

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES

OF

THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

AT THE SECOND SESSION OF THE TENTH CONGRESS, BEGUN AT THE CITY OF WASHINGTON, MONDAY, NOVEMBER 7, 1808.

MONDAY, November 7, 1808.

Conformably to the act, passed the last session, entitled "An act to alter the time for the next meeting of Congress," the second session of the tenth Congress commenced this day; and the Senate assembled at the City of Washington.

PRESENT:

GEORGE CLINTON, Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate.

NICHOLAS GILMAN and NAHUM PARKER, from New Hampshire.

TIMOTHY PICKERING, from Massachusetts.

JAMES HILLHOUSE and CHAUNCEY GOODRICH, from Connecticut.

BENJAMIN HOWLAND and ELISHA MATHEWSON, from Rhode Island.

STEPHEN R. BRADLEY and JONATHAN ROBINSON, from Vermont.

SAMUEL L. MITCHILL and JOHN SMITH, from New York.

JOHN CONDIT and AARON KITCHEL, from New Jersey.

SAMUEL MACLAY, from Pennsylvania.

SAMUEL WHITE, from Delaware.

WILLIAM B. GILES, from Virginia.

JAMES TURNER, from North Carolina.

THOMAS SUMTER and JOHN GAILLARD, from South Carolina.

WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD, from Georgia.

BUCKNER THRUSTON and JOHN POPE, from Kentucky.

DANIEL SMITH, from Tennessee.

EDWARD TIFFIN, from Ohio.

JAMES LLOYD, JUN., appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, to supply the place of JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, resigned, took his seat in the Senate, and produced his credentials, which were read, and the oath prescribed by law was administered to him.

Ordered, That the Secretary acquaint the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled and ready to proceed to business; and that Messrs. BRADLEY and POPE be a committee on the part of the Senate, together with such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives on their part, to wait on the President of the United States and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that a quorum of the House is assembled and ready to proceed to business; and that the House had appointed a committee on their part, jointly, with the committee appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of United States and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled.

Resolved, That each Senator be supplied, during the present session, with three such newspapers, printed in any of the States, as he may choose, provided that the same be furnished at the usual rate for the annual charge of such papers; and, provided, also, that if any Senator shall choose to take any newspapers other than daily papers, he shall be supplied with as many such papers as shall not exceed the price of three daily papers.

The PRESIDENT communicated a resolution and memorial of the House of Representatives of the Mississippi Territory, signed by the Speaker, praying an extension of the time for payment of the first instalment for the purchase of lands, due January, 1809; also, praying that a bill under consideration in the House of Representatives at their last session, for establishing a Federal court in that district, should not pass into a law, for reasons mentioned in the memorial; which was read and ordered to lie for consideration.

Resolved, That JAMES MATHERS, Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper to the Senate, be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ one assistant and two horses, for the purpose of performing such services as are usually required by the Doorkeeper to the Senate; and that the sum of twenty-eight dollars be allowed him weekly for that purpose, to commence with, and remain during the session, and for twenty days after.

On motion, by Mr. BRADLEY,

Resolved, That two Chaplains, of different denominations, be appointed to Congress during the present session, one by each House, who shall interchange weekly.

Mr. BRADLEY reported, from the joint committee, that they had waited on the President of the United States, agreeably to order, and that the President of the United States informed the committee that he would make a communication to the two Houses at 12 o'clock to-morrow.

TUESDAY, November 8.

SAMUEL SMITH and PHILIP REED, from the State of Maryland, attended.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

It would have been a source, fellow-citizens, of much gratification, if our last communications from Europe had enabled me to inform you that the belligerent nations, whose disregard of neutral rights has been so destructive to our commerce, had become awakened to the duty and true policy of revoking their unrighteous edicts. That no means might be omitted to produce this salutary effect, I lost no time in availing myself of the act authorizing a suspension, in whole, or in part, of the several embargo laws. Our Ministers at London and Paris were instructed to explain to the respective Governments there, our disposition to exercise the authority in such manner as would withdraw the pretext on which aggressions were originally founded, and open the way for a renewal of that commercial intercourse which it was alleged, on all sides, had been reluctantly obstructed. As each of those Governments had pledged its readiness to concur in renouncing a measure which reached its adversary through the incontestable rights of neutrals only, and as the measure had been assumed by each as a retaliation for an asserted acquiescence in the aggressions of the other, it was reasonably expected that the occasion would have been seized by both for evincing the sincerity of their professions, and for restoring to the commerce of the United States its legitimate freedom. The instructions of our Ministers, with respect to the different belligerents, were necessarily modified with a reference to their different circumstances, and to the condition annexed by law to the Executive power of suspension requiring a degree of security to our commerce which would not result from a repeal of the decrees of France. Instead of a pledge therefore of a suspension of the embargo as to her, in case of such a repeal, it was presumed that a sufficient inducement might be found in other considerations, and particularly in the change produced by a compliance with our just demands by one belligerent, and a refusal by the other, in the relations between the other and the United States. To Great Britain, whose power on the ocean is so ascendant, it was deemed not inconsistent with that condition to state, explicitly, on her rescinding her orders in relation to the United States, their trade would be opened with her, and remain shut to her enemy, in case of his failure to rescind his decrees also. From France no answer has been received, nor any indication that the requisite change in her decrees is contemplated. The favorable reception of the proposition to Great Britain was the less to be doubted, as her Orders of Council had not only been referred for their vindication to an acquiescence on the part of the United States no longer to be pretended, but as the arrangement proposed, whilst it resisted the illegal decrees of France, involved, moreover, substantially, the precise advantages professedly aimed at by the British Orders. The arrangement has, nevertheless, been rejected.

This candid and liberal experiment having thus failed, and no other event having occurred on which a suspension of the embargo by the Executive was authorized, it necessarily remains in the extent originally given to it. We have the satisfaction, however, to reflect, that, in return for the privations imposed by the measure, and which our fellow-citizens in general have borne with patriotism, it has had the important effects of saving our mariners, and our vast mercantile property, as well as of affording time for prosecuting the defensive and provisional measures called for by the occasion. It has demonstrated to foreign nations the moderation and firmness which govern our councils, and to our citizens the necessity of uniting in support of the laws and the rights of their country, and has thus long frustrated those usurpations and spoliations which, if resisted, involved war, if submitted to, sacrificed a vital principle of our national independence.

Under a continuance of the belligerent measures, which, in defiance of laws which consecrate the rights of neutrals, overspread the ocean with danger, it will rest with the wisdom of Congress to decide on the course best adapted to such a state of things; and bringing with them, as they do, from every part of the Union, the sentiments of our constituents, my confidence is strengthened that, in forming this decision, they will, with an unerring regard to the essential rights and interests of the nation, weigh and compare the painful alternatives out of which a choice is to be made. Nor should I do justice to the virtues which, on other occasions, have marked the character of our fellow-citizens, if I did not cherish an equal confidence that the alternative chosen, whatever it may be, will be maintained with all the fortitude and patriotism which the crisis ought to inspire.

The documents containing the correspondences on the subject of foreign edicts against our commerce, with the instructions given to our Ministers at London and Paris, are now laid before you.

The communications made to Congress at their last session explained the posture in which the close of the discussions relating to the attack by a British ship of war on the frigate Chesapeake, left a subject on which the nation had manifested so honorable a sensibility. Every view of what had passed authorized a belief that immediate steps would be taken by the British Government for redressing a wrong, which, the more it was investigated, appeared the more clearly to require what had not been provided for in the special mission. It is found that no steps have been taken for the purpose. On the contrary, it will be seen, in the documents laid before you, that the inadmissible preliminary, which obstructed the adjustment, is still adhered to; and, moreover, that it is now brought into connexion with the distinct and irrelative case of the Orders in Council. The instructions which had been given to our Minister at London, with a view to facilitate, if necessary, the reparation claimed by the United States, are included in the documents communicated.

Our relations with the other Powers of Europe have undergone no material changes since our last session. The important negotiations with Spain, which had been alternately suspended and resumed, necessarily experience a pause under the extraordinary and interesting crisis which distinguishes her internal situation.

With the Barbary Powers we continue in harmony, with the exception of an unjustifiable proceeding of the Dey of Algiers towards our Consul to that Regency,

NOVEMBER, 1808.

President's Annual Message.

SENATE.

Its character and circumstances are now laid before you, and will enable you to decide how far it may, either now or hereafter, call for any measures not within the limits of the Executive authority.

With our Indian neighbors the public peace has been steadily maintained. Some instances of individual wrong have, as at other times, taken place, but in no wise implicating the will of the nation. Beyond the Mississippi, the Iowas, the Sacs, and the Alabamas, have delivered up for trial and punishment individuals from among themselves, accused of murdering citizens of the United States. On this side of the Mississippi, the Creeks are exerting themselves to arrest offenders of the same kind; and the Choctaws have manifested their readiness and desire for amicable and just arrangements respecting depredations committed by disorderly persons of their tribe. And, generally, from a conviction that we consider them as a part of ourselves, and cherish with sincerity their rights and interests, the attachment of the Indian tribes is gaining strength daily, is extending from the nearer to the more remote, and will amply requite us for the justice and friendship practised towards them. Husbandry and household manufactures are advancing among them, more rapidly with the southern than northern tribes, from circumstances of soil and climate; and one of the two great divisions of the Cherokee nation have now under consideration to solicit the citizenship of the United States, and to be identified with us in laws and government, in such progressive manner as we shall think best.

In consequence of the appropriations of the last session of Congress for the security of our seaport towns and harbors, such works of defence have been erected as seemed to be called for by the situation of the several places, their relative importance, and the scale of expense indicated by the amount of the appropriation. These works will chiefly be finished in the course of the present season, except at New York and New Orleans, where most was to be done; and although a great proportion of the last appropriation has been expended on the former place, yet some further views will be submitted to Congress for rendering its security entirely adequate against naval enterprise. A view of what has been done at the several places, and of what is proposed to be done, shall be communicated as soon as the several reports are received.

Of the gun-boats authorized by the act of December last, it has been thought necessary to build only one hundred and three in the present year. These, with those before possessed, are sufficient for the harbors and waters most exposed, and the residue will require little time for their construction when it shall be deemed necessary.

Under the act of the last session for raising an additional military force, so many officers were immediately appointed as were necessary for carrying on the business of recruiting, and in proportion as it advanced, others have been added. We have reason to believe their success has been satisfactory, although such returns have not yet been received as enable me to present you a statement of the number engaged.

I have not thought it necessary, in the course of the last season, to call for any general detachments of militia or of volunteers, under the laws passed for that purpose. For the ensuing season, however, they will be required to be in readiness should their service be wanted. Some small and special detachments have been necessary to maintain the laws of embargo on that portion of our northern frontier which offered peculiar facilities for evasion, but these were replaced as soon as it could be done by bodies of new recruits. By the aid of these, and of the armed vessels called into service in other quarters, the spirit of disobedience and abuse, which manifested itself early, and with sensible effect while we were unprepared to meet it, has been considerably repressed.

Considering the extraordinary character of the times in which we live, our attention should unremittingly be fixed on the safety of our country. For a people who are free, and who mean to remain so, a well organized and armed militia is their best security. It is therefore incumbent on us, at every meeting, to revise the condition of the militia, and to ask ourselves if it is prepared to repel a powerful enemy at every point of our territories exposed to invasion? Some of the States have paid a laudable attention to this object; but every degree of neglect is to be found among others. Congress alone having the power to produce an uniform state of preparation in this great organ of defence, the interests which they so deeply feel in their own and their country's security will present this as among the most important objects of their deliberation.

Under the acts of March 11 and April 23, respecting arms, the difficulty of procuring them from abroad, during the present situation and dispositions of Europe, induced us to direct our whole efforts to the means of internal supply. The public factories have therefore been enlarged, additional machineries erected, and, in proportion as artificers can be found or formed, their effect, already more than doubled, may be increased so as to keep pace with the yearly increase of the militia. The annual sums appropriated by the latter act have been directed to the encouragement of private factories of arms, and contracts have been entered into with individual undertakers to nearly the amount of the first year's appropriation.

The suspension of our foreign commerce, produced by the injustice of the belligerent Powers, and the consequent losses and sacrifices of our citizens, are subjects of just concern. The situation into which we have thus been forced has impelled us to apply a portion of our industry and capital to internal manufactures and improvements. The extent of this conversion is daily increasing, and little doubt remains that the establishments formed and forming will, under the auspices of cheaper materials and subsistence, the freedom of labor from taxation with us, and of protecting duties and prohibitions, become permanent. The commerce with the Indians too, within our own boundaries, is likely to receive abundant aliment from the same internal source, and will secure to them peace and the progress of civilization, undisturbed by practices hostile to both.

The accounts of the receipts and expenditures during the year ending on the thirtieth day of September last, being not yet made up, a correct statement will hereafter be transmitted from the Treasury. In the meantime, it is ascertained that the receipts have amounted to near eighteen millions of dollars, which, with the eight millions and a half in the Treasury at the beginning of the year, have enabled us, after meeting the current demands, and interest incurred, to pay two millions three hundred thousand dollars of the principal of our funded debt, and left us in the Treasury, on that day, near fourteen millions of dollars. Of these, five millions three hundred and fifty thousand dollars will be necessary to pay what will be due on the first day of January next, which will complete the reimbursement of the eight per cent. stock. These payments, with those made in the six years and a half preceding, will have extinguished thirty-three millions five hun-ded and eighty thousand dollars of the principal of the funded debt, being the whole which could be paid or purchased within the limits of the law and our contracts; and the amount of principal thus discharged will have liberated the revenue from about two millions of dollars of interest, and added that sum annually to the disposable surplus. The probable accumulation of the surplusses of revenue beyond what can be applied to the payment of the public debt, whenever the freedom and safety of our commerce shall be restored, merits the consideration of Congress. Shall it lie unproductive in the public vaults? Shall the revenue be reduced? Or, shall it not rather be appropriated to the improvements of roads, canals, rivers, education, and other great foundations of prosperity and union, under the powers which Congress may already possess, or such amendment of the Constitution as may be approved by the States? While uncertain of the course of things, the time may be advantageously employed in obtaining the powers necessary for a system of improvement, should that be thought best.

Availing myself of this, the last occasion which will occur, of addressing the two Houses of the Legislature at their meeting, I cannot omit the expression of my sincere gratitude for the repeated proofs of confidence manifested to me by themselves and their predecessors since my call to the administration, and the many indulgences experienced at their hands. The same grateful acknowledgments are due to my fellow-citizens generally, whose support has been my great encouragement under all embarrassments. In the transaction of their business I cannot have escaped error. It is incident to our imperfect nature. But I may say with truth my errors have been of the understanding, not of intention, and that the advancement of their rights and interests has been the constant motive for every measure. On these considerations I solicit their indulgence. Looking forward with anxiety to their future destinies, I trust, that, in their steady character, unshaken by difficulties, in their love of liberty, obedience to law, and support of the public authorities, I see a sure guarantee of the permanence of our Republic; and retiring from the charge of their affairs, I carry with me the consolation of a firm persuasion that Heaven has in store for our beloved country long ages to come of prosperity and happiness.

TH. JEFFERSON.

NOVEMBER 8, 1808.

The Message and papers were in part read, and one thousand copies ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

A confidential Message was also received, with sundry documents therein referred to, which were read for consideration.

WEDNESDAY, November 9.

JESSE FRANKLIN, from the State of North Carolina, attended.

The Senate proceeded in reading the documents referred to in the Message of the President of the United States of yesterday.

On motion by Mr. REED,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the state and condition of the Chamber prepared for the Senate to convene in during the present session, and to report whether it is safe and expedient to continue therein, or to remove to some other apartment.

Ordered, That Messrs. REED, WHITE, and BRADLEY, be the committee.

THURSDAY, November 10.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland, submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, amendments are necessary to the militia laws of the United States.

The following motion was submitted by Mr. GILES:

Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the several embargo laws, be referred to a select committee, with instructions to examine and report whether any further measures are now necessary to enforce a due observance thereof during their continuance; and, also, whether any further modification thereof be expedient at this time, and that such committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

On making this motion, Mr. GILES observed, that, as the resolution he had the honor of moving respecting the embargo laws, was intended only as an inquiry into that subject, which was deemed important to all, and if to be further acted upon, requiring immediate attention; and, as it did not commit the Senate upon any point in relation to those laws, he hoped that the committee might be now appointed.

Mr. GOODRICH requested that the motion might not be acted upon until to-morrow, to which Mr. GILES agreed.

The Senate proceeded to the election of a Chaplain on their part, in pursuance of the resolution of the two Houses, and the whole number of votes collected was 20, of which the Reverend Mr. ELLIOTT had 11, and was accordingly elected.

FRIDAY, November 11.

Mr. WHITE submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That the President of the United States cause to be laid before the Senate copies of all the orders and decrees of the belligerent Powers of Europe, passed since one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, affecting the commercial rights of the United States.

Mr. HILLHOUSE submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That it is expedient that the act, entitled "An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States," and the several acts supplementary thereto, be repealed; and that a committee be appointed to prepare and report a bill for that purpose.

Mr. LLOYD submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate a statement showing the number of vessels which have departed from the United States, with permission, between the 22d of December, 1807, and the 30th September, 1808; specifying the names of the vessels and their owners; the size of the vessels; the date of their clearances; the ports or places for which they were destined; and the amount authorized to be brought back to the United States in each of such vessels.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion made yesterday, that a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, amendments are necessary to the militia laws of the United States; and having agreed thereto, Ordered, That Messrs. SMITH of Maryland, SUMTER, and BRADLEY, be the committee.

Mr. MACLAY presented the memorial of Charles Pleasants, and other merchants, of the city of Philadelphia, stating that, since the 10th of March, 1808, they have imported sundry goods, wares, and merchandise, consisting of articles enumerated in the act of Congress, passed on that day, entitled "An act for extending the terms of credit on revenue bonds in certain cases, and for other purposes;" but that, by the construction of the Treasury officers, no advantage of its provisions can be had in favor of goods imported subsequent to its date. The memorialists, therefore, pray that the Legislature will provide for an extension of the relief afforded by the said act to their cases, for reasons stated in the memorial; which was read and ordered to lie for consideration.

The following motion was submitted by Mr. REED:

Resolved, That, in future, the Secretary provide, for the use of the Senate, stationery of the manufacture of the United States, or of some Territory thereof.

The Senate resumed the motion made yesterday, that so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the several embargo laws, be referred to a select committee, with instructions to examine and report whether any further measures are now necessary to enforce due observance thereof during their continuance; and, also, whether any further modification thereof be expedient at this time; and that such committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. MITCHELL moved an amendment, to insert after the word "modification," the words "or a repeal." Mr. M. said his object was to refer the whole subject, and authorize the committee to inquire as well into the expediency of a removal of these laws, as into further provisions for enforcing them, if it should be judged most safe and proper to preserve them in operation. He thought this the most expeditious way of obtaining the opinion of the Senate on that great question, which was the subject of the most anxious solicitude, and on which he wished there might not be a day's nor even an hour's delay.

The amendment was not seconded. Mr. GILES's motion was then agreed to, and Messrs. GILES, SMITH of Maryland, HILLHOUSE, BRADLEY, and POPE, were appointed the committee.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have appointed the Rev. Mr. BROWN a Chaplain to Congress, on their part, during the present session.

MONDAY, November 14.

JOSEPH ANDERSON, from the State of Tennessee, and ANDREW MOORE, from the State of Virginia, attended.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the 11th instant, requesting the President of the United States to lay before the Senate the orders and decrees of the belligerent Powers of Europe since 1792; and the motion having been amended, was agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate copies of all the orders and decrees of the belligerent Powers of Europe, passed since one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, affecting the commercial rights of the United States.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay this resolution before the President of the United States.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the 11th instant, requesting the President of the United States to lay before the Senate a statement showing the number of vessels which have departed from the United States since December 22, 1807; and

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate a statement showing the number of vessels which have departed from the United States, with permission, between the 22d of December, 1807, and the 30th of September, 1808, specifying the names of vessels and their owners, the size of the vessels, the date of their clearances, the ports or places for which they were destined, and the amount authorized to be brought back to the United States in each of such vessels.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay this resolution before the President of the United States.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the 11th instant, directing the use of American stationery, and, having amended the motion, it was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That, in future, the Secretary provide for the use of the Senate stationery of the manufacture of the United States, or of some Territory thereof, as far as the same can be conveniently procured.

TUESDAY, November 15.

The PRESIDENT communicated the resolutions passed by the House of Representatives of the Indiana Territory, on the 11th of October last, stating the discontents prevailing among the people west of the Wabash, in consequence of their connexion with the people eastward of the said river, and requesting a separation, as the only means of restoring harmony, and terminating those discontents, so essential to their general prosperity; and the resolutions were read.

Ordered, That they be referred to Messrs. POPE, TIFFIN, and BRADLEY, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. REED, from the committee appointed on the 9th instant, to inquire into the state and condition of the Chamber prepared for the Senate during the present session, and whether it is safe and expedient to continue therein, made a report, which was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

WEDNESDAY, November 16.

ANDREW GREGG, from the State of Pennsylvania, attended.

SENATE.

The Embargo.

NOVEMBER, 1808.

Mr. BRADLEY laid the following motion on the table :

Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the Barbary Powers, and the unjustifiable proceeding of the Dey of Algiers towards our Consul at that Regency, with the documents accompanying the same, be referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon.

On motion, it was agreed that the motion of Mr. HILLHOUSE, for repealing the embargo laws, be the order of the day for Monday next.

THURSDAY, November 17.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to authorize the transportation of a certain Message of the President of the United States, and documents accompanying the same;" in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill was read three several times by unanimous consent, and passed.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made yesterday, to refer so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the Barbary Powers, and the unjustifiable proceeding of the Dey of Algiers towards our Consul at that Regency, with the documents accompanying the same, to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and, having agreed thereto, Messrs. BRADLEY, GILES, and SMITH of Maryland, were appointed the committee.

Mr. ANDERSON submitted the following motion :

Resolved, That — copies of the memorials of the merchants of Boston, Salem, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Norfolk, which were presented to the Senate during the first session of the ninth Congress, relative to the infringements of our neutral trade, together with the resolutions of the Senate predicated thereupon, be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. WHITE laid on the table the following motion :

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate, so far as he may deem consistent with the public safety, the reasons that have induced the late call upon the Governors of the respective States, to have their quotas of an hundred thousand militia draughted, equipped, and ready to march at a moment's warning, and the services on which it is apprehended there may be a necessity of employing them.

Mr. THRUSTON gave notice that he should tomorrow ask leave to bring in a bill to reward Andrew Joseph Villard for an invention of public utility.

FRIDAY, November 18.

Mr. THRUSTON, agreeably to notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to reward Andrew Joseph Villard for an invention of public utility; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made yesterday for printing the memorials of certain merchants, presented during the first session of the ninth Congress; and the motion was amended, as follows :

Resolved, That two hundred copies of the memorials of the merchants of Boston, Salem, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, New Haven, and Newburyport, which were presented to the Senate during the first session of the ninth Congress, relative to the infringements of our neutral trade, together with the resolutions of the Senate predicated thereupon, be printed for the use of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. LLOYD, further to amend the motion by adding the following, after the word "thereupon:" "and also of the memorials presented to Congress in the year 1798, by sundry citizens of the United States, in opposition to permission being granted to the merchants of the United States to arm their vessels;" it was determined in the negative. And the original motion, as amended, was agreed to.

On motion, it was agreed, that the motion submitted yesterday, to request the President of the United States to lay before the Senate the reasons for calling on the Governors of the several States for their quotas of one hundred thousand men, be postponed.

MONDAY, November 21.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to authorize the conveyance of certain papers and documents by the mail free of postage," in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last mentioned was read, and passed to the second reading.

The PRESIDENT communicated the resolutions of the Legislative Council of the Indiana Territory, passed October 26, 1808, respecting the mode of electing the Legislative Council, and the time of their continuance in office; which were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The bill to reward Andrew Joseph Villard, for an invention of public utility, was read the second time.

THE EMBARGO.

This being the day fixed for the discussion of the following resolution, offered by Mr. HILLHOUSE :

Resolved, That it is expedient that the act, entitled "An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States," and the several acts supplementary thereto, be repealed; and that a committee be appointed to prepare and report a bill for that purpose.

Mr. HILLHOUSE opened the debate. When the reporter entered the Senate chamber, Mr. H. had been speaking for a few minutes, and was then discussing the effect which the embargo had had upon France, and the light in which it was viewed by her rulers. He alluded to the declaration of satisfaction at the measure, contained in a late French exposé, and made many observations tending to show that it was not a measure of hostility or coercion, as applied to France.

On England it had little or no effect. Her resources were immense. If deprived of a supply of grain here, she could obtain it elsewhere. The Barbary Powers were at war with France and at peace with England, who might thence obtain wheat in any quantity she pleased. Great Britain, he said, was a nation with the whole world before her; her commerce spread over every sea, and she had access to almost every port and clime. Could America expect to starve this nation? It was a farce, an idle farce. As to her West India islands, they raised Indian corn; all their sugar plantations could be converted into corn-fields, and would any man say that they would starve because they could not get superfine flour? Was this a necessary of life without which they could not subsist? On the contrary, a great proportion of the American people subsisted on it, and enjoyed as good health as if they ate nothing but the finest of wheat flour. The moment people understood that they could not get their necessary supplies from a customary source, they would look out for it in another quarter, and ample time had been given to them to make arrangements for this purpose. A man of the first respectability in the town in which Mr. H. lived, had been there during this embargo, under the President's permission. What accounts did he bring? Why, that the trade in corn meal and live cattle, articles of great export from Connecticut, and comprising not only the product of that State, but of parts of the neighboring States, would be entirely defeated; that, where they had formerly sent a hundred hogsheads of meal, they would not now find vent for ten; and that, from South America, where cattle had, in times past, been killed merely for their hides and tallow, cattle in abundance could be procured. Were these people to be starved out, when they could actually purchase cheaper now from other places than they had formerly done from us? No; the only consequence would be, and that too severely felt, that we should lose our markets; the embargo thus producing, not only present privation and injury, but permanent mischief. The United States would have lost the chance of obtaining future supplies, they would have lost their market, and ten or twenty years would place them on the same footing as before. Mr. H. said, the West Indians would have learnt that they can do without us; that they can raise provisions cheaper on their own plantations than we can sell them; and knowing this, they would never resort to us. Though we might retain a part of this commerce, the best part would be lost forever. The trade would not be worth pursuing; though this might answer one purpose intended by the embargo, and which was not expressed.

Having considered the article of provisions as important to various parts of the Union, Mr. H. said he would now turn to another article, cotton. It had been very triumphantly said, that the want of this article would distress the manufacturers of Great Britain, produce a clamor amongst them, and consequently accelerate the repeal of the Orders in Council. Mr. H. said he would examine this a little, and see if all the evil consequences which opened on him at the time of the passage of the embargo law were not likely to be realized. He had hinted at some of them at that time, but the bill had gone through the Senate like a flash of lightning, giving no time for examination; once, twice, and a third time in one day, affording no time for the development of all its consequences. This article of cotton was used not only by Britain but by France and other nations on the Continent. Cotton, not being grown in Europe, must be transported by water carriage. This being the case, who would now be most likely to be supplied with it? Not the Continental Powers who have so little commerce afloat nor any neutrals to convey it to them; for the United States were the only neutral which, of late, traded with France, and now the embargo was laid, she had no chance of getting it, except by the precarious captures made by her privateers. To Great Britain, then, was left the whole commerce of the world, and her merchants were the only carriers. Would not these carriers supply their own manufacturers? Would they suffer cotton to go elsewhere, until they themselves were supplied? America was not the only country where cotton was raised; for he had seen an account of a whole cargo brought into Salem from the East Indies, and thence exported to Holland, with a good profit. Cotton was also raised in Africa, as well as elsewhere; and this wary nation, Great Britain, conceiving that the United States might be so impolitic as to keep on the embargo, had carried whole cargoes of the best cotton seed there for the purpose of raising cotton for her use. Great Britain had possessions in every climate on the globe, and cotton did not, like the sturdy oak, require forty or fifty years to arrive at maturity; but, if planted, would produce a plentiful supply in a year. Thus, then, when this powerful nation found America resorting to such means to coerce her, she had taken care to look out for supplies in other quarters; and, with the command of all the cotton on the globe which went to market, could we expect to coerce her by withholding ours? Mr. H. said no; all the inconvenience which she could feel from our measure had already been borne; and Great Britain was turning her attention to every part of the globe to obtain those supplies which she was wont to get from us, that she might not be reduced to the humiliating condition of making concession to induce us to repeal our own law, and purchase an accommodation by telling us that we had a weapon which we could wield to her annoyance. Mr. H. wished to know of gentlemen if we had not experience enough to know that Great Britain was not to be threatened into compliance by a rod of coercion? Let us examine ourselves, said he, for if we trace our genealogy we shall find that we descend from them; were they to use us in this manner, is there an American that would stoop to them? I hope not; and neither will that nation, from which we are descended, be driven from their position, however erroneous, by threats.

This embargo, therefore, instead of operating on those nations which had been violating our rights, was fraught with evils and privations to the people of the United States. They were the sufferers. And have we adopted the monkish plan of scourging ourselves for the sins of others? He hoped not; and that, having made the experiment and found that it had not produced its expected effect, they would abandon it as a measure wholly inefficient as to the objects intended by it, and as having weakened the great hold which we had on Great Britain, from her supposed dependence on us for raw materials.

Some gentlemen appeared to build up expectations of the efficiency of this system by an addition to it of a non-intercourse law. Mr. H. treated this as a futile idea. They should, however examine it seriously, and not like children shut their eyes to danger. Great Britain was not the only manufacturing nation in Europe. Germany, Holland, France, Spain, Portugal, and Italy, manufactured more or less, and most of them had colonies, the exclusive supply of whose manufactures they had heretofore reserved to themselves. While we had enjoyed the carrying trade, we had supplied the deficiency in navigation of those nations; and all the inconvenience felt for the want of it ceased because we stepped in and aided them. This trade had been cut up, and perhaps it was not a trade which the energies of the nation should be embarked in defending. Who was there now to supply all these various colonies that used to be supplied by us? None but England, the sole mistress of the ocean. Whose products, then, would Great Britain carry? Would she carry products of other nations and let her own manufacturers starve? No; and this exclusion from the colonies of other manufactures, and leaving her merchants the sole carriers of the world, produced a greater vent for her manufactures than the whole quantity consumed in the United States.

This, however, was arguing upon the ground that the United States would consume none of her manufactures in case of a non-intercourse. Mr. H. said he was young when the old non-intercourse took place, but he remembered it well, and had then his ideas on the subject. The British army was then at their door, burning their towns and ravaging the country, and at least as much patriotism existed then as now; but British fabrics were received and consumed to almost as great an extent as before the prohibition. The armies could not get fresh provisions from Europe, but they got them here by paying higher prices in guineas for them than was paid by our Government in ragged continental paper money. When the country was in want of clothing, and could get it for one-fourth price from the British, what was the consequence? Why, all the zealous patriots—for this work of tarring and feathering, and meeting in mobs to destroy their neighbor's property, because he could not think quite as fast as they did, which seemed to be coming in fashion now, had been carried on then with great zeal—these patriots, although all intercourse was penal, carried on commerce notwithstanding. Supplies went hence, and manufactures were received from Europe. Now, what reliance could be placed on this patriotism? A gentleman from Vermont had told the Senate at the last session that the patriotism of Vermont would stop all exportation by land, without the assistance of the law. How had it turned out? Why, patriotism, cannon, militia, and all had not stopped it; and although the field pieces might have stopped it on the Lakes, they were absolutely cutting new roads to carry it on by land. And yet the gentleman had supposed that their patriotism would effectually stop it! Now Mr. H. wanted to know how a non-intercourse law was to be executed by us with a coast of fifteen hundred miles open to Great Britain by sea, and joining her by land? Her goods would come through our Courts of Admiralty by the means of friendly captors; they would be brought in, condemned, and then naturalized, as Irishmen are now naturalized, before they have been a month in the country.

Mr. H. went on at some length to show the impracticability of enforcing a non-intercourse law on our citizens.

It had been said that the embargo should not be raised, because there was no commerce that could now be safely pursued. He was astonished that gentlemen should introduce this argument, as it went upon the ground that France and England could mutually arrest our commerce with each other. If this were really the fact, merchants, who were so nice in their calculations, would not risk their property. The insurance offices were perfect thermometers by which to calculate the degree of risk in any commerce. They always made their calculations on the safe side, and it would be found that no property was more sought after than insurance stock, and this was because the institutions were usually conducted by cautious merchants. A few harum-scarum individual merchants might engage in hazardous enterprises and lose all. Such men would never be controlled by law or prudent considerations. But the great body of merchants would always regulate the course of trade, and there was no need of an embargo to save them from running too great a risk.

How had they done in times past? Laws had been in force making it unlawful to trade with the Spanish possessions in South America; but we had nevertheless carried on a profitable trade there, and not all the vigilance of Spain could prevent it. Now and then a few of our citizens had been caught and imprisoned, but that had not stopped our trade; nor was it in the power of France and England combined to do it. On this subject, Mr. H. said, gentlemen took for granted what was not true. France had issued her decree, saying that no vessel should navigate to England or her dependencies. What had been the consequence of this decree? It had not raised insurance five per centum. Had there been no good reason for this? Yes; it was well known that the whole combined navy of France was not able to meet a British fleet on the ocean. The French ships of war, therefore, could never go out but by stealth, and could not spread over the ocean so as to endanger our commerce. Insur-ance had therefore been very little affected; and was it worth while to abandon trade with Eng-land altogether because France said we must not carry it on? This was revenging ourselves upon them with a witness! After the embargo had been laid—for, at that time, he affirmed they had no knowledge of the British orders—some news- paper speculations on the subject had appeared, but the orders were not officially communicated by the President till the 4th of February ensu- ing—what said England? You shall not trade to France, said she. England had it in her power to enforce her decree, and the insurance rising proportionably, the merchant had it in his power to say whether his probable profits would justify his sending a cargo to France under so great an insurance. But he asked a question now as to our interest simply, excluding other forcible con- siderations—when it was not in the power of France to enforce her decrees, and it was in the power of England to enforce her orders in a very great extent, would it have been good policy to involve ourselves in a maritime war with Eng- land, who had overcome all the combined fleets of Europe, for the sake of defending our trade with France? If any trade cost more than it was worth, Mr. H. said it was our interest to abandon it. But there was another danger attendant on our trade to France, and which had ever attended it—sequestration. American property was very apt to be sequestered; and, in enforcing their Ber- lin decree, the French had thought proper to burn our vessels; and though it had been said that the Berlin decree had never been applied to us before the case of the Horizon, yet vessels had been sequestered in February, 1807, sold, and the money retained, and would probably never be restored. This sequestration had been practised in the French ports more or less since the commence- ment of the Revolution, and we had never got one dollar as compensation. To be sure, in the Treaty of Louisiana, we had been allowed to pay money to our own citizens, but it had never come out of French coffers. Was it worth our while to engage in a maritime war with England to support a trade with France? Mr. H. said no; our interest would not have warranted it. For, notwithstanding all that France could do, at a risk of five per cent. we might have had a trade with the British islands, Sweden, Portugal, the East Indies, the British West India islands, and other countries—a profitable trade, too. But gen- tlemen said, would they submit to pay tribute to Great Britain? No. This tribute was but a mere name. They must pay tribute for going from England to France, where they would be captured as a matter of course, because they had touched English ground. It was a tribute to be paid in a case which would never happen—a mere nullity. But, said gentlemen, there are American vessels which have gone to England, the embargo notwithstanding, and thence to various ports of the Continent, by the aid of false papers.

Were they to embark in a conflict to prevent their citizens from doing this? All this smuggling work, where it was not under the sanction of laws of the United States, reflected no disgrace on the honor of the nation, which was not re- sponsible for it.

If there were nothing that would commit the honor of the nation in the way of it, Mr. H. said it would be the interest of this nation to abandon its commerce with France, not only on account of the risk in carrying it on, but on account of the risk after it gets into port. Mr. Armstrong said—but he would not allude to him, for fear he might tread on confidential ground; however, ac- counts had been received from our Consuls and merchants, that whenever it suited the conveni- ence of the French nation to lay their hands on American property, they had done it; and, there- fore, our trade to that country was on a very in- secure footing indeed.

But, said gentlemen, if they allowed our ves- sels to trade to England and not to France, it was a submission to her orders, and a resignation of our independence; therefore, the embargo must be maintained to keep on equal ground. I could never see, observed Mr. H., how the embargo was the means of preserving the honor of the nation. These nations say we shall not trade; and, there- fore, by an embargo, we destroy our commerce. This is magnanimous, indeed. It is a new way of preserving commerce; because foreign nations say we shall not follow it, we say we will abandon it. Do we not comply with the requisition of these nations completely; more than comply, for we surrender all commerce. It is the most tame surrender of our rights.

But, said gentlemen, we must have embargo or war. This, Mr. H. said, had been urged in pub- lic debate, in the newspapers, and almost all com- munications they had received. For his part he could not see how a repeal of the embargo was to involve us in war, except it were, as was said last winter, that Bonaparte would have no neutrals; and, therefore, if we did not continue the em- bargo, he would declare war against us. Was this a ground on which to surrender commerce, and subject all our citizens to inconvenience be- cause he would otherwise declare war? What more could he do than he had done? What more than burn our ships and sequester our property? He could do no more. Why, then, should they be terrified thus? If war came thus, let it come. Mr. H. said he was not for declaring war against any nation, but he was for authorizing the arm- ing our commerce, for authorizing our merchants to defend those maritime rights which were clear and indisputable; and this would not be war, for no nation, not predetermined to make war, would make war upon us for defending our maritime rights. I should not, said he, be willing to go to war for doubtful rights, as that of the carrying trade between the mother country and her colo- nies; but our indisputable neutral rights I am for defending, not abandoning.

Mr. H. said he thought when the embargo was laid, though, perhaps, he had been singular in the opinion, that it was intended as a permanent measure; that the real object was not what had been expressed in the Message, but to put down commerce and set up manufactures; to convert all our commercial capital into manufactures, and all our commercial men into manufacturers; and many honest politicians had thought it would be a practicable, and useful, and beneficial plan, though the contrary had ever been his opinion. In confirmation of his opinion, Mr. H. said, when they looked over official and other publications which bore the stamp of authority, or were considered as being approved by the constituted authorities of the country, they were told that the agriculturist and manufacturer should be planted side by side, and that they should sit at their own doors, clothed in their own manufactures of those articles which they had before received from others. These ideas could never be realized but by abandoning commerce.

Mr. H. here went at some length into a discussion on the subject of manufactures, using arguments tending to demonstrate that large manufactories are as unsuitable to the genius of a free people as to the peculiar habits of the people of the United States.

Mr. H. said no man was more desirous to obey the laws of his country than he was; but in a free country laws could not be forced down. Either by force, or in some other way, the people would get rid of a disagreeable law. They always had and always would do it. Therefore, attempting this system was prostrating the dignity of the Government and teaching the people to trample on the constituted authorities. He wished to see the magistracy of a free country omnipotent in its laws; but if, by projects of this kind, the people were driven to opposition, they would not confine themselves to the Constitutional remedy, but feeling their power, would exercise it with violence. Therefore, when a measure was found not to operate right, they should retreat, and they might do it too with a good grace, for it would be for the honor of the nation that they should retrace their steps.

Mr. H. said he imagined some ulterior steps might be proper if the embargo were raised; but, on conversing with members, he had found so many different opinions to prevail, that he had not coupled anything with this. When the embargo should have been done away, no doubt the councils of the nation would come to some result and adopt some measure which would take its place. For all these reasons, Mr. H. concluded by saying that he was clearly of opinion that his resolution should be adopted, and the embargo repealed.

Mr. BRADLEY moved the postponement of the further consideration of the subject till to-morrow. A committee had been appointed by the House on this subject, and the present agitation of the subject must paralyze the proceedings of the committee, if not operate against its total dissolution.

Mr. HILLHOUSE said he had no objection that the subject should be postponed till to-morrow, but the reason the gentleman had given for it was a very extraordinary one, for when an objection had been made to the appointment of this committee it had been answered that its appointment would not at all interfere with his (Mr. H.'s) resolution; upon which ground no opposition had been made to the appointment of the committee.

Mr. POPE said it had been his opinion this morning that this resolution should have been referred to that committee, but after what had been said, it was his wish that some commercial gentleman, whose knowledge of commercial subjects would enable him to explore the wide field taken by the gentleman from Connecticut, would have answered him. He had hoped, at this session, after the Presidential election was decided, that all would have dismounted from their political hobbies, that they would have been all Federalists, all Republicans, all Americans. When they saw the ocean swarming with pirates, and commerce almost annihilated, he had hoped that the demon of party spirit would not have reared its head within these walls, but that they would all have mingled opinions and consulted the common good. He had heretofore been often charmed with the matter-of-fact arguments of the gentleman from Connecticut; but on this day the gentleman had resorted to arguments from newspapers, and revived all the old story of French influence, in the same breath in which he begged them to discard all party feelings and discuss with candor. The gentleman had gone into a wide field, which Mr. H. said he would not now explore, but begged time till to-morrow, when he would endeavor to show to the nation and to the world that the arguments used by the gentleman in favor of his resolution were most weighty against it. If patriotism had departed the land, if the streams of foreign corruption had flowed so far that the people were ready to rise in opposition to their Government, it was indeed time that foreign intercourse should cease. If the spirit of 1776 were no more—if the spirit of commercial speculation had surmounted all patriotism—if this was the melancholy situation of the United States, it was time to redeem the people from this degeneracy, to regenerate them, to cause them to be born again of the spirit of 1776. But he believed he should be able to show that the proposition of the gentleman from Connecticut hardly merited the respect or serious consideration of this honorable body. Mr. P. said he had expected that in advocating his resolution the gentleman would have told the Senate that we should go to war with Great Britain and France; that he would have risen with patriotic indignation and have called for a more efficient measure. But to his surprise, the gentleman had risen, and with the utmost sang froid told them, let your ships go out, all's well, and nothing is to be apprehended. Mr. P. said he would not go into the subject at this moment; he had but risen to express his feelings on the occasion. He wished the subject postponed, the more because he wished to consult a document just laid on their table, to see how the memorials presented a short time ago from those whose cause the gentleman from Connecticut undertook to advocate, accorded with the sentiments he had this day expressed for them.

Mr. HILLHOUSE said he should have been much gratified if the gentleman from Kentucky had confined his remarks to argument, without making a personal attack on him. Mr. H. said he had arraigned no party, charged none with party views or corruption. He could not see where the gentleman found ground for personality; for Mr. H. said he never did use it himself, nor ever would.

Mr. LLOYD said as it was an exceedingly interesting subject, and had been ten days before the House, and put off with as much civility as possible to accommodate gentlemen, he wished that the subject might progress in regular discussion, not expecting, however, that it would be decided to-day or to-morrow.

Mr. S. SMITH said that if the honorable gentleman last up had a design to give a view of the subject such as it deserved, he should be glad to hear him. The gentleman was capable of giving a correct view of the subject, and perhaps had prepared his mind on it. Mr. S. confessed his own negligence in not being prepared; but if the gentleman from Massachusetts would give a commercial view of the subject, he hoped the gentleman from Vermont would withdraw his motion.

Mr. LLOYD said this was so interesting a subject that he could not be silent on it. Whether he should give that chaste view of the subject of which the gentleman from Maryland was capable, he could not say. If the Senate would indulge him, however, he would express those ideas which immediately occurred to him on the subject.

Mr. BRADLEY withdrew his motion for postponement.

Mr. LLOYD said he considered the question now under discussion as one of the most important that has occurred since the adoption of the Federal Constitution. It is a subject, said Mr. L., deeply implicating, and perhaps determining, the fate of the commerce and navigation of our country; a commerce which has afforded employment for nearly a million and a half of tons of navigation; which has found occupation for hundreds of thousands of our citizens; which has spread wealth and prosperity in every region of our country, and which has upheld the Government by furnishing the revenue for its support.

A commerce which has yielded an annual amount of exports exceeding one hundred millions of dollars; an amount of exports three times as great as was possessed by the first maritime and commercial nation of the world at the commencement of the last century, when her population was double that of the United States at this time; an amount of exports equal to what Great Britain, with her navy of a thousand ships, and with all her boasted manufactures, possessed even at so recent a period as within about fifteen years from this date: surely this is a commerce not to be trifled with; a commerce not lightly to be offered up as the victim of fruitless experiment.

Our commerce has unquestionably been subject to great embarrassment, vexation, and plunder, from the belligerents of Europe. There is no doubt but both France and Great Britain have violated the laws of nations, and immolated the rights of neutrals; but there is, in my opinion, a striking difference in the circumstances of the two nations; the one, instigated by a lawless thirst of universal domination, is seeking to extend an iron-handed, merciless despotism over every region of the globe; while the other is fighting for her natale solum, for the preservation of her liberties, and probably for her very existence.

The one professes to reluct at the inconvenience she occasions you by the adoption of measures, which are declared to be intended merely as measures of retaliation on her enemies, and which she avows she will retract, as soon as the causes which occasion them are withdrawn. The other, in addition to depredation and conflagration, treats you with the utmost contumely and disdain; she admits not that you possess the rights of sovereignty and independence, but undertakes to legislate for you, and declares that, whether you are willing or unwilling, she considers you as at war with her enemy; that she had arrested your property, and would hold it as bail for your obedience, until she knew whether you would servilely echo submission to her mandates.

There is no doubt that the conduct of these belligerents gave rise to the embargo; but if this measure has been proved by experience to be inoperative as it regards them, and destructive only as it respects ourselves, then every dictate of magnanimity, of wisdom, and of prudence, should urge the immediate repeal of it.

The propriety of doing this is now under discussion. The proposition is a naked one; it is unconnected with ulterior measures; and gentlemen who vote for its repeal ought not to be considered as averse from, and they are not opposed to, the subsequent adoption of such other measures as the honor and the interest of the country may require.

In considering this subject, it naturally presents itself under three distinct heads:

1st. As it respects the security which it gave to our navigation, and the protection it offered our seamen, which were the ostensible objects of its adoption.

2dly. In reference to its effect on other nations, meaning France and Great Britain, in coercing them to adopt a more just and honorable course of policy towards us: and, 3dly. As it regards the effects which it has produced and will produce among ourselves.

In thus considering it, sir, I shall only make a few remarks on the first head. I have no desire to indulge in retrospections; the measure was adopted by the Government; if evil has flowed from it, that evil cannot now be recalled. If events have proved it to be a wise and beneficial measure, I am willing that those to whom it owes its parentage should receive all the honors that are due to them; but if security to our navigation, and protection to our seamen, were the real objects of the embargo, then it has already answered all the effects that can be expected from it. In fact, its longer continuance will effectually counteract the objects of its adoption; for it is notorious, that each day lessens the number of our seamen, by their emigration to foreign countries, in quest of that employment and subsistence which they have been accustomed to find, but can no longer procure, at home; and as it regards our navigation, considered as part of the national property, it is not perhaps very material whether it is sunk in the ocean, or whether it is destined to become worthless from lying and rotting at our wharves. In either case, destruction is equally certain, it is death; and the only difference seems to be, between death by a coup de grace, or death after having sustained the long protracted torments of torture.

What effect has this measure produced on foreign nations? What effect has it produced on France?

The honorable gentleman from Connecticut has told you, and told you truly, in an exposé presented by the French Minister of Foreign Affairs to the Emperor, that this measure is much applauded: it is called a magnanimous measure of the Americans! And in a conversation which is stated to have passed recently at Bayonne, between the Emperor of France and an American gentleman, it is said, and I believe correctly, that the Emperor expressed his approbation of the embargo. I have no doubt that this is the fact; the measure is too consentaneous with his system of policy, not to be approbated by him. So long as the extreme maritime preponderancy of Great Britain shall continue, with or without the existence of an American embargo, or with, or without the British Orders in Council, France can enjoy but very little foreign commerce, and that little, the Emperor of France would undoubtedly be willing to sacrifice, provided that, by so doing, he could insure the destruction of a much larger, and more valuable amount of British and American commerce.

It is therefore apparent, that this measure, considered as a coercive measure against France, is nugatory in the extreme.

What, sir, are, or have been its effects on Great Britain?

When the embargo was first laid the nation were alarmed. Engaged in a very extended and important commerce with this country, prosecuted upon the most liberal and confidential terms, this measure, whether considered as an act of hostility, or as a mere municipal restrictive regulation, could not but excite apprehension; for most of her writers, in relation to her colonies, had impressed the belief of the dependence of the West India settlements on the United States for the means of subsistence. Accordingly, for several months after the imposition of the embargo, we find it remained an object of solicitude with them, nor have I any doubt that the Ministry, at that time, partook of the national feeling; for it appears, so late as June, that such a disposition existed with the British Ministry, as induced our Minister at the Court of London to entertain the belief, and to make known to his Government the expectation he entertained, that an adjustment would take place of the differences between this country and Great Britain.

But, sir, the apprehensions of the British nation and Ministry gradually became weaker; the embargo had been submitted to the never erring test of experience, and information of its real effects flowed in from every quarter.

It was found that, instead of reducing the West Indies by famine, the planters in the West Indies, by varying their process of agriculture, and appropriating a small part of their plantations for the raising of ground provisions, were enabled, without materially diminishing their usual crops of produce, in a great measure, to depend upon themselves for their own means of subsistence.

The British Ministry also became acquainted about this time (June) with the unexpected and unexampled prosperity of their colonies of Canada and Nova Scotia. It was perceived that one year of an American embargo was worth to them twenty years of peace or war under any other circumstances; that the usual order of things was reversed; that in lieu of American merchants making estates from the use of British merchandise and British capital, the Canadian merchants were making fortunes, of from ten to thirty or forty thousand pounds in a year, from the use of American merchandise and American capital: for it is notorious, that great supplies of lumber, and pot and pearl ashes, have been transported from the American to the British side of the Lakes; this merchandise, for want of competition, the Canadian merchant bought at a very reasonable rate, sent it to his correspondents in England, and drew exchange against the shipments; the bills for which exchange he sold to the merchants of the United States for specie, transported by wagon loads at noon-day, from the banks in the United States, over the borders into Canada. And thus was the Canadian merchant enabled, with the assistance only of a good credit, to carry on an immensely extended and beneficial commerce, without the necessary employment, on his part, of a single cent of his own capital.

About this time, also, the revolution in Spain developed itself. The British Ministry foresaw the advantage this would be of to them, and immediately formed a coalition with the patriots: by doing this, they secured to themselves, in despite of their enemies, an accessible channel of communication with the Continent. They must also have been convinced, that if the Spaniards did not succeed in Europe, the Colonies would declare themselves independent of the mother country, and rely on the maritime force of Great Britain for their protection, and thus would they have opened to them an incalculably advantageous mart for their commerce and manufactures; for, having joined the Spaniards without stipulation, they undoubtedly expected to reap their reward in the exclusive commercial privileges that would be accorded to them; nor were they desirous to seek competitors for the favor of the Spaniards: if they could keep the navigation, the enterprise, and the capital of the United States from an interference with them, it was their interest to do it, and they would, from this circumstance, probably, consider a one, two, or three years' continuance of the embargo as a boon to them.

It is, therefore, sir, undoubted, in my mind, that the embargo, as it respects England as well as France, is inefficacious.

But, sir, are there yet other channels through which we can operate upon Great Britain, by means of this measure? It may possibly be said that disturbances among the manufacturers in England yet exist, and that they are only quieted for the moment. Sir, as long as I remember to have heard of the British nation, I have heard of tumults among her manufacturers, although I have never known any serious result from them; but every petty squabble between a manufacturer and his workmen, is, by the magic of some gentlemen's imagination, converted into an alarming insurrection, menacing the prostration of her Government. Suppose, sir, by abstaining from the receipt of British manufactures, you make bankrupts of one hundred of her wealthiest manufacturers; what is produced by this? Within twelve months you have witnessed nearly as many bankruptcies in one of your own cities, and yet that city retains its usual credit and reputation for wealth. But, to extend this argument further, suppose, from the causes before mentioned, you make bankrupts of five hundred of the wealthiest of her manufacturers, and that in consequence you deprive of employment fifty thousand of their workmen; what is the effect produced by this? What has become of the manufacturers of France? These men will not starve; they will not become nonentities; in time of war they have a certain asylum; they will be absorbed in her army or navy; and thus you take fifty thousand of the most turbulent of her citizens, who are in constant opposition to the Government, from under the control of a lax civil authority, and by placing them under the coercion of an efficient military discipline, you add in reality to the strength of the nation, and give to her the means of extending and retaining her maritime dominion: this surely is not desirable.

Some gentlemen may say, that the fear of famine is to effect what an insurrection among her manufacturers will not accomplish. Of all idle expectations, this is the most idle. It is well known that the harvest in England is got in during the month of August, and the early part of September: I have before me, sir, a price current of the 20th of September, from which it appears that American flour, subject to the payment of freight, insurance, commission, and other charges, was selling in Liverpool at forty-seven shillings sterling the barrel.

Another fact will, perhaps, give gentlemen some information on this subject. Owing to the interdiction of the trade to the Continent of Europe, sugars, during the last Winter, from the West Indies, had so greatly accumulated in England, as to render them unsaleable in any considerable quantity: this greatly incommoded the West India interest; they petitioned Parliament for a prohibition of the use of grain in the distilleries, and the substitution of sugar and molasses in lieu of it: the reasons assigned in support of the petition were, that it would give a double advantage to the nation, by affording relief to the West India planters, and also greatly reduce the price of food to the poor. The bill was, however, opposed to the landed interest, and at that time rejected on the single ground, that by bringing into the market so large a surplus quantity of grain, as six millions of bushels, being the amount annually consumed in the distilleries, the price would be so greatly reduced as not to pay the farmer for the labor and expense of raising it.

Thus it is evident that we have no chance of operating on the fears of Great Britain on account of her harvest; for it is shown that she has it at any time in her power, and even with an encouragement to her colonies, to throw into her corn market a quantity of grain nearly equal to the whole quantity of wheat exported from this country in the year ending in September, 1807; for, by the returns of the Secretary of the Treasury, it appeared that all the flour and wheat exported during that year, amounted only to what would be equal to about seven millions three hundred thousand bushels of wheat.

But, sir, if we cannot trade with France and England, why should we be deprived of all intercourse with Spain and Portugal? These are nations struggling for their liberties. Will it be told you, sir, that the trade to these countries is an inconsiderable one; that it will yield little or no profit; and that it will be unequally and unjustly divided between the different parts of the United States? Spain, Portugal, and their dependencies, have taken of our exports about twenty millions of dollars in a year. Can this be called an inconsiderable trade?

The exports of Spain and Portugal consist principally in wines, brandies, and fruits. They are not grain countries, but depend principally for their supplies of grain upon other countries. They have formerly received them from the Mediterranean, from the coast of Barbary, and from the Baltic. Under the present circumstances of the European world, these supplies could probably be best obtained from the United States, and would require large quantities of wheat and flour from the Southern States. The Spaniards and Portuguese professing the Roman Catholic religion, and being obliged by its ordinances to abstain for part of the year from the use of meat, and being accustomed to live during that time principally on fish, have rendered Spain and Portugal the best market in Europe for that staple of the Northern States. The lumber for their packages, their casks, and boxes, they obtain chiefly from New York and Norfolk; the lumber of the Eastern States not being so well adapted for their purpose. Thus, then, it appears, that this trade, instead of being an unequal one, is more equally divided among the different portions of the Union, than any other trade which is prosecuted from the United States to any part of Europe.

It remains now, sir, to consider the effects of the embargo on ourselves. Every gentleman must be the best judge of its effects within the immediate circle of his own observation. From the observation I have been enabled to make, it appears to me to be fraught with destruction. It appears to be wasting our resources instead of preserving them; breaking down the spirit of the people, and dividing instead of uniting them. It is inviting foreign insult and aggression, by the imbecility which it opposes to them; and it appears to me to bear extremely hard upon the commercial and navigating States.

The human mind is composed of nearly the same materials in all countries. Extend over an enlightened community, possessing the means of easy communication, a great and severe degree of privation and suffering, without accompanying that suffering with an absolute conviction on the public mind of some great, some urgent public necessity requiring it, and some eventual good to emanate from it, and there is reason to fear you may create great discontent and uneasiness. Wherever this exists in a great degree, it will be manifested in memorials to the constituted authorities of the country. Legislative resolutions will next follow; remonstrances succeed; and if these are unattended to, resistance embodies itself, and the spark of discontent, which might easily have been smothered in its origin, is fanned into a flame of rebellion, spreading ruin and desolation around it, and in its progress perhaps overturning the liberties and Government of the country.

Happily, we have not reached this stage: I trust in God we never shall. It should be the duty of every man, both in and out of office, to adopt every measure, and make every exertion to prevent it. The removal of the embargo will, as I believe, be one means to check an incipient state of discontent. I am therefore for this, as well as for many other reasons, most earnestly and zealously in favor of its repeal, and the passing the resolution for that purpose.

A motion was now made for adjournment, and negatived.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said he was not prepared to go as largely into this subject as it merited, having neither documents nor papers before him. He would therefore only take a short view of it in his way, and endeavor to rebut a part of the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and perhaps to notice some of the observations of the gentleman from Connecticut. He perfectly agreed with the latter gentleman that this subject ought to be taken up with coolness, and with temper, and he could have wished that the gentleman from Connecticut would have been candid enough to pursue that course which he had laid down for others. Had he done it? No. In the course of the discussion, the gentleman had charged it upon some one, he knew not whom, that there was a disposition to break down commerce for the purpose of erecting manufactures on its ruins. If this was the disposition of those who had advocated the embargo, Mr. S. said, he was not one to go with them, and perfectly corresponded with the gentleman in saying that such a plan would be extremely injurious; that possibly it could not be enforced in the United States; and that, if it could, merchants would conceive themselves highly aggrieved by it. But the gentleman's ideas had no foundation. Mr. S. said he had before seen it in newspapers, but had considered it a mere electioneering trick; that nothing like common sense or reason was meant by it, and nobody believed it. The gentleman surely did not throw out this suggestion by way of harmonizing; for nothing could be more calculated to create heat.

The gentleman last up, throughout his argument, had gone upon the ground that it is the embargo which has prevented all our commerce; that, if the embargo were removed, we might pursue it in the same manner as if the commerce of the whole world was open to us. If the gentleman could have shown this, he would have gone with him heart and hand; but it did not appear to him that, were the embargo taken off to-morrow, any commerce of moment could be pursued. Mr. S. said he was not certain that it might not be a wise measure to take off the embargo; but he was certain that some other measure should be taken before they thought of taking that. And he had hoped that gentlemen would have told them what measure should have been taken before they removed the embargo. Not so, however. A naked proposition was before them to take off the embargo; and were that agreed to, and the property of America subject to depredations by both the belligerents, they would be foreclosed from taking any measure at all for its defence. For this reason this resolution should properly have gone originally to the committee on the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES.)

Mr. S. said he was not prepared for a long discussion, he should take but a short view. He would not go back to see which nation had been the first offender. He was not the apologist of any nation, but, he trusted, a fervent defender of the rights, honor, and interest of his own country. By the decrees of France every vessel bound to or from Great Britain, was declared good prize. And still further; if spoken alone by any British vessel, they were condemned in the French prize courts. When a vessel arrived in the ports of France, Mr. S. said, bribery and corruption were made use of in order to effect her condemnation. Every sailor on board was separately examined as to what had happened in the course of the voyage; they were told, you will have one-third of the vessel and cargo as your portion of the prize-money, if you will say that your vessel has touched at a British port or has been visited by a British cruiser. Of course then, by the decrees of France, all American property that floats is subject to condemnation by the French, if it had come in contact with British hands. Were gentlemen willing to submit to this; to raise the embargo, and subject our trade to this depredation? Yes, said the gentleman from Connecticut, who was willing, however, that our ships should arm and defend themselves. Mr. S. said that he had hoped the honorable gentleman would have gone further, and said not only that he would in this case permit our vessels to defend themselves, but to make good prize of any vessel which should impede the trade admitted by the laws of nations. But the gentleman had stopped short of this.

By the Orders in Council, now made law (said Mr. S.) all neutrals—all neutrals, this is a mere word ad captandum, as it is well known, there is no neutral commerce but American—all American vessels, then, bound to France, or countries in alliance with her, are made good prize in the British courts. When bound to any part of the continent of Europe, or any possessions in Turkey or Asia, they are a good prize, Sweden alone excepted. We are then permitted to trade—for it is a permission to trade, since we must acknowledge ourselves indebted to her for any she permits—we are graciously permitted to go to Sweden, to which country our whole exports amount to $56,157! This petty trade is generously permitted us as a boon, and this boon will be struck off the list of permission, the moment any difference arises between Great Britain and Sweden. I am aware, sir, that gentlemen will say this may require explanation. I will give it to them. Great Britain says you shall not trade to any of the countries I have interdicted till you have my leave; pay me a duty, and then you may go to any port; pay me a tribute, and then you shall have my license to trade to any ports you choose. What is this tribute? Not having the documents before me, I may make an error of a fraction, but in the principle I am correct. On the article of flour, they tell us, you may bring flour to Great Britain from America, land it, and, if you re-export it, pay into our treasury two dollars on every barrel. For every barrel of flour which we send to Spain, Portugal, or Italy, where the gentleman from Massachusetts has correctly told us much of it is consumed, little of it being used in Great Britain or France, you must pay two dollars besides your freight and insurance. And this tribute is to be paid for a permission to trade. Are gentlemen willing to submit to this?

On the article of wheat, exported, you must pay in Great Britain a duty of, I believe, two shillings sterling a bushel, before it can be re-exported. On the important article of cotton they have charged a duty on its exportation of nine pence sterling per lb., equal to the whole value of the article itself in Georgia or South Carolina. This is in addition to the usual import duty of two pence in the pound. Thus, if we wish to go to the Continent, we may go on condition of paying a tribute equal to the value of the cotton, in addition to risk or insurance. It is generally understood that two-thirds of the cotton exported by us, may be consumed in England, when all her manufactures are in good work. On the remaining third the people of the Southern country are subject to a tribute—on twenty millions of pounds, at the rate of 17 cents per pound. Let this be calculated, and it will be seen what tax we must pay for leave to sell that article.

But, says the gentleman from Massachusetts, we may now trade to Spain and Portugal—because Great Britain permits us. [Mr. LLOYD observed that he had not said we could trade there because Great Britain permitted it.] I know the gentleman did not say that (said Mr. S.) but it is my inference. He said we might trade there. I deny it. I beg the gentleman to recollect what passed some time ago, between Lord Hawkesbury and Mr. King, and see what reliance can be placed on the promises of British Ministers. On a representation made by Mr. King on the subject of the colonial trade, Lord Hawkesbury agreed, provided the vessel carrying produce from the colonies should go to the United States and re-land her cargo, that she should not be liable to capture. What was the consequence? One year afterwards private instructions were given to the British cruisers to take such vessels, and every atom of this produce was swept from the ocean. If this is the manner in which Ministerial promises have heretofore been fulfilled, what reliance can be placed on them now? By letters from my correspondents, I learn that three merchants engaged in the American trade had waited on Mr. Canning to see whether American vessels might trade to Spain and Portugal. Yes, Mr. Canning answered, they might trade in the produce of their own country. But the King is authorized to vary these laws, and give permission to trade with any country when he pleases. Has he given any such permission to trade with Spain? No. Is then the mere conversation of Mr. Canning a sufficient security? No. Is it anything like as binding as that formerly officially given to Mr. King, and which was violated? Certainly not. Can this then be a safe trade? No, sir; my informant, who was one of the merchants who waited upon Mr. Canning, says that should France, now warring with Spain, overrun any part of the country, and our vessels afterwards attempt to enter, not having heard of it, they would be good prize. I am not learned in the law, but I will ask this question of those who are: Would not a British judge in this case be obliged to abide by the law, instead of the conversation of Mr. Canning? He certainly would; and would give our Minister in this case precisely the answer which the French Council of Prizes gave General Armstrong, that the opinion of an individual could not contravene the express stipulation of a positive law.

The gentleman last up told us that American flour was selling at forty-seven shillings a barrel in England. The gentleman knows that flour carried there, and not entered for re-exportation, cannot be removed. Flour in that situation has been lying ten or twelve months in London, could not be exported, and is somewhat injured by age, having been locked up in the stores of England, without a possibility of exporting it; and it is this that sells at that price.

The honorable gentleman last up has said that the exports of the United States to Spain and Portugal were twenty millions of dollars. The gentleman's arguments were applied to Spain and Portugal. The exports to Spain and Portugal, and all their possessions, including the immense exports to La Vera Cruz, amounted to something near this sum. But let us take the gentleman on his own ground, and see what we could carry on of this trade, in our domestic product, if the embargo were removed. The whole exports of the United States, in the produce of the land, the year ending in October, 1807, were $48,509,502; of which, the proportion to Spain was $1,131,231; to Portugal, $829,313. I agree with the gentleman, that, if the embargo was off, we might carry on a very lucrative trade with the Spanish colonies and the Brazils, if we had the materials to carry it on. They do not want our flour, but articles which can now no longer be got—goods imported from Germany, and nankeens and cotton goods from India. But these are not the produce of our country, to which the gentleman alluded; and I say that the exports of our domestic produce to the colonies and islands of Spain (Cuba alone excepted) are very small. Great Britain will not let us go to Germany to get German goods, and therefore we cannot carry them as we were accustomed to do. But perhaps we shall be told we may carry British goods. What does the gentleman say, as a merchant, to paying double freight, duty, and insurance, and then competing with England in the sale of her own manufactures? We have done it heretofore, because Great Britain was excluded from that trade. Confine the trade then to Spain and Portugal, supposing it to be free, and it will not amount to two and a half millions altogether. We are to say to Great Britain, If you will give us the boon of going to Spain and Portugal, (and perhaps this is but an ignis fatuus to lead us to her prize courts,) we will submit to your tribute elsewhere.

The English Orders had told us we might trade as usual with the West India islands; but now, believing no doubt that this Government has not strength or energy in itself to maintain any system long, what has she done? Proclaimed a blockade on the remaining islands of France, so that we are now confined to British islands alone! We are restricted from trading there by blockade, and what security have we, that if the embargo be taken off—for I wish it were off: no man suffers more from it, in proportion to his capital, than I do; but I stand here the Representative of the people, and must endeavor to act in such a manner as will best secure their interests; and I pledge myself to join heart and hand with gentlemen to take it off, whenever we can have a safe and honorable trade—that, from our submitting to these interdictions, as a right of Great Britain, she may not choose to interdict all trade, she being omnipotent, and sole mistress of the ocean, as we were told by the gentleman from Connecticut. I have seen a late English pamphlet, called "Hints to both Parties," said to be by a ministerial writer, to this effect: that Great Britain, having command over all the seas, could and ought to exclude and monopolize the trade of the world to herself. This pamphlet goes critically into an examination of the subject; says that by a stroke of policy she can cut us off from our extensive trade; that she has the power, and, having the power, she ought to do it.

Mr. S. concluded by saying that he had not meant to take up so much time of the House—he had meant merely to state his ideas of the situation in which we were placed by the edicts of the two belligerents. He wished to place it in such a point of view that gentlemen might be led to adopt such measures as might best secure the interests of the country. Mr. S. said his own private interests pressed so heavily on his mind, that he could scarcely trust himself to decide. He had therefore submitted these ideas to gentlemen whose feelings were not thus affected, that if they might think proper, with the honorable gentleman, to take off the embargo, he might join with them; if not, that some other might be adopted which would lead to the security of our peace and honor.

Mr. POPE said, that in the observations which he had made a short time ago, he had no intention to violate the decorum of debate; and if he had discovered warmth on the general subject, he hoped no gentleman would consider his remarks as personally applied to him.

Mr. LLOYD said he rose for the purpose of making a single observation. He had stated, when up before, that the trade to Spain, Portugal, and her colonies, took off about twenty millions of dollars. He found, by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the exports to these countries amounted to upwards of seventy millions, excluding a large portion of the trade.

Mr. SMITH said he understood the gentleman to apply his arguments to our domestic exports to Spain and Portugal only, and not their dependencies, which the gentleman might, however, have meant to have included.

The Senate adjourned about half past 2 o'clock.

TUESDAY, November 22.

The bill, entitled "An act to authorize the conveyance of certain papers and documents by the mail, free of postage," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. ANDERSON, MOORE, and FRANKLIN, to consider and report thereon.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill to reward Andrew Joseph Villard, for an invention of public utility.

Ordered, That it be referred to Messrs. THURSTON, TIFFIN, and BRADLEY, to consider and report thereon.

THE EMBARGO.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the 11th instant for repealing the "Act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several acts supplementary thereto."

Mr. POPE.—Mr. President: I rise with more than ordinary diffidence to address you on the interesting question under consideration. When I consider the present state of our country—embarrassed with difficulties; menaced with dangers by foreign nations; our ships captured and burnt by one Power, captured, condemned, and confiscated by the other; a storm gathering in the East, which threatens to burst upon us with rebellion and dis-union; the honor, independence and best interest of the American people deeply involved in the course to be pursued—I am seriously impressed with the immense responsibility which devolves upon me, as one of their Representatives, at this awful crisis. The want of some documents, which I had expected would before this have been furnished us, and of a more intimate acquaintance with the commercial world, renders me unable to do justice to all the topics which gentlemen have introduced in the wide range they have taken; although I shall not attempt to explore the whole ground, I will endeavor, with the best lights I possess, to notice such of the arguments of the gentlemen in opposition as seem to demand attention.

On the 4th of July, 1776, the people of these States declared themselves free and independent, and this declaration they sealed with their blood. Their independence was soon after recognised by different Powers of Europe, and finally by Great Britain herself. By this memorable and glorious event, which released them from the shackles of the British Government, and gave them independence, they became entitled to all the rights and privileges on the high seas which could be rightfully claimed by any other nation; and these rights, I presume, it will not be pretended they have either abandoned or forfeited. The high seas have been hitherto considered the common highway of nations, designed by the God of Nature for the common use of mankind, and over which no Power could rightfully claim exclusive dominion. I shall not waste the time of the Senate to inquire whether France or Great Britain has been the first aggressor on our neutral rights, or from which we have received the most injuries and indignities, because such an inquiry appears to me at this time unimportant. I am willing to view both nations with an equal eye as common enemies. Nor do I deem it necessary to retrospect injuries and insults of an ancient date, but shall confine myself to a period and circumstances more intimately connected with the present crisis. In 1805, the British Government asserted that this country was not entitled to carry on trade with her enemy in time of war, not permitted in time of peace. Under color of this new principle, a number of American vessels were captured by British cruisers and condemned in British Courts of Admiralty. This conduct of the British Government alarmed the whole commercial interest of this country, and memorials were sent to the President from the different commercial towns in the United States, protesting in strong and spirited language against this novel principle, and calling upon our Government to resist by negotiation it, as well as the impressment of our seamen. I beg leave to read a part of the memorial from New Haven, in the State of Connecticut. Mr. POPE read as follows:

“That your memorialists have observed with no common degree of surprise and solicitude, the numerous embarrassments which the commerce of the United States has suffered, during the present war with Europe and the Indies, arising from the adoption of new principles by the Admiralty Courts of Great Britain, as well as from the depredations committed on the unprotected trade by lawless freebooters, and the unwarrantable impressment of our seamen. Your memorialists will not attempt to discuss at large the principle, which, they understand, has been adopted by the Admiralty Courts of Great Britain, in recent decisions respecting the rights of neutral nations; it is sufficient for them to observe, that in their opinion, the principle assumed by Great Britain, of considering all the trade of a neutral nation as unlawful, which the same cannot carry on in time of peace, to be new and unwarrantable; a principle not authorized by the maxims of sound justice, which have long been received and respected by nations, as laws by which their mutual intercourse ought to be regulated.

The people of Boston, in their memorial, after reasoning with great ability and perspicuity to prove that this new principle assumed by the British Courts of Admiralty was an alarming infraction of neutral rights, solicit the Government on account of the importance of the subject, to send a special mission to London. Here Mr. POPE read from the Boston memorial as follows:

“But whatever may have been the motives for the proceedings on the part of Great Britain, the effect is notorious. From her recent conduct great losses have been sustained; our commerce has been checked and embarrassed, and large quantities of produce are now remaining locked up in this country, which were purchased for foreign markets; because our merchants cannot send it abroad, without taking risks on themselves which prudence would not justify, or without paying such rates for insurance as the trade of the country cannot afford.

“Thus circumstanced, the merchants of Boston have thought it their duty respectfully to make known their complaints to their Government. Believing the citizens of the United States desirous of cultivating relations of amity with the whole human race; and particularly connected as they are with Great Britain, by habits of constant intercourse and by mutual wants, they cannot but hope, that like dispositions are entertained by the British nation towards this country, and if measures were speedily taken for the amicable discussion, by negotiation, of our complaints, that a sense of her own interest, and a respect for the rights of others, would induce her to depart from her present measures, and to conduct towards us with justice and liberality.

“Under this persuasion, and without meaning in the smallest degree to derogate from the talents or attention of the American Minister at the Court of London, the subscribers, with deference and humility, beg leave to suggest, whether, when so important national interests are at stake, a special mission would not carry with it great influence, and be very instrumental in the accomplishment of our reasonable wishes.”

This earnest and fervent call on the Government by the commercial interest was promptly obeyed by the Administration. The course pointed out by the memorialists was pursued; a special mission was immediately sent; this new principle, as well as other violations of our maritime rights, were resisted with energy and ability, and every effort made to obtain a redress of injuries, and to place our commerce upon a just and honorable basis, as must be evident to every man who has read the documents communicated to Congress during the last and present session. I shall pass over the different decrees and orders of the two belligerents from 1805, until the Fall of 1807. I will pass over the affair of the Chesapeake, which called forth such a burst of indignation throughout this country. In December 1807, during the last session of Congress, the President was officially informed, that Bonaparte had determined to extend his decree of Berlin to American commerce, and although not officially notified, had every reason to believe that the French decree had been or would be retaliated by the British Orders of Council. The President thus warned of the dangers which threatened our commerce on the high seas, communicated the subject to Congress by a confidential message, recommending an embargo, to secure our vessels and seamen from capture. His advice was attended to; the measure was adopted. I expected, or at least hoped at that time, that this measure, besides securing our property, by its pressure on the belligerents, aided by a conciliatory course on the part of our Government, would have induced an amicable adjustment of differences with both or one of the belligerents, and thereby averted the calamities of war; that if it failed to produce this effect, it would at least afford us time to prepare to meet war, if inevitable. That our Administration has used every honorable means during the existence of this measure to settle our differences amicably with the belligerents, cannot be doubted by any one who has read the documents accompanying his recent message. After the Administration had pursued the course marked out by the commercial people, whose organs the gentlemen in the opposition appear to be on this occasion—after resisting the unjust pretensions of France and Great Britain—after the Government had laid an embargo and brought the nation to the eve of a war for the maintenance of our maritime rights—what do we hear? We are told by a part of these same people, to the astonishment of all America, by solemn resolutions, which are already before the public, called the Essex resolutions, that we have no cause of war against Great Britain, and all her aggressions, if not justified, are excused; and our Government is gravely told to disgrace itself by receding from the ground it has taken. The gentleman from Connecticut, whose object seems to be rather to prove this measure wrong at first than what ought now to be done, tells us that the French decree of Berlin was not sufficient to justify this measure at the time it was adopted, because France had no naval force to give it effect on the high seas. If the Berlin decree was not sufficient to justify our embargo, upon what principle can it be pretended that it justified or even palliated the British Orders of Council? Although at the time the embargo was laid we had every reason to believe that the orders had issued, and which turned out to be the fact, yet I will admit, for the sake of argument, that the Berlin decree was not a sufficient ground for the embargo. Will gentlemen contend that the Berlin decree, British Orders of Council, and the French decree of Milan, all which were in force at that time, if then officially known to our Government, would not have been a sufficient cause for the embargo? And if they admit that the whole, combined, would have justified the measure, at the same time that they deny it to have been wise, they are constrained to acknowledge that it was at least fortunate. If the dangers to which our commerce was then exposed rendered the measure proper, how can gentlemen seriously contend that while those dangers continue, it ought to be removed, without proposing some more efficient measure as a substitute?

We are told, however, that the avowed object of this measure was to secure our property and seamen from capture, and that it was represented to the two belligerents as a measure of precaution, not as a measure of coercion or hostility. It is in its nature a precautionary measure, and it was the duty of the President to represent it in that light to foreign Governments; and whatever inconveniences may result from it, they cannot, by the law of nations, consider it as a measure of hostility. Yet the gentleman from Connecticut tells us triumphantly that it has not only failed to produce any effect upon foreign nations, but that it never will operate as a measure of coercion. If the gentleman does not think this measure the best that can be devised, and that some other would better suit the present state of things, it is certainly his duty to propose it, and not to press a negative proposition calculated merely to censure, to find fault. I sincerely lament that this measure has not been productive of all the good effects anticipated. But, sir, although it has not, owing to numerous evasions and violations, together with other causes, induced foreign Powers to discontinue their depredations and restrictions upon our commerce, it does not necessarily follow that, if persevered in and properly executed, it would not produce this effect. It is some consolation to the friends of this measure that it has been productive of some good. It has prevented a large portion of our property from falling into the hands of the belligerents, it has preserved peace and afforded us time to prepare for war, if this sad alternative must be resorted to. The gentleman from Connecticut and the gentleman from Massachusetts do not appear to agree as to the effects of this measure. The gentleman from Connecticut contends that it had no effect, while the gentleman from Massachusetts informs us that it had a very considerable effect on Great Britain in May or June last. If it has at any time had an effect upon either of the belligerents, it proves at least that its advocates did not miscalculate as much as the gentleman from Connecticut would induce the world to believe. The gentlemen have cited a French exposé, to prove that the embargo is approved by that Government; this document I have never seen, and cannot, therefore, comment on it; and the gentleman might have proved by Mr. Canning's letter, that Great Britain is not dissatisfied with it, if the sincerity of such declarations is to be confided in.

The gentlemen have not explained their object in referring to this document; was it to prove that it did not operate on France, but did upon Great Britain, or that it had no effect upon either? If it was their design to prove by this document that France is reconciled to bear the inconveniences of this measure herself, on account of its more severe pressure upon her enemy, which may be the fact, it establishes the very reverse of what the gentlemen contend for. They have endeavored to prove that it has had no effect, nor will have any upon either. We have been told that we have been commanded by one Power to make war upon the other; that it has been the policy of both belligerents to draw us into the contest, is evident; and if our embargo has enabled us to resist their dictatorial mandates or insidious policy, it is fortunate for this country. It has been said that we had as well give up our ships to the enemy as let them rot in our harbors. I think very differently. I would rather have them sunk in the ocean than give them up to enrich our enemies. There is something of principle concerned in this. [Mr. LLOYD said he had not expressed this idea; he had said that it affected the national wealth no more than the vessels should be lost at sea, than that they should rot at the wharves.] Mr. P. said he considered the present contest, between us and the belligerents, not merely as a question of profit and loss; there was something of principle, honor, and independence at stake, and he was not disposed to calculate how much money would be gained by succumbing to a foreign Power. This is not the question with Congress or the nation. After the manner of the gentleman from Connecticut, who was fond of illustrating his ideas by very familiar examples, I will suppose that gentleman was in the habit of dealing largely with two merchants, A and B; that the intercourse between them was mutually advantageous; these merchants suddenly quarrel: A tells him he shall not trade with B, and that if he attempts it he will stop by force, and rob him of what he may be found carrying to B. B tells him he shall not trade with A, under similar pains and penalties, unless he will first go to B and purchase of him a license to deal with A; what would the gentleman do? I presume he would either chastise both for their insolence and injustice, or, if that was not convenient, he would tell them I will have no intercourse with either of you. He would certainly resist their insolence and injustice by force, discontinue all intercourse with them, or submit to their terms. Would the gentleman in such a case calculate whether it would be his interest to submit to the disgraceful conditions of B, who happened to be the stronger of the two, than bear the inconveniences resulting from a non-intercourse? Would the gentleman submit to disgraceful conditions for the pounds, shillings, and pence he would make by a renewal of intercourse with them? I presume he would not. Great Britain and France, in defiance of all law, justice, and right, have, by their decrees and orders, interdicted our trade to a very great extent. Great Britain, however, will permit us to trade, provided we will agree to pay her for the privilege. Now, sir, it appears to me that we must resist their decrees and orders by war, non-intercourse, or we must submit. Are we to be told that honor and independence are out of the question, and that we ought to submit to disgraceful conditions for the sake of trade, because we shall make money by it? Surely not.

However the gentleman from Connecticut and myself may differ in other respects, I concur with him in opinion that we have nothing to hope from the friendship or justice of the belligerents, and that the most efficient means of coercing them is by operating on their interest. If, then, his position be correct, that our only means of bringing Great Britain to terms is to affect her interest, and if it is true, as is generally believed, that our commerce is very advantageous to Great Britain, shall we not, by suspending that commerce, operate on her interest, and will not her interest induce her to do us justice, in order to renew it? The gentleman from Connecticut has told us that our embargo, with the aid of a non-importation act, would produce no effect, because the West India planters can convert their sugar plantations into cornfields, and that therefore they could not be starved. Does the gentleman suppose any man of common sense ever believed that this system of starving, as it has been called, would destroy the belligerents? No, sir; it was expected to operate upon their interest—the only way in which the gentleman tells us they can be coerced. If, as the gentleman supposes, the West India planters will be compelled by our embargo to employ their capital and land in the culture of corn in order to subsist, will they not be materially injured by it? Will not the shipping interest engaged in carrying West India produce to Europe be injured, and will not the consumers in the mother country be injured by a rise in the prices of West India produce, independent of the injury to the Government on the score of revenue? If it had been the interest of the sugar planters to employ any portion of their capital in raising corn, it is wonderful they have never before made the discovery. The gentleman from Connecticut has also informed us that these islands can be supplied from other countries. If other countries can supply the West Indies with those articles which they have heretofore received from the United States, I would thank the gentleman to inform us why those other countries have not rivalled us in this market; for it is not a new one; it has been known a great length of time. Those countries from which these islands can be supplied must have been, I presume, employed heretofore in more lucrative pursuits; and, according to a position advanced by the gentleman himself on the subject of manufactures, those other countries could not be induced to abandon suddenly their present pursuits, in order to supply the West India market. If Great Britain can procure these supplies elsewhere, it cannot be her interest to do so, because it is not presumable that she can procure them on as good terms as from the United States.

The gentleman has informed us that Great Britain can be supplied with cotton from the East Indies and other countries. I will ask the gentleman if Great Britain can procure this article from the East Indies and other countries in sufficient quantity, and on as good terms as from the United States? If she cannot, which I suppose to be the case, she must feel our embargo in her manufactures—one of the vital sources of her strength and prosperity. We are told that a non-importation act would have no effect, because it could not be enforced; smuggling would be carried on to a very great extent. That a non-importation act would, like all other laws, be partially violated, was to be expected. Every law is violated, but with due vigilance such a measure could be enforced to a very great extent. This measure would not be efficient, says the gentleman, because Great Britain will find a market for her manufactures in New Spain and South America. I will ask the gentlemen, whether South America has not been supplied heretofore with British manufactures to a considerable extent, and does the gentleman seriously believe that she would find a market in that country for the immense quantity of her manufactures hitherto consumed in the United States?

Although the gentleman has not, in his resolution to repeal the embargo, proposed a substitute, he intimated in his argument that we ought to arm our commerce against all nations. I am not prepared to say that I will adhere to this embargo system if a better can be devised; but before I embrace a substitute, I must be informed how it is to operate; the gentleman must therefore excuse me for propounding a few questions to him in relation to this measure. I wish to be informed, would not such a measure be war with France and Great Britain, or should we not by such a measure put it in the power of the commercial interest to embroil us with which nation they pleased? Is it probable that our merchants would run the risk of fighting their way to the Continent of Europe, with loaded vessels, in defiance of the British navy? Is it not more probable that Great Britain would have agents in this country to sell licenses to our merchants to trade to the Continent, and would not our merchants for their own security secretly purchase and trade under those licenses? If the object of Great Britain be a commercial monopoly, and we remove our embargo, would it not be in the power of the British merchants, by a secret understanding with, and the connivance of their Government, by agents and secret partners in the United States, to carry on the very trade to the Continent which Great Britain interdicts to us? I have been led to make these inquiries by reading the memorial of the merchants of Baltimore, presented to the Government in 1806, respecting neutral trade, and which was signed by men of all parties, in which it was positively charged that the object of Great Britain in harassing our trade, was to cripple American commerce and promote her own, and that she granted licenses to neutrals to carry on the trade which she interdicted. I will read it:

"It has been said that, by embarking in the colony trade of either of the belligerents, neutral nations, in some sort, interpose in the war, since they assist and serve the belligerent, in whose trade they so embark. It is a sufficient answer to this observation, that the same course of reasoning would prove that neutrals ought to discontinue all trade whatsoever with the parties at war. A continuance of their accustomed peace trade assists and serves the belligerent with whom it is continued; and if this effect were sufficient to make a trade unneutral and illegal, the best established and most useful traffic would, of course, become so. But Great Britain supplies us with another answer to this notion, that our interference in the trade of the colonies of her enemies is unlawful, because they are benefited by it. It is known that the same trade is, and long has been, carried on by British subjects, and your memorialists feel themselves bound to state that, according to authentic information lately received, the Government of Great Britain does, at this moment, grant licenses to neutral vessels, taking in a proportion of their cargoes there, to proceed on trading voyages to the colonies of Spain, from which she would exclude us, upon the condition, that the return cargoes shall be carried to Great Britain to swell the gains of her merchants, and to give her a monopoly of the commerce of the world. This great belligerent right, then, upon which so much has been supposed to depend, sinks into an article of barter. It is used, not as a hostile instrument, wielded by a warlike State, by which her enemies are to be wounded, or their colonies subdued, but as the selfish means of commercial aggrandizement, to the impoverishment and ruin of her friends; as an engine by which Great Britain is to be lifted up to a vast height of prosperity, and the trade of neutrals crippled, and crushed, and destroyed."

According to the course of reasoning adopted by the gentleman from Connecticut, the object of Great Britain in blockading the Continent is not to starve it; it must therefore be to secure to herself the benefit of all the commerce carried on with the Continental Powers. In such a state of things, while those who were trading under the licenses of foreign Governments were making their fortunes, the honest Americans, who would not consent to degrade their country by navigating the ocean under the protection of any Government but their own, would be plundered by both belligerents. If we are to consider the belligerent nations as pirates, no longer bound by those principles of public law to which civilized nations have hitherto subscribed, and are prepared to purchase our rights on the seas, let us do it as a nation, by paying them a sum in gross, and thereby place our citizens on equal ground. We are told that we can carry on a considerable commerce with countries not within the scope of the decrees or orders of the belligerents. This argument is specious and captivating, let us examine it, for I feel as much solicitude as the gentlemen in the opposition to remove this embargo whenever it can be done with propriety; on this, as well as on the subject of an armed commerce, the gentleman will pardon me for requesting information. If we remove our embargo as to Portugal and other places to which our trade is not interdicted, and by a law declare that our citizens shall trade only to those countries permitted by the belligerents, would not that be submission to their orders and decrees; and if we open our ports, and restrict our commerce to those countries, could we ever afterwards hope for a relaxation of the British Orders of Council? Would not Great Britain have every inducement to perpetuate such a state of things, which would afford to her the benefits of our commerce without its inconveniences?

The gentleman from Connecticut has informed us that the object of the Administration, in adopting the present system, is to put down commerce and promote manufactures.

If the Administration has any concealed motive for this measure, I am a stranger to it. It is well known that it has been a favorite object with the present Administration to pay the public debt, and it would be strange indeed that it should pursue a system which cuts off our only source of revenue. This conjecture of the gentleman is too improbable to require a serious refutation. On the policy of promoting manufactures I shall make but a few remarks, as it will hereafter be a subject of distinct consideration. I have supposed that it would be sound policy in this Government to diminish, in some degree, the inducements now held out to our citizens to embark in foreign commerce, and induce them to invest their money in the interior; the increase of manufactures would lessen our dependence on foreign nations, and render us more dependent on each other. There would be more intercourse between the people of the different States, which would tend to nationalize us, and give more strength and permanency to the American Union. To what extent this policy should be carried, I am not now prepared to say. A distinction has been taken between native and foreign commerce, or what is more commonly called the carrying trade. The policy of encouraging our citizens to participate in the carrying trade is one thing, our maritime rights is another. The gentlemen in the opposition complain that this measure bears peculiarly hard on the commercial States. On the subject of commerce, as all others of national concern, I am disposed to consider the United States as an integer, and to forget the lines of partition by which we are separated into different States and districts, for the purpose of internal government; but as the gentleman have contrasted the commercial with the agricultural States, I am willing to meet them. I had thought that this measure, if its pressure was greater upon one part of the country than another, operated more severely upon the growers of cotton than any other part of the nation, and they ought, if influenced by pecuniary considerations, to be the first to complain. The people I represent are an agricultural people, and I ask the gentleman of what importance it is to them whether their produce is carried in foreign or American vessels? For what are the agricultural people now suffering, but to maintain our maritime rights. Sir, we are willing to discard all calculations of profit or loss, and make a common cause with our brethren of other States in defence of our national rights and independence.

It appears to me, sir, that the commercial people ought to be the last to complain. Our Government has imposed discriminating tonnage duties, to give our own vessels an advantage in our own ports over foreigners. We have remitted the duties on foreign articles imported into the United States, intended for exportation. Our Government has evinced every disposition to foster commerce and maintain our maritime rights. We are told that the people are opposed to this measure. To the voice of a free people I shall always bow with reverence. But, sir, it ought to be remembered that in this country the will of the majority must prevail; it is a fundamental principle of our Government, and if we are to judge from recent events, a great majority of the nation are in favor of this measure. We are informed, and it has been intimated on this floor, that rebellion in the Eastern States will be the probable consequence of perseverance in this measure. Are we to be driven from the course dictated by the public interest by alarms of this sort? Are we to be told by a minority that we must recede from the ground we have taken; that we must admit the Government has not sufficient energy to enforce its authority, or that they will rebel? Will gentlemen inform us who they are that are prepared to erect the standard of rebellion against their own Government on the very graves of the brave Bostonians who first raised the standard of American independence? They must be some new people who have obtruded themselves upon our shores; they cannot be Americans; I will not think so unworthily of my countrymen. I believe the American people are generally attached to their Government; I trust it is but the clamor of the moment, which will cease the moment the will of the Government shall be decisively and constitutionally expressed. It has been frequently said that Great Britain is fighting for the liberties of the world; that she is the only barrier between France and universal dominion, and therefore that our weight ought to be thrown into the scale of England, to assist her in this mighty conflict. If our friendship is necessary to England, ought she not to entitle herself to it, at least to do us justice and respect our rights? Shall we submit to insults and indignities from Great Britain to induce her to save us from subjugation by France? Shall we admit for a moment that we cannot maintain our independence? The gentlemen in the opposition have protested against submission; they have not declared themselves for war; if they are for it, I hope they will avow it; they have proposed no substitute. I am not prepared to say how long good policy will justify a continuance of the present system; but, sir, I am ready to declare that I will adhere to it until a better can be substituted. If it be true, as the gentleman from Connecticut has informed us, that the most efficient means of coercing Great Britain, is to affect her interest, and if it be true that our embargo will compel the West India planters to convert their sugar plantations into cornfields for subsistence; if it will produce a scarcity of cotton in Great Britain, or enhance the price; if by a non-importation act we can deprive her of a market for a large portion of her manufactures, the present system, with the addition of a non-importation act, if firmly adhered to, and well executed, may have the desired effect. When I cast my eyes over these States, and observe the freedom and happiness they enjoy, I feel constrained to pause, before I consent to take a step which will involve them in the calamities of war. When I consider the peculiar character of the contest between the two great belligerents of Europe, I feel very unwilling to be drawn into the vortex, lest the fate of this happy nation may become too closely connected with the destiny of one or the other of these contending Powers. At the same time that I consider it my duty to make war the last alternative, I know the American people would prefer to meet it, rather than submit to a sacrifice of their national independence. The conduct of the belligerents, and the state of our country, furnish strong reasons for believing that the period is not distant, when this alternative must be accepted, if the present system should prove inefficient. I hope I have not, in the warmth of debate, violated that decorum which the dignity of the Senate requires to be observed. I certainly have not intended it. I shall conclude with requesting gentlemen to reflect, that in this hour of difficulty and danger unanimity constitutes the basis of our national security.

Mr. WHITE.—I have listened with great pleasure to the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. POPE,) who has just sat down; but, although entertained with his eloquence, have not been convinced by his arguments. I shall not follow him through the New England memorials, nor discuss with him the policy of a non-intercourse law, as that is not the question before the Senate; neither shall I join issue with him as to the apparent expediency of laying an embargo at the last session of Congress; but I will endeavor to show that the operation of this measure upon the country, has been such as now calls most imperiously upon this body to pass the resolution before us. The importance of this subject is admitted on all sides, and the anxiety known to exist throughout every section, and almost in every individual of the community, in relation to the decision now about to be had upon it, is the fullest evidence of the deep and unusual degree of interest universally felt throughout the country, and attaches to the vote we are to give the highest responsibility. Such a responsibility I am not willing to meet without assigning some of the reasons that influence my opinion. And this I shall do the more cheerfully, as I know they will be in conformity with the sentiments of a vast portion of those I have the honor to represent. The embargo, when laid, was admitted to be a mere experiment, but one which we were admonished not to resist, as it was to do great things for the United States. It was, in a few months, to reduce the West Indies to a state of starvation, and to bring the two great belligerent Powers of Europe to our feet. In the prophetic language of the President, it was to "keep in safety our merchandise, our vessels, and our seamen, those essential resources;" and we were told, on all sides, by the numerous advocates of the measure, that it would speedily bring the French and British Governments to a sense of justice. But has it, or is it likely to accomplish any of these desirable objects? I grant you, it has kept our merchandise in safety, if by that was intended to lock up in our barns and storehouses all the produce of our country to rot upon our hands. And as to our dismantled, ark-roofed vessels, they are indeed decaying in safety at our wharves; presenting daily to the merchant a melancholy memento of his present or approaching ruin, and forming a suitable monument to the memory of our departed commerce. But, where are your seamen? Gone, sir; driven into foreign exile in search of subsistence. The very measure that was to preserve them to their country has banished them from it, and many of them forever. Even the vigilance and terrors of our gunboat navy have not been sufficient to confine and starve them in our ports. But, sir, the most mortifying disappointment we have to sustain, is the total indifference with which this boasted measure of our Administration has been treated by both the belligerents. Instead of coercing them to do us justice, we now know officially that it is neither felt nor thought of in France; and the British, so far from offering us terms on the subject, will not even ask us to take it off. Here, I will beg leave to read a short passage from Mr. Canning's letter to Mr. Pinkney, of the 23d of September last, showing most distinctly the sense and determination of the British Government on this subject:

"His Majesty (says Mr. Canning) sees nothing in the embargo laid on by the President of the United States of America, which varies this original and simple state of the question. If considered as a measure of impartial hostility against both belligerents, the embargo appears to His Majesty to have been manifestly unjust, as, according to every principle of justice, that redress ought to have been first sought from the party originating the wrong; and His Majesty cannot consent to buy off that hostility which America ought not to have extended to him, at the expense of a concession made, not to America, but to France.

"If, as it has been more generally represented by the Government of the United States, the embargo is only to be considered as an innocent, municipal regulation, which affects none but the United States themselves, and with which no foreign State has any concern; viewed in this light, His Majesty does not conceive that he has the right, or the pretension, to make any complaint of it, and he has made none. But in this light there appears not only no reciprocity, but no assignable relation between the repeal by the United States of a measure of voluntary self-restriction, and the surrender by His Majesty of his right of retaliation against his enemies."

true, that it is a regulation which affects none but the United States themselves, and tells us that His Majesty neither does nor means to complain of it. And although the gentleman from Kentucky informs us, he has not met with, yet I have seen a recent report made by a French Minister to the Emperor, in which the embargo is approved of and applauded as, what it really is, a measure favorable to them, and an act of great self-denial on our part. Under all these circumstances, and every gentleman here knows the facts I state to be correct, why, in the name of Heaven, continue it? What beneficial end can it produce? The country is, at this moment, bleeding at every pore under it, without the remotest prospect or probability of ultimately deriving the least possible advantage or security from the measure. And as it is not among the least discouraging of the circumstances belonging to the present state of things, that we are able to make no calculation as to the probable time when we shall see the end of the evil; for, upon the same principle that the embargo is continued now, it may be continued for twenty or for forty years, or at least during the war between the two great contending Powers of Europe, which, I presume, no gentleman here expects will be at an end in the life of the present Emperor of France, and as long as an Englishman exists with the means and courage to defend the independence of his country.

I am willing to believe, and do believe, what the honorable gentleman from Kentucky has just now in substance declared, that the gentlemen who supported the embargo laws at the last session upon this floor, supposed they would be speedily productive of great and beneficial results upon our foreign relations; that they would bring the two great belligerents, and especially England, to just and reasonable terms; and that there would be no occasion for continuing them longer than till they should be known on the other side of the Atlantic. But in all this they now see and know their mistake; they now know, from the most authentic sources, that these laws have produced no alteration in the conduct of either France or England in relation to us; that, in fact, they are applauded by the one, and treated with contempt and derision by the other, while we are ourselves the suffering and bleeding victims of the rack upon which we vainly expected to torture them.

It is the fate of humanity to err; the wisest and the best of men are liable to it. And all we ask of these honorable gentlemen now, is to come out openly and acknowledge, in the face of the nation, the egregious mistake into which they fell, and unite with us in redressing the injuries and healing the wounds they have so unnecessarily inflicted upon their devoted country. I make this appeal to them with the more confidence, because I know every gentleman here has too much character and patriotism to be influenced by the pride of opinion to consistency in political error. I will submit to you, Mr. President, whether we have not before us sufficient evidence to show that the Administration themselves are now convinced of the impolicy of this measure, and would willingly get rid of it, if they could do so, consistently with the character of infallibility they wish to preserve in the public opinion. I deduce this conclusion from the offer they say they have recently made to the British Government to take off the embargo as to them, and to continue it as to France, provided they would rescind their Orders of Council. An offer, which, if indeed made unencumbered with other terms, is a complete acknowledgment of a conviction of error on the part of the Administration; because, after they had subjected the country to all the deprivations, and ruinous effects of the embargo for more than six months, it was coming to the precise ground we were requested to take in relation to France, by the British Government, a year before the embargo was laid, in the famous note of Lords Holland and Auckland to Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, accompanying the British Treaty formed by those gentlemen. All they then asked of us was, that we should "not acquiesce in the palpable violation of our rights directed by the Berlin decree if attempted to be enforced;" and surely they could not have contemplated more than that, if France did attempt to enforce that decree; we would interdict all intercourse with her, and continue our commerce with Great Britain; which would be the very effect of the stipulation recently proposed. This proposition from the British Government, however, in December, 1806, was spurned with disdain; and now, after the country is half ruined with the experiment of a perpetual embargo, such as I believe was never before practised upon any people, we condescend to beg those very terms, and they refuse to grant them. Sir, the truth is, the Administration must now be convinced that the embargo is injuring no one but ourselves, and us it must eventually ruin if persisted in. I regret, too, this proposition was made, because it has furnished to Mr. Canning an opportunity of offering a most sarcastic insult to the Government of this country. He tells Mr. Pinkney in reply to it, that "His Majesty would not hesitate to contribute in any manner in his power to restore to the commerce of the United States its wonted activity; and if it were possible to make any sacrifice for the repeal of the embargo, without appearing to deprecate it as a measure of hostility, he would gladly have facilitated its removal as a measure of inconvenient restriction upon the American people." His Majesty would not hesitate to contribute in any manner in his power to restore to the commerce of the United States its wonted activity, and if it were possible, without any sacrifice, for the repeal of the embargo, would gladly facilitate its removal as a measure of "inconvenient restriction upon the American people." I have no faith, Mr. President, in the sincerity of this profession; but I feel most sensibly the severity of the sarcasm, as applied to a measure of our Administration that we were confidently told was to bring England to our own terms.

I will now, sir, with the indulgence of the Senate, endeavor to examine, as concisely and as correctly as I am capable of, the operation of the embargo upon the commerce and general prosperity of the United States. According to the last report of the Secretary of the Treasury, it will be found, that the goods, wares, and merchandise, of foreign growth and manufacture, exported from the United States in the year prior to the first day of October, 1807, amounted to $59,643,558. All the revenue, all the national and commercial wealth that would have arisen from this very extensive trade, is completely destroyed by the embargo; it is a total loss to the country, that can never be recovered. In the same report it appears that the goods, wares, and merchandise, of domestic growth and manufacture, the actual produce of our own country, exported from the United States, in the same year, amounted to $48,699,592. The whole commercial profits and national wealth that would have arisen from the exportation and proceeds of this immensely valuable produce is for the present lost to the country, and a large portion of the merchandise, the produce itself, must be forever lost if the embargo be long continued. All, or nearly all, the product of the fisheries, amounting to $2,804,000, as likewise the agricultural produce of the country, a few articles, such as tobacco, cotton, rice, &c., excepted, which I have not included in this estimate, amounting to $18,521,000, making in the whole twenty-one millions four hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars, that must be forever lost to the fisherman, the farmer, or the merchant, because they are articles of a perishable kind, such as fish, wheat, flour, Indian meal, flaxseed, beef, pork, &c., that will not admit of being kept on hand for market. So that, if the embargo be now continued, the country in fact may be said already to have sustained a clear loss, in her native produce only, of more than twenty-one million of dollars by the measure, besides the duties that would have arisen from near a million and a half of tonnage now idle in our docks, and the immense expense of large detachments of militia, regular troops, and a fleet of gunboats to enforce the laws. And so obnoxious are those laws, that, although to enforce their execution, we have blockaded our own ports, and hung our own citizens, they are still openly resisted by force, and seriously endanger the domestic tranquillity of the country. But, sir, it is to be observed that the actual loss sustained during the embargo, is not the only evil arising from it; another more permanent is to be apprehended. It will have the effect of throwing the commerce of the world into other and different channels; of inducing foreign nations to seek in other countries what they have heretofore been in the habit of purchasing from us, and what we now deny them. In the single article of cotton, for instance, we now, or did, export more than fourteen million of dollars' worth annually, and principally supplied the British manufactories with this article; but it is well known that the soil and climate of the Brazils are equally congenial to the growth of this crop with our own, and with due attention to the cultivation of it, is capable of supplying abundantly all the manufacries of England. Surely, then, I shall be correct in stating, that the embargo is a premium sufficient to stimulate them to this exertion, and to enable them ultimately to supplant us in the sale of this very valuable staple of some of our Southern States. And the intimate connexion known at present to exist between the British Government and the Regency of that country, will greatly aid in producing this result.

Now, sir, let me inquire, during the existence of the present state of things, whence we are to derive our revenue? A consideration certainly of no small importance to a Government depending entirely for her revenue upon commerce. Our commerce is entirely at an end, and of course our revenue; by the way, another loss to the nation of at least fifteen millions of dollars annually by the embargo. This, I know, cannot be felt during the present year, because our Treasury is overflowing with the proceeds of the last. But, from what sources are you to obtain money next year, for the support of Government, and the payment of the national debt? Are gentlemen ready to resort to a direct tax? No, sir; they love peace and power too well. That was once done for the purpose of raising money, I believe, to defend commerce, and the people on that occasion taught their servants a lesson that, I presume, will not be shortly forgotten. The President, I know, in his late Message, has given a favorable account of the present state of the Treasury; and most kindly indeed expresses much concern as to the best use to be made of the surplus revenue of the next year. Sir, among all the cares and troubles of his successor, I venture to predict this will not be one of them; he will not be plagued with surplus revenue next year. Mr. Jefferson's overweening anxiety for the public good must have blinded him to the obvious fact, that, before he can be well warm in his seat at Monticello, the revenue now bonded for will be collected, and as, in consequence of the present abandonment of commerce, there will certainly be no other bonds to become due, it follows necessarily, in the course of your annual expenditures, that, by the next meeting of Congress, your Treasury must be empty; so that, instead of being troubled with surplus revenue, it will require all the fiscal talents of the next incumbent of the Palace, be him whom he may, to provide the sum essential for the support of Government.

The gentlemen who advocate this—I do not know what to call it—*terrapi*n policy; I beg pardon, sir—when driven from every other hold, invariably launch into futurity, and tell us that, if we dare to put out our heads in any part of this wide world, we shall get them broke; or, in other words, if we take off the embargo, we shall have war. Laying out of view any comparison between the probable expense of war, and the actual loss annually sustained by the embargo, the former bearing no comparison with the latter, let us examine, for a moment, what foundation there is for this assertion, and whether we might not at this time, even admitting the British Orders of Council to have their full operation, carry on safely a most extensive and valuable commerce with at least three-fourths of the commercial world. I have before me those Orders in Council; the only restrictive clause is in the following words:

"His Majesty is therefore pleased, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, that all the ports and places of France, and her allies, or of any other country at war with His Majesty, and all other ports or places, from which, although not at war with His Majesty, the British flag is excluded; and all ports or places in the colonies belonging to His Majesty's enemies, shall from henceforth be subject to the same restrictions in point of trade and navigation, with the exceptions hereafter mentioned, as if the same were actually blockaded by His Majesty's naval forces in the most strict and rigorous manner."

As much as I condemn and feel disposed to resist these arbitrary regulations, they certainly do not interfere with, or in any respect embarrass our trade to Hindostan, China, Java, Sweden, Gibraltar, England, Portugal, Sicily, the whole extent of the Mediterranean and Atlantic coast of Africa, Arabia, the Western Isles, and Madeira, Nova Scotia, Canada, the Spanish, Swedish, and British West Indies, the Floridas, Brazils, and all the rest of South America, except Cayenne, as likewise the Northwest coast of America. These countries, too, as will appear by the last report of the Secretary of the Treasury, receive annually nearly four-fifths of the whole native exports of the United States, and are certainly, none of them, notwithstanding what has been said by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. SMITH,) within the purview of the British Orders of Council. That gentleman, when on this part of the subject, I will do him the justice to acknowledge, told us he had risen in great haste, and was unprepared; and, indeed, sir, it would require great haste and great want of preparation to justify some of the statements made by the gentleman to the Senate. Among other things equally extravagant, he told us, in the face of the British Orders of Council, I have just read, that we were now interdicted by those orders from any trade with Spain or Portugal; and, after referring to Mr. Canning's reply to the committee of merchants. viz: "That neutrals were not now excluded from the ports of Portugal and Spain by those orders," triumphantly asked us to tell him, as lawyers, whether, if a vessel engaged in that trade was carried into a British Court of Admiralty, she would be tried by Mr. Canning's conversation with the merchants, or according to the law of the land? I answer the gentleman, not as a lawyer, but as a man of common sense, that she would be tried according to the law of the land. And I wonder it had not occurred to that gentleman, as a man of common sense, that, according to the law of the land, she must be acquitted. Sir, the express language of these orders is, "that all the ports and places of France and her allies, or of any other country at war with His Majesty, and all other ports or places in Europe, from which, although not at war with His Majesty, the British flag is excluded," &c. And will the gentleman undertake to say here, that Spain and Portugal are now the allies of France, or that the British flag is now excluded from their ports? No, sir. The gentleman knows they are, at this moment, waging a most exterminating war with France, in defence of their very existence; and that they derive their principal support and subsistence under the British flag. There is no man who can read and understand plain English, and shall examine these orders, but will tell you in a moment that the ports of Spain and Portugal, so far from being within their spirit, are not now even within the letter of them. But, independent of this, there was a special proclamation of the King, dated on the 4th of July last, notifying to the world that the blockade no longer existed as to the ports of Spain. The advices the gentleman has been pleased to detail to us, as received in private letters from Europe, I shall take no notice of; they are entitled to none, unless he will first submit those letters to the Senate, and then we shall give to the information they contain, that weight to which the characters of his correspondents, and their means of acquiring correct information may entitle it.

Gentlemen, by turning to the last report of the Secretary, to which I have before referred, and I wish them to examine for themselves, will find, that of the $48,699,592 worth of produce and other merchandise, the actual growth and manufacture of our country exported from the United States in 1807, we sent

Almost four-fifths of the whole native exports of the United States for that year, which we might export nearly as safely now as then, but for the embargo; for it cannot, it certainly will not, be now contended, that any part of this commerce is embraced by the British Orders of Council; and the French decrees in relation to it, from a total inability to execute them, are a mere nullity. It is not, therefore, as has been said, the decrees and orders of foreign Powers that have reduced our country to its present distressed and embarrassed condition. It is our own folly, the embargo, that now palsies the labor, the energies, and enterprise of our citizens, and locks up more than thirty-five millions of dollars, the native produce of our country, to perish and sink upon our hands. I want to hear, sir, for I have not heard yet, how this enormous, this unnecessary, and ruinous sacrifice of individual and national wealth, can be justified to the public. There is no man who holds more indignantly than I do, those French Decrees and British Orders; but, before my God, I do most religiously believe that the embargo is a thousand times more injurious to our country than they both could be rendered. Instead of availing ourselves of the immensely extensive and valuable commerce now open to us, with at least three-fourths of the commercial world, it has now become a great favor, if we can be permitted, by the President and his gunboats, to sneak along shore, from one of our ports to another, with as much flour and pork as we can eat on the passage.

Sir, this is the next commercial country in the world to England; we are, in fact, in this respect, their only competitors, and while, as at present, they have an opportunity of monopolizing all the commerce of the world, do you believe they will ever ask you to take off the embargo laws? No, sir. This would be an act of madness in them, equal almost to our continuing them. They do not wish to meet upon the ocean again their industrious and enterprising rivals. They are, no doubt, pleased to see us shackling and crippling ourselves.

Much has been said by the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) on the subject of tribute, and in a manner I do not well understand, unless it be to retort upon the gentleman his own language, ad captandum. I wish it, however, to be distinctly understood, that no part of the commerce, I have undertaken to show the United States might now carry on, would be subject to any tribute. I wish it to be further understood, sir, that I would not only see this country clad in homespun, but covered in sackcloth and ashes, rather than that she should consent to pay tribute. I would see every commercial city upon our shores, and every rag of canvass we hold in flames. I would see our soil smoking with the best blood of its inhabitants, and the bones of our citizens mingled with the ashes of their dwellings, rather than see this people submit to pay tribute to any nation on earth. I trust there is not in either House a member who would not sooner risk his life, and spill his blood, than give a vote that should reduce his country to a condition so slavish and degrading. And I hope, Mr. President, that no insinuation has or will be made here calculated even to intimate an idea that the gentlemen of this body who may vote for the repeal of the embargo laws, would subject this nation to tribute. Such an insinuation would not only be unfounded, illiberal, and derogatory of this floor, but, in other respects, highly unjustifiable.

It has been asked by the gentleman from Kentucky, why do not those who oppose the embargo propose some substitute? Certainly it cannot be expected of us to offer ourselves as the pioneers of this Administration; but, in reply to the question, I will refer gentlemen to a confidential letter, submitted to the Senate a few days past: gentlemen need not be alarmed, I am not going to tell what that letter contains. If any substitute be necessary, in that is pointed out the one I would adopt; there is marked a safe, a high, and an honorable course, that, if pursued, without, I believe, endangering our peace, would add alike to our national character and our national wealth.

It has been well observed by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) that it was time we had become a nation, that we were nationalized. The sentiment was worthy of that gentleman, and one to which I entirely subscribed. But is the system of which this measure is apprehended by many to be but the commencement, calculated to nationalize? No, sir; much better calculated, I fear, to estrange the extremes of the Union from each other, and to familiarize our ideas to an event, that I deem it almost treason to think of, and that every honorable and patriotic American must view as the most calamitous curse that could be forced upon this country. I beseech gentlemen, therefore, to beware how they press this system too far. There is a section, a very respectable and powerful section of this country, that, with commerce, is rich and happy; deprived of that commerce a large portion of its population must starve. That population expect, and, as a portion of the community, have a right to expect, that their only means of subsistence will be fostered and defended, and not sacrificed to manufacturing whims or local prejudices. I do not mean to intimate that the embargo grew out of either of these causes; but the continuance of it at present, under existing circumstances, after the galling experience we have had, and when it can obviously produce nothing but distress and embarrassment to ourselves, may engender and nurture jealousies that, perhaps, time will not allay. I believe the people of this country will submit to any privations for the public good, but they must first be convinced that the public good requires the sacrifice. It must, it will astonish every unprejudiced and reflecting man in the community, if this ruinous measure be persisted in, after the experience we have received, and when we have before us the most conclusive and irresistible evidence to show that it is utterly inadequate to the accomplishment of any of the objects for which it was said to be intended. And conduct that cannot be accounted for on any reasonable ground, is apt, however unjustly, to be attributed to unworthy motives. I trust, therefore, that gentlemen, on their own accounts, will not reject this resolution; that they will, at least, first deliberate and look to consequences; that they will feel well the public pulse before, by this rash prescription, they stagnate the national blood.

Mr. MOORE said he was not a little surprised to hear insinuations of the disaffection of any portion of the people of the United States; but the Senate was now called upon to beware how they drove the people of the Eastern States to rebellion. The Councils of the United States were not to be inflamed by these suggestions; he could not believe them to be well founded; he could not believe that the citizens who, in our Revolution, exhibited such incontestable marks of patriotism, under the privations which the peculiar situation of our country rendered necessary, would now revolt against the Government which they themselves had constituted. He held no such opinion. On the contrary, he believed that they would unite with their fellow-citizens who were sufferers in the common cause with themselves, and unite every effort to maintain that independence they had assisted to gain.

The gentleman from Connecticut had asked, if the embargo had been productive of the consequences expected to result from it when passed? Had it not been more injurious to the United States than to foreign nations? It is certainly true (said Mr. M.) that it has not been productive of all the effects expected by those who were its advocates when it passed, but it has not had a fair experiment. The law has been violated, and an illicit commerce carried on, by which the belligerents have received such supplies as to have partially prevented its good effects.

The publications throughout the United States, and thence in England, that the embargo could not be maintained, have induced the belligerents to believe that we wanted energy, and that we are too fluctuating in our councils to persevere in a measure which requires privations from the people. Under these circumstances, it appears to me that the embargo has not had a fair trial. I have ever been of opinion that the only warfare which we could ever carry on to advantage, must be commercial; and, but for evasions and miscalculations on our weakness, we should before this have been suffered to pursue our accustomed trade.

It has been asked whether the embargo has not operated more on the United States than on the European Powers? In estimating this, it will be proper to take into consideration the evils prevented, as well as the injury done by the embargo. If the embargo had not passed, is it not certain that the whole produce of the United States would have invited attack and afforded a bait to the rapacity of the belligerent cruisers? If a few have accidentally escaped them, it is no evidence that, if the embargo had not been laid, the whole would not have been in the hands of the belligerents. That both belligerents have manifested hostilities by edicts which prostrated our commerce will not be denied by any gentleman. Great Britain, on a former occasion, passed an order, sent it out secretly, and before our Minister was officially notified it was in full operation. Their late orders included all our commerce which was afloat. Was it not to be expected that such would have been the policy of Great Britain in this case, and such our proportionate loss, if the embargo had not been laid, and thus snatched this valuable commerce from their grasp?

Great inconveniences are apprehended from this measure, giving another direction to commerce, and from our losing that to which we have been accustomed. I have no such apprehensions. If, on the contrary, we tamely acquiesce, I will not say in paying tribute, for every one seems to disclaim it—Great Britain, however, having excluded us from the Continent, if we tamely acquiesce, have we reason to expect that she will not, as long as she is a nation, exercise the same policy? Suppose it even to be policy, adopted in time of war, if we calculate the number of years she is in war in proportion to the number of years she is at peace, and suppose such a regulation to exist during all her wars, I conceive that we have lost our independence, if we submit for it. It appears to me that, for many years, Great Britain has adopted new regulations, and added new principles to the established law of nations, to the subversion of lawful neutral commerce. It cannot be doubted then, that if it be in her power she will totally destroy it.

I am not competent to enter into examination of the private evils or benefits resulting to commerce from the measure of the embargo. But I will state a point which, in my mind, is all important in this case: When the Revolutionary war commenced, it was not merely the paying a small duty on tea which was the subject of contest, for it was considered as unimportant; but it was the right of Great Britain to impose a tax without our consent. This is the question now in contest, affecting our independence, as in former times it affected our rights. It is a question affecting our very existence as a nation. If this embargo be removed, and that is the only question now under consideration, no gentleman in the opposition has stated what he would wish in its room. Therefore I shall take the question on the ground of acquiescence on the part of the United States in the Orders of Council. Then, I ask, will the United States so far abandon their independence as to subject themselves to the regulations of Great Britain and France, and be dictatorially told that they shall trade to such and such places only? Shall we admit the right of foreign Powers to restrict us? If we do, with what propriety can we at any future day contest the principle? In my mind this is the important point, and I still remain to form my opinion whether the embargo is the very best measure that could be adopted. Yet, to show to the world that I will not surrender my rights, that I will struggle for our independence, I shall certainly vote against this resolution till I see whether anything else can with propriety take its place.

Mr. S. SMITH said he did not rise to go into the discussion, for he had already taken his share in it, but to answer one observation of the gentleman from Delaware. It would be recollected that the gentleman had some days ago called for all the orders and decrees of the belligerents affecting neutral commerce; it would be recollected that the subject had been pressed upon the Senate yesterday, before these documents could have been received; that, at the request of a gentleman from Massachusetts, the gentleman from Vermont (Mr. BRADLEY) had withdrawn his motion for postponement; that the gentleman from Massachusetts had then spoken, and that he (Mr. SMITH) had replied to him. I stated facts as they occurred to me, without paper or document, and asked the opinion of legal gentlemen on the subject of the operation of the Orders of Council on Spain and Portugal. The gentleman from Delaware has undertaken to decide the question according to common sense. Common sense is my guide, sir; and permit me to say that, nine times out of ten, it is the best guide to follow; and though I have heard the opinion of the gentleman from Delaware, I have not changed my opinion on the subject. I believe that the British will now exclude our commerce from those ports, because the act of Parliament making permanent those orders, authorizes the King to modify them, as to His Majesty may appear proper. I asked yesterday whether a proclamation to this effect had been issued by the King of Great Britain? The gentleman says, common sense will give the orders the construction for which he contends. I take the answer of Mr. Canning to the committee of merchants, and bottom my assertion on it. Will the gentleman deny that, before the Orders in Council were issued, we could, under certain restrictions, trade to those countries? Yet, Mr. Canning answers, when asked by these three respectable merchants, who must have had doubts on the subject, or they would not have applied for information, "with American produce they may go." If they were, as the gentleman contends, as free to go now as prior to the Orders in Council, why did not Mr. Canning answer that they might go without restriction, instead of limiting the commerce to the carriage of American produce? When Mr. S. SMITH had concluded, the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, November 23.

THE EMBARGO.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. HILLHOUSE, made on the 11th instant, for repealing the "Act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several acts supplementary thereto."

Mr. CRAWFORD said that one of the objects of the gentleman from Connecticut was, no doubt, to obtain information of the effects of the embargo system from every part of the United States. This information was very desirable at the present time, to assist the Councils of the nation in an opinion of the course proper to be pursued in relation to it. A Government founded, like ours, on the principle of the will of the nation, which subsisted but by it, should be attentive as far as possible to the feelings and wishes of the people over whom they presided. He did not say that the Representatives of a free people ought to yield implicit obedience to any portion of the people who may believe them to act erroneously; but their will, when fairly expressed, ought to have great weight on a Government like ours. The Senate had received several descriptions of the effects produced by the embargo in the eastern section of the Union. As the Representative of another extreme of this nation, Mr. C. said he conceived it his duty to give a fair, faithful, and candid representation of the sentiments of the people whom he had the honor to represent. It was always the duty of a Representative to examine whether the effects expected from any given measure, had or had not been produced. If this were a general duty, how much more imperiously was it their duty at this time! Every one admitted that considerable sufferings have been undergone, and much more was now to be borne.

Gentlemen have considered this subject, generally, in a two-fold view, (said Mr. C.) as to its effects on ourselves, and as to its effects on foreign nations. I think this a proper and correct division of the subject, because we are certainly more interested in the effects of this measure on ourselves than on other nations. I shall therefore thus pursue the subject.

It is in vain to deny that this is not a prosperous time in the United States; that our situation is neither promising nor flattering. It is impossible to say that we have suffered no privations in the year 1808, or that there is a general spirit of content throughout the United States; but I am very far from believing that there is a general spirit of discontent. Whenever the measures of the Government immediately affect the interest of any considerable portion of its citizens, discontents will arise, however great the benefits which are expected from such measures. One discontented man excites more attention than a thousand contented men, and hence the number of discontented is always overrated. In the country which I represent, I believe no measure is more applauded or more cheerfully submitted to than the embargo. It has been viewed there as the only alternative to avoid war. It is a measure which is enforced in that country at every sacrifice. At the same time that I make this declaration, I am justified in asserting that there is no section of the Union whose interests are more immediately affected by the measure than the Southern States—than the State of Georgia.

We have been told by an honorable gentleman, who has declaimed with great force and eloquence against this measure, that great part of the produce of the Eastern country has found its way into market; that new ways have been cut open, and produce has found its way out. Not so with us; we raise no provisions, except a small quantity of rice, for exportation. The production of our lands lies on our hands. We have suffered, and now suffer; yet we have not complained.

The fears of the Southern States particularly have been addressed by the gentleman from Connecticut, by a declaration that Great Britain, whose fleets cover the ocean, will certainly find a source from which to procure supplies of those raw materials which she has heretofore been in the habit of receiving from us; and that having thus found another market, when we have found the evil of our ways, she will turn a deaf ear to us. By way of exemplification, the gentlemen cited a familiar example of a man buying butter from his neighbors. It did not appear to me that this butter story received a very happy elucidation. In the country in which he lives there are so many buyers and so many sellers of butter, that no difficulty results from a change of purchasers or customers. Not so with our raw material. Admitting that Britain can find other markets with ease, there is still a great distinction between this and the gentleman's butter case. When a man sells butter he receives money or supplies in payment for it. His wants and wishes and those of his purchasers are so reciprocal, that no difficulty can ever arise. But Great Britain must always purchase raw materials of those who purchase her manufactures. It is not to oblige us that she takes our raw materials, but it is because we take her manufactures in exchange. So long as this state of things continues, so long they will continue to resort to our market. I have considered the gentleman's argument on this point as applied to the feelings of the Southern country. No article exported from the United States equals cotton in amount. If then we are willing to run the risk, I trust no other part of the United States will hesitate on this subject.

NOVEMBER, 1808.

The Embargo.

SENATE.

Another reason offered by the gentleman from Connecticut, and a substantial one if true, is, that this measure cannot be executed. If this be the case, it is certainly in vain to persevere in it, for the non-execution of any public law must have a bad tendency on the morals of the people. But the facility with which the gentleman represents these laws to have been evaded, proves that the morals of the evaders could not have been very sound when the measure was adopted; for a man trained to virtue will not, whatever facility exists, on that account, step into the paths of error and vice.

Although I believe myself that this measure has not been properly executed, nor in that way in which the situation of our country might reasonably have induced us to expect, yet it has been so far executed as to produce some good effect. So far as the orders and decrees remain in full force, so far it has failed of the effect hoped from it. But it has produced a considerable effect, as I shall attempt to show hereafter.

In commenting on this part of the gentleman's observations, it becomes proper to notice, not an insinuation, but a positive declaration that the secret intention of laying the embargo was to destroy commerce; and was in a state of hostility to the avowed intention. This certainly is a heavy charge. In a Government like this, we should act openly, honestly, and candidly; the people ought to know their situation, and the views of those who conduct their affairs. It is the worst of political dishonesty to adopt a measure, and offer that reason as a motive for it which is not the true and substantial one. The true and substantial reason for the embargo, the gentleman says he believes, was to destroy commerce, and on its ruins to raise up domestic manufactures. This idea, I think, though not expressly combated by the observations of the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. WHITE,) was substantially refuted by him. That gentleman, with great elegance and something of sarcasm, applied to the House to know how the Treasury would be filled in the next year; and observed that the "present incumbent of the Presidential palace" would not dare to resort to a direct tax, because a former Administration had done so and felt the effects of it, insinuating that the present Administration did not possess courage enough to attempt it. Now, I ask, if they dare not resort to a direct tax, excise laws, and stamp acts, where will they obtain money? In what way will the public coffers be filled? The gentleman must acknowledge that all our present revenue is derived from commerce, and must continue to be so, except resort be had to a direct tax, and the gentleman says, we have not courage enough for that. The gentleman from Connecticut must suppose, if the gentleman from Delaware be correct, that the Administration seeks its own destruction. We must have revenue, and yet are told that we wish to destroy the only way in which it can be had, except by a direct tax; a resort to which, it is asserted, would drive us from the public service.

But, we are told, with a grave face, that a disposition is manifested to make this measure permanent. The States who call themselves commercial States, when compared with the Southern States, may emphatically be called manufacturing States. The Southern States are not manufacturing States, while the great commercial States are absolutely the manufacturing States. If this embargo system were intended to be permanent, those commercial States would be benefitted by the exchange, to the injury of the Southern States. It is impossible for us to find a market for our produce but by foreign commerce; and whenever a change of the kind alluded to is made, that change will operate to the injury of the Southern States more than to the injury of the commercial States, so called.

But another secret motive with which the Government is charged to have been actuated is, that this measure was intended and is calculated to promote the interests of France. To be sure none of the gentlemen have expressly said that we are under French influence, but a resort is had to the exposé of the French Minister, and a deduction thence made that the embargo was laid at the wish of Bonaparte. The gentleman from Connecticut told us of this exposé for this purpose; and the gentleman from Massachusetts appeared to notice it with the same view.

Now we are told that there is no danger of war, excepting it be because we have understood that Bonaparte has said there shall be no neutrals; and that, if we repeal the embargo, we may expect that he will make war on us. And this is the only source from whence the gentleman could see any danger of war. If this declaration against neutrality which is attributed to the Gallic Emperor be true, and it may be so, his Gallic Majesty could not pursue a more direct course to effect his own wishes than to declare that our embargo had been adopted under his influence. And unless the British Minister had more political sagacity than the gentleman who offered the evidence of the exposé in proof of the charge, it would produce the very end which those gentlemen wished to avoid—a war with Great Britain; for she would commence the attack could she believe this country under the influence of France. I would just as much believe in the sincerity of that exposé, as Mr. Canning's sincerity, when he says that his Majesty would gladly make any sacrifice to restore to the commerce of the United States its wonted activity. No man in the nation is silly enough to be gulled by these declarations; but, from the use made of them, we should be led to think otherwise, were it not for the exercise of our whole stock of charity. Now I cannot believe that any man in this nation does believe in the sincerity of Mr. Canning's expressions, or that Bonaparte believes that the embargo was laid to promote his interest. I cannot believe that there is any man in this nation who does candidly and seriously entertain such an opinion.

When we advance to the second proposition, we are told in the most positive terms, by the gentlemen from Delaware and Connecticut, that this measure has produced no effect on foreign nations. The gentleman from Massachusetts barely admits that at first it had excited some small degree of alarm in Great Britain for a short time. I cannot believe that gentlemen wish to be understood literally when they tell us this. It can be nothing more than a figure of rhetoric. It cannot really be meant that the embargo has produced no effect. The gentleman from Massachusetts gets over it by saying that insurrections among her manufacturers were familiar to him; he had always heard of them. But, sir, I do not recollect to have heard of any insurrection, of the kind to which I allude, having taken place. They have at times heretofore been disorderly indeed, but in the late case it was a peaceable assemblage of laborers, not intending to overthrow the Government or to resist the laws, but to show the absolute state of starvation with which they were threatened. There has been nothing of this kind within my recollection before. We have heard of mobs and riotous tumults; but in the present case no movement was made by these unfortunate people to disturb the Government. With a degree of facility which excited my astonishment, the gentleman tells us that if 100 principal manufacturers should be reduced to bankruptcy, and 50,000 mechanics should be turned out of employ, this would but strengthen the army and navy of the British nation; that, when you affect Great Britain most seriously, you do her a benefit. Pursuing this argument a little farther, suppose 500,000 should be unemployed, the arm of the nation would be so much the more strengthened, and the more it would enable her to enforce her arbitrary maritime regulations. I see no conclusion to which this argument would lead us, but to this; that as you destroy her manufactures you make her powerful. If the effect of destroying her manufactures was to be simply that which the gentleman conceives, of arming her vessels and filling the ranks of her armies, it possibly might promote her strength. But these people must be clothed and fed, whether in the sea or land service, and must also have a little pay. If all her manufactures are destroyed, where is she to obtain the sum of money necessary to pay, clothe, and feed these people. Sir, we affect them vitally by affecting their manufactures; for by the export duty on these, and imports on their returns, they obtain great part of their revenue. If they export nothing they can import nothing. This conclusion of the gentleman from Massachusetts cannot therefore be correct.

The gentleman from Massachusetts says, it is true that a considerable alarm was excited in England when the news of the embargo arrived there; that they had been led to believe, from their writers and speakers, that a discontinuance of their intercourse with this country would be productive of most injurious consequences; but that they were now convinced that all their writers and statesmen were mistaken, and that she can suffer a discontinuance of intercourse without being convulsed or suffering at all. To believe this requires a considerable portion of credulity, especially when the most intelligent men affirm to the contrary. In the last of March or the first of April last, we find, on an examination of merchants at the bar of the British House of Commons, that the most positive injury must result from a continuance of non-intercourse. It is not possible that our merchants on this side of the water, however intelligent they may be, can be as well acquainted with the interests of Great Britain as her most intelligent merchants. This alarm however, the gentleman has told us, continued through the Spring and dissipated in the Summer. It is very easy to discover the cause of the dissipation of this alarm. It was not because the loss of intercourse was not calculated to produce an effect, but it proceeded from an adventitious cause, which could not have been anticipated—the revolution in Spain; and there is no intelligent man who will not acknowledge its injurious effects on our concerns. No sooner did the British Ministers see a probability that the struggle between the Spanish patriots and France would be maintained, than they conceived hopes that they might find other supplies; and then they thought they might give to the people an impulse by interesting the nation in the affairs of Spain, which would render lighter the effects of our embargo. This is the cause of the change in Mr. Canning's language; for every gentleman in the House knows that a very material change took place in it in the latter part of the Summer. If then the embargo has not produced the effects calculated from it, we have every reason to believe that its failure to produce these effects has been connected with causes wholly adventitious, and which may give way if the nation adheres to the measure. If however there be any probability that these causes will be continued for a long time, we ought to abandon it. I am not in favor of continuing any measure of this kind, except there be a probability of its producing some effect on those who make it necessary for us to exercise this act of self-denial. When I first saw the account of the revolution in Spain, my fears were excited lest it should produce the effect which it has done. As soon as I saw the stand made by the Spanish patriots, I was apprehensive that it might buoy up the British nation under the sufferings arising from the effects of their iniquitous orders, which, compared with the sufferings which we ourselves have borne, have been as an hundred to one. If there be evidence that the effects of this measure will yet be counteracted by recent events in Spain, I will abandon it, but its substitute should be war, and no ordinary war—I say this notwithstanding the petitions in the other branch of the Legislature, and the resolutions of a State Legislature which have lately been published. When I read the resolutions, called emphatically the Essex resolutions, I blush for the disgrace they reflect on my country. We are told there that this nation has no just cause of complaint against Great Britain; and that all our complaints are a mere pretext for war. I blush that any man belonging to the great American family should be so debased, so degraded, so lost to every generous and national feeling, as to make a declaration of this kind. It is debasing to the national character.

We are told by the gentleman from Connecticut, not, to be sure, in language equally strong with that of the Essex resolutions, that the repeal of the embargo will not involve us in war, unless indeed Bonaparte makes war on us; that we are not driven to that alternative; that we have yet an honorable and lucrative trade left open to us. The same gentleman has said that he will not consent to go to war for rights not well established, but that he will never abandon a neutral right which is clearly established. From this it would appear that the gentleman thinks that the British Orders in Council are no infringement on the rights of neutral nations. [Mr. HILLHOUSE said he did not say so.] I did not say that the gentleman said so; but I drew the inference from the gentleman's position. [Mr. HILLHOUSE observed that he had said that he was doubtful whether the nation should go to war for doubtful rights; but for rights clearly indisputable he would permit the arming of our merchant vessels.] The gentleman's explanations, Mr. CRAWFORD said, did not change the inference he had before stated. He admits that he said that a repeal of the embargo would not involve the nation in war; and that in support of rights not clearly established, he is not prepared to say whether he would go to war or not. I here understood the gentleman to allude to that portion of trade carried on by exporting the produce of enemies' colonies to foreign countries. I had thought that the right of an independent nation to trade with the whole world, except in ports absolutely blockaded, or in articles contraband of war, was a right which could not be denied, a right in which no nation had heretofore attempted to control another. The gentleman from Connecticut says he will not go to war for doubtful rights; and, that he will not go to war against the Orders in Council. I can draw no other inference from these observations, than that the gentleman conceives that the Orders in Council do not infringe our neutral rights; or, that all our rights are doubtful.

How are these orders and decrees to be opposed but by war, except we keep without their reach? If the embargo produces a repeal of these edicts, we effect it without going to war. Whenever we repeal the embargo we are at war, or we abandon our neutral rights. It is impossible to take the middle ground, and say that we do not abandon them by trading with Great Britain alone. You must submit, or oppose force to force. Can arming our merchant vessels, by resisting the whole navy of Great Britain, oppose force to force? It is impossible. The idea is absurd.

By way of ridiculing the embargo, the gentleman from Connecticut, in his familiar way, has attempted to expose this measure. He elucidated it by one of those familiar examples by which he generally exemplifies his precepts. He says your neighbor tells you that you shall not trade with another neighbor, and you say you will not trade at all. Now this, he says, is very magnanimous, but it is a kind of magnanimity with which he is not acquainted. Now let us see the magnanimity of that gentleman, and see if it savors more of true magnanimity than our course. Great Britain and France each say that we shall not trade with the other. We say we will not trade with either of them, because we believe our trade will be important to both of them. The gentleman says it is a poor way of defending the national rights. Suppose we pursue his course. Great Britain says we shall not trade to France; we say we will not, but will obey her. We will trade upon such terms as she may impose. "This will be magnanimity indeed; this will be defending commerce with a witness!" It will be bowing the neck to the yoke. The opposition to taxation against our consent, at the commencement of the Revolution, was not more meritorious than the opposition to tribute and imposition at the present day. I cannot, for my soul, see the difference between paying tribute and a tacit acquiescence in the British Orders in Council. True, every gentleman revolts at paying tribute. But where is the difference between that and suffering yourself to be controlled by the arbitrary act of another nation? If you raise the embargo you must carry your produce to Great Britain and pay an arbitrary sum before you can carry it elsewhere. If it remains there, the markets will be glutted and it will produce nothing. For it appears, from the very evidence to which I have before alluded, that at least four-fifths of our whole exports of tobacco must go to England and pay a tax before we could look for a market elsewhere, and that out of seventy-five thousand hogsheads raised in this country, not more than fifteen thousand are consumed in Great Britain. Where does the remainder usually go? Why, to the ports of the Continent. I ask, then, if the whole consumption of Great Britain be but fifteen thousand hogsheads, if an annual addition of sixty thousand hogsheads be thrown into that market, would it sell for the costs of freight? Certainly not. The same would be the situation of our other produce.

But the gentleman says that he is not prepared to go to war for doubtful rights! What are these doubtful rights? Has the law of nations ever interdicted the trade with enemies' colonies, against the interruption of which the American merchants lately remonstrated with so much force and perspicuity? For the information of the Senate I will read a part of the memorial presented by the merchants of Boston. For my own part, I have never considered it a matter of much importance whether we have suffered more from France or Great Britain. I have long been convinced that both nations intended to do us all the evil they could; and where there is a difference in the quantum, it only results from an inability in the least mischievous to do more. But it is attempted to be shown by the gentleman from Massachusetts that there is a great difference between the injuries received from one Power, and those which we have received from another:

"While your memorialists have witnessed, with mingled feelings of indignation towards the perpetrators and of commiseration of their unfortunate countrymen, the insults and barbarities which the commerce of these States have sustained from the cruisers of France and Spain, it is their object, in the present memorial, to confine their animadversions to the more alarming, because more numerous and extensive detentions and condemnations of American vessels by Great Britain; and to advert to the principles recently avowed, and adopted by her courts, relative to neutral trade in articles of colonial produce. Principles which, if admitted or practised upon in all the latitude which may fairly be inferred to be intended, would be destructive of the navigation, and radically impair the most lucrative commerce of our country."

After going into a train of reasoning to show that the pretensions of Great Britain are a manifest violation of the neutral rights of this nation, they conclude by saying:

"But whatever may have been the motives for the proceedings on the part of Great Britain, the effect is notorious. From her recent conduct great losses have been sustained, our commerce has been checked and embarrassed, and large quantities of produce are now remaining locked up in this country which were purchased for foreign markets, because our merchants cannot send it abroad, without taking risks on themselves which prudence would not justify, or without paying such rates for insurance as the trade of the country cannot afford."

This memorial is in support of the very trade which the gentleman from Connecticut says he would not go to war for. Now a different language is held by the signers of this petition, under the increased injuries we have sustained; and I am only sorry for the character of the United States that this difference of language has taken place.

The gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. WHITE) has said, that, by repealing the embargo, we can now carry on a safe and secure trade to the extent of nearly four-fifths of the amount of our domestic productions. There is nothing more delusive, and better calculated to impose on those who do not investigate subjects, than these calculations in gross. If the gentleman will take the trouble to make the necessary inquiries, he will find that instead of Great Britain taking to the amount he supposes of our domestic productions, she takes nothing like it. It is true that a large proportion of our domestic exports is shipped ostensibly for Great Britain; but it is equally true that a very large proportion of these very exports find their way into the continental ports. For the British merchants in their examination before the House of Commons, already alluded to, say that three-fourths of their receipts for exportation to the United States have been usually drawn from the Continent; and that even if the embargo was removed and the Orders in Council were continued, they must stop their exportation, because the continental ports would be closed against American vessels; because their coasts swarm with English cruisers, the French must know that the American vessels attempting to enter have come from an English port. That they had facilities of conveyance to the Continent prior to the Orders in Council, the merchants acknowledged; and when requested to explain the mode of conveyance, they begged to be excused. No doubt every gentleman has seen these depositions, or might have seen them, for they have been published in almost every paper on the Continent. They have opened to me and to my constituents a scene perfectly new. They tell you that the Berlin decree was nothing. Notwithstanding that decree, they had a facility of conveying produce into the continental ports; but the Orders of Council completely shut the ports of the Continent against the entrance of American vessels. On this point there was no contrariety of opinion; and several of these merchants declared that they had sent vessels to the Continent a very few days before the date of the Orders of Council. This clearly shows that any conclusion to be drawn from the gross amount of exports must be fallacious, and that probably three-fourths ought to be deducted from the gross amount. This statement of the gentleman from Delaware, which holds out to the public the prospect of a lucrative trade in four-fifths of their exports, will certainly have a tendency to render them uneasy under the privations which they are called upon to suffer by the iniquitous measures of foreign nations. Although the statement was extremely delusive, I do not say that the gentleman meant to delude by it. This, however, being the effect of the gentleman's assertion, I am certainly warranted in saying that the evidence of the British merchants who carry on this trade, is better authority than the gentleman's statements.

But admit, for the sake of argument, and on no other ground would I admit it, that these gross statements are correct; and that, at the time the embargo was adopted, these Orders in Council notwithstanding, the trade of the United States could have been carried on to this extent. What security have we, if the embargo had not been laid, after submitting and compromising the national dignity and independence, that the British aggressions and Orders in Council would have stopped at the point at which we find them? Have we not conclusive evidence to the contrary? Are we not officially notified that the French leeward islands are declared by proclamation in a state of blockade? And do we not know that this is but carrying into effect a report of the committee of the British House of Commons on the West India islands, in which this measure is recommended, and in which it is stated that His Britannic Majesty's West India subjects ought to receive further aid by placing these islands in a state of blockade? I can see in this measure nothing but a continuation of the system recommended last Winter in this report, and published—for the information of the United States, I suppose.

If the embargo should be repealed, and our vessels suffered to go out in the face of the present Orders in Council and blockading decrees and proclamations, Mr. C. said, they would but expose us to new insults and aggressions. It was in vain to talk about the magnanimity of nations. It was not that magnanimity which induced nations as well as men to act honestly; and that was the best kind of magnanimity. The very magnanimity which had induced them to distress our commerce, would equally induce them to cut off the pitiful portion they had left to us. In a general point of view, there was now no lawful commerce. No vessel could sail from the United States without being liable to condemnation in Britain or France. If they sailed to France, Mr. C. said, they were carried into Britain; if they sailed to Britain, they were carried into France. Now, he asked, whether men who had any regard to national honor would consent to navigate the ocean on terms so disgraceful? We must be cool calculators, indeed, if we could submit to disgrace like this!

The last reason offered by the supporters of the present resolution, Mr. C. said, may properly be said to be an argument in terrorem. The gentleman from Massachusetts says, by way of abstract proposition, that a perseverance in a measure opposed to the feelings and interests of the people may lead to opposition and insurrection; but the gentleman from Connecticut uses the same expressions as applicable to the embargo. It may be a forcible argument with some gentlemen, and most likely may have had its effect on those who intended it to produce an effect on others. But I trust that this House and this nation are not to be addressed in this way. Our understandings may be convinced by reason, but an address to our fears ought to be treated with contempt. If I were capable of being actuated by motives of fear, I should be unworthy of the seat which I hold on this floor. If the nation be satisfied that any course is proper, it would be base and degrading to be driven from it by the discordant murmurs of a minority. We are cautioned to beware how we execute a measure with which the feelings of the people are at war. I should be the last to persist in a measure which injuriously affected the interest of the United States; but no man feels more imperiously the duty of persevering in a course which is right, notwithstanding the contrary opinion of a few; and though I may regret and respect the feelings of these few, I will persist in the course which I believe to be right, at the expense even of the Government itself.

Mr. MITCHELL said he was not prepared to vote on the question of repealing the embargo laws, in the precise form in which it had been brought before the Senate. There was as yet a want of information; for certain additional documents, expected from the Executive, had not yet been communicated, and the select committee to which the part of the Message concerning the foreign relations of the country was lately referred, had not brought forward a report. He would have been better pleased if the proposition had been so framed as to have expressed indignation at the injuries our Government had received from foreign nations. Then he would cheerfully have given it his concurrence. But now, when those who are willing to do something, though not exactly what the motion proposes, are made to vote directly against a removal of the existing restrictions upon our commerce, their situation is rather unpleasant; indeed, it is unfair, inasmuch as they must either give their assent to a measure, to the time and manner of which they may be averse, or they must vote negatively in a case which, but for some incidental or formal matter, would have met their hearty approbation. He could, therefore, have wished that the question had been presented to the House in such terms as to afford an opportunity of expressing their sense of the wrongs our nation had endured from foreign Sovereigns, and of the restrictions laid upon American commerce by their unjust regulations, as well as on the further restrictions that, under the pressure of events, it had been thought necessary for our own Legislature to impose.

But, although this course had not been taken, he should avail himself of the present occasion to offer to the Senate such sentiments as had arisen in his mind on the subject. In doing this, he should endeavor to take a commercial view of our situation; and, although he felt no small discouragement, from inability to arrange, in a methodical way, the proper topics for a speech, yet he found it his duty to offer something like a survey, however partial or detached, of the mercantile condition of the United States. For this purpose, he should give a sketch of the progress of our trade and navigation from the recognition of our independence in 1783.

Immediately after the severing of their empire in America from the British Crown, difficulties arose on the mode of conducting commercial intercourse between this country and Great Britain. The Parliament immediately took the matter into consideration, and provided by law for a commercial intercourse with the new States. The details of this arrangement were vested in the King and Council, and to this first statute of the British, on the manner of conducting American trade, may be traced the origin of the delegated legislative power, with which that body of men have, in subsequent years, assailed neutral rights. Thus authorized by Parliament to regulate commerce, they have prescribed, enforced, relaxed, or rescinded their orders, according to their pleasure, or the ever-varying course of events, and thereby been enabled, in a summary way, to meet the exigencies of the times.

About this time may be traced the commencement of that wonderful spirit of adventure which so distinguishes our people. We find some of them doubling the Cape of Good Hope, and displaying, for the first time, the flag of their nation to the Chinese at Canton, while others found their way round Cape Horn, and opened a traffic with the nations of the Northwest coast of America. And the joy which was excited on this side of the Atlantic, by the success and the profits of these voyages, was attended by a jealousy on the other, that the monopoly of the East India Company would be invaded by these daring competitors. The exertions of this class of our countrymen have been such, that a small firm in partnership, or even the capital of an individual American merchant, has repeatedly provided the outfit, that, forty years ago, required the patronage of an European Government. Madagascar, the Sandwich, and the Fejee Islands, have been visited, and served but as resting places for our mariners in their circumnavigation of the globe.

Difficulties having been found to increase between the American States and the British Islands, in respect to their commerce, it was found expedient on our part to send them a Minister Plenipotentiary. And, accordingly, in 1785, Mr. Adams went to London in that capacity. As an evidence of the temper both of England and France, at that period of our history, ought to be mentioned the attempts then made to seduce the whalemens from Nantucket. So successful for a while were these wily efforts, that the sandy but industrious island, whence its inhabitants migrated to Liverpool and to Dunkirk, suffered no inconsiderable shock by the migration of many of its most active citizens, and a removal of much of its shipping and stock. It was easy to discern that the desire of the two great commercial nations to increase their respective supplies of spermaceti, bone, and oil, was gratified by depriving our country of the most skilful and daring of its seamen.

While the precarious Orders in Council thus governed the trade of our people to Great Britain, there existed a source of difficulty within the American States themselves, which proceeded from their political condition. A cluster of independent governments, loosely adhering by the original articles of compact, framed during the Revolution, and under the specious appearance of political unity, assuming the character of thirteen distinct sovereignties, begat a variety of unprecedented occurrences. Attempts to strengthen this confederation, by granting the duties on imports to Congress for the purpose of paying the debts and supporting the credit of the nation, were ineffectual. And the refusal of New York, in 1787, to surrender its rich and increasing impost, may be considered as having left the Union to expire for want of support. Under the new Constitution, which was framed that very year, provision was expressly made for vesting in Congress the authority to regulate commerce. We were merely enabled to remedy many of the defects inherent in our former system: and particularly to assume an entire and undivided character in relation to foreign Powers.

The navigating spirit of our countrymen having called the attention of the world to the Northwest coast of America, we find that, in 1790, Great Britain and Spain were preparing to engage in a war, concerning the possession of a region, which, in truth, belonged to neither, but which had been purchased of the natives some years before, and possessed in full right and property by citizens of Massachusetts. In 1793, France, having undergone its republican metamorphosis, declared in due form the same commercial privileges to this as to other nations.

This, if I am not mistaken, said Mr. M., is the point of time when the commercial enterprise of our countrymen was considered, by the belligerent Powers of Europe, as worthy of special attention. And here is the commencement of these efforts to drive a lucrative trade on the one side, and of those exertions to curtail it on the other, which have led us, step by step, to our present awful situation. Repeated disasters and defeats had weakened the naval armament of France. She was unable to maintain her dominion on the ocean, or to give adequate protection to her external commerce. The business which had heretofore been carried on by her own merchant ships was now transferred to neutrals. And of these, the Americans, as the most enterprising, and contiguous to her West India colonies, acquired the principal part of it. Great Britain saw with displeasure the relief thus afforded to her enemy. She endeavored to prevent this interference of a neutral. And, that very year, ordered her cruisers to stop vessels of neutrals going to France and her dominions. The vast diffusion of our commerce, already spread over the greater part of the maritime world, was now very ably portrayed, and presented to the inspection of a prosperous and thrifty people by the American Secretary of State. The intercourse with France, still alluring neutrals by the prospect of great profits, our people crowded their ports with vessels and cargoes. The British persisted in their interruptions of this trade, and proceeded to make seizures, on the allegation that those ships were freighted with French property.

With the British nation, possessing a commerce of the greatest extent and a navy capable of protecting her trade and settlements abroad, it was a matter of the most ardent desire that our Government should have a Treaty of Amity and Commerce. The uneasiness of the people and the discontents in the great cities were so serious, that it was judged necessary to send an Envoy Extraordinary to the Court of St. James. And, with the hope that the fermentation would be delayed by a suitable negotiation, Mr. Jay was despatched on a special mission. He succeeded in forming a treaty. When, however, the President submitted it to the Senate, and its contents were made known to the nation, the dissatisfaction seemed to have been rather aggravated than assuaged. It was contended on the part of a people who could but count, ten years since, the date of their existence as a nation, that the terms were unequal and disadvantageous; and that a total rejection was preferable to the ratification of an instrument by which we made such mighty concessions. It was always my opinion, sir, that the statesman employed to negotiate on this occasion, was treated by public clamor with unmerited severity. He obtained a treaty from Great Britain, at that juncture, which, on the whole, answered our purposes exceedingly well, and was in reality more favorable to us than it probably would have been, had not the pressure of her affairs on the Continent of Europe induced her Ministers to be rather more conciliatory than usual.

In the meantime the thirteen stripes were displayed with increasing frequency and numbers along the coasts of Europe. And such was the opinion of the three great maritime kingdoms, of their appearance, that, in 1794 and 1795, the cruisers of Spain, as well as of England and France, made captures of American vessels. They offered various pretexts for these acts. These chiefly referred to evasions of blockades, to the carrying of enemy's property, and to the concealing or covering it by fraudulent invoices and papers. On the part of France, however, our affairs soon wore a serious aspect. Uncivil dispositions were working up to hostility. The resident Minister of the United States was recalled, and another sent in his stead. At length, after successive and fruitless attempts to accommodate the differences, during which marked disrespect had been shown to our Government and its Commissioners, Congress formally dissolved the existing treaty between the two nations, and authorized American vessels to cruise against those of France. This brings me to the year 1798, during which, and the time we were then embroiled, the British Government granted, for a stipulated sum, the protection of convoy to the merchant vessels of the United States.

This period of our commercial history, of which I am tracing this faint and imperfect outline, was distinguished by two remarkable events; one emanating from an act of our own Legislature, and the other from the misconduct of a petty despot of Barbary. And they are worthy of notice as tending to display the course of our trade and navigation, and of the proceedings of the Government in relation to them. The voyages to Africa for slaves had long disgraced while it enriched several of the European nations. The profits of a traffic in which rum and baubles were bartered away for negroes, allured our countrymen to embark in it. But, for the purpose of stopping so disgraceful and unprincipled an employment, Congress enacted heavy penalties against it. And the commerce of a people, which, as far as its internal regulations extended had been universal, underwent a restriction which permanently prohibited the trade to Guinea in human beings. The rich cargoes conveyed under our flag through the Mediterranean sea had often tempted the cupidity of the Deys and Beys ruling the inhabitants of its southern shore. By annual stipends, the subsidies paid by the Government for the protection of our foreign commerce in those distant regions, the persons, and the goods of our citizens were protected against those audacious pirates. One however, more unwise and unjust than the rest, by the exorbitancy of his demands, drew on himself the vengeance of our nation. He had captured American vessels and doomed their officers and crews to slavery. A war with Tripoli was the consequence, and, at the expense of a million of dollars from the Treasury, our naval heroes compelled those sons of rapine to respect the rights of our nation, and restore to its wonted freedom the commerce of its citizens.

In 1801, there was an occurrence which, though it happened in Denmark, was of evil augury in the eyes of neutral nations. And as forming a link in the chain of events it ought to be mentioned here. A project had been formed among the northern Powers of Europe to revive the Armed Neutrality, which had been originally conceived at St. Petersburg in 1780. A British fleet was sent to the Baltic Sound to dissolve it. A destructive cannonade of Copenhagen, was the consequence of Danish adherence to their principles. Awed by superior force, those brave asserters of their rights sunk into acquiescence. But the citizens of our own or of any neutral nation who consider this transaction in its true bearings and tendencies, will find it big with mischiefs to the weaker Powers that take no part in the neighboring wars. An armed neutrality, or an armed commerce, may be expected alike to impel the stronger belligerent to repress it as a measure of precaution, or to destroy it under a pretence of necessity.

The peace of Amiens subsisted but a short year; for, in 1803, the commencement of hostilities between France and Great Britain implicated in additional difficulties the foreign commerce of America. Our citizens persisted in their right to visit the ports of friendly nations. Our dispute with France had been terminated amicably by a treaty with the First Consul. The British Council, acting under a conviction that this trade was conducted in a manner that succored the enemy while it greatly incommoded themselves, determined that interference was necessary. Their cruisers seized American vessels trading with some of the French ports that were not blockaded, and their courts passed decrees of condemnation against ships with innocent cargoes on a return from ports to which they had carried contraband articles.

Moralists have sometimes considered blindness to the future, a happy trait in the constitution of the human mind. They might with equal or with greater propriety have ascribed much of private and public felicity to a becoming degree of foresight. There was indeed little, very little of a prophetic spirit wanting to satisfy us that our halcyon days were passing rapidly away, and a season of privation and adversity would arise. The haughty nation that had terrified the Scandinavian thrones, next tormented the American coast. The Hudson, the Delaware, and the Chesapeake, had been annoyed by her squadrons of vigilance; ships both inward and outward bound had been captured and sent to Halifax. The trade of New York, Philadelphia, Norfolk, Charleston, and Baltimore was sorely distressed at the very mouths of their harbors. Passengers and seamen were arbitrarily impressed, as the milder phrase is, but really kidnapped or made prisoners. Coasting vessels carrying the domestic produce of our country from one port to another, and in no respect concerned in foreign commerce, were fired upon, and one of their people killed. The national territory was violated, the service of writs to arrest some of these disorderly persons was resisted, the civil authority despised, and defied, and even the public vessels of the revenue assailed with shot. Conduct of this atrocious character was so imprudent and so reiterated, that the repeated appeals of the citizens to their Government, rendered it at length a case in which right blended with duty called upon Congress to act, and the result of these intolerable outrages was the statute for preserving peace in our own ports and harbors.

In the ordinary intercourse of nations, such conduct would have amounted to war. It was indeed war; it was legitimate cause of war; nothing was required after such a severe blow given by them, but for us to return it, and the American would have entered the bloody amphitheatre to contend with the gladiators of Europe. But a pacific policy prevailed. The feeling of our people, smarting still under the wounds of the Revolution, and maintaining the doctrine that every citizen possesses, as an indefeasible inheritance, a portion of his country's sovereignty, was averse to contention in arms. On the part of France no reparation had been made for the heavy spoliations made upon our commerce by her cruisers, save the sum provided to be paid out of our own Treasury in satisfaction of them, by one of the conventions appurtenant to the treaty by which Louisiana was ceded to us. For the losses sustained by our merchants and underwriters, reparation had years before been sought for from Congress; but it had there been decided that losses in consequence of capture by a belligerent as well as by danger from the sea were to be borne by the concerned, and not to be considered as guaranteed by the national Treasury.

I now come to the year 1806, an eventful year to the foreign commerce of our people. An extravagant and armed trade had for a considerable time been carried on by some of our citizens with the emancipated or revolted blacks of Hayti. The French Minister, conformably to the instructions of his Government, remonstrated against this traffic as ungracious and improper; and under an impression that our citizens ought to be restrained from intercourse with the negroes of Hispaniola, Congress passed an act forbidding that altogether. This was the second time that our Government circumscribed the commercial conduct of its citizens. It was also during this year that memorials were forwarded to the executive and legislative branches of our Government by the merchants of our principal seaports, stating the vexations of their foreign commerce to be intolerable, and calling in the most earnest terms for relief or redress. These addresses were mostly composed with great ability; it seemed as if the merchants were in danger of total ruin. Their situation was depicted as being deplorable in the extreme. The interposition of their Government was asked in the most strenuous and pressing terms; and your table, Mr. President, was literally loaded with petitions. The chief cause of this distress was briefly this. These citizens of the United States were engaged during the war in Europe, in a commerce with enemies' colonies not open in time of peace; by this means, the produce of the French West Indies was conveyed under the neutral flag to the mother country. Great Britain opposed the direct commerce from the colony to France through the neutral bottom. The neutral then evaded the attempt against him by landing the colonial produce in his own country, and after having thus neutralized or naturalized it, exported it under drawback for Bordenaux or Marseilles; this proceeding was also opposed by the British, and much property was captured and condemned in executing their orders against it. Their writers justified their conduct by charging fraud upon the neutral flag, and declaring that under cover of them a "war in disguise" was carried on, while on our side the rights of neutrals were defended with great learning and ability in a most profound investigation of the subject.

Connected with these events, progressing from bad to worse, are some proceedings of the Senate, which I deem it necessary here to state. This dignified body listened with peculiar attention to the complaints of the merchants. Their tale of sufferings excited a general sympathy. The most studious efforts were made for devising a plan of relief; at last it occurred that the peculiar organization of the Senate would enable it to pursue a course different from the ordinary routine of legislative business. In its executive capacity, the Senators were the Constitutional counsellors of the President as to treaties with foreign nations; and the Senate, influenced by a desire of removing the difficulties that were thickening around us, resolved to express their sense to the President upon that solemn occasion. After full consideration they framed two strong resolutions, which are recorded in your journal of that session; the one expressed indignant feelings at the aggressions made by the belligerents, and the other requested to demand restitution and reparation for the captures, condemnations, and imprisonments, they had committed. The members of the Senate were sent to communicate these resolutions to the President. It was my lot, sir, to be employed in that service, and I well remember the interview. What effect this conduct of the Senate produced in the mind of the President, it is impossible for me to say, but certain it is, that shortly after, he nominated Mr. Pinkney as Envoy Extraordinary to England, and the Senate gave their advice and consent; and this important step was taken to appease mercantile uneasiness, and to remove obstructions to the freedom of commerce.

This same year was ushered in by a proclamation of General Ferrand, the French commandant at St. Domingo, imposing vexations on the trade of our citizens; and a partial non-importation law was enacted against Great Britain by Congress about the middle of April. But these were not all the impediments which arose. Notices were given to the American Minister in London of several blockades. The chief of these was that of the coast, from the Elbe to Brest inclusive, in May. And here, as it occurs to me, may I mention, the spurious blockade of Curraçoa, under which numerous captures were made. And lastly, to complete the catalogue of disasters for 1808, and to close the woful climax, the French decree of Berlin came forth in November, and, as if sporting with the interests and feelings of Americans, proclaimed Great Britain and her progeny of isles to be in a state of blockade.

Hopes had been entertained that such a violent and convulsed condition of society, would not be of long duration. Experience, however, soon proved that the infuriate rage of man was as yet unsatisfied, and had much greater lengths to go. For, early in the succeeding year (1807,) an order of the British Council was issued, by which the trade of neutrals, and of course of American citizens, was interdicted from the port of one belligerent to the port of another. And in the ensuing May, the rivers Elbe, Weser, and Ems, with the interjacent coasts, were declared by them to be in a state of blockade, and a similar declaration was made on their part to neutrals in regard to the straits of the Dardenelles, and the city of Smyrna. But these were but subordinate incidents in this commercial drama; the catastrophe of the tragedy was soon to be developed. "On the 22d of June, by a formal order from a British admiral, our frigate Chesapeake, leaving her port for a distant service, was attacked by one of these vessels, which had been lying in our harbors under the indulgence of hospitality, was disabled from proceeding, had several of her crew killed, and four taken away." Immediately the President by proclamation interdicted our harbors and waters to all British armed vessels, and forbade intercourse with them. Under an uncertainty how far hostilities were intended, and the town of Norfolk being threatened with an immediate attack, a sufficient force was ordered for the protection of that place and such other preparations commenced and pursued as the prospect rendered proper.

In furtherance of these schemes, a proclamation was published, holding all their absent seamen to their allegiance, recalling them from foreign services, and denouncing heavy penalties for disobedience. The operation of this upon the American merchant service would have been very sensibly felt. Many British born subjects were in the employ of our merchants, and that very Government which claimed as a British subject every American citizen who had been but two years a seaman in their service, refused to be bound by their own rule in relation to British subjects who had served an equal term on board the ships of the United States. But this was not all. The month of November was distinguished by an order retaliating on France a decree passed by her sometime before, declaring the sale of ships by belligerents to be illegal; and thus, by virtue of concurrent acts of these implacable enemies, the poor neutral found it impossible to purchase a ship either from a subject of Great Britain or of France. That season of gloom was famous, or rather infamous, for another act, prohibiting wholly the commerce of neutrals with the enemies of Great Britain, and for yet another, pregnant with the principles of lordly domination, on their part, and of colonial vassalage on our, by which the citizens of these independent and sovereign States are compelled to pay duties on their cargoes in British ports, and receive licenses under the authority of that Government, as a condition of being permitted to trade to any part of Europe in possession of her enemies.

This outrageous edict on the part of Britain was succeeded by another on the side of France, equalling, or if possible, surpassing it in injustice. In December came forth the decree of Milan, enforcing the decree of Berlin against American trade; dooming to confiscation every vessel of the United States that had been boarded or even spoken to by a Briton, and encouraging, by the most unjustifiable lures, passengers and sailors to turn informers. The abominable mandate was quickly echoed in Spain, and sanctioned by the approbation of His Most Catholic Majesty. It has been executed with shocking atrocity. In addition to other calamities, the property of neutrals has been sequestered in France, and their ships burned by her cruisers on the ocean.

Such, Mr. President, was the situation of the European world, when Congress deemed it necessary to declare an embargo on our own vessels. Denmark and Prussia, and Russia, and Portugal, had become associated or allied with France; and, with the exception of Sweden, the commerce of our citizens was prohibited, by the mutually vindictive and retaliating belligerents, from the White Sea to the Adriatic. American ships and cargoes were declared the prize and plunder of the contending Powers. The widely extended commerce of our people was to be crushed to atoms between the two mighty millstones, or prudently withdrawn from its dangerous exposure, and detained in safety at home. Policy and prudence dictated the latter measure. And as the ocean was become the scene of political storm and tempest, more dreadful than had ever agitated the physical elements, our citizens were admonished to partake of that security for their persons and property, in the peaceful havens of their country, which they sought in vain on the high seas and in European harbors. The regulations, so destructive to our commerce, were not enacted by us. They were imposed upon us by foreign tyrants. Congress had no volition, to vote upon the question. In the shipwreck of our trade, all that remained for us to do, was to save as much as we could from perishing, and as far as our efforts would go, to prevent a total loss.

I touch, with a delicate hand, the mission of

Mr. Rose. The arrival of this Envoy Extraordinary from Britain was nearly of the same date with an order of his Government, blockading Carthagena, Cadiz, and St. Lucar, and the intermediate ports of Spain, and thereby vexing the commerce of American citizens. The unsuccessful termination of his negotiation has been but a few months since followed by a refusal on the part of his Government to rescind its orders, that work so much oppression to our commerce, on condition of having the embargo suspended in respect to theirs. And the French Ministry has treated a similar friendly and pacific overture, from our Executive, with total disregard. In addition to all which we learn, from the highest source of intelligence, that the British naval commander at Barbadoes did, about the middle of October, declare the French leeward Caribbean islands to be in a state of strict blockade, and cautioning neutrals to govern themselves accordingly, under pain of capture and condemnation.

If it should appear to you, sir, that I have dwelt with too much minuteness on the series of events that have progressed step by step to the present crisis, the only apology I have to offer is, that I consider it necessary for the purpose of ascertaining what the situation of the nation truly is. Unequal indeed is the contest between the weak and the strong. Where force is substituted for principle, it is vain and useless to talk of rights. Two foreign nations are contending with gigantic efforts for superiority. They have labored, with but too much success, to make the bystanders take sides in the contest. Our Government has hitherto magnanimously maintained its neutrality. Yielding to the solicitations of neither, it was desirous of doing impartial justice to the two. But this fair and equal demeanor would not satisfy them. The tempter not unfrequently practises upon innocence the arts of circumvention; and exalted virtue gives to its possessor no indemnity against malice. The uprightness of our public conduct was pleasing neither to Albion nor to Gaul. And as we had refused to become the ally of either, we have to a certain degree suffered the hostility of both. The ancient and venerable code prescribing law to civilized communities, is abrogated. New and capricious inventions, calculated to suit the clamor of a party, or the spite of a foe, are substituted in their stead. The freedom of the ocean is taken away. This highway of nations is infested with freebooters and pirates; and the more powerful legislates for the rest, in all cases whatever. Towards ourselves the old colonial principle is revived. Americans may navigate the seas indeed, but on condition of paying duties to Britain, or taking from her licenses to trade, and observing such further directions as it shall please her to prescribe.

Are the American people prepared to submit to this? Having examined in my cursory manner the modern and I may say the present state of our affairs, I shall next take a hasty retrospect of this American people, while yet related to Britain as colonists, and before the idea of a separation had entered into the boldest head. The Parliament and Council maintained the right to tax and bind the colonies. The people of the plantations and colonies, since risen to the dignity of States, denied the pernicious doctrine. The mother country prepared to enforce it; and the colonies meditated resistance.

Duties were laid upon paper, glass, and painter's colors, to be collected at the ports of entry in the colonies. Public indignation was never more vehement. It was communicated with electrical speed, from one extremity of the Empire to the other. It was resolved to defeat the stamp act by a refusal to buy its paper. All business was at a stand; memorials and remonstrances were forwarded to the King and to the Parliament. The discontent was so well grounded and so deeply fixed, that Hillsborough, the Secretary of State for the colonies, trembled for the consequences. Resistance, in the form of insurrection or rebellion, seemed inevitable, and to prevent the horrors of a civil war, the odious statute was repealed. The freemen of New York were almost frantic with joy on this occasion, and they erected a superb statue to Chatham for his exertions against the continuance of the law. Their countrymen, from Kennebec to Savannah, sympathized with them in their honest exertions.

The duties on the other articles were also repealed; but the Parliament adhering to the right of taxation, and determining to test the principle, reserved a small impost on tea, to be collected in the colonies. All the resentment which the stamp act had excited, was revived on this occasion; murmurs increased to uproar. To enforce the execution of this law, the officers of the British navy were commissioned to act also as officers of the revenue. To manifest their opposition the people refused to consume the tea. They carried their aversion so far that the tickets of the State lottery, a fourth part of which had usually been purchased in the colonies, remained unsold. They refused to import British merchandise. They established domestic manufactures. They destroyed the obnoxious drug on board the vessels which brought it. They defended their privilege against the naval and military force sent to subdue them. In short, they defended their holy cause: they expelled the enemy from their shores, and finally they achieved the independence of their country. If, in the year 1768, our predecessors could declare a non-importation agreement, rather than submit to foreign taxation, what ought the present race of Americans to do in 1808, when menaced with similar exactions from abroad?

That the present case is stronger than that which preceded and induced the Revolution, may be inferred from several considerations: The American Governments were at that time dependent colonies; they are now independent States. The British Parliament had at least the color of right to levy money upon them; they have now no legal pretext whatever. It was then alleged that the money raised on the colonies would be employed in their own protection and defence; but now there is not even a pretence of the kind: then the colonies looked to the King of that country as their proper sovereign, and the source of all honor and power; now he is an alien to them, and the allegiance that once connected the prince and his subjects has been absolved by his own act. And yet money is demanded by that monarch, from this very people, for the privilege of navigating the ocean, and of carrying her merchandise to the Continent of Europe!

Did the people of the United States authorize their public agents to consent to this? No. Have the President and Senate conceded the point by virtue of the treaty-making power? No. Are the American people represented in the Parliament that authorized these arbitrary measures? They are not. Do they allow that they ought to be taxed where they are not represented? They do not. Is this highminded nation prepared, at the age of thirty-five years, to surrender its independence by submitting to domination at which the infant colonies revolted? I cannot believe it. Will they consent to pay duties on their exports, when required by a foreign Government, while their own Constitution expressly withholds such a power from Congress? I think not, by no means. But I shall be told that this is an external regulation, and has no possible connexion with our internal and domestic concerns. Why really, if this is the fact, I cannot but admire the dullness of British statesmen forty years ago. The simpletons of that day conceived it necessary to collect the amount of duties in the colonial ports where the goods were entered for consumption. The experiment cost them an empire, but it taught them an important lesson. They learned from it a more easy and effectual mode of taxation: This was to charge a duty on their own exports, and collect the money in their cities at home, and by the hands of their officers there. They have successfully followed this lucrative business ever since the expedient occurred to them. Such has been the avidity of the Americans to consume British manufactures, that they have always contributed largely to the ways and means of that Government. It has been calculated upon as a sure and efficient fund. One may almost credit the declarations of certain British enthusiasts, who declare the loss of the colonies to have been a blessing, inasmuch as they were formerly very expensive, and paid no taxes, and at present contribute large sums of money, and are not chargeable at all. And with this tax, in addition to light money, quarantine fees, convoy duty, port charges, topmage, keelage, and various other things that have not yet received names in the commercial nomenclature of America, has our commerce with Great Britain been constantly burdened. As, however, these were in reality regulations of a domestic and municipal nature, a compliance with them involved no dishonor. If our people voluntarily entered their ports, they were bound to obey their laws. But on the late occasion this arrogant Power has gone a greater length. American citizens navigating the ocean, and lawfully pursuing their own business, are arrested on their voyage, and compelled, as a condition of proceeding, to pay an impost for the cargo, or in other words to purchase a license to enable them to go to their place of destination, whether outward or homeward bound. What other expedients those political economists may have in reserve for raising further sums of money on our trade, I am not Œdipus enough to unridle. As far, however, as I can comprehend the case before me, it is marked with stronger features than those which characterized the dawning Revolution. I cannot suppose that any luxury has corrupted, during the short period of their existence, the spirit and temper of the American people. The old Whig temperament still survives unchanged, unadulterated. And he who has but a single drop of whiggish blood in his veins, will ever be ready to assert the good old principles, and maintain them inviolate. If I am deceived in this, I should not err materially in expressing my doubts whether the acquisition of independence is to be considered as a blessing. Upon principle, therefore, the Revolutionary patriots have set us a noble precedent. They carried their self-denial to an absolute privation of intercourse. Is there firmness enough at the present crisis to carry such a law into operation? I know that, at home and abroad, the most subtle measures are adopted to thwart us. For example: Our non-importation law, in forbidding Irish linens, was calculated to encourage the introduction of them from the Netherlands and Silesia. But the British Ministry frame their orders to prohibit this, unless we pay duties to them, and thus purchase the privilege. Our embargo law rendered it unlawful for the collectors to give clearances to American vessels; yet, to defeat this regulation, the British Governors instantly open the West India ports to all manner of persons that will run away without them. While our gunboats and cutters are watching the harbors and sounds of the Atlantic, a strange inversion of business ensues, and by a retrograde motion of all the interior machinery of the country, potash and lumber are launched upon the lakes, and Champlain and Ontario feel the bustle of illicit trade; and strange to tell, under the embargo system, the southern atmosphere has become so subject to gales and tempests from the north, that our poor coasters, who love to hug their native shores, are by distress of weather often driven to Cuba and Jamai'a, and there forced (dire necessity!) to sell their cargoes to repair the damage they have sustained, and refit for a return to that land which they are longing and sickening to see.

If I have not erred in my reasoning, the embargo was correct in its principle, and would also be correct in its continuance under the increasing aggressions of the belligerent nations. But it is contended by the honorable mover (Mr. HILLHOUSE) of the resolution, that expediency ought to govern us on this occasion; and thus I suppose the exception will be as broad as the rule. Let us examine the arguments in favor of this expediency.

We are told that the embargo, if continued, will ruin our commerce. The true operation of the embargo is to save our commerce from spoil and depredation of foreign Powers. The notion that our own Government is unfriendly to commerce is wholly unfounded; from commerce we derive the greater part of our revenue. And to destroy that source of income would be to commit an act of political suicide. It would be killing the hen that lays the golden eggs. To every person who understands the history of our embarrassments, and knows how incessantly Government has been laboring to protect, secure, and improve the commerce of its citizens, such a declaration must appear wholly groundless. Why, sir, the existing quarrels are surely commercial; they are neither territorial nor genealogical. I am one of the warmest friends to American commerce, and always have been. I wish as heartily as any man all the prosperity to that useful occupation that it merits. No gentleman regrets more than myself that it has been harassed so much by the parties at war. No one regretted more than I the imperious necessity under which they laid us of employing an embargo. And I am anxiously looking for the time when, with safety to commerce, it may be removed. If a repeal of the embargo law would restore our commerce to its former thrift, I would call for the question instantly, and give it my affirmative. But, in the present state of the world, it will do no such thing. As soon as the restrictions are taken off, captures and condemnations will be renewed, and the rapacity of the spoilers, stimulated by avarice, as hunger is increased by abstinence, will be greedy to seize and not easy to satiate. As to changing the commercial habits of our people, it is idle to attempt it; the disposition is already formed, and it cannot be altered. This nation is not a new-born babe, whom we can mould and fashion as we please, but it may be compared to a sturdy youth, with habits that will never alter. Nor is this trading spirit peculiar to the seaports. It pervades the innermost recesses of the country, and delights as much in the purchase of lands and their produce as of ships and their cargoes. Such, then, being the turn and disposition of our people, it is as much out of the power of the Government to eradicate their mercantile habits, even if it would, as it was impossible for the rulers of France to abolish the Sabbath.

But it is urged that the embargo will deprive us of revenue. That it will lessen our income is certain. But we have ample resources in our Treasury, to bear us along for a considerable time to come. The stagnating capital of commerce will partly be turned into land, and the purchasers of these national lands will pay the value into the Treasury. There will be a large increase of revenue from this source. By the reduction of the public debt, under the present Administration, thirty millions of dollars, there will be a saving of all the interest that was hitherto paid upon that portion of the principal. And with a discreet economy in our finance, we shall find enough to answer our current purposes. It must be owned indeed that the political atmosphere is cloudy. It would be no cause of surprise to me, that the gloom and darkness should increase and thicken around us. But if this should happen, the patriot heart ought not to be appalled. For my own part, I never permitted myself to despair of the Republic. The storm will pass away, and the cheering rays of the sun will beam upon us again. Suppose, however, that the finances be deficient. The public faith is unimpaired. The national credit is unlimited. Lenders will present themselves in abundance, offering their money upon loan, on the most accommodating terms, like an individual whom losses and disappointments have reduced to the necessity of borrowing moderate sums to facilitate his business, this nation may employ a temporary accommodation in its pecuniary concerns, with benefit to the citizens and without disrepute to itself. Better times will arrive, and the sure and certain hope of this event will be allowed, upon moral, political, and even on Christian principles, to be a firm ground of reliance. Again, it is urged, on the side of expediency, that the surplus produce, if kept at home under the embargo, will spoil upon our hands. Better, sir, to accumulate in our barns and stores, than pass into the possession of enemies. By the bounty of Providence our land has been productive beyond measure. Our citizens now revel in abundance of good things. For the plenty poured into the lap of their country, they are ungrateful to repine. They ought on the other hand to be thankful, and I trust they are so. For an accumulation, it is eminently desirable there should be an outlet. The demand for our provisions in foreign parts arises in a great degree from the occupation of men in pursuits different from the raising of articles for food; and our demand for articles of foreign growth or manufacture, proceeds from the employment of our people in the culture of such substances as are proper to support human life. The former class comprehends eaters or consumers of provisions, who do not labor to rear them. To the latter, belong the growers or cultivators who are directly engaged in procuring sustenance. The surplus produce of each of these classes is exchanged for the accommodation of the other. Now, if the eating class should increase on our side of the Atlantic, consumption will be promoted just as well as if our provisions should be carried abroad, and the farmer will obtain purchasers in his country, who will pay him as good prices as foreigners; besides, it remains to be proved that the removal of the embargo would restore the safe transportation, the rapid sales, and the high receipts, so vehemently desired. The ocean is infested by harpies, who will snatch the food from our mouths. Perishable cargoes will be lost to them under confiscation, or will spoil under detention. It is wholly a petitio principii, to say that a removal of the existing restrictions will diffuse an antiseptic virtue sufficient to keep flour and fish from decay. But the auri sacra fames burns with impatience, and, in the lottery of trade, overlooks the adverse chances, and calculates with certainty on the possession of a prize; and if my estimates of the benefits were as extravagant as those of some gentlemen, I should join with them in the unconditional removal of the restraints. But, even then, I should differ with them on one point; instead of clamoring against our own Government, I should vent my indignation against the belligerents, the real authors of our distresses.

Supposing, however, that the class of persons who consume provisions without laboring directly to raise them, should increase in the United States, and thereby enlarge our domestic market, this very occurrence is made a subject of alarm, under a pretence that a systematic plan is in operation to annihilate commerce, and substitute manufactures in its place. This is one of the most idle whimsies that ever entered into the mind of a statesman. Reasoners often bewilder themselves by ideal or imaginary distinctions, that have no foundation in nature; they make partitions in the intellectual regions, like the invisible or arbitrary lines of geometers, and not by the rivers and mountains, which distinguish the face of nature, and which every eye can discern. Commerce is to be sacrificed at the shrine of manufactures. It would be a pitiful commerce that could be carried on without manufactures. And I will offer as one of the unanswerable arguments against this fallacious reasoning, that the ship, without which commerce cannot be carried on, is a domestic manufacture. Our citizens have become proficient in this exquisite art, and I hope they will never forget their skill. The construction of the ship, in which our productions are to be carried to foreign markets, implies the existence of a cluster of manufactures, and without their aid, the ship cannot be equipped for sea. A commercial state of society, therefore, presupposes the establishment of manufactures, and cannot be carried on without them. I hope the advocates of commerce will not proscribe the shipwright's handicraft, and for fear of promoting domestic manufactures, go beyond the seas to buy their vessels. The ship manufacture is one of the arts that confers distinction and honor to America. I wish prosperity to the ship-builder, and to the rope-maker, and the joiner, and the rigger, and the painter, and the glazier, and the plumber, and iron-founder, and the blacksmith, and the other laborers who work with him in this admirable manufacture; and my good wishes extend to him who shapes the spars and masts, prepares the tar and turpentine, forms the copper into bolts and sheets, and forms the hemp into canvass. In the furniture of the ship too, Mr. President, are contained other manufactures, which do the highest honor to the hand and the head of man; the telescope, the quadrant, the chronometer, the compass, with gunpowder and artillery. And yet the gentleman from Connecticut is terribly afraid that manufactures will supplant commerce. While the ship continues to be the pride and boast of America, and of man, let no one decry manufactures; for without a constellation of auxiliar arts, that stupendous manufacture cannot exist. While on the subject of manufactures, I must do these States the justice to remark, that they are already become a great manufacturing country. The manufactures in iron, from the gathering of the ore, through the operations of forging and refining, up to the casting of hollow ware, the preparation of nails, and fabrication of cannon, are pursued with great success. Works in pelts and skins, such as leather, military accoutrements, saddlery, trunks, gloves, breeches, shoes, boots, harness-making, and book-binding, are carried on to wide extent. Preparations of wood in cabinet ware, furniture, and carriages, are done in beautiful style; in woollen goods, the combination of industry, with skill, has passed from the family fire-side to public institutions. The brass-founder, the copper-smith, the jeweller, and the wire-worker, have made distinguished progress in their respective arts. I pass over brewing, distillery, and a hundred other employments, that I may give credit to the Congress for the aid given to certain other branches of manufacture a few sessions ago. By an exemption of rags from the payment of duties, ample stock was provided for the paper mills, and an additional supply of the materials prepared for gazettes, pamphlets, and books, so necessary to a free and well-informed people. By a similar regulation in favor of regulus of antimony, the manufacture of types was favored, and such aid given to literature, that already the Greek and Latin classics appear in American print. The preparation of mill-stones, and flour, that staple of our country, was encouraged by permitting unwrought burrs to be imported from their quartz strata in France, free from imposts. In like manner the admission of clay, cork, gypsum, bristles, hides, bullion, furs, wool, and many other articles, have worked beneficial effects upon our domestic manufactures. In this enumeration there is no mention of the manufactures which depress the character and prostrate the soul of man. I hope the degeneracy which accompanies the silk manufacture at Lyons, the cotton manufacture at Manchester, and the hard-ware manufacture at Birmingham and Sheffield, will never, never be seen in these abodes of liberty. Indeed, it is impossible it should, while industry is rewarded with the highest wages, and where land can be bought at a moderate price. That compact population, where there are more mouths than food, and those statutes of apprenticeship and poor laws which tie up the hands of the subject, and almost deprive him of locomotion, are unknown among us. The miseries consequent upon an over-population, and upon the manufactures which grow out of that state of society, are as yet so far off, that centuries must pass away before they will overtake us.

The people moreover, it is contended, will not endure the embargo, and will, if it is not repealed, rise in open opposition to their Government, by resisting it. Turbulent men may perhaps be found, who may make direct resistance to those statutes. But Mr. M. declared he had a better opinion of his countrymen than to suppose they would be concerned in insurrections. He was consolled by the reflection that American citizens were not only freemen but trained to the profession and use of fire-arms as militiamen, accustomed to attend courts as jurors, called to decide differences as arbitrators, and privileged to vote as electors; they were besides instructed in the principles of civil liberty, moral order, and religious discipline; they comprehended well the value of life, property, and social connexions; and they had also steady habits of respect to themselves, and the laws enacted by men of their own choice. Such a people will consider maturely the turpitude of resisting the lawful authority. The awful consequences of treason will be perfectly foreseen and avoided. A people worthy to enjoy freedom, will not be prone to riotous conduct; on the contrary, they will feel a strong co-operation of interest with duty, to prevent violence and disorder. The government which surpasses every other in strength is a popular government, where each individual, feeling himself to be a portion of the sovereignty, exerts himself to support the majesty of the laws. The yeomanry of the different commonwealths have nothing to gain by mobs; they are the safeguards of the nation, and the determined foes of rebellion. And as long as the farmers preserve their integrity, (and they will probably maintain it longer than any other class,) so long will misrule and anarchy be prevented. Though a few intemperate and deluded men have already become outrageous, their influence has been very limited and their reign exceedingly short.

Another consequence of the embargo will be, it is urged, an annihilation of the military courage and glory of the nation. If by this observation is meant that it would be better to take warlike measures, I must take this opportunity of declaring, that it has always, since the commencement of my Congressional life, been a most desirable object with me to prepare for the worst of events. Peace has ever appeared to me the season to prepare for war, as Summer is the time to lay up a store for Winter, and youth to provide for old age. Accordingly, I have conceived it to be a leading object of my public duty, to vote for all the measures proposed by others for the general defence, and to propose others myself. I have pressed the business of appropriations for fortifying our weak places with a zeal that some of my friends may have deemed unfortunate. But if a war should be found necessary for the settlement of these commercial disputes, I should think some further time would be requisite to prepare for it. I question whether we are in a condition to rush immediately to the hostile conflict. A little further preparation for the general welfare is probably necessary. Perhaps I may be influenced too much in this case by social feelings. A resident of New York city, I feel the most sincere concern for a people who have long bestowed on me their confidence and loaded me with honors. The works of defence erecting for their security are scarcely far enough advanced to be pronounced effectual; and I heartily hope that important, though vulnerable port, may be properly shielded before we contend with an enemy. I know, and all the world knows, the bravery of the Americans; while, therefore, I disregard the gasconading language of such as would talk us into war, I would prepare seriously for that event. Being so prepared, we may remove the embargo and take our former position on the ocean with a manly and determined attitude. Until Congress shall take further measures of this kind, prudence would indicate a continuance in our present state, at least for a short time; and until the means of precaution and of security shall be more effectually provided, I shall, for one, be willing to bear the reproach of withholding my eager countrymen from the display of their courage, and the acquisition of glory.

But we are told, that the evasions of the embargo laws are so frequent that they cannot be executed. This indeed is lamentably true. We read constantly in the gazettes of American flour offered for sale in the West Indies. The vegetable alkali of New York and Vermont is advertised in Liverpool, as potash from Canada. Ships that were abroad when the embargo was laid, continue to shun their country, though navigating in exile, under the American flag. British vessels are chartered in our ports to carry on a commerce which our vessels are forbidden to engage in. The violators of the laws are making fortunes, while the conscientious observers of them are suffering sad privations. It would be easy to mention many more of these stratagems. The violation of a law is of itself no argument against its wisdom or duration. The statutes against larceny, forgery, burglary, and murder, are frequently broken; and yet it would be thought very strange if such occasional infractions should be pleaded as reasons for their repeal. If, on the whole, I was convinced, that the embargo laws could not be executed, I should consider them as worse than useless, and demanding an immediate repeal; or if I thought the adherence to them for the purpose of avoiding a foreign war, would involve us in a domestic one, there would on that supposition be not one moment's hesitation in my mind in preferring a contest abroad to contention at home. On these points, however, I want further information; and I hope the motion on the table may be so disposed of, as to permit that information to be brought before us. We shall then discover how far the laws are inoperative through their own imperfect construction, through the carelessness of those whose duty it is to execute them, and through the general and avowed disposition of the people at large to disregard them. We shall also learn whether discontent and disaffection have spread so through society, as our alarmists would persuade us. Having thus, sir, taken a view of our past and present condition, I shall, with your leave, offer a few remarks of a prospective kind. Let us now suppose the embargo actually removed, what would be the consequence? There are several subjects of doubt and apprehension, directly before us.

First, I feel if I should give my vote for the resolution before the Senate, I should consent to a surrender of the honor and independence of my country. For these, as long as any portion of them are confided to me, I hold myself, and this nation holds me, solemnly responsible. At the same time, I wish some method might be devised to give a partial outlet to our accumulated productions. I confidently hope this may be accomplished without violating any principle, without incurring the least reproach. The convenience of the citizens will thus be in unison with the honor of their Government.

Secondly, the unqualified and unconditional removal of the existing restrictions would probably give such a loose to commerce, that the reiterated aggressions of former years would be revived, and impressment of seamen and passengers, capture and condemnation of vessels and cargoes, violations of territory, investment of our ports and harbors, and the murder of our citizens, be practised as heretofore.

Thirdly, under existing circumstances, the safety of commerce might require licenses to arm and make reprisals. And this warfare would in all probability soon be whetted up to war. And although I do not dread a state of hostility, when we are impelled thereto by just and necessary causes, as so calamitous an event as many of my friends are pleased to consider it, yet certainly it ought not to be courted, but on the other hand avoided if possible. It has been shrewdly observed by somebody, that nations now and then fall into plethoric habits, and that bloodletting is the most speedy and efficacious remedy. Whether any of the State physicians shall pronounce that disease to exist, and shall attempt to cure it by abstinence or bleeding, my own opinion is that the repeal of the embargo ought to be accompanied with various provisional and defensive measures, not expressed in the motion before the Senate.

Fourthly—but I check myself and forbear to enlarge on these topics. In all our deliberations let us discard foreign preferences, and remember that on great public questions, where alien Governments are brought into collision with our own, there ought to exist in our councils but one mind, one spirit, one feeling, and these should be truly American.

When Mr. M. concluded, the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, November 24.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the conveyance of certain papers and documents by the mail free of postage," reported the bill without amendment.

THE EMBARGO.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the 11th instant for repealing the "Act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several acts supplementary thereto."

Mr. GILES addressed the Senate as follows: •

Mr. President: Having during the recess of Congress retired from the political world, and having little agency in the passing political scenes, living in a part of the country, too, where there is little or no difference in political opinions, and where the embargo laws are almost universally approved, I felt the real want of information upon the subject now under discussion. I thought I knew something of the general objects of the embargo laws, and I had not been inattentive to their general operations upon society, as far as I had opportunities of observing thereupon.

When I arrived here, and found that this subject had excited so much sensibility in the minds of many gentlemen I met with, as to engross their whole thoughts, and almost to banish every other topic of conversation, I felt also a curiosity to know what were the horrible effects of these laws in other parts of the country, and which had escaped my observation in the part of the country in which I reside. Of course, sir, I have given to the gentlemen, who have favored us with their observations on both sides of the question under consideration, the most careful and respectful attention, and particularly to the gentlemen representing the eastern section of the Union, where most of this sensibility had been excited. I always listen to gentlemen from that part of the United States with pleasure, and generally receive instruction from them; but on this occasion, I am reluctantly compelled to acknowledge, that I have received from them less satisfaction, and less information than usual; and still less conviction.

It was hardly to have been expected, Mr. President, that after so many angry and turbulent passions had been called into action, by the recent agitations throughout the whole United States, resulting from the elections by the people, to almost all the important offices within their gift, and particularly from the elections of Electors for choosing the President and Vice President of the United States, that gentlemen would have met here perfectly exempt from the feelings which this state of things was naturally calculated to inspire. Much less was it to have been expected, sir, that gentlemen who had once possessed the power of the nation, and who, from some cause or other, had lost it; (a loss, which they now tell us they but too well remember, and I fear, might have added, too deeply deplore,) gentlemen too, sir, who at one time during the electioneering scene, had indulged the fond and delusive hope, that through the privations necessarily imposed upon our fellow-citizens, by the unexampled aggressions of the belligerent Powers, they might once more find their way to office and power, and who now find themselves disappointed in this darling expectation—it was not at all to be expected, sir, that these gentlemen should now appear here, perfectly exempt from the unpleasant feelings which so dreadful a disappointment must necessarily have produced. It was a demand upon human nature for too great a sacrifice; and however desirable such an exemption might have been at the present moment, and however honorable it would have been to those gentlemen, it was not expected.

But, sir, I had indulged a hope that the extraordinary dangers and difficulties pressed upon us by the aggressing belligerents, attended, too, with so many circumstances of indignity and insult, would have awakened a sensibility in the bosom of every gentleman of this body, which would have wholly suppressed, or at least suspended, these unpleasant feelings, until some measures, consulting the general interests and welfare of the people, could have been devised, to meet, resist, and if possible, to subdue the extraordinary crisis. But, sir, even in this hope too, I have been totally disappointed. I was the more encouraged in this hope, when upon opening this debate the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. HILLHOUSE) seemed sensible of this sacred obligation, imposed by the crisis; when he exhorted us, in conducting our deliberations, utterly to discard the influence of party spirit. It would have given me great pleasure, sir, if the gentleman had afforded us a magnanimous example of a precept so admirably suited to the present state of things. But in this too, sir, I have been unfortunately disappointed. That gentleman's observations consisted almost exclusively of retrospective animadversions upon the original objects and horrible effects of the embargo laws, without seeming to think it was worth his attention to favor us with any reflections upon the prospective course of measures, which the people's interests, the public safety, and general welfare, so imperiously demand. That gentleman represented the embargo laws as mere acts of volition, impelled by no cause nor necessity; whilst the British orders, and French edicts, were scarcely glanced at, and certainly formed the least prominent feature of his observations. He represented these laws as a wanton and wicked attack upon commerce, with a view to its destruction, whilst he seemed scarcely to have recollected the extraordinary dangers and difficulties which overspread the ocean—indeed, sir, he described the ocean as perfectly free from dangers and difficulties, unruffled by any storms, and that we had nothing to do but to unfurl our canvass to the wind, that it would be filled with prosperous gales, and wafted to the ports of its destination, where it would be received with open arms of friendship and hospitality. I wish, sir, with all my heart, the gentleman could but realize these dreaming visions; their reality would act like a magic spell upon the embargo laws, and dissipate them in a moment! But, alas, sir, when we come to look at realities, when we turn our eyes upon the real dangers and difficulties which do overspread the ocean, we shall find them so formidable, that the wisdom of our undivided counsels, and the energy of our undivided action, will scarcely be sufficient to resist and conquer them. To my great regret, sir, we now see, that the United States cannot even hope to be blessed with this union of mind and action, although certainly their dearest interests demand it.

Mr. President, perhaps the greatest inconvenience attending popular governments, consists in this; that whenever the union and energy of the people are most required to resist foreign aggres-sions, the pressure of these aggressions presents most temptations to distrusts and divisions. Was there ever a stronger illustration of the truth and correctness of this observation than the recent efforts made under the pressure of the embargo laws? The moment the privations, reluctantly, but necessarily imposed by these laws, became to be felt, was the moment of signal to every political demagogue, who wished to find his way to office and to power, to excite the distrusts of the people, and then to separate them from the Government of their choice, by every exaggeration which ingenuity could devise, and every misrepresentation which falsehood could invent; nothing was omitted which it was conceived would have a tendency to effect this object. But, Mr. President, the people of the United States must learn the lesson now, and at all future times, of disrespecting the bold and disingenuous charges and insinuations of such aspiring demagogues. They must learn to respect and rally round their own Government, or they never can present a formidable front to a foreign aggressor. Sir, the people of the United States have already learnt this lesson. They have recently given an honorable and glorious example of their knowledge in this respect. They have, in their recent elections, demonstrated to the nation and to the world that they possess too much good sense to become the dupes of these delusive artifices, and too much patriotism to desert their Government, when it stands most in need of their support and energy.

The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. Hillhouse) has made the most strict, and I had almost said, uncharitable scrutiny into the objects and effects of the embargo laws, in the delusive hope, I presume, of obtaining a triumph over his political adversaries. I propose to follow the gentleman, in a fair and candid comparison of information and opinions upon this subject; and I shall do so in the most perfect confidence, that, whenever a thorough examination of the objects and effects of the embargo laws shall be made known, and the merits of the measure fully understood, that there is not a man in the United States who will not applaud and support the Administration for its adoption, who has the uncontaminated heart of an American throbbing within his bosom.

Sir, I have always understood that there were two objects contemplated by the embargo laws. The first, precautionary, operating upon ourselves. The second, coercive, operating upon the aggressing belligerents. Precautionary, in saving our seamen, our ships, and our merchandise, from the plunder of our enemies, and avoiding the calamities of war. Coercive, by addressing strong appeals to the interests of both the belligerents. The first object has been answered beyond my most sanguine expectations. To make a fair and just estimate of this measure, reference should be had to our situation at the time of its adoption. At that time, the aggressions of both the belligerents were such, as to leave the United States but a painful alternative in the choice of one of three measures, to wit, the embargo, war, or submission. I know that this position has not been admitted, though but faintly denied in the discussion. I shall however proceed upon this hypothesis for the present, and in the course of my observations will prove its correctness by the statements of the gentlemen in favor of the resolution.

Before the recommendation of the measure, the laudable and provident circumspection of the Administration had obtained tolerably correct estimates of the amount and value of the ships and merchandise belonging to the citizens of the United States then afloat, and the amount and value of what was shortly expected to be afloat; together with a conjectural statement of the number of the seamen employed in the navigation thereof.

It was found that merchandise to the value of one hundred millions of dollars was actually afloat, in vessels amounting in value to twenty millions more. That an amount of merchandise and vessels equal to fifty millions of dollars more, was expected to be shortly put afloat, and that it would require fifty thousand seamen to be employed in the navigation of this enormous amount of property. The Administration was informed of the hostile edicts of France previously issued, and then in a state of execution, and of an intention on the part of Great Britain to issue her orders, the character and object of which were also known. The object was, to sweep this valuable commerce from the ocean. The situation of this commerce was as well known to Great Britain, as to ourselves, and her inordinate cupidity could not withstand the temptation of the rich booty, she vainly thought within her power. This was the state of information at the time this measure was recommended.

The President of the United States, ever watchful and anxious for the preservation of the persons and property of all our fellow-citizens, but particularly of the merchants, whose property is most exposed to danger, and of the seamen whose persons are also most exposed, recommended the embargo for the protection of both; and it has saved and protected both. Let us now suppose, for a moment, that the President, possessed of this information, had not apprized the merchants and seamen of their danger, and had recommended no measure for their safety and protection; would he not in that case have merited and received the reproaches which the ignorance or ingratitude of merchants and others have so unjustly heaped upon him, for his judicious and anxious attentions to their interests? It is admitted by all, that the embargo laws have saved this enormous amount of property, and this number of seamen, which, without them, would have forcibly gone into the hands of our enemies, to pamper their arrogance, stimulate their injustice, and increase their means of annoyance.

I should suppose, Mr. President, this saving worth some notice. But, sir, we are told that instead of protecting our seamen, it has driven them out of the country, and into foreign service. I believe, sir, that this fact is greatly exaggerated. But, sir, suppose for a moment that it is so, the Government has done all, in this respect, it was bound to do. It placed these seamen in the bosoms of their friends and families, in a state of perfect security; and if they have since thought proper to abandon these blessings, and emigrate from their country, it was an act of choice, not of necessity. But, what would have been the unhappy destiny of these brave tars, if they had been permitted to have been carried into captivity, and sent adrift on unfriendly and inhospitable shores? Why, sir, in that case, they would have had no choice; necessity would have driven them into a hard and ignominious service, to fight the battles of the authors of their dreadful calamities, against a nation with which their country was at peace. And is the bold and generous American tar to be told, that he is to disrespect the Administration for its anxious and effectual attentions to his interests? for relieving him from a dreadful captivity? Even under the hardships he does suffer, and which I sincerely regret, every generous feeling of his noble heart would repel the base attempt with indignation. But, sir, the American seamen have not deserted their country; foreign seamen may and probably have gone into foreign service; and, for one, I am glad of it. I hope they will never return; and I am willing to pass a law, in favor of the true-hearted American seamen, that these foreign seamen never should return. I would even prohibit them from being employed in merchant vessels. The American seamen have found employment in the country; and whenever the proper season shall arrive for employing them on their proper element, you will find them, like true birds of passage, hovering in crowds upon your shores.

10th CON. 2d Sess.—4

Whilst considering this part of the subject, I cannot help expressing my regret that, at the time of passing our embargo laws, a proportion of our seamen was not taken into the public service; because, in my judgment, the nation required their services, and it would have been some alleviation to their hardships, which the measure peculiarly imposed upon them, as a class of citizens, by affecting their immediate occupation; and the other classes, as well as the public Treasury, were able to contribute to their alleviation; and I am willing to do the same thing at this time. Indeed, its omission is the only regret I have ever felt, at the measures of the last Congress. I like the character—I like the open frankness, and the generous feelings of the honest American tar; and, whenever in my power, I am ready to give, and will with pleasure give him my protection and support. One of the most important and agreeable effects of the embargo laws, is giving these honest fellows a safe asylum. But, sir, these are not the only good effects of the embargo. It has preserved our peace—it has saved our honor—it has saved our national independence. Are these savings not worth notice? Are these blessings not worth preserving? The gentleman from Delaware (Mr. WHITE) has, indeed, told us, that under the embargo laws, the United States are bleeding at every pore.

This, surely, sir, is one of the most extravagant effects that could have been ascribed to these laws by the frantic dreams of the most infatuated passions. Blood-letting is the last effect that I ever expected to hear ascribed to this measure. I thought it was of the opposite character; but it serves to show that nothing is too extravagant for the misguided zeal of gentlemen in the opposition. I have cast my eyes about in vain to discover those copious streams of blood; but I neither see nor hear anything of them from any other quarter. So far from the United States bleeding at every pore, under the embargo, it has saved them from bleeding at any pore; and one of the highest compliments to the measure is, that it has saved us from the very calamity which the gentleman attributed to it; but which, thanks to our better stars and wiser counsels, does not exist.

The gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. HILLHOUSE,) not content with describing the general horrors of the embargo laws, has addressed himself, in plaintive tones, to several particular classes of citizens, and has kindly informed each of his particular hardships and sufferings. The gentleman asks, what has become of the merchant? What has become of the farmer? I know something of the situation of the farmer; and, as to the merchant, I had felt serious apprehensions for his situation, until they were materially relieved by the information given by the gentleman. The gentleman tells us that the great capitalists do not suffer; they are in favor of the embargo; but the young, dashing, enterprising merchant, without capital, is destroyed. This statement is highly honorable to the embargo laws, and proves a great deal. The capitalist, who has property, finds its security under the embargo; he is therefore in favor of the measure; but the merchant, who has nothing, is deprived of an opportunity of making something out of that nothing. But his rights are not affected by the embargo; he is left in the enjoyment of the nothing he possessed; and has no reason to complain that the embargo does not give him something without laboring for it. I regret, however, that these merchants, without capital, have lost the chance of making their fortunes by the embargo; but even the most of these, the gentleman tells us, would probably have become bankrupt, by their wild speculations, even if the embargo were not in being; and, of course, their situation cannot be much worsened by it.

But, Mr. President, I am willing to admit that there are many worthy merchants, of small capital, who do suffer by the suspension of their employments; and I am very sorry for them; but this suffering is incidental to every coerced state of things; and is attributable, not properly to the embargo, but to the causes that rendered its adoption indispensable.

The gentleman, however, tells us, with the most sympathetic feelings, that the ships of the great capitalists are rotting at our wharves, and yet these capitalists are in favor of the embargo. Why, sir, this is a very plain case, when stripped of its exaggerations. The ships are precisely twelve months older than they were twelve months ago; and the owners would rather have them there, with this difference of age and proportionate decay, than to see them torn away by lawless plunderers, and wholly lost forever. But, sir, what would have become of many of these capitalists if it had not been for the embargo? Their property would have been plundered, and they become bankrupts. Is it any wonder then, sir, that these men should be in favor of the embargo? Review, then, this statement made by the gentlemen, respecting the merchants, and what is the actual result? Why this, sir; that, although they do suffer by the necessary interruption of their particular occupation, (a suffering I deplore as much as any gentleman in the United States,) yet the real owners of the property do not complain; and almost the only grumblers are those who have nothing to grumble about.

But, says the gentleman, what has become of the farmer? The gentleman knows that I am a farmer, and that I have long borne the appellation with sincere pleasure; I may therefore be presumed to know something of the situation of the farmer; and not only in my own name, but in the name of the whole happy, useful, and honorable fraternity of American farmers, I will tell the gentleman what that situation is at this moment. The American farmer is now enjoying the fruits of his honest industry, in peace and security, blessed at the same time with every political, social, and domestic enjoyment, perfectly exempt from all vexations, and I had almost said taxations, and with pleasure beholds a surplus of fourteen millions of dollars in the public Treasury after paying every debt which could be demanded of the honor of the Government. All these blessings, too, are sweetened by the noble consciousness that they are enjoyed by him as a freeman, and by a constant recollection, and perfect confidence, that he is protected in this enjoyment by a Government which will never basely surrender his rights, nor the national sovereignty, to any foreign aggressor upon earth. Blessed with all these uninterrupted enjoyments, I agree perfectly in sentiment with the gentleman from New York, (Mr. MITCHELL,) that with a heart overflowing with the most grateful affections, he should render thanks to the author of all good, that in the bountiful dispensation of his providence, he has been pleased to pour so many blessings into the lap of the American farmer. Grumbling and repining when thus favored, would, in my opinion, be impiety to Heaven, and ingratitude to his own Government.

The gentleman does not tell you, sir, that the farmer wants anything, but that he has plenty, over much. The puzzle is, to know what to do with the surplus plenty. And how does the gentleman advise the farmer to dispose of it? Why he tells him, raise the embargo and it will increase the price of your surplus produce; and for this supposed difference in price, he advises the farmer to sell his own freedom and his country's independence; and in this contemptible and miserable barter, to purchase his own, and his country's vassalage—to cease to be a freeman, and to become a slave—to give up the noble feelings inspired by liberty and freedom, and to descend to the abject and ignominious existence of a slave without any mental feeling whatever. Sir, let me tell that gentleman, in my own name and in the name of every farmer in the United States, that we would repel with indignity and indignation the disgraceful golden allurement, even if it could be realized. But, sir, dishonorable as the allurement is, it is fictitious, it is visionary. It could not be realized. I believe, and every sensible farmer will believe, that he has for the last ten months obtained more for his surplus plenty under the embargo, than he could have done in any other state of things, which was in the choice of the Government. Let us suppose that the immense mercantile capital which is admitted to have been saved by the embargo had been seized and carried into foreign ports and there condemned; what would have been its effects upon the mercantile capital of this country? It would have so crippled our merchants, that they would not have been able for a long time to purchase the surplus produce of the nation.

But that is not all, these merchants would have claimed indemnification from the Government for losses which, in that case they would have urged, were sustained by its culpable neglect; and they would have plunged us into war, to repair so great an injury inflicted upon the nation; the foreign plunderers too, would have told us, that they cared but little about a war, as they had taken from us sufficient means for defraying its expense. Thus, in that state of things, a war would have been inevitable; and would you tell the farmer, that he would get more for his surplus produce in time of war, than he has received since the embargo? Sir, the farmer knows too well the calamities of war, to be thus deluded by these visionary golden dreams. In the event of war, he would not have received as much for his surplus produce, as under the embargo laws: hence, it obviously appears, from a fair estimate of pounds, shillings, and pence, (since we are compelled to resort to that standard, as the only orthodox test of our national honor, national sensibility, and even national independence,) yes, sir, even according to that sordid standard, the farmer would have been the loser. Besides, sir, to say nothing of the increased taxes, and other burdens indispensable to the support of war, who can count its chances, or limit its duration? Who can calculate its demoralizing consequences? But calamitous as war is, the American farmers would with eagerness encounter all its terrors, rather than surrender their own liberties, and the nation's honor, independence, and sovereignty; let us then for a time, sir, bear our present privations—let war be the last experiment.

But, sir, I will mention another circumstance, which may be some alleviation to the farmer, for the difference in the price of his surplus plenty now and in ordinary times. When the price of produce is low, the temptation to raise large crops will be lessened, and the farmer will turn a certain portion of his labor to the improvement of his farm. The high prices of produce heretofore have induced the farmer to impose too much upon his land—too great demands have been made on it—and it has been in some degree exhausted. The embargo has apprized the farmer of this important circumstance, and taught him his true interest in this respect. I have observed a great change in the application of labor, in this respect, and I have no doubt a general sentiment exists in favor of a still greater change. A greater portion of labor is also converted into household manufactures, which will lessen our demand and dependence upon foreign nations. In both these respects, I believe, the operation of the embargo is favorable to the farmer, at the present moment, and will certainly be favorable to posterity, by transmitting to it a more fertilized soil for cultivation. It will be favorable, at the present moment, in this respect—that, before the adoption of the embargo, the farmer was tempted to apply too great a proportion of his labor to the annual increase of crops, and too small a portion of it to the permanent improvement and fertilization of his farm. I mention this as an alleviation, not as a complete exemption from the effects of the embargo, and its so far producing a beneficial influence upon cultivation and internal improvement.

I hope by this time, Mr. President, that the gentleman will concur with me in opinion, that the situation of the American farmers is rather enviable than miserable—that he has good sense enough to make a just estimate of his own interests, and possesses too much honorable sensibility not to repel with indignation every attempt to seduce him into a disgraceful surrender of his own liberties or his country's independence.

Let us now take a view of its effects upon some other classes of our fellow-citizens, which seem almost to have escaped the gentleman's notice, or at least not to have excited so much of his plaintive sympathies—I allude to the manufacturer, the mechanic, and the laborer. The manufacturer seems to be in such a state of prosperity, as rather to have excited the gentleman's jealousy than his tender commiseration. He fears that the real object of the embargo was to erect the manufacturing system upon the ruins of commerce. I do not mean here, sir, to reply to the suggestion of this unfounded jealousy. I mean, in the course of these observations, to make that a subject of distinct and separate examination. I shall here however take the liberty of remarking, without the fear of still further exciting the gentleman's jealousy, that I am extremely happy to see, not only that we have abundant fabrics for manufactures, but that we have artisans sufficient to mould them into all the articles necessary for home consumption, and thus lessen our dependence upon foreign nations for our supply. I rejoice, indeed, to see our infant manufactures growing into importance, and that the most successful experiment has attended every attempt at improvement. What is the situation of the mechanic and the laborer? They have full employment, good wages, and cheap living. I am told, sir, that within the last year, one thousand houses have been erected in Philadelphia. I see at this time more houses building at Georgetown, even for mercantile purposes, and more improvements in this city, than ever I have seen before; and I believe this generally to be the case throughout the country. That this is a correct statement of facts, I have no doubt. How, then, is this agreeable and unexpected scene accounted for, amidst this mercantile clamor about the stagnation of business? It is because a greater proportion of the overgrown mercantile capital is now diverted from external commerce to internal improvements. And I am strongly inclined to think that this transposition of a certain portion of the mercantile capital will produce a beneficial operation, in a national point of view, and probably even more productive to the capitalist than risking it in the employment of foreign trade.

This I believe to be a fair, just, and candid statement of the operation of the embargo laws upon the several great classes of citizens; and, when correctly viewed, how different in its aspect from the miserable picture of horrors presented to us by the gentleman from Connecticut! When you tell a mechanic or a laborer of his distresses and sufferings, when he has full employment, good wages, and cheap living, he would laugh at you; he would either think you silly, or that you meant to treat him with indignity and insult. These are all the blessings he could wish, and they are enough for any man to possess, when he reflects upon the narrow span of human enjoyments this world affords. Sir, the miserable laborer on the other side the Atlantic would consider the enjoyments of the laborers here Elysium itself; and I can but lament, for the sake of suffering humanity, that it cannot find the way to these enjoyments. I presume that, during the late electioneering scene, every laborer and mechanic in Pennsylvania was told a thousand times that he was ruined by the embargo; but thirty thousand votes (majority) have told these frantic, officious disturbers of the public quiet, in loud and awful tones, how silly and ridiculous they consider the suggestion. The recent elections in most of the other States speak the same emphatic language.

I have been thus minute, Mr. President, in the examination of this part of the subject, as well to relieve ourselves from the miseries and apprehensions of our own deluded imaginations, as to relieve foreign nations, as far as was within my power, from their delusions, which I shall show in the course of my observations, are the principal if not the only cause of the very hardships and sufferings so loudly and causelessly complained of by some gentlemen. Now, sir, take an impartial review of the effects of the embargo laws, as operating upon ourselves, and what is the actual result? Why, sir, as far as they were precautionary, their success has been complete; and whilst in their general operations they have been attended with some privations and sufferings, they have not been without their beneficial effects on society.

The gentleman next triumphantly tells us, that the embargo laws have not had their expected effects upon the aggressing belligerents. That they have not had their complete effects; that they have not caused a revocation of the British orders and French decrees, will readily be admitted; but they certainly have not been without some beneficial effects upon those nations. Let me, however, ask, sir, is this failure a cause of triumph to the gentleman? Does he feel more pleasure in the delusive expectation of a triumph over a political adversary, than in the triumph of the nation over our common adversaries? Are his political feelings so strong, that they are to be indulged, even at the expense of his own, and his country's interests? Does he vainly suppose, that, disregarding or postponing all consideration of the people's interests, when their all is at stake, to the indulgence of these petty animosities, will give him a just claim to the people's applause? If he does, sir, he is mistaken. It is by the reverse of this conduct that he can lay any just claim to their applause. It is by banishing his prejudices—it is by conquering his own passions, and by devoting the whole energy of his mind to their service, at this critical moment, that he can be justly entitled to their applause. This would be for him a glorious triumph—a triumph over his own passions; and it would secure him the public approbation, because the conduct would be right. Let us then, sir, hope for this conciliation, which would be so honorable to ourselves, and would promise so much advantage to the nation.

In this spirit of conciliation and patriotism, then, Mr. President, let us inquire, first, what have been the actual effects of the embargo laws upon the aggressing belligerents? And, secondly, what are the actual causes of their failure of complete success? The first inquiry involves much mercantile information. I have only some views of general mercantile principles—I know little or nothing of their operative details—I had, therefore, hoped for much information upon this part of the subject from gentlemen who possessed it; but have received very little satisfaction from them in that respect.

The first effect of the embargo, upon the aggressing belligerents, was to lessen their inducements to war, by keeping out of their way the rich spoils of our commerce, which had invited their cupidity, and which was saved by those laws. If they had once possessed themselves of this enormous booty, it would have been a sure pledge for open and direct war. It would have defrayed the expenses of the war for several years. If they had not gone to war, they would have been compelled either to restore the captured property, or to make indemnification for it. Its amount alone would have been a sufficient security against either of these acts of justice. And is it not better that this enormous amount of property should be on this side of the Atlantic, than on the other? In the hands of its lawful owners, than in the hands of unprincipled freebooters? Is it not better that it should be drawn to our aid in the event of war, than applied to aid our unjust adversary?

NOVEMBER, 1808.

The Embargo.

SENATE.

Upon this point, I presume, there can be but one opinion.

The second effect, which the embargo laws have had on the aggressing belligerents, is to enhance the prices of all American produce, especially articles of the first necessity to them, to a considerable degree, and, if it be a little longer persisted in, will either banish our produce (which I believe indispensable to them) from their markets altogether, or increase the prices to an enormous amount; and, of course, we may hope will furnish irresistible inducements for a relaxation of their hostile orders and edicts. However I may generally respect the mercantile information of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. LLOYD,) and the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. HILLHOUSE,) they appear to me, on this occasion, not to have been very correct. I have before me, two Prices Current from Liverpool, the one of the 8th, the other of the 20th September last. They, I presume, were written under no political bias, favorable to the United States. Let us draw our facts from them. I will begin with the article of the first necessity in Great Britain, and one which, at all times, excites her highest sensibility. She manifests, at all times, more anxiety about her corn laws, than any other subject of her political economy. This is a necessary result from the peculiar state of her population.

Let us then inquire, what is the present state of breadstuffs in Great Britain. In the Liverpool Price Current of the 8th of September, I find this information upon this subject:

"Our grain market, for the most part of the last month was very dull; however, within this day or two there have been some extensive sales made of New York wheat at 13s. and 3d. at 70 lbs., and the holders now demand 13s. and 6d. to 14s. for prime parcels, which may possibly be obtained, as the appearances for the harvest in most parts of this kingdom are not quite so favorable as was at first thought, the late heavy rains having proved injurious in many places, and the grain is much lighter in the ear than former seasons; but as the dealers and country millers buy only to supply their immediate wants, we do not calculate upon a material improvement on the annexed prices, unless some export vent to Spain or our West India colonies takes place. Good sweet American flour is not to be had in this market."

In the Price Current of the 20th, I find these observations:

"Large speculations have lately been made in tobacco, in consequence of our stock becoming limited; but should the embargo be raised, this and every other description of your produce must very materially decline in price, wheat and flour excepted.

"Our stocks of grain are but moderate, although we have been much favored in our harvest."

What reflection does this information naturally present to the mind? That the crop is limited; that breadstuffs are high, and likely to be higher; that there is such a deficiency of breadstuffs, that our whole supply will not depress the market, even in the event of raising the embargo; and certainly continuing it, (which does not seem at all calculated upon in England,) would lessen the quantity and raise proportionably the demand and price.

The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. HILLHOUSE) tells us we cannot starve Great Britain, she, being mistress of the trade of the world, will supply herself with breadstuffs from other quarters and particularly from Spanish America. I never heard it suggested, except by the gentlemen in the opposition, that we could starve Great Britain; but that, through our produce, particularly our breadstuffs, we could make a strong appeal to her interests. This fact is demonstrated to my mind. The Liverpool merchants differ with the gentleman in his mercantile information. They tell us that our whole supply of breadstuffs will not depress their market. If a ready supply could be obtained elsewhere, upon better terms, there would be no need of a supply from us. But when has it happened, that Spanish America could afford this supply? So far from affording a supply to Great Britain, it gets a portion of its own supply from us. The gentleman tells us that Spanish Americans export great quantities of hides and tallow. That is true; these, however, are not breadstuffs. It is not pretended that Great Britain is in want of meat, but bread; bread is an essential of life; meat is no substitute for bread; it could not prevent even a famine. These documents also go to show the reason of the low price of New York flour, quoted by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. LLOYD.) It is because the flour was not sweet; it had been so long kept as to become sour. I have no doubt that the British Cabinet is now looking at this subject with great anxiety; and particularly at our movements in relation to it. Again, sir; suppose Great Britain should be able to provision her Islands, it would be at such an expensive rate as to render them very unprofitable.

The next important article is cotton. Let us see the prices current respecting that article:

"The operations in our cotton market during the whole of last month have been immense, while our total imports are inadequate to one-half the usual monthly consumption; as the stocks of this article have become more depressed, the speculators continue purchasing with increased spirit, and many of them have already realized considerable profits; we therefore quote an advance on all descriptions of cotton, of from 4d. to 6d. per lb. above our last month's rates, which has principally occurred within the last ten days; but we must beg leave to remark, that such unexampled advances are scarcely ever so well maintained as when they are gradually established, and some occurrence may, perhaps, shortly take place to put a stop to further speculations; we are, however, of opinion, that prices may yet be driven considerably higher, although they have to encounter an extremely bad trade in Manchester."

"West India cottons have advanced nearly in the same proportion as American, and the recent arrivals have fully brought the annexed prices, with every appearance of much higher being realized."

"In cottons we have a great stir; and should we not soon have arrivals from the Brazils, prices must be enormous."

Here the Liverpool merchants tell us, not only that the prices are extremely high, and may be driven much higher, unless some occurrence (to wit, raising the embargo) may perhaps shortly take place, to put a stop to further speculation; but that the total imports are inadequate to one-half the usual monthly consumption. Now, sir, whence is one-half of the usual consumption of cotton to be supplied to the British market. The British merchants seem totally at a loss for a supply from any place; but the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. HILLHOUSE) has pointed out several places of supply—the East and West Indies; and even Africa has been resorted to. They have supplies from all these places now, and yet the Liverpool merchants tell you that the whole imports are not equal to one-half the monthly consumption; I therefore have no confidence in the statement made by the gentleman. With respect to the illustration of his position, by stating the supposed analogous case of his butter merchants, I shall make no reply. Its fallacy was ably demonstrated by the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. CRAWFORD.) I will only incidentally remark, however, that it is the first time I ever recollect to have seen that gentleman in debate, when it appeared to me that he did not know on which side his own bread was buttered.

But the gentleman tells us, that the provident British Government has sent cotton seed to Africa to answer a supply of cotton; that cotton is an annual plant, and of course a competent supply may be produced from that quarter. I am inclined to think that this provident Government does not rely much upon this resource; because I imagine the whole quantity of seed sent thither, would not be equal to the offal from one good South Carolina plantation; and although cotton is certainly an annual plant, yet the conversion of the labor of society from one occupation to another, is not the effect of an annual effort. It is one of the most difficult operations to be performed on society. I therefore feel no apprehension of a supply from this source, at least, for many years. If Great Britain should be cut off from one-half of her supply of cotton, it would certainly place the many thousand manufacturers employed in the various branches of the cotton business, in a state of great distress; and must command the attention of the British Government.

The next article I shall mention, is the article of timber or lumber. I mention these articles particularly in relation to the supply of the West Indies; and the rather, as the traders to these Islands have been foremost in urging the British hostile orders. I recollect, sometime since, to have seen a report made, I believe to the House of Commons, showing the proportion of these articles imported to the West Indies from the United States, in relation to the same articles imported thither from all the rest of the world; and the proportion of these articles, was ninety-nine in the hundred, imported from the United States. It is known that these articles are indispensable to the exports from those Islands; particularly rum, sugar, and molasses. And I am at a loss to know from whence these articles can be supplied, except from the United States. It should also be recollected that timber and lumber are not of annual growth, they are part of the veteran sturdy oak itself; and therefore that their deficiency cannot be so easily supplied as is suggested in relation to cotton.

The next article I shall mention, is tobacco. What say the Liverpool merchants respecting this article?

“During the last month tobacco has experienced some fluctuation, and sales have been made at prices under those quoted; but some considerable orders having appeared for export, the market has again settled at these rates, and if any opening to the continent of Europe, through the medium of Holland, should be found, an advance may be expected; on the contrary, if we have only our home consumption to depend upon, little alteration can take place until the sentiments of the American Government be known at the meeting of Congress in November next.”

It is admitted that tobacco is not an article of the first necessity; it is, however, material to the manufacturer, and highly important to the revenue.

Naval stores are also certainly entitled to some consideration, although some supply of those articles is now furnished from Sweden.

I have selected these articles as specimens of the intimacy and importance of the commercial connexion between the United States and Great Britain; and to demonstrate that it cannot be withdrawn on our part without essentially affecting her interests. Again, sir; what effect will this recession of intercourse have upon the revenue of that country? I shall make no minute estimate, but it will certainly have an effect which cannot be disregarded; and the rather when it is recollected that Great Britain has imposed an export duty of four per cent. upon her goods sent to the United States, which produces to her an annual revenue of about six hundred thousand dollars, probably much more; and that this is a discriminating duty against the United States, which ought to have been repelled the moment it was laid; and especially, as it was avowed that it was imposed upon the United States with the view of placing them on the same footing with the British Colonies.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. LLOYD) tells us, even suppose that your embargo laws drive fifty thousand, or more, manufacturers from their employment in Great Britain, it will only add to her naval and military strength. It would only give her fifty thousand seamen or soldiers more than she now has. This, sir, is an unfortunate specimen of the prosperity which Great Britain is supposed to derive from the embargo laws. If I am rightly informed, generally, and particularly yesterday, by the learned gentleman from New York, (Mr. MITCHILL,) of the materials of which the manufacturers consist, I am disposed to think they would make poor seamen, and sorry soldiers. I do not think the world would have much to fear from their prowess. They are fit for manufacturers, and nothing else; and if driven from their habitual employments they must starve, or become a charge upon the nation. But, sir, the conversion of fifty thousand productive and even expensive laborers, could not contribute much to the wealth or power of any nation; and such an operation in Great Britain, where the poor rates are sufficiently high already, would command the serious attention of the Government.

There is something essential to the physical power of a nation, besides the numbers of seamen and soldiers. It is money, it is revenue. This operation upon labor could not be productive of revenue, but would be an enormous charge upon it. I am therefore inclined to think that the British Cabinet would not feel any great obligation to the gentleman for his ingenious discovery. All these considerations must present strong inducements to Great Britain to revoke her hostile orders; but she has hitherto refused to do so.

Let a candid inquiry be now made into the actual causes of this refusal. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. LLOYD) informs us, that the British Cabinet showed some solicitude about the embargo laws, till some time between the 22d of June and the 29th of July last, within which time information flowed in upon them, which relieved them from this solicitude, and reconciled them to the embargo. [Mr. LLOYD rose to explain. He said he referred to the months of June and July, without mentioning any particular days of those months.] I admit that the gentleman did not mention the particular days; I took the particular days, for greater precision, from the correspondence between Mr. Pinkney and Mr. Madison, from which I presume the gentleman had drawn his information.

What was the information that flowed in upon the British Cabinet, from the 22d June to the 29th of July? That period announced two events. First, the wonderful revolution in Spain, although this event must have been pretty well understood in London before even the 22d of June, perhaps not to its full extent. The other event was, the paltry attempt at the resistance of the embargo laws in Vermont, magnified into a formidable insurrection against the Government; and the unhappy discontents manifested in Boston and its neighborhood, together with the results of the elections in Massachusetts. All these circumstances were certainly greatly exaggerated, or utterly misrepresented. Here then, sir, we clearly discern the real causes of the refusal of the British Cabinet to meet the just and honorable proposition of the United States, and to revoke their Orders in Council. The Spanish Revolution, no doubt, contributed to their determination; but the principal cause was our own divisions and discontents, either wholly misrepresented or highly exaggerated.

Before the 22d June Mr. Pinkney and Mr. Canning were engaged in the most informal and friendly communications; Mr. Canning had gone so far as to intimate to Mr. Pinkney that he might in a few days expect to be able to communicate to his Government some agreeable intelligence, evidently meaning either the revocation, or relaxation of the hostile orders. But unfortunately, shortly after the 22d June, the packet arrived with this flood of disgraceful information from the United States. Immediately after the receipt of this misinformation, Mr. Canning changes his conduct. All informal conferences with Mr. Pinkney are denied, and a formal note demanded, in reply to which, the note of refusal was returned, marked, as we have seen, with indignity and insult to the United States.

Now, sir, let me ask, whether these facts do not demonstrate that the continuation of the hostile orders is principally, if not solely, owing to the dishonorable divisions and discontents in this country, and the exaggerated accounts given of them to the British Government? That events in Spain alone, however intoxicating to the British Cabinet, were not, of themselves, sufficient to produce this effect; because they were known before the change in Mr. Canning's conduct took place, and had not produced that effect. But, the moment the extravagant accounts of the discontents and divisions in this country were received, was the moment of change in Mr. Canning's conduct, and, therefore, must be considered as the real cause that produced it. Besides, sir, was not this change of conduct the natural effect of this disgraceful information? When Mr. Canning was informed that the people of the United States had become false to themselves; had refused to bear the necessary privations imposed by the Government; had in fact, separated themselves from their own Government—that they would elect persons to office, who would, voluntarily, yield obedience to Mr. Canning's orders—what inducements could he have for their revocation? If obedience and submission were gratuitously tendered by the people of the United States, he had certainly nothing to do but graciously to accept them; and his note affords full evidence of this impression on his mind. The refusal of the British Government to revoke their hostile orders, therefore, appears not to have been founded upon a calculation of its interests upon correct information; but upon a miscalculation of its interests upon misinformation. How much, then, is it to be lamented, Mr. President, that our sufferings and privations should be continued, by the discontents which were intended to remedy them? How can the authors of these discontents reconcile their conduct to the nation, or to their own consciences? What compensation or atonement can they ever hope to make to the people for the protraction of their privations and sufferings? What, for the disgrace brought upon the nation? What, for all the horrors and calamities of war, which may, and probably will, be the consequences of such conduct? Let the infatuated authors of it answer these questions. Ages of services cannot atone for these cruel, these unfortunate errors.

It is asked sir, how do the embargo laws operate on France? It is readily admitted, that the commercial connexion between the United States and France is not of such a nature as to make a suspension of it operate as injurious to France herself, particularly in the interior, as on Great Britain. But our commerce cannot be deemed unimportant to France, in the feeble state of her navy. At the time, too, of laying the embargo, Spain, Portugal, and Holland, were in alliance with, or, in subjection to France. Its pressure was materially felt by Spain and Portugal, from their want of provisions; and it is questionable how far that measure contributed to the convention for the evacuation of Portugal by the French army. The want of provisions being one ground alleged for their late convention for that purpose.

The French West India islands, too, have felt the pressure with great severity. They are at this moment in a state of blockade. There were probably two objects in this blockade. The one to reduce the French islands for want of provisions. The other, to seize upon their merchant ships, which it was presumed would hasten thither immediately upon raising the embargo. And it appeared extremely well-timed to effect that object, if Congress, upon their first meeting, had been weak or pusillanimous enough to have raised it. The loss of these islands would be severely felt by the French Emperor, and would probably produce some regret on his part in having contributed to drive the United States to the extremity of the embargo laws.

But, sir, gentlemen are very much alarmed at an expression in a late French exposé. They have made some general allusions to it, but in so vague a manner, as not to be understood with precision. As I am always fond of a correct statement of facts, I will read the expression probably alluded to: "The Americans, a people who involve their fortunes, their prosperity, and almost their existence, in commerce, have given an example of a great and courageous sacrifice. They have suspended, by a general embargo, all commerce and navigation, rather than shamefully submit to that tribute, which the English impose on the navigation of all nations." I cannot conceive the importance attached to this expression, or the view with which it was introduced. It is to be remarked that this is the character given to this measure throughout all Europe, and by none more loudly and decisively, than by the Federal American merchants now in Great Britain.

It is only on this side of the Atlantic, that we hear it described as a weak or wicked measure. But what of all this, sir? Will this French expression change the real character of the measure? Shall we change our own opinions of the true character of the measure because the French Government has thought proper to pronounce an opinion upon it? Are we told to abandon our own right of judging of our own measures, because the French Government officiously undertakes to judge for us? Sir, to me it is perfectly indifferent, what the French Government thinks upon the subject; I shall take the liberty of exercising my own judgment upon it, perfectly exempt from any extraneous influence whatever.

Mr. Canning, sir, has also undertaken to say something respecting the character of the embargo laws. Let us hear what he says upon the subject:

"If considered as a measure of impartial hostility against both belligerents, the embargo appears to His Majesty to have been manifestly unjust, as, according to every principle of justice, that redress ought to have been first sought from the party originating the wrong. And His Majesty cannot consent to buy off that hostility, which America ought not to have extended to him, at the expense of a concession made not to America, but to France.

"If, as it has more generally been represented by the Government of the United States, the embargo is only to be considered as an innocent, municipal regulation, which affects none but the United States themselves, and with which no foreign State has any concern; viewed in this light, His Majesty does not conceive that he has the right or the pretension to make any complaint of it; and he has made none."

"His Majesty would not hesitate to contribute in any manner in his power to restore to the commerce of the United States its wonted activity; and if it were possible to make any sacrifice for the repeal of the embargo, without appearing to deprecate it as a measure of hostility, he would gladly have facilitated its removal as a measure of inconvenient restriction upon the American people."

Let me now ask you, Mr. President, what feelings must rush themselves into your bosom, upon hearing this last, this arrogant insinuation? What must be the feelings of every war-worn veteran, who has so long enjoyed the pleasing consciousness of having been instrumental in achieving his country's independence? What must be the feelings of every young American, who has not basely degenerated from his father's virtues? Do you not see, sir, in this sentence, almost a direct overture of the interference of His Most Gracious Majesty in our political concerns? Do you not see the vain and idle effort to encourage discontents by the expression of His Majesty's good disposition to interpose his good offices to relieve the American people from the inconvenient restrictions imposed on them by their own Government? What indignity, what insult could be greater upon the American people? What could more clearly demonstrate the insatiation, the intoxication of Mr. Canning's mind, produced by the unfortunate flood of misinformation which had poured in upon him? The American people will repel the overture with indignation, with disdain; and sir, as a sure and pleasing anticipation of this result, I rejoiced to see the indignant resentment manifested by the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. WHITE.) It was the more honorable to him, sir, because it was the triumph of his American feelings over a host of prejudices with which I fear he is surrounded. I always knew that gentleman to be a patriot, and when it shall become necessary, I expect to see him amongst the foremost in the ranks of honor, in the defence of his country's rights.

Yes, sir, this insulting overture will doubtless burst the strong fetters of the prejudices of thousands of other American patriots, who will rally to the standard of their own Government, and will teach Mr. Canning how little he knows of American character, or the American sensibility, when he thus ventures to insult it.

Sir, the sentiments contained in this extraordinary note of Mr. Canning's are not new to me. I have seen them for some months in some of the Boston newspapers—it contains nothing more than the ridiculous intimations contained in them, reduced to the form of a diplomatic note, not at all improved, nor dignified, nor better calculated to effect their object, by the sarcastic insolence of Mr. Canning.

Upon an impartial review of the whole of this part of the subject, Mr. President, I think I am warranted in the conclusion that the embargo laws have not been without materially beneficial effects upon both the belligerents; that they have presented strong appeals to the interests of both, but that these appeals have not produced their complete effect. I have no hesitation in saying, sir, that when the proper time shall arrive—if these orders and decrees shall unfortunately be persevered in—I shall, for one, be ready to make still stronger appeals to their interests—appeals limited only by the whole force and energy of the nation.

I think also, sir, I am warranted in concluding, that if the embargo laws have failed of complete success, their failure has been owing to extraordinary causes, which could neither have been foreseen nor anticipated at the time of the adoption of the measure, and therefore cannot furnish any imputation against its policy or wisdom.

Permit me now, sir, to make some observations upon the general character of this measure, as well as replies to some of the more general objections brought against it. I have said, sir, that there are no substitutes for the embargo, but war or submission. I will now proceed to prove this position. A repeal of the embargo, without a substitute, is submission; if with a substitute, it is war. Gentlemen in the opposition seem fully sensible of the delicacy and urgency of this part of the question. When pressed for their substitute, they manifest vast reluctance in producing it.

The gentleman from Delaware, indeed, told us he was not the pioneer of the Administration. I never knew that he was called upon to act in that character; but I hope he will not voluntarily act as the sapper nor the miner of the Administration, especially when he must behold the Administration assailed by the two most powerful belligerents in the world, unfortunately aided I fear too, sir, by a host of domestic sappers and miners, and underminers in the bargain. I am sure, sir, the gentleman will not take upon himself such a character. The gentleman, however, did not withhold from us an intimation, at least, of his substitute—an intimation which could not be mistaken. It was war with France. The question therefore as to him is at an end upon this point. War is the substitute.

But, the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. HILLHOUSE,) after protesting against furnishing any substitute, intimates merely that he is in favor of an armed commerce. Why, sir, do gentlemen in the opposition manifest such a reluctance in producing a substitute, if they have one? They seem to be laboring under an impression that this is a mere question between themselves and the Administration—an unimportant question of ins and outs. The question is certainly of a very different description. It is a question between this nation and foreign nations. It is a question involving our national existence and independence, and the dearest rights of the people.

Let me tell these gentlemen, sir, that the people have a right to demand a substitute from them, if they have one; not merely a vague insinuation to fill up a chasm in a defective argument, but a written proposition, reduced to form, presented for serious consideration; that every word may be strictly examined, and all its bearings seen. Then, sir, we should be in a state of preparation to make a choice between such substitute and the measures of the Administration.

Besides, sir, if this obligation were disregarded, every rule of criticism, every principle of common sense, would require a substitute. If you criticise upon a sentence in writing, the criticism is incomplete until you show a better. In law pleadings, if you object to a plea, as defective, you are bound to show a better. And certainly, sir, the magnitude of the question does not lessen the obligation imposed by the ordinary rules of common sense. Again, sir, I hardly could have supposed that gentlemen of such lofty pretensions to wisdom and talents would have contented themselves with the humble office of finding fault, without furnishing the proper correction. This inactive conduct, this doing nothing for the people in these dangerous and critical times—can furnish but a poor claim to the people's gratitude and applause.

But, sir, I will consider the gentleman's substitute, even with the glimmering views of it which he has presented. His substitute is an armed commerce. Would he extend it to acts of reprisal? If so, it is immediate war. Would he stop short of that? It would still be war, but of a more inefficient kind. If our vessels are to arm, I presume their arms are to be used in self-defence—they would be used against both the belligerents. In the present temper of Great Britain, the first gun fired in a spirit of hostility, even with a blank cartridge—or if it were a pop-gun—would be instant war. It would be a signal to her navy to seize upon the whole of our commerce, which would be spread upon the ocean the moment of raising the embargo. The gentleman's substitute I therefore believe to be war, and war of the most inefficient kind. A repeal of the embargo, without a substitute, is submission. Submission to what? To colonization, to taxation, to tribute!—That this is the true character of the British Orders and Acts of Parliament, we not only know from the measures themselves, but we know it was so understood in the British Parliament at the time of their adoption. As an evidence of this fact, let me call your most serious attention, sir, to some of the observations made in Parliament at the time of their adoption, particularly the observations of Lord Grenville in the House of Lords.

His Lordship said: "As to the duties proposed to be levied under these Orders of Council, he should only say, that when the peace of 1783 took place, he never thought that he should have lived,

'or that the British Parliament should have lived to see the day when a proposition should be made to tax America!" And when a similar suggestion was made in the House of Commons, what was Mr. Canning's reply? Did he deny the object? No, sir; but begged the gentlemen in the opposition not to tell the secret to the Americans! Hush, gentlemen, was, in substance, his reply. Thus adding indignity and insult to the arrogant pretension. Upon this part of the subject, I shall make no comment. It is impossible to improve the eloquence of this Parliamentary language! It must strike deep into the heart of every true American.

The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. HILLHOUSE) says, no tribute will be paid, because there will be no inducement to pay it. France will not receive vessels into her ports, which have submitted to such a disgrace. It is admitted that the tribute is imposed; and to avoid the payment of it, we are to look to France: to give up our national character, and our national honor to the safe-keeping of the French Emperor. [The gentleman rose to explain. He protested against making any such inference.] This was admitted. He only stated the facts, and I supplied the inference. The inference from the facts I deem irresistible. I despise, sir, this miserable subterfuge. Let us act like a nation of freemen—let us be the conservators of our own honor and character. We should be the gainers by it upon the most economical calculation, in pounds, shillings, and pence. Our national character is now worth more than the delusive gains held out by this miserable commerce, and would sell for more in every market; submit to this disgraceful tribute, it would not be worth a cent, and would not sell for it in any market.

The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. HILLHOUSE) says, that the embargo is submission to the mandates of both France and Great Britain, and, therefore, dishonorable. He makes this statement—France says, you shall not trade with Great Britain; Great Britain says, you shall not trade with France; and we say, we will not trade with either, and, therefore, gratify both. The fallacy of this argument consists in the misstatement. France says you may trade with me, and I am anxious you should do so, but you shall not trade with Great Britain; we say, we will not trade with you, nor with Great Britain. Now, sir, is this yielding to the mandate, or gratifying the wish of France? Certainly not. Great Britain uses the same language, and meets with the same reply. Now I contend that we have neither yielded submission, nor gratified the wish of either; but have resisted the wishes and mandates of both; and I have no doubt that both are astonished at the honorable and dignified attitude we have assumed and hitherto persisted in.

But, sir, the gentleman intimates, that the Government of the United States has suspended a rod over the head of Great Britain, and asks, whether an American would negotiate with a rod suspended over his head? Let me ask in turn, sir, if the gentleman's proposition, is not submission; not indeed, while the rod is suspended over our heads; but whilst it is applied with the most unrelenting severity to our backs? I was really hurt, sir, to see that any gentleman could make an observation which would bear the most distant tint of an apology for Great Britain; and I cannot conceive how any gentleman can reconcile it to himself, when he reflects upon the many outrages committed by Great Britain against the United States, before even any attempt was made to do ourselves justice—and that these outrages were increased, in proportion to our patience under them.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. LLOYD) expresses his fears of some design for the destruction of commerce. He tells us, our commerce has grown to an enormous size, and warns us that it is not to be trifled with. The gentleman from Connecticut, too, tells us, that the avowed, was not the real object, of the embargo laws; and that he so prophesied at the time of passing them; that their real object was to encourage manufactures, at the expense of commerce. This charge of insincerity is a serious one. It is of a nature to impose a restraint upon the feelings, against making the merited reply. It has excited my surprise more than anything I ever heard fall from that gentleman; and the only apology I can find for it, is, that he unfortunately prophesied it. It is a painful effort of the mind to admit ourselves false prophets. By this time, it is impossible but the gentleman must be convinced that this was a false prophecy. He reminds me of the two lines in Hudibras:

"A man convinc'd against his will,
Is of the same opinion still."

The gentleman must be convinced, but retains the same opinion. Sir, whether it be a suspicion, or a jealousy, or whatever delusion the gentleman is laboring under, I peremptorily deny the existence of the fact he has insinuated. How has it happened that the commerce of the United States has become so enormous, but from the fostering and protecting influence of the Federal Government? What act of hostility against commerce has ever been shown by the Government? I challenge the gentleman to name one, or a single act from the Southern members unfavorable to our commercial prosperity. On the other hand, have we not always concurred in the stimuli given to commerce by discriminating duties, both on tonnage and merchandise, by the drawback system; and many other acts not material now to mention? It has been from these causes, added to the enterprises of our people, that commerce has arrived to such a pitch of prosperity. They certainly do not warrant the charge brought against the Government.

But what has excited my surprise, more than anything else, respecting this suggestion is, that the delusion upon the gentleman's mind, should be so strong as to banish his recollection of the local interests of the different States in the Union. He seems to suppose that the Southern are manufacturing States. This is not the fact. The fact is, that the commercial are, also, the manufacturing States. The Southern States are agricultural and commercial, not manufacturing, except in the household way; and that is not the species of manufacturing that has excited the gentleman's alarm. The peculiar organization of society in the Southern States, will, for a long time, forbid large establishments of domestic manufactures. This is the kind which gives the gentleman so much alarm; and, in this kind, the Southern States have no local interests whatever. They have, however, an essential interest in commerce, although, generally, the merchants carrying it on, may not reside within them. The agriculturists know, that a prosperous commerce is essential to good prices, and, therefore, they have always contributed to its protection and prosperity. In this state of facts, the gentleman may find a perfect security against his extravagant, and unfounded jealousies. But the gentleman is alarmed, because he has discovered, in the President's replies to sundry addresses from the manufacturers, expressions of satisfaction at their prosperity and improvement in the manufacturing system. But the President has nowhere expressed an intimation, or a wish, that this improvement, or prosperity, should be encouraged and promoted at the expense of commerce. And if he were to indulge so extraordinary an inclination, he could not expect to get a vote south of the Potomac, in favor of the system. Suppose the merchants had addressed the President, in the days of their prosperity, would he not have expressed his satisfaction at the circumstance? And would such expression have been just ground, or any ground, of alarm and jealousy to the manufacturer? Certainly not, sir. Every patriot must rejoice at the prosperity of each, and every class of citizens. Indeed, sir, did not the gentleman himself, in the course of his observations, with a laudable animation, express his high satisfaction at the doings of his own Legislature, giving encouragement to Colonel Humphries, in his attempts at introducing manufactures into the State of Connecticut? Proceedings highly honorable both to the Legislature and Colonel Humphries; and which I have also seen with great satisfaction. But, sir, would it be correct to infer from this circumstance, that commerce is to be assailed and prostrated? Such an inference would be as idle and absurd in this case, as it is in relation to the views of the General Government. Indeed, sir, I concur perfectly with the gentleman in the opinions he has expressed upon the manufacturing system, in relation to the commercial. I have taken more pains in repelling this extraordinary jealousy or suspicion, in the hope that in correcting the public sentiment, in this respect, it would, at the same time, dissipate a great portion of the objections to the embargo laws, which seem to me at this time to be imperiously demanded, by the extraordinary crisis of our foreign relations.

The Embargo.

SENATE.

I am now approaching a part of this subject, Mr. President, which fills me with regret. I know its delicacy, sir, and deeply regret the necessity which impels the examination of it. It is however rendered indispensable, perhaps, by exterior events; but certainly by observations made in the course of this debate. I allude, sir, to the inexecution of the embargo laws; or, rather, sir, to the suggested incapacity of the Government to enforce their observance. The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. HILLHOUSE) tells us, directly, that the Government has not power to enforce the execution of these laws. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. LLOYD) even points out the mode of resistance. He tells us they may be resisted, first, by town meetings, then by petitions, then by legislative resolutions, and, finally, by insurrections and rebellion. [Mr. LLOYD rose to explain. He said, "he did not say 'that this would be the course of events. He only 'stated them, abstractly, as probable results from 'those laws.'" The gentleman is correct in his statement. I meant to be understood, as stating his observations in that way. It cannot escape observation, however, Mr. President, that this is the practical process now going on in the State the gentleman has the honor to represent.

It is submitted to the patriotism and good sense of those gentlemen to determine, whether mentioning these circumstances, even in that way, may not have some tendency to produce effects, which must be so much deprecated by all; and permit me to hope, sir, by none more than by those gentlemen. And whether, sir, they are not calculated to keep up the delusions in foreign nations, which, I believe in God to be the principal causes of our present embarrassments. These circumstances were the less to be expected from gentlemen, who, a few years ago, arrogated to themselves the exclusive appellation of lovers of order and good Government, whilst their political opponents were denounced as anarchists and disorganizers, and not even possessing virtue and honesty enough to be trusted with the public treasury. This, sir, was an imposing appellation; and as long as its sincerity was confided in, it preserved these gentlemen in the dominion of the United States. It was hardly to have been expected that these gentlemen would now be found the first to sound the alarm in favor of anarchy and confusion; nor was it to have been expected, sir, that the Eastern States, which were the first to press the Constitution upon us, and which have reaped a golden harvest from its operations, should be the first to wish to absolve themselves from its sacred obligations.

But, Mr. President, I believe this Government does possess power sufficient to enforce laws. The real character of our Government seems to be entirely misunderstood by foreigners and not fully appreciated by some of our own citizens. It has all the strength of execution, with the most despotic Governments upon earth. It is aided, too, by the knowledge of every citizen, that, when its will is pronounced, it is the fair expression of the will of the majority. The checks of this Government are exclusively upon its deliberations, not upon its powers of execution. So far from it, that the Constitution has expressly provided, that the Government should possess all means necessary and proper for executing its specified powers. There is no limitation, whatever, upon the means for executing the general will, when fairly and deliberately pronounced. Nothing could be more absurd than to suppose, that after so many checks had been imposed upon deliberation in pronouncing the public will, after that will was thus pronounced, that any means, whatever, for its execution should be withheld.

Again, sir, the fundamental principle of our Government is, that the majority shall govern. The principle is known and respected by every citizen, and by none more than the people of Massachusetts. They are taught to respect it from the cradle to manhood. First in their town meetings, then in their Legislature, and, finally, in the General Government. They know too well the fatal consequences of resisting it. I have perfect confidence, therefore, in the people of Massachusetts; and, if their electioneering leaders and partisans should unfortunately stimulate some of them into insurrection, I have no doubt but that the militia of that State, when lawfully called on, will obey the call, and will do their duty. Such a movement would share the fate of all similar attempts, which have preceded it; and its only consequence would be, that its authors, as they would be the first to merit the fate, so they would become the first victims of it. But, sir, I have but little apprehensions from these threats of insurrection and rebellion, for other reasons.

The peculiar interests of the people of Massachusetts forbid the attempt. A few leaders may, perhaps, postpone their interests to their love of power; but few, however, could enjoy the power under any new order of things, and the people at large would soon see that their interests were sacrificed to the indulgence of this infatuated ambition of the few.

Let this subject Mr. President, be a little further examined, in reference to the local interests of the Eastern States, as members of this Union. Potomac may be considered as the boundary line between the commercial and agricultural States.

When our first difficulties with the belligerents occurred, it respected merely a commercial right. What was the conduct of the merchants, and commercial States, upon the subject? You have heard, sir, their memorials read, calling upon the Government, in a voice too loud to be suppressed, to protect them in their commercial rights; the call was obeyed. As I think this part of the subject ought to be well understood, I beg the indulgence of the Senate to read their own proceedings thereupon:

"The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee, made on the 5th instant, on that part of the Message of the President of the United States which relates to the violation of neutral rights and the impressment of American seamen.

On motion, to commit the second resolution reported, it passed in the negative.

On motion, to strike out the following words in the second resolution reported:

'Demand and insist upon the restoration of the property of their citizens, captured and condemned on the pretext of its being employed in a trade with the enemies of Great Britain, prohibited in time of peace; and upon the indemnification of such American citizens, for their losses and damages sustained by those captures and condemnations, and to'

It was determined in the negative—yeas 13, nays 16.

The yeas and nays having been required by one-fifth of the Senators present, those who voted in the affirmative, are—

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Bayard, Gilman, Hillhouse, Kitchel, Mitchill, Pickering, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Smith of Ohio, Smith of Tennessee, Thruston, Tracy, White, Wright.

And several amendments to the said second resolution having been adopted;

On motion, to agree thereto as determined, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 23, nays 7.

The yeas and nays having been required by one-fifth of the Senators present, those who voted in the affirmative are—

Those who voted in the negative are—

Messrs. Adair, Bradley, Plumer, Smith of Vermont, Stone, Sumter, Thruston.

So it was,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to demand the restoration of the property of their citizens, captured and condemned on the pretext of its being employed in a trade with the enemies of Great Britain, prohibited in time of peace; and the indemnification of such American citizens, for their losses and damages sustained by these captures and condemnations; and to enter into such arrangements with the British Government, on this and all other differences subsisting between the two nations, (and particularly respecting the impressment of American seamen,) as may be consistent with the honor and interests of the United States, and manifest their earnest desire to obtain for themselves and their citizens by amicable negotiation, that justice to which they are entitled."

At this time the question involved only a commercial right. What was the conduct of the merchants then? They came forward and pledged their lives and fortunes to support the Government in any measures for its protection. The question is now changed. To the original question, is added a question of national sovereignty and independence. What is now the conduct of these same merchants? They tell you, sir, to tread back your steps, give up the contest, and disgrace your country. These merchants, too, threaten you with insurrection and rebellion, unless you yield implicit obedience to their mandates.

Again, sir, I have little apprehension from these threats, for the following reasons: First, many of the individuals engaged in these excitements, I am told, are gentlemen of property and families. They are, therefore, now in the enjoyment of every political and domestic blessing—their infatuated passions to the contrary notwithstanding. I think persons of this description will pause before they hazard all these blessings; and a moment's impartial reflection will be sufficient to check their career. In the next place, there are many local advantages accruing to the people of the Eastern States from the operations of the General Government. They consist principally of the following, although there are others:

1. The protection afforded to their carrying trade by discriminating duties, both on tonnage and merchandise;

2. Protection and facility afforded to the coasting trade;

3. Protection to their fisheries by duties on foreign fish;

4. Affording a good market for their surplus manufactures and other articles;

5. Payment of the public debt at par, which was bought up at very low rates;

6. As a result from all these advantages, the protection of their population on the seaboard, by lessening the inducements to emigration.

Permit me, sir, to remind the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. LLOYD) that these advantages are not to be trifled with.

But, sir, I have heard it intimated that these advantages could be compensated by a connexion with Great Britain. Indulge me, sir, with an examination of this idea. A connexion between New England and Old England could only be for the benefit of the latter. They are essentially rivals in every occupation. First, in navigation; second, in exports. The exports of New England are principally fish and beef. It would be a great object with Old England utterly to destroy the New England fish market; and the Irish beef would come into an advantageous competition with the export of that article.

These are permanent points of competition, unalterably fixed in the nature of things. They cannot be altered nor destroyed by any sudden ebullitions of passion, nor by any connexion resulting therefrom.

Again, sir, what would be the effect of such a connexion upon the rest of the United States? In that case, the discriminating duties now in favor of the New England States would be turned against them, and would probably be given to the Middle States, and thus New England would be effectually excluded from carrying the bulky and heavy productions of the Southern States. Discrimination might even be made in favor of British ships. It is a matter of no consequence to the agriculturist whether his produce is carried to market in a New England or Old England ship. The only interest he has in the transaction is the price of his produce; and that could always be driven to its highest point by the competition of British tonnage and British capital alone, without taking into the estimate the tonnage and capital of the Middle States. The people of the Southern States are perfectly sensible of the local advantages their Eastern brethren enjoy from the operation of the General Government. But they envy them not—they revel in their prosperity; and the Southern people are pleased with the recollection that they contribute to their prosperity. They find, in return, their compensation in the general safety and protection. I do not mean safety and protection from any internal movements. Upon that point, I would agree with our Eastern brethren upon a reciprocal absolution from all obligation. I mean safety and protection against foreign aggression. Under this plain and obvious view of this part of the subject, Mr. President, I should be disposed to think that our Eastern brethren would be the last to desire to absolve themselves from the sacred obligations of the Constitution.

In the Southern States, we feel no resentments nor jealousies against our Eastern friends. There are no inducements with us to foster and encourage such unpleasant and mischievous feelings. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. LLOYD) has ventured to interpose an opinion between Great Britain and France, respecting the character of the quarrel between them. He has ventured to say, sir, that France is fighting for lawless domination, whilst Great Britain is fighting for her natale solium—for her national existence. Sir, in my opinion, it must be inauspicious to the interests of the people of the United States when their rulers not only feel, but express sympathies in favor of one of the belligerent Powers; and surely, sir, the gentleman must feel no small sympathy for one of the belligerents, if he believes the character of the quarrel to be such as he has described it.

In my judgment, sir, the United States have nothing to do with the character of the quarrel of the belligerents: but I differ entirely with the gentleman on this point. I believe the character of the quarrel is precisely the same on both sides—they are both fighting for lawless domination; and I believe that Great Britain has full as much chance of conquering France, as France has of conquering Great Britain. The only difference between them consists in the difference in the objects of their lawless domination. France claims dominion on the land, Great Britain on the water; they are both equally hostile to us.

The difference to us consists only in the different degrees of force they can bring to bear upon us—in this respect Great Britain does us most injury. We are, thank God, remote from the influence of French power—but the power of Great Britain extends to our shores. France, when she can, seizes and burns our vessels—Great Britain having more power on the ocean, seizes, and confiscates them. The only limit of their hostility is the limit of their power. Both are equally the objects of our just resistance and punishment if we possess the power.

I rejoice that I have heard no apologist for France on this floor, nor anywhere else. I feel, sir, a condescension in introducing, for the purpose of denying, the idle and ridiculous tale of French influence, which has so disrespectfully and disgracefully to our country, been circulated by newspapers. Sir, this idle and ridiculous tale of French influence, I have strong reasons to believe, was originally suggested by British influence. The tale was probably invented by the British Cabinet about the same time of the invention of the tale respecting the secret article of the Treaty of Tilsit, that the Danes had agreed to give up their fleet to the French Emperor to facilitate his invasion of Great Britain. This tale I believe Lord Hutchinson has since pronounced, in the British Parliament, to be a falsehood. About the same period this same energetic British Cabinet probably determined upon the destruction of American commerce, although the Orders for that purpose were not actually issued for several months afterwards. Some tale was thought necessary for the justification of the act, and the suggestion of French influence operating upon our councils was probably the one suggested.

I have heard it said, and believe it to be true, that the Governor of Nova Scotia made the suggestion, in a letter addressed to certain British partisans in Boston. It is hardly to be presumed, that he would have taken upon himself the responsibility of such a suggestion, without the authority of the Cabinet. I am inclined to think that this fact could be proved in a court of justice. Perhaps there may be gentlemen here from Boston, who could give us more particular information upon this subject. I feel, sir, a condescension in touching upon this subject. I wish to see all extraneous influence utterly banished from the country, and the only operating influence—American influence.

I have now, sir, gone through this unpleasant, and, I fear, unprofitable discussion, respecting the character of measures heretofore adopted by the Government; the only hope I have from it is, that it may put us into a better temper for deliberating on the measures now proper to be adopted. Let me then, Mr. President, call the attention of the Senate, to the situation of the United States at this time.

The United States are now left alone to protect neutral principles against the belligerent encroachments of a warring world. In all former wars, the belligerent encroachments have been proportioned to the influence of the Powers at war, compared to the influence of those remaining at peace; but I believe history presents no example of the warring Powers at any former time putting at defiance all neutral rights, all public law. It remained for the present times to witness this unexampled aggression; and it remained for the United States alone to bear the shock. This state of things imposes on them a great, a sacred obligation; the obligation of protecting neutral principles—principles which lessen the inducements to war, and mitigate its rigor—principles highly interesting to mankind; not only to the present, but to future generations, and, in a peculiar manner, to the people of the United States. This arises from their remote situation from the great contending nations of Europe. Hitherto, sir, the talents displayed in defining, and the magnanimity in protecting these principles, have obtained for the United States the respect and sympathy of an astonished world. And shall we, sir, at the moment of extraordinary pressure, basely abandon them without striking a blow? Forbid it interest! Forbid it honor!

Forbid it American gallantry! But, sir, some gentleman seem sufficiently impressed with the hostile character of the belligerent aggressions. With respect to those of France, there is but one opinion. They amount to hostility itself. But, sir, to my astonishment, the acts of Great Britain seem not to have made the same strong impression on the minds of some gentlemen. Let me then inquire, sir, into the real character of acts, which can by some gentlemen be palliated or excused? They are acts amounting to colonization and taxation; to the exercise of the national sovereignty of the United States. Great Britain has even gone so far, as to exercise an act of sovereignty over the people of the United States, which they would not intrust to Congress, but retained to themselves in their highest sovereign capacity.

The British Orders of Council, now sanctioned by an act of Parliament, direct all vessels laden with the produce of the United States, destined to any of the ports of the enemies of Great Britain, to call at a British port, and then to pay an enormous transit duty, and accept a license for the further prosecution of the voyage; and upon refusal, they are forced to do so by British armed ships. This is literally and precisely the introduction of the old and long established colonial principle, of coercing all the commerce of the colony to the ports of the mother country, there to pay a transit duty for their protection by the mother country. In the Colonial state, the mandate of the mother country was sufficient to effect this object. Now the same object is effected by an armed force. This is the only real difference in the two cases. But, sir, this is not all; Great Britain has attempted, by an act of Parliament, to exercise an act of sovereignty over the United States, solemnly given by the people to their Congress. Among the powers given to Congress, I find these words: "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations." &c. Now, sir, permit me to read an act of Parliament, and see whether it does not only impose a tax upon American productions, but also exercises this act of national sovereignty delegated by the people to Congress:

"And whereas it is expedient and necessary, in order effectually to accomplish the object of such orders, that duties of customs should be granted upon certain goods exported from Great Britain; we, your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom, in Parliament assembled, do most humbly beseech your Majesty that it may be enacted; and be it enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that, from and after the passing of this act, there shall be raised, levied, collected, and paid unto His Majesty, his heirs and successors, upon all goods, wares, and merchandise, enumerated or described in the tables, A. B. and C., annexed to this act, exported from Great Britain, the several duties and customs, as the same are respectively described and set forth in figures in said tables."

In those tables, marked A. B. C., are to be found productions of the United States. It has been said, that Great Britain may lay an export duty upon goods within her ports. That is readily admitted—it being a mere municipal regulation. But Great Britain has no right to compel our ships to carry our productions into her ports, for the purpose of imposing duties thereon; and this is the act regulating our commerce, of which I complain.

Again, sir, Great Britain has attempted by this act of Parliament to lay an export duty upon the productions of the United States, a power not even intrusted to the discretion of Congress. I find in the Constitution, these words: "no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State." Here then is an express prohibition to Congress against laying a duty on any articles exported from any State; yet Great Britain has attempted, by an act of Parliament, to lay an export duty on cotton exported from one of the United States—an authority which can only be exercised by the people in their highest sovereign capacity. It is true, sir, that Mr. Canning offered to commute this duty into an entire prohibition of the article, as an export from Great Britain. This, sir, was only adding insult to injury, and showed that Mr. Canning possessed very little knowledge of human character, if he expected to soothe the feelings by insulting the understanding.

I regret that so much respect was shown to this proposition, as to forward it to our Government. It would have been more agreeable to me, if the American Minister had thrown the proposition back upon Mr. Canning.

It is true, Mr. President, that the export duty is to be collected in London, and not in Charleston. But, sir, it is not the better in principle on that account; and it is worse in practice. A vessel sailing from Charleston, is to be forced into London, for the purpose of paying this tribute—better would it be to collect it in Charleston; because the circuitry of the voyage would be saved, and many other vexations and expenses avoided which are now incurred by being forced into London, to make the payment. And if this measure were to be submitted to, I should not be at all surprised to see His Most Gracious Majesty, in the spirit of a mitigated retaliation, send out his collectors to the ports of the United States for the accommodation of our merchants. In that case, I presume, we should all admit it to be a duty imposed upon an article exported from a particular State. Are we, sir, not only basely to surrender to Great Britain our rights, intrusted to us by the people, but treacherously to them to surrender rights reserved to themselves in their highest sovereign capacity? And in a case like this, sir, can it be necessary to resort to argument, to rouse the indignant feelings of the American people?

Mr. President, the eyes of the world are now turned upon us; if we submit to these indignities and aggressions, Great Britain herself would despise us; she would consider us an outcast among nations; she would not own us for her offspring: France would despise us; all the world would despise us; and what is infinitely worse, we should be compelled to despise ourselves! If we resist, we shall command the respect of our enemies, the sympathies of the world, and the noble approbation of our own consciences.

Mr. President, our fate is in our own hands; let us have union and we have nothing to fear. So highly do I prize union, at this awful moment, that I would prefer any one measure of resistance with union, to any other measure of resistance with division; let us then, sir, banish all personal feelings; let us present to our enemies, the formidable front of an indissoluble band of brothers, nothing else is necessary to our success. Mr. President, unequal as this contest may seem; favored as we are by our situation, and under the blessing of a beneficent Providence, who has never lost sight of the United States in times of difficulty and trial, I have the most perfect confidence, that if we prove true to ourselves, we shall triumph over our enemies. Deeply impressed with these considerations, I am prepared to give the resolution, a flat and decided negative.*

* It was intended in the course of the foregoing observations, to show, that the British Board of Trade had, at length, undertaken to regulate our commerce with foreign nations, even when it did not pass through British ports. The paper intended to be offered as evidence of this fact, was then mislaid. It is now subjoined for that purpose.

FRIDAY, November 25.

JOHN MILLEDGE, from the State of Georgia, attended.

The bill providing for the conveyance by mail, free of postage, of all public documents, to or from members of Congress, was read the third time; and on the question, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. ANDERSON observed that the committee of the Senate to whom the bill from the House of Representatives had been committed, had reported the bill without amendment, because they thought the principle objectionable. The committee had conceived that under this law any package, book, bundle of paper, or anything else might be franked. They had also understood from the Department, that the contractors for carrying the mail already complained of its great bulk, proceeding from the quantity of the documents and communications sent from Congress; and that were the present regulation to be adopted, great part of the mail must often be omitted, by which letters or communications requiring expedition and safe carriage might be mislaid or lost. These disadvantages the committee had conceived to be too great to be counterbalanced by the advantages to be derived from a saving to the United States, of the sum allowed to the Postmaster here on free packets, which he understood had been the chief reason for the introduction of the law. He wished, therefore, that the bill might be negatived.

And on the question on its passage, but three members rose in favor of it.

LEGISLATIVE INSTRUCTIONS.

Mr. PICKERING laid before the Senate a resolution of the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, instructing their Senators and requesting their Representatives to use their endeavors to have the embargo laws repealed.

The House agreed that it should be read.

The Clerk was proceeding to read the instructions, when

Mr. ANDERSON objected to it, as he found it was the report of a committee which the gentleman had presented, and which he did not wish to be entered on the journal of the Senate.

Mr. PICKERING observed, that it was not merely the report of a committee, but the act of the Legislature, both Houses having concurred in it.

Mr. ANDERSON said he objected to its being read in any point of view, because it was a novel thing in legislation that instructions given by a State to its Representatives should be inserted on tered a port in Spain, previous to the commencement of hostilities by the patriots, against the enemy, proceed from such port with a cargo, the growth and produce of Spain, direct to a port in the United States, without being liable to a seizure and condemnation as above?

Answer. An American vessel having entered a port in Spain, previous to the commencement of hostilities by the patriots, against the enemy, may proceed from such port with a cargo, the growth and produce of Spain, direct to a port in the United States, without being liable to seizure and condemnation as above, unless the vessel entered in breach of the Orders in Council."

the journals of the Senate. He, therefore, moved a reconsideration of the motion for reading it.

Messrs. HILLHOUSE, WHITE, PICKERING, and LLOYD, opposed Mr. ANDERSON'S motion, contending that this was the mode in which the Legislature of Massachusetts had thought fit to express its sentiments of the measures of the General Government; that so much respect was always given to the memorial of an individual, as to suffer it to be read, and at least as much respect should be shown to the act of a State Legislature.

Messrs. ANDERSON and S. SMITH advocated the motion for reconsideration, contending that it was in nothing like a memorial from the State of Massachusetts, for whom they professed a great respect; that in no former instance had similar instructions been read by the Clerk of the House, except in the case of amendments to the Constitution, in respect to which every State had a Constitutional right to interfere. Mr. SMITH particularly stated an instance in which he had been prevented from presenting to the House resolutions of the Legislature of Maryland instructing him to oppose the erection of a bridge over the Potomac; which, however, he had read in his place, as a part of the debate, and which the gentleman from Massachusetts were certainly at liberty to do.

Mr. HILLHOUSE called for the yeas and nays on the question of reconsideration.

Mr. GILES taking his seat about this time requested, as he had not heard the discussion, that the farther consideration of the subject should be postponed till Monday next.—Agreed to.

The document is as follows:

Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

November 15, 1808.

The committee appointed to consider "whether it will be expedient for this Legislature to adopt any measures with a view to procure a repeal of the laws of the United States interdicting to the citizens all foreign commerce, and imposing vexatious embarrassments on the coasting trade; to relieve the people of this Commonwealth from their distressed state, and to arrest the progress of that ruin which threatens to involve all classes of the community," beg leave to report:

That the committee perceive, with the most serious regret, that the distresses occasioned by the several laws imposing an embargo, have borne with extreme and increasing pressure upon the people, and every day's experience justifies a belief that a continuance of these laws must soon become intolerable. As measures of coercion they are now acknowledged to be altogether impotent. They afford satisfaction to France, and are regarded as ineffectual demonstrations of a hostile disposition by Great Britain. Upon our own country, their effects are becoming daily and palpably more injurious. The produce of our agriculture, of our forests, and of our fisheries, is excluded, altogether, from every foreign market; our merchants and mechanics are deprived of employment; our coasting trade is interrupted, and harassed by grievous embarrassments, and our foreign trade is becoming diverted into channels, from which there is no prospect of its return. The sources of our revenue are dried up, and Government must soon resort to direct taxation. Our sailors are forced to expatriate themselves. Strong temptations are afforded to systematical evasions of the laws, which tend to corrupt the spirit of honorable commerce, and will materially injure the public morals. In fact, the evils which are menaced, by the continuance of this policy, are so enormous and deplorable; the suspension of commerce is so contrary to the habits of our people, and so repugnant to their feelings and interests, that they must soon become intolerable, and endanger our domestic peace, and the union of these States. As the embargo laws have been the cause of the public distress, your committee are of opinion that no equal, permanent, or effectual relief can be afforded to the citizens of this Commonwealth, but by the repeal of these laws. They persuade themselves that the Congress of the United States must be fully impressed with a sense of the total inefficiency of these laws for any valuable purpose, and of their direct tendency to the most serious consequences. Your committee, therefore, trust that Congress will not fail to repeal them. In this confidence, therefore, your committee are of opinion that, upon this subject, the Legislature should, in its present session, confine itself to a repeated disapprobation of the laws interdicting foreign commerce, and to instructing our Senators, and requesting our Representatives in Congress, to use their utmost exertions to procure their repeal.

Your committee might, probably, have contented themselves with the preceding remarks, had not the late Message of the President of the United States excited the most serious alarm; which, in the present critical state of the country, they conceive it a duty to express. They perceive, with the most painful regret, that, in the estimation of the President, our country is now presented with the only alternative of a continued embargo, or a ruinous war; but they cannot hesitate to express their confident belief that the wisdom of the Government may yet find means to avoid the necessity of electing between these great public calamities. If, however, this severe necessity exists in regard to Great Britain, they are led by the Message to presume it results, in a great measure, if not entirely, from the determination of the Executive to adhere to the proclamation of July, 1807, interdicting all British ships of war from the waters of the United States; which has been, and, as we infer from the Message, is still, deemed by the British Government, a measure so inhospitable and oppressive, if not hostile in its character, as to form an insuperable obstacle to amicable adjustment.

Upon this delicate and important subject, the committee are far from asserting that the attack on the Frigate Chesapeake did not justify the original issuing of this proclamation, and enforcing it so long as the injury might be presumed to have the sanction of the British Government. But, as the violation of neutral rights was promptly and explicitly disavowed by the Sovereign of the aggressor, before the remonstrances or measures of our Government could be known; as the right to search our national ships was expressly disclaimed, and a special envoy deputed for the professed object of making to our Government a full, satisfactory, and public reparation, on the simple condition of a previous revocation of this proclamation; your committee are constrained to declare their opinion, that such a revocation, under such circumstances, would not have involved any dishonorable concession, or an abandonment of any just right or pretension, but would have been a fair, reasonable, and magnanimous pledge of the sincerity of the wishes of the American Government to restore the accustomed relations of peace and amity between the two countries. This course must have compelled the British Envoy to have offered that ample and honorable reparation, which would have been deemed by our own nation, and by the world, an adequate atonement for the outrage; or have justified, in the event of the refusal, not only the renewal of the proclamation, but the adoption of measures of the most rigorous and hostile description.

But, even on the presumption that the course adopted by the Government, in refusing to revoke the proclamation as a preliminary to the adjustment of that controversy, be sanctioned by the usages of nations, and the justice of our claims, your committee are still of opinion that a punctilious adherence to diplomatic forms and precedents should not be maintained, at the risk of war, by a nation whose genius and policy are pacific; and which, while justly jealous of the national honor and independence, looks principally to the substantial security of those blessings and regards as insignificant those petty contentions which, originating in courtly pride and vanity, frequently terminate in bloody wars. And they therefore think, that this proclamation ought not, in the present situation of Europe and this country, to remain as the only, or even as the principal barrier to the restoration of our amicable relations with the British nation.

Your committee, therefore, ask leave to report the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senators of this Commonwealth in Congress be instructed, and the Representatives thereof requested, to use their most strenuous exertions to procure an immediate repeal of the various laws imposing an embargo on the ships and vessels of the United States, as the only equal and effectual means of affording permanent relief to the citizens of this Commonwealth, from the aggravated evils which they now experience.

Resolved, That, although this Legislature would cheerfully support the General Government in the prosecution of a just and necessary war, yet they cannot perceive the necessity, intimated in the Message of the President to Congress, of continuing the embargo, or resorting to war; that it is not the policy of the United States to engage in a controversy with any nation, upon points of diplomatic usage, or equivocal right, provided substantial reparation for injuries can be obtained; and that the revocation of the proclamation interdicting the British ships of war from our waters, ought not, in the opinion of this Legislature, to be deemed an inadmissible preliminary, which should obstruct the adjustment of the controversy between the United States and Great Britain.

THE EMBARGO.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the 11th instant, for repealing the "Act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several acts supplementary thereto."

Mr. LLOYD rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: I feel impelled, sir, by a sense of duty, and by the observations of the honorable gentleman last up, (Mr. GILES,) to make some further remarks on this subject.

When I had the honor before to address the Senate, I did not enter into any numerical statements, which, as a mercantile man, might have been expected from me, of the value of the trade which would yet remain to be prosecuted from the United States, notwithstanding the existence of the French decrees or the British Orders in Council; nor did I enter into any detailed examinations of the different degrees of suffering sustained by different sections of the United States, in consequence of the existing situation of our affairs. The reason why the latter was omitted will be presently mentioned. The reasons for not noticing the former were, that having seen so many details in the newspapers and other ephemeral publications, founded apparently on correct data, that I did not consider it necessary to lay any further sentiments on this subject before gentlemen who must be so well informed as the honorable members of this House. But, sir, I had other reasons: having been recently introduced into the Senate, not being much accustomed to public speaking, and being very unexpectedly called into debate, I felt desirous to take up as little time of the Senate as could be done with propriety, being much more disposed to listen to the arguments of other gentlemen than to obtrude upon them any remarks of my own.

When I objected to the postponement on the first day of the debate, it was not my intention at that time to have expressed my sentiments on this subject; but I had hoped to have heard the gentleman from Virginia, who addressed you yesterday, and whom I had observed taking notes for the purpose. Had I been present and heard the observations of the gentleman from Kentucky,

(Mr. POPE.) which I have since seen in the newspapers, I should not have objected to the postponement, as it will always afford me pleasure to meet with civility and respect the wishes of any member of the Senate.

To do away any erroneous impression which may exist, these observations are perhaps not wholly useless.

When I before rose, sir, no gentleman in opposition to the resolution had then spoken on it; and having risen unexpectedly, I could only rely on conjecture for the grounds of that opposition. When I came to this city, from the general public impression abroad, my expectation was, that the embargo would be raised. The question then was, if the embargo were raised, what was next to be done? Of the leading gentlemen with whom I conversed, some had said we must have war; that the question would come to this point in a month; some, that we must fight with both the belligerents; some, with one of them. As I was not Quixotic enough to think of fighting at the same time with the two nations, who commanded nearly all the force of Europe, the question, in my mind, for the consideration of Congress, was narrowed to this point: ought we to go to war with France or with Great Britain? And from this view I made the discrimination between the circumstances of those two Powers when last I addressed you; and I have now no hesitation to say, if we must have war, it would, in my opinion, be preferable to have war with France rather than with Great Britain.

A great deal has been said in relation to the Orders in Council, and the act of Parliament under them, imposing a duty, tax, or tribute—call it what you please—on the transportation of American merchandise from Great Britain to the ports on the Continent. I shall say but a few words more on that subject. France says you shall not go to England on any terms; England says you may go to France under certain conditions. Now, sir, as I have been taught to believe that the whole includes all its parts, I do not see by this how a limited exclusion can be more than a total one. England then, had not, in this instance, behaved worse than France: they have both behaved bad enough. Still, after making these observations, I wish not to be misunderstood. The regulation is an offensive one; and if any gentleman will bring in a bill making it highly penal for any American owner or master of a vessel to purchase this license for proceeding on his voyage from the United States to the ports on the Continent, through the medium of Great Britain, or should pay the tax, and proceed, after being coerced into a British port, I will cheerfully unite with him in passing such a law.

With regard to the Orders in Council, the British say they are measures of retaliation, to be retracted as soon as the decrees which occasioned them shall have been withdrawn on the part of France. Gentlemen say they do not believe these professions; but that Great Britain has deeper and more hostile views than these; that she is jealous of the prosperity of the United States, and fears them as a commercial rival; that she wants to cripple and destroy our trade. Admitting this to be the fact, (and very possibly it may be in part well founded,) what does your embargo effect? I contend that it is an act of absolute submission to her. This is strong ground, and I wish to have it noticed. Suppose Great Britain has the dispositions you attribute to her; she will not now attempt to enforce them; she dare not attempt to drive you from the ocean, because her own interests would at this time be materially injured by it. Suppose she were to attempt it, what would be the consequences? Suffer even the merchants to arm their vessels and their convoys, and their minor cruisers would occasionally experience some unpleasant rencontres. In adjusting the depending accounts of her merchants with this country, she would sustain some inconvenience; and she would also be obliged to submit to the loss of her colonies on the continent of America, now become doubly dear to her, from their recent prosperity, and from the supplies she is drawing from them for the support of her settlements in the West Indies. Now, sir, what does the embargo effect? By it you are doing for Great Britain, without any inconvenience to her, precisely that which she will not venture to do for herself. Great Britain says, you shall trade only partially; and you agree to trade not at all. The continuance of the embargo is, therefore, complete submission to her.

Much has been said about British influence, and certain passages have been read from the memorial of the merchants of Boston, for the purpose, as I suppose, of demonstrating an inconsistency in their opinions in 1806 and at the present time. I have not seen the paper for these two years, but there is no inconsistency in it; the sentiments entertained then are the sentiments entertained now. Great Britain violated our neutral rights; the merchants of Boston complained to their Government in pointed terms, and called on it for protection and redress against Great Britain. Was this an evidence of British influence? The charge, however, existed at that time as well as at the present; but the scene is changed; we had not then a Berlin decree, a Milan decree, a Bayonne decree; our vessels had not been wantonly burned on the ocean, nor had we received any letters from Champagny.

And on this subject what says the Secretary of State to General Armstrong? He tells him that "the burning of neutral vessels detained on the high seas is the most distressing of all the modes by which belligerents exert force contrary to right, and in proportion as it is destitute of apology ought at least to be the promptitude and amplitude of redress." Has this redress ever been obtained? To my knowledge or belief it never has. The merchants of Boston, therefore, probably think that a war with France would now be more for the honor and the interest of the United States than a war with Great Britain. For thinking this, are they justly chargeable with being under British influence? This is an old story. I shall take none of it to myself, nor admit any of its allusions. I challenge any one to produce a shadow of plausibility for any such imputation. I know they were not meant as personal allusions.

Notwithstanding all that has been said, the gentleman from Virginia still considers the embargo as a coercive measure; and if it is not, I know not what good it can effect; and if this good be not effected, then it ought not to be persisted in.

The gentleman seems to think, that by this continuance, Great Britain may still be seriously affected by her want of breadstuff, of timber, of tobacco, or of cotton. Sir, I am sorry that in this discussion we have to refer so much to foreign nations, and sometimes to appear to place their resources in opposition to our own; but I know of no other way in which to take into consideration the propriety of this embargo, or the effects that are likely to be produced from it. The statements, if correct, must be known to them, if not to ourselves; and we ought also to know them.

The gentleman from Virginia thinks that the want of our breadstuff will affect Great Britain. From his extensive knowledge, he must know that the annual consumption of grain in Great Britain is estimated at about one hundred and fifty millions of bushels; that the whole of our exports, converting the flour into wheat, is about seven millions three hundred thousand bushels. Now, admitting that every kernel of this grain used to be sent to Great Britain, (which is very far from the fact,) does the gentleman expect seriously to operate on Great Britain by retaining within our ports five per cent. of all the grain she consumes? Surely not, sir.

The gentleman also thinks that the want of our timber may affect her. Does he recollect that she now has at command the forests of Sweden, of Canada, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and the whole coast of South America? With these resources, is it possible that she can want timber? No, sir; and the worst evidence of it for us is, that she has just laid such a new duty on timber from the United States as, if the trade were now open, would amount to nearly a total exclusion of it.

Will she want tobacco? There are gentlemen on this floor so much better informed respecting this article, that I shall say little about it. It is not a necessary of life; and what is produced in the West Indies, the Carracas, the Brazils, and the Spanish provinces, must, I should presume, be sufficient to prevent the embargo from affecting her by this commodity.

Does she want cotton? Yes, sir, she does. Although the mention made by the gentleman of the "bad trade at Manchester," is not a very happy illustration of the fact, too lively an interest cannot be paid to this article by the Government of the United States. It is the great staple of the country, and more especially of the Southern States. Great Britain imports seventy millions of pounds of cotton annually. The exports from the United States of this article amount to above sixty millions of pounds; of this, Great Britain takes about two-thirds; say, however, she receives from us forty-five or fifty millions of pounds in a year, and that this supply is very important to her manufacturers; the question then is, whether, if we abstain from all intercourse with her, she can supply herself elsewhere? I fear she can. In addition to the increasing supply from her own West India colonies, the Brazils can furnish fifteen millions of pounds. The annual export of cotton by the British from Bombay to China is from fifteen to twenty millions of pounds, which can be sent to Europe with a profit. Here, then, are at least thirty millions of pounds. The cultivation of cotton in Bengal is progressing, and Spanish America will further increase the stock. But I fear we have in our own neighborhood a much more formidable competitor than can arise from any of the beforementioned places; the commerce of the whole coast of Guiana is under the control of Great Britain: a coast of three hundred miles in extent, as well calculated for the production of the best kind of cotton as any in the world. Until within a few years, it scarcely produced any quantity of importance. It now brings into the market more than fifteen millions of pounds annually, and is considered as being capable of producing, in a few years, more than sixty millions of pounds.

One of the worst effects of the embargo is, that it has trumpeted abroad what we never ought to have divulged; it has taught other nations the secret of their own self-dependence; it has induced them to seek new avenues of commerce, and when we are ready again to trade with them, it is greatly to be feared that they will not leave their new to return to their old customers.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) thinks the embargo may be considered as a fortunate measure; that the people in his part of the country are contented with it; that the interior is improving; that Philadelphia has increased, and so have Georgetown and Washington; that the condition of the farmers of his neighborhood is ameliorated; they cultivated too much land before; they now raise less produce, but they are better situated. If this reasoning of the gentleman be sound, pursue the amelioration still further, and he will find his countrymen becoming exceedingly wealthy when they possess nothing at all. I am glad, however, to hear that any part of our country is in a prosperous situation. I should rejoice were the country whence I came similarly circumstanced. With us, industry is paralyzed; our produce is rotting on our hands, and real estate has become nearly unsaleable. This may in part arise from the difference in the nature of our produce. The principal products of Virginia are, I believe, wheat, corn, and tobacco. The gentleman says our exports are beef and fish. These are among the principal. Cattle cannot be sold while beef cannot be exported; and must, therefore, be killed and lost, or kept on hand for better times, at an expense perhaps exceeding its value. In little more than twelve months the fish must return to the ocean in a much more worthless state than it was received from it; while the tobacco of Virginia for a time improves from age, and the grain, with care, may be kept two or three years without essential injury.

The gentleman from Virginia also says that the Constitution of the United States has mostly benefited the Eastern States; that it is immaterial to the Southern and Western States who are the carriers of their produce; the discriminating duties in favor of American shipping are nothing to them; that the Northern States hold the public debt; and, I understood him to say, that the Southern States protect them.

The Constitution, sir, was a matter of compact; the partners to which, like the parties to all other contracts of the kind, probably surrendered something of their individual advantages for the general benefit.

Have the Middle and Eastern States surrendered nothing? For what reason is it that Northern citizens, on the floor of the other branch of the National Legislature, have not an equal representation with Southern citizens? It is because it was part of the compact; it was a concession made by the Eastern States; and for what? for the protection of their commerce. How was this expectation expressed at the time of the adoption of the Constitution? Emblematical representations of commerce and navigation, ships in miniature, were drawn triumphantly through the streets of all the principal seaports in the Eastern States, as indicative of the expected protection to commerce from its adoption. Without American navigation, how would Southern produce have found a market for the last ten years?

As to the public debt, it has nothing to do with the question, unless you wish to criminate those who showed most confidence in the stability of your Government.

With regard to protection, sir; against whom do the Northern States want protection? They have no internal enemies nor enemies on their frontiers, against whom they cannot protect themselves. The assistance of the Southern States may be useful in protecting their commerce from European enemies. If this can be done, and they can have an open trade, it is all they ask.

The drawing parallels of the different degrees of suffering in the different sections of the Union is an unpleasant task; but, in my opinion, my duty requires it. I cannot believe, with the gentleman from Virginia, that any part of the United States is prospering under the present state of things. No, sir; we are all suffering too much. He does not agree with other Southern gentlemen, and among them with his colleague. I think he stated that Virginia, he believed, suffered as much as the Eastern States. This ought to be understood. For a national object our sufferings ought to be nearly equal. I will, therefore, make a short statement, to show how the State of Virginia and the State I in part have the honor to represent, (Massachusetts,) are relatively affected by our present situation. They are both great States.

By the returns from the Treasury Office, it appears that, in the year ending September 30, 1807,

Virginia exported of foreign produce to the amount of - - - - -	$367,713
Massachusetts - - - - -	13,926,377
Virginia exported of domestic produce to the amount of - - - - -	4,393,521
Massachusetts - - - - -	6,185,748

Thus, then, Massachusetts exported, of domestic produce, half as much again as Virginia, and more than thirty times as much foreign merchandise.*

But, sir, take another view of it. Large as it may be, take no account of the whole amount of the exports of Massachusetts, as above stated, about twenty millions of dollars; retain in the account all the exports of Virginia, about five million of dollars; taking it in this confined point of view, which suffers most?

The inhabitants of Massachusetts, in general, cultivate a soil which yields to their unremitting industry the necessaries of life, but affords none of the great staples of the Southern States; still they envy not their Southern brethren the possession of a happier climate, or a more fertile region. They do, however, consider the ocean, which the bounty of the God of nature has spread before them, as in some degree their property; they consider the use of it as their birth-right, as an inheritance bequeathed to them by their ancestors. Those of them who live on the seaboard look to it as the principal means of their subsistence; their vessels are, therefore, to them what his farm is to the Virginian.

Of the whole tonnage of the United States, Massachusetts possesses more than one-third. She has 450,000 tons; Virginia has 69,000 tons. Deduct these 69,000 tons, and estimate the residue at two dollars per ton a month, which is about the common rate of charter in times of active employment, and it will give upwards of nine millions of dollars for a year. Discard from this statement nearly one-half the sum on account of the embarrassments on our foreign commerce, which might remain after the embargo was raised; for the remnant of the coasting trade which is yet prosecuted; for occasional want of employment, and for other incidental deductions, and there will then be left a sum, lost to the owners of navigation in Massachusetts, not much less than the entire amount of the exports from Virginia, as stated in the returns; with this difference, that the produce of Virginia yet remains, and one-half, or one-third, or a greater proportion of its value may be now had, or may be obtained when the embargo shall be raised. Not so with the produce of navigation; that is totally lost; it does not exist nor remain on hand like cotton or tobacco.

* How far the coasting trade may vary this statement is uncertain, as there are no documents before Congress specifically showing the state of it. On the one hand, a considerable quantity of the produce of Virginia is shipped from the seaports of other States; while, on the other, Massachusetts also ships to the same ports very large amounts of India and European merchandise, as well as considerable quantities of domestic produce and manufactures. And the India and China trade from Massachusetts alone, must amount to at least two millions of dollars more than their proportion of the amount as stated in the documents, owing to the principal part of that trade being prosecuted with specie, which is not included in the returns.

I regret extremely that the situation of different parts of the Union is, to my view, so different, and that a sense of my duty to my more immediate constituents requires me to make the contrast; but, be it what it may, the independence of the country is to be preserved at all hazards; and the people of Massachusetts will, I trust, always manifest a love of order and of patriotism which will carry them through every danger which menaces them, and through every danger which menaces the Constitution.

Gentlemen opposed to the resolution say, that those who have brought it forward propose no substitute for the embargo; and the gentleman from Virginia says, that I in particular have given no intimation on this head. I have no reserve in my opinion on the subject. I am free to say, remove the embargo, suffer the merchants to arm their vessels, put the nation in a state of defence, and assert your well-established and indisputable rights, or perish in the contest.

When Mr. LLOYD had concluded—

Mr. MILLEDGE observed that as he had but this day taken his seat, and had always been in favor of granting time to others, he wished that its further consideration should be postponed till Monday next. Agreed to without opposition.

MONDAY, November 28.

Mr. THRUSTON, from the committee to whom was referred the bill to reward Andrew Joseph Villard, for an invention of public utility, reported an amendment; which was read; and ordered to lie for consideration.

On motion, by Mr. WHITE,

Ordered, That the report of the Secretary of the Treasury respecting roads and canals, made the 4th of April last, together with the memorials of the President and Directors of the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal Company, of 1st December, 1805, and 10th January, 1807, be referred to Messrs. WHITE, REED, MITCHILL, ANDERSON, and POPE, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

THE EMBARGO.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the 11th instant for repealing the "Act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several acts supplementary thereto."

Mr. S. SMITH rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: When I last had the honor to address the Senate upon the subject now under consideration, to wit, the repeal of the laws laying an embargo, I took occasion to observe, on the transit duty, or tribute laid by Great Britain, on certain articles, the produce of the United States, when exported to the countries where they are usually consumed on the Continent of Europe. It may not be improper for me to pursue that subject so far as the said tribute is imposed on all the articles usually exported from the United States to the Continent of Europe. I then spoke from memory, but find I was correct as to the amounts on the articles mentioned. I observe, however, a mistake by one of the stenographers, in the word sterling, in the article wheat, when I meant the currency of my country. By the act of Parliament, of the 28th March last, duties on exports are laid to carry into effect the Orders of Council. I shall not notice any but those charged on the products of the United States. It will be recollected that I have already stated that none of the products of the United States can be carried to the Continent of Europe without being subject to capture by British cruisers, unless they shall first be carried to, and landed in Great Britain, and there pay a transit duty, or tribute; of course, all articles the produce of the United States are subjected to that tribute on their way to the countries, so far as they consume the same. On the following articles, those duties or tribute attach, to wit:

American Produce.—Indigo, 45 cents per lb.; Pitch, 95 cents per bbl.; Tar, 95 cents per bbl.; Turpentine, 78 cents per cwt.; Rice, 45 cents per cwt.; Tobacco, per 100 lbs. $3; Cotton, 16 cents per lb.; Timber, staves, and lumber, a prohibitory duty; Ashes, $2 22 per cwt.; Corn, 15 cents per bushel; Wheat, 28 cents per bushel; Flour, $2 per bbl.; Fish, 90 cents per cwt.; Pork, $6 86 per bbl.; Beef, $3 33 per bbl.

What amount would cargoes of some of those articles pay of tribute?

A ship carrying 1,000 bags of cotton, will pay a tribute of $50,000, being about the value in South Carolina, to which add merchants' commission, and other charges of port, of $2,000.

A cargo of 400 hhds. of tobacco will pay, of 1,000 weight each, $11,100

A cargo of 3,000 bbls. of flour will pay $6,650.

A cargo of fish, as I am informed, (for I am unacquainted with the number of quintals carried by a ship of 300 tons,) will pay from $3,500 to $4,000.

Double insurance, double premium, double merchants' commission, insurance, and other charges not noticed—I leave that for the calculation of others.

It is true the King may suspend or alter any part of the act as he shall see proper, and the continuance of the act is only to the end of the next session of Parliament. It is to be hoped that England will see the error which she has committed, as well as it affects her own interest, as also the deep wound inflicted on the honor and interest of her most useful customer. But, sir, if we retract from the stand which we have taken, will she not think, from the instability of our councils, that she may proceed in her system of monopoly, until every branch of our commerce shall be extinguished? But, Mr. President, does the British nation lay similar duties of export on similar articles from her own colonies or her allies? She has heavily taxed the colonial produce carried in American ships in her ports on exportation, but her own coffee, sugar, and other colonial articles, are still exported free of duty; thus enabling her to undersell in the ports of Europe similar articles carried there, the property of Americans. But, says the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. HILLHOUSE,) this tribute is a nullity of itself, for the decrees of France caused all goods that have been landed in England to be seized and condemned on their arrival; of course, he presumes that none will go there: he is mistaken, Mr. President; if the articles shall promise a profit on the Continent, men will be found (and many will do it) that will pay the tribute in England, (and this the English Minister knows,) and who will contrive ways and means of admittance. Is this visionary? No, sir; what has been done, and is done every day, will be pursued when profits sufficient offer the temptation; what then has been done? American ships arriving in the port of London have been chartered (unknown to their owners) to proceed to Holland with a cargo of British coffee, sugar, and other goods, at an enormous freight. The American crew, except the captain, is discharged; a new crew of Englishmen taken on board, to each of whom a promise is made, beside the usual wages, of a large sum, perhaps 50 or 100 guineas, to be paid on the performance of the voyage. They are told that they must declare, if questioned, that the vessel has come direct from America, that she has not been visited by any British cruiser, and has not touched at any British port. Papers forged in England—for the English, Mr. President, are great manufacturers, and have a manufactory of all the papers and documents usually necessary for an American ship. Every paper, even to the merchant's oath, that the property is his, that no foreigner is either directly or indirectly concerned therein; the Consular certificates of origin, of the French or Spanish Consul, as the case may be, showing that the cargo on board had been imported into the United States from some French or Spanish colony; every seal of office so completely imitated, that no man can know the difference. The ship thus provided proceeds to Holland. The Dutch, Mr. President, are hostile to those decrees of France; all are willing to countenance this trade; very little inquiry is made there; the trade is winked at by all the officers of Government, and thus carried on with security. Now, Mr. President, as this trade can thus be carried on, I will ask the honorable gentleman from Connecticut, whether the temptations being great, it will not be carried on by our people, and the tribute paid, for without paying that they cannot escape the vigilance of the British cruisers; they will go into England, they will pay the tribute, and pursue their voyages; and what right shall we have to say they do wrong in so doing? What right has Government to expect individual patriotism, when opposed to individual interest, when the Government itself sacrifices the honor and independence of the nation to sordid interest? Take off the embargo, Mr. President, and will not men say, our Government has acquiesced in the tribute, laid upon commerce by Great Britain? We therefore do no wrong in paying it; we do what every prudent man will do, make our property as safe as possible, and pursue our trade; for we well know that if we do not stop and pay the tribute in England, our ship and cargo must fall a prey to British depredations. We will therefore go into England, pay the tribute, and take our chance to evade the decrees of France. Yes, Mr. President, and it will become such a trade as will in a very short time meet with security by insurances, and that at no very high premium. Again, those vessels returning with articles for the consumption of the United States must stop in England, (or subject themselves to capture,) there land their cargo, and pay tribute, before they can proceed to their own country. Is this a state to which the gentlemen wish to reduce their country? Are they willing to pay tribute to Great Britain? If they are, take off the embargo, and you encourage further aggressions, and further exactions. Sir, there will be no end to them; we had better have remained colonies than submit to such a state of degradation.

Let us take a view of some of the principal articles thus charged, that we may know in what countries they are usually consumed. Cotton, an article of such importance, that its value may be considered as amounting to nearly one-fourth of the value of all the exports of the produce of the United States. Two-thirds, some say less thereof, is required for the English manufactures, when in full work; and one-third for the Continent of Europe. Under the Orders of Council, that one-third, or twenty millions of pounds of cotton, are prohibited from proceeding to its usual place of consumption; of course that one-third must either remain on the hands of the planter, or be shipped to England, where it cannot be consumed, and thus reduce, by so large a surplus, the price of the whole.

Flour.—This article is seldom wanted in France, for France exports the article; nor in England, for home consumption, except when there is a defect in the harvest. It is principally exported to Spain, Portugal, and Italy—to those countries we are forbid to carry it, by the Orders of Council, unless we submit to pay two dollars on each barrel, which two dollars must necessarily be taken off the price in this country, and thus operate as a tax upon the farmer of two dollars per barrel.

Tobacco.—This article is consumed principally on the Continent of Europe—only about one-seventh thereof, or 14,000 hogsheads per annum, is believed to be consumed in England; the residue, or 76,000 hogsheads, per annum, usually consumed in Germany, Holland, and France, must either remain in the tobacco houses of Virginia and Maryland, or go to rot in the King's warehouses at London; or, if removed from thence, subjected to a duty of three dollars per hundred pounds. This is peculiarly hard on the State of Maryland, for of the 14,000 hogsheads exported by that State, not more than 500 or 600 hogsheads is believed to be consumed in England; the residue, say 13,500 hogsheads, can alone find a market in the ports of Holland and Germany, to which countries the English say we shall not carry it; therefore, the taking off the embargo would operate no relief to the numerous and respectable body of planters of the State which I have the honor to represent.

Fish is consumed only in France, Spain, Portugal, and Italy. To these countries we are forbidden to go with this article. It is not candid in gentlemen to state to the Senate, that the embargo compelled the owners of fish to keep that article to rot upon their hands, when it is well known that many vessels were compelled, after having made their voyage to the coast of Europe, to return home with their cargoes of fish, the English not permitting them to enter the ports of their destination. It is true a small portion of the fish caught by the people of the United States is consumed in the West India islands. Gentlemen may be deceived by looking at the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, when they see the large amount stated to be shipped to Great Britain, of the products of the United States. Almost all our business passes, in some way or other, through the hands of British merchants, either by consignments or remittances. By shipping to their address, the American merchant is permitted to draw bills of exchange for a proportion of the amount on the British merchant. The ship proceeds to Cowes or Falmouth, and there receives the order of the London merchant to proceed to the country where the best market can be obtained for their articles; and in this way the export to England is swelled to a large amount, when, in truth, the consumption is in other countries.

The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. HILLHOUSE) says that the embargo tends to demoralize our people. I fear, Mr. President, that the payment of tribute in England, and the perjury employed to evade the decrees of France, will not only demoralize and degrade them in the eyes of all Europe, but also in our own estimation.

When I was last up, I took a view of the exports still left to the people of the United States, not implicated either by the decrees of France or the orders of England. In answer, the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. WHITE) has stated that (the decrees of France and Orders of Council notwithstanding) there would still be an export free to the United States of four-fifths of the amount exported therefrom. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. LLOYD,) more cautious, has stated that there would be still important branches of commerce left open to us. The gentleman from Delaware has given us the countries to which the four-fifths of our exports could go, to wit: Sumatra, Africa, Java, China, Northwest of America, Spanish possessions and islands, Sweden and her colonies. On examining the report of the Secretary, I find that to those countries and some others, we can export as follows, viz:

SENATE.

The Embargo.

NOVEMBER, 1808.

Spanish colonies, Florida, Main, and Cuba	$2,617,348
Portuguese ditto, say Madeira, Western Isles, Cape de Verd, and Brazil	570.303
Morocco and Barbary Powers	8 358
China	84.022
Africa	369.924
South Seas	3,385
Northwest Coast	10,777
Sweden and colonies	472.666
	4,136,783

To those countries (and they are the only ones to which we could have exported under the Orders in Council) it appears that the total amount of exports is only $4,136,783. I have admitted Sweden and her colonies to please the gentleman, although I understand them to be subject to capture under the French decree. A large item is to St. Bartholomews, a Swedish island, serving only as an entrepot. But we are told that Great Britain, in her great goodness, has lately permitted us to trade with Spain and Portugal, and that the Orders of Council no longer attach to those nations. I am of a different opinion, and I derive my opinion from the document now in my hand, viz:

"The Lords of the Committee of Council for Trade and Foreign Plantations having authorized us to make public the following answers to certain questions proposed by us to their Lordships, we publish them for the information of all whom they may concern.

"THOS. BARING.

"A. GLENNIE.

"THOS. MULLETT.

"LONDON, 15th August, 1803."

"Question. His Majesty's Orders in Council of the 4th July, 1808, having ordered, that all hostilities against Spain on the part of His Majesty shall immediately cease, and that the blockade of all the ports of Spain, except such as may be still in possession, or under control of France, shall be forthwith raised—

"Can an American vessel proceed from a port in the United States of America, with a cargo, the produce of the United States, or Colonial produce, direct to any port of Spain or Portugal, not being in the possession of the enemies of Great Britain, and return back to a port in the United States direct, with a cargo the growth or produce of Spain or Portugal, without being liable to capture and condemnation, under the Orders of Council of the 11th and 12th of November, 1807, and the several acts of Parliament passed to carry them into effect?

"Answer. American vessels may proceed from a port in the United States of America, with a cargo, the produce of the United States, or Colonial produce, provided such produce be not the produce of the enemies' colonies, direct to any port of Spain or Portugal; such port not being in the possession, or under the control of the enemies of Great Britain, and return back to a port in the United States direct, with a cargo the growth or produce of Spain or Portugal."

[Here Mr. WHITE explained, and said, that a proclamation had been issued declaring the ports of Spain and Portugal, not in possession of France or her allies, open to the admission of American vessels, with the produce of their own country, or of the colonies of the two nations; but they must return direct to their own country.]

Where the gentleman has got that proclamation, said Mr. S., I know not. I never have seen it, or heard of it. I am, however, of opinion that the Orders of Council do still attach to Spain and Portugal; and that this is only a bountiful relaxation of His Britannic Majesty, which he can change at pleasure, being authorized by the act of Parliament to repeal or alter, as he may see fit. It is a well known fact, that prior to the Orders of Council, we could trade with the Colonial produce of those countries. These regulations of the Lords Commissioners of Trade and Plantations, do not permit such commerce; of course the Orders of Council attach, and should Bonaparte get possession of any port of Spain, and an American vessel be bound to such port, she would, under the Orders of Council, be seized and carried into England—in which case I do not believe the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts would insure for ninety per cent., against condemnation in the courts of Great Britain.

Pursuing the idea of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GILES,) that the regulation of the Board of Trade and Plantations, if submitted to, will reduce us to a state of colonization—I beg leave to observe, that this same Board of Trade regulated our commerce when we were colonies. We were then permitted to go direct to the ports of Spain and Portugal with our flour, Indian corn and lumber, and might return direct to America with salt; but, if we wished to bring wines or fruits, we were compelled to proceed to England, land them, and then proceed to this country. What are the regulations now made for us by the Lords of Trade? Why, sir, we are permitted to proceed to Spain and Portugal, with the produce of our country, but we must return therefrom direct to the United States. If we turn to the right or left hand, we come under the Orders of Council, and are good prize. We are forbid to carry any of the produce of those countries to their colonies, although they permit the trade. And why, Mr. President? Because the British thereby secure that advantage to their own ships. Again, sir, when colonies, Great Britain compelled us to carry our tobacco, indigo, and rice, to England, and there land the same, but permitted us to re-ship those articles, free of any duty, to the countries where they were consumed. Even in time of war, tobacco was re-shipped to France. Now, Great Britain, although we are independent of her power, (perhaps not of her influence,) orders all the produce of our country to be landed in England, and prohibits the re-shipment, until we pay an enormous duty; when, at the same time, the produce of her colonies may be re-shipped, even to her enemies, free of duty. Where is the difference, in principle, between the regulations made for us when colonies, and those made for us at this time? Does not Great Britain still assume the same rights over us, to wit, to regulate our trade in the one instance as well as in the other? We are, in either case, completely in the situation of colonies. It cannot be misunderstood. The Lords of Trade emphatically say, what trade we shall, and what trade we shall not pursue. Nay, in England, I have little doubt, that many people will consider it as excessive impudence in us to complain, when put upon a footing with their own colonies. They forgot that we are independent—I trust, Mr. President, that we shall not also forget it. But let us indulge the gentleman, and add our exports to Spain and Portugal—to what amount are they? To Spain, Teneriffe, and the Floridas, we export annually $1,381,327; to Portugal; $829,313, making, together with the $4,136,783, already stated, the sum of $6,347,323, being, as stated in a luminous report of a committee of the House of Representatives, less than $7,000,000, free of danger from the decrees of France and the orders of Great Britain. So that the gentleman's four-fifths appear, by public documents, (which cannot be controverted,) to be reduced to an amount little more than one-eighth of the native exports of the Union; the total amount being $48,699,592. Shall we, for this pittance, relinquish our independent rights as a nation?

SENATE.

The trade to China gives an export of only $64,000 per annum. It employs an exportation of dollars to near $4,000,000. Nankeens is the object in return of principal value, an export whereof to Europe we are now cut off from. If this trade should be pursued, under this oppression, I will venture, without the spirit of prophecy, to believe that every dollar in the United States will be shipped therefrom. The law prohibiting the importation of slaves has completely destroyed the trade to Africa, so that the item to that country can no longer be counted.

We are told that the sufferings of the commercial States are insupportable, and, from the discussion in the Senate, it would appear as generally admitted that the four New England States are the only commercial—comparisons are generally disagreeable—they appear however necessary upon the present occasion, to show the relative state of commerce among the States. I am warranted also, by the example set me by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. LLOYD,) in making the comparison which I intend to present to this House. In doing it, I pray I may be understood, as not meaning any offence to any State, nor to any individual thereof. New Hampshire cannot be considered a commercial State; judging from the Treasury Report, the products of its labor and agriculture go, I presume to swell the amount of exports from Massachusetts, for their export of native products is only $365,950. Rhode Island may be considered commercial in proportion to her numbers. I have ever admired the industry and enterprise of her citizens, and have been gratified in the extension of her commerce; but their commerce does not exceed the proportion which is due to their numbers—the amount of export of their products is $741,988. But Connecticut, Mr. President, is she commercial? Every American traveller that visits the Eastern States, returns highly gratified with that State; he states with exultation and pleasure, the delightful fields thereof; its high state of agriculture; its smiling villages; and the content and happiness that beams on every human countenance; but does this arise from its external commerce? No, sir, we must give to Connecticut a higher rank; she is agricultural, and will also be a great manufacturing State; her citizens who annually emigrate, to swell the numbers of other States, will be induced to remain at home, and, by their labor and ingenuity, extend and promote the manufactures of their native State. Her port of export is probably New York; with what State, as a commercial State, shall I compare her? not with Georgia, for that State, though with only half her population, exports more than double the amount of Connecticut. With South Carolina? No, sir, that State spares of her products, to swell the exports of Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, an amount equal to the whole of the exports of the native products of Connecticut. With Maryland? No, sir, with a population very little greater, Maryland exports to near three times her amount. With what part of the Union shall I then compare her commerce? It assimilates nearly to that of the District of Columbia, its export being $1,363,352, when that of Connecticut is $1,519,083.

Massachusetts—yes, sir, Massachusetts—is really commercial, but not more so in proportion to numbers than many other States; nay, not equal to some. For instance, South Carolina with half her number exports $7,129,365, when Massachusetts exports of native products only $6,185,748. New York, whose population is the same with Massachusetts, exports $9,957,416—being half as much more as that exported by Massachusetts. Maryland exports $4,016,699—being in full proportion to the exports of that State. Nay, sir, New York alone exports more than all the New England States together, their whole native exports being only $8,812,769. But we may be told (what is true) that the trade of a country does not consist alone in its native exports. We may get some information by examining as well its native as its foreign articles of exportation. Let us examine it in that point of view. It will be found that New York alone, who appears to approve of the embargo, if we are to credit their Governor's Speech, and the answer thereto of both branches of the Legislature, does export of all articles, foreign as well as domestic, to a greater amount than all the New England States together; for her exports are $26,357,963, when the total exports of those States amount only to $24,074,438. Nay, sir, Maryland exports an amount equal to three-fifths of the whole of the New England States, her general export being $14,298,984. I have deemed it not unprofitable to take this view of the subject, to show the commerce of the United States, as they compare with each other.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. LLOYD) has told us, and told us truly, that the tonnage owned by the citizens of that State is one-third of the whole tonnage of the Union; that the want of employment thereof causes an annual injury to the amount of six millions of dollars. My calculation, Mr. President, does not make it near so much. But, sir, suppose the fact, is this attributable to the embargo? I think not, sir. On the contrary, that the owners of these ships ought to bless the wisdom and firmness of those who laid the embargo, and thus saved this immense tonnage from British depredation and condemnation under their Orders of Council, and from French burning and destruction under the infernal decree of Milan. For it has been truly said, by an eminent merchant of Salem, (Mr. Gray,) that not more than one vessel in eight, that sailed for Europe within a short time prior to the embargo, ever reached her port of destination. My own experience, however, has taught me the truth of this remark; and, as a further proof, I have in my hand a list of fifteen vessels which sailed for Europe, and were insured in an office in Baltimore. They sailed between the 1st September and 23d December, 1807. Three arrived, one was captured by the French, one by the Spaniards, one was seized in Hamburg, and nine carried into England. But for the embargo, the ships of the United States that would have sailed for Europe would have shared a fate at least as bad—in my opinion much worse—as that of those fifteen. Not one in twenty would have arrived; for those vessels that sailed in September might well have arrived before the date of the Orders in Council (the 11th November) or the decrees of France. I say, again, let the ship-owners return thanks to their best friends—to those who laid the embargo. As one whose property has thereby been saved, I pray you to accept mine. But, sir, let us compare, in order to know the sufferings of each, whether the other States do not suffer, as to their tonnage, in proportion to the New England States. I take leave to submit the tonnage of the Eastern and a few of the other States.

STATES.	Tonnage.
	Registered.	Licensed.
New Hampshire - - -	20,606	3,493
Massachusetts - - -	304,357	134,603
Rhode Island - - -	28,715	6,523
Connecticut - - -	26,022	20,000
Totals - - -	379,700	164,619
New York - - -	131,047
Pennsylvania - - -	86,723
Maryland - - -	71,648
South Carolina - - -	48,156
Total - - -	337,574

By this, it will appear that the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and South Carolina, own, of ships engaged in foreign trade, nearly the same number of tons as the four New England States. Thus, then, the loss to those States, in point of tonnage, is nearly equal to that of the other four; and, in addition, they suffer the loss sustained by having on hand a greater amount of native products. In fact, the State of Massachusetts suffers less, because she has an immense tonnage employed in the coasting trade, which renders its usual profits and usual employment for her sailors, when those other States have not the same advantage. This advantage applies more particularly to Connecticut than to any other State in the Union; for, of her 46,000 tons of vessels, 20,000 are actually employed in the coasting trade. So that, as to the use of ships, she suffers less than any other in the Union. Her trade by land and water to the other States still continues in full vigor, and renders to her advantages not known to any other State.

We are told that the embargo is a measure injurious only to ourselves; that our fish, beef, pork, flour, tobacco, and cotton, remain to perish on our hands. I have already stated that the fish finds its greatest consumption only in Spain, Portugal, Italy and France, from which countries we are excluded by the Orders of Council; of course the embargo cannot be chargeable with its loss, nor with that of tobacco, when not more than one-seventh thereof as already stated can go to the places of consumption without being subject to British capture. The gentlemen from the States which produce cotton, do not appear to be alarmed at the danger presented to their view, arising from that article being produced in Guiana and Africa. For they well know that it will require population and men well acquainted with the culture of that article to enable those countries to enter into competition with them. They know that cotton cannot be produced in the quantities required by the British manufacturers in any reasonable time, so that they feel confident that a sufficient supply cannot be obtained from any other country than their own. But no man can, no man will believe that any supply from any other country can be brought forward to prevent a stoppage taking place of the looms of Manchester.

We are told, that when the British islands are accustomed to receive their supplies of live cattle from the Main, that Connecticut will lose that valuable branch of their commerce. Yes, Mr. President, if Bonaparte should conquer Spain, her colonies will forever be lost to the mother country—they will become independent—they will be open to the trade of the world; and if cattle can (as the gentleman has truly told us) be procured at their own door by the British planters for two or three dollars per head, it will very soon become unfashionable to go to Connecticut, and there to pay thirty to sixty dollars. But will this be chargeable on the embargo? Certainly not. The gentleman has also attempted to alarm us, lest the Spanish colonies should supply the islands with breadstuffs. No impossibilities stand in his way. The sugar planter will turn his sugar land into corn grounds, and no longer take his supply from the United States. Yes, sir, this will be done, when the gentleman, (Mr. H.) can prove that men will prostrate their own interest. The idea is an idle one, and does not merit an answer.

We are told that the embargo, as a coercive measure, has had, and can have no operation, either on England or on France. I differ with the gentlemen.

France, Mr. President, will feel its operation on the loss of their islands of Martinique and Guadaloupe, (which must fall a prey to the British fleet and army, now about to attack them,) for want of those supplies of provisions they usually derived from the United States—by the famine and distress that will ensue in the Isles of France and Bourbon. Those valuable possessions were formerly supplied from the Cape of Good Hope; but for years have relied entirely upon the United States, and will therefore be in the greatest possible distress, when cut off therefrom. They cannot now obtain supplies from the Cape of Good Hope—for that colony is in possession of the British. France will feel its effect, and the consequent loss of our trade at home. She loses an immense revenue, heretofore collected by the duties on the sugar, coffee, pepper, tobacco, and other articles imported into her ports by our ships. Her people can live without the articles; but the want of the revenue will be severely felt by her Government. New sources must be resorted to, which her subjects will be distressed to meet, being completely deprived of any sale for their brandy, wine, and other valuable articles drawn from France by Americans, and distributed by them to every quarter of the world. France will be made to feel by a want of money. Holland can no longer, in so great a degree as formerly, supply that want. Cut off from commerce, what is Holland? If the Emperor's system is pursued, the grass will be seen growing in the streets of Amsterdam. The German Kingdoms, subject to his power, will be so reduced by the want of sale for their linens, and the want of commerce in the Hanse Towns, that they will be able to render him no aid in money. From the extremes of his power, it will press upon him even to the centre of Paris, and will knock with violence at the doors of his palace.

England, it is true, with her great navy and all-powerful fleets, might preserve herself from feeling the effects of the want of bread, provided that the ports of the Baltic were open to her; but shut out as she is, from every country which has usually exported wheat, where will she find the quantity necessary to enable her to afford supplies to Spain and Portugal, now struggling for their liberties; for their West India islands, and for their immense fleets and armies now employed in foreign countries? From the coast of Barbary we are told! Yes, sir, Barbary, under a good government, could supply all the wants of Europe. But, sir, that Government, immediately it finds that the farmer has gotten his land into a high state of cultivation, the hand of power is laid upon his property, and the man, with his family, flies to the mountains. Nor is this all, the Dey lays such a duty on the export, as leaves but a small pittance, say 20*d.* sterling per bushel, to the cultivator. From thence no important supply can be derived, and this is well known in England. But is the want of breadstuff the only suffering that Great Britain must endure? No, sir; she will feel our embargo in the immense loss of revenue, resulting from the importation of our tobacco, cotton, rice, and other valuable products. Her cities will feel the loss of the non-arrival of our ships, which afforded to them a large revenue for the town dues, employment for the various mechanics and manufacturers employed about ships, the want of commissions derived to their merchants, and from other causes not necessary to enumerate. Liverpool, which owes its rapid rise, in a great proportion, to the American commerce, will feel the loss thereof in a manner that may make them be heard in the Councils of the Kingdom. Is it possible that that nation will not deplore the loss of their exports to us, amounting to twelve millions of pounds sterling per annum? Will gentlemen believe they have no value therefor, when they know that they sent large fleets and armies to La Plata, not to conquer the country, but to force a trade—to compel the Spaniards to receive their manufactures? And what trade? Not more than one million, or, at the most, two millions sterling per annum. What ridiculous policy must that be that can induce a nation to go to an immense expense of blood and treasure to secure two millions of trade, and at the same time wantonly throw away a trade of twelve millions, arising to them without expense of either blood or treasure? Will they long shut their eyes to such a scene of folly and wickedness? No, sir, a non-intercourse will open the eyes of the nation to such ridiculous conduct on the part of their rulers. Is this all, Mr. President? The sugar planters of their West India islands (and they most deserve it) will be made severely to feel; they will not starve, perhaps, but they will have to pay three or four times the price for every article of provision which they, or their slaves consume, and ten times the price for staves and other lumber. Heretofore, they have paid for such supplies in what I call the offal of their plantations, in rum and molasses. Those articles must remain on their hands unconsumed, for none but Englishmen and their descendants make use thereof. We import from the British islands 350,000 gallons of molasses, per annum, value on the spot $87,500; of rum, 5,590,000 gallons, value about $2,412,500. Will gentlemen believe that the want of sales, (and the consequent loss of their value) to the annual amount of two and a half millions of dollars, will not be felt by the British planters? Yes, sir, it has already been felt, if I am rightly informed, to wit: that the Government has been obliged to grant large aid in money to support the West India planters. But I shall fatigue the Senate with details of this kind. My duty, however, has compelled me to present my ideas on this part of the subject to the Senate.

The gentleman from Delaware (Mr. WHITE) feels all alive for the present rulers of the United States; he asks, where are we to get revenue, and with an air of triumph, tells us that we shall not have a dollar in the Treasury at the next meeting of Congress. We were told the same story last year, and thousands of handbills had been distributed throughout the Union asserting that fact. Yet, sir, when we met we found fourteen millions of dollars in the Treasury. We found our receipts more than in any preceding year. The gentleman is alarmed lest the present party in power shall be prostrated, as he thinks that was to which he belonged, by the necessity of laying a direct tax. He is mistaken; they were dismissed, because that the tax after tax, duty on duty, that was laid by them, were dissipated, the people knew not how, and because the people thought their system would lead the nation imperceptibly to monarchy.

SENATE.

The Embargo.

NOVEMBER, 1808.

I feel greatly obliged to the gentleman for the tender feelings which he has expressed on the subject, but I am not alarmed. The present Administration have pursued a course unknown to the last, to wit: the payment of the public debt, averaging for some years past, five millions of dollars per annum. From this payment we are now relieved, because the law permits us no longer to make payment thereof, except by purchase of the stockholders; we cannot compel them to receive. Besides, sir, having paid off thirty-three millions of dollars of the public debt, we have relieved ourselves thereby from the payment of an annual interest of two millions of dollars. Those two items, making together seven millions of dollars, will operate in effect for any purposes now required as so much received. But, sir, we have other resources. It will be recollected, that the law of last session authorized the articles of sugar, coffee, teas, pepper, and certain wines, to be deposited in the public stores until wanted for exportation. Those articles will now be required for consumption, and presuming that as much thereof will be consumed as in former years, we may fairly count on the following duties being collected thereon, to wit:

On sugar - - - - -	$1,843,199
Coffee - - - - -	867,259
Teas - - - - -	966,686
Pepper - - - - -	250,000
Wines, under 23 cents duty - - - - -	41,377
On the public lands - - - - -	700,000
Making together - - - - -	$4,668,521

Nor is this all; it is a well known fact, which will not be contradicted by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. LLOYD,) that the importations from India and China have, in the present year, been equal to that of any preceding year. The bonds (for the duties on which) will become due in the next year; nor has the importation of dry goods from England during the present year been so much less than former years as materially to affect the revenues. On the whole, Mr. President, I believe that the receipts for the year 1809 may with safety be calculated upon, as at least twelve millions dollars, from which nothing being payable toward the principal of the public debt, we may count the actual supply to the Treasury as equal to any preceding year.

Let us take a view of the customary expenditures of the Government for the year 1809.

Civil expenditure - - - - -	1,000,000
Barbary Powers and Foreign inter- course - - - - -	200,000
Military Department - - - - -	1,280,000
Naval ditto - - - - -	1,020,000
Interest on Louisiana debt - - - - -	675,000
Interest on old debt and reimburse- ment - - - - -	3,500,000
New regiments - - - - -	1,000,000

If the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. WHITE) will not admit any other of my calculations, he will certainly admit that if we have fourteen millions now in the Treasury, and expend only $8,675,000, that we certainly shall have some money in the Treasury at the next meeting of Congress, even should the embargo continue all that time; and in case of war, if the people do consume as much as usual, ways and means will be found to introduce the articles on which the duties have heretofore been collected. It must be admitted, however, that our revenue does sustain, and has sustained, a material injury resulting from the Orders of Council of Great Britain. On articles heretofore imported from the Continent of Europe, we derived a revenue equal to three millions of dollars, the importation of those articles is now prohibited by Great Britain. That gentleman may correct me if I am wrong. I will take a view of the articles annually consumed, to wit:

French brandies, 2,739,711 gallons, duty thereon - - - - -	$821,913
Ditto wines - - - - -	31,133
Goods ad valorem, from France and her allies - - - - -	1,000,000
Hemp, iron, glass, cordage, and other articles - - - - -	250,000
Three and a half per cent. retained on drawback, and advantages from neu- tral trade - - - - -	1,000,000

This item is a serious sum cut off from our revenue, by the orders of Great Britain. On the whole, Mr. President, I am, however, of opinion that we safely can calculate on a surplus, after paying the usual expenses of Government, of a sum not less than sixteen millions being in the Treasury, at the next meeting of Congress, or at the disposal of Government provided war shall ensue. But do gentlemen calculate nothing upon the credit of the United States. It is now known to the world, that whatever party may be in power, the faith of the Government, as it relates to the payment of its debts, has been held sacred. It will be recollected, that it was charged against the present ruling party, that when they got into power, all respect for public credit would be lost, and the property in our public funds would be in jeopardy. These, with other charges of a similar nature, having been found to be false, and that the present rulers are as tenacious of public credit, as their predecessors, all fears on that account, have ceased. The public credit will be admitted to be good, and there can be no doubt that any sum of money that may be required for a war, may be had by loan; either in our own country or abroad, without having recourse to a direct tax. So that I pray the honorable gentleman from Delaware to quiet his tender feelings on this subject.

The Seamen.—We at length find the gentlemen are alive to the interest of this useful class of citizens. It may be considered a novelty to them. They tell us that our seamen have abandoned their country and gone into foreign employ. Will the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. HILLHOUSE) say in his place, that the sailors of Connecticut have deserted their country to take refuge on board British ships of war? No, sir, he knows the abhorrence of his fellow-citizens to that kind of service. The seamen of this Union have fathers, uncles, brothers, friends, with whom they find employment. They will be found in the public works of the extensive manufactories which have been established, and among the farmers of the United States. I will not believe that any American sailors have left their country, except some worthless, drunken men. I well know whence this idea has arisen. To avoid the complaints of Great Britain, the navy, prior to the embargo, had discharged all British deserters; they also discharged all British seamen found on board their ships of war—those, together with foreign seamen employed in the merchant service, have been collected by the British Consuls, (who have found that their numbers did not equal their expectations,) and by them have been sent out of the country. That they may never return must be the sincere wish of every lover of his country! We should thereby silence the complaint of Great Britain, to wit: that we employ their subjects, and take from that Government the pretext of impressing American seamen under the presumption that they are their own. The vacancy made by their thus abandoning our country will very soon be filled up by our own citizens—of whom sufficient for all the purposes of navigation will soon be found.

Gentlemen whose feelings are now so tender with respect to American seamen showed little of this when their fellow-citizens were seized, put on board British ships of war, and compelled to fight their battles against nations with whom theirs was at peace. Nay, sir, we find some of them offering apologies in behalf of the British Government for this violence offered to the liberties of our fellow-citizens and to our independence as a nation. I have in my hand a public letter, and, therefore, I may use it, where the writer, a Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. PICKERING,) says "I will close this long letter by stating all the existing pretences, for there are no causes for a war with Great Britain," &c. &c.

"1. The British ships of war, agreeably to a 'right claimed and exercised for ages—a right claimed and exercised during the whole of the Administrations of Washington, of Adams, and of Jefferson—continue to take some of the British seamen found on board our merchant vessels, and with them a small number of ours, from the impossibility of always distinguishing Englishmen from citizens of the United States. On this point, our Government well know that Great Britain is perfectly willing to adopt any arrangement that can be devised, which will secure to her service the seamen who are her own subjects, and at the same time exempt ours from impressment."

Gracious God Mr. President! can that man feel for American seamen, who can say and write, deliberately, that the impressment of five thousand Americans by Great Britain is no real cause, but a pretext only? Will any man believe that a person making use of such expressions can have any feelings whatever for the sufferings of our seamen? I wish Mr. President, we had before us the able discussion held by the same gentleman, (Mr. PICKERING,) on the subject of impressment of American seamen, with Mr. Liston. In that we should see our rights maintained by a strength of argument drawn from our just complaints. He did not then call our remonstrances on that subject pretences. No, sir, he thought as every American will think, that they were grievous, intolerable, and such as no free and high-spirited people ought to submit to. In what estimation are we to hold the future opinions of a gentleman, who, in 1806, did by a solemn vote in Senate approve the following resolution in Senate, which advised the President to send a special mission, "to demand a reparation of wrongs, and particularly as it related to the impressment of American seamen," when we see a public letter in 1808, from the same gentleman, calling the complaints on that subject—pretences, and not just causes!

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to demand the restoration of the property of their citizens, captured and condemned on the pretext of its being employed in a trade with the enemies of Great Britain, prohibited in time of peace; and the indemnification of such American citizens, for their losses and damages sustained by those captures and condemnations; and to enter into such arrangements with the British Government, on this and all other differences subsisting between the two nations, (and particularly respecting the impressment of American seamen,) as may be consistent with the honor and interests of the United States, and manifest their earnest desire to obtain for themselves and their citizens, by amicable negotiation, that justice to which they are entitled."

Let us cast our eyes back to the session of 1805-6, and we shall recollect the memorials presented from the merchants of all the great seaports, praying Congress to adopt measures for the obtaining redress of the wrongs sustained by them from depredations committed on their property by the British, under the pretext "that they were carrying on a trade not permitted in times of peace," although it was acknowledged, that our commerce was carried on conformably to a convention solemnly made between Lord Hawkesbury and Mr. King. The memorial from Boston advised a special mission; that from New Haven, Connecticut, pledged their lives and fortunes in support of such measures as Government might adopt to obtain redress and reparation for past losses. The Senate, alive to those remonstrances, advised the President to demand reparation for the past, and security for the future. The President, in obedience to this advice and in respect to the memorialists, did send a special mission; a treaty was made. It was sent back by the President. Why? It redressed not our wrongs. It requested us to tax our exports, so as to put them on a footing with the British, as to their war charges in similar articles. It made no provision for that grievance to which the Senate had particularly directed the attention of the President, to wit, the impressment of our seamen, and before it was possible that the President could receive it, the British issued a new order for plunder, to wit, to seize all our vessels, without any previous notice, found trading from one port of their enemies to every other port of her or her allies, by which order fifty or sixty American vessels were seized, together with cargoes to the amount of near two millions—this was followed up by other orders, until our commerce is entirely cut off from all its usual course, as well by British as by French decrees. Government took a stand, I think an honorable stand, and now we find those same memorialists, indeed I may say the gentlemen in Senate who advocated the advice to the President, telling us, that truly they had no cause of complaint, that a pittance of trade may yet be pursued, (the orders or decrees to the contrary notwithstanding;) and to pursue this miserable pittance they demand that Government should tread back their steps, shall make this nation contemptible in the eyes of all Europe, shall repeal the embargo laws before they have taken any other step, or adopted any other measure. The honor of our country forbids it, and that Senate which gave the advice, will not meanly retract their own act, or bend the neck to any Power on earth. We know our power, and fear not that of our enemies.

In 1806, the Senate passed the resolution already quoted. In addition to the wrongs then complained of, wrong upon wrong had been heaped upon us, prior to the date of the public letter already mentioned. Who could have believed that the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. PICKERING,) at such a moment, after having recorded his vote on our Journal, against the claim set up by Great Britain, would have written and published the following justification in support thereof:

"The merchant vessels of France, Spain, and Holland, being driven from the ocean, or destroyed, the commerce of those countries with one another, and with their colonies, could no longer be carried on by themselves. Here the vessels of neutral nations came into their aid, and carried on nearly the whole commerce of those nations. With their seamen thus liberated from the merchant service, those nations, in the present and preceding wars, were enabled to man their ships of war; and the neutral vessels and seamen supplied their places, became in fact, though not in name, auxiliaries in war. The commerce of those nations, without one armed ship on the sea appropriated for its protection, was intended thus to be secured under neutral flags; while the merchant vessels of Great Britain, with its numerous armed ships to guard them, were exposed to occasional capture. Such a course of things Great Britain has resisted, not in the present only, but in former wars: at least as far back as that of 1756. And she has claimed and maintained a right to impose on this commerce some limits and restraints; because it was a commerce which was denied by those nations to neutrals in time of peace; because it was a commerce of immense value to the subjects of her enemies; and because it filled the treasuries with money to enable them to carry on their wars with Great Britain.

What did the people of Salem, of Boston and of New Haven mean, when they pledged their lives and fortunes in support of any measures that Government might take to obtain redress of the wrongs that this nation had endured? They meant that there was cause, and that they were prepared to go to war. And yet the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. PICKERING,) has written gravely, when other oppressions were added to those then complained of, that truly, "there were pretences, but no real causes of complaint against Great Britain."

Hostility to commerce—Yes, sir, I have seen a charge of that kind against the party in power, in newspapers, and in town-meeting speeches. I believed it to be used for party purposes. I did not believe that any man of respectable standing, would have asserted such a fact. The honorable gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. HILLHOUSE) has now declared that he verily believes that there is a serious intention to break down commerce, and to raise manufactures upon its ruins. And what are his proofs? That he did at the last session prophecy, that such would be the course of conduct. In ancient days, Mr. President, there were prophets—there were false prophets, who went through the land prophesying falsely to deceive the people. And I trust, Mr. President, the prophecy of the honorable gentleman may be ranked with them. I challenge the gentleman to produce one act—one solitary act—to prove his assertion. He cannot produce one. He may report conversations with individual gentlemen, who might suppose that commerce had been too much favored; and such opinions are entertained, not only by gentlemen from the South, but also by gentlemen from the interior of the North and the East. Yet, sir, I have never seen any of those gentlemen predicate any act hostile to commerce thereon. It may not be unprofitable to take a view of the acts which I have considered as expressive of sincere friendship toward commerce. The statute books are filled with laws establishing light-houses along the whole extent of our coasts, and a chain of lights are now to be seen extending from St. Croix to St. Mary's. No new duty charged therefor, has ever been proposed by any member to be imposed on the tonnage of the United States. The duty on tonnage has re-remained the same from the first law passed thereon. It is small and not felt. The coasting trade of the United States is countenanced in a peculiar manner. It is confined to our own vessels and free of charge. Early after the adoption of our Constitution, Congress passed a law, levying a heavy duty on foreign tonnage, for the promotion of our own; and charging, on all goods imported in foreign vessels, a duty of ten per cent. on the duty imposed on similar goods when imported in American ships. This system secured the carriage of all goods imported into the United States, to our own vessels, and tended greatly to the immense tonnage now possessed by the merchants of the Union. This advantage was necessary to promote our navigation, when in its infancy, but, being now in its manhood, I should have no objection to admit foreign ships on the same footing with our own, to such foreign nations as would admit us on terms of reciprocity into their ports; for, on equal terms, I have no fear of the enterprise of any nation being superior to our own. A system was adopted, and has been continued, highly just in itself and proper, which conducted to the immense neutral trade carried on by the merchants of the United States. I mean the system of granting drawbacks on re-exportation of foreign goods—by which system the nation has been greatly enriched, and thereby aided in the payment of the national debt; but which agricultural men may permit themselves innocently to believe, has contributed to conduct the United States to the present crisis. We, the merchants, ought, therefore, to be cautious how we charge agricultural men with hostility to commerce. Had Congress been justly chargeable therewith, they had a fair opportunity of showing it in 1806, when your tables groaned with memorials from the seaport towns. They might then have said, What have the agriculturalists to do with your neutral commerce? We will protect the commerce carried on in native exports, but will not entangle the nation with those of foreign origin. Did they do so? No, sir; they, as well from the South as from the North, did declare their willingness to support and protect all the fair commerce of the Union. They treated the memorials with respect, and this House acted thereon.

Of thirty Senators present, only seven members voted against the resolution of advice to the President. Three of those were from the East, two from the South, and two from the West. Those gentlemen feared that we should be implicated in war for that trade which the supporters thereof now wish us in a great measure to relinquish. For were the embargo off, it could no longer be pursued to any port of Europe.

But, say gentlemen, protecting duties have been laid on foreign goods to benefit the manufactures of the Union. I sincerely wish there had been, but know of none, except on shoes and on ship-building; this latter I presume commercial men will not complain of. The duties therefore laid were to obtain revenue, not to protect manufactures. Nor did I ever until now hear any gentleman from Connecticut complain or oppose any aid contemplated for our manufactures. The complaint is novel to me, for I should suppose if any State in the Union is in a situation to benefit by manufactures, Connecticut, from her population being full, will be that State. Some small duties have been laid to protect our agriculture, such as on hemp, indigo, and sugars, and a protecting duty laid on fish imported from foreign countries, to secure the consumption of our own country to the labor of its own fishermen, to which little opposition was made by agricultural men. In truth, Mr. President, there has been no act of hostility shown by Congress to the commercial interest, and much, very much of real friendship has been apparent in all the acts of that body.

I have in my hand, Mr. President, a report of a committee made to Parliament in June last. The object of which was to point out what aid could be afforded to their sugar planters of the West Indies. In this report it is recommended "vigorously to blockade the colonies of their enemies," to prevent any sugar, coffee, or other colonial produce being brought to the United States from thence, to compel us to go to their islands for the supply of all our wants of sugar, coffee, rum, and molasses, and be subject there to whatever high price they may charge thereon, and to whatever duty on the exportation thereof they may think proper to impose. This system, which will be to us a system of taxation, has already commenced, as may be seen by the blockade lately declared of all the French islands. It will be continued, sir, and, if the embargo were off, we should find ourselves completely excluded from the benefits which gentlemen have promised themselves by a trade thereto. Retract our present measures, Mr. President, and we submit to every species of taxation and oppression on our commerce that Great Britain or France may think proper to impose thereon. They will think you a degraded people, fit only to be hewers of wood and drawers of water for them. Nor is this visionary; six years ago the British Parliament taxed you in company with their own colonies, (for they still consider you as colonies,) with a duty on all goods exported from Great Britain, of four per cent., when to all other nations they charge but one-and-a-half per cent. Thus imposing on the United States an annual tribute of one million of dollars. We submitted to that imposition, and this has encouraged them to proceed with other and heavier oppressions.

The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. HILLHOUSE) has observed, that, were the embargo off, merchants would buy the produce of the land, the farmer would be relieved, and the loss arising from capture by the belligerents would fall upon the merchants. Why should we take care of them, said he, let the merchants take care of themselves. Is this the language used when the memorials were presented? Did we then tell the merchants to protect themselves? And is this the tender friendship the gentleman from Connecticut means to show to the commerce of the Union? Had such language come from a Southern gentleman, the honorable gentleman from Connecticut would have good right to call it hostility to commerce. The same gentleman has told us, that, although France had interdicted our commerce with England, before the passing of the embargo law, yet insurance did not rise five per cent. on that account. The gentleman is correct—it did not rise at all, for no merchant apprehended any danger from French capture under the Berlin Decree; for the explanation given to General Armstrong by the French Minister of Marine gave full security against every capture on the high seas by the cruisers of France; for not one vessel was taken under that decree on the high seas; of course insurance never rose on that account in America, nor in England, as appears by the examination of merchants before Parliament, except for a short time. The moment the explanation given to General Armstrong came to London the insurance fell to its usual rates, and this will account why insurance did not rise in America prior to the passage of the embargo law. But, sir, it would be very different were the trade open and our vessels subject to capture under the Milan Decree. Privateers of France, knowing that our trade was unprotected, would swarm upon the ocean, and capture all that would be left from the depredations of Great Britain.

Should the resolution to repeal the embargo prevail, I have very little hesitation in saying, that the premium of insurance on vessels bound to England would, in a short time, rise to twenty or twenty-five per cent. against capture by French cruisers; and that no premium would induce the offices to underwrite vessels bound to the Continent of Europe against British cruisers.

We are told by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. LLOYD,) that one of the belligerents makes war upon the world for universal dominion, and the other for her natale solum. For my part, Mr. President, I cannot conceive why the United States should take part with either. Our policy has been "entanglements with no foreign nation." I hope, sir, we shall never turn Don Quixotes in support of one nation whose object is universal dominion on the land, nor in favor of the other, whose object (more injurious to us) is tyranny and universal dominion on the seas. The same gentleman has told us of immense fortunes being made in Canada, by the advantages deriving to the merchants there, from our embargo. I believe there have been evasions in the articles of pot and pearl ashes, which went to Canada, but I cannot think it could amount to the quantity insinuated. The principal trade to that colony has been the export of specie, where bills of exchange on London have been purchased at five per cent. below par, and sold at Boston and New York at seven and a half per cent. above par. The profits resulting therefrom has been to the merchants of those cities. The injury to the nation has been the export of its specie. Measures, no doubt, will be taken to prevent such injury.

The gentleman has said that, if the embargo were off and we were brought into a war by her conduct, that Great Britain would sorely repent it, for that the loss of Canada and perhaps of Nova Scotia would be the consequence. The same gentleman has told us that Great Britain will be able to obtain timber and lumber of all kinds sufficient for her wants from Norway and Sweden. He is mistaken; for Norway belongs to the Dane, from whose King the British plundered at Copenhagen sufficient for their navy for some time, and Sweden cannot supply Great Britain with staves and other articles of lumber. I agree with the gentleman that our ships are our farms; that our Government is as much bound to protect them as they are to protect terra firma; and, sir, it was for their protection, and not for the protection of the land, that the embargo was laid, and that purpose has most effectually been obtained.

Great Britain will also feel severely the want of our commerce to her East India possessions; nay, sir, it has already been felt there—our imports from thence amount to about four millions annually, for which we make payment in Spanish dollars; the goods we purchase are inferior to those made for the India Company. The want of such vent for so large a quantity of goods will be felt; it has been, for the prices thereof fell twenty-five to thirty-three and a third per cent. in Calcutta, the instant they were informed of the embargo. And, sir, the Government of India will feel it as well, arising from the complaints of those who manufacture, as in the want of the annual supply of four million dollars. Indeed, sir, I am informed by a respectable gentleman just arrived from Calcutta, that the Government of India, and English subjects residing there, were greatly distressed when they were informed that an embargo had been laid in the United States—they consider it as a measure peculiarly injurious to that Government.

It may not be improper, before I conclude, to take a view of the dangers which would result to our commerce in case the resolution should obtain. All American vessels bound to Great Britain or any of her possessions in the East or West Indies, or in Europe, would be subject to capture by French cruisers under the decrees of France.

All American vessels bound to Russia, Denmark, Hamburg, Bremen, Holland, France, Italy, the Turkish dominions, Austria, or any part of Spain or Portugal, in possession of French troops, would be subject to capture by British cruisers under their Orders of Council, enforced by an act of Parliament. In this state of insecurity and danger to our commerce, I cannot give my consent to adopt the measure under consideration.

I will terminate by making use of an observation of Mr. Canning, which I conceive equally applicable to us in our present situation:

'Character is power. To lose our character is to lose a material part of our power;' again: 'Not a doubt shall remain, to distant times, of our determination and of our ability to have continued resistance; and that no step which could even mistakenly be construed into concession, should be taken on our part, while it can be a question, whether the plan devised for our de'struction has, or has not, either completely failed, or been unequivocally abandoned."

When Mr. SMITH had concluded, the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, November 29.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion for the reconsideration of the vote of the 25th instant, for receiving and reading the instructions of the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts to their Senators on the subject of the embargo; and on motion, by Mr. ANDERSON, the motion for reconsideration was withdrawn, and the instructions were read.

Mr. GILES gave notice that he should, to-morrow, ask leave to bring in a bill appropriating a sum of money to enable the President of the United States to call into service the seamen authorized by the act of the 5th of March, 1807, not exceeding five hundred.

THE EMBARGO.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the 11th instant, for repealing the "Act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several acts supplementary thereto."

Mr. HILLHOUSE rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: When I offered the resolution for a removal of the embargo, and submitted my remarks to the Senate, I was impressed with serious apprehensions for our country's welfare, on account of the embarrassments so forcibly described, and which have been painted in such vivid colors, by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GILES.) It was because I felt anxious that we should extricate ourselves as soon as possible from those embarrassments, that I came forward thus early with my resolution. I had been led to believe, and still believe, that the way to extricate ourselves is, to explore the causes of our difficulties, to examine into the truth of facts, and to have a candid and impartial inquiry into the policy and expediency of our present measures; that if, unfortunately, we should be found in an error, we may retrace our steps, and not, by an obstinate perseverance therein, involve our country in ruin. Little did I expect that I should be charged with having proposed a tame submission to foreign aggression, or a disposition to abandon our neutral rights, or surrender the independence of my country—much less, with having forgotten the spirit and policy of '76, which carried us safely through the Revolution, and achieved our independence. I confined myself to general remarks, and was not, perhaps, so particular as I ought to have been, to make myself understood. I shall, therefore, now take the liberty of stating what was the spirit and policy of '76; and I shall be able to show, from public documents and records, that, as long as that spirit and policy were pursued, they secured us in the enjoyment of our independence, and caused our maritime rights to be respected. Unfortunately for our country, it was a departure from that policy that has brought us into our present situation. It is not surprising that many mistakes should be made respecting the spirit and policy of '76 by those who must have derived their information from tradition, and not from their own personal observation. I have noticed that many of those who say most on that subject, were either not born, or were in their cradles, or have since migrated to the United States, to enjoy the fruits and blessings of that Revolution.

The patriots and statesmen who guided our public councils at the commencement of the Revolution, believing our rights were invaded, and our liberties endangered by the arbitrary and unwarrantable claims of the British Parliament, resorted first to respectful petitions and remonstrances to induce the British Government to abandon their unjust claims, and adopt such measures as would secure our rights and liberties. But, when these means were found to be ineffectual, they nobly dared to make their appeal to arms, and to declare themselves a free and independent nation. And, though we were without a regular organized Government, and had neither Army nor Navy, they dared, in defence of their just rights, to wage war with a powerful nation. They did not tell us that we must abandon our right to navigate the ocean, or yield up any other right because of surrounding dangers. The maxims then were that, rights which were not worth defending, were no rights; that, to be respected, we must convince others that we would not tamely submit to insult; and that, to preserve peace, we must be prepared for war. This spirit and policy carried us safely through the Revolutionary war, established our independence, and secured our sovereignty, one essential attribute of which, is the right to navigate the ocean. In 1783 we obtained an honorable peace. In 1793, war having commenced between France and England, our maritime rights were invaded by the latter, and our vessels were captured and condemned under the memorable November orders. An attempt was then made to introduce the same policy, to defend our rights and vindicate our honor, which is now, and for some time has been, in the flood tide of experiment. The famous resolutions proposing duties of discrimination between foreign nations, the entering into a commercial warfare with England, and propositions for a non-intercourse law, and sequestration of British debts, will be remembered. The Journals of that session of Congress contain a record of them, and will show who were the friends and advocates of that policy.

Fortunately for the nation, we then had a Chief Magistrate who was actuated by the spirit, and well knew, and was determined to pursue, the policy of '76. He boldly came forward, and put an end to all those projects by nominating an Envoy Extraordinary to the Court of Great Britain, to remonstrate against the wrongs, and demand satisfaction for the injuries we had sustained. That Minister was not sent out with a non-importation or non-intercourse act in his hand, which, the President well knew, would have been understood and considered by Great Britain in the nature of a threat, or an attempt to coerce, and would defeat the object of the mission. He was in reality sent with the olive branch, on the principle of a fair and honorable negotiation.

In the meantime, knowing that a failure of the negotiation must result in war, or an abandonment of our rights, every preparation to meet the event which it was in the power of the country to make, was made. Laws were passed for fortifying our ports and harbors; to provide a Navy; to erect arsenals, and provide magazines; for raising artillerists and engineers; for directing a detachment from the militia; to prohibit the exportation of arms and ammunition, and to encourage the importation of the same; to build or purchase vessels to be armed and equipped as galleys, or otherwise; and for making further and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States. These several acts were passed in the short space of about ten weeks, and, not only found their way into the statute book, but were promptly carried into execution; and, being laws of a mere municipal nature, providing for our internal security and defence, they gave no umbrage to Great Britain. Yet they spoke a language she well understood. What was the consequence? Great Britain admitted our claim, revoked her orders, and made satisfaction for the injury; and a treaty was concluded, under which our citizens have received millions of dollars for the losses they sustained by the capture and condemnation of our vessels. And, since it went into operation, as the gentleman from Virginia candidly admits, the United States have enjoyed unexampled prosperity.

France, still at war with England, had expected that the differences between England and the United States would involve the two countries in war. Dissatisfied, therefore, with the treaty, France manifested an unfriendly disposition towards our Government. In 1797, the spoliations committed under the outrageous decrees of France were such as could no longer be tolerated consistently with our national honor and interest, and the French Government had, moreover, refused to receive our Minister.

It was once more fortunate for the nation that our then Chief Magistrate, and the Councils of our country, were still under the influence and guidance of the spirit and policy of '76. Envoys Extraordinary were sent to remonstrate against the injuries we were suffering and to demand satisfaction—not accompanied by non-importation laws, or any other acts or resolutions which could wound the pride of that nation. At the same time, Congress provided means of defence, so that the nation might be prepared to avenge its wrongs, and vindicate its honor, in case of a refusal on the part of France to do us justice. Laws were passed, prohibiting the exportation of arms and ammunition, and for encouraging the importation thereof; to provide for the defence of the ports and harbors of the United States; to authorize a detachment from the militia, and to provide a naval armament.

France did refuse to treat, and rejected our Ministers. What was the result? Not long, detailed, diplomatic correspondences, further remonstrances, and paper resolutions. A negotiation of a different nature commenced. We spoke a language not to be misunderstood. We spoke from the mouth of the cannon. Our treaties with her were annulled; all intercourse prohibited; our merchant vessels authorized to arm, and defend themselves against French privateers; an army was raised, and our little Navy equipped, manned, and sent out to protect our commerce and capture the armed vessels of France. A war, not of offence, but defence, was commenced. Naval conflicts soon ensued, and a French frigate was taken, after a hard fought battle, by an American frigate commanded by the gallant Truxtun. The French privateers and piratical boats which had annoyed our trade were swept from the ocean, our commerce resumed its wonted activity, and our vessels again navigated in safety every sea. What was the conduct of France? A declaration of war? Far from it. Though she had before treated us with indignity, the manly attitude we assumed in defence of our rights and national honor, commanded her respect, and she proposed and entered into a negotiation, which ended in a treaty that was ratified by both Governments, and was finally promulgated by a proclamation of the President of the United States, on the 21st of December, 1801. At this period the American flag was respected in every sea, and the American name and character were honored by all nations.

Since that period, unfortunately for our country, a different policy has prevailed in the public councils, founded, no doubt, on the idea that "a just nation is trusted on its word, while wars are only necessary to nations of an opposite character." A policy calculated on to save the necessity of ships of war, and exactly comporting with some of the modern ideas of economy. In pursuance of this policy, our Navy has been suffered to decline, and some of our ships have, for years, been moored, to rot, in the mud of the Eastern Branch of the Potomac.

Many efforts have been made, but in vain, for removing our little fleet into the salt water to protect our commerce, at least on our coast, and to secure us from being insulted within our own jurisdiction, by the armed vessels of the belligerents. We were told that if our ships went out, and should meet with foreign vessels depredating on our commerce, or insulting our Government, they would fight, and we should have war. That our ships would fight, on proper occasions, I have no doubt.

Though the discouragements which have been thrown in the way of our naval prosperity have greatly tended to depress the martial spirit, it still exists, and, if an opportunity presents, will be drawn forth into action. Believing this, I confidently rely on our being ultimately able to extricate ourselves from the perplexing and distressing situation described by the gentleman from Virginia. That this opinion is correct, the conduct of our naval force in the Mediterranean sea furnishes ample proof. The war with Tripoli has afforded the only active and honorable employment which our Navy has had since the Treaty with France; and in which, the gallant deeds of our little band of heroes, deeds worthy of the American name and character, have commanded the admiration and applause of surrounding nations; and the recollection thereof will be cherished by the American people, when yonder marble monument, erected in honor of those heroes who fell before Tripoli, shall be mouldered into dust.

The question recurs, What is the cause of our present embarrassments—what has brought us into our present sad dilemma? For a sad one it is, if it be true that we are reduced to the alternative of a war with both belligerents, or the continuance of the present embargo system. Surely they could not have originated in party newspaper publications, or the electioneering squabbles of the ins and the outs. The effects of these are greatly overrated. Though they produce much excitement and noise here, they make but a small impression on the other side of the water. The public documents on our table—those furnished last session of Congress, and information in possession of the Senate—show that our difficulties arise from our having forsaken the spirit and departed from the policy of '76, and in lieu thereof adopted that retiring policy which recommends the abandonment of our right to navigate the ocean, because our commerce is exposed to danger from the illegal attacks and depredations of the belligerent Powers. The spirit of '76 induced us to face danger to secure that right, and would not the same spirit prompt us to hazard something in its defence?

It is a painful task to me to undertake to point out the impolicy and impropriety of our present system of measures; but I see no other way of avoiding those evils which the gentleman from Virginia has so forcibly described, (to remove which I would most cordially co-operate, or to effect that union in our public councils which he so ardently desires, and which I most devoutly wish for.) than by going into the inquiry, to discover where the error lies.

I will go no further back than to 1806, the date of the memorials of the merchants of New Haven, and the great cities and towns on the seacoast, now introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. POPE.) They complained of aggressions on their commerce by Great Britain, and prayed that the protecting arm of Government might be extended for their relief. The Boston memorial suggested a special mission. They expected, no doubt, that the Envoy would be sent, as heretofore, to attempt a friendly negotiation of differences; not to hold out a non-importation act for an olive branch, or to be bound by instructions to demand as an ultimatum that the American flag should protect all persons on board our merchant vessels; which the British Government contended could not be granted, because, they said, it would tend to unman their navy, and cripple that important means of defence against a powerful and enraged foe. And as they disclaimed all right of impressing American seamen, they supposed that our claim, in its utmost extent, might be considered a measure calculated to withdraw from their service their own seamen, rather than to protect real American seamen. This had been the subject of negotiation, as well under the former as the present Administration, and the point had been pressed as far as could be of any avail. The like answer was given to both Administrations—the principle cannot be admitted.

The gentleman from Virginia has read a resolution, declaring that there had been a violation of our neutral rights, and an encroachment upon our national independence, by the capture and condemnation of our vessels under the Orders of the British Government; which resolution passed in February, 1806, by the unanimous vote of the Senate—a vote that does honor to that body, as it exhibits to the nation, and to the world, that whatever may be the collision of party on subjects of minor importance, whenever it is a question in regard to the defence of our own rights, and the interest of a foreign Power, we are an undivided people. Yet, notwithstanding this unanimous expression of the opinion of the Senate, and the appointment of an Envoy, which took place at this time, no measures of defence were adopted. A non-importation act was passed and relied upon for maintaining our claims. This was declared in public debate; and, being made known, could not be concealed. It was wafted to England before our Envoy could reach her shores. So far from being able to use that act for the purpose of enforcing our claims, to prevent its being an insuperable bar to negotiation, our Ministers inform the Secretary of State, in their letter of September 11, 1806, that, in speaking to the British Minister of that act, they mentioned it in these terms: "After a short vindication of the act, in the course of which we did not omit to represent it in connexion with the special mission which grew out of it, as manifesting the friendly sentiments and views of our Government towards that of His Majesty."

Although the mission failed of success, have we not reason to believe, from the documents laid before Congress, that, if the instructions had been as liberal, and the negotiation had been conducted in the spirit and policy of 1776, as was that of 1794, which doubtless was expected by those merchants, it would have had a like favorable termination; an intimation having been previously given, by the British Minister, of a disposition (which, in diplomatic proceedings, is tantamount to a direct offer) to renew the former treaty—under which we had enjoyed ten years' peace, and (to use the expression of the gentleman from Virginia) unexampled prosperity—to remain in force two years after the termination of the present war. The overture was not accepted, from an apprehension, perhaps, that our dexterity in managing a negotiation, aided by such measures as the present policy might dictate, would enable us to obtain better terms. That the non-importation act did not aid, but tended to obstruct, a friendly adjustment, is manifest from the following note of Lord Holland and Lord Auckland, addressed to our Ministers :

DOWNING STREET, Sept. 4, 1806.

GENTLEMEN : We have received a copy (sent by you at our request) of the act of Congress to prohibit, from and after the fifteenth of November, the import into the territories of the United States of a very large description of goods, wares, and merchandise, from any port or place situated in Great Britain or Ireland.

On a full consideration of that act, we think it our duty to express our earnest hope and expectation that some means may be found to suspend the execution of a measure so opposite in its temper and tendency to the disposition and views with which our pending negotiation has been commenced and is carrying on.

The measure, unless suspended, will take effect, if not before our discussions can be closed, at least before it is possible that their result can be known in the United States, and would obviously lead to the necessity of proposing to Parliament similar steps on the part of this country, by which mutual irritation would be excited, and fresh impediments created in the way of such a final adjustment as we trust is mutually desired.

We rely on you for taking such immediate steps in this business as may best contribute to a happy termination of our treaty, and to a cordial and permanent friendship between His Majesty's subjects and the citizens of the United States.

We have the honor to be your faithful, humble servants,

VASSAL HOLLAND,
AUCKLAND.

Our Ministers did recommend a suspension of the act, and it was accordingly suspended.

The effects usually produced by a policy which attempts to coerce, by threats addressed to an independent Power, were exemplified in the correspondence of our Minister at the Court of Madrid, appointed soon after the commencement of the present Administration. After protracted diplomatic discussions, in which our Minister labored to convince the Spanish Government of the justice of our claim, and the propriety of their acceding to it, and this appeal to their reason had proved ineffectual, a last attempt was made, in a pompous, gasconading note, in which (as well as I remember, from having heard the correspondence once read) our Minister informed the Government of Spain that the United States were a great, powerful, and high-spirited nation, who would not submit to injury or insult, and concluded by telling the Spanish Minister that there were only two modes of settling controversies between nations—arbitration or war. The Spanish Minister returned for answer, that the King his master had commanded him to inform the American Minister he should not choose arbitration.

Thus has the matter rested, and our claims are still unsatisfied.

When it was discovered that the United States had abandoned the spirit and policy of 1776, and placed their dependence on acts of Congress, paper resolutions, and diplomatic remonstrances, as their system of defence, what was the consequence? Repeated violations of our neutral rights, and the capture and condemnation of our vessels.

Long and elaborate reasonings have been gone into to establish our rights, and induce a change in the conduct of those Powers, and to cause them to respect our rights, but all to no purpose. Evils have been accumulating upon us to that degree, that we are now told, that, to save our independence and honor, and secure our rights, we must agree to a continued embargo—"a permanent suspension of commerce"—that is, to preserve our rights, we must abandon them altogether. Logic, this, which I do not understand! If there be wisdom or policy in the measure, it is beyond my comprehension. Had this been the spirit and policy of 1776, should we ever have achieved our independence? should we now occupy these seats, under the Constitution of the United States? Our rights are attacked on the ocean; we are called upon to abandon them. If our shores should be invaded, would not this retiring policy invite us to flee to the mountains?

On my mind, there rests not the smallest doubt, that if our public councils had been undeviatingly guided by the spirit and policy of 1776, we should neither have had war, nor been under the necessity, in obedience to our own laws, of abandoning the ocean, and submitting to the loss of a commerce second only in importance to that of any nation on the face of the globe: whereby we are called upon to make a sacrifice of property greater than the whole expense of all the armaments and other defensive measures adopted under both the former Administrations for the protection of our commerce and the vindication of our national honor. In point of real economy, then, we are losers to a vast amount. And to what extent these privations and sufferings are to be carried, and how long to be continued, cannot be foreseen.

Gentlemen who oppose the repeal of the embargo tell us that Great Britain has obtained the complete dominion of the sea; that she is proud, haughty, avaricious; and that her object is to obtain the commerce and carrying trade of the world. After having secured the quiet possession thereof, will she peaceably suffer us to become her rival? Will she not tell us, you voluntarily abandoned, and shall not again assume, them? And would it not be attended with more danger, expense, and difficulty, to regain them, than to hold fast the possession?

In vain should we address her from that retirement recommended by the gentleman from Virginia, as dignified; a retirement in which would be dissipated the resources and wealth of the nation. In vain, I say, should we address her with arguments the most forcible to prove our right to navigate the ocean. In vain should we ask her consent, though we were to employ the persuasive eloquence of that gentleman, to permit us to resume our extended and profitable commerce. We should come forth from our dignified retirement under great disadvantages to commence a new conflict for our right to navigate the ocean. The enemy with whom we shall have to contend may have made peace with her rival, and we be left alone to maintain the conflict.

Or perhaps we may have to contend with an enemy all powerful on the land, and who may become formidable on the sea; with a Power that has for a long time cast a wishful eye towards the fair fields of America, and has almost kept up continual claim to a large portion of the United States, which was once within her embrace, and which was wrested from her by the war of 1756. Then may we expect to see adopted the ancient Roman policy—the turning out of the old proprietors of the soil to make way for military adventurers. Then might we expect the feudal system in all its ancient rigor.

The gentleman from Virginia has told us that his brother farmers must raise less produce, and turn their surplus labor to improve and beautify their farms. Is there not some danger that even this may serve as a lure to tempt the cupidity of some foreign nation; and if the same timid, retiring policy should prevail, will they not be emboldened to attempt to possess themselves of those very farms and improvements? Nor should we be secure, were we to assume the savage garb and manner of life. Mr. President, if a conflict should be necessary to maintain our right to navigate the ocean, I wish it may happen while some of the revolutionary patriots of '76 are still living, who can reanimate their countrymen with their spirit. Some of the present generation may acquire that spirit by inheritance; but none, I fear, by education.

It has been insinuated more than once, that the opposition to the present system of measures (and to that system no one has been more opposed than myself) proceeds from party feelings and disappointed ambition. That this is unfounded, will appear by a resort to the journals of Congress, our statute books, and to well known public transactions. At the commencement of the struggle for our liberties and independence, from a full conviction of the rectitude of the cause, I engaged on the side of our country, with the ardor natural to a youthful mind. And those who know me best will not accuse me of having declined, through the whole Revolutionary war, any exposure or sacrifice which the call of my country required. In 1794 I voted for all those efficient measures of defence then adopted, and opposed the paper resolution policy then brought forward, the same substantially which for some years has been pursued, and is now urged upon us. In 1797–8 I voted for the naval and military preparations then made. Under the present Administration, I have uniformly voted for all such measures of defence as appeared to me to have efficacy, or to comport with the spirit and policy of '76; though the gentleman from Virginia would seem to imagine I was smarting under the unpopularity of my former votes for armies and navies; measures which are supposed to have gone far in effecting a change in the Administration. I am happy, however, in the reflection, that if those votes lost me my popularity and political power, they contributed to save my country's rights and honor. I shall also be found uniformly to have opposed a timid, humiliating policy, which must ever end in war, or an abandonment of our nation's rights and honor. A Senator of the United States is unworthy of that high and responsible station, and to be intrusted with the destinies of his country, if, upon questions of great national importance, involving our rights, honor, and independence, his vote could be governed by his attachment or dislike to a Chief Magistrate, or others in power.

The gentleman from Kentucky, in referring to me, has used the expression "the gentleman in Opposition," meaning, I suppose, to have it understood, that I am an opposer of the present Administration. I do not admit that I am, or ever have been the opposer or the favorite of any Administration. I vow myself to be the opposer only of such measures as in my judgment will not promote the public good. [Mr. POPE rose to explain, and said he meant only to refer to the opposition of Mr. HILLHOUSE to the embargo.] Mr. H. declared himself satisfied.

The gentleman from Kentucky has also announced (he does not say officially) that the Presidential electioneering races for the present season are over, and calls upon the several riders to dismount their hobbies; not reflecting that I am not one of the jockey club, nor had a card of invitation to the race ground, without which none were admitted. Neither I, nor any member from Connecticut, was invited to attend the famous caucus which was convened for the purpose of manufacturing the great officers of State. We were not emulous of that honor, being content with the mode pointed out by the Constitution of the United States, for choosing President and Vice President.

To preserve our independence, and avoid tame submission, we are gravely told by the gentleman from Virginia, and also in a report pronounced by the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) to be the most luminous production ever submitted to Congress, (the result probably of the combined wisdom of the whole Administration,) that "there is no other alternative but war with both nations, or a continuance of the present system." The idea of going to war, at the same time, with the two great belligerent Powers, is as novel and surprising to me, as the idea of a permanent embargo for a measure of defence. Suppose the warfare be on the land; in what manner, let me ask, would the three belligerents, each hostile to the other, array their forces for action, and conduct the battle? Would it be in the form of a triangle, each firing alternately, first on one enemy and then on the other? Or suppose the fleets of two of the belligerents, say French and American, meet on the ocean; and after a bloody conflict, for I have no doubt both nations would fight bravely, the American fleet, for I would always incline to our own side, cripples and captures that of their enemy; a British fleet then comes up and takes both, though inferior perhaps before the action, to either? The idea is too ridiculous to merit serious attention.

When two nations have a common enemy, they are inclined to cultivate a friendly disposition towards each other. If we were to declare war against England, France, no doubt, would revoke her decrees, give us a friendly reception into her ports, and afford us all the aid and protection in her power both by sea and land. England would do the like, if we were to declare war against France. Such unquestionably would be the fact; and it is in vain to shut our eyes against the truth. There was a strong proof of this exhibited in the conduct of England and France in 1794, and 1798.

Is it not national antipathies, more than foreign predilections, that produce crimination and re-crimination of an English party, and a French party, of English and French influence? For the honor of my country I hope it is; for I should be sorry to think so meanly of the American people as to believe they would prefer the interest of any foreign nation to that of their own. Should we unfortunately be brought to make the experiment, by being engaged in a just and necessary war, (and none other I hope will ever be made by the United States,) I am confident we shall find a union of sentiment and action. These are, however, unnecessary speculations; for I see no necessity of declaring war against any nation.

To permit our merchant vessels to arm, under proper restrictions, and to equip, man, and send out our public ships, to defend those maritime rights which are clear and indisputable, is not war, nor will it necessarily involve us in war. Every nation on earth would respect us for defending our essential rights. I do not agree with the gentleman from Kentucky, that the commanders of merchant vessels can commit the peace of the nation, if the Government do not countenance and uphold them in their wrong, but promptly disavow the act. Vessels bound up the Mediterranean sea, and to the East Indies, have always been allowed to arm; and I have never heard that they have, in a single instance, committed the peace of the nation.

In answer to the inquiry, what good has the embargo done? the gentleman from Virginia says, that it has saved to our citizens one hundred and fifty millions of property, which would have been captured and carried into France or England; and to our country fifty thousand seamen, who, instead of being in captivity in a foreign land, are placed in the bosom of their families. This, if true, is an important consideration; but I doubt the fact. Not that I question the veracity of the gentleman: were he to declare a fact as of his own knowledge, I should have a most perfect reliance on it. But in this case the gentleman's declaration being but an expression of opinion, not supported by any one fact within his knowledge, he must excuse me if I cannot yield my assent to it; more especially as circumstances, some of which are within my own knowledge, lead me to a different opinion. It is a fact, that most of our vessels which escaped the embargo, or have since gone out under permits from the President of the United States, have returned in safety, and made good voyages, from which the seamen "have returned to the bosom of their families," and with something to administer to their wants and comfort; not, as in the other case, empty-handed from our dismantled ships, to share the distresses of their little households, and to hear their children cry for bread. Many of our vessels which were out when the embargo was laid, have remained out, avoiding the inhospitable shores of their own country, as they would a land infected with pestilence. Those vessels have been navigating the ocean under the American flag, with as much safety as before the embargo was laid, and have constantly been employed in the carrying trade to vast profit.

Having, at the commencement of this debate, submitted my observations on the supposed possibility of starving England or destroying her manufactures; and the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. LLOYD,) better informed on the subject of commerce than myself, having exhibited the facts to the Senate in a manner that must carry conviction, I shall not trespass on the patience of the Senate with any further remarks on that point.

Nor shall I add to what I have already said to prove that one object of the embargo was to put down commerce, for the purpose of raising up manufactures, than to adduce the authority on which my opinion rests; which was not, as has been insinuated by the gentleman from Maryland, common-place observations, and party newspaper publications, but the declarations of the President of the United States, not in an ordinary correspondence, but in an answer to an address from the Legislature of New Hampshire, a New England State, participating in common with the other New England States in the benefits of commerce. Speaking of the embargo, he says: "It gave us 'time to make a last appeal to the reason and reputation of nations. In the meanwhile I see 'with satisfaction that this measure of self-denial 'is approved and supported by the great body of 'our real citizens; that they meet with cheerfulness the temporary privations it occasions; and 'are preparing with spirit to provide for themselves those comforts and conveniences of life, 'for which it would be unwise ever more to resort 'to distant countries.'" In another answer to an address, this sentiment is expressed, that the agriculturist and manufacturer shall be planted down side by side, so as to receive, at our own doors, those comforts and conveniences of life, which we have been accustomed to seek on the ocean. No such effects could be produced by the embargo, nor can it answer any such purpose, unless made perpetual, or continued for a great length of time.

The gentleman from Virginia has thought proper to go into a consideration of the commercial advantages which he imagines are enjoyed by the people inhabiting the Northern in comparison with the Southern States, under the Constitution and laws of the United States, and has indulged himself in remarks respecting a disposition in the people of New England to insurrection, rebellion, and disunion; but these are topics on which I shall say nothing; as I do not think it expedient to discuss them at this time.

cion, I shall also pass by without further notice, than to assure those gentlemen, that in New England they will produce no intimidation, if they should excite any attention.

It was particularly unfortunate for the gentleman from Virginia, that he should feel himself under the necessity of making remarks that may be construed into a denunciation of a certain description of our fellow-citizens as demagogues, and as having attempted to excite sedition and rebellion, because they doubt the expediency of the embargo, and question the policy of some of the measures of the present Administration. That gentleman, I imagine, will hardly consent that to doubt the policy and oppose the measures of an Administration, shall be the criterion for deciding who are the demagogues of our country; for surely, if that is to be the rule of decision, the conduct of that gentleman during the first Administration under the Constitution of the United States, and the ability and perseverance with which he maintained his opposition to it, would give him a pre-eminent claim to rank high on the list of demagogues. I extremely regret those remarks on another account. I know many of the most venerable characters of our country, men who were patriots of '76, men who made great sacrifices, and risked their lives in our struggle for liberty and independence, men who have acquired a well-earned fame, which has never been tarnished, who doubt the policy of the embargo, and decidedly disapprove the measure, as being altogether inefficient as it regards foreign Powers, and ruinous to ourselves.

The gentleman from Virginia is peculiarly unfortunate also, in ascribing the failure of the embargo, to produce the desired effect on foreign nations, to party misrepresentations, and newspaper electioneering publications, describing the embargo as an unpopular measure calculated to excite general discontent, and bring about a change of rulers, which, he says, reached England between the 22d of June and the 29th of July, and produced a sudden change in the conduct of the British Minister, and in his disposition to a friendly accommodation. I could hardly have expected, even in the heat of debate, such a declaration from a gentleman so well acquainted with the British character and Government. The ministry there know full well how to appreciate party publications, and the representations of the ins and the outs.

Those party misrepresentations, as the gentleman is pleased to call them, and those newspaper electioneering publications, would have had but little effect in England, and still less weight with the ministry, if they had not had an official stamp of truth put upon them, by the Proclamation of the President of the United States. With the indulgence of the Senate, I will read the Proclamation.

"By the President of the United States a Proclamation."

"Whereas information has been received, that sundry persons are combined or combining and confederating together, on Lake Champlain and the country thereto adjacent, for the purpose of forming insurrec-

tions against the authority of the laws of the United States, for opposing the same, and obstructing their execution; and that such combinations are too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the Marshals by the laws of the United States:

"Now, therefore, to the end that the authority of the laws may be maintained, and that those concerned, directly or indirectly, in any insurrection or combination against the same, may be duly warned, I have issued this my Proclamation, hereby commanding such insurgents, and all concerned in such combinations, instantly and without delay to disperse and retire peaceably to their respective abodes; and I do hereby further require and command all officers, having authority, civil or military, and all other persons, civil or military, who shall be found within the vicinage of such insurrections or combinations, to be aiding and assisting, by all the means in their power, by force of arms or otherwise, to quell and subdue such insurrections or combinations, to seize upon all those therein concerned, who shall not, instantly and without delay, disperse and retire to their respective abodes; and to deliver them over to the civil authority of the place, to be proceeded against according to law.

"In testimony whereof I have caused the seal of the United States, to be affixed to these presents, and signed the same with my hand. Given at the City of Washington, the 19th day of April, 1808, and in the sovereignty and independence of the United States the thirty-second. "TH. JEFFERSON.

"By the President,

"JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State."

The Senate will recollect that the last session of Congress was closed on the 25th of April; and, although the Proclamation was dated the 19th of that month, no intimation thereof, or of the state of the country to which it referred, was given to Congress by the President of the United States. The Proclamation was published in Vermont, April 30, and in the National Intelligencer, printed at the Seat of Government, on the 13th of May. Here was an official document, issuing from the same high authority that recommended the embargo, declaring to the nation, and to the world, that there existed so great uneasiness and discontent on account of the embargo, as to induce the forming of unlawful combinations to resist its execution, too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary process of law, and which required the employment of a military force. Superadd to this, that our small standing army, and the whole naval force in actual service, were put in requisition, to aid in its execution.

These circumstances present a melancholy view of our situation. An embargo recommended under the influence of the great popularity of the President, and professed to be laid for preserving in safety our vessels, our seamen, and merchandise, and saving the honor, and vindicating the rights of our country, had become so unpopular, before the close of the session of the Congress which imposed it, that in the President's opinion, it could not be executed by the ordinary process of law, and through the mild medium of courts of justice; so that it had already become necessary to call in the aid of an armed force.

I could have hoped it would not have been found necessary to employ the American navy to cruise against our own commerce; and little did I expect that the army I had so recently voted to raise, for the purpose, as I supposed, of opposing foreign aggression, would be required to point their bayonets at the breasts of their fellow citizens.

When Mr. HILLHOUSE had concluded, the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, November 30.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the amendments reported by the select committee to the bill to reward Andrew Joseph Villard, for an invention of public utility; and the President having reported the bill to the House amended, on the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

THE EMBARGO.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the 11th instant, for repealing the "Act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States," and the several acts supplementary thereto.

Mr. PICKERING rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: The ample discussion already given to the resolution on your table, leaves me nothing to detail on the effects produced by the embargo, in regard to France, to England, or ourselves. On the two great belligerents, practical men, who knew the characters and resources of those nations, foresaw and pronounced that it would make no impression. This we all now know to be the fact, while we ourselves severely feel its pressure. Why, then, not remove it? Because, as we are told, those two nations have violated our neutral maritime rights; and, seeing that to compel their respect for these, we imposed the embargo, and they treat the measure with contempt, to remove it would be submission. So we will endeavor to conceal our mortification, and, because we cannot injure them, we will continue to punish ourselves. To renew our commerce while their decrees and orders remain uncanceled, would, we are told, "be abject and degrading submission; and, that we have but this alternative, "to make war with both nations," or, "continue and enforce the present suspension of commerce."

It has been justly remarked by the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. HILLHOUSE,) that to run away and abandon our rights, is abject and degrading.

To make war on both the belligerents is the most strange, Quixotic idea that ever entered into the head of a statesman. I suppose, as we have a thousand and a thousand times declared, that we have maintained an impartial neutrality towards those nations; so, to verify our declarations, we must now make war upon both impartially! And, as their injuries are said to be equal, (or, we will not inquire which has done us "the most harm,") so we must measure out to each an equal quantity of resentment, and give to each an equal number of blows.

In respect to our violated rights, so far as Great Britain is concerned, those presented by the Administration in the front of our claims, are

1. An exemption from impressment of all seamen on board our merchant vessels.

2. A free trade with the colonies of her enemies.

3. An exemption from capture of our vessels destined for any port of her enemies not actually blockaded.

I am aware, sir, of the consequences of advancing anything from which conclusions may be drawn adverse to the opinions of our own Administration, which, by many, are conceived to be indisputably just. Merely to state these questions, and to mention such arguments as the British Government may, perhaps, have urged in their support on her side, is sufficient to subject a man to the popular charge of being under British influence, or to the vulgar slander of being a "British tory." He will be fortunate to escape the accusation of touching British gold. But, sir, none of these things move me. The patrons of the miscreants who utter these slanders know better, but are, nevertheless, willing to benefit by the impression they may make on the minds of the people. From an early period of my life I was zealously engaged in every measure opposed to the attempts of Great Britain to encroach upon our rights, until the commencement of our Revolutionary war, and during its whole continuance, I was uninterruptedly employed in important civil or military departments, contributing all my efforts to bring that war to a successful termination.

I, sir, am not the advocate of wrong-doers, to whatever country they belong, whether Emperors, or Kings, or the Administrators of a Republic. Justice is my object, and Truth my guide; and, wherever she points the way I shall not fear to go.

Great Britain has done us many wrongs. When we were Colonies, she attempted to deprive us of some of our dearest birth-rights—rights derived from our English ancestors, rights which we defended, and finally established, by the successful conclusion of the Revolutionary War. But these wrongs, and all the wounds of war, were intended to be obliterated and healed by the treaty of peace, when all enmities should have ceased.

Great Britain wronged us in the capture and condemnation of our vessels under her orders of 1793, and she has made reparation for these wrongs, pursuant to a treaty, negotiated on practical principles by a statesman who, with liberal views and real candor, sought adjustment and reparation.

At subsequent periods she has committed wrongs, and if reparation had been demanded in the same spirit of candor and firmness which were manifested in 1794, that distinguished precedent authorizes the opinion, that like equitable adjustment and reparation might have been obtained. But after a four years' negotiation, in which volumes of essays and letters have been written, it has, like the seven years' negotiation with Spain, been brought (in the language of the President) "to an issue of some sort;" that is, every subject of dispute remains as far, probably farther from adjustment, than when the negotiations were begun.

It is this disastrous issue which now enters into our deliberations. According to the statements of the Administration, we are brought into a situation from which we cannot advance without war, nor retreat without dishonor. Their negotiations with France have also terminated in mortification and defeat.

On the two questions of the impressment of seamen on board our merchant vessels, and a trade with the enemies of Great Britain prohibited in time of peace, the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) was pleased to read some parts of a letter written by me last Winter to the Governor of Massachusetts, to be laid before the Legislature; and on the latter (neutral trade) he also read the Journal of the Senate, which exhibited a unanimous vote declaratory of our right to that trade; and then the names of the Senators (mine being one) who voted to request the President to demand and insist on reparation for the injuries done us in violation of that right, and for this purpose to enter into amicable arrangements with the British Government.

On these two questions, I should add nothing to the observations made yesterday by the gentleman from Connecticut, but for the apparent intention of the gentleman from Maryland, to exhibit an inconsistency between my votes in the Senate and the observation of my letter on the same subject.

It is sufficient for me to remark, that in the passages recited by the gentleman from my letter, my object was to show, by exhibiting in a few words, to the view of my immediate constituents, and through them to the people of Massachusetts, some of the reasons which might have influenced Great Britain not to relinquish her ancient usage of impressing her own seamen; nor to consent that neutrals should carry on (as we and other neutrals were carrying on) the whole trade between the countries of her enemies in Europe and their colonies; to show, I say, that as much was to be said on both sides, those rights, as claimed by the United States, were not to be considered so clear and indisputable as to justify a war with Great Britain; into which the proceedings of the Executive, in a variety of ways, seemed calculated to plunge us.

Before I quit this subject, I will make one more observation. It appears to be generally supposed that the rule respecting the colonial trade adopted by Great Britain, and usually called the Rule of 1756, which it seems she has considered as "the ancient and established principle of maritime law."* was peculiar to Great Britain: and Mr. Madison says, "it is well known that Great Britain is the only nation that has acted upon or otherwise given a sanction to it."† He also mentions this rule as having been introduced, for the first time, in the war of 1756; as having been in operation only a few years in that war; and not afterwards acted upon until 1793. Let us examine the subject.

* Mr. Madison's letter of March 25, 1806, to Mr. Erskine.

In Valin's celebrated work on maritime law (a book in the Secretary of State's office) is a regulation of Louis the Fourteenth, in 1704, from which I will recite some passages.

The title of the regulation is remarkable: it is, "Concerning Prizes made at Sea; to secure the navigation of neutral States and allies during war;" implying that this regulation was intended to abate the rigor of maritime law before that time practised towards neutral commerce.

After observing that propositions had been made to him by the Deputies of the Council of Commerce, the French King expresses his approbation of them, "seeing he finds in them the means which he has always sought of procuring equally the advantages of the subjects of neutral Princes and French cruisers." He adds: "The subjects of neutral Princes will thus find the care which His Majesty has taken to preserve for them the same extent and the same liberty of commerce which they have been accustomed to enjoy during peace."

I will now read such of the articles of this French regulation as relate to the question under examination.

"Article 1. His Majesty forbids French privateers to stop, or bring into the ports of His Kingdom, vessels belonging to subjects of neutral Princes, going from the ports of their dominion, and laden on account of the owners or other subjects of the said neutral Princes with merchandise of the growth or manufacture of their own country, to carry the same directly into any other States, whatsoever, even those with which His Majesty is at war; provided nevertheless, that there be not in the said vessels any contraband goods.

"Article 2. They are in like manner forbidden to stop vessels belonging to subjects of neutral Princes, going from the ports of any State whatsoever, even of those with which His Majesty is at war, and laden on account of the owners or other subjects of the said neutral Princes, with merchandise which they shall have received in the same country or State whence they shall have departed, to return directly into the ports of the dominion of their sovereign.

"Article 3. He also forbids them to stop vessels belonging to the subjects of neutral Provinces, departing, from the ports of one of the States neutral or allied to His Majesty, to go into another State alike neutral or allied to His Majesty; provided they are not laden with merchandise of the growth or manufacture of his enemies; in which case the merchandise shall be good prize, and the vessels shall be released.

"Article 4. In like manner His Majesty forbids privateers to stop vessels belonging to subjects of neutral Princes departing from a State, allied to His Majesty or neutral, to go to a State the enemy of His Majesty; provided there be not on board said vessel any merchandise contraband, nor of the growth or manufacture of the enemies of His Majesty; in which cases, the merchandise shall be good prize and the vessels shall be released.

"Article 6. Vessels belonging to subjects of neutral States which shall depart from the ports of a State the enemy of His Majesty, and there have taken their lading, in whole or in part, to go to the States of any other Prince than their own, whether allied to His Majesty, neutral, or enemy, may be stopped and brought into His Kingdom, and shall be declared good prize with their lading, even although laden on account of the subjects of His Majesty, or of an allied or neutral State."

The regulation of Louis XIV. in 1704, (he being then at war with England and Holland,) was re-enacted by Louis XV. in 1744, (France being again at war with England,) with some exceptions in regard to those neutral nations with whom France had formed treaty-stipulations incompatible with that regulation.

In these five articles we have, if I mistake not, the whole doctrine of the British rule of 1756. The direct trade to and from neutral ports and the enemy's ports being permitted, but not the trade to and from the ports of one allied or neutral State, with the ports of another allied or neutral State, if the lading of the neutral vessel consists of merchandise, the productions of the enemy's country; much less to carry the same from one port of the enemy to another port of the enemy.

The principle of the British rule, and of the French regulation, appears to be to prevent neutrals coming in to aid the enemy in the commerce of one part of his dominions with any other part thereof, or in procuring a market for the enemy's productions in any other country than that of the neutral actually transporting the same, and for its own use and consumption.

It appears, moreover, by the preamble to the French regulation, that the restrictions on neutral commerce, which we are now examining, instead of commencing in 1756, were in exercise by the English and Dutch antecedent to that regulation, and with greater rigor; the French King professing to ameliorate the condition of neutral commerce by that regulation.*

* But, Great Britain has admitted that the vessels of the United States might carry on an indirect trade from the European dominions of her enemies to their colonies, and from those colonies to their parent countries in Europe; and in both cases, the trade has been considered indirect when carried on through the United States—that is, when the cargoes laden on board American vessels, in the ports of the enemies of Great Britain, have been first imported into the United States, and carried thence in the same, or other American vessels, to the enemy's countries or colonies respectively. But the facts which should constitute an indirect trade not having been definitively declared—on the contrary, as they have been several times varied, either by the orders of the British Government, or by the decisions of her Courts of Admiralty—much vexation and injury have thence accrued to the commerce of the United States.

But the treaty negotiated by the President's Ministers, (Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney,) and signed by them, with the British Commissioners on the 31st of December, 1806, comprehended a definitive provision on this head. Such trade, between the parent countries and colonies of the enemies of Great Britain, was to

On the subject of blockade, when vessels of war were not so stationed before the port declared to be blockaded as to constitute what is called an actual blockade, undoubtedly abuses have taken place.

To form an actual blockade of a port, ships destined for that object must be "sufficiently near to produce an evident danger in entering." But these words by no means imply a certainty of capture, by the blockading ships, of the vessel so attempting to enter. What degree of risk from blockading ships will amount to a lawful blockade, may sometimes be a disputable question. Would the chance of capturing three vessels out of four, or seven out of eight, exhibit such an "evident danger in entering;" as would constitute an actual blockade—that is, when to insure their entering in safety would be worth a premium of from seventy-five to ninety per cent.? This must remain a question of some difficulty to adjust.

On these points, sir, and all others in dispute with Great Britain, my opinion remains unchanged, that they are yet proper subjects of negotiation, to be undertaken in the real spirit of conciliation and adjustment. That the embargo will not induce her to yield to our demands we have ample proof, not only in the answer of the British Government to our Minister in London, but in the certain ability of that nation and her colonies to supply all their own wants. That she possesses the means, I think, has been demonstrated by gentlemen who have spoken before me. We have heard much of the patriotism and patient endurance of our fellow-citizens under the distresses of the embargo, and, gentlemen speak confidently, that this patience will hold out until Great Britain shall be brought to our feet. At the same time they calculate on the distresses which they fondly imagine the embargo will inflict on the people of Great Britain and her colonies, to excite discontents and insurrections sufficiently alarming to induce that Government to abandon usages on which she relies to maintain her maritime ascendancy, and, at this time, her independence as a nation. But, why should it be supposed that the people of Great Britain will be less patient under sufferings than the people of the United States? Theirs would arise from causes beyond their con-be considered indirect, when the articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of Europe, were first carried to the United States, and, on re-exportation remained, after the drawback, subject to a duty of one per cent. on their value. In like manner, all articles of the growth and produce of the enemy's colonies, being first brought to the United States, and there entered and landed, and on re-exportation remaining subject to a duty of two per cent. on their value, might be re-laden and freely exported to any country in Europe. The duties, in both cases, to be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

This arrangement was calculated to prevent any further dispute between the United States and Great Britain, about the trade between the countries of her enemies in Europe and their colonies. But the President thought fit to reject this treaty, without laying it before the Senate.

trol; ours from some cause or causes operating on our rulers, but which the people can neither see nor understand. Within four months after the embargo was imposed, the President himself, by a proclamation, announced to us and to the world the existence of one insurrection occasioned by the embargo; and the provisions made in the supplementary acts to compel obedience at the point of the bayonet, show how apprehensive the Government were of discontents and resistance. These extraordinary provisions for the execution of a specific measure demonstrate that it was considered as opposed to the general sense of the people; and, in a free country, such a measure cannot long be carried into execution. The votes of approbation of the embargo by public bodies, and other assemblies of citizens, so ostentatiously displayed, while they manifest the force of party, are, to say the least, but equivocal indications of the general sense of the people, or even of the individuals composing those assemblies. Those votes have always had fewer hearts than voices.

Mr. President, the gentleman from Maryland mentioned the extreme danger to which our commerce would be exposed, while the French decrees and British orders remain unrepealed. It has been often said, and perhaps oftener insinuated, in newspapers and pamphlets, that if our vessels were permitted to go to sea, all would be taken. What escaped the French, would be captured by the English; and what escaped the latter, would fall a prey to the former. There is a want of truth in all this. The same gentleman quoted a statement made by an eminent merchant of Massachusetts, [Mr. Gray, of Salem,] that of eight or ten vessels which sailed about the time the embargo was laid, only one had reached the place of her destination. I remember seeing a statement of that sort; and I think, also, that I saw a detection of its fallacy. If they had not reached their destined ports, it did not follow that they were captured and condemned.

The same merchant has expressed his decided opinion, "that, notwithstanding the French decrees and British Orders in Council, if our embargo was off we should have more trade than would be enjoyed by us, if all the world were at peace, and the respective nations should monopolize as much of their own commerce as usual." Another eminent merchant [Mr. Thorndike, of Beverly] expressed, at the same time, the same opinion.

But, without resting the question on opinions, we may appeal to facts. I have sought information of the risks which have attended our foreign trade, within the present year, from the two principal districts of Massachusetts.

By the statement in my hand, lately received, and which is of unquestionable authority, I find, that at one insurance office in Boston, 43 policies have been written, on vessels engaged in foreign voyages, since the first of January, 1808. Of these,

5 were undetermined.

1 vessel (the Neutrality) bound from Marseilles to Boston, captured and condemned at Gibraltar, for violating the blockade declared by the British Orders in Council.

37 arrived safely. In all 43.

It is stated, that there were three policies on the Neutrality; and that possibly there might be more than one policy on one vessel among the 37 safe arrivals.

At another office in Boston, out of 75 risks, principally to the West Indies,

3 vessels were captured by the French, of which the British re-captured 2.

1 captured by the British, supposed to be French property.

16—about this number are undetermined; and the rest, about 55, have ended safely. In all 75.

At another office in Boston, out of somewhat more than 100 risks,

4 vessels were captured by the British, of which 2 were condemned for breach of Orders in Council; 1 probably enemy's property, and 1 remained under adjudication.

1 captured and condemned by the French; and, 1 seized by them at Alicant, while they had the power there.

25 risks were undetermined; and the remainder ended safely.

The premiums of insurance have been about eleven per cent. to and from the West Indies, for the whole voyage.

7 per cent. from the West Indies, with cargo on board.

9 to 10 per cent. from Europe, if not violating British orders.

4 to 5 per cent. from Europe against French capture only.

By a statement received from Salem, on the correctness of which I can rely, I find that in the district of Salem and Beverly, 22 vessels sailed, by the President's permission, between the 5th of April and the 10th of August. Of these vessels, 1 sailed to Sumatra, 1 to Senegal, and the rest to different ports in the West Indies. Of the whole number,

1 returned leaky, and remained at home.

12 returned in safety; and,

9 remained undetermined; but it was not known that any of them had been detained or condemned by any foreign Power.

In all 22.

The insurance on the Sumatra voyage, out and home, was 14 per cent.

Martinico, Havana, and Surinam—the voyage out and home, 9 to 10 per cent.

Havana, at and from 5½ per cent.

The premium of insurance from Calcutta to the United States, the last Summer and Autumn, has been 8 per cent.

Thus, Mr. President, we see that the risk on our foreign trade has been very little increased since the issuing the French Decree of Berlin, and the British Orders in Council.

The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) asks, What would have been the insurance on an American vessel bound to France? I am not informed. Perhaps 75 to 90 per cent., though it is not probable that our merchants would hazard their vessels on such a voyage, or that the underwriters would insure them. But what does this prove? Why, that the risk, under the British Orders, is so great, in attempting to enter a port in France, as perhaps to amount to an actual blockade.

I now beg leave, sir, to communicate the information I have recently received from the latter of the two merchants before referred to.* Having requested of him the data on which his opinion before-mentioned was founded, he has sent me an answer, dated the 23d instant, from which I will read the material parts. He says:

"Respecting the comparative trade of profound peace, and the present moment, if the embargo should be removed, and the decrees and Orders of Council remain, it is a subject about which it is difficult to go into that detail which will show satisfactorily an exact result; because, if you resort to the exports of a year in time of profound peace, and compare the aggregate with a year in war, the prices being so different, the difference in amount will not give the exact data we want. And to take the quantity of each article of export will not be satisfactory; because in different years we export more of the same article to the same market, and in proportion to the quantity raised, or goodness or badness of the crop. But of the fact I have no doubt, that our trade would be much greater and more productive, if the embargo were removed, than it can be in time of peace; because when the colonial trade of the European Powers is confined as usual, we cannot carry any kind of provisions to the colonies of any of them, without being subject to a heavy duty, nearly equal to a prohibition. And we are not allowed to bring away anything but rum and molasses; and of course we lose the whole of the colonial trade, so far as respects importing any articles with a view of exporting them again; excepting only from the Isle of France, and Bourbon, which has generally been free. But we may be shut out there. The trade to the colonies is now free for all exports and imports with small duties. And if the largest and most natural European markets for the sale of colonial produce are occluded, still we have open to us, all that the British have, and we can carry those articles to Sweden, Spain, Portugal, coast of Barbary, Turkey, Sicily, Sardinia, and Malta; the three last of which are ports at which the articles sell high, and are bought for the purpose of smuggling over to the Continent, where they are sent in great quantities."

The following statement is then given, of the amount of our exports from the 30th of September, 1806, to September 30, 1807, (taken from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury) to countries and places other than those in Europe, which are under the government or control, or in alliance with the French Emperor; all which are considered as shut up by the British Orders of Council:

"Domestic exports (or of articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States - - - - -	$36,109,991
Foreign goods exported - - - - -	24,140,495

* Mr. Thorndike.

To this may be added Spanish dollars, exported to India and China, and which are not noticed in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and may be estimated at least at - - - - - 6,000,000

Whole amount - - - - - 66,250,486

"This amount may be exported without being subject to the British Orders of Council, and the extra premiums against French captures would not exceed the following rates, viz:

"To Sweden, 2 per cent.; Swedish and other West Indies, and the Spanish Main, 5 do.; Cape of Good Hope, 4 do.; England, Scotland, without the Channel, say Liverpool, Greenock, Ireland, &c., &c., 4 do.; and within the Channel, 6 do.; Guernsey, Jersey, &c., 5 do.; Gibraltar, 3 do.; Spanish ports in the Bay of Biscay, 6 do.; Spanish ports on the Atlantic, 3 do.; Spanish ports on the Mediterranean, 5 do.; Madeira, the Canaries, Fayal, and other Azores, 3 do.; Portugal, 3 do.; Cape de Verd, 3 do.; Sicily, 5 do.; Malta, 6 do.; China, 4 do.; Sumatra, 3 do.; Spanish and Portuguese America, 3 do.; Calcutta and the coast of Coromandel and Malabar, 8 do.; Africa, 4 do.; Arabia, and Red Sea, including Mocha and Muscat, 4 do.; Manilla, 4 do.; Northwest coast of America, 2 do.; Halifax and Newfoundland, 1 do.

"In time of profound peace, our trade might be fairly estimated thus:

Domestic exports - - - - -	$48,699,592
To which may be added specie to China and India - - - - -	6,000,000
	54,699,592

Foreign exports, nothing.

"In time of peace these must be so very inconsiderable as to be unimportant in this statement."

This is supposing the same domestic articles as were exported in 1806, and allowing them to be at the same prices: so that the comparison stands thus:

Our exports, if the embargo were removed, would be - - - - -	$66,250,846
Free from any embarrassment from the British Orders in Council.
If peace were to take place and the European nations assume their trade as usual; and the prices of our domestic articles remain at the average prices in 1806, (which they would not,) we should export - - - - -	54,699,592

Leaving - - - - - 11,550,894

less export trade in time of peace than we might now enjoy, and which amount is to be twice water borne, once in importing it from the places of growth, and again carrying it to the consumers; and of course would employ shipping appertaining to the carriage of one freight, equal in amount to more than twenty-three millions one hundred thousand dollars.

"As an evidence of the correctness of this statement, it will be seen by a recurrence to the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the year 1803, that the exports had fallen, in that short peace, from $93,020,513, to $55,800,032.

"It is to be observed, that we might now enjoy a trade to South America and the Spanish Main, which might be estimated at least at from four to five millions of dollars, a considerable part of which would be again exported to Spain and Portugal, and which has never made any part of the Secretary's report; because the trade to those countries has been prohibited until lately. It may also be remembered, that the export trade does not show the whole advantage of the colonial trade which we might now enjoy; because all we import for our own consumption ought to be added."

[Here Mr. LLOYD stated that, in his opinion, the value of the trade which might now be prosecuted from the United States, considering the present circumstances of the great nations of Europe, would be as extensive as could be carried on after a general peace, and the adoption, by the European Powers, of their restrictive colonial systems.]

On this clear and interesting view of the commerce which the United States might carry on, were the embargo out of the way, no comments are necessary. The observations of the writer of the letter are evidences of his being master of the subject.

Mr. President, the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) has been pleased to attribute the discontents, in New England, especially in Massachusetts, relative to the embargo, solely to the arts of demagogues, who wish to get into office.

The gentleman from Connecticut noticed this reproach; but as it appeared to be levelled chiefly at leading citizens in Massachusetts, I feel it to be my duty further to remark, that of all the citizens of the United States, none stand more aloof from, none more detest the character of demagogues, than those to whom the gentleman referred. I know those men who reprobate the embargo, and who, in conversation, and in newspapers, express their sentiments about it, or patronize those who do. They are not seeking for offices—many of them could not be persuaded to accept the best office in the President's gift—but to save their country from the effects of measures, in their view, alike ruinous and disgraceful. They are men, sir, whose age, whose experience, whose knowledge, whose wisdom, whose virtue, place them in the first rank of citizens. They are men, sir, ten of whom, had they been in Sodom, would have saved that city from destruction. Among them was the immortal Ames, than whom a purer spirit never left the earth. He wrote while he had strength to hold a pen. He died on the anniversary morning of the nation's birthday—and this was among his last prayers: "Oh, save my country!"

Gentlemen have said much about insurrection and rebellion; and, in language not very conciliatory, pointed all their allusions to the people of New England. Other rulers pronounced them rebels, more than thirty years ago; while many then unborn now wish to cover themselves with their mantle, and to share the honors of the patriots of 1776.

But, why should gentlemen be surprised that great discontents prevail in that country; and that the Legislatures, with a deliberation and solemnity which should command attention, have pronounced their opinions of the embargo? Gentlemen will recollect that there the Revolution began, of which Boston was the cradle. And if they will turn to the Declaration of Independence, they will find one of the reasons for the Colonies separating themselves from Great Britain, and renouncing the Government of the King, was, their enacting laws "for cutting off our trade with all parts of the world."

Mr. President, in a public document on our tables, we are told, that "after a period of twenty-five years of peace, hardly interrupted by transient hostilities, and of prosperity unparalleled in the history of nations, the United States are for the first time, since the treaty which terminated the Revolutionary war, placed in a situation equally difficult, critical, and dangerous."

That our country has enjoyed such unexampled prosperity, I readily agree: but the present is not the first time that these States have been placed in a difficult, critical, and dangerous situation.

The gentleman from Connecticut yesterday noticed the most difficult crisis. In 1793, it required all the firmness and immense popularity of President WASHINGTON, to stem the torrent of popular delusion, that was hurrying the United States into the vortex of the French Revolution.

In 1794, the same steadiness, the same undeviating pursuit of the public welfare, in spite of popular clamor and formal opposition, were necessary to institute a mission to Great Britain, to negotiate and settle with that Government questions of the highest moment to these States, and which, if they remained much longer unsettled, might endanger the peace of the nation. That negotiation, committed to the conduct of a statesman, than whom our country has produced not one more firm, more wise, or more upright, was, by his candor, ability, and decision, brought to a happy conclusion, in fewer months, than some more modern negotiations have occupied years, without being brought to any conclusion; unless their utter failure may be called a conclusion.

In 1795, the United States were agitated to their centre, by the opposition to the British Treaty. Artful and aspiring demagogues seized upon the known prejudices of the people in regard to the two great contending nations; and exerting all their faculties to keep up the popular delusion, hoped that, by the loud and extended clamor, the President would be deterred from ratifying the treaty which Mr. Jay had so happily concluded. Here again were displayed the firmness and patriotism of WASHINGTON. Always determined to pursue the true interests of the people, although at the hazard of his popularity, he ratified the treaty. Here it was presumed, all opposition would cease. But it again appeared, and with a more formidable aspect, in the National Legislature. But I will not dwell upon it. The treaty was finally carried into execution. It had, however, one more enemy to encounter.

Revolutionary France, wishing to involve us in a war with Great Britain, which this treaty, merely of amity and commerce, had prevented, pretended that it was equivalent to a Treaty of Alliance with Great Britain. And seizing on this pretence, at once to vent her resentment, and gratify the rapacity of her rulers with the plunder of our citizens, she let loose her cruisers upon our commerce.

We urged the obligations of treaties, violated by these captures. She answered, that she found only a real disadvantage in those obligations; and continued her depredations. Repeated missions of respectable Ministers to Paris endeavored to propitiate her rulers, and prevail on them to put a stop to such enormities. But they were deaf to the voice of justice. Then it was that our Government authorized an armed commerce, and equipped a small but gallant navy for its further protection; and made other defensive preparations, such as have been stated by the gentleman from Connecticut.

If, sir, our country is now placed in a situation more "difficult, critical and dangerous," than at any of the periods to which I have adverted, though I am very far from adopting that opinion, where shall we look for the cause? If in 1794, when England had powerful associates in her war with France, and the latter had been, comparatively, but little extended beyond her natural limits; the United States, with perhaps two-thirds of her present population, and less than half her present revenue, were able to induce England to accede to their just demands, and to close all differences by an advantageous treaty; how has it happened that the present Administration, with all the accession of power from an increased population, and a more than doubled revenue; when, too, gigantic France wielded the force and the resources of continental Europe; and England, single-handed, was left to meet a world in arms; how has it happened, that with these superior advantages and more powerful means, all the negotiations of the present Administration with England, one excepted, of local rather than general application, and which I need not explain, have failed? Had they been conducted with equal candor, ability, and dignity, must they not have produced as early, and at least as advantageous results? Was this a cause of their failure, that points of questionable right, because not settled by the universally acknowledged law of nations, and therefore of doubtful, or hopeless attainment, were pertinaciously insisted on?

Mr. President, to find a remedy for evils, as well in the body politic as in the natural body, it is necessary to investigate their causes.

Nearly eight years have elapsed since we were told, by the highest authority in the nation, that under the auspices of the Federal Government, the United States were then "in the full tide of successful experiment." And the report on our tables, to which I have before alluded, declares, in grave and solemn language, that during a period of twenty-five years, which brings us down to the embargo, the United States have enjoyed a "prosperity unexampled in the history of nations." Yet during the whole of this period of unequalled prosperity, arising from the active pursuits of commerce and agriculture, each giving life and vigor to the other, that commerce has been exposed to the aggressions of the belligerent nations. For those of Great Britain, up to near the close of 1794, compensation was made, pursuant to the provisions of Mr. Jay's treaty. For the like aggressions by Spain, the like indemnity was given by virtue of the treaty with that Power, concluded in October 1795. For French spoliations during the whole period of her revolutionary war, spoliations which have been estimated at not less than millions of dollars, we have received nothing? Nor have we obtained any reimbursement from Spain for the spoliations committed by her cruisers, after she became the ally of France.

Captures and condemnations, however, more or less extended, have never ceased; notwithstanding all which, and the continued imprisonment of seamen from our merchant vessels, the same unexampled prosperity has attended us; until suddenly, and to the astonishment of the nation, this flowing tide of successful commerce and agriculture was stopped by that fatal measure the embargo. The shock was aggravated by the concealment of its real cause. Sir, I hazard nothing in asserting, that to this day that cause has not been satisfactorily declared. Allow me time to justify this assertion. I bring together facts and circumstances, and then gentlemen will judge whether my conclusion be erroneous or just.

On the 14th of December, 1807, the despatches brought by the Revenge, from our Minister in Paris, were delivered to the Secretary of State. On her arrival at New York, reports brought by her stated, that the French Emperor had declared that there should be no neutrals. The sources of information, and the character of the Emperor, rendered those reports worthy of credit; and though afterwards publicly and stoutly denied, they were believed; and no gentleman here will now be inclined to doubt the fact. These reports, and the mystery which surrounded the recommended embargo, naturally excited suspicions and alarms.

Of the French papers supposed to be brought by the Revenge, none were communicated to Congress, save a letter dated September 24, 1807, from General Armstrong to M. Champagny, and his answer of the 7th of October, relative to the Berlin decree; and a letter from Regnier, Minister of Justice, to Champagny, giving the Emperor's interpretation of that decree. These three papers, with a newspaper copy of a Proclamation of the King of Great Britain issued in the same October, were all the papers communicated by the President to Congress, as the grounds on which he recommended the embargo. These papers, he said, "showed the great and increasing dangers with which our vessels, our seamen, and merchandise were threatened on the high seas and elsewhere, from the belligerent Powers of Europe."

As to the Proclamation of the King of Great Britain, requiring the return of his subjects, and particularly the seamen from foreign countries, it was no more than every government has a right to issue, and commonly does issue, in time of war. This Proclamation contained no evidence of increasing danger to "our seamen;" on the contrary, if I mistake not, (for I have not the Proclamation by me,) there was a solemn, public injunction to his naval officers to conduct impressments with increased caution and care. So that impressments would probably rather be diminished than increased.

Let us now examine the three other papers, all of which, as I have noticed, and as gentlemen remember, related to the decree of November 21, 1806. This decree was issued at Berlin, by the French Emperor, at the moment when, inflated with more than ordinary arrogance and pride, he was sitting in that capital of the Prussian monarchy, just then subverted by his arms.

The first articles declared all the British Isles in a state of blockade. This, according to its terms, subjected to capture and condemnation all neutral vessels bound to and from British ports; but it seems to have been held in a state of suspense. But another article, declaring "all merchandise belonging to England, or coming from its manufactories and colonies, (although belonging to neutrals,) to be lawful prize," was to be carried into execution. Such was the decision of the Emperor as stated by his Minister of Justice on the 18th of September, 1807, in his letter to Champagny. This decision coming to the knowledge of General Armstrong, he, on the 24th of September, wrote to Mr. Champagny, and asked "whether it was the Emperor's intention to infract the obligations of the treaty subsisting between the United States and the French Empire." Mr. Champagny, in his answer of the 7th of October, inclosing the letter of the Minister of Justice, with wonderful assurance, tells General Armstrong that it was easy to reconcile the execution of the decree with the observance of treaties; although nothing was more obvious, (as Mr. MADISON, on the 8th of February last, wrote to General Armstrong,) than that it violated as well the positive stipulations of our treaty with France, as the incontestable principles of public law.

In the European ports, under the Emperor's control, and even in neutral ports, the decree was rigorously executed. And, although it is said there was no formal decision in the French Council of Prizes, condemning American property, under the decree, until the 16th day of October, 1807; yet, Mr. Madison states, as early as the 22d of May, 1807, (in his letter of that date to General Armstrong,) that "there were proofs that the French West India privateers had, under color of the edict, (the Berlin decree,) committed depredations" on our commerce. And, moreover, that Spain "avowedly pursuing the example and the views of the French Emperor," had issued a similar decree, and even in broader terms, which, "if not speedily recalled or corrected, would doubtless extend the scene of spoliations already begun in that quarter."

Such were the French papers in this case. And now let us see the amount of "the great and increasing dangers which threatened our vessels, our seamen, and merchandise."

In the letter of February 8, 1808, from Mr. Madison to General Armstrong, speaking of the Berlin decree, and the Emperor's decision thereon, Mr. Madison says: "The conduct of the French Government, in giving this extended operation to its decree, and, indeed, in issuing one with such an apparent or doubtful import, against the rights of the sea, is the more extraordinary, inasmuch as the inability to enforce it on that element, exhibited the measure in the light of an empty menace." And in his letter of the 25th of March, 1808, to Mr. Erskine, Mr. Madison, speaking of the same decree, says "that France was without the means to carry it into effect against the rights and obligations of a neutral nation."

Thus, then, we see the President's "great and increasing dangers with which our vessels, our seamen, and merchandise, were threatened on the high seas and elsewhere," and its extended operation, rested on what he, through his Secretary, Mr. Madison, has since pronounced "an empty menace," a project "which France had no means to carry into effect."

Shall I be told, Mr. President, of the British Orders of Council? and that they were comprehended in the President's view of the great and increasing dangers to which our commerce was exposed? If that were the fact, was it not his duty to give such information of them as he possessed, to the Senate? He gave none. I know that those orders were afterwards pressed into his service to justify the measure; and still later it has been confidently said, "that those orders stood in front of the real causes of the embargo;" and yet they were invisible to the Senate. What! the great, the operative cause of the embargo, "before which all other motives sunk into insignificance," not seen, not known to the Senate! Not glanced at by the President in his Message, nor intimated to any of the members who were honored with his confidence, and by them to the Senate!

But, from reasoning, I will recur to written proofs, furnished by the President himself, and now on our tables.

In Mr. Madison's letter to Mr. Pinkney, the President's Minister in London, dated December 23, 1807, the next day after the act laying an embargo was passed; and this, after it had undergone three days of earnest opposition in the House of Representatives, during which it behooved the father of the measure, and his friends, to furnish every possible argument to silence opposition, and to satisfy the nation of its expediency and necessity; after all this, Mr. Madison, in that letter, tells Mr. Pinkney that "the policy and the causes of the measure are explained in the Message itself." The contents of the Message (comprehending the papers it referred to) I have already stated; and the statement demonstrates, that they were not the causes or motives of the embargo; for an "empty menace," a decree without the means of carrying it into effect, could be no cause, no motive for a measure, whose avowed object was "to save our vessels, our seamen, and merchandise, from great and increasing dangers."

Sir, let all the documents laid on our tables by the President be examined, and you will not find one in which he hazards the assertion, that the British orders of November 11, were known to him at the time he recommended the embargo, or that an expectation of them determined his recommendation. It was not until the 2d of February, when they had been officially communicated by the British Minister, that he offered them to Congress "as a farther proof of the increasing dangers to our navigation and commerce, which led to the provident measure of the act laying an 'embargo.'" And Mr. Madison, in his letter to Mr. Pinkney of February 19, 1808, cautiously avoids ascribing the origin of the embargo to the British orders; though, he says, the probability of such decrees was among the considerations which "enforced" the measure; the language of the British gazettes, with other indications, having, he said, left little doubt that such orders were "meditated." And he adds, that "the appearance of these decrees (meaning the British orders) had much effect in reconciling all descriptions among us to the embargo."

But I must notice the change of language in Mr. Madison's last letter. In that of December 23 to Mr. Pinkney, he says, "the policy and the causes of the embargo are explained in the President's Message." But in his letter of February 19, he says, "my last (that of December 23) inclosed a copy of the act of embargo, and explained the policy of the measure;" leaving out "causes," and introducing the unknown British orders as among the considerations which enforced it.

The President, too, in his answer to the Boston petition for suspending the embargo, says, not that the British orders were known to exist at the time when the embargo was laid; but only that they were in existence at the date of the law; from which the unwary reader might suppose that they were known to exist at that date.

From all these considerations, it appears to be demonstrated, that the British Orders in Council of November 11, 1807, were not known, and that the newspaper rumors concerning them never entered into the views of the President and Congress, as a motive for laying the embargo. And here the well-known maxim applies, de non apparentibus et non existentibus eadem est lex. Although the British orders were in existence, yet, as they were not known to exist, they were, as to the embargo, nonentities.

The conclusions resulting from the facts and circumstances which I have collected and compared, are serious and alarming. They demonstrate that the representation, in the President's Message recommending the embargo, was delusive, calculated to lead Congress into the belief that the situation of the United States, in relation to France and England, was extremely perilous, requiring the instant adoption of the measure recommended. And as Congress did adopt it, enacting the law recommended, it must be presumed that they believed an embargo was necessary to preserve our vessels, our seamen, and merchandise, from the great and increasing dangers with which the Message stated that they were threatened.

It also follows, as no subsequent disclosure has been made of other dangers known at the time the Message was communicated, that the real cause or motive for the embargo has been, and yet is, veiled from the eye of Congress and the nation.

M. Champagny's letter of October 7, (one of the papers communicated with the President's Message,) requires examination. But I should first remark that, during the years 1806 and 1807, in order to reduce England, by destroying her commerce, the French Emperor, in execution of, and in the spirit of his Berlin decree, ordered all English merchandise to be seized and confiscated in every place on the European continent, enemy or neutral, occupied or which should be occupied, by the French armies. For this purpose, and as one instance among many, his troops took possession of Hamburg, a city with which American merchants carried on a large and valuable commerce, and which, as neutral, was entitled to the same exemption from hostile violence as the territory of the United States, and by the Emperor's orders, Bourrienne, his accredited Minister to that free city, addressed a note to the Senate, in which, having stated that every person who traded on the Continent in English merchandise, seconded the views of England, and ought to be considered as her accomplice; and that a great portion of the inhabitants of Hamburg were in that predicament, and notoriously attached to England; the Emperor caused possession to be taken of their city, and his Berlin decree to be carried into rigorous execution. Accordingly, that Minister, in obedience to the Emperor's orders, among other outrages, declared, "all English merchandises that may be found in the city, in the harbor, or on the territory of Hamburg, no matter to whom they belong, shall be confiscated." This was done so early as the 24th of November, 1806, only three days after the Berlin decree was issued.

With equal atrocity the Emperor caused to be seized and sequestered the vessels and cargoes of neutrals which were brought into, or voluntarily resorted to, the ports of France for purposes of lawful trade. And we know, from a source which will not be questioned, that their liberation was hopeless; because they were worth eighteen or twenty millions of dollars!

Of the vast property thus plundered, a large portion belongs to citizens of the United States. On the 15th of January last the Emperor's Minister, Champagny, wrote to our Minister, General Armstrong, that their property would remain sequestered until a decision should be had thereon; and this decision depended on our associating or refusing to associate ourselves with him and his allied States in their war with Great Britain. Indeed the Emperor was willing to save us the trouble of considering and deciding for ourselves: he declared war for us. "War exists then in fact between England and the United States," are the words of Champagny, in the letter just mentioned! What measures ought to be kept with such a Power? While we are yet independent, he undertakes to prescribe the line of conduct we shall observe, on pain of confiscation of all the property of our innocent and unsuspecting merchants within his grasp! And this monstrous outrage upon our honor and independence, the Secretary of State, with very exemplary meekness, says, "had the air, at least, of an assumed authority!"*

Where his armies did not thus penetrate and plunder, the French Emperor sent to the several Powers on the Continent, whether Emperors, Kings, or petty States, requiring (or, which from him was equivalent to a command, inviting) them to shut their ports against the commerce of England; and, Sweden excepted, (between whom and the French armies lay a narrow sea guarded by Swedish and British ships,) all obeyed. Even the Emperor of Austria, though at peace with England, shut against her his two or three little ports at the head of the Adriatic Sea.

The Prince Regent of Portugal, whose country for more than a century had lived in friendship with England, was the last to obey. But, though he shut his ports, national faith and gratitude towards his friends, forbade his arresting Englishmen and English merchandise. By shutting his ports, he hoped to appease the Emperor, and save his kingdom. But his fate had been determined; although Portugal had for many years been paying a heavy tribute to France, and been, moreover, anxious to observe the duties of a neutral nation. To save himself and family from disgrace and bondage, the Prince quitted his kingdom; finding an asylum in his American dominions.

Thus we have seen the French Emperor not only shutting his own ports and those of his allies, but even those of neutral States, against British commerce; and seizing and confiscating the merchandise proceeding from England and her colonies, although belonging to neutrals, and on neutral territories; and that this unexampled scene of devastation commenced within four days after the Berlin decree was issued.

It was after she had witnessed all these atrocities, and seen the deadly weapon aimed at her vitals, that England issued her retaliating orders of November 11th, 1807.

I now recur to Mr. Champagny's letter of October 7, to General Armstrong, in answer to his inquiry, "whether (in executing the Berlin decree) it was His Majesty's intention to infract the obligations of the treaty now subsisting between the United States and the French Empire?" The answer to which has been already recited.

Allow me to repeat, that this letter of Champagny was one of the four papers communicated by the President with his Message recommending the embargo, and one of the two which, after being read, was not then suffered to remain on the files of the Senate, but was returned to the President, together with General Armstrong's letter to which it was an answer, agreeably to his request. Subsequent events drew it from the Cabinet. Gentlemen will also recollect, that the concluding paragraph of the President's Message, in which he desired a return of those two letters, was ordered by the Senate to be omitted; so that no evidence of the existence of those letters could appear on the Senate's Journal, or in the printed copy. In this letter of Champagny, the views of the French Emperor were but too clearly indicated. To render his decree of blockade "more effectual" (that is in destroying the commerce of England) "its execution must be complete." But as it could not be complete while the vessels of the United States (then with those of England carrying on, almost exclusively, the commerce of the world) continued their extensive trade with England, we were, in language sufficiently intelligible, invited to fall into the imperial ranks, with the maritime Powers of Europe, whom the French Emperor had marshalled against England, and "to unite in support of the same cause;" that is, to destroy the commerce of England. But the people of the United States would have been shocked at an open proposition to shut their ports against the English commerce, at the command or invitation of the French Emperor; they would not have endured it. The measure could be accomplished only by an embargo, and that wrapped up in the mystery which I have endeavored to unfold.

The letter of Champagny must have arrived in the Revenge; and General Armstrong's despatches by her, reached Washington, as Mr. Madison informs us, on the 14th of December; and on the 18th the embargo was proposed and recommended! Four days gave little enough time to digest and mature such a plan!

These, sir, are my views of the origin of the embargo; the result of a careful, and I trust, an impartial investigation. The material facts are on record. Of my reasonings and conclusions gentlemen will judge. If these be correct, the course to be pursued must be obvious. The nation's honor is compatible with the repeal of the embargo. The welfare of our country is not to be sacrificed to the views or feelings of those who have brought it into its present situation.

Let then, the resolution before us be adopted and the embargo removed. As the British Orders in Council were not the cause of the embargo, the honor of the United States is not pledged for their previous repeal.

When Mr. PICKERING had concluded, the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, December 1.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to Congress a report from the Surveyor of the Public Buildings, of the progress made on them during the last session, of their present state, and the

DECEMBER 1, 1808.

The Message and report were read and ordered to lie for consideration.

THE EMBARGO.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the 11th ultimo, for repealing the "Act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States," and the several acts supplementary thereto.

Mr. ANDERSON addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: Two considerations had determined me to give a silent vote upon the resolutions before the Senate; one is, that my sight has been very much affected by an inflammation which I have long had in my eyes, in consequence of which I have not been able to give the necessary examination to the documents which have been published, that have a particular relation to this subject; the other is, that the very able and luminous discussion which has been given to the subject, both in a political and commercial point of view, by the gentlemen who have spoken against the adoption of the resolution, had left little if anything to be said. But, sir, the speech which the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. PICKERING) read in his place yesterday, has determined me to endeavor to answer him. In following the gentleman, I was obliged to take very hasty notes, for his speech being written, he was not obliged to make those pauses which are usually made in public speaking, and which afford time to take more copious notes. I shall, therefore, be obliged to answer the gentleman almost entirely from memory.

In discussing this subject, sir, I think it totally unimportant to inquire whether France or England has done us the most injury, or which was the first aggressor upon our neutral rights. It is admitted by all, that both have given us ample cause of war, and that each has done us much more injury than we are ever likely to receive reparation for. It is our business, therefore, to pursue that course that we conceive will produce the best effect upon both those nations, without evidencing the least partiality for either the one or the other. If, sir, they should both see that we united against them, every measure we adopt would have its proper effect; but if either of those nations should discover that they have any apologists among us, and more particularly in the councils of our nation, every measure we adopt against such nation, must lose full half of its effect. Having made these preliminary observations, I will proceed to consider the arguments of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. PICKERING,) which he has offered in support of the resolution. He has said that no cause whatever existed for laying the embargo; and then proceeds to state the Message of the President and the papers which accompanied it. Those papers, he tells you, were a proclamation of the King of England, requiring the return of his subjects, and particularly the seamen from foreign countries—a letter from General Armstrong to Champagny, and his answer, dated 7th October, relative to the Berlin decree—and a letter from Regnier, Minister of Justice, to Champagny, containing the Emperor's interpretation of that decree.

As to the proclamation, says the gentleman, it contained no evidence of increasing danger to our seamen, for it contained a solemn injunction to the naval officers to conduct impressments with increased caution and care; so that, says the gentleman, impressments would probably rather be diminished than increased. With respect to the construction of the proclamation, Mr. President, I differ greatly with the gentleman. In my opinion, it was intended to extend the arbitrary right of impressment; it speaks a language that cannot be misunderstood; it authorizes any subaltern officer who might be sent on board of merchant vessels to impress all such of their crews as might be taken, or mistaken, for British natural born subjects, those officers being the sole and absolute judges in the case; and the proclamation has expressly directed the officer to pay no respect whatever to certificates of citizenship from any foreign State. I will read a part of the proclamation: "And whereas our natural born subjects have been induced to accept letters of naturalization, or certificates of citizenship, from foreign States, and have been taught to believe that, by such letters, or certificates, they are discharged from that duty of allegiance which, as our natural born subjects, they owe to us—Now, we do hereby warn all such mariners, seafaring men, and others, our natural born subjects, that no such letter of naturalization, or certificate of citizenship, do, or can in any manner divest our natural born subjects of the allegiance, or in any degree alter the duty which they owe to us, their lawful sovereign." Can the gentleman, for one moment, believe, after hearing this language of the British proclamation, that it was intended (as he has said) to diminish impressments? I think it impossible. It is evidently intended to extend impressments, not only to seamen, as such, but to every citizen of the United States who has been naturalized since the acknowledgment of our independence by Great Britain, and who might perchance be found on board a merchant vessel. And would not this extensive kind of search render our native American seamen much more liable to be taken than before the issuing of this proclamation? For the gentleman himself has, upon a former occasion, said, that the British and American seamen were so much alike in their manners, habits, and language, that it was no easy matter to distinguish one from the other. And is it not highly probable, sir, that if so great a likeness has been discovered by one of our own citizens, that at least as great a likeness would be discovered by a British officer who might want seamen, and who had been directed by the proclamation to pay no respect to certificates of citizenship, which had often heretofore protected our citizen seamen against impressments, but which were now all prostrated by the British proclamation? It is rather singular, Mr. President, that Great Britain should set up this claim to naturalized citizens, when by her own statute laws she declares, that "any foreign mariner, or seaman, who serves on board a British man of war, any British merchant vessel, or privateer, during the time of war, for the term of two years, shall, to all intents and purposes, be deemed, and taken to be, a natural born subject of Great Britain." And this nation, the gentlemen has told us, is so firm, that she never recedes from any ground she has taken: hence we are to conclude, that every American citizen whom she can thus metamorphose into a British subject, she will never give up. If then, sir, American citizens are impressed and put on board British vessels in time of war, and remain on board two years during a time of war, according to the statute law of Great Britain, such American citizens become British subjects, and, as such, are never to be given up; and yet no British subject can become an American citizen by our statute laws; for, says the British proclamation, no letter of naturalization, or certificate of citizenship, from any foreign State, do, or can in any manner divest our natural born subjects of the allegiance they owe us, their lawful Sovereign. Does not this proclamation show great and increasing dangers to our seamen? To my mind it does.

I will now examine the other papers which the gentleman has taken notice of, which accompanied the President's Message. These relate to the Berlin decree, passed the 21st November, 1806; this decree was not put in force against neutral vessels for near a year thereafter.

On the 24th of September, 1807, General Armstrong, in a letter to M. Champagny, said that he had learned that a new and extensive construction, highly injurious to the commerce of the United States, was about to be given to the Berlin decree, and asks for an explanation of the Emperor's views in relation to the subject; and on the 7th of October receives for answer, that since His Majesty had not thought proper to express any exception in his decree, (with respect to neutrals,) there was no ground to make any in the execution with respect to anything whatever. This exposition of the Berlin decree, by the Emperor of France, placed in jeopardy all our vessels which might infringe its provisions, and showed the great danger from thenceforward accruing to our commerce. M. Champagny also tells General Armstrong, in the reference he makes to the explanations of the Procureur General of the Council of Prizes, that His Majesty has not decided the question, whether French armed vessels may possess themselves of neutral vessels going to or from England, although they have no English merchandise on board. The doubting manner in which the French Emperor speaks upon this subject, evidently shows his intention, and, of course, the increasing dangers to our ships and merchandise; and the state of things which has since taken place in Europe tends completely to show the well-timed wisdom of laying the embargo.

But, Mr. President, there was another consideration which presented itself at the time, serious and imposing. Shall I be told, says the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. PICKERING,) of the British Orders of Council? I answer by assuring him, that he will be told that the British Orders of Council had a very imposing influence in laying the embargo; they were in many of the public papers, and published in such a manner, and under such circumstances, as could hardly leave a doubt of their having been actually signed by the King on the 11th of November, as stated in the National Intelligencer: and here I hope I may be permitted to take the same ground to prove the fact, that the gentleman has himself taken upon a former occasion; he has said, that the National Intelligencer is considered, and generally believed to be, the Government paper; and that any publication which appears in it as emanating from the Administration, is considered as true. Now, sir, I shall only ask of the gentleman to grant me as much with respect to the British ministerial paper—I think called the Sun—from which paper the National Intelligencer had taken the British publication respecting the Orders of Council, and which stated that those orders had been agreed upon by His Majesty, in Council, on the 11th November, and that they were to be signed by the King on the fourteenth. Thus, then, Mr. President, if the gentleman gives as much credit to the publication of a British ministerial paper, with respect to the transactions of the British Cabinet, as he has thought proper to give to the publication of what he calls our own Administration paper, he must admit that the British publication respecting the Orders of Council was true, and, of course, entitled to credit. But if any doubt yet remains with the gentleman with respect to the British Orders of Council being known here before the Message of the President was sent to Congress recommending the embargo, I will refer him to the evidence given before the British House of Commons, the authenticity of which, I expect he will not doubt.

It is stated by Mr. Martin, an eminent merchant, that on the 12th of November he wrote a circular letter to his American correspondent, which letter was received in America on the 12th or 13th of December, but he believed on the 12th. In this letter, he says that he stated—"It is strongly reported that it is the intention of our Government to extend the system of blockade to France, and the respective States on the Continent under her influence, prohibiting from entrance into any of their ports all vessels whatever, unless such as have last cleared from Great Britain and her dependencies."

Mr. Kinder, another eminent merchant, produced a New York paper, dated the 15th December, in which it was stated, that "the English Government have not issued their proclamation declaring France and her dependencies in a state of siege, and prohibiting all intercourse with them, except direct from a British port, it not having received the signature of the King. A private letter from a member of Parliament,

'mentions that it would be published in the Gazette on the 14th." There are several other proofs made before the House of Commons of a similar character, which I do not think necessary to produce; those which I have adduced, tend most fully to prove, that the British Orders of Council were well known in America some days before the embargo law passed; that they were in fact published in the British ministerial paper on the 14th of November, (as stated in the National Intelligencer, they were to be,) being the very day on which the private letter from the member of Parliament stated that they were to be published. I now trust that the gentleman from Massachusetts will admit, that the British Orders of Council were fully known in this country, known to every member of Congress who had attended to the reading of the newspapers; that he will not say they have been pressed into our service, but that they are fairly proved to have been known, and have had an imposing influence in laying the embargo. But, says the gentleman, if those orders were comprehended in the view of the President, was it not his duty to give such information of them to the Senate? Sir, I do not believe it was his duty to communicate officially, unofficial information. The gentleman well knows, that as President, he is responsible for all his communications, and that he ought to have the most unequivocal proof of every fact which he communicates for our information: and such I believe are the impressions of the gentleman himself—for it will be recollected, that although the British proclamation which accompanied the Message of the President appeared to have every mark of authenticity, (and had been officially published by the British Government,) yet as it had not been officially made known to our Government, the gentleman appeared to be of opinion it ought not to have been communicated by the President; and I am induced to this belief by the gentleman's own showing, for in his letter to Governor Sullivan, in mentioning the papers received from the President, he says, that one of them, meaning the proclamation, was cut out of a newspaper—thereby evidently inferring, that no information but such as the President had officially received ought to have been communicated. If then, Mr. President, the gentleman was so much dissatisfied with the proclamation being sent, which had been published officially, but not officially made known to our Government, how much more so would he have been, had the President sent us unauthenticated publications taken from the newspapers? Besides, the newspaper information was in everybody's hands, and the Senate are not foreclosed from availing themselves of information, from any extraneous source, upon every subject on which they are called to decide. That we decided rightly in laying the embargo, is believed by our country and the world; and had we even decided wrong, we erred upon the safe side, for the means of immediate relief was within our own power. But not so, if the embargo had not been laid; then, indeed, would a very great portion of our seamen, ships, and merchandise, have been wrested from us, perhaps forever: but, sir, happily for our country, the precautionary wisdom of the President, saw, and warned us of our approaching danger; and from the resources that have thus been saved to our country, we are ready and willing to prove to the world, that "we have millions for defence, but not one cent for tribute."

It has been said by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. PICKERING,) that the embargo has not produced the effect its friends had foretold. He will acknowledge, I expect, sir, that it has had a very unfair trial.

Our Government, Mr. President, being predicated upon and supported by the will of the people, that will, in order to induce a strict conformance to the law, should be correctly informed by those from whom the people have a right to expect correct information, but should never be led astray.

But unhappily, sir, with respect to the law under consideration, this has not been the case. Scarce had the law passed before the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. P.) had recourse to very extraordinary means to render it unpopular. He addressed a letter of a very extraordinary character to the Governor of Massachusetts, with intent, as he said, to have it presented to the Legislature, and through them to the people; thereby evidently intending to create an alarm, which was by no means warranted by the passage of the act. What the gentleman's views were, he best can tell. This letter, going from a Senator of the United States, (at a time, too, when Congress was in session,) gave it an imposing influence with the people. It immediately became the life and soul of the Federal newspapers; they sounded it from one end of the Continent to the other. Many weak minds were led astray by it, and it would have done infinite mischief had it not been for the timely appearance of a very able letter written in answer to it, by the gentleman's former colleague, (Mr. ADAMS.) It, nevertheless, had considerable effect upon the immoral, dissolute, and disorderly; it taught them to disrespect the law, being supported by the authority of a Senator, who had written so severe a philippic against it. The tocsin of alarm being sounded against the Administration for having recommended the embargo, and the majority for having passed it, party feelings and prejudices were brought to operate against it; and before it could have a chance of a fair trial as to the effects it might produce, its infringements became numerous, and its operative effects were measurably destroyed. But, sir, I consider the evasions of the law in our own ports but a minor evil compared with those which have been produced by other means. This letter, with all its contingent consequences, was communicated to England, (where, I have been informed, it was considered of so much consequence to that nation as to pass through eight or ten editions,) and by that letter and its accompanying information, the British Government was given to understand, that very great dissatisfaction prevailed among the people. It was, in fact, a notification to that Government to adhere to their Orders of Council, in order that the continuance of the embargo might make a more effectual impression upon the feelings and immediate interests of the people, and thereby change the character of our elections, not only in our States and Congressional districts, but upon our great national election also. But, notwithstanding all these means, thus devised and thus executed, we have to congratulate ourselves, that the good sense and patriotism of our fellow-citizens have prevailed, and we yet remain sustained by the commanding voice of the nation.

That impressions of the character to which I have alluded had been made upon the mind of Mr. Canning, is evident from the correspondence; for Mr. Pinkney, in his letter to the Secretary of State, of the 4th of August, says, that on the 29th of June, he had a conversation with Mr. Canning, which had rendered it somewhat probable that the object mentioned in Mr. Madison's letter of the 30th April, would be accomplished, if he, Mr. Pinkney, should authorize the expectation which that letter suggests. This letter from Mr. Madison to Mr. Pinkney says, "the President is authorized, in such event, (that is, the rescinding of the British Orders of Council,) to suspend in whole, or in part, the several embargo laws." It is evident, from Mr. Pinkney's letter, that on the 29th of June, Mr. Canning evinced a disposition to accede to the equitable and liberal views of the President, which I have already explained. But between the 29th of June and the 23d of September, some extraordinary cause had produced a very different disposition in Mr. Canning, as appears by his letter of the latter date. Upon this letter I shall make no comment; it is before the people, and they will, no doubt, judge of it as they ought. But, sir, I would inquire, from what cause did this change in the British Government proceed? Not from the convulsions in Spain, as has been stated, for they were well known in England previous to the 29th June; nor from the trifling disturbances in Vermont, (which some gentlemen have endeavored to magnify, but) which were of too insignificant a character to produce any effect upon a Government so well informed and enlightened as Great Britain, and one so accustomed to experience, and suppress similar trifling disorders among their people. The real cause of this change in Mr. Canning must then be sought from some other source; and, in my opinion, it can only be found in the torrent of unfounded information, which the British Government had received (after the 29th of June,) of the tenor and character I have already described. To this cause may justly be attributed the continuance of the embargo at this time, and, of course, the real reasons why it had not produced its desired effect; for had it not been for the improper and delusive impressions made upon the British Government, from the causes I have stated, we have reason to believe that Mr. Canning would have accepted the liberal offer made by our Government; the Orders of Council would have been rescinded, the embargo would of course have been raised, and our country would at this time be enjoying the benefits of a lucrative and extensive commerce. Mr. President, I have taken some pains to prove that the President had ample cause for recommending the embargo, and Congress for passing the law; and I have endeavored to show why it has not had its full and desired effect: how far I have succeeded in either, this honorable House will judge.

Upon that part of the subject upon which I shall now speak, (it being entirely of a mercantile character,) I shall not pretend to enter into detail; more especially as the honorable gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. SMITH,) who is a practical merchant, has given us a very satisfactory, able, and extensive view of it. I shall, therefore, be concise, confining my observations to the Orders of Council and the French decrees. I shall take as a postulatam, that all the reasons which operated in laying the embargo, operate with equal, if not greater force, against adopting the resolution for the repeal of the law. I will ask whether any change in our foreign relations has taken place that would now render it more safe to navigate the ocean than when the embargo was laid? The contrary is the fact—for the Orders of Council, which were then only unofficially known, have since been officially communicated to our Government, with all their numerous and appendant explanations, which have rendered the original orders infinitely more complex. Those Orders of Council, with all their modifications, have been confirmed by act of Parliament; and by that act, power is given to the King in Council, further to modify, alter, or extend their provisions at pleasure; so that now we have not even the certainty of those orders, or of the acts of Parliament, upon which to depend, since the King in Council can, and no doubt will, whenever they see cause, adopt a new system of orders, to operate precisely in the manner, and at the time which they might conceive most convenient to themselves, or perhaps most injurious to us; for, from the evidences we have had of the disposition of that Government towards our commerce, we have little indulgence to hope. Those Orders of Council are so susceptible of a variety of construction, so dependent on the will of the Admiralty judge, and the more inscrutable, but not less dangerous will of the King and Council, that an American vessel could scarce hope to make a voyage to almost any port with safety. If our vessels take in cargoes of our own produce, and clear for any port on the Continent of Europe, they are taken by British cruisers and carried to England, for the purpose of paying the transit duty, as it is called, but which, in fact, is a tribute exacted from us, for the privilege of trading to places, to which, as an independent nation, we have a right to go: and this, as has been truly said by my friend from Virginia, (Mr. GILES) is exercising a power over our native exports, which by the Constitution has been denied to Congress. This, indeed, if submitted to, will succumb the best interest of our country, and destroy every attribute of our national independence. Again, our vessels returning from a foreign port, are equally liable to be carried into England by British armed ships, there to pay tribute for the privilege of bringing home their cargo, as in the case of the Sophia. She had only a few casks of gin on board, merely as ballast, but she was nevertheless taken into England, and compelled to pay several thousand dollars, and to purchase a permit to return to her own country! Can we, as an independent nation, submit to these intolerable impositions? And yet, sir, raising the embargo without some more energetic measures being adopted, would be to tell the world, we are so humble a people, so fond of commerce, that we will prostrate both our honor and our independence for the purpose of obtaining it. Forbid it, the spirit and principles of seventy-six! Young, at that day—scarcely in the gristle—not having reached half our present strength—oppressed by the same domineering Power whose ships now cover the ocean, we indignantly refused to submit to similar impositions, although a pretext then existed for claiming a right to exercise them. We, then, were colonies; we, notwithstanding, resisted—first with mildness, but with firmness; and when they refused to listen to the justice of our cause, we appealed to arms, and trusted to the God of battles. We fought, our cause prevailed, and our rights and independence were acknowledged. Some of us still live who devoted not only the springtide and summer of our days, but often risked our lives to achieve these blessings to our country. They were too dearly bought to be tamely surrendered, nor will my countrymen ever agree to surrender them; yet such would be in fact the case, were we to submit to trade under the restrictions of these degrading Orders of Council. Mr. President, in addition to the operation of the British Orders of Council upon our commerce, we have to add the catalogue of French decrees, some of which have come to our knowledge since laying the embargo; and although those decrees cannot affect our commerce in any considerable degree, proportioned to those of England, yet their provisions are equally hostile to the rights of a free and independent nation. Although they have not said, we shall pay tribute for the privilege of carrying our produce to any foreign country, they have said, that if our vessels are caught carrying our own produce to England, they shall be good prize; and the Milan decree has gone so far as to change the character of an American vessel, if in going to a port not even within the purview of the Orders of Council, such vessel shall have been spoken by an English vessel; thus these two Powers, under the pretext of retaliating decrees against each other, sweep the American commerce upon the ocean, wherever either the one or the other can bring it within the provisions of their respective decrees: and we have seen enough of their effects upon some of our vessels that were upon foreign voyages when the embargo was laid, to know that these decrees of France are like those of England, rigidly executed. We have therefore seen, that even as far as the French decrees can be carried into effect, they tend greatly to injure our commerce, and that from both England and France, under the operation of their tyrannic decrees and Orders of Council, we have sustained severe and heavy losses. These orders and decrees still stand in full force, and ready to meet your commerce upon the ocean whenever your embargo shall be raised, especially in the extensive manner contemplated by the resolution upon your table, which evidently intends a total repeal of the law, and without any substitute being offered in its place.

I will now, sir, reply to some observations of the gentleman from Connecticut. He has said that our object in continuing the embargo, is to put down commerce; and I have often heard it said, that the Western and Southern members are unfriendly to commerce. This I deny, as it respects myself. But as I have often been opposed to the extension of our laws (and sometimes successfully) relative to that branch of commerce called the carrying trade, I suppose I may be one of those whom the gentleman has said were opposed to commerce. I will, Mr. President, give my views of the subject, and state my reasons why I have not been very friendly to that kind of trade. When I first took my seat as a member of this House, I considered it my duty to endeavor to make myself acquainted with the revenue laws (which it is known are pretty complex) by which I should be the better able to discharge my duties upon this floor, in a national point of view; and if any collisions of interest should happen from the operation of those laws, between agriculture and commerce, by discovering this collision, I could more faithfully and ably guard the true interest of my constituents, almost all of whom are, as well as myself, agriculturists. In examining these laws, I will acknowledge the drawback system did not fully meet my approbation. It appeared to me, sir, to put too much at hazard the peace of our country. I will not attempt to enter into a full and minute detail of this trade, but will take a sufficient view of it to make myself understood. This trade, Mr. President, it is known is carried on almost entirely in foreign articles, which are imported into this country, and entered for re-exportation. The duties upon those articles which are re-exported, amount to but a small sum compared with the immense tonnage engaged in that trade: the tonnage thus engaged amounts to one-third of the whole tonnage of the United States; and yet the duties do not amount to more than one-fifteenth. The whole duties received from this drawback system amount to about one million of dollars a year, and the whole revenue of the United States, say about sixteen millions. This sum of one million of dollars, thus derived from this kind of trade, is in my opinion too small to hazard so much for it as we do. This trade creates a collision of interest between our own shipping and the shipping interest of the great naval Powers, even when the trade is freely permitted; for, in proportion to the quantity of foreign produce our vessels engaged in this trade carry, in so great a degree do they interfere with the shipping interest of those great naval States, whose existence, in a considerable degree, particularly England, depends upon the support of their navies, and the carrying trade is essential to that support: first, to supply the means of subsistence for immense numbers, who could not be otherwise well supported; and, secondly, by keeping those ships employed in this carrying trade, they create and maintain seamen for the nation, which may and will be wanted in time of war. We do not want this kind of trade, Mr. President, to supply us with seamen for our Navy: our fisheries are encouraged in a sufficient degree for that purpose, and I trust it will be a long time before we shall attempt to establish anything like what may be called a national Navy. From this trade our country is much more liable to be involved in war than we could possibly be by carrying on the whole amount of our own direct and immediate commerce, which nets to the nation, as I have before stated, full fifteen times as much annual revenue as is produced by the carrying trade: and yet this immense commerce, carried on in our own produce, employs but about double the tonnage that is employed in the carrying trade. So extensively, Mr. President, had our merchants engaged in this carrying trade, which although lawful according to the recognised principles of neutrality, predicated upon the established law of nations; yet so great a pressure did it make upon the political views and shipping interest of Great Britain, that she determined to arrest it; accordingly her Courts of Admiralty were directed to declare "that neutrals should not carry on a trade in time of war that was not permitted to them in time of peace, and that they should not be permitted to effect that in a circuitous, which is inhibited in a direct trade." Thus, sir, from the extension of this trade, were we now brought to the eve of war with Great Britain—for under this new principle, thus interpolated, our ships were taken in immense numbers, and few escaped condemnation. In consequence, memorials have been presented to Congress from a principal part of all the great cities in the United States, stating in very strong terms the iniquity and injustice of this new principle, introduced by Great Britain to the almost total annihilation of this carrying trade. These memorials contain a train of reasoning upon this subject, in support of this neutral right, that I think unanswerable: and so much were those merchants engaged at that time in supporting it, that they tendered their lives and fortunes to their country. The right to trade being unequivocally a long established neutral right, the Senate determined to sustain it: accordingly, by an unanimous vote, this body resolved, that the capture and condemnation under the orders of the British Government, and adjudications of their Courts of Admiralty, of American vessels and their cargoes, on the pretext of their being employed in a trade with the enemies of Great Britain prohibited in time of peace, is an unprovoked aggression upon the property of the citizens of these United States, a violation of their neutral rights, and an encroachment upon their national independence." This resolution is very expressive of the sense of the Senate, but we did not stop here; we passed another resolution recommending to the President of the United States, "to demand and insist upon the restoration of the property of our citizens, which had been thus captured and condemned;" and requested the President "to enter into such arrangements with the British Government, upon this and all other differences, as might be consistent with the honor and interest of the United States." The negotiation thus recommended, the President has not been able to effect, according to the tenor of the resolution: that is, consistent with the honor and interest of the United States—although he sent a special Minister for that purpose. Great Britain now pretends to sustain this new principle, under the pretext of its being an old established rule, commonly called the rule of fifty-six; and the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. PICKERING,) who formerly voted in favor of the resolutions which I have read, has introduced a book to support this rule of fifty-six, of which I will hereafter take notice. Thus, Mr. President, we see how nearly we have been to a war for the support of this neutral trade, which yields us so very small a revenue. I am therefore of opinion, that the landed interest ought not to be compromised for the support of this trade. I am willing to support it to a certain extent, but not so far as to hazard the peace of my country. I have now given my reasons for not being friendly to this drawback system; and representing, as I do, an agricultural people, I consider it my imperative duty to watch with vigilance over their interests, which they have confided to my care, and which I trust I shall never cease to support while I possess the power of speech, and words preserve their form and meaning. But, Mr. President, I can with confidence say for my fellow-citizens, and for myself, that we are truly friendly to the true American commerce—meaning that kind, sir, that is carried on with the produce of our own country. This will bring us into no collisions, and will give to the farmer his due portion of the profits of his own industry. In this kind of commerce, the interest of the farmer is assimilated to and rendered reciprocal with that of the merchant. The people that I have the honor to represent, are deeply interested in this kind of commerce; we inhabit a fertile country, growing rapidly in population and improvement, and producing cotton, hemp, and tobacco, and every kind of grain in great abundance, besides stock of all kinds: for the surplus of those articles we can only find a market through the medium of commerce. These, I repeat, sir, are my own sentiments and the sentiments of my constituents, upon the subject of a free commerce, and so strongly are we impressed with the importance of it, that we consider agriculture and commerce essential to the existence and growth of each other.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. P.,) as I have before stated, did, in 1806, vote in support of our neutral rights, but he now tells us they are doubtful—and why does he tell us so? Why, sir, he has found out an old French book, which it seems has convinced him that he was wrong when he formerly voted in favor of supporting our neutral rights against the interpolations of Great Britain. He calls the book a celebrated work on maritime law. One valuable trait in the character of this book, and which seems to have rendered it celebrated in the opinion of the gentleman is, that he thinks its doctrines upon the subject of neutral rights support the doctrine of Great Britain, commonly called the rule of 1756. It appears, says the gentleman, to be generally supposed, that the rule respecting the colonial trade adopted by Great Britain, and usually called the rule of 1756, was peculiar to Great Britain. He also says, it seems that she, meaning Great Britain, has considered the rule of 1756 as the ancient and established principles of maritime law: and this the gentleman attempts to prove for her, and for this purpose introduces Valin's celebrated work, as he calls it, on maritime law. I shall not enter into a detailed examination of the several articles he has read, which however appear to be essentially different from the rule of 1756, but I shall contest the applicability of these regulations altogether; and I trust I can show to the Senate that they cannot, by any possible construction, be admitted as of any authority, as containing established principles of maritime law.

I would ask the gentleman how he proves the rule of 1756 to be the ancient and established principles of maritime law. Because, says he, it appears by Valin that Louis XIV issued a regulation in 1704 respecting neutral rights, and which was re-enacted by Louis XV in 1744, similar in its nature to the rule of 1756 of Great Britain. I shall admit, for argument sake, that those rules of 1756 and regulations of 1704 are similar; but, sir, can this similarity give them any claim to be considered as the established principles of maritime law? Certainly not, sir; for maritime law is considered as the law of nations, particularly with respect to those nations which agree to it; but the gentleman has not shown that the maritime nations ever acquiesced in those French regulations any more than they have in the rule of 1756; and, sir, he ought to have shown that they had, in order to give them the force of maritime law. If those nations had given this sanction, and thereby established the principles contended for by the gentleman, then indeed he would have been correct; and had this been the case, some of the British jurists would no doubt long since have brought them into view, and would have exhibited them as precedents, to support and establish the British rule of 1756.—They seem, however, to have left it for the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. PICKERING,) and their not having done so, is a sufficient proof to my mind that these regulations of Louis XIV and Louis XV, were considered in no other point of view by the other maritime Powers, and by the jurists who have written upon this subject, than the decrees of Bonaparte are now considered by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. P.) and eighty or a hundred years hence, these decrees of the French Emperor would form as good precedents, and there would be quite as much propriety in bringing forward these decrees of Bonaparte as the established principles of maritime law, as those regulations of Louis XIV and Louis XV, offered by the gentleman in support of the rule of 1756; nay, Mr. President, there would be much more propriety, because almost all the continental Powers have sanctioned these decrees of the French Emperor, and yet, would the gentleman say that they ought ever to be brought into precedent as the established principles of maritime law? I suspect he would not. If, then, he would not, sir, his rules of 1704 and 1744, cannot be considered as precedents, but must be returned to their archives, there to rest for another century.

One particular object the gentleman seems to have had in view in introducing these obsolete and inapplicable regulations, is to make it appear that Mr. Madison is mistaken in his letter to Mr. Erskine of the 25th of March, in which he speaks of the rule of 1756. Mr. Madison, said the gentleman, says, "it is well known that Great Britain is the only nation that has acted upon or otherwise given a sanction to it," meaning the rule of 1756. Here, Mr. President, I must observe, that the gentleman has not exhibited that portion of candor (in using the quotation) which he has so uniformly declared he possesses; he has taken only a part of a sentence, it would seem, for the purpose of drawing an inference from it, of which the whole taken together is by no means susceptible, but conveys to my mind a very different meaning. Mr. Madison, in his letter of the 25th of March to Mr. Erskine, in speaking of the rule of 1756, says, "and instead of its being an established rule or principle, it is well known that Great Britain is the only nation that has acted upon, or otherwise given a sanction to it." Here, sir, the whole sentence taken together, conveys a very different meaning from the one the gentleman has thought proper to give it. Mr. Madison is evidently speaking of it as not being an established rule or principle; those words the gentleman omitted. Now, sir, to give the rule of 1756 the sanction of an established rule or principle of maritime law as the gentleman is pleased to call the regulations of 1704 and 1744, and the rule of 1756, it was absolutely essential that they should have been acquiesced in and formally sanctioned by all the maritime Powers; otherwise they must be considered as mere rules, and cannot, by any possible construction, be entitled to be considered as an established rule or principle; and this, sir, is the distinction evidently taken by Mr. Madison between a mere rule acted upon by Great Britain only, and an established rule or principle sanctioned by the maritime nations. I will, Mr. President, examine this doctrine a little further: the gentleman has said (as I have before stated) that Great Britain has considered the rule of 1756 as the ancient and established principle of maritime law, and this he seems desirous himself to think, if we may judge from the means to which he has had recourse to prove and support it. I find, sir, on examining the memorials of the merchants of many of the great towns in the United States, which were presented to Congress in 1806, that they differ very greatly with the gentleman with respect to the antiquity of the rule of 1756. In the memorial from the respectable town of Salem, in the State which the gentleman represents, it is expressly stated "that even the advocates of Great Britain have not pretended to ascertain the existence of the pretended rule previous to the year 1756. To this period they refer for its first establishment; they pretend not to quote any foreign adjudications in point, but rest satisfied that their own courts were competent to establish the law, and to give it binding efficacy on all nations." The memorialists however conceive, and rightly, that it is not within the authority of any nation to legislate for the rest; and that to establish the rule of 1756 as a principle of maritime law, it must, as I have before shown, be acquiesced in by the maritime nations. This has not been the case—for we find that the first attempt which was made to carry this rule into effect was against the Dutch; who, so far from acquiescing in it, protested against it in terms of the warmest reprobation; and the first attempt made to carry it into effect against the United States was in 1801, which was a decree of the Vice Admiralty Court at Nassau, which condemned the cargo of an American vessel going from the United States to a port in the Spanish colonies, with a cargo consisting of articles the growth of Old Spain. Our Minister at the Court of Great Britain remonstrated against this violation of the rights of neutrals, and the subject was referred by the British Government to the consideration of the Advocate General, whose report upon that subject I will read. He says "the sentence of the Vice Admiralty Court was founded in error; that it was now (1801) distinctly understood, and had been repeatedly so decided by the High Court of Appeals, that the produce of the colonies of the enemy may be imported by a neutral into his own country, and may be re-exported from thence even to the mother country of such colony; and in like manner the produce and manufactures of the mother country may in this circuitous route legally find their way to the colonies; that a direct trade not being recognised as legal, and the decision of what was, or was not, a direct trade, was a question of some difficulty, but that the High Court of Admiralty had expressly decided, and the Advocate General saw no reason to expect the Court of Appeals would vary the rule, that landing the goods and paying the duties in the neutral country, breaks the continuity of the voyage, and is such an importation as legalizes the trade, although the goods be reshipped in the same vessel, and on account of the same neutral proprietors, and forwarded for sale to the mother country. This report of the Advocate General was accepted by the British Government, immediately transmitted by Lord Hawkesbury to Mr. King, our Minister at the Court of Great Britain, and by His Majesty's express command, communicated by the Duke of Portland, the principal

Secretary of State, to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, with the information "that it was His Majesty's pleasure that the doctrine laid down in the Advocate General's report should be immediately made known to the several judges of the Vice Admiralty Courts, setting forth to them what is held to be the law upon the subject by the superior tribunals, for their future guidance." Thus our neutral rights were admitted by Great Britain, and the obsolete doctrine of the pretended rule of 1756, after a lapse of nearly half a century, with only one attempt to revive its iniquitous principle, was resisted with success; and this doctrine, by the formal decision of the Advocate General of Great Britain, and sanctioned by the King, was abandoned.

That this doctrine, which had been thus fairly given up, should have been since revived, tends only to prove that whenever Great Britain conceives her interest shall require it, she will exercise her power and forget right. But, sir, it is to me most extraordinary, that after this pretended ancient principle of maritime law first set up by Great Britain in 1756 should have been thus formally relinquished by Great Britain herself, that there should be a solitary citizen of the United States, and still more that a member of this House should attempt to support so hostile a principle to the commerce of his own country; and in order to sustain so unrighteous a doctrine, to offer as a precedent the mere arbitrary regulations of an absolute monarch, and even those unsupported by the acknowledgment of any one single maritime Power.

I now approach, Mr. President, a more serious part of this subject, and I am extremely sorry it has been brought into the debate; but as it has, we must endeavor to meet it. We have been told that the embargo law is peculiarly oppressive and disagreeable to our brethren of the Eastern States, and that whenever the people dislike a law, they will in some way or other get clear of it. We have also been told, that if this law is not repealed, it will in all probability produce disunion. This, Mr. President, is a very serious state of things if the gentlemen are correct; but, sir, in the warmth of argument, our feelings sometimes gain an ascendancy over our reason, and I hope this is the case with those gentlemen. I will not draw any comparison between the sufferings of our fellow-citizens of the East, and those of any other section of the Union—we all experience them. But, sir, I have too much confidence in the patriotism of the people of those States, to believe that they will have recourse to any illegal or violent measures to effect the removal of the law; and less do I believe that they will risk that high character which they so well acquired in contending for the rights of self-government, by using coercive means to destroy that fair fabric, which the united exertions of the whole people, the lives of our heroes, the wisdom of our statesmen, and the firmness and magnanimity of the great Washington have reared for this happy country. And now for what would our fellow-citizens thus commit their characters, and their best interests, which no time or circumstances could restore? Why, say the gentlemen, to obtain a repeal of the embargo. Sir, it is impossible, that men so enlightened should put so much at hazard, to obtain the repeal of a law which by the common consent of the nation in a Constitutional way, will no doubt ere long cease to exist: and, sir, I think it must be equally unfounded, that our fellow-citizens of the East can, for one moment, seriously contemplate withdrawing from the federal Union: our interest binds us too firmly together to admit of such a supposition. The Eastern and Western people are more strongly united by a common interest than is generally understood; we are entirely agricultural, and inhabit one of the most fertile countries on the globe; our produce, which is already very great, and rapidly increasing, will require a large supply of shipping to carry it to market; that shipping our Eastern brethren have hitherto principally supplied, and will, we trust, continue to supply. Thus, by this union of interest, we find that we are absolutely necessary to each other. The Southern States also supply vast quantities of heavy produce, which our Eastern brethren would always have a preference in carrying while we continued united. But should a separation take place, (which I trust and hope no time or circumstances may produce,) in that event, we should be like two near friends engaged in a serious quarrel, which is always more bitter than between strangers; we should conceive that our Eastern brethren had withdrawn unjustly from us, had greatly sacrificed our interest as well as their own; and our attachment, by which we now feel most strongly bound to them, would, of course, become alienated, having no longer a community of interests to support it, which it must be acknowledged has, in a political point of view, great and decided influence. We should, of course, seek other means and other channels, by which to transport our commodities. The old Government would withal make such regulations with respect to commerce that our Eastern brethren (whose products are infinitely small in quantity compared with those of the middle, southern, and western sections of the Union) would lose an immense portion of those benefits which they now enjoy; and although they would injure us in point of physical strength, in proportion to their numbers to the whole force of the Union; yet, in so great a degree, they must also injure themselves. Our vast importance as a nation must sink with this division, neither portion of it must expect to have much weight in the scale of the political world, nothing would be left untried by the intriguing nations of the old world, to establish and preserve as much as possible collisions of interests and discontents in our respective Governments. Viewed in all its bearings, it excites the most solemn consideration, one that fills the heart with the most melancholy sorrow; and under the view that I have presented, and the catalogue of evils that might be added, I think it impossible that our Eastern brethren can have one serious thought of involving themselves, their wives and children, and their common country, in all the horrors of anarchy and of civil war.

Mr. PICKERING spoke in favor of the resolution, and in reply to Mr. ANDERSON; when the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, December 2.

Ordered, That Messrs. TIFFIN, TURNER, and GREGG, be a committee agreeably to the 22d rule for conducting business in the Senate.

The following motion was submitted for consideration by Mr. GAILLARD:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and what, provision ought to be made in case of the inability of the District Judge of either of the districts of the United States to perform the duties of his office; and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

THE EMBARGO.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the 11th of November, for repealing the "Act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States;" and the several acts supplementary thereto.

Mr. GILES rose, and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: I sincerely regret, sir, to find myself driven again into this debate, whilst every feeling of my heart admonishes me to retirement. I sincerely wish to retire, not only from this debate, but from the political world. I am now acting only in obedience to a sense of duty. I shall, however, limit my remarks to as few objects as may be consistent with this obligation. They will principally relate to facts which, in my judgment, have been incorrectly stated, and, of course, require correction. The first fact to which I shall call the attention of the Senate, is the one stated by the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. HILLHOUSE,) and repeated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. PICKERING,) that the non-importation act was an obstruction to an amicable adjustment with Great Britain. Both the gentlemen have stated that Great Britain would not treat with this rod suspended over her head. I assert, on the other hand, that she did treat with this rod suspended over her head, and that its suspension was continued at the request of the British Commissioners. Now, sir, let us resort to the evidence. This will be found in the correspondence from Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney to Mr. Madison. Speaking of Lord Holland, these gentlemen tell us he said:

"That in the meantime we could state to our Government, what was unquestionably true, that those with whom we were treating were diligently and anxiously employed in endeavors to devise an arrangement which should be convenient and honorable to us, and at the same time free from improper hazard to Great Britain; that it appeared to him that the actual pendency of the negotiations here, unless their sincerity were distrusted, as he was sure it would not be, would furnish an adequate motive to Congress for merely postponing the commencement of a law which was originally a very strong measure, and would certainly, if allowed to go into operation at a moment when Great Britain was affording, in the face of the world, an unequivocal demonstration of her wish to remove every ground of misunderstanding between us, acquire a character of extreme harshness; that it was greatly to be lamented that the discussions in which we were now engaged had not been sooner begun; but that knowing, as we did, to what cause the delay was to be ascribed, we knew also that it was unavoidable."

"To these details we take the liberty to add our opinion, formed upon a careful view of the whole subject, that it would be proper, upon the meeting of Congress in December, to suspend the act for prohibiting the importation of certain articles of British manufacture, so as to afford farther time for the completion of the negotiations which it evidently presumes, and which are now in train."

"The ground which Congress have taken in this just and salutary measure, we are far from wishing to abandon; but to suspend and abandon it, are very different things. The last would wound deeply the honor of the nation, and prostrate the character of the Government; but the first is in perfect conformity with the spirit and purpose of the law, and while it would furnish a signal proof of the equity and moderation of our public councils, would preserve unimpaired that firm and dignified attitude which it becomes us at all times, but now especially, to maintain. The suspension will be, so far from relinquishing the measure or weakening its effect, that it will distinctly imply a reassertion of its principle and policy, and an unshaken resolution to act upon and enforce it, as soon as negotiation shall have been sufficiently and unsuccessfully tried."

Our Ministers here state that a suspension of this act was all that was required by the British Commissioners. We also know that the Commissioners of both sides did go on to negotiate, and that a treaty was concluded on, without its being once intimated that this act formed the smallest obstruction to the negotiation, or had any influence in the smallest degree injurious to the provisions of the treaty. But, sir, I think this act facilitated and accelerated the negotiation. It will be recollected that, before the passage of this act, every effort of our Minister to negotiate had been either avoided or refused, and at the time of passing the law the negotiation was itself entirely suspended.* After its passage, you will find, by attending to the correspondence just read, every disposition was manifested by the British Commissioners to accelerate the negotiations; and every pledge of sincerity on their part to that effect was given, to induce our Government here to suspend the law merely to give time for completing the negotiation. I cannot place my hand on the note of the British Commissioners requesting the American Ministers to furnish them with a copy of the act; but in that note, to the best of my recollection, may be seen the real cause of the anxiety of the British Commissioners for the further suspension of that act. It was the injurious effect the measure was calculated to have upon the commerce of Great Britain, if it once should go into operation; and it was this they were anxious to prevent. This act appears to have been viewed by the British Commissioners precisely in the light in which it was seen here by the favorers of the measure. Its character and operation answered every expectation. It produced a treaty; and I regret, sir, that the provisions of the treaty were not such as to justify its ratification. I am aware the gentleman told us that he paid but little respect to the representations of our Ministers; but, sir, they certainly ought to be respected, or we ought to abandon the policy of having Ministers at foreign Courts. In this case, however, there was the less reason for disrespecting their communications, because they have been for some time published, and neither disrespected nor contradicted by the British Commissioners. In this case too, sir, it is not necessary to resort to this evidence exclusively in proof of this fact. It is proved by the note of the British Commissioners, read by the gentleman himself. Let us review that note, and see what information it gives:

"SEPTEMBER 4, 1806.

"On a full consideration of that act, we think it our duty to express our earnest hope and expectation that some means may be found to suspend the execution of a measure so opposite, in its temper and tendency, to the disposition and views with which our pending negotiation has been commenced and is carrying on."

Here, sir, is a request merely to suspend the execution of this act, &c., which is the only rod that gentlemen complain so much of here, but which was no further complained of by the British Commissioners. The true reason of their anxiety for this suspension I have before stated. Now, sir, how does this fact stand? Why, that the British Commissioners did treat with this rod suspended over their heads; and, so far from its having had any injurious influence on the negotiations, it probably had a beneficial one. The gentlemen, then, are utterly mistaken in this fact. For, sir, whether it touched the pride or affected the sensibility of Great Britain or not, she unquestionably did treat with the same rod suspended over her head.

The next subject I shall mention is, the attempt to reproach the President for his instructions respecting the impressment of American seamen. This is an attempt, sir, which really excited my astonishment. Let us critically examine the circumstances under which these instructions were given. The basis of our late negotiations at London were laid in the Senate. What did the Senate say to the President upon the subject of the impressment of American seamen? Let me read a part of their resolution upon that subject: "and to enter into such arrangements with the British Government on this and all other differences subsisting between the two nations, (and particularly respecting the impressment of American seamen,) as may be consistent with the honor and interests of the United States, and manifest their earnest desire to obtain for themselves and their citizens, by amicable negotiation, that justice to which they are entitled."

Here, sir, we find the Senate, not content with intermingling the safety of our seamen with the other objects of the resolution, manifest a laudable solicitude upon this subject, by calling the President's attention to it in a special manner, "and particularly respecting the impressment of American seamen," say the Senate, and both these gentlemen voting in favor of the resolution; and now, when instructions are given in strict conformity with this special injunction, the gentlemen come forward with the most indignant reproaches for this conduct. The ground of objection is stated to be, that the President instructed our Ministers to insist that the American flag should protect all persons sailing in fact under its protection; when the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. PICKERING.) with an irascibility of temper the most wonderful, tells us that the President knew that the British Government would not accede to the proposition; and then ascribes to the President the unworthy motive of intending thereby to defeat the objects of the negotiation. It is necessary to restrain the feelings in replying to this groundless and unworthy insinuation. But, sir, I will tell the gentleman that the President knew no such thing; that the gentleman himself knew no such thing, until the experiment was made. Indeed, there was no time, during the negotiation, when there was a great probability that it would succeed. But, sir, whether the proposition would succeed or not, the President, acting upon the recommendation of the Senate, and particularly of this very gentleman, was bound to make the experiment; especially, sir, when he offered the British Commissioners to make their own terms for securing to themselves the service of their own seamen. But, sir, why not make the proposition? Is it because it is not our right? Is it because it is not just? No; that is not pretended; but because the President knew that the British Government would not accede to the proposition, just or unjust. Now, sir, for one, I am not disposed to indulge the British Government in this capricious outrage upon our unquestionable rights. But, sir, the President was bound to make the experiment, and was bound never to admit the British pretension, if he thought that the only arrangement competent to the protection of American seamen from impressment. Yes, sir, and if the President had given no instructions upon this point, this same gentleman would have been as liberal in his reproaches as he now is, and they would have been much more merited. This singular freak of passionate invective is, to me, unaccountable. The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. HILLHOUSE) gives me great credit for my candor, in ascribing the commercial prosperity of the United States to the British Treaty. The gentleman is entirely mistaken in this statement. I admitted the fact of our commercial prosperity, but I ascribed it to its proper causes, to wit, the encouragements given to it by the Government, and the enterprise and talents of our fellow-citizens. I am willing to admit that the British Treaty had not so baneful an effect upon society as to have prevented this commercial prosperity; but it is the last cause to which, I think, it can properly be attributed. If, however, sir, I had really been convinced, or supposed that the British Treaty had been instrumental in producing that effect, I should have no hesitation in admitting the fact, notwithstanding my opposition to it. I am very far from deeming my opinions infallible; I have often experienced their fallibility; and whenever I shall be convinced of an error, I shall feel no difficulty in avowing the conviction.

The next circumstance to which I shall advert, is the extraordinary suggestion that the embargo is intended to be made permanent. This is a most singular notion, and nothing but the respect I feel for the candor and sincerity of the gentlemen who suggest it, could induce me to believe that they are in earnest. I really before thought, Mr. President, it was merely what I should call an electioneering watch-word. I never expected that it could have had any operation beyond the electioneering ground. No sir; the embargo is not intended to be permanent. But, sir, let us wait a little while, before we make ourselves bloody in the wars of Europe. Let us have a little patience, a little self-denial. I am as much opposed to a permanent embargo as either of the gentlemen from Massachusetts or Connecticut; I think the idea perfectly absurd. I am as ready to fight for the birthright of the ocean as either of the gentlemen. But, sir, I never will consent to raise the embargo until some measures shall be substituted better calculated to assert and maintain our national rights and national independence—measures of more activity and more energy. I am not certain, sir, that this is not the time for their adoption; but, sir, no great mischief can arise from waiting a little longer; waiting events in Europe now in a state of rapid succession.

The next fact suggested which I shall notice is, that the embargo has arrested and destroyed commerce. I think very differently; I think it has been, and still is, a shield interposed for the protection of commerce. French edicts and British Orders would have destroyed commerce; but the embargo, I hope, has saved it. It is very easy to say that the embargo destroyed commerce, because it was the act immediately preceding its suspension, and is easily resorted to as the proximate cause; but there is such a thing as an original or primitive cause: this was the French edicts and British Orders. These would have caused its entire destruction; but they caused the embargo, which caused the suspension of commerce, and has, I hope, shielded it from destruction.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. PICKERING) has taken great pains to show that the Orders of Council had no influence in producing the embargo laws. I think this circumstance of no sort of consequence to the community, but the gentleman seems to think it is of the last importance to himself individually. It probably is; I suppose he stands committed to the public upon that fact. I was not present at the time of passing the first embargo law; but the gentleman's

The Embargo.

SENATE.

labor has perfectly convinced me that he is utterly mistaken in the fact. Let me critically examine the gentleman's evidence. First, he says, that the Orders are not mentioned in the President's Message; and, secondly, that the Secretary of State refers Mr. Pinkney to the President's Message for the causes of the embargo laws. I have examined the President's Message, and think it perfectly correct, the gentleman's angry investigations to the contrary notwithstanding. I do not believe the gentleman could now frame as good a one, after all the lights which time and a farther disclosure of events have shed upon the subject. Permit me now, Mr. President, to call your attention in a particular manner to the contents of this Message. "The communications now made, showing the great and increasing dangers with which our vessels, our seamen, and merchandise, are threatened on the high seas and elsewhere from the belligerent Powers of Europe, and it being of the greatest importance to keep in safety these essential resources." &c., &c. Now, sir, what were the communications accompanying this Message? The correspondence between Mr. Armstrong and Mr. Champagny, showing that the Berlin Decree was in a state of execution, which had before been suspended in its operation in relation to the United States. But, says the gentleman, no papers were communicated respecting these Orders of Council, and, therefore, the gentleman infers that no apprehension existed which could influence this transaction. I draw a very different inference from the Message itself. I presume the communication of this hostile act of France, so immediately after it was known to the Executive, and avoiding a direct reference to the apprehended hostility of Great Britain, could not be conceived to be an act of favoritism towards France. That some hostile act from Great Britain was in contemplation, is most evident from the Message itself. From what quarter does the Message say that great and increasing dangers are threatened to our vessels, our seamen, and merchandise? From the belligerents of Europe. Here is no exception. The belligerents of Europe mean all the belligerents. If the President conceived there were no dangers threatened from any other quarter than from France, he would have used the term France, not the belligerents of Europe. But why communicate the evidence of his apprehensions from France and not Great Britain, if he entertained any? Why, sir, for the most obvious reason imaginable—because the information from France was official. The information from Great Britain was not. It was contained in newspapers only, which were in the hands of every gentleman, and their contents every gentleman could appreciate as well as the President. Now, sir, under these circumstances, was not the Message of the President perfectly correct? Let me ask the gentleman if he can now mend it? If, sir, the President, in his Message, had communicated this newspaper information respecting the apprehended hostility of the British Government, what a glorious theme of invective would have been afforded the gentleman of favoritism to France and hostility against Great Britain! The omission, however, to do this, could not screen the President from the same angry reproaches. If the gentleman will impartially review all these circumstances, and then turn his eyes towards his own heart, he will find that the errors he has so uncharitably ascribed to the President will be found in his own unhappy, ungovernable passions. But, sir, this is not all. I will now refer the gentleman to some evidence to show the incorrectness of the assertion he has made—evidence which he cannot deny, because it comes from his own words, and was attended with such circumstances, in the face of this Senate, that it cannot be mistaken. In the gentleman's passionate zeal yesterday, he told us that no time was allowed in the Senate for the discussion of the original embargo law, but that it was discussed in the House of Representatives; and the principal arguments urged there in favor of the measure were drawn from the hostile acts of Great Britain. The gentleman said that it was urged in that House that the measure would starve Great Britain; that it would bring her to our feet, &c., &c. Now, sir, why these arguments in that House, if there were no apprehended acts of hostility from Great Britain? They would have been strange arguments, if the only hostile acts inducing the measure were the hostile acts of France, not of Great Britain.

[Mr. PICKENING rose to explain. He said he mentioned these circumstances yesterday to show the effects expected from the measure by the friends of it, in which they had been mistaken. He did not speak of them as inducements to the measure.]

I readily admit that the gentleman, at the time of making these observations, was entirely insensible of their irresistible operation in establishing a fact, which he thinks so important to himself to disprove; and in my judgment, sir, they do unquestionably prove that these British Orders, or the apprehensions of them, stood in the front of the inducements to the original embargo law. Sir, were not these arguments in the House of Representatives immediate results from these inducements? Why, sir, that although the Orders were not received in such an official form as to justify their communication by the President, the intention to issue them was announced in the newspapers with so many marks of probability as justly to excite apprehensions in the Government for the safety of our seamen and commerce, and to justify the measure for the protection of both. It has been proved, not only that this information was published in newspapers before the passage of the act in the Senate, but the gentleman will recollect that it did not pass the House of Representatives for two or three days after it had passed the Senate. It was, therefore, very natural that the longer these apprehensions were felt, the stronger would be the inducements to the measure deduced from them; and hence the character of the discussions in that House described by the gentleman. But the gentleman seems to think that apprehensions are not correct grounds for legislation. In ordinary cases, it is admitted; but this was an extraordinary case. The measure was precautionary, and if these apprehensions had not been realized, it would at any time have been in the power of the Government to dispense with the prosecution; whereas, if Congress had waited for a formal authentication of the Orders, their intended object would have been answered, and the precautionary measure rendered unnecessary. But, sir, I think this explanation of very little consequence to the nation. It can be of little consequence to ascertain whether the adoption of the embargo was a lucky hit or a dictate of wisdom; and I should not have taken the trouble of this examination, if the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. PICKERING) had not availed himself of this occasion to assail the reputation of his late colleague, (Mr. Adams)—a gentleman who represented the State of Massachusetts with so much honor to himself and advantage to the State and the nation; upon a point, too, in which the gentleman here present has put himself so clearly in the wrong, from his own showing. I had hoped, Mr. President, that the gentleman would have so far restrained his feelings as to have permitted this gentleman's retirement to have shielded him from these unmerited reproaches; but it now seems that no delicacy of situation can procure an exemption from the inveteracy of the gentleman's passions. This cruel attack has imposed upon me an indispensable obligation to defend this absent gentleman; and it has been principally this circumstance which has driven me again most reluctantly into this debate. Sir, I can attest, and now do attest, with great pleasure, the disinterestedness and purity of the motives which dictated that gentleman's (Mr. Adams) late political conduct. As to its wisdom, that is matter of opinion, and now in a course of experiment; but as to his exemption from all views of personal promotion or aggrandizement, I here assert that fact, upon my own knowledge and my own responsibility, as far as can be warranted by the most explicit and unequivocal assurances from the gentleman himself; given, too, under circumstances which render their sincerity unquestionable. It gives me great pleasure to defend this absent gentleman, not only on account of his innocence of these reproaches, but on account of his merits, his virtues, and his talents, which, in my judgment, place him on so high a ground as not to induce a wish, on his part, to shrink from any comparison with either of the five worthies of Massachusetts, of whom we have been informed by the gentleman, (Mr. PICKERING.)

Permit me now, sir, to proceed with the discussion. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. PICKERING) proceeds to tell us that Mr. Rose was sent here as a messenger of peace; that he brought the olive branch in his hand, but that it was designedly refused by the Administration, and of course a subject of serious reproach and lamentation. Sir, I do not know what Mr. Rose brought in his hand; he never would tell the Government what he brought. But let me ask the gentleman what he left behind him? The gentleman has furnished me with an apposite figure. He left behind him a rod in pickle for us. He left behind him these very Orders of Council, which were designedly concealed from him, although they had been long deliberated upon, and were matured before he left London; and were actually issued almost as soon as he lost sight of the land. If, therefore, he brought in his hand the olive branch, he certainly left concealed behind him the scourge of our commerce. Yes, sir, it was the besom which was intended to sweep, and would have swept our commerce from the face of the ocean. And the gentleman tells us, in a tone of lamentation, that when Mr. Rose arrived here he was met by the embargo. Yes, sir, the judicious vigilance of the Government had saved our commerce from the destructive influence of these concealed Orders of Council. Could you have supposed, Mr. President, that this would have been a subject of lamentation to any American citizen? Could you have supposed, sir, that it could have been made the subject of reproach against the Administration? Could you have supposed, sir, that the most jaundiced passions could have deluded any American citizen so far as to commit himself upon such a charge? Sir, we differ so much in our facts, that it would be more wonderful if we should agree than differ in our conclusions. Is there a gentleman here, sir, prepared to say that this is not a correct statement of facts? And if it is, what is the result? Why, simply, that Great Britain had, in the most insidious manner, issued orders for the entire destruction of our commerce, and that our Government had completely disappointed their iniquitous object, by interposing the embargo for its protection.

But, sir, the gentleman, not content with the profusion of his invectives against the Administration collectively, and the absent gentleman, whom I have defended with great pleasure, has directed his bitterest resentments against the Secretary of State individually. He, sir, has ventured to accuse the Secretary of insincerity in his diplomatic correspondence. Permit me to tell that gentleman that the Secretary of State is incapable of an act of insincerity, either as a man or a politician. The gentleman, himself, sir, has been Secretary of State; and, even in the frenzy of his passions, it is wonderful to me that he did not see that he was forcing himself into a most disadvantageous comparison. I think the instances of insincerity he has quoted partake nothing of that character. I think them perfectly proper, the gentleman's angry criticisms to the contrary notwithstanding. Let us attend particularly to the instances quoted. The first is, that the Secretary had told the British Minister that the Berlin Decree, so far as it professed to place all the British isles in a state of blockade, was an empty menace. Now, let me ask the gentleman if that was not, and is not, the fact? I believe that no gentleman is more strongly impressed with the truth of this fact, nor rejoices more in its truth, than the gentleman himself. But the gentleman

The Embargo.

infers, if this decree was a mere empty menace, as it respects the blockading the whole British isles, it could not furnish any inducement to the measure of the embargo. I differ entirely with the gentleman in his inference. The Berlin Decree, after it was put in a state of execution against the United States, would operate very differently upon the defenceless American commerce spread along the French coast, from its operation as forming the blockade of the British isles; and therefore would be, as it in fact was, an empty menace in that case, whilst it would have a most serious effect in the other, and would certainly furnish a just inducement to the Government for the protection of the exposed commerce of the United States. Here then, sir, I see a perfectly correct sentiment, without any mark of insincerity about it.

But, sir, the gentleman has brought into view another act of insincerity. Let that be also examined. The gentleman complains that our Ministers in London were instructed to tell the British Minister only of the precautionary object of the embargo laws, and of course leave their coercive object to be inferred by the British Minister. This was both polite and proper. It was an instruction to our Ministers in fact to avoid touching the sensibility of the British Ministers and nation. What would the gentleman have done himself, sir? Would he, because there were two objects in passing the law, have instructed our Ministers to have pressed both upon the British Commissioners, although one of them would have touched their national pride and sensibility? This was unnecessary, and would not have been very urbane. It would have been an outrage upon every principle of diplomatic delicacy. I cannot, therefore, see the ground of objection to this instruction, unless it is, that the Secretary of State has not taken the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. PICKERING) for his model; that he had not resorted to some of the gentleman's bold metaphorical flourishes; that he did not instruct our Ministers to tell the British, "that the tiger crouches before he leaps upon his prey." Yes, sir, I am extremely happy to behold the striking contrast exhibited between the former, and present Secretary of State; a contrast so highly honorable to the present Secretary. Indeed, sir, I am the more astonished at the gentleman's driving us into the comparison, so unfortunate to himself, when he must know, or certainly ought to know, that his own inveterate passions utterly incapacitated him from the discharge of the duties of that office, and finally expelled him from it. The gentleman seems to be still harping upon the miserable tale of French influence. I suppose he also, unfortunately stands committed upon that idle suggestion. Sir, insinuations of this nature are degrading to the national character; and I always feel a condescension in being compelled to make a reply. Indeed, sir, it is necessary to impose strong restraints upon the feelings in making the reply the suggestion deserves.

But, sir, the gentleman is so intent, I suppose, upon his own self-justification, that he has manifested great labor and ingenuity in making a collection of scraps from the numerous documents before us; from which he has attempted to infer, not only that the Executive Department was acting under French influence, but that this honorable body was also acting under the same influence; yes, sir, the body of which the gentleman himself is a member. Yet, sir, the gentleman knows, notwithstanding his jealousies, his surmises, and his inferences, that it is impossible; that the fact is not so. Let me ask that gentleman, if he is prepared to say in his place, that any one member of this body, or that this body itself, is acting under French influence, or any improper influence? The gentleman must have too much respect for himself to make such an unfounded assertion. Why then, sir, all this labor at surmise, suspicion, and inference? I leave the gentleman to answer this question. Equally unfounded are the miserable intimations towards the Executive.

Let me ask the gentleman, through what channel his unhappy, suspicious mind has taught him to suppose, that these dark, these invisible negotiations could be carried on? I suppose he would necessarily reply through Mr. Armstrong, our Minister in Paris. Yet Mr. Armstrong has lately retrieved himself entirely from the gentleman's delusive suspicions. We are now told, Mr. Armstrong is a patriot; follow his advice. Again, sir, let me ask the gentleman, if he has heard any apology for the hostile conduct of France, either in this House or anywhere else? Has not every person declared, that their conduct was hostility itself? Mr. President, whether the gentleman intended to make insinuations, or inferences, or surmises, or suspicions, or assertions, if he pleases, of French influence, as operating either upon the Executive, or upon this body, I here in my place do pronounce the whole to be utterly unfounded. But, sir, the gentleman boldly says, there is something concealed. I really should like to know what it is that he supposes can be concealed. I should really like to know, what witchcraft it is that has continually tortured the gentleman's mind with these unhappy, fantastic delusions. No, sir, there is nothing concealed; there is too much exposed; for, sir, in the present whirlpool of inordinate passions, all honorable confidence seems to be disrespected. I will not accuse this gentleman of acting under British influence.* I feel too much respect for the American character to do so. I hope and trust he is not. I am willing to admit that his views are American. But, sir, this consideration will not deter me from expressing my wonder and astonishment at the extraordinary views that the gentleman takes of American interests; first, in the unremitting labor he has taken to put his own Government in the wrong upon every point of discussion between it and the British Government; and in his strange misrepresentation or total disregard of facts; of outrages, sir, upon our dearest rights, by the British Government; outrages which ought to rouse every American feeling into action. Secondly, in the comparative view he has taken of the hostile acts of France and Great Britain. Sir, he has used every effort to magnify, if possible, French aggressions; whilst he has faintly admitted British aggressions, and even palliated or excused them. Let us now see, sir, what is the true character of aggressions which are treated with so much tenderness? Sir, I said the other day, and I have not heard it contradicted, and I say again to-day, that the British Government seizes and confiscates our vessels engaged in a lawful trade; that she has attempted, by an act of Parliament, to colonize and tax us; that she has in the same manner, undertaken to exercise acts of national sovereignty solemnly given by the people to Congress; that she has undertaken to exercise an act of legislation over the people of the United States refused to Congress, and retained to themselves in their highest sovereign capacity. Are these facts denied? No, sir; if true, let me ask the gentleman, what can be worse? what can be more injurious to our interests, or derogatory to our national character? what can the French do, that is worse than this? Nothing, sir, these acts form the climax of outrages. But, sir, the gentleman tells us, that the French Emperor has said, there shall be no neutrals. I do not know whether he has used that identical expression or not. I believe it is not the expression in the paper to which the gentleman alludes. But, sir, suppose it is; what then? Is the gentleman so ready to obey the mandate of the French Emperor, as to take part in the war, because he orders him to do so? I did not think the gentleman would take the yoke so quietly. In effect, both Great Britain and France have said, there shall be no neutrals; and I care nothing for the form of expression. The first declaration to that effect, which I have seen, is contained in the polite note of Lords Holland and Auckland, attached to the late unratified treaty. The language in effect is, if you do not make war on France, we will reserve to ourselves the right to make war on you, according to this treaty of amity and commerce. But, sir, these two great belligerents command us to take part in their wars; are we bound to obey their cruel mandates? Are we to abandon the right of judging of our own interests and policy? I am disposed to think they will ultimately drive us into their wars; but let us keep out of them as long as we think our own interests and policy require the recession.

* See note at the end of the speech.

The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. HILLHOUSE) has attempted to place our situation in a ludicrous point of view; he asks how are we to fight at triangles? Are we to fight France and Great Britain at the same time? Why, sir, this is the very circumstance which increases our embarrassments. It is a situation perfectly novel and unexampled; and distinguishes it from all the cases put by the gentleman as analogous to it. At every other time we have had but one adversary; if we had but one at this time, there would be no difficulty in the choice of measures; but having two at the same time, and both so formidable, presents an unexampled difficulty in the choice of measures; and is the strongest argument imaginable in favor of the position we have assumed. This, sir, is made more evident by the gentleman's illustration. The gentleman says, if two men were to attack him at the same time, would he avoid the combat until he could get one by himself? I presume he would, if he were a man of prudence; especially if either of them were a full match for him; and he knew the moment he set on one, the other would set on him, and tear him to pieces. I think, under such circumstances, a dignified retirement would be at least as honorable as being tumbled in the dust; and would certainly be more the dictate of prudence and wisdom. It therefore appears to me, that the gentleman's illustration is an extremely happy one, to justify the position assumed by the United States, under the peculiarity of their difficulties.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. LLOYD,) I presume with a view of showing that our supply of provisions can be of little consequence to Great Britain, has favored us with a statement of her annual consumption of grain, and our annual exports. The annual consumption of Great Britain he states at one hundred and fifty millions of bushels, and our whole exports at seven millions. I am willing to take his estimate, although our whole exports are probably much more. From this statement, the gentleman seems to infer, that this small sum can be of but little consequence in a market requiring this enormous consumption. I draw a very different inference from these data given by the gentleman; and I am the more disposed to examine this point, as I have often heard the same inferences drawn by others. According to this statement, if Great Britain should raise barely enough for her own consumption, except seven millions of bushels, and it is probable she will not exceed this product the present year, she would want a supply for her whole population for above a fortnight in the year. This would be a serious deficiency; and to appreciate my argument, the gentleman should first make the experiment of starving a fortnight; and I think, before the expiration of that time, he would be willing to admit there was some force at least in my argument. It would be the same case with a nation, if the scarcity operated equally, and upon every individual in the nation, at the same time. But that is not the way in which a scarcity does operate. It operates by raising the prices of grain, and thus excluding those from the use of it, who have no money to buy. In the event of a scarcity in Great Britain, Mr. Canning would probably not have a dish less to his table on that account, whilst the poor would suffer for the want of bread. As the scarcity increased, the greater would be the numbers excluded from the use of bread; and the stock in the nation would be exclusively consumed by those who had the means of purchasing a proportion of it. This would be the course of things as long as the order of society could be maintained, and the suffering poor compelled to bear their hard fate. But, sir, if this quantity of provisions should be wanted in Great Britain this year, and it cannot be obtained anywhere, but from the United States; and if the want of it should drive the prices very high, and bear of course with great severity upon the suffering poor; would not these circumstances alone furnish strong inducements to Great Britain to relax her orders, and to do us justice? To do us justice, did I say, sir? No, sir, to do us half justice; we do not require more than half justice at her hands.

If the suffering poor could be apprized that the deficit of provisions could be made up by opening an intercourse with the United States, and that this depended upon the pleasure of the British Cabinet, would there not be strong representations to them to relieve the suffering poor, when nothing but an act of half justice would be necessary to effect the object? Under such a state of things, the Cabinet could not withstand the representations of the people. May we not hope then, sir, if this should be the state of things in Great Britain during the present year, that these appeals to her interest will not be unavailing? But, sir, I am ready to admit, that I derive the less consolation from this hope, from the apprehension that if even a relaxation of these orders should take place in consequence of any coerced state of things in Great Britain, the relaxation would be but temporary; and the moment the pressure ceased, the hostile measures would be resumed. Since Great Britain has become intoxicated with this extraordinary project of recolonization, I verily believe we shall again have to fight her out of it; and I am inclined to think that now is as good a time for the contest as we can expect in any future time. But, sir, we are told that this subject has a commercial as well as a political bearing; the commercial must certainly be a subordinate one. Let me, however, bestow a few thoughts on its commercial bearings. I mean no disrespect to merchants; but upon this subject I do not think their statements ought to be confided in. I am sure they will excuse the observation, when I tell them that I was taught this lesson at the time of laying the former embargo, by one of the most respectable merchants in the United States; and then a Representative in Congress from the city of Philadelphia. That gentleman then told us, that upon the question of an embargo, the information of merchants was not to be relied upon; that, without imputing to them any improper motive, their statements would necessarily partake of their calculations of their own particular interests.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. PICKERING) has favored us with mercantile information from the insurance offices at Boston and Salem, as well as information from some of his respectable mercantile correspondents. I am willing to respect this species of information as far as it extends and merits attention; but, sir, it does not contain all the information I want; and as little as I know of mercantile principles, I know that it is essentially erroneous. Sir, the information from the insurance offices does not extend to all the objects it ought to embrace. I want to know in the first place, sir, if we repeal the embargo laws, without any substitute, and agree to trade under the British Orders in Council, what would be the premium of insurance upon our national character and national independence? This important article of barter seems to have escaped the attention of the offices altogether; whereas it appears to me to be the previous question. All others sink into insignificance before it. Sir, cent per cent. would not insure them. The policy must be made upon a calculation of a total loss. The insurance could not be done upon these essential articles of barter, in all the insurance offices in the United States. Now, sir, as these are articles which I hold with others in trust, I can never violate the sacred deposit, or put it at risk, until I deem the policy perfectly competent to cover the loss. Again, sir, I wish to know the premium against the British Orders in Council, upon a voyage to France, or anywhere else, where an American vessel may go under the protection of the laws of nations? Cent per cent. would not insure in the exercise of this right; and for one I would rather fight for it than abandon it. Again, sir, what would be the insurance against French captures to European ports, in case the embargo were raised? It would be difficult to make a calculation until some experiments should be made. The reason of the low insurance now is, that the French have no inducements to send out privateers to depredate upon our commerce as long as the embargo restrains it within our ports; raise the embargo, and the temptation to plunder would fill the ocean with privateers. The commerce would stand little chance to escape the plunderers.

These observations are sufficient to show, first, that the information from the insurance offices does not embrace all the articles of barter we have in the market; particularly those of the first necessity. Secondly, that the policies upon most of the articles embraced by it are calculated upon incorrect principles, and not adjusted to the state of things which would exist upon raising the embargo without a substitute. Further, sir, with my little knowledge of commercial details, I will venture, without the fear of contradiction, to question the accuracy of the information furnished by the gentleman's respectable commercial correspondent (Mr. Thorndike.) I am willing to admit, sir, that he is, as the gentleman describes him to be, a merchant of the first respectability; and as such I respect him; but I cannot, in all points, subscribe to his mercantile information. I will mention only two points in which he is evidently mistaken, and they will be important enough to vary the whole aspect of the calculation he has made, as to what trade we could carry on under the Orders in Council. First, he has made a calculation of our trade to Great Britain upon the usual prices of American articles in British markets. This is an extremely incorrect standard of prices; because, if all American articles were driven into the British market, and excluded from the markets where they are consumed, they would bear no price at all. They would not defray expenses. Take the article of tobacco for instance. The United States export upon an average 75,000 hogsheads; of which Great Britain consumes 14,000. The rest are exported to the European Continent. What would be the price of an article, when there is five times as much at market as is wanted for consumption, or for any other use? The merchants examined before the House of Commons unanimously agree, that this article would not defray expenses. They have not only sworn to this fact, but I would ask, if it is not the dictate of common sense, and the common result of every principle of barter? The same remark would apply to cotton and rice, and other American articles; but, perhaps, not in the same degree. As to cotton, I am perfectly convinced from the immense and increasing quantities of that article, raised in the United States, the only way to keep up the price is to keep open all the markets in the world where it is consumed. The gentleman also includes in his estimate exports to the French West India islands. They are now in a state of strict blockade, and of course the whole of this item ought to be expunged. There are probably other material errors; but these of themselves are sufficient to vary the whole aspect and bearing of his calculation. Indeed, sir, I am of opinion that little or no commerce could be carried on under the conflicting orders and decrees. All these calculations are made upon the assumed principle, that the rules prescribed in these hostile decrees and orders would be invariably adhered to in their practical operations. I entertain a very different opinion. The commerce which might strictly be permitted by the orders and decrees, would be subjected to so many vexations by the ignorance or artifices of the commanders of the hostile armed ships, as to render all the remaining commerce dangerous and unprofitable; and I am perfectly satisfied, after incurring the disgrace of submitting to these arrogant and unwarrantable impositions, we should, covered over with disgrace, be compelled to fight for the miserable pittance of commerce, apparently held out to us by these hostile and conflicting orders and edicts. This miserable and disgraceful commerce affords no allurements to me; and it will disappoint all those who have made these delusive calculations upon it. The gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. PICKERING,) in a great degree unravelled the mystery, which was before suspended over the calculations of his mercantile friend, by telling us that this friend had at this time several vessels laden with Southern productions, ready to set sail the moment the embargo shall be raised. This circumstance, without any imputation upon the motives of the gentleman, may be fairly conceived to have had some bearing upon his calculations, and is a case in point to prove the correctness of the information derived from the gentleman of Philadelphia, on a former and similar occasion.

Before I sit down, Mr. President, permit me to explain some expressions which fell from me in debate a few days since, and which seem to have roused into action the indignant feelings of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. PICKERING.) The gentleman might have saved himself these painful feelings, if he had been more attentive to my observations. He supposes that I called his Federal friends in Massachusetts political demagogues. Now, sir, those gentlemen were not particularly alluded to either in words or intentions. I made an observation in very general terms upon the structure of popular Governments. I stated, as an inconvenient circumstance in the operations of such Governments, that when the union and energy of the people were most required to resist foreign aggressions, the pressure of these very aggressions would present temptations to political demagogues, to separate the people from their own Government, and through the people's discontents, to find their way to office and to power. I applied this observation to the present and all future times. I then gave the late and present proceedings, under the pressure of the embargo laws, in evidence to prove the correctness of the remark. I made no particular application of it to any description of gentlemen, nor to any particular part of the United States, nor was it intended to be so applied; it was intended to be general in its application to every part of the Union. The gentleman himself has made the application to his friends; and I readily admit, without reminding him of the old adage, that he is better informed than I am, whether his own application suits his own friends. But, sir, I did not particularly allude to those gentlemen. I feel the same respect for the gentlemen of Massachusetts that I do for those of any other part of the Union. Nor have I any difficulty in saying, that a difference in political opinions is no ground of personal disrespect; and that I do not now, and never have made it one. On the contrary, I am willing to proclaim it to all the world, that I know many Federal gentlemen for whom I feel great personal respect. I regret also, Mr. President, that some of the observations which fell from me the other day have made so strong impressions upon the feelings of the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. HILLHOUSE,) for whom I do feel a high personal respect. Upon reviewing some of them, I fear they were calculated to have too strong a bearing upon that gentleman's feelings; but, sir, it will be recollected, that to his observations I was principally replying, and therefore that my remarks had apparently a stronger application towards him personally than in fact they were intended to have. It will also be recollected, that most of the remarks of this nature were directed against the repeal of the embargo laws without any substitute, and which, in my judgment, would have been submission to foreign aggressions. Since the gentleman has disclaimed all ideas of submission, and has come forward in the true spirit of 1776, I am as ready as any gentleman to do honor to his patriotism. Mr. President, we have now made a fair comparison of opinion and information upon the measures heretofore adopted by the Government. Gentlemen have been indulged with a full retrospect of these measures; may we not hope that we are better prepared to see what measures are now proper to be adopted to save the nation from surrounding dangers? Sir, if we could prevail upon ourselves to act under the scriptural injunction; if we could first employ ourselves in taking the notes out of our own eyes, instead of being so busy in taking them out of the eyes of our neighbors, is it not reasonable to expect that we should see more clearly the course of conduct most proper to be adopted for the people's interest and the general welfare? If we could seriously turn our eyes in upon our own hearts, and impartially examine our own passions, might we not expect to find there some of the errors which we delusively ascribe to others? Is it not to be feared, that this is the real source of our disunion? And is it not greatly to be regretted, sir, that union cannot be obtained, when it is all that is wanted to insure us complete success against our unjust adversaries? Let us then, sir, with a magnanimity becoming ourselves and our stations, banish all personal animosities; let us act like brethren of one family, united in interest, united in honor, united in affection. A knowledge of this circumstance alone might probably secure justice from our adversaries without striking a blow. But, sir, if unfortunately we should be compelled to engage in the bloody scene, how indispensable is it that we should be able to exert the whole energy of an undivided nation!

“After my interview with Mr. Fox, on the 25th ult., I waited a fortnight without hearing from him. This new instance of delay surprised me, because he had shown a sensibility to the former one, and did not seem aware of the necessity of adding to it. Independent of the general object, the war with Prussia, and the blockades incident to it; the doctrine and practice respecting which it was necessary to arrange, furnished a new motive for a communication with him. On mature reflection, I thought it best to call informally, which I did on the 11th, with a view to enter on these topics in the familiar manner I had heretofore done. Mr. Fox was at the office, but did not receive me. He sent the expression of his regret at not being able to do it, being, as he said, just going to attend the Cabinet, who were waiting for him. I called again on the 13th, and experienced the same result, though I had left word that I should then be there. I was informed by his desire, that a summons from the King, to attend him at the Palace, prevented his receiving me on that day. I met him on the 15th at the drawing-room, but had no opportunity of speaking to him. Sir Francis Vincent, the first under Secretary of State, being acquainted with my desire, promised to arrange with him an interview, and to inform me of it. These are the only circumstances worthy of notice that have occurred here since my last till to-day. I mention them that you may be better enabled to judge correctly, in all respects, of the light in which the incident of this day ought to be viewed.”

“With respect to the delay to which I am exposed, it is utterly out of my power to explain to you the cause. I have no reason to change the opinion which I have heretofore expressed of Mr. Fox's disposition on the subject, though I have had no late communication with him. His present reserve is unfavorable, but it may be otherwise accounted for, and on principles which are quite natural, and therefore presumable. He may have experienced more difficulties in the Cabinet than he had expected. Many of the members may be indisposed to an arrangement on such terms as can be accepted, and most of them willing to postpone any decision until the result of the proceedings in Congress is known. Under these circumstances he may find it most eligible to avoid any further communication with me on the subject.

“It becomes, therefore, very difficult, if not altogether improper, for me to press the business at this time. It seems to be my duty to postpone such pressure to the same epoch, that is, till the final proceedings of Congress are known. I shall doubtless receive with them the instructions of the President on the whole subject, which I beg to assure you I shall use my utmost exertions to carry into effect.”

Mr. HILLHOUSE spoke in favor of his motion, and in reply to Mr. GILES. Mr. POPE also spoke against the motion; when,

On motion, by Mr. REED, to refer this motion to the committee to whom was referred, on the 11th of November, so much of the Message of the President of the United States, as relates to the several embargo laws, it was determined in the negative—yeas 5, nays 25, as follows:

MONDAY, December 5.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion, submitted on the 3d instant, that a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and what, provision ought to be made in case of the inability of the district judge of either of the districts of the United States to perform the duties of his office; and that they report by bill or otherwise; and having agreed thereto, Messrs. GAILLARD, ANDERSON, BRADLEY, GREGG, and CRAWFORD, were appointed the committee.

Mr. TIFFIN reported from the committee, that the bill to reward Andrew Joseph Villard for an invention of public utility, was correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time and postponed.

Mr. REED presented the memorial of Lemuel Taylor and others, inhabitants of Baltimore and the Eastern Shore of Maryland, praying an alteration in the route of the mail from Washington to Chestertown; which was read, and referred to Messrs. REED, CRAWFORD, and TIFFIN, to consider and report thereon.

TUESDAY, December 6.

The Senate resumed the bill to reward Andrew Joseph Villard, for an invention of public utility; and, on motion, the further consideration thereof was postponed to Monday next.

WEDNESDAY, December 7.

Mr. GAILLARD, from the committee to whom the subject was referred, on the 5th instant, reported a bill further to amend the judicial system of the United States; and the bill was read and passed to the second reading.

THURSDAY, December 8.

Mr. GILES reported, in part, a bill making further provision for enforcing the embargo; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the Message of the President of the United States, of the first instant, with the communications respecting the public buildings, be referred to Messrs. BRADLEY, GREGG, and FRANKLIN, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

The bill further to amend the judicial system of the United States was read a second time, as in Committee of the Whole; and the President having reported the bill to the House amended, on the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. MACLAY presented the memorial of a number of the surviving officers in the Pennsylvania line of the army of the United States, in our Revolutionary struggle, praying for a remuneration

REPORT ON THE EMBARGO.

Mr. GILES, from the committee appointed on the 11th November last, on that part of the Message of the President of the United States, which relates to the embargo laws, made report in part of a communication by the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject; which was read, as follows:

COMMITTEE CHAMBER, Nov. 12, 1808.

DEAR SIR: Under instructions from the committee appointed to consider the several embargo laws, I have to request the favor of your attendance in the committee chamber of the Senate, at 10 o'clock on Monday morning next, prepared to give such information to the committee as your Department affords, respecting the subjects embraced by the enclosed resolution.

Be pleased, sir, to accept assurances of my high consideration and regard,

WM. B. GILES.

HON. A. GALLATIN, Secretary Treasury.

Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the several embargo laws be referred to a select committee, with instructions to examine and report whether any further measures are now necessary to enforce due observance thereof during their continuance; and, also, whether any further modification of it be expedient at this time; and that such committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

COMMITTEE CHAMBER, Nov. 14, 1808.

DEAR SIR: I am instructed by the committee appointed to consider the several embargo laws, &c., to request you to lay before them, with as little delay as possible, such information as your Department affords, upon the following questions:

1. What measures would be most effectual in preventing the violations or evasions of the several embargo laws, and enforcing a due observance thereof?

2. Can any of the inconveniences of the present system be remedied by further modifications; and what modifications would effect that object?

Be pleased, sir, to accept assurances of my high consideration and regard,

WM. B. GILES, Chairman.

HON. A. GALLATIN, Secretary Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Nov. 24, 1808.

SIR: Indisposition has prevented an earlier answer to your letter of the 14th instant.

For better preventing coasting vessels, regularly cleared, from violating the embargo, two measures appear necessary:

1. That the amount of the bond should be increased.

2. That neither capture, distress, nor any other accident, should be admitted as a plea, or given in evidence on trial.

By the first regulation, the temptation of going to a foreign port, in hopes that the profit on the sale of the cargo will indemnify for the forfeiture of the penalty, will be done away. By the second, every expectation of escaping the payment of the penalty under fraudulent pretences will be disappointed, and the power of remitting the penalties in the few cases of unavoidable accident which may occur will remain as heretofore, and, as in other cases, with the Treasury.

As the object of those two regulations will be to make the bond a sufficient and complete security, they will having a tendency to relieve in a considerable degree the coasting trade from the inconvenience resulting from detentions.

The sufficiency of the bond will, in many doubtful cases, remove the necessity of detaining vessels, or, what amounts to the same, of informing the owners, that, unless they reduce the amount of their cargoes, they will be detained.

I would also submit the propriety of placing under the control of the President, that power of detention vested in the collectors by the act of the 25th of April last. That subject has been a constant source of complaint and difficulty. It has been the uniform practice, from the establishment of the Government of the United States, to give positive instructions to the collectors respecting the execution of the laws, and which they were bound to obey, unless a different construction should be established by a legal decision. This indeed was essentially necessary, in order to secure a uniform construction and execution of the laws. But the provision now alluded to makes the detention to rest on the opinion of each collector, and this must necessarily produce a great diversity in the manner in which the power should be executed. All has been done that could be done to obviate that evil; and the President being authorized to decide on the detentions when made, the opportunity was taken to inform the collectors of what, in his opinion, should be a proper cause of detention. This, however, could be given only as opinion, and operate as a recommendation, and not as an order. Nor does it appear practicable to establish uniformity and to prevent partiality, and either laxity or too great severity in practice, unless the power of prescribing general rules, in that respect, by which the collectors will be bound to abide, be vested in the President.

I am aware that there is another mode of evasion by regular coasting vessels, which will not be prevented by either of the preceding provisions. Either whilst in port, or on their way down our rivers and bays, coasting vessels may receive articles not entered in their manifest, which they put on board other vessels, lying off the coast for that purpose.

But it is not perceived that any legal provision can prevent that infraction, nor that any other remedy can be found than the vigilance of the officers. Another general regulation will however be suggested, perhaps useful as a permanent measure, but which would at all events, under existing circumstances, give additional security for the observance of the laws, and afford some relief to our own seamen, to wit: a prohibition to employ any aliens, either as masters or part of the crew of any coasting vessel.

It is still more difficult to guard against violations by vessels departing without clearance, in open defiance of the laws. The following provisions, on mature consideration, appear the most efficient that can be devised against infractions, which it is the more necessary to repress, as they may be daily expected to increase, and threaten to prostrate the law and Government itself:

1. To forbid expressly, under pain of forfeiture, (the penalty now being only implied,) the lading of any vessel without the permission of the collector, and without the bond for a coasting voyage being previously given—authorizing the collectors to refuse permission, unless the object be that of a lawful coasting or fishing voyage. The great number of vessels now laden, and in a state of readiness to depart, shows the necessity of this provision. If there be cases in which the indulgence of converting vessels into warehouses ought to be granted, there will be no hardship, where the intention is fair, to require a bond similar to that given for a coasting voyage. And the collectors should likewise, in such cases, be expressly authorized to take such efficient precautions as will put it out of the power of such vessels to sail without warning.

2. In order to prevent those fraudulent sales of vessels by which ostensible owners of no responsibility are substituted for those from whom penalties might be recovered, it is necessary to provide that those owners of vessels whose names appear on the register or license should continue to be reputed as such, and liable to the penalties, in case of infraction of the laws, until the register or license shall have been actually surrendered, and new papers shall have been regularly granted by the collector to the purchaser. And, in every such case of purchase, a sufficient bond that the embargo shall not be infringed, to be previously required.

3. The power to seize unusual deposits, now vested in the collectors of districts adjacent to the territories of foreign nations, should, as was contemplated in the bill passed by the House of Representatives, be extended to all the districts. That this is an arbitrary power, which nothing but the unremitting efforts in some places to evade the law can possibly justify, cannot be denied; and it should, like that of detention, be placed under the control of the President, and be executed only in conformity with such general rules as he would prescribe.

4. Exclusively of the assistance which may be derived from gunboats and from the armed vessels of the United States, it would be advisable to authorize the President to add ten or twelve cutters to the establishment. Fast-sailing vessels, of easy draught of water, and requiring only from fifteen to thirty men each, are mostly wanted, and would, for the object contemplated, be as useful as the largest frigates.

5. It is with regret that the necessity of authorizing, on the application of the collector, an immediate call for the local, physical force of the country, must also be stated. But such partial acts of violence as have taken place in some of the seaports cannot be prevented by the circuitous manner in which the public force must now be brought out in support of the laws. And no doubt exists that the mass of the citizens, whether they approve or disapprove of the embargo, would, in every port, instantaneously suppress any such outrage, provided they can be called upon to act in a legal manner.

Some other provisions appear also necessary, for the purpose of carrying the laws more completely into effect along our land frontier:

1. The exportation of specie by land should be expressly prohibited.

2. The power of detaining deposits should be so expressed as to leave no doubt of the authority to detain wagons and other carriages laden and actually on their way to a foreign territory. Although I cannot perceive any reason for the distinction, it has been supposed, in one of the districts, that the law which authorized the detention of flour, beef, or potash, deposited in a warehouse, did not extend to the case of their being deposited in a wagon, although evidently on its way to Canada.

3. The offence now punishable by law is that of exportation. This is not consummated till after the property has actually been carried beyond the lines, where, being in a foreign jurisdiction, it cannot be seized; so that forfeiture, which is the most efficient penalty, can never apply to exportations by land; and no bond being required, as in the case of vessels, the only remedy is the uncertain one of recovering penalties against apparent offenders, who either abscond or have no property. How far it may be practicable to make the act of preparing the means of exportation punishable, or to provide some other remedy, is submitted to the committee.

But it must also be observed, that every degree of opposition to the laws which falls short of treason, is now, with but few exceptions, an offence undefined and unprovided for by the laws of the United States; whence it follows, that such offences remain unpunished, when the State authorities do not interfere. The necessity of defining those offences by law as misdemeanors, and of providing an adequate punishment, appears obvious.

I will beg leave here to add, that it does not appear necessary to continue any longer the indulgence granted to the British merchants to import, for the use of the Indians, articles of which the importation is generally prohibited by law; as that privilege is liable to great abuse, and affords just ground of dissatisfaction to American citizens. Whether it be advisable to continue the permission given to those Indian traders to export furs and peltries, is a question to be decided by political considerations.

The last branch of the subject to which I wish, at present, to call the attention of the committee, relates to interruptions and certain injurious proceedings attempted under color of law:

1. Vexatious suits are brought against collectors, which not only perplex faithful officers, but have the effect of intimidating others, and prevent an energetic performance of their duties. The only provisions which have occurred to me on that subject, are, to enable the collectors who may be sued, always to remove the cause before a court of the United States; to make a certificate, issued by the proper authority, that there was reasonable cause of detention; protect them against damages in cases of detentions, in the same manner as is now provided in case of seizures; and to provide for the safe-keeping, and restoring, when proper, and on security being given, the vessels and property which may be detained.

2. Attempts have in several instances been made to wrest from the collectors by writs of replevin, issued by State courts or officers, property detained or seized by said collectors, or which in any other manner is in their possession, in conformity with some law of the United States. It is evident that such attempts, if submitted to, would defeat, not only the embargo, but also the revenue laws of the United States; that, whenever property is, by virtue of a law of the United States, in possession of a collector, marshal, or any other of their officers, no process, in rem, which will take the property away, whether of replevin, attachment, or any other, can be legally issued by a State authority; and that the sheriff or other person executing the same must be considered as a mere trespasser, and be resisted accordingly. But there is no other way at present to resist such illegal process but actual force. And it appears necessary that another remedy should be afforded, by providing a summary mode of superseding any such process through the interference of the courts and judges of the United States, and by making it penal for any sheriff or other person to execute the same, or in any manner to attempt to take property, which, by virtue of any law of the United States, is in the collector's possession.

3. In some instances where vessels and cargoes libelled for infractions of the embargo have been restored to the owners on their giving security for the appraised value, the valuations have been so low as to reduce the forfeiture to an inconsiderable sum, thereby defeating altogether the law. It is suggested that this might be prevented by a provision authorizing and directing the district judges to set aside, on motion of the district attorney, such valuations, whenever, in their opinion, falling short of the true value.

On the subject of mandamus, I will only observe, that, in the only instance which has taken place, the court, supposing they had jurisdiction, could not, from the manner in which the question was brought before them, have decided otherwise than they did; but that it is desirable that the question of jurisdiction, as it relates either to the courts in whom the power ought to be vested, or to the cases to which it should extend, should be precisely defined by law.

I have not, in this communication, taken into consideration the technical defects of the existing embargo laws, because prosecutions do not fall within my immediate cognizance, and I do not feel competent to the task of pointing out the necessary alterations. Measures have however been taken to procure on that subject, and from the proper sources, information which will hereafter be laid before the committee.

To the remaining inquiry of the committee, whether the inconveniences of the present system may not in some degree be removed, I can only answer, generally, that a law which lays such extensive restrictions as the embargo, cannot be carried into effect without imposing serious inconveniences, even on the domestic intercourse of the United States; and that these must necessarily be increased in proportion to the opposition and efforts to evade or violate the law. It has already been stated, that provisions, which will render the bond given by coasting vessels a complete security against violations by them, will diminish the necessity and extent of more arbitrary restrictions. An authority to permit, on proper security being given, such vessels, when they arrive in port, to keep their cargoes on board, would afford some relief. And I think that the credit on duties accruing on the importation of certain articles which was allowed by the act of the 10th March last, should be extended to all importations of the same articles, made after the passing of the act; those made in vessels which sailed under special permission only excepted. With respect to this last class of importations, as they were permitted by special indulgence, and as it is understood that it has been impossible in many cases to prevent its being abused, and as in almost all, the parties having a species of exclusive privilege, have made sufficiently profitable voyages, the propriety, particularly in the existing situation of the revenue, of allowing them also the advantage of an extended credit on duties, is not perceived.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Enforcement of the Embargo.

SENATE.

Mr. TIFFIN, from the committee, reported the bill further to amend the Judicial system of the United States correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. REED, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 5th instant, the memorial of Lemuel Taylor and others, praying an alteration in the route of the mail from Washington to Chestertown, reported a bill to change the post route from Annapolis to Rockhall, by Baltimore to Rockhall; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

On motion, by Mr. GILES,

Resolved, That the committee appointed on so much of the President's Message as relates to the embargo laws, be instructed to inquire whether it be expedient to suspend the payment of certain revenue bonds given subsequent to the date of the act, entitled "An act for extending the terms of credit on revenue bonds in certain cases, and for other purposes;" and that the committee have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. GILES, from the committee last mentioned, reported a bill supplemental to an act, entitled "An act for extending the terms of credit on revenue bonds in certain cases, and for other purposes;" which was read, and passed to the second reading.

MONDAY, December 12.

Mr. MITCHILL presented the memorial of the surviving officers of the late Revolutionary army and navy of the State of New York, stating the losses they have sustained in consequence of the commutation, which they were induced to accept in lieu of half pay for life, and praying relief.

Mr. GREGG presented sundry petitions from officers in the Pennsylvania line, on the same subject; and the memorials were read.

Ordered, That they, together with one presented on the 8th instant, on the same subject, be referred to Messrs. GREGG, MITCHILL, and BRADLEY, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. THURSTON presented the petition of Thomas Pearson, an officer in the Revolutionary war, representing that, from a want of knowledge of the necessary proceedings, and his remote situation, he was not placed on the pension list till the year 1803, although entitled under the first act of Congress on the subject, and praying relief; and the petition was read, and referred to the Secretary of War, to consider and report thereon.

The bill supplemental to an act, entitled "An act for extending the terms of credit on revenue bonds in certain cases, and for other purposes," was read the second time, as in Committee of the Whole, and the PRESIDENT reported it to the House without amendment. On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read the third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

The bill to change the post route from Annapolis to Rockhall, by Baltimore to Rockhall, was read the second time as in Committee of the Whole; and the President having reported the bill to the House amended; on the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act authorizing the President to employ an additional number of revenue cutters," in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The bill making further provision for enforcing the embargo was read the second time; and, on motion, it was ordered to be considered as in Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The Senate resumed the third reading of the bill to reward Andrew Joseph Villard for an invention of public utility; and having amended the title,

Resolved, That the bill pass, and the title thereof be "An act for the relief of Andrew Joseph Villard."

Mr. BRADLEY gave notice that he should, on Thursday next, ask leave to bring in a bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act for the more effectual preservation of peace in the ports and harbors of the United States, and in the waters under their jurisdiction."

ENFORCEMENT OF THE EMBARGO LAWS.

Mr. GILES, from the committee appointed the 11th of November last, on that part of the Message of the President of the United States which relates to the embargo laws, and the measures necessary to enforce due observance thereof, made a further report, in part, of a bill to authorize and require the President of the United States to arm, man, and fit out for immediate service, all the public ships of war, vessels, and gunboats of the United States; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The bill is as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and required, to cause to be fitted out, officered, manned, and employed, as soon as may be, all the frigates and other armed vessels of the United States, including gunboats; and to cause the frigates and armed vessels, so soon as they can be prepared for actual service, respectively, to be stationed at such ports and places on the seacoast as he may deem most expedient, or to cruise on any part of the coast of the United States, or Territories thereof.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, for the purpose of carrying the foregoing provision into immediate effect, the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized and required, in addition to the number of petty officers, able seamen, ordinary seamen, and boys, at present authorized by law, to appoint, and cause to be engaged and employed as soon as may be, — midshipmen, — corporals of marines — able seamen, — ordinary seamen and boys, which shall be engaged to serve for a period not exceeding — years, but the President may discharge the same sooner, if in his judgment their services may be dispensed with; and to satisfy the necessary expenditures to be incurred therein, a sum not exceeding — dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, and shall be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

TUESDAY, December 13.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made yesterday respecting the expense of the public buildings. The motion was amended and agreed to, as follows :

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to ascertain and report to the Senate the amount which has been already expended by the United States on the public buildings in the City of Washington; and also to ascertain, as near as may be, the amount which would be required to complete and finish the President's house and square, and the two wings of the Capitol.

Ordered, That Messrs. BRADLEY, LLOYD, and SMITH of Maryland, be the committee.

The bill, entitled "An act authorizing the President to employ an additional number of revenue cutters," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. MITCHELL, SMITH of Maryland, and CRAWFORD, to consider and report thereon.

The bill to authorize and require the President of the United States to arm, man, and fit out for immediate service, all the public ships of war, vessels, and gunboats, of the United States, was read the second time, as in Committee of the Whole; and the PRESIDENT having reported the bill to the House amended; on the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the second reading of the bill making further provision for enforcing the embargo; and, an amendment having been proposed by Mr. BRADLEY, it was agreed that the bill, together with the amendment, be recommitted to the original committee, further to consider and report thereon.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the second reading of the bill making a further appropriation towards completing the two wings of the Capitol at the City of Washington, and for other purposes.

Ordered, That the consideration of the bill be further postponed.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES :

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States :

I now transmit to both Houses of Congress a report of the Commissioners appointed under the act of March 25, 1806, concerning a road from Cumberland to Ohio, being a statement of the proceedings under the said act since their last report communicated to Congress, in order that Congress may be enabled to adopt such further measures as may be proper under existing circumstances.

TH. JEFFERSON.

DECEMBER 13, 1808.

The Message and report were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Mr. TIFFIN, from the committee, having reported the bill to change the post route from Annapolis to Rockhall, by Baltimore to Rockhall, correctly engrossed; it was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TIFFIN, from the committee, having reported the bill supplemental to an act, entitled "An act for extending the terms of credit on revenue bonds in certain cases, and for other purposes," correctly engrossed; it was read the third time, and passed.

WEDNESDAY, December 14.

Mr. GREGG presented the memorial of the officers of the marine corps, praying that "that corps may be so organized as to place the officers upon a footing, as to military promotion, with their brother officers in the army," for reasons mentioned in the memorial; which was read, and referred to Messrs. GREGG, SMITH of Maryland, and SUMNER, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. TIFFIN, from the committee, reported the bill to authorize and require the President of the United States to arm, man, and fit out for immediate service, all the public ships of war, vessels, and gunboats, of the United States, correctly engrossed; the bill was read the third time, and the consideration thereof further postponed.

THURSDAY, December 15.

Mr. GILES, from the committee to whom was recommitted the bill making further provision for enforcing the embargo, reported amendments, which were amended and agreed to; and the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House amended; and, on motion by Mr. CRAWFORD, it was agreed to amend the 6th and 10th sections of the bill. On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed, and read the third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

On motion, by Mr. GILES,

Ordered, That the bill to authorize and require the President of the United States to arm, man, and fit out for immediate service, all the public ships of war, vessels, and gunboats, of the United States, be recommitted to the original committee, further to consider and report thereon.

FRIDAY, December 16.

Mr. GILES, from the committee to whom was recommitted the bill to authorize and require the President of the United States to arm, man, and fit out for immediate service, all the public ships of war, vessels, and gunboats, of the United States, reported amendments; and the amendments were considered as in Committee of the Whole, and agreed to; and the PRESIDENT having reported the bill to the House amended, on the question, Shall this bill be engrossed, and read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. TIFFIN, from the committee, reported the bill correctly engrossed, and it was read the third time.

port of the Secretary of the Treasury, in obedience to the act, entitled "An act to establish the Treasury Department;" and the report was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Mr. TIFFIN, from the committee, reported the bill making further provision for enforcing the embargo, correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time. On motion, by Mr. GOODRICH, to postpone the further consideration thereof until to-morrow; the yeas and nays having been required by one fifth of the Senators present, those who voted in the affirmative, are—

Messrs. Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Gilman, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Howland, Lloyd, Maclay, Parker, Pickering, Smith of New York, Sumter, and Thruston.

Those who voted in the negative, are—

Messrs. Bradley, Gaillard, Giles, Gregg, Kitchel, Milledge, Mitchill, Moore, Pope, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Smith of Tennessee, Tiffin, and Turner.

The Senate being equally divided, the PRESIDENT determined the question in the affirmative.

SATURDAY, December 17.

The credentials of MICHAEL LEIB, appointed a Senator by the State of Pennsylvania, were presented and read, and ordered to lie on file.

The Senate resumed the third reading of the bill to authorize and require the President of the United States to arm, man, and fit out for immediate service, all the public ships of war, vessels, and gunboats, of the United States; and the blanks having been filled, and the title amended,

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be "An act to provide for arming, and fitting out for immediate service, all the public ships of war, vessels, and gunboats, of the United States."

ENFORCEMENT OF THE EMBARGO.

The Senate resumed the bill making further provision for enforcing the embargo.

Mr. GOODRICH rose, and addressed the Senate as follows—

Mr. President: This bill, making further provision for enforcing the embargo, requires all our attention. We are not on ordinary business. An embargo for an indefinite period, over a great country like ours, abounding in rich staples and domestic products, and carrying on in its own vessels an extensive and profitable commerce, is a phenomenon in the civilized world. We are about entering on the second year of this novel measure, and even in defiance of the lessons which experience teaches, that without producing any beneficial results, it is embroiling the choicest interests of the nation. On foreign Powers it has made no impression, and its ruinous effect on our own country, we see in the waste of private property and public revenue; in the discontents of our citizens; in the perplexed state of the public councils, and the increasing difficulties that are fast gathering round the Government. The friends of the embargo say, that it has been evaded and violated, but that when strictly enforced, it will compel foreign nations to respect our rights. Under these impressions, the system is to be maintained. To enforce it, the powers of the Government are to be put in array throughout our country, especially in places where discontents are manifested; and an extension is to be given to that system of arbitrary seizures of vessels, goods, merchandise, and domestic products, on suspicion of their being intended for exportation, which came in with the embargo laws, and has attended their execution.

In all this, sir, I see nothing that is to conciliate the conflicting opinions and passions of our citizens and restore concord amongst them. I see nothing that will invigorate the public councils, and resuscitate the dormant spirit and resources of the nation. To me it seems that the Administration, without presenting to public view any definite object or course, are pressing forward our affairs into a chaos of inextricable difficulties. And I cannot but regard this bill as holding a prominent place among the measures leading on that unfortunate issue.

This bill bears marks of distrust entertained by the Government of the people, or a considerable portion of them, and of the State authorities; it places the coasting trade under further and vexatious restraints, as well as its general regulations under the control of the President. It intrenches on the municipal polity of the States, and the intercourse of the people in their ordinary business. And, what above all will wound the public sentiment, for the accustomed and mild means of executing the laws by civil process through the tribunals of justice, it substitutes military powers to be called out and exercised, not in aid, but in place, of the civil authorities.

To show that this is a correct delineation of the character, principles, and provisions of the bill, I ask, sir, your attention to an elucidation of its most important sections.

Not having had time critically to examine the first two, which have lately been introduced by way of amendment, I pass them without remark; leaving it for gentlemen who may follow, to point out their extravagant and oppressive principles.

This bill, as I before observed to you, sir, subjects the coasting trade to further and vexatious restraints, and places it under the control of the President.

It is enacted (section 2):

"It shall not be lawful to put on board any ship, vessel, or boat, of any description whatever, any specie or goods, wares or merchandise, either of domestic or foreign growth, produce, or manufacture, and the same is hereby prohibited, unless a permit particularly stating the articles thus to be laden shall have been previously obtained from the collector of the district in which such ship, vessel, or boat may then be, or from a revenue officer especially authorized by the collector to grant such permits; nor unless the lading shall be made under the inspection of the proper revenue officers, nor unless the owner or owners, consignee, or factor of such ship, vessel, or boat shall, with the master, have given bond with one or more sureties to the United States, in a sum six times the value of the vessel and cargo, that the vessel shall not leave the port without a clearance, nor shall, when leaving the port, proceed to a foreign port or place, nor shall put any article on board of any other vessel; and that the whole cargo shall be reloaded either in the port where the vessel may then be, or in such other port of the United States as shall be designated in the clearance. And it shall be lawful for the collectors of the customs to refuse permission to put any cargo on board any such ship, vessel, or boat, whenever in their opinion there is an intention to violate the embargo, or whenever they shall have received instructions to that effect by direction of the President of the United States: Provided, That nothing contained in this section shall be construed to extend to any ship, vessel, or boat, uniformly employed in the navigation only of bays, sounds, rivers, and lakes within the jurisdiction of the United States, which shall have obtained a general permission, agreeably to the provisions in the fourth section of this act."

The third section regulates all that branch of the coasting trade not confined to rivers, bays, sounds, and lakes.

The sum required in the bond is six times the value of vessel and cargo, and, as is said by those well informed, in most cases will amount to fifteen or twenty thousand dollars. It is apprehended, that many coasters will not be able to obtain sureties for that sum. Many of the owners of coasting vessels are men of moderate property, belonging to the middle class of society in point of wealth, the most numerous and not least meritorious of citizens, whom sudden and adverse changes, and consequent loss of business, first affect and depress.

Should the excessive amount of the bonds drive this description of coasters out of their regular employment, and throw it into the hands of competitors of larger capitals, we shall have an additional evil to those growing out of the embargo to deprecate. The coasting trade is nearly ruined already by the destruction of foreign trade. Both these valuable interests, like the other interests of a free and commercial people, are interwoven with each other; and while we are shut out from a commercial intercourse with the rest of the world, the Government ought to afford by every facility in its power an encouragement to a commercial intercourse between the States.

The collectors may refuse permission to put a cargo on board of any ship, vessel, or boat specified in this section, whenever in their opinion there is an intention to violate the embargo, or whenever they shall have received instructions to that effect by direction of the President of the United States.

Hereby the collectors are deputed to be vice-roys over commerce in the spheres they occupy under the supremacy of the President. As we shall meet with an analogous provision in a subsequent paragraph, I at present waive further remarks on the dangerous policy of vesting the President with such enormous powers.

The fifth section treats of the trade uniformly carried on in rivers, bays, sounds, and lakes. It is there enacted:

"That the collectors of the customs be, and they are hereby, authorized to grant, under such general instructions as the President of the United States may give to that effect, a general permission to ships, vessels, or boats, whose employment has uniformly been confined to the navigation of bays, sounds, rivers, or lakes within the jurisdiction of the United States, when it can be done without danger of the embargo being violated, to take on board at any time such articles of domestic or foreign growth as may be designated in such general permission or permissions, bond with one or more sureties being previously given to the United States by the owner, owners, consignee, or factors of such ship, vessel, or boat, and by the master thereof, in an amount equal to three hundred dollars for each ton of said vessel; that such vessel shall not during the time limited in the condition of the bond, depart from any district of the United States without having previously obtained a clearance, nor until the master or commander shall have delivered to the collector or surveyor of the port of departure a manifest of the whole cargo on board; that the said vessel shall not, during the time abovementioned, proceed to any other port than that mentioned in her clearance, or put any article on board of any other vessel, or be employed in any foreign trade; and that on every voyage or trip the whole of the cargo shall be landed in a port of the United States within the bay, sound, river, or lakes to which the navigation of such vessel is confined."

The amount of the bond prescribed in this clause is three hundred dollars for each ton of the vessel; and it is not less objectionable on account of its magnitude, than in the case I have just animadverted on, whether compared with the relative abilities of the two classes of coasters on whom the respective provisions operate, or the objects in view; and it is more grievous to the districts of country dependent on trade, and intimately connected with its prosperity. The navigation of the ocean we deny, and have long denied to our citizens; that between States is impeded, and I fear we are going on from time to time, by piecemeal, to offer up the trade between districts of the same State, at the shrine of our embargo system.

The coasting trade is placed under the regulation of the President by this bill:

1st. Collectors may refuse permission to put a cargo on board of any ship, vessel or boat, in any case where they have their own personal suspicions that it is intended for foreign exportation, and in every case which may be comprehended within the scope of any general instructions, issued by command of the President. But there is a proviso as to coasting vessels uniformly employed in the navigation of bays, sounds, rivers, and lakes, which shall have obtained a general permission.

2d. General permissions may be granted to the last mentioned vessels, under such general instructions as the President of the United States may give, when it can be done without danger of the embargo being violated, to take on board such articles as may be designated in such general permission or permissions.

Enforcement of the Embargo.

SENATE.

By these general instructions, the President may prescribe the kind and quantity of exports from, and imports into the individual States, and from and to the particular districts within a State. He may suspend them in part or in whole.

The power of issuing general instructions now proposed to be given to the President by law, he exercised in the recess of Congress, and in my opinion, without law. The Governor of Massachusetts was authorized to give certificates, or licenses for the importation of flour into that State; and, under general instructions from the President, without personal suspicion of his own, the collector at Charleston, in South Carolina, detained a vessel; which called forth the independent exercise of the judicial power of the circuit court in that State, to control the President's instructions. I am sensible the Administration and its friends have an arduous task in executing the embargo; difficulties beset them on every side; difficulties inherent in the measure itself, and not to be overcome by accumulating rigorous penalties, and an extension of the Executive power. The power to regulate commerce is vested in Congress, and by granting it to the President, do we not transfer to him one of the most important and delicate of the Legislative powers? What State would have adopted the Constitution, if it had been foreseen that this power would be granted to any man, however distinguished by office?

I will in this place notice one or two objectionable clauses in the bill not immediately connected with either of the points I have discussed.

By a clause in the eighth section, it is provided, that in a suit on a bond for not relanding goods, wares, and merchandise, and failing to produce a certificate thereof, capture, distress, or any other accident shall not be given in plea or admitted in evidence in any such suit. The doctrine here assumed, that capture, distress, or any other accident shall not be pleaded or given in evidence, infringes the first principles of justice, and involves innocence in the punishment of guilt, together with its disgraceful and ruinous consequences. The crime created by the bill, is that of a person's clearing out a vessel and cargo for a port in the United States, and voluntarily going, contrary to law, to a foreign port. To a case of capture, or being prevented by the act of God from reaching the destined port, there can be no pretence of crime. And will Congress declare an offence by statute, and deny to a party accused the right of pleading and giving in evidence the only matter of fact that goes to his exculpation? Of what use is the trial by jury, for ages revered as the palladium of innocence against the oppression of power, if it may thus be narrowed down and perverted? And for what cause is this principle to be introduced? Are courts and juries distrusted? And therefore is it that the established usages and rules of trial are to be abandoned? The Secretary of the Treasury, it is said, may remit and mitigate forfeitures and penalties, and he will give relief. So innocence is to sue, as a favor, for relief, from penalties and forfeitures awarded to guilt, from a Secretary of the Treasury, when it is entitled to an acquittal in a court of justice.

It is made lawful by the seventh section of the bill for collectors to withhold a license or register for a vessel when sold, unless a bond shall be given by the owner previous to the sale, that such ship or vessel shall not contravene the embargo acts.

This provision infringes an essential right of property, and is as oppressive as it is unjust. Owners of vessels already deprived of their use by the embargo, are to be prevented from disposing of them in payment of their debts, or for other purposes, unless on condition of becoming bound for the good behaviour of all future owners of the vessel in respect of the embargo acts, as long as they shall continue.

The sections I have considered, principally affect merchants and seafaring men in their business, at stores, custom-houses, about wharves, ships, and vessels. But other sections take a wider range, and trench on the ordinary concerns of the great body of the people, by the powers they give for unreasonable and arbitrary searches for, and seizures of their property.

Collectors of the customs throughout the United States, by the tenth section, are empowered to take into custody, specie, or any articles of domestic growth or manufacture, under these circumstances, when deposited in unusual places, in unusual quantities, in places where there is reason to believe they are intended for exportation in vessels, sleighs, or other carriages, or in any manner apparently on their way towards the territories of foreign nations, or a place whence such articles are intended to be exported. And, when taken into custody they are not permitted to be removed without bonds being given for their being relanded in some place whence, in the opinion of the collector, there is no danger of their being exported.

Without warrant founded on proof, from suspicion only, may this unbounded license be exercised. Our houses, heretofore our castles, and the secure abodes of our families, may be thrown open to the visits of collectors to search for and seize our money and goods, whenever instigated by suspicion, prejudice, resentment, or party spirit.

No place is to be protected; the people may everywhere be exposed, at home, on the way, and abroad. Specie and goods thus seized without warrant, and on suspicion only, are not to be removed unless and until bond with sureties shall be given for landing or delivering the same in some place of the United States, whence, in the opinion of the collector, there shall not be any danger of such articles being exported. These provisions strike at the vital principles of a free Government; and are they not contrary to the fourth and sixth articles of amendments to the Constitution? Are not these searches and seizures, without warrant, on the mere suspicion of a collector, unreasonable searches and seizures? And is not a man thereby to be deprived of property without due process of law?

Such is the unprecedented nature and enormous extent of the powers given to collectors by this bill; and by what means, and in what manner, are they to be exercised? By the eleventh section it is enacted:

"That the powers given to the collectors by this or any other act respecting the embargo, to detain any vessel, or to take into their custody any articles for the purpose of preventing violations of the embargo, shall be exercised in conformity with such instructions as the President may give, and such general rules as he may prescribe for that purpose, made in pursuance of the powers aforesaid; which instructions and general rules the collectors shall be bound to obey; nor shall they be liable to any action, suit, or judgment on account of any detention of a vessel, or for having taken articles into their custody in conformity with such instructions and general rules."

Here Presidential instructions receive their last seal and stamp of authority. They are made binding upon collectors, and, for acts done in pursuance of those instructions, they are to be irresponsible.

These instructions, according to the terms of the bill, are to become the supreme law of the land, and obligatory on the courts of the United States and of the States. It may be said that to render them authoritative, the instructions must be in pursuance of the powers granted by the bill to the collectors, and that they are mere Executive directions given for the purpose of producing a uniform and systematic course of proceedings among collectors. If indeed this be their object, why is the clause inserted? Since the establishment of the Treasury Department, it has been the practice of the Secretary of the Treasury to issue instructions to subordinate officers; but this favorite embargo, to which all considerations are made to bend, offers the first instance of an attempt to give to them the force of laws. And a critical attention to the section shows that such is its intentment. Although it is declared that, to have the effect of laws, the President's instructions must be in pursuance of the powers granted by the bill to the collectors, it is to be remembered that collectors are to act in particular cases on their discretion, under the President's instructions, which are to be general, and neither the one nor the other are to be defined or limited by any precise rule. Both are arbitrary within the spheres of their general authorities, and the President's instructions are absolute on the collectors, and attempted to be made absolute on the court for their indemnity. They are issued from time to time as supplementary laws to enforce the embargo. No direction is given by the bill for their being published, while they necessarily must and will have important effects upon the rights and liberties of our citizens. It would still be some consolation if this unpleasant inquiry might stop here, but we must enter on a more painful duty. I have before asked by what means are these unprecedented powers to be executed? They are to be executed by military force, not to be employed in aid of the civil authority, but in the first instance in the place, and to the exclusion of the civil authority. By the twelfth section

"It is made lawful for the President of the United States, or such other person as he shall have empowered, to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia thereof, as may be judged necessary for the purpose, in conformity with the provisions of this and other acts respecting the embargo, of preventing the illegal departure of any ship or vessel, or of taking into custody and guarding any articles of domestic growth, produce, or manufacture, and also for the purpose of preventing and suppressing any armed or riotous assemblage of persons resisting the custom-house officers in the exercise of their duties, or in any manner opposing the execution of the laws laying an embargo, or otherwise violating, or assisting and abetting violations of the same."

The military may be employed by such person as the President may have empowered. He may designate, at certain places in the States, persons to call out such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia, as may be judged necessary. Those will be selected who are most convenient and in all respects qualified to act in the scenes to which they may be called. In these appointments the Senate is to have no concurrence. They are to be Presidential agents for issuing requisitions to the standing army, for militia, and not amenable to any tribunal for their conduct. Heretofore a delicate and respectful attention has been paid to the State authorities on this subject. The requisitions of the General Government for the militia have been made to the Governors of the States; and what reason is there for taking a different course to enforce the embargo?

Under our present system have not insurrections been suppressed, rebellions quelled, and combinations and resistance against lawful authority overcome, by the force of the General Government in co-operation with the State governments? Is not the authority of the marshals competent to the execution of the laws? I see no cause for these arrays of the military throughout the country, and the unrestrained license that is to be given to its operations. It is a fundamental principle of a free government, "that the military be kept in subordination to the civil power," and never be put in motion until those be found incompetent to preserve the public peace and authority. But, by the provisions of this bill, these Presidential agents may call out the standing army or militia, or part of them, to follow in the collector's train, to seize specie and goods in houses, stores, and elsewhere, and generally for executing the embargo laws. And even the public peace, so far as respects the suppressing armed and riotous assemblages of persons resisting the custom-house officers in the exercise of their duties, it would seem can no longer be confided to the States, and it is thought necessary to surround custom-house officers with bands of the standing army or militia.

The bill before us is bottomed on a report of the Secretary of the Treasury. How often were his strenuous remonstrances, and those of the chairman of the committee who reported the bill, (Mr. GILES,) formerly heard against the extension of Executive patronage and influence; the interference of the General Government in the local policy of the States, and the ordinary concerns of the people; and, above all, against standing armies? Then no such Executive prerogatives were claimed as this bill contains; no such attempts made as here are made for intrusions on the internal policy of the States, and the ordinary concerns of the people; and then our Army, small in comparison with the present establishment, was kept aloof from the affairs of the State, and the persons and property of the citizens. Our country was happy, prosperous, and respected. The present crisis is portentous. Internal disquiets will not be healed, nor public sentiment controlled, by precipitate and rash measures. It is time for the public councils to pause. This bill, sir, ought not to pass. It strikes at the vital principles of our republican system. It proposes to place the country in a time of peace under military law, the first appearance of which ought here to be resisted with all our talents and efforts. It proposes to introduce a military despotism, to which freemen can never submit, and which can never govern except by terror and carnage.

Mr. THRUSTON, now moved to recommit the bill, which was determined in the negative. And after debate, the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, December 19.

ENFORCEMENT OF THE EMBARGO.

The Senate resumed the bill making further provision for enforcing the embargo.

Mr. LLOYD stated, that he had no objection to the recommitment of the bill, as proposed by the gentleman from Vermont. He had wished for the postponement of it in the second reading, but the Senate had chosen to order otherwise; he had however then said, that he should not feel precluded from offering his reasons against some of the details, as well as against the general principles of the bill in the third reading; and as he had no reason to suppose that he should be one of the two additional members proposed to be placed on the committee, and as, on a former day, those who were opposed to the bill were called on to give their reasons before it should be committed, he would now do it, in order, that if his observations were of any weight, they might receive from the committee, to whom the subject was again to be referred, such consideration as they would merit.

Mr. L. observed, that he had not risen to oppose the bill because the object of it was to enforce a law to the policy of which he was adverse, but he was opposed to the bill, because, in itself, it appeared to him to contain provisions which would be extremely injurious and vexatious to the citizens, and principles which, in his view of them, were arbitrary in their nature, and in their virtual effect unconstitutional. In thus characterizing the bill, he meant no reflection on the committee who reported it; they had undoubtedly taken a different view of the subject from what he had, and if he (Mr. L.) was mistaken in the estimation he had formed of it, he would rejoice more than any member of the committee.

By the third section of the bill, said Mr. L., it is enacted, that it shall not be lawful to put on board any ship, vessel, or boat, any specie, goods, wares, or merchandise, unless the owner, or owners, consignee or factor, of such ship, vessel, or boat, shall with the master have given bond, with one or more sureties to the United States, in a sum six times the value of the vessel and cargo, that the vessel shall not leave the port without a clearance, &c. And by the fifth section it is enacted, that general permission shall be given to vessels that have been uniformly employed in the navigation of bays and rivers, still to navigate the same, provided the owners and master, with sureties, shall first give bond to the amount of three hundred dollars, for every ton of such vessel so employed; which, on a vessel of one hundred tons burden, would amount to thirty thousand dollars.

Requisitions of bonds to this amount, Mr. L. said, were in his opinion excessive. He would instance the effect of them on the State of Massachusetts, not that he conceived they were legislating for a particular State, but he adduced the circumstances of that State in illustration of the principles of the bill, because they were most familiar to him; other States were in different degrees undoubtedly similarly circumstanced. The Hudson alone found employment for near two thousand coasting vessels.

A very large coasting trade, said Mr. L., was carried on between the principal seaports in old Massachusetts and the District of Maine; this trade, for the most part, is prosecuted in lumber, lime, and firewood, towards the Autumn or the close of the year, principally in the latter. The inhabitants of the old seaports are not in the habit of burning coal for fuel, they make use almost entirely of firewood, for a great part of their supplies of which they rely on the District of Maine, and this trade is alike important to the inhabitants of that district, who depend in some measure on the sale of their wood and lumber for their support. They almost exclusively own the vessels engaged in this trade; these vessels are from eighty to one hundred or one hundred and twenty tons burden—some of them are worth three or four thousand dollars; it will be a fair average to estimate them at two thousand dollars each; the cargoes may be worth from three to five hundred dollars: thus then, one of these vessels and a cargo would be worth about two thousand five hundred dollars; and bonds for six times this amount, or fifteen thousand dollars, will be required for every trip they make, for only about three or four weeks employment for their vessels.

The coasters are generally of a respectable but not wealthy class of persons, they inhabit a new country, thinly settled; for the land they occupy, many of them are partially indebted, as well as for the equipment of their vessels. Under present circumstances, in many cases, the whole vicinity, for an extent of several miles, could not muster fifteen thousand dollars in money, to pay the penalty, provided the law was violated; the consequence must be, either that the regulation must be a fallacy on account of insufficient bondsmen being given, and be a mere business of vexation, or the trade would in many instances be abandoned from inability of the owners of vessels to procure such bondsmen as would be acceptable to the collector. If the latter were the case, and the principal part of the trade were cut off, the inhabitants of that part of Massachusetts, who have hitherto received their firewood from Maine, might be greatly incommoded for the supplies of an indispensable necessary of life, in a climate so inclement as the one they inhabit; while the inhabitants of Maine would be equally distressed, from being interdicted from the pursuit of their ordinary occupations, from being deprived of a market for almost the only cash article they now possess, from procuring clothes to cover them, or of obtaining food for their subsistence, for in many parts of that district they do not raise corn enough for their consumption.

And, said Mr. L., what right has Congress to prohibit such a trade as this, for an indefinite period? It was not given by the Constitution, nor in his opinion was it by any means certain that Congress possessed it; perhaps gentlemen were not aware on how frail a tenure, it might be considered that they held even the right to regulate this trade; it might be found to rest on no more solid a basis than that of sufferance. He knew that there was a sweeping clause in the Constitution, on which the gentlemen placed great reliance, that Congress should possess the power to make all laws that might be necessary for carrying the Constitution into effect—but he also knew that in all political contracts, whatever was not specially given, was retained. He also knew that amendments to the Constitution, whenever they clashed with the original stipulations in the Constitution, were of superior force—and by the 11th and 12th amendments, it is expressly declared, that the “enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people. That the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or the people.”

Now, said Mr. L., what is the authority given by the Constitution to the General Government with regard to commerce—it is comprised in two lines—“Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.” Now apply this to the coasting trade between two ports in the same State—take for example the ports of Boston and Portland—and if this trade be not a trade with foreign nations, a trade among the several States, or a trade with the Indian tribes, then sir, whence arises your power even to regulate it, except from sufferance? It may be said that it is natural to suppose the framers of the Constitution meant to give to the General Government the same power to regulate a trade between two ports in the same State, as between two ports in different States—but if their intention were ascertained, it would not become law; it may be a casus omissus, but that does not alter the fact.

It is true this trade has been regulated by the General Government—so long as the regulations were not oppressive, it made no difference to the State, or to the public, whether the regulations came from the General, or from the State Government, and probably would never be objected to. But screw up these regulations so tightly, as to deprive the citizens of their accustomed avocations, take from them the means of subsistence, and your authority to do this will be questioned; and should this bill be passed into a law, and a coaster, engaged in trade between Boston and Portland, was to violate the provisions of it, be indicted for so doing, and convicted thereof, and was to demur to the constitutionality of the law, it is very doubtful, said Mr. L., if there could be found a judge on the judicial bench of the United States that would inflict on him its penalties.

In the sixth section of the bill it is stated, that if any ship, vessel, or boat, not having a general permission, and giving a general bond as prescribed by the act, shall take on board any specie, goods, wares, or merchandise, contrary to the provisions of the act, such ship, vessel or boat, with the goods, wares, and merchandise, shall be wholly forfeited, and the owner or owners shall moreover forfeit and pay a sum equal to the value of the ship, vessel or boat, and of the cargo put on board the same. Can gentlemen, said Mr. L., be aware of the operation of this clause? Suppose he had chartered a vessel a fortnight since to a merchant of Baltimore, and this merchant after the passing of the present act, and contrary to the provisions of it, attempted to evade the embargo, sent the vessel to sea with a cargo of ten, twenty or thirty thousand dollars, and was detected; was he, the owner of the vessel, Mr. L. asked, not only to lose his vessel, but also again to lose the value of ten, twenty or thirty thousand dollars in addition, as the case may be, for the misconduct of another man, of which misconduct he had neither the knowledge or suspicion, nor the power to control or prevent it? The provisions of the second section are still more exceptionable with regard to sleighs, wagons, and carriages. Suppose a man of respectable appearance should have his carriage destroyed or broke to pieces by accident in Boston, and should hire of a hackney coachman, a carriage, without hiring of the same person a driver and horses, to proceed to New York; suppose that after getting to New York, instead of returning the carriage to Boston, the person who has hired it, proceeds with it towards Canada, puts into the carriage fifteen or twenty thousand dollars in gold, and is afterwards detected; is the hackney coachman not only to lose his carriage, and three times the amount carried in it—to lose his house, his entire property—to be stripped naked, not for a crime committed by him, but for lawfully pursuing a business which he had prosecuted not only without censure, but with commendations on his industry, perhaps for twenty years before? This cannot be, as the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. THURSTON) has said, with reference to some of the provisions of this bill. It is too monstrous a principle of legislation ever to be carried into effect, in any free country on the face of the earth.

But, sir, said Mr. L., bad as this is, the next section is still worse; by that section it is enacted 'That the person or persons, whose names do, or may appear, as owner or owners of any ships or vessels, either in the certificates of registry, enrolment, or license of any such ship or vessel, or on the last custom-house document issued before the passing this act, shall be reputed as the true owner or owners of such ship or vessel, and be liable to the payment of all penalties which may be incurred by the owners of such ship or vessel, by reason of any violation of any of the provisions of this act, or of the act laying an embargo.' It is well known, said Mr. L., to all mercantile men, that the custom-house officers will not let the owners of ships keep their own registers; so soon as the vessel enters, the register is taken from the captain by the collector, nor can the owner get it or obtain a new one until the vessel is again loaded and ready for sea. Suppose, said Mr. L., he had sold a vessel last January for ten thousand dollars, to a man whom he knew nothing about, who had paid him the purchase money—in consequence of the embargo, this purchaser of the vessel had not been able to send her to sea until this time; but perhaps a fortnight after the passing this bill, he puts a valuable cargo on board the vessel, attempts to evade the law, and is discovered; am I, said Mr. L., to be punished to the amount of the vessel and her cargo? Am I to be reduced from affluence to beggary for the conduct of a man with whom I have no more concern than with an inhabitant of Kamtschatka, and of whose doings I had no more knowledge—merely because I sold him a piece of property and conveyed it to him in conformity with a special law of the United States, twelve months before the existence of the law, under which I am punished for this offence? This is not only an ex post facto law—it is punishing the innocent with the guilty—it is going one step beyond the Mosaic regulation mentioned by the gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. BRADLEY.) it is not only punishing the man that owned the bullock, but it is punishing the person who sold the cow, that brought the bullock, that committed the injury! This, said, Mr. L., may be sport to us, but it will be death to the victims who come under the operation of the bill, should it ever become a law.

Mr. L. observed, that there were other minor objections to the bill, with the enumeration of which, as the bill would be committed, he should not then trouble the Senate—but with regard to the authority given to the President, under him to the collectors, to arrest and detain the property of the citizens on suspicion; with regard to the exemption granted to the collectors from actions at law, or civil process in consequence of their conduct under instructions received from the President of the United States; and with regard to the authority given the President, to delegate the power to whomsoever he might please—to call into actual service the militia of the United States, without reference to the State authorities—he considered them as principles totally hostile and repugnant to the feelings and all the political institutions of the American people.

Mr. L. said, he knew that the Constitution of the United States was the paramount law of the land, but he also knew, that Constitution possessed only the powers that were given to it, and that, as well as the several State constitutions, it was predicated upon the same broad principles of civil and rational liberty—principles which cannot be infringed in a free country; for in whatever country these principles are violated, that country ceases to be a free one. Among these principles are the following:

All men have certain, natural, essential, and inalienable rights—and among them, the right of enjoying and defending their rights and liberties; of acquiring and possessing and defending property.

Each individual of the society has a right to be protected by it, in the enjoyment of his life, liberty, and property, according to standing laws.

Every man ought to find a certain remedy by having recourse to the laws for all wrongs done his person, property, or character; he ought to obtain right and justice freely and without being obliged to purchase it—promptly, and without delay.

Every citizen has a right to be secure from all unreasonable searches, and seizures of his person, his house, his papers, and all his possessions.

Laws made to punish for actions done before the existence of such laws, and which have not been declared crimes by preceding laws, are unjust, oppressive, and inconsistent with the fundamental principles of a free Government.

The military shall be kept in entire subserviency to the civil power.

In free Governments, the Legislative, the Judicial, and Executive branches ought forever to be kept distinct, in order that they may be Governments of laws, and not of men.

Now, sir, (said Mr. L.,) it appears to me, by this bill, that every one of these principles is violated.

Instead of the citizens being subject to standing laws perspicuously formed, and which promulgate offences before punishment is inflicted for the commission of them, by this bill they may be made to suffer not for crimes, but for lawful and commendable actions performed in the usual course of their ordinary business, many months before such a law as this was even thought of. Instead of their being placed under the dominion of a Government of laws and not of men, they may, by this bill, be subjected to the arbitrary will, whim, caprice, malevolence, misconstruction, or misinformation of an individual; and, Mr. L. said, it made no difference in opinion, whether this individual were the President of the United States, or a collector—they were both human beings, and as much liable to error; the principle being radically wrong in itself, the person acting under it, could not sanction it.

Instead of the citizens obtaining justice promptly and without delay—instead of their being able to find speedy redress for all wrongs done to their persons, their character and their property—in consequence of the attacks of the soldiery, of an unfounded imputation to violate the laws of their country, or an undue arrestation and detention of their property—a shield was interposed between them and the immediate wrong-doer—they could not come into legal contact with him. The laws had lost their office with regard to collectors. And if it were possible to conceive, that a President of the United States, from misconception, from inattention, mistake, mental derangement, or corrupt views, could give unauthorized instructions to the collectors, and the citizens were to suffer severely under them; Mr. L. said, it appeared to him, that the only course they could pursue to obtain redress, was to institute a suit against the incumbent or the individual who might be in the office of the President, and with this suit to travel on from the district court to the circuit court, from the circuit court to the Supreme Court, from Passamaquoddy to Washington—and after dancing attendance several months at this city, if they were successful in the issue of the suit, and were also so fortunate as to have a very liberal jury, they might stand some chance to get a verdict in their favor, with or without one half the value of the loss of their time and the expenses of the prosecution.

Instead, said Mr. L., of the military being kept in strict subordination to the civil authority—instead of the three great branches of Government being kept for ever distinct, it appeared to him, that the military was exalted above the civil power; that the three distinguishing features of free Government, the Legislative, the Judicial and the Executive—instead of their being kept forever separate—were by this bill amalgamated and absorbed by an individual, who on the slightest circumstances in nature, on trifles light as air, gets his suspicions excited; on these suspicions he forms an opinion, on which opinion he passes judgment, and this judgment he is authorized to carry into effect, against perhaps an unoffending citizen, with the whole military force of the United States within his district, if it be necessary for him to employ it.

This state of things, said Mr. L., cannot be; he meant not to wound the feelings of any gentleman, but he must speak freely on the subject; principles of this sort appeared to him more nearly allied to the bow-string discipline of a Turkish despotism, than to the pure and wholesome laws of a free and elective Republic. The entire conviction which gentlemen might feel in their own minds, that the person to whom these powers were given would not abuse them, ought to form no excuse for enacting such laws; they were not legislating for themselves alone, but also for posterity. If there were no other objections to the bill under consideration, it contained precedents of the most dangerous tendency, which might in future, if not at present, be perverted to the worst of purposes. For these reasons, Mr. L. said, he was opposed to the bill, and he both hoped and trusted it never could nor would pass into a law of the United States.

When Mr. LLOYD had concluded, on motion, by Mr. BRADLEY, the bill was recommitted to the original committee; and Messrs. CRAWFORD and THURSTON were added to the committee, further to consider and report thereon.

TUESDAY, December 20.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act authorizing the payment of certain pensions by the Secretary of War, at the seat of Government," in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. GILES, from the committee to whom was recommitted the bill making further provision for enforcing the embargo, reported amendments, which were agreed to as in Committee of the Whole; and the bill was further amended, and the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House accordingly. On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read the third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

WEDNESDAY, December 21.

The PRESIDENT communicated the petition of Eunice Hunt, widow of the late Thomas Hunt, Colonel Commandant of the first regiment United States' infantry, stating the "numberless distresses of indigence to which she is exposed, in a remote corner of the territories of the United States," and praying such relief as may to Congress be deemed proper; and the petition was read and referred to Messrs. MITCHILL, FRANKLIN, and SUMTER, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the committee appointed on the 13th instant, to ascertain and report the expenditures and probable estimates in relation to the public buildings in the City of Washington, made report; which was read for consideration.

Mr. MITCHILL, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the President to employ an additional number of revenue cutters," reported an amendment; which was read and ordered to lie for consideration.

The bill, entitled "An act authorizing the payment of certain pensions by the Secretary of War, at the seat of Government," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. ANDERSON, TIFFIN, and ROBINSON, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. TIFFIN, from the committee, reported the bill making further provision for enforcing the embargo correctly engrossed.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of William White and others;" also, a bill, entitled "An act authorizing the proprietors of squares and lots in the city of Washington to have the same subdivided and admitted to record;" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

ENFORCEMENT OF THE EMBARGO.

The bill making further provision for enforcing the embargo was read the third time; and the title having been amended—

Mr. GILES said, I am sensible that I owe an apology to the Senate, as chairman of the committee, for not having made an exposition of the objects and principles of the bill, reported for consideration, at an earlier stage of the discussion. This omission has not in the smallest degree been influenced by any apprehension, that these principles are indefensible; but, in some degree, from a desire to screen myself, as much as possible, from intermixing in discussions; a task which is never agreeable, but is at present peculiarly distressing and afflicting to my feelings. I also thought that the session had already been sufficiently fruitful of discussions intimately connected with the bill before us; and that the public interests, at this time, required action. I know, too, sir, that I owe an apology to the Senate, for the great number of amendments which, under their indulgence, has been made to this bill after it was first presented to their consideration. But, sir, you will find some apology in the intrinsic difficulty and delicacy of the subject itself, and also in the disposition manifested by the committee, to give to the objections made by the opponents of the bill, that respectful attention to which many of them were certainly entitled, and to accommodate its provisions, as far as possible, to the views of those gentlemen. After every effort, however, to effect this object, it still appears that the bill presents temptations for addressing the popular sensibility too strong to be resisted by gentlemen in the opposition. They have, accordingly, with great zeal and ability, described the provisions of the bill as dangerous and alarming to the rights and liberties of the people. This, sir, is the common course of opposition, and applies to every strong measure requiring the exercise of much Executive discretion. I think, however, I shall be able to show that there is no new principle contained in the provisions of that bill; but that every provision it contains is amply justified by precedents in pre-existing laws, which have not been found to be so destructive to the rights of the people, as gentlemen strenuously insist similar provisions in this bill will be, if they receive the sanction of law. In performing this task, I shall bring into view only such parts of the bill as have been objected to by gentlemen, presuming, that as their objections have evidently been the result of great industry and deliberation, all other parts of the bill remain unobjectionable. I shall also, perhaps, avoid some of the observations respecting minute details; apply my remarks generally to principles; and thus bring my observations and replies into as short a compass as possible.

The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. GOODRICH) commenced his remarks by declaring the embargo to be a permanent measure, deprecating its effects, as ruinous at home and ineffectual abroad. These observations have been repeatedly made by others, and already replied to by several gentlemen, as well as myself; and I am strengthened in the correctness of those replies by all the further reflections I have been enabled to bestow upon them. This part of the subject will, therefore, be passed over without further notice, except to remark, that perhaps one of the causes of the inefficacy of the measure abroad, has been the unprincipled violations of its provisions at home; and the great and leading object of the present bill, is, to prevent such violations. Upon this part of the subject, I am happy to find that one of its most strenuous and judicious opposers (Mr. HILLHOUSE) has candidly informed the Senate, that the provisions of the bill are admirably calculated to effect that object—and if in their practical operation, they should realize the character anticipated by that gentleman, I shall feel no regret for that portion of labor I have bestowed upon them. Indeed, I shall congratulate the committee as well as myself in having been so fortunate as to find a competent remedy for so great an evil.

The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. GOODRICH) informs us, that the public councils are pressing on to measures pregnant with the most alarming results. I hope the gentleman is mistaken in his apprehensions, and I should have been much pleased if the gentleman had been good enough to point them to a better course; but, sir, he has not done so, nor has any gentleman on the same side of the question. Indeed, sir, it would give me great pleasure to do something that would be agreeable to our Eastern friends; but, unfortunately, amidst all the intrinsic difficulties, which press upon us, that seems not to be among the least of them. The gentlemen themselves will not explicitly tell us what would produce the effect—and I am inclined to think that nothing short of putting the Government in their hands would do it. Even this would not be exempt from difficulties. The gentlemen from that part of the United States are nearly equally divided among themselves respecting the proper course of measures to be pursued, and there is an immense majority in every other part of the United States, in favor of the measures proposed; we are therefore surrounded with real and intrinsic difficulties from every quarter, and those of a domestic nature are infinitely the most formidable, and most to be deprecated. Indeed, sir, under present circumstances, the administration of the Government cannot be a pleasant task; and, in my judgment, it requires a great effort of patriotism to undertake it, not on account of external pressures, but on account of internal discontents, stimulated too by so many artful intrigues. But for these unfortunate cir-circumstances, every gentleman would feel an honorable pride in contributing his efforts to devise measures for repelling foreign aggressions, and he would court the responsibility attached to his station. I would not, Mr. President, give up a scintilla of that portion of the responsibility which the crisis imposes on me. Indeed, sir, to have the honor of bearing my full share of it, is the only inducement I have at this moment for occupying a place on this floor. Without that consideration I should now be in retirement. But when I turn my eyes upon internal divisions, discontents, and violations of law, and am compelled to think of measures for their suppression, it produces the most painful sensations, and distressing reflections.

The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. GOODRICH) has been pleased to remind me of my opposition to former Administrations; and he has thought proper to assign me a higher place in the ranks of the opposition than I ever aspired to. If the gentleman will review the proceedings of former days, he will probably find that my opposition was directed more to the objects contemplated by former Administrations, than to the means of effecting objects generally approved.

[Mr. GOODRICH rose to explain. He said that he did not mean to refer to the gentleman's opposition to those Administrations generally, but to the transfer of legislative powers to the Executive particularly.]

I understood the gentleman differently, but stand corrected by his explanation, and will waive the intended reply. I am now, however, unwilling to look into retrospection; it could only produce an unpleasant and unprofitable examination—it is now, as it has been from the beginning of the session, my unceasing effort to take a prospective view of measures—I would rather follow the example of a celebrated Roman conqueror. It was his maxim always to forget the last defeat, and to turn his whole thoughts upon the best means of obtaining victory in the next battle. Stimulated, then, sir, solely by a solicitude to discover what the public interests prospectively require, I will proceed, with the most respectful attention to the gentlemen in the opposition, to examine the objections urged against this bill, both generally and particularly.

The great principle of objection, the gentlemen tell us, consists in the transfer of legislative powers to the executive department. This is an old and abstract question, often heretofore brought into view, and leads to endless discussion. I think I shall be able to show, that the bill introduces no new principle in this respect, but only applies an established principle to new practical objects. The general principle of the separation of departments is generally admitted in the abstract; but the difficulties in this discussion arise from applying the principle to practical objects. The great difficulty exists in the attempt to fix on the precise boundary line between legislative and executive powers in their practical operation. This is not possible. You might attempt the search for the philosopher's stone, or the discovery of the perpetual motion, with as much prospect of success. The reason of this difficulty is, that the practical objects and events, to which this abstract principle is attempted to be applied, are perpetually varying, according to the practical progression of human affairs, and therefore cannot admit of any uniform standard of application. This reflection might have saved the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. LLOYD) the trouble of reading to us the constitution or bill of rights of Massachusetts, in which the principle of separation of departments is very clearly and properly laid down, and which will be very readily assented to in the abstract, but which forms no part of the question in dispute. It cannot, however, escape observation, that this principle is not laid down, even in the abstract, in the Constitution of the United States; and, although it is the leading principle of the Constitution, and probably was the principal guide in its formation, it is nevertheless in several respects departed from.

This body partakes essentially both of the legislative and executive powers of the Government. The executive department also partakes of the legislative powers, as far at least as an approbation of, and a qualified negative of the laws extend, &c. I make these observations, however, not in derogation of the general principle of the separation of powers among the several departments, so far as is practicable, but merely to show that there must necessarily be some limitations in its practical operation. Perhaps the best general rule for guiding our discretion upon this subject will be found to consist in this: That legislation ought to extend as far as definition is practicable—when definition stops, execution must necessarily begin. But some of the particular provisions of this bill, will furnish more precise illustrations of my opinions upon this question; it will, therefore, be waived until I shall come to their consideration.

I will now proceed to examine the more particular objections urged against the detail of this bill. Its provisions respecting the coasting trade are said to be objectionable in the following respects:

First objection—The penalty of the bonds required, is said to be excessive. To enable us to decide correctly upon this point, the object proposed to be effected, and the penalty required, should be considered in reference to each other. The object is to prevent, by means of coasting vessels, domestic articles from being carried abroad. Flour, for instance, to the West Indies. The price of that article here, is less than five dollars; in the West Indies, it is said to be thirty and upward. The penalty of the bonds required is six times the amount of the value of the vessel and cargo. Is any gentleman prepared to say, a smaller penalty will effect the object? I presume not. Indeed, the committee were disposed to put it at the lowest possible point, consistently with an effectuation of the object; and probably it is rather too low for that purpose. As to the penalty, according to the tonnage of vessels, it is believed, no alteration in the existing laws is made in that respect. These penalties will appear the more reasonable, when it is recollected, that, through the indulgence given of the coasting trade, most of the violations of the embargo laws have been contrived and effected.

Second objection—The collectors may be influenced by party spirit in the exercise of their discretion. It is hoped that this will not be the case, and if it were, it would certainly be much to be regretted. It may, however, probably happen, and is one of the inconveniences of the system.

Third objection—The high penalties of the bonds will drive many persons of small means from their accustomed occupations. They will not be able to procure the competent security for their prosecution. It is not to be presumed that this will be the effect to any great extent. If the owner is known to be honest, and has in view legal and honest objects, I have very little apprehension of his not being able to get the security required. But here the question recurs, are these apprehended inconveniences of such a nature as to render it necessary to abandon a great national object, for the accommodation of a few individuals who are affected by them? Is the last effort to preserve the peace of the nation, to be abandoned from these considerations? I should conclude, certainly not.

The next objections are made to the seventh section of the bill, which provides that stress of weather, and other unavoidable accidents at sea, shall not be given in evidence in a trial at law to save the penalty of bonds given as security against the violation of the embargo laws. It is known that, through pretexes derived from this permission, at present, most of the violations of these laws have been committed with impunity—it is, therefore, important to the future execution of the laws, to take away these pretexes. But it is objected that this regulation manifests a distrust of oaths. It does, of what is called custom-house oaths; their violation is already almost proverbial; it does not, however, produce nor encourage this profligacy; it takes away the temptation to it. It is further said, it impairs the trial by jury—very far from it; the trial by jury still exists; this provision only regulates the evidence to be produced before the jury. Gentlemen state particular hardships which may take place under this regulation. It is easy to state possible hardships under any general regulation; but they have never been deemed sufficient objections to general regulations producing in other respects beneficial results. This bill, however, contains a provision for relief in all cases of hardships under the embargo laws. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to grant relief in all such cases. This power vested in the Secretary, is also objected to. It is said to manifest a distrust of courts, and to transfer their powers to the Secretary of the Treasury. Whatever may be my distrust of some of the courts of the United States, I can say that consideration furnished no inducement to this provision. It is a power not suited to the organization of courts, and it has for a long time been exercised by the Secretary of the Treasury without being complained of. Congress proceeded with great caution on this subject. On the third day of March, 1797, they first introduced this principle into their laws, in relation to the collection of the revenue; and, after an experiment of nearly three years, on the eleventh day of February, 1800, they made the law perpetual. This will appear from the 12th section of this bill, which merely borrows this provision from pre-existing laws. It introduces no new principle whatever. This doctrine is carried still further, by an act passed the third of March, 1807, in the eighth volume of the laws, page 318:

“An Act to prevent settlements being made on lands ceded to the United States, until authorized by law.
“And it shall moreover be lawful for the President of the United States to direct the Marshal, or officer acting as Marshal, in the manner hereinafter directed, and also to take such other measures, and to employ such military force as he may judge necessary and proper, to remove from lands ceded, or secured to the United States by treaty, or cession as aforesaid, any person or persons, who shall hereafter take possession of the same, or make or attempt to make a settlement thereon, until authorized by law.”

Here the President is authorized to use the military force to remove settlers from the public lands without the intervention of courts; and the reason is, that the peculiarity of the case is not suited to the jurisdiction of courts, nor would their powers be competent to the object, nor, indeed, are courts allowed to interfere with any claims of individuals against the United States, but Congress undertakes to decide upon all such cases finally and peremptorily, without the intervention of courts.

This part of the bill is, therefore, supported both by principle and precedent.

While speaking of the distrust of courts, I hope I may be indulged in remarking, that individually my respect for judicial proceedings is materially impaired. I find, sir, that latterly, in some instances, the callous insensibility to extrinsic objects, which, in times past, was thought the most honorable trait in the character of an upright judge, is now, by some courts, entirely disrespected. It seems, by some judges, to be no longer thought an ornament to the judicial character, but is now substituted by the most capricious sensibilities.

Justice was formerly painted blind, as a proper emblem of this honorable insensibility to external objects; but modern justice might more properly be represented by the most bright-eyed goddess of the whole Pantheon—tremblingly alive to the influence of all external objects, and so replete with irritable feelings, as, upon some occasions, to approach almost to hysterical affections. When judges so far forget the true character and dignity of their stations, judicial proceedings cannot long preserve the respect heretofore attached to them. The next objections are made against the ninth section of the bill; it is in the following words:

SENATE.

Enforcement of the Embargo.

DECEMBER, 1808.

"That the collectors of all the districts of the United States, shall and they are hereby authorized to take into their custody specie or any articles of domestic growth, produce, or manufacture, when there is reason to believe that they are intended for exportation, or when in vessels, carts, wagons, sleighs, or any other carriage, or in any manner apparently on their way toward the territories of a foreign nation, or the vicinity thereof, or toward a place whence such articles are intended to be exported; and not to permit such articles to be removed until bond with sufficient sureties shall have been given for the landing or delivery of the same in some place of the United States, whence, in the opinion of the collector, there shall not be any danger of such articles being exported."

The objection is, that it violates the fourth article of the amendments to the Constitution; that article is in the following words:

"ART. 4. The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated; no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized."

If this section, or any other, violated this or any other article, word, or letter of the Constitution, the bill would drop unsupported from my hands. The only question which arises between this section and the fourth article of the Constitution is, whether the seizures here authorized are reasonable or unreasonable? I believe that every person will conclude that when property is intended to be used to violate the laws of the United States, and to accommodate their enemies, that it ought to be seized, and the object of its owner prevented; such seizure, therefore, cannot be deemed unreasonable, and of course not unconstitutional: as to searching, there is no power whatever in the section given to enter into houses, nor to search them, either with or without a warrant, neither in the day, nor in the night time, and of course the clause respecting searches, can in no respect whatever apply to this section. Seizures, under less imperious circumstances, are justified by all your revenue laws, &c., and as one case in point among others, I would beg to read an extract from the fourth volume of laws, section 69, page 389:

"An Act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage.

"SEC. 68. That every collector, naval officer, and surveyor, or other persons specially appointed by either of them for that purpose, shall have full power and authority to enter any ship or vessel, in which they shall have reason to suspect any goods, wares, or merchandise, subject to duty, are concealed, and therein to search for, seize, and secure any such goods, wares, or merchandise," &c.

I have never heard of any complaint from this mode of proceeding in collecting the revenue, and there certainly ought to be none against a similar provision for enforcing a due observance of the embargo laws.

It is said this section violates the fifth article of the amendments to the Constitution. The mere reading of this article will be sufficient to show that it has not the remotest reference to any part of this section in question. It is in the following words:

"No person shall be held to answer for a capital or other infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb, nor shall he be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

No private property is proposed by this section to be taken for public use, either with or without compensation, but merely that it should be held for the owner until he should give security that he would not thereby violate the law. I beg leave to refer to a case in point to justify this provision. It is in the sixty-ninth section of the revenue law just read, fourth volume, page 390; the words are as follows:

"SEC. 69. That all goods, wares, and merchandise, which shall be seized by virtue of this act, shall be put into and remain in the custody of the collector, or such other person as he shall appoint for that purpose, until such proceedings shall be had as by this act are required, to ascertain whether the same have been forfeited or not," &c.

The seventieth section of the same act extends the doctrine of seizure for the violation of the law still further. It is in the following words:

"SEC. 70. That it shall be the duty of the several officers of the customs to make seizures of, and secure any ship or vessel, goods, wares, or merchandise, which shall be liable to seizure, by virtue of this or any other act of the United States respecting the revenue, which is now or may hereafter be enacted, as well without as within their respective districts."

The most alarming objections are suggested to be contained in the following clause of the tenth section of the bill:

"SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the powers given to the collectors, either by this or any other act respecting the embargo, to detain any vessel, or to take into their custody any articles for the purpose of preventing violations of the embargo, shall be exercised in conformity with such instructions as the President may give, and such general rules as he may prescribe for that purpose, made in pursuance of the powers aforesaid; which instructions and general rules the collectors shall be bound to obey."

This clause merely provides for the transfer of powers previously given to the collectors, to the President, for the purpose of producing, as far as practicable, uniformity and impartiality in their execution. It was hardly to have been expected that ingenuity itself could have found an objection to this provision. But it is said that this clause gives the President's instructions the force of law. It certainly does in relation to the objects to which they are directed and limited. What are these objects? They are incidental occurrences arising in the course of the execution of the embargo laws, which can neither be foreseen nor guarded against by legislation in any other way, because they are incapable of definition; this provision relates to events and details not in existence, but which may probably happen; events and details, therefore, incapable of definition, and of course cannot be reached by legislation without the aid of the executive department. This case serves to illustrate the general principles I before laid down respecting the transfer of legislative powers to the executive department. But, sir, as great stress has been laid upon this objection by the opponents of the bill, permit me to examine this doctrine in reference to the pre-existing practice of this Government with more minute attention. In this examination it will be found, that, at all times, since its establishment, when it had an object in view which could not be defined, and of course could not be reached by legislation, it has called in the aid of executive discretion for the purpose, sometimes with more, and sometimes with less limitation and restriction. In the first place, let me call attention, sir, to the act of the last session of Congress, to authorize the President to suspend in whole or in part the several embargo laws, in the following words:

"An Act to authorize the President of the United States, under certain restrictions, to suspend the operation of the act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several acts supplementary thereto.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That, in the event of such peace or suspension of hostilities between the belligerent Powers of Europe, or of such changes in their measures affecting neutral commerce, as may render that of the United States sufficiently safe, in the judgment of the President of the United States, he is hereby authorized, during the recess of Congress, to suspend, in whole or in part, the act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several acts supplementary thereto, under such exceptions and restrictions, and on such bond and security being given as the public interest and circumstances of the case may appear to require. Provided such suspension shall not extend beyond twenty days after the next meeting of Congress.

"Approved, 22d April, 1808."

The principle upon which this bill passed, was, that it related to an event not in existence, but which might have occurred during the recess of Congress; and if it had taken place, it would have been all important to the interests of the people, that the suspension of the embargo should take place in consequence of the happening of the contemplated events. Congress, therefore, after extending legislation as far as it could do in defining the circumstances in which the suspension might take place, did not hesitate to trust to executive discretion for making the necessary decisions and arrangements respecting all other circumstances which might occur, but which could not be foreseen; because they depended upon the will of foreign nations, which could neither be anticipated nor controlled. But, sir, perhaps gentlemen will be inclined to disrespect this precedent, because it was adopted without the sanction of their votes. I will, therefore, turn their attention to a precedent, sanctioned, I believe, by the unanimous votes of both branches of the Legislature, and certainly by the votes of the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. HILLHOUSE) and myself, and approved by the then President (Gen. WASHINGTON.) I allude to an act which passed the House of Representatives on the 30th May, 1794, in the following words—approved the 4th June:

"An Act to authorize the President of the United States to lay, regulate, and revoke embargoes.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered, whenever, in his opinion, the public safety shall so require, to lay an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports of the United States, or upon the ships and vessels of any foreign nation, under such regulations as the circumstances of the case may require, and to continue or revoke the same, whenever he shall think proper. And the President is hereby fully authorized to give all such orders to the officers of the United States, as may be necessary to carry the same into full effect: Provided, The authority aforesaid shall not be exercised while the Congress of the United States shall be in session, and any embargo, which may be laid by the President as aforesaid, shall cease and determine in fifteen days from the actual meeting of Congress, next after laying the same.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue and be in force until fifteen days after the commencement of the next session of Congress, and no longer.

"FREDERICK AUGUSTUS MUHLENBERG,

"Speaker of the House of Representatives.

"RALPH IZARD,

"President of the Senate pro tempore.

"Approved, June 4th, 1794.

"GEO. WASHINGTON,

"President of the United States."

This act, giving the President the most unqualified powers to lay, regulate, and revoke embargoes, was, I believe, passed unanimously by both Houses of Congress; but as I was unwilling to trust to my recollection upon this point, I have had reference to the Journals of the House of Representatives at that day, for more precise information, and I find the yeas and nays were not called for upon the passage of the bill; the strong presumption, therefore, is, that there was no opposition to its passage. The following is the extract from the Journals:

Journal of the House of Representatives of the United States, 3d Congress, first session, page 376.

"An engrossed bill authorizing the President of the United States, to lay, regulate, and revoke embargoes, was read the third time.

"Resolved, That the said bill do pass, and that the title be, an act to authorize the President of the United States to lay, regulate, and revoke embargoes.

"Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do carry the said bill to the Senate, and desire their concurrence."

I also find, from the further inspection of the Journals of that day, that very little ceremony was used in laying embargoes; it was then done by resolutions, without even the formality of a bill, and the President authorized to give all the necessary instructions for carrying it into effect, even during the session of Congress. The following is the original resolution for laying an embargo:

Journal of third Congress, first session, pages 216-17.

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That an embargo be laid on all ships and vessels in the ports of the United States bound to any foreign port or place, for the term of thirty days, and that no clearance be furnished during that time to any ship or vessel bound to such foreign port or place, except ships or vessels under the immediate directions of the President of the United States; and that the President of the United States be authorized to give such instructions to the revenue officers of the United States as shall appear best adapted for carrying the said resolution into full effect.

"Approved, 26th March, 1794."

I find, also, upon a further examination of the Journals, that sundry memorials from the merchants were presented for the continuation of the embargo, and among others, one from the inhabitants of the town of Salem, as appears from the following extract:

Journal of third Congress, first session, page 339.

"A memorial of the inhabitants of the town of Salem, in the State of Massachusetts, was presented to the House and read, praying a further continuation of the embargo laid on ships or vessels in the United States, bound to any foreign port or place."

I have read these proceedings to show that the same terrific alarms, respecting embargoes, were not circulated through the country in the year 1794, which now are, because there were then no objects for such an excitement. The history of those times will also show the principle upon which Congress gave to the President unlimited powers to lay embargoes, at his discretion, during their recess. It is known that, in consequence of the British hostile orders against our commerce in 1793, during the session of 1794, Mr. Jay was sent to London to demand redress from the British Government for the injuries done to our commerce under those orders, and to make an amicable adjustment of all the differences between the two countries. It was believed by Congress that if the mission did not succeed, war might probably be the consequence of its failure, and as the result would probably be known during the recess, Congress did not hesitate to give to the President full power to protect our commerce and seamen by an embargo, from the dangers to which both would have been exposed in the event of a war with Great Britain. Upon what principle was this unlimited power given? Why, simply upon this, that the event, upon which its exercise was to depend, was not in existence, but might possibly exist, and, therefore, was incapable of definition, or, in other words, of legislation; and yet the exercise of the power in case of the happening of the event, might be indispensable to the common defence and general welfare.

At that time the nation acted from a just sense of its own interest and honor. It was considered as the cause of this nation, against a foreign nation. It was, then, the irresistible effort of an undivided nation. It must be admitted by all, that the British Orders of 1793, did not present to us the dangers and difficulties resulting from the combined influence of the British Orders and French Decrees of the present day. Whence, then, this sad reverse in our public councils? Whence, then, these unfortunate and alarming internal divisions? These evils can only be ascribed to party spirit. Fortunately at that day, the United States were not distracted and torn asunder by party spirit. Unfortunately, at the present day, this baneful influence seems to have become so inveterate, so lost to its own interest and honor, as to be willing to seek a temporary and ruinous protection under foreign aggressors, rather than to unite in any measures to resist and repel their aggressions.

Gentlemen have even gone so far as to object to the clause for the protection of the public officers from vexatious suits for the discharge of their duties. It is believed that this provision is not only correct in itself, but that it exists in the laws of the several States and in the laws of the Union; the only reply, therefore, that I shall make to this suggestion, will consist in reading the clause objected to in this bill, and a similar clause in the existing laws:

Extract from the bill.

"And if any action or suit be brought against any collector, or other person, acting under the direction of and in pursuance of this act, he may plead the general issue, and give this act and the instructions and regulations of the President in evidence for his justification and defence."

Extract from one of the existing laws.

"SEC. 71. That if any officer, or other person, executing or aiding or assisting in the seizure of goods, shall be sued or molested for anything done in virtue of the powers given by this act, or by virtue of a warrant granted by any judge or justice, pursuant to law, such officer, or other person, may plead the general issue, and give this act and the special matter in evidence; and if in such suit the plaintiff is nonsuited, or judgment pass against him, the plaintiff shall recover double costs; and in actions, suits, or informations to be brought, where any seizure shall be made, pursuant to this act, if the property be claimed by any person, in every such case the onus probandi shall be upon such claimant."

The gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. GOODRICH,) not content with finding fault with the provisions of the bill, has ventured to give it a general character. He has ventured to call it a "military despotism." This, surely, would be a most alarming mark to stamp on the forehead of this bill. If true, the bill would certainly be left without an advocate. But, sir, before I enter into an examination of this harsh and uncharitable suggestion, permit me to ask what is the situation of the United States at this moment as it respects peace or war? It can hardly be said that the United States are at peace, when two belligerents are making war on them; when some of the essential attributes of national sovereignty are attempted to be forcibly wrested from them. The most that can be said, if we are at all at peace, is, that it is a peace like war, and, in my judgment, would authorize the adoption of any measure, which would be justified in a state of war. And, in the event of war, are we to expect to meet with little cavils and difficulties of this kind, with every measure which may be proposed for the annoyance of the common enemy? I hope not, sir. If we should, unfortunately, be driven into war after so many patient efforts to avoid it, I hope and trust it will not be a war like a peace; but that the whole energy of the nation will be brought to bear upon the enemy both by land and sea—I hope the war will be vigorous; and in that case, I am sure it will be short and successful. Let me, then, sir, under this exposition of our real situation, examine the terrible suggestion brought against this bill—what is it, which has doomed it to this unwarrantable reproach? The only section which has the remotest reference to the use of military force, is the eleventh, which is in the following words:

“Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, or such other person as he shall have empowered for that purpose, to employ such part of the land and naval forces, or militia of the United States, and of the Territories thereof, as may be deemed necessary, in conformity with the provisions of this act and other acts respecting the embargo, for the purpose of preventing the illegal departure of any ship or vessel, or of detaining, taking possession of, and keeping in custody any ship or vessel, or of taking into custody and guarding any specie or articles of domestic growth, produce, or manufacture, and also for the purpose of preventing and suppressing any armed or riotous assemblage of persons resisting the custom-house officers in the exercise of their duties, or in any manner opposing the execution of the laws laying an embargo, or otherwise violating, or assisting and abetting violations of the same.”

It will be found, upon examination, that this section contains no new principle; but, like others which have been objected to, merely applies an old principle to a new object. In justification of this assertion, permit me here to read an extract from an act of Congress, which will be found in the seventh volume of the Laws, page 365. in the following words—they will be found to be precisely of the same import with the material words of the section under discussion:

“An Act for the more effectual preservation of peace in the ports and harbors of the United States, and in the waters under their jurisdiction.

“Sec. 5. And be it, &c., That whensoever any armed vessel of a foreign nation entering the harbors or waters within the jurisdiction of the United States, and required to depart therefrom, shall fail so to do, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, or such other person as he shall have empowered for that purpose, to employ such part of the land and naval forces of the United States, or the militia thereof, as he shall deem necessary, to compel the said armed vessel to depart,” &c.

But, sir, as gentlemen in the opposition may have more respect for a precedent in 1794, which probably received the sanction of the votes of all those then in Congress, I will furnish them with one of that date expressly in point. It is in the following words:

Third volume Laws, page 92.

“An Act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States. Approved the 5th June, 1794.

“Sec. 7. Be it enacted, &c., That in every case in which a vessel shall be fitted out and armed, or attempted so to be fitted out or armed, or in which the force of any vessel of war, cruiser or other armed vessel shall be increased or augmented, or in which any military expedition or enterprise shall be begun or set on foot contrary to the prohibitions and provisions of this act; and in every case of the capture of a ship or vessel within the jurisdiction or protection of the United States, as above defined, and in every case in which any process issuing out of any court of the United States shall be disobeyed or resisted by any person or persons having the custody of any vessel of war, cruiser, or other armed vessel, of any foreign Prince or State, or of the subjects or citizens of such Prince or State; in every such case it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, or such other person as he shall have empowered for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia thereof, as shall be judged necessary for the purpose of taking possession of, and detaining any such ship or vessel with her prize or prizes,” &c.

In all these cases the principle is precisely the same. It is the application of the physical force of the nation to carry into effect its laws in different forms, according to the different objects to be effected by it.

But, sir, as I know how easy it is to alarm the public sensibility by the suggestion of “a military despotism,” without examining into its applicability to the case in question, I will take the liberty of giving a short history of the proceedings of the Government in relation to this subject.

In the year 1792, shortly after the establishment of the Government, it was foreseen by Congress, that a state of things might exist, which would require the physical force of the nation to be called forth to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions. At this time, however, no occasion having occurred to render a resort to this remedy necessary, considerable precaution and delicacy were manifested in making the provisions for this object. Accordingly, on the 2d day of May, 1792, a law for this purpose was passed. It is not necessary now to read it, but merely to remark, that it was accompanied with so many precautions, and consequent delays, that, upon the first experiment made under its provisions, it was found to be ineffectual.

This occurred in the insurrection, or the apprehended insurrection in Pennsylvania, and shortly after an act was passed for the same purpose, repealing the act in question, and dispensing with most of its dilatory ceremonies, which were found rather calculated to defeat, than to effect the object, in the event of a prompt and formidable resistance, &c. This act contains the following among other provisions:

Third volume Laws, page 189.

"An Act for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, &c.

"SEC. 1. That whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed or the execution thereof obstructed in any State, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals by this act, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia of such State, or of any other State or States, as may be necessary to suppress such combinations, and cause the laws to be duly executed; and the use of the militia to be called forth may be continued, if necessary, until the expiration of thirty days after the commencement of the then next session of Congress.

SEC. 2. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That whenever it may be necessary, in the judgment of the President, to use the military force hereby directed to be called forth, the President shall forthwith, by Proclamation, command such insurgents to disperse and retire peaceably to their respective abodes within a limited time."

It cannot escape observation, sir, that the authority given to the President to call out the force of the nation, was limited to the militia only, in both the laws referred to; at that time such were the apprehensions or fears of employing the regular land or naval forces for the purpose of executing the laws, &c., that the authority to employ them for that purpose was actually withheld from the President. But subsequent events have taught us the necessity and propriety of dismissing such groundless alarms. It was discovered by the insurrection of Burr, that the United States might be attacked and threatened by the most serious dangers in parts where the militia could not be brought to act with effect, and it was rendered probable that the most exposed and defenceless parts would generally become the objects of attack; accordingly, Congress did not hesitate to pass a law, I believe unanimously, (at least I recollect to have drawn the law and do not recollect any opposition to its passage) solely for the purpose of authorizing the President to employ the land and naval forces in all cases in which he was previously authorized to call out the militia. The act is in the following words:

Eighth volume, page 311.

"An Act authorizing the employment of the land and naval forces of the United States in cases of insurrection.

"That in all cases of insurrection or obstruction to the laws either of the United States or of an individual State or Territory, where it is lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia for the purpose of suppressing such insurrection or of causing the laws to be duly executed, it shall be lawful for him to employ, for the same purpose, such part of the land or naval force of the United States as shall be judged necessary, having first observed all the prerequisites of the law in that respect."

In all these cases Congress proceeded upon the rational ground of applying the force to the object. It is now proposed to proceed on the same principle, and apply the force to existing objects. What is the nature of the obstructions to the laws now proposed to be suppressed? Why, sir, they generally are, forcibly seizing and carrying away from the custody of the revenue officer, vessels or other property seized by him for violating the embargo laws. It is a mere scuffle between the revenue officers and unprincipled banditti for the possession of property. Now, sir, in applying the public force to this object, would it not be perfectly absurd to require that the President should be sent to from the extremes of the United States to issue his Proclamation commanding the insurgents to disperse, &c., when their sole object is to disperse as soon as the mischief is accomplished? This, too, would be almost instantaneous. It certainly would, sir. This is surely a stronger case than the one which called forth precisely a similar provision in 1794, for seizing, &c., vessels intended to be fitted out as privateers in violation of the existing laws; this case is before referred to in the course of these observations. The necessity and propriety of this provision is so obvious, that the people themselves have discovered the want of it, and are now beginning to tender their services for enforcing the embargo laws, in places where they have witnessed their violation—and shall Congress be deterred from accepting this the honorable and patriotic tender of their services? As an honorable testimony of this fact, I have just had put into my hands, the patriotic resolutions of the people of the town of Marblehead, in Massachusetts. They are so highly honorable to the patriotism, disinterestedness, and good sense of the people of that town, that I beg leave to present them to the Senate in their own words:

"At a meeting of the freeholders, and others, inhabitants of the town of Marblehead, legally convened at the Town-house, in said town, on Tuesday, the 7th day of December, 1808, at half-past two o'clock in the afternoon—Capt. Richard James, Moderator.

"The following resolves being read, it was unanimously voted that they pass:

"Resolved, That the town continues steadfast in the faith that the embargo law was a law of wisdom, and that the President and Congress of the United States are entitled and shall receive our warmest thanks for their early attention to the independence, liberty, and just rights of the Union, and particularly of the commercial part thereof.

"Resolved, That this town will use all the energy they possess to carry into full effect all laws the present Congress have or may enact, for the support of our just and equal rights as an independent nation, against the unjustifiable, tyrannical, and imperial orders and decrees of the belligerent Powers of Europe, by proffering to our country our property and services.

"Voted, a committee be appointed to transmit to Joseph Story, Esq., our Representative in Congress, the doings of the meeting.

ing persons: Captains William Story, Nathan B. Martin, and Joseph Pedrick.

"Attest: J. PRENTISS, Town Clerk."

Upon a candid review of this terrific objection, I think I am warranted in the conclusion, that the provision partakes nothing of the character of military despotism—but is fully justified both by principle and precedent.

Still further to excite our alarms, intimations have been thrown out, but faintly I acknowledge, that the embargo laws are unconstitutional. After what had taken place upon that subject in 1794 by the unanimous consent of all the departments, as well as what has lately been decided upon in that respect, I really should have been surprised, in entering a boarding school, to have heard that question propounded, merely to try the skill, or whet the ingenuity of spouting boys, or lisping misses; but to hear it intimated by grave legislators, in quest of truth, and engaged in directing the practical operation of the Government, even too by judges and lawyers, is to me really astonishing; I am astonished that the respect they must feel for the opinions of their acquaintances, as well as of future times, could not deter them from hazarding themselves upon such a suggestion. But, sir, I find, within a few days past, the mental optics of some gentlemen have been upon the stretch to discover other doubts, which, under the names of casus omissus, or some other subtleties, are transformed into realities, so formidable as to destroy the whole energy of the Constitution, and arrest completely the practical operation of the Government. I allude, sir, to the supposed discovery of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. LLOYD,) that Congress could make no regulation of commerce between the ports of the same State, although he will find the principle settled in every law that was ever passed for regulating the coasting trade; that the same principle was formerly decided by the unanimous vote of this body only a year or two ago, and with not more than five dissentients in the other House; and even they might have been influenced by some collateral considerations, when it is also considered, that, without the exercise of this power, several of the most important specified powers would be rendered wholly nugatory. Yes, sir, every speck which a disturbed imagination had supposed it had discovered upon the horizon of the Constitution, is now, by the help of mental microscopes, transformed into a tremendous cloud, fraught with dreadful storms and horrid thunders; and which, in its destructive course, is to tear up all our rights and liberties by the roots! Sir, it is time to turn from such unprofitable scrutines—it is time to bend our thoughts on other objects—it is time to face the public dangers, and to repel them.

The last tocsin of alarm which has been sounded upon this occasion, is the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus.* We have been reminded of the proceedings of this House upon that subject, and the fate they experienced in the other House. Instead of this circumstance being urged as an admonition to those who wish to see the laws respected, and to furnish the means for causing the national will to be executed, it ought to be a caution to those who, with the most laudable zeal for the preservation of individual rights, are deterred from these objects by popular suggestions. I thought, by this time, that every man of common impartiality and common sense had seen in subsequent events the propriety of that measure. I rejoice that I had the honor of proposing it, and always regretted its rejection. Indulge me, sir, with a very few observations on this subject. The Constitution contains but one clause respecting this writ: "The privileges of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended unless when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it." I presume that every man in the United States will now admit that a rebellion did exist, and that the public safety was in danger; no Constitutional objection could therefore exist to the bill, and when its limitations and directions are observed, which appear never to have been presented to public notice, I presume posterior events will have demonstrated its propriety, in the opinion of every candid man of understanding in the community. What, Mr. President, have been the consequences of its rejection! You have seen your judiciary publicly held up to the world as a spectacle of disgrace. You have seen a jury sworn to try an issue in a criminal case, and excluded from the privilege of hearing the most material evidence, upon which the trial of the issue depended. You have seen treason go unpunished. And you have seen the character of imbecility given to our Government, calculated to excite distrust at home, and to invite contempt and attacks from abroad. What would have been the probable effects of passing the bill? Guilt would have received its just reward. The public justice would have been appeased, the confidence in the energy of the Government would have been preserved, and you sentations of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That in all cases where any person or persons charged on oath with treason, misprision of treason, or other high crime or misdemeanor endangering the peace, safety, or neutrality of the United States, have been, or shall be arrested and imprisoned by virtue of any warrant or authority from the President of the United States, or from the Chief Executive Magistrate of any State or Territorial government, or from any person acting under the direction or authority of the President of the United States, the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall be, and the same hereby is, suspended for and during the term of three months from and after the passage of this act and no longer.

*An Act to suspend the privileges of the writ of habeas corpus, for a limited time, in certain cases.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Repre-

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF THE SENATE,

would have been saved, sir, the painful mortification of beholding the most atrocious treason stalking unpunished through the land, triumphing in a security afforded, it is feared, sir, through the hostile propensities of the judge against his own Government, or at least against the administration of his own Government. Yes, sir, and if through popular suggestions we should now be driven from affording the means of executing the embargo laws, the consequences will be the more to be regretted, as the evils to be remedied are much more formidable. Let me, then, sir, now inquire into the causes of the violations of the embargo laws; the nature of the offences, and the description of persons engaged in their commission. The original cause of these violations is, British influence. I do not mean to apply this observation, in the remotest degree, to any gentleman in the opposition to this bill—I believe those gentlemen are perfectly exempt from this influence. I merely speak of British influence as a fact which exists, as an incident attached to society, and of course ought to be guarded against. It is a fact notoriously known, that as soon as the British Government was apprized of the measure of the embargo, an order was issued inviting our citizens to violate the laws by offering to receive and protect their vessels, although they should leave our ports without the customary papers, engage in a lawless trade, and thus at least to assimilate themselves to pirates. It is also known, that the British Government has agents in most of our seaport towns for purchasing up supplies for its fleets and armies. That there are also British merchants, and British capital, connected with unprincipled Americans, engaged in the violation of these laws. Yes, sir, unprincipled Americans have been invited, through these means, to engage in this scandalous traffic. And what, sir, is the nature of the offences they have been induced to commit? Is it treason? No, sir, but it partakes essentially of its character. If, instead of an incipient, we were in an actual state of war, it would be treason, and treason of the basest sort. It is, to say the least, a base abandonment of every honorable and patriotic sentiment. Is it bribery? It certainly partakes of that character. It is violating the laws of our country, and co-operating in counteracting their effects upon our enemies for the sake of money, regardless of consequences. Is it perjury? Yes, sir, it is in most cases perjury in its essence, and subornation of perjury in all. Yet, sir, the authors of these offences and those who countenance and advise the commission of them, have the impudence to talk of moral and religious obligations! Are these the individuals, sir, who are to be treated with so much tenderness? Are these the offences which are to be proclaimed legal and Constitutional? That they have conquered the Constitution, and cannot be controlled by its provisions? If, sir, we should be driven by our fears from affording the means of executing the embargo laws, in what situation should we stand before the nation and the world? We have just said we will not for the present repeal these laws, and we are now about to declare that we are afraid to execute them! That the Constitution furnishes no means for this purpose. What a slander upon the Constitution! What an insult upon the framers of it! What an insult to the people who adopted it! And what will the people say to all this? What is the general sentiment at this moment? It is, enforce your embargo laws or repeal them. And are we about to tell them that the Constitution contains no means for executing the national will when fairly pronounced upon legitimate objects? Or are we to tell them that the Constitution does afford the proper and necessary means for executing the national will, but that we are either afraid, or do not know how to call them into action?

Sir, those who assert that the Constitution is defective in this respect, either do not understand, or they misrepresent its provisions. They neither breathe the spirit, nor speak the language of the Constitution. Sir, I feel for this instrument the most sacred veneration. And with this Constitution in my hand, and its precepts in my heart, I am now ready and willing, in its own spirit and language, to furnish the means necessary and proper for carrying into effect a great national and Constitutional object—for carrying into effect the embargo laws—and thus to make a last effort to preserve the peace of the nation.

Mr. PICKERING said, the legal, the Constitutional, and the commercial objections to the bill under consideration, have been stated by the gentleman from Connecticut, and my colleague, and enforced by reasons which to me appear irresistible. But if their statements were as incorrect as they are true; if their reasoning were as doubtful as it is irrefragable; and if the rigorous provisions of the bill were carried into execution—not by the marshal aided by the posse comitatus or militia, according to former safe and wholesome usages, but by the standing army, by the regular troops, who, as despotism seems now advancing with rapid strides, may soon become the prætorian guards of the Palace; if, I say, the provisions of this bill should be perfectly executed, and the embargo be rendered "complete"—the question, the important question, still recurs—What good will it do our country? How will it promote the public welfare? Shall I be again told, what originated at the Palace, and has been a thousand times repeated by its supporters, that it has saved our seamen, our vessels, and our merchandise? When every man who will open his eyes must see that the position is unfounded, and, that, when assigned as the motive for laying the embargo, has been demonstrated to be a delusion? Yes, sir, it is still insisted on, that if our vessels were permitted to go out, they would all be swept from the ocean! I am astonished at the confidence with which gentlemen, laying high claims to information and discernment, continue to make this assertion.

On a former day, by exhibiting lists of vessels which had been safely sailing on the high seas, and the moderate rate of insurance, I demonstrated that the danger so much talked of was fictitious—that it did not exist. I recollect that the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) has since suggested, that the calculations of my mercantile friend (Mr. Thorndike) of the rates of insurance must be incorrect; that now insurances were low, because “the French have no inducements to send out privateers to depredate upon our commerce, as long as the embargo restrains it within our ports.” To say nothing of the multitude of English merchant vessels, sufficient to excite French cupidity and lust for plunder, I will observe, that my mercantile friend possesses as acute native discernment as the gentleman from Virginia, and, in mercantile knowledge, is most unquestionably his superior. My friend’s calculations do not look back; they are prospective; formed on the risks to be run, if the embargo be removed, and the sails of our merchant vessels be again spread on the sea.

But as the gentleman alike disregards such calculations, and the facts appearing at several insurance offices (and among men of plain, practical understanding, these would be resorted to as sources of correct information;) seeing, I say, the gentleman from Virginia is not satisfied with this testimony, why did he not advert to an authority which he holds in the highest respect, the authority of the President and Secretary of State? They have said, that Bonaparte’s Berlin Decree was an “empty menace,” and that “France was without the means of carrying it into effect against the rights and obligations of neutral nations.” But this also the gentleman passes by. Let me, then, mention one more statement.

In the Message, at the opening of the present session of Congress, the President informed us, that his Ministers at London and Paris had been instructed to explain to the respective Governments his disposition to exercise his power of suspending the embargo laws, in such manner as to open the way to a renewal of commercial intercourse—but that neither Government had accepted his offer. The instructions to his Minister in Paris, the President says, were necessarily modified—but how he did not say; and from the obscurity of his language it would be impossible to divine. By looking, however, to the correspondence between Mr. Madison and General Armstrong, perhaps we may discover the boon or boons offered to France, on condition of the Emperor’s repealing his decrees. Mr. Madison says, that if France revoke her decrees, Great Britain, by following the example, would be obliged to restore to France the full benefit of neutral trade, or, by persevering in her orders, “render collisions with the United States inevitable.” And General Armstrong says, in the like case, that “it may be fairly presumed the United States could no longer hesitate about becoming a party to the war against England.” He adds, that if Great Britain should not obstruct our trade, the wants of France and her colonies would be supplied. If Great Britain should obstruct the trade, “the wishes of His Majesty (the French Emperor) as expressed in February last, would be directly promoted.”

What were the wishes so expressed? No communication of the French Government to the American Minister, exhibiting those wishes, has been laid before Congress. In the mass of other information communicated, has so important a document been accidentally overlooked?

With regard to the other belligerent, the President speaks a plainer language. He says that to Great Britain, “whose power on the ocean is in the ascendant,” it was stated explicitly, “that on her rescinding her orders in relation to the United States, their trade will be opened with her, and remain shut to her enemy—in case of his failure to rescind his decrees also.” Indeed, Mr. President! Let our ships loose from our wharves, let them take in rich cargoes, and sail for all the ports on the globe—except those of France and her dependent States—when, according to the gentleman from Virginia, that temptation to plunder would fill the ocean with French privateers! I will recite the gentleman’s words: “The reason of the low insurance, is, that the French have no inducement to send out privateers, to depredate upon our commerce, as long as the embargo restrains it within our ports—raise the embargo, and the temptation to plunder would fill the ocean with privateers. The commerce would stand little chance to escape the plunderers.” And yet the President, who professes so much solicitude for American seamen and American commerce, was willing, we have just seen, to suspend the embargo, and thereby expose our seamen, our vessels, and our merchandise, “these essential resources,” and “with little chance to escape,” to the plunder of French privateers, which would then fill the ocean! Into such contradictions will mankind be plunged, when the real object in view does not admit of a fair and candid disclosure.

To recur to the question, What good will the embargo do? How will it promote the public welfare? That it is not necessary to preserve our seamen, our vessels, and our merchandise, has been conclusively proved. Yet it is said that it must be continued, and if continued, that it must be enforced with all the arbitrary regulations and powers contained in the bill before us, and which have been so strikingly described by the gentlemen who have spoken before me, in order to preserve our honor—“our national character, and national independence.” In my apprehension this is incorrect. I see, sir, a constant effort to identify our Administration with the nation, but they are essentially distinguishable. The errors of an Administration may bring mischief upon and hazard the ruin of a nation. Witness, at this moment, the brave and generous Spaniards, who, after suffering an age of depression, have been regenerated in a moment, as with an electric stroke, and, nobly rising, are now breaking the chains forged for them, upon the head of their oppressor. Who that has a heart—who that has any sympathy for human sufferings—who that respects the rights of self-government, inherent in every nation—will not bid them God-speed? I would say, go on, noble Spaniards, and be the instruments of Heaven to stay the ravages of the most ruthless tyrant that has scourged the European world, since the Roman Empire fell!

I was saying, sir, that a nation and its administration are essentially distinguishable. It is necessary now to distinguish them in our own country. How has it been brought into its present state of embarrassment? Has it been without the agency of its Administration? For a series of years, sir, illusions have been industriously spread among the people. To dissipate those illusions, so far as was in my power, I have exposed myself to the slanders and reproaches of the ignorant, the base, and the unprincipled. But I am not by such means to be discouraged. Hitherto my attention has been confined to the embargo. It is that which immediately brought the nation into its present deplorable situation; and the only way to escape from it is, by making the distinction to which I have alluded. And I say, sir, that, while in the nature of things it is impossible for the embargo to vindicate the rights or the honor of the nation, its maintenance is deemed of the first importance to the Administration, who have staked their reputation upon it. Hence the unvaried efforts of the Administration and their partisans to impress the belief, that the British Orders in Council were the principal cause of the embargo. For they see that the documents originally laid before Congress as the cause, are utterly insufficient. But if those orders were the cause, the great primary cause, "before which all other motives sink into insignificance," it would seem to follow that the embargo must be continued until these orders are revoked. Hence, sir, it appeared to me of the last importance to show that the British Orders in Council were not the cause of the embargo; and impartial observers think I have shown it, by proving that when the embargo was recommended by the President, those orders were, in this country, unknown. But as some gentlemen persist in asserting the contrary, and on that ground advocate the continuance of the embargo, with the reinforcement of the bill on our tables, and that to be followed, I suppose, with a non-intercourse law, I must be permitted to adduce some further proofs.

We have been gravely told that the French Emperor's Berlin Decree, declaring all the British isles in a state of blockade, could not be justified as a measure of retaliation against England, on account of her declaring in a state of blockade a certain extent of coast, the whole of which could not be invested and blockaded even by her powerful navy, because France had it not in her power to station a single ship before any one port in the British dominions; and that the Milan Decree of 1807 can still rest for its defence on the supposed acquiescence of the United States in the British Orders of the preceding month, "since those orders, which have not been acquiesced in, were not even known in America at the date of the decree." Now gentlemen will be pleased to recollect, that the French Emperor's Decree of Milan bears date on the 17th of December, 1807; and that on the very next morning, December 18th, came the President's Message to both Houses of Congress, recommending the laying of an embargo.

Now, if the British Orders were unknown in America on the 17th of December, what man of common sense will believe that the plan for imposing the embargo (a plan fraught with such extensive and terrible consequences) recommended by the President in the morning of the 18th, had for its basis the British Orders in Council, which were not known in America on the next preceding day? As I observed on a former occasion, even four days (the time which intervened between the arrival of the despatches from France by the Revenge, and the 18th of December, when the embargo was recommended) "gave little enough time to digest and mature such a plan." I now add, sir, that that plan, as far as it then went (and more was not then practicable) was conformable to the views and wishes of the French Emperor. I say, further, sir, that should the strong bill now on our tables become a law, we shall have advanced one large stride further towards such conformity; and that when we concur in one other measure, a resolution for a total non-intercourse with Great Britain, which was adopted last Saturday evening in the other House, we shall then have acted in complete conformity with the views and wishes of the French Emperor, as they are supposed to have existed at the time the embargo was laid. We shall then have shut all our ports against the entrance of British ships and British merchandise; just as the unfortunate and submissive nations of Europe, who are within reach of his arm, had previously shut their ports. I do not say, sir, that it was in obedience to a requisition of the French Emperor, that the President recommended the embargo; but the facts I have adduced show, that the embargo, with its various reinforcements, up to the non-intercourse now in embryo, happens to be in exact conformity with the views and wishes of the French Emperor, as they are supposed to have existed a year ago. But it seems that this will not satisfy the Emperor. We have been too tardy in our movements. A non-intercourse with Great Britain, twelve months ago, might have appeased him. Now we can no longer remain neutral. Now we must be his allies or his enemies. To the offer to suspend the embargo, if he would repeal his decrees, he has not even deigned to give an answer.

With respect to Great Britain, the overture to suspend the embargo, on condition that the Orders in Council were revoked, has been answered. She maintains her original position, that the Orders in Council were purely retaliatory for the French Berlin Decree; which, she says,

"Was the commencement of an attempt, not merely to check and impair the prosperity of Great Britain, but utterly to annihilate her political existence, through the ruin of her commercial prosperity—that in this attempt almost all the Powers of the European Continent had been compelled, more or less, to co-operate; and that the American embargo, though most assuredly not intended to that end (for America can have no real interest in the subversion of the British power,) but by some unfortunate occurrence of circumstances, without any hostile intention, the American embargo did come in aid of the blockade of the American Continent at the very moment when, if that blockade could have succeeded at all, the interposition of the American Government would most effectually have contributed to its success."

"To this universal combination (continues Mr. Canning) His Majesty has opposed a temperate, but a determined retaliation upon the enemy—trusting that a firm resistance would defeat his project, but knowing that the smallest concession would infallibly encourage a perseverance in it."

If the embargo was designed, as professed, why did our Government declare a blockade against the British dominions by land as well as by sea? Neither seamen nor property could be exposed to capture by continuing the trade which had been advantageously carried on by land with the British colonies bordering on the United States. The people of Vermont, particularly, had been accustomed, ever since the Peace of 1783, to exchange their productions with the British subjects in Canada, for salt and other articles of merchandise. Yet even this beneficial trade has been prohibited by the embargo acts; and bloodshed and death have been the consequence. Similar tragic scenes have been acted in the District of Maine. Does not the rigorous prohibition of this land commerce alone demonstrate that other views than have ever been officially avowed really dictated the embargo? Lately we find that, in Holland, (a country governed by a brother of the French Emperor, and absolutely under his control,) the necessities of the people for the supplies usually obtained from England, having caused evasions of the Emperor's strict decrees of blockade—additional provisions have been made; and the breaches of those decrees are henceforward to be punished with death. With similar pace, the United States are advancing—and, by the bill before us, the embargo is to be enforced by additional regulations and penalties of unexampled rigor, and hostile to the mild spirit of American laws; and which, though not in words prescribing the punishment of death, will infallibly have that issue.

Among the reasons assigned for persevering in the embargo, are, "the present unsettled state of the world, the extraordinary situation in which the United States are placed, and the necessity, if war be resorted to, of making it at the same time against both the belligerent nations, and these the two most powerful in the world;" and, under these circumstances, a principle of justice forbade our choosing our adversary! Must not such sentiments expose us to derision? Two nations have injured us—and we should violate the principles of justice, if, to obtain satisfaction, we attacked one without at the same time attacking the other! If we would descend from the airy regions of philosophy, and stand on the ground of plain common sense, we should see this embarrassment which apparently overwhelms the Administration, to be a mere dream. Sir, if a man travelling on the highway should meet two stout fellow-travellers, and be alternately insulted and attacked by both, and he at the same time perceived that they were enemies to each other, what would he do? Stand still, and be kicked and wounded by both? or co-operate with one, at least so far as was necessary to avenge his wrongs, and to provide for his own defence and security against the other? This course is so simple and obvious that even school-boys (who also have their quarrels) could not miss it. But if, while, in this way, avenging the wrongs done by the adversary, he, in effect disarmed the other, and made him his friend; and had, moreover, a fair prospect of inducing him to make satisfaction for the injuries he had committed; how could he hesitate to adopt it?

But, we have been advised by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GILLES,) to wait a little longer, "to wait events in Europe, now in a state of rapid succession." Yes, sir, wait until we see whether Bonaparte overwhelms the Spanish nation; and if Heaven permits this sad catastrophe—what then? Are we to join his arms, and by conquering Canada and Nova Scotia, prepare those countries with our own for a new master? and hasten the glorious period when to the lofty titles of Emperor of France and King of Italy, and Protector of the Confederation of the Rhine, shall be added that of Emperor of the Two Americas? That, sir, will be the natural course of things, if, as some have wished, the British navy were destroyed.

In the short interval of peace, in 1808, Bonaparte, in a few months, sent forty thousand soldiers to subdue the negroes of St. Domingo. The climate subdued his soldiers, and St. Domingo continues independent. But the United States present a very different theatre. French soldiers would here be as healthy as our own. And if with the ships suddenly furnished in France and Holland, Bonaparte at once transported forty thousand men to St. Domingo, what numbers could he not send to the United States in the thousands of British ships, were they also at his command?

It is estimated, sir, that the observations I have made, though on a question for repealing the acts laying the embargo, are irrelevant on the bill now before us. But to me they appear perfectly applicable in both cases; for if they go to show that the embargo ought never to have been imposed, they must avail, in like manner, against enforcing its execution; and, therefore, I have adduced them.

Mr. HILLHOUSE rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: Before I proceed to remark on the merits of the bill under consideration, I shall take the liberty of noticing some general observations of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GILLES,) which can have no bearing on the matter under consideration, and could have been thrown out for no other purpose than to impress the idea that the opposers of this bill and of the embargo are acting under some undue influence or bias, and are endeavoring to obstruct or paralyze the energies of the nation in their operations against foreign aggression. We are told of British capital, British agents, British gold, in too close connexion with the opposition to the embargo and the present bill. Sir, if it is meant to insinuate that the opposers of the embargo and of this bill are under such influence, I despise the insinuation. [Mr. GILES rose and declared that he did not mean to throw out the smallest intimation that the opposers of the bill were under such, or any other, improper influence.] The character and conduct of the greater part of that description of our fellow-citizens, who have been and still are opposed to the embargo, furnish a sufficient answer to any such insinuations as to them. No, sir, our opposition to the embargo proceeds from far different motives; from a thorough conviction of its inefficacy as regards foreign nations, and its ruinous operation as to ourselves. We are not willing to inflict a wound on our own country, because foreign nations do us wrong.

The gentleman from Virginia has renewed his call for a substitute for the embargo. Sir, the embargo admits no substitute. It is a measure radically wrong, and stands in the way of every proper measure. Remove the embargo, and then, and not till then, will the way be open to adopt measures for securing our commerce and defending our rights. I am not a little surprised that the gentleman from Virginia could make up his face to such an imposing call. Had that gentleman run through the journals, from which he has read some passages, he would have found that during a long and uniform course of opposition to a former Administration, which was conducted with acknowledged ability, he was not in the habit of proposing substitutes. He told us what would not, but not what would do. In the present case, were the embargo out of the way, and I found a disposition to listen, I should not hesitate to express my opinion of the proper course to be pursued. But so long as our national councils are under the embargo system, any attempt at other measures would be unavailing.

For the purpose of contrasting the present proceedings of Congress with what was done in 1794, the gentleman from Virginia read from the journals some passages to show "that the nation then moved in a solid body." Yes, sir, the unanimity and spirit then manifested does honor to the nation. But with whom were we contending then? With England. I should have been much gratified if the journals of 1798 (which the gentleman did not think proper to read) had exhibited the same unanimity and spirit when our rights were violated by another Power, and we were insulted by the contemptuous rejection of our Ministers. Far otherwise was the fact; there was then a violent and persevering opposition to the measures of defence which were then proposed and adopted; and by the same description of men who claim credit for a pre-eminent share of patriotism; a conduct to which I advert with reluctance. I was ready to vindicate our rights against England in 1794, and at a much earlier period. I was equally ready to do the like against France in 1798. It matters not to me from what nation injury or insult comes, I am ready to take sides with my country in repelling it—not, indeed, by an embargo, but by any measures of energy which policy or prudence shall dictate. I have never shrunk from taking my full share of responsibility when called to act on great national questions. I leave it to those who have known and observed my public conduct, to decide whether I have manifested much solicitude to find out which would be the popular side. I, sir, am under no apprehensions of being suspected by those who know me of acting under foreign, or any improper, influence. My opposition to the bill does not proceed from a wish to shield from punishment the violators of the embargo; those corrupt agents and friends of Great Britain, as the gentleman has described them. My opposition to the bill proceeds from an unwillingness to see the liberties of my country prostrated by a military despotism; the foundation of which I clearly discern in this bill. Says the gentleman from Virginia, the Senate have declared that they will not repeal the embargo; and they are now called upon to say it shall not be enforced. Not so, the call is that it should not be enforced by improper means—means which endanger liberty and violate the Constitution. Better that the embargo should not be executed than that the Constitution of the United States should be violated.

I extremely regret that the gentleman from Virginia should have felt himself at liberty to travel out of his way to cast reproach on the Judiciary. The judges, by a faithful discharge of their duty (sometimes being obliged to withstand popular error, and sometimes to interpose themselves between a defenceless individual and Executive power.) are exposed to their full share of opprobrium. No reproach for the rejection of the bill to suspend the habeas corpus can fall on the judges; they had no agency in the business. I have indeed felt, sensibly felt, the reproach cast upon the Senate for having passed that bill in so hasty a manner; but it was not slanders contained in newspaper paragraphs which I regarded; they have no more effect on my mind than the passing wind. It was the manner in which that bill was treated by the House of Representatives that wounded my feelings—I felt for the honor of the Senate. I voted with the gentleman from Virginia for that bill, though I did not at the time feel all the apprehensions which seemed to be impressed on his mind. I did not apprehend that a rebellion excited by an individual not clothed with any official consequence or power, without resources, and almost without friends, could ultimately endanger the safety of the Union. But from the communications made to Congress by the President, I was led to believe there was some treasonable proceeding and rebellion which ought to be speedily and promptly resisted and put down. Though I did not see the necessity of passing the bill with so much haste as to subject the Senate to the charge of precipitation; yet, being satisfied of the propriety of passing such a bill, I felt a reluctance, as I always do, at interposing my vote in a manner that may have even the appearance of throwing difficulties in the way of measures which regard the public safety. But no motives of delicacy, or any other cause, will prevent my opposing measures which I think wrong in principle. The loss of the bill to suspend the habeas corpus was in no respect attributable to the court or the judges. There was no interference on their part, nor any conduct of theirs that could warrant the gentleman from Virginia in making the heavy charge "that the hostile propensities of a court against its own country and its own Government, were the reasons why treason escaped punishment." In what instance have the judges interposed a shield between guilt and punishment? The principal leader in that rebellion was apprehended and taken to Virginia; and I rejoiced, at the time, that Virginia was to be the place of his trial, so that no suspicion might exist of a disposition to favor his escape from conviction and punishment. Aaron Burr was acquitted—whether from a defect in the law or testimony, I am not sufficiently informed to decide. But I have no hesitation in declaring it as my opinion, that it was not owing to any indisposition in the judge to do his duty; on the contrary, I think he manifested great integrity and firmness in adhering to the established rules of proceeding in criminal trials, which are the great shield of innocence against oppression; and in giving a fair trial to a political opponent, against whom the popular current ran high, and whose prosecution was aided by Executive influence and power. The opinions of the judge are in print, so that every one can examine for himself, and form his own. Thus much I may venture to say, that the gentleman from Virginia would find it no easy task to point out errors.

It is cause of regret when an individual, and much to be lamented when a public body become so zealously engaged in the pursuit of an object, as not to examine with candor the propriety or expediency of the measures by which such object is to be attained. In the present case, I fear that a zeal to enforce the embargo has blinded the eyes of some to the consequences likely to follow from the course of measures now pursued. I fear, also, that an error has been committed in pointing the debates and measures at a particular portion of the Union, as if violations of the embargo were confined to that quarter. Think ye that the people of Vermont and Massachusetts have been sinners above all the people of the United States? Have there been no violations of the embargo except in New England? Yes, verily. The only difference is, that on Vermont has fallen that political tower of Siloam, the President's proclamation. On the coasts of Massachusetts, and the States of the Chesapeake, almost the whole of our naval force has been sent to cruise, to detect and punish the transgressions of their citizens. This has given an opportunity to the Southern States to violate the embargo with impunity. It has been and still continues to be violated, even in that great and respectable State represented in part by my brother farmer (Mr. GILES;) which State, he has assured us, not only acquiesced in, but applauded the embargo as a wise and salutary measure. To show that I am correct, I will communicate to the Senate some information. One of the committee who had a principal hand in drawing the bill, stated that he was informed by the captain of a coaster (on whose information I should rely, being acquainted with him, and esteeming him a man of truth, and who had the means of knowledge, being employed in navigating up and down the Potomac) that there was a great display of activity and exertion in transporting the produce of the country, particularly flour, to the banks of the river, and shipping it off for other markets. Confirmatory of this, I hold in my hand other information:—"Captain Scovel, who arrived at New York yesterday, (December the 12th,) from St. Pierre, Martinique, and Antigua, states to us that vessels which daily arrived in distress, in the ports he visited, were almost exclusively from the Southern ports, and the greater number from the State of Virginia, laden with flour and other provisions." Again: "Captain Scovel, who arrived here (New York) last Monday, (December 12th,) from Martinique, via Antigua and St. Kitts, informs us, that while he lay at Martinique, a Virginia pilot-boat schooner arrived there with 750 barrels of flour, which the captain sold for $30 per barrel; that, while at Antigua, in the course of four days only, three vessels came in there with full cargoes of flour from Virginia; that he saw at St. Kitts a Virginia schooner that had been at Barbadoes with a cargo of flour, sold part, and then came to St. Kitts with the remainder for a better market." The Secretary of the Treasury informed that the flour which had accumulated in the great flour markets of the United States, was gone. What has become of it? I have heard of no bonfires, except in one instance, to consume some imported gin. One circumstance strongly impresses on my mind a belief, that the products of that State, Virginia, and even the article of tobacco, have found their way to foreign markets; which is, that flour and tobacco, at a particular period during the last Summer, when the embargo was in full operation, rose to a handsome price, and that some of her citizens of distinguished rank were so fortunate as to avail themselves of that price. The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) also stated sundry violations of the embargo. From which, and other information, I am induced to believe, that there are not many States in the Union where the embargo has not been violated. The use I wish to make of this information is, to show that this measure is not to have a limited or local operation; but is to pervade our whole country, and may affect every citizen of the United States. Let me, therefore, entreat this Senate to consider well before they give their sanction to a bill which is to have such a general operation; a bill which contains such novel and extraordinary provisions; a bill which may endanger civil liberty, and lay the foundation of a military despotism.

On the recommitment of the bill, one very obnoxious paragraph was stricken out, and others were altered. Some of the paragraphs I shall pass by without notice. The first to which I shall ask the attention of the Senate is the second section. That places the whole trade and intercourse between the States at the arbitrary will and pleasure of the President, collectors, and special revenue officers; there being no rule laid down by which their discretion is to be governed. And who are these collectors and revenue officers, who are to be intrusted with such unlimited power? Not judges holding their offices independent of the Executive will, and free from Executive influence. They are the mere creatures of the Executive, who are killed or made alive by the breath of the President.

This section provides that it shall not be lawful to put on board any ship, vessel, or boat, of any description whatever, any specie, or goods, wares, or merchandise, either of domestic or foreign growth, unless a permit, particularly stating the articles thus to be laden, shall have been previously obtained from the collector of the district in which such ship, vessel, or boat, may then be, or from a revenue officer specially authorized by such collector to grant such permit; nor unless bonds with surety to the amount of six times the value of the vessel and cargo shall be given for relanding the whole cargo in the United States. And it is made lawful for the collectors to refuse permission to put any cargo on board, whenever, in their opinion, there is an intention to violate the embargo; or whenever they shall have received instructions to that effect, by direction of the President of the United States. A proviso excepts from the operation of this section the bay and river craft. The bond demanded is excessive and oppressive. There is no rule laid down by which the discretion of the collectors or revenue officers is to be governed; or to point out to the citizens of the United States what they may expect or claim as a right. The permit may be refused altogether, upon the mere suspicion or jealousy of the officer, however unfounded. What a door is here opened for partiality and favoritism, and to gratify party feelings and party animosities? And have we not reason to believe it will, in many instances, be improved for the most oppressive party purposes?

Section fourth places the bay and river craft under the like arbitrary discretion of the collectors, who are authorized to grant, under such general instructions as the President of the United States may give, general permission, when it can be done without danger of the embargo being violated, to take on board, at any time, such articles of domestic or foreign growth as may be designated in such permit; bond with surety being previously given in an amount equal to three hundred dollars for each ton, conditioned that every article taken on board shall be relanded in the United States, and that such vessel shall not be employed in any foreign trade, &c.

When the regulation of the whole commerce and intercourse between the different States is placed at the arbitrary discretion of such an host of collectors, without any specific rule laid down in the law by which they are to govern their conduct; will there not, under this act, if it should pass, be danger, will there not be a certainty, that different collectors will adopt different rules, and that different and greater restrictions will be put upon the commerce of some States than others? which would be a violation of that clause of the Constitution which says "that no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another." This clause of the Constitution renders it indispensable that Congress should by law prescribe the rules by which commerce is to be regulated, that they may be certain, specific, and uniform in all the States. There was an inequality in the regulations of last Summer. The Governors of some of the States were authorized to grant permits to import flour: a like indulgence was not extended to the Governors of other States. In some States permits would be very liberally granted; in others, the collectors would be rigid, and stop nearly all the trade of a State.

The fifth section subjects innocent persons to penalties, confounds innocence and guilt, involving both in one common punishment. After declaring the forfeiture of the ship, vessel, or boat, together with the specie, goods, wares, and merchandise, taken on board contrary to the provisions of the third section of this act, it goes on to say that the owner, or owners, agent, freighter or factor, master, or commander of such ship, vessel, or boat, shall moreover severally forfeit and pay a sum equal to the value of the ship, vessel, or boat, and of the cargo put on board the same. By the provision of this section, the inquiry before the court and jury will be, not whether the person accused has been concerned in a violation of the embargo, but whether he be an owner, agent, freighter, factor, master, or commander of such ship, vessel, or boat; and he may have been ignorant of any intention to violate the law; nay more, though opposed to such violation, he is to be adjudged guilty and subjected to punishment. But, says the gentleman from Virginia, this is no new principle, it has already been introduced and recognised by the revenue laws. To prove this, and that collectors are thereby authorized to search for and seize goods, he read the 68th and 69th sections of the collection law of March 2, 1799.*

* "SEC. 68. And be it further enacted, That every collector, naval officer, and surveyor, or other person specially appointed by either of them for that purpose, shall have full power and authority to enter any ship or vessel, in which they shall have reason to suspect any goods, wares, or merchandise, subject to duty, are concealed, and therein to search for, seize, and secure any such goods, wares, or merchandise; and if they shall have cause to suspect a concealment thereof in any particular dwelling-house, store, building, or other place, they, or either of them, shall, upon proper application upon oath, to any justice of the peace, be entitled to a warrant to enter such house, store, or other place (in the day time only) and there to search for such goods; and if any shall be found to seize and se-

SENATE.

The great and leading principle of the revenue law is, that the penalty operates on the property in all cases except where a person is negligent, or knowingly guilty of a violation of the law; in which case there is superadded a personal penalty. For example, a captain who neglects or refuses to enter his vessel, or makes a false entry, or attempts to run goods and avoid the payment of duties, the vessel and goods are declared forfeit, and the captain and other persons concerned in such violation of the law, subjected to a penalty; but in no instance is the owner, agent, freighter, or factor, who has no knowledge of such violation, subjected to a penalty. True it is, the innocent owner may be subjected to the loss of his vessel and goods; but that goes upon an entirely different principle; which is, that the owner is responsible for the good conduct of his captain or agent, so far as the property goes that he entrusts in his hands. But it was reserved for this bill to introduce into our code the criminal principle that an innocent man is to be arraigned, found guilty, and punished, merely for being an owner, agent,* cure the same for trial; and all such goods, wares, and merchandise, on which the duties shall not have been paid, or secured to be paid, shall be forfeited.

"Sec. 69. And be it further enacted, That all goods, wares, or merchandise, which shall be seized by virtue of this act, shall be put into and remain in the custody of the collector, or such other person as he shall appoint for that purpose, until such proceedings shall be had as by this act are required, to ascertain whether the same have been forfeited or not; and if it shall be adjudged that they are not forfeited, they shall be restored to the owner or owners, claimant or claimants thereof; and if any person or persons shall conceal or buy any goods, wares, or merchandise, knowing them to be liable to seizure by this act, such person or persons shall, on conviction thereof, forfeit and pay a sum double the amount or value of the goods, wares, or merchandise, so concealed or purchased."

* An Act to authorize the President of the United States to lay, regulate, and revoke Embargoes.

Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and empowered, whenever in his opinion the public safety shall require, to lay an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports of the United States, or upon the ships and vessels of any foreign nation, under such regulations as the circumstances of the case may require, and to continue or revoke the same whenever he shall think proper. And the President is hereby fully authorized to give all such orders to the officers of the United States as may be necessary to carry the same into full effect: Provided, The authority aforesaid shall not be exercised while the Congress of the United States be in session. And any embargo which may be laid by the President, as aforesaid, shall cease and determine in fifteen days from the actual meeting of Congress next after laying the same.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue and be in force until fifteen days after the commencement of the next session of Congress, and no longer.

Approved, June 4, 1794.

10th Con. 2d Sess.—10

freighter, or factor. This is a principle which would disgrace the most tyrannical code of the most tyrannical Government that ever existed.

Section sixth subjects the reputed owner to the same forfeitures and penalties as the real owner in the preceding section. So that an innocent person is not only liable to the charge of a crime, but to a conviction and punishment, because his name happens to appear on a certificate of registry, enrolment, or license, or the last clearance or custom-house document, though he may have no interest or property whatever in the ship or vessel that shall violate the law, and no knowledge of such violation, or of any intention to violate the law. This same section establishes unwarrantable restrictions on the sale and transfer of property, for it is provided that no sale shall be recognised or rendered effectual, until a bond shall be given equal to three hundred dollars for each ton of such ship or vessel so proposed to be sold, conditioned that such ship or vessel shall not, during the continuance of the embargo, contravene or infringe any of the provisions of the said acts. A vessel of one hundred tons burden cannot be sold without entering a bond of $30,000; an enormous bond, which very few, if any, such owners would be able to obtain, though under the most pressing necessity of selling to obtain the means of subsistence, or bread for his family. Who would entangle his fortune with such a bond? Let me ask the gentleman from Virginia whether, even to oblige a suffering neighbor, he would pledge his farm and mills by entering into such a bond? I have too good an opinion of his prudence and foresight to believe he would thus encumber the place of his dignified retirement with such a bond; and if his patriotism would not induce him to give such a bond, who is there that would do it? As well might Congress pass a law declaring it unlawful to sell at all, as to pass this law; for it is an indirect mode of doing the same thing. And has the Constitution given to Congress any such power? If we are doomed to suffer under the embargo system, it is better far to stop the coasting trade altogether, and chain our coasters, as are our other vessels, to rot at our wharves, than to disgrace our country by such an act. An act which only tantalizes our citizens with the show of a coasting trade, when, by requiring excessive bonds, imposing burdensome restrictions, and submitting the whole to the arbitrary discretion and caprice of a host of collectors it will in fact be annihilated, or nearly so; an act which, under pretence of regulating the sale of vessels, has required a bond which in its operation would, in most cases, amount to an absolute prohibition. An act which opens a door for the most wanton favoritism and cruel oppression; an act which violates some of the most important principles of justice.

The seventh section contains a most extraordinary provision; a provision which virtually goes to deprive the party of his right of trial by jury, an impartial jury of the vicinity, before whom the party would have it in his power to adduce evidence, and make his defence. By this bill, the final decision, whatever it may be, is referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, an Executive officer, holding his office at the pleasure of the President, and residing in this city, the seat of the General Government, which, as regards the convenience of a great portion of the citizens of the United States, is in a distant land. The section provides that, in all suits on bonds given by virtue of this or any of the embargo acts, conditioned that goods, wares, or merchandise, or the cargo of a vessel, shall be relanded in the United States, judgment shall be given against the defendant, unless proof shall be given of such relanding, or the loss of the vessel at sea. But neither capture, distress, or any other accident whatever, shall be pleaded or given in evidence in any such suit. What possible difference can there be between depriving a party of his trial by jury altogether, and precluding the evidence necessary to his defence and the establishment of his innocence? It is an axiom admitted in all codes, that the act of God shall prejudice no man. But, by this bill, if a vessel bound, for example, from New York to New Haven, should have a single hogshead of rum on board, and, in a thunderstorm, this should be set on fire and consumed, and the vessel fortunately escape, because the relanding of the rum, or the loss of the vessel, cannot be proved, judgment is to go on the bond—although the defendant has the most incontrovertible evidence to prove the above fact, (the destruction of the rum,) a complete defence at law—not by custom-house oaths, of which the gentleman from Virginia seems to think so lightly (and which I am sorry he should disparage, as on them depends much of our revenue,) but by the oaths of the most respectable characters of our country, who may be on board, and eye-witnesses of the fact; nay, it might happen to be the gentleman himself. Another case: in a storm, to save the vessel and their lives, the crew and passengers throw overboard a cargo of flour, or such as may be on deck and in the way of working the ship; proof of this is not to be admitted before the court and jury, but judgment is to be rendered against the defendant. Many other such like cases might be put equally strong. Article seventh, of the amendments to the Constitution, provides, that "where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved." Two of the prominent articles of grievance set forth in the Declaration of Independence are in these words:

"For depriving us in many cases of the benefit of trial by jury."

"For transporting us beyond the seas, to be tried for pretended offences."

To deprive the party of the right to plead or give in evidence what would establish his innocence, is to deprive him of his trial; to require a court to render judgment on a bond against the defendant, who is prepared and offers his plea and evidence, to establish a complete and legal defence before a court and jury, is to deprive him of his trial by jury, and is a denial of justice. And to send a defendant thus condemned to the City of Washington to obtain relief is indeed sending him "to be tried for pretended offences." But, says the gentleman from Virginia, by the humane provision contained in the twelfth section, the person thus unjustly condemned may escape the penalties of the law. And how? By conforming to the law of March 3d, 1797, which provides for mitigating or remitting forfeitures, penalties, and disabilities. That is, by going hundreds of miles from his own home to the City of Washington, (little less inconvenient than a voyage across the Atlantic,) there to appear not before an impartial tribunal, composed of judges and jurors of his own vicinity, free from all Executive influence and party bias, but before the Secretary of the Treasury, holding his office at the will of the Executive—not in the manly attitude of a citizen bold in conscious innocence, to defend his character against the imputation of being a violator of the laws of his country—but in the attitude of a suppliant, against whom judgment has already been pronounced; humbly praying, on the bended knee, for the remission of the penalty of the law; which he can claim, not as matter of right, but of grace. Is it possible that free-born Americans can submit to such indignity? Is it thus that the character, the feelings, and the innocence of the American people are to be made the sport of an embargo system? No, sir, pass this law, and that system now oppressive will become odious, more odious, if possible, than were the measures of the British Parliament, which drove us into the Revolution, induced us to bear all the hardships of a long war, and severed the colonies from the parent country.

Sec. 9—Authorizes the collectors to seize or take into their custody, without warrant, without evidence, and at their own discretion, specie, or any article of domestic growth, produce, or manufacture, when there is reason to believe they are intended for exportation; or when in vessels, carts, wagons, sleighs, or any other carriage, or in any manner apparently on their way towards the territory of a foreign nation, or in the vicinity thereof, or towards a place whence such articles are intended to be exported. This seizure may be made, not only on board a vessel, but on the land; not only in a cart, wagon, or sleigh, but wherever they may be; provided there is reason to believe they are intended for exportation. Money is not kept in the highway or open field, but in a house, in a desk, or private drawer; flour and other articles of produce are not kept in a situation to be exposed to the weather, or other injury, but in warehouses or stores: when, therefore, an authority is given to take these articles, when the collector believes they are intended for exportation, it is to take them where they are usually kept and may be expected to be found. My house, I have always been taught to believe, was my castle, my sanctuary, where myself and property could remain in perfect security, unless I should have forfeited the privilege by some crime against the State. But are we not about to declare, by this bill, that a collector, and without any warrant from a civil magistrate, and merely on the ground of his own suspicion, and governed only by his own discretion, may enter my enclosure, my store, my dwelling-house, and there take into custody my money and other articles? That he may call the military to aid him in this work? In the progress of which, may not my private and most confidential papers be exposed? Do not these things tend to irritation, to resistance, to bloodshed? Can such Legislative provisions consist with a wise policy, with the principles of a free Government, or the Constitution of the United States?

In article four of the amendments, it is provided, that "the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated; and no warrant shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the person or things to be seized."

The gentleman from Virginia, here, as in other instances, rests his defence of this section on the law for the collection of the revenue, and particularly on the same sixty-eighth section, which has been read. True it is, that by that law the collector is authorized to go on board a vessel and make search or seizure without warrant; but the moment he sets his foot on the land, and wishes to make search or seizure, application on oath must be made to a magistrate for a warrant, to be executed in the manner directed. There has always been a difference in the mode of enforcing the laws on board of vessels on the water, from what was admitted on the land; and less formality and caution has been observed in making search and seizure on board of vessels, than what is required on the land, in our stores and dwelling-houses. For the purpose of executing the law of nations on the high seas, commercial regulations and the collection of revenue, it has been found necessary at all times, to subject vessels to the inconvenience of being liable to search and seizure without warrant, and without much formality. A great discrimination has always been made between vessels and houses.

There is another manifest distinction between seizures under the law for collecting revenue, and the present bill; there the articles seized are claimed to have become forfeited; but by the present bill there is a bare suspicion that they are about so to be proceeded with as that they may become forfeited. Under those laws the property is immediately placed in the custody of the law, and under the jurisdiction of a court of justice; where the claimant can have a trial, and if he can make out a well-founded claim, is entitled to a restoration of his property. By this bill, the property is held by the collectors, and the owner has no way of obtaining the same but by substituting a bond, with sufficient sureties (which the party may not be able to obtain) for the landing or delivery of the same in some place in the United States, where, in the opinion of the collector, there shall not be danger of such articles being exported.

When the collector has seized or taken money or other articles, it is made his duty to guard them; which must be done either in the place where taken, or in some other place to which he shall in his discretion remove them. And for the purpose of taking into custody and guarding specie or any other article, the 11th section authorizes the President of the United States, or such other person as he shall have appointed, to employ the land and naval forces, or militia of the United States. Take either alternative, the law cannot be executed without a violation of the Constitution. For suppose it to be money, and to avoid any question about an unreasonable search, we will suppose the collector present in my house, and sees me count and place a large sum of money in my desk, which he believes is intended for exportation in violation of the embargo, and makes a seizure, as would be his duty under this bill. If the money is not to be removed, he must, or may, introduce a soldier or soldiers into my house to guard it; which would be in direct violation of the 3d article of the amendments to the Constitution, which says, "no soldier shall in time of peace be quartered in any house, without the consent of the owner; nor in time of war, but in manner to be prescribed by law." If the money is to be removed to some other (in the opinion of the collector) safe place, then is there a violation of the 5th article of the amendments, which says, that no person shall be "deprived of his life, liberty or property, without due process of law."

Sec. 10—Gives to the President's instructions, and the rules he may prescribe, the authority of law. Are we prepared for this, to authorize the President to make proclamation laws? In that section it is provided, that the powers given to collectors "shall be exercised in conformity with such instructions as the President may give, and such general rules as he may prescribe for that purpose, made in pursuance of the powers aforesaid—which instructions and general rules the collectors shall be bound to obey. And if any action or suit be brought against any collector or other person, acting under the directions of and in pursuance of this act, he may plead the general issue, and give this act and the instructions and regulations of the President, in evidence for his justification and defence." Neither in this or the former act is there any rule laid down by which the President's instructions are to be governed—consequently, they depend on his own arbitrary will and pleasure; and it is made the duty of the collectors to pay implicit obedience to those instructions, and through the collectors they are to operate upon the property and concerns of the people. There is no mode pointed out by which these instructions are to be promulgated and made known, as are the laws. By the Constitution, all laws are to receive the sanction of the two branches of the Legislature and be approved by the President. But, according to this section, the President's instructions, proceeding from the recesses of the palace, and communicated only to the collectors, are to have the binding force of law—are to affect the property and concerns of the citizens of the United States—are to control the courts of justice—and thus violate that sanctuary which has always been esteemed a great bulwark to guard the liberties of a free people. These instructions are to be given in evidence on any suit against the officer for his justification and defence. If the officer is bound to obey these instructions, the courts must necessarily be bound to receive them as evidence in justification of the collector—the consequence necessarily follows that they must control the courts of justice.

To support the principle of this section of the bill, the gentleman from Virginia has read to us a law of the United States passed in June, 1794, authorizing the President to lay an embargo, provide the necessary regulations for carrying it into effect, and for revoking the same. Whether I did or did not vote for that law I do not now recollect; the yeas and nays were not taken. But I have no hesitation in saying, that with my present impressions, I should, under like circumstances, vote for such a law, either under the then Administration or the present. We then had disputes with the British Government, which, unless settled by the negotiation then pending, must terminate in war. We had adopted every defensive measure in our power, and Congress were about to adjourn, and wait the issue of the negotiation. If unsuccessful it might become necessary suddenly to stop our vessels in our harbors, previous to a declaration of war. Congress could not be convened, so as to pass a law, much short of two months. It resulted therefore, as a necessary consequence, that the power must be lodged somewhere; and where more properly than with the Chief Magistrate? In my opinion, the power to lay an embargo is not given to Congress by that clause of the Constitution, which gives the power to regulate commerce; it is in direct hostility to commerce. The power to lay an embargo, follows as a necessary appendage to the power of making war. The case might happen when even the commanding officer of the army might be justified in laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in certain harbors and rivers, when necessary to aid a military expedition then on foot. The Parliament of England have the sole power to regulate commerce; the King has the power of declaring war and of laying an embargo. But this is a power to be exercised with great caution; it is a measure temporary in its nature. The present is, I believe, the first experiment of a permanent embargo. It is a power, when given to the Executive, which is to be carefully guarded; as was the law in 1794, by which the President was not to lay an embargo when Congress were in session, nor that should continue in force but for a short time after Congress should convene.

To enable us to form a correct opinion in this case, it is proper to inquire what is an embargo. An embargo, in its nature and legitimate import, is most emphatically a measure, not affecting the internal policy of a country, but operating upon the water, in relation to ships and vessels. Its proper element is the water, not the land; but Congress, during the last session and the present, have been laboring to convert this water-fowl into a land-turtle, which might creep into the enclosure of every man in the nation. Upon these principles, an embargo law, or resolution, would be very short, as was that in 1794. But in the present case. Congress have accumulated one long intricate statute upon another, until the property of the whole country is involved within their grasp. In short, the effort has been to convert an embargo into a non-exportation act. In this, as in many other cases, a wrong title has been adopted; and from that circumstance arises much of our present embarrassment. Had the law of 1794, giving to the President of the United States the power of laying an embargo, so confidently relied on by the gentleman from Virginia, as justifying the powers and principles of the present bill, contained such powers and such principles, it never would have had my support or my vote. It would have merited conflagration, and to have been burnt, as on another occasion was the law of a State, by no ordinary fire.

Mr. President, after enumerating such a catalogue of arbitrary restrictions, oppressive regulations, and unconstitutional provisions, comprised in this one bill, could it have been imagined that there was one objectionable section still left for consideration, more alarming than any that have preceded? One that makes a full stride towards the introduction of a military despotism? It is section 11, which says:

“That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, or such other person as he shall have empowered for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval force, or militia of the United States, or of the Territories thereof, as may be judged necessary, in conformity with the provisions of this and the other acts respecting the embargo, for the purpose of preventing the illegal departure of any ship or vessel, or of detaining, taking possession of, and keeping in custody any ship or vessel, or of taking into custody and guarding any specie or articles of domestic growth, produce, or manufacture, and also for the purpose of preventing and suppressing any armed or riotous assemblage of persons resisting the custom-house officers in the execution of their duties, or in any manner opposing the execution of the laws laying an embargo, or otherwise violating, or assisting and abetting violations of the same.”

Here we see the military called on, in the first instance, to execute the laws—taking the lead under a military chief; not following in the train and under the direction of the civil magistrate, as ought invariably to be the case in a well regulated free Government. Under such a Government, the laws have always been carefully guarded, to keep the military in subordination to the civil power. Once permit the military to get the upper hand, and your liberties are gone. By this bill under whose direction is the military, in the bosom of a State, to be placed? not of the Chief Magistrate of the State, nor of any officer who has received his appointment from a State, or whose appointment has been made with the advice and consent of this Senate; but of a person who is to receive his appointment from the President's sole authority. That no such power as is contained in the provisions of this bill, is necessary for the purpose of executing the laws, or quelling insurrections, is manifest from past experience. Under this Constitution we have had one insurrection, and also a powerful combination to resist the execution of the laws. What was the conduct then? Fortunately for our country, our then Chief Magistrate was both a soldier and a statesman. A statesman who was duly sensible of the importance of keeping the military in subordination to the civil power. In the Western Insurrection, a considerable military force was called out, to the amount of thousands, and marched against the insurgents, but they were preceded by the marshal of the district, the attorney, and the judge. And instead of military execution, the mild process of the civil law was resorted to; and was found sufficient to bring offenders to justice, and maintain the majesty of the laws. The insurrection was quelled, and tranquillity restored to our country. The combination under Fries, to resist the execution of the laws, was also suppressed by a resort to the like mild but efficient measures. No suggestion was then made that it was necessary that more of the military should be introduced into our civil code.

The laws of the United States and the State laws have made ample provisions for calling in the aid of the military, when necessary to execute the laws. By the act of February 28, 1795, the President is clothed with ample power to use military force to execute the laws, observing the necessary prerequisite of a proclamation; and by the ninth section of the same act, the marshals are clothed with the same power and authority, to enable them to execute their duty, as is given to the sheriffs in the several States. And that this is sufficient, the experience of every State evinces. Why this attempt to place the execution of the laws, in the first instance, in the hands of the military? Why this innovation on our ancient usage? I fear it bodes no good to our country.

Has the embargo, which was professed to be laid for the benevolent purpose of "preserving our vessels, our seamen, and our merchandise," become so unpopular, so odious, that it cannot be executed through the mild medium of courts of justice; but that the country must be put under martial law, and the bayonet of the soldier substituted in the place of the tribunal of justice? If so, it ought to be repealed. In a Government like ours, resting wholly on the popular voice, no law ought to be continued that will require a military execution.

I do hope, and must hope, until the signature of the President to the act shall be announced to the Senate, that this bill will never pass the different branches, and be approved by the President. The plea that it is necessary for carrying the embargo into effect, will not justify the measure. This same plea of necessity has always been resorted to by tyrants. It is in times when parties run high, and under popular leaders, that measures are adopted and precedents established, that eventually overturn the liberties of a country. I do not believe, sir, that the citizens of the United States are yet prepared to surrender their liberties at the shrine of either foreign or domestic tyranny, though it should be recommended by the most popular of their favorites. The American people are too well acquainted with the history of former Republics to submit their necks to the yoke, and to wear the chains of slavery, however gilded, and though invited to wear them by the seductive voice of party spirit. When it shall be discovered (and an attempt to execute this act, if unfortunately it should pass, will open the eyes of the people) and they will discover, that there is an attack on civil liberty, the party dissensions which now distract our unhappy country, and are the cause of so much mischief, will disappear; and public spirit, notwithstanding the operation of political soporifics, must be awakened. The people, coming forth in their might, would at once put down the first essay towards the worst of despotisms, a military despotism.

In my mind, the present prospect excites the most serious apprehensions. A storm seems to be gathering, which portends not a tempest on the ocean, but domestic convulsions. However painful the task, a sense of duty calls upon me to raise my voice, and use my utmost exertions to prevent the passing of this bill. I feel myself bound in conscience to declare, lest the blood of those who may fall in the execution of this measure should be on my head, that I do consider this to be an act which directs a mortal blow at the liberties of my country; an act containing unconstitutional provisions, to which the people are not bound to submit, and to which in my opinion they will not submit.

Mr. POPE spoke in favor of the bill.

And on the question, Shall this bill pass? it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 7, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Gaillard, Giles, Gregg, Kitchel, Milledge, Mitchell, Moore, Pope, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Smith of Tennessee, Sumter, Thruston, Tiffin, and Turner.

NAYS—Messrs. Gilman, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Lloyd, Mathewson, Pickering, and White.

So it was, Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be "An act to enforce and make more effectual an act, entitled 'An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several acts supplementary thereto.'"

TUESDAY, December 27.

The VICE PRESIDENT continuing indisposed, the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, December 28.

The VICE PRESIDENT being absent by reason of the ill state of his health, the Senate proceeded to the election of a President pro tempore, as the Constitution provides; and STEPHEN R. BRADLEY was appointed.

On motion, by Mr. GILES,

Ordered, That the Secretary wait on the President of the United States and acquaint him that the Senate have, in the absence of the Vice President, elected STEPHEN R. BRADLEY their President pro tempore.

On motion, by Mr. GILES,

Ordered, That the Secretary make a like communication to the House of Representatives.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

According to the request of the Senate, in their resolution of November 14, that copies should be laid before them of all the orders and decrees of the belligerent Powers of Europe, passed since 1791, affecting the commercial rights of the United States, I now transmit them a report of the Secretary of State, of such of them as have been attainable in the Department of State, and are supposed to have entered into the views of the Senate.

TH. JEFFERSON.

DECEMBER 23, 1808.

The Message and papers accompanying it were read, and five hundred copies thereof ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

According to the request expressed by the Senate, in their resolution of November 14, I now transmit a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and statement, showing, as far as returns have been received from the collectors, the number of vessels which have departed from the United States with permission, and specifying the other particulars contemplated by that resolution.

TH. JEFFERSON.

DECEMBER 27, 1808.

The Message and documents were read, and three hundred copies thereof ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. MILLEDGE presented the petition of William Brown, an officer of artillery, during the whole of the Revolutionary war, stating his services in that arduous contest, and praying that, at an advanced age, he may be placed above the pressure of want; and the petition was read and referred to Messrs. MILLEDGE, FRANKLIN, and GREGG, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. MITCHILL, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Eunice Hunt, made report; which was read for consideration.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the report of the select committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the President to employ an additional number of revenue cutters;" and having agreed to the amendment, the President reported the bill to the House amended. On the question, Shall this bill be read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

On motion, it was agreed, that the bill making a further appropriation towards completing the two wings of the Capitol at the City of Washington, and for other purposes, be further postponed.

Mr. GREGG submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate do cause to be bound as many sets of the documents accompanying the Messages of the President of the United States of the twenty-second and thirtieth of March, one thousand eight hundred and eight, and also of the documents accompanying the President's Message of the eighth of November, one thousand eight hundred and eight, as shall be sufficient to furnish each member of the Senate with one copy, to be delivered during the present session.

TUESDAY, December 29.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to continue in force, for a further time, the first section of the act, entitled 'An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers,'" a bill, entitled "An act authorizing the appointment and employment of an additional number of navy officers, seamen, and marines;" also, a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Augustin Serry;" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate. They have passed the bill, entitled "An act supplemental to an act, entitled 'An act for the extending the terms of credit on revenue bonds in certain cases, and for other purposes,'" with amendments; in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill making a further appropriation to-

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I lay before the Legislature, a letter from Governor Claiborne on the subject of a small tribe of Alabama Indians, on the western side of the Mississippi, consisting of about a dozen families. Like other erratic tribes in that country, it is understood that they have hitherto moved from place to place, according to their convenience, without appropriating to themselves exclusively any particular territory. But having now become habituated to some of the occupations of civilized life, they wish for a fixed residence. I suppose it will be the interest of the United States to encourage the wandering tribes of that country to reduce themselves to fixed habitations whenever they are so disposed. The establishment of towns and growing attachments to them, will furnish, in some degree, pledges of their peaceable and friendly conduct. The case of this particular tribe is now submitted to the consideration of Congress.

TH. JEFFERSON.

DECEMBER 30, 1808.

The Message and resolutions were read, and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the payment of certain pensions by the Secretary of War, at the seat of Government," reported the bill without amendment.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

Mr. FRANKLIN presented the representation of the grand jury, and others, inhabitants of Cabarras county, in the State of North Carolina, on the present embargo, and soliciting permission to export their surplus produce, if it can be granted without any abandonment of national independence or a surrender of essential rights; and the representation was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MITCHILL submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and what, provisions ought to be made at this time for the relief of sick and disabled seamen of the United States.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Augustin Serry," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. MITCHILL, REED, and SUMTER, to consider and report thereon.

The Senate resumed the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act for extending the terms of credit on revenue bonds, in certain cases, and for other purposes;" and on motion, by Mr. LLOYD, it was agreed that they be referred to a select committee; and Ordered, That Messrs. MILLEDGE, LLOYD, and GILMAN, be the committee to consider and report thereon.

Mr. TIFFIN from the committee, reported the bill making a further appropriation towards completing the two wings of the Capitol at the City of Washington, and for other purposes," correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time, and on motion, by Mr. LLOYD, it was ordered to be recommitted to Messrs. GREGG, THRUSTON, and ANDERSON, further to consider and report thereon.

NORTH CAROLINA RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. TURNER presented the resolutions of the Legislature of the State of North Carolina, expressing their sentiments on the present situation of our foreign relations, and approbatory of the measures of Government; which were read, and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

They are as follows:

IN SENATE, November 29, 1808.

The General Assembly of North Carolina, viewing the present situation of the United States, in relation to Great Britain and France, as being alarmingly critical—as requiring the exercise of the greatest wisdom, energy, and prudence, on the part of the General Government, and the highest degree of patriotism and unanimity amongst the real friends of their country—are of opinion, that, as great clamor has been raised against some of the measures lately taken by our Administration, which may have led foreign nations to believe that the people of the United States are a divided people, unable or unwilling to carry into effect any energetic measures of their Government, it may serve to strengthen the hands of those who have the management of our national affairs, for Legislative and other public bodies to publish an expression of their sentiments on the present situation of our foreign relations; which the General Assembly of North Carolina do, in the following resolutions:

Resolved, That we view the pretext offered by Great Britain for not making reparation for the acknowledged outrage on our frigate Chesapeake, by the British ship of war Leopard, as unworthy a nation boasting of a free and enlightened Government.

Resolved, That we consider the acts, decrees, and orders, affecting neutral commerce, issued and enacted by Great Britain and France, as unjust and vexatious, and equally calculated to violate our neutral rights and national sovereignty.

Resolved, That we most cordially approve of the measures which the President of the United States has taken, in the spirit of moderation and equity, to obtain, both from Great Britain and France, a reparation of the wrongs committed against this country, and the repeal of those obnoxious acts, decrees, and orders.

Resolved, That, though the laws laying an embargo have borne hard upon a great part of the citizens of the United States, the Legislature of North Carolina consider them as the best means which could have been devised to preserve our citizens and property from the devouring grasp of the belligerent Powers.

Resolved, That, though the citizens of North Carolina have felt their full share of the pressure of these laws, they will cheerfully acquiesce in their continuance, should the competent authorities deem it expedient to persevere in the measure, until a repeal can be obtained of the unjust regulations which occasioned them; or in any other measure which Congress may deem necessary for the maintenance of our neutral rights.

Resolved, That, sooner than submit to unjust and vexatious restrictions on our commerce; to the impressment of our seamen; and to the taxation of the cargoes of our vessels, at the pleasure of foreign nations; we will live to ourselves, and have no connexion with any of them.

Resolved, That we value peace as one of the greatest blessings which any nation can enjoy; yet, rather than surrender our liberty and independence, we will surround the standard of our country, and risk our lives and fortunes in her defence.

MONDAY, January 2, 1809.

Mr. WHITE, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the appointment and employment of an additional number of navy officers, seamen, and marines," reported it without amendment.

Ordered, That the consideration of this bill be postponed.

Mr. FRANKLIN, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to continue in force, for a further time, the first section of the act, entitled 'An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers,'" reported it without amendment.

TUESDAY, January 3.

Mr. WHITE presented the memorial of the surviving officers in the Delaware line of the Revolutionary army, praying for a remuneration of losses sustained by the commutation of half pay, for reasons mentioned in the memorial; which was read, and referred to the committee appointed on the 12th December last, to consider and report upon similar memorials.

The Senate resumed the motion made on the 28th of December last, for binding certain documents; and

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate do cause to be bound as many sets of the documents accompanying the Messages of the President of the United States, of the twenty-second and thirtieth of March, one thousand eight hundred and eight; and, also, of the documents accompanying the President's Message of the eighth of November, one thousand eight hundred and eight, as shall be sufficient to furnish each member of the Senate with one copy, to be delivered during the present session.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to authorize the transmission of certain documents, by the mail, free of postage," in which they request the concurrence of the Senate. The House of Representatives disagree to the first amendment of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the President to employ an additional number of revenue cutters;" and agree to the other amendment.

The bill last brought up for concurrence was read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate proceeded to consider their amendment to the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the President to employ an additional number of revenue cutters," disagreed to by the House of Representatives; and, on motion, by Mr. GILES, Resolved, That they recede from their said amendment.

The credentials of JAMES HILLHOUSE, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Connecticut, for six years, commencing on the fourth day of March next, were read, and ordered to lie on file.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the appointment and employment of an additional number of navy officers, seamen, and marines;" and on motion, by Mr. HILLHOUSE, to amend the first part of the first section, after the word "assembled," in the second line, to read as follows:

"That there be fitted out, officered, manned, and employed, as soon as may be, all the frigates and other armed vessels of the United States, and gunboats; that the President of the United States be authorized and empowered to cause the frigates and armed vessels, so soon as they can be prepared for actual service, respectively, to be stationed at such ports and places on the seacoast as he may deem most expedient, or to cruise on any part of the coast of the United States, or territories thereof."

And it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 21, nays 9, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bradley, Gaillard, Giles, Gilman, Goodrich, Gregg, Hillhouse, Howland, Lloyd, Mathewson, Milledge, Mitchell, Moore, Parker, Pickering, Reed, Robinson, Smith of New York, Sumter, Thruston, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Kitchel, Pope, Smith of Tennessee, Tiffin, and Turner.

And the bill having been further amended, on the question, Shall it be read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act to continue in force for a further time the first section of the act, entitled "An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers."

On motion, by Mr. HILLHOUSE, to recommit the bill, it was determined in the negative.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

The Senate resumed the motion, made on the 30th of December last, that a committee be appointed to inquire whether any and what provisions ought to be made at this time for the relief of sick and disabled seamen of the United States; and, having agreed thereto, Messrs. MITCHELL, HILLHOUSE, and REED, were appointed the committee.

On motion, by Mr. GILES,

Ordered, That the letter of the Secretary of the Navy to the committee on the bill providing for the arming, manning, and fitting out for immediate service, all the public ships of war, be printed for the use of the Senate.

The bill, entitled "An act authorizing the payment of certain pensions by the Secretary of War, at the seat of Government," was read the third time, and passed.

WEDNESDAY, January 4.

Mr. MILLEDGE, from the committee to whom was referred the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled, "An act supplemental to an act, entitled 'An act for extending the terms of credit on revenue bonds in certain cases, and for other purposes,'" made report. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the Senate do agree to the amendments with an amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Augustin Serry," reported it amended; and the House having agreed to the amendments, the President reported the bill accordingly.

Ordered, That this bill pass to the third reading as amended.

Mr. POPE, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of the Marine Insurance Company of Alexandria, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to authorize the Marine Insurance Company of Alexandria to alter their style and firm, and to insure against loss by fire; and the bill was read, and ordered to the second reading.

The bill, entitled "An act to authorize the transmission of certain documents, by the mail, free of postage," was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and, on motion by Mr. LLOYD to commit the bill, it was determined in the negative; and the President having reported the bill to the House amended, on motion, by Mr. MILLEDGE, the further consideration of the bill was postponed to the first Monday in June next.

Mr. TIFFIN, from the committee, reported the amendments to the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the appointment and employment of an additional number of navy officers, seamen, and marines," correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time as amended. And the title having been also amended, the bill was passed with amendments.

The bill, entitled "An act to continue in force for a further time the first section of the act, entitled 'An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers,'" was read the third time, and passed.

On motion, the bill was reconsidered and amended, by unanimous consent; and the title having been amended,

Resolved, That this bill pass with amendments.

Mr. REED communicated the resolution of the Legislature of the State of Maryland, disapproving of the alteration proposed to the Constitution of the United States, by a resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Virginia, so as "to render the Senators in Congress of the United States removable from office by the vote of a majority of the whole number of the members of the respective State Legislatures by which the said Senators have been or may be appointed;" which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LLOYD submitted the following motion.

Resolved, That President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate all the official as well as informal correspondence between Mr. Rose, the late British Minister to the United States, and the Secretary of State, or any other officer of this Government, which has not already been communicated to Congress.

THURSDAY, January 5.

Mr. GREGG from the committee to whom was recommitted the bill making a further appropriation towards completing the two wings of the Capitol at the City of Washington, and for other purposes, reported the bill without amendment.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill as in Committee of the Whole. A motion was made, by Mr. REED, to strike out the words, "carrying up in solid work, and repairing the west side of the north wing, providing permanent accommodatations for the library;" and on the question to agree to the striking out of these words, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 10, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bradley, Crawford, Franklin, Gilman, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Howland, Kitchel, Lloyd, Mathewson, Mitchell, Moore, Parker, Pickering, Reed, Robinson, Sumter, Tiffin, and Turner.

NAYS—Messrs. Condit, Gaillard, Giles, Gregg, Milledge, Pope, Smith of New York, Smith of Tennessee, Thruston, and White.

And the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House amended.

On motion of Mr. THRUSTON the bill was further amended, by inserting, after the word "staircase," the words, "and providing temporary and adequate accommodations for the library, in the room now used for that purpose, and in the one in which the Senate now sit."

On motion, by Mr. REED, to strike out from the clause "for improvements and repairs of the President's House and square, including a carriage house," the words, "and square;" it was determined in the negative—yeas 15, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Crawford, Franklin, Gilman, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Howland, Lloyd, Mathewson, Moore, Parker, Pickering, Reed, Sumter, and Turner.

NAYS—Messrs. Bradley, Condit, Gaillard, Giles, Gregg, Kitchell, Milledge, Mitchell, Pope, Robinson, Smith of New York, Smith of Tennessee, Thruston, Tiffin, and White.

On motion, by Mr. THRUSTON, the clause for finishing the road on the south side of the President's square, and gravelling the same, with a bridge across the Tiber, on the north side of Pennsylvania avenue, to accommodate foot passengers,—thousand dollars," was amended, by inserting the words "of stone and brick," after the word "bridge;" and on motion, by Mr. REED, to strike out the whole clause as amended, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 16, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Crawford, Franklin, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Howland, Kitchell, Lloyd, Mathewson, Moore, Parker, Reed, Sumter, Tiffin, and Turner.

NAYS—Messrs. Bradley, Condit, Gaillard, Giles, Gilman, Gregg, Milledge, Mitchell, Pope, Robinson, Smith of New York, Smith of Tennessee, Thruston, and White.

On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

The bill to authorize the Marine Insurance Company of Alexandria to alter their style and firm, and to insure against loss by fire, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and the President having reported the bill to the House without amendment, on the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. TIFFIN, from the committee, reported the amendment to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Augustin Serry," correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time as amended, and passed.

Mr. WHITE, from the committee to whom was referred the bill entitled "An act authorizing the proprietors of squares and lots in the City of Washington to have the same subdivided and admitted to record," reported it without amendment.

Ordered, That this bill pass to a third reading. The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I communicate, for the information of Congress, the report of the Director of the Mint, of the operations of that establishment during the last year.

TH. JEFFERSON.

JANUARY 5, 1809.

The Message and communications were read and ordered to lie for consideration.

FRIDAY, January 6.

RETURN JONATHAN MEIGS, JUN., appointed a Senator by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of JOHN SMITH, and, also, for six years ensuing the third day of March next, attended, and produced his credentials, which were read; and the oath prescribed by law was administered to him.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed the bill, entitled "An act to enforce and make more effectual an act, entitled 'An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several acts supplementary thereto,'" with amendments, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The amendments were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Mr. TIFFIN, from the committee, reported the bill making further appropriation towards completing the two wings of the Capitol at the City of Washington, and for other purposes; also, the bill to authorize the Marine Insurance Company of Alexandria to alter their style and firm, and to insure against loss by fire, correctly engrossed.

Mr. GILES presented the petition of Richard Bland Lee, stating the damages that he hath sustained from the troops of the United States when stationed at Harper's Ferry, and otherwise, and praying immediate and adequate redress; and the petition was read, and referred to Messrs. GILES, FRANKLIN, and MITCHELL, to consider and report thereon.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I now lay before Congress a statement of the works of defence which it has been thought necessary to provide in the first instance for the security of our seaport towns and harbors, and of the progress towards their completion. Their extent has been adapted to the scale of the appropriation, and to the circumstances of the several places.

The works undertaken at New York are calculated to annoy and endanger any naval force which shall enter the harbor, and still more, one which should attempt to lie before the city. To prevent altogether the entrance of large vessels, a line of blocks across the harbor has been contemplated, and would, as is believed, with the auxiliary means already provided, render that city safe against naval enterprise. The expense, as well as the importance of the work, render it a subject proper for the special consideration of Congress.

At New Orleans, two separate systems of defence are necessary, the one for the river, the other for the lake, which at present can give no aid to one another. The canal now leading from the lake if continued into the river, would enable the armed vessels in both stations to unite, and to meet in conjunction an attack from either side. Half the aggregate force would then have the same effect as the whole; or the same force double the effect of what either can now have. It would also enable the vessels stationed in the lake, when attacked by superior force, to retire to a safer position in the river. The same considerations of expense and importance render this also a question for the special decision of Congress.

TH. JEFFERSON.

JANUARY 6. 1809.

Accompanying the message is a detailed report of the Secretary of War, which shows that much has been done during the past year towards the defence of our ports and harbors.

The following are the sums expended in the several States:

New Orleans	- - - - -	$80,373
Georgia, South and North Carolina	- - - - -	204,289
Virginia and Maryland	- - - - -	111,432
Delaware, Pennsylvania, and N. Jersey	- - - - -	5,000
New York	- - - - -	379,133
Connecticut and Rhode Island	- - - - -	11,000
Massachusetts and New Hampshire	- - - - -	223,475
		1,014,702

The Message and Report were referred to Messrs. GILES, MITCHILL, SUMTER, ANDERSON, and MILLEDGE.

The bill making further appropriation towards completing the two wings of the Capitol at the City of Washington, and for other purposes, was read the third time, and passed.

The bill to authorize the Marine Insurance Company of Alexandria to alter their style and firm, and to insure against loss by fire, was read the third time, and passed.

The bill entitled "An act authorizing the proprietors of squares and lots in the City of Washington to have the same subdivided and admitted to record," was read the third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the 4th instant:

"That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate all the official as well as informal correspondence between Mr. Rose, the late British Minister to the United States, and the Secretary of State, or any other officer of the Government, which has not already been communicated to Congress."

And a motion was made, by Mr. PICKERING, to insert the following as a preamble to the resolution:

"It having been stated to the Senate, by a member in his place, that besides the formal negotiations with the British Government, relative to the attack made on the United States' frigate Chesapeake, exhibited in the documents communicated to Congress during their last session, by the President of the United States, there had been certain informal overtures upon the same subject, between the British Minister, Mr. Rose, or some person authorized by him, and some person or persons on the part of our Government, which overtures and their result ought, according to the opinion expressed by the said member, to be made known to the people of the United States."

And on motion, by Mr. PICKERING, to amend the said preamble, by inserting, after the word "place," the words "that he had reason to believe:" it was determined in the negative. And, on the question to agree to the preamble, it was determined in the negative—yeas 5, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Goodrich, Hillhouse, Lloyd, Pickering, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bradley, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Gaillard, Giles, Gilman, Gregg, Kitchel, Mathewson, Meigs, Milledge, Moore, Parker, Pope, Reed, Robinson, Smith of New York, Smith of Tennessee, Sumter, Thruston, Tiffin, and Turner.

And, on the question to agree to the original motion, it was determined in the negative—yeas 7, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Gilman, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Lloyd, Pickering, Reed, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bradley, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Gaillard, Giles, Gregg, Kitchel, Mathewson, Meigs, Milledge, Moore, Parker, Pope, Robinson, Smith of New York, Smith of Tennessee, Sumter, Thruston, Tiffin, and Turner.

On motion, by Mr. WHITE, that the bill, entitled "An act to enforce and make more effectual an act, entitled 'An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several acts supplementary thereto,'" be printed for the use of the Senate, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. THRUSTON reported from the committee, that they had this day laid before the President of the United States the enrolled bill, entitled "An act authorizing the President of the United States to employ an additional number of revenue cutters;" also, the enrolled bill, entitled "An act authorizing the payment of certain pensions by the Secretary of War, at the seat of Government."

SATURDAY, JANUARY 7.

ENFORCING THE EMBARGO.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act to enforce and make more effectual an act, entitled 'An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States,' and the several acts supplementary thereto;" and agreed to several amendments.

On motion, by Mr. LLOYD, to amend the amendment to seventh section, after the word defendant, by inserting the words "provided it be practicable to produce them, of which practicability the court before whom the cause is pending shall judge and determine:" it was determined in the negative—yeas 10, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Gilman, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Lloyd, Mathewson, Parker, Pickering, Reed, Sumter and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bradley, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Gaillard, Giles, Gregg, Howland, Kitchel, Meigs, Milledge, Moore, Pope, Robinson, Smith of New York, Smith of Tennessee, Thruston, Tiffin, and Turner.

On motion, by Mr. HILLHOUSE, to amend the second amendment to the tenth section, after the word "court," by insertion of these words: "provided nothing herein contained shall be construed to deprive the party aggrieved of his right of trial according to the rules of common law, as practised in the State where the parties reside," it was determined in the negative—yeas 7, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Gilman, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Lloyd, Pickering, Reed, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bradley, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Gaillard, Giles, Gregg, Howland, Kitchel, Mathewson, Meigs, Milledge, Mitchill, Moore, Pope, Robinson, Smith of New York, Smith of Tennessee, Sumter, Thruston, Tiffin, and Turner.

On motion to concur in the amendment, as follows: after the word "defence," at the end of the section, add:

"And any person aggrieved by the acts of any collector, in either of the cases aforesaid, may file his petition before the district court of the district wherein the collector resides, stating the facts of his case, and, thereupon, after due notice given to the district attorney and the collector, the said court may summarily hear and adjudge thereupon as law and justice may require, and the judgment of the said court, and the reason and facts whereon it is grounded, shall be filed among the records of said court; and if restoration of the property detained or taken in custody, or permission to load as aforesaid shall be decreed, it shall be upon the parties giving such bond with sureties, as is or shall be required to be taken in similar cases by the collector, and not otherwise; but, if the said court shall adjudge against such petition, the collector shall be entitled to treble costs, which shall be taxed for him, and execution awarded accordingly by the court."

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 23, nays 7, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bradley, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Gaillard, Giles, Gregg, Howland, Kitchel, Mathewson, Meigs, Milledge, Mitchill, Moore, Pope, Robinson, Smith of New York, Smith of Tennessee, Sumter, Thruston, Tiffin, and Turner.

NAYS—Messrs. Gilman, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Lloyd Pickering, Reed, and White.

On motion, by Mr. WHITE, to postpone the further consideration of the bill and the amendments to the first Monday in November next, it was determined in the negative—yeas 7, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Gilman, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Lloyd, Pickering, Reed, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bradley, Condit, Franklin, Gaillard, Giles, Gregg, Howland, Kitchel, Mathewson, Meigs, Milledge, Mitchill, Moore, Pope, Robinson, Smith of New York, Smith of Tennessee, Sumter, Thruston, Tiffin, and Turner.

Mr. REED moved to strike out "Secretary of the Treasury," in the 13th section, for the purpose of inserting "President of the United States." He supported the motion with a few pertinent remarks, which were not replied to.

When the vote was about to be taken, Mr. WHITE rose, and observed—

Mr. President, I have no hope of the present amendment succeeding, and, indeed, I distinctly perceive it is not the intention of the majority to vary the bill in any respect from the form in which it is now presented to us. In this, sir, perhaps, they may be right, for I view the bill myself as so vitally poisonous, so radically corrupt, that I do not believe it is amendable. It is under this solemn impression, I confess, more from a sense of duty than a hope of success, that I now arise to make one other last effort to ward off, if possible, this bold and deadly charge upon the Constitution and liberties of this country. For the purpose, therefore, of obtaining another vote of the Senate upon the bill itself, as well as the amendments, I now move you, that the further consideration of the subject be postponed till the first Monday in December next. I thank God that it is at least accorded to one branch of the Legislature to pass upon this bill in the day time, and to this I must attribute the sudden dumbness that seems to have fallen upon its advocates here—their refusal, not only to discuss, but their evident reluctance even to hear any discussion on this subject.

Upon the motion which I have submitted, I consider the bill, as well as the amendments from the other House, open to debate. It was not, however, with this view that I made the motion. I have no wish to talk for the sake of being heard, or to occupy the time of the Senate without, at least, the hope of attaining some object. I had not intended to have said a word on this subject, nor will I now enter upon the merits of the bill. My objections lay to every part of it. Yet, sir, I could not have patience to examine the minute details of a measure in the prominent points of which I see, concealed, a blow directed at the vital parts of everything dear to a freeman. Pass this bill, and the liberties of your country are prostrated. The civil authority is subjected to the military. Not only the property, but the personal liberty, nay, the life of every man in the community, is at the mercy of the Executive; and, what is worse, at the mercy of any instrument he may authorize to call out the military, under the pretence of executing the embargo laws. I see, in this bill, several palpable and glaring violations of the Constitution of the United States, which I am sworn to support. I consider it as laying the whole country under military law—as nothing less than a declaration of war, on the part of the Government, against our own citizens. And has it come to this, sir? For the purpose of executing the embargo, are we ready to sacrifice, or, at least, to hazard, everything dear and valuable? Let me beg gentlemen, once more, to read the eleventh section of this bill. It enacts, that—

“It shall be lawful for the President of the United States, or such other person as he shall have empowered for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces, or militia of the United States, or of the Territories thereof, as may be judged necessary, in conformity with the provisions of this, and other acts respecting the embargo, for the purpose of preventing the illegal departure of any ship or vessel, or of detaining, taking possession of, and keeping in custody, any ship or vessel, or, of taking into custody and guarding, any specie, or articles of domestic growth, produce, or manufacture; and, also, for the purpose of preventing and suppressing any armed or riotous assemblage of persons resisting the custom-house officers in the exercise of their duties, or in any manner opposing the execution of the laws laying an embargo, or otherwise violating, or assisting and abetting violations of the same.”

I am aware, sir, that it may be said we have, in our statute books, a precedent for this section, and that the fifth section, I think, (for I have no book before me,) of a law further to preserve peace within the ports and harbors of the United States, may be resorted to in justification of it. But, it is a precedent only in verbiage. The cases are essentially different. The authority there given to the President, was for the purpose of preserving peace within our own waters, and could be exercised only against an offending vessel of war of a foreign nation. Is that the present case? Is it like it? No, sir. By this section, you delegate to the President, and to his irresponsible agents, uncontrolled authority over all the naval and military forces of the United States now in service and about to be raised; not, give me leave to say, for the purpose of preserving peace—not to be exercised against a foreign enemy, but, to be turned against the bosoms of your own citizens. Will freemen submit to this? Let me admit that the act will not be executed in this way—that even this inordinate and dangerous power may be safely confided to our present Executive—yet, I shudder at the precedent. It is in the days of political calms, and of blind confidence in a favorite, that we are in danger of establishing precedents that, in more stormy times, may be resorted to by ambitious and desperate men, to subvert the Constitution and liberties of our country. And I contend, sir, that, whenever your Executive chair shall be filled by a bold and ambitious man, supported by a blind and dominant party in the two Houses of Congress, and such a man shall wish to play the tyrant, if he first procures a sufficient army to be provided, under any pretences, and can then get delegated to him, by Congress, the powers given in this eleventh section of the bill, his object is accomplished. Your Constitution and your liberties are at an end. He will establish a southern, a western, an eastern, or any other dynasty he pleases, in this country. And this bill will then be shown to Congress. They will then be told that no danger is to be apprehended from such a grant of power to a President, because similar powers had heretofore been given and no injury had resulted to the country.

I arose, sir, with a promise not to occupy the time of the Senate, and it was then, indeed, my only object to move a postponement of the bill. I have, therefore, already said much more than I intended; but, while I am up, I must be permitted to notice for a moment the thirteenth section, which is not an original part of the bill, but has been sent to us by the House of Representatives. This section authorizes the hiring of thirty vessels, not exceeding an hundred and thirty tons each, to be armed and equipped for sea, for the purpose of executing the embargo laws. Sir, the man must be blind who cannot see through this. It savors so strongly of the source from whence it came that it is impossible to mistake it for a moment. It has the very fish-oil about it. It is a Marblehead trick. This is a rider to the famous Marblehead patriotic resolutions, read to us some days since by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GILES.) These Marblehead patriots, not being permitted, during the embargo, to export their fish, for the want of some other capital, are about to commence trade upon their patriotism, and have sent that to market. It seems they not only approve of the embargo, but, with much patriotic modesty, recommend to the Government to hire them and their hundred-and-thirty-ton vessels to execute it. It is not impossible that this thirteenth section was considered and approved of by the same meeting that adopted the resolutions, and is now intended as a Governmental premium to buy patriots with. Hire these Marblehead men, sir; arm their vessels, and tell one of them to victual his vessel for a three, or six months' cruise upon our coast, and to go to sea; my word for it, the next news you have of your patriot, he is in the West Indies, exchanging the pork and flour of the United States for coffee and sugar for himself. This was the object of the resolutions. This is the concealed object of the section. It is intended to disgrace the Government by making it an accessory to the violation of its own laws. But, sir, I have another objection to this section. These thirty vessels, in addition to the twelve revenue cutters we have lately provided, and those now in service, will place under the exclusive direction, not of the President of the United States, but of a subordinate officer, the Secretary of the Treasury, more than fifty vessels of war. A larger number than has ever been intrusted to the control of the Government itself. And who are to appoint these officers? The President and this Senate? No, sir; the Secretary of the Treasury. He is to be the Marblehead President. We all know how difficult it is to restrain even the young officers commanding our gunboats, selected and appointed as they are by the President and Senate, from committing acts of violence and outrage upon our citizens. And what control do you expect the Secretary of the Treasury will be able to assume over these Marblehead marauders if once they are turned loose upon the little coasting commerce that yet remains to our citizens? Sir, I had rather see so many French or British picaroons upon the coast, because they would not be permitted to rob with impunity.

Mr. HILLHOUSE.—I shall not trespass on the patience of the Senate by repeating any arguments already submitted to their consideration. But it will be remembered that the debate on passing the bill as it went from the Senate, was protracted to a late hour, when both speakers and hearers were much fatigued, and it became impossible to consider every point. I will therefore now take the liberty of noticing the precedents upon which the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) so confidently relies to justify the principles of this bill.

The first is, that clause in one of the embargo acts which gives to the President of the United States a discretionary power to suspend the embargo, "in whole or in part," which was indeed an extraordinary power, and nothing short of committing into his hands the power of involving the country in war. The gentleman ought further to have stated, that it was opposed at the time on that ground, and that the votes of gentlemen opposed to this bill are recorded on the journals against it. Who gave to the Executive that extraordinary power? It was the like overwhelming majority that laid the embargo, and would now enforce it by the arbitrary provisions contained in this bill. It is indeed extraordinary, that to justify an arbitrary and unwarrantable grant of power, gentlemen should quote a precedent, of a like nature, of their own making.

An act of March 3d, 1807, authorizing the President of the United States to use military force to remove from public lands, persons attempting to make settlements thereon, is also relied on to justify the principles of this bill; but the gentleman from Virginia will find by the Journals of the Senate, that an act making provision for carrying into execution an Indian treaty, was, at a previous session rejected, because it contained a like arbitrary and unwarrantable provision. The act, as stated by that gentleman, was afterwards passed; not, however, without a strenuous opposition—the votes were 17 to 15, as appears by the yeas and nays.* My vote was against that act, as I hope it will be against every act containing like arbitrary and oppressive provisions. The gentlemen from Virginia advocated and voted for that act, as he has done for others containing grants of extraordinary power to the Executive. Formerly that gentleman's voice was one of the loudest, and I think I have heard none louder, in proclaiming his love and adoration for the people; but now that he is got into the saddle, he, like many others who have acquired power in the same way, is for riding on the necks of the people, and for exercising power in an arbitrary and oppressive manner.

I shall next notice the law of March 31, 1805, and a law containing a like provision, passed June 4th, 1794. As the gentleman from Virginia seems to attach some importance to his precedent, from the circumstance of my having in some instances voted for them, I do not hesitate to declare that I voted for the law of 1805, and it is probable I did also for that of 1794; as I could have no objection to a law which was necessary to preserve peace, and prevent insults to our Government, or the violation of the laws within our ports and harbors, and on waters within our jurisdiction, by foreign armed ships, or vessels fitting out with hostile views against any Power with which we were in amity. The military force authorized by those laws would in no instance be employed on the land, and against our own citizens, except to prevent the carrying on a military expedition or enterprise against such foreign Power. So cautious were the administrators of the General Government of calling in the aid of the military to enforce the laws, that no express power was given to the President of the United States by any act of Congress, to employ any part of the standing army or naval force, until, under the present Administration, the law mentioned by the gentleman from Virginia, of March 3d, 1807, in my opinion a very proper law, was passed, giving the President the power, in all cases where he might call forth the militia for the purpose of suppressing insurrections, or of causing the laws to be executed, to employ for the same purpose, such part of the land and naval force of the United States, as he may judge necessary, "having first observed all the prerequisites of the law in that respect." In the two last lines of this law are a few words of great significance and import—"having first observed the prerequisites of the law." The military is not to take the lead, as in the present bill, but is to come in aid of, and be subordinate to the civil power. That it may appear on our Journals that no effort consistent with the rules of the Senate has been omitted to prevent the passage of this fatal bill, I am glad the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. WHITE), has brought forward his motion for a postponement of the bill to the first Monday of December next. The amendments from the House of Representatives have not in the least reconciled me to the bill—one only is of any value. That offered to the seventh section is a mockery of justice, an insult to the understandings of the American people. By the original bill, as it passed the Senate, "neither capture, distress, nor any other accident whatever, shall be pleaded or given in evidence." The amendment proposes to add:

"Unless such capture shall be expressly proved to have been hostile, and such distress or accident occasioned by no negligence or deviation; nor unless such vessel shall have been, from the commencement of the voyage, wholly navigated by a master, mate or mates, mariners, and crew, all whom shall be citizens of the United States; nor unless such mate or mates, mariners and crew, shall all, if living, and the proof of their death shall lie on the defendant, be produced on the trial, and sworn as competent witnesses; nor unless such master, mate or mates, mariners and crew, shall have signed a shipping paper in due form of law, and a copy thereof, designating specially the master, mate or mates, mariners and crew, and their permanent places of residence, shall have been lodged with the collector of the port, to whom the bond aforesaid shall have been given before the commencement of the voyage; and subscribed and sworn to by the master before such collector; and any master who shall falsely, wilfully, and corruptly swear as to the facts contained in such copy, shall, on conviction, suffer the pains and penalties of perjury."

The impracticability and absurdity of this amendment will be best exemplified by a plain case. A vessel bound from Baltimore to Charleston, South Carolina, say the regular packet, takes on board flour and other articles, to the value, including vessel, of twenty thousand dollars, and twenty members of Congress, who must be presumed to be men of character. On the passage, in a storm, to save the vessel, and the lives of the passengers, part of the cargo is thrown overboard. On the arrival at Charleston every remaining article is fairly landed, and a certificate obtained, which with the testimony of those twenty members, to prove that every article not contained in the certificate was in fact thrown into the sea, are offered to exonerate the bondsmen from the penalty of the bond, which cannot be less than one hundred and twenty thousand dollars. By this amendment the evidence cannot be admitted; but judgment must be rendered for the whole amount of the bond; unless among other conditions, difficult and embarrassing, "the mate or mates, mariners and crew, shall all, if living, and the proof of their deaths shall be on the defendant, be produced on the trial, and sworn as competent witnesses." It is hardly a supposable case, that the bondsmen residing in Baltimore, where the suit must be commenced, should after the lapse of two months, before which no suit can be brought, be able to bring from Charleston, and to court, the mate or mates, and every one of the mariners and crew: some one may have been taken out on the passage by an armed vessel of a foreign nation; or after the arrival at Charleston, it would be marvellous indeed, if some one or more of the crew had not within two months shipped on board some other vessel, and gone to parts unknown to the bondsmen. In the bill there is no provision to enable the master or bondsmen to hold the mate, mariners and crew in custody until a trial can be had, they cannot even summon them until a suit is commenced. In case of a hostile capture, most of the mariners and crew would be carried away to a foreign country, and it would be impossible for the bondsmen to have them in court.

Having offered my sentiments on the various amendments from the House of Representatives, and the amendments offered in the Senate to those amendments as they were severally under consideration, I shall now close with a few remarks on the proposed new section for hiring and employing thirty vessels, not exceeding one hundred and thirty tons each, for enforcing the laws of the United States on the seacoast, and to be employed under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. The Constitution has placed the military and naval force of the United States under the direction of the President, who is to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed." This section places thirty armed vessels, a naval force of no small import, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, for enforcing the laws. Even the revenue cutters, which from the circumstance of their commanders being deemed and by law declared to be officers of the customs, fall under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, under whose superintendence the law has placed the collection of the revenue; even those revenue cutters, when otherwise employed than in the collection of the revenue, are not permitted to remain under the direction of the Secretary; who of all the officers of Government is the most improper to have the direction of the military and naval force to be employed in executing the embargo; for to him alone is confided the power of mitigating the rigor of the several acts, and of remitting penalties and forfeitures. There is a manifest impropriety in making the same person both judge and executioner. The gentleman from Virginia, says we have heretofore reproached the Administration with the want of energy; and complained of them for relying on proclamations, paper resolutions, and legislative acts; and now that something is proposed that has in it the appearance of energy, we are equally clamorous in heaping reproach upon them. Sir, it is the inversion of the proper order of things of which we complain. The Administration and their friends have been making proclamations, paper resolutions, and legislative acts, to be aimed at foreign nations, against whom they are unavailing; whereas, in regard to our own citizens, aided by the marshal and posse comitatus, they might be effectual. And to complete the inversion, the same Administration and their friends have unnecessarily, and in my apprehension, wantonly directed against our own citizens, the bayonet, the military and naval force of our country, which might be efficient against foreign aggressions. It is for adopting this strange, this unaccountable policy we are dissatisfied.

I have opposed the bill in every stage of its progress, and used every exertion in my power to prevent its passage. I shall now only ask that the question may be taken by yeas and nays, that I may once more record my name on the journals against a measure, which, if acquiesced in, may prove fatal to the liberties of my country.

The question was now taken on Mr. REED's amendment, and determined in the negative—yeas 10, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Gilman, Goodrich, Gregg, Hillhouse, Lloyd, Mathewson, Meigs, Pickering, Reed, and White.

On the question to agree to the amendment proposing a new section, as follows:

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized to hire, arm, and employ, thirty vessels, not exceeding in tonnage one hundred and thirty tons each, belonging to citizens of the United States, and so many seamen as shall be necessary to man the same for immediate service, in enforcing the laws of the United States on the seacoast thereof, and to dismiss the same from service whenever he shall deem the same expedient. Provided, however, That such hiring, arming, and employment, shall not be for a term exceeding one year; and the said ships or vessels, when so hired and armed, shall be employed under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury."

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 17, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bradley, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Giles, Howland, Kitchel, Milledge, Mitchell, Moore, Pope, Robinson, Smith of New York, Smith of Tennessee, Tiffin, and Turner.

On the question to agree to the amendment proposing a new section, as follows:

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That the powers given to the President of the United States, by the seventh section of the act of March the twelfth, one thousand eight hundred and eight, to grant permission to citizens having property of value in places without the jurisdiction of the United States, to despatch vessels for the same, shall henceforth cease."

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 26, nays 4, as follows:

MESSRS. Anderson, Bradley, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Gaillard, Giles, Gilman, Gregg, Howland, Kitchel, Mathewson, Meigs, Milledge, Mitchell, Moore, Pope, Reed, Robinson, Smith of New York, Smith of Tennessee, Sumter, Thruston, Tiffin, Turner, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Goodrich, Hillhouse, Lloyd, and Pickering.

So it was Resolved, That the Senate concur in all the amendments to the bill last mentioned.

MONDAY, January 9.

Mr. MILLEDGE, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of William Brown, late an officer in the Revolutionary army, made report. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition.

TUESDAY, January 10.

JAMES A. BAYARD, from the State of Delaware, attended.

Mr. GILES presented the petition of the President and Directors of the Bank of Potomac, praying an act of incorporation, with such privileges as may appear reasonable, to commence and take effect from and after the expiration of the term of the charter of the Bank of the United States, for reasons mentioned in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, to consider and report thereon.

The PRESIDENT communicated the petition of Ebenezer S. Platt, now of Philadelphia, stating his services and sufferings during the Revolutionary war; and that, in consideration thereof, Congress, in August 1777, voted him one hundred guineas, which sum he hath never received. Being now, in his old age, through misfortune reduced to indigent circumstances, he prays that Congress will take his case into consideration, and grant him such relief as his services and sufferings may have merited; and the petition was read, and referred to Messrs. MILLEDGE, FRANKLIN, and BRADLEY, to consider and report thereon.

On motion by Mr. GILES, it was agreed that two members be added to the committee on the Message of the President of the United States, of the 6th instant, on the subject of fortifications; and Messrs. LLOYD and GILMAN were appointed.

Mr. MITCHELL presented the petition of Ebenezer Stevens and others, merchants, of the city of New York, stating, that they have imported from the East Indies large quantities of articles not intended for home consumption, and praying that provision may be made by law, whereby the petitioners may be permitted to re-export their aforesaid merchandise within a reasonable time after the embargo shall be raised, with the benefit of such drawback as has been in such cases heretofore allowed, for reasons mentioned in the petition; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the committee appointed on the 11th of November last, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill supplementary to an act, entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing a uniform militia throughout the United States;" and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

WEDNESDAY, January 11.

The bill supplementary to an act, entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing a uniform militia throughout the United States," was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and the PRESIDENT reported it to the House amended.

On motion, by Mr. HILLHOUSE, to strike out the following words from the second section of the bill, "to be painted and superscribed with such motto or device as the President may direct;" it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 12, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Crawford, Franklin, Gilman, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Howland, Lloyd, Mathewson, Parker, Reed, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bradley, Condit, Gaillard, Gregg, Meigs, Milledge, Mitchell, Pope, Smith of Maryland, Sumter, and Turner.

SENATE.

The votes being equally divided, the PRESIDENT determined the question in the affirmative. On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to authorize the transportation of certain documents, by mail, free of postage," in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last brought up for concurrence was read; and on the question, Shall this bill be read a second time? it was determined in the negative.

Mr. BRADLEY gave notice that he should, to-morrow, ask leave to bring in a bill making further provision for a corps of engineers.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 12.

On motion, by Mr. MITCHILL, that the Senate do reconsider their vote of yesterday on the second reading of the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the transportation of certain documents, by mail, free of postage," it was determined in the negative—yeas 12, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Crawford, Kitchel, Meigs, Mitchill, Parker, Reed, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Sumter, Tiffin, Turner, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bayard, Bradley, Condit, Franklin, Gaillard, Gilman, Gregg, Mathewson, Milledge, Moore, Smith of Tennessee, and Thruston.

Mr. TIFFIN, from the committee, reported the bill supplementary to an act, entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the national defence by establishing a uniform militia throughout the United States," correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

Agreeably to notice given yesterday, Mr. BRADLEY asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill making further provision for the corps of engineers; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 13.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I now render to Congress the account of the fund established for defraying the contingent expenses of Government for the year 1808. Of the $20,000 appropriated for that purpose, $2,000 were deposited in the hands of the Attorney General of the United States, to pay expenses incident to the prosecution of Aaron Burr and his accomplices, for treasons and misdemeanors alleged to have been committed by them; $990 were paid to the order of Governor Williams on the same account; the balance, of $17,010, remains in the Treasury unexpended.

TH. JEFFERSON.

JANUARY 12, 1809.

The Message was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Mr. MITCHILL presented two memorials from 10th CON. 2d Sess.—11 the surviving officers of the New York and Connecticut lines in the Revolutionary army, stating the losses they have sustained by the commutation of half pay, which they were induced to receive; and praying remuneration, for reasons mentioned in the memorials; which were read, and referred to the committee appointed on the 12th of December last, to consider and report upon similar memorials.

The bill making further provision for the corps of engineers was read the second time, and made the order of the day for Monday next.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee, gave notice that he should to-morrow ask leave to bring in a bill supplementary to the act to amend an act establishing circuit courts, and abridging the jurisdiction of the district courts of the district of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio.

MONDAY, JANUARY 16.

The credentials of MICHAEL LEIB, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Samuel Maclay, were read, and ordered to lie on file.

The PRESIDENT communicated the general account of the Treasurer of the United States, from October 1, 1807, to October 1, 1808; as, also, the accounts of the War and Navy Departments for the same period; together with the reports of the accounting officers of the Treasury thereon; which were read for consideration.

Mr. MITCHILL, from the committee appointed on the 3d instant, "to inquire whether any and what provisions ought to be made, at this time, for the relief of sick and disabled seamen of the United States," asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the relief of sick, disabled, and distressed seamen; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill making further provision for the corps of engineers.

On motion, by Mr. MITCHILL, to strike out, after the word "repealed," to the end of the bill, as follows:

"And thereafter the said corps of engineers, constituting the Military Academy, shall be removed, under the direction of the President of the United States, from West Point, and stationed at Washington, in the District of Columbia:"

It was determined in the negative—yeas 12, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Gilman, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Howland, Kitchel, Mathewson, Mitchell, Parker, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, and Turner.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bayard, Bradley, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Gaillard, Grogg, Meigs, Milledge, Moore, Pope, Smith of Tennessee, Sumter, Thruston, and White.

On motion, by Mr. BRADLEY, the bill was referred to a select committee; and Messrs. BRADLEY, MITCHILL, and SMITH of Maryland, were appointed the committee.

Mr. MITCHILL, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 30th of December last, the Message of the President of the United States of that date, respecting a tribe of Alabama Indians, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the relief of certain Alabama Indians; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That the President be requested to direct the proper officers to report to this House the measures which have been adopted to carry into execution the act of Congress, of 21st February, 1806, appropriating two millions of dollars for defraying any extraordinary expenses attending the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations; particularly whether the said two millions of dollars, or any portion thereof, was sent in specie, or by bills of exchange, to either France, Spain, Holland, or any other country, for the purpose of carrying into execution the said act; and, also, to what object the sums so remitted have been applied, or were authorized or intended to be applied.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act establishing circuit courts, and abridging the jurisdiction of the district courts of the districts of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio;'" and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of sick, disabled, and distressed seamen," in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last brought up for concurrence was read, and passed to the second reading.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 17.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House disagree to the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the appointment and employment of an additional number of navy officers, seamen, and marines."

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made yesterday; and

Resolved, That the President be requested to direct the proper officers to report to the House the measures which have been adopted to carry into execution the act of Congress of 21st February, 1806, appropriating two millions of dollars for defraying any extraordinary expenses attending the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations; particularly whether the said two millions of dollars, or any portion thereof, was sent in specie, or by bills of exchange, to either France, Spain, Holland, or any other country, for the purpose of carrying into execution the said act; and, also, to what object the sums so remitted have been applied, or were authorized or intended to be applied.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay this resolution before the President of the United States.

The bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act establishing circuit courts and abridging the jurisdiction of the district courts of the districts of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio,'" was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. ANDERSON, SMITH of Tennessee, and CRAWFORD, to consider and report thereon.

The following Message was received from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I communicate to Congress certain letters which passed between the British Secretary of State, Mr. Canning, and Mr. Pinkney, our Minister Plenipotentiary at London. When the documents concerning the relations between the United States and Great Britain were laid before Congress, at the commencement of the session, the answer of Mr. Pinkney to the letter of Mr. Canning had not been received, and a communication of the letter alone would have accorded neither with propriety nor with the wishes of Mr. Pinkney. When that answer afterwards arrived, it was considered that, as what had passed in conversation had been superseded by the written and formal correspondence on the subject, the variance in the statement of what had verbally passed was not of sufficient importance to be made the matter of a distinct and special communication. The letter of Mr. Canning, however, having lately appeared in print, unaccompanied by that of Mr. Pinkney, in reply, and having a tendency to make impressions not warranted by the statements of Mr. Pinkney, it has become proper that the whole should be brought into public view.

TH. JEFFERSON.

JANUARY 17, 1809.

The Message and communications were read, and one thousand copies thereof ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

The bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act for the relief of sick, disabled, and distressed seamen," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. ANDERSON, MITCHILL, and BRADLEY, to consider and report thereon.

Ordered, That the bill reported by a committee of the Senate for the relief of sick, disabled, and distressed seamen, it having been read the second time, be referred to the same committee.

The bill for the relief of certain Alabama Indians was read the second time, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the appointment and employment of an additional number of navy officers, seamen, and marines," and on motion, by Mr. ANDERSON, that the Senate do recede from their first amendment, in the words following:

SEC. 1. After the word "assembled," insert as follows: "That there be fitted out, officered, manned, and employed, as soon as may be, all the frigates and other armed vessels of the United States, and gunboats. That the President of the United States be authorized and empowered to cause the frigates and armed vessels, so soon as they can be prepared for actual service, respectively, to be stationed at such ports and places on the seacoast, as he may deem most expedient, or to cruise on any part of the coast of the United States, or territories thereof."

It was determined in the negative—yeas 7, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Condit, Crawford, Kitchel, Sumter, Tiffin, and Turner.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bradley, Gaillard, Giles, Gilman, Goodrich, Gregg, Hillhouse, Howland, Lloyd, Mathewson, Meigs, Milledge, Mitchell, Moore, Parker, Pickering, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Smith of Tennessee, Thruston, and White.

On motion, by Mr. BRADLEY,

Resolved, That the Senate do insist on all their amendments to the bill last mentioned, and ask a conference thereon.

And Messrs. BRADLEY, GILES, and HILLHOUSE, were appointed the managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL presented the memorial of William Hardy, an officer in the Revolutionary war, stating his services and sufferings, and praying relief.

Ordered, That it be referred to Messrs. MITCHELL, CONDIT, and GILMAN, to consider and report thereon.

WEDNESDAY, January 18.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the second reading of the bill for the relief of certain Alabama Indians; and the President having reported it to the House without amendment, on the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

THURSDAY, January 19.

MICHAEL LEIB, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of the honorable Samuel Maclay, attended, and the oath prescribed by law was administered to him.

Mr. TIFFIN presented sundry petitions from purchasers of public lands in the State of Ohio, stating "that, from the various incidents to which new settlers are liable, and more especially from the great uncertainty of commanding cash for produce at the present time, they will not be able to make up the final payments for their lands at the time they will respectively become due," and praying that Congress will "so modify the present land laws as will guard them from the embarrassments and ruin they otherwise apprehend may fall upon them;" and the petitions were read, and referred to Messrs. TIFFIN, GREGG, and BRADLEY, to consider and report thereon.

The PRESIDENT communicated the report of the Postmaster General respecting the salaries allowed to the clerks in his office, in obedience to the act of Congress of 21st February, 1806; which was read for consideration.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House insist on their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the appointment and employment of an additional number of navy officers, seamen, and marines." They agree to the conference proposed by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and have appointed managers on their part. The House have passed a bill, entitled "An act for dividing the Indiana Territory into two separate governments;" also, a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Edmund Beaumont;" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The two bills last mentioned were read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. TIFFIN, from the committee, reported the bill for the relief of certain Alabama Indians, correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GILLES, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 6th instant, the Message of the President of the United States on the subject of fortifications, reported, in part, a bill making appropriations to complete the fortifications commenced for the security of the seaport towns and harbors of the United States, and to defray the expense of deepening, and extending to the river Mississippi, the canal of Carondelet; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The PRESIDENT communicated the representation of the inhabitants of Newry, in the county of Oxford, and Commonwealth of Massachusetts, on the mode in which Electors of President and Vice President have been appointed by the two Houses of the Legislature of that State, in Convention; contrary, as they state, to the usual and constitutional mode of legislation; and the representation was read.

FRIDAY, January 20.

The bill making appropriations to complete the fortifications commenced for the security of the seaport towns and harbors of the United States, and to defray the expense of deepening, and extending to the river Mississippi, the canal of Carondelet, was read the second time, and the further consideration of the bill was postponed to Monday next.

Mr. BRADLEY presented the petition of the Baptist Church of the City of Washington, signed by their committee, praying "an act of incorporation, upon such principles as may seem meet;" and the petition was read, and referred to Messrs. BRADLEY, KITCHEL, and TIFFIN, to consider and report thereon, by bill or otherwise.

Mr. TIFFIN, from the committee to whom were referred sundry petitions from purchasers of public lands in the State of Ohio, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to extend the time for making payment for the public lands of the United States; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Edmund Beaumont," was read the second time, and referred, together with the accompanying papers, to Messrs. HILLHOUSE, BRADLEY, and FRANKLIN, to consider and report thereon.

JANUARY, 1809.

The bill, entitled "An act for dividing the Indiana Territory into two separate governments," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. POPE, TIFFIN, and BRADLEY, the committee to whom were referred, on the 15th of November last, the resolutions passed by the House of Representatives of the Indiana Territory on the 11th of October last, and that Messrs. MEIGS and HILLHOUSE be added to the committee.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the committee to whom was referred the bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act establishing circuit courts and abridging the jurisdiction of the district courts of the districts of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio,'" reported amendments; which were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the committee to whom was referred the bill for the relief of sick, disabled, and distressed seamen, made a report. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the further consideration of the bill be postponed to the first Monday in December next.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the same committee, reported the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of sick, disabled, and distressed seamen," without amendment; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

On motion, by Mr. HILLHOUSE, to strike out the following words:

"And the same shall be refunded to the Treasury of the United States, out of such surplus as may accrue to the fund for the relief of sick and disabled seamen, at such times and in such manner as shall not defeat the general purpose for which such fund is established:"

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 11, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bayard, Bradley, Condit, Franklin, Gaillard, Giles, Goodrich, Gregg, Hillhouse, Howland, Mathewson, Meigs, Milledge, Pickering, Smith of New York, Sumter, Tiffin, Turner, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Crawford, Kitchel, Leib, Lloyd, Mitchell, Moore, Parker, Pope, Smith of Maryland, Smith of Tennessee, and Thruston.

On motion of Mr. POPE, to strike out the words "and distressed," after the word "disabled:" it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 18, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Condit, Franklin, Gaillard, Gregg, Howland, Kitchel, Leib, Mathewson, Milledge, Pickering, Pope, Smith of Maryland, Sumter, Thruston, Tiffin, Turner, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bradley, Crawford, Giles, Gilman, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Lloyd, Meigs, Mitchell, Moore, Parker, Smith of New York, and Smith of Tennessee.

On motion, by Mr. GILES, the further consideration of the bill was postponed to Monday next.

MONDAY, January 23.

Mr. HILLHOUSE, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Edmund Beamont," reported the bill without amendment; and the bill was passed to the third reading.

The bill to extend the time for making payments for the public lands of the United States, was read the second time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act, establishing circuit courts and abridging the jurisdiction of the district courts of the districts of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio,'" and the PRESIDENT having reported the bill to the House amended, on the question, Shall this bill be engrossed, and read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of sick, disabled, and distressed seamen."

On motion, by Mr. MITCHELL, the consideration thereof was further postponed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the second reading of the bill making appropriations to complete the fortifications commenced for the security of the seaport towns and harbors of the United States, and to defray the expense of deepening and extending to the river Mississippi the canal of Carondelet; and the PRESIDENT having reported the bill to the House without amendment, on the question, Shall this bill be engrossed, and read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

ADDITIONAL NAVAL FORCE.

Mr. BRADLEY, of the conferees from the Senate, on the disagreement between the two Houses, in relation to the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the appointment and employment of an additional number of navy officers, seamen, and marines," made the following report:

That they have met the conferees on the part of the House of Representatives, and have had a free conference on the subject of the disagreement between the two Houses, and regret that it has not been in their power to compromise the disagreement. They submit to the Senate certain propositions made by them to the conferees from the other House, as evidence of their earnest desire to have accommodated all differences, and a justification of their conduct to the nation; they subjoin the letter from the superintendent of the navy yard, in the absence of the Secretary of the Navy, that the state of the frigates might be fully known. They are compelled to say, they found no disposition on the part of the other conferees to depart in the least respect from the bill as passed by the House of Representatives, or in any manner to wish any accommodation, short of the Senate receding, in every instance, from their amendments. They therefore unanimously recommend to the Senate to adhere to their amendments.

Propositions, with the subjoined letter, communicated to the conferees on the part of the House of Representatives.

"The conferees from the Senate, on the disagreement between the two Houses, in relation to the amendments made by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the appointment of an additional number of navy officers, seamen, and marines," being sincerely desirous to accommodate all differences between the two Houses, do propose to the conferees from the House of Representatives, a middle course, which will impose little, if any, additional burdens on the nation; the four frigates being at present in a state of repair, as they are informed, can very soon be equipped for actual service; they presume, from the known liberality and spirit of accommodation, which has so uniformly marked the proceedings of both Houses of Congress, that they will readily concur therein, to wit:

"To amend the first amendment made by the Senate, to read as follows:

"That, in addition to the frigates now employed in actual service, there be fitted out, officered, and manned, as soon as may be, the four following frigates, to wit: the United States, Essex, John Adams, and President; and, moreover, the President of the United States is hereby authorized and empowered to equip, man, and employ, in actual service, so many of the other public armed vessels now laid up in ordinary, and gunboats, as, in his judgment, the public service may require; and to cause the frigates and other armed vessels, when prepared for actual service, respectively, to be stationed at such ports and places on the seacoast as he may deem most expedient, or to cruise on any part of the coast of the United States or Territories thereof, and"

And so modify the second amendment of the Senate, that, in lieu of the words "three hundred and fifty," insert only "three hundred."

And so modify the third amendment of the Senate, that, in lieu of "four thousand four hundred and forty-seven," insert the words, "three thousand six hundred."

And to recommend to the Senate, to recede from their two last amendments made to the second section of the bill.

And to amend the title to read,

Subjoined is a letter from Captain Tingey, superintendent of the navy yard, showing the state of the frigates.

NAVY YARD, WASHINGTON,
January 20, 1809.

SIR: I have the honor to state, in reply to your note of this morning, that the frigates United States, Essex, and John Adams, are now in as good order in their hulls as on the day they were launched, and can be rigged in a few weeks if so ordered, and suitable appropriations made.

The frigates "Congress and Adams" might also proceed to a station in the mouths of any of our bays or harbors, but I do not consider their hulls in a situation fit to bear the sea in heavy weather.

The frigates Constellation and New York, I consider as unfit to proceed from this yard, until they shall have had a thorough repair, and the remaining frigate, the President, is now progressing under a thorough repair, and may, I presume, be ready for sea in May next, with the number of carpenters now employed here.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

Ordered, That the report lie for consideration, and that it be printed for the use of the Senate.

And on motion, the Senate adjourned until to-morrow.

TUESDAY, January 24.

Mr. POPE, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for dividing the Indiana Territory into two separate governments," reported the bill without amendment.

On motion, by Mr. WHITE, on behalf of the committee to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on roads and canals, it was ordered that the memorial and petition of the President and Directors of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, be printed for the use of both Houses of Congress.

Mr. TIFFIN, from the committee, reported the bill making appropriations to complete the fortifications commenced for the security of the seaport towns and harbors of the United States, and to defray the expense of deepening and extending to the river Mississippi the canal of Carondelet, correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TIFFIN, from the committee, reported the bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act establishing circuit courts and abridging the jurisdiction of the district courts of the districts of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio,'" correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Edmund Beamont," was read the third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to extend the time for making payments for public lands of the United States; and the further consideration of the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the managers, on the part of the Senate, at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, on the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the appointment and employment of an additional number of navy officers, seamen, and marines," in the words following:

"That they have met the conferees, on the part of the House of Representatives, and have had a free conference on the subject of the disagreement between the two Houses, and regret that it has not been in their power to compromise the disagreement.

"They submit to the Senate certain propositions made by them to the conferees from the other House, as evidence of their earnest desire to have accommodated all differences, and a justification of their conduct to the nation; they subjoined the letter from the superintendent of the navy yard, in the absence of the Secretary of the Navy, that the state of the frigates might be fully known.

They therefore unanimously recommend to the Senate to adhere to their amendments."

On motion, to adhere to their amendments to the bill, agreeably to the report of the conferees, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 23, nays 10, as follows :

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bradley, Giles, Gilman, Goodrich, Gregg, Hillhouse, Howland, Leib, Lloyd, Mathewson, Meigs, Milledge, Mitchell, Moore, Parker, Pickering, Reed, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Smith of Tennessee, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Gailard, Kitchel, Pope, Sumter, Thruston, Tiffin, and Turner.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to alter the time for the next meeting of Congress," in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last mentioned was read, and passed to the second reading.

FOREIGN INTERCOURSE.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES :

To the Senate of the United States :

According to the resolution of the Senate, of the 17th instant, I now transmit them the information therein requested, respecting the execution of the act of Congress of February 24, 1806, appropriating two millions of dollars for defraying any extraordinary expenses attending the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations.

TH. JEFFERSON.

JANUARY 24, 1809.

The Message and documents were read, and one thousand copies thereof ordered to be printed for the use of the two Houses of Congress.

The documents are as follow :

In compliance with the resolution of the Senate, so far as the same is not complied with by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the 20th instant, the Secretary of State respectfully reports, that neither the whole nor any portion of the two millions of dollars appropriated by the act of Congress of the 21st of February, 1806, "for defraying any extraordinary expenses attending the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations," was ever authorized or intended to be applied to the use of either France, Holland, or any country other than Spain; nor otherwise to be applied to Spain than by treaty with the Government thereof, and exclusively in consideration of a cession and delivery to the United States of the territory held by Spain, eastward of the river Mississippi.

All which is respectfully submitted.

JAMES MADISON.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Jan. 21.

In compliance with the resolution of the Senate of the 17th instant, the Secretary of the Treasury respectfully reports :

That the President of the United States did, by virtue of the act of the 21st of February, 1806, authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to place two millions of dollars at the joint disposal of John Armstrong and James Bowdoin, Commissioners for settling all matters of difference between the United States and the Government of Spain, and in case of the death of one of them, at the disposal of the survivor, to be jointly applied, by the said John Armstrong and James Bowdoin, or in case of the death of one of them, by the survivor, to such purposes, as he, the said President, should think proper to direct in his instructions to them.

That the Secretary of the Treasury did, accordingly, on the 18th day of March, 1806, authorize the said John Armstrong and James Bowdoin, to draw bills of exchange for the said two millions of dollars, in the manner following, viz : on the bankers of the United States at Amsterdam for one million of dollars, and on the Treasury of the United States for one million of dollars.

That the bankers of the United States at Amsterdam were, at the same time, authorized to pay the bills, which might be thus drawn on them, out of the funds in their hands on account of the foreign debt, for which purpose remittances to that amount, and which were not necessary for the payment of that debt till the year 1807, were purchased and transmitted to them, between the 18th day of February and the 18th day of March 1806.

That this transaction was officially communicated by the Secretary of the Treasury, to Congress at their next session, in his annual report on finances, of 6th December 1806, and in the following words—"It is here proper to state, that, under the authority given by that act, a credit of one million of dollars has been opened in Holland to the Ministers of the United States appointed to treat with Spain. Should the credit be used, the million will be charged to the proper appropriation; but, although the balance chargeable to the expenditure of the year 1807, will in that case be only one, instead of two millions, as stated in the above estimate, the general result will be the same; as it will then be necessary to replace in Holland the million thus employed for a different object than the payment of the foreign debt, to which it now stands charged."

That no specie was sent to any country whatever, nor any other remittances made, nor any other measures, than those above stated, taken by this department, for the purpose of carrying into execution the above-mentioned act.

That John Armstrong and James Bowdoin have not, jointly or separately, drawn either on Holland or on the Treasury, or in any other manner, for any part whatever of the sum which had been thus placed at their disposal: and that all the remittances which had, with a view to that object, been made to the bankers at Amsterdam, sooner than was necessary for the payment of the foreign debt, have by them been exclusively applied, in the course of the year 1807, to the payment of that debt.

That the authority which had been given to John Armstrong and James Bowdoin to draw for that money, or any part thereof, ceased with the return of the last mentioned gentleman to the United States.

And that no part of the moneys appropriated by the above-mentioned act, of the 13th February 1806, has been, or can hereafter be expended: the appropriation, untouched and entire, having expired on the 31st day of December last, and been carried to the credit of the surplus fund, in conformity with the provisions of the act, entitled "An act making further provision for the support of public credit, and for the redemption of the public debt," passed March 3, 1795.

Respectfully submitted,

ing the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations," passed on the 13th day of February 1806, and of which the annexed is an official exemption:—I, Thomas Jefferson, President of the United States of America, do hereby authorize and empower Albert Gallatin, Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, to take all proper and necessary measures for placing the two millions of dollars appropriated by the act above recited, at the joint disposal of John Armstrong and James Bowdoin, Commissioners Plenipotentiary and Extraordinary, for settling all matters of difference between the United States and the Government of Spain, and in case of the death of one of them, at the disposal of the survivor—to be jointly applied by the said John Armstrong and James Bowdoin—or, in case of the death of one of them, by the survivor, to such purposes as I may think proper to direct in my instructions to them: and for so doing this shall be his sufficient warrant.

In testimony whereof I have caused the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed.

Given under my hand, at the City of Washington, this eighteenth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and six.

TH. JEFFERSON.

By the President:

JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State.

Be it known, that I, Albert Gallatin, Secretary of the Treasury of the United States for the time being, by virtue of the within commission, power, or warrant of the President of the United States, have authorized and empowered, and by these presents do authorize and empower the within mentioned John Armstrong and James Bowdoin, jointly, or, in case of the death of one of them, the survivor, to draw bills of exchange, for the two millions of dollars appropriated by the annexed act of Congress, in manner following, viz: on Wilhem and Jan Willink, N. & J. & R. Van Staphorst, bankers of the United States at Amsterdam, for two millions, five hundred thousand guilders, current money of Holland, equal at par to one million of dollars, and on the Treasury of the United States for one million of dollars, being the remainder of the sum appropriated as aforesaid—the bills for one fourth part of the last mentioned million to be made payable on demand, and the bills for the remaining three-fourths thereof, to be drawn at thirty, sixty, and ninety days after sight.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the Treasury to be affixed to these presents, and have hereunto subscribed my hand at the City of Washington, the 18th day of March, one thousand eight hundred and six.

An Act making provision for defraying any extraordinary expenses attending the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That a sum of two millions of dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated towards defraying any extraordinary expenses which may be incurred, in the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to be applied under the direction of the President of the United States, who shall cause an account thereof to be laid before Congress as soon as may be.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be and he is hereby authorized, if necessary, to borrow the said sum, or any part thereof, in behalf of the United States, at a rate of interest not exceeding six per cent per annum, redeemable at the will of the Congress of the United States. And it shall be lawful for the Bank of the United States to lend the whole or any part of the same.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That so much as may be necessary of the surplus of the duties on imports and tonnage beyond the permanent appropriation, heretofore charged upon them by law, shall be and hereby is pledged and appropriated for the payment of the interest, and reimbursement of the principal of all such moneys as may be borrowed in pursuance of this act, according to the terms and conditions on which the loan or loans may be effected.

NATHANIEL MACON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

GEORGE CLINTON,
Vice President U. S. and Pres't of Senate.

Approved, February 13th 1806.

TH. JEFFERSON.

I, James Madison, Secretary for the Department of State of the United States of America, hereby certify, that the writing within contained is a true copy of an act of the Congress of the said States, passed on the 13th day of February last, entitled "An act making provision for defraying any extraordinary expenses attending the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations," the said copy having been compared with the original roll remaining in the office of the Department of State, aforesaid.

Witness my hand and official seal, at the City of Washington, the eighteenth day of March, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and six; and of the independence of the said States the thirtieth.

JAMES MADISON.

MARCH 18, 1806.

GENTLEMEN: Having been directed by the President of the United States to place at your disposal two millions of dollars, under the authority vested in him by the act, entitled "An act making provision for defraying any extraordinary expenses attending the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations," passed on the thirteenth of February, 1806, I have the honor to enclose a power under the seal of this office, authorizing you to draw 2,500,000 guilders current money of Holland, and equal to one million of dollars, on the bankers of the United States at Amsterdam, and the other million of dollars on the Secretary of the Treasury at Washington. An open letter to the said bankers, is also enclosed, which you will be pleased to transmit to them only in case you may find it necessary to draw on them for that sum, as I have not thought it proper to give them any previous information on the subject, and have only placed sufficient funds in their hands without apprizing them of the object. It will therefore be necessary, that you make arrangements with them respecting the manner in which you will draw; but I believe they will be able to answer your drafts even if they were at ten days sight. It is proper for me to add that you are not authorized to draw partially on that fund, nor for any other object than that pointed out to you by the Secretary of State. And it will be necessary that you should inform me as early as possible, whether you will draw on Amsterdam or not; as the extent of the remittances to be made by this department on account of the foreign debt, will depend on the knowledge of that fact.

In relation to the drafts on the Secretary of the Treasury for the other million of dollars, you will be pleased to observe that they must not be at shorter sights than is mentioned in the power, that they must be expressed in dollars, and that they must not be negotiated under par. Letters of advice must accompany every set, and in addition thereto, a triplicate of all the bills should at the same time be transmitted.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, gentlemen, your obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

JOHN ARMSTRONG and JAMES BOWDOIN, Esqrs.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 18, 1808.

GENTLEMEN: In my three letters of the 1st and 13th instant, and of this day, I enclosed remittances, amounting altogether to Grs. 2,597,660 11; which remittances were made on account of the principal and interest of loans obtained by the United States in Holland, but subject nevertheless to such other dispositions as I might think proper to direct.

I have now the honor to inform you, that, in conformity with orders received from the President of the United States, I have this day authorized John Armstrong, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris, and James Bowdoin, Minister of the United States at Madrid, (who have been appointed Commissioners Plenipotentiary and Extraordinary, to adjust all differences between the said States and Government of Spain,) jointly, or in case of the death of one of them, the survivor, to draw on you for two millions five hundred thousand guilders, current money of Holland. You will, therefore, be pleased to honor their joint, or, in case of death, the survivor's drafts on you to that amount, and as soon as you shall have received notice of their intention thus to draw to give me immediate intimation, in order that I may have time to replace the funds necessary to meet the demands payable at Amsterdam in 1807, on account of the principal and interest of the loans obtained by the United States in Holland.

From my view of the funds heretofore placed in your hands, I presume that you may honor the drafts of those gentlemen even before the time when the remittances above-mentioned shall become due. But, in order to prevent any inconvenience or disappointment, Messrs. Armstrong and Bowdoin have been requested to write to you, and to make in concert the necessary arrangements on that subject.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, gentlemen, your obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Messrs. Wilhem & Jan Willink, N. & J. & R. Van Staphorst, merchants, Amsterdam.

WEDNESDAY, January 25.

WEDNESDAY, February 1.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations to complete the fortifications commenced for the security of the seaport towns and harbors of the United States, and to defray the expense of deepening, and extending to the river Mississippi, the canal of Carondelet; and the PRESIDENT having reported the bill to the House amended, it was ordered to the third reading as amended.

The bill making provision for Judges of the United States, in certain cases, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendments being offered, on the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time? it was determined in the negative.

The bill to repeal so much of any act or acts to authorize the courts of the United States to make compensation to their officers for unenumerated services out of the public Treasury, was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. THURSTON, BAYARD, and ANDERSON, to consider and report thereon.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of William White and others," was resumed, as in Committee of the Whole; and, after debate, the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 2.

The credentials of SAMUEL WHITE, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Delaware, for six years, commencing on the 4th of March next, were read, and ordered to lie on file.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, presented the petition of Robert Brent, and others, inhabitants of the City of Washington, praying that a company may be incorporated for opening a canal through the city, for reasons mentioned in the petition; which was read, and referred to Messrs. SMITH of Maryland, BAYARD, and WHITE, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. BAYARD stated that he, together with his colleague, were instructed on the subject, and submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be required to inquire and report to the Senate whether it be expedient that one or more batteries or fortifications should be erected at or near Wilmington, at or near Newcastle, at or near Port Penn, and at or near Lewis, in the State of Delaware, for the protection of the said towns and the country adjacent; and in case he be of opinion that it would be expedient to erect such batteries or fortifications, that he report whether any, and what, additional appropriations will be necessary for the purpose.

Mr. TIFFIN, from the committee, reported the amendments to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations to complete the fortifications commenced for the security of the seaport towns and harbors of the United States, and to defray the expense of deepening, and extending to the river Mississippi, the canal of Carondelet," correctly engrossed, and the bill was read the third time as amended.

Resolved, That this bill pass as amended.

Mr. TIFFIN, from the committee, reported the bill to provide for the incorporation of religious societies in the District of Columbia, correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. THURSTON asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill fixing the allowance to be made to private physicians and surgeons employed in the public service; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill authorizing the sale and grant of a certain quantity of public land to the Chesapeake and Delaware and Ohio Canal Companies, and the motion made on the 30th of January to amend the bill was withdrawn.

On motion, by Mr. LLOYD, to strike out the sixth section of the bill, as follows:

"Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That a quantity of land, not exceeding — acres, shall be sold and granted to the Ohio Canal Company, at the rate, and subject to all the rules, regulations, and conditions of the grant made by this bill to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, to be located on any of the public lands of the United States in the Indiana Territory, in the manner provided for the said Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company."

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 18, nays 11, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bayard, Crawford, Meigs, Milledge, Pope, Smith of Tennessee, Thruston, Tiffin, Turner, and White.

And the bill having been further amended, the President reported it to the House accordingly; and on the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

Ordered, That the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of William White, and others," be further postponed.

FRIDAY, February 3.

The bill fixing the allowance to be made to private physicians and surgeons employed in the public service, was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. THURSTON, LEIB, and CONDIT, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. TIFFIN, from the committee, reported the bill authorizing the sale and grant of a certain quantity of public land to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time, and the blanks filled as follows: First, two hundred thousand acres; second, two thousand shares; third, four hundred thousand dollars; fourth, seven years.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be "An act authorizing the sale and grant of a certain quantity of public land to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company."

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House do not concur in the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations to complete the fortifications commenced for the security of the seaport towns and harbors of the United States, and to defray the expense of deepening and extending to the river Mississippi the canal of Carondelet."

Mr. ANDERSON, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to revive and continue, for a further time, the authority of the commissioners of Kaskaskia," reported the bill without amendment, and the consideration of the bill was postponed to Monday next.

The Senate proceeded to consider their amendment to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations to complete the fortifications commenced for the security of the seaport towns and harbors of the United States, and to defray the expense of deepening and extending to the river Mississippi the canal of Carondelet," disagreed to by the House of Representatives; and it was agreed that the further consideration thereof be postponed.

Mr. POPE gave notice that on Monday next he should move for leave to bring in a bill authorizing the sale and grant of a certain quantity of public land to the Ohio Canal Company.

Mr. ANDERSON gave notice that he should, on Monday next, ask leave to bring in a bill to authorize the making of a turnpike road from Mason's causeway to Alexandria.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, submitted the following motion, which was read and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed, to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives, to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice President, and of notifying the persons elected of their election; and for regulating the time, place, and manner, of administering the oath of office to the President.

Ordered, That Messrs. SMITH of Maryland, and GAILLARD, be the committee on the part of the Senate.

MONDAY, February 6.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Robert Brent and others, by permission, reported a bill to incorporate a company for opening a canal in the City of Washington; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. ANDERSON obtained leave to bring in a bill to authorize the making of a turnpike road from Mason's causeway to Alexandria; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed the consideration of their amendment, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations to complete the fortifications commenced for the security of the seaport towns and harbors of the United States, and to defray the expense of deepening and extending to the river Mississippi the canal of Carondelet; and, on motion, by Mr. MITCHILL, Resolved, That the Senate do recede from their said amendment.

The PRESIDENT communicated the report of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, stating that the measures which have been authorized by the Board, subsequent to their report of the 5th of February, 1808, so far as the same have been completed, are fully detailed in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury to this Board, dated the third day of the present month, and in the statements therein referred to, which are therewith transmitted and prayed to be received as part of their report. And the report was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The bill, entitled "An act to revive and continue for a further time the authority of the Commissioners of Kaskaskia," was resumed as in Committee of the Whole; and the consideration of the bill further postponed.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House concur in the resolution of the Senate for the appointment of a joint committee to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice President, and of notifying the persons elected of their election; and for regulating the time, place, and manner, of administering the oath of office to the President, and have appointed a committee on their part.

TUESDAY, February 7.

The bill to authorize the making of a turnpike road from Mason's causeway to Alexandria was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. ANDERSON, FRANKLIN, and SMITH of Maryland, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the joint committee appointed to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice President, and of notifying the persons elected of their election, and for regulating the time, place, and manner, of administering the oath of office to the President, reported in part the following resolution; which was read and agreed to:

Resolved, That the two Houses shall assemble in the Chamber of the House of Representatives, on Wednesday next, at 12 o'clock; that one person be appointed a teller on the part of the Senate, to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote, and the persons elected, to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid; which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice President, and, together with a list of the votes, to be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

Ordered, That Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, be appointed teller on the part of the Senate, agreeably to the foregoing resolution.

A message from the House of Representatives brought to the Senate "the several memorials from sundry citizens of the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the mode in which the appointment of Electors for President and Vice President has been proceeded to on the part of the Senate and House of Representatives of said State, as irregular and unconstitutional, and praying for the interference of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, for the purpose of preventing the establishment of so dangerous a precedent."

The message last mentioned, referring to the memorials of sundry citizens of the State of Massachusetts, was read.

Ordered, That the message and memorials lie on the table.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act to revive, and continue for a further time, the authority of the Commissioners of Kaskaskia," and no amendment having been proposed, the bill was ordered to the third reading.

The bill to incorporate a company for opening a canal in the City of Washington was resumed as in Committee of the Whole, and no amendment having been proposed, on the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House agree to the report of the joint committee "appointed to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice President, and of notifying the persons elected of their election, and to regulate the time, place, and manner, of administering the oath of office to the President," and have appointed Messrs. NICHOLAS and VAN DYKE tellers on their part.

WEDNESDAY, February 8.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from Joshua Clark, an American seaman, stating that he was imprisoned at Bordeaux, and otherwise experienced great sufferings, under the authority of the American Consul at that place, and praying redress; and the letter was read.

Ordered, That it be transmitted to the Secretary of State.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House is now ready to attend the Senate in opening the certificates and counting the votes of the Electors of the several States in the choice of a President and Vice President of the United States, in pursuance of the resolutions of the two Houses of Congress of the seventh instant; and that the President of the Senate will be introduced to the Speaker's Chair by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The two Houses of Congress, agreeably to the joint resolution, assembled in the Representatives' Chamber, and the certificates of the Electors for the several States were, by the President of the Senate, opened and delivered to the tellers appointed for the purpose, who, having examined and ascertained the number of votes, presented a list thereof to the President of the Senate, which was read, as follows:

Proceedings.

SENATE.

Whereupon, the President of the Senate declared JAMES MADISON elected President of the United States for four years, commencing with the fourth day of March next; and GEORGE CLINTON Vice President of the United States for four years, commencing with the fourth day of March next.

The votes of the Electors were then delivered to the Secretary of the Senate; the two Houses of Congress separated; and the Senate returned to their own Chamber.

On motion, by Mr. SMITH of Maryland,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be delivered to JAMES MADISON, Esq. of Virginia, now Secretary of State of the United States, a notification of his election to the office of President of the United States; and to be transmitted to GEORGE CLINTON, Esq. of New York, Vice President elect of the United States, notification of his election to that office; and that the President of the Senate do make out and sign a certificate in the words following, viz:

Be it known, That the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, being convened at the City of Washington, on the second Wednesday in February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and nine, the underwritten, President of the Senate pro tempore, did, in presence of the said Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes of the Electors for a President and Vice President of the United States. Whereupon, it appeared that JAMES MADISON, of Virginia, had a majority of the votes of the Electors as President, and GEORGE CLINTON, of New York, had a majority of the votes of the Electors as Vice President. By all which it appears that JAMES MADISON, of Virginia, has been duly elected President, and GEORGE CLINTON of New York, has been duly elected Vice President of the United States, agreeably to the Constitution.

In witness, whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of the Senate to be affixed, this — day of February, 1809.

And that the President of the Senate do cause the certificate aforesaid to be laid before the President of the United States with this resolution.

Mr. GILES submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the several laws laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, be repealed on the 4th day of March next, except as to Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and that provision be made by law for prohibiting all commercial intercourse with those nations and their dependencies, and the importation of any article into the United States, the growth, produce, or manufacture, of either of the said nations, or of the dominions of either of them.

Mr. GILES also submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law for interdicting all foreign armed ships from the waters of the United States.

And on motion, the Senate adjourned until tomorrow.

THURSDAY, February 9.

The President communicated a report of the Secretary of War, in obedience to the orders of the Senate of February 2, respecting fortifications in the State of Delaware; which was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter signed James Sykes, Speaker of the Senate of the State of Delaware, enclosing a certificate of the appointment of SAMUEL WHITE, a Senator of the United States, for six years, commencing with the 4th of March next.

Mr. TIFFIN, from the committee, reported a bill to incorporate a company for opening the canal in the City of Washington, correctly engrossed.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the committee to whom was referred the bill to authorize the making of a turnpike road from Mason's causeway to Alexandria, reported an amendment; which was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

FRIDAY, February 10.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of William Hardy, made report. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition.

The bill to incorporate a company for opening the canal in the City of Washington was read the third time; and the blanks having been filled, as follows: first, one hundred thousand; second, forty thousand; third, forty thousand—

Resolved That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be "An act to incorporate a company for opening the canal in the City of Washington."

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to authorize the making of a turnpike road from Mason's causeway to Alexandria; and the PRESIDENT having reported the bill to the House amended, on the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

The bill, entitled "An act to revive and continue for a further time the authority of the Commissioners of Kaskaskia," was read the third time, and passed.

SATURDAY, February 11.

Mr. TIFFIN, from the committee, reported the bill to authorize the making of a turnpike road from Mason's causeway to Alexandria, correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government during the year 1809, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last brought up for concurrence was twice read by unanimous consent, and referred to Messrs. SMITH of Maryland, FRANKLIN, and CRAWFORD, to consider and report thereon.

MONDAY, February 13.

On motion, by Mr. GREGG, the following resolution was agreed to:

Resolved, That the committee to whom the petition of the marine officers was referred, be instructed to inquire whether any, and if any, to what extent, augmentation of the marine corps is necessary; and that they be authorized to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. WHITE presented two memorials from citizens of the State of Delaware, whose names are thereunto subscribed, praying the repeal of the embargo laws, for reasons stated in the memorials; which were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The PRESIDENT communicated the memorial of the inhabitants of Point Coupee, in the Territory of Orleans, praying to be allowed the right of pre-emption to certain lands rendered fit for cultivation by their exertions, or that the said lands may be granted to them as a donation or compensation for their industry, care, and expense; and the memorial was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

DISBURSEMENT OF PUBLIC MONEYS.

Mr. HILLHOUSE—Mr. President: I hold in my hand a resolution, which I intend to submit to the consideration of the Senate, after having made a few remarks to show the ground on which it rests, and explained my reasons for bringing it forward at this time.

In the discharge of my official duty, as one of a committee to inquire after facts in relation to a nomination which has recently been under the consideration of the Senate, I was led to inspect sundry accounts and documents in the public offices, from which I derive the knowledge of what I am about to state, and concerning which there can be no mistake, as the several items are taken from those accounts and documents.

Having formerly had some acquaintance with the manner of conducting business in the public offices in relation to our money concerns, I did suppose there existed a complete check upon all improper expenditures of public money, and a perfect security against its being drawn out of the Treasury in a manner not warranted by law. One predominant and principal ground of security, I had understood to consist in the control which the head of each department had over the business confided to his department, and his responsibility for a due and reasonable exercise of his discretion and judgment. But having discovered, by an opinion of the Senate lately expressed, an opinion which I am bound to respect, that the Secretary of War is not responsible for what I consider an improper expenditure of public money in that department, I am of opinion that some further and more effectual provision ought to be made. To show on what I ground my opinion, that there has been an improper disbursement of public money, I will read part of two sections of the law fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States, passed March 16th, 1802; and exhibit a brief statement of facts.

The 4th section fixes the monthly compensation of the Brigadier General as follows: "to the Brigadier General two hundred and twenty-five dollars, which shall be his full and entire compensation, without a right to demand or receive any rations, forage, travelling expenses, or other perquisite or emolument whatsoever, except such stationery as may be requisite for the use of his department." The fifth section fixes the number of rations to which each officer and soldier shall be entitled, by which no officer above the rank of colonel is entitled to any rations at all. That section further provides that there shall be allowed, "to the commanding officer of each separate post, such additional number of rations as the President of the United States shall from time to time direct, having respect to the special circumstances of each post." Under the provisions of that law there have been allowed, at Natchitoches, to Colonel Cushing double rations from September 1st to 23d of October, 1806, and from the 8th to the 20th of November, 1806. At New Orleans, to Lieutenant Colonel Freeman, triple rations from July 1st to 11th December, 1806; and to Colonel Cushing in the like manner, from the 17th December, 1806, to 20th of May, 1807; and in June 1809, Brigadier General Wilkinson's account for extra rations as commanding officer at those same posts was allowed as follows, viz:

At Natchitoches, 36 rations per day, from the 13th to the 30th September, 1806, 18 days at 17½ cents	113 40
Same place, 36 rations, from October 1, to November 11, 1806, 20½ rations at 18 cents	272 16
	385 56
At New Orleans, 36 rations per day, from November 12, 1806 to 24th May, 1807, 194 days, 9,312 rations at 15 cents	1,047 60
Quarters, stabling, &c. from 25th November, 1806 to 24th May, 1807, six months	600 00
	$2,033 16

Notwithstanding the express provisions of the law, and the allowance of extra rations to other officers at the same posts, the above account was admitted by the Secretary of War, and sanctioned by his signature; but was disallowed by the Accountant of the War Department as being against the law of March 16th, 1802. Whereupon the final decision was referred to the Comptroller of the Treasury, who decided that the account might be passed to the credit of General Wilkinson, because it had been admitted by the Secretary of War, with the approbation of the President of the United States, and sanctioned by the opinion of the Attorney General. By which it appears that the approbation of the President of the United States, supported by the opinion of the Attorney General, is considered as a sufficient authority for the allowance of accounts and the payment of money in direct opposition to a positive law of the United States, an error which ought to be corrected.

By the act establishing the Department of War, Indian affairs are placed under the direction and control of the Secretary of War; and in that Department there have been allowed and paid, as compensation to Indian Commissioners to hold treaties, for the table expenses of the Commissioners, supplying the Indians, and other expenses, the following sums, viz:

Officers of the United States receiving salaries or monthly pay, have been occasionally employed on other business for a short time, and, on account of extraordinary trouble and expense attending such employment, have received, in addition to their ordinary compensation, the per diem allowance fixed by law or usage for such service. The present is, I believe, the first instance in which such an officer has been employed every day in the year for two or three years in succession, and has been permitted to receive, in addition to his entire salary or monthly pay, a per diem allowance exceeding his salary or monthly pay, and the whole of his expenses. The salary of Judge Ellsworth, while employed on a foreign mission, had been received during his absence, by his attorney, but was refunded, and he received only his compensation as a foreign Minister; and in the case of Mr. Jay, his expenses only were paid. There can be no propriety in such allowance, and a remedy ought to be provided.

There has also been allowed and paid in the War Department an account amounting to $6,619 72, for the table expenses of General Wilkinson and Governor Claiborne, from December 7th, 1803, to April 24th, 1804, four months and seventeen days, the time they were employed as Commissioners to take possession of New Orleans, and for a private secretary $548, and for stationery $27 50, amounting in the whole to $7,266 62. The allowance of this account is under the hand of the Secretary of War, who states that it was done by order of the President of the United States. As this account had no relation either to the military service or to Indian affairs, I am unable to say why it was carried for settlement to the War Department and not to the Accounting officers of the Treasury.

It appears, by authentic documents which I have examined, that there have been paid to General Wilkinson, this favorite of the Administration, (for I think none other than a favorite could have obtained from the Treasury of the United States money to such an amount,) the following sums, viz:

For his pay as Brigadier General from March 16th, 1802, the date of the law, to February 1, 1809, at $225 per month - - - $16,562 50

It may also be proper, by some legislative provision, to regulate the business of advance pay to the officers of the Army. There may be circumstances when it would be proper, as when ordered on distant service; but, unless regulated, it is liable to great abuse, as is obvious from an inspection of General Wilkinson's account, by which it appears that he has received, since March 1st, 1808, his pay in manner following, to wit:

Partial Repeal of the Embargo.

SENATE.

PARTIAL REPEAL OF THE EMBARGO.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Mr. GILES's motion made on the 8th instant, for repealing, on the 4th of March, the laws laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, except as to Great Britain and France, and their dependencies; and prohibiting all commercial intercourse with those nations and their dominions.

Mr. GILES addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: In times of great public trial and difficulty, when a proposition deeply affecting the character and the interests of the nation is presented for adoption, an indispensable obligation is imposed upon its author to state the considerations upon which it is founded. Under this impression, I shall now proceed to make as full and as frank a development of my inducements in moving the present resolution, as may consist with the ordinary limits of discussion.

It is a circumstance greatly to be regretted, sir, that as our dangers and difficulties are increasing and pressing upon us, our divisions of opinion respecting the proper course to be pursued in relation to them, appear to be increasing in the same proportion. This probably arises, in a great degree, from the unfortunate state of mind produced by collisions in argument. Gentlemen are in the habit of banding their whole thoughts upon the discovery, not only of arguments for fortifying their own opinions, but for repelling the differing opinions of their friends. If this habit of reflection could be reversed—if each gentleman could prevail upon himself to give full weight to the arguments, to respect more the opinions and motives of his friend, and to doubt more the infallibility of his own, it is scarcely possible to believe, that when an union of interests is admitted by all, but that some point of union in the measures to promote those interests, might be found and agreed upon. And may we not be permitted to hope, sir, when the fatal consequences of divisions are so obvious to all, that the urgency of our difficulties will produce this course of reflection? Amidst all these difficulties, it is fortunate however, that there is one point in which we are all united—that is, resistance to foreign aggressions. It is true, no vote upon that point specifically has yet been taken in this House; but in the other House it has, after much discussion and great deliberation, and the result was as near unanimity as could be expected upon any occasion involving so many considerations. The only points of difference now to be adjusted and compromised, relate to the extent of that resistance, and the mode of its application.

The resolution I have had the honor to submit, is brought forward solely in reference to those points; and is dictated by that spirit of concession and conciliation which I have taken the liberty of recommending to others, and which, in my judgment, is imperiously demanded by the present critical situation of our affairs.

I am fully sensible, Mr. President, of the high responsibility incurred by moving the present resolution; and I also know, that when nothing is left us but a choice of difficulties, it is much easier to criticise any expedient that may be chosen, than to devise and present a better for consideration. But, sir, it should be recollected, that merely to criticise or find fault, when no expedient is left us altogether free from objection, is the most subordinate office that genius can perform; and at the same time it is the least honorable for the individual, and the most unprofitable to the nation and to the people. I make this observation, not with a view of deterring gentlemen from bringing forward any fair objections to the resolution under consideration, but merely to remind them that I shall consider the task unaccomplished, until they present some substitute better calculated to save the honor and protect the interests of the nation; and when this is done, I will readily pay them the tribute of superior wisdom, and unite with them with the most fervent devotion.

The resolution before you, sir, is not the one of my choice, nor the one by which I could wish that my responsibility could be tested. It is the offspring of conciliation and of great concession on my part. I feel, sir, in common with my fellow-citizens, a great repugnance to war. I think the dreadful resort should only be made in a case of self-defence. I protest against war merely for the purposes of conquest, or aggrandizement: but in my opinion, war is amply justified by the existing crisis.

In my judgment, if the public sentiment could be brought to support them, wisdom would dictate the combined measures of embargo, non-intercourse, and war. I have no doubt but that their combined influence would be the most efficacious in meeting and subduing the crisis; but, sir, very few gentlemen, I believe, have brought their minds up to this state of energy; and perhaps, in the present state of the public mind, distracted and drawn by various delusions, as it is, from the real source of our injuries, the experiment might be deemed a rash one, even if it could be obtained. I have, however, sir, so much confidence in the good sense and patriotism of the people, and in the efficacy of these measures, that I will briefly state their probable effects for the consideration of the people; and I am the more disposed to do so, because I believe the time is not past, but is fast approaching, when the whole energy of the nation must be called forth to save what we have left of our honor, independence, and dearest interests. These would be the obvious effects of the combined influence of the measures suggested. Embargo would deprive our real enemy of many of our productions which I believe to be indispensable to his prosperity in many respects. Non-intercourse would deprive him of our market for his surplus manufactures, an operation not less injurious to him than the other, whilst war could be made to retort upon him some of the evils of his own injustice. I would present nothing of value to him on the ocean, to whet his cupidity, and stimulate him to a perseverance in the war. I would front him on the ocean with empty destructive ships, brave and hardy defenders of them, and rusty iron guns. If he achieved a conquest, it should be a conquest of hard knocks, while there should be nothing of value to gratify his cupidity, or compensate his own losses.

I would at the same time, seize upon his colonial possessions upon this continent. If the whole energy of the nation could be brought to act vigorously in this way, I will venture to predict, that within six months Great Britain would be brought to value our friendship as much as she would to deprecate our enmity. But, sir, whilst I would apply the scourge with one hand, with all the severity which the active energy of the whole nation could inflict, I would, with sincerity and good faith, hold out the olive branch with the other; my demands should be moderate, and within the limits of justice. And believe me, Mr. President, Great Britain would soon learn how to make a choice. Whilst, sir, you would expose nothing of value to her, she would necessarily present to your spoliations a rich commerce, a commerce which her Orders in Council were intended to enlarge, and which she considers as almost indispensable to her national existence. Permit me at the same time to express an opinion that the whole British navy would be very far from affording a competent protection to this wide spread commerce. With respect to prejudices against the embargo, I would remark, that considering the zeal, ability, and artifices, which have been employed to excite them, particularly in one section of the Union, it is matter of surprise that the people have submitted to the privations, which have been delusively ascribed to that measure, with no greater discontents than have been manifested by them; and the experiment has rather confirmed, than lessened, my opinion of the patriotism of the people; but still perhaps so many prejudices have been excited, as to justify some relaxation in that respect. In that case however, letters of marque and reprisal, and the invasion of Canada, ought, in my judgment, to have been substituted; war would then have been resorted to in a less efficient form, and the people upon the experiment, I have no doubt, would regret the sacrifice; but the House of Representatives has thought proper to reject that proposition, and the one now offered seems to be the next best calculated to save the honor and protect the rights and interests of the nation.

I have never relied so much on the coercive effects of the embargo, singly, as some gentlemen have done; and I have at all times been of opinion that preparations for more efficient measures should have been made to come in aid of, or to substitute the embargo, whenever it should be ascertained that it had failed of its coercive objects. I was, notwithstanding, willing at the commencement of the present session to persevere in the system until the events which I anticipated should take place in Spain, and become known in Great Britain, and until the early proceedings of Congress should also be known there. It appeared to me that if a relaxation on the part of Great Britain, should not be coerced by the influence of these events combined, upon their first impression in Great Britain, all hope of a relaxation from the embargo alone would then be at an end; and that no other alternative would be left us but war. The first impression produced by these results, would probably be the greatest; because the spirit of speculation would be stimulated thereby, and the natural effect of that spirit is to drive prices beyond the level which would be produced by the ordinary causes; and if, under such an impression, no relaxation should take place, none could be afterwards rationally expected. My sincere love of peace, and the little remaining hope of avoiding war, induced me at that time sternly to set my face against the repeal of the embargo; but I then thought, and still think, that at some period of this session some other measures ought to be resorted to, either with or without the embargo. That period is now arrived, submission cannot for a moment be taken into consideration. The decisive course of measures which I conceived were imperiously demanded by the existing circumstances of the country, are still more strongly called for by the contents of Mr. Canning's letter of the 22d of November last, to Mr. Pinkney. This letter I have heard represented as wholly unimportant. I view its contents in a very different light. I deem them highly important. They go to take away my last hope of peace. They go to satisfy my mind, that we have now no alternative but war. Submission is out of the question. Permit me to read an extract or two from that letter, upon which my opinion is founded. They will be found in pages 13, 14, of the last printed Message of the President—

"The purpose of this letter is not to renew the discussion upon the subject of your proposal, but merely to clear up any misunderstanding which had existed between us in the course of that discussion. I cannot conclude it, however, without adverting very shortly to that part of your letter, in which you argue that the failure of France, in the attempt to realize her gigantic project of the annihilation of the commerce of this country, removes all pretext for the continuance of the retaliatory system of Great Britain."

"If the foundation of the retaliating system of Great Britain was, (as we contend it to have been) originally just, that system will be justifiably continued in force, not so long only, as the decrees which produced it are mischievously operative, but until they are unequivocally abandoned, and, if it be thus consistent with justice to persevere in that system, it is surely no mean motive of policy for such perseverance, that a premature departure from it, while the enemy's original provocation remains unrepealed, might lead to false conclusions, as to the efficacy of the decrees of France, and might hold out a dangerous temptation to that Power to resort to the same system on any future occasion."

Here we find Mr. Canning, although in a tone somewhat different, not only confirming his rejection of the first and honorable overture made by Mr. Pinkney, for the revocation of the hostile orders, &c., contained in his letter to Mr. Pinkney of the 23d of September preceding, but we find him introducing the subject apparently for the purpose of preventing any similar overture, under any circumstances, and expressly declaring that the orders shall continue in force, not only so long as the French decrees shall be mischievously operative, but until they shall be unequivocally abandoned, and leaves a strong inference on my mind that they are not to be abandoned on any terms; and, I believe, are intended to become the permanent law of the land. If this point were clearly ascertained, surely all America would eagerly unite in the war. But, sir, I shall have occasion again, in the course of the observations I propose to make, to remark further upon the contents of this letter. Although this resolution is not the one of my choice, and is, as gentlemen must now see, several points below the ground which in my judgment the best interests of the nation would authorize and require us to take, yet I will state some of the effects, which I presume will flow from it, and which, under all circumstances, are the best that can now be obtained. It will put the destructive influence of the Orders of Council to the test of practical experiment, and thus settle for us the question of peace or war. It will be a resumption of our commerce with all nations, except the belligerents having in force against us hostile orders or edicts, whilst it will be a continual protest against them. It will manifest our attention to the wishes and interests of our Eastern friends, who will not be satisfied, of the destructive effects of the Orders in Council upon their commerce, by any inferences drawn from the obvious meaning of those orders, but insist upon a practical experiment upon them. Their vessels may be put in motion, and trade to all countries, where they can trade without compromising their own and their country's honor. It will demonstrate the necessity of putting the nation into a better state of defence, whilst it will postpone, for a time, the resort to war; in my judgment, the ultimate and only resource now left us against belligerent aggressions. It is therefore the only remaining chance for preserving peace. It will leave no chasm in our protest against the belligerent orders and edicts, and thus far save us the disgrace of submission.

I am bound in charity to presume, Mr. President, that gentlemen must differ essentially with me in opinion respecting the causes of war, or it is not possible that we should differ so much as to the propriety and necessity of resorting to it. I therefore propose to state with openness and candor the real causes of our sufferings, the real causes of war. These may principally be summed up in the monstrous and extravagant claim set up by Great Britain to the despotism of the ocean. The despotism claimed upon the land by France, although equally reprehensible, is less injurious to us. It is felt, no doubt, with great severity by those nations whose situation has subjected them to its influence—but it has pleased a kind and beneficent Providence to place us beyond the sphere of its destructive influence, whilst the impotency of France, upon the ocean, relieves us from any great and serious injuries from her upon that element.

Great Britain has assumed the principle of the conquest of the ocean, and, as a reward of that conquest, asserts and maintains the right to carry on herself the commerce of the world, or to prescribe rules for conducting it by other nations, and thus render it subservient to her own views, and her own interests. This claim of exclusive dominion upon the ocean by Great Britain, is hostility against the rights of all other nations. It is in fact war against all nations having equal rights with herself to navigate the ocean. It compels all other nations either to surrender to Great Britain the monopoly of the commerce of the world, or to submit to such rules as she shall prescribe for conducting it. This extravagant notion was conceived by the British jurists as early as the commencement of the French revolution; and since the destruction of the French fleet at Toulon, the Government has made several attempts to introduce it into practice; sometimes with more, sometimes with less restraint or disguise. It is impossible for me to refer to all the instances of this kind; I must, therefore, turn the recollection of the Senate generally to the various orders issued since that time, restraining neutral commerce, in utter contempt of all public law, and acknowledged neutral rights. During the latter part of Mr. Pitt's administration this doctrine had become popular, and it was resolved to put it into practice. It was, however, deemed proper to prepare the world for the reception of the monstrous pretension: accordingly, a pamphlet was written as the precursor of the system proposed to be introduced for the government of the commercial world. I pay but little respect to pamphlets in general, and should not now, but the pamphlet alluded to has always been represented as written under the direction of the then British Ministry, and intended to prepare the world for this new system of commercial warfare; and in this point of view it is entitled to the most serious consideration, and the rather, as the course of policy recommended by it, has since been strictly pursued by the British Ministry, and they have even extended the system since, beyond the utmost limit prescribed in that work.

The pamphlet alluded to, is entitled "War in Disguise." I beg to call the attention of the Senate to two or three short paragraphs therein. They will be found in pages eight and nine:

"Have we then lost the triumphant means of such effectual warfare, or have the ancient fields of victory been neglected?"

"Neither such a misfortune, nor such folly, can be alleged. Never was our maritime superiority more decisive than in the last and present war. We are still the unresisted masters of every sea; and the open intercourse of our enemies with their colonies, was never so completely precluded."

Here the pretension of the unresisted masters of the ocean is explicitly assumed, and it can hardly be necessary to remark, that the whole policy recommended in the book, is founded upon that assumed principle. Again, in pages 183, 184, in considering the prudence of applying the proposed remedy in regard to the colonial trade, I find these expressions:

"The sum of all these opposing considerations seems to be this, 'we may provoke a quarrel with the neutral Powers.' I propose, therefore, briefly to consider, first, the degree of this danger; and next, whether the evils of such a quarrel, if certain, would be greater than those to which we at present submit."

"It is certain, that should His Majesty's Government think fit to recall the indulgent instruction that has been so much abused, and revert to the rule of the war in 1756, with such modifications only as can be safely allowed, great clamors would immediately arise in the neutral countries. The neutralizing agents, deprived of a large portion of their fraudulent gains, would exclaim aloud against the measure; and even such merchants as have carried on the colonial trade on their own account, would not be well satisfied to find their field of commerce materially narrowed by the assertion of our belligerent rights.

The neutral Governments therefore would, no doubt, complain and remonstrate; 'but would they, if firmly though temperately resisted, push the controversy into a quarrel?' Would they maintain their pretensions to the trade in question, at the expense of a war with Great Britain? I firmly believe they would not."

These passages serve to show, that the principle was assumed with a full knowledge of its destructive influence on neutral rights.

The next, or the Fox Administration, seemed to think there was some hazard and delicacy in making this unprovoked attack upon the rights of all nations, and seemed to entertain some doubts of the practicability of the profligate system; but they were compelled, by the infatuated jurists of the day, to make some essay towards carrying it into effect; witness their orders of January 7, 1807, interdicting neutrals from going from one port to another port of their enemy. This extraordinary order, too, was issued only seven days after signing a Treaty of Amity and Commerce with the United States. But, sir, this partial compliance with the public sentiment could not retain them in office. The little respect they retained for neutral rights, and their timid doubts, were amongst the causes which drove them from office, to make way for an energetic administration—one totally destitute of all respect for public law, for neutral rights—destitute of all the scruples and obligations of justice. I propose to give a short sketch of the history of this energetic administration.

1st. As its operations have affected other nations:

2d. As they have affected the United States.

Let us see the consequences which have resulted, and which are likely to result from this energy, originating in folly and in pride; stimulated to its ends in utter disregard of every principle of justice and of public law, and directed to unattainable objects. Permit me, sir, in this exposition, to pay some attention to dates—they will serve to illustrate some of my ideas. The change of Ministry took place either in the month of January or February, 1807. Preparations for executing this lawless system of energy were made with great activity, and in the month of August following, they were made to burst upon the head of an unsuspecting and unoffending friend.

In that month, a surrender of the Danish fleet is demanded. This demand is founded upon a false suggestion, that the Danes had, by a secret article in the Treaty of Tilsit, agreed to give up their fleet to France, to facilitate the invasion of Great Britain. This suggestion was utterly false and unfounded, and so the Ministry were flatly told, to their faces, in Parliament afterwards, by Lord Hutchinson, at that time Minister at the Court of St. Petersburg. Upon the refusal of this iniquitous demand, Copenhagen was immediately sacked, and a profligate and indiscriminate slaughter of men, women, and children ensued. The Danish fleet was forcibly seized, and borne off in triumph. But, sir, with their unhallowed trophies, the British bore off the distrusts and detestation of the world, and left behind them the hatred and the enmity of Denmark. Do you believe, sir, that the British Ministry, or the British nation, have gained any solid advantage by this wanton display of energy? Do you believe, sir, that the loss of character, and the enmity of Denmark, are compensated for by the booty of the Danish fleet, which Great Britain did not want? No, sir. The one might excite in the nation a thoughtless and transitory exultation, but the others are durable losses and stains, which time itself cannot wipe away, so long as history shall remain to record the acts of men and of nations.

The next effort to display this energy makes its appearance in Sweden. A nation fighting for its independence against all Europe, and protected from their lawless power, more from the inaccessibility of the country, its lakes, morasses, &c., than by its resources and arms. Under these circumstances, Sir J. Moore, a great military chief, is sent to offer to the King of Sweden the aid of British co-operation, probably the admission of the British fleet into Swedish ports. How was this flattering overture received by that monarch, in the depth of his distress? Sir, he instantly saw the danger of British perfidy, and he ordered the messenger to be confined—to be incarcerated. But, fortunately for him, he escaped in disguise and disgrace. For this, and other acts, the King of Sweden has been called a madman; but, sir, this act, in my judgment, serves to show that he is a statesman, as well as a soldier. The British perfidy towards Denmark was the cause, and the justification, of his conduct. He had just seen the British, upon a false suggestion, seize upon the fleet of his neighbor, Denmark, and he justly concluded, that, if he admitted a British fleet into his ports, his fleet would also be seized upon, and borne off, whenever the convenience or interest of Great Britain should require it. Here sir, are seen some of the fruits of the perfidious energy practised upon Denmark. And, in the month of July, 1808, Sir John Moore returned to London, to give some mysterious and unintelligible account of the disgraceful issue of his perfidious embassy.

About the same time, those generous interposers in the affairs of other nations sent a fleet and army to Portugal, their friend and ally, to aid the Portuguese in expelling or subduing a French army, then in the bosom of their country. These wretched and devoted people, deserted by a weak and impotent Government, left almost without the smallest semblance of internal police, and struggling against a French army in their bosom, hailed with acclamations of joy the arrival of their generous deliverers. And what happens? In the month of September, following, a convention for the evacuation of Portugal is made by the British and the French—the Portuguese, the principals in the war, and the allies of Great Britain, not even consulted—and, upon taking down the French standard of despotism, the Portuguese, with indignation and astonishment, behold unfurled, in its stead, the British standard of despotism.

I now find, sir, from the London newspapers, by the last accounts from Portugal, that a formidable party has risen up against the Regency; or, in plain English, against British insolence and despotism—for, sir, the cause of the Regency is the cause of the British—and is not this the natural consequence of such conduct? Yes, sir, that miserable and devoted people are probably divided in opinion. The one-half thinks the despotism of their French oppressors the most intolerable; the other-half, that the despotism of their generous British deliverers is still worse.

Spain is now also receiving the generous interposition of this energetic Administration. The tragic scene in this devoted and commiserated country is not yet closed, or, at least, not known here. But, I should not be at all surprised to hear, by the very next intelligence which shall be wafted from that bloody scene of action, that the generous Britons have run away, and left the Spanish patriots in the lurch, and have forcibly borne away the Spanish fleet as a slight reward for the generous aid afforded the patriots. And, if such should be the fact, Mr. President, do you not believe it would be justified in this country? Yes, sir, some old rule, or some new rule, or some no rule, would instantly be hunted out for its justification. After so many atrocious acts of Great Britain, affecting the dearest interests of our own country, have been justified, there is no act she could perform towards other nations, which would leave her without her advocates here.

I turn with disgust and mortification from this horrible picture of wrongs inflicted by Great Britain upon other nations, to a recollection and recapitulation of the injuries and insults heaped upon my own country, and particularly by the present energetic Administration; and I feel degraded as an American, when I review and recollect our patient forbearance under them, and particularly, sir, when I hear one of my fellow-citizens say there are no causes of war; wait for a further accumulation of injuries and insults. I hope, sir, I am mistaken in the views I have of the causes of war. A discovery of the mistake might relieve me from feelings which, as an American, I cannot but possess, but which I am unable to describe. But, sir, to call the attention of gentlemen with more certainty and precision to the injuries and insults inflicted on us, I have reduced the disgusting catalogue to writ-ting. Sir, I believe that nearly contemporaneous with the determination of the British Ministry to seize the Danish fleet, was its determination to plunder and destroy American commerce. The principle of that determination applied with equal force to both nations. It was exclusive dominion on the ocean; and as one false suggestion was made the pretext for seizing the Danish fleet, so another suggestion, equally false, was made the pretext at once for the destruction of our commerce, and for sowing the seeds of division among our people. That false suggestion was, sir, that the Government of the United States was acting under French influence, and engaged in some secret negotiation with the French Emperor for some ridiculous and visionary division of the United States. The success of this falsehood, and the extent of its circulation, &c., are now pretty generally known in all parts of the United States. Without any further prefatory observations, therefore, let me read to you the catalogue of injuries and insults inflicted by Great Britain on the United States. I think it probable, sir, I have omitted some, because it is a subject to which I turn my mind with disgust, and from it with pleasure.

Catalogue of British Injuries and Insults.

Impressment of American seamen.

Seizing and confiscating our vessels upon various unauthorized pretexts.

Blockading our ports, seizing vessels entering therein, and sending them to some neighboring ports for condemnation.

Firing at, and detaining coasting vessels within our acknowledged jurisdiction; murdering a citizen in these acts of wantonness.

Violating our neutrality by destroying a French ship of war within our jurisdiction, and thus entitled to protection.

Attacking a public armed ship of the United States.

Rifling some, and murdering others of her crew. Refusing atonement for these outrages. Regulating and restraining our commerce. Colonizing and taxing us by Orders of Council, reduced to the form of law by an act of Parliament.

Interfering in our political concerns, by inviting our citizens to violate our laws, and by publishing a letter from the British Secretary of State, by way of appeal to the people against their own Government.

Forcing a contraband trade with armed ships, &c.

Mr. President, am I mistaken in these facts, or are they true? If true, sir, is there a gentleman here present prepared to tell the American people that all these injuries and insults have been inflicted upon them by Great Britain, and all atonement for them refused, and that there is no cause of war? That their honor and interest do not demand war, that they are not yet sufficiently degraded, but must wait for a greater accumulation of injuries and insults! But, sir, permit me to press this inquiry still further. Its importance demands it. It is of the last importance to the people to understand it correctly; that not a doubt should be suspended over the facts. Sir, I have said twice before this session, and I now say a third time, and I beg gentlemen to answer me explicitly, yea or nay—I have twice said, and I now say a third time, that Great Britain by her Orders in Council, now reduced to the form of law, has abridged the rights of national sovereignty, that she has colonized and taxed the people of the United States. Here let me stop, sir; let me single out these acts alone, and ask gentlemen if they are true? Gentlemen have not denied them; gentlemen cannot deny them. Well, sir, are gentlemen prepared to tell the people of the United States that Great Britain has abridged their rights of national sovereignty, that she has colonized and taxed them, and perseveres in so doing, and in the same breath, and at the same time, to tell them there are no causes of war, that they must wait for further injuries and insults! I have so much confidence in the intelligence and patriotism of the people in every section of the Union, that I do not believe such language would be justified or even tolerated in any part of the United States. No, sir, the people of Boston, enveloped as they are with prejudices, would repel the degrading expostulation if it were fairly presented to their view and consideration. But, sir, I propose to press the examination of this subject still further. I propose to select two or three of the most formidable and intolerable acts of outrage from the disgusting catalogue, and to bestow on them a more critical attention. These will be acts of the present energetic Administration. I suppose that other gentlemen cannot understand the Orders of Council as I do; if they did, it would be impossible for an American to offer an apology for, or even a palliation of them. They shall, therefore, receive my first attention: First, as they affect our rights of national sovereignty; secondly, as they affect the different occupations of commerce, agriculture, and fishing; thirdly, the pretexes upon which they are attempted to be justified.

The Orders of Council, now reduced to the form of law, abridge our national sovereignty, in undertaking coercively to regulate our commerce, in defiance of our own laws and the laws of nations, and in subjecting it to heavy taxes or tribute. The power to regulate the commerce of the United States with foreign nations, is given by the people to Congress. These Orders of Council undertake to regulate it by force, and in defiance of the laws of Congress. Indeed, the orders extend their regulation of it further than Congress is authorized to do by the people; for they have charged our exports with heavy duties, which Congress is prohibited from doing by the Constitution. Great Britain may, by municipal regulations, lay any tax she pleases upon the exports of our productions from Great Britain, but she has no right to force our commerce into her ports for the purpose of collecting a tax from it, nor subjecting it to capture and condemnation for any departure from the rules she prescribes for conducting it upon the ocean. Submission to these regulations would be the surrender of some of the most essential attributes of national sovereignty, and would justly exclude us from the family of nations, because we should thereby consent to be excluded from the exercise of some of the essential rights of sovereignty, which are indispensable to the equality of nations. This result is so plain, that I suppose that there can be but one opinion respecting it.

But, sir, I am the more disposed to examine the operation of these orders upon the different occupations of commerce, agriculture, and fishing, because I have lately heard it said and repeated, that they merely affect the occupation of commerce, and as a consequence resulting from this interpretation of them, it is said that the merchants may go out and take care of themselves. This, sir, is an extremely fallacious suggestion, and gentlemen, particularly agriculturists, ought to be very cautious in adopting it. This mistake has probably arisen from the want of a due consideration of the subject. It has arisen from the want of discriminating between the right of commerce, or rather the right of regulating commerce, of prescribing the rules for conducting it, and the occupation of the merchant. The right of commerce is a national right; it belongs to the nation collectively. The occupation or the exercise of the right only belongs to the merchant. The right to carry on commerce does not belong to the merchant exclusively; any other citizen may, if he chooses, exercise the right; but these Orders of Council affect both the right of commerce, and the occupation of commerce; they also affect the right of agriculture, and of fishing, still more. They affect the occupation of commerce by limiting its extent and objects; but the principle of the orders once admitted, it will regulate the occupation of agriculture, and probably destroy the occupation of fishing. If submitted to, it would probably lessen the value of every farm in the United States, as well the farms upon the water, as the farms upon the land. Apply the orders to the articles of either flour, cotton, tobacco, or fish. I will select two articles only for the purposes of illustration; but the operation of the orders will apply equally to all. Take tobacco, for example. According to the orders, every hogshead of tobacco exported from the United States, is to be carried first into a British port, there to pay an export duty of three dollars per hundred weight, before it can be permitted to find its way to the Continent of Europe, where it is principally consumed. The value of the article to the grower is upon an average about $6 per hundred weight. The merchant in purchasing the tobacco of the grower, will tell him, your tobacco is worth $6, but I can give you three only, because I am compelled to call in Great Britain, and there pay the other three to make up the price to the British treasury, and besides to incur all the charges of the ports, and the circuitry of the voyage, &c. The same observations will apply with equal force to every other article of agriculture. And thus, the principle of the Orders of Council once submitted to, will enable Great Britain as effectually to regulate the various occupations of agriculture, as if she were permitted to say at once, the colonists may raise grain, &c., but they shall not raise tobacco, &c. If you permit her to impose taxes at pleasure, on any of your productions on their way across the ocean, to their market of consumption, she can in that way as effectually prohibit its cultivation, as if she were authorized to prohibit it in the first instance by a positive prohibitory regulation. The effect of the principle in each case is the same, the only difference consists in the mode or the medium through which the principle is effectuated. It is not likely Great Britain would discourage the cultivation of grain, because she generally requires the importation of a certain quantity for her own consumption. But if the Orders of Council were to be submitted to, living in a part of the country where I have an election to cultivate grain or tobacco, I should certainly abandon the cultivation of tobacco altogether, because, charged with the present export tax, I am persuaded it would afford nothing to the grower.

Now, sir, let me see how these orders are likely to operate on the American fisheries, and American fish. I believe no American fish is allowed to be consumed in Great Britain; yet all the American fish carried to foreign markets for consumption, must first call at a British port, and there pay a duty. I do not recollect the precise amount. [Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said ninety cents per quintal.] I do not know the proportion that this tax bears to the whole value of the quintal, but it is not material to my illustration. Admit the principle, and the proportion of the tax to the value of the articles can be varied at the pleasure of the British Government. When you come to recollect, sir, the extreme jealousy entertained at all times by the British Government of the American fisheries, the importance they attach to their own fisheries, as the nursery of their seamen, and as almost indispensable to the prosperity of their navy, would you not conclude, sir, that the farms upon the ocean were in as much danger from the operation of the Orders of Council, as the farms upon the land? And I beg gentlemen more particularly interested upon this subject to give these observations a fair and impartial consideration.

But, Mr. President, this suggestion of withholding the protection of the Government from commerce, I conceive wholly inadmissible; for, exclusively of many other considerations, it must have been the result of some very cursory reflections, or superficial observations, upon the attitude the Government has assumed in relation to revenue, or an entire miscomprehension of it. Sir, the occupation of commerce is as much entitled to the protection of the Government as any other occupation, and an abandonment of it as injurious to the interests, and as derogatory to the character of the Government, as the abandonment of any other. Once avow that principle, once have it understood by foreign nations that your commerce is abandoned to its fate, and its prosperity is impossible, its destruction is inevitable. Its very prosperity would produce its destruction, by inviting the cupidity and violence of foreign nations. But, sir, the attitude the Government has taken upon the subject of revenue, forbids the abandonment of commerce. Almost your whole revenue is derived from commerce. You have dispensed with your internal taxes, and your only internal resource is derived from the sale of your public lands. Whatever may be the productiveness of that fund hereafter, it is not now more than equal to one-twentieth of the demands of the Government. Hence, sir, the Government must either afford protection to commerce, or renew the internal taxes. Can you doubt, sir, which of these alternatives the Government would choose? We are told, sir, there are prejudices against a navy. I know there are, sir, and I believe I have partaken of them as much as any gentlemen in the United States, and stand as much committed to the nation upon that point. But the circumstances of the country, at the time of discussing the question of creating a navy, formerly and at the present time, are extremely different. Our commerce then was comparatively small to what it now is. The proposed expenditure upon the navy would have been nearly equal to the whole annual product of the revenue derived from commerce. The revenue now derived from commerce is nearly quadrupled, and besides, at that time, our commerce was almost exempt from foreign aggressions. Its present prosperity, and unprotected state, has invited aggressions from abroad, and unless it is protected it will be destroyed.

Whatever my prejudices or opinions may have been, or may now be upon this subject, I am not so weak and obstinate as to suppose that those prejudices or opinions can control the practical progression of human affairs, nor that there is any consistency in applying the same opinions to a different state of circumstances and events. These must and will control prejudices and opinions. Mr. President, notwithstanding all the existing prejudices against a navy, I now confidently express an opinion, that if you continue to draw your revenue through the medium of commerce, if that commerce should continue to prosper and increase, and if foreign cupidity and violence should continue to exist, you will have a navy to protect your commerce. I consider the effect as certain as any other effect produced by irresistible causes. When this effect will take place, when these prejudices will be overcome, whether this year or the next, or at some more future time, I will not pretend to say; but that it will happen at some time, is as certain as that any other effect will happen that is impelled by irresistible causes. The extent of this protection will depend on the discretion of the Government, and there is a security against its being carried too far by the great preponderating influence of the landed and mechanical interests of the United States. The present measures, dictated by the present state of things, are in my judgment peculiarly favorable to the acceleration of this result; and I am surprised that our Eastern friends, instead of encouraging them, should be throwing obstructions in the way. A result at all times so desirable to them, and so well calculated to give them that weight in the scale of the Union which they now seem to think they do not possess, but which they have lately manifested great anxiety to possess.

Whilst upon this part of the subject, Mr. President, permit me to express my deep mortification and regret at the unfortunate differences of opinion which exist between the Eastern and Southern people respecting our foreign relations. I will not examine into the causes of these differences of opinion, because it might excite unpleasant feelings in some gentlemen, which I wish particularly to avoid. These differences are the more to be wondered at, when we all know that our interests are common in that respect; and that in relation to each other they are peculiarly mutual and reciprocal. Never were there people whose occupations rendered their interests more mutual and reciprocal than the Eastern and Southern people of this Union, whose wants and supplies were better suited to each other, or presented fewer points of rivalry. The Eastern people have ships and seamen, and delight in employment upon the water; the Southern have lands, and delight in agriculture. Their productions too are bulky and heavy, and peculiarly suited to furnish employment for the Eastern carriers, not only coastwise, but for foreign trade. The Southern people have no desire to enter into the competition, but are perfectly content to permit their Eastern friends to take the trouble of carrying their productions to the markets of their consumption, and to enrich themselves from the fruits of their labors and their speculations; yet, notwithstanding all these things, and notwithstanding we all know the horrible consequences of divisions, we still witness alarming differences of opinion, which have not only encouraged and invited the interference of a foreign nation in our political concerns, but have also pervaded social intercourse, and even materially lessened the enjoyments of society. And after all, Mr. President, permit me emphatically to ask you, to whose, or to what good? Why, sir, our foreign adversaries may profit by our divisions, but they are equally destructive to the real interests of all parties among ourselves.

Sir, without pressing this subject further, may I not be permitted to indulge the flattering hope, that when these solemn truths shall be presented to the serious reflection of all the people of the United States, in every quarter and section, that they may be impelled by a sense of common interests, and common dangers, to unite heart and hand against our common adversaries; and notwithstanding present appearances, that our unfortunate differences of opinion may finally eventuate in renewed acts of reciprocal kindness, confidence, and friendship?

Permit me now, sir, to inquire into the pretex-upon which the British Ministry undertake to justify these extraordinary Orders in Council, and I will venture to assert that they will be found both false and insincere. The pretext set up for the justification of these orders, is suggested to be founded on the right of retaliation upon their enemy. The right to retaliate through the United States is said to be founded on the culpable neglect of their Government to resist French aggressions upon their neutral rights, by which it is pretended that Great Britain has sustained an injury, and thus claims a right to counteract the injury through the United States. Upon the same pretext France claims and exercises what she calls the same right, in consequence of the culpable neglect of the United States in not resisting the aggressions of Great Britain. The suggestion of each is false in fact. The United States have not been guilty of any culpable abandonment of its rights in relation to either of the aggressing belligerents. The Government has constantly interposed all reasonable resistance to the aggressions of both; of which reasonable resistance it was the proper judge; at least it was entitled to its full share in the decision, and any forcible resistance to that decision when made was an act of war. I do not therefore propose to enter into the question, whether Great Britain or France first commenced their aggressions, since both were properly and reasonably resisted. But, if I were to express an opinion upon this question, I should have no hesitation in saying that Great Britain first began, and so far France has more pretex-

 There were many acts of the most serious aggressions committed by Great Britain, under pretended blockades, before the Berlin decree; and the impressment of American seamen was contemporaneous with the commencement of the war. (a) This was not, and is not the less an act of aggression, because it is stale, has been long practised, and because we are habituated to it—but it was not acquiesced in. It was met by reasonable remonstrance, and resistance, and therefore is no justification of the French decrees; but at the same time it takes away even the shadow of a pretext from Great Britain upon the question of who began to do wrong first; for there is a reciprocal condemnation of each other, and so far a joint exculpation of us, at least from the commencement of the wrong to either. But, sir, let me now examine the pretext of the British Ministry according to Mr. Canning's own exposition of it.

The acts of France complained of are admitted by Mr. Canning now to be merely nominal in relation to Great Britain, that they are utterly harmless and contemptible, that they have ceased to be mischievous, operative, &c. Yet he tells you that he will not revoke the Orders in Council for fear his motives in doing so may be mistaken; not that it is not in itself just and proper to revoke them, according to the principle of retaliation upon which they were originally adopted; but merely for fear his motive in doing an act of justice and propriety may be mistaken or misconceived by others. But, sir, let us hear him in his own words:

FEBRUARY, 1809.

Partial Repeal of the Embargo.

SENATE.

"The struggle has been viewed by other Powers, not without an apprehension that it might be fatal to this country. The British Government has not disguised from itself, that the trial of such an experiment might be arduous and long, though it has never doubted of the final issue. But if that issue, such as the British Government confidently anticipated, has providentially arrived much sooner than could even have been hoped; if 'the blockade of the continent,' as it has been triumphantly styled by the enemy, is raised even before it had been well established, and if that system, of which extent and continuity were the vital principles, is broken up into fragments, utterly harmless and contemptible, it is nevertheless important in the highest degree to the reputation of this country (a reputation which constitutes great part of her power) that this disappointment of the hopes of her enemies should not have been purchased by any concession; that not a doubt should remain to distant times of her determination and of her ability to have continued her resistance, and that no step which could even mistakenly be construed into concession, should be taken on her part, while the smallest link of the confederacy remained undissolved; or while it can be a question whether the plan devised for her destruction has, or has not, either completely failed, or been unequivocally abandoned." [Canning to Pinkney, Sept. 23, 1808.]

"The purpose of this letter is not to renew the discussion upon the subject of your proposal, but merely to clear up any misunderstanding which had existed between us in the course of that discussion. I cannot conclude it, however, without adverting very shortly to that part of your letter, in which you argue that the failure of France in the attempt to realize her gigantic project of the annihilation of the commerce of this country, removes all pretext for the continuance of the retaliatory system of Great Britain. This impotency of the enemy to carry his projects of violence and injustice into execution, might, with more propriety, be pleaded with him, as a motive for withdrawing decrees at once so indefensible, and so little efficacious for their purpose, than represented as creating an obligation upon Great Britain to desist from those measures of defensive retaliation, which those decrees have necessarily occasioned. If the foundation of the retaliating system of Great Britain was (as we contend it to have been) originally just, that system will be justifiably continued in force, not so long only as the decrees which produced it are mischievously operative, but until they are unequivocally abandoned; and, if it be thus consistent with justice to persevere in that system, it is surely no mean motive of policy for such perseverance, that a premature departure from it, while the enemy's original provocation remains unrepealed, might lead to false conclusions, as to the efficacy of the decrees of France, and might hold out a dangerous temptation to that Power to resort to the same system on any future occasion." [Canning to Pinkney, Nov. 22, 1808.]

What, sir, does Mr. Canning here tell us? Why, sir, on the 22d of September last, that the French blockading decrees were then broken up into fragments, utterly harmless and contemptible; and on the 22d of November following, that they had ceased to be mischievously operative, &c. &c. Retaliation may be defined an injury returned for a wrong received. Well, sir, if the United States had done no other wrong to Great Britain but neglecting to repel the wrong of France, and the wrong of France ceased to produce any injurious consequences, why not revoke the orders inflicting the most destructive injuries upon the United States? Why, Mr. Canning in substance tells us, not that it would be wrong to do so, but he is afraid that the world would mistake his motive for doing right. And, sir, is the commerce of the United States to be destroyed, the people to be colonized and taxed, and the nation to be insulted and degraded, merely because Mr. Canning fears, if he should cease to inflict these wrongs, his motive for ceasing to do so may be misconceived or mistaken! And are the people of the United States to be told that all these injuries and insults are to be continued merely to expiate Mr. Canning's idle and pretended fears, that his motive for his conduct may be mistaken? What, sir, can be more derogatory to the character? what more injurious to the interests? what more insulting to the understanding of the American people? Yet, sir, we are told there are no causes of war! We must wait for more degradation! Sir, Mr. Canning tells us he thinks this is no mean motive of policy for continuing these orders after the original causes ceased. Sir, I will not pretend to think against Mr. Canning upon this subject; but, sir, I think, and I know that it will be a mean, an infinitely mean motive of policy on our part to submit to his injuries, his insults, and his degradations, as well as his absurd and sophisticated exposition of his motives for them. But, sir, permit me again to ask if the United States had not a right to judge of the extent and mode of resisting the French decrees? They certainly had, and did so; and after having made their decision in those respects, a contrary hostile decision by Great Britain was an act of war against the United States; and, according to her own principle of retaliation, the proper act of retaliation on their part was an act of war, not indeed through the ribs of a third innocent, unoffending party, but directly back upon herself, and it ought instantly to have been resorted to upon her refusal to revoke her hostile orders.

But, sir, permit me to put this doctrine in a still stronger point of view. The right of retaliation, I presume, is equal and reciprocal among all nations, and when the British Ministry ventured to retaliate upon their enemy through us, they adopted that policy upon their own responsibility; they subjected themselves to all its consequences; we certainly had a right to adopt a counteracting policy; war would have been the natural, legitimate, and correct act of retaliation. But, sir, suppose I were now, in a spirit of mitigated retaliation, to propose to pass a law imposing a duty equal to one-half of the value of all the original productions of Great Britain, and direct, that all her vessels sailing with such productions either to Spanish America, or any of the American Indies or isles, or to any other place under the protection of the laws of nations, should first call at some port of the United States, either Boston, New York, Baltimore or Charleston, and there pay the tribute; and if they failed or refused so to do, to authorize our armed ships to capture and bring them in for condemnation; would not the proposition be thought extravagant and monstrous? the proposition of a madman? Yet, sir, it would be more reasonable than the Orders in Council, which are the same in substance, but were adopted without provocation or pretext. Yes, sir, the pretext is false, it is insincere. The real ground of the Orders in Council will be found in the settled determination of the British Cabinet to monopolize the commerce of the world, or to render it subservient to their own views and interests, and particularly to involve in this general destruction the commerce of the United States. Sir, I draw this conclusion not only from Mr. Canning's own prevaricating letters and sophisticated expositions, but from various intimations to that effect by the British jurists, and particularly from a late pamphlet, written it is said, under the direction of the Ministry, and for the express purpose of preparing the British nation and the world for the monstrous pretension. Indeed the production is ascribed to the elder Mr. Rose, one of the most influential advisers of the Cabinet, and it is extremely probable we shall see the doctrine openly avowed in the British Parliament, now expected to be in session. The pamphlet is entitled "Hints to both Parties," from which I beg leave to read a few extracts:

"The Orders in Council have been stigmatized, as being at once absurd and contemptible, in relinquishing the principle of right on which their justification is founded, for a paltry consideration of pounds, shillings and pence. But how can that measure be deemed absurd, which at once unites interest and policy? And so far from rendering Great Britain contemptible, how can she possibly assume a more dignified character, than in thus showing the world that Bonaparte, with all his dependent Kings, are but her tributaries; that they can receive no article either of comfort or necessity, without paying an acknowledgment to her maritime supremacy, and contributing to the expense of carrying on that war, which the ambition, injustice, and aggressions of their tyrant have rendered necessary."

Here, sir, we see a picture of the fantastic and gigantic attitude which the inflated pride of Great Britain has assumed. Bonaparte and all his dependent Kings are her tributaries, paying tribute to her treasury, and homage to her pride. Why, sir, to be sure, this dreaming delusive vision must be very fascinating to British pride, and gratifying to British cupidity, and I should have said nothing about the Ministry's indulging themselves in these delightful reveries, if they had not included the United States in the magnificent train of their humble tributaries. It is true, sir, they are not expressly included in this sentence, but they are made so in fact, and it was intended they should be so included, as I shall presently show by another quotation from this ministerial production. Yes, sir, I shall presently show you one single word, which is the key that unlocks the whole views of this energetic Ministry in relation to the United States. But let me first present you another passage, sir, which will serve to show how far this Ministry calculates upon effecting their objects by interfering in our political concerns, and by fomenting divisions and discontents among us? After speaking with apparent exultation of the assassination of the Emperor of Russia, in consequence of his interruptions of the trade of his subjects with Great Britain, an event impliedly admitted to have been produced by British stratagem, the author thus proceeds in page 37:

"If any further elucidation of the principle to which this event is ascribed were wanting, it promises to be found in the United States of America, where the cultivators of the soil are deprived of the fruits of their labors, and the merchants of their commercial gains, by the present embargo. This forced state of things cannot be of long continuance. Already have the Vermontese set the constituted authorities at defiance, and persist in carrying on their trade with the Canadians across Lake Champlain, while the Northern States manifest strong symptoms of discontent."

I shall only remark upon this sentence, that it serves to show how greedily these events were seized upon, and how greatly they were overrated, and proceed to the 39th page:

"From what has been adduced upon the subject of privations, it may be inferred that the attempts of other Powers to injure Great Britain, by pursuing this system, must be abortive. But it is not so with the same system adopted by Great Britain, in retaliation upon them. What they can only threaten, she can execute. While they can only partially restrict her commerce, her naval superiority gives her the means of annihilating theirs. The people, thus reduced to misery and distress, will consider their rulers as the authors of their sufferings; and this sentiment once excited, will lead to revolt, through revolt to revolution, through revolution to a change of measures, and ultimately to peace."

"Let then the principle of the Orders in Council be strictly enforced. When the enemy feels the pressure of our retaliations, and relaxes his decrees, we should reject, instead of admitting those commodities, by the sale of which he procures resources for his revenue, gives relief to his subjects, encourages them to the continuance of the war, and reconciles them to his authority."

Here sir, we see the vital principle of all our wrongs, of all our sufferings. It is the supremacy of the British navy. What others threaten, Great Britain can execute. While her commerce is protected, she has the means of annihilating the commerce of others. But this is not all of the horrid picture which is here exhibited. Although the British navy is admitted to be the destructive machine for inflicting all the wrongs upon the people of the United States, they will be told to look for the real cause of their sufferings to their rulers, as the authors of them; and this sentiment once excited, will lead to revolt, through revolt to revolution, through revolution to a change of measures, &c.; and thus the people are to be deluded and made the unsuspecting instruments of their own slavery and sufferings. And Mr. President, permit me, with the most humiliated feelings as an American citizen, to ask, whether the course of events in this country has not corresponded precisely with these anticipations?

and whether there be a doubt that the authors of these anticipations have also been instrumental in practising these delusions upon the people for the purpose of effecting their objects, and realizing their calculations and predictions? But, Mr. President, may we not indulge the pleasing hope, that these unfortunate delusions of the people are nearly at an end? or that they will be so, as soon as the real authors of their delusions and sufferings are pointed out to them? I will now turn over to the next page, and there you will find the key which unlocks the whole iniquitous views of this energetic Ministry towards the United States. The author is urging the country gentlemen in England to unite with the Ministry in this gigantic project of universal dominion on the ocean, and thus he expresses himself:

"Many gentlemen connected with the landed interest opposed the substitution of sugar for corn in the distilleries, as a discouragement to the agriculture of Great Britain. How much more strongly ought they to oppose these licenses to trade in the staple commodities of France and Holland; not only on the same principle, but on every consideration of sound policy? The former measure is temporary, the latter is permanent. The former gives relief and encouragement to our own subjects; the latter gives relief and encouragement to our enemies. The former promotes the agriculture of our own colonies; the latter promotes the agriculture of our enemies. The former enables us to consume an additional quantity of sugar, which is paid for in British corn, or manufactures; neither of which are taken in exchange for the commodities imported under the latter. The sugars imported under the former, are brought home in British ships, and add to that carrying trade which is the nursery of our naval strength; the articles imported under the latter, are brought in foreign vessels, and increase the naval strength of other Powers. Let the country gentlemen, then, unite their efforts, and support the cause of British commerce, and the British navy, against the agriculture, the commerce, and the navy, of our enemies or rivals."

Here the United States are expressly included in this scene of general destruction meditated against commerce. Enemies or rivals! The word rivals, sir, is the key which unlocks the designs of the Ministry against the United States. Do you suppose, sir, the author did not know the meaning of the word rivals, or that it was slipped in without design? No, sir, it was intended to tell the British nation that they must not stop at the destruction of the commerce of their enemies. The destruction must be indiscriminate; it must extend to rivals as well as enemies. And, sir, who are the rivals of Great Britain in commerce? The United States, and the United States alone. The term rivals, is as descriptive of the United States as the term United States itself. I think, sir, from the combined influence of all the preceding circumstances, it is demonstrated beyond a doubt, that all our sufferings arise from the settled determination of the British Ministry to exercise exclusive dominion upon the ocean. To monopolize the commerce of the world, or render it subservient to British views and British interests.

Permit me now, sir, to select another act of this energetic administration towards the United States for a few animadversions. I mean, sir, their interfering in our political concerns in many respects, but particularly by holding out inducements to our citizens to violate our laws; and even appealing to the people against their own Government, by some invisible agency. I allude, sir, to the order (b) issued shortly after the passing of our embargo laws, for receiving vessels which should violate those laws, even without the customary papers; and to the publication of Mr. Canning's letter addressed to Mr. Pinkney on the 23d of September last, in one of the newspapers printed in Boston.

I consider, both these acts as highly insulting to the American people and Government, and they ought to have been repelled with indignation, and would have justified hostility itself. Sir, in issuing this order, the British Ministry appears to me to have set a dangerous example to other nations, particularly to the United States, because the United States might retort her favorite retaliatory system upon herself. Suppose, sir, immediately upon the receipt of that order in the country, the United States had retorted by passing a law holding out inducements to British seamen to desert from their ships, and to afford them protection, and even to promise them protection and rewards upon bringing in the ships themselves, Do you think, sir, that Great Britain would have been altogether free from apprehensions as to the effects of such a retaliatory measure? The British fleet, sir, is extremely formidable to the Government—the floating dungeons and severe discipline, not always palatable to the seamen. They have several times been very much out of humor, and it is impossible to foresee the consequences of the inducements the United States have in their power to offer the disaffected. But sir, this subject presents another consideration to my mind. In the year 1793, Great Britain entered into the war against France solely upon the ground of resisting the spirit of disorganization, which, it was alleged, France was introducing into all nations. It was for the alleged act of separating the people from their Government. Now, sir, how is Great Britain likely to wind up the war? Why, sir, she seems now to have become the champion of the very system against which she originally entered into the war. She now seems to have become the common disturber of the peace of all nations. Surely, sir, the British nation or Parliament never can, upon cool reflection, approve of this profligate act of its Ministry.

Let me now, sir, implore your most serious attention to the publication of Mr. Canning's letter in the Boston newspaper. The time and circumstances attending its publication aggravate the act. It was an unpardonable insult, and ought to be repelled with indignation. Particularly insulting was it to those for whose use it was more immediately intended. Is it possible that the British Parliament or nation can justify this act of abandoned profligacy? In the cases of Genet, Yrujo, &c., their Ministerial functions were suspended. Their recall was immediately requested, and complied with. In those cases, the authors were known; in this, he is concealed. The publication is conducted, or directed, by an invisible hand. But, sir, the act is not the less dishonorable or reprehensible on that account.

No, sir, the author, skulking from public view, stamps the character of the transaction with peculiar disgrace. Insults of this kind, sir, have been practised upon the British Government and nation. Let us see how insults of this nature were received and treated by that Government and nation. Several cases of this nature have occurred in Great Britain, but I will select one in point, which occurred in the time of George the First, in the year 1727. It will be found recorded in "Belsham's Memoirs of George the First," pages 192, 193, and in the proceedings of Parliament of that day, in reference to that subject. These I have examined, and find them still more pointed than the historical account of them, particularly the resolutions of the House of Commons, which are highly worthy of imitation. They are contained in a very large book, and I therefore declined bringing it to the Senate. The case was, sir, that the Imperial Resident at the Court of London, Count de Palm, was instructed by His Government to present to His Britannic Majesty a strong and pointed memorial against certain expressions or intimations in the King's Speech to Parliament, which were suggested by the Imperial Court to be unfounded and false, as they probably were, &c., &c., and to publish the memorial for the information of the British nation. How, sir, did the British Government and nation receive and repel this insult? Sir, it was received with universal detestation, and repelled with universal indignation. It rushed, for the moment, the spirit of party. It was deemed an insult to every man, woman, and child, in Great Britain, &c., &c. But, sir, let me give you the account in the words of the historian.

"With the memorial also was transmitted, from Vienna, a letter from the Chancellor, Count Zinzendorf, to Count Palm, expressly commanding him, in the name of His Imperial Majesty, after presenting the memorial to the King of Great Britain, to publish it, together with the letter annexed, for the information of the British nation. The Chancellor Zinzendorf affirms, in this letter, that, 'it is easy to see that the speech was made for no other purpose but to exhort the nation to a rupture and open war with the Emperor and Spain, and to make the Parliament approve the precipitate and burdensome measures which the Government has taken for private ends, too well known. That, on the first report of these false suppositions, the Emperor, and the King of Spain, in order to silence them, proposed a formal act, de non offendendo, into which all the contracting parties of the Treaties of Vienna and Hanover might enter, till such time as a definitive agreement might have taken place, but that this proposition was rejected: He says that, the articles of the quadruple alliance are expressly and publicly laid down as the unalterable basis of the Treaty of Vienna, and, that to affirm, that by a secret pact, concluded at the same time, engagements have been entered into by their Imperial and Catholic Majesties, repugnant to the same, is an outrageous insult to the majesty of the two contracting Powers, who have a right to demand a reparation proportioned to the enormity of the affront. And, that the high contracting parties had no other view than that of making peace between themselves without injuring any one else.' The allegations contained in this letter and memorial seem but too well founded, but the intemperate language of these papers gave high and just offence; and Mr. Shippen, Mr. Hungerford, Sir William Wyndham, and all the leaders of opposition in Parliament, warmly concurred in the address presented to the Throne on this occasion, and which passed the House without a dissentient vote. And an order was sent to M. de Palm, signifying 'that the said Palm, having delivered into the hands of His Majesty, at his late audience, a memorial highly injurious to the honor and dignity of his Crown; and having, also, publicly dispersed the same, with a letter from the Count de Zinzendorf to him, the said Palm, still more insolent than the memorial, His Majesty looked upon him no longer as public Minister, and required him forthwith to depart out of this kingdom.'

Here, sir, we find the Imperial Resident, the Count de Palm, immediately ordered out of the country, and the nation rising into instant war to repel the insult and retrieve the wounded honor of the nation. Here, sir, we find the bickerings of party silenced; we find every heart united; we find the opposition facing about, and the whole nation presenting a hostile front to the authors of the insult. Can you believe, Mr. President, that a nation which feels so just a sensibility, when an insult is inflicted by others upon itself, can for a moment justify its Ministry in inflicting a similar insult upon another nation? Can you believe, sir, that the British nation or Ministry can feel any respect for those for whose use the publication was intended, when you contrast their conduct with the generous and correct conduct of the British Opposition? When, instead of rousing every American feeling to repel the insult with indignation, it seems to have been received with complacency, and directed to its iniquitous end! And shall we be compelled to believe that all honorable feeling is lost and buried under the dominant influence of party sensibility? Surely, sir, this cannot be an attitude which any party would wish to assume, and thus present itself either to the American or the British nation! Yet, sir, the only difference in the character of the insult in the two cases is, that in one the author was known and avowed, and in the other, he secures himself by his invisibility. But, sir, if the author of the publication be an authorized British agent, and he will avow himself in a bold and manly way, I have no hesitation in saying he ought instantly to be sent out of the country, let the consequences be what they may. Sir, in no country in the world ought this point to be held more sacred, and the insult more firmly repelled than in the United States, where our presses are under no restraint—where not only freedom, but licentiousness, characterizes almost every page.

But, sir, our degradation does not stop here. Let me select one other act for a single animadversion. The British are now driving a forced trade, in violation of our laws, on our Southern frontier; and whilst it demonstrates the importance of our commerce to their prosperity, it at the same time degrades us below the Spanish colonies; for they do sometimes resist such aggressions, but we take them with patient forbearance and quiet submission. Let me now, sir, compare the injuries and insults received by the United States, and by other nations, from Great Britain; and contrast the resistance. Sir, I wish I could spare myself the pain and mortification of performing this task; but, sir, I deem it indispensable. It is a sacred duty I owe to the people, and must be performed. Sir, the demand upon Denmark, whilst observing an honest neutrality, was, to be sure, flagitious, but it was resisted by war. The overture to Sweden, whilst in the depth of distress and difficulties, to be sure, was perfidious, but the messenger was ordered to be incarcerated. The conduct in Portugal, whilst weak—deserted by its Government—conquered almost by a foreign host—was cruel and insulting; but it was repelled with indignation, and perhaps by hostility. The horrid catastrophe of the bloody tragedy in Spain is not yet known; and as my mind is perfectly exempt from even the semblance of a wish to exaggerate British outrage, so I will suppress my anticipations in relation to the fate of the Spanish fleet. Whilst the United States, more injured and insulted than all these nations together, are alone to bear with patient meekness and long-suffering; and the gallant, honorable, and high-minded American people to be told there are no causes of war!—that they must be still more humiliated—still further degraded! Wait, with patience, till another catalogue of injuries and insults shall stain the fair, unsullied page of your national character! And some men go so far as to recommend submission altogether! Mr. President, the love of peace is one of the most amiable passions of the human mind. It is fondly cherished by the American people. But, sir, when it degenerates into a fear of war, it becomes, of all passions, the most despicable. In its application, it is, of all others, the most unfortunate and ruinous to a nation. It excites contempt and invites attack from abroad, whilst at home it dispirits the people, and disqualifies them from exerting the energy they possess. Is there not ground to fear, sir, that Great Britain has mistaken the character of the people and Government of the United States in that respect? And, if so, is it of no importance to undeceive her? And how can this be done? It can only be done by manly, open, direct, and honorable war. Let war, then, sir, be openly resorted to, and vigorously conducted. Give the people an opportunity of retrieving their character, or at least of proclaiming their true character to the world. It will even be found economical of blood and treasure; it will in the end be favorable to peace itself; for, sir—permit me to borrow an appropriate and emphatical expression of a gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. HILLHOUSE)—it will be a war for peace. Yes, sir, as that gentleman expresses it, we must fight for peace. Without war, or fortunate events abroad, I am satisfied we can have no peace.

I fear, Mr. President, I am trespassing too much on the kind indulgence of the Senate, but, sir, I cannot conclude my observations without examining the most prominent objections urged against a war with Great Britain. This I propose to do with candor and impartiality.

The first objection is derived from the supposed character of the quarrel in which Great Britain is engaged. It is said she is fighting the battles of the world against the spirit of French domination. That her national existence is at stake. That she is fighting merely for her natale solum, &c., whilst France is contending for the dominion of the world. This is not the true character of the quarrel. They are both fighting for domination; each upon the element to which he can apply his power. France claims domination on the land—Great Britain on the ocean. But it is said if the Emperor of France should succeed and destroy Great Britain, or control her fleet, his power would be directed against the United States, and they would be the next victim. This is a remote and extremely improbable contingency. It is my opinion that the chances are greatly in favor of Great Britain's succeeding in the contest; and I believe that our situation would be just as critical, if Great Britain, having the command of her fleet, had also the command of the men on the continent, as if France, having the command of the men on the continent, had also the command of the British fleet. In either event we could expect no mercy, and our only reliance for preserving our independence would, as it ought always to be, upon our own courage and resources. I would, therefore, deprecate either of these events. But, sir, whilst I should deplore the circumstances of either of these nations subduing the other, I think the chances of ultimate success in favor of Great Britain. I will state a few of the grounds of this opinion. In Great Britain the Government is strong, stable, popular, and from her insular situation, the navy affords the nation a complete protection against foreign invasion. The resources of Great Britain are great, and her people brave and loyal, &c. These afford her strong securities. In France, the order of things is scarcely settled. The dynasty is new, probably depending on the life of a single individual; the chances of his death alone, and the probable consequences flowing from that single event, give to Great Britain a better prospect of final success in the contest than any reasonable calculation of probable events would give France, in relation to the conquest of Great Britain. This consideration, therefore, has no alarms or terrors for me. It is certainly a mere possible contingency against every calculation upon probable events—it is visionary. But, sir, where does this sensibility—(I will not call it sympathy, because Great Britain has no feeling from which it can be derived) where, I say, sir, does this sensibility for the safety of Great Britain exist? I believe in the United States alone; certainly not in the British nation nor Ministry. Let me call your recollection to Mr. Canning's language on this subject. Do you hear him express any whining fears of the loss of national existence?

any timid alarms from the influence of French power? What does he say, sir? On the 23d of September last he tells you, that Bonaparte's gigantic projects of domination were then broken up into fragments, utterly harmless and contemptible. And on the 22d of November last, that Bonaparte's decrees were merely nominal; that from his impotency they had ceased to be mischievous in practice, &c., &c. And what do the Ministerial pamphleteers tell you? Why, sir, that Bonaparte and his train of dependent Kings are the tributaries of Great Britain; and that the British rivals also shall follow in the train to grace the magnificence of the scene, and shall contribute their homage also to the supremacy of the British navy! Is this the language of a nation struggling for its existence? Is this the language of a nation trembling with alarms of subjugation from French power? No, sir, the British nation has no such feelings nor apprehensions; this sensibility exists only in the United States. If Great Britain really felt these alarms, she would feel more respect for the rights of other nations; she would moderate her claims upon the ocean; she would leave to other nations some little share in the exercise of rights upon that element. But, sir, where will this argument end? If on account of some remote, improbable, and contingent danger, we are to bear all the wrongs already heaped upon us by Great Britain, when are we to stop? When will the load become too grievous to be borne? I wish this point ascertained and fixed, that Great Britain may know it, as well as ourselves; for there is no doubt she will pile on us as long as we will bear, and perhaps she may overstep the bounds from the want of knowing the limits. Sir, these grounds of objection are unsubstantial; they are nothing more than mere pretexts for indulging our habitual predilections for Great Britain, and if we think otherwise we deceive ourselves. The plausibility of these suggestions may, perhaps, however, have extended their influence beyond the sphere of British predilections. But, sir, I am convinced in all those cases, it has arisen from the want of due consideration of the subject.

The only effects of entering into the war against Great Britain, would be to lessen the range of her commerce, and limit the dangerous influence of her navy, and thus to restore to ourselves some of our lost commercial rights. But her national existence even in that case would not be endangered, and even if it were, she could stop the war at pleasure, by doing us less than justice. (c)

Indulge me now, sir, in examining another objection against entering into a war with Great Britain; which, while it is the most unaccountable, has, I believe more influence on the minds of gentlemen, than all other considerations taken together. It is, sir, the strange suggestion, that the British Ministry had refused to accede to the just and reasonable propositions made on the part of the United States, from a belief of the insincerity of our Government in conducting the negotiation; and that, if the overture could be renewed in sincerity and good faith, it would be accepted on the part of the British Government. Groundless and extravagant as this supposition is, permit me to make a few observations on it. In the first place I would ask, by whom have our negotiations with Great Britain been conducted since the commencement of the present Administration? First, by Mr. King. Has Mr. King ever made any intimations of insincerity on the part of the Administration during his agency? I believe not. I believe that Mr. King entirely approved of the course pursued during his time, and I am sure the Administration highly approved of his conduct. I believe it was judicious, honorable, and dignified. I presume some respect might be paid to his negotiations by Federal gentlemen, for I believe he has not yet forfeited their confidence, if I am to form an opinion from the votes given to him for the Vice Presidency at the late election. The Federalists gave him all the votes which were at their disposal. The next agent on the part of the United States was Mr. Monroe. From late occurrences it cannot be presumed that Mr. Monroe is in possession of the knowledge of any circumstance of insincerity against the Administration, which he would withhold from the public. Mr. Monroe has, in fact, written a book. He has told all he did know. Although, sometime since, we often heard it said, he could tell more than he would tell. But no evidence of insincerity has yet appeared. Our present agent is Mr. Pinkney. He is a Federalist: an intelligent, honorable, and respectable Federalist. Some confidence, it is supposed, might be paid to his opinions, and communications. Yet it is known that he approves of the measures of the Administration, as far as they go; but he would go further. If, however, sir, gentlemen disrespect the testimony of all these witnesses, let me present them with another, to whom, upon this point at least, they will certainly yield some respect. It is Mr. Canning. Although his desire to cherish and encourage this delusion may clearly be seen, through the prevarications of his two last letters to Mr. Pinkney, yet he expressly tenders Mr. Pinckney the homage of his respect for the candor and liberality displayed by Mr. Pinkney in conducting the negotiation, and it is very easy to discern that he is compelled to respect the motives which dictated Mr. Pinkney's instructions. (d) But, sir, it was placed completely in Mr. Canning's power to put the sincerity of our Government to the test, by accepting, instead of rejecting, the frank and reasonable proposition offered to him by Mr. Pinkney. His rejection of it is proof positive, that he did not wish to put the sincerity of our Government to the test. Again, sir, let me beg your attention to another consideration. Whatever errors the political opponents of the President may fancy they see in his general character, their prejudices could never carry them so far, as not to exempt him entirely from the passions of political ambition, and personal aggrandizement. His voluntary retirement from his present station, is irrefragable proof of his exemption from these passions. In a few days he goes into a chosen retirement, to enjoy the blessings, in common with his fellow-citizens, which his wise Administration has spread over this extended country; and, sir, in his solitude, with a heart overflowing with gratitude, I sincerely hope he will enjoy all the happiness which is the just reward of the amiableness and philanthropy of his character. But, sir, under such circumstances, what possible inducement could he have for an act of insincerity in conducting our foreign relations? What possible inducement could he have to involve his country unnecessarily in war? In his retirement, he will be as much subject to the good or bad consequences of his own measures, as any other citizen; it is not, therefore, possible to conceive that he would adopt ruinous measures, while he himself would be subject to all their consequences. No, sir, this suggestion of insincerity is nothing more than a miserable delusive vision; a mere catch of the human mind, to indulge itself in its own passions and prejudices, when there is no justification that can be derived from more substantial considerations. It is the result of a forced suspicion, for the want of some document or paper, as a justification for the indulgence of these unfortunate passions. Observe, too, the inconsistencies and absurd contradictions of gentlemen laboring under the influence of these passions. In the same breath, sir, they accuse the President of such a devotion to a vain philanthropy and speculative philosophy, as to disqualify him for the rugged duties of a politician, and of an insincerity in conducting our foreign relations, with a view of involving the United States in war, in direct opposition to the habitual and dominant passions of his mind. No, sir, the President is the lover of peace, and I fear that his amiable and anxious solicitude to preserve it, may have had some tendency towards rendering war indispensable. Sir, these prejudices and jealousies, so causelessly indulged by gentlemen, may have, it is feared, the most unfortunate influence upon the interests of the American people, and upon the character of the American nation. For, sir, when jealousies and prejudices once take hold of the human mind, they distort all facts, they invert all just inferences, and they make themselves the food for their own subsistence and indulgence.

Let me now, sir, solicit your attention to one more consideration in relation to this subject. If it be once admitted that the hostile measures of Great Britain against the commerce of the United States, are dictated by the settled determination of the Ministry to exercise exclusive dominion upon the ocean, you will find in that principle alone the solution of all our difficulties in our negotiations with Great Britain, without resorting to the delusive and extravagant suspicion of an insincerity on the part of the Administration. That this is the real principle which has dictated her measures, I think I have demonstrated beyond the possibility of a doubt; and nothing but adverse events in Europe, or war by the United States, can, in my judgment, induce her to recede from a principle at once so fascinating to national pride, and gratifying to mercantile cupidity.

No, sir, I am perfectly satisfied, if the Administration were to send a deputation of a chosen band of British partisans, even headed by Mr. Erskine himself, that the British Ministry would not sacrifice this favorite visionary project of aggrandizement upon the altar of their combined supplications and intercessions. This is not a question of mere complaisance between the two nations. It is a question of power, of lawless, unrelenting power on one side, against right, unquestionable unassuming right on the other.

Mr. President, does it not appear from a review of all the facts and observations I have now had the honor of presenting to this Senate, that forbearance has extended to its utmost limit; that without some relaxation on the part of the belligerents, war is inevitable; and that we have no expedient left, but to demonstrate by our own energies, both to Great Britain and France, how much more interest they have in cultivating our friendship than in provoking our enmity? Mr. President, from these observations, it will be also readily seen that the proposition before us is pitched to a key several tones below that which my wishes and my views of the public interests would strike. I hope, sir, it is still within the limits of national honor and national interests. Strike only one key lower, sir, and I fear it will sound in national disgrace and dishonor. How desirable, therefore, is it, sir, that we should all, of all parties, unite in some proposition to save the honor and protect the interests of the nation? And may not this yet be hoped for, when Federalists, as well as Republicans, have all entered their solemn protest against submission? After having displayed an almost unanimity in favor of resistance, may we not hope for an equal unanimity in favor of the extent and mode of resistance? May we not indulge the hope, that gentlemen who differ with us upon political subjects generally, will now meet us upon this proposition of conciliation and concession? Particularly, sir, when they must know and see the dangers of division! When other nations have lately presented so many instructions and horrible examples of divisions; that at all times one party is as much the victim of them as the other; that the ruin to both is equal and indiscriminate, and the advantages alone to the common adversary of both. And, sir, can it be necessary to urge any arguments to those who have usually associated in political measures and opinions against the ruinous effects of divisions amongst themselves? Surely not, sir. The ruinous effects must be obvious to every gentleman. Is it not better then, sir; is it not more honorable, wise, and magnanimous, for each gentleman to concede something of the particular views which he has taken of our difficulties, to the varying views of his friend and associate, than by pertinaciously adhering to the full extent of his own, paralyze and destroy the views of both? The spirit of conciliation and concession is peculiarly recommended by the novelty and difficulty of our situation; and surely, sir, no gentleman has yielded to its influence more readily, or to a greater extent, than myself. I could not give a stronger example of its operating influence on myself, than the proposition now under consideration affords; and I would require no greater concession on the part of any other gentleman. Let us then, sir, unite in this proposition. I believe it will save the honor of the nation; it will settle for us the question of peace or war, by the meeting of the next Congress; it will be a continual protest against the hostile edicts of the aggressing belligerents; and it will give us time for effectual and active preparations for defence and of offence. Let us then, for the present, assume this attitude, and direct all our attention to those indispensable objects. Let us meet here in May next, in a state of readiness for war; and if, in the interval, no relaxation of the hostile orders and edicts of the belligerents should take place, let us then call into action the whole resources and energies of the nation to assert our rights, and to do ourselves that justice which is now so ruinously and iniquitously withheld.

[NOTES.]

(c) Extract from a convention between His Britannic Majesty and the Empress of Russia, signed at London, 15th of March, 1793.

"Article 3. Their said Majesties reciprocally engage to shut all their ports against French ships; not to permit the exportation, in any case, from their said ports for France, of any military or naval stores, or corn, grain, salt meat, or other provisions; and to take all other measures in their power for injuring the commerce of France, and for bringing her, by such means, to just conditions of peace.

"Article 4. Their Majesties engage to unite all their efforts to prevent other Powers, not implicated in this war, from giving, on this occasion of common concern to every civilized State, any protection whatever, directly or indirectly, in consequence of their neutrality, to the commerce or property of the French, on the sea or in the ports of France."

A similar treaty was entered into between His Britannic Majesty and the King of Spain, on the 23d of May following; with the King of Prussia, on the 14th July following; and with the Emperor of Austria, on the 30th of August following.

Extract of a letter from Thomas Pinckney to the Secretary of State, dated London, July 5th, 1793.

"I urged every argument that suggested itself to me, in support of the neutral rights which I contended were injured in this instance; pointed to inconveniences that would attend the execution of the instructions, and urged that the case put by Vattel, of a well grounded hope of reducing the enemy by famine, did not exist, provisions being cheaper in the ports of France than in those of England. Lord Grenville, on being asked, said Spain would pursue the same line of conduct; and upon its being objected, that even their late convention with Russia did not extend to this subject, he answered that, though it was not expressly mentioned, it was fully understood by both parties to be within the intention of it. At the close of the conversation, I told him I should transmit these instructions to you, accompanied by his reasons in their justification. Lord Grenville spoke in high terms of approbation of the answers to Mr. Hammond's memorial, which he received by the packet.

Extract from a report made by a committee of the Senate on the 18th of April, 1808, on the subject of foreign relations, recapitulating the order of belligerent aggressions on neutral trade.

"1st. The British order of June, 1803, unlawfully restricting the trade of the United States with a certain portion of the unblockaded ports of her enemies, and condemning vessels with innocent cargoes, on a return from ports where they had deposited contraband articles.

"2d. The capture and condemnation in the British Courts of Admiralty of American property, on a pretended principle, debarring neutral nations from a trade with the enemies of Great Britain interdicted in time of peace. The injuries suffered by the citizens of the United States, on this head, arose not from any public order of the British Council, but from a variation in the principle upon which the Courts of Admiralty pronounced their decisions. These decisions have indeed again varied, without any new Orders of Council being issued; and, in the higher Courts of Admiralty, some of the decisions, which had formed the greatest cause for complaint, have been reversed and the property restored. There still remains, however, a heavy claim of indemnity for confiscations, which were made during the period of these unwarrantable decisions, and for which all negotiation has hitherto proved unavailing.

"3d. Blockades notified to the Minister of the United States at London, and thence made a ground of capture against the trade of the United States, in entire disregard of the law of nations, and even of the definition of legal blockades, laid down by the British Government itself. Examples of these illegitimate blockades, will be found in the notifications of the blockade of May 16th, 1808, of the coast from the river Elbe inclusive—blockade of 11th May, 1807, expounded 19th of June, 1807, of the Elbe, Weser, and Ems, and the coast between the same—blockade 11th of May, 1807, of the Dardanelles and Smyrna—blockade of the 8th of January, 1808, of Carthage, Cadiz and St. Lucar, and of all the intermediate ports between Carthage and St. Lucar, comprehending a much greater extent of coast than the whole British navy could blockade, according to the established law of nations.

"4th. To these injuries, immediately authorized by the British Government, might be added other spurious blockades by British naval commanders, particularly that of the island of Curraçoa, which for a very considerable period was made a pretext for very extensive spoiliations on the commerce of the United States.

"5th. The British Proclamation of October last, which makes it the duty of the British officers to impress from American merchant vessels, all of such of their crews as might be taken or mistaken for British subjects—those officers being the sole and absolute judges in the case.

"For the decrees and acts of the French Government, violating the maritime law of nations in respect to the United States, the committee refer to the instances contained in the report of the Secretary of State, January 25th, 1806, to the Senate; in one of which, viz. a decree of the French General Ferrand, at St. Domingo, are regulations sensibly affecting the neutral and commercial rights of the United States.

"The French act next in order of time is, the decree of November 21, 1806—declaring the British Isles in a state of blockade, and professing to be a retaliation on antecedent proceedings of Great Britain violating the law of nations.

"This decree was followed, first by the British order of January, 1807, professing to be a retaliation on that decree, and subjecting to capture the trade of the United States, from the port of one belligerent to a port of another—and secondly, by the orders of November last, professing to be a further retaliation on the same decree, and prohibiting the commerce of neutrals, with the enemies of Great Britain, as explained in the aforesaid letter of Mr. Erskine:

"These last British orders again, have been followed by the French decree of December 17th, purporting to be a retaliation on the said orders, and to be put in force against the commerce of the United States, as stated in the aforesaid letter of Mr. Champagny."

(b) GEORGE R.—Instruction to the commanders of our ships of war and privateers; given at our Court at Windsor, the 11th day of April, in the 48th year of our reign.

"Our will and pleasure is, that you do not interrupt any neutral vessel laden with lumber and provisions, and going to any of our colonies, islands or settlements in the West Indies or South America, to whomsoever the property may appear to belong, and notwithstanding such vessel may not have regular clearances and documents on board; and in case any vessel shall be met with, and be in her due course to the alleged port of her destination, an endorsement shall be made on one or more of the principal papers of such vessel, specifying the destination alleged, and the place where the vessel was so visited. And in case any vessel so laden shall arrive and deliver her cargo at any of our colonies, islands or settlements aforesaid, such vessel shall be permitted to receive her freight, and to depart, either in ballast, or with goods that may be legally exported in such vessel, and to proceed to any unblockaded port, notwithstanding the present hostilities, or any future hostilities which may take place; and a passport for such purpose shall be granted to the vessel by the Governor, or other person, having the chief civil command in such colony, island or settlement. G. R."

(c) Can any thing be more important to the United States, than to ascertain with unequivocal certainty the true principle upon which the Orders in Council are founded? If, as I conscientiously believe, they are founded upon the principle of exclusive dominion upon the ocean; what would be the effects of a war with France, which is recommended as a palliative by some gentlemen? Would it not be to rivet upon the United States the commercial shackles under which they are now groaning? In what character would this nation act with Great Britain in the war? As a colony, or as an independent nation? In the event of success in establishing the principle of the war, the exclusive dominion of Great Britain on the ocean; what share of jurisdiction would she deal out to the United States? What share could her rivals expect from her domineering pride, her spirit of monopoly, and her mercantile cupidity? Fellow citizens! ponder upon these questions!

(d) The following paragraph contains an extraordinary example of Mr. Canning's prevarications. It is taken from his letter to Mr. Pinkney, of the 22d November last. The object of writing this letter, appears principally to have been, to prepare Parliament, now probably in session, by anticipation, for the explanation of an assertion made by him to the preceding Parliament. It is presumed, he thought this assertion necessary to induce Parliament to give his energetic Orders in Council the form of law. Hear him, in his own words—

"It is to these missions that I particularly referred, when I said that I had 'more than once expected you to open a correspondence with me upon the subject of the Orders in Council.' This expectation it was that alone prevented the sending instructions to Mr. Erskine to reply to the note addressed to him by Mr. Madison, on the 25th of March, in answer to that note of Mr. Erskine's in which he communicated the Orders in Council, and in allusion to these missions, particularly to that of the Ossage, and to the expectation which had been founded here, upon the return here of that vessel after its voyage to France, it was, that I made that declaration in Parliament which, I see, has been the subject of some misapprehension, (I will not say misrepresentation) in America, that 'since the termination of Mr. Rose's mission, the American Government had not made any communication here in the shape of remonstrance, or in a tone of irritation.'"

The public will doubtless be surprised to be informed, that previous to Mr. Canning's making this unfounded assertion in Parliament, he had not only received from Mr. Pinkney the most pointed and eloquent remonstrance against these Orders in Council, within a very few days after they were first issued, but that he had also previously received the most formal and urgent remonstrance from Mr. Madison, dated — day of —, through Mr. Erskine; the medium of communication pointed out by himself. I had, on a former occasion, made such observations in the Senate upon this profligate conduct, as it appeared to me to merit. The repetition therefore was deemed unnecessary in this debate, although the subject was intimately connected with it. But as those observations have never found their way to the public view, and as it is deemed highly important that this transaction should appear in its true character before the public, I have thought proper to subjoin it by way of note; and merely to remark, that the assertion made by Mr. Canning was a false suggestion, both in its essence, and in its consequences; and even, according to the most indulgent construction of Mr. Canning's own dexterous explanatory equivocation, it is an intentional suppression of the truth. How far the British Parliament will be pleased, or feel itself disrespected, in being thus entrapped into a measure, involving the deepest interests of that country, is for its exclusive determination. But it must be peculiarly aggravating to the American people to be informed, that an attempt has been made to blot them from the list of independent nations, to colonize, and to tax them, upon no better foundation than a mere Ministerial stratagem.

"The said printed paper was brought up to the table, and read.

"The said printed paper is bound up with the other papers of this session.

"Resolved, nemine contradicente, That an humble Address be presented to His Majesty, to express the highest resentment of this House at the affront and indignity offered to his Most Sacred Majesty, by the memorial delivered by Monsieur de Palm, the Emperor's Resident, and at his insolence in printing and dispersing the same throughout the Kingdom; to declare their utmost abhorrence of this audacious manner of appealing to the people against his Majesty, and their detestation of the presumptuous and vain attempt, in endeavoring to instil into the minds of any of His Majesty's faithful subjects, the least distrust or diffidence in his most sacred royal word:

"To return His Majesty the thanks of this House for his care and vigilance in discovering the secret and pernicious designs of his enemies, and his goodness in communicating to his Parliament the dangers that threatened this Kingdom; and to assure His Majesty that this House will stand by, and support His Majesty against all his open and secret enemies, both at home and abroad; and effectually defeat the expectations of all such as may have in any manner countenanced, encouraged, or abetted, the disturbers of the public tranquillity, in this extravagant insult upon His Majesty; or flattered them with hopes, that an obstinate perseverance in their destructive measures could stagger the firmness of the British nation in vindication of His honor and in the defence of their rights and privileges."

The just concern you express for my honor, and the dignity of the Crown, is very becoming a British Parliament; and this fresh proof of your confidence in me will convince the world that all attempts to divide our hearts and interests will be vain and ineffectual."

TUESDAY, February 14.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made by Mr. HILLHOUSE yesterday; and

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to examine and report whether any, and what, further regulations or provisions are necessary to check the allowance or payment of extravagant claims, or unreasonable accounts, and to prevent an improper expenditure of public money; and that the committee be authorized to call on the several Departments for such information and papers as may be necessary to aid them in their inquiry; and to report by bill or otherwise.

Ordered, That Messrs. GILES, HILLHOUSE, and CRAWFORD, be the committee.

Mr. GREGG, from the committee appointed on the subject, reported a bill authorizing an augmentation of the Marine Corps; and the bill was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. GREGG also reported a letter and estimate from the Secretary of the Navy, on the subject, for consideration.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act extending the right of suffrage in the Indiana Territory, and for other purposes;" also, a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Daniel Cotton;" in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The two bills last brought up for concurrence were read, and passed to the second reading.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the disposal of certain tracts of land in the Mississippi Territory, claimed under Spanish grants, reported by the land commissioners as antedated, and for other purposes;" in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

PARTIAL REPEAL OF THE EMBARGO.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the 18th instant, viz:

"That the several laws laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, be repealed on the 4th day of March next, except as to Great Britain and France, and their dependencies; and that provision be made by law for prohibiting all commercial intercourse with those nations and their dependencies, and the importation of any article into the United States, the growth, produce, or manufacture, of either of the said nations, or of the dominions of either of them."

Mr. BAYARD moved to strike out the following words.

"Except as to Great Britain and France, and their dependencies; and that provision ought to be made by law for prohibiting all commercial intercourse with those nations and their dependencies, and the importation of any article into the United States, the growth, produce, or manufacture, of either of the said nations, or of the dominions of either of them."

Mr. BAYARD addressed the Chair as follows:

It will be perceived, Mr. President, by the motion which I have made to amend the resolution offered by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, that I do not approve of the course which it seems the Government have determined at length to pursue. The honorable gentleman has told us, it is not his plan, and I give him credit for the fairness and candor with which he has avowed the measures to which he would have resorted. He would have raised the embargo and declared war against England. Being opposed in this scheme, by a majority of his friends, his next proposition was to issue letters of marque and reprisal. Finding, however, that the other House had refused to go even so far, he had, on the principle of concession and conciliation with his friends, agreed to take the course proposed in the resolution, in hopes that our vessels going upon the ocean and being captured under the Orders in Council, would drag the nation into a war; when, he presumed, the war being made upon us, we would agree to fight our enemy. Sir, it is upon this very ground, and considering this as its object, that I am opposed to the resolution. England is not our enemy, nor does a necessity exist to make her so. I am not going to deny that we have many, and heavy complaints to make against her conduct, nor shall I contend that causes do not exist which might justify a war; but I mean to say that policy forbids the measure, and that honor does not require it.

The gentleman has painted in very glowing colors, the wrongs and insults which we have suffered from British violence: he has recorded in his catalogue the offensive acts of British agents, as well as the injuries, pretensions, and orders of the Government. I do not mean to defend, nor even to palliate any aggressions, public or private, against the rights or honor of our country; but sir, I cannot conceal my surprise, that this gentleman, so much alive to British wrongs, should be insensible to everything which we have suffered from France. The gentleman has exhausted the language of terms of invective and reproach against the British Government and nation, but he has been silent as the grave as to the French. How can it be, that what is wrong in Britain is right in France? And wherefore is it, that the same acts of France are borne with patience, which, proceeding from Britain, excite such a spirit of indignation? You have the Orders in Council to complain of; but have you not the decrees of His Imperial Majesty? We are told that the Orders in Council give us laws, regulate our commerce, and degrade us to the state of colonies; but do they contain more, or do they extend as far as the imperial decrees? Do they make us more the colonies of Britain, than the decrees make us the colonies of France? And are we to invoke the spirit of liberty and patriotism to a resistance to Britain, while we are tamely yielding ourselves to French bondage? We are told of our vessels being forced into British ports and compelled to pay tribute; but nothing is said of their being invited into French harbors and then seized and confiscated.

With all the complaints against the British orders, and the silence as to the French decrees, ought we not to be surprised in discovering that the orders are exceeded in severity and injustice by the decrees? Let it be remembered that this system of outrage upon neutral rights originated on the part of France in the Berlin Decree—that decree, in effect, forbids neutrals to trade to England or her colonies, or to purchase or to carry their manufactures or produce. In commencing this system, France justified its principle, and compelled her adversary to retaliate by acts of the same injustice against neutrals who submitted to

it. Tell me which we have first and most to blame, the one who set the example, or him who followed it?

It is a consideration also of great weight, that at the time when the Berlin Decree issued, France was bound to the United States by a solemn treaty to permit the trade which that decree prohibits—a treaty signed by Bonaparte himself, and expressly providing for the freedom and security of our commerce with his enemy, in the event of war: and if the Orders in Council are a violation of the laws of nations, they are not, like the French decrees, a breach of plighted faith. The orders leave to us the direct colonial trade.

Our intercourse is not interrupted with the colonies and dependencies of France; but the decrees interdict all neutral commerce with the colonies and dependencies of England, as well as with the mother country. Your very ships which entered an English port are “denationalized,” and are liable, after the lapse of any time, though performing a voyage otherwise innocent, to seizure and confiscation.

Another feature of injustice and iniquity distinguishes the decrees from the orders. By the orders our merchants are apprized of the commerce which is interdicted. Full time for the notice of the prohibition is allowed, before the property is exposed by transgression of the orders, to be confiscated or seized. No such forbearance can be discovered in the decrees, which are to be indiscriminately executed upon the innocent and the guilty; upon those who never heard or could have heard of them, in the same manner as upon those who, knowingly, violate them.

I hope, sir, it will not be understood that I mean to defend the Orders in Council, or to advise this nation to submit to them; but I could wish to direct some portion of the warmth and indignation which has been expressed against them, against those decrees which produced them, and which exceed them in iniquity and outrage. The avowed object of the gentleman from Virginia is a war with England. On this subject I make but one question—is it possible to avoid it with honor?

If this possibility exists, the war ought to be avoided. And it is my opinion that it does exist. To this opinion I am in a great degree led by a want of confidence in the sincerity of the disposition of our Executive to settle our differences with Great Britain. Your measures have not been impartial as to the belligerents, and your negotiations have not been sincere as to England. The gentleman from Virginia has called this charge of insincerity a miserable and melancholy fact; and if you will have patience with me, I will furnish proof enough to support the belief even of the most incredulous.

I mean to show that your Government has had it in its power to secure peace with Britain by the settlement of the differences between the two nations, and that the means have not only been neglected, but means employed to prevent such a settlement from taking place.

It will be necessary for us to consider what those differences were.

They may be referred to three heads:

1st. The rule, as it is called, of the war of 1756.

2d. Constructive blockade.

3d. Impressment of seamen on board of American merchant vessels.

I do not mean to say, that there were no other causes of complaint, arising from the indiscretion and insolence of the British commanders; but they had not the character of national differences, and would probably have soon ceased and been forgotten if the points of controversy between the Governments had been amicably arranged. To settle the differences which I have stated, a negotiation was opened in London, in 1803, and carried on till December, 1806. It is remarkable, that while this negotiation was depending and progressing, our Government had recourse to a step in its nature calculated to repel, instead of to invite the British Government to a friendly settlement. In April, 1806, they passed a law prohibiting the importation of certain British goods. The acknowledged object of this law was to coerce Britain to agree to our own terms. Did this law evidence a disposition to be friendly on our part, or was it calculated to inspire a friendly temper on the part of England?

It was fuel to the flame of discord. The British Government is not less high-spirited and proud than our own, and the attempt to force them to terms, was the likeliest course which could have been pursued, by provoking retaliation, to widen the breach between the two countries.

This measure, enforced when negotiation was going on, and promised a favorable result, is no small proof in my mind, that the Executive was satisfied with the forms of negotiation, but wanted no treaty with England.

I proceed to inquire whether our differences with Britain were not of a nature to be compromised; and if our Government had been sincerely disposed, whether they might not have retained the relations of amity with that Power.

First, as to the rule of 1756. This rule was founded on the principle, that a neutral could not acquire a right to trade by the cession of one belligerent in time of war, which did not exist but was withheld in time of peace. The rule was supported on the principle, that a neutral could not come in aid of a belligerent and cover its property on the ocean, when it was incapable of protecting itself.

I am not going to defend this rule, nor to inquire into its origin. Thus much I will say, that if it was the British rule of 1756, it was the express rule of the French maritime code in the years 1704 and 1744. I will not trouble you with the reading the decrees of the French Monarchs, which I have on the table, made in the years mentioned, and which prohibit to neutrals any but a direct trade to the colony of an enemy. Though the rule of 1756 may not be an ancient rule, yet we must admit it was a new rule, introduced in the present war, and contrived to ruin or injure the American commerce.

France was unable to trade with her colonies; the United States became her carriers, and under our flag, the manufactures of the mother country were safely carried to the colonies, and the produce of the colonies transported to Europe. This trade was certainly as beneficial to France as profitable to the United States. Britain only was the sufferer, and the rule of 1756 was revived in order to take from French commerce the protection of a neutral flag. Our Government were certainly right in claiming the free enjoyment of this profitable trade, but the only question is, whether the neutral and belligerent pretension did not admit of adjustment by each side making an equal concession of points of interest.

The Treaty of 1806, which the President rejected, fairly compromised the dispute on this subject. The eleventh article of that Treaty secured to the United States the carrying trade of France and her colonies, subject to terms somewhat inconvenient to the merchant, but rendering it no less beneficial to the nation. The treaty requires that goods exported from France or her colonies in American vessels shall be entered and landed in the United States; and when exported from France through the United States to her colonies, shall be liable to a duty of one per cent., and from the colonies to France of two per cent., to be paid into our own Treasury. This regulation of benefit to the Government, by the duty which it gave to it, was of little prejudice to the trade, and there is no room to doubt that the trade, thus secured from the spoliations to which it was before subject, would have flourished beyond its former limits.

Our differences, therefore, as to the carrying trade so much harassed by the British rule of 1756, not only admitted of compromise, but was actually settled by an arrangement in the Treaty of 1806, with which the nation would have been perfectly satisfied.

The second head of dispute regards the practice of constructive blockades. The complaint on this subject was, that blockades were formed by proclamations, and that neutrals were compelled to consider ports blockaded before which no force was stationed. That the principle of blockades was extended to unwarrantable limits, is most certainly true, and there is no question as to our having just cause to complain of the vexatious interruptions to which it exposed our trade. The present war between France and England is without a parallel between civilized nations; it is not a struggle for renown or ordinary conquest, but on the part of Britain for her independence and existence. Principles of neutrality or of right have been little regarded upon the land or upon the ocean; and the question with the belligerents has been less what the law of nations permitted them to do, than what their strength enabled them to accomplish. It is unlawful for a neutral to attempt to enter a blockaded port—but a port cannot be considered as blockaded unless a force adequate to the end is stationed before it. The blockades, therefore, which England created simply by a proclamation, were an abuse of which neutrals had just cause to complain.

The United States did complain, and these complaints were listened to by the British Government. The tenth article of the Treaty of 1806, has made provision on the subject; and though England has not renounced the principle of which we complain, yet it is qualified by the notice which is required to be given to the vessel attempting to enter a blockaded port, before she is exposed to seizure and confiscation. The provision in the treaty would no doubt have corrected in a considerable degree the abuse from which we had suffered, and it was our policy to have waited for better times for a completer remedy for the evil.

But, sir, the last head of dispute which I enumerated was made the chief and most important ground of complaint against the British Government—I mean the searching American vessels for British seamen. The right claimed by England was to seize her own seamen on board our private vessels. The right to search a public vessel, or to seize an American sailor, was never asserted by the Government. The claim, however, which was insisted on, involved a point of equal interest and delicacy to both countries. There is nothing novel in the pretension, that a nation engaged in war had a right to recall her subjects from foreign countries, or from foreign service, to assist her in the war.

Every nation in Europe has claimed and exercised the right. Our Government has not denied it; but the consequences of the manner of exercising it, have formed the ground of our complaint. Has a belligerent a right to search a neutral vessel for her seamen? I should suppose not. This question between other nations is of small importance. Between the United States and Britain, it is of great magnitude.

The sameness of manners, habits, language, and appearance, render it always difficult and sometimes impossible to distinguish between an English and an American sailor. If the right to search for British seamen were admitted, there would no longer be security for the American sailor; the right admitted, I have no doubt our navigation would be ruined. As an American, therefore, I would never concede the principle. Let us see however, how the case stands in relation to Britain. Her navy is the shield of her salvation—whatever impairs its strength diminishes its power and safety. Tenacious as she has ever been of personal liberty at home, yet when men are wanted for her fleets, the habeas corpus sleeps. Her sailors are her right arm, which withers as she is deprived of them. From the seductions of our maritime service she had everything to dread. Our merchants can give her seamen a dollar for every shilling which she is able to afford them.

They shall be better fed, more gently treated, and exposed less to hardship and danger. Let them find a secure asylum on board our merchant ships, and how soon will the decks be thinned of the English ships of war. Which has the most at stake on this subject, England or America?

I will not decide the question; but this is evident, that neither will ever unconditionally relinquish the principle for which she has contended. At the present crisis, it was impossible for our Government to expect the formal abandonment by the British Government of this right of search. What course, then, should they have pursued? They should have temporized on the point, as Britain was willing to do, and waited for a more propitious epoch, for the final arrangement of the dispute.

Your Commissioners, who negotiated the treaty, found that it was impracticable to obtain the cession of the principle for which they contended, and upon their own responsibility, to their great honor, to preserve the peace of the two countries, accepted assurances from the British Ministry, which in their opinion, and I have no doubt, in fact, would have effectually removed the abuses of which we complained. I beg pardon of the Senate for reading an extract from the letter of Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, of the 3d of January, 1807, which contains the assurances to which I refer: "We are sorry to add, that this treaty contains no provision against the impressment of our seamen. Our despatch of the 11th of November, communicated to you the result of our labors on that subject, and our opinion that although this Government did not feel itself at liberty to relinquish formally, by treaty, its claim to search our merchant vessels for British seamen, its practice would nevertheless be essentially, if not completely, abandoned. That opinion has been since confirmed by frequent conferences on the subject with the British Commissioners, who have repeatedly assured us, that in their judgment, we were made as secure against the exercise of their pretensions, by the policy which their Government had adopted in regard to that very delicate and important question, as we could have been made by treaty. It is proper to observe, however, that the good effect of this disposition, and its continuance, may depend, in a great measure, on the means which may be taken by the Congress hereafter to check desertions from the British service. If the treaty is ratified, and a perfect good understanding produced between the two nations, it will be easy for their Governments, by friendly communications, to state to each other what they respectively desire, and, in that mode, to arrange the business as satisfactorily as it could be done by treaty." Such was the footing upon which our Commissioners were wisely disposed to leave this delicate affair. And would to God that our President, wishing as sincerely as his friends profess for him, to accommodate the differences between the two countries, had as prudently agreed to the arrangement made for him by his Ministers! What has been the consequence of this excessive anxiety to secure our seamen? Why, that your service has lost more sailors in one year of embargo than it would have lost in ten years of impressment.

But, sir, in this lies the secret—a secret I will dare to pronounce. Your President never meant to have a treaty with Great Britain. If he had intended it, he would have taken the treaty of the 31st of December, 1806. If he had intended it, he would never have fettered the Commissioners with *sine qua non*s which were insuperable.

It was an invariable article in the instructions, to form no treaty, unless the claim to search merchant vessels for deserters was utterly abandoned; this was never expected, and at the arduous crisis at which it was insisted upon, it was impossible to expect it. And yet, rather than temporize upon the point; rather than accept the actual abandonment of the principle, without its formal renunciation, a treaty, the work of years, negotiated by his favorite Minister, and calculated to appease the animosities existing between the two nations, is rejected.

You will bear with me, sir, while I say that this precipitate and fatal measure is the cause of all the embarrassments which we have felt, which we are feeling, and which we are likely to suffer. I ask, why was this treaty rejected? We are told for two reasons—

1. Because it contained no engagement against the impressment of American seamen on board merchant vessels.

2. Because of the collateral declaration of the British Commissioners, that England retained the right to retaliate upon France the principles of her Berlin Decree, if the United States should submit to its execution.

I have shown, from the public documents furnished to us by the President, the footing upon which our Ministers placed the point of impressments.

Our Commissioners considered the assurances given by the British Ministers, a better pledge for the safety of our seamen than a formal provision in the treaty. But if these assurances had even not been given, the treaty would not have compromised our rights, or prejudiced our interests on the subject; in the mean time, it would have induced more friendly relations, and prepared both countries for such further concessions as their mutual interests might require. To me it is a matter both novel and surprising, to discover in our President this strong and unyielding attachment to the highest points of our maritime rights. I had thought before, that he was not so friendly to our Navy, to our merchants, and to our commerce.

I had thought that he would rather our ships were exchanged for farming utensils, and our seamen converted into husbandmen. But now, sir, it seems, so highly does he value our navigation, that he prefers hazarding all the calamities of war, rather than suffer one feather to be forcibly plucked from the wing of commerce.

Can any one believe that our Government seriously intended to conclude a treaty with England, when our Commissioners were instructed to make no treaty unless Britain formally consented that our merchant flag should protect every deserter from her navy?

The insertion of this sine qua non in the instructions is sufficient to satisfy my mind that there was no sincerity in the negotiation which was carried on with the British Government.

We have been asked by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GILES.) whether it can be imagined that such men as KING, MONROE, and PINKNEY, would have colluded with the Executive, or, if they would not have borne evidence of his insincerity if such had been the fact? Mr. King, he tells us, is a Federalist, to whom we have lately given proof of confidence and attachment. Mr. Monroe, he represents of a disposition not likely to be guilty of concealment through affection for the Administration; and Mr. Pinkney is said, also, to be a Federalist.

All this the gentleman may take as true. But, Mr. King, sir, was never engaged in this negotiation, and, as to Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney, I most clearly acquit them of any collusion with the President, because, so far from colluding with him, they have acted against his secret and express instructions. Surely, I have no reason to doubt the sincere disposition of these gentlemen to make a treaty with England, when they concluded one under the responsibility of acting against their orders. No; my charge of insincerity against the Executive, is founded upon the documents, a long time secret, now public, and upon the nature of the objections which have uniformly obstructed the adjustment of our differences with Britain.

The second impediment to the ratification of the treaty was, the declaration of Lords Holland and Auckland which accompanied it. What did this paper impose upon us? Resistance to the Berlin Decree. And, will you permit me to ask, whether it was ever your intention to submit to that decree? You do not mean to submit to the Orders in Council, and does not the Berlin Decree go to the extent of those orders? Are you better prepared, or more disposed to submit to France than to England? No; I hope we shall agree to fight, before we consent that either of those Powers shall give laws to the ocean.

I know, at one time, it was pretended that the Berlin Decree was designed only as a municipal regulation; municipal, when it declared England and her dependencies in a state of blockade, and their manufactures and produce liable to capture! It is true that the Minister of the United States in France, got some such explanation of the decree from the French Minister of Marine. He did not consider it as derogating from the Treaty of 1800, between France and the United States. But, when the Emperor is applied to by the Grand Judge, his answer is, "that since he had not thought proper to express any exception in his decree, there is no ground to make any, in the execution, with respect to anything whatsoever." When the Minister of Marine was applied to for his construction of the decree, he gave his opinion, but affected not to be the proper organ of communication on the subject. In this, you see that craft and force were both united for the most destructive execution of the decree.

The decree was allowed to sleep for nearly a year; a public Minister delivers his opinion that it was not to infract our treaty, and, after our property, to an immense amount, is allured by these deceitful appearances into French ports. His Imperial Majesty declares, in effect, through his Minister of Justice, that the Treaty with the United States was not expressed as an exception in the decree, and, therefore, its provisions were to form no obstruction to its execution. So, sir, we have probably lost some millions of dollars by our anxiety to consider this decree as a municipal regulation. Suppose, however, it had not designed what its terms so plainly express—the blockade of the British isles. In such case, what embarrassment would our Government have incurred by agreeing to the proposition of the English Commissioners to resist the decree, if executed against our neutral rights? If France had confined the execution of the decree to her own ports, Britain could not have complained of the execution of her own law, within her own jurisdiction, and we should have had nothing to which we were to oppose resistance. But, suppose the decree had been executed on the ocean, and you had become bound to oppose its execution by force—would your undertaking have been greater than the offer you lately made to England in case she would repeal her Orders in Council?

I shall, hereafter, have occasion to view this subject in another point of light; but at present, I ask, did not Mr. Pinkney mean to tell Mr. Canning, under his instructions from the President, that, if Great Britain would repeal her Orders in Council, the United States would resist the execution of the French decrees? This is stated in the letter of Mr. Canning to Mr. Pinkney, of the 23d of August, 1808, and admitted, as it is not denied, in the letter of Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Canning of the 8th of October, in the same year. Your Government, then, would now agree to the terms which they so indignantly repelled when first proposed to them, and on the ground of which, in part, they refused the treaty which their Ministers had negotiated. It would seem, then, that no other material ground remains for the rejection of the treaty than the want of a formal clause to secure our merchant seamen against impressment.

Is it your intention ever to have a treaty with Britain, or, are the nations always to continue in a state of strife and contention? You were offered the Treaty of 1794, and you refused it. Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney negotiate a treaty in 1806. The President rejects it, and insists on a point in the most obnoxious form, which he knows will never be conceded, and without the concession of which no treaty is ever to be made. Does all this look like a sincere disposition to adjust our differences with England?

It is of importance, Mr. President, to consider, in the late negotiation, who were the men in power in the respective countries. Can our President expect ever to see an English Administration more disposed to treat upon favorable terms with this country, than the Fox Administration? The name of Fox is the most grateful English name that is known to an American ear. From my childhood, I have heard that Fox was the friend of America. He was the early champion of our rights when Britain first attempted to deprive us of them. His voice was always raised in our favor, in opposition to the power of the Crown. Fox was at the head of the ancient Whig interest of England, and a firm supporter of the principles of freedom. He was, too, a philanthropist, and deemed, in sentiment, by some, a citizen of the world. He was, additionally, sir, a French citizen—as well as our worthy President.

I hope it will not be thought that I mention with any invidious view, this last circumstance. I state it, only, for the material purpose of showing the community of character between these great men, which recommend them to the fraternization of the French people. If Mr. Jefferson was not willing to accept the treaty which Mr. Fox offered him, from what administration in England can he ever expect a better? And may I not ask, also, if he can look to men in the United States in whom he will have more confidence, for their skill and integrity, than in those whom he employed in the late negotiation? We have all heard that Mr. Monroe was his early and bosom friend, and we have all seen that he has been his favorite Minister.

Let us, also, not forget the time when the treaty was concluded. No time could have been more propitious. It was at the moment when England was sinking under the triumphs of her adversary. Bonaparte had just broken to pieces the power of Prussia, driven the Russians to their frontier, and converted their Emperor from an enemy into an ally. If you are not satisfied with the terms which England was willing to grant you at a moment of depression, can you look for better when she has less to fear from your enmity, or to hope from your friendship?

You find, sir, that your President was favored by every circumstance in the negotiation of the treaty which he finally rejected.

It is not a little remarkable that he should have undertaken to reject this treaty without consulting the Senate, his Constitutional advisers. He was in possession of a copy of the treaty, while the Senate were not allowed to see it. He would not trust their opinions upon it. They might have approved it, and the responsibility would have been still greater to have rejected it after they had agreed to it. You will pardon me for speaking plainly. It is my duty to express my conviction, though I may happen to be wrong.

To me it has always appeared that your President was taken by surprise when he found a British Treaty laid at his door. His instructions to his Ministers precluded the possibility of a treaty, and it never entered his head that they would have been daring enough to conclude a treaty against his orders. But, the Ministers having obtained what they considered the substance, disregarded the form, and sent a treaty as little looked for as desired.

I do not mean to contend that the President was bound to lay this treaty before the Senate, but, in exercising the power to reject it without their advice, he took upon himself a great responsibility, and is answerable for all the consequences of an act exclusively his own. To this act, in my opinion, may be attributed the present embarrassments of our country. Had the treaty been accepted, our trade would have flourished, as heretofore, and with it, our agriculture, manufactures, and the fisheries. But it pleased our Chief Magistrate to reject it, and every day has since added to the gloom which has spread over our country.

In this condition was the state of our affairs, when an unexpected event occurred, calculated to inflame to the highest pitch the animosity of our citizens against the British Government. I allude to the attack of the Leopard upon the Chesapeake, in June, 1807. In relation to this outrage, the people of America felt but one sentiment. A more wanton, flagitious, and perfidious act was never perpetrated. It is an act which America never will, nor ought to forgive, till it is expiated by adequate satisfaction. But still, sir, we must restrain our indignation, while we inquire whose act it was, and who is answerable for it. The material inquiry is, was it, or has it become the act of the British Government?

The British Minister, as soon as the news of the occurrence reached him, voluntarily and unasked, declared that it was unauthorized by the Government. He disavowed it in Parliament, and the King himself confirmed the disavowal.

It rested then as the act of Admiral Berkeley. The nation, however, were bound to make satisfaction for the injury done us by their public servant. If they refuse adequate satisfaction, they adopt the act. The Government were sensible of this obligation, and they took steps to comply with it. They sent a special Minister, for the sole purpose of making reparation for the injury we had suffered. This Minister we received, and agreed to consider the outrage which had been committed, as the act of Berkeley. Considered as the act of the Government, it would have been an act of open war. You commence a negotiation as to the terms of reparation, but here the same spirit which rejected the treaty, baffles every effort to accommodate this new cause of offence.

When informed of the attack upon one of our public vessels by a British man of war under the orders of an Admiral, our Government had reason to apprehend that no individual, however high in rank, would have hazarded so daring an outrage without the authority of his Government.

With this view, and to preserve peace and tranquillity in our harbors, we may consider the President as justified in issuing his proclamation, interdicting the entrance of British armed ships into the waters of the United States. But, sir, the moment it was ascertained that the act of Berkeley was unauthorized, so soon as the Government had solemnly disavowed it and offered reparation, the proclamation ought to have been withdrawn. Are you permitted to punish a nation for the acts of its subjects, in which it does not participate? The law and the practice of civilized nations on this point, is explicit and uniform.

When the subject of one Power offends against the sovereignty of another, this will not justify retaliation upon other subjects of the same Power with the one who offended. It has uniformly been our own doctrine, and it is the common interest of mankind to maintain it, that in such case you must apply to the sovereign of the party offending, and abstain from any act of hostility till he refuse you reparation. This course our Government did not pursue; for the act of an individual they retaliated against his nation.

Upon the grounds which have been stated, you may excuse the issuing of the proclamation; but what excuse is there for its continuance, when we acknowledge ourselves, in treating for reparation, that the act complained of is the act of an individual, and not of his Government?

A proclamation like the one issued, without adequate cause, was a breach of neutrality, and a just cause of war. For, to admit into your ports and grant succor to the armed ships of one belligerent, while you exclude those of the other, is not consistent with that impartiality which belligerents are entitled to claim from neutrals. The point was so understood and so felt by the British Government, and they required, as they had a right to do, that as they had not committed the act complained of, the proclamation, which had an operation or appearance of hostility against them, should be recalled. If they refused reparation, we had a right to redress ourselves, but had we a right to take the redress into our own hands, and at the same time to require them to make us reparation? When you ask justice, you must expect to do it. A nation should be as ready to perform its duties as to insist upon its rights. The British Government had given sufficient evidence of a disposition to grant satisfaction for the injury done us, by sending to the country a special Minister for the purpose; that Minister was instructed to make voluntary reparation, but to grant none under the coercion of the proclamation. In his first communication to the Secretary of State, he informed him that his powers did not allow him to make reparation unless the proclamation was withdrawn. The affair was then managed with sufficient adroitness to catch the popularity of the country; when it was known that the proclamation must be first withdrawn, its revocation and reparation were proposed by the Secretary as simultaneous acts. Why was this proclamation so tenaciously insisted on? If you had revoked it, and the reparation offered was deemed insufficient, you would have no difficulty in renewing it. It is no task to our President to issue a proclamation; at most, we contend only for a point of etiquette, a thing important perhaps in a monarchy but very little respected among us Republicans. Give me leave to say, that in this negotiation I soon became persuaded, that the difference in question was not to be settled by itself, but was to stand open in the general account. If there had been a sincere desire to settle it, the paltry measure of the proclamation would not have formed an obstacle for a moment. I have here a new and great proof that the Executive is not sincerely desirous of a full and friendly settlement of all differences with England. It may be difficult to trace the motive which governs; but I can plainly discover the same spirit now, which agitated the nation in 1795; a spirit then subdued by the mighty influence of Washington, but which has since risen with increased strength, and now dominates.

I consider, sir, that the measures of the Administration have been not only insincere, but extremely feeble; they will not settle the differences with England, and yet have not courage openly to quarrel with her. They pass a non-importation act to punish the impressment of seamen and the aggressions upon our carrying trade; they exclude by proclamation British armed ships from our waters to avenge the outrage on the Chesapeake; and what benefit to ourselves or detriment to our adversary have these measures produced? They are calculated to increase the animosity between the nations, but I know of no other effect they can produce. So far, indeed, have they been from constraining Britain to accede to our terms, that they have rendered her more regardless of our rights and interests. She has since given us new and more feeling causes of complaint by her Orders in Council of the 7th of January, and the 11th of November, 1807. These orders take from us the trade of nearly all Europe. They are the counterpart of the French decrees. God forbid that I should justify them! I will never admit that France or England has a right to make laws for the ocean; nor shall I ever hesitate, when they insist on the execution of such laws, to declare myself for war. I am as free as any gentleman in this Senate, to protest against submission to the decrees of France or the orders of England; but is not submission to the decrees as disgraceful as submission to the orders? The gentleman from Virginia said nothing of the decrees; nothing of a war with France—his resentment was confined to Britain.

We have, sir, to choose our enemy between these two nations. We are hardly equal to a contention against both at the same time.

How does the case stand in relation to them? The Emperor first issues his Berlin Decree, interdicting our trade to England and her colonies; England then gave us notice, if you allow France to prevent your trading with us, we will not suffer you to trade with France. If you are tame enough to submit to a French decree, you will surely not be too proud to yield to British orders. Assure us that you will resist the execution of the decree, and we will not retort its principles upon you. This our Government declined doing, and left England to pursue her own course. Her Government then issues the order of the eleventh of November, retaliating the Berlin decree. I do not defend this order; but if the Administration had resisted, as they ought to have done, the Berlin decree, we should not have seen the order. What now is to be done? England insists on her orders, as a measure of retaliation against France. Prevail on France to repeal her decrees, or agree to resist the execution of them; and if England then executes her orders, I will be as ready as any man to go to war with her.

No such course has been taken, but what have we done? Laid an embargo. And for what purpose did we lay the embargo? This is a subject of conjecture to some; but our Government tell us, it was to preserve our ships, our sailors, and our mercantile capital. Some have said to preserve them from the operation of the Orders in Council. When the embargo was laid the Orders in Council were not known in this country.

Of this fact I want no stronger proof, no stronger can exist, than that the President in his Message to Congress, in which he recommends the embargo, says not a word of these Orders in Council. No, the embargo was not produced by the Orders in Council, nor by anything which we heard from England, but by news which had then been recently received from France.

We are told the embargo was to save our ships, our sailors, and mercantile capital. I do not believe that such was its object, but if such were its purpose, we have been miserably disappointed. The embargo for a short period might have been a prudent measure. As a step of precaution, to collect our seamen and mercantile capital, I never have complained of it. But it is insulting to common sense, to propose it as a scheme of permanent security, as it must daily consume, and finally annihilate the objects of its preservation. Your ships once in, and the danger known, you should have left your merchants to their own discretion. They would have calculated the profits and the perils, and been determined by the balance of the account. No class of society is more capable of taking care of itself.

It is said we have preserved our seamen. The President has as gravely repeated this remark in his Message, as he recommended to us to devise means to dispose of our surplus revenue, at a moment when it was evident that the situation of our country would drain the Treasury of its last dollar.

Where are your sailors? They are not to be seen in your ports. One half that were employed by you have passed into foreign service, and many that remain, are to be found begging in your roads and at your doors.

As to our ships and mercantile capital, the one-tenth part of the loss from decay and waste and want of employment, would have paid for an insurance against every danger to which they would have been exposed. It is not my intention, Mr. President, to detain you with any details on this subject, as I should be compelled to repeat the same things which have been stated by other gentlemen on a former occasion. But there are some general views of the subject not undeserving of notice, which yet remain to be taken.

If the embargo were ever a measure of precaution it certainly has long lost that character. As a measure of coercion, it was hopeless unless completely executed. If the party to be coerced was partially supplied, the object was defeated.

Now I ask you, sir, if your Government ought not to have been acquainted with its own powers, its own people, and its own situation, well enough to have known that it was impossible for it to confine the whole produce of the country within its limits for any length of time? Ought they not to have seen the vast temptations which have arisen and presented themselves, as well to our own citizens as to foreigners, to combine in order to break or elude your laws? Ought they not to have known that with our extent of coast and frontiers, with our numerous waters, that a wretched gunboat navy, aided even by ten thousand regulars, was not capable of covering our borders and shutting up the numberless outlets of the country? Could they expect that patriotism was to feed and clothe the people of the North; or that thousands would submit to starve in order to contribute to the success of an experiment?

We all know that the opposition to the embargo in the Eastern States is not the opposition of a political party, or of a few discontented men, but the resistance of the people to a measure which they feel as oppressive and regard as ruinous. The people of this country are not to be governed by force, but by affection and confidence. It is for them we legislate; and if they do not like our laws, it is our duty to repeal them.

It is madness to talk of forcing submission when there is general dissatisfaction. Your Government is in the hands of the people; it has no force but what it derives from them; and your enforcing laws are dead letters when they are once driven to resist your measures.

It would sir, be some consolation, amid the sufferings which this miserable system has caused, if, in looking abroad, we could discover that the nations who have injured and offended us felt its oppression only equally with ourselves. But when we find that we have been scourging ourselves for their benefit and amusement, when they can tell us with indifference and contempt that they feel for us, but that we must correct our own folly; instead of meeting with the poor comfort which we expected, we are overwhelmed with accumulated mortification.

Was this a measure against France? No; the Emperor commends the magnanimous sacrifice which you have made of your commerce, rather than submit to British tyranny on the ocean. His Imperial Majesty never approves what he does not like, and he never likes what does not comport with his own designs. I consider it admitted that the embargo was intended to coerce England, and that the gentleman from Virginia now contends that, if it had been strictly executed, it would have had that effect. Nothing has happened that common foresight might not have foreseen. The gentleman has read to you extracts from an English pamphlet, published before the embargo was laid, which predicts the very evasions of the law, the discontents it would produce, and the opposition it would meet with, which we all have had the melancholy opportunity of witnessing. I know the pamphlet was referred to for another purpose—to show that British gold or influence had corrupted or seduced the Vermontese before the embargo was imposed. The gentleman may believe the fact to be so, if he pleases; but I say, sir, that your Government here, with all its means of information, ought to have known as much about the condition of Vermont as a pamphleteer on the other side of the Atlantic.

It seems now to be admitted, and the fact is too evident to be denied, that the embargo has failed in its coercive effect upon Britain. The want of bread, cotton, or lumber, has neither starved her subjects nor excited them to insurrection. Some gentlemen have shrewdness enough to discover an effect in an English price current, which might, to be sure, have been owing to the embargo, or might have been produced by the operation on the market of some private speculations. But it has enriched Canada, and has taught the islands their policy and ability to live without us.

Would to God, Mr. President, that the embargo had done as little evil to ourselves as it has done to foreign nations!

It is ourselves who are the victims of this miserable experiment. Your Treasury will lose at least fifteen millions of dollars, and your country, in addition, not less than forty. This tax has not been so much felt, though it has not in truth been less paid, because the embargo has not taken the money out of our pockets, but only prevented it going into them. This measure has been not only ruinous to our interests, but it is hostile to the genius of our Government. It calls for an increase of your regular Army, and a vast augmentation to your military force. Ten thousand bayonets were not sufficient to enforce it, but fifty thousand volunteers (as I have seen by a bill on the table) were to be invited to assist in its execution.

That measure of an Administration which arms citizen against citizen, or requires the soldier to act against the citizen, is baneful to liberty. If persevered in, there would soon be an end of free government.

The effect is also to be deprecated, upon the spirit of your military. They are called upon to execute the laws they are unable to construe, and, in obeying their orders, are exposed to the commission of murder.

Your naval forces are sent out to cruise, not for enemies, but for defenceless fellow-citizens, and they return to boast, not of a gallant battle, but of a miserable seizure, which may bring poverty upon some wretched family in their own country.

It has been often said, in defence of the embargo, that the nation had nothing left but that measure, submission, or war. Can you distinguish between the embargo and submission? Can you pretend to say what is a voluntary self-restriction imposed as a matter of choice? Can it be denied that it has been forced upon us by the conduct of one or both of the belligerents? And, with a full knowledge of the fact, can you describe it as anything but vile, abject submission?

FEBRUARY, 1809.

Partial Repeal of the Embargo.

SENATE.

France tells you, you shall not trade to Britain; you obey her. Britain tells you, you shall not trade with France; you submit. You have not resisted the Decrees or Orders, but have complied with the object of both. We have borne the burden of the embargo till it has almost broke our backs, and even when we are sinking under it, we pretend to say, it is no task to bear it. In this case, it is then said, there only remained submission or war. Submission I put out of the case. I trust in God it never entered into the head of one American. But I deny that war is necessarily the alternative; and I never will admit it, till I see sincere efforts made to accommodate our differences with England. The President, in his Message at the opening of Congress, would give us the impression that Britain had refused the last and the fairest offer it was in the power of our Government to make, in order to preserve peace. It will be important for us to understand the nature and extent of that offer. The proposition, no doubt, was made by Mr. Pinkney; in conformity with his instructions. To avoid error, I will take the liberty of reading to the Senate the words of Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Canning on the subject, in his letter of the 23d of August last:

"I had the honor to state to you sir, that it was the intention of the President, in case Great Britain repealed her orders, as regarded the United States, to exercise the power vested in him by the act of the last session of Congress, entitled 'An act to authorize the President of the United States, under certain conditions, to suspend the operation of the act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several supplementary acts thereto,' by suspending the embargo law and its supplements as regards Great Britain. I am authorized to give you this assurance in the most formal manner."

Now, sir, what is the amount of this boasted offer? Nothing more than the assurance of our Minister of an intention of the President to remove the embargo in case the Orders in Council were actually repealed. Great Britain was to repeal her Orders, allow the President to make the most of that act with her enemy, and trust to his executing his good intention when it should suit his good pleasure. The offer to England related only to the embargo, when this experimental measure, so far from being injurious to her, was adding wealth and strength. It leaves her navigation without a rival on the ocean, and has restored to her more seamen than she could have impressed in ten years. Well may Mr. Canning say there is no assignable relation between the removal of the embargo and the repeal of the Orders in Council.

The President had instructed his Minister to assure the British Government that the embargo was designed solely as a municipal regulation, operating in favor of Britain, if she will relieve us from the pressure of a measure adopted against her enemy. But, let me ask, was there any offer made to rescind the proclamation or to repeal the non-importation law? Two measures much more offensive and hostile to Great Britain than the embargo. With these laws in force, it was a mere mockery to offer the removal of the embargo. What more proof do we want, than this transaction affords, that the Executive, has not been sincere in his endeavors to restore a good understanding between this country and England? And therefore it is that I contend war is not unavoidable with that nation. I confess, sir, I should think a war with England, one of the greatest evils which could befall this country, not only from the sufferings which it would inflict upon it, but also from the fatal connexion with France to which it would give birth.

We have seen what has been the course of the Government in relation to Britain; and I will beg a few moments to examine what has been its conduct in regard to France. The last proposition made to Britain is well known—the documents fully disclose it; but what at the same time was proposed to the French Government? This we know little of. We have not been furnished with the correspondence with that Government on the subject. The transaction is covered with a dark and impenetrable veil. The President tells us in his Message that the same proposals were not made to the two belligerents; and it would seem, from what he hints, that the offer to France in case she repealed her decrees, was to join her in the war against England. It cannot be denied, that we have lost more by the spoliation, and have been more harassed under the arbitrary edicts of France, than of England. By the Treaty of 1800, we gave up more than twenty millions of dollars which had been seized, and confiscated in France. Since that time we are officially informed, that an amount nearly equal has been seized, and confiscated or sequestered. She has wantonly burnt our ships on the ocean and made no compensation. Her Berlin decree, of the 21st of November 1806, commenced the present system of outrage upon neutral rights. In effect it interdicts all trade with England and her colonies. This is followed by the Milan decree of the 17th of December, 1807. Under this edict an American vessel which has been searched, or visited against her will, by a British cruiser, or is proceeding to, or returning from England, is liable to be captured as good prize. And finally, to complete this monstrous system, comes the Bayonne decree, the 17th of April 1808, which declares every American vessel, found upon the ocean, liable to seizure and confiscation. Opposed to these accumulated violations of our neutral rights, what step has our Government taken against France?

Have they passed a non-importation act, issued a proclamation, or imposed an embargo? The last measure is general in its terms, but is avowedly against England alone. No, they have contented themselves with memorializing, remonstrating, and protesting. Against England we took every step short of war, against France we have employed nothing but gentle words. Has your Government then shown an equal resentment against the wrongs suffered from these two Powers?

It may be from the habit of enduring; but we do not feel an aggression from France with the same quickness and sensibility that we do from England. Let us see, sir, the same conduct observed with regard to both belligerents; let us see the impediments to a friendly settlement with Great Britain removed; let us witness a sincere effort made, to regulate the intercourse of the two nations by a treaty formed on principles of mutual concession and equal interest, and I will answer for it, if Great Britain persists in her orders, that you will find no division in this country, on the question whether we shall submit to them or resist their execution.

Permit me, Mr. President, to detain you a few moments longer. I am sensible that I have already trespassed upon the indulgence of the Senate, and I shall hasten to conclude the remarks which I have thought it of importance to make upon the resolution which has been submitted.

The objects of the resolution are embargo, non-intercourse, and non-importation, as to England and France and their colonies. The existing embargo is to be repealed only in part, one-half the channel of your rivers is opened, the other half is to be embargoed; and vessels may proceed to sea, but they must not pass through the embargoed waters. I can well conceive of one port in the United States being embargoed and the others open; but of an embargo which gives the right to every vessel in the harbor to leave it, I confess I have no comprehension. I should have supposed that the honorable gentleman might have ventured to repeal the embargo generally, and trusted to the provisions on the subject of non-intercourse to accomplish what seems to be the object in view, in partially retaining it. Sir, it is a strange infatuation that the name of this odious measure should be preserved, when the thing itself is abandoned.

And what, sir, are we to gain by a non-intercourse? It can never benefit the nation—it is nothing more than a part of that miserable musquito system, which is to sting and irritate England into acts of hostility. I have no doubt she sees the object, and she will take care not to give us the advantage which would be derived from war being commenced on her part. But, I ask, what will be the effect of non-intercourse? I see no other than that it will require two voyages instead of one to transport our produce to the markets of the interdicted countries. You carry your merchandise to Lisbon, and there deposit it; and from thence it is carried in foreign ships to England and France. Who will pay the expense of this circuit of transportation? The United States. It will be deducted from the price of your produce. Can the gentleman contrive no system which will operate with less severity upon ourselves than upon those whom he deems our enemies? If the resolution has no design, but what is apparent on the face of it, it is evident that its sole operation is against ourselves. Its inevitable effect will be to reduce the profit of what we have to sell, and to increase the expense of what we have to purchase. I can perceive also, sir, that it will be a measure of unequal pressure upon different sections of the country, and that its weight will fall heaviest upon that part of the Union already too much galled to suffer any addition to its burden. The lumber, the live stock, the fish, and the articles of common exportation to the Eastward will not bear the expense of double freights. Will they thank you for repealing the embargo, and adopting a substitute which continues to shut the ports of the North while it opens those of the South? Will they thank you for a measure which deprives them even of the miserable consolation of having fellow sufferers in their distress? If this resolution be adopted you do nothing to heal the wounds which you have inflicted. If New England loses her trade she will derive no comfort from its being under a non-intercourse, and not under an embargo law.

It is a part of the resolution, that we are to import no produce or merchandise from England, or France, or their colonies. Do you expect, sir, that a law to this effect could ever be executed, in time of peace? As to the manufactures of England she can make them the manufactures of any country in Europe; she will give you the exact marks, and stamps, and packages of any place to which your trade is open, and she will defy you to distinguish her fabrics from those they attempt to imitate. But, sir, the consequence chiefly to be dreaded from such a measure would be the practice of smuggling, to which it would certainly give birth. Can you expect in one moment to change the habits of a whole country? We know, sir, the power of habit: it is a second nature. Can an act of Congress instantly change your nature? No, sir—they who can afford it, will have what they have been accustomed to. They will pay any price for articles, without which, perhaps they can scarcely exist. Smuggling must follow—and will follow with forgery and perjury in its train. It is the honor and character of your trading people which now protects you from smuggling. Break down this sentiment, habituate them to perjury, destroy the disgrace attached to this violation of your law, and you lose half the security and means you have in the collection of your revenue.

The complaint has been made, that while we find fault with the measures proposed, we refuse to point out the course we would have the Administration to pursue. I have, sir, no hesitation on my part to disclose my opinion, or to offer the humble assistance of my advice on the subject. In a few words I will tell you what I would do: Place England and France upon the same footing, by repealing the non-importation act, rescinding the proclamation, and repealing the embargo. Then ask for, and insist upon adequate reparation for the affair of the Chesapeake. Make a treaty with Great Britain, if as good terms could be obtained as those in either of the treaties which have been refused. Agree to resist the execution of the Berlin Decree, and if she afterwards persisted in her Orders of Council, declare war against her. Such would be my course. War would be the last resort, and I believe, in my conscience, we should never be driven to it, if the course were pursued with a sincere disposition to preserve peace. Permit me, sir, to notice one remark of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, which had escaped me, and I am done. The gentleman told us that the removal of the embargo was designed as a concession to our Eastern brethren. I rejoiced to hear this sentiment of forbearance. Such sentiments give hopes that the Union may still be preserved. We have been led to the brink of a tremendous precipice—another false step, and we shall be lost in the abyss. Our safety is in treading back our steps. We have lost our way. Some ignis fatuus has beguiled us. There is a path of safety and honor—the path the nation once trod. Let us endeavor to regain it, and invoke the spirit of WASHINGTON to lead us once more into it!

The question was now taken on Mr. BAYARD'S amendment, and determined in the negative—yeas 8, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Gilman, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Lloyd, Parker, Pickering, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Gaillard, Giles, Gregg, Howland, Kitchel, Leib, Mathewson, Milledge, Mitchell, Moore, Pope, Reed, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Smith of Tennessee, Sumter, Thruston, Tiffin, and Turner.

On motion of Mr. HILLHOUSE to postpone the further consideration of the motion, it passed in the negative.

On the question to agree to the original motion, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 22, nays 9, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Gaillard, Giles, Gregg, Howland, Kitchel, Leib, Mathewson, Milledge, Mitchell, Moore, Pope, Reed, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Smith of Tennessee, Sumter, Thruston, and Tiffin.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Gilman, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Lloyd, Parker, Pickering, Turner, and White.

Ordered, That Messrs. GILES, SMITH of Maryland, and CRAWFORD, be the committee to bring in a bill accordingly.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government during the year 1809," reported the bill without amendment.

WEDNESDAY, February 15.

On motion, by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, Resolved, That a committee be appointed, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to consider whether any, and, if any, what, measures ought to be adopted for the further accommodation of the President of the United States, for the term commencing the 4th day of March next, to report by bill or otherwise.

Ordered, That Messrs. SMITH of Maryland, WHITE, and SUMTER, be the committee on the part of the Senate.

Mr. GREGG gave notice that he should tomorrow ask leave to bring in a bill to amend the charter of Georgetown.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government during the year 1809;" and the PRESIDENT having reported the bill to the House amended, it was ordered to the third reading as amended.

The bill authorizing an augmentation of the Marine Corps was read the second time.

Ordered, That the consideration thereof be postponed.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of William White and others," was resumed, and the consideration thereof postponed until Monday next.

On motion, by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government during the year 1809," as amended, was read the third time, by unanimous consent, and passed.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Daniel Cotton," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. WHITE, SMITH of Maryland, and SUMTER, to consider and report thereon.

The bill, entitled "An act for the disposal of certain tracts of land in the Mississippi Territory, claimed under Spanish grants, reported by the land commissioners as antedated, and for other purposes," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. ANDERSON, FRANKLIN, and CRAWFORD, to consider and report thereon.

The bill, entitled "An act extending the right of suffrage in the Indiana Territory, and for other purposes," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. POPE, TIFFIN, and SMITH, of Tennessee, to consider and report thereon.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made the 8th instant, that provision ought to be made by law, for interdicting all foreign armed ships from the waters of the United States; and having agreed thereto, Ordered, That it be referred to Messrs. GILES, SMITH of Maryland, and CRAWFORD, the committee to whom was yesterday referred the motion for the repeal of the embargo laws, to consider and report thereon.

THURSDAY, February 16.

The bill authorizing an augmentation of the Marine Corps was resumed, as in Committee of the Whole; on motion, by Mr. REED, to strike out the words "one Major," it was determined in the negative—yeas 10, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Howland, Kitchel, Leib, Mathewson, Moore, Reed, and Turner.

NAYS—Messrs. Bradley, Giles, Gilman, Goodrich, Gregg, Hillhouse, Lloyd, Milledge, Mitchell, Parker, Pope, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Sumter, Tiffin, and White.

And no amendment having been made to the bill, on the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House agree to the resolution for the appointment of a joint committee to consider whether any measures ought to be adopted for the accommodation of the President of the United States, for the term commencing the 4th of March next, and have appointed a committee on their part.

Mr. GILES, from the committee appointed on the 14th instant, on the subject, reported a bill to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. GILES gave notice that he should to-morrow ask leave to bring in a bill to provide for the better government of the Navy of the United States.

Mr. GREGG obtained leave to bring in a bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to amend the charter of Georgetown;" and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

And on motion, the Senate adjourned until to-morrow.

FRIDAY, February 17.

Mr. TIFFIN, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act extending the right of suffrage in the Indiana Territory, and for other purposes," reported the bill without amendment; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment having been proposed, it was ordered to the third reading.

Mr. TIFFIN, from the committee, reported the bill authorizing an augmentation of the Marine Corps, correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

The bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to amend the charter of Georgetown," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. GREGG, FRANKLIN, and THRUSTON, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. GILES asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act for the better government of the Navy of the United States;" and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act for imposing additional duties upon all goods, wares, and merchandise, imported from any foreign port or place," in which they ask the concurrence of the Senate.

The last bill brought up for concurrence was read, and passed to the second reading.

On motion, by Mr. LLOYD,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to confer with the Surveyor of the Public Buildings, relative to the accommodation of the Senate at the next session of Congress.

Ordered, That Messrs. THRUSTON, LLOYD, and GREGG, be the committee.

The PRESIDENT communicated the report of the Secretary of War, in compliance with the fifth section of the "Act to regulate and fix the compensation of clerks;" and the report was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

And on motion, the Senate adjourned.

SATURDAY, February 18.

Mr. FRANKLIN gave notice that he should on Monday next ask leave to bring in a bill freeing from postage all letters and packets to Thomas Jefferson.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the joint committee appointed to consider whether any, and, if any, what, measures ought to be adopted for the further accommodation of the President of the United States, for the term commencing the 4th day of March next, reported a bill making provision for the further accommodation of the household of the President of the United States; and the bill was twice read by unanimous consent, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The bill, entitled "An act for imposing additional duties upon all goods, wares, and merchandise, imported from any foreign port or place," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. SMITH of Maryland, FRANKLIN, and BRADLEY, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. THRUSTON, from the committee to whom was referred the motion relative to the accommodation of the Senate, at the next session of Congress, made report; which was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the disposal of certain tracts of land in the Mississippi Territory, claimed under Spanish grants, reported by the land commissioners as antedated, and for other purposes," reported amendments; which were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Mr. WHITE presented a memorial from sundry citizens of the State of Delaware, praying a repeal of the embargo laws, for reasons mentioned in the memorial.—Laid on the table.

The bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act for the better government of the Navy of the United States," was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and the PRESIDENT having reported the bill to the House amended, on the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read the third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

The PRESIDENT communicated the petition of a number of French citizens of the Territory of Michigan, praying that Congress would authorize an edition of the laws relating to that Territory, as well as the most important general laws, in the French language, for reasons mentioned in the petition; which was read, and referred to Messrs. THRUSTON, BRADLEY, and MITCHILL, to consider and report thereon.

The bill, entitled "An act extending the right of suffrage in the Indiana Territory, and for other purposes," was read the third time, and passed.

MONDAY, February 20.

Mr. GREGG, from the committee to whom was referred the bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to amend the charter of Georgetown," reported amendments; which were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Mr. GILES submitted the following motion:

FEBRUARY, 1809.

Non-Intercourse.

SENATE.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of amending the act, entitled "An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States," in such a manner as that the circuit and district courts of the United States shall be subjected to, and be regulated by, the laws of the several States in which they shall be held, which are now in existence, or may hereafter be enacted, regulating the issuing of process, the proceedings thereon, and the suspension thereof: Provided, The same shall not extend to process on behalf of the United States.

Mr. FRANKLIN asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill freeing from postage all letters and packets to Thomas Jefferson; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The bill to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House amended.

On motion, by Mr. REED, to strike out of the 14th section, the following words: "and to cause to be issued, under suitable pledges and precautions, letters of marque and reprisal against the nation thereafter continuing in force its unlawful edicts against the commerce of the United States," it was determined in the negative—yeas 11, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Condit, Franklin, Gilman, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Lloyd, Mathewson, Parker, Pickering, Reed, and Sumter.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Crawford, Gaillard, Giles, Gregg, Howland, Millidge, Moore, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Smith of Tennessee, Tiffin, and Turner.

And the bill having been further amended, on the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. TIFFIN, from the committee, reported the bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act for the better government of the Navy of the United States," correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the amendments reported by the select committee to the bill, entitled "An act for the disposal of certain tracts of land in the Mississippi Territory, claimed under Spanish grants, reported by the land commissioners as antedated, and for other purposes;" and, having agreed thereto, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House amended accordingly. And the bill having been further amended, it was ordered to the third reading, as amended.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill making provision for the further accommodation of the household of the President of the United States; and the bill having been amended, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly. On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed, and read the third time, as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 21.

The credentials of JOSEPH ANDERSON, appointed a Senator for the State of Tennessee, by the Executive of that State, from and after the expiration of the time limited in his present appointment, until the end of the next session of the Legislature thereof, were presented and read, and ordered to lie on file.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion submitted yesterday, and,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of amending the act, entitled "An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States," in such a manner as that the Circuit and District Courts of the United States shall be subjected to, and be regulated by, the laws of the several States in which they shall be held, which are now in existence, or may be hereafter enacted, regulating the issuing of process, the proceedings thereon, and the suspension thereof: Provided, The same shall not extend to process on behalf of the United States.

Ordered, That Messrs. GILES, BAYARD, and ANDERSON, be the committee to consider and report thereon.

The bill freeing from postage all letters and packets to Thomas Jefferson was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment having been proposed, on the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to amend the Charter of Georgetown;" and the PRESIDENT having reported the bill to the House amended, on the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. TIFFIN, from the committee, reported the bill making provision for the further accommodation of the household of the President of the United States correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TIFFIN, from the committee, reported the amendments to the bill, entitled "An act for the disposal of certain tracts of land in the Mississippi Territory, claimed under Spanish grants, reported by the commissioners as antedated, and for other purposes," correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time, as amended.

Resolved, That this bill pass, with amendments.

NON-INTERCOURSE.

Mr. TIFFIN, from the committee, reported the bill to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes, correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time, and the blanks filled—section three, with the words twentieth and May in two instances.

On motion by Mr. BRADLEY, the words, "or being pursued by the enemy," were stricken out of the first and third sections, by unanimous consent.

Mr. LLOYD addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: When the resolution on which this bill is founded was brought forward, I had expected it would have been advocated—as a means of preserving peace—as a menace to the belligerents, that a more rigorous course of conduct was about to be adopted towards them, on the part of the United States, provided they continued to persist in their injurious decrees, and Orders in Council—as giving us time to prepare for war—or as a covert, but actual war, against France and Great Britain.

I feel indebted to the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GILES,) for not only having very much narrowed the consideration of this subject, but for the open, candid, and manly ground he has taken, both in support of the resolution and the bill. I understood him to avow, that the effect must be war, and that a war with Great Britain; that, notwithstanding the non-intercourse attached to this bill, the merchants would send their vessels to sea; those vessels would be captured by British cruisers; these captures would be resisted; such resistance would produce war, and that was what he both wished and expected. I agree perfectly with the gentleman, that this is the natural progress, and must be the ultimate effect of the measure; and I am also glad, that neither the honorable Senate nor the people of the United States can entertain any doubts upon the subject.

I understood the gentleman also to say, that this was a result he had long expected. Now, sir, as there have been no recent decrees, or Orders in Council issued, if war has been long looked for, from those now in operation, I know not what excuse those who have the management of our concerns can offer to the people of the United States, for leaving the country in its present exposed, naked, and defenceless situation.

What are our preparations for war? After being together four-fifths of the session, we have extorted a reluctant consent to fit out four frigates. We have also on the stocks, in the navy yard and elsewhere scattered along the coast, from the Mississippi to the Schoodick, one hundred and seventy gunboats, which, during the summer season, and under the influence of gentle western breezes, may, when in commission, make out to navigate some of our bays and rivers, not, however, for any effectual purposes of defence, for I most conscientiously believe, that three stout frigates would destroy the whole of them; and of the enormous expense at which this burlesque naval establishment is kept up, we have had a specimen the present session, by a bill exhibited to the Senate, of eight hundred dollars for medical attendance, on a single gunboat for a single month, at New Orleans. If other expenditures are to be made in this ratio, it requires but few powers of calculation to foretell that, if the gunboats can destroy nothing else, they would soon destroy the public Treasury.

We have also heard of a project for raising fifty thousand volunteers, which has, I believe, been very properly stifled in its birth, and we have appropriated, during the present session, one hundred and fifty thousand dollars towards the erection, repairing, and completion, of our fortifications. A sum about equal to the expenditure of the British Government for six weeks, or two months, on a single fortress in the Province of Canada, and which sum, with us, is to put into a state of defence, against the naval power of Great Britain, an exposed and accessible maritime frontier of two thousand miles in extent!

In contemplating war, it is also proper to advert to the state of the Treasury. Under such an event, and with any serious preparation for war or actual prosecution of it, the present funds would soon be exhausted. How soon cannot be stated, because the amount of them cannot be accurately ascertained. A part, and a considerable part, of the money now on hand, does not belong to the public. It is the property of the merchants; it is deposited in the Treasury as in a bank, to be checked for, whenever that commerce, which Mr. Jefferson, in his Notes on Virginia, most emphatically says, our country will have, shall be again reopened.

And thus situated, what are the projects offered for replenishing the public coffers in future? It is the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to develop the resources of the nation, and to point out new sources of supply, whenever the usual channels are impeded. He has designated three modes. The first, if executed, embraces, in my view, and I am sorry to say it, a marked violation of the public faith. It is the suggestion of stopping drawbacks on merchandise, which, in many instances, the merchants, from a reliance on the stability of your laws, and the integrity of the Government, have imported expressly for exportation, and not for domestic use or consumption in this country, and which exportation you have prevented them, alike contrary to their inclinations and their interests, from making for a longer period than ever was known or endured in any other nation.

The second project is one which, in my opinion, would do little honor to the genius of any man. It is a sweeping project for doubling, at the moment, the duties on every description of imported merchandise, on which a duty is now payable. Without notice to the merchant, without inquiry, without discrimination, without distinction between the necessities of the poor man and the luxuries of the rich one; between the indispensable raw materials of the manufacturer and the useless decorations of fashion. By which, bohea tea and Madeira wine, brown sugar and cosmetics, coaches and carpenters' tools, are all, by a single stroke of the pen, raised in the same ratio; and a duty of 100 per cent. on the present rates, without favor or affection, equally recommended to be imposed on the whole of them.

The third project is certainly not a novel one; it is simply that of shifting the burden off our own shoulders on to those of our successors: it is that of borrowing money on loans.

I have been, sir, among those who have respected the intelligence and acuteness of the Secretary of the Treasury. I have thought the office very ably filled; nor has my estimation of his talents been diminished from the few personal conferences I have had with him since I have been in this city; but if his fame rested on no firmer a basis than the reports made to Congress the present session, in relation to enforcing the embargo laws, and to our fiscal concerns, then an infant's breath might easily burst the bubble. At any rate, it may very truly be said, that if such are our preparations for commencing, and our resources for continuing a war, they are those which will serve neither to inspirit ourselves, nor to frighten our enemies.

If we are to have war, with whom is it to be prosecuted—not in terms I mean, but in fact? Certainly not with France. Her few possessions in the West Indies have probably, by this time, ceased to belong to her, and between her European territories and the United States a gulf intervenes, a power is interposed, which neither the Emperor of the West nor the King of the Two Americas can either fathom or resist.

It then appears, if we are to have war, it is to be a covert war, with the two belligerents, but in reality an actual war with Great Britain alone, and not a war with both France and Great Britain, as the face of this bill seems to import.

If this be the determination of our Government, and the war is to commence at a future day, and not instantly, what is the course which policy would dictate to this country to pursue? Certainly not a prohibition of the importation of her manufactures. A long period of years must elapse before we can furnish for ourselves many articles we receive from her even of the first necessity, or those which, from habit, have become such to us. We should, therefore, sedulously endeavor, not only to guard against exhausting our present stock, but to adopt every means in our power to replenish it.

It would be expedient to throw wide open the entrance of our ports for importations, to overstock as much as possible the United States with British manufactures. This would procure for us a double advantage; it would promote our own accommodation, by giving us the means of commencing and prosecuting war with fewer privations, and it would powerfully tend to unite the interests of a certain class of the inhabitants of that country with our own—for, as the mass of importations from Great Britain are made on long credits, should a war ensue before such credits are cancelled, it is obvious, that, until the conclusion of the war, those debts could not be collected, and this circumstance alone, to a certain extent, might operate as a preventive check to war, or, at any rate, would secure in the bosom of the British nation a party whose interests and feelings would be intimately connected with a speedy return of peace.

By adopting a non-intercourse antecedent to a state of war, our own stock of supplies becomes exhausted, the British merchants have time and notice given them to collect, or alienate, by assignment, their debts in this country. A warning is given them to buckle on their armor; their good disposition towards us is not only changed, but embittered, and the very persons, who, in the one case, might possibly prevent a war, or be instrumental in effecting the restoration of peace, would in the other, probably be among the most willing to rush into the contest, from the impulse of temper, and from the conviction that their own circumstances would not be deteriorated by its consequences.

A non-intercourse would also be attended with great hazard and disadvantage. It would be as well understood by others as by ourselves; it could alone be considered as the precursor of war; and the blow would be struck, not when we were prepared, but when our opponents were ready for the contest; and should this bill go into operation, it is very possible, that during the ensuing Summer, some of our cities may exhibit heaps of ruins and of ashes, before expresses could convene at the seat of Government even the heads of our departments.

Another evil would arise, and that a permanent one; whether a non-intercourse eventuated in war or peace, it would materially and adversely affect both the habits of the people and the revenue of the State. Many of the articles which are now imported from Great Britain are indispensable for our comfort, and some of them for our existence. The people cannot do without them: the consequence must be, that, instead of being regularly imported, the articles will be smuggled into this country, and thereby the price not only becomes greatly enhanced to the consumer, but the duties are wholly lost to the Government.

Hitherto, the revenue of the United States arising from impost has been collected with a degree of integrity and punctuality highly honorable and unexampled in the history of commercial nations. This successful collection of duties has not however been effected by the employment of swarms of revenue officers, spies, and informers, as in other countries; it has been infinitely more effectually secured, by an honorable pride of character, and that sentiment of affection which was naturally excited in the hearts of freemen towards the Government of their choice, and a Government under which, in the main, they have experienced much prosperity. But barriers of this description, like other high-toned sentiments of the mind, being once broken down, can with difficulty be restored, and the chance of materially impairing this, in reality, "cheap defence of nations" should, in my opinion, of itself, afford a sufficient reason for the rejection of all measures of doubtful policy.

In a country nearly surrounded by, and every where intersected with, navigable waters, encompassed by a frontier beyond the ability of ten Bonaparte armies to guard, and inhabited by a race of men unrivalled for hardihood and enterprise, and at present in a state of poverty, the temptation of great prices will be irresistible—for there is no truism in morals or philosophy better established than the commercial axiom, that demand will ultimately furnish a supply.

There are, undoubtedly, periods in the history of a nation, in which a contest would be both honorable and indispensable, but it should ever be the result of great deliberation, and in an extended republic, perhaps, of necessity. That government is most wise and most patriotic, which so conducts the affairs of the nation over which it presides, as to produce the greatest ultimate good; and when a nation is attacked at the same time by two assailants, it is no reflection on its honor or its bravery, to select its opponent; and on principles of reciprocity, independently of those of interest, the first aggressor would undoubtedly be entitled to the first notice.

Who then has been the first aggressor? I answer, France. The Berlin Decree is in a great measure the cause of our present difficulties. In justification of France in doing this, I know gentlemen resort to the convention between Russia and Great Britain in 1793, to prohibit a supply of grain to France; but this is by no means sufficient justification to France, even without referring to a decree to the same effect issued in May of the same year by France, while she was ignorant of the secret stipulation between Russia and Great Britain.

For a long period, and among most of the maritime nations of Europe, the right of inhibiting a supply of provisions to an enemy, was tacitly acquiesced in, or expressly admitted. This practice existed even so long ago as the Mithridatic war, and has probably been followed up, without an interval at any one time of fifty years, from the commencement of the Christian era to the present day. This attempt therefore of Great Britain to injure France, formed no excuse for France to attempt to injure Great Britain by violating the commerce of the United States.

On the 31st of December, 1806, the British Government formally notified the American Government, that Great Britain would consider an acquiescence in the Berlin Decree on the part of neutral nations, as giving to her (Great Britain) the right to retaliate in the same way against France.

Had the American Government, at this period, manfully and explicitly made known its determination to support our rights at all hazards, I have no belief that our present difficulties would ever have existed.

In May succeeding, advices were received of French privateers, under this decree, depredating upon American vessels in the West Indies; and during the same month the ship Horizon, in distress, was thrown by the act of God on the French coast, and was seized under the same authority.

In November, 1807, the British, in conformity with their notice, issued their retaliating order. A prior Order in Council of January, 1807, had been issued, but this only affected vessels trading between different ports of France, or between ports of France and her allies; a trade always obnoxious to suspicion, and one which during war must ever be expected in a great degree to be restricted, and which is also interdicted by a standing law of the French Government, passed in 1778, and confirmed by the present Emperor.

Then followed in succession, on the part of France, the Milan and Bayonne decrees. The last of which dooms an American vessel to condemnation from the exercise of a right universally acknowledged to belong to belligerents, and one which the neutral has no possibility of preventing, that of being spoken with by an enemy cruiser, which from her superior sailing there was no possibility of avoiding. In point of principle, this is the most outrageous violation of neutral rights ever known, and this, too, took place under the existence of a treaty made within a few years by the same person who issued these very decrees. While with Great Britain we have no treaty, and whose orders are expressly bottomed upon and limited in duration by the French decrees, and issued after having given twelve months' notice of her intention to oppose them in this way, and the Orders in Council are even as yet not co-extensive in principle with the French decrees.

I have, in taking this brief view, confined myself exclusively to the decrees and orders of the two Governments, without adverting to other causes of complaint on either side. I consider myself as warranted in doing this, from the American Government having explicitly taken this ground, and made known that, on the removal of the decrees and orders, it would, on our part, remove the embargo, and restore the accustomed intercourse between the two countries.

From this consideration of the subject, it irresistibly follows, that France was the first aggressor on us, in issuing her decrees—that in point of principle, they are much more outrageous violations of right than the British Orders in Council—that the latter originate from, and co-exist only with the former, and that France should of consequence be the first object of our vengeance.

The effects of a war with one or the other nation, would be as distinctly perceptible. With France it would make no difference to us. For as long as she continues her decrees, commerce with her could not be prosecuted—no man would be mad enough while her coast is lined, and the ocean covered with British cruisers, to send his vessel to France, where she would meet with certain condemnation for being even seen and spoken with by a British frigate. With France therefore, the actual difference arising from passing this bill, and declaring a non-intercourse would be next to nothing.

With Great Britain the effects would be reversed. No one now doubts her ability or disposition to carry her orders into effect, nor her preparation to extend the theatre of war. If we commenced war upon France, as she would be the common enemy of both nations, there is no doubt in my mind that our differences with Great Britain would be favorably settled, that the commerce of the world, excepting as it respects France and her allies, would be again open to us, and that a trade, which has hitherto employed nearly seventy millions of our capital, might be again accessible to the industry and enterprise of our citizens.

a war with Great Britain, what will be its consequences? If your citizens are united, you can capture Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick; when you have effected this, what remains next to be done? You have reached the ne plus ultra of your ability. Thenceforward your ports are hermetically sealed. Privateering, from the convoy system adopted by Great Britain, could not be successfully prosecuted; no food for enterprise remains, and thus you would remain, five, ten, or fifteen years, as the case might be, under the wisdom and good sense of the nation predominated over its passion, when an accommodation would be made with Great Britain, following her example with regard to her West India conquests restoring the captured provinces, enriched by American population and industry, and giving us perhaps a treaty, still less favorable than the much execrated instrument of 1794, which, bad as it was said to be, has proved a cornucopia of wealth to our country, if it produced nothing less than a thirteen years' peace and which, to my view, is vastly preferable to its abortive successor of the year eighteen hundred and six.

As a young people, neither our duty nor our interest requires that we should enter into a war with any nation without a rational prospect of success. If we are to engage in a war with Great Britain, it will be a war of no ordinary cast—whose effects and duration no man can distinctly foretell; such a war cannot be carried on with a divided people, with “restrictive energies,” or paper resolutions—it must be a war to be prosecuted at the expense of the blood, the treasure, and perhaps the prosperity of the country.

Such a war ought never to be undertaken by a young nation, by a Republican people, unambitious of conquest, already possessing territory enough for “the thousandth generation,” except under circumstances of the most urgent necessity, and after every honorable, open, and reciprocal effort to preserve peace had been in vain attempted.

In this country it may emphatically be said the vox populi is the vox Dei. The Government, whatever may be its disposition, cannot go to war without the people; and the people, intelligent in many parts of the country as their rulers, knowing their own interests, and knowing also who will have to sustain the burden of the contest, will not engage in any but a just and necessary war, and then only after the necessity has been made obvious to their comprehension.

It is the policy of this Government to spread information before the people, they can therefore judge for themselves. With regard to our foreign relations, they have not before them all the facts; they have however enough to present to them the singular spectacle, that we are about to declare a non-intercourse with two nations; with one of which it must produce a destructive war, while the other enemy, if it be proper so to style her, who furnishes the root of the system, chuckles at the measure we adopt, ostensibly to annoy her—praises our embargo, and speaks in the most recent and official communications of her Government, to us, as joined in a common cause with her; and publicly declares “that the allies of France and the United States sacrifice, with a resolution equally generous, their private conveniences, in repelling from all points the English commerce, and employing the means calculated to promote that end.”

What will the Government of Great Britain and the people of this country, after hearing this, think of the rumors now afloat? That the French Minister, apparently well satisfied with his situation, has engaged a house near the city of Baltimore on a three years' lease? That the President's confidential Secretary, leaving the duties of his recent appointment as a captain in the army, is going to France, while a six-dollar bearer of despatches, I know not whom, is going to England; and that even at this moment, when all intercourse is to be interdicted, we are, from the exuberance of our philanthropy, cutting our own throats, and sending cotton seed to France in a Government vessel, to teach them how to supplant us in the cultivation of the great staple commodity of our own country.

To say the least of it, the people will perceive in a non-intercourse, or in its synonyme, war, an uncommon, if fortuitous coincidence with the views of one belligerent, in opposition to those of the other, and will not at present, in my belief, concur in such a coincidence if they can constitutionally prevent it.

The recollection is yet too vivid, of the enormities of the French Revolution; of the more recent but still more extended atrocities of her imperial Government; the violation of her treaty with us; the gross infractions of our rights; the unmeasured contempt and disgrace she has heaped upon us; to permit for a moment the people of this country, either in terms or in substance, to join with her “in a common cause to repel from all points the English commerce, and to employ the means calculated to promote that end.”

In the Northern and Eastern sections of the United States, the great majority of the people are, as I believe, ready for a war with France, if the Government choose to direct it, as being the war first called for, by a regard to the honor and interest of our country, and as being the nation with whom, according to the observations of the gentleman from Virginia, made some time since, we are already in a state of actual hostility.

With Great Britain they would not readily engage in war, until all hope of accommodation shall have vanished; and to evince this, a new negotiation, another effort at adjustment, ought still to be made. The attempt to produce peace can disgrace no nation not in danger of immediate subjugation.

If this negotiation be undertaken and conducted with publicity—in the spirit of amity, moderation, frankness, and reciprocity, and with a due regard to the existing and peculiar circumstances of the times, and it should fail, then the boon so ardently desired, by every honest man in the country, that of union, would be attained. In such case, there would be but one voice in the Republic—the nation would be united as one man, and would be ready, at the command of their rulers, to take the path to death or victory.

This is the course which, in my humble opinion, the United States ought to pursue.

As to the commercial effects of a non-intercourse with Great Britain and France and their respective dependencies, and with any country or place in the actual possession of Great Britain or France, and a prohibition to import their manufactures or produce, I shall not waste the time of the Senate minutely to consider it.

No trade would remain, which could be prosecuted without fraud, humiliation, or disgrace; no one would mistake a non-intercourse for a pacific measure; distant voyages, therefore, those of the North-west coast of America—to China, Manilla, Batavia—to the Arabian and Persian Gulfs, would not be undertaken; with a non-intercourse hanging over their heads, our merchants would not even venture to send their vessels to the Brazils.

In Europe, who can tell whether Spain or Portugal are in the actual possession of France or Great Britain? They both have armies there, or on the frontiers, and neither nation has a Government. No honorable Senator of this House, nor any collector in the United States, can now tell, whether a merchant has or has not a right, under this law, to send a vessel to either of those countries; and if he did, and the French or the British were the conquerors before her arrival there, whether such vessel would or would not come within the penalties of this act.

Yes, sir, we can trade elsewhere, we can go to the lawless States of Barbary, and perhaps make Algiers a great emporium for American merchandise—to the Azores or Western Islands—to Sweden, the most impoverished country in Europe, and where half a dozen ships loaded with West India produce would overstock all her markets. We could also for a short time trade to St. Bartholomews, in the West Indies—I mean until actual war commenced. But wherever a depot was opened it would be instantly glutted with American produce, which, from a combination among the purchasers, would be sold for a song; while British manufactures would come to us by a circuitous route, and at an immense price, covered with perjuries, and doubly platted with Russian, Prussian, Dutch, and German certificates.

The consequence of all this must be, that the products of the Southern States, the corn, wheat, flour, cotton, and some of the tobacco, would find a bad market; while the bulky and more perishable articles of the North—the fish, which in warm weather cannot be rehandled, and the lumber, which from its bulk and little value cannot pay two freights, would, under this non-intercourse, be nearly as unsaleable as under the embargo; while, worse even than this, our excommunicated opponents would get their supplies on cheaper terms than they have ever received them since we have been a nation. I have no hesitation in saying, that such a trade as this would be superlative degradation, and that it ought not to be prosecuted by any independent people.

Mr. HILLHOUSE said: As it regards the future destinies of our country, the bill on your table is one of the most important that has engaged the attention of Congress. This bill marches us to the precipice, from which the next step may plunge the nation into a war, incalculable as to calamity and duration. Under circumstances like these, the duty I owe to myself, my constituents, and my country, requires me to come forth boldly, and speak my sentiments in plain language.

I am sorry, sir, we have not the whole information to which we are entitled before we are called on to decide this question. The bill is predicated on the principle of the entire failure of the negotiation with the great belligerents; the whole correspondence, therefore, ought to be before us, that we may perfectly understand what is our situation in relation to those Powers. But I know, sir, and every Senator must know, we have not that information. It is withheld from us. It is manifest, from the documents which have been communicated by the President of the United States, that there has been a double-gear'd correspondence between our foreign Ministers and the Department of State. An official correspondence, and a private correspondence. As regards England, we have very little of the private correspondence. As regards France, we have but a small portion of either the official or private correspondence. Can any one believe, that, during such a critical period of our affairs with that nation, for very long intervals there should have been no communications or correspondence between our Government and our Minister at the Court of France? The very letters we have, refer to others which must contain important information. Why this concealment? Sir, being denied the direct and clear evidence in the possession of our Government, we must depend on such information as we can find. This must be my apology for some of the circumstances which I shall state in the course of my remarks; circumstances to which I should not have been under the necessity of resorting, if all the correspondence, official and private, had been laid before us. Such as was not proper to be made public might have been sent confidentially, as is frequently done. It ought to be known before we determine on committing the peace of the nation.

Before I proceed to general remarks, I will notice some few of the details of the bill; on which I shall, however, be very concise, as the whole is radically wrong, and incapable of amendment. This is the first attempt in legislation to have a partial embargo on the same port. I know it is not unusual to have a partial embargo, that is, an embargo on a particular port, or certain ports. But that all the ports should be embargoed and not embargoed at the same time, is a novelty, is what I cannot understand. The very nature of an embargo is to confine vessels in port; and how can vessels be confined and not confined by the same act? The gentlemen who prepared this bill were not so wanting in knowledge in the affairs of legislation as not to understand this business perfectly. The only possible use there can be in keeping alive the embargo act, the supplementary embargo acts, and the enforcing statute, is to avail themselves of the military force, and of the odious and oppressive provisions contained in them, to aid in the execution of this measure, without incurring the popularity which might be attached to the re-enacting of like provisions in this bill. The fact is, however, that all the provisions in those various acts for carrying them into effect, so far as regards France or England, or their colonies and dependencies, are virtually adopted by this bill.

Section eleventh of this bill authorizes the President of the United States, "in case either France or Great Britain shall so revoke or modify her edicts, as that they shall cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, to declare the same by proclamation; and thereupon cause to be issued letters of marque and reprisal against the nation thereafter continuing in force its unlawful edicts." The Constitution says, "The Congress shall have power to declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land or water." The exercise of this authority, given by this section to the President, to grant letters of marque and reprisal, is to rest on the revocation or modification of the edicts of France or Great Britain, so as not to violate the neutral commerce of the United States. And this complicated question is left to the judgment and unlimited discretion of the President. His individual opinion on the nature of a variety of edicts not specified, and which will admit of various constructions, is to govern. If the condition on which such a power was to be exercised, were some specified event, certain and precise in point of fact, which is not this case, it might be questioned whether the Constitution would, even then, warrant Congress in delegating to the President the power of declaring war, or of granting letters of marque and reprisal.

The thirteenth section provides that no vessel shall be allowed to go on a foreign voyage, unless, among other things, bonds are given, in some instances in double, and others in four times the value of the vessel and cargo; "nor unless every other requisite and provision of the second section of the act"—(the enforcing act) "shall have been complied with." One of which is, that bonds shall be given to six times the value of vessel and cargo. It cannot be the intention that bonds, in some instances to eight, and others ten times the value, should be demanded; and yet I may ask, how are you to get along with the positive provision in this section? Perhaps, indeed, it may be done with the aid of the present learned Attorney General, who has such a wonderful faculty of explaining away positive statutes.

Section fourteen contains a provision directly opposed to that part of the Constitution which says, "no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another."

By this section all the ports of the United States are released from certain oppressive and burdensome restrictions respecting their coasting trade, excepting the collection districts adjacent to the territories of a foreign nation, which are to remain subject to those restrictions, amounting almost to a total prohibition of their coasting trade. No such exception is to be found in the Constitution; and if Congress may thus single out the ports of one district, why not those of a State, and thereby wholly arrest the commerce of a State which may be so unfortunate as to fall under the displeasure of the Administration? If the Constitution may be departed from in one instance, what security is there that all imposts, duties, or excises, shall be uniform—that capitation or other direct tax shall be according to the census—or that no tax or duty shall be laid on the exports? As well, nay better, might a tax or duty be laid on the exports of a particular port, than that their coasting trade should be burdened according to the provisions of those several acts.

I will close my remarks on the details of the bill with some notice of the nineteenth and last section, which seems to be a favorite one with the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. SMITH,) because it repeals, after the end of the next session of Congress, the several embargo acts, and the enforcing statute. Sir, I have no confidence in this provision. We find such a clause tacked to almost every bill which may hazard popularity. By examining the statute book, you will find a great number of important laws resting on such a clause; and before the close of almost every session we pass a short bill, containing perhaps three or four lines, further to continue such laws in force to the next or some future session of Congress.

Mr. President, it has been with very great concern that I have viewed the progress of our affairs in regard to our foreign relations, since the discussion on the resolution I had the honor to submit, for the repeal of the embargo. It is with deep anxiety, I contemplate the passing such an act as is now under consideration. The embargo has produced discontents of a very alarming nature. This bill, if it should unfortunately pass, may drive the people to desperation. The embargo has destroyed our commerce. This bill, if carried into effect, will destroy the benefits of commerce, and may involve us in war. If the provisions of the bill are not intended to be executed, it would be degrading to the Government, it would be dishonorable to pass it; as it would be holding out a lure, nay an invitation, to our citizens to become violators of our laws, and expose us to the derision of the world.

Suppose the act passed, and rigorously executed, what would be the consequence? Every man of common sense in our country can tell you. Our produce would be confined to a few ports, one or two, perhaps, in the West Indies, the market would be glutted, and it would not bring one-third its value. British and other merchants would purchase at their own price, and transport it to markets where wanted, at an immense profit. Such articles of foreign growth and manufacture as were admitted would be at an exorbitant price, but many articles of indispensable necessity would be excluded altogether.

It will be remembered, that, when the embargo bill was on its rapid march through the Senate, at the last session, I did not fail to warn them of the danger of passing such an act; for that an embargo could not and would not, for any great length of time, be executed. No, sir, the despotic power of Bonaparte could not execute it. Now that it is found it cannot be executed, the bill on your table is proposed as a substitute. Let me ask, can that be executed? I have no hesitation in saying it cannot and will not be executed. For if the laws will not admit the introduction of such articles of foreign growth and manufacture as are of indispensable necessity, they will be smuggled into the country, and the payment of duties avoided. Sir, Congress cannot control the elements; and they might as well attempt that, as to enforce such acts against the general interests and wishes of the people. The operation of such statutes will be to convert your merchants into smugglers, and your citizens into spies, prowling about like beasts of prey, seeking whom they may devour. Our country will be filled with seizures, our Federal courts crowded with suits for penalties and forfeitures, and our State courts with suits for damages. Many of our citizens possessing integrity and honor, too scrupulous to engage in such a traffic, might think of quitting their country, and seeking protection under some foreign Power, having laws of a milder aspect.

Let me entreat the Senate to pause, for a moment, and reflect whether they can have any assurance that there will, much longer, be a patient submission to such measures? Whether the burden is not already insupportable? And whether the sufferings of the people have not become intolerable? Some gentlemen have declared their disbelief of the accounts of the sufferings of the people. They do not believe that such sufferings exist, because the sufferers have not proclaimed them on the house-top. It is not men of wealth, who, under any circumstances, and in any times, can produce an abundance of the necessaries of life—or men in the receipt of ample salaries, which suffer no diminution from the embargo—or men who receive a per diem allowance, not depending upon commerce or agriculture for its continuance—about whom I feel an anxiety. Such men, though, by the embargo, they may be deprived of the opportunity of adding to the thousands already laid up in store, will not suffer want. It is the laboring people in the Northern and Eastern States, who depend on their daily occupations for the support of themselves and their numerous families, whose sufferings I regard. On this class of citizens we depend to do the labor of our country. Many of them, though in the humbler walks of life, are respectable; they are freemen; they add greatly to our strength and security in the hour of danger; for they are numerous and hardy, and bear arms; and, what is most to their honor, are always prepared, when their country calls, to go forth in her defence. These are men who cannot be turned off with a peck of corn a week.* Men about whose sufferings we cannot feel indifferent. To find out the sufferings of this class of our citizens, you must not go to demagogues, political partisans, or office hunters, who always say what they think will please those in power; you must look behind the curtain which shields from public view domestic concerns and private sufferings. There is nothing which people more studiously conceal than that pinching poverty which compels them to beg charity of others. I have known families, who, from sickness or other misfortune, have been deprived of a regular supply of the necessaries of life from the labor and industry of him on whom they depend for support, who have almost perished with want, rather than go to the poor-house, or submit to be supported by the town; and for whose relief the most secret and delicate modes of bestowing charity have been resorted to.

To convince the Senate that the sufferings of our people are real and not imaginary, I will state one piece of information from New Haven, on which may be placed the fullest reliance. During the present inclement season, hundreds of applicants for admittance into the poor-house have been denied. In ordinary times the poor-house would accommodate three times the number in it. Always, until now, it has been more than sufficient to accommodate all that were under the necessity of going to it. In addition to the provision made by the town, and the various charitable societies, resort has been had to the raising of money by subscriptions, to purchase wood and provisions, to prevent people from perishing with cold and hunger; a point of suffering this to which we were never reduced under all the pressure of the Revolutionary war; though in that time our little town suffered much, and was once sacked and plundered by the British army. This, for the moment, was distressing, but the usual occupations of its inhabitants, a sure source for the supply of their wants, not being taken away, they were soon able to procure for themselves the necessaries and many of the comforts of life. Sir, it is no pleasant spectacle to behold a flourishing little town, where, though wealth did not abound, a competency, derived from honest industry, made every man happy, reduced to such distress, and that, too, by the measures of their own Government. These sufferings are not confined to New Haven, they pervade all our commercial towns. I have seen very affecting descriptions of them from other places—descriptions which must touch the tender feelings of every heart not rendered callous by party spirit. From the patriotic city of Baltimore, where the embargo has been approved, we have the following information, being an extract from the communication of the Mayor to the City Council:

"The gentleman appointed to distribute the funds, have, with zeal and industry truly commendable, in every instance, in person, visited the families applying for relief, and extended the hand of charity to them, in proportion to their several necessities, and the sums collected. In your wisdom and humanity, I confidently repose for further relief; as the reports of the gentlemen appointed to visit them are truly distressing to the feelings of humanity, both as to their numbers and their necessities."

In this same paper, I find the following account:

"The Marine Society of Philadelphia have discovered upward of one thousand objects of charity, who, from a state of comfort, have been reduced to the lowest abyss of poverty."

I shall not take up the time of the Senate in noticing other official accounts of suffering equally distressing. It will be doubly afflictive to the people to find our Government obstinately bent on measures which have produced so much individual distress, after they are acknowledged to have failed to produce the desired effect on foreign nations. This will seem to be more than trifling with their sufferings; and I will not be answerable for the consequences. For my part, I believe the point of suffering is as great as can be endured; and may I not be permitted to ask the question, whether much more ought to be endured?

I am not one of those who advocate the doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance; or that oppression, even from our own Government, is not to be resisted. I do believe that it is not only justifiable, but a paramount duty to resist, whenever the oppression becomes intolerable, or unconstitutional measures, which strike at the foundation of civil liberty, are attempted to be enforced. This doctrine is not new, sir, it is the doctrine which our ancestors brought with them to New England, and have handed down to us as our most precious birthright; an invaluable inheritance to freemen, which I hope neither we nor our children will ever be induced to surrender.

To show that the doctrines which I have advanced, and the opinions I entertain, are not peculiar to New England, I will take the liberty of reading what was said by Earl Chatham, one of the greatest statesmen England ever knew, when oppressive and unconstitutional measures were, by an administration of that country, attempted to be enforced. And, surely, gentlemen will not say the Constitution and Government of England is more friendly to liberty, and the free expression of opinion, than the Constitution and Government of the United States. Parliamentary Debates, volume 29, page 50:

"My Lords, I need not look abroad for grievances. The grand capital mischief is fixed at home. It corrupts the very foundation of our political existence, and preys upon the vitals of the State—the constitution has been grossly violated—the constitution at this moment stands violated. Until that wound be healed, until the grievance is redressed, it is vain to recommend union to Parliament—in vain to promote concord among the people. If we mean seriously to unite the nation within itself, we must convince them that their complaints are regarded, and that their injuries shall be redressed. On that foundation, I would take the lead in recommending peace and harmony to the people. On any other, I would never wish to see them united again. If the breach in the constitution be effectually repaired, the people will of themselves return to a state of tranquillity. If not, may discord prevail forever! I know to what point this doctrine and this language will appear directed. But I feel the principle of an Englishman; and I utter them without apprehension or reserve. The crisis is indeed alarming: So much the more does it require a prudent relaxation on the part of Government. If the King's servants will not permit a Constitutional question to be decided on, according to the forms, and on the principles of the constitution, it must then be decided in some other manner; and rather than it should be given up, rather than the nation should surrender their birthright to a despotic Minister, I hope, my Lords, old as I am, I shall see the question brought to issue, and fairly tried between the people and the Government. My Lords, this is not the language of faction; let it be tried by that criterion, by which alone we can distinguish what is factious, from what is not—by the principles of the English constitution. I have been bred up in these principles; and know that, when the liberty of the subject is invaded, and all redress is denied him, resistance is justified."

When the Parliament of England were attempting to enforce these unjust and oppressive measures on the Colonies, which caused resistance, and terminated in our Revolution and independence, Lord Chatham, this friend of civil liberty, said in the House of Lords, "I rejoice that the Colonies have resisted."

An objection arises to this measure of non-importation and non-intercourse, from the circumstance of the strong resemblance it bears to that system of warfare which the nations of continental Europe have, under the auspices of Bonaparte, been induced to wage against England. Was not that a non-intercourse, and a non-importation of all articles the growth or manufacture of the British dominions? Will not this circumstance alarm the minds of the people? It may be said this measure, upon the face of it, purports to be against both belligerents, and is therefore impartial. Was not that the case also with the embargo? And has not that been found to be a measure in perfect unison with the wishes, feelings, and views of Bonaparte? It is in vain to deny it, he has been too explicit in his declarations on that subject to leave a doubt. Nay, sir, what he has said, taken in connexion with other known facts, has gone far to excite, in the minds of the people, in one portion of the Union, a suspicion, and I should be incorrect if I should say more than suspicion, that there was some secret understanding. Here let me remark that, I do not mean to accuse the Administration of anything inconsistent with our rights as an independent nation; for as such we have a right not only to co-operate but to form an alliance with France. If our Administration believed, as I know many do believe, that it would be a wise policy, should we not have cause to fear they would adopt that course? It is because I believe such a policy would be unwise, would be ruinous to the nation, that I wish to avoid everything that looks that way.

I have said that what the Emperor of France, or, which is the same thing, what his confidential Ministers have said, taken in connexion with other matters known to us, has excited suspicion, that there was an understanding between our Administration and France in relation to the embargo. I will now enumerate some of the circumstances. During the last session of Congress, letters were received from the Continent of Europe, bringing information, from a respectable source, that on the sailing of the United States' armed schooner Revenge, from France, with Doctor Bullus, and despatches, our Minister there wrote to Holland, communicating information that the arrival of the Revenge in the United States would be immediately followed by a general embargo, and urging the merchants to hasten the departure of their vessels, under an apprehension, as I suppose, that the embargo might induce a declaration of war on the part of Great Britain. This intelligence, I am credibly informed, has been confirmed by a person not long since in this city, who states that he was in Holland at the time, and was well acquainted with the fact. The Revenge arrived, and the ever memorable embargo was laid. The question is asked, and I am not able to answer it, how was it known in France, unless there had been some previous communication and understanding on that subject, that such an embargo would be laid, at a time when such a thing was not suspected by the people of the United States? That the Emperor expected a policy of the nature of the embargo to be adopted in the United States, is manifest from another circumstance. After the embargo began to operate on the inhabitants of Guadeloupe, to induce them to be patient under their sufferings, the three chief officers there, members of Bonaparte's Legion of Honor, issued their proclamation on the 21st of March, 1808, in the name of the Emperor of the French, in which, referring to our embargo, they say :

"That the rigor of these measures is a new proof of the faithfulness of this Power (the United States) to its former friendship with the French empire; of its attachment to the general interests of Europe, which are likewise its own, as one of the great means of accelerating a maritime peace, by the impossibility which it presents to the common enemy of the means to continue the war."

This proclamation must have been issued in consequence of orders and instructions from the Emperor; for his officers do not act in his name without orders; and those orders must have been issued in consequence of his previous knowledge that an embargo was to be laid; because there was not time, after the embargo act arrived in France, for such orders to have reached Guadeloupe before the issuing of this proclamation. Another circumstance, which made some impression, was the unceasing effort, during the last session of Congress, to convert the embargo into a non-intercourse. Expecting, no doubt, that, by cutting off all remittances, by land as well as by sea, the merchants would cease to send out their goods. If this bill passes, we shall have adopted the very measures which have been required by the French Emperor of other neutral nations, and it will be considered as furnishing irresistible evidence to confirm those existing suspicions.

There are other circumstances which have excited alarm. I must speak out—times have become too serious to conceal anything; for I consider the vote which is about to be given, on this bill, as deciding the all important question of peace or war. When an opinion seemed to prevail, a little time since, that it would be necessary to repeal the embargo, those who are considered as the most confidential organs of the Administration, strenuously urged the first of June for the time of the repeal. And why? Not certainly on account of any advantage it could be to the people of the United States to postpone the repeal to that time. The real cause why the 1st of June was fixed on, is not for me to say; but I can tell you what is suspected by some of the people to be the reason; it is, that there may be time for the despatch vessel to go to France and return; so that some arrangement may be made as to a substitute for the embargo, that the Emperor may not take umbrage at the repeal. These suspicions are much increased by a report which is in circulation, for the truth of which, however, I cannot vouch, that the Private Secretary of the President is to be the bearer of the despatches. It can hardly be supposed that this confidential agent of the President should be sent on the mere errand of a post-boy. People fear some private agency, some secret negotiation, which may ultimately in linking the destinies of our country to those of France. An idea which is terrifying to them; for, as it regards our liberties and our free Government, the embrace of France would be the grasp of death. Bonaparte will never rest satisfied to see the people of any country in the enjoyment of liberty. The name of a free Republic is a living reproach to him. Other questions are asked, which I am not able to answer; such as, why the next session of Congress is fixed on the fourth Monday of May? Whether it is not to give time for the despatch vessel to go and return? Whether the plan of going to war with both the belligerents was not with an understanding with one nation that it was to be merely a nominal war? And whether, in any other point of view, the idea of going to war with two such powerful belligerents, at the same time, was not too ridiculous to be seriously entertained for a moment? On the last point, I have information perfectly satisfactory to my mind, that such a war would not be objected to on the part of France.

Sir, the bill before you is war. It is to suspend all intercourse, to put an end to all the relations of amity. What is that but war? war of the worst kind—war under the disguise of non-intercourse, which is only a milder mode of declaring it. If we must have war, let it be an open war. Let gentlemen come forward with a bold and manly front and declare war; and not attempt, in this covert manner, to decoy and deceive the people into war. I honor the open conduct of the gentleman from Virginia: he has not hesitated to declare that his sentiments and wishes are for war. If I entertained the same opinion of the conduct of our Administration, and of foreign nations, as he has declared, I would join him heart and hand for a declaration of war. But, sir, the policy of our country is pacific, as I hope it always will be. The nation will not consent to go to war until all honorable and fair means have been attempted to settle differences by negotiation—a negotiation conducted in a manner that shall evince the most perfect sincerity and justice. An Administration that should commence a war, against public sentiment, would assume an awful responsibility, and bring on themselves and their country inevitable disgrace. Even the monarchy of England cannot sustain a war that is unpopular.

The gentleman from Virginia has, in pathetic strains, invited us; he has in emphatic language called upon all parties to unite in supporting the cause of our country. In the cause of our country we will unite. The American people will all unite in supporting our nation's independence, and in the support of our rights. In no portion of this Union will the people be more united, or more obedient to such a call than in New England. They will not surrender, but with their lives, either to foreign domination, or domestic despotism, their unalienable privilege of freemen, their birthright.

But, sir, there is a manifest difference between a call to support our country's cause—and a call to support the measures of an Administration. The former is peremptory and irresistible. But the latter is not entitled to the like support, unless its measures are founded in justice, wisdom, and sound policy. The people of New England have sufficient discernment to distinguish between the Constitution of the United States and the Administration—between their country and the Administration of its Government. They cannot be induced to sacrifice their best interests to support the failing projects of an Administration whose political character and influence, and not the honor and interest of the country, are at stake on the measures now proposed to be enforced.

An Administration to be just must be sincere and impartial, both toward foreign nations and our own citizens. Conscious of this truth, the gentleman from Virginia has declared, in the most decisive language, that the present Administration have been both sincere and impartial, and has challenged us to adduce proof to the contrary. As the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. BAYARD) has so ably and so conclusively proved the insincerity and partiality of the Administration, as regards foreign nations, I shall not take up the time of the Senate on that point, but confine myself to a very few remarks upon the insincerity and partiality which have been practised upon our own citizens. May I not ask, whether the commencement of this Administration was not distinguished by circumstances which might well excite doubts of Executive sincerity? In the inaugural speech, we were told:

"All will bear in mind this sacred principle, that though the will of the majority is in all cases to prevail, that will to be rightful must be reasonable, that the minority possess equal rights, which equal laws must protect, and to violate would be oppression. Let us, then, fellow-citizens, unite with one heart and one mind, let us restore to social intercourse that harmony and affection without which liberty, and even life itself are but dreary things. And let us reflect that, having banished from our land that religious intolerance under which mankind so long bled and suffered, we have yet gained but little, if we countenance a political intolerance, as despotic, as wicked, and capable of as bitter and bloody persecution. We have called by different names brethren of the same principle. We are all Republicans—we are all Federalists. Equal and exact justice to all men, of whatever state or persuasion, religious or political."

I was so credulous as to believe all this sincere. I went home, and was active and in earnest to propagate the same opinion among the people of the State to which I belonged. The people were prepared not only to support the Constitution and Government of their country, which they will always do, but such an Administration as they understood, from the inaugural speech, we were to have. A few months only elapsed, however, before there was displayed a spirit of intolerance and party spirit, which filled them with astonishment. Persons, old Revolutionary characters, were displaced, not for want of talents or integrity to the due execution of their offices, nor for any neglect or infidelity in the performance of their duty. Whether such removals were merely on account of political opinion, or because such men would not be obsequious to the particular and private views of the Executive, I leave to others to explain. Though eight years have elapsed, this political intolerance has not ceased; during this very session we have been called upon to sanction appointments to fill vacancies made by such removals. Like partiality and injustice have been practised toward citizens of the United States in regard to appointments to new offices. I will not take up the time of the Senate in enumerating cases. The appointments of the present session are fresh in the minds of every member of this body. Unfortunately, the time has never yet arrived, when the only inquiry was to be, "is he honest, is he capable, is he faithful to the Constitution." Sir, an Administration thus conducting is not entitled to support; and an Administration thus managing the affairs of a nation will not ultimately be supported.

I shall next inquire in what has consisted the wisdom of the Administration as regards their measures? Those measures which have been adopted, and are now proposed to be extended and enforced, for they are links of the same chain, and as they regard foreign nations, are feeble; and, as far as the experiment has been made, have proved wholly inefficient. While at home they have prostrated a flourishing commerce—destroyed both our revenue and our resources—paralyzed private enterprise and honest industry—given encouragement to fraud, deception, and violence; exposing the honest, industrious, unsuspecting citizen, to become the dupe and the prey of unprincipled speculators—deprived many of our fellow-citizens of the means of gaining a subsistence—and rendered them incapable of contributing anything to the general defence and security of the nation. In the management of our foreign relations there has been such a want of wisdom as to bring our country (to use the expression of the gentleman from Virginia,) "into an awful crisis;" and if the same course of measures is to be persevered in, we shall, in all probability, be entangled in inextricable broils.

As to sound policy, as regards the measures of the present Administration, I have not been able to discern it. The measures now pursuing appear to me to be the reverse of sound policy. Let me ask, in what consists the policy of administering another poisonous dose to a patient already sick and fainting under the embargo? Has not experience shown us that there is no policy in non-importation and non-intercourse laws? Can it consist with good policy to increase the discontents of a people driven almost to desperation, by attempting to enforce, by the bayonet, acts which are opposed to the sentiments, feelings, and interest of the people? So long as the people preserve their liberties, and reserve in their own hands their arms, can it be prudent or politic for an Administration to attempt coercion?

Mr. President, I will now close my remarks with a concise prospective view. If we pass this bill, in what situation will the President elect find our affairs on the 4th day of March next, when he is to take the chair of State? To the embargo, and various supplementary acts, and the enforcing statute, the unpopularity of which an Administration of eight years standing, aided by the personal popularity of the Chief Magistrate could not sustain, we are about to superadd a non-importation and a non-intercourse; measures as incapable of execution—not less inefficient in regard to foreign nations—and, as they respect ourselves, equally oppressive and injurious, and, if possible, more odious than the embargo. This bill is covert war, and not only gives to the President of the United States the power, but seems to lay him under a necessity of commencing active war; which by the Constitution is confided only to Congress. By this bill we are about to extend that threatening policy, which is not likely to bring about an amicable adjustment of differences, but is, as well as other provisions of the bill, artfully calculated to involve our country in war. No Power having national feelings, or regard to national character, and possessing the means of resistance, will submit to such coercion.

Is it conducting candidly toward the President elect? Is it giving him a fair opportunity, for the present Congress to lay him under the necessity of going to war, or of receding in a manner to which some might be disposed to attach the idea of disgrace? No, sir, good policy requires that we now recede from measures found to be ineffectual or injurious. There would be magnanimity in this. To retract errors becomes a great mind. We ought to repeal the embargo altogether, and leave the President elect free to adopt such measures, and to pursue such a course as wisdom, sound policy, and the lessons of experience may dictate. In this situation the President elect would have it in his power to extricate us from our present embarrassments, if, fortunately, he should possess the fortitude and magnanimity (which may I not be permitted to hope will be the case?) to determine to assume the elevated character of President of the United States, and not to become the chief of a party.

If the Administration which is to commence on the 4th of March, shall adopt and pursue a course of measures which shall wear the stamp of sincerity, justice, wisdom, and sound policy, both as regards our own citizens and foreign nations, it will have the cordial co-operation and firm support of the great body of the people; but if governed by an intolerant spirit of party, a persecuting spirit as regards our own citizens, or a want of sincerity and justice toward any foreign nation, such an Administration will not be supported; and, on the experiment, it will be found that such an Administration cannot go on with the Government.

The question was now taken on the passage of the bill, and determined in the affirmative—yeas 21, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Condit, Franklin, Gailard, Giles, Gregg, Howland, Kitchel, Leib, Mathewson, Meigs, Milledge, Mitchell, Moore, Pope, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Smith of Tennessee, Thruston, and Tiffin.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Crawford, Gilman, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Lloyd, Parker, Pickering, Reed, Sumter, Turner, and White.

So it was resolved that this bill pass, and that the title thereof be, "An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes."

WEDNESDAY, February 22.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for imposing additional duties upon all goods, wares, and merchandise, imported from any foreign port or place," reported amendments; which were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee appointed to confer with the Surveyor of the Public Buildings, relative to the accommodation of the Senate at the next meeting of Congress, and

Resolved, That the Surveyor of Public Buildings do cause to be prepared, for the accommodation of the Senate at the next session of Congress, the room called "The Library Room," in the manner stated in the said Surveyor's report, with as little expense as may consist with the reasonable comfort of the members, and the convenience of spectators.

Mr. TIFFIN, from the committee, reported the bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to amend the charter of Georgetown," correctly engrossed. The bill was read the third time, and the blank in the fourth section was filled with the word twelve.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title ereof be, "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act to amend the charter of Georgetown.'"

Mr. TIFFIN, from the committee, reported the bill freeing from postage all letters and packets to Thomas Jefferson, correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title hereof be, "An act freeing from postage all letters and packets to Thomas Jefferson."

Mr. GILES, from the committee to whom the subject was referred on the 14th instant, reported bill further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

THURSDAY, February 23.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the committee to whom was referred the bill making further provision for the Corps of Engineers, reported the bill amended.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments, as in Committee of the Whole, and having agreed thereto, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House amended; and on the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time is amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

On motion of Mr. BRADLEY, it was ordered that the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of William White and others" be the order of the day for Monday next.

The bill further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, was read the second time.

Mr. WHITE from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Daniel Cotton," reported the bill without amendment.

Ordered, That this bill pass to a third reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the amendments reported by the select committee to the bill, entitled "An act for imposing additional duties upon all goods, wares, and merchandise, imported from any foreign port or place;" and having agreed to the report, and the bill having been further amended, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly.

On motion, by Mr. LLOYD, the bill was further amended, by inserting, after the word "place," in the eighth line of the printed bill, "except in any vessel which cleared out from the United States prior to the 22d of December, 1807, for any port or place not in Europe or the West Indies;" and on the question, Shall this bill pass to the third reading as amended? it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 9, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Gaillard, Gregg, Howland, Kitchel, Leib, Mathewson, Meigs, Milledge, Mitchell, Moore, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Smith of Tennessee, Sumter, Thruston, and Turner.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bradley, Gilman, Hillhouse, Lloyd, Parker, Pickering, Reed, and White.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of certain Alabama Indians," with amendments, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of certain Alabama Indians."

Ordered, That it be referred to Messrs. MITCHELL, CRAWFORD, and GREGG, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. GREGG, from the committee, reported the bill making further provision for the Corps of Engineers, correctly engrossed.

FRIDAY, February 24.

Mr. GREGG, from the committee, reported the amendments to the bill, entitled "An act for imposing additional duties upon all goods, wares, and merchandise, imported from any foreign port or place," correctly engrossed.

Mr. THRUSTON, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of a number of French citizens of the Territory of Michigan, reported a bill providing for the promulgation of certain laws in the Territory of Michigan; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The bill making further provision for the Corps of Engineers was read the third time, and the blank in the first section filled with "July."

Resolved, That this bill pass, and the title thereof be "An act making further provision for the Corps of Engineers."

Mr. FRANKLIN reported from the committee appointed on the subject: Whereupon, Ordered, That the committee to whom was referred the petition of Richard Bland Lee be discharged from the further consideration thereof.

ADDITIONAL DUTIES.

The bill, entitled "An act for imposing additional duties upon all goods, wares, and merchandise, imported from any foreign port or place," was read the third time as amended.

Mr. LLOYD moved to postpone the further consideration of this bill until the first Monday in June next; and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: After the observations which I have before made, sir, on this bill, and the detailed consideration which was given to it yesterday, I should not again rise, were the subject not a commercial, and an exceedingly important one; nor is it now my intention to make more than a few remarks, and these the Senate will probably think entitled to more than usual respect, when I inform them they will principally be, neither my own, nor wholly accordant with my opinions.

This bill can only be advocated upon the ground that a war is about to ensue, and that, to prepare the public treasury to sustain the prosecution of such war, this proposed duty is necessary. My purpose is to cite some authorities to show that neither the one nor the other is either expected or necessary; and the authorities I shall adduce to prove this, are those to which the Senate is accustomed to pay the highest respect.

SENATE.

Additional Duties.

FEBRUARY, 1809.

The first is from Mr. Gallatin's report to Congress in November, 1807, in which he says—

"A maritime war will, in the United States, generally and deeply affect, whilst it continues, the resources of individuals; as not only commercial profits will be curtailed, but, principally, because a great portion of the surplus of agricultural produce necessarily requires a foreign market. The reduced price of the principal articles exported from the United States will operate more heavily than any contemplated tax. And, without inquiring whether a similar cause may not still more deeply and permanently affect a nation at war with the United States, it seems to follow that, so far as relates to America, the losses and privations caused by the war should not be aggravated by taxes beyond what is strictly necessary. An addition to the debt is doubtless an evil; but experience having now shown with what rapid progress the revenue of the Union increases in time of peace; with what facility the debt formerly contracted has, in a few years, been reduced; a hope may confidently be entertained that all the evils of the war will be temporary, and easily repaired; and that the return of peace will, without any effort, afford ample resources for reimbursing whatever may have been borrowed during the war.

"The credit of the United States is also unimpaired, either at home or abroad; and it is believed that loans to a reasonable amount may be obtained on eligible terms."

And the same gentleman, (Mr. Gallatin,) in his report to Congress the present session, further remarks—

"The expenditures for the year 1809 ought not to exceed the sum of thirteen millions of dollars, which, as has been stated, is requisite for the support of the present establishment; and this would leave, for the service of the year 1810, a surplus of three millions of dollars, which, together with the proposed loan of five millions of dollars, would be sufficient to defray the Peace Establishment, and to pay the interest on the public debt during that year; thus two years more would be provided for, without either increasing the public debt or laying any new taxes. It is certainly only with a view to war, either immediate or contemplated, that it will become necessary to resort, at least to any considerable extent, to extraordinary sources of supply."

Now, sir, as there is no doubt but a new duty is a new tax, it is apparent from these observations of Mr. Gallatin, that if revenue is wanted, loans, and not taxes, ought to be resorted to, and that of course this new duty or tax ought not to be imposed, as the opinion expressed by the Secretary no doubt is correct, that the present "reduced price of the principal articles of the United States, already operate more heavily upon the citizens, than any contemplated tax that ought to be assessed, and that the losses and privations caused by war should not be aggravated beyond what is strictly necessary," and more especially should this not be done, when war as yet may be uncertain, and when it also appears that without a war, the Secretary, according to his own statement, has resources enough, without new duties or taxes, to carry the United States forward two years, to the end of 1810.

The next authority I shall adduce, is one that will not be contested in this House; it is the highest in the nation. The President of the United States, in his Message to Congress at the commencement of the present session, after stating that the receipts amounted to near eighteen millions of dollars, and also remarking on the partial extinction of the public debt, makes the following observations and inquiries: "The probable accumulation of the surpluses of revenue beyond what can be applied to the payment of the public debt, merits the consideration of Congress. Shall it lie unproductive in the public vaults? Shall the revenue be reduced? Or shall it not rather be appropriated to the improvement of roads, canals, rivers, education, and other great foundations of prosperity and union?"

Sir, as no new decrees, or Orders in Council, have taken place since the delivery of his Message, no very material change in our foreign relations can have occurred. I know that an accommodation with Great Britain at the commencement of the session was not expected by the President of the United States; he, therefore, cannot now expect war more than then; nor could he ask you whether the surpluses of revenue should "lie unproductive in the public vaults?" or whether "the revenue should be reduced?" if he had the least idea of a necessity to raise the duties on imported merchandise 50 per cent. on the present rates,—which in some instances is equal to 50 per cent., also, on the first cost of the articles—and this, too, so shortly after he made these inquiries. It is clear, therefore, the President could not recommend the assessment of these duties; and if you pass the bill, he very possibly may refuse to sign it.

The last authority I shall bring forward is that of an honorable Senator from Maryland, now in his place, (Mr. S. SMITH,) to whose opinions on commerce and finance, his friends in this country are disposed to pay much respect. In his speech delivered in favor of the embargo, which is printed, he said, in answer to the gentleman from Delaware—

"We are told that we shall not have a dollar in the Treasury at the meeting of Congress. We were told the same story last year, and thousands of hand bills had been distributed through the Union asserting that fact; yet, sir, when we met, we found fourteen millions of dollars in the Treasury—we found our receipts more than in any preceding year. The gentleman is alarmed lest the present party in power shall be prostrated, as he thinks that was to which he belonged, by the necessity of laying a direct tax. He is mistaken; they were dismissed, because that, the tax after tax, duty on duty, that were laid by them, were dissipated, the people knew not how; and because the people thought their system would lead the nation imperceptibly to monarchy."

The gentleman from Maryland proceeds to show the diminution of the public debt by an average of five millions of dollars a year, and then states that,—

FEBRUARY, 1809.

Additional Duties.

SENATE.

"Besides having paid off thirty-three millions of dollars of the public debt, we have relieved ourselves thereby from the payment of an annual interest of two millions of dollars. These items, making together seven millions of dollars, will operate, in effect, for any purposes now required, as so much received. But we have other resources. The law of the last session authorized the articles of sugar, coffee, tea, pepper, and certain wines, to be deposited in the public stores until wanted for exportation. Those articles will now be required for consumption, and, presuming that as much thereof will be consumed as in former years, we may fairly count on the following duties being collected, to wit: on sugar, &c., including public lands, $4,668,000. Nor is this all. It is a well known fact, which will not be contradicted by the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the importations from India and China have, in the present year, been equal to that of any preceding year; nor has the importation of dry goods from England during the present year been so much less than former years, as materially to affect the revenue. On the whole, Mr. President, I believe that the receipts for the year 1809 may with safety be calculated on as at least twelve millions of dollars, from which, nothing being payable towards the principal of the public debt, we may count the actual supply to the Treasury as equal to any preceding year.

"Let us take a view of the customary expenses of the Government for the year 1809. Civil List, &c., including one million of dollars for new regiments, $8,675,000. If the gentleman from Delaware will not admit any other of my calculations, he will certainly admit that, if we have fourteen millions now in the Treasury, at the next meeting of Congress, (in the winter session,) and in case of war, if the people consume as much as usual, ways and means will be found to introduce the articles on which the duties have heretofore been collected."

Now, sir, it is clear, from the showing even of this honorable gentleman whose calculations are received with so much respect here, that whether there is peace, war, or embargo, our resources are yet abundant to carry us on, at least until the next winter, and as we are to meet again in three months, it follows, that the present undigested project must be worse than useless.

To all this mass of evidence and authority against both the necessity and policy of laying this duty, I have only to add a few observations to show that it will, in its operation, be both unequal and unjust.

It is well known that permanent duties, except on their first imposition, are paid by the consumer; but whenever duties are to be of short duration, as in the present instance, or until the stocks of merchandise prior to the assessment of the duty are run off, the price does not rise in ratio with the duty, and that, of consequence, the whole, or part of the duty, is thus much of loss to the merchant. This, in a degree, cannot be avoided, nor is it even a subject of complaint, where due notice has been given of the intention to lay the duty; but if it be imposed without notice, or giving time for preparation, then the interest of the merchant is sacrificed.

The basis of all commerce is calculation; what calculation can be found for distant enterprises when the data are perpetually shifting? If a merchant rests on the stability of the laws of the Government, and sends away his vessel, and on her return finds a new duty of 50 per cent. imposed, which, for the circumstance of it, the consumer does not pay, his whole calculations are defeated, and he pockets a loss instead of a profit for his industry.

Commerce is very probably as well understood in England as anywhere. In that country new duties on imports are imposed with great caution; whenever contemplated, the subject is generally a long time under consideration, sometimes hanging over from one session to another. The Ministry make it a point frequently to consult committees of merchants from most of the principal seaports in the kingdom. The result is, the subject is well considered; and, when the duties are imposed, they are submitted to with cordiality and cheerfulness. Mr. Pitt, in the latter part of his life, always adopted this mode. He did not think it condescension to consult merchants on subjects with which they were better acquainted than himself. In the early part of his administration, I have understood, he rashly imposed some additional and heavy duties on imported merchandise; the consequence was, the revenue diminished, and smuggling increased. With his characteristic vigor he determined to stop it, and lined the coast with luggers, revenue cutters, and frigates; still the revenue did not increase. He consulted the merchants—they told him the articles were taxed beyond their bearing; he manfully retraced his steps, and took off the additional duty—and immediately smuggling did not pay its cost—his luggers, cutters, and frigates, became useless, and the revenue advanced to its ancient standard. This is one among many memorable instances that might be adduced to show that an unwise augmentation of duties is very far from producing an increase of revenue.

There is another view of the subject on which I shall say a few words. This new duty will operate as a bounty to monopolizers, forestallers, and speculators. Gentlemen are not aware of the avidity with which mercantile men have regarded the proceedings of this session. I am told that, within half an hour after the question was taken, about a fortnight since, in the other House, ten expresses started for different parts of the United States. It is notorious that English and West India goods, and most articles of foreign merchandise in the United States, have been bought up by speculators; it is now in the hands of a few persons; by passing this law, you discourage new importations, and enable the present holders to grind the poor, by extorting high prices for the articles they hold, from a want of competition in the market. From all these views of the subject, and from the sentiments I have quoted from the President, Mr. Gallatin, and General Smith, it is apparent that this measure is unwise, unnecessary, and impolitic.

I am unwilling, sir, to take up the time of the Senate; but, however unavailing may be the efforts of my friends and myself, I wish to have it recorded that I was neither ignorant of the very injurious operation of this bill upon my constituents, nor unwilling to endeavor to prevent it. I therefore ask the indulgence of the Senate, that the yeas and noes may be taken when this question is decided.

And on the question, it was determined in the negative—yeas 10, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bradley, Gilman, Hillhouse, Lloyd, Mitchell, Parker, Pickering, Reed, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Gaillard, Gregg, Howland, Kitchel, Leib, Meigs, Milledge, Moore, Pope, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Smith of Tennessee, Sumter, Thruston, and Turner.

On motion, by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the further consideration of the bill was postponed to Monday next.

SATURDAY, February 25.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, presented a memorial signed by twelve hundred and four citizens of Frederick county, and State of Maryland, pledging "their lives, fortunes, and sacred honor," to support the constituted authorities against foreign and domestic violence; and the memorial was read; and, on request of Mr. SMITH, withdrawn for the purpose of communicating it to the House of Representatives.

The bill providing for the promulgation of certain laws in the Territory of Michigan, was read the second time, and postponed until Monday next.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I now lay before Congress a statement of the militia of the United States, according to the last returns received by the Department of War.

TH. JEFFERSON.

FEBRUARY 25, 1809.

The Message and documents were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments; and, after progress, on motion, by Mr. GILES, the consideration of the bill was postponed until Monday next.

Mr. GILES submitted a communication from the Secretary of the Navy in relation to this bill; and it was agreed that it be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. MITCHILL, from the committee to whom were referred the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of certain Alabama Indians," made report: Whereupon,

Resolved, That the Senate do concur in the said amendments.

Mr. MITCHILL submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of three members of the Senate be appointed, who, with three members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the said House, shall have the application of the money appropriated by the "Act making a further appropriation for the support of a library," passed 21st February, 1806; and that the Secretary give information thereof to the House of Representatives.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Daniel Cotton," was read the third time, and passed.

MONDAY, February 27.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of William White and others."

Ordered, That it be recommitted to Messrs. POPE, GREGG, BRADLEY, MITCHILL, and ANDERSON, further to consider and report thereon.

On motion, by Mr. GILES,

Ordered, That the bill further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, be postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed the third reading of the bill, entitled "An act for imposing additional duties upon all goods, wares, and merchandise, imported from any foreign port or place."

Ordered, That the consideration thereof be postponed until Thursday next.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the 25th instant; and,

Resolved, That a committee of three members of the Senate be appointed, who, with three members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the said House, shall have the application of the money appropriated by the "Act making a further appropriation for the support of a library," passed 21st of February, 1806; and that the Secretary give information thereof to the House of Representatives.

Ordered, That Messrs. GILES, THRUSTON, and GREGG, be the committee on the part of the Senate.

REMONSTRANCE OF MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. LLOYD, in behalf of the Senators from Massachusetts, presented a memorial and remonstrance from the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, against certain acts of the General Government, and also expressing the opinion of that Legislature in relation to certain measures presumed by them to be contemplated by the Government of the United States; which was received and read, as follows:

To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, the memorial and remonstrance of the Legislature of Massachusetts.

When the Government of a free people is felt to be oppressive on the community; when its measures appear to originate in imperfect conceptions of the interest of the whole, or inattention to the important concerns of any considerable portion; a decent respect for the opinions of their fellow-citizens, and a just sense of their own rights, require of that part of the society which feels oppressed or alarmed, a prompt and explicit declaration of their opinions. Such a course of proceeding, by producing early and frequent public discussions, is calculated to support all such measures as are wise and expedient, and on the other hand it furnishes a reasonable opportunity to the Government to abandon all such as are found to be impracticable or injurious: it is calculated at once to silence the murmurs of the people if they are unfounded, and to remove all their just causes of complaint.

The citizens of Massachusetts are firm and zealous in the vindication of their rights; but their habits and their principles equally forbid a resort to violent, disorderly, or unconstitutional means for that purpose. They indulge a pride in the belief, that the Constitutions of Government, under which they live, are so framed, as to afford a peaceable remedy for every grievance to which they may be subjected. They have accordingly, by petitions from various parts of the State, expressed to the President of the United States their sentiments on the oppressive operation and destructive tendency of the embargo laid on their ships and vessels in December, 1807. This Legislature, also, in the same spirit, have heretofore endeavored, through their Senators and Representatives, to communicate to the Government of the United States, their opinions and views of the system of policy lately adopted and pursued by the Administration. They have seen with regret that these peaceable and respectful efforts have not produced any relaxation of the rigorous measures complained of; but that, on the contrary, it has been thought proper to enforce the embargo, by a late act, exceeding in severity all that preceded it—an act which, if continued in operation, will, as we apprehend, not only complete the destruction of the commercial prosperity, but prove highly dangerous to the public liberty and domestic peace of this people. This Legislature have also felt the most serious alarm from perceiving the other measures lately proposed and contemplated in the Congress of the United States. At this awful and momentous crisis, we ought not to affect ignorance of those events, which, on ordinary occasions, a sense of decorum might forbid our noticing. It would be a base dereliction of duty if, at such a moment as the present, we should permit a too scrupulous regard for mere forms, to prevent our attempting everything possible for the security of our constituents, and for the peace and happiness of our common country. This Legislature, therefore, with the plainness and sincerity which become the representatives of a free people, and with all the respect which is due to the honorable body which they address, do present this their solemn remonstrance against the course of measures which is now oppressing this part of the United States.

Commerce has been one of the chief employments of the people of New England, from the first settlement of the country, and their success has promoted and abundantly rewarded the labors of agriculture. This latter in its turn has extended and encouraged commerce, and from the joint operation of these causes, New England, without any great staple, and without any peculiar local advantages, has constantly and rapidly increased in wealth, prosperity, and power. If, however, the advantages of commerce were less obvious and less important, yet the habits of the country, so long and firmly established, could not be suddenly changed, without producing consequences the most distressing and destructive. Our husbandmen and mariners cannot, by an act of Government, be converted into manufacturers; nor will our merchants and mechanics ever consent to abandon their cities, and retire from the sea shore, to clear up and cultivate the wilderness. The history of the world has demonstrated, that even the most despotic Governments have hardly ever succeeded in changing the habits of a great people; and most certainly in a free country it cannot be attempted with any prospect of success. The measures adopted by the British Government to interdict or control our commerce, were among the most powerful causes of the Revolution. The power of establishing commerce is enumerated, in the Declaration of our Independence, among the essential rights of sovereignty; and in the articles of confederation, trade, religion, and the sovereignty of the States, are mentioned as the three principal objects which that compact was intended to protect. In the present Constitution of the United States, while the Government are entrusted with a greater and more adequate power for the protection and extension of commerce, the caution and jealousy of the people have imposed various restrictions on that power. The Government are prohibited from imposing any tax or duty whatever on exports, lest, in virtue of that authority, they might in any degree embarrass the exportation of our produce. The people have manifested a similar disposition in other articles of the Constitution; and if, at the time of framing and adopting that instrument, any question had arisen as to the extent of the power, or the duty of the Government in this particular, there can be no doubt that a clause would have been inserted, most explicitly declaring the interests of commerce to be one of the principal inducements for forming the Union, and its encouragement and defence to be among the first duties of the Government; while the right to annihilate or obstruct it would have been explicitly denied. For a long time after the establishment of this Government, the fisheries, navigation, and trade of the country were protected and widely extended. They furnished almost the whole revenue of the United States, and encouraged universal industry. When, in the year 1794, the commercial rights of the nation were assailed by Great Britain, the immortal Washington, by dignified, fair, and impartial negotiation, procured for his country ample compensation for past injuries, and security against future aggressions. In the year 1798, our Government, under similar circumstances, attempted, in the same manner, to obtain from France indemnity for outrages, and a recognition of our rights; and when fair negotiation was found to be fruitless, they did not hesitate immediately to adopt measures of defence becoming an independent and powerful people. The success of these wise and patriotic measures, and the universal satisfaction manifested by the people, in their effects, seemed to have decided forever the true policy of the United States. But, in the year 1806, when our commercial rights were again attacked by the same nation, which had but imperfectly atoned for her injuries in 1798, and in a manner more unwarrantable, insolent, and outrageous, than before, the people expected that the Government would have recourse to the same policy which had formerly been crowned with such signal success. Instead of prompt and vigorous measures of defence, they have seen the Government retiring from the conflict, and by annihilating their whole foreign commerce, tacitly confess that they are unwilling or unable to protect it. This apparent inability or indisposition to resist aggression has furnished a pretence to another Prince to retaliate on his enemy though our unprotected rights. Thus the United States are placed in a situation unprecedented, it is believed, in the history of the world, being involved at the same moment in serious controversies with two most powerful nations, who are themselves at war with each other.

The interdiction of foreign commerce, for an indefinite period, by perpetual laws, is justly considered as a total annihilation of it. The people of this country are not accustomed to class among their rights such enjoyments and privileges as depend on the will of any set of men whatever; under such circumstances they would cease to be the rights of a free people. Yet it is obvious, that the acts laying an embargo have suspended their commercial rights, and if those acts are Constitutional, these rights can never be restored without a concurrent act of all the branches of the Federal Government. The events now passing at the Seat of Government strongly exemplify the force of this remark. If one branch of the Legislature should be unanimously inclined to remove the embargo, and even if the other branch should concur, yet the President of the United States may prevent the passing of an act for such a purpose; and if afterwards only twelve members of the Senate should adopt his policy, and unite in supporting his measures, the embargo must remain in force. Most certainly the people of this country never intended to subject to the discretionary power of thirteen men one of their most essential and invaluable rights. If the existence or the apprehension of war would justify a temporary embargo, the spirit of the Constitution would demand that it should be imposed for a short and definite period; so as to require from time to time the same concurrence of opinion to continue it which is now required for its removal.

In the act of Congress, passed on the ninth day of January last, for enforcing the preceding embargo acts, this Legislature see with extreme pain a perseverance in the system which has proved so injurious to the country. But they are still more alarmed from examining some of the provisions of this act, which appear to them hostile to the dignity and independence of this Commonwealth, and subversive of the civil liberty and Constitutional rights of its citizens. They see there, the rights of individuals subjected to the arbitrary will of an Executive officer, instead of being defined and secured by standing laws; secret and variable instructions and orders of the President entitled to equal respect with the laws of the land; an indefinite and almost unlimited authority given to the officers of the customs, without any warrant from a civil magistrate to search for, and seize, the property of the citizens; excessive sureties required of men who are not even charged with any offence, and excessive fines and penalties imposed; individuals exposed to losses and penalties, for actions which were lawful at the time of committing them; and the benefits of a trial by jury in many cases virtually denied. If any citizen, who is aggrieved, should apply for redress to the laws and judicial courts of the Commonwealth, their processes may be impeded, their officers resisted, and their authority put at defiance, by the standing army of the United States, under the command of any inferior officer empowered by the President. Thus, whenever a petty officer shall be found hardy and adventurous enough to exercise the authority conferred by this act, the sovereignty and independence of the State will be humbled in the dust, or its Government must vindicate by force its dignity and its honor, and may be consequently involved in a civil war.

This Legislature cannot review, without the most painful emotions, the measures of the General Government which they have here been considering. They cannot, without the most gloomy apprehensions, contemplate the probable consequences of a perseverance in such measures. They are constrained respectfully, but most unequivocally, to declare their conviction, that the several laws before referred to, which interdict the foreign commerce of the United States, and which have imposed numerous embarrassments on the coasting trade, must have originated in a misconstruction of the Federal Constitution; that they are contrary to the spirit and intention of that instrument, and are not warranted by any of the powers therein given by the People to the Congress of the United States. In the hope of preventing any further evil consequences from these measures, and with the most ardent desire to preserve inviolate the Constitution of these States; and to remove every source of discontent and jealousy among the different members of the Union, this Legislature do solemnly remonstrate against the several acts of Congress for imposing and enforcing the embargo, and do earnestly request your honorable body to take the same into your most serious consideration; and by repealing them to restore this People to their former enviable state of freedom, prosperity, and happiness.

It is impossible to contemplate the repeal of the several acts relating to the embargo, without considering the various substitutes for this measure which have been proposed, and which are now before the public. This Legislature feel bound to express the strong and decided opinion they entertain on the subject before any of these proposed measures shall be adopted. The expression of this opinion is required by a just sense of their own rights and those of the State which they represent, and also by a due regard to the sentiments and feelings of their constituents, which are well known to the individuals of this Legislature, and which are so strongly displayed in the numerous petitions and memorials daily arriving from all parts of the Commonwealth.

The prohibition of all intercourse with France and Great Britain, and their respective dependencies, would probably prove fruitless and inefficient, from the extreme difficulty of enforcing its observance; and would thus serve to bring into contempt the laws and the Government of the country; or, if enforced, it would impose embarrassments on commerce nearly as fatal as the obstructions created by the present embargo. It would soon become a restriction only on the orderly and well disposed part of the community, and would furnish opportunities and inducements to the officers of Government, by occasional indulgence and connivance, to promote the interest of their personal and political friends. But, in another view of this measure, it appears still more serious and alarming. It is obvious that, if the embargo was removed, our citizens would have but little intercourse with France or her dependencies. The total disregard of the laws of nations, and the obligation of treaties, manifested by that Government; the seizure and detention of neutral property in all parts of her dominions; the unprecedented decrees against neutral commerce, promulgated at Berlin, at Milan, and at Bayonne, would deter our citizens from adventuring in commerce with her subjects. The proposed non-intercourse, therefore, would in effect apply solely to Great Britain. The natural tendency of this measure, which is undoubtedly foreseen, if not intended, by some of its advocates, would be to involve the nation in war with Great Britain—a measure which would necessarily produce a fatal alliance with France.

The project of arming our merchantmen to resist seizures by either of the belligerents, appears to manifest a spirit which, when excited in a just cause, will always be warmly approved, and vigorously supported by the people of Massachusetts. They cannot cease to lament, that some portion of this spirit had not been exhibited in resisting the first outrage on our rights, by the Berlin decree of November, 1806. If our Government had at that time expressed a strong sense of this outrage on the nation, and a firm resolution to vindicate and maintain its rights, they would have been most cordially and zealously supported by men of all political parties. This project, if adopted now without limitation, however it may be intended by those who propose it, would speedily and inevitably lead to a war with Great Britain. France has comparatively few cruisers on the ocean, which is covered by the ships of her enemy. Our vessels would be seldom encountered by those of the former Power, while hardly one would escape those of the latter. All our actual collisions would necessarily be with Great Britain, who would thus be made to appear the only aggressor; and when the public sensibility was excited by these causes, the dictates of reason, of justice, and sound policy, would cease to be regarded. It cannot be too often repeated, that such a war would necessarily involve a destructive alliance with France—an alliance which experience has shown to be more fatal than any war, and which is universally dreaded, throughout this part of the United States, as highly dangerous to the independence of the nation, and hostile to the liberties of the world.

The Legislature of Massachusetts express without reserve their sentiments on the conduct of the two belligerent Powers of Europe. They cannot be restrained by the audacious and unfounded insinuation, that the people of New England are influenced by undue partiality to either of those Powers. They repel with indignation this slanderous aspersion, which cannot be believed even by those who propagate it. It is refuted by the well known spirit and patriotism of this people; it is disproved by the annals of our Revolutionary War, and by our whole history to the present day. This State was among the first to resist the encroachments of the British Government at that time; her citizens still retain the same spirit to oppose unjust aggressions, from whatever quarter they may be attempted. While they cultivate this spirit, the pledge of their liberties and their independence, they cherish also those moral habits and religious principles which distinguished their ancestors, the first settlers of this country. While vindicating their own rights, they are admonished candidly to examine, and religiously to respect, the rights of others. They can never cordially engage in any contest which does not appear to them necessary to the honor and the essential interests of their country; nor can they appeal with confidence to the God of armies, in a war which does not appear to them to be just.

With these impressions, the Legislature of Massachusetts have deliberately examined the several documents respecting the foreign relations of the United States, which were published by Congress for the information of the people. They have impartially weighed and considered the dates and the contents of the maritime decrees and orders of France and Great Britain, affecting the commerce of the United States, and the dispositions of those two Governments, as manifested in their correspondence with our public ministers. The numerous and repeated aggressions on the part of France, displayed in these documents, are as injurious to the honor of the nation as to the interests of the citizens—violating at once the obligations of our treaty with that Government and the established principles of the law of nations. The remonstrances and complaints of our Minister appear to have been treated with centemptuous silence, or answered only with new outrages; and he seems at last to have abandoned all hope and expectation of influencing that Government by diplomatic representations, and to have left to the wisdom and the spirit of the United States to adopt such other measures as may be necessary to cause their rights to be respected. While France shall maintain this contemptuous indifference, and these hostile dispositions, it appears hardly possible to attempt any accommodation with her which shall not tarnish the honor and endanger the independence of our country.

On the part of Great Britain there appears, from those documents, to be a disposition to cultivate a good understanding with this country. They have manifested a strong desire to make atonement and compensation for injuries that were even unauthorized and unintentional, and to adjust the respective rights and claims of the two nations on such a basis as shall prevent future collisions. If these dispositions on her part are sincere, and we do not see in these documents any reason to question their sincerity, they should undoubtedly be met by a correspondent disposition on our part. They certainly furnish an opportunity to attempt a negotiation, without any sacrifice of honorable sentiment or independent feelings, and this Legislature have great confidence that such a negotiation, conducted in a fair, impartial, and candid manner, would speedily restore harmony between the two countries. In considering the different degrees and orders of France and Great Britain, it is obvious that those of the former have been uniformly first in order of time, and most injurious in their nature. But even if those nations were, as has been sometimes asserted, on the most perfect equality in this respect, and if the conduct of each furnished such a cause of war as would leave only the choice of our adversary, every motive of policy would induce the United States to select France for her enemy. Without condescending to calculate, with precision, the comparative ability of those two nations to injure and annoy this country, the present state of the world should decide our choice. In one event we should have the satisfaction of aiding in that glorious struggle now carried on in Europe against the tyranny of France, and of assisting to maintain the cause of that brave and gallant nation which has lately thrown off the yoke of her oppressors, and which was among the first to promote our exertions in a like cause. In the other case we should be immediately arrayed on the side of France; we should necessarily aid the gigantic strides of her Emperor towards universal domination, and assist in annihilating the independence of nations and the freedom of the world.

On motion, by Mr. LLOYD, the memorial was ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

TUESDAY, February 28.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill further to amend the several acts for the establishment of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments; and the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House amended.

On motion by Mr. HILLHOUSE, to add the following words to the end of the third section:

NAYS—Messrs. Bradley, Condit, Franklin, Gaillard, Giles, Gilman, Howland, Mathewson, Milledge, Moore, Pope, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Smith of Tennessee, Thruston, Tiffin, and White.

On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed, and read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes," with amendments, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate. They have passed a bill, entitled "An act further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, and making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment, and of the Navy of the United States, for the year 1809;" also a bill, entitled "An act to extend to Amos Whittemore, and Wm. Whittemore, jr., the patent right to a machine for manufacturing cotton and wool cards;" in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill, entitled, "An act further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, and making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment, and of the Navy of the United States, for the year 1809," was twice read by unanimous consent, and referred to Messrs. SMITH of Maryland, CRAWFORD, and FRANKLIN, to consider and report thereon.

The bill, entitled "An act to extend to Amos Whittemore and William Whittemore, jr., the patent right to a machine for manufacturing cotton and wool cards," was twice read by unanimous consent, and referred to Messrs. LLOYD, BRADLEY, and MITCHILL, to consider and report thereon.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes."

On the question to agree to the amendment of the 11th section, as follows:

Strike out the words, "And to cause to be issued, under suitable pledges and precautions, letters of marque and reprisal against the nation thereafter continuing in force its unlawful edicts against the commerce of the United States:"

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 17, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bayard, Bradley, Condit, Franklin, Gregg, Howland, Kitchel, Mathewson, Meigs, NAYS—Messrs. Gaillard, Giles, Gilman, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Leib, Lloyd, Milledge, Moore, Pickering, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Smith of Tennessee, and Turner.

On the question to agree to the amendment in the 12th section, as follows:

Strike out "fourth of March next," and insert "fifteenth of March, 1809:"

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 25, nays 6, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bradley, Condit, Franklin, Gaillard, Giles, Gilman, Gregg, Howland, Kitchel, Leib, Mathewson, Meigs, Milledge, Mitchill, Moore, Parker, Pope, Reed, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Smith of Tennessee, Sumter, Tiffin, and Turner.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Goodrich, Hillhouse, Lloyd, Pickering, and White.

All the other amendments to the bill were agreed to.

WEDNESDAY, March 1.

Mr. TIFFIN, from the committee, reported the bill further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LLOYD, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to extend to Amos Whittemore and William Whittemore, jr., the patent right to a machine for manufacturing cotton and wool cards," reported the bill without amendment; and the bill was read the third time, by unanimous consent, and passed.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, and making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment, and of the Navy of the United States, for the year 1809," reported the bill amended; and the Senate proceeded to consider the said amendments, as in Committee of the Whole, and the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House amended.

On motion, by Mr. BRADLEY, further to amend the bill, to strike out the following words in the sixth section: "For the fortification of the ports and harbors, in addition to the sums heretofore appropriated for that purpose, one million of dollars:" it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 23, nays 6, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bayard, Bradley, Condit, Franklin, Goodrich, Gregg, Hillhouse, Howland, Kitchel, Leib, Lloyd, Mathewson, Moore, Parker, Pickering, Pope, Smith of Tennessee, Sumter, Thruston, Tiffin, Turner, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Crawford, Milledge, Mitchill, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, and Smith of New York.

And the bill having been further amended, it was ordered to the third reading as amended.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, with a statement of the emoluments of the officers employed in the collection of the customs for the year 1808; which was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act concerning invalid pensioners," in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last brought up for concurrence was twice read by unanimous consent, and referred to Messrs. BRADLEY, SMITH of Maryland, and FRANKLIN, to consider and report thereon.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed the bill, entitled "An act further to amend the judicial system of the United States," with amendments; in which they request the concurrence of the Senate. They have also passed the bill, entitled "An act to extend the time for making payments for the public lands of the United States," with amendments, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate. The House of Representatives have passed a bill, entitled "An act supplemental to the act, entitled 'An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes,'" in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act further to amend the judicial system of the United States." Whereupon,

Resolved, That they concur therein.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act to extend the time for making payments for the public lands of the United States." Whereupon,

Resolved, That they concur therein.

The bill, entitled "An act supplemental to the act, entitled 'An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes,'" was twice read by unanimous consent, and ordered to the third reading.

Mr. GREGG presented the memorial of Arthur St. Clair, accompanied with papers and remarks on the report of the committee to whom his petition was referred at the last session, and praying a reconsideration thereof, for reasons stated in the memorial; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FRANKLIN, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Ebenezer S. Platt, made report. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the prayer of his petition cannot be granted, and that he have leave to withdraw the same.

THURSDAY, March 2.

Mr. GILES, from the committee to whom was referred the resolution directing an inquiry into the expediency of amending the act, entitled "An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States," reported that it is not expedient at this time to adopt any measure in relation to that subject; and the report was agreed to.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act concerning invalid pensioners," reported the bill amended; and the President having reported the bill to the House amended, on motion, the bill was read the third time, by unanimous consent, as amended.

Resolved, That this bill pass with an amendment.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill entitled "An act for the relief of Jacob Barnitz," in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. TIFFIN, from the committee, reported the amendments to the bill, entitled "An act further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, and making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment, and of the Navy of the United States for the year 1809," correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time as amended.

Resolved, That this bill pass as amended.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate resumed the third reading of the bill, entitled "An act for imposing additional duties upon all goods, wares, and merchandise, imported from any foreign port or place;" and on the question, Shall this bill pass as amended? it was determined in the negative—yeas 5, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Condit, Kitchel, Leib, Pope, and Robinson.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bradley, Crawford, Franklin, Gaillard, Giles, Gilman, Goodrich, Gregg, Hillhouse, Lloyd, Mathewson, Meigs, Milledge, Mitchell, Moore, Parker, Pickering, Smith of Maryland, Smith of Tennessee, Sumter, Thruston, Tiffin, and Turner.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Jacob Barnitz," was read three times by unanimous consent, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill providing for the promulgation of certain laws in the Territory of Michigan. And, no amendment having been proposed, on the question, Shall this bill be engrossed, and read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

The bill, entitled "An act supplemental to the act, entitled 'An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes,'" was read the third time, and passed.

FRIDAY, March 3.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House disagree to the first and fourth amendment of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, and making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment and the Navy of the United States for the year 1809;" and they agree to the other amendments to the said bill.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, and making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment and the Navy of the United States for the year 1809;" and, on motion, by Mr. GILES, that the Senate insist on their said amendments disagreed to, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 26, nays 2, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bayard, Bradley, Condit, Gaillard, Giles, Gilman, Hillhouse, Howland, Kitchel, Leib, Lloyd, Mathewson, Meigs, Milledge, Moore, Parker, Pickering, Pope, Reed, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Smith of Tennessee, Tiffin, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Crawford and White.

So it was, Resolved, That they insist on their said amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to deprive, in certain cases, vessels of their American character, and to prevent, under certain disabilities, any citizen of the United States taking a license from any foreign Power to navigate the ocean, or to trade with any other foreign and independent Power;" in which they request the concurrence of the Senate. They do not concur in the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the sale and grant of a certain quantity of public land to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company."

The bill, entitled "An act to deprive, in certain cases, vessels of their American character, and to prevent, under certain disabilities, any citizen of the United States taking a license from any foreign Power to navigate the ocean, or to trade with any other foreign and independent Power." was read; and, on the question, Shall this bill be read the second time? it was determined in the affirmative.

On motion, by Mr. ANDERSON, that the bill be read a second time, it was objected to as contrary to rule.

Mr. TIFFIN, from the committee, reported the bill providing for the promulgation of certain laws in the Territory of Michigan correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act authorizing the augmentation of the Marine Corps," with an amendment, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the said amendment. Whereupon,

Resolved, That they concur therein.

The PRESIDENT communicated to the Senate the following letter from the President elect of the United States:

CITY OF WASHINGTON, March 2, 1809.

SIR: I beg leave, through you, to inform the honorable the Senate of the United States, that I propose to take the oath which the Constitution prescribes to the President of the United States, before he enters on the execution of his office, on Saturday the 4th instant, at twelve o'clock, in the Chamber of the House of Representatives.

I have the honor to be, with the greatest respect, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,

JAMES MADISON.

The Hon. JOHN MILLEDGE,

President pro tempore of the Senate.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The PRESIDENT also communicated the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the memorial of the stockholders of the Bank of the United States, referred to him on the 26th of April last; which was read, as follows:

The Secretary of the Treasury, to whom was referred the memorial of the stockholders of the Bank of the United States, praying for a renewal of the charter which will expire on the 4th day of March, 1811, respectfully submits the following report:

The Bank of the United States was incorporated by the act of March 2, 1791, with a capital of ten millions of dollars, divided into twenty-five thousand shares, of four hundred dollars each. Two millions of dollars were subscribed by the United States, and paid in ten equal annual instalments. Of the eight millions of dollars subscribed by individuals, two millions were paid in specie, and six millions in six per cent stock of the United States. Two thousand four hundred and ninety-three of the shares belonging to the Government were sold in the years 1796 and 1797, at an advance of twenty-five per cent; two hundred and eighty-seven were sold in the year 1797, at an advance of twenty per cent; and the other two thousand two hundred and twenty shares in the year 1802, at an advance of forty-five per cent; making together, exclusively of the dividends, a profit of $671,860 to the United States. The greater part of the six per cent stock originally paid by the stockholders has since been sold by the Bank; a portion has been redeemed by Government, by the operation of the annual reimbursement, and the Bank retains at present only a sum of $2,231,598 in six per cent stock.

About eighteen thousand shares of the Bank stock are held by persons residing abroad, who are by the charter excluded from the right of voting. The stockholders resident within the United States, and who have the exclusive control over the institution, hold only seven thousand shares, or little more than one-fourth part of its capital. They appoint annually twenty-five directors of the Bank itself, which is established at Philadelphia, and those directors have the entire management of the discounts and other transactions of the institution in that city, and the general superintendence and appointment of the directors and cashiers of the offices of discount and deposit established in other places. There are at present eight of those offices, viz: at Boston, New York, Baltimore, Norfolk, Charleston, Savannah, the City of Washington, and New Orleans. The last two were established at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The profits of a Bank arise from the interest received on the loans made, either to Government or to individuals; and they exceed six per cent or the rate of interest at which the loans are made, because every bank lends, not only the whole of its capital, but also a portion of the moneys deposited for safekeeping in its vaults, either by Government or by individuals. For every sum of money thus deposited, the party making the deposit, either receives the amount in bank notes, or obtains a credit on the books of the bank. In either case he has the same right at any time to withdraw his deposit; in the first case, on presentation and surrender of the bank notes; in the other case, by drawing on the bank for the amount. Bank notes, and credits on the books of the bank arise, therefore, equally from deposits, although the credits alone are, in common parlance, called deposits; and the aggregate of those credits, and of the bank notes issued, constitutes the circulating medium substituted by the banking operations to money; for payments from one individual to another are equally made by draughts on the bank, or by delivery of bank notes. Experience has taught the directors what portion of the money thus deposited they may lend, or in other words how far they may with safety extend their discounts beyond the capital of the bank, and what amount of specie it is necessary they should keep in their vaults. The profits, and therefore the dividends of a bank, will increase in proportion as the directors will increase loans of the moneys deposited, and suffer the amount of specie on hand to diminish. Moderate dividends, when not produced by some particular cause which checks the circulation of bank paper, are the best evidence of the safety of the institution, and of the wisdom of its direction.

The annexed table of all the dividends made by the Bank of the United States since its establishment, shows that they have on an average been at the rate of 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ (precisely) 8-13 (14) per cent. a year, and proves that the bank has not in any considerable degree used the public deposits for the purpose of extending its discounts.

From what has been premised, it appears that the property of a bank in full operation, consists of three general items, viz: 1st. Outstanding debts, consisting principally of the notes payable at sixty days, which have been discounted at the bank. 2dly. Specie in the vaults. 3dly. Buildings necessary for the institution. On the other hand, the bank owes: 1st. To the stockholders, the amount of the capital stock originally subscribed, payable only in case of the dissolution of the institution. 2dly. To Government or individuals, the whole amount of moneys deposited, payable on demand, and including both the credits on the bank books, commonly called deposits, and the bank notes in circulation. The account is balanced by the amount of undivided profits and accruing discounts, which constitute the fund for defraying current expenses, for paying subsequent dividends, and for covering contingent losses:

The following statement of the situation of the Bank of the United States, including its branches, exhibits the true amount of public stock which is still held by the institution, of the cost of its buildings and lots of ground, and of the undivided surplus or contingent fund subsequent to the dividend made in January last. But the amount of loans to individuals or discounts, of specie in the vaults, and of moneys deposited, including both the credits on the bank books, commonly called deposits, and the bank notes in circulation, is taken on a medium; and, so far as relates on the credit side of the account, to specie on hand, and, on the debit side, to deposits, is several millions of dollars less than it happens to be at this moment; both having been swelled much beyond the average by the embargo, and by the unusually large balance in the Treasury, which is principally deposited in the bank. Some minor items arising from accidental circumstances are omitted for the sake of perspicuity.

It sufficiently appears from this general view, that the affairs of the Bank of the United States, considered as a moneyed institution, have been wisely and skilfully managed.

The advantages derived by Government from the bank are nearly of the same nature with those obtained by individuals, who transact business with similar institutions, and may be reduced to the following heads.

1. Safe keeping of public moneys. This applies not only to moneys already in the Treasury, but also to those in the hands of the principal collectors, of the Commissioners of Loans, and of several other officers, and affords one of the best securities against delinquencies.

2. Transmission of public moneys. As the collection will always, in various quarters of the extensive territory of the Union, either exceed or fall short of the expenditures in the same places, a perpetual transmission of money, or purchase of remittances at the risk and expense of the United States, would become necessary in order to meet those demands; but this is done by the bank at its own risk and expense, for every place where one of its branches is established, which embraces all payments of any importance.

3. Collection of the revenue. The punctuality of payments introduced by the banking system, and the facilities afforded by the bank to the importers indebted for revenue bonds, are amongst the causes which have enabled the United States to collect with so great facility, and with so few losses, the large revenue derived from the impost.

4. Loans. Although the prosperity of past years has enabled Government, during the present Administration, to meet all the public demands without recurring to loans, the bank had heretofore been eminently useful in making the advances which under different circumstances were necessary. There was a time when, exclusively of the six per cent. stock held by the institution as part of the original subscription, the loans obtained by Government from the bank amounted to $6,200,000. And a similar disposition has been repeatedly evinced whenever the aspect of public affairs has rendered it proper to ascertain whether new loans might, if wanted, be obtained.

The numerous banks now established under the authority of the several States, might, it is true, afford considerable assistance to the Government in its fiscal operations. There is none, however, which could effect the transmission of public moneys with the same facility, and to the same extent, as the Bank of the United States is enabled to do through its several branches. The superior capital of that institution offers also a greater security against any possible losses, and greater resources in relation to loans. Nor is it eligible that the General Government should, in respect to its own operations, be entirely dependent on institutions over which it has no control whatever. A National Bank, deriving its charter from the National Legislature, will at all times, and under every emergency, feel stronger inducements, both from interest and from a sense of duty, to afford to the Union every assistance within its power.

The strongest objection against the renewal of the charter seems to arise from the great portion of the bank stock held by foreigners; not on account of any influence it gives them over the institution, since they have no vote, but of the high rate of interest payable by America to foreign countries on the portion thus held. If the charter is not renewed, the principal of that portion, amounting to about $7,200,000, must at once be remitted abroad; but if the charter is renewed, dividends equal to an interest of about 8½ per cent. a year must be annually remitted in the same manner. The renewal of the charter will, in that respect, operate in a national point of view, as a foreign loan, bearing an interest of 8½ per cent. a year.

That inconvenience might perhaps be removed by a modification in the charter, providing for the repayment of that portion of the principal by a new subscription to the same amount in favor of citizens; but it does not, at all events, appear sufficient to outweigh the manifest public advantages derived from a renewal of the charter.

The conditions in favor of the public, on which this should be granted, are the next subject for consideration.

The nett profit, annually derived by the stockholders from a renewal of the charter, is equal to the difference between the annual dividends and the market rate of interest. Supposing this to continue at six per cent. during the period granted by the extension of the charter, and the dividends to be on an average at the rate of 8½ per cent., that profit will be 2½ per cent. a year. If the charter be extended twenty years, the value of the privilege will be equal to an annuity of 2½ per cent. on the capital, that is to say, of $250,000 for twenty years; and such annuity being payable semi-annually, is worth almost $2,890,000. This, however, would be much more than any bank would give for a charter, as it would leave it nothing but the right of dividing at the rate of six per cent. a year, which the stockholders have without a charter. It is believed that they would not be willing to give even half that sum for the extension, and that about $1,250,000 may be considered as the maximum which could be obtained, if it was thought eligible to sell the renewal of the charter for a fixed sum of money.

It is, however, presumed that the decision on the conditions which may be annexed to an extension of charter will be directed by considerations of a much greater importance than the payment of such a sum into the Treasury. The object will undoubtedly be to give to the institution all the public utility of which it is susceptible, and to derive from it permanent and solid advantages rather than mere temporary aid. Under those impressions, the following suggestions are respectfully submitted:

I. That the Bank should pay interest to the United States on the public deposits, whenever they should exceed a certain sum, which might perhaps be fixed at about $3,000,000.

II. That the Bank should be bound, whenever required, to lend to the United States a sum not exceeding three-fifths of its capital, at a rate of interest not exceeding six per cent.; the amount of such loan or loans to be paid by the Bank in instalments not exceeding a certain sum monthly, and to be reimbursed at the pleasure of Government.

III. That the capital stock of the Bank should be increased to $30,000,000, in the following manner, viz:

1. Five millions of dollars to be subscribed by citizens of the United States, under such regulations as would make an equitable apportionment amongst the several States and Territories.

2. Fifteen millions to be subscribed by such States as may desire it, and under such equitable apportionment amongst the several States as may be provided by law; and a branch to be established in each subscribing State, if subscribed for by the State.

3. The payments either by individuals or States to be either in specie or in public stock of the United States, at such rates as may be provided by law.

4. The subscribing States to pay their subscription in ten annual instalments, or sooner, if it suits their convenience, but to receive dividends in proportion only to the amount of subscription actually paid, and their shares of bank stock not to be transferable.

IV. That some share should be given in the direction to the General and State Governments: the General Government appointing a few directors, and the Government of each subscribing State appointing a few directors in the direction of the branch established in such State.

The result of that plan would be, 1st, That the United States, receiving no interest on public deposits, might, without inconvenience, accumulate during years of peace and prosperity, a treasure sufficient to meet periods of war and calamity, and thereby avoid the necessity of adding, by increased taxes, to the distresses of such periods. 2dly, That they might rely on a loan of $18,000,000 on any sudden emergency. 3dly, That the payment of the greater part of the proposed increase of capital being made in ten annual instalments, that increase would be gradual, and not more rapid than may be required by the progressive state of the country. 4thly, That the Bank itself would form an

All which is respectfully submitted.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 2, 1809.

On motion, the Senate adjourned to five o'clock.

Five o'clock in the Evening.

Ordered, That Messrs. SMITH of Maryland, BAYARD, and GALLARD, be a committee of arrangement for the reception of the President of the United States to-morrow, on the occasion of his inauguration.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House insist on their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, and making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment and of the Navy of the United States for the year 1809." They ask a conference, on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and have appointed managers on their part. They have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of William Hastings," in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution of the House of Representatives, requesting a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill first above mentioned; and having agreed to the same.

Ordered, That Messrs. GILES and BRADLEY be the managers at the same on the part of the Senate.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of William Hastings," was read. On the question, Shall this bill be read a second time? it was determined in the affirmative. On motion, that the bill be now read a second time, it was objected to as against the rule.

Mr. GILES, from the managers at the conference on the bill, entitled "An act further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, and making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment and of the Navy of the United States for the year 1809," made report. Whereupon, it was agreed that a bill further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, be now read three several times, by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be "An act further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments."

Resolved, That Messrs. MITCHILL and SMITH, of New York; be a committee on the part of the Senate, with such as the House of Representatives may join, to wait on the President of the United States and notify him that, unless he may have any further communications to make to the two Houses of Congress, they are now ready to adjourn.

Ordered, That the Secretary acquaint the House of Representatives therewith; and request the appointment of a committee on their part.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act to amend the charter of Georgetown,' with an amendment, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act to amend the charter of Georgetown.'" On motion of Mr. BRADLEY, that the bill, and amendment be postponed to the next session of Congress, it was determined in the negative.

On motion, by Mr. BRADLEY,

Resolved, That the Senate disagree to the said amendment.

Mr. MITCHILL, from the committee, reported that they had waited on the President of the United States, who informed them that he had no further communications to make to the two Houses of Congress.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that the Senate having finished the business before them, are about to adjourn.

The Secretary having performed that duty, the Senate adjourned without day.

EXTRA SESSION.

EDWARD TIFFIN, from Ohio.

JOHN LAMBERT, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of New Jersey for six years, and SAMUEL SMITH, appointed a Senator by the Executive of the State of Maryland, attended, and their credentials were read.

JAMES LLOYD, junior, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, attended, stating that he was elected, but not in possession of his credentials.

JOSEPH ANDERSON, from the State of Tennessee; RICHARD BRENT, from the State of Virginia; JAMES HILLHOUSE, from the State of Connecticut; MICHAEL LEIB, from the State of Pennsylvania; RETURN J. MEIGS, from the State of Ohio; JONATHAN ROBINSON, from the State of Vermont; SAMUEL WHITE, from the State of Delaware, severally attended.

The oath required by law was administered to the Senators above mentioned, in the six years' class, respectively, except to Mr. BRENT.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES attended, and communicated the following

ADDRESS :

Unwilling to depart from examples of the most revered authority, I avail myself of the occasion now presented, to express the profound impression made on me by the call of my country to the station, to the duties of which I am about to pledge myself by the most solemn of sanctions. So distinguished a mark of confidence, proceeding from the deliberate and tranquil suffrage of a free and virtuous nation, would, under any circumstances, have commanded my gratitude and devotion, as well as filled me with an awful sense of the trust to be assumed. Under the various circumstances which give peculiar solemnity to the existing period, I feel that both the honor and the responsibility allotted to me are inexpressibly enhanced.

The present situation of the world is, indeed, without a parallel, and that of our own country full of difficulties. The pressure of these, too, is the more severely felt, because they have fallen upon us at a moment when the national prosperity being at a height not before attained, the contrast, resulting from the change, has been rendered the more striking. Under the benign influence of our Republican institutions, and the maintenance of peace with all nations, whilst so many of them were engaged in bloody and wasteful wars, the fruits of a just policy were enjoyed in an unrivalled growth of our faculties and resources. Proofs of this were seen in the improvements of agriculture; in the successful enterprises of commerce; in the progress of manufactures and useful arts; in the increase of the public revenue, and the use made of it in reducing the public debt; and in the valuable works and establishments everywhere multiplying over the face of our land.

It is a precious reflection that the transition from this prosperous condition of our country, to the scene which has for some time been distressing us, is not chargeable on any unwarrantable views, nor, as I trust, on any involuntary errors in the public councils. Indulging no passions which trespass on the rights or the repose of other nations, it has been the true glory of the United States to cultivate peace by observing justice; and to entitle themselves to the respect of the nations at war, by fulfilling their neutral obligations with the most scrupulous impartiality. If there be candor in the world, the truth of these assertions will not be questioned; posterity, at least, will do justice to them.

This unexceptionable course could not avail against the injustice and violence of the belligerent Powers. In their rage against each other, or impelled by more direct motives, principles of retaliation have been introduced, equally contrary to universal reason and acknowledged law. How long their arbitrary edicts will be continued, in spite of the demonstrations that not even a pretext for them has been given by the United States, and of the fair and liberal attempt to induce a revocation of them, cannot be anticipated. Assuring myself, that, under every vicissitude, the determined spirit and united councils of the nation will be safeguards to its honor and its essential interests, I repair to the post assigned me with no other discouragement than what springs from my own inadequacy to its high duties. If I do not sink under the weight of this deep conviction, it is because I find some support in a consciousness of the purposes, and a confidence in the principles which I bring with me into this arduous service.

To cherish peace and friendly intercourse with all nations having correspondent dispositions; to maintain sincere neutrality towards belligerent nations; to prefer, in all cases, amicable discussion and reasonable accommodation of differences, to a decision of them by an appeal to arms; to exclude foreign intrigues and foreign partialities, so degrading to all countries, and so baneful to free ones; to foster a spirit of independence, too just to invade the rights of others, too proud to surrender our own, too liberal to indulge unworthy prejudices ourselves, and too elevated not to look down upon them in others; to hold the union of the States as the basis of their peace and happiness; to support the Constitution, which is the cement of the Union, as well in its limitations as in its authorities; to respect the rights and authorities reserved to the States and to the people, as equally incorporated with, and essential to the success of, the general system; to avoid the slightest interference with the rights of conscience or the functions of religion, so wisely exempted from civil jurisdiction; to preserve, in their full energy, the other salutary provisions in behalf of private and personal rights, and of the freedom of the press; to observe economy in public expenditures; to liberate the public resources by an honorable discharge of the public debts; to keep within the requisite limits a standing military force, always remembering that an armed and trained militia is the firmest bulwark of Republics; that without standing armies their liberty can never be in danger, nor with large ones safe; to promote, by authorized means, improvements friendly to agriculture, to manufactures, and to external as well as internal commerce; to favor, in like manner, the advancement of science and the diffusion of information, as the best alimant to true liberty; to carry on the benevolent plans which have been so meritoriously applied to the conversion of our aboriginal neighbors from the degradation and wretchedness of savage life, to a participation of the improvements of which the human mind and manners are susceptible in a civilized state;—as far as sentiments and intentions such as these can aid the fulfilment of my duty, they will be a resource which cannot fail me.

It is my good fortune, moreover, to have the path in which I am to tread lighted by examples of illustrious services, successfully rendered in the most trying difficulties, by those who have marched before me. Of those of my immediate predecessor it might least become me here to speak. I may, however, be pardoned for not suppressing the sympathy with which my heart is full, in the rich reward he enjoys in the benedictions of a beloved country, gratefully bestowed for exalted talents, zealously devoted, through a long career, to the advancement of its highest interest and happiness.

But the source to which I look for the aids which alone can supply my deficiencies, is in the well-tryed intelligence and virtue of my fellow-citizens, and in the counsels of those representing them in the other departments associated in the care of the national interests. In these my confidence will, under every difficulty, be best placed, next to that which we have all been encouraged to feel in the guardianship and guidance of that Almighty Being whose power regulates the destiny of nations, whose blessings have been so conspicuously dispensed to this rising Republic, and to whom we are bound to address our devout gratitude for the past, as well as our fervent supplications and best hopes for the future.

After which, the oath prescribed by law was administered to the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, by the Chief Justice.

The President of the United States then retired, and the Senate repaired to their own Chamber.

Ordered, That Messrs. ANDERSON and BAYARD be a committee to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him that the Senate are ready to receive any communications that he may be pleased to make to them.

MONDAY, March 6.

FRANCIS MALBONE, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island, for six years, commencing on the fourth instant, attended, and produced his credentials; which were read.

The credentials of RICHARD BRENT, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Virginia, for six years, commencing on the fourth instant, were read.

The oath required by law was administered to Messrs. BRENT and MALBONE, respectively.

On motion, by Mr. ROBINSON,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to pay, out of the contingent fund of this House, to George Thomas, Walter Reynolds, and Tobias Simpson, the sum of fifty dollars each, in addition to their annual compensation.

Mr. ANDERSON reported, from the committee, that they had waited on the President of the United States, who informed them that he should this day make a communication to the Senate.

Soon after, a communication was received from the President of the United States, submitting sundry nominations to office, which were mostly confirmed.

TUESDAY, March 7.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from Governor Huntingdon, enclosing a resolution passed by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, approving the measures of the General Government; which was read.

After the consideration of Executive business, Messrs. BAYARD and REED were appointed a committee to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him, that, unless he may have any further communications to make to them, the Senate are ready to adjourn.

Mr. BAYARD reported, from the committee, that they had waited upon the President of the United States, who informed them that he had no further communications to make to them. Whereupon,

The Senate adjourned without day.

From the Mississippi Territory—George Poindexter, Delegate.

Two new members, to wit : NATHAN WILSON, returned to serve in this House as a member for New York, in the room of David Thomas, who hath resigned his seat, and THOMAS GHOLSON, jr., returned to serve as a member from Virginia, in the room of John Claiborne, deceased ; appeared, produced their credentials, and took their seats in the House.

And a quorum, consisting of a majority of the whole number, being present, a message was received from the Senate, informing the House that a quorum of the Senate is assembled, and ready to proceed to business ; the Senate have appointed a committee on their part, jointly, with such committee as may be appointed on the part of this House, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communications he may be pleased to make to them.

The oath or affirmation to support the Constitution of the United States was then administered to Mr. NATHAN WILSON and Mr. GHOLSON, by Mr. SPEAKER, according to law.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that a quorum of this House is assembled, and ready to proceed to business ; and that the Clerk of this House do go with the said message.

The House proceeded to consider the resolution of the Senate for the appointment of a joint committee of the two Houses to wait on the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make to them : Whereupon, the House agreed to the said resolution ; and Mr. MACON, Mr. QUINCY, and Mr. MCCREERY, were appointed the committee on their part.

Mr. MACON, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, reported that the committee had performed that service; and that the President signified to them he would make a communication, in writing, to this House, to-morrow at twelve o'clock, by way of Message.

On motion of Mr. SMILIE,

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House cause the members to be furnished, during the present session, with three newspapers to each member, such as the members shall respectively choose, to be delivered at their lodgings; and that the clerk be directed to procure such papers from any number of offices that the members shall elect: provided, the expense does not exceed the amount of three daily newspapers.

And then the House adjourned until to-morrow morning eleven o'clock.

TUESDAY, November 8.

Several other members to, wit: from Pennsylvania, JACOB RICHARDS; from Virginia, MATTHEW CLAY, and WALTER JONES; and from South Carolina, ROBERT MARTIN; appeared, and took their seats in the House.

A new member, to wit: SAMUEL SHAW, returned to serve in this House as a member from the State of Vermont, in the room of James Witherell, who has resigned his seat, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have resolved that two Chaplains, of different denominations, be appointed to Congress for the present session, who shall interchange weekly; to which they desire the concurrence of the House.

The House proceeded to consider the foregoing resolution of the Senate, and it was agreed to.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Governor of the State of Pennsylvania, enclosing a letter to him from JOSEPH CLAY, the Representative for the district composed of the city and county of Philadelphia, and county of Delaware, in the said State, containing his resignation of a seat in this House; also, a proclamation of the said Governor, and a certificate of the election of BENJAMIN SAY, to serve as a member for the said District and State, in the room of the said Joseph Clay; which were read, and referred to the Committee of Elections.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Mississippi Territory, accompanied with a memorial of the said House of Representatives, praying a revision and amendment of the laws relating to the sale of the lands of the United States, as far as relates to the instalments due, and to become due, for the lands purchased by settlers in the said Territory; also, that the provisions of a bill which was depending before this House at the last session, for the establishment of a Federal Court in that Territory, may not be enacted into a law, for the reasons therein mentioned.—Read and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

A motion was made by Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, that the House do agree to the following resolution and order, to wit:

Resolved, That the order hereto subjoined, be inserted among the rules and orders of this House:

Ordered, That a standing committee, to consist of one member from each State, the Representatives or Representative from which may or shall attend, and to be styled "the Committee of the Post Office and Post Roads," shall be appointed, whose duty it shall be to take into consideration all such matters and things touching the Post Office and Post Roads of the United States, as shall be presented, or shall or may come in question, and be referred to them by the House, and to report thereon; and also to report such alterations and amendments to the laws concerning the Post Office and Post Roads as may become necessary.

The motion was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House proceeded in the reading of the said Message, and the documents which accompanied the same, and made some progress therein; when an adjournment was called for: Whereupon, the farther reading was postponed until to-morrow.

[For this Message see Senate Proceedings, of this date, ante, page 11.]

STANDING COMMITTEES.

The following Committees were appointed, agreeably to the standing rules and orders of the House, viz:

Committee of Elections—Mr. FINDLEY, Mr. DAVID R. WILLIAMS, Mr. CLAY, Mr. LAMBERT, Mr. BLAKE, Mr. STURGES, and Mr. ELLIOT.

Committee of Claims—Mr. HOLMES, Mr. FITKIN, Mr. SEAVER, Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. HUMPHREYS, Mr. BROWN, and Mr. BUTLER.

Committee of Commerce and Manufactures—Mr. NEWTON, Mr. McCREERY, Mr. CUTTS, Mr. MARION, Mr. DANA, Mr. MUMFORD, and Mr. PORTER.

Committee of Ways and Means—Mr. GEORGE WASHINGTON CAMPBELL, Mr. WILLIS ALSTON, Mr. EPPER, Mr. SMILIE, Mr. TALLMADGE, Mr. FISK, and Mr. JOHN MONTGOMERY.

Committee on the Public Lands—Mr. JEREMIAH MORROW, Mr. GOODWYN, Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. BOYD, Mr. ELY, Mr. BIBB, and Mr. HOWARD.

Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business—Mr. CLOFTON, Mr. VAN RENSSSLAER, and Mr. DURELL.

Committee of Accounts—Mr. NICHOLAS R. MOORE, Mr. STEDMAN, and Mr. MILNOR.

Ordered, That a Committee for the District of Columbia be appointed, pursuant to an additional rule and order of the House, agreed to on the twenty-seventh of January last; and a committee was appointed, of Mr. LEWIS, Mr. VAN HORN, Mr. SOUTHARD, Mr. BLACKLEDGE, Mr. REA of Pennsylvania, Mr. LEMUEL J. ALSTON, and Mr. WHARTON.

Motion to Repeal the Embargo.

H. OF R.

WEDNESDAY, November 9.

Another member, to wit: ROBERT JENKINS, from Pennsylvania, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

The House proceeded in the reading of the documents accompanying the President's Message; which being concluded, on motion of Mr. DAWSON, they were referred, together with the Message, to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

On the question as to the number to be printed, it was moved by Mr. FISK, and seconded by Mr. DANA, that ten thousand copies be printed. Negatively by a considerable majority.

Five thousand copies were then ordered to be printed.

The House was then cleared and the doors closed, for the purpose of reading the confidential part of the President's Message.

After the doors were opened, a resolution yesterday laid on the table by Mr. RHEA, for appointing a Committee of Post Offices and Post Roads, to consist of one member from each State, was taken up and agreed to. The following gentlemen compose the Committee: Mr. RHEA of Tennessee, Mr. GREEN, Mr. CHITTENDEN, Mr. DAVENPORT, Mr. STANFORD, Mr. CALHOUN, Mr. TROUP, Mr. DESHA, Mr. WHITEHILL, Mr. NEWBOLD, Mr. VERPLANCK, Mr. PUGH, Mr. STORER, Mr. JEREMIAH MORROW, Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, Mr. NATHAN WILSON, and Mr. WILBOUR.

THURSDAY, November 10.

Several other members, to wit: from Virginia, WILSON CARY NICHOLAS and JOHN RANDOLPH; and from North Carolina, JAMES HOLLAND; appeared, and took their seats in the House.

On motion of Mr. LEWIS,

Ordered, That the memorial of sundry proprietors of Washington, relative to the subdivision of squares and lots in the said city, and admitting the same to record, presented the fourteenth of March, one thousand eight hundred and six, be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have proceeded to the appointment of a Chaplain to Congress for the present session, on their part; and the Reverend Mr. ELLIOTT hath been duly elected.

The House then proceeded, by ballot, to the appointment of a Chaplain to Congress, for the present session, on the part of the House; and, upon examining the ballots, a majority of the votes of the whole House was found in favor of the Rev. ORADIAH B. BROWN.

Mr. PORTER presented the petition of a number of merchants of Philadelphia, praying that the bill giving an extension of credit on revenue bonds, be amended so as to include bonds given for duties on goods imported since the passage of that law; and for which it does not provide.—Referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. SOUTHARD presented the petition of Stephen Sayre, praying further compensation for services rendered the United States by negotiation in the north of Europe; which he moved to refer to the Committee of Claims. The motion was negatived; and on motion of Mr. HOLMES, the petition was rejected, without a division.

MOTION TO REPEAL THE EMBARGO.

Mr. CHITTENDEN said he rose with considerable diffidence to offer to the House a resolution on the subject of the embargo. Having witnessed the feelings heretofore excited by a similar proposition at the last session, he said he would assure gentlemen that he had no object in view but to bring the subject before the House, and excite a fair and liberal discussion. He had hoped that the situation of our affairs would ere this have authorized the removal of the embargo. Disappointed in this, he felt it a duty which he owed to his constituents and to the nation, to endeavor to elicit an expression of the opinion of the House, to prevent ruinous speculations, and to relieve the nation from suspense. The measure had now been in operation ten or eleven months, and he had not perceived the good effects resulting from it. The importance of this subject, its interesting nature to his constituents, who, in addition to the common sufferings, had the extreme mortification of being represented as in a state of insurrection, must be an apology for his coming forward at this early period on the subject of the embargo. He then offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the act passed at the last session of Congress entitled "An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several acts supplementary and additional thereto," ought to be immediately repealed.

On the question whether the House will agree to consider the resolution, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 83, nays 9, as follows:

Mr. CHITTENDEN then moved, that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, to whom was referred the President's Message.

Mr. MACON had no objection to a fair discussion. If the laws were wrong, and productive of no beneficial effect, they ought to be repealed. He suggested to the gentleman, however, the propriety of moving a reference to a Committee of the Whole, other than that on the state of the Union.

Mr. CHITTENDEN so modified his motion, and it was agreed to refer the resolution to a Committee of the Whole.

On the question for what day it should be the order, Mr. CHITTENDEN moved to-morrow.

Mr. SMILIE said, he had no objection to meet this question, but not at so early a period. From the general state of our foreign relations, he thought the resolution was ill-timed. What could the gentleman mean by bringing this distinct question now before the House? Does he mean, said Mr. S., that we must repeal the whole of the embargo system, and substitute nothing in the room of it? Certainly, if his intention may be judged by the manner in which the subject is brought forward, he means this. If he does, I wish him to come forward and tell us so; tell us that he and his constituents are willing to pay tribute and submit; that they will surrender the independence of their country. To consider this motion now, unless a substitute for the embargo were proposed, Mr. S. said, he could not agree. He therefore moved that it be made the order of the day for Monday week. In the meantime he took it for granted that the President's Message would become the subject of consideration, and the House would be prepared to say what course it would pursue.

Mr. W. ALSTON objected to the mode in which the subject had been now introduced; and suggested that it would have been more respectful to the President first to have considered the Message. But since the gentleman had thus brought forward the question of repealing the embargo law, he was ready to meet him on his own ground to-morrow. He trusted it would then be seen in what quarter and from whom the opposition to the execution of the measure had arisen, and the desire for its removal now proceeded.

Mr. DANA presumed the gentleman from Vermont was perfectly competent to show the motives of his actions and the object he had in view without the assistance of the gentleman from North Carolina. Really, commencing the public business in this manner did not bode auspiciously to its progress. As a reason for now bringing this subject forward, Mr. D. reminded gentlemen of a fact which in the fulness of their zeal they seemed wholly to have overlooked—that the season was fast approaching when the navigation of the northern portion of the Union would be locked up. If the embargo was to be removed at all, it was of the utmost importance that it should be done promptly; that it should be decided within a fortnight from this time. And whether it should be removed or not, it was of importance to know the opinion of this body. Need gentlemen now be told that in almost all the ports of the Union vessels were preparing for sea? That some had even bent their sails; many having taken cargoes on board? These now remained in a state of suspense, and a state of suspense always gave birth to perpetual speculations. To put a stop to these speculations, it was necessary that a decision of the question should be had. How it should be decided at the present time Mr. D. said he did not undertake to say. The people should know, as soon as practicable, consistently with the decorum of Legislative deliberation, the decision of the House.

As to the question asked by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SMILIE,) as to paying tribute, and as to the gentleman who proposed the resolution being willing to pay tribute—if the gentleman wanted to know the spirit of Vermont, Mr. D. referred him to the history of the Revolutionary war. Let the gentleman see if, for her numbers, any other State gave the enemy more bloody battles. Let him then suppose the gentleman from Vermont to differ from the mass of his fellow-citizens whom he represents. Mr. D. censured these insinuations as indecorous in the extreme. Mr. D. said the present motion led to a question of serious moment; and when they came to a decision of it he wished it to be done by comparing their opinions fairly, frankly, and decisively, if necessary; and that they might unite in taking the course which would best maintain the rights and preserve the honor of the nation. On the question of the raising of the embargo, it was necessary, however, that there should be an authoritative decision one way or other.

Mr. ELLIOT said it might for aught he knew be considered disrespectful to the President to urge the immediate agitation of this momentous question; but if it were so, a forbearance from so doing on that account would be a respect inconsistent with the independence of sentiment which elevates and warms the character of an independent people. He had read somewhere in the works of celebrated newspaper civilians of this country, that "oppugnation" or even disrespect were treasonable offences. He hoped no gentlemen here meant to advance the doctrine that disrespect partakes of the nature of treason.

Mr. E. then spoke of a resolution which he had intended to have offered, and which he described, as leading to an inquiry into the mode in which the embargo law had been executed.

Notwithstanding the insinuation of the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. ALSTON,) which no one could mistake, notwithstanding whole volumes of newspaper denunciation, Mr. ELLIOT said he trembled not for the character of Vermont. The great body of the people of Vermont, though hostile, as he firmly believed, to the whole system of the embargo, had manifested a degree of patriotism that had not been exceeded by any; they had never failed, when called upon, to march to the frontiers and enforce those laws which they disapproved.

He thought it due to the character of the nation to investigate this subject; the constitutionality of the laws, the propriety of their continuance, the manner in which they had been carried into execution, and the manner in which they had been evaded. Whilst he did not wish to precipitate the discussion, much less the decision, yet he thought the day mentioned by the gentleman from Pennsylvania was too distant. The people had certainly looked forward to the meeting of Congress with considerable solicitude, as much excited by the embargo system as by the situation of our foreign affairs. The people of the United States, (said he) do not believe that they are called upon to decide between the embargo or war. We who originally opposed the embargo law, believing that it would be ruinous to the nation, are under no obligation to propose the substitute which is called for, and which we would have proposed, though it would not have been adopted, had not the embargo been put into operation. Mr. E. apologized for his warmth on this subject by alleging the sensibility he had felt at the allusion of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. ALSTON explained that he had not said or meant, that it would be seen from "what quarter of the Union" opposition came.

Mr. MACON could see no advantage in postponing a decision of the question, being himself ready to meet it at any moment. The very proposition of the resolution would excite all the attention of the seaports, and awaken all their anxiety. He thought it out of order now to discuss the merits of the question.

Mr. TROUP said he felt himself bound at all times to treat with the greatest delicacy all motions and propositions of an ordinary nature. But there were times in which his feelings compelled him to depart from the ordinary rule. This was one. He had voted against the consideration of the resolution because he would reject, with that indignity which it deserved, an abstract proposition at this time to remove the embargo; and because he thought a prompt rejection would mark to the foreign world the temper of the country. He suggested, since it was to be discussed, that the discussion should be postponed a while until time was given to digest the voluminous mass of documents laid before them. For in these documents were contained the best arguments in favor of the embargo.

Mr. EPPES was willing to vote in favor of the commitment of the motion; but did not wish the delusion under which some portion of the people of the United States labored should longer continue. He wished them to understand what course would be pursued. If, said he, it be the opinion of the Representatives of the nation that the embargo should be taken off, and no other measure substituted, the majority governs in a Republic, and I should, with every good citizen, submit to its decision; but I should ever feel for the eternal disgrace of that nation of which I should then feel it a misfortune to be a member. As it is my opinion that should the embargo be raised, other measures ought to be adopted, whether I meet with the support of the House or not, I will at least evince to the people whose representative I am, that I will not submit to British or French tyranny, but hand down to their posterity unimpaired that liberty which their forefathers so nobly achieved.

Mr. E. then proposed the following resolutions, as an amendment to Mr. CHITRENDEN'S motion:

"Resolved, That, from and after the — day of — next, all intercourse between the United States and Great Britain, its islands and dependencies, ought to cease and determine.

"Resolved, That, from and after the — day of — next, all intercourse between the United States and France, its islands and dependencies, ought to cease and determine.

"Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law for arming and equipping for immediate service — thousand militia, in addition to the force already authorized by law."

The SPEAKER informed Mr. EPPES that these could not be received while another question was pending, and Mr. E. withdrew them for the present.

Messrs. BLACKLEDGE, CLOPTON, and G. W. CAMPBELL, declared themselves positively opposed to the motion in its present abstract form. Their observations were of the same tenor as those of Messrs. SMILE, TROUP, and EPPES.

Messrs. COOK and CURTIS spoke in favor of an immediate consideration of the subject, from its importance to the mercantile interest.

The resolution was then made the order of the day for Monday next; a motion for postponement until Monday week having been negatived.

EXECUTION AND EVASIONS OF THE EMBARGO LAWS.

Mr. ELLIOT offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before the House of Representatives copies of all instructions which have been transmitted by him to the collectors of the revenue and other officers of the United States, in relation to the execution of the act laying an embargo upon all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several acts supplementary and additional thereto.

Mr. ELLIOT observed, that as his sole object was to obtain information, he presumed no objection could be made to the resolution.

Mr. QUINCY said it certainly was not his intention to make any objection to the resolution, on the contrary, he was happy that it had been brought forward. His mind had been turned to the same subject, and he suggested to the gentleman from Vermont whether his resolution comprised all the information which might be desirable. Mr. Q. said for himself he should wish to see all the instructions given, not only by the Secretary of the Treasury, but by any head of any department, to any civil or military officer, touching the embargo law.

Mr. ELLIOT said that all the objects which he had in view would be answered by the resolution as it now stood. The calling for such a mass of matter might delay the production of the part which he wished immediately to obtain.

Mr. LOVE thought that the calling for these instructions would be an assumption by the Legislature of the functions of a department with which they had no connexion. Their business was to enact laws; the execution of those laws was confided to another department. If there had been an infraction of the Constitution or laws by that department, there was a Constitutional mode of redress.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS said, as the resolution went to call for information, he felt solicitous to enlarge its scope by an amendment which he held in his hand. [Mr. ELLIOT said he had no objection to such an amendment.] Mr. W. said the gentleman perhaps might not approve of the amendment when he heard it read. It was in these words:

"Also, as far as practicable, the names and places of residence of such persons as have been detected in violating the embargo laws."

Mr. ELLIOT consented to the amendment.

Mr. DANA said, on the general merits of the resolution, having information for its object, he should not suppose that it was so reprehensible as the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. LOVE) seemed to think it. They were placed in an unfortunate situation indeed if they could never ask for information, except they would first accuse some one of the Departments of misconduct. He really hoped the gentleman did not wish them to become accusers before they had information on which an accusation could be formed, or to prefer complaints before they knew of what to complain.

Mr. LOVE said, as he understood the resolution, it stood on the broad ground of an inquiry into the manner in which the laws had been executed, and that it was travelling out of their province. He was not opposed to receiving information; but he could not see how jurisdiction on this subject could be assumed by Congress. Would they pass a law declaring void instructions which had been given? No. If, then, no use could be made of information when received, he could not see why it should be required. He wished the gentleman to explain his object.

Mr. ELLIOT said the gentlemen from Virginia seemed to object to the motion, first, because he wished to hear it dilated on, and secondly to know the object contemplated by it. Though perhaps not so much in the habit of dilating as the gentleman from Virginia, he would explain his object, and before the subject was dismissed, there would probably be dilatation sufficient on it. He hoped, notwithstanding the alarming doctrines of late advanced in regard to motions, that no gentleman would ever rise on this floor to make a motion, the object of which he should be ashamed to declare and defend.

A great number of facts (said Mr. E.) have been stated to me from various quarters in relation to the execution of the several embargo laws. Indeed, I have collected almost enough to fill a volume, which have left in my mind not a particle of doubt that the Constitution and laws have been almost daily violated in the execution of the embargo laws, and sometimes in the most flagrant manner. These facts I will hereafter state to the House. It is not to be presumed, however, because the Constitution and the laws have been violated by subordinate officers, whether civil or military, that these violations have been authorized by the Executive. I will not presume it; I have no right to do so; nor does the resolution. But I think it very proper that it should be ascertained whether the officers, in these violations or supposed violations of the Constitution and laws, are or have not been authorized by instructions received from superior officers. If, when the information is obtained, it shall appear that the statements which I have received on these subjects are erroneous; that the Executive has not authorized the commission of these violations which have been stated to me; I shall certainly have nothing of which to accuse the Executive. And if it shall even appear that the Executive has gone further than he should, it will not follow that it will be either my duty or disposition to move an impeachment. Certainly the Executive officer is liable to errors of judgment; he may have misinterpreted his authority, and thus have led to violations, without any corrupt intention. I have stated in the most explicit manner my object: I mean not to impeach the head of the Executive or any other Department; for I know not, officially, where, in any one instance, orders have been issued which amount to a violation of the Constitution or laws. Although I have not dilated so much as the gentleman could wish, he must be convinced of the propriety of the motion.

Mr. LOVE said, since the gentleman had explained his object, he would withdraw his opposition.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL wished the resolution to lie on the table till to-morrow, to give time for further consideration. He had no objection to calling for information when necessary, though he must say, that had any persons suffered by violations of the Constitution and laws, under pretence of carrying them into effect, they had their remedy in a court of justice, against the individual officer perpetrating the offence. When brought to trial, the officer would, in defence, produce the authority upon which he acted. That authority would be the instructions to which the gentleman alluded; which would then properly be subjected to a judicial decision on their constitutionality or legality, and the party injured thus obtain his redress.

The resolution was then, with the consent of Mr. ELLIOT, ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. EPPES now moved the resolutions given

British Orders and French Decrees—Embargo.

above; which were referred to the committee to whom was referred Mr. CHITTENDEN'S resolution.

FRIDAY, November 11.

Two other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, SAMUEL TAGGART; and from Maryland, JOHN CAMPBELL; appeared, and took their seats in the House.

A new member, to wit: RICHARD S. JACKSON, returned to serve in this House, as a member for the State of Rhode Island, in the room of Nehemiah Knight deceased, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

On motion of Mr. LIVERMORE, the House came to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of rebuilding two light-houses on Plum Island, at the mouth of Merrimack river, in the State of Massachusetts; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

BRITISH ORDERS AND FRENCH DECREES.

Mr. BURWELL offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before this House copies of the act or acts of Parliament of Great Britain carrying the Orders in Council of the 11th November, 1807, into effect; and also an act placing the commerce of America in English ports upon the footing of the most favored nations."

Mr. B. said he had never met with the documents here referred to. He thought it very important that they should be before the House and the nation, that they might know precisely the duties imposed on American commerce; and particularly that they ought to have a copy of the act placing this country on the footing of the most favored nation, that it might be seen, in carrying their own produce to Great Britain, what immense advantage was given to America. If he was not mistaken, such was the advantage that the British merchant might pay double the freight for American produce to be exported in British vessels to England, which an American merchant would, and yet reap double the profit to be made on the same produce, if carried in American vessels. It was in this view he thought the production of these papers important, and to have considerable bearing on the question of our foreign relations, which had been made the order of the day for Monday next.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL said he was willing to see all the acts alluded to; but he believed they were so numerous and so contradictory in their nature, that it would require all the skill and ingenuity of the House to discover the extent of their operation, or to define what would be the practice under them.

Mr. BURWELL'S resolution was adopted without a division; but a short time afterwards rescinded, on motion of Mr. MACON, seconded by Mr. QUINCY, with the consent of Mr. BURWELL, and the following resolution adopted, giving more latitude to the call for papers:

10th CON. 2d Sess.—16

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before this House copies of all acts, decrees, orders, and proclamations, affecting the commercial rights of neutral nations, issued or enacted by Great Britain, and France, or any other belligerent Power, since the year 1791; and also an act placing the commerce of America in English ports upon the footing of the most favored nations."

In advocating the above resolution, Mr. QUINCY expressed his wish to have all these papers, that it might be clearly understood which Power had commenced the system of violations of neutral commerce.

In discussing the terms of the resolution Mr. J. G. JACKSON took occasion to observe that the precise words were immaterial; for that every edict violated which affected neutral commerce.

Messrs. BURWELL and CUTTS were appointed a committee to wait on the President with the above resolution.

EMBARGO LAWS.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON said, in order to meet the proposition of the gentleman from Vermont (Mr. CHITTENDEN) of yesterday, he would offer to the House the following resolutions:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law for more effectually carrying into execution the several embargo laws.

Resolved, That no vessel shall be allowed to depart from one port to another of the United States that does not with her cargo wholly belong to a citizen or citizens of the United States, and be navigated solely by citizens thereof."

Mr. JACKSON said, it was not his purpose now to discuss the propriety of their adoption or the principles contained in them; but he moved their reference to the same committee to whom was referred the resolution for repealing the embargo laws—which was agreed to.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

On motion of Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the state of the Union, Mr. MACON in the Chair.

Mr. CAMPBELL, after observing that it appeared proper that the several subjects contained in the President's Message should be referred to the consideration of committees, offered the following resolutions, which were severally agreed to in Committee of the Whole without a division, and concurred in by the House:

1. Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to our relations with foreign Powers, be referred to a select committee.

2. Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to fortifications for the security of the seaport towns and harbors, be referred to a select committee.

3. Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to our Military and Naval Establishments, be referred to a select committee.

4. Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to revising and improving the militia system of the United States, be referred to a select committee.

5. Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the disposition of surplusage of our revenue, to improvements of roads, canals, and rivers, be referred to a select committee.

6. Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to encouraging and promoting internal manufactures, be referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

7. Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to our finances, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. GEORGE WASHINGTON CAMPBELL, Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. MUMFORD, Mr. FISK, Mr. CHAMPION, Mr. JOHN MONTGOMERY, Mr. BACON, Mr. TAYLOR, and Mr. POTTER, were appointed a committee, pursuant to the first resolution.

Mr. BLOUNT, Mr. BURWELL, Mr. COOK, Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, Mr. RIKER, Mr. JEDEDIAH K. SMITH, and Mr. TROOP, were appointed a committee, pursuant to the second resolution.

Mr. NELSON, Mr. DAWSON, Mr. TALLMADGE, Mr. HOWARD, Mr. STORER, Mr. BUTLER, and Mr. SHAW, were appointed a committee, pursuant to the third resolution.

Mr. MACON, Mr. CLAY, Mr. FINDLEY, Mr. DURELL, Mr. CUTTS, Mr. STURGES, and Mr. JOHNSON, were appointed a committee, pursuant to the fourth resolution.

Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. QUINCY, Mr. BROWN, Mr. KIRKPATRICK, Mr. LAMBERT, Mr. SAWYER, and Mr. DESHA, were appointed a committee, pursuant to the fifth resolution.

And on motion, the House adjourned until Monday.

MONDAY, November 14.

Several other members, to wit: from New York, JOSIAH MASTERS; from Maryland, PHILIP B. KEY; and from North Carolina, THOMAS KENAN; appeared and took their seats in the House.

On motion of Mr. ELLIOT, the House proceeded to consider the resolution proposed by him on the tenth instant, which lay on the table; and the same being again read, was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before the House of Representatives, copies of all the instructions which have been transmitted by him to the Collectors of the Revenue and other officers of the United States, in relation to the execution of the act laying an embargo upon all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several acts supplementary and additional thereto; and, also, so far as practicable, the names and places of residence of such persons as have been detected in violating the embargo laws.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON,

Resolved, That the committee appointed on so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the Military and Naval Establishments, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the President of the United States to employ such an additional number of seamen, not exceeding —, as, in his opinion, the public service may require; and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

On motion of Mr. BACON,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the transportation of the Message of the President of the United States of the eighth instant, and the documents accompanying the same, by mail, free of postage.

On motion of Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee,

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands do inquire into the expediency of laying off and describing, by certain metes and bounds, a tract of country to which the Indian title hath been extinguished within the limits of Louisiana, and to include all the settlements within the said Territory; and of having the said tract of country laid off into townships and sections, half and quarter sections, agreeably to the several laws heretofore made for surveying the public lands of the United States; and, also, to inquire into the expediency of granting one quarter of a section to every free male white person who now resides thereon, or who will, within — years, actually improve and reside thereon.

Also on motion of Mr. RHEA,

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands do inquire into the expediency of laying off and describing, by certain metes and bounds, a tract of country to which there is no existing Indian title, within the limits of the Territory of Orleans; and to include all the settlements on the west side of the river Mississippi within the said Territory; and of having the said tract of country laid off into townships and sections, half and quarter sections, agreeably to the several laws heretofore made for surveying the public lands of the United States; and, also, to inquire into the expediency of granting one quarter of a section to every free male white person who now resides thereon, or who will, within — years, actually improve and reside thereon.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Indiana Territory, enclosing several resolutions of the said House of Representatives, submitting to the consideration of Congress certain propositions which they pray may be adopted for the convenience and benefit of the inhabitants of that Territory.—Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. BLACKLEDGE, the House came to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the President of the United States to employ an additional number of revenue cutters; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

INLAND NAVIGATION.

Mr. MARION presented the petition of the company for opening the Catawba and Wateree rivers, signed by J. F. Grimke, President, stating the embarrassed state of the association, and praying that the Secretary of the Treasury may be authorized to subscribe to such number of shares on account of the United States, as Congress may in their wisdom think proper.

Mr. M. moved a reference of the memorial to the committee on that part of the President's Message relating to internal improvements.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, with due submission to the gentleman from South Carolina, he could not see the propriety of the reference moved for. He thought the petition was for a specific object. If he understood the reference of this part of the President's Message, it embraced a general question, and indeed nothing short of an alteration of the Constitution of the United States. He could not, therefore see the propriety of referring to it a petition for a specific aid.

Mr. MARION said, he was induced to move a reference to this committee, because he had no doubt the memorial had been preferred in consequence of an idea which had gone abroad, from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of last session, that Congress had it in view to take the subject of the improvement of the country under serious consideration. Expecting that other applications of a like nature would be made, he thought it best that they should go to the committee on the general subject.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, the two questions were totally distinct; for, if this petition should go to any committee already appointed by the House, it should be to the Committee of Claims. If not to the Committee of Claims, there should be some such thing as a Standing Committee of Benevolences and Aids, and it should go to that. Without any disparagement to the memorialists, he thought it highly improper to refer their prayer to a committee who had under their consideration the general subject of internal improvements, its expediency and constitutionality. This was entirely a matter of individual claim. The two subjects were in their nature so distinct, that it did not appear to him that the same committee could take up and consider both. With submission, therefore, to the gentleman who presented the memorial, he moved that it be referred to a select committee.

Mr. MARION consenting, that course was given to the petition, without opposition. Messrs. MARION, TRIGG, MOSELY, JENKINS, and GARDNER, form the committee.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That every pension or arrearages of pensions due or that may hereafter become due to any officer or soldier of the United States, who served in the Revolutionary war with Great Britain, and who doth reside in any of the United States, in which there hath not been established a Commissioner of Loans, or in which there may not be any resident attending Commissioner of Loans, shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury at the City of Washington, on application of the party interested, conformably to the rules and restrictions provided by law for the payment of pensions or arrearages of pensions by a Commissioner of Loans.

Mr. MORROW, of Ohio, moved to strike out the words in italic, as he could not conceive any reason why the accommodation should be confined to pensioners of one description only.—Agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER moved to insert, after the words "United States," the words "and Territories thereof."—Agreed to.

Mr. RHEA's resolution, as amended, was referred to the Committee of Claims, to consider and report by bill or otherwise.

EMBARGO.

Mr. MUMFORD offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several acts supplementary thereto, be repealed, so far as to allow the ships and vessels of the United States to depart with their cargoes for those countries not subject to the decrees of France, or those subject to the British Orders in Council.

Mr. MUMFORD observed, that his object was, simply, to inquire into the propriety of opening our trade with those countries not subject to the orders and decrees of England and France, viz: Spain and her colonies in the East and West Indies, including Buenos Ayres; Portugal and her colonies in the East and West Indies, including the Brazils; China and the native ports in India; Russia; Denmark; Sweden and her island of St. Bartholomew's in the West Indies; the coast of Barbary; and the Island of Hayti.

The resolution was referred to the Committee of the Whole, to whom several resolutions on the same subject have been referred, without opposition.

TUESDAY, November 15.

Another member, to wit: JAMES KELLY, from Pennsylvania, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

Mr. CLOPTON, from the Committee of Revisal and Unfinished Business, to whom it was referred to examine the Journal of the last session, and report therefrom such matters of business as were then depending, made a report, in part, thereupon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. FISK,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of altering the times and places for holding the Circuit and District Courts of the United States in the district of Vermont; and that they report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Ordered, That Messrs. FISK, SAMUEL SMITH, and GRAY, be appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

On motion of Mr. JOHN MONTGOMERY,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire if any, and what, compensation ought to be made to Captain Pike, and his companions, for their services in exploring the Mississippi river, in their late expedition to the sources of the Arkansas, Osage, and La Platte rivers, together with their tour through New Spain; and that they have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

Ordered, That Messrs. J. MONTGOMERY, D. R. WILLIAMS, JOHN G. JACKSON, LIVERMORE, and HELMS, be appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, presented a bill to authorize the transportation, by mail, free of postage, of a certain Message of the President of the United States, and documents accompanying the same; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER.

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the ordinance for the government of the several Territories of the United States as authorizes the Governors of said Territories, respectively, to prorogue and dissolve the General Assembly.

Ordered, That Messrs. POINDEXTER, HOLLAND, JOHN SMITH, KELLY, and DEANE, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

WEST INDIA TRADE.

Mr. SAWYER begged leave to add one more resolution to those already before the House on the subject of the embargo.

Resolved, That it is expedient for the United States to open a communication and trade with the West Indies generally."

Mr. S. said, he thought the present resolution would be found, when they were all taken up and examined by the House, the least liable to exception of any. For he could not go so far with trade as to vote for the resolutions of the gentleman from Vermont in favor of an indiscriminate repeal of the whole embargo system; neither could he go so far against it as to support those of the gentleman from Virginia for a total non-intercourse. He thought our best policy might be found in a medium between the two. In the first place, the Orders in Council, which were, he supposed, a principal cause for those latter resolutions, do not affect our West India trade; and unless that trade came under the cause which very properly influenced the gentleman in his intention of suppressing our foreign trade, he could not see the necessity of its being included in its effects. He would mention one fact of serious importance, which was, the very great amount of revenue which we derived from that quarter. By recurring to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of November last, it would be found that almost one half of our revenue arose from that trade. [He here read the report, and enumerated the different articles, with their relative amount, the aggregate of which was, $7,803,195.] Whether it would be prudent or wise in us to give up this large sum, to dry up this genial current, at a time when it was so much required to support the body politic under its accumulating ills, was certainly a serious question. To these considerations of a general nature, which he trusted would have some weight with the House, he added another particular reason, which had very great weight with him for introducing this resolution. The district he had the honor to represent was engaged exclusively in this trade. Their staple article, viz. lumber, was calculated for no other market. Vast piles of that article had been accumulating in the hands of our merchants, in payment of their accounts as in ordinary cases, under a supposition that some opportunity might offer of making their usual shipments, by which means alone would they be enabled to comply with their engagements. If this opportunity were now denied them, inevitable ruin must overtake a considerable portion, and infinite injury to the whole of them, as their creditors would see no motives for farther indulgence, but would fall upon them, and the hard earnings of an active life would be wrested from them for comparatively inconsiderable claims. This would induce the merchant to heap upon his customers a share of the evils which he felt himself. He therefore felt some solicitude for the fate of his resolution.

The resolution was referred to the Committee of the Whole to which several resolutions on the same subject had been referred.

WEDNESDAY, November 16.

Another member, to wit: ROGER NELSON, from Maryland, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

A new member, to wit: BENJAMIN SAY, returned to serve in this House as a member from the State of Pennsylvania, in the room of Joseph Clay, who has resigned his seat, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

On motion of Mr. VAN HORN, a memorial presented at the last session, and not finally acted on, on the subject of a canal through the City of Washington, was referred to the Committee of the District of Columbia.

Mr. VERPLANCK presented the memorial of a large and respectable number of the freeholders of Dutchess county, in the State of New York, detailing at considerable length the evils and pressure of the embargo, and praying its removal. The petition was referred to a Committee of the Whole to whom Mr. CHITTENDEN's and other resolutions are referred.

MIRANDA'S EXPEDITION.

Mr. McCREERY presented the petition of thirty-six American citizens, confined at Carthagena, in South America, under the sentence of slavery. The petition was read, as follows:

VAULTS OF ST. CLARA, CARTHAGENA,
September 16, 1808.

To the honorable the Congress of the United States of America, in Congress assembled:

The petition of thirty-six American citizens confined at Carthagena, South America, under sentence of slavery, humbly sheweth:

That we, your petitioners, were brought from New York in the armed ship Leander, Thomas Lewis, commander, on the 2d of February, 1806, together with a number of others, mostly inhabitants of that State and city, under the most specious engagements of their country; to establish which, they beg leave to state that Colonel William Smith, then Surveyor of the port of New York, William Armstrong, Daniel D. Durning, and John Fink, butcher, of the city of New York, declared they were authorized to enlist a number of men to go to New Orleans, to serve as guards to the United States mails, and a number of others as mechanics. Some backwardness on the part of your petitioners to engage being discovered by William Smith, he read passages from letters to prove his authority, and several paragraphs from newspapers to convince them of the validity of their engagements. William Armstrong and Daniel D. Durning were appointed to command them, and were to accompany them to the City of Washington, where they were to receive clothing and accoutrements, and thence to New Orleans. The ship Leander, owned by Samuel G. Ogden, and formerly in the St. Domingo trade, was procured for the conveyance of your petitioners to the City of Washington, for which purpose she was hauled down to the watering place, where your petitioners went on board her the 1st day of February, 1806, and the next day (the 2d) the ship put to sea. Shortly after Miranda, under the name of Martin, and a number of persons hitherto unknown to your petitioners, appeared on board, in the character of his officers; which, for the first time, awakened strong suspicions in the breasts of your petitioners that they had been entrapped into the power of wicked and designing men, and that, too, when retreat was impracticable. From New York your petitioners were carried to Jacmel, in the island of St. Domingo, where they were exercised in military duty, under the most arbitrary stretch of power, by Miranda and his officers. At Jacmel several attempts to escape proved abortive, from the vigilance of our oppressors, they having procured guards to be stationed in all the passes leading from Jacmel to other parts of the island, where your petitioners might expect to receive aid and protection from their countrymen. At Jacmel two schooners were hired, on board of which your petitioners were sent, under the care of a number of officers, whose wariness still remained unabated; and on the 27th March, 1806, the ship, accompanied by the two schooners, proceeded towards the coast of Terra Firma, where, after touching at the island of Aruba for refreshments, she arrived on the 28th of April, when two armed vessels hove in sight, which, after some manœuvring, the ship engaged, but soon ran away, leaving the two schooners to be captured. They were carried into Porto Cabello, where your petitioners were proceeded against as pirates, a number of warlike implements being found on board, which were placed there without the knowledge of your petitioners. And on the 12th July following, the process against us closed at Caraccas, sentencing ten, whom they considered to be criminally engaged, to be hanged and beheaded, and the remainder (your petitioners) to eight and ten years' slavery on the public works at Omoa, Bocca Chica, and the island of Porto Rico. Your petitioners were all sent to this place, where those sentenced to Bocca Chica were put to work, chained two-and-two, and the residue, in double irons and close confinement, strongly guarded, waiting for an opportunity to be sent to their respective places. Upon several occasions your petitioners were told by William Armstrong, Thomas Lewis, and others, that they were sent out by the Government of the United States. To prove to the satisfaction of your honorable body the truth of the above statement, your petitioners beg you will examine Robert Laverty, John Stagg, John Ritter, Matthew Morgan, Richard Platt, Adam Ten Brook, and John Miller, of New York, who were under the same engagements with your petitioners. Francis White and Thomas McAllister, butchers in the Bear market, New York; Mr. Brinkeroff, tavern keeper, near the Bear market; David Williams, John Garret, and a Mr. Kemper, weighmaster, whose son was executed at Porto Cabello, were present when all or most of your petitioners were engaged, and can prove beyond all doubt that your petitioners could have had no other idea than that of entering into the service of the United States. Captain Bomberry, of the ship Mary, of Baltimore; Captain Israel, of the brig Robert and Mary; Captain Waldron, of the schooner Victory; and Captain Abbot, of the brig Charleson Packet, all of Philadelphia, were eyewitnesses to the tyranny and oppression under which your petitioners labored while at Jacmel. When the crew of the Bee, one of the schooners which was chartered by the Leander, refused to go in her, a number of officers from the ship, with Lewis at their head, came on board the Bee, and, after beating and cutting the men with sticks and sabres in the most brutal manner, dragged them on board the Leander, put them in irons under a strong guard, and kept them there until the moment of sailing, when they were sent on board the Bee, with orders to keep near and to leeward of the ship. Another man, who had effected his escape from a French privateer, and found his way to Jacmel, with the hope of getting a passage home in some of his country vessels, was seized at the instance of Thomas Lewis, commander of the Leander, and captain under Miranda, thrown into prison, and compelled to go in the expedition, or to starve in jail.

Your petitioners are confident, that, when your honorable body becomes thoroughly acquainted with the circumstances of art and deception which betrayed them into the expedition, the destination of which they had no knowledge until it was too late to retreat, you will not only punish such of their betrayers as are within the reach of your power, but will adopt proper measures to restore your unfortunate petitioners to liberty and their families. We beg leave to mention that Jeremiah Powell, who was an officer of high confidence in the expedition, was pardoned without hesitation by the Spanish monarch, on the application of his father. Your petitioners have embraced many opportunities to convey to your honorable body the prayer of a petition, but, from the length of time elapsed since they sent off their last, and not hearing of any measures being adopted in their favor, they fear none ever arrived; and by the present opportunity several copies of this petition have been transmitted to gentlemen residing in different parts of the United States, with the hope that some of them may arrive safe.

Your petitioners cannot for a moment believe that the United States will suffer officers under her Constitution to kidnap her citizens into expeditions and services fitted out and maintained by a foreign outlaw against Powers with whom she is at amity and peace, under the specious pretence of engaging them into the service of their country, without punishing the aggressors, and using every effort to regain her citizens. Such is the case of your unfortunate petitioners, who entreat you, as children would a parent, to relieve them from total destruction, on the brink of which they have been thrown by the practice of frauds and villainies hitherto unheard of.

A short time since, a British ship of war arrived at this place, the commander of which, (Edward Kittoe, Esq.,) upon being applied to by nine of our companions, who declared themselves to be British-born subjects, and being made acquainted with the circumstances which led to our capture, immediately sent on a petition to the Viceroy of this Kingdom in behalf of us all, but particularly for such as are British subjects, whom we expect will eventually be liberated. Nothing but humanity and a strong desire to relieve distress could have induced Captain Kittoe to this step, who, we are confident, as much as ourselves, regrets its failure of success, and to whom we feel every way indebted, and shall ever recollect it with gratitude and thanks.

When your petitioners remonstrate against any harsh treatment of these people, they invariably ask, "Why don't your country liberate you!—it rests solely with them."

Your petitioners feel confident, from the justness of their claim to the interference and protection of the constituted authorities of their country, measures will be adopted to restore them to liberty; and having no doubt but your honorable body will afford them that protection which citizens have a right to claim from their country, your petitioners beg that your honorable body will convey them an answer, and your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c.

CARTHAGENA, August 12, 1808.

On my arrival at this place, I was applied to in behalf of the unfortunate men captured under the orders of General Miranda, who are under sentence of transportation to the different public works at Omoa, Porto Rico, &c., among whom are several British subjects, (whose names are inserted below.) I am well aware of the enormity of their crime, as I understand they were taken without colors or papers; but, as a British officer, I consider it a duty to plead for those in distress, wherever they may be found; and I trust, from the known lenity of your Excellency's character, I shall not plead in vain. The men in question are originally of British descent, and are allied to my nation by many ties. They have no Consul—no Minister—to prefer the prayer of their petition to your Excellency, having been prevented by the war between our nations from making known their situation to the President of the United States. Suffer me, therefore, to address your Excellency, and beg for their release, on a solemn promise that they will never be found again in arms on a similar occasion. As I am the bearer of welcome tidings to the inhabitants of the province under your Excellency's command, make me also the bearer of them to the unhappy sufferers now confined in Carthagea. It is true, I am unauthorized to make this request in the name of the British Government for the men in general, but I am convinced the step will be approved; and if your Excellency will lend a favorable ear to my petition, the circumstance will not pass unnoticed on their part; at all events, your Excellency will have the prayer of many individuals for your eternal happiness, and among them will be found (not the least fervent) those of your Excellency's most humble servant,

EDWARD KITTOE,
Com. H. B. M. ship Sabrina.

P. S.—If my request for the liberation of all General Miranda's men is by your Excellency deemed unreasonable or improper, I beg to confine it particularly to such as are British subjects: that is an indispensable duty I owe to them and to my country.

VAULTS OF ST. CLARA, CARTHAGENA,
September 16, 1808.

RESPECTED SIR: I have taken the liberty to direct to your care a memorial of thirty-six American citizens, who have been lying in shackles more than two years—a great proportion of which time in stocks, upon the broad of their backs, not even taken out to answer the ordinary calls of nature—with the request that you would present, or procure it to be presented to the Legislature of the U. States; and, should it be acted upon the approaching session of Congress, to be good enough, by the first convenient opportunity, to acquaint us with what is to be done, and what prospect we have of being liberated from this loathsome confinement, little short of death. I enclose you a copy of a petition, which the commander of a British frigate presented to the Viceroy of this Kingdom, in our behalf, with liberty to publish it in the Telegraph, with a suitable caption, should you think proper. Indeed, I think it would serve our cause. However, its effect I submit to your better judgment, well convinced you will feel disposed to succor suffering humanity; and, if unable to bring to condign punishment the authors of our misfortunes, you will not withhold your aid to release us from this miserable condition. Our number has been reduced by deaths and escapes from forty-seven to thirty-six. I also enclose to your charge, a letter for my father, which I beg you would put on board some of the wood shallops belonging to Otter Point, which always may be found at the wharf, the foot of the Marsh market; or, if they cannot conveniently be found, to leave it at Mrs. Hay's, in Old Town, not far from Mr. Asque's, near the Baptist meeting, with the injunction to send it on as speedily as possible. For a description of the fraud and deception, which placed us in this unhappy situation, I refer you to the memorial itself.

I am your obedient, humble servant,
ROBERT SAUNDERS, JR.
Mr. THOS. DOBBIN, Printer, Balt.

The petition was referred to a committee, consisting of Messrs. McCRERY, LOVE, FRANKLIN, DANIEL MONTGOMERY, junior, and THOMPSON, to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

TERRITORIAL GOVERNMENTS.

Mr. POINDEXTER, from the committee appointed on the subject, reported a bill concerning the power of the Territorial Governments. [The object of it is to take away from Governors of the Franking Privilege.

H. OF R.

Territories the power of proroguing or dissolving their Legislatures.]

The bill was twice read; and

Mr. POINDEXTER observed, that as the bill must stand or fall on its principle, and could not want amendment, he should wish to dispense with the usual course of reference to a Committee of the Whole, and that it should be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. TROUP hoped the House would not be precipitated unadvisedly into a decision of a question of this kind; that they would not break in upon a system which had served them so well without maturely deliberating upon it. The ordinance for the government of the Territories he considered as Constitutional law, and it should be viewed and treated with as much delicacy as the Constitution of the General Government itself. It had served them well, it had nurtured the Territories from infancy to maturity, and he hoped the House would not innovate on the system, but for the most substantial reasons. He therefore wished this bill to take the course of all other business, and go to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. POINDEXTER said it was not his object to exclude deliberation by his motion; as the day for its third reading might be fixed a fortnight hence, if the gentleman from Georgia wished it. He knew the difficulty of getting up such bills when committed to a Committee of the Whole; he also knew that in a few days the House would be engaged in great national concerns, which would occupy their entire attention to the exclusion of other business of minor importance. The gentlemen seems to think (said Mr. P.) that to leave to the Governors of Territories of the United States powers which are fitted but for the Sovereigns of Europe is highly decorous; whilst I think they should be spurned from the statute book. The gentleman is mistaken when he says that we should view the ordinances in the same light as the Constitution; they are mere statutes. Placed by the Constitution under the particular care of Congress as the Territories are, the ordinances enacted for their government are mere statutes, subject to the revision of Congress, as other laws are.

Mr. PITKIN said the ordinances for the government of the Territories had been framed with great deliberation, and should always be considered as a compact between the General Government and its Territories. Whether an alteration could or could not be made without their consent, he would not undertake to say. He thought therefore in this case the usual rule should not be violated, for it was well known that no amendment could be received on the third reading of a bill.

Mr. TROUP said, the gentleman from the Mississippi Territory had totally mistaken his object. It was not procrastination that he wanted, but a mature consideration of the question, whether on this day or on this day fortnight. When he had considered the ordinance as a compact equally sacred with the Constitution of the United States, and as unalterable without the consent of the parties to it, it was then that he considered this a question of such great and signal importance that he wished time for deliberation. And when he said this, he expressed the opinion of a man than whom no man in the country was more deeply read in its Constitution—St. George Tucker—who had described it as a compact unalterable, but with the consent of both parties. The gentleman would take away from the Territorial Governors the power to prorogue and dissolve the Assemblies. What would then be the state of the Territorial Legislatures? They would (said Mr. T.) be as completely independent of the General Government as the General Government is, I hope, of Great Britain at this moment. Retain the qualified veto, and take away the power to prorogue and dissolve, and what will be the consequence? The moment a misunderstanding takes place between the Legislature and Executive, legislation is at an end; and where legislation ends, revolution begins, and there is an end of government.

Mr. POINDEXTER said, at the suggestion of several gentlemen, he should consent to a reference of the bill to a committee, as he did not wish now to hasten the discussion. But the gentleman was mistaken if he supposed that taking away the power to prorogue, would deprive the Governors of their veto on laws. The Governors had an unqualified veto on the acts of the Legislature. The gentleman said, (observed Mr. P.) that take away the power of prorogation, and if a misunderstanding arise between the Governor and the Legislature, there is an end of legislation. That is now the fact. If there be any misunderstanding between them, the Governor sends the Legislature home; and I agree with the gentleman from Georgia, "where legislation ends, revolution begins." In this situation, I wish to take some power from the Governor and place it in the people, which would render the Government more congenial to the spirit of the Constitution and of the people of the United States. But I waive discussion and consent to reference.

The bill was made the order of the day for tomorrow.

• FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

The bill reported yesterday, for authorizing the transportation by mail, free of postage, of the documents accompanying the President's Message, having been read a third time—

Mr. RANDOLPH said it was very far from his intention to oppose the passage of this bill, as he should suppose there could be but one opinion on its final passage; but he submitted to the committee who reported the bill the propriety of acting on the subject generally, if they should think themselves authorized to do so; if not, after the passage of the bill, he would move a resolution to instruct the committee to report a bill to authorize the members of both branches of the Legislature to frank all public papers. He could not see the propriety of the law as it now stood, restricting packets to a certain weight; for if a member wished to send ten times the weight allowed by law, he had nothing to do but to divide it into as many packets as it weighed ounces. Cui bono? For the benefit of the Postmaster of this place. The public is taxed, said he, two cents as many times as a document weighs ounces, when thus divided; and from this I understand that the Post Office here is perhaps the most lucrative in the Union. I acknowledge these remarks are not very pertinent; but as this bill is before the House, and no other business demands immediate attention, I thought it pertinent to ask the chairman of the committee whether the committee considered it within their function to report such a bill.

Mr. RHEA said that his own opinion was that the bill should be general; but the committee had not thought as he did.

The bill was passed without a division.

Mr. RANDOLPH then offered the following resolution, adding to his former reasons, another: that the free packets paid a double duty—a tax at the office where they were received, and, by a special provision, he believed, a duty of two cents to the Postmaster here; and this did not prevent members from franking the most bulky packages, with this additional disadvantage, that if one part miscarried, the whole became useless:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law for sending free of postage, to and from members of Congress, all papers and documents touching the public service of the United States, or of any of the States or Territories thereof.

The resolution was passed, and referred to the Committee of Post Offices and Post Roads.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Mr. CHITTENDEN moved for the order of the day on his resolution on the subject of the embargo.

Mr. SMILIE thought, from the commencement of this business, they had taken an irregular course. In his opinion all the resolutions on this subject should have been referred to the committee on that part of the Message of the President of the United States relating to Foreign Relations. And to get at this object he moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the consideration of those resolutions.

The SPEAKER informed Mr. SMILIE that the motion could not be received while another was pending.

On the question to take up the order of the day, it was negatived—ayes 34.

Mr. COOK said he could not discern any disposition in the House to submit to the orders and decrees of Britain and France, and as the resolution which had been offered did not precisely meet his idea, he begged leave to submit another:

Resolved, That the act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States and the several acts supplementary thereto, be repealed, so far as to permit the vessels of the United States to depart with their cargoes for those countries not subject to the decrees of France, nor the orders of the British Council: and

That the citizens of the United States be authorized by law to arm and equip their merchant vessels for the purpose of defending them against French and British cruisers, who may molest them when bound to any port or place not actually invested or blockaded.

On the suggestion of Mr. ELLIOT, the SPEAKER observed that the first clause of the resolution had been moved by Mr. MUMFORD, and was already before the House.

The second clause was then referred to the same committee to whom resolutions on the same subject have been referred.

THURSDAY, November 17.

Another member, to wit: DENNIS SMELT, from Georgia, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

Mr. SAY presented a memorial from sundry persons in the city of Philadelphia, stating that they have at great labor and expense erected a manufactory of shot; and praying that, to encourage the domestic manufacture, a duty be laid on all imported shot.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

PETITIONS FOR REPEAL OF THE EMBARGO.

Mr. LIVERMORE said he held in his hand several petitions from inhabitants of the State of Massachusetts, signed by between four and five thousand persons, praying for a repeal of the embargo laws.

One of the petitions (from Newburyport) was read.

[In this petition the following sentence was twice read, by desire of one of the members:

“Your memorialists would further represent to your honorable body that they have witnessed with great surprise and alarm a systematic attempt among the enemies of the people to excite a belief that our nation has in its power only a choice of evils; that an embargo, or war with Great Britain, is our only alternative, an opinion which appears to your memorialists wholly devoid of foundation. Whatever injures the United States may have sustained from that Power, we cannot perceive that a war with her would be either necessary or just, whilst she evinces on her part a disposition for an amicable settlement of all subjects of controversy; and especially, when we view her as almost alone maintaining a contest, on the successful issue of which depend the rights and liberties of the civilized world.”]

Mr. LIVERMORE said as the other petitions were precisely similar, he moved that their reading be dispensed with, and that they be referred to the Committee of the Whole to whom several resolutions on the subject have been referred.

The SPEAKER proceeding to put the question on reference—

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS said, as he understood the same sentiments were repeated in all, and as there were sentiments expressed in the first which he could not understand, he called for the reading of another of them.

Mr. LIVERMORE said he had no objection.

Another of the petitions was then read, and they were all referred, without opposition, to the committee to whom several resolutions on the same subject have been referred.

Mr. LIVERMORE moved that the petition be printed—Negatived, 17 only rising in favor of it.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Mr. MACON said, already had many resolutions been submitted to the consideration of the House on the subject of our foreign relations, and the embargo; some for a total and some for a partial repeal of it. As none of the motions had met his entire approbation, and as he considered this as one of the most important questions that could come before the House, he wished to submit to the House two or three propositions; which he wished to take a course different from that which had been given to the others on the same subject.

I have been astonished (said Mr. M.) to see so many resolutions on the subject of the embargo, and none contemplating its entire continuance. Is the American nation ready to bow the neck? Are we ready to submit to be taxed by Great Britain and France, as if we were their colonies? Where is that spirit which for this reason separated us from the nations of Europe? Where is that spirit which enforced a simple resolution of the old Congress, not then binding upon the people, as a law from Heaven? Is it extinct? Is it lost to this nation? Has the love of gain superseded every other motive in the breasts of Americans? Shall the majority govern, or shall a few wicked and abandoned men drive this nation from the ground it has taken? Is it come to this, that a law constitutionally enacted, even after a formal decision in favor of its constitutionality, cannot be enforced? Shall the nation give way to an opposition of a few, and those the most profligate part of the community? I think the stand we took last year was a proper one; and I am for taking every measure for enabling the nation to maintain it. Just as our measure is beginning to operate, just as provisions are becoming scarce in the West Indies and elsewhere, notwithstanding the evasions of our law, we are called upon to repeal it. I should not have made this motion at this time, had it not been for the petition just presented. When I stand here, sir, charged by a part of the community with being one of "the enemies of the people," notwithstanding I am willing to commit the petition, treating it with that respect which I conceive to be due from us to the prayer of any portion of the people, I wish my sentiments on this subject to be seen.

A proclamation has been issued by one of the belligerents since the passage of our embargo law, sir. Look at it. What says it? Clearance or no clearance, we will receive any neutral vessel into our ports; and, in speaking of neutrals, recollect that there is no nation in the civilized world that has a claim to the title, except ourselves. This proclamation then tells our citizens "Evade the laws of your country, and we will receive and protect you." This is the plain English of it.

If the mad Powers of Europe had entered into compact to injure us as much as they could, they could not have taken a more direct course to it. I consider them both alike, and the measures I would take would place them both on the same footing. I have made my resolutions as general as possible, to give all latitude to the committee.

Mr. M. then read his resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the committee appointed on that part of the President's Message which relates to our foreign relations, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of excluding by law from the ports, harbors, and waters of the United States, all armed ships and vessels belonging to any of the belligerent Powers having in force orders or decrees violating the lawful commerce of the United States as a nation.

Resolved, That the same committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting by law the admission into the ports, harbors, and waters of the United States, any ship or vessel belonging to or coming from any place in the possession of any of the above-mentioned Powers, and also the importation of any goods, wares, and merchandises, the growth, produce and manufacture of the dominions of any of the said Powers.

Resolved, That the same committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the act laying an embargo, and the several acts supplementary and additional thereto."

On the subject of the first of these resolutions (said Mr. M.) it might be proper to interdict the entrance of all armed vessels, although I have confined the interdiction to the belligerents. A certain time might be fixed on which the second should go into operation.

I have thought proper, sir, to bring forward all these resolutions together, to show my own opinion on what ought to be done. It is time for those who think the embargo a lawful and proper measure to come forward and declare it. No other person having as yet thought proper to do it I have now done it. I believe the embargo was right; that it was right to pass laws to enforce it; and believing this, I feel no hesitation in avowing it. Time has been when the impressment of our seamen was cried out against by a large majority of Congress. Now the cry is, that we will not let them go out and be taken. For if they go out they must be taken. Neither of the two great Powers of Europe have shown the least disposition to relax their measures; neither I hope shall we. I believe we have but three alternatives—war, embargo, or submission. The last I discard; this nation never would submit; nor are there many people in it that would. That is out of the question; then, the only question is, whether in the present state of the world, the embargo or war is the best for us? Arm your merchantmen, as has been proposed, send them out, and you have war directly. If we are to have war, I should rather have it openly, and let the nation know that we mean it. I am for the embargo yet. I am told flour is from thirty to fifty dollars a barrel in the West Indies; I am also told that wheat is fourteen shillings sterling a bushel in England. This must have an effect, if adhered to, through Spain and Portugal. France if she carries her armies into that country, cannot support them. Nor can Spain support her own armies, and at the same time those Great Britain sends there; for where war is waged, almost all agriculture is destroyed; and it only requires firmness in us to force them both by this measure to acknowledge our rights. If I am mistaken in my opinion, I wish that measure to be adopted which may best maintain our rights and independence.

It is not the embargo which causes the pressure on the people. No, sir, it is the orders and decrees of England and France. Take a license from England, and you may trade, but on no other terms. Let an officer of the British fleet visit your vessel, and France will condemn it. These are the things which destroy commerce. The country in which I live feels the measure as much as any; they are agriculturists, and their crops remain unsold; and if they will do without the principal, and resist imposition by withholding their produce, those who make a profit by the freight of our produce, may afford to lose that profit. Can any man tell what would be the consequence of war, in these times? In common war some regard is had to the laws of nations by belligerents, and they fight each other. In the present war the belligerents disregard the laws of nations, and fight every one but one another.

Mr. M. concluded by saying that he was aware that he had said nothing new, nor could anything new be said. The documents published at the last session and those published now put the subject in so complete a point of view, that it was impossible to add light to them.

The House agreed to consider the resolutions.

Mr. ALSTON suggested to his colleague the propriety of referring the last resolution to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, who had last session reported all the bills amendatory to the embargo laws.

Mr. MACON said he meant nothing less than disrespect to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, but he wished all the resolutions to go to one committee, that they might have the whole system before them.

Mr. DANA made a few observations which were not distinctly heard. He thought that an agreement to the third resolution would commit the House on the subject of the embargo; and suggested the propriety of taking the question on each separately.

Mr. QUINCY said he wished the last resolution to be separated from the first, as the House would be committed by its adoption. Not that he wished to avoid a discussion of that subject, for he wished for nothing so much as that the House would permit them to go into a discussion of the subject in Committee of the Whole. [Mr. MACON consented that the last resolution should lie on the table.] Mr. Q. said he wished to press a discussion on the subject of the embargo; for such was the state of public opinion in the Northern part of the Union that but one general sentiment prevailed, that the embargo would be immediately raised. Instead of postponing the subject from day to day, he only wished it to come before the House that gentlemen might understand one another, and put an end to the doubts that now existed.

The first and second resolutions offered by Mr. MACON were agreed to without a division. The third was ordered to lie on the table—yeas 78.

THE EMBARGO.

On motion of Mr. CHITTENDEN that the House do now, according to the order of the day, resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on a resolution moved on the tenth instant, relative to a repeal of the several acts laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States; and the question being taken thereupon, it passed in the negative—yeas 56, nays 58, as follows:

FRIDAY, November 18.

Mr. HOLMES, from the Committee of Claims, made reports favorable to the petitions of sundry inhabitants of Knox county, Kentucky, and of Daniel Cotton; which were referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MORROW presented the petition of sundry inhabitants of the State of Ohio, stating that, in consequence of not being able to make payment of the purchase money due for public lands, their purchases are liable to forfeiture.

[The petition contains the following sentence: "Notwithstanding your petitioners find their means of payment suspended, and sincerely regret the causes which have produced the scarcity of circulating medium, and the loss of a market, yet we are decidedly op-opinion that the measures pursued by the General Government were those, and those only, that saved our country from the evils and distresses of war, and which measures we are willing to support with our lives as well as our property."]

The petition was referred to the Committee of Public Lands.

Mr. QUINCY moved that it be printed for the use of the members; negatived—ayes 20.

Mr. LEWIS presented a petition of the Vestry of the Episcopal Church, in the town of Alexandria, praying that a law may be passed, authorizing the petitioners to raise, by way of lottery, the sum of twelve thousand dollars, for the purpose of building a new church, and the purchase of a burial ground within the said town, or its vicinity.—Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the President of the Legislative Council of Indiana Territory, enclosing a report of a Committee of the House of Representatives of the said Territory, adopted by the said House; also, the copy of a petition from sundry inhabitants of that Territory, in opposition to the admission of slavery or involuntary servitude within the same.

The SPEAKER laid before the House certain resolutions of the Legislative Council of the Indiana Territory, relative to the election of members of the said Council by citizens of the said Territory entitled to vote for Representatives to the General Assembly of that Territory; and that the continuance in office of the members of the Council shall be for the term of four years only.—Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a certificate from the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the said Territory of the election of JESSE B. THOMAS, to serve in this House as the Delegate in Congress for the said Territory, in the room of Benjamin Parke, who has resigned his seat; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, presented a bill to authorize the conveyance of certain papers and documents, by the mail, free of postage; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time on Monday next.

Mr. GHOLSON presented the petition of Amey Dardin, of the county of Mecklenburg, in the State of Virginia, widow and relict of David Dardin, deceased, praying compensation for the value of a horse called Romulus, which was impressed into the service of the Continental army during the Revolutionary war with Great Britain.—Referred to the Committee of Claims.

TERRITORIAL GOVERNMENTS.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill concerning Territorial Governments.

The bill having been read—

Mr. BIBB said, that if the House were now called upon for the first time to pass an ordinance for the government of the Territories of the United States, he should attach very little importance to the decision of the present question. But he considered it not now an abstract question of expediency, but as one of great moment, from the circumstances with which it was connected. He denied the right of the House to pass the bill; and if they had not the right, it was surely unnecessary to argue the question on the ground of policy. It would be recollected that the Mississippi Territory was formerly the property of the State of Georgia, and ceded by that State to the United States on certain conditions, one of which was that the ordinance for the government of the Territory Northwest of the Ohio should be the basis of the government of the Mississippi Territory. If this, said he, be one of the conditions of a compact between the United States and Georgia, surely the United States have no right to infringe it without the consent of Georgia; and I, as one of her Representatives, formally protest against the passage of this bill. It may be said, that Georgia is very little interested in the abstract question, whether the Governor should or should not have the power of prorogation; but, if a right exists to alter one part of the ordinance without the consent of Georgia, it certainly implies a power to alter it in every part.

Mr. TROUP moved that the Committee rise and report progress.

Mr. POINDEXTER inquired of the gentleman, what was his object in making this motion?

Mr. TROUP said, his object was that the Committee should rise and report progress, and give him an opportunity of making a motion that the further consideration thereof be indefinitely postponed; and he made the motion for the best of all possible reasons—that the Committee had no reason before it to induce it to act otherwise.

Mr. POINDEXTER said, he would state the reasons for which he had introduced the bill, and which would, he hoped, insure it the sanction of the Committee. I will, in the first place, said Mr. P., advert to that part of the ordinance which is proposed to be amended by the bill under consideration. In the ordinance for the government of the Northwestern Territory will be found this article: "The Governor shall have power to prorogue and dissolve the General Assembly, when, in his opinion, it shall be expedient." The bill proposes to take away this power, as being arbitrary and oppressive in the extreme, and incompatible with the Constitution of the United States. This ordinance was passed previous to the adoption of the Federal Constitution, and if it had been the subject of consideration subsequent to its adoption, this provision had never been inserted, giving to Governors of Territories a power paramount to any power possessed by the President of the United States. Take away this power and a Governor will still have left the power of negativing all acts, so that none can pass without his assent; and, being the agent of the General Government, he would give consent to no law incompatible with the interests of the United States.

It has been said that the ordinance cannot be altered without the common consent of the parties to it, and that the State of Georgia must be called upon to give its assent before the Congress can alter it. There are two parts of this ordinance; the first contains the form of government, and the second several articles of compact which are declared unalterable but with common consent. After reciting the form of government, the ordinance says:

"The following articles shall be considered as articles of compact between the original States and the people of the States in the said Territory, and forever remain unalterable, unless by common consent, to wit."

[Here follow six articles.] The ordinance declares that which follows the declaration to be unalterable, but by common consent; it follows of consequence that that which precedes the declaration is alterable. Independent of this reasoning, which cannot be refuted, at every session since we have been a Territory, there have been laws passed altering the ordinance in some shape or other. For example, the ordinance requires two judges to hold a court; and, in a variety of instances, Congress has legislated with respect to the form of government of the Territory. I had supposed that the articles of agreement between the United States and Georgia had become obsolete, with respect to the imagined necessity of the consent of Georgia to legislation on the subject of the Territory. It was urged at the last session with all the eloquence which the gentlemen from Georgia are in so great a degree possessed, and disregarded; for it was decided by both Houses that the United States had a right to rule the Territory without the consent of Georgia.

The Constitution of the United States says that Congress shall "have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." Can an agreement arising from the exercise of this power, supersede the right of exercising the power expressly delegated by the Constitution itself? Certainly not.

On the ground of policy, I presume, that there is no gentleman who will contend that the power of which I wish to deprive the Governors, ought to be retained. The gentleman from Georgia himself says, that if he were about to frame an original ordinance, he would not think of such a power. As the opinion of Judge Tucker has been referred to on one subject, I will refer to it on the subject of prerogative. Let it be recollected, that the power to prorogue and dissolve is one of the highest prerogatives of the King of England: that it crept into the governments of his colonies, and thence into this ordinance, previous to the adoption of the Constitution. It now remains for the United States to say, whether they will copy after Great Britain, and because it is a high prerogative, give the Governors of the Territories of the United States the same powers as she gives to her Territorial Governors. I trust it will be expunged.

"The title 'prerogative,' it is presumed, was annihilated in America with the Kingly Government." "This definition (of prerogative) is enough to make a citizen of the United States shudder at the recollection that he was born under a Government in which such doctrines were received as catholic," &c.

This is the opinion of Judge Tucker. Is not this sufficient to induce us to take away from Governors this prerogative? Is not this feature modelled after the feature in the Government of England? Certainly; and that it is transferred from her Colonial Government, I can show by the present ordinance for the government of Canada, [to which Mr. P. referred.] It is the same principle, and we have copied it.

I will not object to retain this power, if any gentleman can show any advantage to be gained by it. I will suppose an extreme case; that any of the Territories designed to commit treason, and the Legislature were to pass an act giving it their sanction; (and they have shown less treasonable disposition than some of the elder States, if we may judge from occurrences of a few years past)—could not the Governor put his negative on this law? There could be no such law without his consent. It is therefore entirely unnecessary, in any possible case, to give the Governor the arbitrary power of dissolving the Legislature.

There is a special reason, which has operated upon my mind as forcibly as the general reason in favor of the bill on the table. In the Territory which I have the honor to represent, we have been nearly twelve months without any Legislature. The Governor thought proper to dissolve the Assembly without any reason given, for the ordinance does not bind him to assign reasons for his acts. Within a few days, a new Council has been chosen, which may again be dissolved as soon as it meets, and the Territory again left without a Legislature, and no reason assigned for the procedure. Is it possible that this Government will sanction such arbitrary practice? If it does, it will be the first case since the Revolution in which such a procedure has been sanctioned. I beg leave to refer gentlemen to the glorious year 1776. I beg them to revert to that instrument, in which all the sins of our political father, George III, were delineated, and they will find that one of the charges against him was that he permitted his Governors to dissolve the Legislatures from time to time. Are we prepared to ingraft these arbitrary principles into our Constitution, and cherish them when practised in so arbitrary a manner? Instead of this ordinance being passed with deliberation, it must have passed originally sub silentio, and been adopted for all the new Territories without any discussion at all; for, if the principle had been investigated, it would never have been enacted into a law. In the Declaration of Independence it is stated that "he (George III) has dissolved Representative Houses repeatedly, for opposing, with manly firmness, his invasions on the rights of the people." Here we see that, at that day, we complained of the arbitrary exercise of power, and I hope that, at this day, we shall give it a death-blow. If any gentleman wishes to retain it, let him show a single possible case in which it can properly be exercised—never, but to gratify the ambition or caprice of an individual. The people elect Representatives and send them to legislate; if they do not please the Governor, he can say, “gentlemen, go to your homes—I dissolve you.” Can there be any necessity for this? But I will not detain the House longer, except to express a hope that the Committee will not rise, unless it be to report the bill.

Mr. TROUP said he would state, in as few words as he could, his objections to the passage of the bill. It was only the day before yesterday that this bill had been introduced into the House, proposing to alter one part of the ordinance. To-day, a petition came from another Territory to alter another part of it. Before they adjourned, it was ten thousand to one that not a remnant of the ordinance would be left, with their good will.

I have before stated it as my opinion, said he, that the articles of the ordinance are a compact between the people of the States and of the Territories, unalterable but with the consent of both parties. With the permission of the House, I will read the opinion of Judge Tucker on this subject:

“Congress, under the former confederation, passed an ordinance July 13, 1787, for the government of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the Ohio, which contained, among other things, six articles, which were to be considered as articles of compact between the original States and the people and States of said Territory, and to remain unalterable, except by common consent. These articles appear to have been confirmed by the sixth article of the Constitution, which declares, that all debts contracted and engagements entered into, before the adoption of the Constitution, shall be as valid against the United States under the Constitution as under the Confederation.”

In this case there are not only two but three parties to the articles—the United States, the State of Georgia, and the people of the Territories. You will recollect, as my colleague properly stated to you, that the right of soil and jurisdiction of this Territory was originally in the people of Georgia. Of course Georgia had power to prescribe for the Territory what form of government she pleased, provided it was republican. By the articles of cession, the right of soil and jurisdiction was ceded to the people of the United States, on the express condition that the articles of the ordinance should form the government of the Mississippi Territory, and that they should not be governed otherwise. The inference inevitably is, that the State of Georgia would not have ceded but upon the express condition; and this inference is the more inevitable, inasmuch as, in this clause, Georgia has made an express exception to a particular article in the ordinance; from which, I say that Georgia intended that no other alteration should be made.

What was the policy of the ordinance, and what the object of its framers? Why, assuredly, to render the governments of the Territories dependent on the Government of the United States. And how was it to be effected? By making the Territorial Legislature in a great degree dependent on the Governor, and him absolutely dependent on the Federal Executive. The moment we make the Legislature of a Territory independent of its Executive, we make it independent of the Federal Government.

And again, as my colleague has correctly told you, if you have a right to repeal one part of the ordinance, you have a right to repeal another part, and so overturn the whole system at a blow. If so, what will be the effect on the articles of cession and agreement between you and Georgia? I will tell you. By the articles of cession you reserve to yourself the right of disposing of the Territory; you also agree to pay Georgia, one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars out of the product of the first sales of the land. Suppose you transferred to the independent Legislature of the Mississippi Territory the right to dispose of this Territory, what security has Georgia for the payment of her one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars? Moreover, I feel every disposition to treat with respect the people of the Mississippi Territory, and particularly as I perceive that they approve of that course of our Government, in which I most heartily concur; yet I must say that a large majority of the people have a landed interest distinct from that of the Government of the United States. Take away from the Governor his power to prorogue and dissolve, leave him the veto, and there will soon be collision. The Legislature passes an act; the Governor puts his veto on it. The Legislature stands out, and the Governor will not yield, and eventually you may, perhaps, have to decide the question of Territorial property by the sword. Recollect, that upward of six thousand people have gone over in the present year, with every apparent intention to force a settlement against your interest and that of Georgia. I am very glad that the military have received orders to disperse them. I trust that they will be dispersed, and that every man who stands forth in resistance will be put to the sword.

But the gentleman from Mississippi Territory is certainly mistaken as to one point. He seems to consider the Constitution of the United States as giving to the people of the Territories the same rights as the people of the States. It is a mistaken idea, neither warranted by the letter or spirit of the Constitution. For although the Constitution has declared that the people of one State are entitled to all the rights and privileges of another, yet it has not declared that the people of the Territories have the same rights as the people of the States. In another part of the Constitution it is, indeed, expressly declared that Congress shall make all laws for the disposal of the Territories; but there is a salvo, that all acts done and contracts made previous to the adoption of the Constitution, shall be as binding as if done afterward. The articles of the ordinance were enacted previously, and are consequently binding under the Constitution. It cannot be controverted, that they were wisely adopted, and have been salutary in their operation. They were framed by the Congress of '87, composed of men whose integrity was incorruptible, and judgment almost infallible. These articles, from that time to this, have remained unaltered, and carried the Territories through difficulties, almost insuperable, to prosperity. And now, for the first or second time, an alteration is proposed, the consequence of which cannot be foreseen, without any evidence that it is either necessary or expedient.

The population of every new country must necessarily be composed of a heterogeneous mixture of various tempers, characters, and interests. In a population thus composed, it would be highly ridiculous to expect that love of order and obedience to law would always predominate. Therefore the old Congress wisely reserved to itself the right to control them; to give the Governor power, when a Legislature became disorderly, to dissolve them; and for the exercise of this power he is accountable to the General Government.

The gentleman from Mississippi wishes us not to treat the Territories as children, whose wild extravagancies may require correcting by the indulgent hand of their parents, but as the equals of the States, without any other reason than that which he states to be the situation of the people of his Territory. They will next wish us to admit them into the Union before their population will authorize it; tell us that that Territory does not grow fast enough, and we must demolish the system for their convenience.

Mr. T. adverted to the representation made by Mr. POINDEXTER, of the state of things now existing in the Mississippi Territory. If such were the situation of the Territory, and Mr. T. said he sincerely regretted it, he could put the gentleman in a way of settling the dispute in a regular and Constitutional way, and which would be the most prudent and advisable. Certainly, in this dispute, one of the parties must be right and the other wrong. They had nothing to do but prefer their complaints before the proper authority, and, if they were there substantiated, they would obtain redress of their wrongs. If, on the contrary, the people were wrong and the Governor right, the wisdom of this part of the ordinance would be proved beyond question.

Mr. POINDEXTER observed that the gentleman from Georgia had set out with telling the House that if the Legislature were made independent of the Governor, they could pass any law they pleased respecting land titles. The gentleman could not have looked at the ordinance, for there was an express provision that the Legislature should "never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil by the United States in Congress assembled, nor with any regulations Congress may find necessary for securing the title in such soil," &c. Independent of this, it is control sufficient if the Governor have a veto on the laws. The gentleman has told you, said Mr. P., that these articles are unalterable but with common consent. When up before, I read that part which is unalterable. It is the articles of ordinance and not the form of government; and to this Judge Tucker refers when he speaks of it. The gentleman has said, that the situation of the people would not be bettered by taking away the power, if the veto were left. In my opinion it would be ameliorated. Let the Governor retain his veto, but let them remain in session, and pass laws, that the General Government may see whether such laws are worthy of rejection or of approbation. Now, if the Governor discovers them about to pass a law or do an act he does not like, he sends them home. Lop off a little of this Executive power, and let the Legislature pass laws which he may negative, and the General Government will have an opportunity of seeing that the Governor will not consent to proper laws. Trust your Executive and distrust the people, and you sap the foundation of the Government. Whatever leads to the conclusion that the people are always wrong and the Executive right, strikes at the root of republican institutions.

The gentleman has spoken of the wildness and extravagance of the people of the Mississippi Territory. Does he recollect the invasion of the Spaniards two years ago? That, at a few days' notice, at the requisition of the Commander-in-Chief, a detachment of two hundred and fifty militia were sixty miles on their march? When an arch traitor from the East designed to sever the Union, the people of the Territory, without call, assembled near the city of Natchez, and arrested the traitor. These proceedings cannot be exceeded even by the spirit or prudence of the State of Georgia. I hope the indignation of this House will be displayed at these insinuations against the motives of people who have manifested the greatest patriotism. In respect to the late measures of the General Government, no people feel them more severely than the people of Mississippi, and no people better support them. There may be symptoms of wildness and extravagance, but they show a submission to the laws and measures of the Union.

The gentleman talks of tender parents. If he considers the State of Georgia as one of our tender parents, I protest against it. Although she be one of our parents, there has been no proposition ever made on this floor, for the good of the Territory, which has not met the opposition of that State. But these are subjects on which I will not dwell.

The gentleman has stated that a number of people have gone over to the Mississippi Territory to settle lands, against the express provisions of the law. That, under the pretext of a purchase from an Indian, named Double Head, people have gone over to settle lands, is true; but from where? From Georgia. They are citizens of Georgia; people nurtured by this tender parent into a state of manhood, and unwilling to participate longer in the tender cares of the State of Georgia. They have been, very properly, ordered to be driven off by military force, because they have infringed a law of the United States.

NOVEMBER, 1808.

Proceedings.

H. OF R.

But these things do not touch the present question. I now propose to take away a power which has been, by mi-take, incorporated into the Constitution of a free people.

Mr. BIBB said that the State of Georgia had never undertaken to legislate for the Mississippi Territory; but there was a compact existing between the United States and Georgia, and he called upon the United States to adhere to it. They dared not violate it, except they could violate the most solemn compact—the Constitution.

Mr. TROUP observed that, it had been said this power of the Governor was a badge of slavery copied from the British constitution. That in many things they had been copied too far, he agreed; but as to this prerogative, it was no such badge of slavery, and was found not only in the articles of the ordinance, but in the constitutions of various States, qualified in a greater or less degree. Mr. T. quoted the constitutions of New York and Massachusetts, both which States had been considered republican. Massachusetts, to be sure, was a little wavering now, but he hoped she had not quite gone over to the enemy yet. These constitutions gave a qualified prerogative to the Governor of the State.

The Committee now rose—58 to 36.

Mr. TROUP moved that the further consideration of the bill be postponed indefinitely—[equivalent to rejection.]

Mr. POINDESTER calling for the yeas and nays on the motion, it was decided—yeas 57, nays 52, as follows:

YEAS—Lemuel J. Alston, Willis Alston, jun., Ezekiel Bacon, David Bard, William W. Bibb, William Blackledge, John Blake, junior, Adam Boyd, Robert Brown, Joseph Calhoun, John Campbell, Martin Chittenden, Samuel W. So the bill was postponed indefinitely.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 21.

Another member, to wit: JOHN BOYLE, from Kentucky, appeared and took his seat in the House.

Mr. HOWARD presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the State of Kentucky, stating that the King of Great Britain having, by his proclamation of the sixteenth of October, one thousand eight hundred and seven, claimed the allegiance of all persons who may have been born in his dominions, and were not inhabitants of the United States of America at the period of their Revolution, and disregarding the laws of naturalization in other countries, hath authorized the impressment into his service of his pretended subjects, and treated as traitors such as may have taken up arms against him in the service of their adopted country; the petitioners being, at the present time, precluded from the privilege of following commercial pursuits on the high seas in safety, therefore pray that such measures be adopted by Congress as may effectually resist the unjust assumption of power claimed and exercised by a foreign nation; and pledging themselves to support with their lives and fortunes whatever steps may be taken, or acts passed, by the General Government, for the welfare of the Union.— Referred to Mr. HOWARD, Mr. JOHN MORROW, and Mr. HARRIS, to examine the matter thereof, and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

Mr. LEWIS presented a petition of the Common Council of the town of Alexandria, in the Territory of Columbia, praying that the petitioners may be invested with power to establish and regulate, by law, such inspections of articles of the growth, produce, or manufactures of the United States, offered for sale or exportation within the said town, as they may, from time to time, deem advantageous; also, that certain regulations relative to debtors and judicial process, in the town of Alexandria, may be adopted, for the convenience and benefit of the inhabitants thereof.

The said petition was read and ordered to be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

An engrossed bill to authorize the conveyance of papers and documents by the mail, free of postage, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JEREMIAH MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred, on the eighth instant, a memorial of the House of Representatives of the Mississippi Territory, made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On a motion made by Mr. DANA, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide for regulating the conduct of such merchant vessels as, by agreement of the respective owners, may sail in concert for mutual assistance and defence, in cases which may be allowed by law; and also for settling, according to the course of proceeding in Courts of Admiralty, the respective rates of contribution to be made between them, on account of any loss or damage which may be thereby incurred:

The resolution was read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole to whom was committed a resolution moved by Mr. CHITTENDEN, on the tenth instant.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill authorizing the President to employ twelve additional revenue cutters; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. J. G. JACKSON,

Ordered, That the memorial of Return Jonathan Meigs and others, witnesses against Aaron Burr, attending the circuit court for the Virginia district, presented the ninth of November, one thousand eight hundred and seven, be referred to Mr. JACKSON, Mr. HEISTER, and Mr. N. WILSON, to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

MIRANDA'S EXPEDITION.

Mr. LOVE, from the committee to whom was referred, on the sixteenth instant, the petition of thirty-six citizens of the United States now confined at Carthagena, in South America, under sentence of slavery, made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to be referred to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

The report is as follows:

That it appears, from the statement of the petitioners, that, in February, 1806, they sailed from New York on board the Leander, a ship owned by Samuel G. Ogden, the command of which was, after getting to sea, assumed by General Miranda.

That, from New York, the said ship sailed to Jacmel, where the said Miranda procured two schooners, on board which the petitioners were placed, which, together with the Leander, sailed, under the command of Miranda, about the last of March, in the same year, for the northern parts of South America, and arrived on the coast of Terra Firma in the latter part of April following.

That, upon their arrival on the said coast, the two schooners, on board which the petitioners were embarked, were captured by two Spanish armed vessels; the ship Leander, with Miranda on board, having made her escape.

That the petitioners, together with ten others, were convicted by a Spanish tribunal, at Porto Cabello, of the crime of piracy, from the circumstances of suspicion which attached to their situation, and not from any act of that kind committed on the high seas; that the ten others abovementioned were sentenced to death, and the petitioners some to eight, others to ten years' slavery, which they now are suffering; some chained together, others closely confined under heavy irons and a guard, destined to other places and to similar punishment.

The petitioners state that they were entrapped into the service of the said Miranda, on the said expedition, by assurances, made at the time of their engagements, that they were to be employed in the service of the United States, and under the authority of the Government. For the truth of their statement, and a confirmation of the charges they make against certain persons of having thus deceived and betrayed them into an involuntary co-operation in the design of fitting out an armament against a nation in amity with the United States, they refer to the testimony of several persons, said to be inhabitants of the city of New York, and to have had proposals made to them similar to those by which the petitioners were induced to engage on board the Leander.

The petitioners also state that no opportunity was offered them of escaping from the service of the said Miranda and his associates; that they were restrained under the most rigorous discipline, and at Jacmel, the only place where an opportunity of escape might have been probable, they were strictly guarded to prevent it. For the truth of this they refer to certain captains of vessels then at Jacmel belonging to the ports of Philadelphia and Baltimore.

The committee further report that the foregoing statements of the petitioners are unaccompanied by any competent testimony in support of them, and, at the same time, are uncontradicted by any opposing circumstances; they are of opinion that a very strong probability of the petitioners not having been guilty of the crime of wilfully engaging in the unlawful expedition of Miranda attends their application: first, because the petitioners have made a detailed statement of facts relative to the deception practised on them, referring to such species of evidence as to render their contradiction easy, if not founded in truth, and thus lessen their claim on their country, and diminish their hopes of liberation; second, because it is presumed they were proven to the Spanish tribunal before which they were convicted to have been offenders in a secondary degree, those who were proven to have been more heinously guilty having been sentenced to suffer death.

The committee, however, are of opinion that, should the petitioners have been guilty of a crime against the United States by a voluntary or otherwise culpable infraction of its laws, the dictates of humanity, no less than the principles of justice, ought to influence the Legislature of the United States to adopt the proper means of restoring them to their country, in order that they may expiate the offence by a punishment suited to but not transcending the magnitude of their crime.

The committee, therefore, beg leave to submit the following resolution for the consideration of the House:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to adopt the most immediate and efficacious means in his power to obtain from the Viceroy of Grenada, in South America, or other proper authority, the liberation of thirty-six American citizens, condemned on a charge of piracy, and now held in slavery in the vaults of St. Clara, in Carthagena, and that the sum of ——— dollars be appropriated for that purpose.

THE EMBARGO.

On a motion made by Mr. CHITTENDEN that the House do now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on a resolution submitted by him on the tenth instant, relative to a repeal of the several acts laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the Uni-

And on motion, the House adjourned until tomorrow.

TUESDAY, November 22.

Two other members, to wit: from New York, PHILIP VAN CORTLANDT, and from South Carolina, RICHARD WINN, appeared and took their seats in the House.

Mr. LEWIS presented a petition of the Washington and Alexandria Turnpike Company, and of sundry other inhabitants of the county of Alexandria, in the Territory of Columbia, praying a revision and amendment of a law, passed at the last session of Congress, entitled "An act for the establishment of a Turnpike Company in the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia."—Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. VAN ALLEN,

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire whether any amendment ought to be made relative to the compensations of the officers of the customs now allowed by law; with leave to report thereon by bill, or otherwise.

10th CON. 2d Sess.—17

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL, from the committee appointed, on the eleventh instant, on so much of the Message of the President of the United States, at the commencement of the present session, as respects our relations with foreign Powers, made a report in part thereon; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next. The report is as follows:

The committee to whom was referred so much of the Message of the President of the United States, of the 3d instant, as respects our relations with foreign Powers, report in part—

After a period of twenty-five years of peace, hardly interrupted by transient hostilities, and of prosperity unparalleled in the history of nations, the United States are, for the first time since the treaty which terminated the Revolutionary War, placed in a situation equally difficult, critical, and dangerous.

Those principles, recognised by the civilized world under the name of law of nations, which heretofore controlled belligerent Powers, regulated the duties of neutrals and protected their rights, are now avowedly disregarded or forgotten by Great Britain and France. Each of those two nations captures and condemns all American vessels trading with her enemies or her enemy's allies; and every European Power having become a party in the contest, the whole of our commerce with Europe and European colonies, becomes liable to capture by either one or the other. If there be any nominal exception, it is made on a condition of tribute, which only adds insult to the injury.

The only plea urged in justification of those hostilities, is that of retaliation, grounded on a presumed acquiescence of the United States in previous aggressions by the other party. Waiving a discussion of the correctness of the principle of retaliation, a principle doubtful in itself, and altogether inadmissible to the extent to which it has been carried, and when operating on the neutral rather than on the enemy; it is altogether untrue that the United States have ever voluntarily acquiesced in the unlawful aggressions of either nation; omitted or delayed any measures calculated to obtain redress, or in any respect deviated from that impartiality to which they were bound by their neutrality. France has alluded to the violations of the national flag, and of the sovereignty of the United States, in the instances of Pierce's murder, of the outrage on the Chesapeake, and of the destruction of the Impetuous. The measures taken to obtain redress in those cases are of public notoriety, and it may be added, that, with the exception of the last, those aggressions on the sovereignty of the United States did not affect their neutrality, and gave no right to France either of complaint or interference. Setting aside irregularities of less importance and equally chargeable to both nations, such as the British Order of June, 1803, and the decree of the French General, Ferrand—the principal violations by England of the neutral rights of America, prior to the Berlin decree of November, 1806, and which, if acquiesced in, might have given grounds of complaint to France, are the capture of American vessels laden with Colonial produce, founded on a renewal of that pretended principle generally called "the rule of 1756," the impressment of American seamen, compelled thereby to become the auxiliaries of England against France, and proclamation or nominal blockades, particularly that of the coast from the river Elbe to Brest, notified in May, 1806.

It will not be asserted, that the United States ever tamely acquiesced in either of those pretensions. It will not be denied, that, with respect to the two first, the most strenuous efforts were incessantly made to procure an alteration of the British system.

It is true, that, to the nominal proclamation blockades of England, the United States had opposed only spirited and repeated remonstrances, and that these had not always been successful. But, the measures which a neutral nation may be supposed bound to take against the infractions of its neutrality, must always bear a certain proportion to the extent and nature of the injury received, and to the means of opposition. It cannot certainly be pretended that a hasty resort to war should in every such instance have become the duty of America. Nor, can the irregularities of England, in declaring in a state of blockade a certain extent of coast, part of which was not, and the whole of which could not, even by her powerful navy, be actually invested and blockaded, be plead in justification of that decree, by which France, without an efficient fleet, pretends to announce the blockade of the dominions of a Power which has the incontestable command of the sea, and before no port of which, she can station a single vessel.

The Milan decree of 1807 can still less rest for its defence on the supposed acquiescence of the United States in the British Orders of the preceding month, since those Orders, which have not certainly been acquiesced in, were not even known in America at the date of the decree. And it is proper here to add, that the French have, particularly by the sequestration of certain vessels in their ports, and by burning our ships on the high seas, gone even beyond the tenor of their own extraordinary edicts.

The allegation of an acquiescence in the Berlin decree of November 1806, by which alone the British Government pretends to justify the Orders of Council, is equally unfounded. In the note on that subject, addressed on the 31st of December 1806, by the British Government to the American Ministers, after having stated that "they could not believe that the enemy would ever seriously attempt to enforce such a system," the following declaration is expressly made: "If, however, the enemy should carry these threats into execution, and if neutral nations, contrary to all expectation, should acquiesce in such usurpations, His Majesty might probably be compelled, however reluctantly, to retaliate in his just defence," &c. The two requisites, necessary, in the opinion of Great Britain, to justify retaliation, are stated to be, the execution of the decree, and the acquiescence of neutral nations. Yet, within eight days after, and in the face of that declaration, without waiting for ascertaining either of those facts, the retaliating British Order of January 7th, 1807, was issued, which, contrary to the acknowledged law of nations, subjected to capture, vessels of the United States sailing from the ports of one belligerent to a port of another belligerent.

The United States, in the mean while, and without delay, had taken the necessary steps to ascertain the manner in which the French Government intended to execute their decree.

That decree might be construed merely as a municipal law forbidding the introduction of British merchandise, and the admission of vessels coming from England. Under that aspect, and if confined to that object, the neutral rights of America were not affected by its operation.

A belligerent may, without any infraction of neutral rights, forbid the admission into his ports of any vessel coming from the ports of his enemy; and France had undoubtedly the same right to exclude from her dominions every species of British merchandise, which the United States have exercised in forbidding the importation of certain species. Great Britain might be injured by such regulations; but America had no more right to complain of that part of the decree, than France had to object to the American Non-Importation Act. So far, indeed, as respects the United States, they were placed by the municipal part of the decree in the same situation, in relation to France, in which they are placed in their intercourse with Great Britain, by the permanent laws of that country. The French Decree forbids American vessels to import British merchandise into France. The British Navigation Act forbids American vessels to import French merchandise into England. But that broad clause of the Berlin Decree, which declared the British Islands in a state of blockade, though not followed by regulations to that effect, still threatened an intended operation on the high seas; this, if carried into effect, would be a flagrant violation of the neutral rights of the United States, and as such they would be bound to oppose it. The Minister of the United States at Paris immediately applied for explanation on that subject; and the French Minister of Marine, on the 24th December, 1806—seven days before the date of the above mentioned note of the British Government—stated, in answer, that the Decree made no alteration in the regulations then observed in France with regard to neutral navigation, or to the commercial convention of the United States with France; that the declaration of the British Islands being in a state of blockade did not change the existing French laws concerning maritime captures; and that American vessels could not be taken at sea for the mere reason of their being going to, or returning from, an English port.

The execution of the Decree comported for several months with those explanations: several vessels were arrested for having introduced articles of English manufacture or growth, and among them, some which, being actually from England, and laden with English colonial produce, had entered with forged papers, as if coming from the United States. But no alteration of the first construction given by the French Government took place until the month of September, 1807. The first condemnation on the principle that the Decree subjected neutral vessels to capture on the high seas, was that of the Horizon, on the 10th of October following. Prior to that time there could have been no acquiescence in a decree infringing the neutral rights of the United States, because, till that time it was explained, and, what was more important, executed in such manner as not to infringe those rights—because, until then no such infraction had taken place. The Ministers of the United States at London, at the request of the British Minister, communicated to him on the 18th October, 1807, the substance of the explanations received, and of the manner in which the Decree was executed; for they were at that time ignorant of the change which had taken place.

It was on the 18th of September, 1807, that a new construction of the decree took place; an instruction having on that day been transmitted to the Council of Prizes by the Minister of Justice, by which that court was informed, that French armed vessels were authorized, under that decree, to seize without exception, in neutral vessels, either English property or merchandise of English growth or manufacture. An immediate explanation having been asked from the French Minister of Foreign Relations, he confirmed, in his answer of the 7th of October, 1807, the determination of his Government to adopt that construction. Its first application took place on the 10th of the same month, in the case of the Horizon, of which the Minister of the United States was not informed until the month of November; and on the 12th of that month, he presented a spirited remonstrance against that infraction of the neutral rights of the United States. He had, in the meantime, transmitted to America an instruction to the Council of Prizes of the 18th of September. This was received on the — of December; and a copy of the decision in the case of the Horizon, having at the same time reached Government, the President, aware of the consequences which would follow that new state of things, communicated immediately to Congress the alteration of the French Decrees, and recommended the embargo, which was accordingly laid on the 22d of December, 1807; at which time it was well understood, in this country, that the British Orders of Council, of November preceding, had issued, although they were not officially communicated to our Government.

On the 11th of that month those orders did actually issue, declaring that all the ports of France, of her allies, and of any other country at war with England, and all other ports of Europe, from which, although not at war with England, the British flag was excluded, should thenceforth be considered as if the same were actually blockaded; that all trade in articles of the produce or manufactures of the said countries, should be deemed unlawful; and that every vessel trading from or to the said countries, together with all goods and merchandise on board, and also all articles of the produce or manufacture of the said countries, should be liable to capture and condemnation.

These orders cannot be defended on the ground of their being intended as retaliating on account of the Berlin Decree, as construed, and uniformly executed from its date to the 18th September, 1807, its construction and execution having till then infringed no neutral rights. For certainly the monstrous doctrine will not be asserted even by the British Government, that neutral nations are bound to resist, not only the acts of belligerent Powers which violate their rights, but also those municipal regulations, which, however they may injure the enemy, are lawful and do not affect the legitimate rights of the neutral. The only retaliation to be used in such cases, must be such as will operate on the enemy without infringing the rights of the neutral. If solely intended as a retaliation on the Berlin Decrees, as executed prior to the month of September, the British Orders of Council should have been confined to forbidding the introduction into Great Britain of French or enemy's merchandise, and the admission into British ports of neutral vessels coming from a French or other enemy's port. Instead the ground of retaliation on account of any culpable acquiescence of neutrals in decrees violating their rights, is abandoned by the very tenor of the orders; their operations being extended to those countries from which the British flag was excluded, such as Austria, although such countries were neither at war with Great Britain, nor had passed any decree in any way affecting or connected with neutral rights.

Nor are the orders justifiable on the pretence of an acquiescence on the part of the United States in the French Decree, as construed and executed subsequent to the 18th September, 1807, when it became an evident infraction of their rights, and such as they were bound to oppose. For their Minister at Paris immediately made the necessary remonstrances; and the orders were issued not only without having ascertained whether the United States would acquiesce in the injurious alteration of the French Decree, but more than one month before that alteration was known in America. It may even be asserted that the alteration was not known in England when the Orders of Council were issued; the instruction of the 18th September, 1807, which gave the new and injurious construction, not having been promulgated in France, and its first publication having been made in December, 1807, and by the American Government itself.

The British Orders of Council are, therefore, unjustifiable on the principle of retaliation, even giving to that principle all the latitude which has ever been avowedly contended for. They are in open violation of the solemn declaration made by the British Ministers in December, 1806: that retaliation on the part of Great Britain would depend on the execution of an unlawful decree, and on the acquiescence of neutral nations in such infraction of their rights. And they were also issued, notwithstanding the official communication made by the Ministers of the United States, that the French Decree was construed and executed so as not to infringe their neutral rights, and without any previous notice or intimation denying the correctness of that statement.

The Berlin Decree as expounded and executed subsequent to the 18th September, 1807, and the British Orders of Council of the 11th November ensuing, are therefore, as they respect the United States, contemporaneous aggressions of the belligerent Powers, equally unprovoked and equally indefensible on the presumed ground of acquiescence. These, together with the Milan Decree, of December, 1807, which filled the measure, would, on the principle of self-defence, have justified immediate hostilities against both nations on the part of the United States. They thought it more eligible, in the first instance, by withdrawing their vessels from the ocean, to avoid war, at least, for a season, and at the same time, to snatch their immense and defenceless commerce from impending destruction.

Another appeal has, in the meantime, been made, under the authority vested in the President for that purpose, to the justice and true interest of France and England. The proposition made by the United States and the arguments urged by their Ministers are before Congress. By these, the very pretext of the illegal edicts was removed and it is evident, that a revocation, by either nation, on the ground on which it was asked, either must have produced, what both pretended to have in view—a restoration of the freedom of commerce and of the acknowledged principles of the law of nations;—or, in case of refusal by the other belligerent, would have carried into effect, in the most efficient manner, the ostensible object of the edicts, and made the United States a party in the war against him. The effort has been ineffectual. The propositions have been actually rejected by one of the belligerent Powers, and remain unanswered by the other. In that state of things, what course ought the United States to pursue? Your committee can perceive no other alternative, but abject and degrading submission; war with both nations; or a continuance and enforcement of the present suspension of commerce.

The first cannot require any discussion. But the pressure of the embargo, so sensibly felt, and the calamities inseparable from a state of war, naturally create a wish that some middle course might be discovered, which should avoid the evils of both, and not be inconsistent with national honor and independence. That illusion must be dissipated; and it is necessary that the people of the United States should fully understand the situation in which they are placed.

There is no other alternative, but war with both nations, or a continuance of the present system. For war with one of the belligerents only, would be submission to the edicts and will of the other; and a repeal in whole or in part of the embargo must necessarily be war or submission.

A general repeal without arming, would be submission to both nations.

A general repeal and arming of our merchant vessels, would be war with both, and war of the worst kind; suffering our enemies to plunder us without retaliation upon them.

A partial repeal must, from the situation of Europe, necessarily be actual submission to one of the aggressors, and war with the other.

The last position is the only one on which there can be any doubt; and it will be most satisfactorily demonstrated by selecting among the several modifications which might be suggested, that which may on first view appear the least exceptionable—a proposition to repeal the embargo, so far only as relates to those Powers which have not passed or do not execute any decrees injurious to the neutral rights of the United States.

It is said that the adoption of that proposition would restore our commerce with the native Powers of Asia and Africa, and with Spain, Portugal, Sweden, and Russia. Let this be taken for granted, although the precise line of conduct now pursued by most of those nations, in relation to the United States, is not correctly ascertained. So far as relates to any advantages which would result from that measure, if confined to its ostensible object, it will be sufficient to observe that the exports of articles of domestic produce of the United States, during the year ending the 30th September, 1807, amounted to $48,700,000, and that the portion exported to the countries above enumerated, falls short of seven millions; an amount too inconsiderable, when compared with the bulk of our exports, to deserve attention, even if a question affecting the independence of the nation was to be decided by considerations of immediate profit.

But the true effect of the proposition would be to open an indirect trade with Great Britain, which, through St. Bartholomew and Havana, Lisbon, Cadiz, or Gottenburg, would receive, at prices reduced by glutted markets and for want of competition, all the provisions, raw materials for her manufactures, and other articles, which she may want. Whether she would be satisfied with that favorable state of things, or whether, considering that boon as a pledge of unqualified submission, she would, according to the tenor of her orders, interrupt our scanty commerce with Russia, and occasionally, under some new pretext, capture rather than purchase the cargoes intended for her own use, is equally uncertain and unimportant. Nor can it be doubted that a measure which would supply exclusively one of the belligerents, would be war with the other. Considered merely as a question of profit, it would be much more eligible at once to raise the embargo in relation to Great Britain, as we would then, at least, have the advantages of a direct market with the consumer. But the proposition can only be defended on the ground that France is the only aggressor, and that, having no just reason to complain of England, it is our duty to submit to her orders. On that inadmissible supposition, it would not only be more candid, but also a more dignified, as well as more advantageous course, openly to join England, and make war against France. The object would be clearly understood, an ally would be obtained, and the measure of submission might be better palliated.

It appears unnecessary to pursue any farther the examination of propositions, which the difficult situation of the United States could alone have suggested, and which will prove more inadmissible or impracticable as the subject is more thoroughly investigated. The alternative is painful; it is between a continued suspension of commerce, and war with both England and France. But the choice must ultimately be made between the two; and it is important that we should be prepared for either the one or the other.

The aggressions of England and France, collectively, affecting almost the whole of our commerce, and persisted in, notwithstanding repeated remonstrances, explanations, and propositions the most candid and unexceptionable, are, to all intents and purposes, a maritime war waged by both nations against the United States. It cannot be denied that the ultimate and only effectual mode of resisting that warfare, if persisted in, is war. A permanent suspension of commerce, after repeated and unavailing efforts to obtain peace, would not properly be resistance; it would be withdrawing from the contest, and abandoning our indisputable right freely to navigate the ocean. The present unsettled state of the world, the extraordinary situation in which the United States are placed, and the necessity, if war be resorted to, of making it at the same time against both nations, and these the two most powerful of the world, are the principal causes of hesitation. There would be none in resorting to that remedy, however calamitous, if a selection could be made on any principle of justice, or without a sacrifice of national independence.

On a question of such difficulty, involving the most important interests of the Union, and which has not, perhaps, until lately, been sufficiently considered, your committee think the House alone competent to pronounce a decisive opinion; and they have, in this report, confined themselves to an exposition of the subject, and to such introductory resolutions, as will be equally applicable to either alternative. The first of these, being merely declaratory of a determination not to submit to foreign aggressions, may, perhaps, at first view, appear superfluous. It is, however, believed by the committee, that a pledge by the Representatives of the nation, that they will not abandon its essential rights, will not at this critical moment be unacceptable. The misapprehensions which seem to have existed, and the misrepresentations which have been circulated, respecting the state of our foreign relations, render also such declaration expedient. And it may not be useless that every foreign nation should understand, that its aggressions never will be justified or encouraged by any description of American citizens. For the question for every citizen now is, whether he will rally round the Government of his choice, or enlist under foreign banners! Whether he will be for his country, or against his country?

The committee respectfully submit the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That the United States cannot, without a sacrifice of their rights, honor, and independence, submit to the late edicts of Great Britain and France.
2. Resolved, That it is expedient to prohibit, by law, the admission into the ports of the United States of all public or private, armed or unarmed, ships or vessels belonging to Great Britain or France, or to any other of the belligerent Powers, having in force orders or decrees violating the lawful commerce and neutral rights of the United States; and also the importation of any goods, wares, or merchandise, the growth, produce or manufacture of the dominions of any of the said Powers, or imported from any place in the possession of either.

3. Resolved, That measures ought to be immediately taken for placing the country in a more complete state of defence.

Five thousand copies of the report were ordered to be printed for the use of the members of both Houses of Congress.

ADDITIONAL REVENUE CUTTERS.

Mr. NEWTON called for the order of the day on the bill authorizing the President to employ twelve additional revenue cutters.

Mr. QUINCY stated that he had no objection to the immediate discussion of the subject, any farther than he thought it would forestall the more important questions which were to be debated upon. He alluded to the resolutions for the repeal of the embargo laws, &c.

The SPEAKER told the gentleman that the merits of the bill were not now before the House.

It was Mr. QUINCY's intention, (he continued,) to make a motion; and, if in order, he would move that the consideration of the bill be postponed.

The SPEAKER said the motion would have been in order had it been the first made; but, as that of the gentleman from Virginia had been previously submitted, it would of course be first put. The question was then taken upon Mr. NEWTON's motion, and carried—yeas 66, nays 29.

The House having resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole,

Mr. NEWTON rose to state that the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures had understood, from the proper authorities, there was a necessity, for the proper execution of the revenue laws, that the force under the direction of the Treasury Department should be considerably increased.

Mr. BLACKLEDGE remarked, that the cutters proposed to be built were necessary, not only the better to enforce our embargo laws, but, to the proper execution of those for the regulation of the revenue. He informed gentlemen that there was but one revenue cutter in the whole State of Georgia. Mr. B. hoped the Committee would agree to the bill then before them.

Mr. DANA inquired whether any written information touching the necessity there might be for twelve revenue cutters had been received by the Committee—any letter from the Secretary of the Treasury? He thought it was necessary, if so, that it should be submitted to the House.

Mr. NEWTON replied that there had been no written communication from the proper Department to the Committee. They had not thought it essential, having also understood that the Secretary of the Treasury was particularly occupied. However, he had taken the shortest method, by waiting upon the Secretary himself, and had received the information before alluded to. He had understood that the probable expense of each cutter would be about $10,000, or, $120,000 for the whole. Each cutter to carry about twenty men.

Mr. QUINCY thought that the correct mode of proceeding would require other than mere verbal information. Respect for themselves should induce gentlemen not to act without official communication upon the subject. They could not, upon any other conditions, agree to so great an augmentation of the force under the direction of the Treasury Department. There had, heretofore, been but ten cutters employed. There were never more than ten when commerce was at its height and the revenue flourishing. But now, the House was called upon to vote twelve additional cutters, when we are without revenue, without commerce, and there is no information of an official nature before the House, upon which it might act.

Mr. NEWTON could not see that it was of any consequence to the House, whether there had been a written communication to it upon the subject, so that the information came through the proper organ, from the proper authority. It was necessary, in times of difficulty like the present, to act with spirit and promptitude. The laws should be executed with the greatest strictness; and it was always wise to take time by the forelock.

Mr. ELLIOT had always been opposed to this mode of legislation. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. NEWTON) had stated it to be of no consequence whether the House had written information upon the object of the bill, so that the communication had been made through the proper organ. Did the gentleman mean to call himself the proper organ of communication? If the gentleman did, he was willing to consider him as such. Let him then enter into a little detail, and show to the House the necessity there exists for the erection of twelve additional revenue cutters. It might be recollected that, upon a former occasion, when the building of a number of gunboats was proposed as a system of national defence, there had been a communication in writing made to them. The President did not take upon himself the responsibility of the measure. Before they were called upon to vote, they had found upon the table the necessary information from the Secretary of the Navy. Here had, indeed, been a communication through the proper organ, but it came in writing. And, as it had been obtained in that case, he hoped it would also be obtained in the present one. He wished to know where the necessity appeared for the increase of cutters proposed by the bill, for it surely could not arise from any increase in the revenue of the United States. Mr. E. was not at all satisfied that they were wanted, and, until further information was had, must vote against the bill.

Mr. NEWTON did not intend to reply to the gentleman last up, on his cavilling respecting the proper organ of communication. He, however, did consider himself, in the present case, as the proper organ. If the House had received any information from the Treasury Department itself, it would have been found, he believed, to contain nothing further than he himself had detailed. Mr. N. then moved that the Committee rise and report the bill.

Mr. BLACKLEDGE made some observations in support of the bill, but they were not distinctly heard.

Mr. DESHA was of opinion that the consideration of the bill ought for a short time to be postponed, until the House could see whether the embargo laws would be repealed. Should those laws be rescinded, the cutters proposed to be built would be found to be unnecessary. He confessed that, without any official information, and until the great questions before the House should be decided, he felt a reluctance to vote upon the present bill. He, therefore, should move that the Committee rise and report progress.

Mr. UPHAM also hoped for a postponement of the subject. For his own part, he could not understand whether these cutters were wanted for the purpose of more effectually enforcing the embargo laws, or to prevent infractions of the revenue laws. As far as respects information, he thought himself entitled to know for what he was voting away money.

Mr. MOSELY said it seemed extraordinary to vote for the building of additional revenue cutters, when, in fact, there existed no revenue. Certainly the name of them should be changed, and, instead of revenue, they should be called embargo cutters. It appeared to him that there would soon be more pressing calls for public money. The question should, in his opinion, be postponed.

Mr. BLACKLEDGE said that the expense of building the cutters would be defrayed by the detection of goods attempted to be smuggled. There had, already, been many condemnations. They were taking place every day. And it was to support the laws that these cutters had been called for.

On the motion of Mr. NEWTON, that the Committee rise and report the bill, it was carried—yeas 47, nays 46.

And, on a motion that the House should consider the report of the Committee of the Whole,

Mr. PITKIN moved that it be postponed until Monday next. The reasons for the adoption of the bill, as given by the gentleman from North Carolina, were the protection that would thus be afforded in the collection of the revenue, and the more strict enforcement of the embargo laws. But, shall we be at the expense of $120,000 without knowing, when the cutters are built, if they will then be wanted? They might, probably, be necessary if the House intended to continue the embargo laws and adopt the non-intercourse restrictions. He, however, wished first to know the result of these questions.

Mr. LIVERMORE was in favor of a postponement of the subject. Nothing could be lost by a short delay. To use the expression of the gentleman from Virginia, it was certainly prudent to take time by the forelock, and it was his wish to do so in regard to the information upon the subject, which was to be desired. It certainly would be better to wait, to see whether the measure was necessary. The gentleman had stated that each cutter will cost about $10,000; but, may he not be in error? This would not be the first time that a gentleman had been mistaken in his calculations. The cutters would, in his opinion, cost much more than the sum specified. They may probably cost $15,000 a-piece. Every gentleman had a right to call for information from the proper source. He asked where the great necessity could be shown for these vessels. For what purpose are Secretaries appointed if they cannot be called upon to yield the information to this House which many thought necessary? Such information had been so called for, and he wished to know from an official source what sum the cutters proposed to be built would cost. Should it turn out that these cutters would not be wanted, or that a much greater sum than had been contemplated was expended in building them, can we account to the nation and our constituents for it? Shall we tell them we did not know—but, that the Chairman of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures told us so; telling us, at the same time, that he had it from the Secretary of the Treasury? But, has the President of the United States told us that these vessels were necessary? He has not. Mr. L. repeated that every gentleman upon that floor had a right to call for information. He should not vote for this bill unless the House had resolved to continue the embargo laws and pass a non-intercourse resolution. These great questions, he hoped, had not been prejudged, and decided upon beforehand. Certainly, if the embargo be repealed, it will, at least, be doubtful whether these cutters will be requisite; and there has not yet been information enough to convince the House that they ought to vote away the money.

Mr. NEWTON declared that he had no wish to precipitate any measure, and would be the last in urging the too hasty consideration of a question. The gentleman last up, has told the House that these revenue cutters are not wanting—that, in fact, there is no revenue. Others have talked about embargo cutters. It is true there is a resolution upon the table for the repeal of the embargo laws, but, these laws are not yet repealed. Let gentlemen recollect that they are still in existence, and if we do enact laws, it is our duty to see that they are enforced. He appealed to gentlemen whether information had not been made public of the intention of many British merchants to smuggle goods into our country, the importation of which our laws prohibited; and to the good sense of the House for the propriety of supporting the measures of Government and the sovereignty of the country. He would state to the House that there was, in Georgia, not a single revenue cutter.

Mr. LIVERMORE said that he did not deny the necessity there might be for employing the twelve additional cutters. He only said that he was not convinced of the necessity. For his part, he had heard of no smuggling but from Canada.

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, thought the consideration of the bill ought not to be postponed. The laws which we have passed have been most shamefully violated. So long as we have laws, we ought to see that they are rigidly enforced. Gentlemen tell us we ought not to act with precipitation. Sir, we have travelled a snail's pace in comparison with those miscreants who have violated, and are planning violations of your embargo laws. It appeared as if gentleman had agreed to create delays by long speeches about nothing. But he trusted the majority would not be driven from the ground which they had taken, and from the opinions he had heard expressed, he was convinced that a respectable majority of that House had determined against a repeal of the embargo laws. As to the talk about information, he had supposed there was information enough among the gentlemen of that House to ascertain the probable expense of building a revenue cutter.

Mr. DANA apprehended the question to be, whether we should deviate from the usual mode of proceeding? whether or not we shall dispense with official information to which we are undoubtedly entitled? It is the duty of the Executive to give us such information in an official form, upon all objects falling within the business of the department under his control. There has been heretofore but ten revenue cutters employed, and now we are called upon to double the amount. But the Secretary of the Treasury should tell us in an official manner, that the addition is necessary, and let the responsibility rest with the Treasury Department. He wished not to be understood as intending the slightest disrespect to the Chairman of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, or in the least as doubting the information of that gentleman. Yet he thought it always the better method, as the House had an unquestionable right to have official information, to adopt the usual course. The duty peculiarly belongs to the Secretary of the Treasury, and we should always have it from himself, unless upon such trivial subjects as did not merit serious consideration. Let us inquire if the expense of building these cutters is too trivial to merit this consideration. The gentleman from Virginia had supposed that there was information enough in the House to ascertain the price of twelve revenue cutters. But as they might vary in size; and the price was regulated by tonnage, it would be rather difficult. He really thought it would puzzle the most able seaman in the United States to tell the expense of building a vessel, the size of which he was unacquainted with. But the cost had been rated at $120,000, and that was certainly worthy of consideration. If the cutters should not be wanted, it would be throwing as much money away as would defray the expenses of that House during the session, and that to gentlemen would assuredly be worthy of consideration. He was always willing to provide for the proper protection of the revenue, but did not think we were always safe in passing laws without having the necessary information; he believed it the better course to have it. And as the present case was not very urgent, would vote to obtain the regular official information.

Mr. ALSTON observed that this was the old story; it was impossible to take a single step without motions for delay. Let gentlemen reflect on certain laws passed at the last session of Congress, and on the object of the bill now before them, and they would find that the power was left discretionary with the President to employ the cutters or to let it alone. If he does not find them to be necessary, he is not bound to have the cutters built. On this subject there can be no benefit derived from waiting for further information. Gentlemen have talked about the repeal of the embargo laws, the passage of a non-intercourse bill, &c. Mr. A. declared this was the first time in all his life that he had ever heard such an argument urged. It was the first time he had understood that we should wait in passing laws to protect our revenue, until a motion for the repeal of certain other laws had been acted upon.

Mr. UPHAM perfectly agreed with the gentleman, that whatever laws were in force, ought to be strictly executed. But he stated his conviction that a majority of the people of the United States had expected that the embargo laws would be repealed at the beginning of the present session of Congress. That had been his own honest opinion. He was doubtful whether these cutters were wanted at all or not; but if they were, and it was determined at all events to enforce the embargo laws, why not come up to the main question at once? The regular way would be to decide that great question first.

Mr. NEWTON rose to request the House to attend to the course which this discussion had taken. Gentlemen had called for information, but at the same time had manifested a disposition, if they had that information, not to cease their opposition to the continuance of the embargo laws. They had told us repeatedly that our seamen were in want, yet when a bill is brought forward to provide for those seamen they are foremost in opposing it.

Mr. DANA thought that if our seamen could have no other provision made for their support, this would scarcely answer the name. Ten revenue cutters to provide for sixty thousand seamen! Or taking half the number usually employed in the commerce of the United States, say thirty thousand, and ten revenue cutters are to provide for them! Really, sir, and how many men must one of these cutters carry? Our seamen were less respectable than he thought them, if they could be provided for in this way. For supposing each of these vessels to carry twenty men, or even one to every ton, it would not do. They could not then talk of dealing out half allowances, or the fiftieth hundredth part of an allowance, nay, a thousandth part. As it respected the revenue of the United States, when information was laid before the House, he could then judge for himself. If this force be necessary for securing the revenue of the United States, it would be absurd to deny the responsible officer the means of doing his duty. But if it was intended for an inhibition of revenue, instead of protection, he should not vote for it until the main question was decided. He wished first to know the stand which would then be taken.

Mr. QUINCY said that the argument drawn from a want of information, was not the strongest which might be urged against the consideration of the bill, for there had been none sufficient to convince the House that the twelve cutters mentioned in the bill would be enough for the purpose of enforcing the embargo and non-intercourse laws. Perhaps it might be thought necessary at this time to have official information, that we might act intelligibly. Gentleman say that our laws are violated, and that they must be carried into more complete effect; but if the laws are entirely done away, surely the House will not vote the twelve additional cutters. He hoped, therefore, that the House would not thus indiscreetly decide upon so important a question.

Mr. LLOYD asked what possible difference there could be between a decision now or on Monday? If it is necessary to act immediately, why not send out our armed vessels? They could surely be got ready before vessels which were yet to be built. And if the embargo was to be continued, he trusted these cutters were not the only means contemplated to enforce it, for it was desirable that it be made to operate equally on the honest and dishonest. If the embargo laws were repealed, he hoped the nation would have recourse to something more efficient than revenue cutters. It was Mr. L.'s wish to see the stand which might be taken before he could vote.

Mr. PITKIN remarked that he would not have made the motion had he thought it would have brought on a discussion. But a delay of the present bill was not a delay of the main question. He had not been one of those who had contributed to that delay. It would, however, be recollected, that the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. ALSTON) had voted with those who had promoted that delay. Mr. P. was anxious that the main question should be acted upon before the collateral one was taken up. When that one had been decided, this one would of course come on.

The yeas and nays were here called for.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS believed that the object of the gentleman from Connecticut was not to delay the consideration of the bill before the House. He hoped that gentleman was incapable of it. Would not, then, his wishes be met, by again referring the bill to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures? For there were no good reasons why the consideration of the bill should be postponed until Monday. Postpone it until Monday, and what do you gain by it? You are exactly where you were when you set out. By recommitting the bill to the committee which reported it, information could by it be obtained in an official form. If the gentleman would so vary his motion, he would vote for it with pleasure

There were many reasons in support of this mode of proceeding, in preference to its postponement. He then moved a recommitment.

Mr. DANA said the motion perfectly met his wish. He believed it accorded with the object of every remark which he had made upon the subject.

Mr. PITKIN had no objection to a recommitment.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS hoped the House would agree to a recommitment, as it would be observed, by the bill before them, not one revenue cutter could be obtained, there not being any specific appropriation for that purpose. And by the laws providing for the collection of the revenue, no appropriation had been made which could meet the expense. [Mr. W. here quoted the part of the laws which relate to this subject.] He then remarked that the House never had considered the moneys alluded to in these laws as an appropriation for a purpose like the present. Should the House recommit the bill, the committee, no doubt, would take good care to amend it in that respect.

Mr. NEWTON replied that this question occurred to him when he drew the bill. But he had found upon inquiry, that any expense incurred in the way proposed, was immediately charged to these laws. He here quoted the laws, and contended, that as soon as the bill was passed, the President, under them, was authorized to build the cutters. What was the object of the recommitment? If his construction of the law was right, there was no necessity for delay. In times like these, it is requisite we should be prepared for action. He added, that owing to our great extent of coast these cutters were absolutely necessary to prevent violations of the revenue laws.

The question on recommitment was then taken, and carried—ayes 61, noes 55.

WEDNESDAY, November 23.

Mr. JEREMIAH MORROW presented petitions from sundry inhabitants of the State of Ohio, respectively praying that the forfeitures of interest which may have been incurred on the instalments due for the purchase of lands of the United States by the petitioners, may be remitted; and that the time for completing the payment of the purchase money for the said lands may be extended to such length of time as Congress, in their wisdom, may deem proper—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, that so much of the report of the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred a memorial of the House of Representatives of the Mississippi Territory, made and ordered to lie on the table on the twenty-first instant, as is contained in the last resolution submitted by the committee, be recommitment to the same committee; and the question being taken thereupon, it passed in the negative.

On motion of Mr. JEREMIAH MORROW, the said report was referred to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

THURSDAY, November 24.

Another member, to wit: BARENT GARDENIER, from New York appeared, and took his seat in the House.

Mr. LEWIS, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, presented a bill authorizing the proprietors of squares and lots in the City of Washington, to have the same subdivided and admitted to record; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

Mr. CLOPTON, from the Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business, to whom it was referred to examine such laws of the United States as have expired, or are near expiring, and require to be revived, or further continued, made a report, in part, thereupon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

FRIDAY, November 25.

Mr. GARDENIER presented several petitions from the inhabitants of Ontario county, New York, praying for the repeal of the embargo laws.—Referred to the committee on Mr. CHITTENDEN'S resolution.

PRESIDENT'S PROCLAMATION.

Mr. ELLIOT observed, that there was more than one precedent on the Journals of the House, of cases in which copies of Proclamations of the President of the United States had been called for. At the last session the House had called for a copy of the Proclamation interdicting British ships from our waters. Therefore, in order to add another link to the chain of documents respecting the execution of the embargo laws, he wished to call for the Proclamation alluded to by his colleague, who had offered a resolution on the subject of the embargo.

Mr. E. then offered the following resolution, which was agreed to without opposition:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the House a copy of a Proclamation issued in April last, in consequence of the opposition to the embargo laws near Lake Champlain."

Mr. ELLIOT and Mr. DESHA were appointed a Committee to present the resolution to the President of the United States.

THE EMBARGO.

Mr. MACON said he had some time ago moved three resolutions, two of which had been agreed to, and the third ordered to lie on the table, on the suggestion of some gentlemen, that it would interfere with a resolution already referred. He had waited thus long that a decision might be had on the resolution alluded to (Mr. CHITTENDEN'S.) Several unsuccessful attempts having been made to get that up, he now moved for the consideration of his resolution, in the following words:

Resolved, That the same committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the act laying an embargo, and the several acts supplemental and additional thereto."

The resolution was taken up, and agreed to without opposition.

CLOSED DOORS.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he was very sorry to be compelled by a sense of duty again to close the doors of the House, but he had a motion to make, which could not, agreeably to the rules and orders of the House, be made with the galleries open.

The doors were accordingly closed, and so remained for two hours, when they were opened.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee of Claims favorable to the petition of the inhabitants of Knox county, Kentucky; which was concurred in, reported to the House, by whom it was also agreed to, and the House then adjourned till Monday.

MONDAY, November 28.

Another member, to wit: MATTHEW LYON, from Kentucky, appeared and took his seat in the House.

Mr. HOLMES, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of certain persons therein mentioned. (certain citizens of Knox county, Kentucky) which was twice read and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

DISABLED SOLDIERS.

Mr. NELSON said he would make no apology for offering to the House the following resolution. It was on a subject which required no apology, and with which the House was sufficiently acquainted to render any preface unnecessary.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of making provision by law for the relief of the infirm, disabled, and superannuated officers and soldiers of the late Revolutionary Army and of the present Army of the United States; and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The resolution was agreed to without opposition, and Mr. NELSON, Mr. SAY, Mr. BLOUNT, Mr. RICHARD JACKSON, and Mr. JOHN SMITH, were appointed the committee.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

On motion of Mr. CAMPBELL, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the committee on the subject of our foreign relations.

The first resolution, in the following words, having been read:

Resolved, That the United States cannot, without a sacrifice of their rights, honor and independence, submit to the late edicts of Great Britain and France:

Mr. CAMPBELL opened the debate. He said that ill health had hitherto prevented and might hereafter prevent him from giving that attention to the subject which the all-important crisis would seem to require; it was, however, his duty to bring the subject before the House. The committee having in their report presented to the House the view in which they had considered the subject referred to them, and the reasons generally which induced them to present these resolutions to the House, he said it was not his intention at this time to enter into a discussion of their merits. Those reasons had been deemed sufficient by the committee to justify them in presenting these resolutions to the House; and as the objections to this, if any there were, could not be foreseen, he would not attempt to anticipate them. According to the view which he himself had taken of the first resolution, it could require no discussion, it was too clear to require demonstration, and too self-evident to need proof of its propriety. It might indeed seem to require an apology from the committee for presenting a proposition which every American must long since have determined for himself. When the question had been first presented to his consideration, it had appeared to him that it was totally superfluous, and to be doing little more than announcing to the world that the United States were still independent; but on further consideration, it had been deemed by the select committee of some importance that in the present critical situation of the United States, they should fix on some point at which all would meet. After a perusal of the documents laid before the House at the opening of the session, Mr. C. said it had been supposed that no one would hesitate in declaring his indignation at the flagrant violations and encroachments on our rights by the belligerent Powers, while it had been supposed that some difference of opinion might exist as to the mode of resistance. After it was once determined that they would not submit, that they would repel aggression, it had been supposed that they might with greater probability of unanimity discuss the course proper to be pursued. With a view to this the committee had presented this resolution to the House. It was expected that all would unite in it and prove to the world that the Representatives of every portion of the American people were determined to maintain their rights, for the belligerent Powers really seemed to suppose that the American people had forgotten them, and had therefore assumed the right of prescribing the course of conduct which we should pursue. To submit to regulations of foreign Powers, which limited the conduct of the American people and prescribed the rules by which they were to be governed, which pointed out the very ports to which they should or should not go, which fixed the tribute or tax which they should pay, would be not only to abandon their dignity and honor, but to surrender, shamefully surrender our independence. Mr. C. said he would not take up the time of the Committee in showing that the Orders of Council of Great Britain and the Decrees of France, were, on the part of those nations, an assumption of power to give laws to this country, in direct violation of our neutral rights, and an encroachment on our sovereignty. This would require no argument. The real question is, said he, shall we govern ourselves or be controlled by the will of others, shall we become tributary or not, shall we submit or be independent? And to the Committee he cheerfully left the decision of this question.

Mr. MUMFORD next addressed the Committee of the Whole. He observed that although he had the honor of being one of the Committee of Foreign Relations who framed the report under consideration, he dissented from that report in some respects. We had now arrived at a momentous crisis in the affairs of our country, and he hoped the House would deliberate with that firmness and moderation which became the Representatives of the free and independent people they had the honor to represent on this all interesting concern. However they might differ on smaller points of minor importance, yet when the best interest of the country was at stake he hoped they would unite in some mode to secure our rights and promote the interests of the United States. The proposition which he had the honor to move a few days ago, was consonant in some degree to the instructions offered by our Ministers to Great Britain and France, offering to remove the embargo in relation to either, that should rescind their obnoxious decrees. Neither of them having receded, Mr. M. said he would continue the embargo in relation to them both. Nay, further, he would inflict the severest penalties on any one who should receive a license or voluntarily pay tribute to either of them. He considered them both alike. He wished to see the country placed in a complete posture of defence; but he could not see any good reason why we should not trade with those nations who were willing to receive us on friendly terms, and to trade with us on the principles of reciprocity and mutual interests. This would not compromise the honor of the nation. Even admitting that it might possibly lead to war, which he doubted, he was convinced that the citizens of this country would rise en masse in support of that commerce which neither France nor England had any right to interdict. He did presume, with all the zeal of some gentlemen for irritating measures, it was not seriously contemplated to declare war against all mankind; he was for having at least a few friends in case of need. What was our situation now? The President of the United States had told them, after speaking of France and England, that "our relations with the other Powers of Europe had undergone no material change since the last session." This being the case, our commerce was open with them all except France and Great Britain and their dependencies.

Mr. M. said he was well aware that he should be told, if we permitted this commerce to those countries who were disposed to receive us on friendly terms, Great Britain and France would indirectly receive their supplies. He acknowledged this, in a certain degree, but his primary object was to relieve his own country. Where was the patriotic breast that did not beat in unison with the patriotic and valorous sons of Spain? Shall we refuse them a loaf of bread merely because we are afraid Great Britain and France might possibly cut a slice off as it passed along? Let us take a view of their whole conduct towards the United States, since their Revolution, which had been a series of good offices. They had immediately released our vessels which had been sequestered in the ports of Spain by the iron hand of the sot-disant Emperor of the West. Let us now turn to the New World. What has been the conduct of that Government erected by the friends of the Patriots in the Havana? More than fifty vessels had gone out, under the permission of the President, for the purpose of collecting debts due to them in that island. They have compelled their citizens to pay these debts, and the vessels have returned loaded to the United States, and contributed essentially to the revenue of the United States. Is this not truly characteristic of Castilian honor and generosity?

Mr. M. said, he considered the Revolution in Mexico as the most important era which had taken place since our glorious Revolution, which, in his opinion, would ultimately lead to securing our Southwestern boundary on a permanent footing; and but for the recent Revolution, New Orleans might even now have been in possession of France. When the question of slavery was agitated among the inhabitants of that place, it was not unusual for them to say of the United States, we care nothing about you—we shall soon have other governors. It was no doubt within the recollection of many members of this Committee, that a man had been lately taken up at Nacogdoches. He had not at the time taken much notice of the report—had considered it but a common newspaper report, or, as it might be called, a display of the arts of able editors—but there had a fact lately come to his knowledge which he conceived to be his bounden duty to give to the Committee. It had been communicated to him in such a confidential manner that he could not mention names; but love of country was with him paramount to every other consideration, and he would state the fact for the information of the Committee. A gentleman, said Mr. M.—an Italian by birth, of a noble family, and who was recommended in our Revolutionary war to General Washington, a man of genius—after having resided some time in the United States, returned to Europe, and was taken into favor by Bonaparte. At what time it is not known, but such a person was landed in some port of the Atlantic shores, and travelled from thence through your Western country. Some time in the month of June, information reached Louisiana that a French officer of distinction had a conference with Governor Grand Pré at Baton Rouge, which occasioned serious conjectures. No more was heard of him till the 21st July, when he passed over to the Spanish lines, wide off from the American post of Natchitoches. He there opened a trunk, and put on his regimentals, and proceeded to the Spanish port of Nacogdoches, where he was arrested by orders from the Spanish officers. It was presumed that the information of the Revolution of Spain had not reached him when travelling to the Westward. Thus, sir, while we have been threatened on the North, we have been treading on a precipice in the Southwest.

I will now proceed, said Mr. M., to give some details in respect to those countries which my motion contemplates. In the official report of the Secretary of the Treasury, we find the following Statement of Domestic and Foreign Exports :

Whither exported.	Domestic	Foreign.	Total.
Sweden and her West India colony - -	$476,656	$949,613	$1,422,369
Spain and colonies -	3,998,575	14,226,145	18,224,720
Portugal and colonies	1,399,616	297,900	1,687,516
Africa and Morocco -	377,282	1,061,616	2,439,898
China - -	84,022	113,253	197,280
South seas and N. W. coast of America -	14,162	98,199	122,361

The trade to Hayti may be considered, by examining the annual report from 1801 to 1802, to be about half the amount of the exports to the French islands, stated to be $6,710,889—half of which is $3,255,444. The greatest proportion of which consists in the productions of our own industry, as the Secretary at that time did not discriminate between foreign and domestic produce. We may, from the nature of the trade, pay about 10 per cent. on foreign productions.—Domestic, $3,000,000; foreign, $331,544; total, $3,315,444.

This, said Mr. M., will open a market for the produce of Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, and New Orleans—the Southern, Middle, and Eastern States—and give life and activity to commerce, so much desired by all classes of our citizens.

Mr. M. concluded by saying, that this was his view of the subject for the present. He said we were a young nation; and although he should not shrink from the contest, if necessary, yet it became us to act with precautionary steps. If he differed with gentlemen on this subject, it was an honest difference of opinion, and he had no other motive than a love of country.

Mr. QUINCY.—Mr. Chairman, I am not, in general, a friend to abstract legislation. Ostentatious declaration of general principles is so often the resort of weakness and of ignorance, it is so frequently the subterfuge of men who are willing to amuse, or who mean to delude the people, that it is with great reluctance I yield to such a course my sanction.

If, however, a formal annunciation of a determination to perform one of the most common and undeniable of national duties, be deemed by a majority of this House essential to their character, or to the attainment of public confidence, I am willing to admit that the one now offered is as unexceptionable as any it would be likely to propose.

In this view, however, I lay wholly out of sight the report of the committee by which it is accompanied and introduced. The course advocated in that report is, in my opinion, loathsome; the spirit it breathes disgraceful; the temper it is likely to inspire neither calculated to regain the rights we have lost, nor to preserve those which remain to us. It is an established maxim, that in adopting a resolution offered by a committee in this House, no member is pledged to support the reasoning, or made sponsor for the facts, which they have seen fit to insert in it. I exercise, therefore, a common right, when I subscribe to the resolution, not on the principles of the committee, but on those which obviously result from its terms, and are the plain meaning of its expressions.

I agree to this resolution, because, in my apprehension, it offers a solemn pledge to this nation—a pledge not to be mistaken, and not to be evaded—that the present system of public measures shall be totally abandoned. Adopt it, and there is an end of the policy of deserting our rights, under pretence of maintaining them. Adopt it, and we can no longer yield, at the beck of haughty belligerents, the right of navigating the ocean, that choice inheritance bequeathed to us by our fathers. Adopt it, and there is a termination of that base and abject submission, by which this country has for these eleven months been disgraced, and brought to the brink of ruin.

That the natural import and necessary implication of the terms of this resolution are such as I have suggested, will be apparent from a very transient consideration. What do its terms necessarily include? They contain an assertion and a pledge. The assertion is, that the edicts of Great Britain and France are contrary to our rights, honor, and independence. The pledge is, that we will not submit to them.

Concerning the assertion contained in this resolution I would say nothing, were it not that I fear those who have so long been in the habit of looking at the orders and decrees of foreign Powers as the measure of the rights of our own citizens, and been accustomed, in direct subserviency to them, of prohibiting commerce altogether, might apprehend that there was some lurking danger in such an assertion. They may be assured there can be nothing more harmless. Neither Great Britain nor France ever pretended that those edicts were consistent with American rights; on the contrary, both these nations ground those edicts on the principle of imperious necessity, which admits the injustice done at the very instant of executing the act of oppression. No gentleman need have any difficulty in screwing his courage up to this assertion. Neither of the belligerents will contradict it. Mr. Turreau and Mr. Erskine will both of them countersign the declaration to-morrow.

With respect to the pledge contained in this resolution, understood according to its true import, it is a glorious one. It opens new prospects. It promises a change in the disposition of this House. It is a solemn assurance to the nation that it will no longer submit to these edicts. It remains for us, therefore, to consider what submission is, and what the pledge not to submit implies.

One man submits to the order, decree, or edict of another, when he does that thing which such order, decree, or edict commands; or when he omits to do that thing which such order, decree, or edict prohibits. This, then, is submission. It is to take the will of another as the measure of our rights. It is to yield to his power—to go where he directs, or to refrain from going where he forbids us.

If this be submission, then the pledge not to submit implies the reverse of all this. It is a solemn declaration that we will not do that thing, which such order, decree, or edict commands, or that we will do what it prohibits. This, then, is freedom. This is honor. This is independence. It consists in taking the nature of things, and not the will of another, as the measure of our rights. What God and Nature has offered us we will enjoy, in despite of the commands, regardless of the menaces of iniquitous power.

Let us apply these correct and undeniable principles to the edicts of Great Britain and France, and the consequent abandonment of the ocean by the American Government. The decrees of France prohibit us from trading with Great Britain. The orders of Great Britain prohibit us from trading with France. And what do we? Why, in direct subserviency to the edicts of each, we prohibit our citizens from trading with either. We do more; as if unqualified submission was not humiliating enough, we descend to an act of supererogation in servility; we abandon trade altogether; we not only refrain from that particular trade which their respective edicts prescribe, but, lest the ingenuity of our merchants should enable them to evade their operations, to make submission doubly sure, the American Government virtually re-enact the edicts of the belligerents and abandon all the trade which, notwithstanding the practical effects of their edicts, remain to us. The same conclusion will result, if we consider our embargo in relation to the objects of this belligerent policy. France, by her edicts, would compress Great Britain by destroying her commerce and cutting off her supplies. All the Continent of Europe, in the hand of Bonaparte, is made subservient to this policy. The embargo law of the United States, in its operation, is an union with this Continental coalition against British commerce, at the very moment most auspicious to its success. Can anything be more in direct subserviency to the views of the French Emperor? If we consider the orders of Great Britain, the result will be the same. I proceed at present on the supposition of a perfect impartiality in our Administration towards both belligerents, so far as relates to the embargo law. Great Britain had two objects in issuing her orders. First, to excite discontent in the people of the Continent, by depriving them of their accustomed colonial supplies. Second, to secure to herself that commerce of which she deprived neutrals. Our embargo co-operates with the British views in both respects. By our dereliction of the ocean, the Continent is much more deprived of the advantages of commerce than it would be possible for the British navy to effect, and by removing our competition, all the commerce of the Continent which can be forced is wholly left to be reaped by Great Britain. The language of each sovereign is in direct conformity to these ideas. Napoleon tells the American Minister, virtually, that we are very good Americans; that, although he will not allow the property he has in his hands to escape him, nor desist from burning and capturing our vessels on every occasion, yet that he is, thus far, satisfied with our co operation. And what is the language of George the Third, when our Minister presents to his consideration the embargo laws? Is it Le Roi s'avisera? The King will reflect upon them. No; it is the pure language of royal approbation, Le Roi le veut. The King wills it. Were you colonies he could expect no more. His subjects as inevitably get that commerce which you abandon as the water will certainly run into the only channel which remains after all the others are obstructed. In whatever point of view we consider these embargo laws in relation to those edicts and decrees, we shall find them co-operating with each belligerent in its policy. In this way, I grant, our conduct may be impartial; but what has become of our American rights to navigate the ocean? They are abandoned, in strict conformity to the decrees of both belligerents. This resolution declares that we shall no longer submit to such degrading humiliations. Little as I relish, I will take it, as the harbinger of a new day—the pledge of a new system of measures.

Perhaps here, in strictness, I ought to close my observations. But the report of the committee, contrary to what I deem the principle of the resolution, unquestionably recommended the continuance of the embargo laws. And such is the state of the nation, and particularly that portion of it which, in part I represent, under their oppression, that I cannot refrain from submitting some considerations on that subject.

When I enter on the subject of the embargo, I shrink with wonder at the very threshold. I know not with what words to express my astonishment. At the time I departed from Massachusetts, if there was an impression which I thought universal, it was, that at the commencement of this session an end would be put to this measure. The opinion was not so much that it would be terminated as that it was then at an end. Sir, the prevailing sentiment, according to my apprehension, was stronger than this—even that the pressure was so great that it could not possibly be endured; that it would soon be absolutely insupportable. And this opinion, as I then had reason to believe, was not confined to any one class, or description, or party; that even those who were friends of the existing Administration, and unwilling to abandon it, were yet satisfied that a sufficient trial had been given to this measure. With these impressions I arrive in this city. I hear the incantations of the great enchanter. I feel his spell. I see the Legislative machinery begin to move. The scene opens; and I am commanded to forget all my recollections, to disbelieve the evidence of my senses, to contradict what I have seen and heard and felt. I hear that all this discontent was mere party clamor—electioneering artifice; that the people of New England are able and willing to endure this embargo for an indefinite, unlimited period; some say for six months, some a year, some two years. The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. MASON) told us that he preferred three years of embargo to a war. And the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. CLOPTON) said, expressly, that he hoped we should never allow our vessels to go upon the ocean again until the orders and decrees of the belligerents were rescinded. In plain English, until France and Great Britain should, in their great condescension, permit. Good Heavens! Mr. Chairman, are men mad? Is this House touched with that insanity which is the never-failing precursor of the intention of Heaven to destroy? The people of New England, after eleven months deprivation of the ocean, to be commanded still longer to abandon it, for an undefined period to hold their unalienable rights, at the tenure of the will of Britain or of Bonaparte? A people, commercial in all aspects, in all their relations, in all their recollections of the past, in all their prospects of the future—a people, whose first love was the ocean, the choice of their childhood, the approbation of their manly years, the most precious inheritance of their fathers; in the midst of their success, in the moment of the most exquisite perception of commercial prosperity, to be commanded to abandon it, not for a limited time, but for a time unlimited—not until they can be prepared to defend themselves there, (for that is not pretended,) but until their rivals recede from it—not until their necessities require, but until foreign nations permit! I am lost in astonishment, Mr. Chairman. I have not words to express the matchless absurdity of this attempt. I have no tongue to express the swift and headlong destruction which a blind perseverance in such a system must bring upon this nation.

But men from New England, representatives on this floor, equally with myself the Constitutional guardians of her interests, differ from me in these opinions. My honorable colleague (Mr. BACON) took occasion, in secret session, to deny that there did exist all that discontent and distress which I had attempted, in an humble way, to describe. He told us he had travelled in Massachusetts; that the people were not thus dissatisfied; that the embargo had not produced any such tragical effects. Really, sir, my honorable colleague has travelled—all the way from Stockbridge to Hudson; from Berkshire to Boston; from inn to inn; from county court to county court; and doubtless he collected all that important information, which an acute intelligence never fails to retain on such occasions. He found tea, sugar, salt, West India rum and molasses dearer, beef, pork, butter, and cheese cheaper. Reflection enabled him to arrive at this difficult result: that in this way the evil and the good of the embargo equalize one another. But has my honorable colleague travelled on the seaboard? Has he witnessed the state of our cities? Has he seen our ships rotting at our wharves; our wharves deserted, our stores tenantless, our streets bereft of active business; industry forsaking her beloved haunts, and hope fled away from places where she had from earliest time been accustomed to make and to fulfil her most precious promises? Has he conversed with the merchant, and heard the tale of his embarrassments—his capital arrested in his hands, forbidden by your laws to resort to a market, with property four times sufficient to discharge all his engagements, necessitated to hang on the precarious mercy of moneyed institutions for that indulgence which preserves him from stopping payment—the first step towards bankruptcy? Has he conversed with the mechanic? Has he seen him either destitute of employment or obliged to seek it in labors odious to him, because he was not educated to them?—that mechanic who, the day before this embargo passed, the very day that you took this bit, and rolled it like a sweet morsel under your tongue, had more business than he had hands, or time, or thought to employ on it, now soliciting, at reduced prices, that employment which the rich, owing to the uncertainty in which your laws have involved their capital, cannot afford. I could heighten this picture—I could show you laboring poor in the alms-house, and willing industry dependent upon charity. But I confine myself to particulars which have fallen under my own observation, and of which ten thousand suffering individuals on the seaboard of New England are living witnesses that there is nothing fictitious.

Mr. Chairman, other gentlemen must take their responsibilities—I shall take mine. This embargo must be repealed. You cannot enforce it for any important period of time longer. When I speak of your inability to enforce this law, let not gentlemen misunderstand me. I mean not to intimate insurrection or open defiance of them. Although it is impossible to foresee in what acts that "oppression" will finally terminate, which, we are told, "makes wise men mad." I speak of an inability resulting from very different causes.

The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. Macon) exclaimed the other day, in a strain of patriotic ardor, "What! shall not our laws be executed? Shall their authority be defied? I am for enforcing them at every hazard." I honor that gentleman's zeal; and I mean no deviation from that true respect I entertain for him, when I tell him that, in this instance, "his zeal is not according to knowledge."

I ask this House, is there no control to its authority; is there no limit to the power of this National Legislature? I hope I shall offend no man when I intimate that two limits exist: Nature and the Constitution. Should this House undertake to declare that this atmosphere should no longer surround us; that water should cease to flow; that gravity should not hereafter operate; that the needle should not vibrate to the pole: I do suppose, Mr. Chairman—sir, I mean no disrespect to the authority of this House, I know the high notions some gentlemen entertain on this subject—I do suppose—sir, I hope I shall not offend—I think I may venture to affirm, that such a law to the contrary notwithstanding, the air would continue to circulate, the Mississippi, the Hudson, and the Potomac, would hurl their floods to the ocean, heavy bodies continue to descend, and the mysterious magnet hold on its course to its celestial cynosure.

Just as utterly absurd and contrary to nature is it, to attempt to prohibit the people of New England, for any considerable length of time, from the ocean. Commerce is not only associated with all the feelings, the habits, the interests, and relations of that people, but the nature of our soil and of our coasts, the state of our population and its mode of distribution over our territory, renders it indispensable. We have five hundred miles of seacoast, all furnished with harbors, bays, creeks, rivers, inlets, basins, with every variety of invitation to the sea, with every species of facility to violate such laws as these; our people are not scattered over an immense surface, at a solemn distance from each other, in lordly retirement, in the midst of extended plantations and intervening wastes. They are collected on the margin of the ocean, by the sides of rivers, at the heads of bays, looking into the water or on the surface of it for the incitement and the reward of their industry. Among a people thus situated, thus educated, thus numerous, laws prohibiting them from the exercise of their natural rights will have a binding effect not one moment longer than the public sentiment supports them.

Gentlemen talk of twelve revenue cutters additional to enforce the embargo laws. Multiply the number by twelve, multiply it by an hundred, join all your ships of war, all your gunboats, and all your militia, in despite of them all, such laws as these are of no avail when they become odious to public sentiment. Continue these laws any considerable time longer, and it is very doubtful if you will have officers to execute, juries to convict, or purchasers to bid for your confiscations. Cases have begun to occur. Ask your revenue officers, and they will tell you that already, at public sales in your cities, under these laws, the owner has bought his property at less than four per cent. upon its real value. Public opinion begins to look with such a jealous and hateful eye upon these laws, that even self-interest will not co-operate to enforce their penalties.

But where is our love of order? Where our respect for the laws? Let legislators beware lest, by the very nature of their laws, they weaken that sentiment of respect for them, so important to be inspired, and so difficult to be reinstated when it has once been driven from the mind. Regulate not the multitude to their ruin. Disgrace not men of virtue by the tendency of your laws, lest, when they cannot yield them the sanction of their approbation, the enterprising and the necessitous find a principal check upon their fear of violating them removed. It is not enough for men in place to exclaim, "the worthless part of society!" Words cannot alter the nature of things. You cannot identify the violator of such laws as these, in our part of the country, for any great length of time, with the common smuggler, nor bring the former down to the level of the latter. The reason is obvious. You bring the duties the citizen owes to society into competition not only with the strongest interests, but, which is more, with the most sacred private obligations. When you present to the choice of a citizen bankruptcy, a total loss of the accumulated wealth of his whole life, or a violation of a positive law, restrictive of the exercise of the most common rights, it presents to him a most critical alternative. I will not say how sublime casuists may decide, but it is easy to foretell that nature will plead too strong in the bosom to make obedience long possible. I state no imaginary case. Thousands in New England see in the continuance of this embargo, and in obedience to it, irremediable ruin to themselves and families. But where is our patriotism? Sir, you call upon patriotism for sacrifices to which it is unequal; and it requires its operation in a way in which that passion cannot long subsist. Patriotism is a great comfort to men in the interior, to the farmer and the planter, who are denied a market by your laws, whose local situation is such that they can neither sell their produce, nor scarcely give it away, and who are made to believe that these privations will ultimately redound to the benefit of the country. But on the seaboard, where men feel not only their annual profit, but their whole capital perishing, where they know the utter inefficacy of your laws to coerce foreign nations, and their utter futility as a means of saving our own property—to such laws, in such a situation, patriotism is, to say the least, a very inactive assistant. You cannot lay a man upon the rack and crack his muscles by a slow torment, and call patriotism to soothe the sufferer.

Foreign Relations.

But there is another obstacle to a long and effectual continuance of this law—the doubt which hangs over its constitutionality. I know I shall be told that the sanction of the Judiciary has been added to this act of the Legislature. Sir, I honor that tribunal. I revere the individual whose opinion declared in this instance the constitutionality of the law. But it is one thing to venerate our courts of justice; it is one thing to deem this law obligatory upon the citizen, while it has all these sanctions; it is another, on this floor, in the high court of the people's privileges, to advocate its repeal on the ground that it is an invasion of their rights. The embargo laws have unquestionable sanction—they are laws of this land. Yet, who shall deny to a representative of the people the right, in their own favorite tribunal, of bringing your laws to the test of the principles of the Constitution?

Is there any principle more wise, or more generally received among statesmen, than that a law, in proportion to its pressure upon the people, should have its basis in unquestionable authority as well as necessity? A Legislature may sport with the rights of an individual. It may violate the Constitution, to the ruin of whole classes of men. But once let it begin, by its laws, to crush the hopes of the great mass of the citizens; let it bring every eye in the land to the scrutiny of its laws and its authority, to be permanent those laws must possess no flaw in their foundation.

I ask, in what page of the Constitution you find the power of laying an embargo? Directly given, it is nowhere. You have it, then, by construction or precedent. By construction, of the power to regulate. I lay out of the question the common place argument, that regulation cannot mean annihilation, and that what is annihilated cannot be regulated. I ask this question, Can a power be ever obtained by construction, which had never been exercised at the time of the authority given, the like of which had not only never been seen, but the idea of which had never entered into human imagination. I will not say in this country but in the world? Yet such is the power which, by construction, you assume to exercise. Never before did society witness a total prohibition, like this, in a commercial nation. Did the people of the United States invest this House with a power of which, at the time of investment, that people had not and could not have had any idea? for, even in times of faction, it had never existed. But we have precedent. Precedent is directly against you. For the only precedent, that in 1794, was in conformity to the embargo power, as it has been exercised in other countries. It was limited. Its duration was known. The power passed from the Representatives of this House only for sixty days. In that day, the Legislature would not trust even WASHINGTON, amid all his well-earned influence, with any other than a limited power. But, away, sir, with such deductions as these; I appeal to the history of the times when this national compact was formed. This Constitution grew out of our necessities, and it was, in every stage of its formation, obstructed by the jealousies and diverse interests of the different States. The gentlemen of the South had a certain species of property, with the control of which they would not trust us in the North; and wisely, for we neither appreciate it as they do, nor could regulate it safely for them. In the East our sentiment concerning their interest in commerce, and their power to understand its true interests, was, in a great degree, similar. The writings of that period exhibit this jealousy, and the fears excited by it, formed in that portion of the United States a formidable objection to its adoption. In this state of things, would the people of New England consent to convey to a Legislature, constituted as this in time must be, a power not only to regulate commerce, but to annihilate it, for a time unlimited, or altogether? Suppose, in 1788, in the convention of Massachusetts, while debating upon the adoption of this Constitution, some hoary sage had arisen, and with an eye looking deep into futurity, with a prophet's ken, had thus addressed the Assembly: "Fellow-citizens of Massachusetts: To what ruin are you hastening? Twenty years shall not elapse, before, under a strict and dubious construction of the instrument now proposed for your adoption, your commerce shall be annihilated. The whole of your vast trade prohibited. Not a boat shall cross your harbors, not a coaster shall be permitted to go out of your ports, unless under permission of the distant head of your nation, and after a grievous visitation of a custom-house officer."

Sir, does any man believe that, with such a prospect into futurity, the people of that State would have for one moment listened to its adoption? Rather, would they not have rejected it with indignation? Yet this now is not prophecy, it is history. But this law is not perpetual, it is said. Show the limit to it—show by what terms it can be made more perpetual.

The universal opinion entertained in New England, among commercial men, of the total imbecility of this law, as a measure of coercion of either belligerent, is another cause pregnant with discontent in that country. It may do well enough to amuse ourselves with calculations of this kind on this floor, but intelligent merchants, masters of vessels, seamen, who are acquainted with the West Indies, and with the European dominions of both Powers, speak with sovereign contempt of the idea of starving either of these Powers into submission to our plans of policy. The entire failure of this scheme, after a trial of eleven months, would, I should suppose, have satisfied the most obstinate, of its hopelessness; yet it is revived again at this session. We are told, from high authority, of the failure of the wheat harvest in Great Britain, and this has been urged as a further reason for a continuance of this measure. Have gentlemen, who press this argument, informed themselves how exceedingly small a proportion our export of wheat bears to the whole consumption of the British dominions? Our whole export, to all the world, of wheat in its natural and manufactured state, does not amount to seven millions of bushels. The whole consumption of the British dominions exceeds one hundred and fifty millions. Let gentlemen consider what a small object this amount is, in a national point of view, even could the attainment of the whole supply be assumed, as the condition of her yielding to the terms we should prescribe. Are not the borders of the Black Sea, the coast of Africa, and South America, all wheat countries, open to her commerce?

But, the embargo saves our resources. It may justly be questioned, whether, in this point of view, the embargo is so effectual as, at first, men are led to imagine? It may be doubted if the seed-wheat for this harvest is not worth more than the whole crop. I say nothing of the embarrassments of our commerce, of the loss of our seamen, of the sunken value of real estate. But our dead, irredeemable loss by the embargo, during the present year, cannot be stated at less than ten per cent, on account of interest and profit on the whole export of our country; that is, on one hundred and eight millions, ten millions eight hundred thousand dollars.

Nor can our loss upon a million tons of unemployed shipping be stated at less than twenty dollars the ton—twenty millions of dollars. Thirty millions of dollars is a serious outfit for any voyage of salvation, and the profit ought to be very unquestionable before a wise man would be persuaded to renew or prolong it. Besides, is it true that the articles the embargo retains, are, in the common acceptation of the term, resources? I suppose that, by this word, so ostentatiously used on all occasions, it is meant to convey the idea that the produce thus retained in the country will be a resource for use or defence in case of war, or any other misfortune happening to it. But, is this true? Our exports are surplus products, what we raise beyond what we consume. Because we cannot use them, they are surplus. Of course, in this country, they have little or no value in use, but only in exchange. Take away the power of exchange, and how can they be called resources? Every year produces sufficient for its own consumption, and a surplus. Suppose an embargo of ten years, will gentlemen seriously contend that the accumulating surplus of fish, cotton, tobacco, and flour, would be a resource for any national exigencies? We cannot consume it, because the annual product is equal to our annual consumption. Our embargo forbids us to sell it. How, then, is it a resource? Are we stronger or richer for it? The reverse: we are poorer and weaker. Weaker by all the loss of motive and activity, by all the diminution of the industry of the country, which such a deprivation of the power to exchange produces. And what can be poorer than he who is obliged to keep what he cannot use, and to labor for that which profiteth not?

But the inequality of the pressure of this measure of embargo upon the people of the Eastern States, is another source of great discontent with it. Every gentleman who has spoken upon the subject has seemed to take it for granted that this was a burden which pressed equally. But is this the case? I shall confine myself to a single fact, although the point admits of other elucidations. Compare the State of Virginia with that of Massachusetts, in the single particular of the amount of capital embarrassed by this law. Virginia with a population, according to the last census, of nine hundred thousand souls, has four million seven hundred thousand dollars in exports, forty thousand eight hundred tons of registered shipping at thirty dollars the ton, amounting to one million seven hundred dollars in value, constituting an aggregate of six millions of dollars, obstructed by this embargo. Massachusetts, on the other hand, has in exports twenty million one hundred thousand dollars, and three hundred and six thousand tons of registered shipping, equal nearly to ten million of dollars in value, constituting an aggregate of capital, in Massachusetts, equal to thirty millions of dollars, obstructed by this law. By the last census, the population of Massachusetts is about six hundred thousand souls; so that, in Virginia, nine hundred thousand souls have to bear a pressure of embarrassed capital equal to six millions of dollars, and in Massachusetts, six hundred thousand souls, a pressure of thirty millions. To equalize the pressure of Virginia with Massachusetts the capital of the former ought to be forty-five millions instead of six millions. I wish not to bring into view any unpleasant comparisons, but, when gentlemen wonder at our complaints, they ought rightly to appreciate their causes. The pressure resulting from the embarrassments of this immense capital is the more sensibly felt, inasmuch as it is not divided in great masses among rich individuals, but in moderate portions among the middling classes of our citizens, who have, many of them, the earnings of a whole life invested in single articles destined for a foreign market from which your embargo alone prohibits them.

It is in vain to say that, if the embargo was raised, there would be no market. The merchants understand that subject better than you, and the eagerness with which preparations to load were carried on previous to the commencement of this session, speaks, in a language not to be mistaken, their opinion of the foreign markets. But, it has been asked, in debate, "will not Massachusetts, the cradle of liberty, submit to such privations?" An embargo liberty was never cradled in Massachusetts. Our liberty was not so much a mountain as a sea nymph. She was free as air. She could swim, or she could run. The ocean was her cradle. Our fathers met her as she came, like the goddess of beauty, from the waves. They caught her as she was sporting on the beach. They courted her while she was spreading her nets upon the rocks. But an embargo liberty—a hand-cuffed liberty—a liberty in fetters, a liberty traversing between the four sides of a prison and beating her head against the walls, is none of our offspring. We abjure the monster. Its parentage is all inland.

The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. MASON) exclaimed the other day, "Where is the spirit of '76?" Ay, sir, where is it? Would to Heaven that, at our invocation, it would descend to alight on this floor. But let gentlemen remember that the spirit of '76 was not a spirit of empty declaration, or of abstract propositions. It did not content itself with non-importation acts, or non-intercourse laws. It was a spirit of active preparation, of dignified energy. It studied both to know our rights and to devise the effectual means of maintaining them. In all the annals of '76, you will find no such degrading doctrine as that maintained in this report. It never presented to the people of the United States the alternative of war, or a suspension of our rights, and recommending the latter rather than to incur the risk of the former. What was the language of that period, in one of the addresses of Congress, to Great Britain? "You attempt to reduce us, by the sword, to base and abject submission. On the sword, therefore, we rely for protection." In that day there were no alternatives presented to dishearten; no abandonment of our rights under the pretence of maintaining them; no gaining the battle by running away. In the whole history of that period there are no such terms as "embargo," "dignified retirement," "seeing who can do each other the most harm." At that time we had a Navy—that name so odious to the influences of the present day. Yes, sir, in 1776, though but in our infancy, we had a Navy scouring our coasts, and defending our commerce, which was never for one moment wholly suspended. In 1776, we had an army also, and a glorious army it was. Not composed of men halting from the stews, or swept from the jails, but of the best blood, the real yeomanry of the country, noble cavaliers, men without fear and without reproach. We had such an army in 1776, and WASHINGTON at its head. We have an army in 1808, and a head to it.

I will not humiliate those who lead the fortunes of the nation at the present day, by any comparison with the great men of that period; but, I recommend the advocates of the present system of public measures, to study well the true spirit of 1776, before they venture to call it in aid of their purposes. It may bring in its train some recollections not suited to give ease or hope to their bosoms. I beg gentlemen who are so frequent in their recurrence to that period to remember that, among the causes which led to a separation from Great Britain, the following are enumerated: unnecessary restrictions upon trade; cutting off commercial intercourse between the Colonies; embarrassing our fisheries; wantonly depriving our citizens of necessaries; invasion of private property by Governmental edicts; the authority of the Commander-in-chief, and under him of the Brigadier General, being rendered supreme in the civil government; the Commander-in-chief of the army made Governor of a Colony; citizens transferred from their native country for trial. Let gentlemen beware how they appeal to the spirit of '76, lest it come with the aspect, not of a friend, but of a tormentor; lest they find a warning when they look for support; and, instead of encouragement they are presented with an awful lesson.

But, repealing the embargo will be submission to tribute. The popular ear is fretted with this word tribute, and an odium is attempted to be thrown upon those who are indignant at this abandonment of their rights, by representing them as the advocates of tribute. Sir, who advocates it? No man, in this country, I believe. This outcry about tribute is the veriest bugbear that was ever raised in order to persuade them to quit rights, which God and nature had given them. In the first place, it is scarce possible that, if left to himself, the interest of the merchant could ever permit him to pay the British re-exportation duty, denominated tribute. France, under penalty of confiscation, prohibits our vessels from receiving a visit from an English ship, or touching at an English port. In this state of things, England pretends to permit us to export to France certain articles, paying her a duty. The very statement of the case shows the futility of the attempt. Who will pay a duty to England for permission to go to France to be confiscated? But, suppose there is a mistake in this, and that it may be the interest of the merchant to pay such a duty, for the purpose of going to certain destruction, have not you full powers over this matter? Cannot you, by pains and penalties, prohibit the merchant from the payment of such a duty? No man will obstruct you. There is not, as I believe, but one opinion upon this subject. I hope, therefore, that gentlemen will cease this outcry about tribute.

However, suppose that the payment of this duty is inevitable, which it certainly is not, let me ask, is embargo independence? Deceive not yourselves. It is palpable submission. Gentlemen exclaim, "Great Britain 'smites us on one cheek!'" And what does the Administration? It "turns the other also." Gentlemen say, "Great Britain is a robber, she 'takes our cloak.'" And what says the Administration? "Let her take our coat also." France and Great Britain require you to relinquish a part of your commerce, and you yield it entirely. Sir, this conduct may be the way to dignity and honor in another world, but it will never secure safety and independence in this.

At every corner of this great city, we meet some gentlemen of the majority wringing their hands, and exclaiming "What shall we do? Nothing but embargo will save us! Remove it, and what shall we do?" Sir, it is not for me, a humble and uninfluential individual, at an awful distance from the predominant influences, to suggest plans of government. But, to my eye, the path of our duty is as distinct as the milky way—all studded with living sapphires—glowing with cumulating light. It is the path of active preparation—of dignified energy. It is the path of 1776. It consists not in abandoning our rights, but in supporting them as they exist, and where they exist—on the ocean as well as on the land. It consists in taking the nature of things as the measure of the rights of your citizens, not the orders and decrees of imperious foreigners. Give what protection you can. Take no counsel of fear. Your strength will increase with the trial, and prove greater than you are now aware.

But, I shall be told this may lead to war. I ask, Are we now at peace? Certainly not, unless retiring from insult be peace—unless shrinking under the lash be peace. The surest way to prevent war is, not to fear it. The idea that nothing on earth is so dreadful as war, is inculcated too studiously among us. Disgrace is worse. Abandonment of essential rights is worse.

Sir, I could not refrain from seizing the first opportunity of spreading before this House the sufferings and exigencies of New England under this embargo. Some gentlemen may deem it not strictly before us; in my opinion it is, necessarily. For, if the idea of the committee be correct, and embargo is resistance, then this resolution sanctions its continuance. If, on the contrary, as I contend, embargo is submission, then this resolution is a pledge of its repeal.

Mr. DANA said, he considered it unfortunate if the doubt existed in the minds of members of this House which seemed to be implied by the resolution under consideration. Was it really a question whether the Representatives of the people of the United States would bow their free necks to a foreign yoke? Was it to be decided by renewing the Declaration of their Independence? Once declared, Mr. D. said, it was to be considered as a given point that our independence should be maintained. And it was not always a sufficient reason for agreeing to a proposition that it was truth. For himself, he had not supposed that much doubt existed on this point. Even the committee themselves seemed to have considered this declaration as unnecessary, for they say it might to some seem superfluous. He thought the real policy to be pursued by this country should be such as never to make this a question; and when it became a question, a declaration in words added not to the determination to resent aggressions on our independence. However, as the resolution had been submitted to the House, it became a question how it should be decided, and another question, what was the import of it? In one respect he approved the resolution, because it was concise; and yet there might be a difference of opinion as to the terms of it. The questions now submitted to the Councils of the Nation were questions relative to our maritime rights. He knew not that any question existed as to our territorial rights. The language of the resolution was very broad, and he wished that it might be varied, so as to be more specific and appropriate. With this view, that no doubt might exist of the import of the resolution, he moved to insert between the words to and the, the words, "abandon the navigation of the ocean in consequence of." This amendment presented a question on which he wished a decided expression of the opinion of the House.

Mr. SLOAN said, he perfectly acquiesced in the amendment moved by the gentleman from Connecticut, if one word more was added, and that was the word "longer," between the words not and submit. He, for one, thought that our rights were already abandoned, and that they had been abandoned too long.

Mr. DANA said, that, whatever had been his opinion of the past measures of the Administration, he would not propose an amendment which would imply that the Councils of this Nation had submitted. Gentlemen who had favored those measures probably did not consider them as submission. He therefore could not consent to cast that reproach on them. The gentleman from New Jersey, he hoped, would not consider it a want of attention to him; but, for these reasons, he could not accept his amendment.

Mr. BACON observed that he had hoped, from the observations of his colleague, (Mr. QUINCY,) that there would have been no objection to the adoption of this resolution, as reported. What could be less exceptionable than the resolution here offered, that the United States would not sacrifice their rights, honor, and independence, to the edicts of Great Britain and France? There was, indeed, considerable address displayed in the construction of this amendment. The declaration contained in the resolution was, that the United States would not in any manner submit to the edicts. The gentleman wished to say that the United States would not submit to abandon the ocean—thus narrowing down the mode of resistance. The conclusion to be drawn from which, was, that they would not submit to the embargo, which resisted those decrees. Instead of saying that they would not submit to the decrees, the gentleman from Connecticut wished them to say that they would not submit to abandon the ocean. Gentlemen said that the embargo was an abandonment of the ocean. The gentleman, therefore, wished to entrap the House into a declaration that they would not submit to the embargo.

NOVEMBER, 1808.

Foreign Relations.

H. OF R.

Mr. TAYLOR said, it had been the desire of the select committee to present to the House a proposition which should leave out of view not only party feelings, which were supposed sometimes to actuate the House and the nation, but anything relating to the manner in which this resistance was to be made by the nation against the orders and decrees, alluding but to one object—the infraction of our neutrality by foreign nations; that the question should not be trammelled with war or no war, with embargo or no embargo; but that it should appear to the world that there was a spirit in this nation determined to oppose the orders and decrees of the belligerents. It was not necessary that he should have stated this as his determination, for he had given an instance of it, and so had the House, in passing the embargo law. A proposition was now brought forward on which he must vote—what? That he would not abandon the ocean in consequence of the orders and decrees. He said that a temporary abandonment was not a total abandonment; and if by the former the House should think that they could coerce an observance of their rights, the measure would probably be resorted to. This however was a question for the decision of the House. Why then trammel this resolution with another proposition which was not connected with it? An apology might be thought necessary for proposing a truism to the consideration of the House; but it would be recollected that during the late session of Congress a colleague of his had come forward and demanded whether there was or was not a man in the nation who would submit to the belligerent edicts? From one quarter an appropriate answer had been made; from another quarter there had been no reply. And what had been the conduct of the latter? Had there not been a proposition made (by Mr. LIVERMORE) at the late session, to make war against one (France) and enter into connexion with another (Great Britain)? This had been introduced; and would it not have been the most servile submission? This sentiment was not disavowed by the gentleman (Mr. QUINCY) who had given them his opinion on this resolution, and travelled out of the path of his argument to vent his spleen against other measures which were not recommended to the House by the committee, who had left it wholly with the House to say what measures they would adopt. Why should the House be made to decide on a proposition like this; when they had already adopted a measure (the embargo) which showed their willingness to make any sacrifices for maintaining their rights to the ocean? The complaints made by the gentleman from Massachusetts proved that the people had borne a great deal. Mr. T. said he had given a sufficient proof by his vote in favor of the embargo not to make it necessary for him now to say that he would not abandon the ocean, unless for such a time, as, by affecting the interests of the belligerents, should compel them to abandon the nefarious project of laying under contribution our lawful commerce. Notwithstanding this disposition, Mr. T. said, he could not vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut, as its adoption would evade the question which he wished to be taken on the principles of the resolution.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON hoped that the Committee would not consent to permit an evasion of a decision on the great question now proposed to them, and thus enable gentlemen to creep out by the aid of the proposition of the gentleman from Connecticut. He wished the question to be solemnly decided, because he believed that there were individuals in a certain portion of this body, who were not willing to say that they would resist these aggressions; and he was induced to believe it by a late assertion that the United States had no cause of complaint against Great Britain. If the gentleman from Connecticut would bring forward a distinct proposition to the amount of his amendment, Mr. J. said he would vote with him. Retiring from the ocean for a time was not an abandonment of it; but an acquiescence in the arbitrary edicts of the belligerents would be an abandonment. What was the amount of the resolution as reported by the select committee? Let it be examined and it was this; that the United States would carry on trade notwithstanding their edicts. He wished not to afford gentlemen an opportunity of getting off the odium which would attach to them if they voted against the plain proposition for resistance; and he hoped that the committee would not sanction the amendment, notwithstanding that he was ready to vote for a distinct proposition to the same effect as the amendment.

Mr. LIVERMORE said that the principal question proposed to the House by the amendment was, whether it was consistent with a determination to resist, to abandon the ocean in consequence of the edicts of Great Britain and France? Would any gentleman say that it was? Would any gentleman say that it comported with honor and independence to abandon the ocean? He conceived not. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BACON) seemed to conceive that if the amendment were adopted, it would be contended that the embargo was an abandonment of commerce. From its intruding upon the gentleman's mind thus, Mr. L. said there must be some truth in the idea. In considering this amendment, Mr. L. said he wished to consider it in its full extent. He did not in general wish that in legislation any abstract proposition should be laid down. It did not appear to him to be the proper mode of doing business; though it was probable that gentlemen might, from a cursory view, think proper to give this resolution their sanction. He could not see how any gentleman could dissent from the amendment.

This declaration of non-submission must relate altogether to something to be done or suffered on the ocean: and what then? Why he should suppose that he submitted by giving up navigation in consequence of the edicts of foreign Powers. It really appeared to him, that in withdrawing from the ocean, we did submit; that receding from the ocean was obeying the edicts. France said that we should not trade with Great Britain.

Great Britain said that inasmuch as this was the case, we should not go to the Continent without paying her a certain duty. He granted that both were injurious. What then? The question was, should the United States submit to them? He was not one of those to whom the gentleman who spoke last had alluded, as being afraid of the odium of voting against the first resolution, though he should readily vote for it. But he would much rather vote for it with the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut. He did not know why honorable gentleman should throw out these insinuations. The gentleman had said that those who opposed the proposition said that they would submit. He had never heard any one say so; on the contrary, he contended that it would be humiliating to submit. But they might differ as to the manner of resisting; and he should contend that withdrawing from the ocean was submitting to the decrees of France and Great Britain. He said that he would not submit to the edicts of Great Britain more than of France; at the same time that he contended that withdrawing from the ocean would be submission to both.

Mr. LYON said he felt as strong an abhorrence as any gentleman to submit to the edicts of Great Britain and France, therefore he was inclined to vote for the resolution as it would stand when amended as proposed by the gentleman from Connecticut; he would prefer the resolution in that shape much to what it was in the shape it was presented by the committee. The amendment gave a tone to the resolution, which could not be misunderstood; whereas the resolution as offered, while it speaks against submission, is a mere repetition of the professions against submission, which preceded the embargo, a measure which, in his opinion, consisted of the very essence of submission. By that measure we have submitted to be shut off from the ocean. In the rage caused by this political hydrophobia we have submitted—submitted even to the destruction of our uninterdicted trade, even our innocent coasting trade.

I did hope, said Mr. L., that by this time the representatives of the nation would have recovered from this political hydrophobia. I did hope that, when gentlemen had had a year's experience with their wise, their strong measure, which I have always esteemed a foolish and weak measure as to its external operations—when they themselves were convinced that it had failed in every point of answering the purposes they contemplated, I had hoped they would have magnanimity enough to give it up. I did hope they would by this time have felt a disposition to be merciful to their own country; that they would suspend the operation of this destroyer against their fellow citizens. I had hoped they would have some regard for the intimations, the something like assurances they gave last year, that a year's experience would satisfy them; but my hopes are all vanished. From everything I can learn, from what has passed in the House this session, it seems the nation are, by the wise authors of this wise measure, to be subjected to its calamities—

Ged only knows how long. And for what reason is it now to be continued? Is it to starve the British nation, and to save our seamen? With all the energy with which this wise measure has been armed by your countless embargo laws, I have not heard of a single poor West India negro being starved by it. I have seen, it is true, a newspaper, which states, under the sanction of high authority, that our seamen have been saved by it; but I have it from other quarters, that many more than half of those we last year called American seamen, have, together with many of our fishermen, gone into foreign service. The sailors have not all caught the hydrophobia; they retain their love for the watery element, and are gone to enjoy it.

Among the diversity of evils and calamities brought on by the embargo system, so emphatically called a wise measure by its very wise projectors and supporters, there is none has vexed me so much as the injury done to the cause of republicanism—that cause in which I have long labored, and will cease to labor in only when I cease to breathe—that cause has suffered much. I told the Eastern Democrats last year, both here and in private conversation, that the Federalists, grown wise by adversity, would take every advantage of their folly, and get themselves into power. I foresaw then what has happened in the Eastern States. I assured them that Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Vermont, would, in consequence of their wise measures, discard their democracy, and approve of that federal folly which would have left the nation in a state of progressive growth, in a state of activity, prepared for defence or offence, prepared to support its rights by other means than inactive declamation. I told them that their people would prefer the state of things in which every man is allowed to embargo himself, or to exercise his energies, and employ his capital or his credit to his own emolument, and the benefit of the nation. My predictions have come to pass. Massachusetts has returned to that Federalism which she had shaken off. New Hampshire has told her embargo delegation that she has no further occasion for their services. Rhode Island has done the same. I hear a great boasting that Vermont is saved. I am well acquainted with that State, its situation and its constitution, and I can declare to you that it is not saved from a radical change to Federalism; that State being able to aid the embargo laws a little while longer, is owing to a defect in their constitution—it is owing to their having perhaps one hundred rotten boroughs or Old Sarums represented in their Legislature. The majority of the people of that State have elevated the Federal Governor, whom they had lately discarded. They have elected a Federal upper house, but owing to unimproved townships, in which there are not more than half a dozen families, being able to send an equal representation with those townships which contain five hundred families or upwards, the republicans of that State have been able to boast of the short-lived triumph they now enjoy. The time has been when the inequality I speak of was so great, that less than forty members in that House represented one-half the people of the State, while the other half sent more than one hundred and twenty members. The time has now arrived, sir, when my last year's predictions have come to pass; it is apparent as the daylight. Yet the republican gentlemen of that State are disposed to attribute the change to anything else rather than the true cause. In the embargo system, they seem determined with closed eyes and hardened hearts, to proceed on until their opponents shall wrest from them the last vestige of power.

I regret sincerely to see in the President's Message at this time an intimation to the Legislature to prepare for disposing of the surplus which is to arise from our revenue, after it has discharged certain debts which now encumber it. This intimation looks too much like diverting the attention of the nation from the real situation of its finances.

It is true that there are about fourteen millions in the Treasury. How much more is there to come in, and where is it to come from? That fourteen millions must be disposed of by this time twelve months, and we cannot expect money enough to come into the Treasury within that time to carry us more than about three or four months longer. If you should now take off the embargo, the duties to be derived from the return cargoes are to be bonded, and the money will not reach the Treasury time enough to save you from borrowing next year. Should you now lay a land tax, it would be the same thing. I confess I am not financier enough to find out any way to avoid borrowing next session of Congress. When the people see you have recourse to the borrowing system—that system which we republicans so loudly exclaimed against under the former Administration, and that to support a measure, or a course of measures, that has no other effect than that of impoverishing them, they will turn their backs upon you; they will prefer Federalism, or any other ism, rather than be cajoled in this way. Passing southward from the New England States, how stands New York now? They have acted wiser; they have discarded their embargo men, without taking up Federalists altogether, but the danger is that Federalism will prevail even in that wiser State. Jersey will undoubtedly follow. And I will venture another prophecy: that this House will contain, after another election, a majority of Federalists from the States south of Pennsylvania, unless this system of coercing the people to be idle, to be inactive, to be poor, to be miserable, is given up. Not having had time to read all the documents, and being unprepared to enter largely into debate, I shall waive any further observations, with a view to expressing my opinions more fully on the subject at another time.

Some further desultory debate took place on Mr. DANA's amendment, in which Messrs. RHEA, MACON, G. W. CAMPBELL, and FISK opposed it, and Messrs. ELLIOT and DANA supported it.

On the motion of agreeing to the amendment of Mr. DANA, it was lost—ayes 31.

Mr. LIVERMORE said he had an amendment to propose, which he hoped would meet the opinion of every gentleman, since the chief argument against the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut was, that it narrowed the ground of resistance. He proposed to add to the end of the resolution the following words: "and that an abandonment of the navigation of the ocean, is a relinquishment of our rights, and a submission to the edicts of Great Britain and France."

Mr. COOK objected to the insertion in this resolution of any irrelevant matter, with a view to evade its object; although were the amendment introduced as a separate proposition, he might vote for it.

Mr. SMILIE said he really could not help giving credit to the gentleman from Connecticut, for the ingenuity of his amendment; but the gentleman from Massachusetts had certainly improved upon it. Accept that amendment (said he) and you condemn indirectly the very measures which this Government has taken for resistance.

The amendment moved by Mr. LIVERMORE was negatived, twenty members only rising in favor of it.

The Committee then rose, (half past 3 o'clock,) reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

THE EMBARGO.

Mr. GARDENIER presented a petition of the inhabitants of Southold, Suffolk county, New York, against the embargo. He moved to dispense with the reading, and refer it to a committee.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS said he could not dispense with the reading.

The Clerk proceeded in the reading of the petition; but before it was concluded, a motion was made to adjourn, and carried.

TUESDAY, November 29.

On motion of Mr. JEREMIAH MORROW, Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reviving and continuing in force, for a further time, the authority of the board of commissioners for investigating claims to land in the Kaskaskia district; and that they report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. HOLMES, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill authorizing the payment of certain pensions by the Secretary of War at the seat of Government; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The letter presented yesterday, by Mr. GARDENIER, from sundry freeholders and inhabitants of the town of Southold, in the State of New York, was read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of the whole House to whom was committed a resolution proposed by Mr. CHITTENDEN on the tenth instant.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the committee on the subject of our foreign relations. The first resolution still under consideration.

Mr. W. ALSTON said, if gentlemen had confined themselves to the resolution immediately before them, it would not be necessary further to discuss it, as no gentleman had objected to its adoption; but as the subject of our foreign relations generally, as reported by the select committee, was fairly within the rules and orders of the House, and proper for investigation, he should offer a few remarks in support of that report, and in doing so, he assured the House that he should not very long ask their attention.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. QUINCY,) who favored us yesterday with a long harangue upon this question, made so many extraordinary assertions, so contradictory in themselves, that I think there is no man under Heaven that could well understand him, and much more difficult would it be to reconcile his very contradictory arguments to each other: for, however plausible he might be in some of his observations, before he concluded he was certain to destroy any impression they were calculated to make upon the minds of his hearers. Mr. A. said he would begin his observations in reply at the very point where the gentleman had ended; the gentleman had stated that the course the Government ought to pursue was as clear as the milky way; that no man could or ought to mistake it; but as he was an humble minority man, it was not his business to lay any plan before the House. Resistance! defend your rights upon the sea! was his language. Strange language this. If the path was so clear, how happened it that the whole wisdom of the Government and the nation should find such difficulty in pursuing of it? for, he believed, turn whichever way they would, innumerable difficulties presented themselves to all, except a few in the State of Massachusetts, and he hoped that they were very few, who wanted to join one party and go to war with the other; who were willing to submit to the orders of Great Britain, and plunge this nation into a war with France at the hazard of our liberty as an independent nation. If this was the gentleman's resistance, and from his observations and remarks he thought no man could well draw any other inference, he hoped they should not adopt his course. He, however, rather concluded, from everything the gentleman had said, that resistance to the laws of his own Government, fairly enacted, and declared by the Judiciary of his country to be Constitutional, would suit his palate a little better than any other resistance, unless, indeed, a coalition with Great Britain to resist France might suit him better. The gentleman had exclaimed loudly against paying tribute, and urged, at the same time, that no tribute would be paid, for, if our vessels were permitted to go to England, that the edicts of France would prevent them going elsewhere. This was not Mr. Alston's opinion, for were our vessels permitted to leave our ports, and by paying a duty in England, could find a better market upon the Continent, the merchants, tribute or no tribute, would pursue that course which their interest directed. The gentleman talked of resistance, and resistance on sea. Did any one believe that he seriously meant meeting the powerful navy of Great Britain on the sea; of that Britain who had been emphatically styled the mistress of the ocean, and who was fighting for the liberties of the world and of mankind? No, sir, said Mr. A., nothing of the kind is meant; submission to her orders would be the inevitable consequence of the gentleman's resistance, and finally a loss of everything dear to the American character; a loss of our liberty and independence as a free people.

The gentleman from Massachusetts talks about the spirit of 1776, and cautions my colleague, too, who mentioned that spirit a few days since, not to invoke it. Wherefore does the gentleman do this? Is it because he does not wish the American people of the present day to know that the spirit of our ancestors was opposition to British aggression?

The gentleman says the embargo must be repealed; that there is a voice in this nation louder than the voice of Congress; that the air will continue to circulate and the waters to descend, any law to the contrary notwithstanding. Good God, Mr. Chairman! has the American nation come to this, that the laws of our country are to be violated, that trade and commerce shall be carried on whether sanctioned by the Government or not? The gentleman says the whole nation calls aloud for its repeal; that there is but one sentiment on the occasion; that every part of this great community feel its effects, I readily admit; but that they wish its immediate repeal at the expense of our liberty as an independent nation, I positively deny. I must confess my astonishment, when I heard the gentleman reiterate those sentiments—when I cast my eyes into the newspapers of the day, and saw that town meetings had been held in the neighborhood of the town in which the gentleman comes from—(Boston) where I find the subject was discussed and a large majority against the repeal of the embargo laws; yet, sir, it may not be true, and the sentiment may be universal. It appears, from the same papers, that Mr. Gray, of Salem, one of the most intelligent and distinguished Federal merchants upon the continent, was present at a meeting in his town, and clearly pointed out to the satisfaction of a large majority present, that if the embargo laws were repealed whilst the present restrictions remained in force against our commerce, that any trade would be so hazardous and uncertain, that no honest merchant could or would attempt it. Notwithstanding all these facts, staring us in the face, what the gentleman asserts may be true, and these things not have taken place. If the subject of repealing the embargo was now before us, I would readily go into an investigation of the subject, and offer some remarks why it should not now be repealed. It will undoubtedly be discussed before the session ends, and I am certain I shall be found as willing as any member on this floor to take it off as soon as the interest, safety, and honor of this nation will permit it.

From the great commercial talents of the gentleman, I had expected that he would have taken a commercial view of the subject, and have shown us that intercourse might be opened to advantage somewhere. Had it been shown, I am certain that I should be among the last to hold on upon restrictions injurious to the community. Had it been in the power of the gentleman, no doubt he would have done it. I therefore take it for granted, that under existing circumstances, no benefit would result to the honest and upright trader. Provided the gentleman could obtain his object, nothing but hazard, difficulty, and danger, would be presented, independent of national degradation and dishonor.

There has been laid upon our tables, this morning, a document containing petitions which were presented two years ago. I have not had time to look into them, but, as well as my memory serves me, they contain language and sentiments very different from the language of those of the present day, and from the self-same quarter of the United States, too. They pray a further attempt at negotiation, and suggest a special embassy; and, in case of its failure, they pledge their lives and fortunes in support of the measures that the Government may adopt in vindication of their just rights. I call upon gentlemen—particularly the gentleman from Massachusetts—to examine the grievances they complain of. It was nothing more or less than a violation of a commerce carried on by the merchants of this country from an enemy's colony to the mother country. This, sir, was the complaint in which the pledge was given to shed their blood in case of failure. Well, sir, the very steps were taken, and negotiation completely exhausted upon the subject; and (as is contained in the report of the select committee) nothing but insult, added to injury, is the result. Yet, we are told that these very people will not submit to the laws of their country. I cannot bring my mind to believe this to be the character of the good citizens of the State of Massachusetts, notwithstanding the gentleman's strong assertions to the contrary. If the gentleman is determined upon resistance, and that upon the sea, where is he to find an enemy? France, we are told, has not a rag of sail upon the ocean. Does the gentleman mean to invade the Emperor Napoleon's territory, or does he mean to attack Great Britain, the mistress of the ocean, who, we are emphatically told, is fighting the battles of the world for the liberties of mankind? An idea of that sort of resistance is too idle to merit serious consideration.

Mr. BACON.—In all the various discussions which have arisen in the House on the great subject of our foreign relations, and on the general course of measures which were adopted in reference to them, in the course of the last session, I do not at present recollect having occupied the time of the House in listening to any observations of mine on those general subjects. I have heretofore forborne from trespassing upon their patience on two considerations—because I had been persuaded that the discussion was already in much abler hands than my own, and because I was strongly impressed with a conviction, that, in the perilous and momentous crisis to which the affairs of this country had been for the year past verging, both the House and the nation required from their Representatives on this floor less argument and more action—less declamation and more decision. I am now fully sensible that both these considerations continue to exist in their full force, and that the interests of the people will not always be best subserved by him who occupies their time with the most elaborate speeches, or amuses them with the best chosen rhetorical figures.

Impressed with the full force of these reflections, I should still have continued to listen to others, in silence, had I not conceived myself pretty loudly called upon by the observations of my colleague yesterday, and did I not think it a duty at this early period to rescue the report of the select committee (one of whom I had the honor to be) from those imputations which have been improperly heaped upon it by him; as also to meet some of those remarks which he seemed to direct particularly to myself.

That gentleman opened his address by expressing his entire and unqualified concurrence in the broad position which is set up in that general resolution reported by the select committee, which is now before us. And what was his reason? Because, said he, that resolution, if adopted, must be considered as a specific pledge, on the part of this House, for an entire departure from that general system of restrictive policy which has been pursued during the past year. If the gentleman, indeed, viewed the resolution in this light, why would he not suffer it to glide through with that silent and general acquiescence which on all hands seemed to be promised to it? Why step aside, with so much zeal, to attack that system, which, upon his supposition, no one was about any more to defend? Why make it the great laboring point of his very labored and systematic argument, to discredit that odious embargo system which he affected to think every one was now about to give up? Was it because his hostility to it was so deep that he could not bear to see it die, unless he had a hand in contributing to its exit, and was determined to show his constituents, that, in the language of sportsmen, he also was in "at the death?" The only reason which I recollect to have been given by him for his unusual course, was, that the future adherence to this embargo system was specifically recommended by the report of the committee. Whatever may be the future judgment of this House on the policy of continuing this measure for a longer period, or assuming a different position, I assert that no such recommendation is contained in that report; and it is inconceivable to me on what part of it the gentleman will support his assertion. So far from this, that the decision of that great question, and the expediency of electing either that or another alternative, is expressly left open to the House by the committee themselves. [Mr. B. here read the following paragraph, from the report, in justification of his construction of it:]

"On a question of such difficulty, involving the most important interests of the Union, and which has not perhaps until lately been sufficiently considered, your committee think the House alone competent to pronounce a decisive opinion; and they have, in this report, confined themselves to an exposition of the subject, and to such introductory resolutions as will be equally applicable to either alternative."

The gentleman, therefore, is evidently utterly unsupported in imputing to the report what it expressly disavows; and cannot certainly justify the course which he took by any apology of this sort. But, even if the question of the embargo was one which could properly arise out of any part of the system recommended by the committee, it certainly was in no degree connected with the general declaratory resolution now under consideration. And the gentleman's observations, if applicable to any stage of the discussion, were obviously premature, and "a leaping before he came to the stile." The same remark would apply to the observations which we heard from the friend (political friend, I mean) of my colleague, from Kentucky, but which it is impossible I should think of answering on this floor. That the last-mentioned gentleman should have suffered himself to wander into so irregular a course, is not at all surprising—he is not a standing professor of method. But my honorable colleague is a man, who, in the course of his every-day discussions in this House, entrenches himself in all the niceties of a special pleader. He is a man of fine distinctions, of divisions and subdivisions, and who will generally war upon a single word which he finds out of the ranks, and wage hostility upon a straggling adverb. Much more, then, should I have expected that he would not have allowed himself to stray into an argument so wholly irrelevant to the subject immediately before the Committee, and into observations so entirely premature. The gentleman (to use the language of the day) raised the embargo upon his anti-embargo speech before the time. Whether it was because it has been so long on hand, that, like some other articles, it might have spoiled by longer keeping, I will not undertake to say. But, although the course which the gentleman took, in his view of the subject before us, might not itself be correct, yet I feel myself now in some measure justified, if not strongly called upon, to follow him in some of those remarks upon our past measures and present state, which he has presented to the Committee.

The first remark of his which demands notice at present, is, that the principles which he found avowed in the report of the select committee were loathsome in his view, and disgraceful to the nation. As the gentleman has seen fit on this point to deal only in general allegations, it is impossible for me to vindicate from his reproaches any of those particular positions which are so much the object of his abhorrence. Is it that concluding paragraph which is so offensive to the gentleman?

"And it may not be useless that every foreign nation should understand that its aggressions never will be justified or encouraged by any description of American citizens. For, the question for every citizen now is, whether he will rally round the Government of his choice, or enlist under foreign banners! Whether he will be for his country, or against his country!"

I hope it was not this sentiment which bore with it so loathsome a relish; but it is not for me to select those parts of it which he is offended with, and which he has denounced only by general allegations. The gentleman had before, in commenting on the general resolution reported by the committee, remarked that he was opposed usually to abstract legislation, and general declaratory resolutions, viewing it as he did to be usually the resort of weakness or of ignorance; and yet he can himself thus deal in general and sweeping denunciations of that report. It is not for me to make the application of his former maxim. But, says the gentleman, of what use can be the declaration which is set up in this resolution, that the rights, honor, and independence, of our country were violated by the edicts of Great Britain and France—for who questions it? I am glad, sir, to hear at last, from so high authority, that there can be no question raised on this point. Accustomed as I have been for a long time past to be told, through the medium of too many of those prostituted gazettes which live upon the perverted passions of the day, and disgrace the nation which supports them, that this Government and not Great Britain were the real aggressors in the present controversy; that she, instead of being the injuring, was in truth the injured party, and had therefore the best right to complain. I rejoice to see these calumnies at last put down by so commanding an authority, and hope that, from this time, the public are to be imposed upon by them no longer. To those unquestionable invasions of our national rights, the gentleman further agrees, in general terms, that this nation ought not to submit. But what, says he, do your past measures amount to but submission? I well know that this language has been the catchword of newspaper argument during the Summer past, and am not altogether surprised at hearing the sophism renewed at this time—and how does the gentleman proceed to prove it? Submission, says he, is the agreeing to a thing ordered by another in the manner that he prescribes, or refraining to do a thing that he prohibits you from doing. England says that we shall not trade with France and her allies, and they, in their turn, say that we shall not trade with England. We prohibit altogether the trade with both. His conclusion is, that we submit to the course prescribed by both. But, sir, is the refraining from our trade with both those Powers pursuing that course of conduct which the interest of either of them demands, or the policy and spirit of their edicts against us evidently holds forth? It is as much the interest and the wish of Great Britain that we should continue our trade with her, as that we should forbear it with France and her allies. What have we said by the embargo?—that we will forbear the latter and continue the former? No. But that, unless you take off your interdictions against that trade which you wish to deprive us of, you shall not have the benefits of that other trade which it is your interest and your wish to have us pursue. The policy of the French edicts, and their effect upon our interests and rights being precisely similar, the measure which we mete to them is also the same. Again, says the gentleman, the embargo is not only submission to both, but it is aiding directly the policy of both against each other—for, says he, the object of France is to compress the commerce of Great Britain. The withdrawing of our trade aids that policy. The policy of Great Britain is to cut up neutral trade to France, and thereby excite discontent and revolt among her subjects, and the withdrawing of our trade aids that policy. By the gentleman's own argument, then, it is proved that the embargo has operated as a measure of compression, of inconvenience, or, in other words, of coercion against both Powers; upon Great Britain, by compressing and narrowing her trade, and upon France, by withholding her customary supplies; and the very same argument by which he attempts to prove that it is in accordance with the policy of the one, proves also that it is in hostility with that of the other; that it is, so far as it goes, resistance; and this is all that was ever contended for by its advocates. I take the gentleman now solely upon his own argument, without drawing to my aid other considerations which strengthen and explain this conclusion. But the gentleman will allow nothing to be considered as resistance, which is not bottomed on powder and ball; every other measure, as one of coercion, must be submission. In the natural world, every order of animals is endowed with its own peculiar weapons of annoying its antagonist, and waging war in its defence; and most of them are different from each other. Would it be strange if there was a similar variety in the organization of nations. Because Great Britain wages hostility only by ships of war and great guns, does it follow that this country cannot and must not attempt to do it in any other mode, at least for a temporary period? or, because Napoleon attacks his enemies with muskets and bayonets, must the United States be allowed to use only those weapons? Even in open and actual war, fortresses are not always taken by open and direct assault; it is frequently found most practicable to reduce them by the slower operations of a siege, and the withholding of supplies. This may at times be the policy of a nation, and before other means are resorted to, may be a prudent and a wise policy. Those means failing, they must, to be sure, in the last resort, rely upon that which is emphatically called the last appeal of nations, and rest their vindication upon the sword; and upon that I trust we shall, if necessary, not be backward to rest ours.

Proceeding as he has heretofore done to represent to this House the interests and the sentiments, not only of all his own constituents, but those of the whole body of Massachusetts, the gentleman declares, that, in that State, the opinion that the embargo must at all events be removed, is not only general, but universal with every man of every party. Sir, I protest against the right or authority of my colleague to bring before this House the unanimous sentiments of Massachusetts, or to undertake in himself, alone, to represent their united interests. That the people of that State have suffered, and are now suffering much, from the present pressure of our national concerns, is not denied; that they all ardently desire that our commerce should be opened so soon as is compatible with the great interests of the nation, cannot be doubted; in this wish the interest and the most sincere desires of all here, as well as there, must unite. They have ardently hoped that such a repeal might take place consistent with the policy on which these laws were originally founded at the opening of Congress; and they, as well as the Government itself, had the best reason to suppose, at a particular period, that this might have been done. But that the undivided voice of the people of Massachusetts has ever been expressed unequivocally, that the embargo ought, at all events, and without any regard to the existing or future state of things, to be forthwith removed, is a position of which that gentleman has no evidence. On this subject, the opinions of a large portion of the citizens of Massachusetts, like those of their brethren elsewhere, have been formed upon no decisive system of measures; they repose with as much confidence as they ought to do, in the wisdom and information of the Government, for the adoption of that course which, under all circumstances, shall be thought the most prudent and eligible, and in that course, whatever it shall be, they will, I trust, acquiesce as good citizens, and carry it into effect with an undivided will. But, coming here, says the gentleman, under the impression of this universal sentiment, that the embargo must be removed, and meeting with men who, after hearing the incantations of the great enchanter, intimate that it may be best longer to continue it, I feel utterly astonished, seem to have got into the regions of magic, and ask whether this House is mad! Sir, it would not be the first instance wherein the madman himself has fancied that his own insanity was imputable to others. There is an eminent instance in sacred writ, wherein madness was unjustly charged upon one who spoke to his accuser only the words of truth and soberness. But if the gentleman means to intimate, that by the incantations of any man or men, the members of this House are operated upon by any undue influence, independent of their own judgment and views of propriety; in behalf of myself and those with whom I am generally happy in acting, I repel the charge, and pronounce it altogether unmerited. We know of no such enchantment, and we act under none. The insinuation, if so intended, is altogether unwarranted.

We are asked by the gentleman, in the common language of the day, whether any man thinks that the people of New England are to be indefinitely prohibited from the use of the ocean, and commerce perpetually abandoned? The very words of the report which he so much reprobates furnishes the best answer to this suggestion. It is there stated, that—

“The aggressions of England and France collectively, affecting almost the whole of our commerce, and persisted in, notwithstanding repeated remonstrances, explanations, and propositions, the most candid and unexceptionable, are, to all intents and purposes, a maritime war waged by both nations against the United States. It cannot be denied that the ultimate and only effectual mode of resisting that warfare if persisted in, is war. A permanent suspension of commerce, after repeated and unavailing efforts to obtain peace, would not properly be resistance; it would be withdrawing from the contest, and abandoning our indisputable right freely to navigate the ocean. The present unsettled state of the world, the extraordinary situation in which the United States are placed, and the necessity, if war be resorted to, of making it at the same time against both nations, and these the two most powerful of the world, are the principal causes of hesitation. There would be none in resorting to that remedy, however calamitous, if a selection could be made on any principle of justice, or without a sacrifice of national independence.”

The idea of this perpetual abandonment of the ocean, so often held up as the catch-word of party, is expressly negated by the report, and exists no where but in the imagination of those who sound it. If we can ultimately make our way upon the ocean by no other means, we must fight it there; the only question is, when is the proper period to adopt it.

In his remarks upon some observations which fell from me in the course of our secret session, my colleague asks triumphantly, what are the means which I possess of knowing the actual situation of the various classes of people in Massachusetts, under the operation of the embargo? I have travelled more than once, during the Summer past, from the seaboard to the western frontiers of that State. Has the gentleman himself done as much? But have I been in the cities, seen the general desertion of their streets, and the ships rotting at the wharves? Yes, sir, I have been more than once in more than one of our principal cities, but have not seen that total desertion of the streets which is spoken of. I have seen, indeed, a great contrast to the picture exhibited in those times of profound peace and unparalleled prosperity which immediately preceded the present stagnation of business. But I have still seen much occupation and pretty general employment of some sort or other, for most classes of the citizens, but have seen or heard of no one starving in those streets. But have I conversed with merchants? Yes, sir, I have even conversed with merchants; have been to this oracle of all wisdom, as the gentleman seems to look upon them. I have conversed freely with more than one merchant, who had himself as many of his ships rotting at his wharves, as had most merchants of our country, and have found many of them, though suffering their full proportion of the general pressure of the times, satisfied that nothing better could have been done; convinced, that by the adoption of any other alternative, they could not have expected immediate relief, and willing to forego their immediate interest for the general good of our country; with a full confidence that Government had done the best that was in its power for their relief. It is far from my intention to be understood that the state of our national affairs has not been sensibly felt, and the industry of our citizens much paralyzed, in that part of our country, by the operation of these measures. It certainly has. But my object has been, both now and the other day, only to express my opinion, that the tragic picture of general ruin and universal suffering drawn by my colleague, a ruin so wide that every eye could see it, and a suffering so deep, that every man must feel it beyond endurance, was altogether overcharged and exaggerated, and this, so far as my information extends, I feel no hesitation in asserting.

It is pronounced in an emphatic and commanding style, by the gentleman, that these laws must be repealed, and for this imperative reason, that the public mind is against us, that we cannot expect to be able to enforce them much longer by any means, and that there exists a control over this body in the nature of things and in the Constitution. Sir, I agree there is a control, in the Constitution, over all our acts; but I had hoped, after this question had once been submitted, as it has been, to the decision of that tribunal whose judgments that gentleman and his friends had been heretofore so much in the habit of respecting, and when, after a solemn argument, an opinion sanctioning their constitutionality had been given upon great deliberation and advisement, by a judge of great legal weight and personal respectability, and whose opinion, from his known political character, could not be suspected of any party views; after all this, I had hoped that we should have heard no more suggestions about the unconstitutionality of this law; particularly from a quarter where we had been accustomed to hear the doctrine that the judicial power was supreme, controlling not only the exercise of individual rights, but also the power of every other branch of the Government. But we are told that a judicial decision is one thing, a popular decision may be another. Indeed, sir, has it come to this, that having appealed from the opinions of your legislative department, in all its branches, to that oracle of the Constitution, the Judiciary, and finding even that against them, we are now to be threatened by an appeal to the people, over the heads of the whole Government? It is now some years since the country was put into fermentation by the irregular conduct of a foreign incendiary, in affecting to appeal from the decision of your Executive branch alone, and I did not expect to have seen this course of conduct so soon revived in a more exceptionable manner by my honorable colleague. But when he speaks of a control over our proceedings existing in nature, what can he mean? He says, not by open insurrection. Sir, I trust that considerations of a control existing over the acts of this Government in any source except the limitations of our Constitution, will not be suffered to influence our judgments in the exercise of our representative functions; they ought not to do it, and I trust they will not. But the public sentiment, we are told, is setting too strongly against us, and it is in vain to think of executing our laws in defiance of public opinion. It would be in vain, sir, to conceal that the public prejudice in the Eastern section of the Union has been too successfully operated upon by designing men, and a spirit of opposition to, and evasion of, these laws, most shamefully excited. And how has this nefarious object been effected? By the grossest misrepresentations and most palpable perversions of the objects, the causes, and the policy of this abused measure. By calumnies and misstatements emanating too often apparently from the seat of this Government. I have now in my hands a sample of one of them, which, among a thousand others of the same sort, has accidentally fallen under my notice.—[Mr. B. here read the following extract of a letter in the Boston Repertory, of the 22d instant, purporting to be written from Washington and dated November 15, 1808:]

"It is said (and there can be no doubt of the fact) that Mr. Armstrong has written a letter in which he has this observation: 'We have greatly overrated our means of coercion, the embargo is not felt here, and in England it is forgotten. I wish it was raised.' Notwithstanding this, these stupid politicians are determined to keep it on until they altogether destroy your commerce; and I believe it would give them not the least uneasiness to see a lighted torch put to your shipping at the wharves; indeed, I have heard some of them say as much."

Sir, I hope misrepresentations of this sort do not issue directly from this House, and yet the sentiment which has just been read is too much in accordance with the representations which, in the course of the last Spring, were given in handbills, circulated in a certain part of Massachusetts, purporting to be an address made to a public meeting of his constituents by an honorable member of this House, who had just come from the seat of our deliberations. We were there told of confidential and undisguised disclosures made to that gentleman by members of this House from the Southern section of the Union, that, in their opinion, our national commerce was rather an injury than a benefit, and that its advantages were not worth its protection. I do not know whether the gentleman to whom the propagation of such information was thus publicly imputed, is willing to be responsible for that which was attributed to him in the publication last alluded to; nor have I heard that he has contradicted it, and the declaration has been left to work its effect upon public prejudice. Sir, it is by calumnies of this sort that the feelings and jealousies of our citizens have been played upon, and this hostility against your laws excited. And, after all, these operations have been brought into action, gentlemen come and tell us that the public opinion in Massachusetts is setting against us, and that so repugnant are our laws to the feelings and habits of our people, that they cannot be executed. Sir, the people of that State and of all New England, are a people vigilant of their true interests, jealous, and very properly jealous, of their personal and commercial rights, and resolved to vindicate them against wanton aggression from any quarter. Goaded as they have been by artifices like these, and operated upon by misrepresentation of the views of their Southern brethren, and of the object and policy of our laws, is it strange that they have been wrought up to feverish habits, and that the execution of those laws is evaded, and in some few instances resisted? I trust that the means of true information which we have lately diffused among them, will, in a good measure, correct those misconceptions, and allay those prejudices which have been thus artfully and wickedly excited.

We are next told by the gentleman, that you cannot identify the violator of these laws with the common, unprincipled smuggler, that those who break them will not be considered as "the most worthless part of society," and therefore disreputable among their fellow-citizens. And why, sir, can you not? Because, says he, the temptation to violate is so strong that human nature cannot be expected to resist it; that the patriotism of your merchants, though it may induce them to shed their blood for the good of their country, cannot be expected to lead them to sacrifices which this system calls for. It is, sir, a rule in morals and ethics, that virtue is not virtue until it is put to the test by the ordeal of temptation; so in politics, that sort of patriotism which cannot withstand a pecuniary temptation for the good of our country, is not to be counted upon. But can it be that the gentleman has given us a correct character of the sort of patriotism of his mercantile friends; that they will consent to almost any sacrifices for their country's cause, even to the spilling of their blood, but touch their property and you touch them to the quick, and they shrink? Sir, I trust he has not done justice to the character of our merchants, and I cannot suffer his views of them to prejudice them in my esteem. They will, I trust, if our country calls, offer up not only their bodies and their blood in her cause, but will even consent to part with a little of their property, if necessary. I know that many of them would part with their all rather than they would brook dishonor.

No man, it is said, now believes that the professed objects of laying the embargo have been or can be at all answered by its continuance. The question of its continuance not being now before the House, I shall notice only some observations of my colleague as to its past effects. He says, that, as a saving of resources, the loss sustained by the country has already been greater than the saving. And how does he draw his comparison? By resorting to an estimate of our revenues—of the amount of our freightage, and the value of our shipping, taken in a year of profound peace, and at a period of prosperity unexampled, not only in the history of this nation, but of the world. He then compares the aggregate of these with an estimate of the present probable amount of revenue accruing, and the value of our freightage and shipping. But, is this comparison a fair one? Will it be pretended, that under any measure which could have been adopted, to meet the unprecedented state of things in which, by the violence of other nations, we have been placed during the past year, that state of prosperity which we had before enjoyed would not have experienced a great and a sensible change—that the amount of our revenues would not have suffered a serious diminution, and the freightage and vessels of our merchants have sunk to a very disproportionate value, compared with former times? Sir, it cannot be pretended but that such, under whatever measures had been pursued, must have been the result. The contrast presented to us by the gentleman is therefore utterly fallacious. But it may, with propriety, be considered, that all that portion of our resources, which, by being kept at home, has not fallen into the hands of our enemies, may be said to be saved to ourselves, even though their value in our hands should be greatly diminished, or even annihilated. It has not been suffered to increase their resources, and multiply their means of annoyance against us. This consideration is certainly not without its weight.

The gentleman dwells much upon the unequal pressure of this measure, and its unfair operation upon the different sections of the country. The inequality is, in my view, by no means so great as he supposes. It affects most classes of our country who have anything to affect, and those who have not, are frequently as loud against it as any other part. But the same argument would probably apply with nearly equal force against any other measure which, in any event, might be necessary to assert our rights and vindicate our commercial interests. In the event of war, (which the gentleman allows must sometimes be resorted to,) the seaboard and frontier settlements, being most exposed, must be subject to the greatest depredations, and experience the severest pressure. The great towns may be bombarded, their property ravaged, and their habitations levelled with the ground. Would our cities therefore say that we never must have war, even to save the country? These partial and unequal sacrifices for the general good always have been, and always must be, submitted to. It arises from the nature of things—is inevitable from the situation of the country—and does not grow out of this or any other particular course of measures; and especially ought any little inequalities to be submitted to, when the great object of the measure is to assert that particular interest in which the inhabitants of our cities are supposed by the gentleman to have a paramount interest.

We are warned by the gentleman not to appeal to the spirit of 1776, in aid of the general course of measures which have been taken in vindication of our rights. He tells us that the spirit of that day was one entirely different from that which governs the policy of these times; that it was a spirit of action, and not of passive submission—not of restrictions upon our commercial enterprise, but of active exertion.

Mr. QUINCY here said that he had not used the words now imputed to him; he said the word embargo was not to be found in the proceedings of that day.

Mr. BACON.—I will show the gentleman how much he will gain by his play upon words. [He then proceeded to read from the Journals of the old Congress the following paragraphs from the non-importation and non-exportation association of the Colonies, entered into by Congress, and recommended to the Colonies.]

Mr. QUINCY asked what was the date of those proceedings?

Mr. BACON answered, October 20, 1774.

Mr. QUINCY said, his expression was, that no such measure was taken in 1776.

Mr. BACON.—The gentleman is welcome to his hair-breadth escapes and his repeated explanations. I will soon bring him down to 1775—a period not very unlike 1776 in its principles and objects; nor is a non-exportation measure altogether different from an embargo.

[The following are the paragraphs referred to:]

“To obtain redress of these grievances, which threatened destruction to the lives, liberty, and property of His Majesty’s subjects in North America, we are of opinion that a non-importation, non-consumption, and non-exportation agreement, faithfully adhered to, will prove the most speedy, effectual, and peaceable measure. And therefore we do, for ourselves, and the inhabitants of the several colonies, whom we represent, firmly agree and associate, under the sacred ties of virtue, honor, and love of our country, as follows:

“1. That, from and after the 1st day of December next, we will not import into British America, from Great Britain or Ireland, any goods, wares, or merchandise, whatsoever; or, from any other place, any such goods, wares, or merchandise, as shall have been exported from Great Britain or Ireland. Nor will we, after that day, import any East India tea from any part of the world; nor any molasses, sirups, paneles, coffee, or pimento, from the British plantations or from Dominica; nor wines from Madeira or the Western Islands, nor foreign indigo.”

“4. The earnest desire we have not to injure our fellow-subjects in Great Britain, Ireland, and the West Indies, induces us to suspend a non-exportation until the tenth day of September, 1775; at which time, if the said acts and parts of acts of the British Parliament, hereinafter mentioned, are not repealed, we will not directly or indirectly export any merchandise or commodity whatsoever to Great Britain, Ireland, or the West Indies, except rice to Europe.”

This was in 1774. Again, on the 1st August, 1775, I find this further resolution:

“Resolved, That, under the prohibition, in the said association contained, to export to or import from the islands of Great Britain and Ireland, this Congress intends to comprise all exportation to or importation from the islands of Jersey, Guernsey, Sark, Alderney, and Man, and every European island settlement within the British dominions; and that, under the denomination of the West Indies, this Congress means to comprehend all the West India islands, British and foreign, to whatever State, Power, or Prince, belonging, or by whomsoever governed; and also the Summer islands, Bahama islands, Berbicia and Surinam on the Main, and every island and settlement within the latitude of the southern line of Georgia and the equator."

Thus far, sir, did the patriots of '76 commence their resistance to foreign subjugation by an embargo, and I was indeed surprised to hear my colleague endeavoring in this point of view to contrast the policy of that period and the present one, and now shielding himself from his error under a mere play upon the words by which, at different periods, the same measure happened to be called. I repeat it, then, that the spirit of the Revolution is not inaptly invoked at this crisis, nor are the measures of 1808 dishonored by a comparison with those of '76. The objects of that day and of this are substantially the same, and I trust that the same ulterior measures, and the same spirit will be found, if necessary, to carry us through the struggle.

But the gentleman protests against the suggestion of our having to pay tribute under the British orders, being brought into the debate to influence our prejudices, or alarm our apprehensions; he calls it the mere stalking-horse of party, and begs that it may be put out of the debate. He will excuse us if we cannot consent to lay aside in complaisance to him a consideration which this House and this nation never can and never ought to overlook. He does not deny that such is the requirement of the British Government; that our exports before they can go from this country to the Continent of Europe shall first enter at a British custom-house, and pay a duty to be fixed by that Government; but, says he, there is no danger that our merchants will ever pay it, because, by the French decrees, the very circumstance of their coming from England and paying the duty, subjects them to confiscation as soon as they shall arrive at a continental port. But the gentleman well knows that such of our merchants as have been allured by an improper thirst for gain, have long been in the habit of going with their cargoes from England to the Continent, notwithstanding the decrees; contriving by false and forged papers, purporting to be made out from American custom-houses, to conceal the fact of their having actually sailed from England. This is a thing now of public notoriety. There is, I am told, more than one instance of the official evidence of it in this city, and it is proved by British publications of the highest authority to have for some time been a course of business extensively pursued; and it is even said that there are in London offices where all the necessary papers for a vessel sailing from all the principal ports in the United States are to be purchased by the ream. What, then, has the commander of an American vessel, anxious to make a profitable voyage to the Continent of Europe, and unable to get there directly on account of the British orders, to do, but what it is proved too many of them have been in the habit of doing for a long time: visit Great Britain, pay the duty required upon his cargo by the acts of Parliament, purchase his forged papers giving him the appearance of coming directly from an American port, and thus complete his fraudulent voyage. But, says the gentleman, we can by our laws prohibit this procedure, and effectually punish and prevent those who would otherwise be base enough to attempt it; is this to be believed, sir? He had but a little before told us that the temptations of profit to evade our embargo laws were so great, that our merchants could not be expected to resist them; that it was too much to require of human nature, and we could not therefore execute these laws on our own soil. I ask whether the temptations of a profitable voyage to the Continent—and vastly profitable they are when they can be got through with—will not render it quite as difficult for those upon whom they operate to resist them, and whether we can expect to repress this spirit of cupidity in our citizens three thousand miles off, more easily than when they are upon our own shores? Certainly not. This disgraceful tribute, therefore, will be paid, and the consideration of it is a just and serious subject for our attention.

In answer to the inquiry which the gentleman very properly anticipated would be pressed upon him in relation to the course which in his judgment ought originally to have been pursued, instead of the one which he so much reprobates, he very modestly tells us, that it is not for him, a solitary individual, to offer his projects for the Government, though our course, he adds, is as clear as the milky way, if we would but see it. Sir, the honorable gentleman is not generally so over modest that he dare not even hint his projects to the House; nor indeed ought he to be. His talents and information will entitle him to assume a very different attitude, and he is generally not very backward in assuming it. If he or his friends have in truth some grand specific which would at once cure all the diseases of the nation, surely it is but a duty of patriotism in them to bring it forward, and let the nation see it. When they are in the habit of reprobating every other measure that can be proposed or adopted, we have a clear right to demand of them their project; we have a right to ferret them out of their lurking holes, and in the name of the nation, to demand a disclosure; but there is no danger of their disclosing that which they have not to disclose. They know full well, that in the peculiar state of this country and of the world, it is out of human power to point out any course which shall at once assert our rights, and not press upon the popular pulse and the general interest. It is safest, therefore, to deal in general assertions. The gentleman is willing generally not to submit; he would resist—but how? Why possibly it may be war. The gentleman condemns general abstract forms of legislation, as the general resort of weakness and folly. I do not think so of his general unspecified professions in relation to this subject; on the other hand they are in my view the expedient of art, of address, and of cunning, for the purpose of avoiding responsibility and commitment, and so must be received by the nation.

In conclusion I will only add, that I am rejoiced that we are likely at last to unite in one position; that the edicts which have been levelled at us are an unquestionable violation of the rights, honor, and independence of our country, and that they are not to be submitted to. I trust that the nation will follow us in this determination, and that like them, after having exhausted every other means of conciliation, and tried every other alternative, if they shall continue still to be driven from one stage of oppression to another, until having retreated to the very wall, they can consistently submit to aggression no longer; that they will then, like their fathers of 1776, without waiting to estimate the exact amount of their means, resolve at all events to vindicate their unquestionable rights, and trust to the sword for their defence.

Mr. BACON concluded by saying, that as the question of the future continuance of the embargo had been expressly left open by the committee, so he did not wish to be understood as expressing any opinion on that point. His motive in rising had been principally to vindicate the report of the select committee from the attacks of his colleague, to repel his animadversions upon its past policy and operation, and to notice some of the particular allusions to himself.

Mr. SLOAN said he should not, in asking the attention of the Committee to the remarks to which he was about to make, attempt to follow the observations of the gentleman from Massachusetts who had preceded him; and he hoped that his honest confession that he neither arrogated to himself the eloquence or information of that gentleman, would be an excuse for his blundering along in that manner of which he was capable. He first observed, that he had waited with great anxiety and much impatience to hear the commencement of a debate, which, from the importance of the subject and the suffering situation of his beloved country, he had expected would have been commenced in the first week of this important session. He had been rejoiced, therefore, to hear the resolution early brought forward by his worthy friend from Vermont, but was sorry that, at that time, observations had been made calculated to rouse into action all the angry passions which are so injurious to free discussion. This being his opinion, and having always entertained the opinion that more advantage was to be gained by discussing coolly, than in retorting with virulence and pursuing with precision, the arguments of others, he should make but little or no allusion to the observations of gentlemen who had preceded him. Mr. S. said he should—2dly. He should state his objections to the embargo laws as they now stand.

1st. Briefly notice an observation of his friend from Massachusetts, (Mr. QUINCY.)

3dly. He should give his opinion of the effect of these laws on foreign nations.

4thly. He would consider their operation on ourselves; and 5thly, and lastly, conclude with a few miscellaneous observations.

First, my friend from Massachusetts observed, that when one cheek had been slapped by Great Britain we have turned the other. Hearing this observation, I was induced to look minutely into the Message of the President of the United States to see whether this be true or not; and, having done so, I beg leave to dissent from his opinion. The President says:

“Under a continuance of the belligerent measures, which, in defiance of laws which consecrate the rights of neutrals, overspread the ocean with danger, it will rest with the wisdom of Congress to decide on the course best adapted to such a state of things; and bringing with them, as they do, from every part of the Union, the sentiment of our constituents, my confidence is strengthened that, in forming this decision, they will, with an unerring regard to the essential rights and interests of the nation, weigh and compare the painful alternatives out of which a choice is to be made.”

Now, sir, permit me to say, that this sentence does not warrant the construction put upon it; for I understand the President as having made no decision, but as having left the subject wholly to the Representatives.

It has been argued, that there is no alternative at this time but embargo or war. Did I believe this to be the fact, I should be of an opinion very different from that which I now entertain. But I do not believe that war will necessarily follow a removal of the embargo. I find, by reference to the fourth volume of the laws of the United States, that matters were carried to such a height between this country and France ten years ago, that the vessels were permitted to arm for their protection. What was the consequence of this? Did war ensue? In my apprehension it did not. I say, in my apprehension, because I recollect, at the last session, the House was divided in opinion as to the meaning of the word “war;” for some said we were at war last session, and others said we were not. In my opinion, therefore, as war did not follow the arming our merchant vessels, neither will it follow the removal of the embargo.

I will now state my Constitutional objection to the law. In the Constitution I find a power given to the Congress of the United States “to regulate commerce.” This is the only section from which the power of laying an embargo is derived. Now I address myself to the plain understanding of every member in the House, and ask whether the power to regulate be a power to annihilate? Expressing myself in my unlearned way, suppose I employ a man a number of days to regulate my orchard, do I authorize him to cut it down? Certainly not. There is a power given to Commissioners of this city to regulate the markets; have they, therefore, a right to prohibit them? I contend not; they are appointed to keep them in order, and improve them. I would not be understood as saying that Congress have not a power to lay an embargo for a short time; but I do contend that they have not power to pass a law without limitation. I voted for the first embargo law and for two supplements. Many members can bear me witness, that I opposed the third, and could I have voted upon the whole at that time, I would rather have voted against them than have voted for that supplementary law, which I considered oppressive and ruinous to the citizens of the United States. I considered it as acting unequally, and therefore unjustly; as much so as if Congress were to pass a law prohibiting the citizens of the United States from the interior of Pennsylvania or New York from taking their produce from their field or garden to carry it to market; and if any member in this House can satisfy me that there is any substantial difference between this, and prohibiting persons who had laid out their all in purchasing coasting vessels from carrying produce from one port to another, then I may be convinced that the third supplement was proper. I was willing to apply Constitutional power to prevent our citizens from exporting to a foreign market; but I would not prevent them from carrying produce to any place they conceived most convenient and ready, when the embargo should be raised, to make the most of it.

I will now give my opinion of the effect which this law has had upon foreign nations. I will not dwell upon the causes which produced it, nor the motives which induce others now to wish a continuance of it, for I believe the Representatives of the people never to have any other object in view than the public good. I conceive, however, that this measure has been pleasing to the British Government, for the reason that that Government has always been jealous of our commercial prosperity. The glorious luminary of Heaven is not more obvious to my view than that measure is giving them all that they wish. Methinks I hear them felicitating themselves on the arrival of the blessed time when they should not only occupy every sea, but become the carriers of the whole world. The embargo I consider as calculated to favor their purpose. Spain is nobly contending for her rights, and this I say, because I think every nation under Heaven is entitled to a choice of its Government; and the embargo prohibits our furnishing them with supplies. It also prohibits the export to St. Domingo, and other places against which we have no cause of complaint, and which the Emperor Napoleon is endeavoring to subjugate. Therefore I consider it perfectly congenial at this time to the will of the Emperor of the French, while England is at the same time enjoying that trade to St. Domingo and elsewhere, which would be extremely beneficial to us.

Now as to its effects upon ourselves, I consider it as acting partially and unequally upon different parts of the country, and that it must, in a short time, if continued, reduce to distress a large portion of the industrious part of the community. I mean those who have purchased land which they cannot pay for, those whose dependence and usual occupation is fishing, those who are solely employed in the coasting trade, and the seamen employed in conveying produce; as much they will be distressed as if Congress were to pass a law that the farmer or planter should farm or plant no more. In making these observations, I conceive that I am fully justified by sentiments which I have gathered from a large portion of citizens, particularly in the city of Philadelphia, which ranks as one of the first in the Union. I live near them, and think it my duty to inform the House that, for months before I left home, I was wearied with the cries of those suffering from the embargo, and hoping that something might be done for them. One woman says, "my husband has been out of employ so long, the family is starving; the embargo has ruined us; we cannot live over the winter." These cries, Mr. S. said, met his ears, and he always hoped to be sensible to the sufferings of the weak, and to be able to plead their cause.

Mr. S. adverted to the late elections in Pennsylvania, which he said were no proof of the approbation by the people of the embargo. He said that whatever he might be considered elsewhere, he was in the city of Philadelphia considered a Democratic Republican, and that the Republicans there said to him, if not to others, "we will support our principles; but we hope something will be done for us, for we cannot support the embargo." Mr. S. deprecated the making this a question of party. Did he come here to legislate for Democratic Republicans only? No; and it would hurt his feelings as much to hear the cries of the wife of a poor suffering Federalist as of the wife of a Democratic Republican.

Mr. S. concluded with miscellaneous remarks of some length. He exhorted the Representatives not to take a partial view; each of them ought to look widely around him in the performance of his legislative duty; to resemble Him, according to the poet,

"Who sees with equal eye, as God of all,

"A hero perish or a sparrow fall."

He alluded again to the distress in Philadelphia and elsewhere; spoke of the enormous and usurious interest he had of late known to be paid on money; stated the evil consequences of permitting the dishonest violators of the laws to make fortunes at the expense of honest citizens, and its tendency to promote evasion of revenue laws hereafter. He hinted at the danger of opposition to the laws from citizens with arms in their hands, and finally observed that he wished the embargo laws wholly repealed; though he might be induced to vote for any measure which should be thought proper to supply their place.

Mr. SMILIE said he just rose to express his feelings at the fatherly regard the gentleman (Mr. SLOAN) had manifested for the people of Pennsylvania. He had expected, however, that he would have furnished the House with an account of the state of the people in his own district. It was a little strange that the city of Philadelphia, which had two Representatives on the floor, should have chosen the gentleman from New Jersey as the organ for communicating their complaints to the House. From them there had been no complaint. Indeed, there had been no petition or remonstrance from the State of Pennsylvania respecting the embargo. Perhaps the reason the gentleman from New Jersey was applied to was, the great weight which it was known he had in the House. But with respect to Pennsylvania the Government might be easy. He pledged himself that that State would support Government in all Constitutional and necessary measures, notwithstanding what had been said by the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. SLOAN said he would just observe that this was the first time that he had ever heard that a member from any particular State could not give his opinion as to any other State in the Union.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, said that the report of the committee to whom had been referred that part of the Message of the President, which respected our foreign relations, was now out before the sovereign people of the United States; and while their Representatives were deliberating concerning it they also were considering and making their opinions of it.

It is desirable, said he, that this first resolution may have the support of every gentleman in this House, and that there may be a concurrence on the reasons which will decide the vote of this Committee on this resolution.

This resolution is a proposition deduced from the facts stated in the report; the report is a concise and correct statement of the case between the United States and Great Britain, and between the United States and France, respectively. It virtually is an appeal on behalf of the United States, and a declaration or manifest to all the world. It is not a declaration of independence; but a declaration is implied in the proposition, that is to say, the rights, honor, and independence of the United States are violated by the late edicts of Great Britain and France, and the United States cannot submit to the said edicts. To declare the United States of America free, sovereign, and independent, does not remain to be done. On the fourth day of July, in the year one thousand seven hundred and seventy-six, the United States of America were declared free, sovereign, and independent—that declaration was made with the noise of drums, the sound of trumpets, the thunder of artillery, and the shouts of thousands of brave men in arms. The sound of that declaration was loud and strong; it passed over and vibrated on the shores of the Atlantic, bounding the nations of Europe. The nations heard the sound, and all, except one, (Great Britain,) hailed with welcome the origin and rise of this new nation in the West, and said "let it be perpetual." Great Britain itself, after a bloody seven years' war, was compelled to acknowledge, in due form, by solemn treaty, that the United States of America were free, sovereign, and independent, as they had declared themselves to be, and that declaration is engraved on the tablet of eternity, and will never be erased.

The United States, sovereign and independent, have certain attributes and properties, and rights, without which sovereignty cannot exist. Among these may be numbered a supreme power of legislation, of ordaining and executing their own Government—a right to pursue their own happiness—to cultivate their own fields—to manufacture articles, such as may be deemed proper, and to navigate the ocean, in the exercise of commerce, agreeably to public law and public reason. "In the beginning, the ocean was composed of elementary particles, free and voluble, being part of the great donation to the human family, and rolling on the shores of islands and continents, it presents itself for use. The ocean is the right and common property, and the great road of all nations who may choose to use it."

The late edicts of Great Britain and France stated in the report, are the cause of the resolution now under consideration. An object of the resolution is to pledge every citizen, and every State and Territory of the United States, mutually and reciprocally to each other, in the support and maintenance of the rights, honor, and independence of these United States—"for, (in the language of the report,) the question for every citizen now is, whether he will rally round the Government of his choice, or enlist under foreign banners; whether he will be for his country or against his country?" An effect of the resolution, if agreed to, will be confidence of the citizens mutually in each other, and they will be, as they are, and ought to be, "a band of brothers." There is reason to believe that various reports, the offspring of discord, and injurious to the United States, have occasionally, by accident or design, reached foreign Powers; the resolution, if adopted, will have powerful effect in evidencing the unreasonableness and inconsistency of all such reports.

Mr. R. said by the word edicts, used in this resolution, he understood all the Proclamations, Orders of Council, acts of Parliament, and decisions of Courts of Admiralty of Great Britain, and all the decrees and decisions of the tribunals of France, which violate the rights, the honor, and the independence of the United States. If it shall be asked, how are the rights of the United States violated by the edicts? It is answered—the report of the committee states how. Let the thousands of the seafaring citizens of the United States who are impressed, and separated from their friends, families, and country, have been forced on board of British armed vessels, and therein compelled to fight against nations with whom their country is not at war, speak and answer. Property to the amount of many millions of dollars belonging to citizens of the United States engaged in lawful commerce, consistent with the principles of public reason, has been captured on the ocean, and condemned by Courts of Admiralty, in pursuance of the same edicts; let that property answer. If it be asked, how is the honor of the United States violated by the edicts? It may be answered, that the United States, intent to preserve peace, and to continue in possession of those blessings which constitute national happiness, heretofore have not appealed to the sword, but endeavored by friendly negotiation to obtain redress for injuries and violences committed on them, in consequence of the same edicts; and from the same peaceable conduct, cause may be assumed to suppose that the United States will not do what is in their power to do to obtain satisfaction for injuries received, and to prevent in future the operation of the edicts.

If it be asked, how is the sovereignty of the United States violated by the edicts? It is answered, by the Constitution of the United States the Congress have power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization; that several persons, emigrants from the British dominions, have, since the Treaty of Peace with Great Britain, arrived in the United States, and in pursuance of laws of naturalization enacted by Congress have become citizens of the United States; notwithstanding which, by a late proclamation of the King of the United Kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland, all such emigrants are required to return to the dominions of the said King; which requisition, so far as it can, goes to make void and of no effect the naturalization and citizenship of the same persons, and to contravene and repeal the laws in virtue whereof they became citizens, and to supersede and overthrow the Constitution, and Government, and sovereignty of the United States.

If the edicts of Great Britain and France are submitted to, what rights of the United States will be sacrificed? The neutral rights of the United States will be destroyed, and the right of navigating on the ocean, consistent with the rules of public reason, will be annihilated, and their commerce will be subservient to the rules, regulations, and laws of foreign Powers.

The United States, by the ever to be remembered Declaration of Independence, took high ground among the nations of the earth. The great men who, on behalf of this nation, signed their names to that declaration—their successors and followers, and citizens of every rank, who carried on the mighty work of Revolution, and in any manner assisted therein, persevered against all opposition, and finally succeeded in the establishment of this nation on the high ground which had been taken and manifested to all the world, in the same Declaration of Independence. A submission to the edicts will be descending from the high stand taken by the Declaration of Independence, and a sacrifice of the honor of the United States. Mr. R. said, let the members of this House read the Declaration of Independence—let them read the last paragraph of that declaration—let every citizen of the United States read it—and then let every one lay his hand on his breast and ask himself, am I prepared to depart and descend from the state and situation which the great and good men who effected the Revolution placed me on? If there be any one who will openly say and avow, that he is willing and prepared to descend from that state of national honor, let him say so—let him speak out, that he may be known.

If the edicts are submitted to, how or in what manner will the independence of the United States be sacrificed? Wherever supreme legislative power is, there dwells sovereignty. Whatever nation has power to impose laws on another, is sovereign to that other. If the edicts are submitted to by the United States, the United States will be bound by the Proclamations, Orders of Council, acts of Parliament, decrees and decisions of Courts of Admiralty of foreign Powers, in making, enacting, and ordaining, whereof they, the United States, had no voice. Where this state of national existence begins, national sovereignty ends, and a species of colonial or territorial, or tributary existence commences.

This proposition, said Mr. R., is a resolution properly, that is a determination; and, when agreed to, will be an expression of the will of this nation—a firm, immoveable, irrevocable determination not to submit to the late edicts of Great Britain and France.

Mr. R. said he had no design to offer any amendment to the first resolution reported by the committee, but for argument or illustration would suppose a motion made to amend it, by striking out the syllable "not," in the word "cannot," in the first line of the resolution, so that it might then read—"Resolved, That the United States can, without a sacrifice of their rights, honor, and independence, submit to the late edicts of Great Britain and France." And suppose that amendment was agreed to, and this resolution so amended, should, together with the report, go out to the sovereign people of this nation for their inspection and approbation; what would they think? What would they say? What would they do? What would they not do? What would they not inflict on us, their Representatives, for agreeing on their behalf to such a dishonorable resolution? They would, and justly too, hurl vengeance on our devoted heads for sacrificing their rights, their honor, and their independence. Let us beware; the never-sleeping eye of the mighty spirit of this injured nation is watching and observing us, is marking and noting down all our conduct. This first resolution, Mr. R. said, is a complete text—every word of it is expressive—it is expressive of all the injuries, outrages, and oppressions, that these United States have, for many years past; endured from unjust and overbearing force and power. To add to or subtract from this resolution would destroy it; and every proposed amendment must have that object in whole or in part in view.

Mr. R. said he had not been able to please himself in doing justice to the merits of the resolution; that he had stated only some of its great outlines, and must submit a further elucidation of it to any gentleman better prepared who may think proper to do it. He said he considered the resolution under consideration all important—at this particular time more peculiarly so—and that it would have his support.

Mr. R. said he did not wish to make a text of any observation of any gentleman; but as the word tribute had been mentioned, and some gentleman had said that that word ought to be discarded and dismissed from the debate, it was not his inclination to dismiss or discard that word. He thought the term appropriate—that the word tribute was nearly synonymous with the word tax or toll—that if a man is authorized by law to fix a turnpike on a highway or great road, and to collect from travellers a certain sum of money, that is called tax or toll. If a man is possessed of force and power sufficient to enable him arbitrarily or despotically to establish a turnpike gate on a highway, and to compel every passenger to pay to him a sum of money, say one dollar, for liberty to travel on the road to pass through the gate, that dollar in that case may properly be called tribute.

Mr. R. said, he contended that the ocean was a highway of nations, and if any one nation, for instance Great Britain, was possessed of maritime power and force sufficient to compel any other nation engaged in commerce to land its produce and pay tax or duty for it, to have liberty to convey it on the ocean to any third nation, that tax or duty may be properly denominated tribute; because the nation paying it is by superior force and power compelled to pay it to that nation who, by force, has arbitrarily and despotically, and contrary to public reason, erected an imaginary turnpike on the ocean to the complete destruction of all neutral commerce, and to effect and establish a perfect system of universal commercial monopoly. Mr. R. said he admitted that the maritime power of Great Britain was superior, that it extended over the ocean from the rising to the setting sun, and from the frozen ocean in the South to the frozen ocean in the North; but that notwithstanding this, he never would agree that the United States shall submit to the edicts of Great Britain. He said he also admitted that the power of France on the Continent of Europe was superior; notwithstanding that, he would never agree that the United States shall submit to the edicts of France. He said it was his opinion, and he firmly believed, that the sovereignty and independence of the United States were placed on a firm and immovable foundation, and could not be overturned, and that they would be rising in virtue, honor, in greatness, in power, and in national happiness and felicity, when some of the nations who now oppress them would be sinking into corruption, mouldering into ruin, and blotted out, except in remembrance. Nations, in respect to existence, he said, are as trees in the forest; the loftiest, proudest oak, that has stood firm against the storms of ages, originating from an acorn, vegetating to greatness, and lifting its high head to the heavens, at length attains its utmost—decay begins, corruption progresses, it tumbles down from its height, and lays prostrate on parent earth, there it dissolves and returns to its pristine indiscriminate condition.

When Mr. R. had concluded,

Mr. COOK moved that the Committee rise and report progress—negatived, 55 to 50.

Mr. RANDOLPH begged leave to renew the motion that the Committee now rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again. He did this from a knowledge that some gentlemen had already left the House from indisposition, and others would soon follow their example, unless the Committee would indulge them by rising.

The motion was carried, ayes 71, and the House immediately adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, November 30.

On motion of Mr. HOLMES,

Ordered, That the Message of the President of the United States, of the sixth of February, one thousand eight hundred and seven, and a report of the Secretary of State of the fourteenth of December last, relative to a claim of the legal representatives of the late Caron de Beaumarchais, with the documents accompanying the same, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS, after a few prefatory observations, offered the following resolutions, the first of which was referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, but not acted on, last session:

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting the entry of any vessel into the United States from any port or place, to which a vessel of the United States is not admitted by permanent regulations of the Government owning such port or place, or by treaty.

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting the masters, commanders, and owners of vessels of the United States from receiving British licenses, and of enforcing the return of all vessels of the United States now without the same."

These resolutions were agreed to without opposition.

The following Message, was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

According to the request of the House of Representatives, expressed in their resolution of the twenty-fifth instant, I now lay before them a copy of my Proclamation of the nineteenth of April last.

Nov. 30, 1808.

TH. JEFFERSON.

By the President of the United States.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas information has been received that sundry persons are combined or combining and confederating together on Lake Champlain, and in the country thereto adjacent, for the purpose of forming insurrections against the authority of the laws of the United States, for opposing the same and obstructing their execution, and that such combinations are too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the power vested in the Marshals by the laws of the United States:

Now, therefore, to the end that the authority of the laws may be maintained, and that those concerned directly or indirectly in any insurrection or combination against the same may be duly warned, I have issued this my Proclamation, hereby commanding such insurgents, and all concerned in such combinations, instantly and without delay to disperse and retire peaceably to their respective abodes. And I do hereby further require and command all officers having authority, civil or military, and all other persons, civil and military, who shall be found within the vicinity of such insurrections or combinations, to be aiding and assisting, by all the means in their power, by force of arms or otherwise, to quell and subdue such insurrections or combinations, to seize upon all those therein concerned, who shall not instantly and without delay disperse and retire to their respective abodes, and to deliver them over to the civil authority of the place, to be proceeded against according to law.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States to be affixed to these presents, and signed the same with my hand.

Given at the City of Washington, the 19th day of April, 1808, and in the sovereignty and independence of the United States the thirty-second.

By the President: T. JEFFERSON.

JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State.

The said Message and Proclamation were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations; the first resolution reported by the committee still under consideration, as follows:

Resolved, That the United States cannot, without a sacrifice of their rights, honor, and independence, submit to the late edicts of Great Britain and France."

Mr. JOHNSON said, that in discussing this subject he should consider the whole subject of foreign relations before the Committee. The first resolution he considered of primary importance, as containing a solemn declaration that the edicts of the two mighty belligerents of Europe were violations of our honor, our independence, and our sovereignty. An unanimous expression of this sentiment, said he, would give us confidence in each other; it will be a sacred pledge of all parties to resist these degrading encroachments; difference of opinion would then be manifested but as the means of saving this nation from the impending calamity. The whole nation would understand this declaration, that he who is not for us is against us—no neutrals. There can be no middle ground. The line should be drawn, that the friends and enemies of this country should be known; that the persecuted foreigner who left his native home to escape the iron yoke of despotism, may be distinguished from foreign agents and emissaries settled among us for the purposes of disaffection; and that American newspapers differing only as to the means of national security may be known from the seditious hirings of foreign gold, whose daily avocation is the abuse of our Government, and the justification of foreign aggression.

To prove the great design of the French Emperor, we refer to the execution of the Berlin decree—unfriendly vexations of our trade in the Mediterranean and the English channel; the destruction of our merchant vessels upon the high seas by fire; the Milan and Bayonne decrees, under which our vessels have been detained and their cargoes confiscated.

To prove the deliberate hostility of the British Cabinet towards the United States, we refer to a catalogue of outrages of still deeper dye, and as to the quantum, of tenfold magnitude—a hostility coeval with the birth of this nation. Without magnanimity in prosperity, unadmonished by adversity, her conduct has been the same. Talk not of her conflict for existence. In the years 1791, '92, '93, '94, when she had to battle the combined Powers of Europe against France, haughty and imperious, our country fell a sacrifice to the cupidity of her cruisers, and our seamen were dragged into slavery upon British ships of war. And since the scene has been changed, and Napoleon leads the same Continental Confederacy against England, her conduct has been the same—our seamen still impressed, and our commerce put under tribute.

I am more than astonished to see this House therefore inundated by every mail with publications from the East, declaring that we have no cause of complaint against Great Britain; that we should rescind the proclamation of interdict against British armed vessels; that we should repeal the non-importation law; that the embargo should be taken off as to Great Britain; that we should go to war with France; that punctilio prevents a settlement of our differences with Great Britain; inviting the people to violate and disregard the embargo, to put the laws and the Constitution at defiance, and rise in rebellion.

These considerations induced me to examine this matter, and to prove to every honest American, what we all believe in this place, that the object of one Power is to destroy our neutrality and involve us in the convulsing wars of Europe; and the object of the other, a monopoly of our commerce, and the destruction of our freedom and independence. Let evidence as conclusive as holy writ put the enemies of this insulted country to shame. We are informed by our Minister in London, (Mr. Monroe,) in a communication dated August, 1807, that a war party of powerful combination and influence existed in Great Britain, who wanted to extend their ravages to this country; that we could not make calculations upon the justice of Great Britain; that in her many assumptions of power and principle she would yield but from the absolute necessity. Who is this war party? The British navy, to whom we have opened our ports, and extended all the hospitalities of a generous nation; while in the enjoyment of which that very navy waged war against our unoffending citizens. The ship owners, the East and West India merchants, and what cause have they for war? The enterprising citizens of the United States have been their rivals and superiors in a lawful and profitable commerce; and, lastly, political characters of high consideration. These compose this war party. In January, 1804, in an official communication of Mr. Madison, Mr. Monroe is charged with the suppression of impressment as his primary object; 2d, the definition of blockade; 3d, the reduction of the list of contraband; 4th, the enlargement of our trade with hostile colonies. The negotiation opens and what is done? With industry and exertion our Minister was unable to bring the British Cabinet to any amicable arrangement. Lords Hawkesbury, Harrowby, Mulgrave, and Mr. Fox, succeeded each other, and every attempt to negotiate was in vain. Each of them brings expressions of good will and good disposition towards the United States, and a wish for amicable arrangement. But these professions and dispositions evaporate in invitations to the country and the city—in promises and procrastinations. To-day we are amused with a conversation at the foreign office, which animates with a lively hope—to-morrow hope is swallowed up in despair—and the third day announces some new injury. Affairs on the Continent now call the attention of the British Ministry, and with every disposition of good will there must be a pause. In this amicable pause business required that our Minister should go to Old Spain; but upon his return to England, what astonishment seized his mind at the sad spectacle the changing scenes presented. Under the old rule of '56, and other interpolations upon public law, our merchant vessels are swept from the bosom of the ocean without notice, by British cruisers, and carried into British ports for condemnation. But why this change? A coalition had been formed in the North against France. British gold effected it. Russia and Austria had combined against France, and here the hopes of England rested.

But we all know her hopes were blasted. This is the reason why the blow was aimed, and your commerce sacrificed. The remonstrances of our Minister could not keep pace with new aggressions. This temporizing policy of England, and the destruction of our commerce, buried party spirit in America for the moment, and produced an indignant protest against her conduct from the great commercial cities in the Union, in which their lives and their property were pledged to support the Government in measures of just retaliation. And on this occasion the merchants of Boston requested the President to send a special Envoy to England, to give a greater solemnity to our claims of indemnity and future security. The cause of the merchants became a common cause, and the non-importation law was enacted, and Mr. Pinkney sent as a special Minister, agreeably to request. Let the commercial interest cease to complain. It is for them principally that we now suffer. These deeply-inflicted wounds upon the commerce of America, engulfed for a moment the consideration of the primary object of Mr. Monroe's mission—the impressment of seamen—and it would seem, that when our Minister pressed one great subject of complaint, some greater outrage was committed to draw our attention from the former injury. Thus the unavailing exertions of our Minister for upwards of two years at the Court of St. James, eventuated in an extraordinary mission, and the non-importation law; a measure of retaliation, and which rendered us less dependent upon a foreign Government for such articles as can be manufactured at home. To bring further evidence of British hostility, let us attend a little to the Administration of Mr. Fox. He came into office about the 1st of February. On the 31st of May, information was received in London of the extra mission of Mr. Pinkney. Mr. Monroe, therefore, had an opportunity of about four months with Mr. Fox to settle our differences, without any interruption, not even the ideal one which has been suggested, as giving a temporary stay to the negotiation, viz: the waiting the arrival of Mr. Pinkney. The United States had a right to expect something like justice from this able Minister, because he entertained a sincere desire to conciliate the friendship of this nation by acts of justice. But in this just expectation we were disappointed. The hostility of other members of the Cabinet with whom he was associated, was the real cause of difficulty, joined perhaps with his sudden indisposition and death. Mr. Fox acknowledged our right to the colonial trade; he promised to stop the capture and condemnation of our merchant vessels; but when pressed to answer our complaints in writing, he promised, but broke that promise; and ultimately refused to give any orders with respect to the capture and condemnation of our vessels. Thus the golden apple was presented to our grasp, and then snatched forever from our sight.

Now let the Committee attend to the chapter of negotiation, which produced the rejected treaty. First, the subject of blockade is proposed, and a definition demanded. We denied the doctrine of paper breastworks, spurious and illegitimate blockades, to be executed in every sea by the British Navy, of which our neutral rights were the victims. Such as the blockade of the coast of Europe from the Elbe to Brest, of the Elbe, the Weiser and Ems. The whole coast of Old Spain, of the Dardanelles, and Smyrna, and of Curraçoa. Upon this subject, Great Britain would yield nothing.

2. No duty can be laid upon American exports, but Great Britain imposes a duty of four per cent. upon her exports to the United States, under the name of a convoy duty; by which duty the citizens of the United States pay to Great Britain an annual amount of $1,300,000; but upon this unfriendly discrimination she will yield nothing.

3. Upon the search of merchant vessels she would yield nothing.

4. Upon the colonial trade she imposed new restrictions. She would yield nothing; a trade which produced the United States revenue to the amount of $1,300,000 per annum; and furnished exports from the United States of $50,000,000 annually.

5. Upon the West India trade she would yield nothing, and upon the East India trade she imposed new restrictions.

6. Upon the impressment of seamen, the subject was too delicate; she was fighting for her existence; she would yield nothing.

7. Upon the mutual navigation of the St. Lawrence, so important to the Northern States, they would yield nothing; but would demand a monopoly of the fur trade, and influence over the Indians within our own limits. Thus ended the chapter of negotiation.

I turn with indignation from this to a new species of injury, involving the events connected with and preceding the President's proclamation interdicting the armed vessels of Great Britain from our waters. I allude to the conduct of the officers of the British navy, and the evident connivance of the British Government. I will only mention three prominent cases.

1st. The Cambrian, and other British cruisers, commanded by Captain Bradley, who entered the port of New York, and in defiance of the Government arrested a merchant vessel, and impressed into the ships of war a number of seamen and passengers, refused to surrender them upon demand, and resisted the officers, served with regular process of law, for the purpose of arresting the offenders.

2d. The case of the Leander, Captain Whithy, with other British armed vessels, hovering about New York, vexing the trade of that port, arresting a coasting vessel of the United States by firing a cannon, which entered the vessel and killed John Pierce. The murder of Pierce, a fact so notorious, could not be proved in a sham trial in England, though the most unexceptionable characters are sent as witnesses from the United States; and not even an explanation is made to satisfy this country for the murder of a citizen. Call upon the citizens of New York, who saw the body of their slaughtered countryman; ask the mourning relatives of the murdered Pierce, whether he was slain or not! But from this tragic scene we must turn to one of a deeper hue.

The attack upon the Chesapeake. This vessel had just left the shores of Virginia, leaving the British ship of war, the Leopard, enjoying the hospitalities of our laws. The Chesapeake was bound to the Mediterranean in defence of our rights. One hundred and seventy American tars were on board, who had undertaken this honorable enterprise. Unsuspecting of harm, while their rough cheeks were bedewed with tears in parting from their friends and country, their powder-horns empty, rods mislaid, wads too large, guns not primed—all was confusion. In this unhappy moment the messenger of death comes. The unfortunate Barron refuses to permit his men to be mustered by any but an American officer. His Government had given the command. This is the provocation. The vessel is attacked, and, without resistance, eight are wounded, three are killed, and four taken and carried into British service, one of whom has been hung as a malefactor in Nova Scotia. It has been said, that the Goddess of Liberty was born of the ocean. At this solemn crisis, when the blood of these American seamen mingled with the waves, then this sea nymph arose indignant from the angry billows, and, like a redeeming spirit, kindled in every bosom indignation and resentment. A nation of patriots have expressed their resentment, and the sound has reached the utmost bounds of the habitable world. Let a reasoning world judge whether the President's proclamation was too strong for this state of things, and whether it should be rescinded without atonement.

Do the wrongs of this nation end with this outrage? No. Clouds thicken upon us; our wrongs are still increased; during the sensibility of this nation, and without atonement for the attack upon the Chesapeake, on the 16th October, 1807, a proclamation issues from the British Cabinet respecting sea-faring persons, enlarging the principles of former encroachments upon the practice of impressment. This proclamation makes it the indispensable duty of her naval officers to enter the unarmed merchant vessels of the United States, and impress as many of the crew as a petty and interested naval officer may without trial point out as British subjects. The pretension is not confined to the search after deserters, but extended to masters, carpenters, and naturalized citizens of the United States—thus extending their municipal laws to our merchant vessels and this country, and denying us the right of making laws upon the subject of naturalization. The partners of British and Scotch merchants can cover their property and their merchandise from other nations under the neutral flag of the United States to Leghorn, Amsterdam, Hamburg, &c. But the patriotic Irishman or Englishman who has sought this protecting asylum of liberty, are not secured by our flag from the ruthless fangs of a British press gang. And at this very moment our native citizens and adopted brethren, to a considerable number, are doomed to the most intolerable thralldom in the British navy by this degrading practice. There the freedom of our citizens depends upon the mercy of naval officers of Great Britain; and, upon this subject, every proposition for arrangement is trampled down by these unjust pretensions. Information was just received of the execution of the Berlin Decree, when the papers from every quarter announced the existence of the British Orders in Council, making a sweeping dash at our rightful commerce. Something must be done. The events which have been retraced, all pressed upon us. The treatment of our Minister, and his unavailing exertions; the result of the negotiation which gave birth to the rejected treaty; the memorials of the merchants; the outrageous conduct of the British naval officers upon our seaboard; the connivance at their conduct by the British Government; the proclamation of October 16, 1807; the execution of the Berlin Decree, and the Orders in Council. These considerations required the arm of Government, and at this inauspicious period, when the clouds which had so long threatened and darkened our political horizon gathered to a thick and horrible tempest, which now seemed about to burst upon our devoted nation, the embargo snatched our property from the storm, and deprived the thunderbolt of its real calamities. The effects of this measure at home and abroad, notwithstanding its inconveniences, will best attest the wisdom of the measure, which will be increased in its efficacy by a total non importation law. As a measure of coercion upon other nations, I not only have the strongest hopes, but also a rational confidence in it, founded upon the most conclusive evidence. The misrepresentations in this country, the violations of the embargo, and the hope of changing the parties in the United States, or of producing a separation of the States; these miscalculations have destroyed entirely the efficacy of this measure, and been a main cause why Great Britain has not relaxed in her injustice towards America. And if we can rigidly enforce this system, my confidence is undiminished, my faith strong, that the United States will have reasonable terms offered to them. Yet the violators of your laws have been the great cause why the present state of things has been protracted. They are as infamous as the cowboys in the Revolution, who embodied themselves to feed our enemies with the only cow of a weeping widow, or a poor soldier who was fighting for his country. The commerce of the United States with the West Indies, the Continent of Europe, and Great Britain, will present to this Committee the evidence upon which this faith is bottomed. The United States have furnished the West Indies with the essentials of existence, and also have afforded a market for the colonial produce of those islands. In fact, they cannot live without provisions from the United States in the present state of the world. These islands have been reduced to wretchedness and want already, notwithstanding the violations of the embargo, and flour, we learn, has been as high as 20, 30, 40, 50, and $60 per barrel. The vast importance of these possessions alone, to the mother country, might have been sufficient to have produced a settlement of our differences, if other considerations had not prevented. Attend to the trade with England and the Continent previous to the Orders in Council. The annual exports of British manufactures to the United States amount to twelve million pounds sterling. In exchange for these manufactured articles, Great Britain receives to the amount of four million pounds sterling in tobacco, cotton, wheat, and the substantial of life. The eight millions which remain due must be paid in money or bills. To raise this money, the American merchants carry to the Continent of Europe produce of the United States to the amount of this eight millions, which is sold, and the amount remitted to the merchants in London to pay the debts of our merchants. This trade is now destroyed by the Orders in Council, and not the embargo—for this very measure has saved our vessels from capture, our merchandise from condemnation, and our seamen from impressment.

Admit for one moment that our embargo was raised to-morrow, and the merchants were permitted to carry on their commerce, keeping out of view the disgrace of submitting to British and French edicts, and what would be the result? If the merchants directed their course to any other ports than those of the British dominions and countries in alliance and friendship with her, then your property must only float upon the ocean as materials for British plunder. If they were to direct their course to the ports of the British dominions, they would be subject to capture by the French privateers. But admit that our vessels would escape these privateers, what price would our merchants get for their produce in British warehouses, when the British dominions would not consume fifteen millions of our exports, which have amounted altogether, foreign and domestic, to one hundred and eight millions? In this state of things our merchants would see their merchandise rotting in the British warehouses, with expenses of carriage upon it, without a possibility of relieving it from that situation. The Orders in Council, and not the embargo, have destroyed the commerce of the world. The commerce of the United States is of infinite importance to Great Britain. The whole manufacturing interest, the mechanic, the laboring poor, are deeply injured by its suspension. We shall no longer furnish a market for her manufacturers, nor furnish her the raw material and other exports important to her. Mr. J. then adverted to a statement of the exports from Great Britain to all the world, which had the stamp of authority upon it, amounting to thirty-seven million pounds sterling; and after deducting the exports to places from which Great Britain is now entirely excluded, including America, her exports would amount only to about six millions pounds sterling. Could a nation countenance a system like this when her very existence depended upon commerce? She might brave the storm for a season, and the immense capital thrown into the island of Great Britain for want of commerce, might enable the Cabinet to facilitate their loans; but a change must take place if this nation would persevere. Attend to London and Liverpool merchants, and Mr. Brougham, in the House of Commons, against the Orders in Council, and this statement will be confirmed. It was proved that, before the Orders in Council, the usual activity in trade existed. The merchants received the same remittances; the premium on insurance was the same. But when the Orders in Council were issued, the premiums on insurances amounted to a prohibition of trade. Merchants who had received remittances to the amount of £100,000 monthly, received nothing. Men of business reduced their hands from the number of fifty to twelve, and others reduced the wages which they paid for labor, from £200 per week to £50. Orders were protested, and the Orders in Council assigned as the special reason. Notwithstanding these facts, the cry is, take off the embargo. All the evils which afflict this nation are ascribed to the embargo, when in fact it protects our commerce from plunder.

Turn your attention, sir, to the interior of Great Britain. The embargo has produced other effects. The weavers and tailors assembled by hundreds and by thousands, in a peaceable way, to remonstrate against the Orders in Council; but they were welcomed home to see their families starve by the sound of the cannon, and some of them killed. And when these effects are seen, Mr. Canning tells us that he would gladly remove the embargo, as a measure of inconvenient restriction upon the American citizens, if it could be done without a great sacrifice, or without seeming to interfere in measures of our internal regulation. The prudence of His Majesty is very conspicuous, and his tenderness truly paternal. But, recollect the proclamation which issued from the British Cabinet, inviting and encouraging the violators of the embargo! The arms of His Britannic Majesty opened to receive smugglers! Come in, all ye heavy-laden with provisions, and I will give you rest! Whether you have papers or not, you shall not be molested. Thus, protection is offered to the smuggler, whilst the bona fide merchant must be driven from the ocean, or fall a sacrifice to the Orders in Council.

Foreign Relations.

H. OF R.

We have been admonished by gentlemen not to use the word tribute. If I should not be able to forget words which some gentlemen consider mere declamation, but which upon my mind make an awful impression, I hope to be excused. The British Orders in Council do fix a tax upon our commerce, as much as if it were imposed upon the wheat in your barn, the horse you ride, or the corn in the field; and submit to one on account of the superiority of the British navy, the other will soon follow, and be enforced by a standing army. A merchant vessel loads with cotton for the continent of Europe—the ship and cargo the property of an American citizen: Great Britain has said by her orders, confirmed by an act of Parliament, that the merchant shall enter a British port and pay a tonnage duty, a tax of ninepence per pound on the cotton, and then pay for a license—a pass to sail to Europe! Is this taxation or not? And an attempt has been made to evade the force of this statement, by saying that the tax would not be paid, because France had said, if we pay this infamous tribute, our property shall be confiscated on its arrival at the Continent.

Thus, the iniquity of the Orders in Council is washed away by a declaration from Napoleon, that we shall not pay this tribute, under the penalty of confiscation. But, sir, suppose our merchant should refuse to go by a British port and pay this tax, what follows? British cruisers will capture the vessels, and a British court of admiralty will condemn your cargo, under these blessed Orders in Council.

It is time that party spirit should sleep in oblivion. I exhort gentlemen to recollect the importance of union. At the most alarming crisis that ever convulsed the political world; when Empires and Kingdoms have changed with the season; and America, buffeted on every side, has maintained the ground of perfect neutrality; this nation should make a pause on this high eminence, before they plunge into the dread conflict. One false step might irretrievably involve the country in the common broil. If war becomes necessary, and the present measure should fail to coerce our enemies, the object in view is worth the conflict. But, between the non-intercourse system and war there is no alternative. A Republican Government should never seek or invite war; but they will never abandon their independence, or yield to the unjust demands of Imperial despotism or monopolizing monarchy.

We have been told not to invoke the spirit of 1776, and that it would become a tormentor to the embargo system. Sir, let us invoke and hail that spirit. When it comes, it will only frown on the enemies of our country.

The parallel between the times preceding the Declaration of Independence and the times preceding 1808 is awfully impressive. In both cases, as far as England is concerned, this nation had to resist taxation of a British Parliament. Without money or revenue, without ammunition, without clothing, the people of America resisted, and they were successful; and in 1808, their posterity, with a full Treasury, with ammunition, and every desirable object, will not sell their birthright for a mess of pottage. In 1776, the gentleman says, we had an Army. Before the Colonies had an army, a British army occupied the Legislative Hall of Boston, and the streets were drenched with the blood of its citizens. By saying this, does the gentleman mean war? Let him speak out; for the same spirit of slaughter which roused the Americans at the battle of Lexington now looks you in the teeth, and demands of you submission. Let not the gentleman talk of local jealousies—they do not exist. The cause is a common cause. In the conflict with Great Britain, in the Revolution, when Boston was to be the devoted victim of Parliamentary vengeance, did her patriotic sisters desert in the hour of danger? No, sir. Virginia declared the cause a common one, and her example was followed by other States. As early as 1769, Virginia recommended a non-importation agreement to resist foreign taxation. Did Massachusetts consider this as submission? No; she adopted the system, and was the last to abandon it. The enthusiasm of liberty was general, and men, women, and children, joined in its execution. The Union is one and indivisible. Inflict a wound upon the right hand in Massachusetts, and the blow is equally felt in the left in Kentucky. Though an interior State, and distant perhaps from the ravages of war, she will stand firm in the cause of freedom. For her firmness and patriotism, I, as one, stand pledged. The Western country never will relinquish the lawful commerce of the United States. Away, then, with those infamous publications which speak of enemies to commerce!

The imaginations of some gentlemen create ideal dangers. I neither fear the conscripts of Napoleon nor the navy of Great Britain. Upon terra firma we know we are safe. And, though a thousand evils may result from war, the spark of liberty can never be extinguished in America. Armies might mow down our citizens, as the mower his grass, but another race of men, more powerful than these, would rise up and defend the soil where the fathers of our independence are entombed. Events are rolling on, the effects of which human wisdom cannot foresee. This is not the cause of an individual; it is the cause of seventeen sovereign and independent States and their Territories. Not the present generation alone, but posterity, is deeply interested, and must rejoice or mourn at the result of our present struggles.

Mr. CLOFFON said, that it had not been his intention to trouble the Committee with any remarks on the resolution now immediately under consideration; but, from the turn which the debate had taken, he now thought it proper to offer to the Committee a few remarks.

I shall vote for the resolution, said Mr. C., but really, sir, I should pause—I should hesitate—I should feel extremely reluctant to vote for it, if I could imagine that it involves the consequences supposed by a gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. QUINCY,) who spoke the day before yesterday on this subject. That gentleman supposes that the resolution, if adopted, will be a pledge that this House will abandon the whole system of measures heretofore adopted in respect to our foreign relations. That gentleman believes also that the suspension of trade is a complete abandonment of all our rights to trade. On both of these points, sir, I do widely differ in opinion from that gentleman. His opinion that an adoption of the resolution pledges the House to abandon the system heretofore adopted, with respect to the suspension of export trade, induces him to vote for it. My opinion being quite different from his, I feel a propriety in voting for it on the ground of my understanding of its import. I consider it, sir, as a plain declaration of the sense of the committee, on the wrongs inflicted on their country by the belligerent nations, and an evidence of their determination to assert their rights as an independent nation—that this is simply the true import of the resolution.

But there is a course of trade which, if sanctioned and pursued, would be an abandonment of our commercial rights. I do believe, said Mr. C., that a submission to exercise an absolute right under any condition or restriction whatever, prescribed by another Power, is a complete abandonment of that right. It is then no longer asserted as such absolute right. It becomes a mere favor granted by that other Power. But it is not so with a bare suspension of the exercise of that right. This suspension asserts the absolute right, by refusing to exercise any privilege under the condition or restriction prescribed by the other Power. Thus, sir, I will exemplify the position I have stated. When an American vessel, bound for a port in continental Europe, first sails into a British port, and there pays a tax, prescribed under British the Orders in Council for permission to proceed to the port of her original destination, she then abandons the absolute right to sail to that port, and accepts the permission as a mere privilege granted to her by the British Government. But a suspension of her voyage is no such abandonment. So a suspension of the commerce of the United States by the embargo law is no abandonment of their rights of commerce. The Legislature do not relinquish their rights by suspending the trade during such time as it shall be deemed expedient so to do.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, in the course of his remarks, made allusion to a declaration made by me some time ago, in reference to a resolution introduced by a gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. CHITTENDEN.) That resolution proposed an absolute, unconditional repeal of the act laying an embargo, and the several acts supplementary thereto. The declaration alluded to was applied to that resolution, and the repeal proposed in it—an absolute, unconditional repeal of those laws, without proposal of any other measure. The declaration was that, as one member of this House, I never could, never would consent to the repeal so long as the orders and decrees of the belligerents against our commerce continued in force; that is, such repeal as was proposed in the resolution—an absolute, unconditional repeal, without the adoption of any other measure in lieu of it. This, sir, was meant, if not so expressed. Indeed, said Mr. C., I cannot see how it can be considered as necessary, for a right understanding, that I should have so particularly expressed myself; as the declaration was made in direct reference to the resolution proposed. I know not how I could have been supposed to mean otherwise—how I could have been supposed to pledge myself by that declaration forever to adhere to the embargo, at all events, during a continuance of those orders and decrees, and forever to prefer it to any other measure. The period may possibly arrive, said he, when it will be deemed preferable to arm and force the trade, rather than further continue the embargo. The period, for aught I know, may arrive when war itself would be preferable to such further continuance of it. The period may arrive when I may be convinced of this—when it will be my duty to vote for raising the embargo, and permitting American vessels to be armed for their defence, though war should be the consequence. But the period never can arrive, so long as those orders and decrees continue in force, when I shall feel willing (if I know anything of my own heart) to vote for raising the embargo without some other provision being made in support of our maritime rights. If, therefore, the period should arrive, during a continuance of those edicts, when I shall vote for removing the embargo, it will be on condition that some other provision, some effectual provision, shall be made in support of those rights. To open the trade under the existing circumstances, and subject it to all the outrages to which it would be exposed, without security, from the operation of those edicts, I trust, as one individual member of this body, I never shall consent.

The gentleman from Massachusetts expressed astonishment, that a declaration, like that alluded to, should have been made; and, if I mistake not, said Mr. C., he asked, very sagaciously indeed, if members of this House were becoming mad? Whether those gentlemen with whom I have the honor generally to act, or myself, shall manifest any degree of madness, our conduct, I presume, said Mr. C., will best determine; in the meanwhile, however, I believe we may safely answer the gentleman, that we are not mad, but "speak forth the words of truth and soberness." And further, I trust that we are aiming to do the acts and deeds of honor and patriotism, as well as others. Perhaps the gentleman's astonishment may be excited anew at the declaration now again made by me, precisely in the same sentiment, precisely with the same meaning, as before. It is not, I repeat it, an absolute declaration that I never will vote for raising the embargo during a continuance of the edicts of the belligerents; but that I never will vote for it without some other provision, in support of our just rights.

Sir, said Mr. C., I am not now pledging myself to vote for removing the embargo on the condition I have mentioned. On the contrary, I say that from every view I have been able to take of the existing state of things, it seems to me that the embargo ought still to be continued. When the resolution, which has been mentioned, proposing a repeal of the embargo system was first offered, I was then of opinion that no proceedings ought to be had relative to the particular act laying the embargo, since the belligerents had continued in force their unjust and outrageous edicts against our lawful commerce. On that subject I would then have remained perfectly silent, I would have passed over that particular act with the utmost indifference, I would have refrained from touching the subject, as I would refrain from moving the House for the appointment of a committee to inquire whether these States constitute an independent nation or not. In this sentiment I voted against a consideration of the resolution at that time. Did I say, sir, that I would have refrained from touching that subject? Yes. I would have refrained—and I would still refrain from touching it so as to agitate the question of repeal at this time, or so as in any other manner to weaken any of the laws upon that subject. I would rather make them much more effectual. I would add tenfold strength to their validity—I would act in that spirit, and would manifest such degree of unconcernedness as to the effect which the system has on ourselves, as to demonstrate to the proud tyrants who inflict the injurious aggressions, and to the whole world besides, that we do not feel it. This would show to them that however they may view it as a sacrifice on the part of the people of this country, it is one which the great body of them do not regard—one which they are prepared to endure without a moment's uneasiness, without a moment's repining. This, said Mr. C., I did believe would have been good policy for the House to have adopted at the beginning of this session—a policy in which to have been joined by a majority I should have rejoiced. I consider it, said he, to be highly important to the reputation of this country that any expectation of the belligerents that this Government would submit to their unjust edicts should be disappointed; that they should as early as possible be convinced of their mistake in respect to the American character. Sir, said he, it is supremely important to the honor, the dignity, the glory of this rising nation that such edicts should never be in any manner submitted to on our part; that the idea of receiving as a gracious boon, from either of them, the privilege of trading where and in what we have a complete right to trade as we please, should be spurned with indignation; that there should be found no room for a doubt of our fixed determination, or of our ability, to abide by the measure, which we have adopted, as a means of asserting our rights; and that no step should be taken on our part, which could be construed into any degree of acquiescence in their violations. Shall we then submit to purchase such a paltry privilege by payment of tribute? an odious, abominable tribute? Can the high soul of America stoop down to this? No, sir, it cannot, it will not. I trust, said he, that this resolution will serve as one evidence that it is determined never to submit; and with this sentiment I feel a satisfaction in voting for the resolution. It manifests to the world the determination of this body; and, if adhered to, will leave no ground to the belligerents for any further calculations, favorable to their designs, from the partial discontents which have appeared in one section of the country.

Mr. C. concluded by observing that the measures recommended by the select committee in the other two resolutions reported by them, not being then immediately under consideration, he should not enter into any general discussion of them, or make any further remarks respecting the embargo at this time, as that subject also was not immediately before the Committee.

Mr. RANDOLPH.—We have now progressed very far in the fourth week of our session. We met here at a time when every man in this House and out of it seemed to vie with his neighbor in the expression of the opinion that this is a momentous crisis. There are few of us who have influence enough at home to avoid the censure of their constituents, in case of a failure in a punctual attendance on their duty. At the commencement of this session public expectation was raised to the most painful pitch; and yet one-fourth of the time assigned by the Constitution for our deliberations has elapsed, and in what situation does the Congress of the United States find itself? Debating what has been termed an abstract proposition. When the report was made, my worthy friend who sits before me, (Mr. MASON,) with his wonted sagacity, saw in that proposition its entire futility. Let me not be mistaken, it is not my intention to deny the truth of the proposition, much less to vote against it; but my friend from North Carolina saw that it was not to be made the basis of a future conduct; that, in fact, no bill, no measure, nothing substantial, could grow out of it. And are we to employ ourselves in this manner for the amusement of the galleries, of the public of Georgetown, Washington, and its vicinity? When this resolution was introduced by the committee, whose report is now under consideration, I regretted it on a variety of accounts, not only in the same view as my friend before me has taken of it, but for other reasons. I asked myself, in the first place, on whom it was to operate? On us? Have we so conducted ourselves heretofore, or are we now about so to act that a doubt exists among us whether we will support our rights, or submit to the high behests of the two great belligerents? For ourselves is this medicine, or for the American people? Do they want a rallying point? Has the Government of the United States ever taken a ground in which they have been backward to support it? Are we fearful of the temper of our own citizens? Do we think it necessary to raise their courage to the sticking-place by this incentive? or is it to operate on the two great belligerents? Is Mr. Armstrong or Mr. Pinkney, in some new note, to serve up this new prescription, to excite the minds of those Governments to American wrongs, and to a sense of justice? I am afraid not; I am afraid we have tried this method too often not again to fail of success. I did, indeed, regret it; I regretted the introduction of this resolution, not only for the reasons which I have stated, but as going still farther to establish the creed that words, in some form or other, are all the means which we have to employ. No, sir; if we make an impression upon Europe, it must be by something more substantial. We have tried the old diet-drink, long enough.

The House will pardon me if I forbear a minute recapitulation of the wrongs which we have received, not only from the two great belligerents of Europe, but from the little belligerents also. I confess that I have not a stomach for the nauseous detail. I cannot, like Shylock, take a pleasure in saying, on such a day, you called me dog! on such a day, you spit upon my gabardine. I have seen them dressed in every possible shape, in correspondences of our Ministers and in reports of committees of this and the other House. I must confess, for one, that I take no pleasure in the perusal of such reports. I cannot riot in the strength of our argument—I wish the argument of the enemy was a little better, and ours a little worse; I cannot hail every new aggression, because it gives occasion to extend our demands of reparation. I wish we had not quite so much argument on our side, and that they had a little more of the injury on theirs. I verily believe that, as long as you have the whole of the injury, they will have very little solicitude in yielding to you the best of the argument. Yes, sir, I confess I feel a deep sense of mortification at hearing this incessant theme rung in my ear, and the only remedy found to be in words, words, words—correspondence of Ministers, instructions of Secretaries of State, and reports of committees of the two Houses. We have been four weeks in session, and, as to benefit—I speak of myself, I hope there are others who are conscious of having done a greater share—as to the benefit that the public has received from my attendance, I had much better have been at home, enjoying the fine weather in my own family, than sitting here, listening to the discussion of propositions, from which, whether negatived or agreed to, no possible good can be derived. We have been four weeks in session, raised a Committee of Exterior Relations, who have brought in a long and laborious report, and, so help me Heaven, not one atom of substance is there in the report, except the instruction moved by my friend from North Carolina; all the rest is preface, episode, prologue, and epilogue. I have no disposition to attack the gentleman's report; I have no particular fault to find with it. It is much in the style and fashion of the times—the aggressions of France and Great Britain served up, though, I think, not with quite such exquisite cookery as sometimes is presented to our palates.

But perhaps it may be said that the declaration which occupies the outpost of that report is to be taken in connexion with the subsequent resolutions, and that the whole subject is fairly before the committee, and ought to be embraced in one point of view. As far as I have been able to understand the language of that resolution, it means precisely nothing, or more than meets the eye. It is a resolution that it is inconsistent with the honor, independence, and so forth, of the United States to submit to the edicts of Great Britain and France. I think that is the language. Is this to be considered as a declaration of war against these two Powers? Or are we to resolve in one breath that we cannot, without a sacrifice of our rights, honor, and independence, submit to the edicts of Great Britain and France, and, in the next breath, solemnly resolve that we will? I know it has been said that a temporary suspension of our commerce is not an annihilation of that commerce. Where will gentlemen find a temporary suspension of our commerce? In what clause of the statute book will they find the time prescribed when that commerce shall revive? And if a perpetual prohibition of all commerce of exports and a prohibition of all commerce of imports be not a submission to the edicts of Great Britain and France, I know not in what submission can consist. I have not the assurance to stand up on this floor and declare that the embargo is a resistance to the edicts of Great Britain and France, when I find our Government has given to the Governments of those two countries an explanation of it so very different. The embargo is represented to be nothing more than an internal regulation, not a cause of offence, not an aggression or cause of aggression, nothing hostile in its character. Is it, then, a resistance to the decrees of Great Britain and France? And if a suspension of exports be not resistance, but a mere measure of internal regulation, not of retaliation, how will the suspension of commerce or of imports constitute that resistance?

I listened to the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. QUINCY,) the other day, with very great pain, because I heard him attempt, as I conceived, to draw lines of distinction between different sections of this great Continent. He entered into calculations, which I not only believe, but know, to be erroneous, tending to show that his section suffered out of all proportion more than all others. It is not my purpose now to examine his statements. I admit that there are parts of the country which suffer more than others, but I deny the gentleman's positions in toto; I deny that the Treasury and custom-house books afford any data of the relative commerce of each State, and parcularly of the State which I partly represent and the State contiguous to it on the south. But, at the same time that I deprecate the effects of this measure throughout the United States, I trust that there exists and will always exist within this country a power to execute the laws. I shall be among the first to rally around them. When the opposite doctrine is fairly broached and acted on, cannot see to what purpose we are a confederated people; to what purpose we have a national government; I cannot bring myself to believe that there exists in this country a disposition, and I am sorry to see this very resolution, because it seems to imply that there does exist such a disposition,) to violate the laws and sap the foundation of the Union. I shall not act on the resumption, but wait until a case shall occur, and, when it does occur, I would apply the only corrective—the knife, and the actual cautery. But, on that account, I do not the less deprecate the effects of the embargo; I look upon it as a measure ruinous, in a great degree, to our country. At the same time, there is an aspect in which I cannot but behold it with pleasure. It is a test of the patriotism and virtue of this people. The submission of those who think even worse of it than I do—I will say their quiet submission; for their opposition has extended only to argument—is a test of the virtue of our people, of their willingness to support the Government in any sacrifice for the public good—to support it even where that Government has obviously mistaken and misunderstood their best interests. Compare, if you please, for a moment, the pressure of the embargo, and the degree of pressure arising from the celebrated excise law; put the two things in the balance, and weigh them. In the one case here was insurrection, open rebellion; you see the Father of his Country obliged to extend his arm to chastise his undutiful children and reclaim them to the path of duty. In the other case you see (whatever may have been the evasions of the law) ostensible submission to it. The virtue in the one case which withstood the stronger temptation, is not to be put in competition with that which succumbed to the weaker in the other.

But in viewing the policy which has been pursued, for some time back, and gentlemen seemed determined now to adhere to it, I am irresistibly led to inquire into the causes which produced our present form of Government. I believe they grew out of commerce. The principal difficulty, I believe, among the States, was, that there was no general power for the regulation of commerce. That commerce was the principal source whence revenue was to be derived; and the want of general and uniform regulations dried up that very source. The first proposition was to vest the old Congress with the power of laying an ad valorem duty generally. Certain I am that the meeting at Annapolis, the precursor of the Convention of 1787, was a meeting directed to the promotion of the commercial interests of this country. The United States were governed by this consideration primarily—for surely they were in very little danger of going to war with one another—in forming a Government under which this very commerce has arisen to a height to which no man could have anticipated. And are we now, without warning, to break up all our institutions heretofore, and declare for a Chinese policy? Do gentlemen remember when a discrimination was made between American and foreign ships, the excitement which it created? The gentlemen from the Southern States said, you are going to tax us for the benefit of the Eastern navigation. When a proposition was made to lay a heavy duty on the import of foreign manufactures, the gentlemen of the Southern States said, you tax us for the benefit of your manufactures. This is well remembered. But, did any man ever dream that these two sections of the country should unite, the one to destroy the raw material, and the other to cut up commerce by the root? There was, indeed, formerly a contest between the grower and the carrier, each contending for his separate interest—but that both should unite, the one to prevent the growth, and the other to prevent the carriage of produce, is really a solecism I am unable to explain. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. QUINCY) speaks feelingly of the sufferings of the people of Massachusetts. I believe the picture which he drew may be correct. I am even willing to allow (holding up my hands at the same time against all his calculations) that his constituents may suffer more than mine. But what is the situation of the tobacco country, and I live in the heart of it, whether you draw the line from North to South, or from East to West? If we pursue this course of policy, the product of the New England fisheries may be consumed, the rice of South Carolina may be eaten, and the cotton of Georgia may be spun. What is the tobacco planter to do with his two crops of that ridiculous and nauseous luxury? What is he to do with the third crop, for the time is fast approaching when preparation must be made to plant it? And in what situation are we placed? I have no disposition to enter into highly-colored pictures of the state of the country. I feel too much the condition of that part from which I come, to say much about it. It is deplorable—that is enough.

But perhaps it may be said that, whatever objection be taken to the two first resolutions, there can be no doubt of the perfect propriety of the final one. What is it?

“Resolved, That measures ought to be immediately taken to place the country in a more complete state of defence.”

This is a twin brother of the first. Will you refer it to a committee to draft a bill in pursuance of it? Are you going to refer the first resolution to a committee that a bill may be placed on the statute book, to perpetuate the fact that the United States are insulted and have not resisted? For, as far as the report goes, of what does it speak? Of keeping within ourselves and of preparing for defence. If a man be insulted beyond the power of human endurance to bear, how does he resist? By retiring to his house and adding another bolt to his street door—another supplement to the embargo system? Is this the way in which we will resist? And yet the same committee say that they will not submit, and bring nothing before you but a vague proposition that the United States be put in a better state of defence. Shall we raise more troops? Gentlemen will hardly venture upon that. Will you arm the militia? That plan, to use the slang of the day, has had the go-by given it. You are told that the militia can only be armed in such small portions that the good to result from the measure will amount to little or nothing. Nothing remains, then, but to build more gunboats. The President of the United States says, that it has not been deemed expedient to build those already authorized. What new measures of defence are then contemplated? We have tried every chord, and none of them will vibrate. What will be the next resort? In fact, I am extremely sorry to be obliged to speak in this free manner of this report; but it appears to me that this House have asked of the Committee of Exterior Relations bread, and they have received a stone. They have received "naked resolutions." Really, to use the words of one of the gentlemen (Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL) who advocates them, they appear in all the nakedness of infantile imbecility. Naked they came into the House, and naked they must go out of it. They are not to be clothed with measures; or, at least, it is generally avowed that no measure is to be taken in consequence of the one under discussion.

I do not know how far I may or may not have been in order in the observations which I have hastily thrown out; I say, hastily, because it may be supposed that I have risen to redeem that pledge which the public papers of the morning have given for me to address the House, when nothing was further from my mind. But, before I sit down, I will ask the gentlemen who brought in the report, to reconcile some things which do not appear to me altogether intelligible, as they now stand.

"The Milan decree of 1807 [17th December] can still less rest for its defence on the supposed acquiescence of the United States in the British orders of the preceding month, since those orders, which have not certainly been acquiesced in, were not even known in America at the date of the decree."

The decree of Milan, then, was dated on the 17th of December; the orders were not known in America at the date of the decree, and the embargo was laid on the 22d. In another part of the report, we find the following:

"This was received on the — day of December, and a copy of the decision in the case of the Horizon having at the same time reached Government, the President, aware of the consequences which would follow that new state of things, communicated immediately to Congress the alteration of the French decrees, and recommended the embargo, which was accordingly laid on the 22d of December, 1807; at which time it was well understood, in this country, that the British Orders of Council of November preceding had issued, although they were not officially communicated to our Government."

This is an anachronism which I cannot reconcile, though I do not say that it is irreconcilable. It is very far from being my wish, if the United States are determined not to submit to the orders and decrees of the belligerents, nothing would be farther from my mind, than to destroy the unanimity of that resistance; but I confess that I wish to see in what that resistance is to consist. I am as firmly of opinion as I am certain that I am now addressing you, that the difficulties in which the United States now are, take date from the year 1805-'6—a date at which some gentlemen have, in the discussion, commenced the series of foreign wrongs inflicted on us. Much has been said of the spirit of '76. It was in the year 1805 that this spirit slept. We then knew that our territory was trod by hostile footsteps, and we would not take steps to assert its character. From that time, its character has been on the decline in Europe, and we have to re-establish it by something better than this report—by something of a very different nature—unless, indeed, the first resolution is meant to contain a declaration of war against both belligerents, and the second to devise the best mode of carrying it on against one of them, leaving at the same time all resistance to the other out of the question. I wish to confine myself to that part which goes to excluding imports; that part which excludes all foreign armed ships, has my hearty concurrence. It has so happened that, from the time to which I have referred, the difficulties of this country have been thickening, and the character of the country declining abroad. That this is a fact, no man can or will deny. Then it must be by a different policy from that pursued from the time which I have mentioned, that the character of the country is to be recovered. The old policy has been tried, it will not answer. What have we done? We have been trampled upon unresistingly by Spain. When the Minister of our country was at the Court of that Government, and when, I have every reason to believe, as far as the papers laid before the House enable me to judge, that he had taken an imposing attitude, what was the result? The negotiation was paralyzed by the news that a special mission of Mr. Bowdoin, a respectable man—if there must be a special mission, as good a man as any for the purpose—was to interfere with that negotiation! We had already two Ministers at the Court of Spain. When our negotiation was pending with the British Government, too, there seems to have been a fear lest a Minister of our country should come into collision with foreign Governments, and a special Minister is sent after him to keep the discussion forever hung up in a sort of diplomatic Court of Chancery. We passed a non-importation law, and neither the House nor the nation have forgotten the auspices under which that law passed. When it was said that it would lead to the destruction of commerce, was not the idea scouted by many; and, among others, by a member of great influence, who is now snatched from us by the hand of death, and who was the representative of the commercial town of Salem? He ridiculed the idea of our commerce being circumscribed. Were we not told that we could sweep the commerce of Britain from the ocean? And what has been the consequence? We have swept our own commerce from the ocean, and I fear we shall sweep our agriculture from the land. One false step leads on to another. For want of due resistance to the weaker power of Spain, we have been trampled on by the stronger. No, sir, this temporizing, this hesitating, this extraordinary mission policy will not do. After things were brought to their late and present disastrous condition, we laid an embargo; that was to be the panacea to react on the enemy—it was to be the sword and the shield—the war in disguise; it was to bring Europe, in general, and Great Britain in particular, to your feet. We have calculated long enough on the weakness of our adversary. We have waited with upcast eyes watching her downfall till our own begins to approach. It is time to calculate less on her weakness and more on our strength. I am amused sometimes at the arguments which I hear on this floor. The Grenville administration get into power—you negotiate with them and make a treaty—it is rejected, scouted. Be it so. Meanwhile the Grenvilles go out and the Portlands and Cannings come in; and, as if destitute of arguments of our own, the doctrines of these very men in opposition—Lords Grenville, Auckland, and Holland, (from whom nothing better than the rejected treaty could be obtained,) with the Barings and Broughams in their train, are hailed with joy and resorted to as the text-book whence we quote, to prove—what? To show that the sentiment of the people of Great Britain is in favor of us. And yet when we come to negotiate with these very advocates of ours, we cannot agree. At the same time, the declarations on this floor are resorted to there as arguments in their favor. In fact, it is high time for us to give over counting on the insurrections of the Manchester weavers, and for them to give over counting on the revolutionary spirit of the Green Mountain boys. We calculate with as much correctness on the effects of our non-impotations and embargo systems, as they do on the disaffection of any part of this country. We know them to be mistaken, and why may we not be? In fact, we know ourselves to be mistaken. The result of those measures proves it. Indeed, with that description of people who calculate that the navy of Britain will sink her, or that the army of Napoleon will ruin him, there is no arguing. They are out of the sphere of reasoning. For those there should be a new dictionary, and a new system of logic. After all, then, we pass the embargo; this was the real, genuine panacea. What has been its effect? After speaking of it in this House as a measure which would coerce your enemies to submission, and talking of it in Europe as a municipal regulation, in offering to withdraw it we have been by one Power insulted, by the other laughed at. The report says, from one of them no answer has been received—from France. Sir, we have an answer from France which satisfies every one who has seen it; and there does not exist a man in this country base enough to comply with the wishes of the one party or the mandates of the other. We have gone to Europe, and said of this embargo, which was laid unquestionably, even by the report of the committee, before the British Orders in Council were received—because, as they tell you, it was before the Milan decree was known—we have told the belligerents that this consequence shall be withdrawn if they will withdraw their provocations. In fact, like Jack, in the tale of the Tub, we have hanged ourselves for spite, in hopes that one or the other of our enemies will come and cut us down. Both have refused, and it remains for us to say whether we will longer dangle in our garters. I, for one, have no such disposition.

On the subject of the embargo, as it has been dragged into this controversy, I will say that the view taken of its origin has been much more erroneous than the predictions as to its effect. It is well known to have originated in the determination of France to act on the Berlin decree in the broadest sense of the letter of it, and in the proclamation of Great Britain inviting home her native subjects. It is as well known to me that it did not originate in the Orders of Council, as that it did not originate in events which took place long since it was enacted. For although the Orders in Council were unquestionably issued before the embargo was laid, as unquestionably they were not known to us, and were not once mentioned in my hearing as a cause for the passage of that law.

Sir, I have occupied your time to very little purpose; I am as sensible of it as any man who hears me. It was not my intention to have taken some of the positions which I have advanced since I got up. I have been irresistibly led to open some questions which may lead to unpleasant discussion; but I could not omit the temptation to self-justification.

I know, sir, that I have had neither art nor part in bringing you into this disastrous situation, and that reflection is worth to me everything, which, in a political point of view, this world has to afford.

Mr. TROUP said he was extremely happy to agree in one thing with the honorable gentleman who had just sat down, that the Southern had not suffered less by the operation of the embargo than the Eastern States; but when, in differing from the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. QUINCY) on a point of still greater importance, he was also compelled to differ from the honorable gentleman from Virginia, he did so with the deepest regret. It has been said by the gentleman from Massachusetts, observed Mr. T., that for the last eleven months the country has suffered by this system of embargo the extreme of disgrace and humiliation, and the gentleman from Virginia has called it a measure of degrading submission. Sir, it is not a measure of submission; it is a measure of resistance, and of the most formidable resistance. Whatever may have been the object of the Executive in recommending the embargo, it has ever been supported by me as a measure of coercion—as a measure of justifiable retaliation. I contend that it is not submission. Acquiescence in the orders and decrees—submission to seizure and condemnation—would be submission, to all intents and purposes; but that measure which keeps at home the ships and property which our enemies seek to capture on the high seas is not submission, but resistance: and the gentleman from Massachusetts will find it so to his sorrow. Commerce, sir, is the life-blood of England; it is the foundation of her wealth, her prosperity, and her maritime grandeur. But the gentleman says we have retired from the highway of nations, and left our great rival free to navigate it. True, we have retired from the ocean; we have left our rival free to navigate but very little more than between port and port of her own dominions. We have given the finishing stroke to her exclusion from the commerce of the whole civilized world; she has not one tittle of it left other than what you yourselves would have if your embargo were raised tomorrow; and your committee have told you what that is—a scanty, contemptible commerce of seven millions of dollars. England lost one hundred millions when France shut the Continent against her; she lost fifty millions by the occlusion of your own ports; and nothing of trade is left her but that which she may drive with the native Powers of Asia and Africa, with Sweden, and precariously with Spain, Portugal, and their possessions. No more, then, of raising the embargo to carry on commerce, when, without a sacrifice of independence—without a dishonorable submission to the Orders of Council—we cannot carry on more than seven millions of commerce.

I know it is said that the people of the Southern States are the enemies of foreign trade—that their spirit and their interest are anti-commercial. Sir, in this sentiment, which is itself without foundation—nay, without even the shadow of foundation—is to be sought that jealousy which has given rise to so many evils, and from which such serious evils are yet to be apprehended; but, sir, it is a mean, pitiful, contemptible jealousy. The Southern States are not the enemies of commerce. Indeed, how can it be said of a people who raise seventy millions of pounds of cotton, and for which they have not a home market for ten millions, that they are the enemies of commerce! No, sir; they have, from the beginning of your Government to the present day, sacrificed as much to the prosperity of commerce as any people of the Union. They have been at all times as ready to go to war for commerce—on the attack of the Chesapeake they were even more forward to go to war for the honor and dignity of the flag, than the people of the Eastern States.

A little more, than was said by my friend from Virginia, as to the comparative operation of the embargo on the Eastern and Southern States. Compare the operation of this measure by the proper test—the only true and correct one—the depreciation of the respective staples of those two sections of the Union. Let the gentleman from Massachusetts state to the House what has been the depreciation of his beef, pork, fish, cheese, butter, onions, potatoes, and cabbages, and I will tell him what has been the depreciation of our great staples, cotton and rice. The ordinary market price of cotton is between eighteen and twenty-two cents; the embargo price is from ten to twelve. The ordinary price of rice is from five to six dollars; the embargo price is from two to three. Our people are, besides, in proportion to their number, more in debt than the people of the Eastern States.

But the gentleman from Massachusetts warns us against a perseverance in the system of embargo. A perseverance, according to the gentleman, is to be followed by open hostility to the laws. Sir, I dread no such hostility—we have no reason to dread it. It is altogether impossible that men who are actuated by the basest of human passions can make a serious movement in a revolution. No, sir; I insist upon it, we have no cause to fear the anti-embargo men of Massachusetts. One brave, independent, generous yeoman of Massachusetts, would drive half a dozen such fellows into the ocean. But, the truth is, the gentleman seems to have wholly mistaken the condition of his countrymen. He told us they had suffered everything but famine; that the distress and ruin were co-extensive with the country. They could not or would not suffer longer. Yet, sir, the gentleman was not well seated, before his colleague (Mr. BACON) rose, and with equal claim to veracity, and the same opportunity of forming a correct opinion, told you that his honorable colleague had given a very high coloring to the picture; that the distresses of the people were by no means as great as they were described; and that, if they were less prosperous and flourishing than before the embargo, they were far—very far—from that state of misery which his colleague had represented.

Sir, many of these observations have been made with extreme reluctance; they have been extorted under circumstances which must give pain to every American, but which cannot fail to kindle in him the liveliest indignation. No man can read without horror and disgust in the papers of the day the most treasonable and flagitious libel that ever disgraced our country—the anonymous publication circulated in Newburyport.

Sir, it is remarkable that we have been so gradually familiarized with British outrages, and have at length become so completely reconciled to the most extravagant excesses of them, that what two years ago you would have been willing to go to war for, would now be considered a matter of too trifling importance to merit your attention, much less your resentment. Two years ago you were willing to go to war to limit the right of search; you would have gone to war to prohibit the practice of impressment; you would have gone to war to overturn the lawless system of blockade; you would have gone to war for the colonial trade; for the attack on the Chesapeake; two years ago you would have gone to war for the Orders in Council; and now that all these outrages, and more than these, have accumulated on your head, until you are bowed down to the earth, you are content to beg a little commerce of England! You tell England, if she will be pleased to grant you a little trade, you will open your ports to her, and shut them against France! This last, this humiliating overture, she rejects with indignation. You have no choice left, as your committee has reported, but between war and embargo. We cannot go to war with one, without going to war with the other; because, the wrongs done by one are not less than the wrongs done by the other—unless, indeed, you consider the shedding of innocent blood the greatest of all possible wrongs.

I know this measure of embargo has been condemned, loudly condemned; but only by men who propose to reseat themselves in power by an appeal to the feelings and interest of the community. In one part of the country this appeal has been made with effect. The avaricious have been corrupted, the ignorant have been duped. In all countries there are the avaricious and the ignorant, and the passion of the one and the credulity of the other have been wielded with success by the anti-embargo men. Sir, the people have been led to believe, that a great commerce could be carried on under the orders and decrees, when in fact no commerce could be carried on without compromising the honor of the nation. They have been led to believe that a commerce could be carried on without hazarding the peace of the country, when in fact no commerce could be carried on without involving the country in war; and whilst the great object of the Government was to protect commerce, the embargo was said to aim a deadly blow at commerce. It is by such misrepresentations that the noisy enemies of embargo out of doors have been deluded and corrupted. And are these the people to whom we are called on to turn a respectful and deferential ear? the merest Shylocks—men who cry out, away with your honor, your independence, your neutrality—they are all stuff—give me gold! British merchants, British agents, and malcontent Americans—the depraved of the cities, and the ignorant of the country—men who are ready to sacrifice the honor and independence of the nation for a little trade in codfish and potash! If we are thus degenerate—if we are thus fallen in thirty short years, it is high time to abandon your republican system of Government. Sir, will posterity believe that this very people, who thirty years ago magnanimously offered up their lives and fortunes for the acquisition of independence, are now prepared to sacrifice that very independence to their avarice? Will posterity believe, that this same people, in one short year, forgot the affair of the Chesapeake? That they were ready to shake hands with the murderers and robbers of their countrymen? I will not, for myself, assent to such a base barter of honor for gold. No, sir! If it has come to this—if we cannot for a year or two years endure the privations incident to a measure of embargo, if we cannot exist without the luxuries of life, notwithstanding the most imperious calls of honor and of duty, we are unworthy the blessings we enjoy—we have lost our virtue, and are ripe for the dynasty of the Bonapartes or any other dynasty; and whether you are conquered by France into miserable servitude to-morrow, or corrupted to sell your country to England, is not worth a reflection. This accursed avarice will ruin you.

Sir, it is not to such a people as those—and I trust in God, a majority of the people of New England are very different—that I would appeal to test the correctness of the measure of embargo. Were I disposed to test its correctness by its popularity, I would appeal to the people of Virginia, too honorable to be corrupted, too enlightened to be duped. I would ask them what they thought of the embargo, and they would answer with an almost unanimous voice—they would go further—they would be ready to support it with their lives and fortunes.

You have done everything for commerce—you have negotiated for commerce—you have jeopardized the peace of the country for commerce—you have passed an embargo to protect commerce—and commerce is the first to abandon you. God forbid that I should speak thus of the whole mercantile community. I have seen too many instances on this floor of noble and magnanimous sacrifice of private interest to the public weal; they are not the Smiths, or the Grays, or the Crowninshields, of whom I speak.

If the embargo were raised to-morrow, none would trade but men of desperate character and bankrupt fortune—the real bona fide American merchant would not venture a ship at sea; and where would they trade? Why, to be sure, they might drive a trade in beef and pork and flour to the West Indies, and some of our cotton and rice and tobacco would find their way to England, if the French privateers did not catch them—but the market would soon be overrun—it would be no better than the home market; and where would you trade to besides? If you are determined to pay the ninepence per pound tribute, for permission to re-export your cotton to the Continent, the French decrees would take it, and if they did not, the price of the article would be so enhanced by the tribute, that the market of the Continent would be lost to you.

Permission to arm is tantamount to a declaration of war, and the people of this country want peace, as long as they can preserve it with honor. And do you think, sir, we are ready to plunge headlong into a ruinous war, naked and unarmed, to gratify a few bankrupt commercial speculators? It is easy to declare war; it is more difficult, under present circumstances, to maintain peace, and it is most difficult of all to wage a successful war. Sir, beware! It is the object of the gentleman from Massachusetts and his friends to lead you, step by step, into a war, and if he can, into an unpopular war, which the moment you cease to conduct with effect, you are ruined, and he and his friends are exalted. To such an event, deplorable as it would be, I could be reconciled if I believed the gentleman and his friends would govern in the true spirit of the Constitution; but liberty has been hunted down in the Old World—there is scarce a remnant of it left, save in America—here it is sustained by the ruling party; and, sir, the moment this party ceases to rule, Republicanism is gone, and with it the hopes of all good men forever. On this account I deprecate such an event.

It would appear to me from the tenor of the gentleman's remarks (Mr. QUINCY) that he wants war with France and alliance with England. If this be the fact, the gentleman is not consistent. If he is really as much afraid of the gigantic power of France as he affects to be, (and I must confess, for my part, I am very much afraid of it,) assuredly it is not policy to provoke France—it is our policy to keep out of the way of both monsters as long as we can, and to husband our resources. And what would avail an alliance with England? You could only furnish men to be slaughtered on the Continent. I can tell the gentleman from Massachusetts in what he would much better exemplify, both his patriotism and consistency—in union—in uniting to call into activity the resources of the nation for its defence—in organizing and arming and disciplining; and, what is not less desirable, in adopting a system of finance, which would not fail you in any exigency; in short, in pursuing the course in which you are—which the soundest policy points to as the safest and the best, the course of impartial neutrality, if indeed neutrality has anything to do with it.

As to the embargo, so much has been said, both in and out of doors, in its justification, that I will forbear to touch it. It is only necessary to observe that it has been supported, and will be continued as a measure of security and of just retaliation; as a measure of security it keeps the property at home, which, but for it, would have enriched your enemies—as a measure of retaliation, it would have had its effect, but for the anti-embargo men of Massachusetts. If the gentleman will co-operate to make it efficient he will soon find the great mercantile politicians of England, from Anderson down to M^cCall Medford, have not been mistaken in the belief that this country can vitally affect the colonial and manufacturing interests of that, by an embargo system.

As to a declaration of war against France and Great Britain, and the policy of making it immediately, no local considerations should be permitted to enter into our view of it; but this much is to be said, that the Southern people are more interested in raising the embargo than going to war: by the first they would find a vent for a small proportion of their staples; by the latter they could get nothing but taxes and fighting. The anti-embargo men of Massachusetts would not make more by the first than ourselves, and by the last they would make nothing more than their privateers would make for them; but the great object is to postpone the evil.

One word, before I sit down, as to what fell from the gentleman from New York. He proposes to repeal the embargo in relation to Spain and Portugal. Sir, is the political condition of those States characterized by a permanency and stability which would warrant commercial connexion with them. Trade with the Junta of Seville—a mere political ephemeron—a being of a day!

Sir, I wish the Spanish patriots success with all my heart, but success is impossible. Ten thousand to one, that whilst I am speaking, this same Junta of Seville is imploring clemency at the footstool of the great usurper. Indeed, sir, if we are bound to consider this people of any definite description, we are to consider them rather as French subjects than Spanish patriots, for the only official paper in relation to them is the instrument of abdication and renunciation by which this unhappy people have been transferred over, like a flock of sheep, to the Emperor Napoleon, and by the very men for whose rights of empire they are said to be contending.

Mr. MASTERS said he lamented the present situation of affairs, which he feared would terminate to our disgrace; he wished that one sober view should be taken of this great question, before they blindly rushed deeper into a scene of confusion and distress.

In the precarious situation in which this country stands, said he, it is the duty of every man to avow his principles and sentiments with firmness and integrity. It is public delusion to bow to the chimerical projects and phantoms of any man. No man can be deemed independent, unless he is guided by the reason and expedience of things, abstracted from all party and personal prejudices. I trust these resolutions will be determined by their merits, and not by Executive or party influence.

Great pains have been taken both in conversation and in print to work upon the feelings of the people, to persuade them it must be embargo or war, at the same time you intend non-intercourse and then war.

This report is calculated to manage, cultivate, and set in action, the warmth of public imagination, in order that a non-intercourse and the embargo may be well received.

The report states, at the time the embargo was laid, the British Orders in Council were known and understood in this country, though not officially communicated. The fact is, the British Orders in Council were not even mentioned in the debate on that question; and when the Administration found they had mistaken its operation, they went to the British Government supplicating and begging that those orders might be rescinded. Sir, this nation feels humbled with the unhappy issue of their measures, and by deviating from an energetic and practical course, are whirled about, the sport of every gust, and easily driven into any port.

Mr. M. said it had been in the power of this nation more than once to have adjusted their differences with Great Britain. When Mr. Fox came into the British administration, he offered our Minister to renew the expired treaty, and at the same time remarked it should not prevent him from proceeding in the negotiation, and endeavoring to make such a treaty as would be most satisfactory to both countries. In the meantime the renewal of the old treaty would prevent all collision between the two nations. Mr. Monroe's instructions would not admit of it.

NOVEMBER, 1808.

Foreign Relations.

H. OF R.

Although Jay's Treaty was exceptionable in many points, and not popular in this country, yet this nation prospered under that treaty more than they have since without it.

Mr. M. said the late treaty concluded with the British Government, by Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, was, in his opinion, more advantageous than the former. This last treaty was rejected principally on account of the protestation signed by the British Commissioners. It was worthy of consideration that the protestation was no part of the treaty, and our Government had since offered to continue the embargo as to France, provided the British Government would rescind their orders, which was substantially complying with the protestation, yet this treaty is rejected. It never has been in our power, said he, honorably, to adjust the existing differences with France, whose Emperor has always showed the greatest contempt for the neutrality of every nation, and whose determination is to compel us to take part in the war, either as friends or allies. If the nation does not know this, I know it, and you know it, Mr. Chairman. The demands are positive, and because we have not promptly obeyed, France has swept by sequestration and confiscation all the American property, from Italy to Antwerp, amounting to more than one hundred millions of livres; she has burnt and sunk many of your vessels without even the form of a trial. Why do you continue the embargo, and add to it a non-intercourse? Are you waiting for an answer from Bonaparte, that he has taken off his decrees, that you may go to war according to his demand? or do you wish to continue this pressure, in order to gain time to offer to the great Emperor, in more explicit terms, that you will take sides with him?—Your measures are leading to that point, and it will be the result.

Russia, Prussia, Holland, Spain, Portugal, Naples, in short, all the subjugated world, passed embargo laws under the influence of France, under the same pretence, and worded nearly in the same manner as ours; therefore your embargo laws had a tendency to prevent the British Government from rescinding their Orders of Council, and were more injurious than beneficial. Great Britain has given you her answer. Sir, our affairs have proceeded daily from bad to worse, until we have been brought step by step to this state of things. By not resisting the first belligerent decree, we have invited retaliation and courted calamity.

You ought to desist from a course of measures which will, in my opinion, bring the people of this nation into want and misery. This is a question which will decide the fate of this country. Sir, before you pass a non-intercourse, I beg the House sincerely and gravely to consider the calamities which will follow: inconveniences, mischief, and distress, are great and certain. The belligerent Powers have trampled upon the law of nations, and we have trampled on and disgraced ourselves. If these measures were intended to coerce them, they would prove visionary and philosophical, and not founded on experience. Your extreme and theoretical measures may be brought forward, ad infinitum, in order to extinguish all principles of action, which arise from experience and probability.

Mr. M. said the embargo originated from no plan of sound policy whatsoever, and was in contradiction to all the principles of commerce. Your finances, said he, must lean upon commerce, or your whole system will tumble upon your head. You are throwing open the doors to smuggling. Whenever the laws of trade press hard upon the people, your shores and frontiers are full of contraband. When he cast his eye back on our once flourishing commerce and agriculture, grown to perfection through a series of fortunate events, and a train of successful industry and enterprise unparalleled in the annals of the world, and contrasted them with our non-intercourse and embargo, it gave him melancholy reflections. He could not embrace a system which tended to destroy this country.

In looking round, said he, you will discover symptoms of radical decay, and proof of consuming strength. Never did a people suffer so much from fallacious measures and empty words. This non-intercourse and embargo must be given up. They stand on no solid principle; it is a reflection on your wisdom to persist in them; you cannot show either of them to be the means of obtaining some useful end; there can be no dignity in persevering on your ill chosen ground; you are not punishing the belligerents; the operation against them is childish and fruitless; you are punishing ourselves. The project of abstinence and starving men into a sense of duty might apply to a convent or monastery, but the operation as against the belligerents is extremely absurd and ridiculous.

We have got into this difficulty; the great question is, how are we to get out. One obstacle in the way is, that you proudly boasted when you laid the embargo, and you now scorn meanly to sneak out of difficulties, and are pressing the nation into non-intercourse and war. I think it best to have the generous courage, when you find and feel an error, honorably and fairly to renounce it.

If your non-intercourse and embargo are intended to habituate the citizens to the manufacturing and wearing of homespun, that is also visionary. Instead of homespun, the genius of the people is commerce, commerce—money, money; and we ought to spurn from us the hand of unconstitutional power, that would wrest from us those privileges. Let the House be cautious to guard against the progress of subtle encroachments on commerce, and consider that it may be undermined, as well as openly attacked. If you attempt to destroy or depress commerce, you excite a jealousy between the States, which, however much to be lamented, will end in a separation. Among the united interests of the commercial and agricultural parts of the Union, nothing can be more detrimental than their jealousies of each other, and nothing can be so advantageous to this country, as their united efforts for their mutual benefit. You have already excited jealousies, and shaken the confidence of the people; mutual affection and confidence between the several States is the glory and safety of all. You have turned the course of trade into other channels, which cannot be recovered back for years to come, and posterity will curse the non-intercourse if it is adopted, and posterity will curse the embargo, which will be remembered as great instances to instruct the world to avoid unpardonable error. Sir, you know they cannot be carried into effect without a large military force, subject to military tribunals. I have always understood that military force was not to be applied to enforce obedience to a law, but when called for by a civil magistrate; and if they are not under the civil authority, it is not government, it is war, civil war, and we have no protection against tyranny. While we follow the sound of liberty, let us take care we do not lose the substance.

Mr. M. said he had taken great pains, and paid attention with deliberation to the highly interesting and important situation of the country, and did believe it indispensably necessary to negative the resolution for a non-intercourse, and raise the embargo. If you do not, said he, it is but the beginning of distress, and I never knew anything which gave me more heartfelt regret than these measures. This nation has experienced great advantages resulting from the different branches of trade, and the sources of public wealth and individual happiness are increasing and extending. Reject this resolution of non-intercourse; raise the embargo, in whole or in part, you will then invigorate her exertions, and reanimate her hopes. If you do not, you will sink down the nation into despair, and an absence of hope for Constitutional relief, and their resentment may get the ascendancy of their moderation, and your laws will be evaded by force. Sir, a want of remedy is in effect the same thing as a want of right.

I will not say where it will end; I will be silent on that head, and go no further. But look to the consequences. No rational man will deny that this state of things cannot be attended with either duration or stability.

Mr. LYON occupied the floor till half past three o'clock, when the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, December 1.

Another member, to wit: THOMAS MOORE, from South Carolina, appeared and took his seat in the House.

JESSE B. THOMAS, the delegate from the Indiana Territory, returned to serve in the room of BENJAMIN PARKE, who hath resigned his seat, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

Mr. JEREMIAH MORROW presented a memorial of sundry officers who served in the Revolutionary war with Great Britain, now residing in the State of Ohio, stating, that, from the procrastination of the acts for funding the public debt, and the distress of the memorialists, they were compelled to dispose of their certificates for pay and commutation at much less than the nominal amount; and praying such relief in the premises, as to the wisdom and justice of Congress shall seem meet.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH presented a memorial of sundry late officers of the said Revolutionary army, residing in the State of Pennsylvania, to the like effect.

The memorials were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the committee to whom was referred the petition of thirty-six American citizens confined at Carthagena, in South America, under sentence of slavery; and, after some time spent therein the Committee rose and reported progress.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, the first resolution under consideration, in the following words:

"Resolved, That the United States cannot, without a sacrifice of their rights, honor, and independence, submit to the late edicts of Great Britain and France."

The question was taken on the resolution, and carried, nem. con.

The second resolution having been read, in the following words:

"Resolved, That it is expedient to prohibit, by law, the admission into the ports of the United States of all public or private, armed or unarmed, ships or vessels belonging to Great Britain or France, or to any other of the belligerent Powers having in force orders or decrees violating the lawful commerce and neutral rights of the United States; and also the importation of any goods, wares, or merchandise, the growth, produce, or manufacture of the dominions of any of the said Powers, or imported from any place in the possession of either."

Mr. RANDOLPH called for a division of the resolution, taking the question on each clause of it separately.

The question was taken on the first clause, ending with the words "United States"—carried without opposition.

The second clause was agreed to by the Committee, eighty-four to twenty-one.

Mr. BURWELL.—I feel bound by the course the debate has taken to express my sentiments upon the resolutions, and place in a proper point of view my conduct and opinions. The view taken of the subject by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. QUINCY) is, to be sure, an extraordinary one; he seems to have considered it a question whether we shall have a free trade or not. Can he seriously believe that to be the true question before the House? Can he hope to impose that belief upon us? In the course of my remarks I will endeavor to show that the question stands upon very different grounds, and that heretofore we have had but a choice of evils, and have but the same hereafter. He has presented us a highly wrought picture of the distresses and sufferings of the New England States generally. Is this intended to operate upon us in favor of free trade? or does the gentleman expect, by unfolding to Europe these dreadful calamities, to awaken the tenderness of Mr. Canning, and dispose him, by withdrawing the Orders in Council, to facilitate the removal of the embargo, as a measure of inconvenient restriction to the American people? Will this language have a more beneficial effect upon France? No, sir, it requires a firm and decisive tone, manly fortitude, to command respect from these Governments. But the gentleman, like an indiscreet officer, in a state of siege, while endeavoring to form an honorable capitulation, tells his adversary he can hold out no longer, his provisions are exhausted, his men disheartened, and his works of defence are tottering. Others have taken a retrospective view of this subject, and say that the Government might have avoided the present difficulties, if a different course had been adopted. I could have wished that all which is past should be forgotten, and that we should now take the course best adapted to secure the honor and independence of our country; but as this Government depends upon the will of the people, and derives its strength from their approbation, it is necessary they should know the truth of things urged on this part of the subject. The gentleman from New York (Mr. MASTERS) told us yesterday all our difficulties might have been averted by the ratification of the rejected treaty of Monroe and Pinkney. Without deciding the merits of that treaty, at the same time yielding every tribute of respect to the talents of the negotiators, I altogether deny the assertion. I beg leave to recall to the attention of gentlemen a single fact. By a reference to the note of Mr. Canning of 23d of September last, you will find the orders of January, 1807 and November 11th, rest upon the same ground, and are defended upon the same principle, the "unquestionable right of His Majesty to retort upon the enemy the evils of his own injustice." You well know that of January was issued in seven days after the signature of the treaty, and before its reception in the United States; and supposing therefore the treaty had been ratified, it proves that the same measure would have followed; and that part of the argument is completely done away by a reference to that note. With respect to the conduct of our Government in relation to Great Britain, the proclamation interdicting your ports and harbors to British ships of war, and the non-importation act, deserve some consideration, particularly the proclamation. It has been stated that all our difficulties have been protracted upon a point of etiquette. The proclamation was not a departure from our neutrality with Great Britain and France, because it inflicted a penalty for the violation of a general statute, passed in 1804, without reference to a particular nation, and applicable equally to any Power that should offend against it. If the ships of France had committed similar outrages, they would, I am confident, have received the same treatment. Do you doubt the violation of the law? Look at the conduct of the squadron. It cannot be reconciled with the independence of the United States, and the proclamation was the mildest precaution when they exercised the hostile rights of sovereignty in this country. They stopped our vessels, impressed our seamen, attacked our frigate, threatened the destruction of Norfolk, and arrayed themselves in complete hostility against us in our own waters. I do not mention these circumstances to excite strong feelings against the nation; I would ask if the United States could suffer the officers of a foreign Government to exercise this power, within our territory, and whether, if the French had done the same acts, it would not have been considered blameable to permit them to remain there?

If the British navy had conducted themselves right, they would have been entitled to and received the customary hospitality. Is it too much for the United States to ask, as a condition for revoking the proclamation, and inconsistent with the dignity of the British Government to give, an assurance that their hospitality shall not be again repaid by the violation of their peace? As to the non-importation act, I would ask, can gentlemen believe if it had not passed, the system pursued by Great Britain would have been different? Had not the policy which terminated in the Orders of Council commenced previous to the passage of your law? Mr. B. contended that the measures adopted by that Government grew out of the state of things in Europe, and the peculiar character of the present war. The non-importation act could not have given offence to the English Cabinet, because it was a commercial regulation justified by previous injuries, and the discrimination made in England of four per cent. more on goods exported to the United States than the continent of Europe; and this country had an undoubted right to countervail it in any way they pleased. England had the less right to complain, as she was in the habit of excluding from her ports such articles as were objectionable, and in her colonies had placed the exports of the United States upon terms by no means reciprocal.

Admit for argument sake, that the act was improper, its policy equivocal—it was not enforced; and therefore the English never experienced any injury from that act. It does not constitute an apology for them. Why ascribe the conduct of England to these causes, when your Ministers, Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, have declared to you, there were strong and powerful interests in that country, anxious for a war with you; they have told you those interests combine power and wealth sufficient to control the Government; and you have been cautioned by Mr. Monroe, in the most propitious moments of his negotiations, against this spirit; that the liberal views of the Minister must yield to the clamor of the West India planters, the jealousies of the East India Company, and ship-holders, and the impatient avarice of the navy. It is the ascendancy in the Cabinet of these influences, thwarted by the war on the Continent, which menaces your commerce with extermination, and your country with servirtude. It kept pace precisely with the progress of these events.

The first cause of complaint you had, was the obstruction to the exportation of foreign articles to the Continent, the surplus of similar articles became multiplied in the hands of the British merchants, and the means of disposal gradually lessened, with the conquests of France, and her occupation of the continental seaports; in order to counteract these effects, they tried to destroy our trade, by declaring the continuity of the voyage between the colonies and mother country illegal; your vessels were then required to stop in the United States, change the cargo, and pay or secure the payment of the duties, before they could proceed to the Continent. These regulations obviously tended to destroy the superior advantages of the commerce of the United States, and when France had succeeded in cutting out the British entirely from the trade of the Continent, a report of the West India committee declared, that unless all West India and colonial produce was compelled to reach the Continent through England, they could not cope with the American merchant; and the planters in the British colonies could not compete with their rivals without absolute loss. To secure the interest of her planters the American commerce must be depressed. It was the same object which revived the rule of 1756, and extended its application to us, upon principles totally new; and the orders of the 11th November, which followed the execution of the Berlin decree, were intended to give efficacy to this project. Upon this point the gentleman from Massachusetts is good authority; he admitted one of the objects was the annihilation of neutral commerce; he seems however to have forgotten that it was impossible for an American vessel to reach the Continent; and argues as if your commerce was perfectly free, overlooking the actual situation of the United States. You are told by the gentleman from Massachusetts, you have effectually yielded to the operation of the French and British edicts, by withdrawing from the ocean, in conformity to them. I would ask him, if we had armed against both Powers, in addition to the embargo, whether that would be submission? Yet, according to the gentleman's logic, submission consists in refusing to trade with the belligerents. Let us take him upon another ground; he says take off the embargo, and let your vessels go to sea. Well, suppose that to be done; your vessels go to sea, and trade exclusively to Great Britain; for she says you shall go no where else; would that be submission or resistance? Unquestionably submission. But, sir, grant your present system to be submission, is it of that abject kind recommended by the gentleman, which renounces the character of your flag, abandons your property and citizens to the mercy of every picaroon and plunderer on the high seas? Upon the subject of tribute, you are told by him, it will not be paid, if you first go to England—because your merchant will not afterwards go to the Continent, as he knows France will confiscate his property. Is it come to this, and are we to be indebted to France, our bitter enemy, for protection? Is the national honor to be deposited in such hands? It is asked, could we not trade to Russia, Denmark and Sweden? Yes, you could go direct, but for the Orders of Council, which compel you to touch first at a British port, and pay the duty which she requires for permission to carry on that commerce, to which you have an undoubted right, without imposition or obstruction from that Government. In this case who will save your honor, and your people from paying tribute? The gentleman from Massachusetts admits the trade of the United States must stop in England; it was upon that ground he endeavored to prove we need not pay tribute. What will be the consequence to the United States and the New England people themselves? Why, as England does not employ or consume more than one-third or one-fourth of all your exports, of course you will lose the employment of your shipping in that proportion. What will become of the vessels usually employed in the export trade, in exporting the remaining produce to the Continent, when they are absolutely prohibited from approaching it? They will be useless; and it is absurd, in the present state of things, to imagine they would be relieved by taking off the embargo. He tells us, in speaking of the relative importance of the commerce of Massachusetts and Virginia, that the State of Massachusetts exported to the amount of twenty millions of dollars, thirteen in foreign and seven in domestic produce. Great part of the latter is actually the product of Virginia, whose resources he has endeavored to underrate.

In the report of the Secretary of the Treasury you will find the whole United States exported a little more than one million and a half of foreign produce to England; this is all she wants; while Massachusetts alone exports thirteen millions; several other States export as much foreign produce. Can it be necessary to say what will be the consequence of carrying all these goods to Great Britain? Instead of enhancing the value to the proprietor, the loss and depreciation in the price are inevitable. You must pay an export duty of seventeen per cent. ad valorem, the consumption in that country being prohibited; and, according to the gentleman's account, the trade closes there. But, admit it may be sent abroad, that it escapes the fangs of French privateers and unprincipled confiscation in French ports; in that case you cannot, in addition to the expense of a circuitous voyage, pay seventeen per centum, and come into competition with British merchants trading in similar products, favored with the consumption of the home market, and aided by the drawback in foreign markets. Sir, you would lose upon the property at least as much as you do here, where, by the progress of internal consumption, it is gradually going off at its full value. When the gentleman talks about a disposition to sacrifice commerce, a disposition which never did or can exist, what would he say, if, instead of the British repealing our drawbacks, we were to do it? The drawback given by the United States to the Eastern merchant upon exportation to foster navigation, the British Government has undertaken to repeal, and that which we give as a stimulus to enterprise, they extort as a tax upon it. You will find the drawback has been made the standard for the duties imposed by England on foreign exports.

I would again demand, what would these gentlemen say if we should repeal the drawback? They would say, you paralyze our commerce, suspend the employment of our capital, and sacrifice us to our rivals; yet, when the thing is done by a foreign Government, having no jurisdiction over us, they see nothing hostile to commerce—not a murmur is heard; but they tell you, let the merchants trade, they will not pay tribute, France will prevent that: they are determined upon free trade in spite of drawbacks, circuitous voyages, exposure to captures, new duties, and total exclusion from a market. "Everything," says the gentleman from Massachusetts, "stops in England." How does this affect the remaining branch of your navigation? Such is the amount of the discriminating duty in favor of British vessels and against American, by giving them the preference in the transportation of some of your own produce, you save the whole freight, without including other charges incident to the voyage. Can your ship come into competition when it is the interest of the shipper of every article to give your adversary fifty per cent. more than you can carry it for? This fact is demonstrable, with the certainty of arithmetical calculation, and if gentlemen will take the trouble to calculate the discriminating duties upon cotton they will be satisfied. It is proper to observe a discriminating duty is not a recent thing, the duty is relatively now what it was before; but as the gross amount of duty imposed on American produce by the act of Parliament, carrying the Orders of Council into effect, has increased, this effect has resulted. Let us examine how the fisheries will be affected, which, to some gentlemen, are a source of tremendous uneasiness. For these fishermen I sympathize with all my soul, because they are precisely in my own situation. They impose on stockfish 2s. 6d. sterling per cwt., and on every species 4s. sterling per cwt. Now, gentlemen have always told you, the fisheries cannot subsist without some special bounty from Government. Will they now contend that that branch of industry can maintain itself against a duty, the fourth part of the value of the fish? Cut off, too, from its natural market, and forced into one in which there is no demand? The merchant who has patronized the fisheries, and vested his capital in the transportation, will no longer find it his interest to pursue his accustomed traffic in this article to Europe. On the subject of the fisheries, I remember a remark of Alexander Baring, who is considered one of the most intelligent merchants in England, that the cutting off our trade with the Continent would effectually destroy their own fisheries, because, he said, they used to sell their fish to the American merchants, who sent them to Spain, Portugal, &c., under the neutral flag. How much greater must be the injury when to the loss of the market must be added the expense of double freight and insurance, and a prohibitory instead of a protecting duty? Gentlemen will hardly call this a matter of bounty from his Royal Majesty. What will be the effect on the planter? I believe I have shown the interests of the Eastern merchants and fishermen are completely destroyed.

It will be found that similar duties are laid on lumber and other important articles, operating in the same way as on the fisheries. With respect to the productions of the Southern country, let us take tobacco, an article in which I am personally interested. We export annually about 86,000 hogsheads from the United States, of which, it is stated by Mr. Baring, the consumption in England is about 12,000 hds. annually. What will become of the surplus? If lodged in England it will not sell, because the quantity exceeds the demand in England, while the risk of capture, and duties on exportation, must confine it to that country, and destroy competition among the purchasers. On this subject, I beg leave to read a calculation of the tribute to which that article is liable:

A cargo of tobacco may be said to consist of four hundred hogsheads. For the sake of round numbers we will suppose each hogshead only one thousand pounds, and the account stands thus:

Four hundred thousand pounds of tobacco at 1½ sterling per lb. is	£2,500 sterling, or	$11,200 00
Tonnage at 12s. per ton, on 400 tons, is	£240 sterling, or	1,065 60
Light money, and about fifty other charges, will amount to		800 00

Amount of tribute on each cargo	-	12,965 60
Deducting the amount of tobacco consumed in England, the residue destined for the Continent, and which would go direct but for the Orders in Council, is compelled to touch in England, and pay besides double freight duties, which, calculated as above, stands thus: Say 68,000, though the real quantity is 74,000 hds. weighing 1,000 pounds, at 1½d. sterling per pound, is	£425,000, or	$1,998,600 00
One hundred and seventy ships' tonnage, at $2,000 each	-	340,000 00

Amount of tribute on tobacco	-	2,338,000 00
------------------------------	---	--------------

The amount of tribute, then, on 74,000 hds., the quantity consumed on the Continent, is $2,338,000, nearly one half the value of the whole article when shipped from the United States, estimated on the custom-house books, at $6,000,000. After having destroyed its value, by depriving us of a market, and hindering its consumption, I venture to pronounce that, if the embargo was removed, it would not pay the risk and freight, much less the duty. The planter would receive no reward for his labor, and the merchant undertaking the shipment would be ruined. But the gentleman from Massachusetts talks about navigating the ocean as a matter of perfect safety. What are the facts, so far as they have transpired? Mr. Gray, of Salem, a man whose patriotism has honorably triumphed over the prejudices of party, and whose commercial accuracy will not be questioned, has stated that, out of seven vessels which sailed from that port in the month of December, only one reached the Continent, and she had to pay heavy charges to escape confiscation; she was, to use a vulgar saying, whipped and cleared. I have seen a list from a single insurance office, in Baltimore, of vessels cleared out from the 1st of September to the 23d of December, and out of fifteen which sailed for the Continent, in that time only two escaped—two were condemned, two acquitted, and nine remain in jeopardy. Why, then, will gentlemen tell us we can carry on commerce, when such vessels as have sailed have been devoted to certain capture? In the case of the insurance company to which I have alluded, the loss of property was calculated at a risk of eighty per cent. on its whole value; and, in the case of the port of Salem, at a risk at least as great. With respect to the trade with the French and Spanish colonies, which was open when the embargo was laid, everybody knows we had enough of some of these articles to serve this country for five years to come—we were overstocked—they would be of no value in the United States, and why, then, bring them here? For, I have before shown that, if they had been brought, they could not have been re-exported with safety or profit.

This, then, being the state of affairs at the time the embargo was laid, it becomes proper to speak of the policy which governed my vote. It has been echoed from every part of the House, that the embargo has failed in its purpose; that it has not starved and brought England and France to our feet. I had no such expectation. As far as I recollect what I thought or said at the time of its passage, no such consequence as starving the belligerents was anticipated. I advocated it as a precautionary measure; in that point of view it has not disappointed my expectations. It has answered, then, fully, because it has saved the property which was in port, and got in that which was out, a sum equal to one hundred million of dollars.

It has as yet saved us from war, and what is equally important, it has saved us from tribute. I had another object; to give an opportunity to appeal to their interests, and ascertain whether the belligerents would respect our rights or not. As for what Mr. Canning insinuates, that we looked for the downfall of the British nation from our measures, I did not anticipate such an effect, neither did I with that view support the present system. I contend for nothing but free trade, and ask nothing more of them, nor will I ever be content with less, I am one of those who have always considered the British nation safer than it has been within a hundred years; her relative situation is incontestably more firm than it was at the commencement of the French revolution. Is there a navy on the ocean to oppose her? No. She has swept from that element everything under the name of a ship of war; a danger of internal commotion, which threatened her at the commencement of the present war, no longer exists from the example of the French revolution; no man can suppose that the example of France can now invite emulation; it has ceased to be contagious; the systems resemble too much—all honest men loathe and detest with abhorrence the habitual violation of national rights, whatever may be her internal regulations. In estimating the policy of the embargo when laid, and the effects it would have produced, we should bear in mind the situation of Europe; that was peculiarly favorable for an appeal to the commercial interests of Great Britain. Mr. C. himself admits it was a state in which such an attempt was most likely to succeed; at that time she was excluded from the Continent of Europe, and the want of the commerce of the United States would have been sensibly felt by her. If the coercive effects of the embargo have been partially defeated by the change which has since occurred in Spain, no one can consider it as an error in our calculations at the time, because it could not be foreseen.

There is a remark made by Mr. Canning, connected with this subject, which deserves a reply. He says, the embargo, by an unfortunate concurrence of circumstances, did come in aid of the "blockade of the Continent." The Minister would find a very natural solution for this mystery, if he would only recollect the "unfortunate concurrence" in point of time of the extension of the French decree and his orders against neutral commerce. But, sir, the embargo was materially unlike the blockade of the Continent, inasmuch as British goods were not excluded from your ports, and consequently "did not come in aid of it." I again disclaim all identity in the cause, or concurrence in the views of the French Emperor. My ground was exclusively American; I asked no surrender of British rights. How far the effects of this measure have been defeated by events in this country, appears very obvious to my mind. How does it happen that Mr. Pinkney, as late as July, had every reason to believe the British Government would accede to a proposition which has been since rejected? How does it happen that their tone has been so suddenly changed? This alteration could not have been caused by the events in Spain, because they were known previous to that time, and the change was too abrupt to have an entire connexion with the state of things in Spain and Portugal. Sanguine calculations were entertained that the United States would be dismembered, and your Government destroyed. This was the common prophecy of newspapers and pamphlets. The author of "Hints to both Parties," no less a man than Mr. Marriot, a Ministerial member of Parliament, sagely remarks, that the Chief of your Government must follow the fate of Paul, when Russia and Great Britain were at war; that he is mistaken (as my colleague Mr. RANDOLPH declared) we all know; but the effects were the same as if the calculation had been correct, because the Ministry had acted upon it, assuming it to be a fact. But this writer is certainly mistaken in assimilating this Government to that of Russia. Though it would be easy to take off an individual in this country, it will be found infinitely more difficult to effect a revolution in its policy. The destruction of one man would not change the temper of the people, or alter the policy of the National Councils. While I regret the effects produced in Europe by the intemperance of our own people, and the shameful misrepresentations of the papers and foreign emissaries, I am far from questioning the right of the people in every section of the country to speak what language, and to give what intelligence they please to foreign Powers. It is one of the evils arising from our political institutions, but which is counterbalanced by the good effects which the liberty of the press produces. It is, however, lamentable that the essential interests of the country have been sacrificed by retarding a settlement of our differences.

There is one fact which proves that the calculation of the British Government on our divisions has been decisive in her Councils. I mean the proclamation inviting the violation of our embargo laws—affording protection to those who resist the authority of the law. Is this the conduct to be pursued toward us by a nation professing friendship? Is it the conduct of one civilized country to another? It is not, and can only proceed from the delusion produced by the reports of individuals who have been scattered through this country to engender mischief. Mr. Canning speaks this language, as if his hopes of rebellion were consummated. He evidently considers us torn to pieces, incapable of resistance, and obliged to fall a victim to their policy. But I trust there is a redeeming spirit which will avenge the wrongs of this injured nation. There has been another effect produced by the embargo, notwithstanding the shameful evasion of the law. The price paid in the West India islands for your products, some of which are essential to existence, and all necessary to comfort; this price has been extravagantly high, and must have been injurious to the planters, who, while they found the means of vending their produce limited, were compelled to pay for articles of foreign growth, high prices, and exchange their own below the usual price, which, even at its common standard, afforded no profit. In Great Britain herself, as was expected, the gradual advance on the price of all the raw materials for her manufactures, has not only embarrassed their operations, but thrown thousands out of employment; the effect has kept pace with the exhaustion of the stock on hand when the embargo was laid.

The plan proposed by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. MUMFORD,) for permitting a trade with Spain and Portugal, would be far from affording adequate relief to the great and important interests concerned. Your exports to Spain and Portugal do not exceed four million of dollars in domestic, and sixteen millions in foreign produce. Supposing this commerce free, what would be the effect of prosecuting it? Do you think, in the present state of things, you can come into competition with the Spanish, Portuguese, and British vessels? I apprehend not; for it will unquestionably be the policy of the new Government to favor their own navigation, and that of the British nation, with whom they are in alliance, in preference to another. And, let me tell you, by this moment, their markets have been glutted with foreign produce by the English, who are convenient, and have, themselves, a superabundance. But, have you any assurance that the present state of things will continue? Suppose your vessels were to clear out for ports of Spain and Portugal; is there any certainty you would not find them occupied by French troops? And, in that case, an unprincipled confiscation of all your property must be the immediate consequence. Besides, how do you know, these countries are not within the scope of the Orders of Council? All you know upon this subject, is a conversation said to have passed between some merchants and Mr. Canning. He tells you, to be sure, it is not impossible some relaxation of the orders, not calculated to impair their rigor, but to accommodate them to neutrals, may take place. You understand pretty well, from experience, what these favorable modifications mean. I shall presently have occasion to speak of them. You rely, then, upon a conversation, in which a British Minister has undertaken to do—what? To regulate the trade between this country and an independent nation—(for it must be considered independent until subdued.) He tells you, that you may carry direct your own, and the produce of the Spanish and Portuguese colonies, and bring back the produce of those countries in return. This boon, seized upon here with avidity, is stamped with an assumption of authority, subversive of your national independence. If it rests with them to regulate your commerce at their pleasure, what pledge have you, when it conflicts with their interests, they will not curtail it? How are you to satisfy the scrupulous consciences of the Admiralty Courts, that the sugar you carry was raised in Cuba, and not in Martinique or Guadeloupe? And, if you succeed in this, a thousand pretexts will be found by the learned crafts of Doctors' Commons to rob you of your property. When I talk of the security of our trade, I talk of a non-entity. It is regulated by the single dash of a pen; and that not of your own Government, but of a foreign Power.

But, sir, gentlemen may attach some stability to this indulgence, from the exception of the Spanish and French colonies, in the Orders of Council. They have often adverted to the fact, and the British Government itself has not failed to press it upon you as a proof of her favor, and a new claim upon your gratitude. The truth is, she was pursuing her own interest; she was more concerned in the trade to the colonies than you were yourself, for which your merchants exported only four or five millions in native products. They became factors of the British, and circulated nearly twenty millions of English goods, which could not otherwise find entrance into those ports. Is it not easy to discover what was the policy of the permission to trade to these islands? It was, that her special interests, not yours, were promoted by it. No; she would not even permit you to seek a market for your indemnification after serving her. Now she can go there directly, and sell her goods without your assistance. What follows? Does she consult your interest by permitting you to carry on the trade open to her own merchants? No, sir, and if any doubts remain, let me call your attention to the late proclamation, blockading the French West India islands. We have despatches from England down to the 25th of September; at that time there was no intimation to your Minister, and not a whisper in the political circles, of this thing, and suddenly, when it was supposed in England (in the language of the gentleman from Massachusetts) "that we must take off the embargo," you see a proclamation dated only fifteen days later than the latest dates from England, declaring that every vessel going to the French West India islands, shall be liable to seizure and condemnation. What language does it speak? What policy does it evince? To my mind it presents a train of reflections, to which I am unwilling to give utterance, and apply the appellation which the transaction deserves. It is insidious and hostile to its utmost extent. Suppose the gentleman had moved to take off the embargo the first of the session, and had succeeded by the tempting promise of this trade. You well know the French islands have been literally ruined by the embargo. They have not been, like the islands of His Majesty, supplied by the infractors of the law, principally British agents, through Canada and Nova Scotia, with provisions. Every vessel laden with flour and provisions would have shaped her course to these islands, where there was the greatest scarcity, and the greatest probability of profit; and by this "unfortunate concurrence" between the removal of the embargo, (as was expected in England,) and the proclamation of blockade, all your commerce in that direction would have been swept off and destroyed. This blockade is of old standing, at least as old as the petitions of the last summer—it is dated the 14th of October—delayed six days, and sent by express for our notification about ten days after the meeting of Congress, at which time it was supposed the embargo would be raised. It is said this express vessel met British vessels going into Barbadoes as she came out, from whom the instructions were received. But it is reduced to certainty, these vessels arrived on the 20th, and the proclamation issued on the 14th. Yes, sir, the nets were artfully spread, the sportsmen stationed, and the whole flock would have been entangled and taken, but for the embargo. Will gentlemen not take warning?

There has been one observation made on which I will make a few remarks, and but few; but they are necessary to a fair and candid discussion. It has been said that we ought to have resisted the Berlin decree; that if we had done that, we should have been saved from our present disagreeable situation, and have taken from Great Britain a pretext for enforcing her Orders in Council. The gentleman from Massachusetts defines submission to be the doing that which you are commanded to do, and resistance in the doing that which you are commanded not to do. I thank him; he is perfectly correct. I will use his definition, and apply his own principles to this case. What said the Berlin decree? You shall not go to Great Britain, if you do France will seize and confiscate your property. What was our conduct? We did go to Great Britain, and our shipments were nevertheless as great as before the decree; we did carry on the forbidden trade, and therefore, by the gentleman's own definition, resisted. Let us take another view of this subject. In the note of Lords Holland and Auckland, attached to the rejected British Treaty, they tell us among other things, that if the enemy should carry these threats into execution, and the United States should acquiesce, they should probably be compelled to retaliate in the same way; but disclaim the right to retaliate if the French Government formally abandons, or tacitly relinquishes them. What is tacit relinquishment? Was there a single case in which it was executed, and known to us previous to the Orders in Council? Not one; and does not the fact, that American vessels went from England to France, as before, prove a tacit relinquishment? Certainly. Indeed so far from its being a tacit relinquishment, it was a formal abandonment, amounting to a positive and express acknowledgment, that the decree was not in force against the commerce of the United States. I have already shown that England received no injury from the operation of that decree, because we traded with her as we had done before, and the retaliating orders, admitting the right of Great Britain to retaliate on her enemy through neutral trade, could not exist until we had received an injury and acquiesced in it. But so far from its being known we had acquiesced, the execution of the Berlin decree, and the orders of the 11th of November, reached this country nearly at the same time. If our commerce had been vitally assailed by this monstrous decree, and we had not effectually resisted, I am not prepared to say how far it would have been a departure from our neutrality, and would have justified the measures adopted. Sir, I never would have submitted to it. You must remember I declared I would vote against a general embargo, but that I anticipated, from the British, measures quite similar to those of France. We did our duty, resisted when attacked by it, and I scout all idea that the people would have submitted, or that any man would have proposed such submission. You hear no apology for France; you hear no palliation of her outrages, or disguise of her views, and you see every man ready to exert the energies of the nation to avenge the wrongs of the country. Take the Orders of Council in another point of view: they profess to retaliate on France through us, because we have permitted her to attack our rights. Why then were they not confined in their operation to France; why did they comprehend nations with whom we were in amity, and from whom we had received no injury? Will any person say we ought to have gone to war with Russia, Denmark, and Sweden? You are bound to consider these nations independent, and treat them as such, while they manifest no disposition to change the subsisting relations between us, and refrain from hostile acts. The unlimited scope given to the Orders in Council, manifestly shows the retaliation on France was a mere pretext. But if the object of Great Britain was really retaliation on France, how could she get over the proposition made by the Government of the United States to continue the embargo as to France, and remove it as to England, provided she would withdraw her Orders in Council? This would have been a compliance with her requisition for resistance to the Berlin decree, and destroyed all ground for the continuance of the orders. But here we are told that our Government has offered to comply with that, which if they had done in the first instance, would have saved us from difficulties. This is indeed a strange inference: that England would have acceded to the proposition formerly, because she now rejects it. Sir, the United States can never consent to give authority to that unlimited right of retaliation which she claims. And so far from this offer being a compliance with that demand, it was an honest and fair avowal of the conduct which the Government would pursue towards France, if left to itself. It was honorable, sir; and the rejection of that favorable proposition, connected with the obvious causes of that rejection, convinces my mind she does not want to be on good terms with us. She thinks more may be made in another way.

It has been urged in the course of this debate that the embargo destroys all our revenue, and that if we remove it our Treasury would be again filled. What is the fact on this subject, taking it upon their own ground? You inevitably lose upwards of a million of dollars collected by way of drawback, on articles re-exported from the United States for consumption in foreign markets; the obstacles interposed by the orders, and the imposition of a transit duty by act of Parliament equivalent to the duties remitted in this country, cut off at once this amount, it is pocketed elsewhere. Again, we have heretofore derived a revenue from all that part of our importations which is from the Continent of Europe, and every other part of the world not included in the Orders of Council; the impost derived from this trade, and the means which it afforded of paying revenue into the Treasury are at an end, nor could it be resumed by raising the embargo. I will venture to assert these losses constitute one-half of the revenue; they are irretrievably lost while Europe continues in its present state. Again: Suppose you continue to trade with England, how would your revenue derived from the consumption of her manufactures stand affected? Grant that one-half of our revenue is now collected from the commerce with Great Britain; if the produce of this country is reduced to a mere drug by being restricted to her ports, (and I have shown that would be the case,) could you continue to consume her goods? It is an established axiom in trade that the exports and imports must always bear an exact proportion, and it is ridiculous to suppose the use of foreign goods would continue after the means of payment ceased to exist; in other words, the exchange of labor between the two countries would be too unequal to last. In a short time even that branch of revenue would dwindle into insignificance; it would not replenish the Treasury. Thus, sir, take these edicts and Orders in Council in any possible point of view, their operation upon your commerce is exclusion from the continental market, the destruction of your revenue, the lessened value of the produce of your soil, and the prostration of your fisheries and navigation. Enterprise cannot continue when every avenue of commerce is cut off; in short they produce the very evils which gentlemen wish to charge on the embargo. I have endeavored to consider this question as a question of pecuniary calculation altogether, and it is so clear to my mind, that there does not exist a temptation to sacrifice the honor and independence of the United States, that I am astonished gentlemen can take any other view of the subject than that I have taken. To take off the embargo at this time, while the decrees of France and the orders of England remain in force, without adopting some other measure equally efficient, would be to submit to the meanest degradation. It would be sending your property to certain ruin, exposing it to the lawless spoliation of every pirate with which the ocean is infested, without the means of resistance or the hope of justice. If you do not now take a stand for your rights, when will you? Can the occasion ever be more urgent? It would be vain hereafter, when you have yielded, and the nation is habituated to foreign domination. Do you flatter yourself that your grievances will close here? You will be mistaken; it is not the nature of power intoxicated with success to retract its encroachments, or commercial avarice to relax its pretensions. The little you now have will soon be claimed, and what you have already yielded, will furnish the pretext to enforce your compliance; you will not even be remunerated by profit for your disgrace. It is not a time when submission is entitled to moderation, or concessions insure forbearance. Our agriculture must continue as it now is until some new direction be given to the destructive tempest, which renders it almost impossible to navigate the ocean. I know that the operation of our measures is strong, that every man must feel them more or less, and the plainest calculations cannot quiet the restlessness of pecuniary embarrassment. But, sir, while I candidly believe the members of this House feel their full share of the public pressure, (that at least is my case,) and are honestly governed by what they believe the interest of the country, I cannot but rely upon the patriotism of the people. Let gentlemen, therefore, who disapprove of this system, come forward and say what they think best to be done. They owe it to themselves, and their constituents, and they cannot withhold their counsels without violating a sacred duty they are pledged to perform. Let them do this instead of dividing and distracting the Government, and weakening the nation; they are Americans, and ought not to sacrifice the national rights to the pride of party. As to the embargo, show me something better, and I will retract like an honest man, and adopt it. I do not consider myself precluded from a choice of measures because I once voted for it. There is no object to which I stand pledged but the safety of the nation, and no system but that which will most certainly promote it.

My colleague has said we are called on by every sense of duty we owe to ourselves and country to unite and annoy our enemies, and make the strongest possible impression upon them. I agree with him. It is time to retaliate the aggression and injuries of which we have been so long the victims. This is the only way to change their temper, by retorting the evils of their own injustice; some foreign magic must have withered his brain, and that man must be under the influence of foreign Governments who will not go all lengths to support the honor of the nation. It is to be regretted our harmony has been disturbed by the introduction of subjects not connected with the existing state of things, or calculated to meet future difficulties. Union would be more promoted by looking prospectively. As to those measures alluded to by gentlemen as the cause of our present difficulties, they passed before I had a seat on this floor, and without any participation of mine. Can there exist a doubt that the crisis has arrived when we must take care of ourselves, and keep to ourselves? Every mode of insult to the nation has been tried, and even your public Ministers have come in for their full share of neglect. As to keeping them any longer in Europe to be writing notes and papers, it is out of the question; for one I am prepared to go along with my country and share its fate. I shall vote for the first and third resolutions, because we cannot without dishonor submit to the flagrant violation of our neutral rights, and because we should be prepared to defend them. The second, excluding armed vessels, shall also have my approbation. I am willing to place the English and French upon the same ground. Their conduct has forfeited all claim upon us to the hospitality and protection of our waters. I am disposed to exclude the productions of both, and cut off all intercourse until they are disposed to renew it upon terms of equality. As for this measure injuring England more than France, we cannot help that; but it ought to be recollected that it has not been long since we were told by the British themselves, all their efforts to injure France were vain, while she enjoyed the benefit of the American commerce.

The third resolution, in the following words, having been read:

“Resolved, That measures ought to be immediately taken for placing the country in a more complete state of defence.”

Mr. RANDOLPH said he supposed that this was a resolution to which there might probably be but little opposition; but at the same time he, for one, should like to know what were the details connected with it.

The CHAIRMAN asked if the gentleman from Virginia wished to hear the report read?

Mr. RANDOLPH.—Very far from it, sir.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, as the chairman of the committee was not present, and he felt at all times disposed to give any information in his power, he would state what he knew on the subject. The situation of the United States being at this time critical, and as it was possible if not probable that war would ensue, Mr. N. said it had been his opinion, and that of the select committee, that we should be prepared for it. It had been doubted by the committee whether this subject came properly within their province; but it had been the opinion of the majority that it would be proper for them to express their sentiments on the subject; with an idea that if the House should concur, the resolution might be referred to another committee, whose business it would be to procure such details from the departments as would enable them to make the proper arrangements for carrying the wish of the House into effect.

The resolution was agreed to, nem. con.

The Committee then rose and reported the resolutions to the House.

The House proceeded to consider the said report at the Clerk's table: Whereupon the first resolution contained therein being again read, a motion was made by Mr. DANA, to amend the same, by inserting between the words "submit to," and the words "the late edicts of Great Britain and France," the following words, "abandon the navigation of the ocean in consequence of:" and on the question, that the House do agree to the said amendment, it passed in the negative—yeas 26, nays 96, as follows:

Mr. DANA spoke against the propriety of introducing the resolution, but did not oppose its passage.

Mr. TAYLOR replied.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS called for a division of the question, so as to express the sense of the House as to the edicts of each belligerent, separately.

Mr. MOSELY said, he should, at this time, make a very few remarks only, as applicable exclusively to the resolution.

He observed, that it appeared to him very singular and extraordinary that, at this period, the House should be presented with the abstract proposition contained in the resolution, that the United States cannot, without the sacrifice of their rights, honor, and independence, submit to the late edicts of Great Britain and France.

Sir, said he, the obnoxious edicts alluded to in this resolution were as well known and understood months prior to the close of the last session of Congress, as they are now.

Why then should it now, for the first time, be thought requisite to make this declaration. If such a declaration could be deemed necessary to show our spirit it certainly seemed to him to come with a very awkward grace at this time of day.

But he considered the resolution itself as rather a harmless thing. It may admit of various constructions. At all events, he said he perceived nothing very alarming in it. -It can "break no man's leg, nor pick no man's pocket." He presumed it was not intended or calculated to expose the nation to the waste of much blood or treasure, from any hostile resistance to their edicts which was to result from the adoption of this resolution.

Indeed, said he, if this resolution were to be presented to the public, disconnected with the reasoning in the report, and with no explanation of its meaning; it would, as has been remarked, be regarded by a great proportion of the people as a pledge for the repeal of the embargo laws.

These laws, by compelling them to abandon the ocean, they consider as producing that very submission and sacrifice of the rights, honor, and independence of the nation which this resolution disavows.

Instead of viewing their present situation in the light of a dignified retirement, as some gentlemen are pleased to term it, they do conceive it as a dastardly relinquishment of their incontestable rights. But those who voted for the embargo laws, and who are still for continuing them, it is to be presumed, entertain no such ideas. Finding, however, that others do, and that such sentiments are continually becoming more prevalent, it was perhaps thought prudent and proper to have a general declaration of this sort, as explanatory of their own views of their own measures. If this be all, Mr. M. said, he certainly felt disposed, on all occasions, to gratify gentlemen whenever it could be done without injurious consequences. His greatest objection, he said, was an apprehension that we should diminish our own dignity, and expose ourselves to ridicule, by saying so much and doing so little. He feared that foreign nations would begin to conclude, that they had nothing to apprehend from us, but proclamations, paper resolutions, abstract propositions, and menaces without meaning. However, he said, he believed, when called upon, he should give his vote in favor of the resolution.

Mr. GARDENIER said that he should probably, on the present question, be in a very small minority; and this being the case, he felt an unwillingness to vote, without at the same time asserting the principle on which he opposed it. He was opposed to it for two reasons; first, because it was legislating on an abstract proposition, resolving a certain thing which could not be disputed; and secondly, because no definite consequence was to result from the adoption of it. One gentleman, said he, asserts that the adoption of this resolution, if followed by any consequence, will be followed by a repeal of the embargo. Another gentleman considers the adoption of the resolution as pledging the House and nation to the approbation and continuance of this same embargo law. Then it is legislating on words without signification, entering into a resolution which subjects us to no specific course after it is passed, binds us to nothing; for one gentleman can vote for this resolution, because in consequence of it he considers the House bound to repeal the embargo. Let the members of this House look for one moment to the ridiculous consequence of voting upon an abstract proposition which is followed by no consequence, which decides no question, which ties us down to no course of proceeding. No individual commits himself on any point in controversy by voting on this resolution. Therefore, Mr. G. said it was an idle and useless proposition. It appeared to him to be below the dignity of the House to vote for or against it; and if he knew any way in which the question could consistently be evaded, he should pursue that course in preference to the vote which he felt himself obliged to give. In the view in which he considered this resolution, he could not see how men, legislating for the good of the nation, could bring themselves seriously to vote for such a proposition. It is not only idle, said he, but in my mind it is not asserting the dignity of this House, and of the nation, to pass a resolution expressed in the terms in which this is expressed. "Resolved, That the United States cannot, without a sacrifice of their rights, honor, and independence, submit." The United States cannot submit to anything, sir; the moment we submit, that moment we have no more rights, honor, and independence. I had thought, as an American citizen, that to submit in any case, was to relinquish those peculiar privileges which distinguish the citizens of the United States from all others; I should, therefore, as soon think of bringing forward a resolution for the adoption of this House, that it is a relinquishment of our rights and independence to submit at all, as that it is such a sacrifice to submit to the edicts mentioned in the resolution. The proposition then amounts to this: that for the United States to submit is to sacrifice their independence. And who disputes it? No one. In this view of the subject, therefore, the adoption of this resolution would seem to imply a doubt whether this nation has shown a disposition to resist the aggression of foreign Powers. If the fact were really so, if we had been in the habit of submitting to insults and aggression, at any rate I would not wound the feelings of this injured people so much as to pass a resolution which should imply that it had been the case; for if any possible practical utility can result from the adoption of this resolution, it would be this and this only: that inasmuch as our conduct hitherto had been calculated to impress foreign nations with an opinion that we would submit, it has become necessary to declare that we would not submit. Now, is this country placed in such a situation, either by the conduct of the Administration or its opponents, that a new declaration of independence has become necessary? Has the spirit of '76 travelled back so far as that it is now necessary to declare that we are independent? If this were seriously a matter of doubt, in such a case I might be inclined to adopt such a resolution as this. But I do not think so. The spirit of independence is as broad awake as ever it was; it is as warm and glowing as it was at the battle of Bunker's Hill; and, therefore, certain as I am of this, I am not prepared to give my assent to such a proposition; because I think its adoption calculated to carry with it an expression of doubt as to the matter which it resolves to be true. When the Declaration of Independence was made in '76, we were not, immediately antecedent to that period, independent. That the character of this nation might be justly estimated, it became necessary that a declaration of independence should be made. That was made; and ever since that time it has been unnecessary to declare that it did exist. I see nothing in the temper of the people at this time which is calculated to make me fear that they mean to relinquish their independence. I will say that in neither of the great parties in the country is there any disposition to relinquish it. In the party which I oppose, I do not believe that there exists any design to surrender our independence, although I believe their measures destructive to the interests of the nation; and in the party to which I belong, (and the being attached to it is a circumstance in which I feel more pride than in any other.) I am certain that no such disposition exists. There is no necessity, therefore, for passing this resolution. I would not hold out to foreign nations that any circumstance had occurred which rendered it necessary to declare that we are an independent nation; for that is the pith of the proposition.

Four other members rising in favor of the previous question, it was put in this form—"Shall the main question be now put?" and carried—ayes 85.

Mr. RHEA rising to speak at this time, and an objection being made by some gentlemen on the ground of order,

The SPEAKER declared it his individual opinion that debate was inadmissible after an affirmative decision of the previous question; but that the House had at the last session overruled his opinion, and he felt himself obliged to yield to their decision.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS appealed from this decision, permitting debate after a decision of the previous question, on the ground that it was contrary to the rules of the House.

Much debate took place on this appeal, and Mr. RANDOLPH called for the yeas and nays on it.

Before they were taken, however, a motion was made to adjourn, and carried.

Another member to wit: EVAN ALEXANDER, from North Carolina, appeared and took his seat in the House.

Mr. LEWIS, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, to whom was referred, on the sixteenth ultimo, a petition of sundry inhabitants of the City of Washington, presented on the tenth of November, one thousand eight hundred and seven, reported a bill to incorporate a company for opening the canal in the City of Washington; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was recommended, on the twenty-second ultimo, a bill authorizing the President to employ twelve additional revenue cutters, reported an amendatory bill, authorizing the President to employ an additional number of revenue cutters; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House tomorrow.

Mr. JEDEDIAH K. SMITH presented a petition of SAMUEL MOREY, of the State of New Hampshire, praying that the patent heretofore granted to the petitioner for sundry improvements made by him on steam engines, may be extended to such farther time as Congress in their wisdom may deem proper.—Referred to Mr. JEDEDIAH K. SMITH, Mr. UPHAM, Mr. MATTHIAS RICHARDS, Mr. GOODWYN, and Mr. HOLLAND; to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

The SPEAKER presented to the House sundry proceedings of the Grand Jury for the county of St. Clair, in the Indiana Territory, at a term of the Circuit Court held in the month of October last, stating certain grievances to which the inhabitants of the said county have been and are now subjected from the connexion subsisting with the country lying eastward of the river Wabash; and praying such relief in the premises as to the wisdom and justice of Congress shall seem meet.—The proceedings were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A Message, received yesterday, from the President of the United States, was read, transmitting a report from the Surveyor of the Public Buildings, of the progress made on them during the last season, of their present state, of the expenditures incurred, and of those which may be requisite for their farther prosecution.—Ordered to lie on the table.

The House resumed the consideration of the question on an appeal from the decision of the Chair which was depending yesterday at the time of adjournment: Whereupon, the said decision being again read in the words following, to wit:

“That, conformably to the determination of the House on the fifteenth of December last, it did not preclude debate on the main question.”

And on the question, “Is the said decision of the Chair correct?” it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 101, nays 18, as follows:

The question then recurring, that the House do agree to so much of the first resolution reported from the Committee of the whole House, as is contained in the first member thereof, in the words following, to wit:

“Resolved, That the United States cannot, without a sacrifice of their rights, honor, and independence, submit to the late edicts of Great Britain.”

Mr. RHEA made a few remarks in support of it.

Mr. UPHAM made a few observations, going to show that any gentleman might vote for or against this resolution, under whatever interpretation he pleased; giving to the terms of it whatever construction should best suit his ideas.

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia said, that the importance of this subject had been acknowledged by all the gentlemen who had addressed the Committee of the Whole; they had admitted that this was a crisis which called for all the information, talent, and decision of the nation, which, unfortunately for its best interests, were divided into parties and subdivided, so as materially to affect that strength which ought to be united. The course of discussion which had been pursued, necessarily resulted from the nature of the subject, our foreign relations; everything connected with them came before the House in some shape or other. And although the time of the House might be employed on some things unnecessarily, according to his conception it would be well employed in defending measures which had been condemned with a view to prejudice the public mind; for it was not with the hope of changing the conviction of any member of the House, but for influencing the people, that they had been thus condemned. And as some gentlemen had taken views of our situation which were conceived by him to be incorrect, disingenuous, and improper, he thought it due to himself, to the majority with whom he was associated, and the people, to state the grounds on which they acted, according to his conception.

We are scarcely permitted to touch the threshold of this investigation, said Mr. J., when we are called upon to take care how we act; insurrection is threatened, and an attempt is made to influence the House by representations of hostility to the Government, in the Eastern people, which only pervades the minds of those who represent them. I know that watchfulness is characteristic of a republican form of Government; it is the grand sentinel of the system; and I should regret to see the disposition to watch over and animadvert on the measures of the Administration, lulled into a listless security. But it is not that watchfulness, disgracing the authors of misrepresentations which have extended to every hamlet and fireside in the country, that is proper, but a candid examination of both sides of the question. Audi alteram partem, is a precept founded on justice and reason, and necessary to a correct decision. Misrepresentations have gone forth to every quarter of the Union, and charges, reiterated in some instances on this floor, have operated on the public mind, so as to excite unnecessary, unjust, and unreasonable jealousies against the Government. Party spirit, the bane of free governments, a monstrous excrescence growing out of liberty, and threatening even liberty itself with destruction, still exists in our country, and after the unsuccessful experiment of seven years has been made, it is in vain to expect to disarm it of its antipathies and its malice. Its great maxim seems to be that the end will justify the means; and if it can attain its end by the most dishonorable means, that they are justifiable. To this source in a great measure may be ascribed the difficulties this nation has to encounter, and to this source, foreign nations are unfortunately too much in the habit of looking; to our opposition prints and our opposition men, England looks for support, and from them an idea has gone abroad that the insurrections of the Vermontese and the opposition in the Northeast would overturn the constituted authorities; and, if not by the regular process of election, by revolution itself, a change would be made in the politics of those who administer the Government of the United States. We know that it is the wish of each of the belligerents, who have swallowed up in the vortex of their interminable disputes all the nations of the world but the United States, to unite us in their cause. Each one wishes to form more intimate connexion with us than those we have with its enemy. This disposition is natural; for when we look into private life, we see individuals endeavoring to enlist those who have no concern in the dispute among their partisans in their personal contests. Besides this wish, common to both the belligerents, a spirit of monopoly and jealousy of our commercial greatness has seized upon the Government and people of one of them. It is evident from the conduct of Great Britain for many years past, that she cannot consent to submit to the idea that the United States shall be reaping the rich harvest of their neutrality, while her thousand ships are scouring every sea and driving everything from its surface. The commercial spirit of the people of the United States has been the cause of that jealousy; that spirit which in its infancy was so eloquently portrayed by Edmund Burke, which has been so essentially fostered by the measures of our Government, has grown with our growth, and strengthened with our strength. Our hardy adventurous seamen have prosecuted commerce in every sea, and reaped the most advantageous harvests appertaining to it. Therefore it is natural to suppose that with the jealousy excited by our successful competition, and a knowledge of her supremacy on the ocean, Great Britain, who wields its trident, should be disposed that we should bow to its haughty mistress; and though we have not succumbed, every right appertaining to us as a neutral nation has been assailed in turn. Let us look at the injuries practised by Great Britain, in relation to their effects upon the United States in their national and neutral character; and first with reference to those effects on ourselves. Our citizens have been impressed, under a pretext that they were British subjects; they have been deprived of their liberty, seized and carried from their country, compelled to endure an arduous service, and to fight against nations with whom we were at peace. The colonial trade, from which we derived a revenue of a million of dollars per annum, was next assailed by them, on the principle that they had a right to prohibit a trade with enemies' colonies not permitted in time of peace. This attempt to destroy our commerce was enforced by an arbitrary and tyrannical interpolation of new principles into the law of nations, giving efficacy to the spirit which contemplates the pressure of its rival in every quarter. We find that spirit in other outrages, in relation to blockades notified to us, made only on paper, enforced solely towards neutrals, and which never existed in reality: thereby cutting off trade with places which, by the laws of nations, except actually blockaded or invested, we have a right to carry on. By the order of June, 1805, a very essential branch of our commerce was likewise cut off, and our vessels were captured, although returning with innocent cargoes, which were not liable to seizure, upon the pretext that they previously had been employed in a trade with contraband articles. British outrages have been committed not only on the high seas, but in our own harbors. The case of Pierce, in the harbor of New York, is not forgotten by you, sir, or by the United States. An American citizen, pursuing his lawful commerce within our own waters and exclusive jurisdiction, had his vessel fired upon, and he was killed. The case of the Cambrian was one of the same character; there the commanding officer declared that he claimed jurisdiction in our waters within the length of his buoys, and there impressed our seamen, in defiance of the laws of hospitality and the laws of nations. We find the exercise of similar pretensions in the case of the Impetueux, a vessel belonging to a belligerent, stranded on the coast of North Carolina, which, though by the laws of nations exempt from attack, because within the jurisdiction of a third and neutral party, was destroyed by British vessels. By the Order of January, 1807, restraining the trade of the United States, from one port to another port of the same, or another belligerent enemy, a profitable branch of our trade was annihilated. In addition to these, the orders of November 11, 1807, amount to a declaration, in effect, that we shall not sail on the ocean without carrying our produce first to Great Britain, there paying a duty, and receiving a license to carry it to its place of final destination. The attack on the Chesapeake was, at the time of the commission of the outrage, deemed by all parties, if not disavowed, a just cause of war, and one whereat the public indignation could scarcely be appeased without a resort to war. The invitation to violate our embargo laws, touched upon by my colleague

DECEMBER, 1808.

Foreign Relations.

H. OF R.

(Mr. BURWELL) yesterday, connected with all those acts which I have recited, manifests a determination on the part of Great Britain, that our pride shall be humbled, the commerce which we have enjoyed shall be destroyed; that we shall bow to the supremacy of her thousand ships, and that we shall not sail on the ocean without her permission.

How is it when we cross over the water and look at France? We find by the proclamation of General Ferrand, an attempt made to regulate our trade to St. Domingo, inconsistent with our rights. The Berlin decree, declaring the British islands in a state of blockade, although ineffectual because she had not the power of executing it, was not less outrageous than many of the acts to which I have referred of the British Government. The Milan decree, which may be considered as a supplement to the British orders, has endeavored to extend the principle and to render more efficient the measures of destruction which are aimed by both the belligerents against our commerce. A decree is also said to have passed at Bayonne, by which France attempts to execute the embargo laws by seizing those American vessels which have not returned home, and is of the same character with the others. The burning our vessels is among the most flagitious of the whole, for which no apology can be offered consistent with reason and justice, and for which no apology has been attempted but the impracticability of keeping them in possession from the superior naval force of Great Britain.

But we were told the other day that a recapitulation of the injuries which we have received served but to blazon the dishonor of the country. It is proper that they should be recurred to, because they are the groundwork of our proceedings, and it impossible to keep them out of view, although the recital of them may tend to irritate and wound the feelings. But the reproach comes illy from those who say that our Government is chargeable with all these misfortunes, and are not attributable to the acts of our enemies, for so we may call them (although not declared enemies) who trample on our rights, add confiscation to insult, and murder to both. And how is this assertion proven? Why, we are told by Mr. RANDOLPH, that, in 1805, when the Kempers were taken from our territory by American citizens, we had submitted to the hostile tread of a foreign nation; that our character has declined abroad ever since; and that we ought to have gone to war at this time. What was the case of the Kempers? As well as I recollect it was this: These persons had committed an outrage within the Spanish territories. They were either Spanish subjects or American citizens; they took refuge within the American territory, and were seized by American citizens and negroes, carried out of our limits, and delivered up to the Spaniards. And was this cause of war? Is it from such cases as this that attacks from Europe have been encouraged? Should this nation have gone to war for this act? No, sir; for the nation or individual who is alive to the insults of the weak and pusillanimous, always have, and my life on it, always will shrink from a contest with the powerful and the brave, and expose themselves to the imputation of cowardice. The act was disavowed; Governor Grand Pré denied that it had been done with his cognizance. I recollect seeing an account in the public papers during the last summer, that some officer of the United States had pursued deserters from one of the gunboats in the Mississippi within the Spanish lines, there seized upon the individuals himself, and brought them within our jurisdiction, and retained them in custody. Is there not a wide difference between this act, committed in a foreign territory by our own officers, and the one committed in our territory by individuals instigated by foreigners? And if there were no difference, would this be considered by the Spanish Government as cause of war against us? Would our Government hesitate to disavow the act? Certainly not, as we do not claim the right of invading a foreign territory for the purpose of seizing deserters; and would the unauthorized act of one of our officers be cause of war against us? No, sir. Then as certainly it would not be cause of war by us, unless indeed we act upon the principle that where the enemy is weak and pusillanimous we must take upon ourselves airs of resistance; and when he is great and powerful we must shrink from the conflict. I therefore do not admit that a failure to make war for this individual offence was a submission or a cause of the declension of our character abroad. If it has declined at all, it is in consequence of the unjust attacks made on this Government and on the majority of this House and the nation by enemies in our own country. The nation which goes to war for an ignis fatuus offence, will not be followed in it by the people. They will understand the causes of the contest; and when they find their Government right and their adversary wrong, then they will rally around the public functionaries; and I believe that all honest and virtuous citizens of the country who understand the causes of our present difficulty, though many are deluded and imposed on, will rally round their Government at this time.

Not content, however, with saying that the affair of the Kempers has been a cause of disgrace to the nation, the same gentleman has told us that the non-importation law produced our difficulties; that he prophesied the consequences of it, and his prophecy has become history. I shall refer to documents which come in such a shape and from such a source as with the gentleman will be unquestionable; and I will attempt to prove from them that he is mistaken. Mr. Monroe, in his letter of March 31, 1806, says:

"From what I can discern, I think that there is much cause to believe that Mr. Fox has the best disposition to settle our differences on just principles, but it must be recollected that some other of the members of the Cabinet have not always thought with him on such topics. On the most deliberate reflection, I am convinced that too much reliance ought not to be placed on these favorable appearances, and that there is cause to fear that if the Congress should separate without adopting a system of coercive policy calculated to meet the most unfavorable result, their forbearance may contribute to the disappointment of our reasonable expectations. By this, however, I do not wish to imply that measures of the kind alluded to should be carried into prompt execution. I mean only that the attitude should be taken, but its operation be suspended by suitable powers to the President, till he shall be duly notified that the negotiation has failed. Such a suspension will be deemed a sufficient mark of respect to those in the Ministry who are disposed to a fair accommodation, and the attitude will, in my opinion, tend to aid their councils in producing that effect."

I suppose, therefore, sir, that the non-importation law is not, in whole or in part, the cause to which any of our embarrassments are to be ascribed, because the then Minister of the United States, who, with the gentleman making the charge, is high authority, residing on the spot, witnessing the career of the administration even of Mr. Fox, advised the adoption of the measure; and it was precisely pursuant to such advice that some measure ought to be adopted, that the non-importation law was passed. Then, with regard to the dispositions manifested by the British Government in relation to it, we have the evidence of the same gentleman in his letter of May 17, 1806—

"That on the whole the measure is considered by the Government papers, on account of the distant period at which it does commence, rather as a pacific than as a hostile one. I persuade myself that the present Ministry will see in the circumstance of delay a strong proof of the disposition of the United States not only to preserve the relations of peace with Great Britain, but of their confidence that the Ministry is animated with the same desire. I cannot help remarking likewise the fact, that this paper was sent me immediately after the passage of the bill was known. It furnishes a strong presumption, that the Government papers judge correctly of the sentiments of the Government on that point. It may be inferred that a knowledge of the passage of the bill hastened the communication to me."

Here we not only find it a measure which the Minister deems correct, but we find that it is not deemed improper or hostile, and is considered as a proof of a pacific disposition. I will not admit for a moment that this measure is the Pandora's box from which have flowed the evils which beset this country, but rather that there is a fixed disposition in the Government of Great Britain to cramp the commercial spirit of this people, and to make them bow to the mistress of the ocean. In Mr. Monroe's letter of the 9th of June, 1806, we have further evidence of this. In a conversation which took place between him and Mr. Fox—

"In speaking of the non-importation act, he expressed his regret that it had passed. He said that it had the air of a menace, and that it was not agreeable to do things by compulsion. I reminded him how long we had complained of injuries which his Government had not attempted to justify—injuries which were not imaginary or perspective, but real and severe, which affected equally the honor and the interest of the United States. I added that under such circumstances his Government had no right to complain of the act referred to. I assured him, however, that I was of opinion, if the Ministry had not changed, that a bill of a very different import would have been adopted; that I had reason to believe that the tone of our Government, and of the Congress, had been essentially moderated by the information which I had given of his assurances that our differences should be settled amicably, and on just principles; that the act which had passed in consequence of that information was little more than a declaration to the citizens of the United States that the object would be duly attended to."

It was such a declaration, sir, as was produced by the exigency of the times, when our tables were covered with petitions from the mercantile interest, demanding redress. Mr. Monroe continues:

"I observed that he must be sensible, after the subject had been taken up by Congress, as it was before the change of the Ministry was known, that it was impossible for that body to dismiss it without some expression of the rights of the United States in the question in dispute, without exposing itself to the charge of having abandoned them. He seemed finally to admit that the Congress could not well have avoided doing something in the business, and that the measure which had been adopted ought to be considered as a moderate one."

When we have such testimony as this, why will gentlemen persist in saying that our embarrassments are attributable to the passage of the non-importation act?

But it is said that our negotiations in Europe have been paralyzed by extraordinary missions; that when our affairs might have been well settled, we had hung our disputes up in chancery by them; that the negotiation in Spain particularly was paralyzed by the mission of Mr. Bowdoin. This is a new charge; notwithstanding the number which we have had from the same quarter heretofore, this was not one of the catalogue of offences. But this declaration comes with an ill grace from gentlemen who have declared that there was no Spain; that there were no longer Pyrenees; France had swallowed up all, and if so, an extraordinary mission to Spain could be of no importance, she being under the influence of the tyrant of the Continent. But the old worn-out story has been touched upon, that Mr. Monroe might have settled our differences with the Ministry of Mr. Fox, but for the extraordinary mission. Sir, if Mr. Fox or the British Ministry had been disposed to settle the difficulties with this country on amicable terms, there was time enough for it; and if those difficulties had been settled, inasmuch as the law of nations has been trampled under foot by Great Britain, and the treaty of 1800 by France, it does not follow that an hundred treaties would have restrained their licentious invasions of right. But let us recur to facts. The documents before me will prove the reverse of the assertion; and from the same source when I have proved that the non-importation act was not the cause of our present difficulties, I will prove that Mr. Fox, with the best intentions, was incapable of entering into any stipulations with our Minister, being overruled by his colleagues in the Ministry. Let us recollect under what circumstances he came into office. His great talents had been arrayed against Mr. Pitt, who was the favorite of the King, and whom Mr. Fox and his party drove from power. He was brought in, in opposition to the will of the monarch, being forced upon him by the nation; and if he were not, he was prevented from acting according to the disposition which he felt. On a reference to the documents it will be found that he came into office on the 12th of February, from which time to the 31st of May, when information of the extraordinary mission arrived in England, was a period of near four months; and was a longer time than was necessary for settling differences with our Minister and entering into a treaty which could have been discussed and concluded in a few weeks. If it was not, it might well be said that our national affairs were hung up in a Court of Chancery, where discussion might be protracted ad infinitum, and a decision postponed to the end of time.

We are informed, by the letter of Mr. Monroe of the 12th of February, that "as soon as Mr. Fox took possession of his office, he requested an interview with the foreign Ministers, which took place yesterday." After detailing a part of their conversation, Mr. Monroe says:

"I could not avoid intimating to him that the friendly disposition which our Government had shown, had been most ungenerously requited by his; that it seemed as if it had pursued a just and friendly conduct towards the United States, till the moment that the new coalition was formed, and gave the present blow when the prospect was favorable to success, and kept the business in suspense to see the result of affairs on the Continent and in the United States. He heard me with much attention and apparent interest, intimated that he had been accused of being too friendly to America, and when I spoke of the treaty with Russia, he observed that he had thought that the arrangement made by it was a good one, though I did not understand him as pledging himself by the remark to its conditions. I requested that he would make himself master, as soon as in his power, of the correspondence between Lord Mulgrave and myself, and give me an interview, which he promised. I am happy to add, on a view of all circumstances, that I think the prospect of arranging our affairs with this Government, especially that one which respects the trade with the colonies of its enemies, on satisfactory terms, a very favorable one. It is certain that nothing more favorable to such a result was, or could reasonably have been expected from the first interview with the present Minister."

Here we find that the disposition which characterized him while in the opposition had not deserted Mr. Fox when in power, and he intimated to our Minister that he had been accused of too friendly feelings to this country.

On the 31st of March, Mr. Monroe writes that Mr. Fox gives him reason to expect that the condemnation of American vessels, which was then very frequent, owing to the resuscitation of the rule of 1756, would be suspended. In the same letter Mr. Monroe says: "From what I can discern, I think there is the best reason to believe that Mr. Fox has the best disposition to settle our differences on just principles, but it must be recollected that some other members of the Cabinet have not always thought with him on such topics. On the most deliberate reflection, I am convinced that too much reliance ought not to be placed on these favorable appearances," &c. Here we have still further proof of the disposition of Mr. Fox to settle the affairs of this country, and of the impracticability of doing it because he was overruled by the Cabinet. Pursuing the subject further, we find the same ideas introduced into his letter of April 3, 1806.

"How the Cabinet is disposed in this question, it is not in my power to state. Some of its members are known to have differed with Mr. Fox in respect to the policy of Great Britain towards the United States on former occasions, and in similar cases. It is possible that the spirit of conciliation on which the Ministry is formed may be felt in the present one. Every view, however, which I have been able to take of the subject, confirms me in the justice of the remarks which were communicated to you in my last of the 31st ultimo."

We are told in one of the letters which I have read, that Mr. Fox intimated that he would give orders to suspend the condemnation of American vessels. On the 18th of April, we find this had not been done, and although assurances had been given, the hostile acts were continued, as his influence had not been sufficient to procure a suspension of them. Mr. Monroe writes on the 18th of April that Mr. Fox had the day before said that he was essentially ready to proceed in the discussion of the subjects of difference.

"Some remarks of his having led the conversation to the merits of the principal topic, I told him that he must leave us in the enjoyment of the trade in question, and pay us for the property taken. To the first proposition he immediately assented. To the second, he said there would be objections. He added that he had taken steps to prohibit the further condemnation of our ships and cargoes, as I had desired, of which he intended to have informed me by note, but had been prevented by other business; he had no objection, however, still to do it."

In his letter of the 20th of April, Mr. Monroe says, "the prohibition mentioned in my letter of the 18th is to be extended to the seizure as well as the condemnation of our vessels, of which he is to give me an official note in a day or two." On the 28th of April, Mr. Fox, although he had stated on the 20th that he had taken steps to prohibit further seizures, said that such orders had not been issued; that in truth to issue them would be to give up the point in negotiation. What does this prove? Not that Mr. Fox would be guilty of sanctioning such an unpardonable libel on his own character, by equivocations in this way and doing nothing, but that he was controlled by his associates in the Administration. On the 28th of April, Mr. Monroe says:

"You will observe that Mr. Fox insisted in the late interview on restricting the trade with enemies' colonies in a greater degree than he had done in the preceding one. I am convinced that this was produced by the Cabinet deliberations on the subject, for I am strong in the opinion, that if left to himself, he would meet in arrangements which would place the whole business, and indeed all our relations, on the most broad and liberal basis, in a firm belief that, by so doing, he would advance the best interests of his country. But he has to consult and accommodate with others, some of whom may perhaps not entertain in all respects the same sentiments, or be equally prepared to encounter, in a new scheme of policy, ancient and deep-rooted prejudices."

On the 17th of May we find the following :

"After my interview with Mr. Fox, on the 25th ultimo, I waited a fortnight without hearing from him. This new instance of delay surprised me, because he had shown a sensibility to the former one, and did not seem aware of the necessity of adding to it."

Thus this friendly Ministry, with Mr. Fox at its head, although Mr. Monroe had given an opinion, from the intimations of Mr. Fox, that everything would be amicably settled, on the 16th of May had done nothing towards it, but we find the blockade of the coast, from the Elbe to Brest inclusive, notified to Mr. Monroe on that day. Heretofore assurances of friendship had not been wanting, and now we find them verified by the blockade of a coast of a thousand miles, which all the ships of war of Great Britain are scarcely competent to blockade in an effectual manner. Here comes proof to put assertion to the blush. In his letter of the 20th of May, Mr. M. says :

"With respect to the delay to which I am exposed, it is utterly out of my power to explain to you the cause. I have no reason to change the opinion which I have heretofore expressed of Mr. Fox's disposition on the subject, though I have had no late communication with him."

Talk of the extraordinary mission suspending negotiation, sir, when it is proven that it had been suspended from the 12th of April to the 20th of May!

"His present reserve is unfavorable, but it may be accounted for, and on principles which are quite natural, and therefore presumable. He may have experienced more difficulties in the Cabinet than he had expected. Many of the members may be indisposed to an arrangement on such terms as can be accepted, and most of them willing to postpone any decision, until the result of the proceedings in Congress is known."

Then, in his letter of the 9th of June, Mr. Monroe writes word that accounts were received on the 31st of May, that the President and Senate had adopted the measure of a special mission. The negotiation had previously been suspended by the impossibility of producing a consentaneous disposition in the Ministry with whom Mr. Fox was associated, and by whom he was overruled. I must therefore conclude that the charge is equally incorrect in relation to the failure of the negotiation, as I have proved it to be futile as to the hostile tread of our territory; that neither the consequences ascribed to the one or the other were at all attributable to our Government, but to a persevering disposition of a part of the British nation, not to permit our rights to be exercised or acknowledged on the high road of nations.

Sir, the effect of these decrees and measures, which I have noticed in the course of my observations, has been to sweep our commerce from the ocean, and even from the seashore, because there the commerce of the United States has been attacked, or if permitted to be carried on, it is only on conditions which every man in this House, every American, must spurn with indignation. What! shall we pay tribute for permission to sail on the ocean? The idea is too preposterous to be combated. Montgomery, Mercer, and Warren, and a host of worthies, who bled for the attainment of our independence, died in vain—WASHINGTON and his compatriots, who, at the expense of toil and bloodshed in the field, aided by our Solomons in the Cabinet, established our independence, fought to little purpose, if, after the lapse of a short period of thirty years, we can consent to pay tribute for the liberty of exercising an undeniable right. But I have as yet considered these measures, these encroachments of the belligerents, only with reference to their effects on ourselves. I will now consider them with reference to violations of neutral right affecting each other.

First, let us consider the measures of Great Britain. The impressments of our seamen, a topic on which I can never think with coolness or without sensations which confound my judgment, are not to be considered injurious only in reference to us. They have been injurious to the enemies of Great Britain, because they have tended to maintain the naval superiority of that nation which has kept all the Powers of Europe in check, and dictated maritime law to all nations, and would have been just ground of complaint by France against us if we had acquiesced in them. The vexation of the colonial trade; what is it? I have merely glanced at it, because I was aware that if I had extended my remarks I should have destroyed the patience which I fear I have already almost exhausted. The colonial trade was one which enabled the enemies of Great Britain to subsist, and conveyed the produce of the enemy's colony to the mother country. France would then have had great right to complain if we had acquiesced in the destruction of this trade, because France recognised its legality in the war which gave rise to the celebrated rule of 1756. A vessel during that war was captured by a British cruiser, recaptured by the French, and brought into port—the recaptors claiming salvage. The vessel and cargo were discharged by the French courts, which decreed the salvage was not due, because the capture was illegal, and the Admiralty Court of Great Britain would have released the vessel and cargo. Surely, then, they would have cause to complain if we had acquiesced in that infraction of our commercial rights. On the subject of blockades, if we had submitted, France might have complained with much greater right. The Government of Great Britain has declared whole Continents in a state of blockade; to use the diplomatic language of their orders, they tell us that "they must be considered as in a state of rigid blockade," although perhaps the notification was made without a vessel to annoy the entrance of the ports, and under a total impossibility of annoying it within the limits marked out. The law restricting our commerce with unblockaded ports was also a violation of the law of nations. In the case of the Cambrian, the commander of which vessel has to be sure been punished by his Government with promotion, there was also a cause of complaint if acquiesced in, because it is actually prohibited by the law of nations that a belligerent shall increase his force within the territory of a neutral State. The order of January, 1807, restricting the trade from one port to another of a belligerent Power, was also injurious to France, and of which she would have had good cause of complaint against the United States if we had acquiesced in it. All these are so many violations of neutral rights and national law injurious to France, and all but the last preceded the Berlin decree, and the last was before the operation of it.

In what point of view are the decrees of France to be estimated in relation to Great Britain? The Berlin decree was mere brutum fulmen, and I will take British authority and prove that her own vessels could not venture to sea. The Berlin decree in part was no cause of just complaint, because it related to municipal regulations which do not interfere with the acknowledged rights of neutrals. The Milan decree was very hard on paper, but we are told, and it is verified by experience, that Great Britain yields nothing to the thunders of that artillery, it passes by like an idle wind which she regards not. But I acquiesce with pleasure in the declaration that both France and Britain are regardless of justice when opposed to the exercise of the power of prostrating our rights.

How are the decrees of both belligerents considered with reference to an acquiescence by us? There never was a more base libel than the insinuation of acquiescence by us in the edicts of either. A recurrence to the documents will prove it. The United States have never acquiesced in any violation by either of the belligerents. But it is admitted by the minority that enough has been said as to Great Britain though not as to France; that there has been an acquiescence in French usurpations; and indeed it has been asserted, with a temerity not to be passed over with impunity, that there has not only been an acquiescence in the decrees, but a disposition to obey the commands of the French Emperor. It is true that there has not been as much said or written in relation to France as to Great Britain, because the injuries committed by the latter exceed those of the former tenfold. So far from admitting that there has been an acquiescence in the conduct of the conqueror of Europe and tyrant of France, a recurrence to the documents will prove that measures of greater vigor have been taken in relation to him than in relation to the tyrant of the sea; that the language and instructions of the Government have partaken of this character; and that it has manifested more sensibility to the injuries committed by France, than to those committed by Great Britain. When the Berlin decree was issued, Mr. Armstrong wrote to M. Decres immediately for an explanation of it. It has been objected that although the explanations, given by that Minister, were satisfactory, if he were the proper organ of the Government, he was not the person of whom to ask them, that the Minister of Foreign Affairs was the proper person. But surely the individual to whom the execution of the decree was confided must be considered as the proper person to give explanations concerning its import. But we have proof from Mr. Champagny, the successor of Talleyrand, that Decres was the proper organ, and that he was to be consulted. Champagny, in his letter of August, 1807, says that "as the execution of the maritime measures indicated by the imperial decree of the 21st November, 1806, rests naturally with his Excellency the Minister of Marine, and that moreover he has already had the honor of addressing you some first observations on the application of that decree, I transmitted without delay your letter." Thus the Minister of Foreign Relations, to whom it is said that our Envoy at Paris should have addressed his note, and from whom alone he should have received them, referred him to the Minister of Marine for the proper explanations. So that the utmost diligence was manifested by the representative of this nation at the Court of France, in obtaining proper explanations in relation to the construction of the decree; and not only the explanation was satisfactory, but, what was more important, the practice under it was satisfactory also, as it corresponded with the explanation given. When our vessels were burnt at sea, an outrage so scandalous as to destroy the pretensions to civilization of the nation authorizing it, a special remonstrance was directed against the injurious procedure. When the offensive note of Mr. Champagny was presented, Mr. Armstrong was specially directed to remonstrate against it; and he did remonstrate in such terms as were consistent with the dignity and honor of this nation. But when the infamous rider attached to the famous treaty was presented, there was no remonstrance directed, although that rider, with other communications, from the same source, are equally as offensive and equally obnoxious and repugnant to every American feeling as the insulting language of Champagny himself. Let us compare them, and see if I am not justified by facts in the conclusion which I draw. Champagny says—

"In the situation in which England has placed the Continent, especially since her decrees of the 11th November, His Majesty has no doubt of a declaration of war against her by the United States: whatever transient sacrifices war may occasion, they will not believe it consistent either with their interest or dignity to acknowledge the monstrous principle, and the anarchy which that Government wishes to establish on the seas. If it be useful and honorable for all nations to cause the true maritime law of nations to be re-established, and to avenge the insults committed by England against every flag, it is indispensable for the United States, who, from the extent of their commerce, have oftener to complain of those violations. War exists then in fact between England and the United States; and His Majesty considers it as declared from the day on which England published her decrees. In that persuasion, His Majesty, ready to consider the United States as associated with the cause of all the Powers, who have to defend themselves against England, has not taken any definitive measure towards the American vessels which may have been brought into our ports; he has ordered that they should remain sequestered, until a decision may be had thereon, according to the disposition which shall have been expressed by the Government of the United States."

This language is justly offensive, insulting, and inadmissible, but not more so than the justly offensive, insulting, and inadmissible notes to which I will refer. What is their language?

"The undersigned cannot, therefore, believe, that the enemy will ever seriously attempt to enforce such a system. If he should, they are confident that the good sense of the American Government will perceive the fatal consequences of such pretensions to neutral commerce, and that its spirit and regard to national honor will prevent its acquiescence in such palpable violations of its rights, and injurious encroachments on its interests.

"The undersigned, considering that the distance of the American Government renders any immediate explanation on this subject impossible, and animated by a desire of forwarding the beneficial work in which they are engaged, are authorized by His Majesty to conclude the treaty without delay. They proceed to the signature under the full persuasion that before the treaty shall be returned from America with the ratification of the United States, the enemy will either have formally abandoned or tacitly relinquished his unjust pretensions, or that the Government of the United States, by its conduct or assurances, will have given security"—[security to whom?] "to His Majesty, that it will not submit to such innovations in the established system of maritime law; and the undersigned have presented this note from an anxious wish that it should be clearly understood on both sides, that without such an abandonment on the part of the enemy, or such assurances or such conduct on the part of the United States, His Majesty will not consider himself bound by the present signature of his Commissioners to ratify the treaty, or precluded from adopting such measures as may seem necessary for counteracting the designs of his enemy."

The one of these Powers says that she considers war as declared; that the United States cannot submit to such sacrifices, and therefore war is declared. The other says that if we acquiesce—if we are not guided by spirit and national honor—if we do not give security to His Majesty, by our conduct or assurances, that we will not acquiesce, he wishes it clearly to be understood by both sides, that His Majesty would not be bound or precluded by the (rejected) treaty from chastising us in turn. This language, so insulting, is offered to a dignified, free, and independent nation. It is not less offensive than the language of their Minister here. What says he?

"I am charged by His Majesty to express to the Government of the United States His Majesty's perfect confidence in their good sense and firmness in resisting the unjust pretensions contained in the decree issued by the French Government at Berlin, on the 21st November, which, if suffered to take effect, must prove so destructive to the commerce of all neutral nations.

"His Majesty, therefore, with that forbearance and moderation which have at all times distinguished his conduct, has determined, for the present, to confine himself to the exercise of the power given him by his decided naval superiority, in such a manner only as is authorized by the acknowledged principles of the law of nations, and has issued an order for preventing all commerce from port to port of his enemies, comprehending in this order, not only the ports of France, but those of other nations, as, either in alliance with France or subject to her dominion, have, by measures of active offence, or by the exclusion of British ships, taken a part in the present war.

"His Majesty feels an entire confidence that the moderation and justice of this conduct will be duly appreciated by the United States, and has charged me to express to their Government, in the strongest terms, the regret he has experienced in being thus compelled, in his own defence, to act in a manner which must prove in some degree embarrassing to the commerce of neutral nations, and his sincere desire to avoid any stronger measures; to which, however, if the injustice and aggression of his enemies should not be resisted by those nations, whose rights and interests are invaded by so flagrant a violation of all public law, it may be ultimately necessary for the King to have recourse."

He confides in our good sense! Is it not insulting to us to say so? Has he any right to dictate to us what course we shall pursue? It is this which constitutes the essence of the insult in the note of Champagny, in the rider to the treaty, and in this instance also. Well, sir, we did not give those assurances to His Majesty; and on the 23d of February, 1808, we are informed by His Majesty's Minister here, that "His Majesty has been induced hitherto to forbear recurring to measures of this nature by the expectation that the Governments of the neutral States, who have been the objects of the French decrees, would have been awakened to a just sense of what they owe to their interests and own rights, and would have interposed with effect, either to prevent the execution of the French decrees, or to procure their abrogation.

"But His Majesty having been disappointed in this just expectation, and perceiving that the neutral nations, so far from opposing any effectual resistance, have submitted to whatever regulations France may have prescribed for giving effect to her decrees, can no longer refrain from having recourse to such measures, &c.

"Such a measure the maritime power of Great Britain would have enabled His Majesty to enforce; nor would those nations which have acquiesced, without effectual remonstrance, in the French decree of blockade, have derived any right from the more perfect execution of a corresponding determination on the part of His Majesty, to complain of His Majesty's enforcing that measure which the enemy has executed imperfectly only, from the want of the means of execution.

DECEMBER, 1808.

Foreign Relations.

H. OF R.

"His Majesty, however, actuated by the same sentiments of moderation by which His Majesty's conduct has been uniformly governed, has been desirous of alleviating as much as possible the inconveniences necessarily brought upon neutral nations by a state of things so unfavorable to the commercial intercourse of the world.

"The relaxations must be considered as most peculiarly favorable to the particular interests of the United States.

"Another most important relaxation of the principles upon which His Majesty's orders proceed, is that which licenses the importation of all flour and meal, and all grains, tobacco, and other articles, the produce of the soil of America, with the exception of cotton, through the ports of His Majesty's dominions, into those of his enemies, without the payment of any duty on the transit. This, I beg leave to observe, an instance in which His Majesty has deprived his measure of its most efficacious and hurtful operation against the enemy, through motives of consideration for the interests of America."

The same insulting and insidious language which is contained in the note of Mr. Canning to Mr. Pinkney! He regrets that we have not given security for our good behaviour, and that His Majesty is compelled to chastise us for it; and adds that these modifications must be considered as peculiarly favorable to the United States, being made wholly through motives of consideration for the interests of America. These notes are as offensive and insulting as the note of Champagne, which cannot be exceeded, and can never be submitted to.

But there is another point of view in which these orders should be examined—in relation to the professed object of retaliating on us. And I protest against the pretensions of one belligerent to retaliate on us for injuries inflicted by another belligerent. The practice, if submitted to, would prostrate the rights of this country. In war, retaliation may be proper between the parties to it, on the perpetrators of such outrages as the murders of Ismael and Prague, where a victorious General entered towns which had bravely opposed him, and put all the inhabitants to the sword. It might have been proper in the war in which we opposed His Majesty, who has always manifested such extreme sympathy for us, when we were treated as rebels, confined in prisonships, and denied the right of prisoners of war, because we ungratefully revolted from the mother country. In such cases retaliation may be proper; it brings nations to a sense of their duty and interests. But to say that because one nation strikes at the rights of this country, and we cannot effectually resist the blow, that another nation shall be permitted to strike us also, is a principle which I hope will never be treated with complaisance, but always spurned with indignation. Although it is inadmissible, it is in consonance with the practice of the belligerents in the present war, who seem to have said, "Let us attack all the world but each other; let the war be carried on through neutrals, but let us, as to each other, cry, hands off! and this is a war which we may carry on ad infinitum." Retaliation also implies a prior wrong, and Great Britain should be silent on the subject. If she looks at the impressment of our seamen, restrictions on the colonial trade, blockades, the order of June, the case at New York, where she increased her force within our waters, the case of the Impetueux, all which took place before the Berlin decree, her pretension of retaliation is destroyed; and if retaliation be admissible at all, it must be by her enemy, and not by her. What is the pretext on which she assumes the right of retaliation? Look at the famous rider, and you will find it; there it is claimed on the ground, first, of an execution by France of her threats; and, secondly, an acquiescence in them by us. But the order of January, 1807, professedly in retaliation, was issued before either took place.

I have said that the order of January, 1807, was issued before any execution of the threats of the French Government, and before any acquiescence in such execution by the United States, and consequently inadmissible even on the British principle. A recurrence to dates will prove that no execution of the Berlin decree was known to Great Britain at the time that the notorious Orders in Council were issued. On the 7th of January, 1807, Mr. Armstrong writes that a modification favorable to the United States had taken place. On the 17th, he speaks of an injurious construction which he had heard of; on the 24th of September he states that he knew that an injurious construction was about to take place; on the 17th of October, he writes that this construction was certainly to take place; and in November, 1807, he heard of the decree in the case of the Horizon, and on the 12th remonstrated against it. No execution of the decree was known to the British Government at the time of issuing the Orders in Council, nor to Mr. Armstrong, but for a few days antecedent to the orders. But, independent of this, it was proven on the floor of Parliament that no condemnation was known to have taken place prior to them. It seemed to be an object with the Ministry to prove that the execution of the decree was known in England; but no such proof was produced. It was proved by the evidence of their most celebrated merchants that no such case had been known to them. But even if France had intended to execute it, it was an idle menace, because she had no ships of war on the ocean, and could not even go from one port to another of the Continent without skulking along shore to avoid meeting vessels of her enemy, and Great Britain is dishonored by attacking us on account of it. She knew very well that our trade had been carried on without the least interruption, notwithstanding the decree. The absurdity of retaliating upon a threat was ably exposed by Lord Erskine. He said if the moon were to be declared in a state of blockade, it would be necessary, according to the practice of his Majesty's Ministers, to have the whole board of astronomers convened to react on her satellites. Suppose the Emperor of China, whose policy forbids external commerce, and who has no ships, were to declare the whole European Continent in a state of blockade, would it be required by his Britannic Majesty, from his sympathy for our interests, that we should go on a Quixotical expedition to China to compel him to repeal the decree? It would be equally as absurd as if the moon being declared in a state of blockade, we should be required to resist the declaration.

But gentlemen in this House again charge us with blazoning our dishonor by a repetition of the injuries we have received, notwithstanding the same gentlemen attribute every misfortune and encroachment on our rights to our own Government alone. I have endeavored to show, indeed I have shown it by a recurrence to documents which prove it, that the fault is not attributable to our Government, but to the hostile disposition of the belligerents. But it is said that Bonaparte is extremely hostile to us, as if he alone entertained feelings of hostility; that he has declared to our Minister, that we must be either his allies or his enemies. I have never seen the proofs of such a declaration, nor heard of it in such a way as to entitle it to credit. I never heard it suggested except in paragraphs of newspapers attributed to members of this House, which I am convinced are libels, because it is not true, that he or his Ministers have ever uttered such a threat to General Armstrong; but even if it were true, would it amount to more than the hostile acts, acts of war committed by him and the other belligerent, such as murdering our citizens, cutting off our trade, seizing and burning our vessels? No doubt they are both hostile to us. But it is said we know the wishes of the one belligerent, and the mandate of the other. I have no doubt as to what are the wishes of Britain; but I know not what is the mandate of the Emperor of France. I have heard of threats attributed to him which I trust he dare not utter to our Minister, such as a declaration that we should take the attitude of allies or enemies, that we should do the one or the other. I hope that if our Government would not recall the Minister in such a case, he would not submit to the disgrace of remaining there a day longer. But even were such the fact, it would not increase the proofs of the hostile disposition of the Emperor. Can it be doubted that Great Britain has the same hostile disposition? Look at her conduct to this country in her taxing us; look at the other more conclusive and unquestionable infraction of our rights, which was remarked upon by a gentleman who usually sits before me, when our doors were closed; look at the hissings at the London Tavern, when the corrupted pensioners of St. Stephens and the whole Ministry were assembled: the President and the United States were given as a toast and hissed with indignation; the clamor was so great, that Sir Francis Baring, for the purpose of resisting the popular obloquy, found it necessary to write a letter to the editor of a public paper, apologizing for having toasted the American Government and its President. If it had been done at a Bacchanalian revel, such as I have heard has taken place in this country, at which "success to the British navy" and "His Majesty's arms," and "damnation to democracy" were drunk among the toasts, I should have paid no regard to it, although, as it is represented, honorable members of this House might have been among the guests bidden to the feast. But when it occurs at a patriotic feast, where the Ministry of Great Britain are present, nay even gave it, and their indignation such as to require an apology for having proposed the toast, it does present itself in a very unquestionable shape, as proof of hostility to this country. Does not the affair of the Chesapeake prove it also? Surely it does. And because we have taken an attitude of precaution, and said, forasmuch as we have been wantonly assailed by a highway robber, we shut our doors and not open them to admit him and his whole gang, we hear the cry of French party, that "the finger of Napoleon is in this thing;" "you do not act from a spontaneous influence; you are sacrificing your rights to Napoleon." Sir, this cry is raised by British partisans, whose disposition is to sacrifice our rights at the shrine of Great Britain. Do the republicans of the United States vindicate the conduct of France? Do they palliate it? No, sir; not one of them. One universal burst of indignation has expressed their sensations at her conduct. With the minority, the few, not the people, for I beg to be understood as making a pointed distinction between those knowing ones at the head of a faction and those on whom they operate—the people, notwithstanding they have acted in hostility to the true interests of the country, are in my opinion still virtuous, they have been misled by the aid of ancient prejudices, deep-rooted and difficult to be eradicated, whether they relate to religion, politics, or anything else. How does the account stand with the few, I ask, in relation to the vindication of England? Look at the publications in Boston, the cradle of the Revolution. There the attack on the Chesapeake was vindicated and justified, although Mr. Canning and the whole British nation disavowed the act. And what is this ascribable to? I beg gentlemen to be cautious how they talk of French partisans. It will, as the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BACON) has said, expose them to an insinuation—nay, more, proofs are not wanting—of an undue predilection for the enemy of France and the enemy of this country. Have we not lately seen it published in Eastern papers, that we have no cause of complaint against Great Britain? Yes, sir, the Pickerings of the nation have said it, if not in terms, in effect; and it is this which had an influence on the foreign relations of this country. The pamphlet (Hints to both Parties) referred to yesterday by my friend and colleague, (Mr. BURWELL,) speaks of the necessity of perseverance in the British system, because of the probability of an insurrection in the North, and that, like Paul's empire, wrested from him by assassins, everything will be laid at the feet of Great Britain. What are these ideas produced by? By such productions as Pickering's letter, and a letter which lately appeared in the Newburyport Herald, purporting to be from a member of Congress. When we look at this famous letter of the 16th of February, which included every offence committed by France, the recital of which gentlemen sicken at the idea of, we are told that the immediate if not the only object in calling out the militia was to excite a war pulse, for Great Britain has done us "no essential injury." Most magnanimous mother! We never can discharge the obligation of gratitude which we owe her "thousand ships." What, sir! Can we doubt the effect of such productions in Europe? The fact of its passing through eight editions in London, proves the effect of these charges of a hostile disposition, an effort on the part of the President "to excite a war pulse," unjust resentment, a war without necessity, and the keeping the Orders of Council, and almost everything relating to Great Britain wholly out of view. The British Government is told from no informal source, by the opinion (official I may say) of a man high in the estimation of his party, that the President wishes to keep up resentment against Great Britain, "by exciting new resentments and cherishing old prejudices." I beg gentlemen to be careful how they urge a charge of foreign influence when there are such damning evidences to stare them in the face in proof of their own predilections. Notwithstanding all this, I am not willing to admit there is so much depravity and corruption in this nation, as to produce such a partiality in any portion of the country for Great Britain as the majority have been most falsely charged with entertaining for France.

But we are told that "punctilio" alone prevents a settlement of our differences with England. This is contained in an extract of a letter from a member of Congress, to a gentleman of Newburyport, and thus the people are deluded. Punctilio is the only cause of dispute! These falsehoods produce the arrogance and hostility of Great Britain to us, because she believes that we are a rope of sand; that the North is in a state of insurrection and the South falling off. And if these ideas were realized it would not be astonishing; because to a high-minded yeomanry, such as the great mass of the people of the North and East, it is natural to suppose that such statements as have been made will excite resentments against the Government. It is not in the power of every man to read all the productions of the times; and if he does, they do not make that impression upon him which they do upon statesmen whose duty it is to examine minutely; and therefore, they do not know that every effort has been made to settle our differences with Great Britain; and believe the statement when they are told that punctilio only prevents a settlement. What is the idea naturally excited in England by this language? Why, as Mr. Marriot's pamphlet says, "Let us hold out: our friends will soon rise into power, and thus we shall gain a complete victory." The successful invasion of France or the decapitation of the despot of Europe would not to the British Ministry and its friends be a more desirable event than the overthrow of the Republican party in the United States. They are blind.

ed to their true interests, and hold out, in their injurious conduct to us, with the hope of producing such an event. I wish the practice of judging of us by looking to the opposition, were abandoned in England, and the Government of that country would then be convinced that the people of this have no interest foreign to that of their Government, nor the Government any interest but that of the people, and a wish to do them all justice; that neither the Government nor the people are disposed to surrender their rights or tremble at their threats; and that they have hitherto been deceived by misrepresentations of our dispositions. To these we may attribute the insolence of Mr. Canning's late note, not much less insolent than those to which I have already referred. I will read a single paragraph from it.

"His Majesty would not hesitate to contribute, in any manner in his power, to restore to the commerce of the United States its wonted activity; and if it were possible to make any sacrifice for the repeal of the embargo, without appearing to deprecate it as a measure of hostility, he would gladly have facilitated its removal as a measure of inconvenient restriction on the American people."

. Kind, philanthropic souls! They have great charity for us; they would forgive us all our sins of hostility, proved by their friend's (Pickering's) letter, which passed through eight editions; but they regret that they cannot remove an inconvenient restriction on us, though they would be very glad to do so. The cry of French influence recoils on its authors. Sir, if there be any foreign influence, it is British; but I am unwilling to believe that there is either. I should not have indulged myself in this insinuation, were it not that I every day see some communication justifying it; and I would not, perhaps, have troubled the House with any remarks at this time, were it not from an intimation which I have received from a meeting of my constituents, asking that we should treat with both belligerents without favor or affection to either! I despise the Governments of both nations from my soul. Although at no remote period my ancestors came from England, I think alike of the despoiler of Europe, the usurper of Spain, the great tyrant of the land, and of the robber of the Spanish frigates in time of peace, the destroyer of Copenhagen, and the murderer of its helpless women and children. I have no confidence in either. These are times in which we ought to speak out. It is time that the people should know that we have nothing to expect from either belligerent; negotiation has been spun finer than the cotton can be which is to pass through British ports and pay a transit duty. I know it is impolitic and unworthy of the magnanimity of the Representative of a free people to abuse foreign Governments when the times do not call for decision; but we cannot be guilty of treason to our own people, because our remarks wound the feelings of our enemies.

I have said that I have no sympathy for either of the belligerents. For their Governments I feel equal hatred, indignation, and resentment; and will submit to accommodation with neither till the injuries committed on the rights of my country are atoned for. Yet it is true that Great Britain has done, and will continue to do us, most harm, and in that proportion I feel my enmity to her increased. Bonaparte, whenever it is in his power, seizes our vessels. His Majesty retaliates because we have not given security for our good behaviour, such as is asked of a malefactor released from confinement for a bailable offence. But it is said that punctilio prevents a settlement of our differences. Why, then, if that be the case, let us give it up. It is shameful, scandalous, and unworthy of a free people, whom we should misrepresent if we stood on punctilio. Is a determination to protect our citizens punctilio? I have always understood that the object of associations for self-government was to preserve the personal rights of the individuals composing it, in comparison with which property is as nothing. I will not say when our citizens are torn from their families and compelled to fight the battles of a foreign nation, that it is mere punctilio. Is the carrying trade punctilio? Let us look at the language of gentlemen themselves on this subject, some of whom are now accusing us of punctilio. [Mr. JACKSON here quoted a passage from a memorial from the merchants of the town of Boston, presented two years ago, remonstrating warmly against the captures by Great Britain of the vessels of the United States employed in the carrying trade.]

Is this, then, a matter of punctilio? We were asked by the gentleman from Connecticut to ingraft an amendment on this resolution, saying, that we will not abandon the navigation of the ocean; and are told that punctilio only precludes us from submitting to navigate the ocean as Great Britain pleases. Was the affair of the Chesapeake punctilio? Was the murder of Pierce a mere matter of punctilio? Was the jurisdiction of the officer in the harbor of New York within the length of his buoys a mere matter of punctilio? Is everything in dispute punctilio? The payment of tribute?—this is a little more punctilious than any other; yet our refusal to submit to the dishonor and disgrace of it is but a matter of punctilio. I hope in God there will be a punctilious resistance, so long as the American name exists, to the payment of tribute. The resignation of our independence is punctilio, and the threepenny tax on tea, which kindled a flame that burst the shackles of tyranny, was all punctilio too, sir!

The embargo was produced by this punctilious spirit of avoiding dishonor and disgrace, and of avoiding the payment of tribute, when ruin and tribute were assailing us under the decrees and orders of the great land mammoth and the shark of the ocean. It is denied that the British orders induced the embargo. What has that to do with the question? Whether they led to the embargo or not is immaterial, for the contention for that point is an admission of the fact that they would have justified it. The effect of the embargo was to bring home our citizens from abroad. Unfortunately some have disgraced themselves so much as to receive British licenses. By calling those home who were abroad, and retaining those who were here, till they could launch on the ocean again without danger of confiscation and ruin, and what is worse than all, of compulsion to pay tribute, we were not at all dishonored. It may be likened to the case of an unarmed man who is among his enemies. He retires home to associate with him his friends, arming himself and launching forth in resistance of the infraction of his rights. The time is not yet come for us to make a sally. It is due to the spirit of this people that every effort should first be made to preserve peace. The Governments of Europe, whether ruled by monarchs or despots, wage war when they please; the people march to war without inquiring why or wherefore, and imagine that, in so doing, they display their patriotism. But that ignoble spirit does not pervade this country, and thank God that it does not. The people will inquire and examine, also; they will believe that it is no dishonor to retire from the scene where they cannot carry on their usual occupation, and refuse to go to war till every preliminary step is taken. It is no disgrace to say that unprepared we cannot fight both Great Britain and France. We are appealing to the justice and interests of those nations. It is to be hoped that their eyes will at length be opened to their dictates. Thus far the appeal has been in vain, and trade could only have been carried on in its accustomed channels under submission to pay tribute.

But it is denied that this refusal to carry on trade will have any beneficial effect at all, and it is said that it is withdrawing from the contest; that it is an abandonment of our rights; that Great Britain was struggling for the trade of the world, and we have relinquished it to her. What does this trade consist in, sir? The trade with us is cut off, and consequently, through us, with her enemies. She may trade to some of her own dependencies and back again, and to Spain and Portugal, if they are not yet overwhelmed by the victorious arms of the usurper; and to that extent only can she go. But gentlemen say, remove the embargo and all will be well—we can trade. Sir, honest men are restrained from trading by respect for their own and their country's honor; and it is our duty to restrain those who disregard all such considerations. Shall we submit and trade? Is trade to be purchased on such terms as these? Were these sentiments fostered for a moment during the period of our Revolution? No, sir. If the fathers of the Revolution, many of whom are still living, had sat them down and calculated the profit and loss in a pecuniary view of resisting the threepenny tax on tea, they would have lost the opportunity of performing those glorious exploits which are recorded in the page of history, and gave birth to a nation.

But it is said by gentlemen, that we may trade to the West Indies, and a proposition to that effect was laid on the table by a gentleman from North Carolina, now absent from his seat, (Mr. SAWYER.) Apropos, comes intimation that the trade is blockaded by an order, unquestionably issued under the circumstances referred to by my colleague yesterday, under an expectation that the embargo would be raised, and our commerce be flowing into those ports.

Others say, let us trade to Spain. Spain may be, and in all human probability is, by this time, a conquered country; for whether one party or the other prevails, the Spanish kingdom loses its independence. Look at the late capitulation between the British and French in Portugal. It was not a surrender made to the Portuguese, for whom the British were nominally fighting, but to the British themselves. They came not as allies, but as conquerors; each party is contending for the supremacy, and manifests a disposition to maintain it when acquired. But gentlemen say, let us carry on a trade to aid the Spanish patriots; let us extend to those struggling for liberty the same assistance which we sought for in the struggle for our independence. I warn gentlemen against the imposition. The Spaniards are fighting for a monarch who has transferred them to another, like a flock of sheep. There is a little patriotism to be sure in fighting for a King of their own choice; but it is not a patriotism to enlist the sensibilities of such a people as this in their favor. They are fighting for one King against another; and though I participate in the feeling which others profess, and wish that they should have a choice of despots, yet I will not interfere in any manner between Great Britain and France, who are contending for the empire there. If we were to trade to Spain, it would be the ne plus ultra allowed by Great Britain, who would there receive our domestic produce, and furnish her manufacturers in return. Remember that we are contesting her monopoly of the trade of the world, and there we should surrender it. The principle would hold good if the trade were confined to the West Indies. Great Britain would there receive the products of this country, and we hers in return. We might as well permit them to take our produce at the mouth of the Chesapeake; and, indeed, it would not be a great extension of the principle contended for, if we were to allow her to establish a custom-house, and appoint collectors of duty in every seaport town in the Union.

By continuing the embargo, we can prepare to defend our towns. The fires lighted up in Copenhagen are scarcely extinguished; they are yet glowing before us, in imagination at least; and we ought to recollect that, if we do not submit, it is war; if we do submit, it is tribute. And, if we have war, our towns will share the fate of fortified Copenhagen, unless we strengthen and fortify them. First, let us prepare to defend ourselves. Gentlemen say, defence is not resistance. Let us prepare to defend ourselves, sir, and then we will be better able to resist and attack our enemies.

But we are told that the system is ruinous. If we become bankrupts in money, sir, we shall be sound in honor; and if we carry on trade without adopting stronger measures, we shall be bankrupts in fortune and reputation also. We
