptior est, et in ambiguis orationibus maxime sententia spectanda est ejus, qui eas protulit.' De Regulis Juris. And it is always disagreeing to a humble Supplicant to tax or calumniate, and therefore it cannot be so expounded, but should be interpreted the best way the words may admit; 'Quia de jure in dubiis et obscuris, quod minimum et benignius est sequimur.' Leg. 9. F. ibidem.

Item. The Writing aforesaid, as in form of Supplication, was used also as a Supplication, and so delivered by the Pannel to the earl of Rothes, to be presented to his majesty, as affirmed by the Dittay itself, and indeed offered to his majesty: which, howsoever his majesty did not accept of then, and take the samen to his consideration; yet the supplicants did think that the very presentation thereof did seem to assure the nature of the writing to be a Supplication: and scarcely even could the wisest conceive so of the pannel's having the writing, as it is now interpret against his majesty; but think that his majesty had past all offence thereof, as the law speaks of action of injury, whereof the present accusation is a kind. Leg. 2. §. 1. F. de injuria, 'Verba legis injuriarum, actio ex bono et æquo est et dissimulatione abolitur, si quis enim injuriam dereliquit, hoc est statim passus ad animum suum non revocaverit, postea ex penitentia remissionem injuriam non potuit recolare.' By the which it appears, that the Pannel had no such mind or intention as the Dittay would rub (fix) upon him in all the progress of the matter libelled against him. And I suppose that none will think, that by the presentation of the Supplication at the first to his majesty by the Supplicants, that they then by so doing were culpable of a capital crime, if the same had been immediately thereafter destroyed, and never more seen nor heard. And if they then were not culpable, shall any supervenient act make them culpable, or more culpable? 'minimè nonquam enim crescit ex post facto præteriti delicti estimatio,' Leg. 130, §. 1. de Regulis Jur. 'Multo minus ex post facto oritur novum delictum, quod ab initio non fuit quoad accusatum, aut ubi offensa si qua fuit dissimulatione abolita sit.'

It is eiked (added) by Mr. Robert Margill, If it had been leisome (lawful) to this Pannel, as a born counsellor, in that great council and parliament, and other noblemen, to propound to his most sacred majesty the things contained in that supplication alleged to be scandalous; which are not affirmations, but as it may seem, grievances, remonstrances, and expedients: then it was also leisome to the Pannel, and others, to represent even out of parliament to his most sacred majesty, our dread sovereign, what they could have propounded then, but did abstain (therefrom) for the reverence they carried to his majesty: specially when they did it in most submissive manner, as the hail strain thereof beats, and out of a most loyal affection. 'Et prius est verum ergo et posterius.' The verity of the minor is plainly embraced by Bodin, 'qui est acerrimus Regiæ majestatis propugnator,' cap. 1, lib. 3, 'ubi de senatu et quod senatori de republica loquendum sit, præsertim de omnibus fere capitibus in supplicatione hac contentis.' As to the connection, it depends first on the duty of a good counsellor here, to whom, as God has given to be endowed with reason, so our most sacred sovereign and his progenitors have given to be a wise man and counsellor even from his birth. That he may learn to exercise his reason from his birth, for the benefit of the commonweal; which is the first place of honour, as Cicero says, and is that which we call nobility; shall he not have as it were a magazine of reasons, as may seem to him good, and even communicate them with others, for trying of the same? specially at this time of surveying of the laws, that according to the time, and other circumstances, he may furnish to his majesty his best counsel in every thing that he thinks may concern the weal of the country whereiu he lives, as by duty even from his birth he is bound: like to the labourer, to whom in a rainy day, 'quæ mox celo properanda sereno maturare datur.'

Next, it depends upon the good mind to the Commonweal, whereof his most sacred majesty is the head, 'ut non teneatur injuriarum quicquam reipub. causa faciat.' Neither is that thought to be an injury, Leg. Injuriarum, 13. §. 1. Leg. quod Reip. F. de Injuriis juncti Leg. neminem 9 Cod. ex quibus causis irrogetur infamia, et Leg. ex varia quarta de Delatoribus, lib. 2. Cod.

Thirdly, It does depend upon the conception of the words, which is by way of most humble Supplication. 'Et verba propter adjunctam mutant naturam suam, Carvetta ad decisiones: afflicti neque tam refert qualia sunt quæ intra nosmet composuimus quam quomodo essentur.' Ac Quintilianus, lib. 2. 'Et ut in aliis rebus ita in sermone, forma dat essentiam sermoni;' for even good words may be used in an evil sense, ut heus bone vir! But this is worthy of all praise: 'Et si non dederis Cæsar, permittite rogari, offendent nonquam thura precesque Deum,' kings are gods on earth; and albeit by Bodin extrema provocatio be counted inter jura majestatis, that from a king himself there is no appellation (appeal); yet he commends the sort of appellation a Philippo ad Phi ipsum, and alledges it to be the opinion of Baldus, ad Legem primam et ultimam Cod. de Relationibus, et Leg. 1. §. 1. F. de Appellationibus, viz. to his majesty.

For seeing the alleged scandalous Petition was offered to his most sacred majesty to be read, but not received nor read, nor after due consideration condemned by his majesty; it was not thought so dangerous (let me speak it with reverence) as to come under the compass of the acts of parliament, and so as it ought not to have been divulged: I mean, in that quiet manner, as it might not be imparted to Mr. John Dummure, 'sub sigillo taciturnitatis,' and not to have been copied. And farther, the Pannel ought to be excused and assolized (absolved) from the Dittay, 'si delictum dici debeat, quod cum loquimur in delictis in quibus dolus est de substantia delicti, tum credulitas et sive justa sive injusta sit causa, excuset, nam videtur cessare animus delinquendi.' Clarus, § final. Quæst. 60, num. 22. 'Et in delictis voluntas non finis attenditur.' Gailus lib. 2. Obser. 99. num. 6. 'At hic nullus exitus nisi bonus, idem observatione undecima, quod in delictis principium non finis attenditur,' num. 18. 'Ubi de homicidio perpetratur et consilium convitia tenditur.' Lege sison, quinta Cod. de Injuriis, 'et causatur hæc actio ex affectu inferentis,' Pharm. Quæst. 105. Inspec. 3. num. 3. ex Lege illud tertis, §. 2. Leg. non solum 2, in princip. si quis servum 26, de Injuriis ubi Pharmaciis, 'Quod lata culpa his dolo æquiparetur et locutis multa de presumptione doli in utramque partem, et de juramento purgationis subdit.' Num. 118, 'dicta inspectione quod verba debent impropriari ad fugiendum delictum et malum animum, præsertim cum in publico dicta sunt.' Which we say, when it was not concealed, but offered to be given to his most sacred majesty; neither is it presumed that any man has a mind to defame his neighbour. Pharm. dicta Inspec. 2. num. 418, et sequent. And were he not to be thought more than mad, who would draw up, instead of a Supplication, a Libel full of detractions against his sacred sovereign lord; or who would keep the same beside him, let be to offer to give it to his dread sovereign? And in the crime of Lese Majesty, 'Dolus malus est de substantia criminis;' it being ever said in the 'Digestis, Cujus opera dolo malo quid factum sit id rempublicam.' What shall it not be de substantia delicti, in this alleged crime of detraction, not so evil as is alleged in the Dittay? But as the same agrees with a remonstrative supplication (let me say it with reverence) wrong glossed, as it may concern the Pannel, (where he had so many probable causes inducing him thereto) 'Quæ qualitates et circumstantiæ conjecturæ, cum nulla delinquendi consuetudine probata, relevant contra dolum præsumptum etiam propter prohibitionem.' Carerius, fol. 104, 105. viz. That these things might have been propounded in parliament; That he was a counsellor of estate; That other noblemen thought then also (as) well of it as he; That it was for the weal (at least so apprehended by them) of the country, in this time of surveying the laws; That it was offered to be given to his majesty, and that under the form of a most humble supplication: That other hard supplications concerning the estate had been received graciously by his majesty; That it was not then taken notice of, nor upon consideration condemned. And it might have been, that if any here had perchance lighted on it, they would have done worse with it than the Pannel. For, as Quintilian says, 'Consilium et itatio quadam acti, petita et plura perpendens, ac comparans latentibus rebus et dubeis adhibenda.' Now no right nor virtue in itself can be seen but quasi facies; as Plato says: yes, verity, equity, and utility, are lain hid in the draw-well of Democritus: 'Et ut quisque altissima mente est, ita ex altissimo Democriti puteo quasi submersas veritatem, æquitatem, et utilitatem, nititur haorire.' Yet so is the reason of man obfuscat (darkened) since his Fall, that he cannot penetrate to that deep, for the darkness; which by disceptation of contrary reasons, like two flint-stones stricken upon other, some sparkles of light flee out, for letting see to draw forth these virtues. Wherein consider also the Pannel's carriage and his life by-past; and if any thing tending to sedition was ever heard of him, or even what effect has followed. 'Qualitas enim facti ex persona factientis præsumitur,' Glossa finali Canone non omnis.' 5. quest. 5, et dicta Lege septima, § 1. F. Ad Legem Julii Majestatis. 'Ubi ait modestinus, nam et persona spectanda est, an facere potuerit, an ante quid fecerit, et an cogitaverit justa, et jam causa excusata seditione quæ jam crupit.' Boerius Tractatu de seditiosis præmisso 4, num. 2. Ubi utitur exemplo Moisis et Israelitarum ad Aquos Meriba. And shall the Pannel, who had so many reasons for him, be thought punishable as one seditious in that mean matter of divulging as said is, of a remonstrative supplication? whereof but by illation and misconstructing (satis pace dixerim) it is gathered, far from the Pannel's mind, that sedition might have been moved. No, no, that man is only styled seditious, who, by direct speeches, draws the people in factions, and going madly before one of them, cries out the word (vivat) 'scilicet hæc aut illa factio.' Borrius dicto Tractatu Præmisso 2 num. 2. Et Carerius fol. 10, 31. pag. 2. num. 3, in fin. ubi etiam dicunt, 'Quod in his quoque qui jam seditionem excitant puniendis requiritur, et studiose rumore et tumultum conciliarent vociferatione.' Which things, seeing they are so far from the nature of the Pannel, and from his doings, his intention and mind ought to be justified, and consequently he ought to be assolized from the Dittay produced.

December 6, 1634.

It is alleged by Mr. John Nisbet for the Pannel, That the dittay is no ways relevant, because nothing is libelled to infer a seditious and sinister intention of the pannel, in contriving, concealing, or imparting of the piece challenged; neither is it libelled, that the pannel knowing the alleged Libel to be seditious and infamous, concealed or divulged the same; but to the contrair, it is libelled, That the Pannel, immediately after the receipt thereof, delivered it to my lord Rothes to be presented to his majesty, which clears the candour of his intension, and the opinion he had of the nature of the piece, and of the use he thought might be made of it to propitiate his majesty, and not to traduce his sacred person or government to his subjects. And therefore, albeit he had concealed it, and divulged it, he cannot be obnoxious in the pains of the acts of parliament, which are only against seditious Contrivers of slanderous Writings, and malicious Concealers of Writings, nottourly and to their knowledge seditious, expressly compiled by incentives and firebrands of sedition, and exposed to the view of the subjects for that effect. For the words of the acts of parliament (To the reproach of his majesty's person, estate, and government, steering up Sedition, tending to steer up the hearts of the subjects to hatred) impleth intension. And the civil and canon law requireth 'dolum generale in omni actione injuriarum tanquam substantive requisitum.' Galus lib. 2. Observatione 99. And expressly both in the compiling and divulging of seditious and infamous libels, Leg. Lex Cornelia, § 1. F. de Injuriis, 'Cum dolum non adest, nisi dolo malo quis fecerit (viz.) Librum ad infamiam alicujus pertinentem scripserit, composuerit, vel ediderit.' Leg. illud § sane eodem titulo, 'Impubes et furiosus non passus facere injuriam, quia neuter est doli capax; nam hi solent pati injuriam, non facere: cum enim injuria ex effectu facientis non consistit, consequens erit dicere, hos sive pulsant, sive convitium dicunt injuriam fecisse non videri.' Leg. 34. F. de Obligationibus et Actionibus, injuria ex effectu sit, Institutionibus de Injuriis, §. 1. Leg. 5. §. ultima, F. ad Legem Aquilianam; Ubi dicit Julianus, 'Actionem injuriarum non competere, quia non faciendæ injuriam causam fecerit, sed monendæ, et injuriæ non factum queritur, sed causa faciendæ expressa.' *Leg. 39. de Furtis decreti secunda parte, Causa 5. unica Codicis, 'si quis imperatori maledixerit, ubi petulaas et improbum mendacium, quo imperialia nomina læcessantur, non statim injuria censetur, et eo nomine puniuntur; sed distinguitur an ex levitate processerit et sic contemnitur, an ex insania, et miseratione digna censetur, an ex injuria et sic remittitur et declaretur. Sic injuria confunditur et recipitur cum animo injuriante.' Omnes Doctores, Menochius consil. 197. lib. 12. per totum. The cause debated by the doctor is coincident with the present, but not so pregnant in favour, 'Arguebatur senator scripsisse injuriose de principe in huic sensum, quod cum senatorum numerus utili sanctione coarctatus fuisset, postea esset amplius importunitate et ambitione postulantium, mentem principis impollente; et cum rursus nova Constitutione consultum fuisset, et numerus senatorum immixtus, denique, aut demum actus fuit, et in immensura crevit magna cum supremi ordinis iactura et inutili intensa, totiusque status incommodo addiderat, hospitalionibus tota die patriam maxime gravari et forenses animi remanere gravatos.'

Menochius consultus num injuriose scripserit, respondet, 'Qui injuriarum et male dicitur accusacionem instituit; duo debet probari, alterum verba esse injuriosa, alterum prolata esse animo injuriandi. Et hæc methodo ostendit verba non esse injuriosa, quia laudem ducit continet nomen ejus constituto dicatur optima, et potius bono zelo et pro celsitudinis utilitate prolata videntur. Deinde arguit senatoris peccam non incidisse, quia verba injuriosa etiam de sua natura puniuntur, tanquam cum animo injuriandi proferuntur, et præsumptio juris stat. pro eo qui proleteri aliqua verba que videntur injuriosa, et dicitur ea dixisse absque animo injuriandi. Ergo, satis superque fundata est intentio senatoris quod scripserit predicto, non modo non animo efficiendi injuria serenissimum principem, sed potius laudandi et similia verba a subito bene merito de principe præsumitur prolata potius bono zelo. Secundo, quia quando verba sunt dubia, standum est declarationi ejus qui ea dixit: et quando sunt dubio, similiter declaratio ab aliis verbis præcedentibus vel subsequentibus, vel ab utrisque. Et in caso dicitur senatorem principem lædasse, cum dixerit fuisset in arbitrio sua celsitudinis, non senatorum numerum augetet. Addit, quod injuria requirit dolum, sine quo illata dici nequit, et in caso constat omnem dolum absuisse, quia dolum non præsumitur commissum contra personam benemeritam; non præsumitur in homine probato, non præsumitur in eo qui pro beneficio patriæ aliqua verba protulit, que principis personam videntur allicere; non præsumitur in subdito, quia nihil nunquam contra principem molitus est. Quæ præsumptio multo magis comprobatur, quando verba voce vel scriptis directa sunt ad principem; et si hæc in homine privato vera sunt, quanto magis in senatore gravi et illustri, qui alioqui ex his verbis concipere sibi contingere

'grave detrimentum? Cravetta in simili casu dicit Judæos Christi inimicos, in dubio non presumitur, aliquid dixisse ad injuriam Christi, quanto minus debet presumi crimen injurie in subdito, contra suum dominum?' Idem ibid, num. 26. 'Conjunctus non presumitur injuriam, conjunctum animo injuriandi intra septimum gradum.' Glossa in Leg. vestes, F. de leporibus. 'Multo minus presumendum est subditum velle injuriare dominum suum:' et Consil. 6. 'Non est simile quod vir facultatibus plenus adeo stultus fuerit, ut prodigius esset personæ et æris, et quod dolus non solet committi contra tantum principem, sine causa.' Idem, Consil. 256. 'Absolvit quendam Parisiensem seditiosis insinulationum, quum nullo animo injuriam dixerit alto voce quod princeps quidam male faciebat, et facere non poterat, quia adita dicendum poterit bono zelo moveri, et in dubio presumendum est ut delictum excludatur, et quia presumptio delicti removetur propter bonam famam et opinionem Parisiæ.' By all which presumptions, more pregnantly concurring than in any case extant in law, the pannel's innocency is cleared abundantly. And nothing farder can be exacted but his declaration by oath, which he offers most willingly; and by the universal and uncontroverted practice of all nations, seconded with like presumptions, importeth absolution: 'Quia probatur animus non injuriandi, juramento ejus qui injuriam intulit.' Guido. Consil. 223. num. 2. in fine. Menoch. de presumptionibus, lib. 5. Presump. 40. num. 32. Idem, Consil. 256. 'Qua intentione reus verba dixerit ab ejus animo pendat, et ideo ejus declaratione cum juramento standum est, quia dependentibus ab animo status juramento ejus de cujus animo dabitur.' Leg. 1. Codic. de Sicariis et aliis Legibus ab eo citatis. Godolphredus ad Legem si non convitii, Codice de Injuriis, 'Meo purgationis juramentum causa cognita defertur habita ratione persone, qui injuriosus natura sua verbis usa est,' Gailus, lib. 2. Observ. 106. 'Notum est injuriam absque animo non committi, et innocentiam cum animo constat juramento probari posse, et ita in camera judicatum refert.' And therefore in respect of the premises, the Dittay is no ways relevant, both because Dolus is not libelled, and because the Dittay bears that the pannel gave the piece challenged to my lord of Rothes of intention to be presented to his majesty: whereby the innocency of his intention is evidenced, and of his accession in having or divulging the piece aforesaid, since he was so far from thinking the piece injurious to his majesty, in that he had ventured by my lord Rothes's means, not only to acquaint his majesty therewith, but to present it as a fit apology to his majesty; as is acknowledged by the dittay, which we accept in that part.

It is farther alledged for the Pannel, That the hearing, having, and not reporting, is not relevant to infer a concealing after the pannel's knowledge that the king was acquainted therewith, because 'celamus eum qui ignorat,' leg. 1.

F. de Actionibus empti et venditi. And the reason expressed in the act of parliament why the reporting is enjoined, is, that seditious pieces of that nature may come to his majesty's knowledge. After which time, the pannel was not obliged to importune his majesty with superfluous reports, seeing it is acknowledged by the Dittay, that immediately it was delivered by him to my lord Rothes; and so acquitted himself of all that was incumbent to him in duty anent the point of revealing.

It is likewise alledged for the Pannel, That the points of the alledged Libel quarrelled as outrageous to churchmen, or to noblemen, is not relevant to infer the crime and pain of infamous libelling, because they are not challenged by the parties interested, and of the law: 'Volenti non fit injuria, et injuria dissimulatione aboletur si quis deliquerit, et ad animum non revocaverit.' Secondly, There is no act of parliament irrogating capital punishment upon the authors of infamous Writings, reflecting against subjects, but only against his majesty's sacred person, estate and government.

It was thereafter alledged, under Protestation ut supra, by Mr. Roger Mowat for the Pannel, That the Dittay is not relevant to infer the pain libelled upon, because an humble supplication in name of a number of his majesty's loyal subjects, for removing of the prejudices which his majesty had or might conceive against them as supplicants, and for conciliating his majesty's gracious favour towards them, is not such an infamous libel as falls under the compass of the acts of parliament upon which the said Dittay is founded: but the supplication quarrelled, whereupon the pannel is accused quoad eam, and the rest of the said noblemen, is an humble supplication in their names, as a number of his majesty's most loyal subjects, to remove his majesty's prejudices, and to conciliate his highness's favour; ergo no infamous libel falling within the compass of these acts, quoad eam, and the pannel. The major is clear by the definition, nature, and qualities of an infamous and scandalous libel, (where there must be maligning, detraction, and calumny), and by the definition of an humble and submissive petition and supplication, which differs far from an infamous libel, and altogether heterogeneous. The assumption, viz. that the quarrelled supplication, whereupon the pannel is accused, is an humble petition to remove prejudice, and to conciliate his majesty's gracious favour, is evinced in the said quarrelled supplication itself, in the inscription, in the intention of the supplicant; and lastly, in the humble desire of the supplication, which is the substance, life, and quintessence of all petitions: the intention and end of the supplicants being the essence of the petition, and the harsh or hard expressions of the said quarrelled supplication (being submissive and modest in the inscription and desire thereof, as said is) cannot infer guiltiness against the Pannel, who is not Author nor Writer thereof. And also any Petition, formal by a secretary, a lawyer, or a writer, to be given and presented to his sacred majesty, (even though the desire thereof might seem just) being hard and difficile, or containing harsh (harsh) expressions not easy to be understood by every reader, shall infer guiltiness and punishment of death upon the supplicants mention therein, who perchance may be absent out of that part of the kingdom where the petition was founded. And if the harshness of some expressions, contained in the said quarrelled supplication, can infer the guiltiness libelled, and punishment of death, upon this pannel, the supplication and remonstrance made and presented to his most sacred majesty by a great many of the nobility, who then were afraid at the large extent of his majesty's late revocation and reduction, would likewise fall under the compass of these acts of parliament. But that supplication and remonstrance was accepted by his royal majesty, and his majesty was pleased with it. And since the same has tended to his majesty's honour and benefit, in the matters of surrender annuity, and plantation of the Kirks, with competent stipends, the connexion is proven, because the humble supplication and remonstrance was no less expostulative nor this, which may be easily cleared by perusing the said remonstrance itself; ergo, &c.

It is answered by my Lord Advocate, That the second allegiance, and all the members thereof, and Additions made to it by the Pannel's procurators, ought to be repelled, in respect of the Dittay, which subsumes relevantly upon the two acts of parliament, word by word, as the same are conceived. And where it is alleged that the infamous libel cannot be esteemed infamous or reproachful, quoad accusatum: because it is conceived under the form of a supplication, and contains not infamiam or injuriam, but tends to pacify his majesty, whom the supplicants supposed to be offended; and that it contains nothing 'positive vel enunciative circa verum vel falsum,' 'sed via postulati circa bonum vel malum.' And likewise where it is alleged that the Dittay is not relevant, there being nothing libelled to infer the libel quarrelled to be seditious, and that the pannel knew the same to be seditious; and that there is no Dolus libelled: it is answered, That all these allegations ought to be repelled in respect of the Dittay, which is qualified according to the qualification of the acts of parliament. And the designation of a supplication alters not the nature of the libel in the points where it is challenged as reproachful and scandalous; but these points being of their own nature scandalous and seditious, cannot be excused under the veil and pretence of a supplication, especially where the reproaches are emitted against his majesty's sacred person: 'Quia in minima pulsatione sacre et supremæ majestatis nulla admittitur excusatio, ut ait Horondus,' lib. 8, de Libellis defamatoribus: tanta est atrocitas libellorum

'famosorum; et imperator Augustus libelles famosos in principum tractaverit sub specie læsæ majestatis.' Et citat. Ciceronem. lib. 4, de Republica, 'uti sit nostræ discessionis tabula cum per paucas res capite sancivissent in hæc, hanc præcipue sancendam putaverunt, si quis hoc tentavisset sive carmen condidisset quod infamiam facere flagitiumve alteri; et multo magis ubi quis modestie nescius, et pudoris ignarus, improbo petulantique stylo sacre majestatis numen crediderit lacevendum.' And this crime is so odious and heinous that there needs no dolus to be libelled, quia dolus præsumitur. And for the colouring of the supplication, it is altogether impertinent; because that would elude the law, seeing every man who resolves to abuse the sacred person of the sovereign prince, has it in his power to give what name he pleases to his scandalous and odious conceptions, whether to design them by use epistle, by use history, by a petition, by an admonition, and lastly, if he pleases, by a vow, to cover his crime under the mask of piety. And for supplications, the law is clear, that albeit they be offered to the supreme prince, yet if they contain a reproach and scandal to a subject, they are punished, lege apud Labionem, F. de Injuriis et famosis Libellis, §. 29, cujus hæc sunt verba: 'Si quis libello dicto principi factam alicuius fuerit insectatus, tenetur injuriarum.' And therefore much more, where a subject dares presume to make offer to his sovereign lord of a supplication; and in it presume to tax or reproach his majesty's person, his gestures, his speeches, his promises in his supreme parliament, and to lay aspersions upon his glorious honour, majesty, and dignity; which, with the rest of the points of the libel, there repeated, are as many aggravant qualities to infer the atrocity of this infamous and seditious libel. And Pharra, in his 30 Concil. num. 34, 35, 87, and 62, disputes at length this question: 'An sub specie voti libellus famosus excusetur?' And concludes, 'Quod quavis color infamie sub velamine petitionis magis aggravat et injuriam et animum injuriandi.' And no man can be able to deny but the definition of a famous libel is most competent to this particular case, which is 'ubi vel delictum, vel vitium, vel defectus improprietatur alicui personæ.' And not only one, but all these concur in the particular qualifications contained in the dittay; and of the law, 'Actos sumunt denominationem a potentiore, præcipue in actu mixto.' And read this infamous libel, it shall be found in the strain of it, and the most powerful position, to aim still at his majesty's person, estate, and government; which are so much more inexcusable, that they were needless; and not only needless, but contrary and destructive of the narration and consolation, which seems to tend for pacifying his sacred majesty. For if the purpose of the supplicants had been to propitiate his majesty, their sorrow and grief for his majesty's supposed offence; and an humble deprecation of his majesty's wrath, had been fit and useful means to procure their wished desire: but in place of these, to enter irreverently and outrageously upon the gesture of the prince, upon his acts and gestures in parliament, upon the censuring and misconstruing of his proceedings, and drawing the hail body of the estate under the asperity and atrocity of their seditious speeches; it is a thing without example. And where it is alledged, That this petition was presented to his majesty by the earl of Rothes; and if any injury was therein, it was removed by dissimulation: it is answered, That dissimulation never removes injury, but upon preceding knowledge. But there is no notice thereof to his majesty, because refused: and, as I am credibly informed by those who have heard it out of his sacred majesty's most gracious mouth, his majesty has declared that his majesty remembers well the time that the earl of Rothes made offer of that supplication to his majesty; and that his majesty's Answer to him was, 'My lord, ye know what is fit to you to represent, and I know what is fit to me to hear and consider; and therefore do, or do not upon your peril.' And the circumstance of presenting to his majesty can have no place to extenuat, but rather to aggravat the crime; because the pannel in his own depositions has declared, that after reading thereof by the earl of Rothes and him, it was thought of such a strain as was not to be represented to his majesty; and therefore the representing, after it was disallowed, increases the offence. And where it is alledged, if his majesty had received it, that no crime nor punishment might have been inferred against the presenter; it is formally contrair, in respect of the odious and seditious conception thereof, which would have deserved the punishment of law in greater measure: in respect whereof, the said hail alledgances ought to be repelled.

It is duplyed by Mr. Alexander Pearson for the Pannel, That where it is replied by my Lord Advocate, that the alledged and infamous Libel, though under the title and form of Supplication, yet the same being indeed scandalous and reproachful, that it cannot escape under that cover: it is answered, That the alledged libel cannot be thought scandalous, quoad supplicantes, neither doth it affirm the particulars libelled by the Dittay cum hoc in se non habent; being a supplication which of its own nature speaks not byt as it seeks, and no more than it seeks: and whatever reasons or motives it propors to persuade, it ends in a humble request for a gracious answer from his majesty: that it cannot be said to affirm directly, which any infamous libel of its own nature requires, divi lege nunc codice de summis libellis. The words of the law is, 'in ejusmodi assertionibus sides veri opitulate non sit.' Therefore requires assertions direct, which is not in the alledged libel: but proports reasons and motives, laying out the same to the view and consideration of his majesty, if thereby graciously and favourably it may obtain its desire. Where it is replied by my Lord Advocate, That delus needs not be libelled, 'Quia delictum; et injuria presumitur facta animo injuriandi et sic dolose'; it is answered, That giving and not granting the same, 'Injuria presumitur animo injuriandi in dubio tantum, et nisi probetur contrarium.' Clar. § Injuria, num. 17. But to the present case it is by the most evident presumptions, above rehearsed in the defences made for the pannel clearly manifested, that there was no mind in the Supplicants and pannel of injury or wrong; therefore cannot be presumed to have offered any injurious and scandalous Libel to his majesty, or done any thing thereunto with that mind.

And where it is replied by my Lord Advocate, That if the supplicants had a purpose of deprecating his majesty's offence, and intreating his majesty's gracious favour, they had made choice and use of fit means to come to that end, and not by scandalous speaking or reproaching:

It is answered, What fitter means can a supplicant use for intreating of favour, than by humble supplication? And that which my Lord Advocate calls scandalous reproaches in the alledged Libel, is grievances and remonstrances thereof, humbly presented to his majesty, and not assertive reproaches, ut supra. And where it is alledged, That dissimulation removes not injury, but upon preceding knowledge; and that his majesty did not read nor take to consideration the supplication foresaid presented: it is answered, That the supplications offered to his majesty, although his majesty took not the same to consideration, seems to assever the nature of the writing to be a Supplication, and was a great inducement to the supplicants to think that his majesty had passed all offence thereof conceived. And where it is alledged by my Lord Advocate upon the pannel's deposition, wherein it is alledged that the Pannel and the earl of Rothes together, after the reading the supplication; thought it not fit that it should be presented to his majesty; it is answered, That the Pannel's alledged deposition propors not the earl of Rothes and his together reading of the supplication; like as it is of truth, that the said supplication was offered to his majesty by the earl of Rothes, before the Pannel and the earl of Rothes had any thoughts or purpose of suppressing of it: and howsoever the pannel had had once a mind of suppressing the same, yet he thereafter knowing that it was indeed offered to his majesty, was a great inducement to the Pannel to esteem and think of it as one supplication.

It is further duplyed by Mr. John Nisbet, for the Pannel; Where it is replied by my Lord Advocate, That it is subjoined relevantly, and the Dittay is qualified according to the qualifications in the acts of parliament; That dole being essentially required in all actions of injury, albeit acts of parliament, by reason of their shortness, are not specified in the expression thereof; they must be interpret conform to the common strain of law, 'Quia in statutis penalis aliquid delictum capitaliter, etiam si quod de dolo non fit mentio, dolus requiritur, et 'non sufficit lata culpa.' Phar. Quest. 86. Num. 16, 25. 'pro qua opinione citat et quam plures doctores, qui aiunt se liberasse aliquos a pœna mortis, et esse mente tenendum ad confusionem judicum imperatorum, qui credunt non esse recedendum a verbis statuti: et subjungit,' num. 27. Ibid. 'Multo magis cum statutum imponit pœnam pro eo quod de jure communi non punitur.' As the present case, the points of not reporting, and not apprehending, are punishable by no other law in the world; and that the sinistrousness of the intention is necessary to be libelled, it is consistent with reason, because the crime consists thereof; 'Et ideo oportet ponere in libello, quia non probat hoc esse quod aliquando contingit abesse.' Codice de Probationibus Leg. Neq; as the present case. A seditious concealing or having, is not verily libelled by the having of a piece alledged seditious, because a man may have a seditious piece, and yet not be a seditious concealer, because he may be of opinion that it is not seditious. And it were hard in law or reason, upon the errors of opinion, to infer the guilt of so atrocious a crime, which, as all crimes, requires an express consent. And by the law, 'Nihil est tam contrarium consensui, quam error,' F. de Jurisdictione omnium judicium Leg. 'si per errorem et errantem nulla est voluntas,' Codice de Juris, et Facti Ignorantia.

And where it is replied by my Lord Advocat, That the designation alters not the nature of the alledged Libel, it is replied, that the designation of the foresaid libel, joined with the strain and fashion of it, vindicates the Pannel's innocency in the conceiving and using of it; because it would appear to any man to be a supplication, and not an infamous libel, seeing it is addressed to his majesty, whose royal and excessive goodness excludes all presumption of injury, and of the law. 'Subditi contra principem suum fraudem committi voluisse non presumitur.' Menoch. concil. 404. num. 27. Cravetta concil. 309. num. 6. It beginneth at an humble supplication of his majesty, and concludeth with a hopeful assurance, that his majesty will listen thereto: And therefore, 'cum ex ordine principii interpretemur fidem,' Baldus in Leg. quinta Codice de Commissis. 'Multo magis ex principio et fine reliqua interpretanda sunt; et ex extremis media presumuntur.' Menoch. de Presumptionibus, lib. 6. It contains ample eulogies of his majesty's royal goodness, and justice of his blessed father and their predecessors. 'Et ideo verba debent intelligi de actu uniformi, non difformi; id est, uniformitur in laudem, et decus, et non partim in laudem, partim in vituperium.' Cravetta concil. 9. num. 27. 'et verba debent potius impropriari et intelligi secundum fictionem Juris, delictum fugiatur.' Ibid. et Pharm. Quest. 105. So that it is clear, that the supplication proves not a naked and transparent veil of designation, but probable grounds resulting upon the strain of the piece itself. Whereas my lord Advocat aggravates the circumstance of the person injured, being his sacred majesty, the laws adduced convince the odiousness of the crime, when it is notorious; but extenuate the presumption, that the Pannel should have been tainted therewith, because so sacrilegious a crime is not presumed: 'et maxime petulant et improbum mendacium,' convinces not an injurious intention against a prince. And the purporters have left place to prove the candor of intention, notwithstanding the most express and formal injuries of words. Leg. unica Codice, 'Si quis imperatori maledixerit.' And where it is replied by my Lord Advocat, that dolo is presumed; it is replied, 'Quod animus injuriandi non presumitur; et incumbit injuriato eam probare,' Jacobus de Bello Visu, lib. 1. cap. 3. 'Actor habet necessarium ponere in libello quod animus injuriandi interesseret.' And all the Pretorian edicts require formally dolum malum, F. de servo corrupto, lib. 3. et edictam contra corruptentem album, F. de Jurisdictione omnium Judicum. Leg. 7. § Doli Mali. Edictum de vi publica, qui Dolo Malo, F. ad Legem Julianam de vi publica, Leg. 10. Et in Crimine Majestatis ad Leg. Julianam Majestatis. 'Et cessat Dolus quia non presumitur,' Leg. Dolum, Codice de Dolo Pharm. Quest. 105. Inspectione 3. et 121. In Libello debet exprimi, 'Quod Injuriatus animo injuriandi fecerit, quando sumus in personis in quibus malus injuriandi animus non presumitur.' Salicetus in Leg. si non convitii Codice de Injuriis, num. 4. 'distinguit utrum is qui injuriam fecisse dicatur, talis sit persona qui presumptionem injurie faciat cessare, an vero talis qui non facit.' And far more when the person that is injured concurs to exclude the presumption of injury. 'Princeps qui transcendit omnem injurie effectum et affectum.' Cravet. concil. 9. 'Etiam Judæus non presumitur aliquando dixisse ad injuriam Christi.'

Whereas it is replied by my Lord Advocat, That if the designation of a supplication should be admitted to palliate an injurious intention, the law would be eluded, 'Quæstio colore infamie sub velamine petitionis;' it is replied, That the inconveniency cannot be obtruded in this case, because the like presumptions of innocency will not be concurrent.

Where it is replied by my Lord Advocat, That the impudent presumption in presenting a piece of that strain to his sacred majesty, aggravates the crime; it is replied, That the citation adduced by my Lord Advocat, aggravates only the intention, 'et animum injuriandi,' when it is constant; but infeebls the presumption, That noblemen of their quality and wisdom should have adventured to present a piece that they thought of that nature; seeing it cannot be presumed, that they should have thought that the name of a supplication would have satisfied or eluded the king's majesty's sagacity, and make them to eschew due punishment.

The lord Justice-General continued the court till Tuesday next the 9th. At which time, when it was replied by my Lord Advocat the last day of the process upon the law, 'Item

'apud Labionem,' that the nature of a seditious or infamous libel is not compatible with the presenting to his majesty, 'Quia libellus potest dare principi, et nihilominus in eo fama aliena laesantur.'

It is as yet duplied thereto by the said Mr. John Nisbet for the Pannel, That the Case meets not, because the law adduced is of a libel presented to the prince, and reflecting upon any other person than the prince himself: And it has never been heard that any has been so inconsiderate as to present his own Dittay to a prince.

Whereas it is replied by my Lord Advocat, That the most of the alledged libel adduced by the supplicants, to enforce their intention in propitiating his majesty, is impertinent and destructive of the conclusion itself; and therefore, 'Denominatio sumenda est a potentiore, praecipue in actu mixto.'

It is duplied, That in law words destructive of a Protestation, 'Relevantur per protestationem (verbi gratia.)' The word 'Mentiris; salvo honore, si subsessent conjecturae per quas talis protestatio adjuvaretur, quod scilicet protestans non haberet animum injuriandi.' Clarus, §. Injuria, num. 13. And albeit in matter of notion and form, 'Conclusio sequitur deterioram partem syllogismi,' yet in practico syllogismo, the conclusion, being 'the vis vis vis, transmittit ab intellectu practico,' to be espoused and embraced by the will, is most considerable; and the impertinence of Mises used to enforce the same, is acknowledged by all moralists to be an escape of imprudency in the pre-election, and not of guilt in the intention. And whereas my lord advocat contends, 'Quod denominatio sumenda est a potentiori;' it is answered, quod expressa elogis are more powerful than strained consequences. And an express supplication contained in the hail strain of the piece, should preponderate some incident glance: 'Et quando verba injuriosa non principaliter, sed in consequentiam prolata sunt, etiam quando sunt de sua natura injuriosa' (as is not in this present case) 'praevaleant dicta vel scripta sine animo injuriandi.' Mar. Conc. 107. num. 10.

Whereas it is replied by my Lord Advocat, That the definition of the infamous Libel, is quadrant against the piece quarrelled:

It is duplied, That albeit a peace, 'ubi delictum vel vitium vel defectus impropere alicui,' be materially infamous; yet formally and in relation to a guilt and a crime, dolus malus is necessarily required, as an essential ingredient in the definition of an infamous libel. Damhauderius in practica, cap. 138. num. 1. 'Scriptis fit injuria cum dolose et maliciose componatur et scribuntur cantilenae, rythmi, libelli, comediatae aut cantioncule, quibus alterius laceratur nomen et fama; et libellus famosus, et compositio facta in scriptis in famam alicuius, ejus quod quis probare non vult, et in publico jactat. vel in loco ubi invenitur.' Phar. Quaest. 105. Inspec. §. num. 1. 'Et ad essentiam libelli famosi videtur requiri,

'quod fuerit positus in publico, vel loco ubi invenitur.' Ibid. num. 485. et Casone, Caus. 5. Quaest. 1. 'Qui in alterius famam publice scripturam aut verba contumeliosa confinxerit, flagelletur.' And albeit in law 'calumniari' materially 'est falsa crimina intendere,' ad Senatus Consultum, Turpilianum, Leg. 1. §. 1. nevertheless 'non tamen qui non probat quod intendit protinus videtur calumniari, nam ejus rei iniquatio arbitrio cognoscentis committitur, qui reo absolute de accusatoris conciliis incipit quaerere quia mente ductus ad accusationem processerit,' F. ad Senatus Consultum, Turpilianum, Leg. 1.

Where it is replied, That the presenting of such a piece aggravates the crime, and the odious conception thereof is punishable notwithstanding the presentation; it is duplied for the Pannel, That the presenting of it by so worthy a nobleman put the pannel, in bona fide, to think it not a piece of that nature whereof it is alledged to be, and to overpass, at the least to mistake the odiousness of the conception of it, if there be any.

It is eiked (added) by Mr. Robert Macgill for the Pannel, with Protestation, as set down from the beginning, not repeating that which I have said; but remitting the most honourable and wise Judges (quia vis jam est premissa) to these things set down before by me, touching every particular, as they have been worthily replied by my Lord Advocat.

And first, anent the Qualification contained in the acts of parliament.

It is answered first, That the first act libelled is only against delators, as said is, and expounds the act 83 Jac. 5. Parl. 6. as might be cleared by the time wherein that act was also made: But be remits it to the consideration of the Judges. Secondly, It is answered, That there being no Qualification set down in this first act of parliament, but a general law, that general law ought to receive the qualification according to the distinction propounded by me, in all humility, of inordinat speeches against a prince, in the last part of my first exception, in respect of the absurdity of the parity of crimes, and pains which would follow, if it were not so limited: And remits, as before, to Galius, anent the interpretation of municipal laws. And what shall the general rules of the law (miscalled by some Regulae Leshim) receive their own exceptions according to reason; and the municipal laws, which even in the most substantial points of the commonwealth, will alter three or four times in an age, according to the circumstances (nisi ex moribus legis); shall they, say I, stand good in a general sense contrary to reason? which I count to be the judgment of the lawyers. See in the last part of my Duply, strengthening my first exception; where it is shown that the word 'government,' in the 134th act; and so in this act, ought not to be understood against counsellors and lords of parliament: Which is followed out largely in my second exception, and so ought not to be understood in any other act; to make them contraveners, where they had optimum animum, and according to their opinion only might be thought to have erred, quod humanum est, as was alledged by Mr. John Nisbet; 'Nepere id prius quam rationis ad veritatem eliciendam inter se conflant.'

The Second is anent the colour or mask of Supplication; remits that to the practice alledged by Mr. John Nisbet out of the Consensus of Menochius touching government, set down so rudely, ut sit addita supplicatio, and, as it were, dropped out of the gall of bitterness. And yet notwithstanding the lawyers verdict was to absolve the nobleman. Remits also to the last part of my first exception in the end, anent the exposition of words and sentences, taught likewise in the second exception, and anent the form of speaking and prayer, especially where 'contra presumptionem doli.' It is clearly evinced that the pannel had not 'animum dolosum,' but rather a very good will and intention, which he, as we say in a proverb, wishes most humbly might be taken in part of payment. And remits that anent presumption of Dole, which my Lord Advocat said in the fourth place to my second exception, parte secunda, That whether it be necessary to libel, or not, yet seeing it is, 'de substantia delicti, et credulitas a causa sive injusta excuset a delicto, quia abest animus delinquendi,' as Clarus has there alledged, ergo, to be assolized as author, &c.

And to the Third, adduced by my Lord Advocat, anent the definition of an infamous Libel, and the punishment of injuries against private persons, and far more against princes; we disallow altogether such inordinate speeches, and say, That they ought to be punished as the lawyers have defined according to the mind of the speaker or penner. But that the definition of an infamous libel cannot agree herein, so far as concerns the pannel, it is not to be thought; 'quis directis et conceptis verbis, maliciose et perditissimo animo,' must injuries be imprinted: Which, in all humility, the pannel thinks not to be here; and remits to my second exception. And that a capital pain ought to be inflicted upon all sort of inordinate speeches or writings, and all sorts of speakers and writers, and upon the havers, bearers, and not revealers, indistinctly, even against princes; let me say it, with all reverence, as my Lord Advocat would insinuate by the places adduced, it is not the lawyers mind.

The Fifth, alledged by my Lord Advocat, goes back again upon an alledged disguising. But we deny that any thing adduced either anent supplication or vow agrees with our case, where nothing can be said to be improperat directis verbis (else the pannel had been a mad man): But by a wresting way, sub specie dicitur, may be thought by some to infer injury. And here again remits to these parts of my exceptions, et supra, anent the exposition of words.

The Sixth is anent our most sacred sovereign his safety; wherein remits to that part of my exception anent the appealing from a prince to himself, especially by a counsellor; 'Donec intelligatur quid velit supplicato, et rationes hinc inde adductæ, quas ex animo acies manum inter se conferant.' As to his majesty's own declaration, the pannel seals his mouth with the finger of Harpocrates, and reverences his majesty's sayings as oracles, and in all humility, accepts them as an acknowledgment of the offer made.

The last, I think, are the Pannel's own Depositions; wherein distinguish the dumbing and the times and all shall agree. His disallowed of it first, as that of the general; it was rejected by his most sacred majesty: But the pannel thought that it might have been kept till a more convenient time, according to the appellation also mentioned, and till causa esset it had been condemned. And the pannel depones, That before ever the principal came back, the copy was surreptitiously purchased by Mr. John Danmure, in falsifying his promise.

It is triplyed (replied the third time) by my Lord Advocat, that the duplies in the whole parts and members thereof are impertinent; because the exception was founded upon the form and designation of the infamous libel. That being designed a supplication, it could not contain matter of ane infamous libel; which exception was answered with this reply, That the Dittay is directly subsumed upon the acts of parliament, viz. That this, which they call a supplication, is a writing containing reproaches and scandals against the person, state, and government of our gracious sovereign, as the Dittay bears; and so more was necessarily to be replied but upon the acts of parliament. And yet, for informing the mind of the judge, it was cleared both by the express text of the civil law, and by the judgement of the best jurists, and versed in criminals, That the designation purges not the infamous speeches conceived in a supplication to the prince, being to the infamy of ane subject, much less to the dishonour of the supreme and sovereign prince. And this is not pertinently answered by no part of the duply; but both the acts of parliament and civil law concurring, stand in full force to elide the exception. And the points urged by the duply, has nothing to do with the exception, but are points extraneous, founded upon intention, libelling of Dole, presumption in favour of the pannel, and others, in whose name it was alledged the said supplication was drawn up; which I may justly term presumption; For whatsoever distinction they have in their quality from others, it is from the bounty and favour of their supreme prince and sovereign, who is the fountain and source of all honour and dignity. And good reason that they bray (enjoy) all their privileges, in all causes with all persons, except where they come in competition with their supreme sovereign: and there, as Godolphred writes, 'ad legem Julianam majestatis, ubi majestas palato, defenditur nulla digni-

'as; nullum culmen, nulla fortuna est immunitis.' And in this case, where reproaches, scandals, and aspersions are laid upon our gracious sovereign, the excuse of nobility, that it may be presumed that they did it not malò animò, is rather an accusation than an excuse; because no subject is so bound to know the true respects of humility, and reverence, and obedience due to the sovereign prince, as those to whom his majesty hath communicated a shadow of his glorious honour. And as to the instance adduced out of Menochius, we have nothing to do with it; for it is likely, he that answered so, had not such a law as we have. And as to the instance adduced out of Lex Jure, 'si quis imperatori maledixerit,' that by that law there is no place left to the accused to purge himself of his evil intention, that is true in the case of the law, but has nothing to do with us, 'ubi non est lubricum lingue quod facile ad posuam non est trahendum;' but a malicious and seditious writing, compiled of purpose to the reproach of their gracious sovereign. And in writings of this kind, as Harodius expresses in his 18th title, fol. 208, there are no worse reproaches and conatus (says he) than those which are done by writing, than those which are done upon manifest deliberation; because the same proceeds upon an evil and seditious purpose, and pierces deeply, and abides longer than the injury by words. And for all the rest of the instances and authorities of the civil law, I oppose the two acts of parliament, which are the only grounds of this libel; in so far as it concerns the authors of the infamous libel, the not apprehending the authors thereof, the concealing and not revealing of the same. And as to the mention made in the entry of the Dittay of the common and civil law, the same is wholly in respect of the divulging and dispersing of the said infamous libel, whereof our said acts of parliament make no express mention. And where we have our own laws, and acts of parliament, as we have in this case, these must be the only rule of judging. And the exception and duple, albeit they have many quotations of the common law, yet all needless and impertinent; since they are not adduced to purge that part of the Dittay which is founded upon the common law. But in the points disputed, we have good warrant to adhere to our own acts of parliament, (except in so far as we are forced by the objections made by the pannel's procurators to clear the doubtful and ambiguous terms of their exception and duple) because by act of parliament, made by king James 1, par. 3. cap. 48, and by king James 4, par. 6. cap. 79, it is statute and ordained, That all the leidges be governed by the king's laws, and no others. And his majesty's Advocat offers, whenever it shall please any Lord Justice General to command him to clear any speech that is founded upon the common law, that he shall do the same by word.

It is quadruplyed, (pleaded the fourth time) by Mr. Alexander, Besson, for the Pannel

That where my Lord Advocat triplyes a part of his lordships reply to have received no answer by the duplies made for the pannel; to wit, that part thereof, which bears, that the writing quarrelled, although in form and title a supplication, yet does contain reproachful speeches, &c. it is answered, That the alleged infamous libel, in so far as it concerns the pannel, cannot be esteemed but as a supplication, in respect of the duple and the reasons contained therein, which I need not repeat here.

Where it is triplyed by my Lord Advocat, That our Duple is impertinent; it is quadruplyed, That if there be any impertinency, his lordship is to be blamed therewith, for having occasioned it by an unnecessary reply. And for the points urged by us for the pannel, to clear his intention, and to vindicate him from the presumption of injury, in compiling or being accessory to the piece quarrelled, not extraneous, both because the acts of parliament require intention, by the intentional words 'to the reproach, steering of sedition, &c.' And albeit they should contain nothing thereof, a sinister intention being required in the essence of the crime, it must necessarily have been libelled conform to the passages already cited in our duple.

Whereas my Lord Advocat triplyed, That the character of nobility accused non excusat in this case; it is quadruplyed, That that is only where the crime is constant, (i. e. evident.) And that eminent quality ever wants the presumption, than any invested therein should injure their sacred prince; whereof they are not only a shadow, but noble and mystical members, as is cited already.

Where it is triplyed by my Lord Advocat, that the case adduced out of Menochius, is not pertinently adduced here, because there was no law; it is quadruplyed, That the question resulted upon the common law, which contains due punishment upon the authors of infamous libels, and chiefly against princes. And the case was not so pregnant in favour of the party whom he absolves, because he was the author, and had exposed to the view of all the world the piece thus challenged. And we adhere to the author's opinion; and instances, how it has never been found to be an undoubted point in jurists and advocates, to vindicate pieces quarrelled to be injurious.

And where it is triplyed by my Lord Advocat, that the instance Lex Jure quadrata not; it is quadruplyed, That the instance of the present case is more pregnant, because the case of the law adduced, 'improbat potantiam medicis,' are challenged: And in the present case the piece challenged; is not expressly injurious; and all that can be inferred upon the pannel, is an indirect and impudent accusation thereof.

And where it is triplyed by my Lord Advocat, that the allegations of the duple are impertinent, because not alleged for the points of the common law not expressed in the acts of parliament; it is quadruplyed, That there are alleged in our duplies for all, and refers ourself to our duplies.

To the whilk it is quintuplyed (answered the fifth time) by my Lord Advocat, That the words of the act of parliament has no respect to the intention of the person, but only express the effect of the reproaches which tend to move dislike betwixt his majesty and his good subjects. And it is granted in the quadruply by Mr. John Nisbet, That they are materially re-proachful, and not formally.

It is sextuplyed by Mr. John Nisbet for the Pannel, that the words 'to the reproach,' imply dole and intention; because the crime prohibited by the act of parliament consists essentially thereof, and is cleared by all the allegations adduced, and more expressly by other acts of parliament of that nature, as the 90th act of queen Mary, 6 Parl. whereof the words are, 'Tending to scir the hearts of the subjects to hatred,' which are emphatically words of intention. And whereas my Lord Advocat would inforce an acknowledgment of material injury in our quadruply, we disclaim it, and maintain that it cannot be evinced therewith; and albeit it were, there rests a relevant defence in law upon the innocency and candour of intention.

Thurdly, It is alledged by Roger Mowat for the pannel, for a third principal Defence to that part of the subsumption of the Dittay, qualifications, and oondescendings thereof, bearing that the pannel himself was and is author, deviser, consuler, adviser of the infamous Libel, and airt and part of the penning, writing, and updrawing thereof; at least is guilty of the hearing, and of the concealing, and not revealing the author thereof; and most guilty of the not apprehending of Mr.
William Haig, whom the pannel affirmed to be the author of the said libel, it being in his power to have apprehended him; and also is guilty of the divulging and dispersing thereof, in so far as the said pannel knew of the penning of the said libel, gave his opinion to the making thereof, and in token thereof interlined a part of the same in divers parts with his own hand, which by ocular inspection is to be seen, and which the pannel has also confessed by his deposition under his hand, as the said Dittay in that part bears, &c.

That the Pannel ought and should be simpli- citer assoilzed (absolved) therefrom; And 1st,
That the said Pannel cannot be criminally pursued as author and deviser of the said Libel; because by the pannel's own deposition, taken by the lords of the committee on the 9th of June 1634, the pannel has deponed, that the said Mr. William Haig was the author of the said libel. Likens the said Mr. William his misive letter, all written and subscribed with his own hand, dated at Campbire the 27th day of the said month of June, which letter was directed to the pannel, and exhibited by him before the said committee; bears the said
Mr. William his grant that he was the penner of the said supplication or libel; and takes the crime upon him in soliciting his friends by his other letters and missives, likewise produced to the said lords of committee, to deal for purchasing and obtaining to him a remission for the said alledged crime. And so the said

Mr. William having not only confessed himself to be the author, but having dealt with and solicited his said friends for a remission, as said is, the said dittay can never be sustained against the pannel as author and deviser thereof; which misive letters are in the pur-suer's own hand. Item, the said pannel ought likewise to be absolved from that part of the said dittay, bearing to be consuler, adviser, and airt and part of the penning, writing, and drawing up of the said quarrelled libel; because the said two acts of parliament, whereupon the said dittay is founded, make no mention of consulters or advisers. And acts of parliament, specially in this kind, are strictly to be taken, and suffer no extension beside that which is expressly set down therein. 2dly, Giving, (granting) the said acts might be extended to consulters and advisers, (as they cannot) yet absolutur ought likewise to be granted from the alledged consulting and advising by the pannel, and his being airt and part of the penning, writing, and drawing up of the said supplication now quarrelled; because the said pannel being examined by the said committee upon the said 9th of June last, and being then interrogat who was author and penner of the said libel, not only has deponed, ut supra, that it was the said Mr. William Haig, who gave the said libel to him, and who (as he thought) was the author thereof: but being thereafter interrogat upon another interrogat the same day, if the said Mr. William had any command to draw up the said quarrelled supplication or libel, or if the pannel or any of his knowledge, was at the forming thereof, the pannel has also deponed upon his said great oath to the said interrogators, that the said
Mr. William Haig had no warrant from him, nor knew he of any warrant given to the said
Mr. William, or that any was present at the forming thereof. Which clearly evinces and manifests that the pannel was neither author, deviser, consuler, adviser, nor airt and part of the penning and writing of the said libel;
seeing the said pannel being brought before the said committee, and urged by them to give his oath upon the said points, he has given the same, he has deponed, ut supra, denying all the said several points. After the giving of the which oath of verity, and subscribing the same, as the same produced by my Lord Advocat bears, no dittay or pursuit, criminal or civil, can now or hereafter be sustained against the pannel upon these points, whereupon already he has given his said oath; because no other manner of probation can be received against him, to prove contrair to his said oath, given before the said committee in manner aforesaid. And where it is libelled in the said dittay, and qualifications thereof, that the pannel is author, consuler, adviser, airt and part of the penning and writing, at the least guilty of the hearing, concealing, &c. not revealing, not apprehending, &c. in so far as the pannel knew of the penning thereof by the said Mr. Wm. Haig, advised and gave his opinion anent the making of the said libel, and in token thereof interlined it in divers parts with his own hand, &c.

It is alledged, That the pannel ought to be simpliciter absolved from the said qualification libelled in these words, in so far as the pannel knew of the penning of it, advised and gave his opinion anent the making of the same; because that is likewise directly contrair to the pannel's deposition foresaid, proceeding upon the said interrogator, moved by the said committee wherewith he was interrogat, if Mr. William Haig had any warrant or command from him to draw up the said libel, and if the pannel, or any of his knowledge, was at the forming thereof. Whereunto the pannel has made answer, and upon his said great oath deponed, That Mr. W. Haig had no warrant from him, nor knew he of any given to him, or that any was present at the forming thereof. And so the pannel by his deposition, upon his said oath, having deponed, that Mr. Wm. Haig had no warrant from him, nor knew he of any warrant given to him, or that any was present at the forming thereof; the said crininal pursuit can never be sustained to infer thereby that the pannel is author, consulter, deviser, adviser, art and part of the penning, writing and drawing up; because that is altogether denied by the said pannel, as his said deposition clearly bears. And being denied upon his great oath, as said is, that part cannot be sustained upon the said qualification and inference libelled; it being impossible, per rerum naturam, that the said dittay in these points can any way be proven by any other probation whatsoever, after giving his said oath.

Court adjourned till to-morrow the 10th instant.

Intrant the said 10th day.

The pannel and procurators (as before) compared the said day.

Quarto, It was alledged by Mr. Roger Mowat for the Pannel, As for his fourth principal Defence against that part of the Dittay, bearing, that the pannel knew of the said alledged infamous libel, advised and gave his opinion to the making of the same, and in token thereof interlined a part thereof in divers parts with his own hand, as may be seen by ocular inspection, and as his Confession in the deposition bears; that absolutur should be granted from that part, bearing that the pannel knew of the penning thereof, because that is directly contrair to the pannel's deposition, before repeated, which does contain an express denial of his knowledge of the forming of the said libel, or that any was present at the forming thereof. And to that part of the qualification libelled, bearing, that in token that the pannel knew of the penning thereof, he interlined a part with his own hand; it is alledged, nullo modo relevat, unless it had been relevantly libelled in the dittay, that the pannel interlined the said lines the time of the forming of the said libel, or shortly thereafter, which is not said: for mending and interlining to be a token against the mender or interliner of a writing, that he knew of the penning thereof, and gave opinion to the making of the same, must necessarily be libelled to have been at or immediately after the writing of the same. Which cannot be urged upon the pannel in this particular, because by his deposition, given upon the 16th of June 1634, upon an interrogator wherewith he was interrogat, whether he had interlined some lines in the said quarrelled supplication, which was exhibited by him before the lords of the committee, and whether he did the same before he shewed it to Mr. John Dunmure, or to the earl of Rothes, has deponed, that the said Mr. John Dunmure never saw the said interlined libel, but only the copy, which was cast in the fire after the redelivery thereof; and deponed, that the said interlined copy lying then before the said lords, and now in my Lord Advocat his pursuer's hands, was that copy which was delivered by the pannel to the earl of Rothes, but was not interlined until long after the earl of Rothes redelivered the same; and deponed, that never one saw it since the said interlining. And so it being that copy which should have been presented to his majesty, and which was offered to be presented, it is not likely nor probable, and with reason cannot be affirmed to have been interlined before the time of the said offer of presenting. And so the said interlined libel cannot be counted a token (as the dittay bears) of the pannel's knowledge of the penning of the said libel; and of his advising and giving his opinion to the making thereof. Likeas, in rei veritate, the said interlining was after the said Mr. John Dunmure was first questioned in March last, by the space of nine mouths, or thereby, after that the said supplication was offered to have been presented to his majesty. And so a private interlining of the said copy by the pannel, by adding or mending some few words, which neither in matter nor form can be quarrelled, being so long after the intended offer thereof made to his highness, cannot be a token against the pannel, as is libelled, to make him to have been upon the knowledge of the penning, and to have given his advice and opinion to the making thereof; Hoc attento, That the said interlined copy was never seen by any, but by himself, after the said interlining, which simply he produced the same to the said committee, which in law he could never have been compelled to do, if he had expected that any such advantage had been taken thereupon to his heavy prejudice. For the pannel did never fear nor suspect that the said committee would have desired or induced him to have exhibit and produced before them a paper, the production whereof might have imported no less to him than the probation of the alleged crime, committed in the dittay, to make him thereby guilty and punishable by death. And it is notour that the pannel did, at the aids lords desire, produce the same to them, upon their promise that it should not ensnare the pannel, seeing in law he was neither obliged to produce any writing, nor to declare, nor to give his oath upon any interrogators demanded of him; neither would he have done it, if he had known (as now in experience he finds) that it might and would have brought upon him the said alleged crime and punishment of death.

It is added by Mr. Alexander Pearson for the Pannel, in fortification of the said fourth exception propounded for the Pannel: First, for that part thereof, hearing, That the pannel the 9th of June last deponed, upon his great oath, that Mr. William Haig had no warrant of him for drawing up of the said supplication, and that he knew nothing of the forming thereof; that the pursuer cannot be heard now upon that part of the Dittay, to pursue the pannel, because of the pannel's oath and declaration foresaid, which cannot in law and reason be called again in question; 'Propter jurisjurandi religionem, quod speciem transactionis continet majoremque habet auctoritatem quam res judicata, et dato juramento, non aliud queritur quam juratum sit.' Leg. 1, 2, et 5. § 2. F. de Jurejurando. Where it is alleged by the Dittay, That by the letters sent by Mr. Haig to the pannel, it is affirmed by Mr. Haig that he had the allowance of the pannel to the making and penning thereof, non relevat, because Mr. Haig being author and penner of the alleged infamous libel, by his own grant in his missive letter, dated 27 June, and also acknowledged so by the Dittay, Mr. William Haig's declaration foresaid (no ways granting the same), can no ways be respected, or have force against the pannel, 'Quia de jure socius aut particeps criminis adversus socium fidem non facit,' Leg. Quoniam, Cod. de Testibus. Leg. Si Filium, Cod. de Liberati Causa.

It is alleged by Mr. John Nisbet, that the Dittay is not relevant, in so far as it qualifies the pannel to be author of the piece challenged by the interlining thereof; because the interlining in one point only, convinceth that he hath not been author of the rest. Secundo, The interlining has no contingency with the point challenged, but is a smoothing of some apparent shrewdness in conception. And in a word, the Dittay is no ways relevant in so far as it qualifies any accession by the pannel's depositions; because it is affirmed by the pannel, that he was induced to depone, upon assurance that he should not be ensnared. And of the law, 'Confessio emanata sub spe impunitatis non importat condemnationem.' Clarus, § final. Quæst. 55. num. 8. et 9. 'Ubi assertio opinionem Imole id asserentis esse æquorem;' Pharm. Quæst. 81. num. 280. 'Confessio emanata sub promissione impunitatis non sufficit ad condemnationem, nec in foro conscientie nec con-tentioso; et contententem non afficit.' Eadem Quæstione, num. 42. Hiplitus in § postquam num. 15.

It is answered by my Lord Advocat, That the exceptions proponed against that part of the Dittay, bearing the pannel to be author, adviser, consulter, deviser, and airt and part of the penning, writing, and drawing up of the infamous libel, ought to be repelled in the hail members thereof.

And first, where it is alleged, that my lord is not author, because that he has deponed that Haig is author, and Haig by his letter has granted himself to be author; because that is not a defence, but a denial: for both Haig and the pannel might be authors and contrivers of an infamous libel. And therefore the Dittay in this point is relevant, and consequently must be put to the knowledge of ane assize, (jury) before whom the probation and verification of the Dittay is to be used; and before whom it is easy to shew and clear, that neither the pannel's deposition can liberat him, nor yet Haig's letter, who in the defence is granted by the procurators to be socius criminis. And giving (granting) the justice would take the dispute of this to himself, which is proper to the assize; yet if any moment stood in Haig's letter, it must be taken complex; for by the same letter he affirms, that the pannel was adviser of the said seditious libel.

And where it is alleged, that Deviser, Consulter, and Adviser, are not contained in the acts of parliament whereupon the Dittay is founded, ought to be repelled in respect of the act of parliament of king James 6, his majesty's gracious father of eternal memory, part. 12. c. 151. wherein it is declared, That all criminal libels shall contain the parties complained upon to be airt and part of the crimes libelled: which is in this case per expressum libelled; and the words of adviser, consulter, deviser, sunt synonyma et implexa.

And where it is alleged, that the pannel in his deposition has denied that he was either author or adviser, that is a denial ut supra, and not a defence against the relevancy. And where it is alleged, that the pannel having deponed by oath, that no other probation can be used contra jusjurandum; it is answered, That it is against all law, reason, and custom, to oppose jusjurandum in criminalibus. For then after examination by the judge, which is ever taken upon oath, no criminal should pass the knowledge of ane assize; and it were a proclamation of universal impunity, if oath should determine the trial.

But that which is alleged by the pannel and his procurators super jusjurando, has on'y place 'in civilibus et in jurejurando delato per actorem,' which cannot have any respect in this case. And it is notourly known, that Anchindrine and Garrarie not only deny'd upon oath, but abode by the denial in the torture and question; and yet notwithstanding their oath, and denial by oath, were put to the knowledge of ane assize, and convicted. And where it is alleged, against the specification in the libel of this first point of author, that knowledge, advising, and interlining, are not relevant; I declare that I adhere in the first place to the general subsumption of the Dittay upon the act of parliament, whereby it is subsumed that the pannel is author, adviser, consuler, deviser, and airt and part of the seditious libel: and protest, that notwithstanding of whatsoever defence is or shall be propounded against the qualifications, (albeit the same might be found relevant, which cannot be in reason and justice) That the said general shall pass to the knowledge of an assize, as relevant per se. Under which protestation, I proceed to make answer to the defences against the qualifications.

And first, where it is alleged that this clause, bearing the pannel knew of the penning of the said scandalous libel by Haig, and advised and gave his opinion ament the making thereof; that the samen is contrair to the pannel's depositions, given by him upon oath, (as said is;) I answer, That this impugns not the relevancy of the Dittay concerning the qualification, and therefore must pass to the knowledge of an assize. And as to the pannel's depositions, whether they be conform or disconform to the libel, non est hujus loci; because neither is the Dittay founded upon them, nor are they used by me as pursuer, neither as a part of the libel or proof of the libel.

And where it is alleged, that that part of the qualification ament the pannel's interlining is not relevant, except it be condescended quo tempore interlined, if 'in ipso actu vel statim post actum;' it is answered, That this part of the qualification is used jointly with the rest. And there is no necessity of condescending, because quocunque tempore interlined, it is a sufficient evidence of the concurrence, consent, and advising to Haig, maker thereof; especially in respect it was drawn up by him, viz. Haig, in name of the pannel, and others having interest in that writing, which is truly an infamous libel, and termed in a sinistrous notion by name of a supplication: Likeas the pannel his procurators has in their second defence maintained this action of law, That 'principium et finis tanquam duo extrema includunt medium.' And therefore the pannel's knowledge, as the first imitation of that infamous libel, and his receiving the same from Haig immediately after the penning thereof, and receiving to be presented to be his majesty to their use who were alleged supplicants, and the interlining thereof ex post facto, (albeit not interlined before the delivery thereof to the pannel) is relevant in law with the rest of the members of the qualification per se, by and airtour (over and above) the general, to sustain this Dittay, to make the pannel author, adviser, deviser, consuler, and airt and part of the penning and drawing up of the said infamous libel: specially seeing it will be constant (i. e. evident) by the depositions, when the same shall be used before the assize, that the same was not interlined longo intervallo after delivery thereof by Haig to the pannel, but very shortly after in tempore quasi continuo. And where it is alleged, That this interlining was not till after nine months after the receipt thereof from Haig, that is not, or cannot be verified, nor has no warrant in the depositions. And where it is alleged, That this interlined libel cannot be used against the pannel, because it was never delivered to Dummire, nor never shewn to any, till the pannel produced it before the committee, and it was produced under promises that it should not be used to the pannel's prejudice; and that the pannel was not obliged to answer, neither to have produced the same before the committee: it is certain the committee urged nothing from the pannel but by good warrant and to which the pannel was obliged to answer upon his allegiance; and the denial to give an answer to his majesty's commissioners, who had warrant under his sacred hand and seal, which was exhibited to the pannel, would have inferred against the pannel a more dangerous crime than that he is now accused upon, by declining of his majesty's judgment, and of his majesty's commissioners. And for the committee, they urged nothing from the pannel but a plain, true, sincere, and speedy declaration of his knowledge of the author and contriver of the said scandalous libel, which, as it was incumbent for the committee in obedience to his majesty's warrant to them, so it could breed no snare nor prejudice farther, nor he did burden himself by his own confession; in respect whereof, the exceptions ought to be repelled.

It is dupleed by Mr. Roger Mowat to my Lord Advocat his Reply, made to the defences proponed against that part of the dittay whereby it is alleged, That the pannel cannot be convened as author, consuler, adviser, &c. but that the said Defence ought to be repelled, and the hail members thereof. And first, That the said first part of the defence is not a defence, but a denial of that part of the dittay; and that the denial must be referred to an assize, and disputed there, and not here; and that the same is not relevant, because albeit the pannel has alleged another author, yet they might be both authors of the said libel. It is answered, That the said alleadgance stands relevant, notwithstanding the reply, because the said defence in that part is not simply a denial, but is a denial very pregnant, instantly verifying that the pannel cannot be said to be the author, and so criminally to be pursued; because by his deposition before the said committee, he has not only denied upon oath that he is the said author, but has likewise instantly verified the same, condescended upon the true author; and not only has simply condescended upon the said author, but has likewise instantly verified the same: which verification being proponed with the said defence, is both relevant and competent now only to be decided before my Lord Justice, and not before the Assize, seeing it is a peremptory exception instantly verified. And whereas the said Reply bears, That the said Author Mr. William Haig's letter, bearing that the pannel was adviser, is to be taken complex, there is no such speeches nor words mentioned or contained in the said letter, which must now be produced, because it has been seen by the pannel, that it may say for itself. And whereas my Lord Advocat alledges, That the assize is only judges to the probation, and that he prove before them that the pannel was author, adviser, &c. of the said alledged infamous libel; that ought to be repelled in respect of the alleadgeance propounded for the pannel, founded upon his depositions and Haig's letter: which depositions and letter being already produced, and delivered to the pannel, and used, and liberty granted to propound his defences thereupon, the defence is so proponed, that it may be either found relevant or repelled. And it cannot but be found relevant, because a pannel being pursued for a crime, as author thereof, this is a most usual and relevant defence, that he cannot be convened as author. But he must be absolved from that point, because he offers him instantly to prove another author: upon whom he likewise instantly condescends; and not only condescends, but instantly verifies and proves. And so the exception being relevantly propounded, and instantly verified, as said is, it must be here found relevant, and likewise proven, and cannot be referred to the inquest. And where it is replied by my Lord Advocat, That that part of the defence founded upon the pannel's depositions, bearing that he has confessed another author, and giving his oath thereupon cannot be respected, being but his own depositions and declarations, and cannot work in his own favours; it is duplyed, That that part of the said Answer and Reply ought to be repelled, in respect of the said defence founded thereupon; especially seeing the said depositions were given before the said committee, who were appointed by his majesty for trial of the said author. And the said depositions being a part of the said trial, the pursuer cannot be heard to quarrel them, especially seeing they are used by the pursuer against the pannel, and are now as his evidence. And if the pursuer use them against the pannel, it is lawful for the pannel to make his use thereof, so far as makes for him, in respect whereof the alleadgeance stands relevant in that part founded upon the said depositions. Which, together with the said misive letter written by Mr. Haig, and which the pannel propounds conjunctim, to prove his alleadgeance, verifies clearly that part thereof: and so being both relevant and proven, is sufficient to elide (quash) that part of the dittay, That the pannel should not be found convenable as author. And whereas my Lord Advocat in his reply answers, That the said first defence, or first part thereof, is not relevant, bearing that it is alledged for the pannel, That he cannot be convened as author, seeing there is another author condescended upon, and proven; because it is replied that they might both be authors of the said alledged libel: it is duplyed, That that part of the said Reply ought to be repelled, in respect of the dittay itself, wherein it is not libelled that they are both authors, but only that the pannel is author; and when it shall be so libelled, it shall have an answer. And where it is replied by my Lord Advocat, That that part of the defence, bearing that consultants and advisers are not contained in the acts of parliament, upon which the dittay is founded, ought to be repelled in respect of the 151st act of the 12th part. of king James 1. of happy memory, wherein it is declared, that all criminal libels contains airt and part. To that it is duplyed, That the defence stands relevant notwithstanding of the said answer; and that the pannel can no ways be drawn within the compass of the said two acts, except upon that which is especially contained therein; and consultants and advisers are not contained therein. And as to that contained in the other act of parliament, cited aenent airt and part, it is answered, That they are different: and if they be alike, airt and part should only be mentioned in the dittay, and not in the other with consulting and advising, which are clearly several points, and must be severally elided; in respect whereof, that part of the said alleadgeance stands relevant. And where it is replied, That the pannel's depositions, alledged in the exception, to verify that he was not consultant, adviser, &c. because that the said depositions bears that he knew not of the penning, and gave no advice thereto, that that part of the said alleadgeance is likewise denied ut supra, and not a defence. It is replied, That as my Lord Advocat repeats his reply against the denial, so for the pannel the said defence and duply, made in fortification thereof, are here repeated; especially that part of the duply founded upon the said depositions, bearing that the said depositions are used by my Lord Advocat against the pannel, and therefore must work in his favour also. Where it is replied to that part of the alleadgeance, bearing that the pannel cannot be convened as author and deviser, because he has given advice, and in token thereof has mended and reformed a part of the said libel; that that cannot be respected, because of the reason contained in the said exception, bearing that it is contrary to the depositions, and that it impugns not the relevancy. It is answered and duplyed to the said Reply, That the same ought to be repelled, in respect of that part of the alleadgeance which is founded upon the pannel's deposition, and needs not impugn the relevancy, because it is peremptory for that part, and as it is relevant, so it is instantly proven by the said depositions, and elides that member of the Dittay, being peremptorily proponed, and instantly verified and proven by the said depositions. And albeit it be replied by my Lord Advocat, That the said depositions are not used by him neither as part nor proof of the libel, yet it is contrair, because they are mentioned in some part of the libel, and so used. And as for proof, they cannot be yet used as such, till the relevancy be discussed. But albeit my Lord Advocat should not use them, yet the pannel uses the same; and the said depu-sitions may be found a lawful probation to him of any thing that he shall found thereupon.

And where it is alleged by my Lord Advocat in his reply, That that part of the Defence used by the Pannel against the interlining libelled, that the same is not relevant, because not libelled when interlined, as that part of the said alleadgance bears; and it is answered by my Lord Advocat, That that part of his lordship's qualification is used jointly with the rest; and that quocunque tempore interlined is an evidence of the Pannel's concurrence with Haig, in respect it was done by Haig in name of the Pannel and the rest of the supplicants; To that it is duplyed, That that part of the alleadgance proponed for the Pannel stands relevant, notwithstanding of that part of the reply made thereto; and that it is yet contended for the Pannel, that it is no ways relevant to alledge quocunque tempore interlined thereupon, to infer against the Pannel that he was author, deviser, and airt and part of the penning: for common sense evinces, that to be airt and part of the penning or devising of a writing, must be done either the time of the forming of the said writ, or very shortly after, otherwise interlining can never infer author, deviser, or airt and part of the penning. And it is clearly set down in the said alleadgance, that great time interviened betwixt the author's penning and devising of the said libel, and the Pannel's interlining of it; for it is clear and nottour to my Lord Advocat and the lords of the Committee, by clear depositions before them, that the said interlined libel was that same which was intended to have been presented to his majesty by the earl of Rothes, and that it was not interlined during the hail time the said earl had the same, and for a long time after. And so that part of the said Dittay is no ways relevant to infer the said Pannel to be author for the said interlining, because the time of the said interlining is not libelled quando, and that it was at the time of the penning, or immediately after.

And where it is answered, That the said libel was done by Haig in name of the Pannel and the rest, that part of the answer ought to be repelled, as altogether irrelevant, not bearing that it was done at their command; for to do any deed in name of another person, cannot be counted that person's deed in whose name it was done. And where it is replied, that the general is relevant, without that part of the qualification anent the interlining after that the Pannel received it from Haig, especially seeing it will be constant by the depositions, when they will be produced before the assize, that there was no interlining longo intervallo, but shortly: To that it is duplyed, It ought to be repelled in respect of the alleadgance, and the qualifications therein contained, bearing clear and undeniable circumstances of the time of the interlining; and likewise in respect of the said depositions, whereupon that part of the said alleadgance is founded, and which now the pursuer uses by pro-pounding his reply thereupon. And seeing both the pursuer and the Pannel condescends upon the said depositions as a probation of that part, that part of the Dittay cannot be referred to the assize, to be proven before them, anent the time of the said interlining; but as the defence is relevant, as it is proponed, and ought and should be so found, so the depositions may be presently received as the probation thereof, being instantly verified and proven, as said is. And where it is answered, That the nine months, contained in the alleadgance, alleged to have interviened betwixt the penning and interlining, is not verified; it is duplyed, That, first, relevancy must precede probation: Secundo, That the said space and time may be gathered out of the circumstances contained in the said alleadgance and depositions: and lastly, The Pannel's own declaration must be taken thereupon, seeing the pursuer shews nothing in the contrary. And this judicatory admits no dyet to prove any thing that is found relevant, which is not proven instante. And where it is alleged against that part of the Pannel's alleadgance, bearing, that the said interlined copy was never seen before it was produced before the Committee; and that the Pannel had promise not to be snared, and needed not to have produced it, except he had pleased; and that it is replied by my Lord-Advocat, That all that was urged from the Pannel by the Committee was by good warrant, whereunto he was obliged to answer upon his alleadgance; and that the denial to answer before them would have inferred against the Pannel a more dangerous crime, if he had refused; and the Committee only urged a true declaration anent the author: It is duplyed, That the Pannel is not to dispute now anent the warrants of the said Committee, and upon the crime that might have followed if he had denied to answer, and whether he might have declined them or not. But this he duplies in fortification of that part of the alleadgance, That albeit he had neither declined the said Committee (as he did not) nor had opposed in any case their powers or warrants; yet he might have lawfully proponed before them this defence, which to his great and heavy prejudice he did omit, That of law and reason he was not obliged, nor could not been urged to have made any depositions; nor given answers to interrogators anent any demand concerning the said libel quarrelled; because his answers and depositions might have been the ground of a criminal pursuit against him (as now it is.) And so with reason he might have been silent, and the saids lords of Committee could have taken no exception against him for his said silence. And therefore that part of the said Pannel's alleadgance stands relevant, notwithstanding of the answer bearing that he could not have been compelled to have made any deposition either upon his oath or declaration, if he had remembered, and had alleged the danger that was to follow and ensue thereupon. In respect whereof, the said replies, and every one of them, ought to be repelled, in respect of the said allendgances and duplies made in fortification thereof.

It is farther duplyed for the Pannel by Mr. Alexander Pearson, That where it is replied by my Lord Advocat to that part of the last defence, bearing that Mr. William Haig, the author and penner of the alledged libel, by his own grant in his missive letter, and also acknowledged by the Dittay, that his declaration that the pannel gave his allowance to the penning and forming of the said alledged libel, cannot be respected, nor have any faith, 'quia particeps criminis adversus socium, fidem non facit,' whereupon my Lord Advocat infers a grant against the pannel, of his giving allowance to Mr. Haig in the forming of the alledged libel: To which it is answered, That the inference and the consequence is not good, and has no force; because the foresaid defence does no ways inforce a grant of allowance by the pannel to the forming of the alledged libel, but does only import that Mr. William Haig, the author and penner thereof, that his declaration (not granting any) bearing the pannel to have given allowance to him in forming the alledged libel, cannot be respected, nor have any faith at all against the pannel, himself being clearly the author and penner thereof; 'quia particeps aut socius criminis adversus alium, fidem non facit.'

It is also farther duplyed for the pannel by the said Mr. Alexander Pearson, That where it is replied by my Lord Advocat, that it is against law and reason to oppone jusjurandum in criminalibus, and that the opposition of an oath given has only place in civilibus; it is answered, that the contrair is true in law, to wit, That causes criminal are sometimes even decided by oath of party by clear law. First Leg. 25, § 5, F. de Jurejurando: Verba Legis, 'Si quis juraverit se non capuisse, non debet adjuvari hoc jurejurando in actione furti, quia aliud est factum fecisse, quod vel clam fieri potest.' Et Leg. 6, § 5, F. de his qui notantur infamia: verba legis, 'Sed et si jurejurando delato juraverit quis non deliquisse, non erit notatus; nam quodammodo innocentiam suam jurejurando approbant, quibus luce clarius est.' Et in causis criminalibus juramentum deferri, ergo etiam causis criminales per juramentum delatum decidi.' And it is alike, utrum jusjurandum a iudice an a parte delatum sit, utrumque enim decisorium est litis: expressa Leg. 1. F. de jurejurando: verba, maximum remedium expediendarum litium in usum venit iurjurandi religio, quia vel ex pactatione ipsorum litigantium, vel ex auctoritate iudicis deciduntur controversiæ: et ratio quia iudex non defert, juramentum nisi in supplementum, et ubi res aliter probari non potest.' And therefore that part of the defence foresaid stand good and relevant, notwithstanding of the reply.

It is likewise duplyed by Mr. John Nisbet for the Pannel: Where it is replied by my Lord Advocat, that the opposing of the pannel's depositions, wherein he disavows that he is author, deviser, conscious or necessary to the framing of the alledged libel; is not a defence, but a denial; it is duplyed, That sundry points of the dittay being qualified, by the pannel's deposition, there results to him a relevant defence in law, upon the indivisibility and complex taking of his depositions, 'quia confessio non potest pro parte acceptari, et pro parte sperni.' Bartol. in Leg. Aurelius, § Idem quasiit, num. 2. F. de Liberatione Legata. Pharma. Quæst. 81. num. 168. et aliis numer. 'Quando est præsumptio quod qualificato confidente occiderit ad sui defensionem, ut parte si occidens sit vir probus, nullamque occidendi: offendendi causam habebat, et quia occusus erat homo rixosus; talis qualificata confessio non potest dividi, nec pæna extraordinaria imponi, et sic confitens omnino absolvendus est.'

Whereas it is replied by my Lord Advocat, that the relevancy of the qualification, and disconformity of the pannel's depositions, is not proper to be debated here, but must be remitted to the assize; it is duplyed, That all dispute and debate of law must be decided by the judge, and is not pertinent to be agitated before the assize, who are only judges facti et quasitores to make inquiry into the verity of the deed.

Whereas it is replied by my Lord Advocat, that interlining 'vel in actu ipso, vel post actum quocumque tempore,' of a piece drawn up for the use of the pannel and others interested, evidences the pannel's accessory concurrence in the forming and devising the piece: it is duplyed, That it is most unreasonable, because it should follow, that interlining of any piece or book should import concurrence in the first framing of it, which is contrair to reason.

Whereas it is replied by my Lord Advocat, That 'principium et finis tanquam duo extrema medium includunt;' as is acknowledged by us in the use of that maxim; and consequently that the first intimation of the pannel's knowledge, and the immediate receiving of the piece challenged, and interlining ex post facto, are relevant to make the pannel author, or airt and part: it is duplyed, That that maxim is used by us in the interpretation of sundry passages of a piece done unico contextu, which therefore must be presumed to be done uno animo et uno stylo, by the analogy of the two extremes interpreting the midst; and can never be used to make disparat acts, to join preposterously, to prove accession in forming and devising, seeing the first intimation alledged by my Lord Advocat is of knowledge, which presupposeth a thing to be done.

Where it is replied by my Lord Advocat, that the Libel produced before the lords of the committee with the pannel's depositions, notwithstanding promise and assurance that they should not be used, may be used by my Lord Advocat, and that the procedure of the lords of committee is most warrantable, that the pannel was obliged to answer by his allendgance: it is duplyed, That the warrantable procedure of the committee is not contested, nor cannot be; and that the pannel, albeit he could not decline his majesty's commissioners, might very well in reason and law have refused to depone his own dittay. And we adhere to the former citations, averring that the assurance given by judges should secure pannels against any use that could have been made of their depositions.

It is added to the duplies by Mr. Robert Macgill, That where my Lord Advocat has replied, that the oath of a party to be indicted may be urged in criminals, 'quod hoc vix sit 'auditum in jure,' Clarus § ult. Quæst. 63, et Quæst. 45, num. 9. And if it hath been practised in some parts, as likewise in this country in the Examination of these who are to be indicted, 'Consuetudo illa est vetustas erroris 'quæ non adeo suo momento valituræ aut ut 'legem vincat aut rationem.' Apud Gregorium, et Codice Justiniano, quæ sit longa Consuetudo. The reason of the law is, that the maintaining of our life is so natural, that what will we not say for the defence of it? 'Et supra omnia vitandum est perjurium.' And the reasons of the practicians is nothing, which is lest crimes should be unpunished: for upon probation by writing, witnesses or other confession, quæ non est jurata, or upon presumptions luce meridiana clariores, an alleged criminal may be put to the knowledge of any assyze; or otherwise the question may be used, 'ad elicendam veritatem.' And where celerity of punishment may be objected rather or a man perjure himself, 'vindictæ tarditas supplicii gravitate compensetur.' But accepting the practise to be so, I say, that 'in confessione jurata nullo pœnæ metu propter impunitatem promissam.' The maxim of the law must be here received, quod approbo, non reprobo; especially seeing the pannel was so simple and careless in respect of his innocency, that he remitted the forming of his depositions to the lords of committees themselves, he being then removed the time of the dyting and writing of them, and did subscribe them file implicita.

Where it is replied, that advising and devising may be attributed or qualified by any subsequent deed to the alleged crime: it is answered by that of Sallust, 'Et antequam incipias consulo,' &c. and so it is in mandato. And as to the rathabitation, est fictio juris; and it is to be understood 'in criminibus manifestis, et non ubi queritur de nomine criminis'; as in our case. And remits to the distinction alleged in the hinder part of the first exception.

It is duplied by Mr. Roger Mowat to the two practiques of Auchindrane and Carrarie alleged by my Lord Advocat, That they suit not this case, saying that depositions should not prove in favour of the pannel, because if any depositions were given by these two persons, not granting the same, they were given after their indictment for the crimes of murder; but here the depositions are given before any crime known. Secondly, If any depositions were given, they were the voluntary depositions of the party, not demanded by the judge. Thirdly, it is not replied, that these delinquents propounded any defence upon their depositions, and craved their said depositions to verify the said dispute. Lastly, it was not there alleged and offered to be proven, That there was any other author of the said murder, which was their crime; whereupon if they had descended and offered to prove the same, their depositions would have been further respected. In respect of which clear differences of these delinquents ~~from~~ this case, no respect can be had to the practiques alleged.

The Dyet continued till to-morrow the 11th instant.

Curia legitime affirmata, the said 11th of December, 1634. Parties and Procurators as before.

The king's majesty's Advocat having heard the Duplies made to his lordship's Reply, declares that he finds nothing worthy therein to be answered, except one point of law moved very impertinently anent the division of confession in criminals, and another made in facto anent the challenge made to the committee in an alleged promise made to the pannel at the time of his examination. And for the first, which is disputable in jure, if it had been pertinent to the purpose, his majesty's Advocat declares he would have triplyed thereto in writing, and is ready, upon any Lord Justice's desire, to clear it to his lordship. And as to the other part in facto, it is more pertinent to be cleared before the assyze. And therefore he supersedes his answer, excepted he be enjoined thereto by my Lord Justice General.

Quinto, It is alleged by Mr. Roger Mowat for the pannel against the second alternative of the Dittay, That the pannel ought to be assailed, and cannot be put to the knowledge of an assyze, for alleged hearing, concealing, and not revealing, and not apprehending of the author of the alleged infamous libel, and alleged divulging and dispersing thereof, as the Dittay bears: because giving, and not granting, that the foresaid supplication quarrelled might be found scandalous against Mr. William Haig, the known author thereof; yet quoad this pannel, who is not, nor cannot be found the author, it cannot be so declared, because the addition of the act 1594, militats only against such writings as are manifestly, clearly, and without doubt or difficulty evident and seen, and known to be infamous libels, and at the very first sight may appear such unto every ordinary understanding. But the quarrelled supplication being of a dutiful strain, and such as might be mistaken even by very understanding readers and hearers, the addition of the said act can no ways be extended to the hearers, concealers, not revealers, and not apprehenders. But so it is, that the said quarrelled supplication was delivered by the said author to the pannel as an humble supplication, and given by him to the earl of Rothes as an humble supplication, and returned to him under the same name: likeas the pannel is content to make faith aenent his knowledge and conception thereof, that he received and retained the same eo nomine; and therefore cannot be put to an assaye upon these points, seeing they are points that cannot in reason be found capital by, the common and civil law, but by the said addition, which was made in turbulent times, and never took effect, but in continual desuetude, as has been said before. And it were very hard, upon such an act, never practised heretofore, to make noblemen and others his majesty's good subjects obnoxious to a capital crime. And albeit the said quarrelled supplication might now be found to be infamous, yet the finding it now to be such, ought not, nor cannot be drawn back to infer the pain of death upon those who bona fide did not think it such, as now it is said to be by the said Dittay; they having 'justam et probabillem ignorantiam,' by doing that which truly they did, thereby not to have incurred the hard and rigorous censure of the said act of parliament. Secondly, It is alledged, that absolvitur ought to be granted ut supra to the pannel, because the supplication quarrelled was never declared heretofore infamous: and before it had been declared infamous and scandalous, and by the said declarator the pannel had been certified of the danger, the alledged having and hearing thereof cannot be now sustained as a relevant ground to infer this criminal pursuit and pains of death against him. And with reason it should have been first so declared against him, that he, and others his majesty's loyal and good subjects, being lawfully warranted by the said Declarator, might have thereafter eschewed to have offended in that kind. Thirdly, absolvitur ought to be granted, because the said quarrelled supplication was intended and offered to be presented to his sacred majesty; which intended offer of the said supplication by the earl of Rothes, put the pannel in tuto, that he could never have suspected any crime or punishment for hearing, keeping, &c. to have followed after the said intended offer: and so was thereby in optima fide to hear, keep, and not to reveal any thing thereanent. The making of the which offer to his royal majesty, in the pannel's judgment, did then vindicate him that he thought nor conceived not the said supplication scandalous or seditious; seeing it is presumed that no man of judgment, or ordinary sense and reason, would be so foolish as to offer his own Dittay to his prince.

And that the Pannel's innocency may farther appear, and that his Opinion and Judgment of the said quarrelled supplication, as he offers to declare the same then to have been, may be trusted above all other presumptions that can be adduced in the contrair; it is to be remarked, and gravely and wisely considered by the judges, that the pursuer in effect has no other evidence nor probation of the said particulars libelled in the said dittay against the pannel, but such as proceed from his own depositions made before the said committee: which point is so considerable, that in reason no advantage should arise thereupon against him, seeing he was not obliged thereto, but of his own accord. And as in law a person accused criminally cannot be compelled either to depone or declare at the command of the judge, so the depositions given by this pannel before the said committee, should not be respected, in so far as the same may be made ane ground of the said dittay, which concludes and infers no less against the pannel nor the pain of death. And for the point of concealing and not revealing the said writ, de facto the same was revealed by the pannel to the earl of Rothes, in so far as the same was appointed to be presented to his sacred majesty, and thereby to have been revealed to his highness: likeas accordingly the earl of Rothes did offer to present the same, as said is. In respect whereof, absolvitur from the said concealing and not revealing; absolvitur likewise for not apprehending; because, as is said before, the pannel is ready to declare, that in his judgment and conception he did not think the said quarrelled supplication to be such as it is libelled by the dittay, for the reasons before adduced. And in that respect it was hard for him as a private man to take upon him to apprehend the author of a writing, which before he had not conceived to fall within the compass of the said act of parliament. For albeit in matters of treason all good subjects are obliged in duty under all highest pain to discover and delate authors and practisers thereof; yet in other matters, in writing, and such like, wherein are doubtful and ambiguous expressions, which may suffer divers interpretations and constructions according to the humours, capacities, and conceptions of the readers; there is no such necessity posed by the said acts of parliament libelled, nor by the makers of the same, that a writing coming to a man's hands, whereof he makes not the right sense and meaning as others do make thereupon, that the said writing not rightly understood by him, shall thereupon be a ground of a criminal pursuit to make him lose his life for not taking, or not apprehending, or not revealing the author of the said writ. The preparative seems dangerous and singular; it would therefore be carefully adverted unto, specially at this time, and in this case; when as the putting of the said act in practice, seems to have the first beginning upon this pannel. And the taking and apprehending of leidges has heretofore been dangerous to sundry apprehenders; and is instanced by the earl of Queensbury and the laird of Geichtis practices, for taking of leidges at their own hands.

It is answered to that part of the said Dittay anent Mr. Haig's apprehending of his own danger upon the simple sight of the committee's letter by the pannel, That that cannot make the pannel necessary to his escape, no more nor his own consent anent the penning of the said quarrelled supplication can make the pannel airt and part of the forming and penning thereof; seeing the said pannel's second deposition bears that he was neither upon the counsel nor knowledge of his escape, and knew not of it till three or four days after he was gone. That part of the dittay anent the pannel's receiving of Mr. Haig's letter, is no way relevant to infer the pain and crime libelled against the pannel. First, because this is not a matter of treason, wherein receiving and writing of letters are prohibbit. Secondly, The pannel was not prohibbit by the lords of the committee to receive any letters. Thirdly, The said letters are produced and delivered to the saids lords, which in rigour of law he needed not to have done. Fourthly, Being produced, they prove nothing against the pannel, but are clearly in his favour; because Mr. Haig professes himself therein to be author and penner of the said supplication. And where it follows in the said dittay, that it is affirmed and avowed in some of the said missives, That Mr. Haig had the pannel's approbation and allowance to the making and penning of the said supplication, that is altogether irrelevant, as having no warrant from the said missive letter, which contains no such affirmation as is libelled. And the pannel craves the letter bearing that passage presently to be read, seeing it is in my Lord Advocat's hands; which desire should be granted, because the pannel has seen it, with the rest of his said missives, by warrant from my lord justice and his assessors.

It is added by Mr. Alexander Pearson to the Exception, That the pannel is not guilty of concealing, not revealing and divulging of the alleged infamous libel, because the writing quarrelled being in form of a supplication, and used as a supplication by offer made thereof to his majesty, who then gave no signification of any offence therewith, the pannel is not, nor cannot be counted formally a concealer, not revealer, or divulger of an infamous libel, there being no such knowledge nor opinion anent the writing foresaid of the pannel: 'Quia injuriam potest facere nemo, nisi qui scit se injuriam facere.' Leg. 3, § 3, F. de Injuriis. 'Sed accusatus non habebat hanc scientiam, sed justam causam credendi,' to think of it otherwise as a supplication, for the reasons above rehearsed. And as when any is accused of theft, it is a good defence to say, 'Quod domini voluntate et consensu rem contrahant, saltem putavit dominum consensurum, sive id falso, sive id vero putet;' expressa Leg. 46, § 7, de Furtis, 'maxime dum suberat infra causa ita credendum.' So by the like reason in the matter of meddling with the infamous libel, it must defend the pannel, that he had no knowledge or conscience of ane infamous libel, and that he had just and probable causes to think of it as a supplication, 'sive id falso sive id vero putavit, et generaliter ubi de obligando queritur, propensiores esse debere nos (si habeamus occasionem) ad negandum, ubi deliberando ad liberationem,' ait Arianus, Leg. 47, de Obligationibus et Actionibus: 'ergo in re presentis rapiendus est accessio ad liberationem accusati.' Specially anent the divulging, because this point of dittay anent divulging, is not founded upon any acts of parliament, but only upon the common and civil law, and therefore should be decided by the said law: by which the defence now alledged for the pannel is very relevant. Farther, that part of the dittay, bearing that the pannel by shewing to Mr. Haig of the warrant of his citation, did thereby give him occasion to escape furth of the country, is not relevant; because that which of itself is good, may give occasion to evil: and the pannel's shewing the warrant of his citation, is no more nor if being verbally cited, he had told Mr. Haig of his citation, which is no crime.

It is added by Mr. John Nisbet, that the dittay subsuming concealng of the piece quarrelled, is contrary to itself, bearing the imparting of it to my lord Rathes, of purpose to present to the king's majesty.

It is added, that the not apprehending the author of an infamous libel, is not relevantly qualified, by the not taking of Haig; seeing it is not libelled, that the alledged libel was declared to be of that nature, or conspicuously or nottourly, at least to the pannel's knowledge, an infamous piece; and that it was in the pannel's power to apprehend the author without incurring any hazard of law, for the injurious interpellation or apprehending of any person, whom he was not able to convince to be author: specially seeing the not apprehending of the author of a treasonable piece cannot impart any guilt against the not apprehender, who is not able to convince the author of the crime by lawful probation, and therefore not obliged to apprehend, since he cannot do it without the danger of retaliation, in case he succumb; James 6, par. 2, cap. 49. And in law, 'Qui injuriose interpellat in judicio civili tenetur injuriam,' F. de Injuriis, Lege 19. 'Et si liber pro fugitivo apprehensus sit, apprehendens punitur.' And by the like reason, the apprehender of a party, whom he cannot convince by lawful probation, is punishable; and in the civil law, he is obnoxious in the pains of Lex Julia de Vi publica, and of Lex Cornelia de Injuriis.

Secondly, The apprehending enjoined by act of parliament is only subsidiary, when a party is declared author, and cannot be well apprehended by the judge: and a party that is ready to delate the author of an infamous piece, to the end that he may be apprehended by the judge, he is not obliged to apprehend him summarly.

Thirdly, The not apprehending of the foresaid author is excuseable; because the pannel was enjoined by the lords of the committee not to divulge the business whereupon he was convened, and to keep all things secret until his deposition.

It is farther siked by Mr. Robert Macgill, anent the not apprehending, That the pannel ought to be assoilz'd therefrom, because freedom is so natural and favourable, that even amongst the Romans many of their magistrates had not Prehensionem; and that which the tribunes of the people had, it was also for the people's freedom. Gellius, lib. 13, cap. 12. Wherein it is certain of the law, 'quod nec magistratibus licet aliquid injuriose facere, quin injuriarum teneantur.' Leg. nec Magist. 32, F. de Injuriis. 'Unde etiam captura debet esse ex decreto judicis et judicia quæ resultant ex processu generalis inquisitionis debent esse sufficientia ad capturam, decerniturque captura ex facti qualitate et debet processus esse informatus licet reus qui captus est, non citatus sit.' Clar. § ultima, Quæst. 28, et Questione 20, num. 2. 'Quod in delictis enormibus id ita hodie servatur.' If then it be so, in magistratibus capturam jubentibus, can it be thought that any municipal law can command apprehension, 'nisi in casibus de jure, et ratione competentibus?' And so 'in criminibus decorum enormitate jam satis constat' (where the pannel professes before God) 'et jurisjurandum purgativum de jure recipitur.' Leg. Lex Cornelia 5, § 8, de Injuriis. That he never remembered of such an act, he could never have imagined at that time the piece quarrelled to have been of such a sort, much less to be treasonable; and remits here to the distinction of crimes propounded in the last part of my first exception, where crimes and pains ought to be ruled in reason even in municipal laws; and except in such seditious speeches, which is the first sort of inordinat speeches against a prince, 'Ubi et tractatus adesse debet, ut in conjuratione Catilinæ;' no lawyer did ever think the haver, hearer, and not revealer, not apprehender, to be punishable by death; 'et ut videtur absurdum.' All municipal laws ought to receive their own limitations according to reason: and remits here to the second part of my duply, in fortification of my first exception, grounded upon Gaius, lib. 2, Observations 33, anent the interpretation of municipal laws; and to the limitation expounding the act 134, which forbids any man, of whatsoever quality, to speak in time coming anent the government: which would be absurd, if it received not its own limitation to speak (about it) in council and parliament. And repeats here again the gracious acts of our dread sovereign anent the surveying of the laws.

It is answered by my Lord Advocat to the fourth Exception propounded against that part of the dittay, whereby the pannel is indicted and is punishable by death; and that by the act of parl. 94. for not apprehending of Haig the author of the infamous libel, and for not revealing of the same, ought to be repelled in the hail members thereof. And notwithstanding the same, the dittay in that part is severally and per se relevant, ought to be put to the knowledge of an assize; because it is subsumed in the dittay precisely, according to the words of the act, That the pannel, who knew Haig to be author, did not apprehend, but concealed him and it, and not revealed them; and also gave occasion to Haig of his escape; and since his escape, received divers letters from him, which were concealed till the pannel was interrogat thereupon by the committee. And where it is alledged in the exception, that the dittay is not relevant in this point, not condescending that the infamous libel was declared to be an infamous libel; and in particular that the dittay in that part is contrair to itself, which bears the pannel to be guilty of concealing; and yet bears also that he delivered it to the earl of Rothes, to be presented to his majesty: it is answered, that the dittay is relevant, because it subsumes directly according to the act of parliament, which speaks not of an infamous libel declared to be so, but of an infamous libel of speeches, which are so really in the self. And there is no contrariety in the dittay, because giving to the earl of Rothes is concealing, except it were qualified that the earl of Rothes were such a person to whom the act of parliament ties the hearer to reveal, which he is not, not being of his majesty's secret council. And where it is alledged that the true meaning and sense of the act is only to be understood of reproaches and infamous libels, which are certainly, conspicuously, and nottously so, and not of such speeches and libels which are of a doubtful and ambiguous, or indifferent nature, which at the first view and hearing could not appear to all men to be infamous and scandalous: it is answered, That 'Ubi lex non distinguit, nec nos distinguere debemus.' And seeing the act comprehends reproaches and scandalous libels, which are so really, 'et non opinione,' the judge and assize are obliged to judge and proceed according to the nature of the thing prohibited, as it is so really, and not to leave place to frustrate the execution of the law under the veil of opinion. And of the law, 'ignorantia juris neminem excusat ne quidem in delictis, licet sic ignorantia probabilis præcipue in atrocioribus,' of which nature this is. Neither can the pannel pretend excuse upon the uncertainty, obscurity, or ambiguity of the infamous libel; because this infamous libel, by the first view, reading, and inspection thereof, might and should have appeared to him to have been of that nature. And no nobleman, or whatsoever subject of whatsoever quality, being of the pannel's knowledge, learning, and understanding, can or could justly pretend any doubt or scruple; but that the said infamous libel was, in the first view and reading thereof, of the nature of a scandalous libel, punished by death. And albeit in infamous libels against subjects there might be some shadow of excuse, by reading and looking upon the same, and receiving thereof either for curiosity, or to learn the quickness of a wit evil set in the penning of such infamous libels: but such excuses are damnable in infamous libels which touch with the least aspersion or blame the honour, credit and glorious estimation of our gracious sovereign. Likeas the pannel cannot pretend ignorance, in so far as he granted in his depositions, that after his receiving thereof from Haig, when he did communicate the same with the earl of Rothes, that they found the same of such a strain as ought not to be presented to our gracious sovereign. And where it is alledged that this act of parliament 94, in the points of the addition auent not apprehending and not revealing, are not of crimes punishable to death by the common law; and that the same has been in long desuetude, and out of use; that ought not to be respected, because we are ruled by the laws of the kingdom, by the acts made by James 1, and James 4, before alledged; and there is no prescription in law. And where it seems to be adduced to infer 'probabilem ignorantiam,' it is answered 'Quod omnis ignorantia juris est improbabilis et punibilis.' And where it is alledged the pannel 'habebat ignorantiam facti eamque probabilem quæ excusat in delictis;' in so far as albeit this infamous libel was punishable to death in the person of the author, yet it cannot be punishable to death in the pannel, not being author as he alledges, because it was delivered to him as a supplication, to be presented to his majesty; and that he presented it to the earl of Rothes, who made offer thereof to his majesty; and after returned it to the pannel, which (as the pannel alledges) put him 'in tuto et in bona fide' not to apprehend Haig, not to reveal it to any of his majesty's council as a scandalous and infamous libel, because he did not conceive it to be so; and is content to depone upon his great oath, that he did not know, nor apprehend the same to be an infamous libel: it is answered, that the nature and strain of the infamous libel must be the rule of punishment or impunity, and not the opinion of the pannel; the reproaches, exprobatons, and scandalous aspersions thereby put upon his majesty's sacred person, estate, and government, being so noutour, evident, and conspicuous, that neither the pannel, nor none of his knowledge and judgment, could pretend excuse or ignorance in the reading thereof; 'Et est ignorantia maxime inexcusabilis nescire hoc quod omnes sciunt:' but especially in the pannel, who adverted to it narrowly, and heard it not simply spoken, but had it delivered to him in writing, which he kepted, copied, and advised with, and found the strain thereof of that nature, as was not fit to be presented to his majesty. And where it is alledged, That the pannel cannot be punishable to death for not apprehending of Haig, and not revealing of him and his infamous libel, except it had been declared to have been infamous, and Haig to have been the author thereof) and that the apprehending of Haig in a matter so obscure and doubtful, would have been dangerous to the pannel per Tualowathias or retaliation, ordained by the act of parliament of king James, his majesty's blessed father, of happy memory, parl. 2. cap. 49. It is answered, that act of parliament requires no other declarator but the real nature and quality of the speeches and infamous libel; neither could there have been danger in apprehending, being warranted by the law. And where it is alledged, That all depends upon the pannel's deposition which he made voluntarily for satisfaction of the lords of committee; and that therefore he must have yet place to clear his own depositions; and that for clearing thereof, he is ready to depone by his great oath, that at the receipt of the said infamous libel, he received the same as a supplication, and so kepted it, and retained it: it is answered, that the most substantial part of the dittay is founded upon the nature of the infamous libel, and not upon the pannel's depositions; wherein his denial of knowledge upon oath cannot liberat him from the punishment of death contained in the act of parliament.

And where it is alledged, that albeit the justice should find this libel to be infamous now, yet it cannot be drawn back to the time of his receipt from Haig; it is answered, that it needs no declaration of judge, and consequently is not to be drawn back, but was so from the beginning.

And where it is alledged, That albeit in matters of treason all subjects are obliged to delate, yet not in matters which are doubtful, but certain; it is answered, That this is certain, 'et de jure et de facto:' de jure, because commanded to apprehend under the pain of death; de facto, because of the said infamous libel, which is really and of the own nature so.

And where it is alledged, that 'Credulitas in furis præbet causam probabilem,' for the which the text of the laws are adduced; it is answered, 'Quod illa credulitas probanda est aliter quam per juramentum rei.'

And where it is alledged, that 'proniores esse debemus ad liberandum;' it is answered, That this has no place in atrocioribus, and which are so clear and manifest as this.

And where it is alledged, that the Pannel ought to be assoilzed for not apprehending and not revealing, because he did reveal it to the earl of Rothes, who did make offer of it to his majesty; it is answered, 'Quod nullo modo relevat,' in respect of the act of parliament which ordains the revealing to be to a counselor, which Rothes was not. And the offer to his majesty by the earl of Rothes non relevat, except it be alledged, that the earl of Rothes offered it to his majesty as a scandalous libel, to be punished conform to the act of parliament; which is not nor cannot be alledged. And supposing that this revealing by the earl of Rothes to his majesty might be sustained as lawful for procuring impunity from the act, which is not granted: yet the Pannel is punishable to death upon the other member, for not apprehending of Haig, whom he in his depositions declared to have been the author thereof, and whom he might have apprehended, both at the time of receipt thereof, and also at the time when the Pannel shewed to Haig the warrant of his citation before the Committee, he having him then in his power. And where it is alledged, that he could not apprehend him then, in respect of the command given to the Pannel by the Committee, to acquaint no persons with the causes of his warning: that cannot be adduced for an excuse, but rather makes the Pannel inexcusable, because he transgressed the command of the Committee in showing of the warrant to Haig, and yet did not apprehend him; but, showing of the warrant, gave him occasion to escape. And where it is alledged, that giving of occasion is not relevant, and also that receiving letters from him (not being in a matter treasonable) is not punishable; it is answered, That these circumstances are not essential parts of the Dittay per se, but used as admittes to aggravate the Pannel's crime in not apprehending of Haig, and entertaining with him correspondence after his flight.

And where it is alledged the letters, if they were produced, would prove nothing against the Pannel, but in his favours, non est hujus loci, because now we are only upon the relevancy of the Dittay. But when they shall be used in the proper place before the assize, it will be clear, that the same make rather against than for the Pannel, in respect whereof the said fourth exception, and hail members thereof, ought to be repelled.

It is deplyed by Mr. Roger Mowat, in fortification of the Defence proponed for the Pannel, bearing, that giving and not granting that the foresaid supplication quarrelled might be found scandalous against Haig the author; yet quoad the Pannel cannot be found, because the addition of the act 94 militats only against clear writings, clearly known to be infamous; and at the first this appears not so, being of a doubtful strain, as the exception bears.

Whereunto it is replied, that the hail members of the Dittay, aent hearing, not revealing, not apprehending the author, are severally relevant, in respect of the act of parliament; whereupon it is subsumed, that the Pannel knew Haig to be the author, and did not apprehend him, but concealed and revealed neither him nor the said alledged libel, and sick-like occasioned his escape, and received letters from him since. It is deplyed, that the said fourth alleadgance proponed for the Pannel, stands relevant in the hail members thereof, notwithstanding of the said reply founded upon the said act of parliament; and the Pannel refers himself to the said exception and hail members thereof, to be judicially pondered and considered. And farther alledges, that the said reply is not relevant, bearing that part of the subsumption of the Dittay is founded upon the said act, bearing, that the Pannel knew Haig to be the author, and did not apprehend him: Because albeit the Pannel knew him to be the author, as his deposition bears in these words, that he took him to be the author; yet it followeth, not by good consequence in law or reason, that he took him to be the author of this as a seditious and scandalous libel, as my Lord Advocate in his replies bears hardly upon us, which were to take controversum pro confesso: And so the Pannel still abiding by his former defence, acknowledges, that if he had known the libel to have been infamous, he was tied to the strict observance of the act of parliament made against libels of that nature and kind. But seeing the Pannel was still denied all such knowledge as is enforced upon him by the Dittay and reply, and that it is against reason that any further knowledge of a writing should be enforced upon a party, otherwise than he declares himself, and has declared ab initio; for he has still affirmed, and yet does affirm, that he never conceived that quarrelled writ to have been infamous, or to have carried or rubbed any aspersion upon his sacred sovereignty; which if he had perceived, he would rather have lost his life before he had concealed one jot thereof, as he was bound in duty. And so seeing the gloss and commentar of his knowledge of the said libel, must always be referred to himself, and not by the gloss made in the Dittay, importing no less than the loss of his life; the said reply ought to be repelled, unless it were alledged that the Pannel, by his knowledge and by his understanding, had perceived the said libel to be as the Dittay bears, which he professes he never did. For if this ground hold, that all men reading writings should have a like knowledge thereof; and that any reading a writing should understand all the sense or commentaries that could be made thereupon, or else to incur such pains as might follow; this inconvenience might ensue, that bairns, or mere ignorants, or fools, reading writings of this kind and nature, might incur the self-same dangers; which is a great inconvenience, for certainly they know no better: and by their knowledge they apprehended not the danger, which wiser and more learned men prying more narrowly thereinto, did perceive and find out. For it has pleased God to give every man his own particular knowledge, and not all knowledge to one. And except it were replied, that the Pannel either by word or writing had signified or expressed any other knowledge or conception of the said quarrelled writing, which may verify against him that he acknowledged the same to be scandalous; as the Dittay bears, the said reply should be repelled as irrelevant. And the conception and knowledge of the said writing must necessarily be referred to the Pannel's own declaration, whose life and fortune cannot be taken away upon another man's exposition of a writing, which the Pannel is content to make faith that it never entered in his judgment or sense to know that to have been the meaning; which if he had known, he could not but at the first view have fulfilled and obeyed the law set down in the saids acts, as his disposition, and his carriage, and his bygone actions clearly evince, and needs no further questioning. In respect whereof, the said reply ought to be repelled, as altogether irrelevant, for the reasons before alledged.

And where it is replied by my Lord Advocat, That the giving of the said infamous libel by the pannel to the earl of Rothes, is de facto concealing, except the said earl were such a person to whom the act ties the hearer to reveal; which he is not, because he is not ane counsellor: to that it is duplyed, That the said reply is no ways relevant, because albeit the said act of parliament expresses a number of kinds of persons in place, to whom the crimes prohibited by the said act are to be revealed; yet it excludes not other persons, but that such crimes may be revealed to them as well as to the persons contained in the act: and the revealing thereof to other persons would be counted good service, and not taken for a fault in the revealer. Secondly, The said earl, to whom the said writ was revealed, albeit he be not privy-counsellor, yet by the laws of this country he is born a counsellor, and was so at the making the said act, as all the earls in Scotland were then: and therefore the revealing to the said earl may be estimat to have been done conform to the said act. Thirdly, The said earl is ane sheriff, and by the act of parliament the saids crimes are ordained to be revealed to sheriffs, as one of the persons mentioned in the said act: and therefore the delivery of the said quarrelled writ to the earl of Rothes by the pannel, is clear revealing, and not concealing; at the least is such revealing, that in law and justice should liberat and free the pannel from the crime libelled in the dittay, and from the heavy pain that follows thereupon, being no less than the loss and tinsel of his life.

And where it is replied by my Lord Advocat to that part of the said defence, bearing that the act of parliament is of notorious and known seditious libels, and not of doubtosome and ambiguous writs, which in reading may suffer divers senses and constructions, of the which last kind it is alledged that the writ quarrelled is: to the which it is replied, 'Ubi lex non distinguit, neque nos distinguere debemus.' And seeing the act comprehends reproaches and scandalous libels, which are really so, et non in opinione; the judge and assyze should proceed according to the thing prohibited, and not leave place to the veil of opinion: To that part of the said reply it is duplyed ut supra. That albeit the said act comprehends reproachful and scandalous libels, which are really so; yet it follows not, for the reasons adduced in the first duply made to my Lord Advocat's first reply immediately preceding, which I here repeat brevitatis causa; for here is all the controversy, Whether my Lord Advocat's opinion in the dittay, or the pannel's opinion in the defence against the dittay, shall carry the greatest force, seeing they are both different opinions. And it seems most favourable and most reasonable, that a nobleman's life being quarrelled and drawn in question and hazard upon the interpretation and commentary, that the pannel should have the preference anent the interpretation, for preservation of his life, honour, and estate; especially in respect that it is not only simply offered, that he would declare the true meaning, which he always knew and understood, of the said writing, but likewise offers to make faith thereupon. And as this is most reasonable, so it ought to be favoured upon the pannel's part in this case, so heavy and so dangerous to him; for it is not denied, but the act prohibits the hearing, having, concealing, &c. of infamous and scandalous writings; but this writing quoad eum cannot be called so: neither prohibits the act, that readers of such writings should otherwise read, know and understand the same, nor according to the knowledge that it has pleased God to give them.

And to that part of the Reply, bearing that the Pannel cannot pretead excuse upon the uncertainty and ambiguity of the said quarrelled writing, because by the first view it might and should have appeared to him to have been of that nature; albeit in libels against subjects there might be some excuse by reading, retaining, and looking upon them; yet the pannel cannot pretend ignorance after the receiving thereof from Haig, and communicating the same to the earl of Rothes, that they found it of such a strain, as should not be presented: It is duplyed, That this part of my Lord Advocat's reply doth unwillingly force the pannel to fall upon the exposition of the words of the said libel; which cannot be eschewed, in respect of that part of the reply, bearing that by the first view it might and should have appeared to him to have been of the nature of a seditious libel: which the pannel flatly refuses, and is formally contrair, because he never took it to be so; for the first words of the said quarrelled writ are thir, (these) 'To the king's most excellent majesty, the humble Supplication of the lords and other commissioners of the late parliament, humbly sheweth,' &c. And these being the first words of the said writing, if in reason it may be affirmed that the pannel cannot pretend excuse, because by the first view that writing containing these words; if, I say, it might and should have appeared to him to have been a seditious writing, the pannel remits himself about it to the wise and judicious deliberation of the judges and noble auditors. For as it has been oft said before, and now not to be repeated, the pannel declares that he never took the said writing in his opinion and judgment for any other kind of writing or libel, but for ane humble supplication and remonstrance, in all humility to have been presented to his sacred majesty; and which accordingly was delivered to the earl of Rothes, to have been presented and by him offered to his majesty, and refused in manner contained in my Lord Advocat's own declaration of his sacred majesty's own speech and words uttered to the said earl of Rothes, the time of the offering thereof: whereupon the pannel takes instruments. And so the said quarrelled writing not being at the first view seditious, as is libelled in the dittay, and contained in the reply, but in the said first words being a most humble supplication; the pannel most justly pretends excuse, that seeing de facto the said first words are not seditious at the first view, that therefore he ought not to be convened by this dittay, as haver, bearer, and concealer of the said seditious writing; but ought to be suffered and permitted to make his own interpretation, that he never thought it so; and therefore cannot be pursued criminally upon his life therefore, as the dittay bears.

And at that part of the Reply, bearing that albeit in libels against subjects there might be some excuse by reading, receiving, and looking upon the same; yet the pannel cannot pretend ignorance, in respect of his depositions, after receiving from Haig, by communicating the same to the earl of Rothes, that they found it of such a strain as should not be presented: to that it is dplyed, That the saids depositions make nothing against the pannel; for the pannel did never deny the receipt of the said quarrelled writing from Haig, nor that he did communicate the same to the earl of Rothes, and that they found it of such a strain as should not be presented. But the times being distinguished, the doubt is soon solved; for the depositions apparently express not the times. For the pannel did not depone, That before delivery of the said quarrelled writing to the earl of Rothes, and before the earl of Rothes his intended offer thereof to the king's majesty, that they found it of such a strain as should not be presented: but that conference betwixt the earl of Rothes and the pannel, was long after the intended offer and refusing. At which time, upon the occasion of the harshness and misconstruction of some words, that speech was uttered betwixt them; and from that time furth, nothing further followed. And therefore the pannel's deposition makes nothing for the said argument. That the pannel could not pretend ignorance: in respect whereof, the said reply, and hail members thereof, ought to be repelled.

It is farther dplyed by Mr. Alexander Pearson, That where it is replied by my Lord Advocate, that the pannel's opinion of the writing, and the alledged probable cause of his ignorance to be a scandalous libel, adduced, cannot defend the pannel from concealing, &c. because the writing in itself is really scandalous, and at the first view might and should have appeared in that nature to any man of the pannel's understanding; and who can pretend opinion 'nesciendo hoc quod omnes sciunt?' It is answered, That the pannel's opinion of the writing, and the probable causes of his ignorance of the same to be scandalous, does defend the pannel from the crime libelled, not only for the reasons and laws already adduced, in the matter of injury and other crimes, which are most pregnant; but also because no capital crime whatsoever is or can be committed sine dolo, whereof the pannel is altogether free in all sorts thereof;

'Et a dolo vero et a dolo præsumpto ex qualitate facti.' 'A dolo vero,' which the pannel's innocent intention evinceth in the defences proponed for him in the second exemption; and there he is purged abundantly, for the reasons contained therein, which are here repeated brevitatis causa.

The Justice and Assessors continues this Dyet till to-morrow, the 12th instant.

Curia legitime affirmata, the said 12th of Dec. 1634, &c.

It is alledged by the said Mr. Alexander Pearson, and dplyed by the pannel. Secundo, That the said Pannel is free 'a dolo præsumpto, quia tunc præsumitur dolus ex qualitate facti, ubi quis facit quod scit vel scire debet se non debere facere: At in proposito nostro nulla scientia nec conscientia criminis in accusato, nec ignorantia ejus quod omnes intelligunt.' But most just and probable cause of ignorance of the writing to be scandalous, which would have affected even the wisest and most sagacious then; although now ex post facto, by pregnancy and viracity of spirit, the writing quarrelled being searched unto exactly, the same being interpret by the dittay, and urged upon the pannel as seditious; which interpretation now of it, cannot make damnable the estimation and opinio of the writing quarrelled, which it had of before amongst men of common understanding, to make culpable of capital crime: 'quia injuriarum æstimationio non addit tempus quo judicatur, sed ad id quo facta est referre debet;' Expressa Leg. 21. F. de Injuriis. 'Et nunquam crescit et post facto præteriti delicti æstimationio.' And it is hard that the pannel, upon error of judgment, should incur capital punishment.

Where it is replied by my Lord Advocate, That the pannel cannot pretend ignorance of the writing quarrelled, because by his deposition the 7th of June, he has declared that he thought it not fit to be presented to his majesty; It is answered, That the reply is not relevant, and that the pannel then thinking it not fit to be presented, hinders not but the said writing being thought fit by others to be presented to his majesty, and indeed offered to his majesty, the pannel thereby was confirmed the more to think of it as a supplication, and may make the defences thereupon, his credulity foresaid.

Where it is replied by my Lord Advocate, 'Quod omnis ignorantia juris est improbabilis et punibilis,' and that the pannel can pretend no probable ignorance thereof; It is answered, That the addition of the act of parliament 94, anent concealers, whereupon this part of the dittay is only founded, had never strength nor vigour of law, (never being yet practised against any since the first making thereof) but being as it were by desuetude abolished, ut supra in our first exception, shews that the ignorance thereof is neither improbable, nor punishable against the pannel.

Where it is replied by my Lord Advocate to that part of the fourth exception, bearing 'quod credulitas id furis præbat causam probabilem,' and that by parity of reason it should have place also in the matter of infamous libels; to the which it is replied, 'Quod illa credulitas aliter probanda est quam per juramentum rei.' It is answered, That the Pannel urges not his credulity of the writ quarrelled upon his own Declaration, only, but also upon other circumstances, evidences, and presumptions, already adduced in the said fourth exception and former defences; which clearly evinces the pannel's credulity, and the justness thereof.

Where it is replied by my Lord Advocat to that part of the exception, propounding the words of the law where it is said, 'Ubi de obligando et liberando queritur, propensiores esse debemus ad liberandum;' to the which it is replied, That the law cited has no place in clear and manifest crimes, as this is: It is answered, that the reply takes controversum pro confesso, That the crime whereupon the pannel is accused is clear and manifest, which it is not; but in the notion of a crime (if any there be, which we do not grant) the same is most abstruse and obscure: and if any clearness be, it is for the pannel's innocency; in respect whereof, the exception stands relevant, notwithstanding of the reply.

It is further duplied by Mr. Roger Mowat, to the reply made by my Lord Advocat to that part of the said fourth defence, bearing that the pannel is not punishable for not apprehending and not revealing, upon an act become in desuetude, because the lediges are ruled by the laws of the kingdom, as the acts of k. James 1, and k. James 4, bears; and that there is no prescription in laws, and that 'omnis ignorantia juris est improbabilis et punibilis.' It is duplied, That albeit the lediges are and should be ruled by his majesty's laws, yet where laws are become in desuetude, and have never been practised, the lediges ought to be certified thereof, and new intimation ought to be made, as in the first defence at length is contained. And neither of these can be alleged in this present case; and therefore the dangerous consequence of this and the like laws ought to be prevented before the same be practised, which is the mind of the law-giver. And to that, bearing that there is no prescription in laws; is it duplied, that desuetude must be estimat equipollent to the prescription of laws obscure, or that are not in daily custom. And where it is replied against probable ignorance, 'Quod omnis ignorantia juris est improbabilis et punibilis;' it is duplied, That 'ignorantia juris in damnis vitandis non nocet:' and this is our case. And where it is replied to that part of the said fourth defence, bearing that the pannel had probable ignorance, the defence ought to be repelled, because the nature and strain of the quarrelled writing must be the rule of the punishment or impunity, and not the opinion of the pannel; 'Et quod est ignorantia maxime inexcusabilis nescire hoc quod omnes sciunt:' it is duplied to the said reply, That the pannel still contends that the nature and strain of the supplication quarrelled may be the rule of his punishment and impunity, according to his opinion of the right meaning and sense that he made thereof, for the reasons already adduced in the former duplies immediately preceding; wherein the pannel contends, that with reason he himself must be the only trucheman and interpreter of the said writing, in case any other commentor or interpretation be made thereof, containing such a sense and meaning, as being received and admitted, will bring upon him the punishment of death: which duply is here repeated brevitatis causa.

And where it is replied, That the Reproaches and Exprobations therein contained are so nottour, that the pannel nor none of his judgment could pretend ignorance on the reading thereof; it is duplied ut supra, that the pannel refuses his having knowledge of any such reproaches, and professes his ignorance thereof; albeit he read the same, and others likewise of better judgment than himself, who did never observe nor find out the like, according to their judgment and understanding. Which reproaches and scandals, if they had perceived and remarked, (as they did not) would have touched them as near as any other of his majesty's subjects whatsoever of their quality or degree: but seeing the pannel, and the rest of the hearers and havens of the said quarrelled supplication, pretend their ignorance foresaid of any such knowledge, as is now expressed in the said ditty; the pursuer can never be heard to force any other knowledge upon them, to that end that they may be found guilty of the crime libelled, and punishment of death therefore.

And where it is replied, That it is 'ignorantia maxime inexcusabilis nescire hoc quod omnes sciunt;' it is duplied, that my Lord Advocat will do well to apply that rule to the present case, and show 'quod sit hoc quod omnes sciunt.' For if his lordship means by his ditty, then that rule can have no place here, because no man knew any such glosses or interpretation of the said supplication, but the pursuer himself, before the coming furth of the said ditty. And if before that time many were of another opinion, concerning the meaning of the said supplication; then my Lord Advocat cannot be heard to say, that it was 'ignorantia maxime inexcusabilis' in the pannel 'nescire hoc quod omnes sciunt,' seeing no man knew that which was set down in the said ditty, but my Lord Advocat himself: and many knew, and yet know, that the said quarrelled Supplication in their judgments and conceptions carried with it no such meaning or construction.

And where it is replied, That the Pannel's Defence, founded upon his Depositions which he made voluntarily for satisfaction of the committee, cannot be respected, because the most substantial parts of the ditty are founded upon the said quarrelled supplication, and not upon the pannel's depositions; and that his denial of knowledge by oath, cannot liberat him from the pain of death: It is dupleed, That albeit many substantial points of the said dittay be founded upon the said supplication, yet they are founded upon the pannel's depositions also. And albeit the said dittay quarrels and impugns the said supplication in sundry passages, which the pannel doth not maintain as they are expressed in the dittay, because when he and the other supplicants read and heard the said supplication, they found no such meaning in it; and they leave the defence of that commentary to the author himself, and declare ut supra by their judgment they found it not of such a strain as the dittay bears: the declaration ought now to be received, for clearing of the pannel and remanent supplicants from all suspicion of such knowledge as the dittay bears upon them, for the reasons foresaids, contained in the former defences and duplees. In respect whereof, the said reply ought to be repelled, in respect of the saids depositions already given, and of the pannel's declaration upon oath, which he now offers to give.

Where it is replied to that part of the said Defence, bearing that albeit the said alledged libel should be now found to be infamous, yet cannot be drawn back, that there needs no declarator of the judge; consequently may be drawn back, because it was infamous from the beginning: it is dupleed, that the defence stands relevant notwithstanding the reply. Which defence bears expressly that the pannel and other supplicants received the said libel (now quarrelled) as an humble supplication; and in token of their said knowledge addressed the same to be presented to his sacred majesty, as the said defence bears. And so what has been found out since to be therein by the pursuers, and those of deeper wit and knowledge than the pannel and other supplicants, cannot be laid to their charge; for whom all presumptions are most clear and evident, that the pannel had never so much as one thought or opinion, as is contained in the dittay.

Where it is replied to that part of the exception founded upon the instance of treason, as the same bears; it is dupleed, that my Lord Advocat in that answer takes controversum pro confesso, ever taking this for a ground that the supplication is seditious and scandalous, and so to be reputed and holden against the pannel and others in like case, which is still denyed, for the reasons before adduced. Where it is answered by my Lord Advocat, that that part of the said defence anent the revealing to the earl of Rotbes is not relevant, in respect of the act of parliament; it is dupleed, and ought to be repelled in respect of the former duplees answering this point, that earls, the time of making the said act, were born counsellors; and that the earl of Rotbes was a sheriff, which the act allows.

And where it is replied, That the offer to his majesty non relevat, except it were alledged that he offered it as a scandalous libel; it is dupleed, that the said reply is no ways relevant, because it was sufficient by presenting it to his royal majesty to reveal the same in that manner: and it cannot be now known whether it would have been so thought by his sacred majesty, albeit he refused the same; but it is certain that the pannel and the presenter would never have presented the same, if they had thought it scandalous. And that part of the defence, bearing that it was revealed by the presenting, needs not to bear that it was offered to be presented as scandalous, for that was not their end, neither had they any such meaning by the said presenting; their intention being, as is contained in the said defence, to have it presented as an humble supplication, to receive a gracious answer, as other remonstrances had gotten before. And so there is no necessity to alledge it was to be presented as a scandalous libel.

And where it is replied, That (granting the said revealing to his majesty might have been sustained as lawful, yet the pannel is guilty of death for not apprehending; it is dupleed, that the said reply is not relevant, because if the said revealing was lawful, ergo there was no necessity of apprehending; for the words of the act of parliament anent the prohibition are alternative. And albeit, as it is answered before, that the pannel thought Mr. Haig to be author, yet in respect of this conception of the said libel, he thought him not to be such an author as merited apprehension, because the said libel in his opinion fell not within the said act of parliament. And repeats his former answer, and the two practicks about the apprehending of free leidges; adding thereunto the late lord Maxwell's practick, who having apprehended by virtue of a commission, was notwithstanding forfeaulted therefore.

To the reply, bearing that my Lord Advocat granted that the circumstances of the receipt of Haig's letter are not essential parts of the dittay per se, but used as adminicles to aggravat the pannel's crime of not apprehending, and giving him occasion to escape, and entertaining of correspondence with him thereafter: it is dupleed, that the pannel and his procurators accept of the said answer, and protest that no respect be had thereto, as an essential part of the dittay. And the alledged correspondence is no ways relevant, not bearing that the pannel did write letters to Haig: for correspondence must be mutual, otherwise it can be no correspondence.

Where it is replied, 'quod non est hujus loci' to produce Haig's letter; it is dupleed, That it is 'maxime hujus loci' to be produced, if that part of the Dittay founded upon it be found relevant, because they were already produced by warrant of my Lord Justice; and being now produced, nothing shall be found in them to carry any warrant for that part of the said Dittay. And being produced to the pannel, and his procurators for their information and defence, must yet be produced to be compared with the said Dittay. For if they shall find that the Dittay and the Letter do not agree, then that part of the said Dittay founded upon the said missive will not be sustained, and so cannot be put to the knowledge of an inquest. In respect whereof, the hail replies and all the members thereof ought to be repelled.

It is duplyed by Mr. John Nisbet; Where it is replied by my Lord Advocat, That the dispute against the relevancy of the qualification is superfluous, because the general subsumption conform to the act of parliament is per se relevant: it is duplyed, That the general is not relevant, 'quia non oportet in criminibus vagari,' Leg. Libellorum, F. de Accusationibus: 'Et locus, et tempus, et minutia delicti exprimenda sunt; alioqui accusatio ipso jure est nulla.' Clarus, § final. Quæst. 12, num. 8.

Whereas it is replied by my Lord Advocat, That the Dittay is not contrair to itself, because of the acquainting his majesty by my lord Rothes's means does not expiat and purge the concealing, my lord Rothes not being one of these persons to whom the delators of such pieces, and authors thereof, is appointed by the act of parliament: it is duplyed, That these persons are only specified for receiving of such delations in subidium, where the revealer knows not any other summar and secret way to acquaint his majesty; and not to tye them to an unnecessary circuit, where by a more compendious way his majesty may be acquainted, and the authors suppress. And we represent the inconvenient to ensue, if parties by whose means his majesty has been acquainted with pieces of that kind, shall be obnoxious to the pains of the act for not seeking a baill or sberiff, to tell unto them that which by other and more direct means is shown to his majesty.

Whereas it is replied by my Lord Advocat, That the acts of parliament require not a judicial declarator of the nature of such pieces, nor the former knowledge of the party challenged, but without distinction punish the not revealers and not apprehenders of the authors of pieces materially seditious; 'Et ubi lex non distinguit, nec nos distinguere debemus:' it is duplyed, That statutes being particular conclusions of law, presuppone principia universalialia et prima, and imply intrinsically the common notions of law and reason. And therefore seeing in reason there cannot be a crime of concealing, unless the piece or author alledged to be concealed were either declared to be, or to the pannel's knowledge were, such as he ought to reveal, because clare is relative to knowledge; it is not relevantly subsumed that Ilaig was author of one piece materially scandalous, and that the pannel revealed him not, unless a former knowledge were assumed likewise. And the law itself furnisheth a ground for this distinction, because the word 'concealing' importeth knowledge: 'Et statuta punientia delicta capitaliter non habent locum nisi dolo interveniente, etiam quod de dolo non fiat mentio.' Paulus de Castro in Lege Nemo, num. 5. Codice de Episcopis et Clericis, 'Ubi perstringit imperitiam judicum qui verbis statutorum mordicus inherens, et multo magis cum dolis requiritur, vel expresse vel tacite, tunc enim nec lata culpa sufficit, tacite autem requiritur dolus, cum statutum utitur verbis, nullis audeat vel præsumat.' Which are expressly in the act of the 10th parliament; and must of necessity be considered to understand the addition contained in the act of the 14th parliament; 'Idque multo magis in delictis quæ de sua natura requirunt dolum prout est falsum injuria et similia.' Phar. Quæst. 87, per totam. Whereas it is replied, 'Quod iudex debet procedere secundum naturam rei prohibita,' and should not leave place to elude the law sub velo opinionis; it is duplyed, That by all statutes of that nature crimes are only obviated and prohibited: And the judge should proceed to try whether crimes be committed, or not, and not to condemn escapes or errors of judgment, which are not arbitrary to the will to shun, but depend upon the disposition of organs and representation of fantasmas, which are exhibited 'ab intellectu agente,' and 'necessitate intellectum patientem,' to ane assent, where it is furnished with no probable grounds to elide the same; as is known even to the novices in philosophy by that trivial maxim, 'Intellectus per assensum præmissarum convincitur ad assentientium conclusionem, saltem quoad specificationem.' And where my Lord Advocat would expose the weakness of the pannel's judgment in not discovering the nature of seditious pieces, to enforce the punishment of a crime, it is duplyed, That the law is not eluded by the slender pretence of opinion; but the pannel's conception of the piece, verified by his oath, and by all possible presumptions, which we have at length deduced, must liberat him from the guilt and pain of the crime, seeing in law 'carent animo injuriandi ex quo crimen consistit,' verified by the oath of the party; and any assisting presumption imports absolvitur, as is already shewn by the forecited laws, and the harmony of doctors. And whereas it is replied, 'Quod ignorantia juris non excusat in delictis atrocioribus;' it is duplyed, That 'ignorantia juris' being at the most 'lata culpa æquiparatur dolo, et non excusat in actionibus descendentibus ex contractu, vel quasi, sed excusat in criminibus vel delictis, quia voluntas, quæ maleficia distinguit, spectatur, non veritas vel exitus.' Leg. Divus Hadrianus, F. ad Legem Coruelium de Siciariis. Phar. Quæst. 87. 'Ubi regulariter dolum requirit, et ubi abest dolus, pœnam asserit cessare, idque etiam in crimine læsæ majestatis,' num. 10, et per totam. And the atrocity of the crime excludes not a probable excuse, 'Quia causa quælibet, etiam levitas, credulitas excusat a dolo regulariter.' Phar. Quæst. 90, num. 1. 'Et non solum si sit levis sed colorata et irrationabilis imo etiam temeraria et bestialis.' Idem ibid. num. 3. Ubi refert doctores concordantes Claudius Battan-dia, Reg. 'Si fatua credulitas a dolo excusat cum vehementibus presumptionibus probatur,' num. 1 & 2. 'Et causa levis excusat in crimine injuriarum, et ad excusandum sufficit error verus vel presumptus.' Phar-dicta Quæst. num. 29, 'Et levis causa excusat etiam in crimine læsæ majestatis.' Ibid. num. 26. 'Et multo magis in iis qui de sua natura nec de jure civili reprobata sunt.' As is the points of not apprehending and concealing. 'Ibi enim dolus non presumitur, et si quis sic egerit sine dolo et animo delinquendi creditur agentis assertioni ex quo habet pro se juris presumptionem.' Num. 14, et num. 90. 'Et ignorantia juris excusat a dolo.' Num. 91. 'Et crassa supina et affectata excusat ex opinione Baldi et Tiraquelli,' quo citat. num. 99. 'Nisi sint circa ea quæ sint de jure naturali gentium et divina prohibita.' Whereas it is replied, That the pannel cannot pretend ignorance in respect of the piece conspicuously infamous, and of the pannel's sufficiency and qualifications, and in respect of the person injured, being his sacred majesty; and therefore excludes all excuse upon curiosity, or any other respects, excusable by the law, and, at last, in respect of the pannel's disapproving of the piece in his own depositions: It is duplyed, That the piece is not notourly infamous for the reasons adduced. And here we protest, That my Lord Advocat's odious decyphering of the piece, necessitates us to vindicate not itself, but the conception that the pannel had, and that any man may have, that is not preoccupied with the unnatural glosses of the Dittay. And for the pannel's qualifications, it evinceth that he would not have delivered a piece notourly infamous to be presented to his majesty, as is acknowledged by the Dittay, and so to have endangered his honour and life, if he had had any such conception of it. And for the pannel's disproving of the piece, it convinceth not his sinister intention in using or having a piece disprovable, because it is not deponed that he disproved it as seditious or infamous, but 'quando verba confessionis sunt dubia, possunt et debent declarari et interpretari per contententem, et in meliorem partem.' Phar. Quæst. 81. num. 38. 'Et confessio dubia et incerta interpretatur in bonam partem in favorem contententis, et secundum illius intentionem.' Bald. in Leg. Unica num. 23. Codice de Confessis. And the pannel declares that he disproved it not as seditious, but fit to be suppressed, in respect of his majesty's will expressed to my lord Rothes anent pieces of that strain. Whereas it is replied by my Lord Advocat, That the defect of the common law, in the points of concealing and not apprehending, cannot be obtruded, and that there can be no prescription of laws; yet there is antiquation and desuetude, as we have before shewn: And the defect of the common law is adduced as a probable candour of the desuetude in points debording from the common law. Whereas it is replied by my Lord Advocat, That the nature of the piece must rule, notwithstanding of the pannel's conception thereof, because it is only required that the piece should be really seditious; it is duplyed, That in matter of crime the intention and conception is most considerable, as is already inculcat; and when there is a question anent the credulity of the party, his credulity is probable by oath, Barad. § Recte Lege inter omnes, F. de Furto; especially where there concur some presumptions. Whereas it is replied, That 'ignorantia est inexcusabilis nescire quod omnes sciunt;' and that the pannel's narrow advertency and canvassing of the piece challenged, in reading, copying, advising, interlining, joined with his opinion anent the presentation thereof, excludes all presumptions of ignorance: it is duplyed, that it cannot be said 'quod omnes sciunt,' seeing my lord Rothes, a nobleman of eminent quality and sufficiency, made offer, at least mention thereof, as a supplication to his majesty, for the pannel's opinion. It is already answered for his depending of the piece; it is so far from aggravating or convincing liis knowledge of the piece to be of that nature, that he is confident that indifferent and impartial judgments, the more they advert to the strain of it, they will be the more edified of the nature of it, that it is not so notourly injurious. And therefore the pannel protests that his procurators may vindicate his conceptions of it, and remonstrate the strange inferences that the Dittay makes of it. Where it is replied by my Lord Advocat, That apprehending is warranted and enjoined by the acts of parliament, and therefore not dangerous; it is duplyed, That apprehending is warranted, when parties are able, by lawful probation, to bind upon the persons apprehended the guilt of the crime for which they delate and apprehend them. And that even in the crime of lese majesty there is no warrant to apprehend parties, albeit known to the apprehenders guilty of the crime, unless they be able to qualify and prove the guilt, under the pain of Tausioratia and retaliation in case they succumb. Where it is replied, That the most material parts of the Dittay are founded upon the nature of the piece itself, and not upon the pannel's depositions; it is duplyed, That howsoever there results a relevant defence in law upon the pannel's absentis animi, which is probable by his oath, assisted with presumptions; and is admitted in the most strict inquisitions, as is constant by the uniform and constant harmony of all criminalists. Whereas it is replied by my Lord Advocat, That there needs not a declarator of the judge to be drawn back; it is duplyed, That in all countries where the concealing of heretic books is punished, a judicial declarator is necessarily required; and the private opinion and mistaking of parties before declarator was never censured, much less punished.

Whereas it is replied by my Lord Advocat, That the maxim, 'Prioniores debemus esse ad liberandum non habet locum in atrocioribus et delictis contra principem;' it is duplyed, That we retort this answer, 'ubi lex non distinguit nec distinguere debemus. Et non de-

‘linquit qui in dubio contra fiscum respondet,’ F. de Jure Fisci; ‘et turpe est et principi in-juriosum credere inventum qui principem omnibus benefactentem, neminem ledentem, injuria velit efficere; et quavis excusatio etiam levissima et maxime fatua in criminibus atrocissimis admittitur.’

It is added by Mr. Robert Macgill to the preceding duplies, That where my Lord Advocat replieth, that ‘juris ignorantia non excusat;’ that the said rule may be understood ‘in jure, quod usu invaluit;’ for even if in these petty statutes anent the inflicting of pecunial pains contained in the 9th act, parl. 31, 1612, a new intimation of them is thought fitting to put the leidges in mala fide before they be practised, what then in this act, and some others, under the compass whereof sundry here may fall, shall there not an intimation be required where life, honour, and lands, are in danger, and a capital pain to be inflicted for to put the leidges in mala fide? Item, Where it is replied, ‘Quod nec ignorantia facti excusat propter presumptionem doli;’ it is answered, that the pannel’s ‘ignorantia facti’ is ‘ab omni doli presumptione aliena;’ who could never think that under the general law, contained in the addition, could come in all sort of inordinate speeches, and all sort of hearers, concealers, and not apprehenders. And for the excusing of any dole that can be presumed, he adduces the knowledge of law and reason, which ought to expone all municipal laws, ut evitetur absurdum; which is, that all sorts of inordinate speeches or writs, even against a prince, and all concealers and not apprehenders, should be punished alike: For the Prator says, ‘Si quis adversus ea fecerit, prout quaque res erit, animadvertam.’ Leg. item apud Labionem 15. G. 251. 28. ‘Ubi de pœnarum distinctione ex circumstantiis juxta Legem aut facta 16. in principio,’ F. de penis, ‘quam consideratione affectus et animus facientis maximum habet momentum,’ Leg. illa 3. § 1. dicta Leg. 15. § 38. Lege si quis certum 26. in fine, F. de Injuriis. So that my Lord Advocat’s reply anent credulity, that it excuses not, and that it is not a sufficient warrant ad juramentum purgativum, and that it ought not to be here received; the same ought to be repelled, because ‘credulitas sive justa sit causa sive injusta excusat ubi dolus requiritur,’ as in our case. Clarus, § finali, Quæst. 60. num. 22. ‘Et quod recipiatur juramentum purgativum concurrentibus aliis ad animi boni probationem indicium constat,’ per Phar. Quæst. 105. Inspect. 3. post num. 111. ‘Leva vero judicia sufficere,’ ait Alexander, Conc. 115. Columna penultima, Volumine quarto. ‘Et à delicto etiam conventicula, et male congregationis, causam vel levem excusare,’ ait Cravetta, Conc. 4. num. 26. But so it is, there may be many good reasons alledged, wherefore the pannel had a good mind; as, that all which is in this quarrelled petition, might have been proposed in parliament. And the rest of the reasons adduced in my second exception, ‘adeo ut dolus non sit presumendus’ against the pannel; neither is the argument good that the pannel disallowed it, or thought it not fit for a time, ergo he thought it seditious negatur sequi. And because my Lord Advocat, in all the members almost of his reply, returns upon this, That the piece of itself is really seditious; and that obscurity and ambiguity of words may receive evasion and excuse among subjects, but not in the case of the pannel: I answer, that the exception stands good, notwithstanding of the reply, in respect of the examples and cases following. And, first, I confess that such inordinate speeches and writings as were uttered betwixt Catiline and his complices against a government, and against a prince’s progenitors, or his person, in that sort are punishable both in the person of the speaker and penner, as also of the hearer, not revealer, and not apprehender; wherein the case of this addition is verified: and no others are hearers, not revealers, and not apprehenders. Clarus, § ultima, Quæst. 87. num. 2, et 3. But mark in a second case, ‘Quod nobilis qui directis verbis et assertionibus dixit, ait, scripsit, principem suum non habere animum renouerandi;’ by Matheus, De Afflictis, decisione 307. num. 27. is not thought punishable by the ordinary judge: but ‘remittendus,’ ut in Leg. Unica, ‘si quis principi maledixerit ubi tamen improperatur defectus liberalitatis, quæ est præcipua virtus in principibus;’ as our Saviour himself affirms, Luke chap. 22. Evangelium Bountiful. The third case is of him who spake or writ that which by interpretation might be misconstrued to an evil sense, as was said in the second part of my first exception; and remits also to that comment of Menochius, adduced by Mr. John Nesbit. And where my Lord Advocat would eschew, by saying that Menochius had not such a law as we, and that we ought to be governed by our own laws; remits to the end of my first exception anent the exposition of all municipal laws, according to reason. Ubi Gaylus expones the maxim, ‘Ubi lex non distinguit nec nos distinguere debemus, et ut vitetur absurdum paritatis;’ our laws may be so expounded. Ergo if the authors of these last speeches and writings be scarcely punished, far less ought the hearers, not revealers, and not apprehenders; for even in apprehension, ‘quæ est captura oportet ut constet de criminis enormitate,’ which is not here.

It is triplyed by my Lord Advocat, That he finds no necessity to triply. But if the justice, and his lordships assessors, require any thing to be explained in that which is duplied, upon signification of their pleasure, he shall be ready to expend all doubts verbo, which he did.

The Justice General continues this Dyet till to-morrow the 13th.

The said 13th of December, 1634. The Justice continued the Dyet till the 16th of December, 1634.

Curia legitime affirmata, &c. and Procurators in Defence, as before.

Mr. Roger Mowat, as procurator for the pannel, repeats only the former defences, and duplies of them, anent the revealing by the pannel to the earl of Rothes of the supplication or petition contained in the dittay, and the earl of Rothes his offering thereof to the king's majesty; and that the act of parliament is satisfied thereby, which does not exclude the revealing to other persons, nor are mentioned in the said act: but affirms positive all manner of revealing, whereby knowledge may come to his majesty, which is the end of the said revealing, sufficient, as said is, in ane act of this kind, which has never been in custom. And so revealing being clear, as said is, there needed no apprehending.

My Lord Advocat repeats his former answers, That the revealing is not clear nor relevant; and albeit it were, that the not apprehending makes the pannel guilty, and so to fall under the punishment contained in the act of parliament libelled.

It is alledged by Mr. John Nisbet under Protestation, That the vindicating of the libel challenged from the glosses of the dittay, shall not import any approbation thereof either by the pannel or his procurators; but in so far as they are necessitat, by my Lord Advocat's replies, to vindicat the pannel's innocency in the hearing, or any other accession to the said libel challenged. It is first replied by my Lord Advocat in his replies, bearing that the nature of the piece is so notoriously infamous, that at the first view it is apparent to the most shallow and ordinary understanding, to be injurious to his majesty in all the points libelled: it is duplyd thereto, that the points of the alledged libel import no reproach to his majesty's person, estate, or government, in the pannel's conception, for these reasons: 1st, That point anent gesture is not reproachful, because 'sub-jecta sunt talia qualia prædicata demonstrant,' Bartolin, Primario Leg. S. F. de Instructo vel Instrumento Legato. And there is no injurious attribute enumerat, to defame his majesty's gesture; but it is only affirmed, that his majesty's notes bred a fear, which is ane attribute of casuality, and not of quality. Secondly, the intention of his majesty's noting could not be conceived by the pannel to be ane taxing of his majesty of any point of indiscretion or injustice, unless the act of noting had been qualified in the alledged libel to be unjust, or indiscreet; which were sacrilegious to think of a prince estranged from his country, and from the occasions of knowledge and knowing of his subjects: for he may in justice and wisdom remark the opinions of the lords of parliament, and thereby probably to found a conjecture of their inclinations to his majesty's service. Thirdly, the alledging the noting of the names of the dis-assenters could not at the first be conceived to imply an officious prying into the gesture of the prince, but rather a loyal fear of incurring the king's displeasure; taking hold of a simple gesture, whereby his majesty might have seemed to have taken notice of their untowardness to his majesty's service. Fourthly, there is no ground of reproach inferred upon his gesture, as the dittay bears. It is duplyd to that point anent his majesty's refusal to hear the reasons of some dis-assenters, That the first part of the Answer to the former point quadrats here. Secondly, The alledged refusal of his majesty to hear the reasons of the dis-assenters, cannot be so readily conceived to rub matter of reproach upon his majesty's sacred person or proceedings; but in the contrair argues his majesty's royal goodness in not accepting the scrupulous, preposterous anticipations of reasons before voting in parliament, as being derogatory from the ancient and hereditary liberty of noblemen's votes, and from his majesty's royal bounty, ready to acquiesce in the free opinion of his estates; and far from a previous and partial espousing of either part of any debatable point, before the final decision in parliament. And as for the inference of fear to become obnoxious to his majesty's displeasure, it is not ane inference of ane reproach, but rather of a dutiful love, which debords (runs out) ofttimes into a needless fear.

It is answered to that point of the Dittay challenging that passage, viz. 'That the proposing of resolutions carried by plurality of votes, was never censured by a prince of so much justice,' contains no subject of reproach; but on the contrair, ane ample and true acknowledgment of his majesty's undoubted goodness and justice, used as an argument to deprecate his majesty's censure, as incompatible with his majesty's goodness, and the example of other princes like to his majesty.

It is answered to that point of the Dittay bearing that his majesty's honour is undermined by the affirming a general fear of innovation in essential points of religion, that his majesty's honour is not stained; because there is nothing affirmed to have been done by his majesty, which might occasion any such fear; and the panic and groundless fear of subjects, reflects no reproach upon a blameless prince. Secondly, It is affirmed that there is fear of novation intended, but not by his majesty, as is clear by the motives of that fear adduced by the supplicants, viz. 'That there is allowance of printing Arminian books;' which is not positively affirmed, but upon report, and the impunity of Arminian preaching, which reflects upon churchmen only, to whom it is incumbent to advert to the printing and preaching of orthodox tenents. And therefore albeit it were false, cannot fall under the compass of the acts of parliament, as seditious, and reproachful to his majesty, his estate, person, and proceedings.

It is answered to the point of admission of Papists upon the parliament and articles, That in the Pannel's conception it reflects not against his majesty, and therefore is not relevant to infer the crime of seditious libelling, or accession thereto. Item, It is answered to that point of the Dittay, bearing the king's majesty's proceedings to be misconstrued in the alledged prohibition of the gentry to meet, That his majesty's royal procedure is not taxed as unjust;

but without dying upon the words of justice or injustice of the interruption of those meetings, it is only insinuat, that albeit in parliament they might have objected against the interruption of those meetings, and had occasion to oppose his majesty's will, as they thought, that these meetings should be interrupted, they contented themselves and were not refractory. And herein, and in the hail strain of the following points, (in the Pannel's conception) it is only an endeavour to shew that the disassenting from some acts, was not from any faction and waywardness to oppose his majesty's will, as they feared he might have been possessed with; seeing in other points, wherein they had occasion, and probable grounds in their opinion to oppose it, they were silent. Moreover, it is answered for this point, and all others following, 'Quod in causa criminali quando verba possint interpretari ad bonum vel malum, in dubio debent intelligi ad bonum, et excludatur presumptio delicti.' Cravetta, Concil. 9, num. 21. 'Et secundum subjectam materiam,' Leg. Proculus, F. de Usufructu: 'Et quando verba dubia sunt, non debent intelligi capiose indammum preferentis, sed secundum ipsius mentem: et convenit animadvertere, qua mente quid dicatur, et multo magis quid concipiatur.' Leg. penult. F. ad exhibendum. 'Et quando verba sunt dubia, ut videntur injuriosa, vel non, standum est declarationi ejus qui ea dixit vel scripsit.' Menoch. Concil. 197. lib. 12. 'Multo magis ejus qui imprudens et bona fide iis usus est. Et quando verba sunt dubia, declaratio sumitur a verbis præcedentibus vel subsequentibus, vel utrisque.' Menoch. Concil. citat. num. 7. And therefore if the strain of the words, the nature of the subject being a supplication, the declaration of the Pannel's conception of them, and other ensuing words which declared them, be adverted unto; it will be found the Pannel is excusable, if in this conception they import no reproach to his majesty: for the hail last part of the supplication resolves in an innunciation de possibili præterito. We might have represented quo versificatur ratione presentis; and therefore if at the time of the parliament they had power to represent these things, the enunciation of that power cannot import calumny or reproach to his majesty. And seeing the actual representation of these things could have imported no injury to his majesty, 'quia ubi licentia loquendi nisi in dando consilio et senatu?' Menoch. Concil. 107. num. 2, far less could the affirming of their forbearance from an act not injurious in itself, have been conceived or interpreted to be reproachful to his majesty. And whereas it is libelled, that the prohibition of the nobility and gentry to meet amongst themselves, or with the lords of the articles, is false; non relevat, because it is not positively affirmed that they were prohibit, but only that they might have represented the prohibition of these meetings. For the verity of the which enunciation, and the defence of it from being reproachful, the power of representing is sufficient with any probable ground to believe that these meetings were prohibit, whether upon surmises, or upon any other occasion. And lastly, it is declared afterward, that they forbear to make use of these reasons, which they might have probably represented, to give his majesty full content in every thing that in their opinion maketh not a breach in our religion or laws: whereby the justness and lawfulness of all they consented to or forbore to oppose, is clearly acknowledged; And that it appeared to the Pannel, and may appear to any, that they might have opposed the king's procedure. It is not to traduce it as unjust in points which they both by their silence acquiesced unto, and expressly acknowledge that they import no breach in our religion and laws, but to show how probably they might have opposed divers points thereof, if they had been possessed with a seditious spirit of opposition, and thereby carried to dis-assent from other acts, as they feared his majesty might have been moved to believe.

It is answered to the point of slighting the grievances of the country, That his majesty's proceeding is not taxed, because it is not said that they were proponed in parliament, and rejected or slighted; but only whereas in the convention of the estates the person chiefly intrusted by his majesty undertook to acquaint his majesty therewith, and to procure redress, nevertheless no notice was taken thereof, and they were slighted not by his majesty, but by those who undertook to acquaint his majesty, and therefore reflects only upon them.

It is answered to that point of the ditty bearing the ignorant and false affirmations, that before the 1609 year of God, the noblemen made choice of some of their rank to be on the articles, the supplicants ignorance, in the pannel's conception, lays no aspersion upon his majesty or his proceedings.

It is answered to that point of the ditty, bearing the taxing of the undutiful choice made by the bishops, of noblemen insufficient, or un-experimented, to be upon the articles, That it is not injurious in the pannel's conception to his majesty, in his person, estate, or government. Secondly, Repeats the general answer, that it is not positively affirmed of the bishops, that they did undutifully, or that the noblemen elected upon the articles were popish or ignorant; but that they had probable grounds in their opinion to think so, and to represent.

It is answered to the point of reproaching of his majesty for the acceptance of the taxations, That in the pannel's conception his majesty is not challenged upon his speeches in parliament, nor upon the narrative of his proclamations, nor by the antitheses of king James 1, his practice: but his majesty's speeches in parliament, his proclamations, king James 1, his practice, and the parallel of the estate of the country, and the end of taxations under either king, and his majesty's father of worthy memory, is adduced in the pannel's conception as specious reasons wherewith they might have opposed the granting of the taxations, if they had had an disloyal intention to mar his majesty's ways and benefits.

It is answered to the point of challenging of his majesty for employment of his taxations, and for his liberality in rewarding his officers, That in the pannel's conception it is not spoken positively and by way of reproach, as the former points, shewing how far the dis-assenters were from averseness or tepidness in his majesty's service; seeing without expatiating on the common head usual on such occasions, against the granting taxations; without inquiring of the reasons and causes of granting the taxations; without representing the inconvenience to ensue, they all unanimously favoured his majesty's benefit.
